Mr. Fane: I received a call at 12:30 to say our president, Mr. Hargrove, could not be here today. I took the two o'clock flight from Toronto. I am certain our organization, if invited, would attend in respect to both the House of Commons and the Senate.

Senator Prud'homme: I am glad that the Senate, at least, is taking this time. I am very happy that you appeared in the Senate.

The Chairman: Thank you, honourable senators, that concludes the period for questions. On your behalf, I thank Mr. Fane for appearing here this afternoon on such short notice.

Senator Prud'homme: While we are waiting for the next witness, can our distinguished house leader give us an update at this time?

Senator Graham: If I may, Mr. Chairman, the House of Commons has just finished a series of votes on supply; votes with which the honourable senator would be acquainted from his long experience in the other place. They have gone into private members' hour. As a result, we have nothing new to report with respect to any deliberations which may be taking place in relation to the progress of the legislation.

Senator Prud'homme: Do I understand, then, that debate is concluded for today on this bill in the other chamber?

Senator Graham: To quote a well-known baseball legend, "It's not over till it's over."

The Chairman: Honourable senators, our next witnesses are Mr. Terry W. Ivany, President and Chief Executive Officer of VIA Rail. He is accompanied by Mr. Mike Gushue, Vice-President of Public Affairs.

Mr. Terry W. Ivany, President and CEO, VIA Rail: Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, I am delighted to be here to help you, if I can, in your deliberations. The government's decision to legislate the parties back to work means, first, that we can resume our service and start serving our customers again. This is obviously good news for our customers.

As well, I must tell you that I have not really given up on the collective bargaining process.

I would now like to give you the background about what brings me here today. VIA Rail's collective agreements all expired on December 31, 1993. Since then, VIA Rail and its unions have been subject to various stages of conciliation as provided for under the Canada Labour Code. For a number of reasons, we have been unable to conclude a new collective agreement. However, we have made a very determined effort, and I believe we have come very close to signing an agreement with at least one of our major unions.

During this process, we had the report of Mr. Hope. Subsequent to the delivery of that report to the minister, the various unions were in a strike position, and VIA Rail was in a position to either lock out its employees or to promulgate rules, none of which we chose to do then because we felt it would have a detrimental impact on the ongoing negotiations.

As we all know, VIA operates over CP and CN track. When CP operations were curtailed by strike or lockout earlier this month, it had very little effect on VIA because 95 per cent of VIA Rail's operations are on CN tracks.

However, the strike by the BLEUTU meant that VIA Rail had no choice but to shut down its operations. That took place last Saturday, and we had to decide what to do about the rest of our employees at that time, particularly the CAW workers.

We had several options at that time: We could have locked out the employees, or we could have asked them to come to work, although we had no work for them to do. We were still confident that we could make progress on a collective agreement, so we chose the route of laying off the CAW, as opposed to locking them out.

At this point, I would like to acknowledge the successful efforts of VIA's management employees to get passengers to their destinations, especially given the fact we had three hours' notice of the strike from the unions. I can successfully or happily report that we have no passengers stranded at VIA, nor did we on the day the strike began.

This was obviously not an easy feat. VIA's operations stretch from coast to coast, Halifax to Victoria. If I may give you an idea of the nature of VIA's network, VIA serves and operates 421 trains weekly over 14,000 kilometres of track to over 400 communities nation-wide. This network carries more than 3.6 million passengers per year. In 1994, some $508 million were necessary to provide these services of which $176 million came from passengers in the form of revenues; the rest came from public subsidy. Today, VIA has been asked to reduce its subsidy by $145 million annually, which effectively will be incremental over the next three years.

Many of you may recall that when VIA was asked to meet these challenges, there was a great deal of speculation about the size and restructuring of our routes or, putting it bluntly, route cuts. Quite frankly, I preferred to take quite a different approach to that particular challenge. In turn, I asked all my managers to look at ways of cutting costs within the organization. To date I can report that we have identified at least $40 million a year of costs to come out of the organization. I should also report that 45 per cent of our administrative costs have been reduced this year. We have cut our administrative overload by 45 per cent this year.

We have identified many other areas of cost reduction. However, we are certainly not there. Yet over the next four years, we will have a shortfall of $110 million. The commitment of our employees to cut costs, to aggressively market our services and to increase the level of service to our customers will certainly help us meet this gap. In today's economic environment and with the challenges that VIA has to meet, it is impossible to meet this gap without restructuring and modernizing our collective agreements.

In this respect, as was indicated by Conciliation Commissioner Hope, the situation in which VIA finds itself in the current round of collective bargaining is very different from that of the two other companies. Mr. Hope said to me that VIA is as different from the freight railways as manufacturing is from the trucking companies.

Even after the annual funding reduction of $145 million referred to previously, VIA will still require a federal subsidy of over $200 million annually. As labour constitutes 45 per cent of VIA's cost, we cannot reach our goal without modernizing the collective agreements. In this respect, we believe we can no longer afford to pay employees full salaries for life, whether or not we have work for them, pay our engineers and conductors by the mile rather than by the hour, pay some employees for 40 hours of work when they may work as few as 20 hours, and pay four employees to change a fuel pump when only two are required to do the job. On the other hand, we are determined to pay our employees a fair day's wages for a fair day's work.

I would like to remind you that no one in this process has been asked to take a cut in pay. VIA is committed to being a high-quality, low-cost transportation service. I have confidence in the collective bargaining process. I especially hope the process in the bill will take VIA's distinctive financial and operational realities into account.

Honourable senators, we believe our employees deserve fair and reasonable protection from change. I believe that the best job security we can provide to employees is to work hard to get costs down, to serve our customers well, and to create a strong and viable passenger service for this country.

Honourable senators, those are my opening remarks. We would be very happy to answer any questions you may have.

[ Mr. Ivany ]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I have a few questions regarding VIA so that I can properly understand its position in the major problem we are facing. Does VIA pay the same wage scales for the same jobs as the other two railroads? There is no differentiation?

Mr. Ivany: Yes.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Is VIA attempting to break away from the industry wage pattern and claim that given its precarious financial situation, it should pay lesser wages?

Mr. Ivany: No. As I said in my opening statement, senator, we are not, in any way, asking employees to receive less money. We believe we are different. I think we are different in many ways. For instance, we are not in the business of transporting grain, cars, concentrate or any of these commodities. We are in the business of moving passengers in a very different marketplace than the other two railways find themselves. We are certainly not asking people to take any less money in this process.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Mr. Hope was quite hard on VIA in his report, at least in the paragraphs I want to quote to you. He says:

> As stated, there is no likelihood of a negotiated settlement between VIA Rail and the Unions, and it seems most unlikely that strike action on the Railway would induce a settlement.

According to Mr. Hope, you and the unions have come to an absolute impasse and you need legislation or arbitration to get things cranked up again.

Mr. Ivany: Mr. Hope looked at a particular situation and a particular environment at a particular point in time. We have clauses in our collective agreement today that perhaps the two railway unions would find attractive for their particular circumstances, while we do not find them that attractive for our particular circumstances. There was some caution on the part of the unions not to make a deal at VIA prior to any deal with the other two railways, primarily because such a deal would set a floor that they would not want to set.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Mr. Hope goes on to say:

> Further, VIA made it clear in the Commission proceedings that it had no interest in any subsequent process for resolving disputes with its Unions. It is reasonable to predict that, as soon as it is free to do so, VIA will unilaterally impose some or all of the changes in the expired collective agreements that it has pursued unsuccessfully collective bargaining.

Mr. Ivany: Our focus was on the process in place at that particular time. Commissioner Hope was probably right in understanding our position in terms of focusing on the collective bargaining process.

You must bear in mind that we were negotiating at that time. I was not in any way preoccupied with a subsequent process. My focus was on the existing process, which was to reach a collective agreement with our unions.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Mr. Hope points out that VIA is better off financially on strike than it is operating and, therefore, the Government of Canada would be financially in a less liable position if a strike at VIA continues indefinitely. That is a rather crude way of looking at the issue, but this is an important report. He says:

> VIA Rail is in the unique position of having nothing to lose by taking that initiative. The strike, as stated, would improve its financial condition by limiting the operational losses it incurs. Conversely, if Parliament were to intervene and order an interest arbitration or other third party process, VIA would be in a position to seek government support...

My point is this: How much government involvement is there in VIA's negotiations? Is the Minister of Transport, for one, influencing you in your negotiations with the unions?

Mr. Ivany: You are absolutely correct in pointing out that Mr. Hope said we could save $1 million a day, or whatever the number was. That is a crude way to put it.

Quite frankly, senator, my ambition here and my great desire is to be operating our trains today, not sitting and saving this so-called $1 million a day. If we were saving that amount, it is a one-time saving, and that is not what we are interested in. I am much more interested in operating our trains and serving our customers.

We are unusual in that we receive a subsidy. When we strike, we reduce our subsidy. However, in the long term, I am not sure that will be the case because we will lose customers. It will be difficult to get them back. Therefore, given this interruption in our service, I think there will be revenue shortfalls in the future. There is no benefit to be gained by the railway being down. We want to operate, get back into business do the things we are good at doing. We are in control of our own destiny on the collective bargaining process.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: How much of your current problem is inherited as a result of the creation of VIA, and how much is of your own making? Mr. Tellier said today that employment security was a bad decision by management — in hindsight, of course. In the case of VIA Rail, was that a conscious decision taken by VIA, or did it inherit that situation when VIA was created?

Mr. Ivany: We all inherited certain things.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I understand VIA is a merger of employees of both major rail lines.

Mr. Ivany: Most of our employees came from CN, and most of the collective agreements we have today are a migration as well. I think that was a different time, a different environment, and a different set of circumstances. I am sure everyone at the time thought that was a good deal. My concern is that these particular agreements are not really in sync with the environment that we find ourselves in today.

Senator Kinsella: In how many collective agreements is VIA Rail involved with the unions?

Mr. Ivany: We have a collective agreement process now with CAW, which looks after our shop craft people, and also our on-board train people and our off-train people. We have the TCU and the BLE and the UTU, which is the locomotive engineers and the conductors.

Senator Kinsella: Is that eight collective agreements?

Mr. Ivany: And BMWE.

Senator Kinsella: How many collective agreements are there?

Mr. Ivany: That would be eight.

Senator Kinsella: How close are you to settling any one of those eight?

Mr. Ivany: I think we came very close to some kind of deal with the TCU, the BLE and the UTU.

Senator Kinsella: There are two collective agreements you could probably conclude. Are you continuing to negotiate on the two on which you are very close? Are you maintaining relations with the negotiators?

Mr. Ivany: Yes. We have indicated to the CAW verbally that we are ready, any place, at any time. Today we officially sent notification letters and invited them back to the bargaining table. We have not given up that process.

Senator Kinsella: That is good. If this legislation is passed, do you think you can finish those, notwithstanding the legislation?

Mr. Ivany: I have predicted the outcome of these negotiations for the past 18 months, and I have been wrong just about every time.

Senator Bryden: Mr. Ivany, I appreciate what you are saying. I wish to restrict this to simply asking for some information. You indicated that you are trying to gain efficiencies in not just the salaries for life, which the previous witness indicated may be a misnomer, but also in getting the efficiencies to pay by the hour instead of miles for your running operators, and to pay 20 hours if, in fact, the work takes 20 hours instead of the 40 that is required in the collective agreement.

Finally, the one you mentioned was that if a pump can be changed by two employees, it should not be necessary for four to be paid, simply because the agreement calls for that.

Is it not the case that this is the same type of issue faced by many major industries that have historical collective bargaining processes, from the pulp and paper industry to the refining process, and so on?

Mr. Ivany: I would suggest that maybe the last two would be such, that is, the maintenance of ways and the craft flexibility. The other one, which is a very major issue with VIA, is this method of pay for locomotive engineers and conductors.

Many years ago, when the railways started, they had steam engines. From my boyhood in Newfoundland, I can remember the steam engine rolling through. It was called a "Newfie bullet."

It used to take a very long time to go across the island because a steam engine certainly did not go very fast. It was thought to be appropriate that they would pay people by the mile at that time. Steam engines would get maybe 10 to 15 miles per hour on a good day, going downhill.

However, today our trains travel at 100 miles an hour. There is a possibility today for a locomotive engineer to earn as much as $75,000 to $85,000 and work as little as 20 hours per week. We do not want to take any money away from that particular person, but we would like to increase the number of hours that that person would work. That is the method of pay situation. The other two, as I said, are very common today, such as maintenance of ways and the craft flexibility.

Senator Bryden: You referenced the Newfie bullet. I recall the days when steam engines used to go through a town close to my home town, and there used to be a fireman on the locomotives. Is it not the case that there used to be a term that went with trying to get rid of firemen that was called the feather-bedding of the railroad unions? Is the pay for life a different kind of feather-bedding?

Mr. Ivany: I am not familiar with the term "feather-bedding." With respect to employment security, our particular company is somewhat different from the two other railways. You qualify for employment security after you have received four years of cumulative service. If you start out with our company when you are very young, I guess the day that you reach the fourth anniversary you should pop the champagne, because you have won the lottery. If you are paid for life, that would equate to about $1.3 or $1.4 million you had just received.

We have made quite a few suggestions on that particular aspect of our collective agreements. I am new to the railway industry, but I found it very interesting, coming into a unionized environment, that employment security is not applied on a seniority basis, which is really the basis under which unions operate. What actually happens is that it is the younger person who goes home on employment security and the older folks who stay and have to work. That is how it works in our particular company.

Senator Bryden: What is the reason for that?

Mr. Ivany: I have tried to figure that out, and I cannot. I have talked to many of our employees about that. If you talk to the younger people, they think it is okay. If you are talking to the more senior people in our company, they do not think too much of it.

The other area is the shop craft people. The people who work in our major centres require eight years of cumulative service to qualify for employment security.

Senator Oliver: My question is an extension of the questions which were put to you by Senator Kinsella. I should like to tie your response to him to specific clauses of the bill that is before the House of Commons.

• (1830)

Those clauses specify that the matters referred to the mediation-arbitration commission would be matters that, at the time of the commission's establishment, remain in dispute. What is your opinion as to the likelihood of coming to an agreement on these matters — that is, the currently unresolved issues — before the commission can be established? Is there any hope?

Mr. Ivany: Senator, I came here today reconciled to the fact that there is no hope that reasonable people can agree on a solution to a problem that we all identify. Our unions have told us that they recognize that VIA has some very different challenges as compared with the other two railways.

The environment in which we tried to make a particular settlement was not conducive. I am hoping that our friends in the union will now see that they can make a collective bargain with our organization and get on with doing the things that we want to do, which is to serve our customers well, develop a high-quality, low-cost operation of which we can all be proud. Hopefully, we can be in operation for many years to come and provide lots of employment for our people and for Canadians. I never give up. We will keep trying to come to some terms on this until we have something, whether it is through this process or some other.

Senator Oliver: Are you in agreement with the form of arbitration-mediation commission that is set forth in the bill? If not, have you tried to effect any changes or amendments in the House of Commons or its committee?

Mr. Ivany: First, we believe in the collective bargaining process. I would be less than candid if I told you that we are happy with what is happening. We are not. We do not like being out of operation; we like to operate. We want to make a collective agreement with our unions by agreeing amongst ourselves. If everything else fails, this particular process is the best that one can come up with.

Senator Comeau: I am not as familiar with VIA Rail's employment security provisions as I am with the other ones. Therefore, I may be off base on my approach to this question. My understanding is that in the past certain bargaining units conceded pay raises, or portions of pay raises, in order to achieve employment security as protection against technological and operational changes in the future. In other words, they paid premiums for this insurance. I understand that the rail companies are now saying, "You have paid this premium for all these years, but we are not prepared to honour the proceeds of the insurance."

Mr. Tellier seemed not at all concerned that they were prepared to dishonour the insurance policy for which these people had been paying. In your role as president of VIA Rail, are you comfortable with history recording that you did not honour this kind of commitment made by your predecessors?

Mr. Ivany: You talked about the fact that at one point in time this employment security measure was negotiated. Obviously, it was done in good faith because everyone agreed to it. The other interesting thing about negotiations and contracts — and I have been in a couple — is that on occasion both the company and the unions like to place a termination date on the contract. It could be a two-year contract or a three-year contract. One of the reasons I have always wanted that — and I think it is probably the same with the unions — is that they want to renegotiate and renegotiate because things have changed. The environment has changed. Prices have gone up. Prices have gone down.

In this particular case, people are saying that we are dishonouring the contract because we want to change something through the collective bargaining process. That is what it is all about. That is why we have termination dates on contracts.

With respect to whether we have honoured our commitments, I can assure you that we have honoured employment security. We can provide you with numbers in the millions of dollars which, over the past years, we have paid. We are honouring it today.

I take exception, senator, when it is said that if I change this agreement today, then I am dishonouring the process. I do not think so.

Senator Comeau: I suppose I might have used Mr. Tellier's example. He indicated to us that he was not prepared to even grandfather the provisions under which these people had been paying over the past eight or nine years. What you are suggesting to me is that for those people who have been paying the premiums up to now you are prepared to honour this insurance contract, but that what you want is a new contract for the future, which is something quite different from what Mr. Tellier stated.

Mr. Ivany: I am not saying that. I am saying that in a collective bargaining process there are termination dates on contracts. When you agree on a new contract, that is when it applies.

About this collective bargaining process, I have heard people talk about new entrants. They call them "new babies." They say that no new babies are to be involved in employment security. I am not saying that I am prepared to do any grandfathering. I am saying that in the new collective agreements that we reach, these are the new rules that apply. They apply to everyone.

Senator Comeau: You are simply prepared to tell those people who have paid the premiums over the years, "Too bad. You made a mistake some years ago. Your bargaining unit made some mistakes some years ago. You paid those premiums over the years, but too bad."

Mr. Ivany: I am not familiar with the so-called premiums people have paid. There was a point in time when a collective agreement was negotiated. All the parties agreed to it. The contents of that particular collective agreement have been honoured by the companies. They have been participated in by the employees up to this point in time. We are now in a different environment. Some of the measures that we have in the collective agreements in force today are not in sync with today's reality. I believe that if a settlement can be negotiated, then these are the rules that will apply. I assume that if it is negotiated, then it is agreed to by all the parties. Everyone will accept it.

Senator Andreychuk: You said that you are committed to the collective bargaining process. Do you think that clause 12 and this back-to-work legislation process will help you in long-term collective bargaining with the unions with which you deal?

Mr. Ivany: If clause 12 helps VIA to survive, then obviously I believe it will help our employees. It will help the environment in which we will operate in the future.

Senator Andreychuk: That is the whole point. Do you believe that clause 12 will help you survive?

Mr. Ivany: I think clause 12 is recognition of the environment in which we find ourselves today. Without it, our survival is in jeopardy.

Senator Andreychuk: Why do you believe that a commission would not of its own accord take into account all the aspects that are contained in clause 12? What makes clause 12 so unique and so valuable to you?

Mr. Ivany: In our particular case, we have a shortfall of $110 million. That has to be taken into consideration by someone. We have done a considerable amount ourselves to reduce our costs. It has not affected the salary of anyone in our organization. It has not affected employment security, method of pay or the maintenance of wages. We have done this on our own. We have cut administrative and management costs by 45 per cent. We have found other efficiencies in the organization. What we are now saying is that we still need more help. We believe that modernizing our collective agreements to reflect today's environment will help us to achieve that particular deficiency in our funding.

Senator Andreychuk: Are you saying that since the inception of VIA Rail management has not looked at the economic viability of their company when approaching the bargaining tables?

Mr. Ivany: I have absolutely no interest in reflecting on the quality of management, or lack thereof, in the past. I am concerned about today's environment. Today's environment is a very competitive environment. In VIA's particular case, we have a considerable financial challenge ahead of us to fit the financial envelope that has been applied to us if we are to survive.

As I started to say, one of the easy ways to do that is to cut the network. Of course that affects hundreds of people, hundreds of employees, and hundreds of passengers and communities across the country. We chose to approach it in a different way. We believe in a fair day's pay for a fair day's work. There is nothing wrong with that. It is not complicated. It is very straightforward.

In terms of efficiencies, we have been able to gain through things we have taken upon ourselves with respect to processes and bureaucracy, and cutting waste wherever we can. We have made some progress. That $40 million adds up to $160 million over the next four years. We are still short $110 million. We must find that somewhere, or we have to make some very serious decisions about our structure.

Senator Andreychuk: Prior to this legislation being drafted, had you had discussions with the government on similar needs for these kinds of guidelines?

Mr. Ivany: I would have to be absolutely candid with you that our desire and all of our energy has been focused on the collective bargaining process. Whenever we talked to anyone, and I think we have talked to some people in this chamber, we made it clear that our "druthers" were to continue the collective bargaining process. As I answered one senator before on a question about whether I was interested in some other process, our focus is on collective bargaining. That is where we stay.

Senator Andreychuk: Am I to interpret from that answer that there have never been any discussions between yourselves as managers of VIA Rail and government officials that should an impasse come, you needed the protections that you believe clause 12 gives you?

Mr. Ivany: I never discussed clause 12 with anyone.

Senator Andreychuk: Did you discuss a similar concept?

Mr. Ivany: I am saying that if it came to this kind of process which Mr. Hope has suggested, which is basically what it is, we thought that we would like to be treated separately and apart from the other two railways. We believe we are distinct and different from the other railways in our makeup, in terms of our funding and in terms of the kinds of things that we must do for the Canadian public. Certainly we have discussed that.

Senator Andreychuk: Would you be able to give me an objective standard of the issues in clause 12? How would you define your viability coast-to-coast, short term and long term? Do you have some sort of markers that a commissioner would be able to use, other than the bottom line, as you put it?

Mr. Ivany: I find it very difficult to answer your question. In terms of passenger service, I do not think any passenger service in the world pays its own way, with one or two exceptions. Canada is a very large country. The government has decided, up to this point in time, that it wants a national passenger service. In order to provide that, because of the demographics, distances and population involved, it is necessary to subsidize it to a certain degree.

In our organization, we have been trying very hard to reduce waste and cost wherever we can find it, and we have had a high degree of success up to this point in time. We are not finished yet. As part of that process, we think we should modernize our collective agreements. If you want a description of viability, it will be up to anyone who wants to interrupt it what viability means to VIA. In terms of what we are striving for, it is to fit within the financial envelope that has been given to us by the government. That is our viability.

Senator Prud'homme: If we were to strike out clause 12, does the bill then become useless for you?

Mr. Ivany: We did not ask for clause 12.

Senator Prud'homme: I did not imply that.

Mr. Ivany: If we have to have this kind of process, I think clause 12 is obviously very important to us.

The Chairman: On behalf of the committee, I thank you both, Mr. Ivany and Mr. Gushue, for appearing and answering our questions this afternoon.

Our next witnesses are Mr. George Hucker, Vice-president and National Legislative Representative of the International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. With him is Mr. Tim Secord. Please proceed.

Mr. Tim Secord, Legislative Director, United Transportation Union: Members of the Senate, first and foremost I thank you for having the wisdom and the fortitude to allow us to come here and speak today on this issue. Hopefully, through our presentation we will be able to answer your questions, or at least most of them. I believe the Senate has been provided a copy of our written submission, and I will read from that text, if I may.

We welcome the opportunity to appear before the Senate to present our views on some of the important issues which we believe have resulted in a strike by railway workers in Canada, and to present our position with respect to amendments that are required to the back-to-work legislation, Bill C-77, the Maintenance of Railway Operations Bill, 1995.

This submission is on behalf of the approximately 15,000 members of the Canadian Council of Railway Operating Unions, the two components of which are the United Transportation Union and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. We represent highly trained and skilled men and women across Canada and the United States — conductors, locomotive engineers and the train and yard service employees who operate the freight and passenger trains.

Of course we would have preferred to have appeared before the Senate or another government body under different conditions to discuss other pressing issues in the railway industry and not the current labour dispute. The rail strike is a manifestation of these other pressing issues. While we recognize the focus of the moment is the rail strike, these other considerations must be addressed.

In our submission we have been as brief as possible in presenting a background to the rail negotiations, a description of the perception of interference by Transport Minister Young, the railway agenda and their demands and last, but not least, our concerns with the proposed legislation.

Railway negotiations, as many of you know, have a long history and are most often extremely complicated. The two component unions of the CCROU have been about involved in railway negotiations and representation of railway and bus employees on all railways in Canada and the United States for over 100 years. The collective agreements in effect for running trades employees are extensive and have been carefully constructed over this period of time through the traditional exchange and accommodation of collective bargaining. Indeed, some of the conditions of employment contained in the collective agreements were obtained through a similar binding arbitration process to the one you are considering in the proposed legislation that will be before you.

Our pay systems in the industry have evolved over a 75-year period in this give-and-take bargaining process. Above all, these systems of pay, and any tinkering therewith, is a most sensitive issue as the focus of these many years of negotiations and gains made for accommodations for the railways has been directed to building on these provisions. In other words, many of the unions' gains made over the years are in the pay systems "basket," and now the railways want the basket. If that were not difficult enough to address, the railways are using the federal government to do their bidding through the auspices of Transport Minister Young. We will comment later in our submission on this matter.

Nevertheless, provided there is a degree of fairness and logic, our organizations and our members have always accepted and dealt with change in the rail industry. We will continue to do so. Since the 1950s, for example, we have negotiated a reduction in the size of a crew on a freight train from five to two employees. Our bargaining unit was reduced by over 10,000 members in Canada. It is obvious from our record that we do not resist change without serious justification.

Over that same period, the length of freight trains has increased to the point where many are over one-mile long. This, in combination with the handling of increasing levels of dangerous commodities, and higher train speeds, has increased the responsibility of locomotive engineers, conductors and train and yard service employees.

In our last round of negotiations, the railways were provided the ability to operate crews with just a conductor and a locomotive engineer. This represents huge continuing productivity gains for the railways, saving the wages of at least one and sometimes two employees on every freight train. This was done in exchange for an increase in pay rates and a degree of lay-off protection. At CN Rail the lay-off protection is referred to as "furlough boards" and at CP Rail it is in the form of a "sub-benefit" plan. The pattern for these agreements came from the U.S. collective agreements and their crew consist reductions.

In passenger rail service, we dealt with many changes, including crew size reductions, even before VIA Rail was created by the federal government in 1978. Since VIA Rail, we have addressed through negotiations many other changes, including major service reductions by the federal government and further crew size reductions. All these changes have provided tremendous productivity improvements to that railway.

Our concern is that at both CN and VIA Rail these gains are being wasted by an inept and excessive management structure, all of which is supported by the federal government. The real freight and passenger transportation problems will never be addressed so long as the federal government fails to address the disease rather than the symptom of that disease.

This is clearly not the time or place for negotiations or submissions on the contentious issues in the rail negotiations. Therefore, we have confined our remarks to a broad overview, which will be evidence of the monumental and, perhaps, impossible task facing the parties in this round of discussions.

At the VIA Rail bargaining table there are two monumental issues still not resolved. Each by itself is considered by the most novice labour relations practitioners as next to impossible to gain membership ratification or support. The two railway demands are to change the pay systems for locomotive engineers, conductors and assistant conductors from a mileage/hourly rated system to a purely hourly rated system. For the bargaining unit of the United Transportation Union, there will be a further crew consist reduction from two to one employee on every passenger train. For your information, this latter demand, if implemented, will leave the conductor alone to handle the safety of the train and passengers.

The men and women who operate the rail passenger service in Canada are highly trained, dedicated employees who operate under extremely demanding and stressful conditions. Passenger trains in the corridor operate at 100 miles per hour over numerous public crossings and through numerous train order speed restrictions and other work directives. A single error, as you all know, can result in serious damage to the public and fellow employees. Few, if any, technological safety advances have been implemented in rail passenger service in Canada.

The impact of this first pay system demand is to reduce two bargaining units by a minimum of 25 per cent. We previously referred to the complications and sensitivity of the pay system issue. Even if membership acceptance could be gained for the implementation of this demand, the effect of this one change will modify to a greater or lesser degree almost every provision of the existing collective agreement in force.

This has been the focus of the unions during our long history of collective bargaining and is the very foundation of our members' agreements. The dual system of pay, arbitraries, initial and final terminal time and other pay increments have been built and relied upon over years of collective bargaining.

For your information, the current mileage/hourly system of pay restricts, for safety considerations, the amount of work that can be performed by a passenger train crew to 4,800 and 6,450 miles per month respectively for the locomotive engineer, conductor and assistant conductor. This is similar in many ways to the hours on duty restrictions in effect for airline pilots. This aforementioned demand, in combination with the railway demand to reduce the size of the train crew from two to one employee, reduces the bargaining unit of the United Transportation Union by almost 75 per cent.

In respect to the issue of crew consist reductions, aside from the serious safety considerations with respect to on-board emergencies and, of course, the safety of the passengers, the second issue has the effect of reducing the bargaining unit of the UTU by a further 45 per cent to 50 per cent, moving from two employees on a passenger train to just a conductor. The recent fire on a passenger train outside Toronto is a clear indication of the need for train employees.

With respect to CP Rail and CN Rail issues, without getting into any great detail regarding these negotiations, we can confirm that the demands have almost equal implications on our membership at the freight railways. It should be noted that the railways are reporting profits we predicted, and these profits will increase. The railways are making profits in spite of recent unusual and huge capital outlays, such as the purchase of locomotives. CP Rail doubled its order for high horsepower locomotives from General Electric for a total outlay of $200 million. In addition to that is the construction of the Sarnia Tunnel and the writedown of the employee buyouts as a result of 10,000 unionized employees being laid off.

In regard to the negotiations, just one of the railway demands, if successful, will reduce employee earnings by approximately 25 per cent. That demand is to have the freight train crew work the first and the last one hour and 30 minutes without compensation. Other demands are to double the length of the crew runs, "run throughs," across Canada with a significant reduction in employment and the elimination of the right of fatigued employees to take rest, and the requirement to remain on duty 12 hours instead of 10.

The gains made by way of tradeoffs in the previous crew consist reductions are also on the table, with the railways seeking to eliminate job protections and force long-service employees, on short notice, to locations across the country. An employee with layoff protection in the province of Quebec could be forced to take employment in Vancouver. This will, of course, reduce costs and most likely force employees who now have job protect benefits to resign rather than suffer the cultural shock of the move. There are, of course, many other concessionary demands on the table which the parties have not been able, or have not been given the opportunity, at CP Rail, to reasonably address.

With respect to government interference, one single controversial issue has daunted the negotiators at all the bargaining tables and deserves comment, for we believe that this has been the one single, prevailing factor that has prevented any of the parties from reaching a settlement. You are likely aware that, throughout the discussions, Transport Minister Young has interfered with the bargaining process by way of inflammatory comments to the news media and to any group that would listen. It appeared that each time we were at an important juncture of the sensitive negotiations, including the conciliation process, Mr. Young would make provocative statements which, quite frankly, appeared to us to be an attempt to scuttle our negotiators' ability to reach an agreement. His comments soured the tone of several of our bargaining sessions and ensured that the membership's attitudes were completely negative and resistant to change.

For example, at the beginning of one critical bargaining session with VIA Rail at Toronto, the union's negotiating committee was greeted with the headline in The Toronto Star, "Employees work 5 hours for 3 days pay." At the time of a meeting of the WESTAC Group in Winnipeg, he made another uncalled-for comment suggesting that the contracts could be blamed on the educational levels of the union negotiators. These comments resulted in the union officers present there from WESTAC walking out of that meeting.

Even during the Hope Conciliation Commission process, we were greeted by a headline in the Montreal Gazette of Friday, January 13, 1995, at Section D, page 8, which read: "Minister critical of VIA's lifetime jobs." His comments prior to this session are irresponsible. You might be interested to know that the Hope Commission report acknowledged that there was, in fact, interference in the negotiations, and that this likely had an impact on the outcome.

Now that railway workers are on strike and the impact of the issues and his interference has crystallized, the officers of the labour unions are left to struggle with a deep animosity toward the Liberal government which Mr. Young's interference created. That resentment will no doubt be directed to the federal government in other ways, perhaps as early the Parti Québécois sovereignty referendum vote.

The issues at the bargaining table are driven by other considerations which must, in our view, be addressed as a public policy measure. First, we believe that notwithstanding the result of the negotiations, there should be a full-scale industrial relations inquiry into the rail transportation industry. This, in our view, should encompass all aspects of the industry and not just labour relations.

The railways' problems with respect to improving profits encompass much more than concessions at the bargaining table. In our view, this is simply a smoke screen for poor management. Many things must be done to improve profits. Restructuring to reduce the excess trackage is clearly one major consideration. In this regard, we have recently been working with the railways in order to assist in this problem and, at the same time, save as many jobs as possible. The negotiation of the Northern Quebec Internal Shortline, with vastly changed working conditions, is one example.

Recent investments and marketing of CN North America and CP Rail bring the Canadian railways into the same traffic densities of U.S. Class I carriers and ultimately the same economies of scale. This will, of course, improve the profit picture, but the downside is possibly a loss of jobs to Canadians. Nevertheless, the expansion into the denser markets of the U.S. and the improving and sustained growth in the Canadian economy and traffic that is now being experienced will quickly eliminate the rationale for many of the issues at the bargaining table.

In our view, labour relations at VIA and CN Rail have deteriorated, and this will result in more serious problems in the future. This should be addressed immediately. Fueling this situation is, of course, poor management, the bargaining atmosphere and the continuing perception that there is excessive management at both CN and VIA Rail, either on staff or contract, and that profits are reduced as a result. We believe this is more than a perception and that this aspect should be investigated and addressed by the government.

Bill C-77, on the surface, appears to call for our return to work at all railways and sets up a mediation/arbitration process and binding arbitration. Our concerns and modifications sought in the proposed legislation are explained below.

As originally feared, VIA Rail may not be included. The clause of the bill which deals with CN Rail, clause 24, stipulates that it shall:

> ...come into force on expiration of the twelfth hour after the time at which this Act is assented to.

In contrast, the comparable clause of the bill which deals with VIA Rail Canada Incorporated and CP Rail reads as follows:

> This Part and Schedule...shall come into force on a day and at an hour to be fixed by order of the Governor in Council.

The reference is to clauses 46 and 68 of the bill.

It is my understanding that two amendments have gone through the committee of the House of Commons which address our concerns in that regard.

To be clear, no part of the bill with respect to VIA Rail or CP Rail applies unless, and until, the government decides to implement the law. The previous experience of the shop craft unions was a delay of approximately five months prior to the implementation of the legislation, hence our concern with regard to those two previous clauses.

In addition to changing the above provisions of the bill, we are also working to exclude the "Guiding Principle" of the bill in clauses 12, 34 and 56 which reads as follows:

> Each Commission shall be guided by the need for terms and conditions of employment that are consistent with the economic viability and competitiveness of a coast-to-coast rail system in both the short and the long term, taking into account the importance of good labour-management relations.

These terms of reference are not typical of instructions to an arbitrator/commissioner, nor are they at all required. Arbitrators/commissioners, as a matter of course, consider and decide economic issues placed before them, and clearly do not need direction to do so. Putting a spotlight on this issue in the legislation is seen as yet another effort by the government to influence the decision of an arbitrator/commissioner against the employees.

Other concerns to improve the fairness of the process include the provision for union input into the selection of the chairperson, and requiring the commission to report back to Parliament before the imposition of the binding arbitration process.

We had the opportunity to listen to the previous witnesses and would like to comment on their evidence and answer any questions which may emanate from that.

Our latest experience with commissioners was in 1987. At that time, although the legislation conferred the authority upon the commissioner to look at every aspect, especially the financial accounts of the railways, the arbitrator had extreme difficulty getting both CN and CP Rail to open their books. We are obviously concerned that that could happen again.

I know that you want to ask us questions about clause 12. Our first choice with regard to that clause is to remove it in its entirety. Our second choice would be to remove clause 12 and replace it with clause 8(2)(b) of Bill C-74, the West Coast Ports Operations back-to-work legislation, which allowed the arbitrator the freedom to study all the issues rather than having his hands tied by the wording of the current clause 12.

Someone asked earlier about long-term solutions. The long-term solution which we envision is the assurance that the process provided for in Part I of the Labour Code is fulfilled with respect to collective bargaining without interference from the government or any of its ministers prior to the conclusion of that process.

The Canada Labour Code was amended two years ago. That amendment provided for final offer presentation when requested. In other words, the employer had the right to request that its final offer be submitted to the union's members for ratification.

Although it is not perfect, the Canada Labour Code has worked well since its inception with respect to collective bargaining. At this point in time, we do not necessarily have major concerns with that code. You must remember that the language contained in the code is not at fault with respect to this ongoing strike. What is at fault is the interference of the Minister of Transport and the employer's reliance on the legislative process this week.

That is the end of our submission. If you have any questions, we will do our best to answer them.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: This may come as a shock to you, Mr. Hucker and Mr. Secord, but you have a lot in common with certain senators in this chamber. We too have been victims of the Minister of Tranport's inflammatory statements over the last year. We know exactly how disruptive that approach to serious matters can be. I am glad to see we are in good company. I hope you feel the same way, and I hope your resolution is successful. I do not know what will happen in our situation.

With respect to the mileage system of pay, the representative of VIA Rail mentioned the case of an engineer who can earn up to $75,000 a year for only 20 hours of work a week. Is that a fair indication of how lucrative the old system of pay has become?

Mr. George Hucker, V.P., National Legislative Representative, International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers: The system of pay can be lucrative. However, to give you specifics on the issue Mr. Ivany raised is really difficult without considering a number of factors. For example, the run, the time of day and a myriad of other factors could impact the gross wage of a locomotive engineer and conductor. Yes, the system is lucrative. However, we have attempted to make changes to that system of pay and have been unsuccessful in having the employer look at changes.

During the 1986 round of negotiations, we asked the employer to come forward if it thought there was a better way of paying us. All it would take was a telephone call. I was chief negotiator for my union at that time. I am still waiting for the telephone call.

Problems negotiating a different pay structure have evolved over some 75 years. The current system has worked very well. If it had not worked well, my friend Rob Ritchie would be in this chamber bleeding all over the place about the need for change. That has not happened.

With respect to your question about a lucrative pay system based on the factors I have mentioned, I could not give you a "yes" or "no" answer.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We do not have time to get into particular details. I gather from what we heard this afternoon that there is a complete impasse between the employer and the employees. The Hope Commission report pretty well says that in the same terms.

Mr. Hucker: You are absolutely right. I served notice on the employer in October of 1993. My view was perhaps simplistic in thinking that we could negotiate. However, once we met with the Minister of Transport, we knew we would end up in this place. There was no way we could get any of the employers to believe that the end result would be a collective bargaining agreement. That is unfortunate. Every once in a while we get into rooms, bang each other on the sides of our heads, and end up asking someone to solve our problems for us. However, the majority of our history has been quite the contrary. In my 28-year career as a train conductor and locomotive engineer, I have been on strike three times. We do not have a long history of intransigence on either side of the table. We have looked at the problems in our industry and negotiated proper collective agreements. Having said that, it is awfully difficult when one of the interested parties ties both of your hands and then says, "Now we negotiate." It is not possible to negotiate in such an atmosphere.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: In your 28 years, you have seen a lot back-to-work legislation affect your industry. Would you say that this legislation favours the employer in a more obvious fashion?

I want to ensure that my thoughts are clearly expressed. I am not assuming that previous back-to-work legislation favoured one party or the other. We have been hearing, however, that clause 12 throws a real spanner into the works. It limits what the arbitrator can look at. Has that type of liability for the unions appeared in similar back-to-work legislation?

Mr. Secord: This is the first time we have ever seen such lopsided legislation in favour of the employer. Let me remind you that we have never seen it lopsided in favour of the union.

Someone mentioned the essential service concept.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Yes.

Mr. Secord: If CN were declared an essential service, would the government drop all of its plans to privatize the railway?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That question would have to be addressed to the government side.

I had that question as my last item for this first round. Would you at least look at the possibility of implementing an essential services policy in Canada so that at least basic services in essential industries in the private and public sectors can be provided during a strike? Instead of running six trains between Montreal and Toronto every day, you only run one. Then at least you have a minimum service. Unless the whole system of negotiation changes or attitudes — and sometimes personalities — change, we will be revisiting these back-to-work legislation sessions over and over again. We have had three in the last 13 months.

Mr. Secord: If the Minister of Transport and Paul Tellier had not stuck their noses into the collective bargaining process, we would not be here today. We would not be on strike. If VIA Rail had not been set up in 1978 to fail right from the start with 40 year-old equipment and wheelage rates charged by CN and CP, we would not have a problem at VIA Rail today. In fact, we would have many more trains in service.

With respect to your question, I certainly think that is an avenue for discussion. You asked whether we should look at an essential services concept. Again, if we are to have an essential service, perhaps we can have a trade-off. We will consider what you are asking if the government is prepared to talk to us about their plans for CN Rail.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We cannot get into that today.

Senator Kinsella: Do you recognize that in your industry there is a major public interest component?

• (1920)

Mr. Hucker: Yes, we do. We are the travelling public also. We are affected as well. I left Montreal yesterday. They are backlogging trains in the Port of Vancouver, not moving them, even though the CP operating crews that Tim and I represent, are still working. If that is the impact upon the travelling public, how do we get around it? We are prepared to look at some way of getting around it. Having said that, we must know where you are coming from in regards to essential services for the travelling public.

Senator Kinsella: Therefore, you recognize the duty that is placed upon us as parliamentarians to assist the public interest issue as is proposed by the government, and to scrutinize it. However, I too am astonished by the imprudence manifested by the Minister of Transport who has interfered, according to your testimony, with the collective bargaining process. He ought not to have interfered. He should be censured for having interfered. He should interfere as far as transportation policy is concerned and the public's right to have the public interest interpreted and protected. However, his interference has placed this issue under a whole different light.

You have our sympathy and understanding, and hopefully the Minister of Transport will learn from this experience to have greater custody of his tongue.

Clause 12 provides:

> Each Commission shall be guided by the need for terms and conditions of employment that are consistent with...

What if that was to read "Each Commission shall be guided by the need for terms and conditions of employment that may or may not be consistent with the economic viability and competitiveness"? What is harmful in having the commissions take into consideration, as a guiding principle, the economic viability and competitiveness? If you do not like that, you say what is the contradictory apposite of that, or at least what is the contrary apposite of that?

The contrary apposite of it would be that the commission would be guided by the need for terms and conditions of employment that may or may not be consistent with the economic viability and competitiveness. That would be, in my judgment, foolish. Therefore, if the contrary and the contradictory are foolish, then the apposite would be not foolish. Do you think there is any logic in what I seek, or are we all confused now?

Mr. Secord: I am glad you cleared that up for us. With respect to the verbiage that is used in the clause, we have never seen that verbiage before. If you used the term "may" or "may not," again, I think it is semantics, senator. I think it does not change the context of the verbiage.

If you look at that paragraph, after the comma where it says:

> ...and the long term, taking into account the importance of good labour-management relations.

> ...that is a real nice motherhood statement, but it means absolutely nothing in the context in which it is written.

Had that clause been changed to state, "...terms and conditions of employment taking into account the importance of good labour management relations," then talked about economic viability, it changes the whole context of what is there, because now the first priority is they must look at labour management issues before viability issues.

The word "viability" should be thrown out. It should state "economic justifiability." "Viability" is a completely different term than "justifiability." If they want to make an economic argument before the commissioner, then they should justify it. The arbitrator will take that into account because the economic side will be part of the employer's argument.

Senator Kinsella: On the matter of the model of arbitration that is provided for in Bill C-77, you made reference to final offer arbitration. Do you think that in your circumstances that would be a better approach?

Mr. Secord: I made reference to final offer presentation as it is referred to in Part I.

Senator Kinsella: What if the arbitration method was final offer arbitration?

Mr. Secord: That would be great for the company. Then they would never have to negotiate because they would always be able to rely on the arbitrator.

Mr. Hucker: Our long-term history has been collective bargaining with the employers. Our lucrative agreement is indicative of the fact that we have been very successful with them. We have also taken into consideration their economic viability at the bargaining table because they do put before us at the table what their status is in regard to their economic condition.

A great deal has been said about the fact that they are in competition with trucks and the U.S. carriers. In 1980 the Staggers Act changed railroading in the United States. Unfortunately the government in this country has not seen fit to do exactly the same thing in Canada, so the railways are no longer looked at as a utility and cannot pass their costs onto their customers.

However, when we come back to the bargaining table, Paul Tellier, Rob Ritchie and Terry Ivany will be saying that you must make the economic conditions part of the your collective agreement so there is a better bottom line.

Rob Ritchie this year was buying another 200 locomotives. I am not a tax expert, but I am sure it is double the length of time to write those locomotives off in this country than it is south of the border. That gives the American roads an advantage over us. The fuel tax paid on a litre of fuel oil is substantially higher in this country, and that gives the American carrier an advantage over us. The status of the dollar is also an advantage for the United States. It is not just the fact the employees have good contracts and are being paid sums that are commensurate with their skill and the types of jobs they have. There is a whole myriad of other issues that must be taken into consideration before we look at our industry.

Our industry is in trouble. We acknowledge that fact. However, it should not be resurrected on the backs of the employees. It certainly should not be done at the behest of the Minister of Transport who is supposed to look after our industry, not to interfere in our industry.

Senator Keon: You raised the issue of safety in your brief. Also, you were not very complimentary to your management in your brief.

It has been suggested at times that the Canadian railroad industry has not really kept up with technological change. You are suggesting that this, coupled with the reduction in manpower, is a potential for serious risk to the public and employees alike. Could you expand on that a little?

Mr. Secord: Look back a few short months to the incident at Brighton, Ontario. It was mentioned in the brief. Had there not been the number of crew members who were on that passenger train at the time, it would have been a lot more serious, and we may have ended up with some fatalities or other injuries that we certainly did not want to have happen in the first place. If you take that crew and cut it in half, what happens if that one crew member is the first victim? Who is left to open the doors? Who is left to get the people off the train?

Senator Keon: Do you think that the Canadian track system, switch systems and safety systems are as technologically advanced as European systems, for example?

Mr. Secord: I could not comment on that, senator, because I am not knowledgeable about the European systems. I will say to you that the best safety system that we have on the railway are those employees who are trained.

Senator Stewart: The statement attributed to the Minister of Transport about employees who work five hours for three days' pay inevitably attracts attention.

Mr. Hucker: If you want my term, you can have it.

Senator Stewart: I want your rebuttal to that. Do you think that he is talking about engineers here? That would be my guess. Am I wrong? Do you think I am right?

Mr. Hucker: We are both engineers.

Senator Stewart: That is what I figured.

Mr. Hucker: Yes, he is talking about us, senator.

Senator Stewart: Tell us what the real situation is. I do not know what the extremes might be, but let us say you are the engineer on a train from Montreal to Toronto. How long would that run take? It would be done by one engineer, is that right?

Mr. Hucker: It would be done by two engineers.

Senator Stewart: Where would you break the run? Would there be two engineers at one time, or would one engineer take the train to Kingston, perhaps, and then another take it from there?

Mr. Secord: There would be two engineers on the engine, and they normally share the shift. One will run halfway, and the other will change off with him. In addition to that, there is a tail-end crew as well.

Senator Stewart: Let us stay with the engineers. You say that one engineer would really be responsible for half that run?

Mr. Hucker: Senator, one engineer would operate the locomotive for half the run, but both are equally responsible for the safe operation.

Senator Stewart: They are both there throughout the entire run?

Mr. Hucker: Yes, sir.

Senator Stewart: How long would that run take?

Mr. Secord: Approximately four and one-half hours.

Senator Stewart: Let us say that run is done on a Monday. When would either or both of those engineers be liable to be called for work again?

Mr. Secord: Instead of dealing with the hypothetical, I can speak to the Toronto-Montreal run. Those engineers work nine round trips a month. They are restricted to this mileage limitation I mentioned on page 6 of 4,800 miles. When they reach the earnings of the equivalent of 4,800 miles, they must take the time off. That is it.

Senator Stewart: That is 4,800 miles a month?

Mr. Secord: Yes. If you are looking at 333 miles between Toronto and Montreal, times two for a round trip, multiply that by the number of trips you would have to make — and they are working roughly nine trips one month, eight trips the following month. That is 18 days they work this month, and 14 days next month. They work their 16 days in the month, and they go home and sit for the other 14 or 15 days that are left in the month. They do not get a pay cheque for those 14 days. Their earnings for those 14 days have already been paid to them when they worked the 16 days, or eight trips.

For the minister to say they get five days' pay for three hours worth of work, or three days' pay for five hours work, whatever he said there, he has a certain way with words, there is no doubt. That was somewhat misleading, because he was really saying that those three days' pay for five hours work represented perhaps six days in the month. If the engineer made $500, that $500 was for three or four days. It represented that time period, not just the five hours.

Senator Stewart: It was not just the time he was actually running?

Mr. Secord: That is right.

Senator Stewart: That is helpful. I wish to ask you about something else. At page 10 of your statement, you refer to the railway problems with respect to improving profits. In your next sentence, you say:

> In our view this is simply a smoke screen for poor management.

Let us put VIA Rail aside. Let us concentrate on CN Rail and CP Rail. Are you talking chiefly about CP here, or are you talking chiefly about CN, or are you talking about both equally?

Mr. Secord: We are talking about both equally. I would certainly be prepared to speak to CN, and I am sure Mr. Hucker would love to speak to CP.

Senator Stewart: I think it might be useful, in view of the fact that the proposed legislation refers to viability. What do you think is wrong? The comparison is interesting, because here we have one of the major private enterprises in Canada, CP Rail, and on the other hand one of the major nationalized enterprises in Canada, CN. You are telling us that both have severe management problems. Would you briefly indicate where we ought to look if we were trying to diagnose the management problems?

Mr. Secord: If you owned the CNR and I said to you, "I can save you $240 million over the course of the next two years," what would you say?

Senator Stewart: I would say, "Tell me more."

Mr. Secord: CN told us, "No." They just walked away from us. They did not want to talk to us.

Senator Stewart: All right. What specifically would you have indicated as the ways to make that major saving?

Mr. Secord: We had proposed a training package that would have reduced their accident, health and compensation costs over the course of two years. It would have reduced their expenses in accident-related costs by 60 per cent over two years. At the time, the figures that CN was giving us for their actual accident-related costs for 1992 were $450 million. Over the course of two years, it would have been around $240 million we would have saved them.

Senator Stewart: Is that your major example?

Mr. Secord: That is just one example. There are many. If you ask me, 200 million bucks is a lot of change.

Senator Stewart: Are you saying they are just not very bright?

Mr. Secord: Yes. You said that, but I will certainly underline it. I agree with you wholeheartedly.

• (1940)

Senator Stewart: But there might be other explanations.

Mr. Hucker: I can give you an example of that, senator. Two years ago in negotiations, one of the major issues on the table was a thing call "dead-head." When you fly, you have probably noticed that there are pilots or other crew flying on the aircraft as passengers. That is called dead-heading. We do the same thing on the railways.

We had some problems in Medicine Hat, Lethbridge and Golden, British Columbia. I said to them, "I will fix your problem. All you have to do is give me a date to be in Montreal." That was in 1991. Since then, I have this new job as vice-president. It is now 1995. I am still waiting for the phone call. That is what we are talking about.

The number of taxis that are used in Western Canada to dead-head crews around is incredible. We have crews that are called at two or three o'clock in the morning. They are dead-headed to an away-from-home terminal. They will sit for 10 hours at that terminal, because that is when they go back on pay. They then turn around and take those same three crews and dead-head them back to their home terminal. At one time that would have involved six men; it is less than that now. That is mismanagement of a resource.

Senator Stewart: I do not want to traverse the same ground we have just covered. There must be some explanation for the unwillingness to see the efficiency of what you are proposing.

Let us put aside the question of whether they are bright or not. Is it, perhaps, because they lack experience in this business? Is it because the bureaucratic structure is so thick that the people who make the decisions are too far from the front line? Or are they just tired of hearing from you?

Mr. Secord: With respect to CN, I heard Paul Tellier mention in this chamber earlier that when he came on stream with CN, he got rid of five senior officers. There is no question about that. The moment he did that, all those junior line officers ran scared for fear that the axe would fall on them. No one, but no one, at CN Rail would make a decision for fear the axe would fall on them.

As you have mentioned, the bureaucracy in that company is too thick. The layers between the persons who make the decisions and the persons who have to fulfil them are too thick.

As far as cutting CN management jobs, it has been our experience that the way they reduce the management structure is to take the name off one door and put it on another. They get rid of one person's job, give him a new title and move him down the hall. That is how they reduce management at CN Rail. What has been reduced?

Mr. Hucker: As far as CP is concerned, I would never suggest to you that Rob Ritchie, who is a long-time employee of CP — the same as I was before I got my union job — knows the industry inside out. He is an extremely intelligent and capable manager of the company. As I said to the senator from the opposite side earlier in my comments, part of the problem is how this industry is structured out of this house. I am sure Mr. Ritchie will bring along some people who can talk to you about those points.

Senator Stewart: I should like to move to another matter which has come up twice before. It is the whole question of competition, particularly with trucking and U.S. rail companies.

You made reference to this point earlier. You implied that there are differences. You mentioned the cost of fuel in the United States. I did not really follow you. Would you traverse that ground again? There are a couple of questions on which I would like to have answers. I will ask them when I am sure of the ground.

Mr. Hucker: Ontario Hydro buys coal for power production. It can buy coal from Montana a lot cheaper than it can buy it out of Canada. Never mind the length of transportation, because it is almost equal. A number of years ago I saw some figures pertaining to the sales tax on a litre of diesel fuel oil in Montana and Minnesota. It was something in the order of two cents per litre. The average in this country was something in the order of 17 cents per litre.

If you can buy the same product in the United States for less than you can in Canada, leaving aside for the moment that labour costs are equal, where will you go to buy it? If I tell you that your product will be cheaper because I am factoring in less of a fixed cost, where will you go? You will go to the United States to pick up the product.

I am sure that Mr. Ritchie can tell you far more about this than I can, senator. Some 75 per cent of the traffic that hits the West Coast of North America that is bound for Toronto and Montreal comes through Tacoma, Washington, and Long Beach, California. Why? By water, Tacoma is eight hours farther away than is Vancouver when coming in by way of the Strait of Juan de Fuca. That is one of the problems.

I do not know all the economic details, but that is what we are up against.

Senator Stewart: Are saying that there are other factors which make transportation on U.S. lines less expensive and that the railway companies are expecting their employees to make them competitive with these lower cost railways?

Mr. Hucker: Yes.

Senator Bryden: Mr. Hucker and Mr. Secord, I should like to thank you for your brief. It was useful to have a written document from which to work. I enjoyed listening to your explanations. Indeed, you may have raised the level of rhetoric in this chamber to some extent.

Can you tell me where the head office of your umbrella group is?

Mr. Hucker: My head office is in Cleveland, Ohio. However, I work about five blocks away from here on the corner of Metcalfe and Laurier. I am National Legislative Representative of the International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. I am headquartered in Canada. What we do in Canada stays right here.

Mr. Secord: With respect to the Canadian Council of Railway Operating Unions, our joint office is in Telesat Court in Gloucester.

Senator Bryden: Is that where the umbrella group is located?

Mr. Secord: That is correct.

Senator Bryden: On page 3 of your brief, you indicate that in the last round of negotiations you allowed the railway companies to operate with just one conductor and one locomotive engineer, saving at least one and sometimes two employees on every train. How long were those employees superfluous to the operation of the trains before you allowed this?

Mr. Secord: We will leave the locomotive engineer out, because he is still there. The conductor was always there. There used to be two brakemen at one time. About 10 years ago, we signed a reduced freight crew agreement, which reduced the number of brakemen to one. In the last round of negotiations, we negotiated a conductor-only operation.

Senator Bryden: What changed to allow you to operate with just one?

Mr. Secord: We were put into that position because of some technological advances put forward by the railway. We knew that we had to try to negotiate a settlement because of what we saw coming in the railway industry, which was cabooseless trains. In the United States, that is the way the railways had gone. They were moving toward conductor-only operations with an end-of-train unit or tail-end device.

We thought it would be better if we got in there and negotiated the adverse conditions which we believed would affect us before they actually affected us. We were successful in doing that. In so doing, that is where our wage scales or our monetary gain came from. However, we did lose a position in order to achieve that gain.

Senator Bryden: This would not have been the final denouement of the tradition of feather-bedding which was around for years in the rail industry.

Mr. Secord: We are at the point, senator, where we have only one person left. There is not much more we can give. We need the engineer to operate the locomotive and we need the conductor to perform the manual labour and to separate and service the customers. We have bottomed out. I do not know if there is anything left for us to give.

Senator Bryden: There are no feathers left. Is that what you are saying?

Mr. Hucker: I do not believe there was featherbedding. We do not have employment security, which has been a real focus of this round of negotiations regarding the non-operating people. It is kind of hard to hear the term "feather-bedding." When I started out, there were five men on a crew. Now we are down to two. We had the foresight to listen to the railway and to see what was coming in the future, so we negotiated agreements to ensure these people were properly protected. As far as feather-bedding is concerned, that term is foreign to our side of the industry.

Senator Bryden: I understand that. Could you tell me the average annual wage for a locomotive engineer?

Mr. Hucker: I would suggest it is in the range of $60,000 to $65,000 per year. It may be higher depending on the run and on other circumstances. There are people who make in excess of that; a yard engineer would make less than that.

Senator Bryden: What would be the maximum salary, $80,000?

Mr. Hucker: I believe so. We always like to tell the companies they pay us on the consequence of error. When something goes wrong, they pay us not to make mistakes, even though we do. We are all human. That is what I like to tell them across the bargaining table, that they are paying me for the consequence of error.

Senator Bryden: I appreciate that. On page 6 of your brief, you indicate that in order to earn $65,000 to $80,000, the locomotive engineer travels a minimum of 800 miles per month and a maximum number of 4,800 miles.

Mr. Hucker: Senator, that is a passenger train crew. I do not want to get into this because there are not enough hours left in this week to be able to explain our dual system of pay. However, a freight engineer or freight conductor works 3,800 miles per month. The calculation is slightly different. That means after I work a day, I am off one and a half days. In effect I work as many as 12 trips per month.

Senator Bryden: What is the average pay of the person who does 4,800 miles per month?

Mr. Hucker: I would suggest it is in the same range. It is probably at the high end of the range.

Senator Bryden: One page before those numbers, on another point you indicated that these trains travel at 100 miles per hour. Even with my rudimentary mathematics, that looks like he gets paid one-twelfth of $80,000 for working 48 hours per month. Is that correct? That is a good rate.

Mr. Secord: If you were looking at that sentence and you said you made $100 for 100 miles, it would be like making $100 an hour. It does look pretty good now. You have to understand, senator, that is deceptive because we are spreading those wages over the month. As I said before, you are not working the entire month. You are only working 14 to 16 days. For the other 14 or 16 days, you are not getting paid.

Senator Bryden: He still makes $80,000 per year and if you divide that by 12, it is a pretty good monthly wage for working 48 hours if the train goes 100 miles an hour.

Mr. Secord: It is not 48 hours, senator, because, as you know, the railways are a continuous operation. They are exempt from some of the provisions of Part III of the Code regarding hours of work. These people are available around the clock. Prior to two years ago, some of them worked around the clock in order to make those funds. The opportunity for that type of earning potential is there, but that does not mean to say that everyone makes that kind of money. I want to make it clear that we do not make as much as the engineers. We make about $45,000 as conductors.

Mr. Hucker: If I may make one point, when I was working as a locomotive engineer, my round trip was about 24 hours. I worked west out of Thunder Bay on high-speed freight trains. My round trip was 24 hours which meant I left home, arrived at the away-from-home terminal and, by the time I got back again, a full 24 hours had gone. I had to be available for those 24 hours.

I could make ten trips a month. If you work eight-hour days in a factory — or as a page in this building — working 20 days per month, at the end of the shift you go home every night. At the end of my shift, I am still 150 or 200 miles away from my home, but I have to be ready to go to work. Then in some cases I work as much as a 33-day month if you calculate the 16 hours that I am away from home. I am working a lot longer to make that kind of money.

Sure, it is great that we can do the math that way. You used the figure of 100 miles per hour. I suggest that if I could let you operate a VIA Rail train at 100 miles an hour, you would soon realize that $75,000 or $80,000 is not enough to watch the idiots who run across the track in front of you.

Senator Bryden: It would be worth more than that to have the people on the train if I was in the seat.

Mr. Hucker: Right.

Senator Bryden: Just to continue, you indicate a concern on page 7 about the safety of going from 10 hours to 12 hours before rest. It is my understanding that the 12-hour period does not violate any safety standards, either in Canada or in the U.S. in this system. Is that correct?

Mr. Secord: Senator, I am glad you brought that up because, in the United States, under the U.S. Hours of Service Act, which has been in effect since 1907 and was changed in 1937, the 12-hour limit is a legislated requirement. That is the limit that any employee can work in the U.S. That does mean they could not have negotiated something less that would have given them some relief from having to work 12 hours.

In Canada, we do not have an hours of service act. We did have the opportunity to have in our collective agreements a provision that after 10 hours on duty, we would be entitled, if we so desired and if we were that tired, to book rest and be relieved from duty. That is clearly a safety issue. Some senators may be aware that Transport Canada has a standing order or directive currently in force against the railways, presumably to be settled this June, which says that under no circumstances can any employee in covered service, which means working on trains or on the road, work more than 12 hours per shift, similar to the U.S.

The employers in their demands are relying on that order. They are hoping that will be legislated by the regulator so they can rely on it to get rid of the 10-hour provision in our collective agreement. We are not prepared to give away our negotiated rights just because there is a legislated right.

We must remember that the legislated right is the limit of the issue. It is the floor. It is not the ceiling. The ceiling is anything above that. The 12 hours is at the bottom. If we can negotiate something better, as we have, then we intend to keep it.

Senator Bryden: Absolutely, but if for whatever reason you end up having a 12-hour limit, you would not be violating any legislated standards.

Mr. Secord: None that are currently in force.

The Chairman: There is a 10-minute rule for questioning. The Chair has been very lenient. I will put you down for a second round.

Senator Kinsella: Mr. Chairman, we do have another witness who has been waiting some time. We should act out of courtesy to him.

Senator Stewart: On a point of order, if I may; over the years, one of the great virtues of Senate committees is that those who come before the committee are given a full opportunity to be heard. Senators are also given a full opportunity to exhaust their questions.

• (2000)

This is an important situation for the witnesses, for the companies, and for the economy. If Senator Bryden is on a run of questions, it is beneficial to the Senate that he should be allowed to complete that list of questions.

The Chairman: I will answer to the committee. My responsibility as chairman is to keep it flowing, and there are other questioners on the list. We do have one last witness who has been waiting for literally hours.

Senator Stewart: The country has been waiting for a week.

The Chairman: The Chair should not argue. What is the wish of the committee?

Senator Bryden, you have the floor.

Senator Bryden: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I can control the length of my questions; I cannot control the length of the answers.

Mr. Hucker: Many union officers are like politicians: They can talk for hours and say nothing. I sympathize with you.

The Chairman: Order, please. We have been at this since three o'clock. I think the questions and answers should be short and to the point.

Senator Bryden: How long were each of you involved in negotiating contracts at the national level for the government?

Mr. Secord: Yes. The Chair wanted a short answer. I do not negotiate contracts, senator; I deal strictly with legislation. However, Mr. Hucker has negotiated contracts.

Mr. Hucker: For eight years, I have been the chief negotiator for my union.

Senator Bryden: I ask the question because of something Mr. Secord said. Believe me, I do not mean to defend the Minister of Transport. From long experience, he is capable of looking after himself. Mr. Secord said that if it were not for the intervention of the Minister of Transport and Mr. Tellier of CN, we would not be here and there would not be a strike. It is my understanding that there has been a strike in 15 out of the last 15 years. What was the intervention that caused the previous 15 strikes?

Mr. Secord: We have not had 15 strikes in the railway. From what I can remember, I have only been involved in two. In fact, over the course of the last 15 years, we have only had one. I have been employed for 20 years and only been involved in one, and this is the second.

Mr. Hucker: My union signed its first agreement with CP Rail on February 1, 1886, and up to 1987 we were on strike once.

Senator Bryden: On page 9, in the last line under the heading "Government Interference," you say:

> That resentment will no doubt be directed to the Federal Government in other ways, perhaps as early as the Parti Québécois Sovereignty referendum vote.

Does this mean that your union has taken a position?

Mr. Secord: No. We just wanted to get your attention, senator.

Senator Bryden: On the bottom of page 10, you speak of wanting to improve labour relations.

> Fueling this is of course poor management, the bargaining atmosphere and the continuing perception there is excessive management at both CN and VIA Rail ...

Does the leadership of the labour movement, in your opinion, bear any responsibility for this impasse, or is it all attributable to poor management?

Mr. Hucker: I would suggest that, as Conciliator Hope said, we are as guilty as management and government in this area. We have had our problems, just as the government has had their problems, the same as CP and CN and VIA have had their problems. We are not saying that poor management has been the sole issue. We have had some internal problems to deal with.

Senator Comeau: You gave some very dramatic examples of how the Minister of Transport has not been helpful in this whole situation. It leaves me to wonder why you did not choose to ask for his resignation. Is it because you want to see him self-destruct?

Mr. Hucker: Mr. Secord, you can answer that.

Mr. Secord: I think the senator already answered it. It would have done no good. We have to work with the minister's office, and we have to work with the departments for which he is responsible. We would rather work together with people to get a resolution than throw another log on the fire. We were hoping that perhaps the caucus could have controlled the minister.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: So were we.

Mr. Hucker: I can give you an example of my problems with the Minister of Transport and his department. Under their auspices, the railway industry, through the locomotive engineers and the three major carriers, are conducting a study in regards to sleep-related problems in our industry. It has not been all bad from his officials on down. Again, it is awfully hard to negotiate when someone is out there throwing these little darts at you every once in a while. Sometimes they are huge darts, not little darts. We put forward in the brief a summary of the problems we have had with his conduct.

Senator Comeau: An old sailor might comment, "Loose cannon on the deck?"

Mr. Hucker: You said that, senator; I did not. We probably represent as many MBAs as Mr. Ritchie has working in his company.

Senator Comeau: They are not all great.

Mr. Hucker: I left university too, like anybody else.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Comeau. This completes the list for this round. I thank both Mr. Hucker and Mr. Secord for taking the time to appear before the Senate in a very cooperative way.

Mr. Hucker: Thank you very much. I wish we had an opportunity at the other place to do exactly the same thing.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, our fifth and last witness will be Mr. Rob P. Ritchie. Welcome to the Senate, Mr. Ritchie. Would you please introduce your colleague?

Mr. Rob P. Ritchie, President and Chief Executive Officer, CP: This is Mr. David Flicker, our Vice-President of Government Affairs.

The Chairman: You may proceed with a statement at this time.

Mr. Ritchie: Thank you. I am the last witness, so I will not repeat much of the evidence that has been presented. I am here at your invitation to answer your questions and to provide you with some information about how CP Rail views Bill C-77.

• (2010)

Improving labour productivity is one of the four key issues that must be resolved to ensure Canadian railway viability. The other issues are improved service and operations, significant restructuring of the railway lines — particularly in Eastern Canada — and the elimination of regulatory and taxation inequities.

Railway expenses have been reduced. This reduction has not been matched by the decline since 1988 in railway freight rates. Since that time, in rail terms, railway freight rates have been reduced by approximately 40 per cent.

Financial viability was measured by CP Rail in terms of capital and related factors, such as the operating ratio of cash flow. These have deteriorated significantly since the passage of that bill in 1987. This has led to a steep reduction in the rate of return on capital employed by our company, to the point where the railway is having difficulty renewing its capital assets.

Canadian railway labour productivity in 1992, as a percentage of productivity in the United States, was approximately 55 per cent. Based on the May 1994 exchange rates, Canadian labour costs — based on an RTM basis, which is our work load measure — was about 25 to 30 per cent and higher than our competition in the United States.

We also need to compare labour productivity to other modes in Canada. In 1993 Canadian railway workers earned approximately 53 per cent more than employees in the trucking industry in this country, trucking being our main competitor.

Railway labour weekly earnings increased by approximately 66 per cent between 1983 and 1993. This is more than practically any other industry in Canada. This compares with rate increases for the same time period of 27 per cent for the trucking sector, 57 per cent in the marine sector, and 34 per cent in air transportation.

Therefore, yes, in the current round of railway contract negotiations we have been focusing on reducing labour costs. We have also been focusing on making the work rules more flexible, eliminating artificial barriers amongst the crafts, and on making income security for life, without having to work being a last resort rather than an option of choice.

We continue to believe that a negotiated settlement would have been preferable to all parties, but this simply was not possible. Legislated measures are a process of last resort if the parties cannot negotiate a settlement or significant economic disruption results. We have given negotiation our best shot. We have been on strike now for almost 16 days. We have come to accept that the process proposed by the government is the only way left to achieve a settlement.

The economy has been disrupted. The 2,000 people at CP Rail who are out in the field keeping trains running are beginning to feel the strain. We are amenable to the mediation-arbitration process as set out in the legislation.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I want to thank you particularly for your patience or for not showing your impatience at having to wait around for so long before appearing before us.

I can assure you that while this day will probably have no impact on the legislation itself, it will have an impact on all parliamentarians when they read the record regarding the complex issues at stake here. I believe we are receiving a better understanding of the issues, even though we are hearing contradicting and conflicting views from the parties.

Certainly those of us who have been following since the beginning will leave with a better understanding of what is essential, and hopefully some day we will be able to avoid these unpleasant requirements of having to pass back-to-work legislation.

I have heard VIA Rail and CN particularly saying that they now regret having given employment security. Those were better times and happier times and maybe lax times. The carriers are coming to Parliament to have us undo agreements that were entered into voluntarily between the employer and employee. Is that a fair assessment of the impact of this law?

Mr. Ritchie: You are prejudging what the results of the mediation-arbitration will be. We do not prejudge it at all. We are seeking to modify employment security. That is why we have been working through a strike for the last 16 days.

We believe that the negotiated settlement that we have with approximately 3,000 of our unionized employees was a good settlement for us. We believe it will be a good settlement for them. We also believe that we were very close to a negotiated settlement with the Brotherhood of Maintenance and Way Workers and also with the running trades. However, that situation deteriorated as of last Thursday night. I am not sure what happened. That led to the strike lock-out at Canadian National and VIA Rail which led to the formation of Bill C-77 and me being here this evening.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Clause 12 in the bill gives the arbitrator the requirement to assess the economic viability of the systems. Since all of them now are pleading poverty if certain agreements remain in force, this is certainly a bias in favour of the employers to remove some of the advantages that employees have now, particularly employment security, which seems to be the one provision that the employers are constantly adamant about.

Mr. Ritchie: I am in no position to prejudge the mediator-arbitrator. There is a mediation process in the bill that I think is important. We should not lose sight of that. It still gives an opportunity to arrive at a negotiated settlement.

There are three aspects of that famous clause 12. Viability is the first, competitiveness coast to coast is second — which I think is important to the shippers — and the continuation of good management–labour relations, which is important to the employees, is third. I believe that the bill is an attempt to find a balance between railway viability, competitiveness for shippers and employees. There can be no doubt that the question of railway viability must be addressed. I wish we were not in a position where we had to utilize the back-to-work legislation.

However, it is difficult to move from an industry that has had a history of this to total negotiated settlement. I believe trying to touch on all these three bases is a good balance.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What is your assessment of the conciliation report itself?

Mr. Ritchie: The Hope report?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Yes.

Mr. Ritchie: We are on record with the Minister of Labour that we felt that the Hope report made some interesting observations and was ploughing new ground. It was not perfect.

There were areas that we felt were of concern to us, in particular the length of time that it would take, and the question of economic viability being debated was of some concern to us as well.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The back-to-work legislation that we had last week, Bill C-74 regarding the West Coast ports problem, required the arbitrator, if it came to an impasse, to consider the conciliation report on that particular problem.

There is no reference to a conciliation report in the bill before us, which I think is unusual, is it not? Do you know why it is being disregarded as far as the legislation goes?

Mr. Ritchie: You are right. That must be addressed to the minister. I point out the fact that we are into a mediation-arbitration process, which I think is an interesting concept that did come out of Mr. Hope's report.

• (2020)

Senator Lynch-Staunton: In effect, mediation-arbitration is really arbitration, is it not? The mediation part of the equation is automatically succeeded by arbitration if one fails.

Mr. Ritchie: Some people have that opinion. We would seek to arrive at a negotiated settlement through mediation because we believe that the situation respecting all three railways is unique. Contracts are different, and we do not believe that an arbitrated settlement is in the best interests of the company or of our employees.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Mr. Hope suggested a 60-day mediation period and a 120-day arbitration period. The legislation indicates 70 days, or more at the discretion of the minister. Does the length of that time frame merely prolong the agony?

Mr. Ritchie: The issues are well known between the company and our unions. It will take time to allow the chairperson to get familiar with the issues.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Or chairpersons, because there could be a number of bargaining units.

Mr. Ritchie: Yes, there could.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Each bargaining unit is entitled to its own chairperson.

Are you open to, if not in favour of, the possibility of devising some form of essential services policy or process in Canada so that when we enter a strike, at least minimum services in essential areas are provided to Canadians? The system in Quebec works quite well.

Mr. Ritchie: The practice in the railway industry with respect to essential services is different from essential services in the provincial arena. We are an interrelated industry that requires maintenance of way workers, to look after equipment, run the trains and fill out forms. To say that any one of those persons is essential is very difficult. They are all essential in the operation of a railway. If 10 per cent of our employees were declared essential, you would only have 10 per cent of the railway running. You would then have to go through some form of triage to determine who would get service and who would not. That would be a very difficult process to determine.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Are you saying that the system cannot operate in a partial manner; that it must operate in toto or not at all?

Mr. Ritchie: No, obviously not. We are an example of a railway operating at 80 per cent to 85 per cent today. However, we are doing that with our human resources wasting right now. We cannot continue in that fashion for a long period of time. We were obviously willing to do so to put economic pressure on ourselves and our unions to come to a deal. I am not saying the system is perfect.

Back-to-work legislation is not the way to run a railway. We need to arrive at a strategic partnership with our labour groups. What is good for labour will be good for us.

[ Mr. Ritchie ]

We are a service industry facing a great deal of competition from other modes of transportation in Canada and the U.S. Our long-term goal is to serve our customers well. We need Mr. Hucker and his members. We need the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way employees looking after the track properly.

There is not a lot of supervision in the railway industry. There are over 19,000 miles of track. People must know their jobs, be well trained, and want to do the job at hand. That means good labour-management relations.

We have a 114-year history. It has not been all that bad. However, you people unfortunately see us when we end up before you. We are not proud of that. We are working to stay away from this place in the future.

Senator Olson: Mr. Ritchie, I want to ask you questions about the employment security problem. It is the basis for this dispute. At least, that is what we have been led to believe.

You made an interesting comment: You went to great lengths to explain that you wanted to improve labour productivity. I think you said that your labour costs are 53 per cent higher than your main competition, the motor truck industry. How did you get so far out of line with your main competitor?

Mr. Ritchie: There has been a series of negotiations to improve productivity. We have paid for that productivity. We have had productivity improvements of approximately 5 per cent a year over the last 5 years. However, to achieve that productivity, we had to buy our way out of three-man crews and cabooseless train operations, for example.

Senator Olson: I am aware of that. Are you negotiating to reduce your costs? We heard earlier today that labour costs in the railway industry in Canada are about 46 per cent of total costs.

Mr. Ritchie: They are in that neighbourhood, yes. That is why we are negotiating to get our labour costs down. In many cases, we have been successful in doing so. Employment security is one of the ways to reduce our labour costs. We are not seeking to eliminate employment security, however. The deal we negotiated with the three unions representing 3,000 people calls for significant modification.

We are looking to transfer people on employment security in Montreal to our main shop in Calgary, where we need the same number of employees with identical skills. We are willing to pay their move, and we are willing to pay them for the fact that they will move. That is how we are looking to reduce employment costs. We are looking to change the work rules so that we can more effectively use the employees we have.

Senator Olson: I am very pleased that you offered that explanation. I was not aware that you had made that offer.

Have you offered a modified employment security position as a substitute for the agreement negotiated in 1985? That seems to be the major sticking point. We have been led by the unions to believe that there will be no discussions until you agree to a major modification of employment security. Have you offered concessions to the workers in addition to those you just mentioned?

Mr. Ritchie: Yes, senator. We offered the concessions I just mentioned. They were accepted by 3,000 employees. They call for people to accept a job anywhere in Canada. We are willing to pay them to accept that contract. In other words, we are willing to give a lump sum payment and a wage increase over three years. That provision has been accepted. We are willing to pay people to move. That provision has been accepted.

We are talking about modified employment security. If the employees take it and go to a job where we need them, they have a job. We are better off because we do not have to train a new employee. These are good, skilled employees.

If the employees decide they do not want to move — and I have heard a lot of emotional talk about our moving people from Quebec to Alberta — they can elect to stay in Montreal. Again, we have offered a modified package. If the employees elect to stay in Montreal, they must accept any job in the railway. To date, some employees in Montreal have not accepted any job in the railway because they have not been required to do so by the contract. Fifty-five jobs in the running trade in Montreal due to traffic growth have been turned down by the Angus workers who are on employment security.

Senator Olson: I think you could properly tell me that unions can speak for themselves. What was their response to this series of offers with respect to employment security, which not only the Angus workers but others could accept?

• (2030)

Mr. Ritchie: Those three unions accepted them.

Senator Olson: What did the others say?

Mr. Ritchie: Two other major groups are affected by employment security. We believed we were coming close to a different deal for the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way workers a week ago. Those negotiations went cold when we thought we were very close to a deal. Frankly, we have had a very difficult time with the Canadian Auto Workers. They do not want to accept nationwide seniority. We believe that we need that flexibility if they want to have employment security.

The economy changes across this country quite quickly, and if people wish to take employment, we need to be able to transfer them to where the work is. If they do not want to take that work, we are willing to give them some modified unemployment benefits that will carry them over, I think very generously, for three to five years with retraining provisions. We are not being heavy-handed. It is arguable that the employment security package which we are trying to negotiate is one of the richest packages still available in Canadian industry. We are willing to do that in order to arrive at a negotiated settlement.

Senator Stewart: The issue of the difference between wages paid to truckers and railway employees has been touched upon by Senator Olson. Putting that aside and putting aside the matter of artificial barriers to work assignment, let us go back to the two other points you mentioned at the beginning, Mr. Ritchie.

You said that labour productivity is very much lower in Canada in the railways than in comparable companies in the United States. If I heard you correctly, you said that in terms of regulatory and taxation environments, there is not a level playing field. You are under pressure, your employees are under pressure and your industry is under pressure. I am trying to get an understanding of some of the aspects of that pressure.

Would you tell us what would be necessary to create a level playing field with American competition, insofar as regulation and taxation are concerned? Having done that, would you give us your explanation of why labour productivity is so much lower in Canadian companies than in comparable American companies?

Mr. Ritchie: I will reverse that, senator, if you do not mind, because I think that would work better for what you are seeking.

Labour productivity in Canada changes for different types of workers, but let us use as an example the workers who have employment security. To bring them up to the level in the United States, we must change the work rules to get rid of the steam-age delineations among the crafts within our shops. Over the years we have not been able to change from pipe fitters, boilermakers and blacksmiths to a composite mechanic, although many of our men and women have these composite skills.

Second, the density of our lines are not the same as they are in the United States. We must run a lot farther to pick up tonnage in Canada because we are more sparsely populated than is the United States. Therefore, we need more people running around picking up traffic in order that we can make a heavier train.

Third, taxation in Canada does not encourage the substitution of labour by capital. In the United States you can write off your equipment twice as fast as you can in Canada, so you are encouraged, for cash reasons, to substitute capital or put capital in. We have not been able to do that in Canada, although we have tried mightily to convince the Department of Finance that this would be good for the Canadian economy because it would help to revitalize the Canadian railway industry.

On the fiscal side, we pay over 14 per cent of our revenue in government taxation at the federal and provincial levels. That includes property taxes and fuel taxes. In the United States, that figure is 7 per cent. That represents many millions of dollars for CP Rail. How much is it, David?

Mr. David Flicker, Vice-President of Government Affairs, CP: It has been found, in a series of regulatory proceedings, that the difference is about $200 million a year for Canadian railways. If they were operating in the States, they would be paying $200 million a year less in taxes than they do for the benefit of operating in Canada.

Senator Stewart: Is that CP and CN together?

Mr. Flicker: That is CP and CN combined, and those are findings of the government's National Transportation Act Review Commission and the IBI report of the Transportation Association of Canada. It has been verified repeatedly.

Mr. Ritchie: The other area in which they have a leg-up in the United States is the ability to rationalize the railway track. In Canada, we have been slow and reluctant to move ahead on that. There are many barriers for railway companies to do that. We are starting to make progress in that area. We believe that there are changes coming to the National Transportation Act that will help us in this area, but we are behind the times, and we have to get moving.

Canadian Pacific must revitalize its railway. We must increase our capital spending to $500 million or $600 million a year for four to five years. We have been at the level of about $250 million, and that is not replacing our assets. If we wish to keep the railway in private enterprise, we must create the conditions which allow us to earn the cash to do so.

Senator Stewart: With regard to trucking, you mentioned an explanation for why wages are higher in rail transport than in trucking transport. Is there anything to be said with regard to the fact that highways are provided by the taxpayer, in one way or another, for the trucking industry, whereas, for the most part, at least in modern times, the railway companies must provide their own ways?

Mr. Ritchie: Yes, senator. Thank you. We believe that is one of the inefficiencies in the surface transportation policy which the government must address. Highways are provided at less than cost for the trucks. On the other hand, railways provide their own right-of-way, and on top of that, to add insult to injury, we must pay property tax on them, and that tax is quite high. It is a significant amount of money. It is over $30 million in Quebec and the same in British Columbia. These are not insignificant sums for us.

The other point that we must remember when looking at the trucking industry is that no definitive study has been done in Canada to determine how much a truck costs and how much of the highway it consumes. Highways are not built only for automobiles. They are built for automobiles and trucks. If they were built only for automobiles, they would be a lot less expensive to build and a lot less expensive to maintain. The grades are less when there are heavy trucks operating, and the curvature is less. The signage is more intense because automobile drivers must be able to see around it. All of those things should be considered, but have not been. That is a matter for frustration in the railway industry in this country and in the United States.

In addition to that, vehicle weights and dimensions are continually growing in Canada. It is to the point that they are significantly higher than in the United States. A truck in Canada can weigh up to 133,000 pounds. In the United States on the interstate highway the maximum weight is 90,000 pounds. That gives the advantage to a trucker over the railway in Canada by a considerable amount. There is no plot here to put the railways out of business. This is done to try to keep our industry competitive. To this date, there has not been an entire approach to the surface transportation industry in Canada.

Senator Kinsella: In how many collective agreements is CP Rail involved?

Mr. Ritchie: Seven.

Senator Kinsella: Did you say that you were close to an agreement with one or two of the seven?

Mr. Ritchie: We have agreements with three.

Senator Kinsella: There are four outstanding and therefore subject to this bill; is that right?

Mr. Ritchie: Yes, sir. All seven are subject to this bill, unless the three reject the contract.

Senator Kinsella: In terms of the process for settlement, after this legislation comes into force, are you satisfied that the process will be operated on a level playing field from the standpoint of both industry and labour, at the mediation level? Keep in mind that should it fail, the arbitration powers will kick in, if I understand the bill correctly. Do you have concerns that passing on the information to the commission when it is playing its conciliation role would generally be done without prejudice and, if it is the same body which then becomes the arbitrator and you have been giving company data without prejudice, might this not place you at a disadvantage from the arbitration standpoint?

Mr. Ritchie: Senator, you ask if the mediation-arbitration process is a level playing field. On the mediation side, I think it depends on how the parties want to play it. We want a negotiated settlement. Thus, in the mediation process we will try to reach a negotiated settlement.

The process of mediation-arbitration is similar to what is called a presidential emergency board in the United States where it does impact on mediation. It is not pure mediation as we know it. However, it lends itself to a little more intelligence when the arbitration comes around. People know what the issues are. You can start to get some finality to these issues. You can reach an arbitrated settlement that is proper and which addresses the industry and the needs of the employee. It is no surprise to both parties. They know what is coming. It helps to hear all the issues.

Senator Andreychuk: Mr. Ritchie, I was impressed with the fact that you said settling the labour dispute was one of four targets in bringing your company into a more viable position. Could you comment on clause 12 of the proposed bill? Why do you believe that it may help you by having it in the legislation? I presume that in your previous labour negotiations you would have put forward before mediators, et cetera, what you could or could not pay in practical terms for the viability of the company and the industry. Why is it necessary to have it in the bill? How will you approach the mediation process differently because it is there? Or will you approach it differently?

Mr. Ritchie: I do not know whether we will approach the mediation process any differently. However, I think it is obvious to all of us — railroads and unions — that a traditional arbitration process takes a look at both sides and seeks to find middle ground. I believe that the railway industry is at a critical point in its life, which is why the viability clause was put in the bill.

Our ability to service our customers effectively and efficiently is at a critical stage, which is why the competitive coast-to-coast clause was put into the bill. I believe that both labour and union management are at critical stages, which is another reason why that clause was put in. I am the first to admit that back-to-work legislation will never be perfect. However, we have to address all three of those issues. I think that this legislation has come as close as any that we can expect to try and do so.

Senator Andreychuk: We recently legislated longshoremen back to work without such a clause. Do you believe that your industry is in a more critical position, or was there something in the way you were bargaining that led you to believe that you needed this clause?

Mr. Ritchie: I cannot answer for the industry on the West Coast. Mr. Hope stressed the viability issue of the railways, which is one of the reasons it surfaced. There have been many studies done by various government bodies in terms of the position of the railway industry. I believe that is another reason why that clause is in the bill, senator.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Once this legislation goes through and things get back to normal — hopefully some time early next week — what will the long-term impact of the last week or so be on the Canadian economy? The short term can be measured in dollars. However, surely you and others have had calls from customers concerned about your ability to meet certain schedules. I am sure suppliers are upset. Do you think we have been hurt badly? How badly have we been hurt by it?

Mr. Ritchie: It is difficult to say. It is so competitive out there. In terms of our export commodities, representatives of the coal and the grain industries have been on the phone to me quite often. They have pointed out the significance and importance of security of supply and what we are facing from the Argentinians, the Americans and the Australians in our bulk markets. The container people do not phone so often because their ships go to Tacoma. They do not come to Seattle. I think Montreal has been damaged considerably.

Both the employees and the company will have to struggle hard to regain the trust. Canada had quite a period of labour peace. I am not so sure why that was. I am not so sure if I know why we are having this discord right now. As a country and as a company there is no doubt that we have been hurt.

The Chairman: If there are no further questions, on behalf of honourable senators, I wish to thank Mr. Ritchie and Mr. Flicker for their appearance here tonight and for their patience in waiting their turn.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Mr. Chairman, before you report, may I just say — and I am sure I speak for many of us — that this has been an invaluable and most informative day. It is one which will help us in the future as we tackle these important and complex problems.

I want to thank all those who appeared before us. I thank the government for agreeing to hold this exercise. Unwittingly or not, it has agreed to a limited form of pre-study.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, shall I report that the committee has completed its examination of the question referred to it earlier this day?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

---

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Your Honour, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred the question of the desirability of enacting immediately a measure to terminate the present railway strike, has considered the said question and has concluded its consideration thereof.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move:

> That when the Senate completes its business today the sitting be suspended to the call of the Chair.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the deputy leader and I have had some discussion as to the absolutely-impossible-to-understand dynamics over in the other place. Perhaps the deputy leader could enlighten us as to what the options are in terms of notice over the weekend, if we do need to come back to deal with this legislation? We would all appreciate the benefit of your wisdom, sir.

Senator Graham: I just heard our own whip behind me saying, "Well, I certainly would appreciate some wisdom."

Again, after our preliminary investigation of this very serious problem facing the country, I regret that I am none the wiser than I was yesterday or last evening or this afternoon. The scenario as outlined earlier stands. I could add that there are two or three windows of opportunity to again seek unanimous consent, so Yogi Berra lives at least in my heart.

As I understand it, the Commons session on Friday begins at 10:00, Question Period ends at noon and the session adjourns at 2:30. As I stated earlier today, if all else fails, there is a House order to have report stage at nine o'clock Saturday morning and, in the absence of unanimous consent, time allocation. I believe that House order also includes, if required, a sitting in the other place on Sunday beginning at one o'clock, again with time allocation to deal with third reading.

If we go the limit, we should be back here late Sunday afternoon or early Sunday evening. If the log jam breaks earlier, it could be sometime tomorrow or Saturday. I have been looking at my Picasso paintings again.

In that event, we will attempt to give adequate notice to all honourable senators. If we are to receive the bill at the latest on Sunday, with agreement on both sides, we will attempt to give approximately six hours' notice. However, as agreed with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, if the log jam breaks tomorrow or Saturday, the time frame could be a bit tighter.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at pleasure, to the call of the Chair.

At 1:30 p.m., Sunday, March 26, 1995, the sitting of the Senate was resumed, the Speaker in the Chair.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1994-95

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-79, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1995.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday, March 28, 1995.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1995-96

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-80, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1996.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday, March 28, 1995.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

TRANSPORT

MOTION TO DEBATE MEASURE TO TERMINATE RAILWAY STRIKE—REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

On the Order:

Motion of the Honourable B. Alasdair Graham:

That the question of the desirability of enacting immediately a measure to terminate the present railway strike be referred to a Committee of the Whole; and

That the Committee meet later this day.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider the motion and hear witnesses, and that Senator Corbin take the Chair.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the question, the Honourable Eymard G. Corbin in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is now in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk has proceeded to bring in today's witnesses. They are Don J. Bujold, the National Secretary-Treasurer of the Transportation Communications Union, and Maureen Prebinski, Director of Education and Information Services for the same union.

Honourable senators, I wish to welcome both of those witnesses on your behalf. It is my understanding that Mr. Bujold has a statement to make at this time. Will you please proceed, Mr. Bujold?

Mr. Don J. Bujold, National Secretary-Treasurer, Transportation Communications Union: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity afforded me of appearing before the Senate today.

On behalf of the members of the Transportation Communications International Union, I wish to thank the committee members for agreeing to receive us and for their interest in what our union's position is on Bill C-77, the Maintenance of Railway Operations Bill, 1995.

The Transportation Communications Union, TCU, represents 10,000 workers across Canada who are involved in the transportation of goods, people and information. TCU members work for Canada's national railways, trucking firms, ferry operations, and grain operations. There are 2,000 TCU members who work for CP Rail, and it is on behalf of those members that I appear before you today. TCU has become a party to this legislation by virtue of article 31(a).

I wish to provide you with some background on TCU's negotiations with CP Rail over the past year. As with other unions, TCU's collective agreement with CP Rail and its clerical workforce expired on December 31, 1993. Beginning in November of 1993, TCU opened talks with CP Rail. The climate of negotiations was, to say the least, heated and frustrating. We continued to talk despite the outrageous demands of the company, which were, in the words of Conciliation Commissioner Allan Hope, "controversial and provocative."

However, very early in the bargaining process, the federal government embarked on a campaign of interference in the natural progression of talks and provided CP Rail with little incentive to fully commit itself to bargaining in good faith. Early in 1994, pursuant to section 106 of the Canada Labour Code, Human Resources Development Minister Lloyd Axworthy appointed Mr. Paul Fraser to conduct an independent review of the current state of labour issues in national rail bargaining. This was an unwelcome intrusion into the bargaining process and allowed the railway companies to avoid entering into serious negotiations with the unions until after the independent review officer presented his findings.

A former labour relations officer for Canadian National, Donald Fraleigh, presented a report to Transport Canada in late April, 1994, on the conditions of work in the railway industry. His report was widely circulated among members of Parliament and omitted important information to ensure a one-sided view of working conditions and employment security.

We then saw the Minister of Transport, Doug Young, repeatedly coming down clearly on the side of the railway companies when he spoke of railway viability and competitiveness, and how union contracts prevented the national railways from competing in the new world economic order. The minister, in an appearance before the Western Transportation Advisory Council in October, insulted thousands of railway workers across the country when he referred to them and their union leaders as workers with limited education. I believe his exact words were, "workers with Grade 7 or 8 education." It was no stretch of the imagination for us to realize exactly which side the government was supporting in this current round of negotiations, and it certainly was not the workers.

I would submit to you there are other more significant factors that have worked to undermine the railway industry's competitiveness. Specifically, the lack of an integrated transportation policy in this country, as well as the reduced value governments have placed on rail transportation, have contributed to the decline in Canada's railway competitiveness, vis-à-vis the United States. In addition, taxation policies, including diesel fuel tax rates and property taxes on railway rights-of-way transportation corridors, have helped reduce railway competitiveness. In my view, these are far greater factors than labour costs.

This background puts into context the atmosphere in which we struggled to reach a contract for our members at CP Rail. It was an atmosphere in which certain government officials repeatedly insulted and slammed railway workers. It was an atmosphere in which the railway companies knew that they had the backing of the government, and so they had little incentive to settle the contract disputes.

Despite this, the TCU, together with two other unions, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Rail Canada Traffic Controllers, were able to reach a tentative settlement with CP Rail on March 12, 1995, one week before strikes and lockouts occurred at Canadian National and VIA Rail. Even so, the TCU, IBEW and RCTC have been included in Bill C-77, presumably because our tentative agreements have not yet been ratified by the membership. Voting is being conducted on our tentative agreement, and ballots will be counted on April 26.

While the TCU has reached a tentative agreement with CP Rail, we are obligated to comment on Bill C-77 and express our concerns with the legislation.

Under clause 32(8) of this legislation, the minister may defer issuing a notice of the appointment of a mediation-arbitration commission where the employer and the union have reached a tentative agreement. However, the legislation does not guarantee that the minister will not exercise his or her discretion and refrain from issuing notice under the legislation until the entire process, including membership ratification, has run its course. We respectfully request that TCU, IBEW and RCTC be guaranteed that there will be no action taken by the government in our process pending the outcome of our membership ratification votes on April 26.

In addition, under clause 33(1)(b), each mediation-arbitration commission to be set up under this bill shall fix dates for the termination of new collective agreements established by this process. The date set by this legislation for the termination of contracts is no earlier than December 31, 1997. The tentative agreement signed by our union, if ratified, would end on December 31, 1996. Would the freely negotiated settlement between the TCU, IBEW, RCTC and CP Rail be arbitrarily extended to conform with the legislative requirement for collective agreements with other unions? If this is the government's interpretation, then the TCU must strongly protest.

Our tentative agreement was freely negotiated and settled prior to legislative intervention. We cannot accept legislation that will change the terms and conditions on which we have signed. We request that the TCU, IBEW and RCTC be guaranteed an exclusion from the legislated termination date of December 31, 1997, for collective agreements affecting other railway workers.

Finally, the right to withhold one's labour in order to fight for fair and just working conditions is fundamental to the foundation of the labour movement. While we oppose any move by government to restrict or remove the right to strike, we recognize that sometimes government must act in the public interest and end a strike. We do, however, oppose the government when its defence of the public interest disguises its intent to defend corporate interests, and this is what we believe is the underlying intent of Bill C-77.

In each part of Bill C-77, at clauses 12, 35 and 56, the mandate of each mediation-arbitration commission must take into account:

> ... terms and conditions of employment that are consistent with the economic viability and competitiveness of a coast-to-coast rail system in both the short and the long term, taking into account the importance of good labour-management relations.

It is on this point that we must be very clear: The national railways have put forward the position that employment security provisions of collective agreements must be rescinded in order for their operations to reach financial viability. The government, in the statements made by various ministers, appears to support this position. Therefore we feel the government has shown a bias in favour of the railway companies' demands by its inclusions of clauses 12, 35 and 56 in the legislation. It is our view that clauses 12, 35 and 56 are unnecessary, and we respectfully request that they be eliminated from the legislation.

I thank the committee once again for hearing our views on Bill C-77. I would be pleased to answer any questions that senators might have.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Bujold.

Senator Lynch-Staunton, do you wish to question the witness?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Thank you for your presentation. It was certainly clear and forceful.

Mr. Bujold, how long have you been in labour negotiations on behalf of your union?

Mr. Bujold: I have been involved as an officer of the Transportation Communications Union since 1984.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Based on your personal experience and knowledge of previous negotiations, have you ever seen the employee and the employer so far apart, as you are telling us they are today?

Mr. Bujold: Not only have I been a full-time officer of the union since 1984, I have 31 years with Canadian Pacific. In all that time, I have never seen an issue come between the parties and split them so far apart.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Although you and two other unions have come to some tentative agreements with CP Rail, that is the only positive result of over a year of discussions, off and on; is that correct?

Mr. Bujold: That is correct.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Can we assume that voluntary negotiations between the parties are impossible and that a law is required to put an end to this matter?

Mr. Bujold: I am missing something. I am sorry, but I am missing what you are asking me.

• (1350)

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You may despise being forced back to work, but it appears from what you say that there is no alternative because negotiations between the parties have been fruitless.

Mr. Bujold: The three unions referred to in my submission did reach a tentative agreement with the railways.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Yes, but that is the only bright light in all the negotiations, I gather.

Mr. Bujold: I must suggest that that is correct.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: In this place, we will not amend the legislation. I think we have already gone over our amendment quota, according to the government. However, we certainly want to learn all we can from you, from the employers and from the previous union representatives so that we can contribute to finding a better resolution for these issues without Parliament intervening so often.

Can you tell us exactly how the comments and interventions of the Minister of Transport and of Mr. Axworthy poisoned the atmosphere or affected the relations between the two groups who were negotiating?

Mr. Bujold: First, the Fraleigh report was an extensive report concerning the troubles that would face the railway unions and the companies. However, this report failed to mention that it was the companies who decided, in this round of negotiations, that they would not negotiate with the organizations as a collective group.

In past negotiations, a number of unions came together as an association of railway unions to negotiate a collective agreement. Both companies in this round of negotiations stated that they would not negotiate with them; that they had intentions of negotiating with the organizations separately. In my view, that first created the atmosphere.

When we made an appointment under section 106 of the Canada Labour Code, that effectively put the companies on hold, waiting to see what the CLC report would say.

With respect to Doug Young's comments, for example, at a WESTAC meeting when he referred to the railway workers' representatives having grade 7 or 8 educations and not being able to understand how they could out-negotiate the railways, certainly those comments did not help to set a climate appropriate for collective bargaining.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The big issue is employment security. The rail companies have made it clear that they cannot live with the present form of employment security. In your tentative agreement, how much have you backed off, if at all, from the employment security provisions in the old agreement?

Mr. Bujold: The employment security, as I see it, was negotiated in 1984 as a sweeping employment security provision. To decide now, at this date, to completely remove it from the agreement is, in my view, just not possible.

As an organization, together with the other two organizations, we recognized that we had a fight on our hands here that we could win at the end of the day. We decided then to sit down with the employer, the three organizations, to see what we could do to reduce the effect of the employment security on both railways. We did not completely remove the employment security, but the agreement does contain a number of options for the employees we represent in lieu of moving from location to location.

Our situation is somewhat different because employment security does not work as simply as is being inferred. In order to maintain employment security, a worker may be required to move, for example, from Sudbury to a location such as Toronto. Many of our members would refuse, and indeed many have refused such a move and lost their employment security completely.

Based on those situations, we entered into negotiations with a number of options, and those are contained in the agreements we negotiated. The employment security issue is still there in the agreements yet to be ratified. However, as a last resort, the employee must accept any work right across the CP system in order to maintain his employment security.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: If you have been able to agree with CP on modifications to the existing provisions regarding employment security, why is it that the other union is having difficulty? Is it because of the type of work you do? Why can the other unions not also come to a similar agreement?

Mr. Bujold: The other unions have problems somewhat worse than our own. We represent a total of 20 people who are on employment security, so we were able to address those issues by building into the agreement options for early retirement incentives. However, the unions which have 300 employees sitting on employment security, in Montreal, for example, are in somewhat more difficulty in addressing the issue.

When you talk about the maintenance union members, those people who work on the track, they have also not reached a collective agreement. With the number of gangs and locations involved, they have trouble entertaining the type of agreement that we have entertained, although, in my view, it is probably a good agreement based on the fact that we will likely lose employment security in its entirety for the members in the end. However, their situation is much different from that of the three organizations who have negotiated agreements.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The three unions have these tentative agreements with CP Rail, and the vote is to take place in April.

Mr. Bujold: The vote will be held on April 26, 1995.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: All three unions have the same date.

Mr. Bujold: We have the same ratification date, that is correct.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Of course, the company is on side. They are just waiting for the members' approval. Yet you fear that this bill may tamper with this tentative agreement. When you brought these concerns to the minister, or at least to the Department of Labour, did they react at all? Where the law does not provide for tentative agreements, do you have any verbal assurances that the mediator-arbitrator involved with your bargaining units will recommend something which has already been agreed to between the three organizations and the company?

Mr. Bujold: No, we do not have any such assurances. To bring that point home, I have just returned, with the other two unions, from a gruelling trip across the country, holding massive membership meetings to explain the types of steps we took to negotiate a collective agreement, to explain the political environment out there, as a consequence of the refusal of the other organizations, and to explain the differences in our situations. I say those were gruelling meetings, but I found them to be quite successful.

However, for a bill to be passed now which would do harm to that collective agreement before we can decide whether to ratify, in my view that would do irreparable damage to the three organizations which did sit down and negotiate an agreement based on the political climate and the employment security issue.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: But have you made representations to the department?

Mr. Bujold: No, we have not.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Do you know if CP Rail has made representation? Do you know whether they will also insist that the agreements, tentatively agreed to, will be confirmed or not interfered with by the application of Bill C-77?

Mr. Bujold: I have no knowledge as to whether or not they did.

Senator Stewart: We were told by the president of Canadian Pacific that their company does not enjoy a level playing field with American competition. The reason this matter comes up, Mr. Chairman, is that there is an uneasiness that an effort may be under way to assist the railway companies to overcome this absence of a level playing field in part of their operations at the expense of employees.

What is your impression as to the difference in the circumstances affecting, let us say, Canadian Pacific and its American competitors? Is that a matter on which you would have any direct information?

Mr. Bujold: In my view, one of the things which puts the Canadian railways at a great disadvantage with the American railways is the tax levied on both Canadian railways. I referred to that tax in my submission.

• (1400)

For example, Canadian Pacific, which runs from coast to coast, is required to pay a tax based on its fuel and tonnage haul in each province. That tax is not levied on American roads. That puts Canadian roads at a great disadvantage with the American roads.

Senator Stewart: Your answer presupposes that there are situations where Canadian companies are competing with American companies for the same business. Is it your impression that the volume of business involving American competition with Canadian roads is about the same as it was 10 years ago, or has it increased considerably?

Mr. Bujold: I would say that the competition has increased greatly because of the north-south flow. There is a great deal of traffic in that direction. I do not have the figures. However, a significant amount of traffic has been removed from both railways.

Senator Stewart: Are you saying that in any labour settlement that takes into account the economic circumstances of the railway companies, the fact that there is intense American competition now and that we can anticipate that competition to increase should be a major consideration?

Mr. Bujold: Certainly. However, the point I am trying to make is that there are problems in some of the collective agreements. Changes must be made. If the railways would have proceeded in the manner in which we have negotiated agreements in the past — that is, allowing the organizations to come together to negotiate a collective agreement, as opposed to making a decision to negotiate an agreement with each and every individual union — we may well have arrived at some way of addressing the problems.

When you look at the members we represent you will see that many people need to have 20 years of seniority with the national carrier to be able to hold employment. You must appreciate how the labour force has been reduced. The technology which has affected the railway worker must be taken into consideration.

Senator Stewart: When Mr. Ritchie was here on March 23, I asked him about American competition. He made reference to the difference between labour productivity in Canada and the United States. Speaking specifically of workers who have employment security, he said:

> To bring them up to the level in the United States, we must change the work rules to get rid of the steam-age delineations among the crafts within our shops. Over the years we have not been able to change from pipe fitters, boilermakers and blacksmiths to a composite mechanic, although many of our men and women have these composite skills.

Is this a topic to which your union is sensitive? Is it a topic on which you can be helpful to this committee? What do you say in reaction to what Mr. Ritchie told us?

Mr. Bujold: For obvious reasons, it would be difficult for me to comment on the groups which are represented by the Canadian Auto Workers. My understanding is that they gave a presentation on this bill.

With respect to productivity and the employees we represent, that would not be a true statement because we do not have anyone on employment security. As I said, one has to have roughly 20 years of seniority to hold full employment.

All the clerical people have been centralized in major centres. We do not have people sitting around doing nothing. Mr. Ritchie well knows that if you go into the centres to look around, not a whole lot of time is being wasted. It is tough for me to comment on the shop craft groups.

Senator Stewart: You said that you do not have a lot of people sitting around doing nothing. Do you mean to imply that other unions do?

Mr. Bujold: Not at all.

Senator Beaudoin: At the end of your brief you refer to clauses 12, 35 and 56. Clauses 12 and 56 are of the same nature, while clause 35 is somewhat different. Is it really clause 35 to which you wish to refer, or is it clause 34, which is of the same nature as the two others?

Mr. Bujold: Yes.

Senator Kinsella: I should like to turn to two questions which you have raised in your brief. The first one involves the application of clause 33(1)(b) to your union, given the fact that you have a tentative agreement that is subject to the ratification process. Based on your many years of experience in the labour field, what do you think the government's interpretation of that clause should be?

Mr. Bujold: Our union, the IBEW and the RCTC came together jointly to negotiate that agreement. Based on the environment that we were in and the politics of the day, we firmly believe that having negotiated freely a collective agreement, the government should leave it alone. If ratified, the expiry date that was freely negotiated with the employer should stand.

Senator Kinsella: To what date do you refer?

Mr. Bujold: December 31, 1996.

Senator Kinsella: Mr. Bujold, are there authorities in the labour field in Canada who would argue your position in the same way as you have argued it?

Mr. Bujold: There could be. For many reasons I am not in a position to go into that today. If three organizations sit down with their employers to negotiate collective agreements and a bill to change that relationship is presented, we have to wonder about the reasoning for going through the process.

• (1410)

Senator Kinsella: That provision on page 15 of the bill is discretionary. The minister may defer. The minister does not have to do this. The minister could simply not appoint a commission. Did your executive, and that of your associate union, recommend to the membership that they ratify the tentative agreement which you reached?

Mr. Bujold: Yes, we did.

Senator Kinsella: Given the history of these issues, one would expect that they would be ratified.

Mr. Bujold: That is correct. The legislation kept being changed. Those were real issues with which we had to deal. In some areas, the membership questioned what we were doing when there was legislation in place with the potential to hurt the agreement in the first place.

Senator Kinsella: We expect to hear from the minister later today. On your behalf, we will ask her that question as to their interpretation.

If their best argument for imposing on your agreement the same duration as that imposed through arbitration was to have symmetry, if not to have a period of tranquillity in the industry for two years, what would be your counter-argument to that reasoning?

Mr. Bujold: My counter-argument would be that although these negotiations have probably been the toughest negotiations ever experienced in the railways, these three organizations came to terms and reached a collective agreement. Why would it be any different when our agreements expire in December of 1996?

Senator Kinsella: My colleague Senator Beaudoin has drawn to our attention the wording of clause 12, and we have discussed it with other witnesses who appeared before us on Thursday. Many would argue that it is a good thing that the state has such awesome power to protect the public interest. In fact, you have alluded to that yourself. However, does the interference of the Minister of Transport make the words "economic viability," which appear in this bill, a greater concern than they would have been had there not been that kind of interference, as you perceive it?

Mr. Bujold: Yes. Due to the interference in the collective bargaining process, that wording in the legislation is of great concern.

Senator Doyle: You have given us an account of your differences with the minister, and arguments have arisen over what he said regarding the educational background of both the workers and the union leaders. Without getting into whether he was being reasonable or unreasonable, to your knowledge in recent years has there been any extensive or effective programs to upgrade educational standards, if not within the union leadership certainly within the working force?

Mr. Bujold: First, the comments made by the minister certainly do not receive my approval. I disagree wholeheartedly with what he said. We do have the odd railway worker and the odd labour leader who has more than a grade seven or grade eight education. His statement was irresponsible. It sent the unions the message that we would be greatly scrutinized in this round of bargaining and that the government would take the side of the railways.

Senator Doyle: I am certainly not asking you to take sides. I think it is a reasonable question. Are you aware of any programs underwritten by the railways which consciously appeal to workers to upgrade their basic educational standards?

Mr. Bujold: No, I am not.

Senator Doyle: Thank you very much.

Senator Kinsella: Returning to the phrase "economic viability" in clauses 12, 35 and 54, do you have any difficulty with the concept that in any industrial setting economic viability is an important factor as workers and management sit down to negotiate fair terms and conditions of employment?

Mr. Bujold: Without economic viability in the rail industry, it will be very difficult to operate. We may end up with a number of short lines, such as they have in the United States. There must be viability within the rail industry, or there would be no railway.

Senator Kinsella: What is your greatest fear in terms of the rights of railway workers when one applies that concept or principle of economic viability? Is it your concern, for example, that there may not be fairness because a sector of the industry or a sector of the employment group which is not unionized will do very nicely, whereas those in the bargaining units might not fare as nicely? Is that a concern?

Mr. Bujold: No, not at all. With regard to economic viability of the railway, my greatest concern is that the railways will be allowed to go too far, that the measures taken would be so drastic as to completely eliminate employment security. Employment security was negotiated, and the railways may have to experience some pain in order to reduce their liability with regard to those employees who have it.

That clause of the bill, if enacted, would remove that liability completely. I suggest that such a proposal should require an arbitration process. Taking away the employment security of 300 people and taking them off the payroll of the company would naturally be great for the books. The viability of the company would be that much greater. However, there must be a way of giving these people other work or having them leave the rail industry through attrition. I am very concerned that the enactment of that clause will remove those people from the labour force completely.

Senator Kinsella: I take it that the assumption upon which we will operate is that the commissions will have complete access to the books of the companies in order to be able to apply that principle of economic viability. Do you think that will happen?

Mr. Bujold: I would be surprised if it did.

Senator Kinsella: Is there any way, in your view, in which the commission would be able to apply that principle without looking at the books?

Mr. Bujold: I believe it would be extremely difficult for them to do so. The commissioners would have to know the cost of the workers now on employment security. They would have to know the changes, if any, made to employment security and what that has done to reduce the overall costs of the company. I do not know how the commissions would be able to do that without seeing the books.

Senator Stewart: I realize that this is not a question for which you are the primary source of information, but since you know the industry and you have looked at the bill, it would be interesting to know what you anticipate. The bill makes reference to commissions. That is true even within the CNR or Canadian Pacific. Legally, there are to be several commissions.

For example, do you anticipate that, on behalf of CP, the membership on each of the several commissions will be the same persons? What is the situation with regard to the other companies? If that is your answer for CP, will they all be the same? Will we have 18 different commissions?

Mr. Bujold: I have read the bill, but I have not gone over it with a fine-toothed comb. I am not sure whether the bill would set up a commission on CN Rail, a commission on VIA Rail and a commission on CP Rail, or if it would set up a commission on CP for each and every individual contract out there. It could be that it would set up perhaps 18 separate commissions.

Senator Stewart: Technically, they would be separate commissions. However, the question is whether the personnel would overlap to such an extent that there would really be only one commission. I realize that this question is more appropriate for the minister, but I am interested in your view because of your knowledge of the situation to which the legislation will apply.

Mr. Bujold: Technically, they could appoint several commissions. However, my view is that they would appoint one commission.

The Chairman: Do other senators wish to question the witnesses? If not, it remains for me to thank both witnesses for their appearance here this afternoon.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: Honourable senators, shall I report that the matter referred to the committee earlier this day has been duly considered?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

---

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Your Honour, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred the question concerning the enforcement of the back-to-work legislation, has studied the question and now makes its report accordingly.

Hon. Eric Arthur Bernston (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, does that conclude the pre-study phase?

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): We are grateful to the witnesses who came here for the purpose of examining this very important issue facing the country.

Honourable senators, you heard the House of Commons bells ringing, and I understand the vote is being taken at the present time. In order for us to allow appropriate time for the bill to be received in this chamber, I move that we adjourn during pleasure, to resume at approximately 2:45 p.m.

The Senate adjourned at pleasure.

At 2:45 p.m., the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

MAINTENANCE OF RAILWAY OPERATIONS BILL, 1995

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-77, to provide for the maintenance of railway operations and subsidiary services.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 57(1)(f), I move that this bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

SECOND READING

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government) moved second reading of Bill C-77, to provide for the maintenance off railway operations and subsidiary services.

She said: Honourable senators, we gather here today in a most unusual sitting to consider a law ending a week-long strike which has paralyzed rail transportation throughout this country. We in this house have been prepared to deal with this legislation every day of the past week, not just because it is our job but because it is critical to the public interest of Canadians whom we represent.

It has been a frustrating week, so much so that on Thursday and earlier today we joined in this house to carry out a special procedure during which we heard witnesses from the unions and the railways in advance of receiving the bill. I thank colleagues throughout this chamber for making that process possible. I have no difficulty at all in acknowledging the initiative taken in this process by my friends opposite.

Honourable senators, this process in fact provided key participants in this dispute with an opportunity to appear in an open parliamentary forum to educate parliamentarians and the public on their points of view and disagreements which led to this massive work stoppage. However, it also permitted the Senate to use its cooperative flexibility to ensure that when the House of Commons had sorted out its difficulties, we could move quickly to carry out the final stage of this parliamentary process.

Honourable senators, none of us take any satisfaction from having to intervene in labour disputes. It is, indeed, an admission of failure all around. Every time government and Parliament must choose to force companies and unions back to work, it undermines our collective bargaining system and the confidence in which it is held by Canadians. However, the Parliament of Canada has a mandate which extends to protection of the public interest of all Canadians and the whole country. That is where our responsibility lies today.

All participants in this dispute must be conscious as well of the need to restore faith in the validity of that fundamental labour-management process in the efforts of reconciliation which follow from the provisions contained in this bill.

Last week we had before us legislation to deal with a labour stoppage at the ocean ports in British Columbia involving one employer's association and one union representing less than 500 longshoremen foremen. The dispute we are dealing with today is far greater in magnitude and in consequence.

Bill C-77 is about something much more than merely addressing another failure of the collective bargaining process. It must be seen in the larger context of the economic health of the country. Canada is in the midst of a strong recovery. Since October 1993, 454,000 full-time jobs have been created in this country. The most recent trade figures show that our exports surged 6.2 per cent in January to a record of $22.5 billion, and every day we ship $590 million worth of goods to the United States, our largest trading partner.

At the same time that our economy is showing this new strength, the railways, the heart of Canada's transportation system, are shut down. Our ports are shutting down as goods pile up on the wharves. Our grain elevators are shutting down as cars sit idle on the tracks. Our manufacturing plants are shutting down as the delivery of parts to assembly lines has been stopped. The magnitude of the problem can be better appreciated when one realizes that CN Rail alone normally handles 7,000 carloads of freight every day. It handles 60 per cent of the rail freight in Canada. However, since a week ago yesterday it has not operated a single train.

Every sector of the economy is affected, be it agriculture, forestry, mining, manufacturing, tourism, oil or gas; be it a steel mill in Regina, an automobile assembly line in St. Thomas, pulp and paper plants in Quebec, a gypsum pit in Nova Scotia, or the closure of the Lantic sugar refinery in New Brunswick.

All members know the impact that a rail strike has on agriculture. The total cost of the disruption for the grain industry could be as much as $100 million per week. Our international reputation as a reliable grain supplier is being seriously undermined, coming as it does after the strike of last year at the West Coast port. This is particularly true in Japan and in the Pacific Rim. During the period from April to July, we had anticipated weekly grain exports of approximately 630,000 tonnes. Obviously, this will not be achieved if the grain cars are stopped from reaching our ocean ports.

The loss of production to the Canadian economy could run into billions of dollars. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association, as has been noted in this house, estimates $3 billion to $5 billion in lost production in a single week. In addition to its impact on rail freight, this dispute has shut down all rail passenger traffic.

We are part of a national Parliament that has a responsibility to act when faced with a national problem, particularly one of such magnitude. Unfortunately, as has been shown in the past week, not all parliamentarians share this view. Last Monday, in the other place, when the government sought unanimous consent to introduce Bill C-77, it was denied by the members of the Bloc Québécois and, at the time, the New Democratic Party. After the bill was introduced the following day, consent was again denied. Last week, day in and day out, consent was denied. On Thursday, the New Democratic Party belatedly came on side, but the members of the Bloc Québécois, whose goal is the separation of Quebec from Canada, continued their opposition to this measure, right up until today when the procedural clock ran out.

Every hour of every day, as progress was blocked, the consequences, both economic and social, mounted. More workers were laid off, more companies shut down, more ships turned away from our ports, and our international reputation again was jeopardized. None of this apparently moved the Bloc Québécois. Even in the face of the damage being done to the economy of Quebec, the workers of Quebec, and the people residing in their ridings, they remained adamant. Canadians in every province should therefore have no illusion about why the trains are not yet running and why everyone was not back at work. The vast majority of the members of this Parliament were willing to act in the national interest and in the interest of their regions, but the members of the Bloc Québécois were not. This should not be forgotten.

As a Liberal government, we believe in the collective bargaining process. We view the role of government as that described in the preamble to Part I of the Labour Code of Canada, which reads:

> ...the Parliament of Canada desires to continue and extend its support to labour and management in their cooperative efforts to develop good relations and constructive collective bargaining practices, and deems the development of good industrial relations to be in the best interests of Canada in ensuring a just share of the fruits of progress to all...

The underlying spirit of the Labour Code is that the government attempts to facilitate an agreement between the parties, and only as a last resort does it ask Parliament to intervene.

In the current rail dispute, as we all know, there are three large employers: CN Rail, CP Rail, and VIA. There are seven major unions: The Brotherhood of Maintenance of Railway Employees; the National Automobile Aerospace Transportation and General Workers Union of Canada, otherwise known as the CAW; the United Transportation Union; the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; the Canadian Council of Railway Operating Unions; the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; and the Transportation Communications International Union. Approximately 32,000 workers represented by these unions are on strike, locked out, or laid off because of work stoppages.

This government, as well as the former administration, went to some lengths to facilitate an agreement. There were some successes. On March 12, CP Rail concluded a tentative settlement with three of its unions, representing 2,900 employees. This settlement was reached with the assistance of the federal mediation and conciliation service. If that settlement is ratified, it will not be subject to Bill C-77.

Unfortunately, agreements could not be reached between the railway companies and the other unions. Briefly, most of the collective agreements that existed between the railway companies and unions expired on December 31, 1993. The exceptions are certain contracts between shop craft employees and CN Rail which expired on December 31, 1991.

Well before the expiry of the other collective agreements, the parties entered into a normal collective bargaining process in an attempt to renew those agreements. The negotiations continued even after the agreements had expired, but it soon became clear that outside assistance would be needed if the negotiations were to progress.

Requests were made to the Minister of Labour for conciliation officers. Conciliation officers were, in fact, appointed for a number of disputes, beginning on February 18 of last year with the appointment of a conciliation officer for CN Rail and the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees in their negotiations.

Generally speaking, the conciliation officer process did not prove successful. The conciliation officers, upon the conclusion of their efforts, presented their individual reports to the minister. Largely on the basis of those reports, a conciliation commissioner, Mr. Allan Hope, was appointed in November 1994. He met with the parties, he examined their submissions and then presented his own report last month.

• (1500)

Although Mr. Hope did not evaluate their negotiating positions, he did conclude:

> That it was apparent that a multiplicity of hard and complex issues divided the parties, and, on the merits, their positions were defensible and understandable, albeit in diametrical opposition.

Mr. Hope made it clear in his report that what made the negotiations complex and difficult was the firm and opposing positions the parties were taking on the issues of employment, security and work rule flexibility.

The companies are demanding changes to reduce costs and remain competitive. They claim that many provisions of the expired collective agreements are antiquated and that ultimately at risk is the continued viability of our railway system. For the unions' part, work rule flexibility means the loss of seniority rights and the deterioration of trade training and trade skills. As for employment security, the unions argue that it is a benefit they achieved in the collective bargaining process in exchange for concessions and tradeoffs in other areas. It is a fundamental disagreement on these two issues that has resulted in the nationwide shutdown of the railways.

Honourable senators, during a short period following the presentation of Mr. Hope's report to the parties on February 22, negotiations resumed, but on March 8, the Brotherhood of Maintenance and Railways began a series of rotating strikes against CP Rail in Northern Ontario. On March 13, the company locked out the employees who participated in those rotating strikes.

On March 17, CP Rail locked out members of the CAW, who refused to cross the picket lines established by the Brotherhood of Maintenance and Railways Employees. This led to more strikes, refusal to cross picket lines, more lockouts and ultimately what we have today, which is a disruption of economic activity in every part of Canada.

Honourable senators, Bill C-77 will end that disruption and establish a process for concluding new collective agreements between all parties. The bill is divided into three parts pertaining to CN Rail, CP Rail and VIA Rail. All three parts, which come into effect 12 hours after Royal Assent, call for the immediate resumption or continuance of railway services.

Honourable senators, the bill provides for the establishment of 20 separate mediation-arbitration commissions involving the three railway companies and the various union bargaining groups. While mediation-arbitration commissions have not been used before in federal emergency legislation, the dispute resolution technique of mediation-arbitration has been used on six previous occasions. Most recently, it was used in the back-to-work legislation for the West Coast ports, which called for the appointment of a single individual as a mediator-arbitrator. It was also found in the 1991 legislation dealing with the Thunder Bay grain dispute.

However, in this case, instead of a single mediation-arbitrator, we will have commissions, as recommended in Mr. Hope's report. The appointment of the chairpersons of the commissions will be made by the minister. The employers and the unions are expected to each nominate one member to the appropriate commission. The legislation says that the minister may defer establishing such a commission where a union and a company have reached a tentative agreement. Otherwise, the commissions will be established when the act comes into force.

Within 70 days of appointment, subject to an extension by the minister, each commission is required to: mediate the matters in dispute between the parties after hearing the parties; arbitrate any issues remaining in dispute following mediation; where necessary, establish a new collective agreement; and fix the termination date of the new agreements, which shall be no earlier than December 31, 1997.

Honourable senators, nothing in the bill precludes the parties from amending any provision of the new or amended collective agreements except for the provisions dealing with their date of expiry.

The last provision is one that was talked about at length during our Committee of the Whole hearings; that is, clause 12 of the bill which provides that each commission will be guided by the need for terms and conditions of employment to be compatible with the short- and long-term economic viability and competitiveness of a national rail system, taking into account the importance of good labour-management relations. We heard much evidence on this clause. Clearly, the railways believe it will be beneficial to them, while the unions are convinced that it has the potential to prejudice their positions during the upcoming mediation-arbitration process.

As I was listening, honourable senators, I reflected that we may have been hearing a somewhat simplistic interpretation by both parties on a clause which is meant to strike a balance between the needs of the companies to remain competitive in a changing transportation environment and the duty of the unions to obtain the best possible deal for their members. A competitive and viable railway system is in the interest of all Canadians, including the railway companies, the railway workers, and their unions. A 1994 study commissioned by CN and CP concludes that the financial health of the railways depends on an improved operating margin. This requires increasing revenues, as well as reducing operating expenditures, of which labour costs are one element. However, as we have heard from witnesses on both sides in the last few days, it is only one of the elements.

That being said, clause 12 does not and is not intended to direct the commission to arrive at any particular result, neither in relation to employment security provisions nor any other term and condition of employment of railway workers. The unions and the companies will have a full opportunity to present their views to the commission on what terms and conditions of employment would be consistent with both economic viability and good labour-management relations. It is only if the parties are unable to agree on these issues during mediation that the commissions — which each include a representative of both companies and labour — will be required to arbitrate. Clause 12 directs no particular result, but it gives a clear indication of the factors which the commissions must consider in their discussions.

Honourable senators, this is a balanced and fair approach to resolving the difficult issues the parties are facing. The government hopes that during the mediation process the parties will be able to fashion a balanced agreement which provides a fair deal for the workers and enhances the ability of the railway companies to remain competitive.

Honourable senators, back-to-work legislation is never the government's preferred option in any labour dispute. However, if we learned anything from our hearings in Committee of the Whole on Thursday and today, it is that in this instance, there was no alternative in the end. Mr. Tellier agreed with my honourable friend, Senator Lynch-Staunton, that the unions and the railroads are at an impasse. Mr. Gary Fane, of the Canadian Auto Workers said:

> It was inevitable that we would end up here.

He complained that, as far as VIA Rail was concerned, "We have had absolutely no quality collective bargaining."

• (1510)

Mr. Terry Ivany, the President of VIA Rail, expressed similar pessimism, but from his company's point of view, when he remarked:

> ...I came here today reconciled to the fact that there is no hope that reasonable people can agree on a solution to a problem that we all identify.

Mr. Tim Secord, Legislative Director of the United Transportation Union, described how labour relations at VIA and CN Rail have deteriorated. He also agreed with Senator Lynch-Staunton that there is a complete impasse between employer and employees.

Mr. Rob Ritchie, President of CP Rail, said, "We continue to believe that a negotiated settlement would have been preferable to all parties, but this simply was not possible."

The testimony we heard from all the witnesses reflects the findings of Mr. Hope, who concluded that the parties are at an impasse and that bargaining has not advanced to any significant degree beyond the original exchanges of position.

The mediation-arbitration process will give the parties that fair and serious chance to come to a meeting of the minds. We have learned already from our witnesses that both sides have put forward proposals to deal with the very difficult issue of employment security. In his testimony, Mr. Ritchie of CP Rail said clearly, "We are not seeking to eliminate employment security."

After explaining how his company came to terms with three other unions, Mr. Ritchie said:

> It is arguable that the employment security package which we are trying to negotiate is one of the richest packages still available in Canadian industry. We are willing to do that in order to arrive at a negotiated settlement.

On the other side, we heard from Mr. Fane of the CAW, who said:

> On the employment security question, the union has proposed at least 10 or 11 different changes directed at diminishing the company's liability. Our people do not want to sit at home and get paid to do nothing.

There certainly appears to have been an effort to address this issue. When the mediation process established by Bill C-77 begins, the parties will not be starting from zero. There will be a real opportunity to reach a negotiated settlement. However, if mediation proves unsuccessful, then new collective agreements will be fashioned through an impartial arbitration process.

Honourable senators, there really is no other alternative to what we are being asked to do today. The parties are at an impasse. The entire country is paying the price. Through Bill C-77, we are addressing the responsibilities that fall to us when the failure of collective bargaining results in very serious harm to the national interest.

It is in this context, honourable senators, that I would urge all members of this chamber to give expeditious approval to this legislation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, in the fifteen and one-half years that I have been a member of the Senate, this is the thirteenth time that we have been called upon to pass legislation to end a labour dispute. I introduced approximately six or seven of those bills as Leader of the Government in the Senate. Perhaps I should not admit it even at this late date, but during most of the time that I served in government, I was chairman of the ad hoc committee of cabinet on labour relations.

Thus, these bills for me, as for many honourable senators, have a familiar ring. Because the most recent such bill was passed here only 10 days ago relating to longshoring on the West Coast, the speeches on both sides of the house on these occasions also have a familiar ring to all of us.

That being said, no two cases are entirely the same. I wish to thank the Honourable Leader of the Government for her thorough presentation in which she placed before us the background and rationale for this bill and its provisions. In particular, I think it was important that she describe, as she has done, the dimensions of the economic damage done to the country by a strike of this kind, thus emphasizing the need for the government to act promptly, as it has done. I think there will be general agreement among honourable senators for just about everything she has said in this regard.

Honourable senators, there are unique and quite special circumstances surrounding Bill C-77. I intend to comment on them. First, I wish to say a word about the role of the Minister of Labour, that of the government, and that of Parliament in these situations. It is always, by law and by tradition, a positive role in the promotion of industrial peace. For the Minister of Labour, it is an activist role. Read section 107 of Part I of the Canada Labour Code which gives the minister additional powers to ensure the promotion of sound collective bargaining practices and industrial peace. Whether it is being played by Parliament, the government or the Minister of Labour, the role is always intended to be an impartial one, to be neutral as to the issues, and objective as to the parties and the issues.

Earlier, in her speech today, my honourable friend placed on the record part of the preamble to Part I of the Canada Labour Code, which is a statement of Parliament's intent and the spirit in which Parliament oversees labour relations in the federal jurisdiction. That is always intended to exclude any sense of partisanship as to the issues and the parties involved. It makes no difference whether the dispute is in the private sector or the public sector. The role of the Minister of Labour — and, for that matter, of the government and Parliament — is the same. That is to say, it is an impartial role.

It must be acknowledged, however, that there are very severe pressures on the Minister of Labour, when, for example, the employer is the department headed by her ministerial colleague the President of the Treasury Board, as happens when the dispute involves the federal public service as a party. Even when the employer is not the government directly but, rather, a Crown corporation such as Canada Post, CN Rail or VIA Rail, the Minister of Labour cannot be unaware that cabinet colleagues who have responsibility for those Crown corporations have an obvious interest in the outcome.

Then there is the overall responsibility of the cabinet and of the government for the economy of the country; there is the concern of the Minister of Finance, and others, as to the impact of any dispute and the settlement of any dispute on the financial requirements of those Crown corporations and, therefore, on his own bottom line, on the government's deficit.

All these factors were present in the current situation, as they frequently are. Now, as always, the Minister of Labour, as a result, has a delicate balancing act to perform to maintain the credibility of her own role and that of her department, as well as the impartiality and the integrity of the process. I say, and I will return to this later, that the present minister has done this very admirably in the circumstances.

The present situation facing the minister, the government, Parliament and ultimately the mediation-arbitration commissions that will be appointed under this bill, is especially complex because the main issues in the negotiating process are part of a much larger picture. That picture is the future structure of the railway industry in Canada, its place in the transportation sector, the links between that and the economic competitiveness of our country as a whole. We have had abundant evidence on these points, notably from Mr. Tellier, Mr. Ritchie and Mr. Ivany, the representatives of the railway companies.

It occurred to me as long ago as Thursday, when Mr. Tellier was testifying, to ask myself whether we are trying to resolve all of these longer-term questions in the course of passing a back-to-work bill. It would be dangerous for us to think that we are doing that, or to send a signal that we expect that to be done. This legislative train can only carry so much freight. We should be aware of our limitations, and of the limitations of this legislation and the process.

The larger picture to which I refer is not yet in focus. The policy framework is not yet fully settled by the government, and the railways cannot fully decide on their future course. We know that fundamental changes are coming, but we do not know exactly what they will look like.

The problem for the unions is that they see themselves as being told that they must contribute now to this process and that they must contribute substantially by making major concessions when they do not know what further changes will be imposed upon them by events in the not-too-distant future. I think their apprehension is understandable enough.

The report of the conciliation commissioner makes frequent reference to this policy vacuum, or partial vacuum — if a vacuum can be partial. He refers to the recommendations of various commissions and committees which the government has in hand, notably the 1992 report of the Royal Commission on National Passenger Transportation, the Parliamentary Task Force on the Commercialization of CN Rail, and the National Transportation Act Review Commission of 1993. These reports, says the conciliation commissioner:

> ...incorporate criticisms of certain of certain of the collective agreement provisions that are seen by analysts as a bar to what is described as a need to "rationalize" the national rail network, particularly on CN rail and particularly in Eastern Canada. What policy the Government has developed or is developing in response to those criticisms, and the impact those policies will have on these disputes, is not known by the parties and is the subject of disruptive speculation.

Again and again the conciliation commissioner returns in his report to this problem of coming changes, still unknown but bearing upon the negotiations. Thus, on page 15 he says:

> The absence in bargaining of a specific plan for rationalization, coupled with the suspicion, if not the implication that such a plan is either being developed or is under consideration, had a chilling effect on the Unions with respect to their willingness to negotiate with the Railways.

On page 55 he says:

> ...the uncertainty with respect to Government policy was a major distraction in bargaining.

On page 56 he says:

> ...none of the parties were in a position to address the implications of Government policy in terms of the collective bargaining issues raised between them. However, it was clear that Government policy could have a profound effect on those issues.

He later says:

> Vital collective bargaining questions arise with regard to those recommendations that can only be answered in the context of Government policy.

I do not know whether it is bad luck or bad timing — probably both — that this round of collective bargaining should take place at a time when change, transition and rationalization are all in the air, but the exact form that this change will take is still in the future; the policy context on the part of the government, undetermined.

This is one matter in respect of which I do not fault the Minister of Transport. I think it is clear that if Mr. Young had his way, these matters would all be resolved by now in the way he wants them resolved, and we would be well down the road to the kind of rationalization he believes is necessary. To say that he has been "jawboning" the issues is a classic understatement. In his frustration with his inability to move the system fast enough or far enough, and perhaps in his frustration with his inability to move his cabinet colleagues far enough or fast enough, he has been lashing out at labour practices which are regarded as an obstacle to the kind of railway rationalization that he wants to see.

Regardless of the merits of the minister's case, his timing could not have been worse. His rhetoric, as usual, is in many cases excessive and found to be offensive. Mr. Young has what some sports commentators call "an attitude." Whenever I think of him, the name of Chris Chelios of the Chicago Blackhawks comes to mind. One is tempted to say that the Minister of Transport is his own worst enemy, but at the rate he has been accumulating enemies, there will be serious competition for that title.

In any case, Mr. Young, the Minister of Transport, broke with the tradition of government neutrality. I counted 15 references in the conciliation commissioner's report to what Mr. Hope calls "the partisan role played by government in supporting the position of the railways." This, honourable senators, is unprecedented. This aggressive approach by the Minister of Transport turned a negotiating climate that was bad, perhaps awful, into one that was impossible. It has made the role of the Minister of Labour infinitely more difficult. It has put a cloud over this legislation and over our parliamentary debate, and it has perhaps put a cloud over even the mediation-arbitration process that will follow passage of this bill.

Honourable senators, if Mr. Young and the government really believed that they knew what the new contract should look like, especially with regard to the complex issue of employment security, perhaps they should have brought in a bill imposing a new contract. That is not something I would advise a government ever to do, but there is some precedent for it, and at least they would have had the courage of their convictions. However, honourable senators, Mr. Young and the government do not know, any better than you or I, what kind of an employment security regime will be appropriate and accepted. They do not know. The minister really should have been quiet about this.

We are now in a position where Parliament and the parties must put our faith in the mediation-arbitration commissions and in that process. Why, then, make that process more difficult? The unions are apprehensive that the government, Parliament, perhaps even the commissions, are not being as fair and as even-handed as tradition and the law would have it. I believe that is why the Hope report suggested a rather elaborate process in two stages, which might last as long as six months, to try to arrive at a resolution. The government decided on a shorter time-frame, but there is nothing to stop the commissions from proceeding in the way suggested by the conciliation commissioner, Mr. Hope.

The unions, are concerned about clause 12 of the bill, which I confess at another time and in other circumstances would seem to me to be quite innocuous. The unions are concerned that clause 12 has been put there to tilt the mediation-arbitration process in favour of management's argument. I must say that Mr. Tellier, with his usual candour, and Mr. Ivany and perhaps Mr. Ritchie, certainly the president of CN and the president of VIA Rail, all indicated that they think clause 12 is pretty important.

When my honourable friend, the Leader of the Government, tells us, as she told us today, that the purpose of clause 12 is to strike a balance between the approaches of the two sides, I have to tell her that that effort, so far as clause 12 is concerned, has failed. I believe it has failed because management testified on the matter here and they were in favour of clause 12, while the unions testified here were opposed to clause 12 and quite apprehensive about it. Further to that, I must say that my limited research has not indicated any similar provision in previous legislation.

Honourable senators, I hope that when Minister Robillard is here for Committee of the Whole she will make her position clear on this matter and give the necessary reassurances as to the neutrality, the objectivity and the impartiality of the process to be launched by this legislation. In this connection, we have had a reasonably good start with the assurances of the Leader of the Government as given in her speech.

I do think, honourable senators, that it is important to state that the Department of Labour's excellent reputation for fairness and impartiality has been maintained throughout this difficult period. The conciliation commissioner, reporting to the former minister, Mr. Axworthy, stated as follows:

> I can confirm that you and your officials have maintained the traditional posture of strict neutrality and objectivity in dealing with the disputes. In fact, your officials, under what I know to be your direction, proved to be of great assistance and guidance to the parties and to me in what must have been very trying circumstances. I want to say in particular that Warren R. Edmondson, Director General of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, and T. G. Hodges, Regional Director, FMCS, facilitated and coordinated the Commission proceedings, all the while retaining a clear sense of propriety and scrupulousness consistent with the role of the ministry and the standards required to maintain the credibility of the process.
> Mr. Edmondson seconded Mr. Hodges to the Commission for the duration of its proceedings and did so with an appreciation for the confidentiality imposed on Mr. Hodges that required him to be released from his usual reporting responsibilities. It quickly became apparent that Mr. Hodges, who has an extensive background in the mediation and conciliation role in the railway industry, enjoys the trust, respect, and high regard of all of the parties, a circumstance which speaks positively for the standards your Ministry has been able to maintain through what I am sure has been troubled times.

This is quite high praise from Mr. Hope. I am sure it is well deserved. I think it is important to place that on the record, especially in view of the other circumstances to which I and others have referred, notably the damaging interventions of Minister Young in this matter.

Honourable senators who were here on Thursday for Committee of the Whole will recall that Mr. Fane, representative of the Canadian Auto Workers, made a point of expressing confidence in the new Minister of Labour's integrity, openness and fairness. I saw in yesterday's newspapers that two other union leaders, Mr. "Buzz" Hargrove, also of the CAW, and Gary Housch, the vice-president of the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Workers, were quoted in the same vein with regard to the new minister, Madam Robillard. This is of great importance for if ever the parties lose confidence in the impartiality of the minister, the department or the integrity of the process, we will be in dire straits indeed.

Honourable senators, in voting for this bill, we are not voting for a railway rationalization plan which is still a matter of future policy. We are not voting on the privatization of CN Rail because there is no such proposal before us. We are not voting for changes to the configuration of VIA Rail because these have not been decided. We are not asking the mediation-arbitration commissioners to anticipate these developments or to prepare the way for them. This would be too great a burden to place on these commissions and on this process.

I hope it may be possible, honourable senators, for these commissions to achieve a greater measure of consensus on some of the changes that are necessary to bring about the restructuring which we all know is inevitable and to do so in a way which ensures the long-term health and viability of the industry. However this cannot be done by fiat. It can only be done over time. It requires that the entire policy framework be established so that the parties and the public will be able to plan and act coherently.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question regarding the Honourable Senator Murray's presentation. At the beginning of his speech, he made what I think is an extremely important assertion. He repeated several times that the government, the opposition, the railway companies and the unions really do not know and have not demonstrated what the fundamental changes in railroading in Canada are likely to be. Therefore, the unions are very apprehensive as to what their share will be in coming to an agreement.

• (1540)

You have acknowledged that all of this is true and that we are not quite sure what to expect. Would the honourable senator give an undertaking to join with other senators in determining the future of railroading requirements for Canada?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I would be glad to do that if the Senate wishes to embark on such an undertaking. I must observe, however, that the government does not lack for recommendations, including recommendations of parliamentary committees and royal commissions on the future profile of the railway industry and, indeed, the transportation sector.

[ Senator Murray ]

Senator Olson: There are many recommendations, but in order to put a package together, you must accept some recommendations and reject others. We must do that and do it fairly soon, or we may find ourselves without a comprehensive structure in the railway system of Canada. Would the honourable senator help us? Obviously he has had a lot of experience, as chairman of the committee, in cabinet, and in observing the situation since.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, again, there is a lot of interest in these matters on both sides of the chamber. I am sure we would all be well disposed to taking part in any inquiry that looked like it might help resolve some of these issues.

The Hon. the Speaker: It was moved by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, seconded by the Honourable Senator Graham that, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), this bill be read the second time now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to Committee of the Whole.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

---

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, the Honourable Eymard G. Corbin in the Chair.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would ask that the Honourable Lucienne Robillard, Minister of Labour, be invited to participate in the deliberations of the Committee of the Whole.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Pursuant to rule 21 of the Rules of the Senate, the Honourable Lucienne Robillard, Minister of Labour, was escorted to a seat in the Senate chamber.

Senator Fairbairn: Mr. Chairman, I welcome once again the Minister of Labour to our midst. We are delighted to have you here, but we are sorry that it is so soon after your last engagement. We hope that with all your efforts in this portfolio, we will watch you from afar and not frequently in this chamber. We are glad to have you. Perhaps you could introduce your officials to the senators.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-77, an act to provide for the maintenance of railway corporations and subsidiary services.

Shall the title be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause one, the short title, be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: The committee is now on clause 2.

[Translation]

Madam Minister, would you care to make a statement?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour): Perhaps just a few words to say that I was very disappointed when, as the Minister of Labour, I had to bring in back-to-work legislation a second time, this time for the railway sector.

We all know that the bargaining process in this sector is extremely complex and that negotiations had been going on for many months, in fact, more than a year. Since the majority of the collective agreements had expired by the end of December 1993 and the parties usually start negotiating before expiration of the agreement, we had since that time made every effort to give the parties the support they needed to reach an agreement.

First, a conciliator was appointed to help the parties negotiate, but we did not get any tangible results. Subsequently, a conciliation commissioner, Mr. Hope, was appointed last November. For several weeks, Mr. Hope tried to reconcile the parties. His report was transmitted to the parties on February 10, 1995.

After that, we continued our efforts to help the parties negotiate an agreement. From the very beginning it was clear the unions wanted to put pressure on Canadian Pacific only. They started rotating strikes in Ontario and later in other provinces. However, there was no such action at Canadian National or VIA Rail.

At this point, I made it very clear to the parties that I did not intend to bring in back-to-work legislation, since operations continued. During that time, an agreement in principle was reached between Canadian Pacific and three unions representing more than 3,000 employees. At that point, I had reason to expect that they would manage to negotiate with the other unions as well. However, that was not the case. Negotiations have reached an impasse.

I met with the parties after all work stopped at Canadian National and VIA Rail last Saturday. On Sunday afternoon, this time last week, I met officials from the three railway companies and representatives of the unions involved — to ask them if they could not come to an agreement on each of the issues dividing them or at least agree on the dispute resolution process that would be binding on them, to prevent me from having to bring in legislation. Unfortunately, the parties did not reach an agreement, and thus this bill had to be introduced.

Mr. Chairman, this bill forces the resumption of railway operations at all three companies within 12 hours of the bill receiving Royal Assent and provides for the appointment of an arbitration commission in respect of each of the bargaining units. The new feature introduced in this bill is the fact that there is not only one person, a mediator-arbitrator, but three persons in the commission: a president appointed by the minister and one representative from each of the two parties. This is an all new process.

This could bring the parties together and allow mediation to succeed because mediation is the first step before the commission has to make an arbitration decision on the matters in dispute. Once it is appointed, this commission has 70 days to achieve concrete results. We deemed it necessary to formulate guiding principles for this commission. We mentioned that throughout the mediation and decision-making process, the commission must take into account the economic viability and competitiveness of the business, as well as the importance of good labour-management relations. This is a new labour relations provision.

We have always thought that the mediator-arbitrator had to take these two elements into account in his decisions. I think it is always better for legislators to clarify their intentions, as we did in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I will not belabour the consequences of this work stoppage which started one week ago. The economic consequences are enormous in every line of activity which depends on the Canadian railway system. Indeed, not only are the railway system, workers and employers affected, but also the industries which rely on that system to get the materials they need to operate.

The economic impact is enormous everywhere in the country. In the case of VIA Rail, the situation has an impact on passengers, particularly those who commute on a daily basis. Under the circumstances, and considering the enormous impact on the Canadian economy, the government had no choice but to introduce this back-to-work legislation.

I urge the parties to try to find a solution to the dispute. Clause 10(8) of the bill allows the parties to reach an interim agreement, or at least to agree on the conflict resolution process, which would make it unnecessary to establish a mediation-arbitration commission.

These are the main elements of the legislation. I will be pleased to answer any questions.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Again, we welcome you, Madam Minister, even though you are here for the same reasons as two weeks ago. It is always a pleasure to welcome a member of the cabinet. You seem to have found solutions or proposals that are slightly different from those in Bill C-74.

As you know, a few days ago we had witnesses representing the employers and the unions. As well, two union representatives have appeared today, all of which has given us an opportunity to discuss the principal grievances with them. In totality, the situation is most disturbing. There is an absolute impasse between the two parties. The parties themselves are not completely unanimous internally. That being the case, there is still a major impasse and a chasm which must be breached somehow. I would like your comment on whether the role of government is one of the reasons for the poor atmosphere that exists in the labour negotiations.

All I will do is quote —

[English]

Senator Murray has already alluded to this in his second reading speech, but I would like your comment on the validity of this comment by Mr. Hope. It states on page 53, paragraph (a):

> The controversial and provocative aspect of the demands is found in the partisan role played by Government in supporting the position of the Railways and the tenacity with which the demands have been pursued.

My question is this: Do you agree with Mr. Hope that the government has played a partisan role?

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: I think it has always been obvious that the government wanted to maintain a viable and competitive rail system in Canada. At the same time, they believed that collective bargaining was the best way to settle disputes.

I think that the two sides of my reply are not at all contradictory. All efforts were made to help the parties reach an agreement. Mr. Hope was very clear on that point when he said that this industry is a very complex one. Even as commissioner and conciliator, he could not make specific recommendations on each point at issue. Instead, he made recommendations on the process itself and said it would be better for the parties themselves to find a solution to each point in dispute.

I think governement actions show that we agree entirely with this philosophy.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That does not answer my question. On page 58 of the French version, paragraph a), Mr. Hope describes the provocative aspect of the demands of the railways, whih he blames on the partisan role played by the government in supporting their position.

Mr. Hope is telling us in a very straightforward manner that the Government of Canada supported the demands made by the railways from the very beginning. Is Mr. Hope right in saying so?

Mrs. Robillard: You know very well that, as Minister of Labour, I never sided with unions or management. I have always tried to act impartially, and it was never intended to rule on the demands of the companies or those of the unions.

Therefore, I do not accept the allegation that the government sided with company management. I feel it is important to always remain impartial and to do everything necessary so that both parties can reach an agreement. It is always very difficult for someone to pass judgement without having taken part in the bargaining process.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I do not wish to insist, Madam, but you have not answered my question.

No one is questioning your neutrality, you have only been here for a few weeks. This dispute has been going on for months. Mr. Hope, who was asked to study the issue, handed in his report on February 6, before you were sworn in. What I am asking is this: Having reviewed the matter, do you agree with what he says in sub-paragraph (e) on page 75? He says:

> What is new is the aggressive stance of the government with respect to those issues and the implication that government policy favours the railway to the point of contemplating the imposition of the terms sought if they cannot be achieved in bargaining.

Mrs. Robillard: Mr. Chairman, I think you have before you proof in the form of the bill being studied that the government does not wish to impose working conditions for each matter still to be settled.

Furthermore, the government also does not take a stand on the issue of whether the principle of job security for workers should be re-evaluated. I can only conclude that the government has remained faithful to its policies, which are to put faith in the collective bargaining process and to keep the railways viable and competitive.

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: This law is more important than any interpretation, accurate or not, of what Mr. Hope says. You are not denying directly that there was partisanship on the part of the government during at least part of the negotiations. I hope we keep that in mind whenever a similar problem arises.

I should like to go to clause 12 of the bill, to which you have referred, which states that under any proper negotiations, the commissioner or the arbitrator must look into economic conditions. That is there in case he forgets.

How do you explain the fact that the unions are adamantly opposed to clause 12, while the employers are enthusiastic about it? If it is taken for granted, then why would the unions ask us to take it out, if we had the power to do so, while the employers practically pleaded to keep it in? It seems by that attitude that one party is slightly more favourable than the other.

Mrs. Robillard: Mr. Chairman, since this bill was tabled in the House of Commons, I have heard a number of different interpretations of clause 12. The interpretations have come from management, the union and the Bloc Québécois in the House of Commons.

I must say that in listening to these different interpretations, I had the impression that people did not really understand the intent of the legislator. Allow me to explain a little why we introduced this clause.

I think everyone knows that the best job protection possible is the certainty that the employer is competitive. I think everyone agrees with this.

Clearly, today's most successful companies are those that are competitive without losing sight of the importance of properly managing their human resources.

In the context of human resources management, this also means harmonious labour-management relations, as demonstrated, I think, by these competitive companies.

We are also very aware that various internal and external factors can affect the economic viability and competitiveness of a business. These factors may have to do with the quality of management or the financial management of a business, railway regulations or the economic environment in which a business operates. All these factors affect the viability and competitiveness of a business. We must not forget, however, that employment conditions are among these factors.

In this case, what we, as legislators, tried to do in clause 12 is to clearly indicate to both parties that they must come to terms with these realities.

This clause has been misinterpreted. It does not require the commissions to achieve specific results with regard to job security clauses, for example, or any other employment conditions.

I think that there is nothing keeping the unions and the employers from telling the commission what employment conditions, in their opinion, are consistent with economic viability and good labour-management relations.

No goals have been set. The factors which the commission must take into account in its proceedings and decisions are identified.

We must never forget that the duty of the commission is first and foremost to try mediation before resorting to arbitration.

The fact that not only the economic viability and competitiveness of the business but also the importance of good labour-management relations must be taken into account is, I think, fair to both parties.

That is what clause 12 means. I cannot understand how one can infer from this clause that the legislator is bent on taking away the workers' security of employment.

If that is what a company head construed it to mean, he is wrong. Similarly, if a union leader gave it the same interpretation or if anyone thinks that working conditions can be set without taking into account the economics of the company, I think they are deluding themselves, particularly in today's business environment.

The point is, Mr. Chairman, that when issues are referred to it in the future, the arbitration board should take these two factors into consideration.

Senator Murray: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Chairman.

The problem, Madam Minister, is that, for many of us, this is the first time we see such a mandate included in this kind of bill.

Are there precedents?

Mrs. Robillard: There are none, senator. It is something new.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: When speaking at second reading, the Leader of the Government did refer to a report submitted by CN and CP saying that unless their operating costs could be brought under control, the future of the railway industry in Canada would be in jeopardy; and under operating costs are labour costs.

Clause 12 arose from this report, if I am not mistaken. We are entitled to think that it is there for the employers rather than for the employees. At any rate, it is my impression.

I have two more questions. Usually, in back-to-work legislation, reference is made somewhere to the conciliation commissioner's report.

• (1610)

Bill C-74 states that if mediation fails, then the arbitrator must take cognizance of the conciliation report. In Bill C-77, by not being mentioned, it is dismissed out of hand. Surely there are many things in the Conciliation Commission report that could be of great value. It is all very well to say that they will take them into consideration, but clause 12, you state, was always there, although it was never written. Why do we not specify that the report must be considered at a certain stage?

Mrs. Robillard: Mr. Chairman, as I said, clause 12 was not written in to assist employers. I want to be very clear on that issue.

As minister responsible, who gave instructions on the drafting of the bill, I want it to be very clear for the honourable members of this house that this was not our goal.

The goal was to provide for balance, when decisions affecting labour relations are made, between good union-employer relations and the viability of the enterprise.

I think that an arbitrator making decisions that would threaten the survival of a firm would not help the workers either. It is with that in mind that this clause was drafted.

As for the second part of the question, that this bill does not require reading the Hope report, unlike the bill we examined a while ago on the ports of the West Coast, and the report of the commissioner-conciliator on the West Coast ports — which contained very specific recommendations on how to settle each aspect of the dispute — there are no recommendations on each aspect of the dispute. The recommendations focus on the process instead. This is why we did not think it was necessary to include such a clause in the bill.

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Clause 16, which I think is also new for back-to-work legislation reads:

> No order shall be made, no process shall be entered into and no proceeding shall be taken in any court
> (a) to question the establishment of the Commission or the appointment of any member of a Commission or;
> (b), to review, prohibit or restrain any proceeding or decision of a Commission.

Therefore, decisions of the commissions are final. No matter how they are arrived at or whether or not they follow their mandate, there is no appeal. Is that correct?

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: This clause is inspired by section 86 of the Canada Labour Code which contains a similar provision for conciliation commissions. When we consider the situation as such, we realize that the mechanism of mediation-arbitration commissions is also unusual in that this is the first time we will have an arbitration commission consisting of three members. The mechanism is far more complex and the time allowed is very short, it is only 70 days.

The purpose of this clause is to prevent anyone from starting dilatory legal proceedings that might paralyse the work of the commission. However, there is always a possibility for the courts to intervene with a judicial review, if the rules of natural justice are violated or a jurisdiction is manifestly exceeded.

Hence, it is always possible to appeal to the courts. However, considering the complexity of the situation and the new mechanisms we are using in this bill, we felt this clause was necessary.

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I do not understand — unless the government is on a "no access to the courts" kick — why the complexity of a problem is grounds for refusing the assistance of a third party in case of a dispute? If that is the only reasoning — the problem is complex, therefore give complete discretion to those to whom we entrust with finding a solution and forget any outside review — it is certainly a strange way of bringing the parties together.

It is very clear.

> No order shall be made, no process shall be entered into and no proceeding shall be taken in any court.

[Translation]

In French, it reads as follows:

> Il n'est admis aucun recours ou décision judiciaire visant à ...

[English]

Everything is covered in (a) and (b). There have been complex problems before which have been touched by back-to-work legislation.

The complexity in this matter is influenced by the fact that the government intervened openly and rudely in the early stages and brought in a bias in favour of the employer. There are clauses here which appear to favour the employer. Then they bring this in and plead complexity in order to refuse any ability, in case a commission does not follow its mandate or goes beyond its mandate, for a court to at least hear whether there is any substance to the claim.

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: Mr. Chairman, my colleagues tell me that privative clauses do exist. They can be found regularly in many acts, including the Canada Labour Code, in order to protect the finality of the decisions rendered by the Canada Labour Relations Board, for example, or by grievance adjudicators. Therefore, they may be used in legislation.

I will say again that given such a clause, a proceeding for judicial review is always possible.

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: If we have time, perhaps we can come back to that point.

The Chairman: I do have a number of names on the list. You have been speaking for over 20 minutes.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I apologize.

The Chairman: You do not have to apologize, but the normal rule is 10 minutes for each senator. You can come back as often as you wish, but I think perhaps at this stage we ought to move on.

Senator Stewart: As I understand your bill, Madam Minister, we could end up with 20 commissions. However, I am assuming that the intention is that there will be an overlap of personnel. How many chairpersons do you anticipate you will appoint?

Mrs. Robillard: Exactly, senator. Theoretically, the bill provides for the establishment of 20 commissions. Why? Because there are seven bargaining units at Canadian National, seven at Canadian Pacific and six at VIA Rail — 20 bargaining units in total. So that each party can be represented in the process, employers as well as unions, we provided for 20 commissions.

However, the bill allows for the appointment of only one chairperson or three. For example, in the case of Canadian Pacific, one person could represent the employer. As for the union, the same person could represent two bargaining units. This is more or less how we think these commissions could operate.

The bill is quite flexible in that it allows for the appointment of one, two or three chairpersons.

[English]

Senator Stewart: Clause 12 relates to CN Rail. There are similar clauses for CP Rail, number 34, and one for VIA Rail.

Madam Minister, you just now told the committee that it was not your intention that either of the considerations mentioned would be dominant. Now let me give you my impression of how I would interpret the message of Parliament in clause 12 if I were one of your commissioners. Clause 12 states:

> Each Commission shall be guided by the need for terms and conditions of employment that are consistent with the economic viability and competitiveness of a coast-to-coast rail system in both the short and the long term...

Taking into account the importance of good labour-management relations, at least in the English version the emphasis is on the first part — it "shall be" guided by the requirement for economic viability and competitiveness. Then we have "taking into account," which of course is adjectival.

Let me ask you first, why do you use the expression "a coast-to-coast rail system"?

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: The main goal is to have a viable and competitive coast-to-coast rail system. For a system to be competitive, several elements must come into play. At the same time, good management of human resources, resulting in harmonious labour-management relations, is a must.

I know very few businesses which can stay in operation for a long time without good management of human resources. Therefore, human resources management is a part of competitiveness.

[English]

Senator Stewart: Excuse me, minister, but would you please focus on my question? Why use the phrase "coast-to-coast"? I assume one meaning may be that you do not want each region to be dealt with independently. Is that what you mean by the phrase "coast-to-coast"?

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: I believe it is clear that Canadians want a coast-to-coast rail system. We do not want to favour one region over another. We want to maintain the current system.

[English]

Senator Stewart: Does this exclude the U.S. portions of the remaining systems? When you use the expression "coast-to-coast," I immediately think of the old concept of east to west within Canada. It seems to exclude those parts of the systems which are south of the border. Is that intended?

Senator Doody: Or parts of Canada that do not have a railway system.

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: Honourable senators, I have difficulty grasping the meaning of the question. First and foremost, I am referring to the system which we presently have in Canada. I am saying that we must maintain our coast-to-coast system.

[English]

Senator Stewart: Could you tell us what you mean by "long term"? Is that three years, five years or seven years? These are the terms of the commission's authorization. What does the word "long" mean in this context?

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: Honourable senators, clearly we do not want our Canadian railway system to survive only in the short term. When we say "long term," we mean many years from now. We want this system to remain. We want it to survive and I do not intend to put a limit to what I mean by "long term." It seems to me that it is quite clear.

[English]

Senator Stewart: The commission must look ahead and impose terms and conditions which will be consistent with competitiveness for an infinite period of time. Is that not a rather difficult assignment?

Mrs. Robillard: Honourable senators, the mediation-arbitration commission will first try mediation, successfully I hope. If it has to rule on work conditions, we have clearly indicated that the collective agreement will be effective until December 31, 1997, at least.

Should the commission rule that the new collective agreement will be valid until December 31, 1997, I hope that in future, for subsequent collective agreements, the parties will come to an agreement. You know that railway companies and their unions managed to sign collective agreements before.

Let us take one step at a time. We are aiming for a three-year collective agreement.

[English]

Senator Stewart: The immediate date of expiration can be no earlier than December 31, 1997. However, in a situation where the chairperson decides the terms of the agreement, what is the outer limit? Is it five years after December 31, 1997, or two years or one year or ten years? Parliament is giving tremendous power here. It would be nice to know how far it reaches into the next century.

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: There is no limit indicated in the bill. That is very clear.

[English]

Senator Stewart: That is what I feared.

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: If I may, I will complete my answer. As for the way mediators-arbitrators were used in the past, in terms of limit, they were usually limited to the time frame specified in the act. That is the minimum. Our collective agreements usually are for three or four years.

• (1630)

Senator Kinsella: Madam Minister, I wonder if you could explain the relationship between clause 10(8), which you mentioned in your presentation, and clause 32(8).

Mrs. Robillard: They are exactly the same. That is because the bill is divided into three parts: the first one deals with Canadian National, the second one with Canadian Pacific, and the third one with VIA Rail. The clauses are exactly the same, except for the bargaining units, which are identified at the beginning of each part.

[English]

Senator Kinsella: Madam Minister, with regard to the TCU, the IBEW and the RCTC, which I understand have reached a tentative agreement, can you guarantee us that you will wait before appointing a commission, at least until the ratification date set by those agreements has been reached? We were told it will be no later than April 26.

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: Honourable senators, if the ratification date is April 26, as the unions and the company have indicated, yes, I can give you my word that no mediation-arbitration commissions will be appointed.

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Would that also include the expiry date of the contract? It does not coincide with the expiry date in the legislation before us.

Mrs. Robillard: Yes.

Senator Kinsella: Therefore, if those agreements are ratified and they provide an expiry date of December, 1996, notwithstanding this legislation, that will be the expiry date for those contracts, not December 19, 1997, as provided for in the bill.

Mrs. Robillard: Exactly.

Senator Kinsella: Returning to clause 12 and taking into consideration the economic viability, will the commissions have authority to demand from the parties all data which the commissions deem necessary in order for the commissions to measure economic viability, whether that would mean looking at the books of the companies or looking at data surrounding the demands of the employee groups? What power will the commissions have to help them measure economic viability?

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: Honourable senators, the commissions will have that power. Their powers are mentioned in clause 13 of the bill: first, the power to obtain all the information they consider necessary; and second, if they so desire, to engage the services of technical advisers and other experts and assistants to help them carry out their mandate.

[English]

Senator Kinsella: Are you looking for additional information?

Mrs. Robillard: No, that is fine.

Senator Kinsella: During our prestudy of this matter, we heard from witnesses who expressed a fair degree of distress throughout the negotiating process. They said that throughout the discussion, the Minister of Transport, Mr. Young, had interfered with the bargaining process by way of inflammatory comments. They gave examples.

We also heard from witnesses who felt that you have done an excellent job in maintaining the neutrality appropriate for the Minister of Labour. We laud you for that. However, you represent the government. In the minds of the parties, you have a colleague who has interfered in a biased and inflammatory manner.

We are using the extraordinary power of the state to interfere with the normal collective bargaining process in the name of public interest, which you as a member of government are responsible for measuring. We understand that. However, can you give this house some assurance, so that those witnesses will have some degree of comfort, that the Minister of Transport will not further interfere in the collective bargaining process in an inflammatory fashion?

Mrs. Robillard: Honourable senators, it is clear that the mediation-arbitration commissions operate completely at arm's length from the government.

I may add that in order to further guarantee the neutrality and impartiality of the chairpersons of the commissions, the chairperson is appointed by the Minister of Labour and the two other parties each appoint a representative. I intend to appoint members of the judiciary as chairpersons of the commissions to ensure that we have the requisite neutrality and impartiality during the commissions' proceedings.

[English]

Senator Kinsella: Are you in a position to reassure this chamber that you will not be consulting whatever with those candidates you will be appointing?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I think they all have jobs by now anyway.

Mrs. Robillard: The appointment of chairpersons is the exclusive responsibility of the Minister of Labour.

Senator Murray: I have only one question. I would like to go back to a question asked earlier by the leader of the opposition regarding the absence in the bill of any provision requiring the mediation-arbitration commissions to take into account the report by Commissioner Hope. You replied that Mr. Hope had not made specific recommendations on the issues in dispute.

However, I note that Mr. Hope provided a rather extensive and balanced analysis of the differences separating the parties. I find the commissioner's report very useful.

I would ask you if you agree that the mediation-arbitration commissions would do well to take into account Commissioner Hope's report, without being legally obliged to do so.

Mrs. Robillard: I believe that Senator Murray has answered his own question. Any chairperson is perfectly free to read the Hope report, which is in the public domain. There is no obligation, however, to take it into account in the arbitration decision.

I assume that whoever is appointed chairperson will certainly read the Hope report. You can see that in the bill before us, the Hope report has also influenced the legislator — with respect to the composition of the mediation-arbitration commission, for instance.

Senator Beaudoin: My question relates to clause 16, the clause prohibiting proceedings.

You said that this clause was used in other legislation, which is true, but that it would not prevent a court process if, for example, something was against fundamental justice or beyond the mandate of the jurisdiction involved. If this is correct, I have really no problem with clause 16, because if a commission were to go beyond its mandate and against fundamental justice, the matter could be taken to court according to labour law precedents.

Mrs. Robillard: Mr. Chairman, this is exactly what my legal adviser, Pierre Hamel, was saying.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, a supplementary question.

Could you give us the particulars of previous bills where such a clause appears?

Senator Beaudoin: You referred to the Canada Labour Code, did you not?

Mrs. Robillard: For example, for grievance adjudicators — and my legal adviser tells me that in their case the clause prohibiting proceedings is even stronger — or for the decisions of the Canada Labour Relations Board, there is a prohibiting clause.

Senator Beaudoin: In any case, there are precedents.

[English]

Senator Andreychuk: Madam Minister, you have said that you believe the process will be fair to both employees and management. However, the Hope report has pointed out some difficulties. Minister Young has created difficulties. A simple reading of clause 12, rather than a legalistic one, indicates that the process is weighted in favour of the economic viability of the operations rather than in favour of what I perceive back-to-work legislation is supposed to be about, that is, an agreement on the employee-employer relationship.

I returned only minutes ago from the west. Most of the workers on the railway there are convinced that because of these previous actions, and particularly because of the wording of clause 12, the process is weighted in favour of management rather than the employees. Consequently, they think it is not a fair process.

How will you counteract that assertion? I know you have said that you have a certain interpretation of clause 12, but you will not be the commissioner. You will simply appoint the commissioner. How will you dispel that attitude of workers out west, keeping in mind that Canadians universally want the railways to resume operations quickly?

Mrs. Robillard: The sought-after goal, which is a viable and competitive rail system, is shared by both labour and management.

The means to reach this goal may differ. However, I do believe that labour is in total agreement with the goal being sought, which is a viable and competitive rail system. This may be the best way to protect jobs in the long run.

Regarding the interpretation to be given to clause 12, which is entirely new, I do hope that the members of every commission will read the official report of the debates to be apprised of the legislator's intent.

Earlier today, in the House of Commons, at the third reading stage of the bill, I explained the goal the legislator is pursuing in clause 12. I believe the commissions can be guided by the statement I made during the debate in the House of Commons.

The last point I would like to make is that I do understand the concerns labour has regarding this clause. I am fully aware of them. I believe that each commission chairperson will have to be very carefully selected and that the expertise of commission members will be crucial. I can assure the members of this house that I will take particular care in the selection of those who will be called to chair these commissions.

[English]

Senator Andreychuk: With regard to your interpretation of clause 12, I remind you of what Senator Stewart said. You are putting economic viability first and taking into account the good labour-management relations. However, what if your interpretation that this is a fair balance is not that of the commissioners? Their interpretation may be the same as mine; that is, that economic viability comes first. There is also clause 16. How do you conclude that a commissioner would accept your interpretation of clause 12 rather than mine? How do we overcome that impasse in light of the structuring of clause 16 and the Canada Labour Code?

Mrs. Robillard: As far as clause 16 is concerned, I had the opportunity to clarify its impact and consequences.

As for clause 12, it is also clear to me that several factors, other than just employment conditions, have an influence on the viability and competitiveness of a company. There are several factors, and I certainly do not think that employment conditions are all that matters.

As I mentioned earlier, there is the quality of management — the financial management of the company. The nature of the company is even a factor. The whole field of regulation in the rail sector and Canada's economic environment are among the factors that have an effect on the competitiveness of the company. Included in these factors are conditions of employment. For a company to remain competitive, it is essential that it manage its human resources well. I would see that as interrelated.

Again, when you look at clause 12, there is no specific direction given to the commission regarding the issues in dispute between the employers and the unions. There is no requirement that job security be abolished so that the business can be economically viable. This is not what clause 12 says. If a company director reads this into it, he is mistaken.

Some companies are economically viable and have job security, so that conclusion is not automatic. In his deliberations or when arriving at an arbitration decision, a mediator-arbitrator must take both these factors into account. Nor can he ignore the viability of a company, because if the employment conditions are such that the company goes bankrupt, I do not think that anyone will be any further ahead.

Senator Andreychuk: I must admit that when I first read clause 12, I did not have as much difficulty with it as I do now that I have started to understand the railway sector. The dilemma is that we do not know what constitutes economic viability of a rail system in Canada. That has plagued us for decades. We are trying to move this system, which started with steam engines, into the 21st century.

• (1650)

Madam Minister, you will be asking the commissioner to determine what the economic viability of a rail system is from coast-to-coast, et cetera, long term and short term, when in fact the managers of the respective railways have not come to a definitive agreement or understanding of what that means, nor have we in public policy. Economic viability depends very much on what we want the railway to do. Those are government issues that have not been answered yet. How will the commissioner be able to handle this monumental task? That is yet to be explained to me.

You have the respect and confidence of the union and the management by taking a hands-off, neutral approach while remaining supportive. I give you my compliments on that. However, I would have hoped that you would have given the commissioners that same hands-off competence to interpret clause 12 as creatively as they can, because that is the only way this clause will work.

Today you have indicated what you believe clause 12 says. I find it difficult to understand how the commissioner will be able to handle this situation in a fair, uninterrupted or untampered way so that union and management will be assured that their problems will be resolved in a neutral environment.

Mrs. Robillard: Mr. Chairman, I do not have anything to add to the comments I have already made on this issue. I will only say that, right now, both the unions and the employers are concerned about economic viability. This is not a new issue for the unions, nor for management. Their interpretation may differ, but their concern is the same.

I do hope that they can express their respective views before the commissions and that the commissions will propose fair solutions.

[English]

Senator Andreychuk: Are you giving the assurance that it will be the commissioners who will ultimately interpret clause 12?

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: Yes, absolutely.

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: There were amendments in the House confirming that all three agreements come into effect 12 hours after Royal Assent. In the original text, only CN Rail was liable for immediate return. CP Rail and VIA Rail would be left up to the minister. Why was there a change in your calendar? What prompted you to have two different dates? Why was it decided to make the dates uniform?

Mrs. Robillard: You are quite right when you say that, in the initial bill the return-to-work order going into effect 12 hours after Royal Assent only applied to Canadian National. In the case of Canadian Pacific and VIA Rail, it was to be at a time set by Order in Council.

I must say that when I tabled the bill in the House, I thought it would pass very rapidly with the support of the Bloc Québécois. This, however, was not the case. This past week, the situation at Canadian Pacific continued to deteriorate.

I introduced amendments to the bill before the committee after receiving a clear indication that Canadian Pacific was forced to stop its operations on other lines. Since the beginning of the strike, Canadian Pacific had managed to maintain its services by using foremen. However, as early as Wednesday, the company had to stop other lines which were operating and made it very clear that within three or four days it would no longer be able to keep any lines in operation. It then became clear that no lines would remain in operation. This is the reason for the changes I introduced.

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You have agreed that if the ratification vote on April 26 confirms the agreement between the TCU, IBEW and the RCTC with CP Rail, the government will respect that agreement. However, what if amongst the many bargaining units and the three employers there is a willingness for some to get together voluntarily? Will the government respect that return to the table, or will it apply the law despite that willingness to get into collective bargaining again?

Mrs. Robillard: As you see, pursuant to clause 10(8), if both parties come to an agreement before I appoint the mediation-arbitration commission, then we could recognize the agreement reached without having to —

There is a seven-day delay before I appoint the commissions. I will inform both parties that they have to appoint a representative. The parties will have at least seven days to negotiate a tentative agreement or an agreement on the process itself. They will still have that opportunity to settle the dispute before the commissions are set up.

[English]

Senator Stewart: I asked earlier why you put in the expression "coast-to-coast." Does that mean in the case of CN Rail, for example, the entire system, which would include its lines south of the border?

In the case of Canadian Pacific, and I am sure it is true in the case of CN Rail, we were told by Mr. Ritchie that its competitiveness is affected by the regulatory situation in the United States, and it is affected also by taxation on property and fuel. I am interested in ascertaining whether the government is trying to establish a level playing field in which the companies will be viable and competitive. What is intended with regard to the circumstances in which viability and competitiveness are to be sought?

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: This is a very relevant question because it shows, Mr. Chairman, that several elements, besides the terms and conditions of employment, affect a company's competitiveness. I think this is pretty clear. The senator mentioned a number of points that confirm this statement.

The senator is certainly aware that, when Finance Minister Paul Martin recently tabled his budget in the House of Commons, the Honourable Minister of Transport also introduced a document on the new orientation of Transport Canada and the 1995 budget.

This document clearly indicates that the federal government is developing a detailed plan to renew the rail industry, a plan to revitalize the services and their marketing, to cut down on management, operation and labour costs and to reduce government regulations. I would imagine that the Minister of Transport will also take into consideration the issues raised by the senator.

Senator Stewart: If I understood what you told the committee earlier, Madam Minister, a decision by a commission is final.

Mrs. Robillard: Yes.

Senator Stewart: You have told us that there is likely to be more than one commission. I hope I am being haunted by unwarranted fears. However, you have told us that there may be different interpretations of clause 12. Let us suppose that the commission that deals with CN interprets those words one way, while the commission that deals with CP comes up with another conclusion. How will that be overcome? Or will they chat with each other?

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: Under the bill, I can appoint three different chairpersons. Right now, I intend to appoint one chairperson for both CN and CP, and another one for VIA Rail.

[English]

Senator Stewart: That is an assurance upon which we can rely. Presumably you come to that idea because you foresee the possibility of diverse interpretations of the criteria.

Mrs. Robillard: You can certainly trust this minister.

[English]

Senator Stewart: Yes, but I want to know what the words are. Is it one chairman or two?

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: I will repeat that I intend to appoint the same chairperson for CN and CP, and another chairperson for VIA Rail.

[English]

The Chairman: Honourable senators, that completes my list of questioners.

Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, shall clause 3 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 8 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 12 carry?

Some Hon. Senators: On division.

The Chairman: Shall clause 13 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 14 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 15 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: On division.

The Chairman: Shall clause 17 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 18 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 19 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 20 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 21 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 22 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 23 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 24 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: We are now in Part II of the bill.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Mr. Chairman, if you wish to avoid calling the remaining clauses, I would ask you to record "on division" for clauses 34 and 56.

The Chairman: Is it your wish to show a recorded division on those two clauses?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Yes, as well as clauses 38, 56 and 60.

The Chairman: In that case, is it agreed, honourable senators, that clauses 25 to 33 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 34 carry?

Some Hon. Senators: On division.

The Chairman: Shall clauses 35 to 55 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Kinsella: For greater clarification, clauses 46 and 68 are as amended with the insert into the bill that we have received.

The Chairman: Yes, that is taken for granted. The problem is that there was not time to reprint the bill. We are talking about the bill as adopted by the House of Commons. That should be clear.

Senator Murray: That refers to all the amendments made, does it?

The Chairman: As far as I know, yes.

To recap, honourable senators, clause 56 is carried on division. Clauses 57 to 59 are carried. Clause 60 is carried on division. Clauses 61 to 68 are carried.

Shall Schedule I carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall Schedule II carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall Schedule III carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Before leaving the committee, honourable senators, I wish on your behalf to thank the minister for her cooperation.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

---

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Your Honour, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-77, an act to provide for the maintenance of railway operation and subsidiary services, has examined the said bill and has directed me to report the same to the Senate without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(b), I move, on behalf of Senator Fairbairn, that the bill be read a third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL

26 March 1995

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that The Honourable Antonio Lamer, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 26th day of March 1995, at 5:15 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

Yours sincerely,

Anthony Smyth
Deputy Secretary, Policy, Program and Protocol

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

That the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide have power to sit at 3:30 o'clock in the afternoon, Tuesday next, March 28, 1995, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Would the honourable senator advise us if she has consulted in this matter with the vice-chairman of the committee, the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, and does she have her concurrence?

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, yes, of course I have. We set up a schedule of meetings, and this would be the sixth meeting we have scheduled for the coming week. If we meet Tuesday afternoon, it may not be necessary for us to meet Tuesday evening. We have three evening meetings and three daytime meetings scheduled at this point.

I may say, I was informed there is a display notice on the television which says that we are meeting at 8:30 tomorrow morning, and that is certainly not correct.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, March 28, 1995, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

---

The Hon. the Speaker: We will now adjourn to await the arrival of His Excellency, the Deputy Governor General.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Antonio Lamer, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate said:

> I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to cause Letters Patent to be issued under his Sign Manual and Signet constituting the Honourable Antonio Lamer, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, his Deputy, to do in His Excellency's name all acts on his part necessary to be done during His Excellency's pleasure.

The Commission was read by a Clerk at the Table.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

> An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and the Income Tax Application Rules (Bill C-59, Chapter 3, 1995)
> An Act respecting an agreement between Her Majesty in right of Canada and the Pictou Landing Indian Band (Bill C-60, Chapter 4, 1995)
> An Act to amend the Department of External Affairs Act and to make related amendments to other Acts (Bill C-47, Chapter 5, 1995)
> An Act to provide for the maintenance of railway operations and subsidiary services (Bill C-77, Chapter 6, 1995)
> An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act (jury service) (Bill C-216, Chapter 7, 1995)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

---

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 28, 1995, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, March 28, 1995

The Senate met at 2:00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

NEW SENATORS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received certificates from the Registrar General of Canada showing that the following persons, respectively, have been summoned to the Senate:

Rose-Marie Losier-Cool

Céline Hervieux-Payette

INTRODUCTION

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there were senators without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senators were introduced; presented Her Majesty's writ of summons; took the oath prescribed by law, which was administered by the Clerk; and were seated:

Hon. Rose-Marie Losier-Cool, of Bathurst, New Brunswick, introduced between Honourable Senators Fairbairn and Corbin.

Hon. Céline Hervieux-Payette, of Montreal, Quebec, introduced between Honourable Senators Fairbairn and Kirby.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the honourable senators named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the Constitution Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

• (1410)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is with great pleasure that I welcome two new senators to this house, Céline Hervieux-Payette, from Quebec, and Rose-Marie Losier-Cool, from New Brunswick.

[English]

Senator Losier-Cool brings to the Senate an extensive background in education. She was a teacher for 21 years at Népisiguit High School in Bathurst, New Brunswick. She has also served on a number of boards and associations related to education and to women, both nationally and provincially, including the Canadian Teachers Federation and l'Association des enseignantes et enseignants francophones du Nouveau-Brunswick, of which she was the first woman president.

She is vice-president of the New Brunswick Advisory Council on the Status of Women. She has a special interest, which she was relating to me just yesterday, in ensuring that young women have fair opportunities to present themselves for success in the workplace.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I know that Senator Losier-Cool's vast experience will continue not only to serve New Brunswick well, but the entire country and each of us in this house.

[English]

Senator Hervieux-Payette is a lawyer who has had an active and distinguished career in politics, business, and community affairs. Many of us have known her well since 1979 when she was first elected as a Member of Parliament for the riding of Mercier in Montreal.

In 1984, she was appointed our first Minister of State for Youth in Canada and has carried on that interest to this day as a governor of the Montreal Youth Chamber of Commerce. She also served as Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. In the context of events these days, it is interesting to note that she was the minister who initiated Canada into its strong leading role in the sports drug testing program.

Honourable senators, throughout her career, Senator Hervieux-Payette has remained adamantly attached to Canada, has valued Canadian unity above all, and without a doubt will serve this house and this country with vigour, passion and intelligence.

[English]

I welcome both new senators, and I look forward to working with and being educated by them. I hope they will enjoy this place and that it will become another element of their very productive careers.

• (1420)

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this side of the chamber is pleased to join with the Leader of the Government in welcoming two new colleagues and wishing them well as they assume their new responsibilities. It is certainly encouraging to see the Prime Minister adopt a pattern set by some of his predecessors, particularly by Mr. Mulroney, in appointing to this place a Canadian with no attachment to political parties.

Honourable senators, it is certainly the case of Senator Losier-Cool, who was very definite about this after her nomination was announced, insisting that she was accepting it on behalf of those who are not involved in politics.

Her remarks in the areas of education and the status of women, areas in which she has been actively and successfully involved for many years, will have even greater weight since they will not be tinged by partisanship. In fact, while being officially under the banner of the government party, she will soon realize deep down inside that keeping away from Liberal policy will only give her greater credibility in the performance of her duties.

The same cannot be said of Senator Hervieux-Payette, who sat in the other place and was a cabinet member.

That being said, we must recognize that it is perfectly legitimate for those who take an active part in the politics of this country, at whatever level of government, to let the upper house benefit from their experience.

Senator Hervieux-Payette has a reputation for speaking her mind. Someone went as far as likening her rapid-fire delivery to the pecking of a woodpecker. We will recall in particular the non-equivocal stand she took on the repatriation of the Constitution and the Meech Lake accord. We therefore look forward with special interest to benefiting from her proverbial out-spokenness, especially as Quebec is about to embark in a referendum campaign in which she will no doubt want to play a key part, alongside former members of the Quebec government who are now sitting in this place and in the other place.

[English]

Once again, colleagues, welcome, and best wishes for success in the important role you have been called upon to play.

THE LATE JOHN PETER HUMPHREY

TRIBUTES

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I always made sure to attend the annual conferences organized by John Humphrey, at McGill University, under the title John Humphrey Annual Lectureship on Human Rights.

On the evening of March 7, at McGill, I was listening to the vibrant tribute paid to John Humphrey by another distinguished Canadian legal scholar, judge John St-John Macdonald, from the European Court of Human Rights. Little did I know then that I was seeing my colleague John Humphrey for the last time. He was obviously frail, but his clear thinking and his sharpness were intact when he addressed the audience.

John Humphrey was an eminent jurist, a prolific author, a law professor, a dean, a top international official and a remarkable human being. At McGill, he told the audience that he did not want to be remembered personally, adding that we should instead think of his joint efforts with others to promote human rights.

That thought reminds me of what Jean Monnet once wrote. In his memoirs published in 1976, he said that he did not really try to become "someone," but to do "something." This is precisely what John Humphrey did. He was a pioneer in Canada; he accomplished a lot and his legacy will be a lasting one.

He wrote the first draft of the 1948 Declaration of Human Rights, which is more and more often referred to as the Magna Carta of the 20th century.

John Humphrey set up organizations and foundations which will last. He wrote a lot and he made a difference throughout the world.

In recent years, all kinds of honours were bestowed on him, both in Canada and at the United Nations. These honours were well-deserved.

The 20th century may have witnessed two world wars, but it also saw the promotion of human rights. John Humphrey is among those who made a significant contribution to promote fundamental rights in the world. He was a great man.

We offer our deepest sympathy to his wife, Dr. Margaret Kunster.

I will conclude by quoting a line from Benjamin Franklin, which so accurately reflects John Humphrey's ideal:

[English]

> God grant that not only the love of liberty but a thorough knowledge of the rights of man may pervade all the nations of the earth, so that a philosopher may set his foot anywhere on its surface and say: 'This is my country.'

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, it was John Humphrey who taught us that:

> ...whenever authority has become insensitive, arrogant, or abusive, or is illegitimate, or is foreign, or because it has lost contact, or indeed never had any contact with the people, under such circumstances, men and women will always struggle for their rights and freedoms.

A native of New Brunswick, this great Canadian has left us with many lessons to be used in the ongoing struggle for the protection and promotion of human rights. His greatest achievement was to have been an architect of the United Nations Universal Declaration on Human Rights, which was proclaimed by the General Assembly on December 10, 1948, a common standard of human rights for the world community and which many have called the "Magna Carta of the 20th century."

Honourable senators, Canada and Canadians were very proud that Professor Humphrey was the first director of the United Nations Division of Human Rights where, for some 20 years, he guided the UN's human rights work around the world. This was the period in which the International Covenants on Human Rights were prepared, as well as the number of special human rights instruments. As former Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim observed:

> These historic international instruments will furnish the United Nations and its members important tools for the achievement of one of the main objectives of the charter of the world Organization — the promotion of human rights for all, without discrimination.

Honourable senators, the struggle for human rights and the struggle against the abuse of authority has a great tradition. It includes the long and successful struggle of the commons — and the barons — against the English Crown; it is adorned with names like Locke, Milton and Burke; and it counts among its trophies the Magna Carta, the Bill of Rights, and habeas corpus. From this century, we can add the name Humphrey and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Honourable senators, it was my deep privilege to have known John Humphrey as a collaborator and friend for some 30 years. His life was built on the recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family, which form the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world. His mission was to work to ensure that human rights be protected by the rule of law. His epitaph might well be the words of Article I of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights:

> All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

Hon. Sharon Carstairs: Honourable senators, I do not rise to speak about John Humphrey because I did not know him. However, I heard him on the radio last year when he spoke about the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the United Nations. I was awed by what he had to say about the importance of the rights of the individual.

SOUTH AFRICA

ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW PARLIAMENTARY SYSTEM

Hon. Sharon Carstairs: Honourable senators, I rise today because I have just had an experience with which I think John Humphrey would have been content. It has been my privilege to spend the last two weeks working with provincial members of Parliament from South Africa. In two seminars, one held in Caladon and one held in Bloemfontein, elected members of seven provincial parliaments, three in one session and four in the other, met together to discuss the parliamentary system of government.

They are engaged in the challenge of establishing their own uniquely different parliamentary system. They welcomed knowledge of Canada's system, while recognizing at the same time that their model must be for them, made by them, and will therefore be different from that which we have established in this country.

Honourable senators, members of all the elected South African parties were represented. The ANC, the National Party, the Democratic Party, the Freedom Front, the Inkatha Freedom Party, all sent representatives to one or both of the seminars.

The seminars were sponsored by IDRC as part of the Governance Project, the funding for which comes from CIDA. IDRC used the services of the Parliamentary Centre here in Canada and the Institute for Democratic Action in South Africa.

In addition to my presence, the Honourable John Bosley, former member of Parliament and former Speaker of the House of Commons, was there, as was Bob Miller, the Deputy Director of the Parliamentary Centre, as we exchanged our ideas on parliamentary government with the South African parliamentarians.

Honourable senators, I have to tell you that I was filled with awe and respect for these dedicated elected officials. They have put aside their personal animosities, their anger, their bitterness, and in some cases their rightful outrage in order to work together to continue the miracle which is South Africa in 1995. Their difficulty is heart-warming and, quite frankly, inspiring.

As someone who has always understood and been the beneficiary of democratic principles, it is difficult for me to sit down and ask a young man in his early 30s how he managed to be placed on the ANC list for their proportional representation. A black man, he was a little grim as he replied to me, "Perhaps 11 years of internment helped me to make the list." This was a man who had gone to jail at age 18 for participating in a student riot. He was released at the age of 29. He has now been elected to one of the provincial parliaments. It was hard to know what to say to him after that.

I have returned with a better understanding of our parliamentary system, but also of theirs. Above all, I have returned with enormous respect and admiration for all in South Africa who work in a spirit of reconciliation in their government of national unity at both the provincial and the federal level.

NATIONAL FORUM ON HEALTH

APPOINTMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE FROM METROPOLITAN TORONTO

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, on October 27 in Question Period, I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate why Metro Toronto had been ignored, forgotten or snubbed by the Prime Minister in his formation of the National Forum on Health.

With 44 hospitals, including some of the country's great teaching institutions, it seemed only sensible that a 22-person panel, chosen to spend $12 million in pursuit of challenges in Canada's health care system, should have representation from the city of Banting and Best.

Good intentions were never doubted. The government has an inexhaustible supply. What about lights, camera, action?

Honourable senators, I am able to report today that Mr. William R.C. Blundell, a businessman from Toronto, has joined the forum. Mr. Blundell has served on advisory committees to the Ontario and federal governments, and is a director of a number of Canadian corporations.

I congratulate Mr. Blundell and the Prime Minister. Most of all, I congratulate the Leader of the Government in the Senate for her intervention. My leader thanks her, my city thanks her, and I thank her.

To show our gratitude, at the proper time later today or this week, I will ask Senator Fairbairn three more questions to demonstrate our continuing curiosity about the National Forum on Health.

THE ESTIMATES, 1994-95

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (D) PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the eleventh report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Fiance concerning the examination of Supplementary Estimates (D) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1995.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day, and that it form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Doody, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

SIXTEENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the sixteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, requesting that the committee be empowered to incur special expenses pursuant to the procedural guidelines for the financial operation of Senate committees.

I ask that the report, together with its appendices, be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Kirby, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

[ Senator Doyle ]

ADJOURNMENT

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, March 28, 1995, at one thirty o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY RIGHTS AND THIRD WORLD AGRICULTURAL DEVELOPMENT—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I give notice that on March 30, 1995, I will call the attention of the Senate to the document I tabled today on the subject of GATT, intellectual property rights and Third World agricultural development.

TRANSPORT

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT REDEVELOPMENT—ALLEGED INVOLVEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Over the weekend there were media reports questioning the involvement of the Prime Minister in the Pearson airport deal. There was a two-page story in the Financial Post magazine. Yesterday, during Question Period in the other place, questions were raised again concerning the role of the Prime Minister in this same issue.

Colleagues, I know in the past there have been comments regarding the need for an independent inquiry to clear the names of ordinary Canadians caught up in this deal, including the reputations of 52 members of this place. Today, however, I am even more convinced, when the secrecy and intrigue surrounding this deal begins to implicate the Prime Minister himself, that it is time that there be a forum in which this matter can be heard. Canadians deserve the facts.

Will the Government Leader in the Senate announce today her support for the motion put before this chamber by the Honourable John Lynch-Staunton calling for an inquiry into the Pearson affair? Will the leader take this step to show her support, if not for ordinary Canadians, at least for the Prime Minister?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to deal with the initial comments of my honourable friend regarding certain media reports of the last day or two. I draw to the attention of members of this house the Prime Minister's comments yesterday in the House of Commons, comments which were reiterated to myself personally when we discussed this issue yesterday. The Prime Minister made it very clear that he did not at any time meet with the Matthews Group on the question of the Pearson airport deal. That has been stated in both Houses of Parliament before. I simply restate it again because the story keeps coming up. His answer remains firm and unequivocal.

On the question of my honourable friend's inquiry, that has been moved. It is now a subject of debate. I will be speaking on it at some point soon.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. The leader will certainly allow a correction. The Prime Minister never said he did not meet with the lawyer and the principal involved; he said he did not discuss Pearson airport with the two people at the meeting. He stated that he took the opportunity of checking at his law firm with the lawyer representing Matthews. He spoke with him and got confirmation that they had not discussed this matter at all at that meeting in Toronto. Therefore, a meeting was held. The point is that the Prime Minister says that at that meeting, they did not discuss the Pearson airport deal. What did they discuss for an hour and a half, when the only topic of interest to Mr. Matthews was Pearson airport?

Senator Fairbairn: My honourable friend is quite right and I will, if it is necessary to do so, clarify my answer. Yes, a meeting did take place. No, the issue of Pearson airport was not discussed. Indeed, I believe the Prime Minister said further at the time that he was not aware of the privatization plan. He said that in the House of Commons yesterday. As far as the subject matter of the meeting is concerned, I will be pleased to follow that matter up for my honourable friend.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—INFLUENCE OF GOVERNMENT ACTIONS ON ATTRACTING FUTURE BUSINESS

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In an advertisement, the Government of Canada, through the Greater Toronto Airport Authority, is seeking a chief executive officer to head up the planned airport authority that is to take control of Pearson. The mandate of the new CEO will be to develop a plan for the airport and to begin securing financing for future work. Given the action of this government to date regarding Pearson and the introduction of Bill C-22, is it not sending the wrong message to the investment community about doing business with the Government of Canada? Is the government concerned about the impact Bill C-22 will have on financing future development work at Pearson airport and other government projects for that matter?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): As Senator Atkins will know, I have expressed the view many times in this chamber, and will do so today, that we will find a legislated solution to our discussions on Bill C-22, certainly on Pearson airport.

In terms of the airport authority, one of the strongest messages that we could send forward on the necessity for the development of that fundamental transportation link in our country is to reach a solution in this house on the question of Bill C-22.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—IMPORTANCE OF PASSAGE OF BILL C-22 ON DEVELOPMENT—KNOWLEDGE OF ROBERT NIXON—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: Honourable senators, can the leader confirm the fact that Mr. Nixon was briefed by Transport Canada officials on this very matter and was informed that indeed there was a risk if the legislated end to the contract was proceeded with?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be pleased to follow up on the senator's question. I personally am not familiar with the details of the document to which he has referred. I will be pleased to try to find information for him. I am sure he knows that I would not like to comment on details of a document with which I am not familiar.

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, I was very interested to read the written answer to my question of a few weeks ago regarding the problem your government was experiencing with regard to the development of Terminals 1 and 2 at Toronto airport.

As I said, I read the answer with interest. For the purposes of my question, I will summarize it.

You indicated in your answer that the government could not proceed with the development or redevelopment of the airport or of the two terminals because of outstanding subleases registered against the title.

Any first year law student answering a legal question in such a way would clearly fail his exam for the very simple reason, honourable senators, that subleases are registered because there is a principal lease. If the principal lease is cancelled, the subleases arising from the principal lease are normally cancelled as well.

To this end, honourable senators, why did your government not ask the courts to cancel the subleases?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, unfortunately I am not a first-year law student. I cannot comment on his evaluation of the response as far as he personally is concerned. Our vastly preferred option on the question of Pearson airport is to resolve, with the cooperation of the whole house, our outstanding differences with a view to arriving at a legislated solution to the question of Bill C-22. That is the fundamental goal of the government at this point, and that is the one that we continue to work towards.

• (1450)

Senator Nolin: You have given us this answer several times, but what you are saying is this: Bill C-22, and only Bill C-22, will allow us to proceed with airport development. These are two completely different issues. If your government is concerned about the quality of the infrastructure at Toronto airport Terminals 1 and 2, there is nothing keeping you from starting any work there at this time. Bill C-22 is a separate issue. It is a lease or contract asking Parliament to cancel or order full cancellation. It is a different matter.

I will repeat my question from the other day. What is keeping you today from starting the repair and maintenance work at these terminals?

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, my friend Senator Nolin and I come from different perspectives on this issue. The government has made its goal and its route very clear; there is no question as to that, and the route is through legislation and Bill C-22. We will proceed on that route.

I did answer my friend's questions to the very best of my ability. There are one or two impediments at this point in time. Our concentration is on trying to work cooperatively in order to arrive at an agreement which will permit us to proceed with Bill C-22.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, on the same point, it is not Bill C-22 that is delaying any improvements and essential works to the Pearson airport; it is the fact that the government has delayed the creation of the Greater Toronto Airport Authority. The transfer of responsibilities may not happen for 14 or 18 months. The planned turnover date is not until April 1, 1996. That means that essential works are being delayed, not by our delay of Bill C-22 — if indeed we are delaying it — but rather by the government's delay in transferring its responsibilities to an airport authority and in not acting expeditiously in the creation of the airport authority itself.

The government is buying time because it does not, in fact, have the money available to invest in Pearson airport, whereas if these agreements had been put in place, there would be thousands of people working there now and at least $100 million already invested for the benefit of the Greater Metropolitan Toronto area.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, my friend knows that we do have disagreements on some of these issues. It would be my contention that the development could have taken place and the jobs could have been created at this point had we been able to come together more swiftly on an agreement on this legislation; an agreement which would enable us to transfer over control to the Toronto regional airport authority.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Which does not exist yet. I am sorry, I did not mean to interrupt.

Senator Fairbairn: One difficulty is that the Toronto airport authority, as my honourable friends know, has the capacity to advise the government, but taking control of the whole operation is still not possible.

I continue to hope that, as we further study the issues raised in the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, we can come to a legislative solution in this chamber.

CANADIAN HERITAGE

ACTIONS OF FILM REVIEW BOARD ON ADULT FILMS— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I have been told that the Film Review Board, in a closed meeting, has secretly approved a recommendation to allow scenes of bondage, degradation and violence in adult films — and we know what "adult films" is the code word for. This action took place almost a year ago now. If this is actually true, we have taken a huge leap backward in our struggle against violence and degradation of women.

Will the Leader of the Government look into this matter for us and advise us if my information is correct? If so, would she not agree that decisions of this kind should not be taken behind closed doors but should be aired for public debate and response?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Did Senator Doody make reference to the Film Review Board?

Senator Doody: Yes, I am told that the Film Review Board made this decision on May 6 past, almost a year ago. Now the results of it are filtering through. I am speaking of the Film Review Board, which I assume is the censorship board by a more acceptable name.

Senator Fairbairn: I would be very pleased to take Senator Doody's question and the information in it to my colleagues at once.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CLEAN-UP OF CANADIAN NATIONAL TRAIN WRECK DEBRIS ON BIRDTAIL SIOUX RESERVE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, officials of the Department of Indian Affairs in the Manitoba region have confirmed that four diesel locomotives and some 20 tanker cars, the wreckage of a 1968 train derailment, are rising from a bog on the Birdtail Sioux First Nations Reserve along the Canadian National Railway mainline near the Manitoba-Saskatchewan border. The wreckage was buried rather than removed in the wake of a major derailment. The fact that it is resurfacing came to light in 1993 when officials of the band approached the Department of Indian affairs.

That train wreckage is posing a safety hazard to children on the reserve, a threat to the cattle and horses raised by the band, and a potential environmental threat to the land and water of the Birdtail Creek, which flows into the Assiniboine River. It is not known whether residue of any toxic substance contained in the tankers is leaching into the surrounding area.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate ask her colleague the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development when this long overdue clean-up will begin, and what will be the cost to the Canadian taxpayer?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be very pleased to do so. I am not familiar with the situation which my honourable friend describes. However, I will certainly refer this matter to the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs and, if necessary, to any related ministers who might have a responsibility in that area.

LEGAL ACTION AGAINST CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, negotiations with Canadian National to have the wreckage safely removed reached an impasse some months ago. I am advised that the Department of Indian Affairs is preparing to release funds to allow the clean-up, but will then attempt to recover the sum by suing CN.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate inquire from the Minister of Transport whether he will request that CN return to the negotiating table in order to avoid the diversion of funds from the budget of the Indian Affairs Department and the additional, very high expense of litigation between a government department and a Crown-owned railway?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that sounds like an extremely complex situation, and I would be glad to help my honourable friend get through it.

THE SENATE

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND— APPOINTMENT OF NEW SENATOR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, after listening to Senator Doyle thanking the Leader of the Government in the Senate for her part in getting action on the subject-matter of his question, I stand today to ask a question of my own, in the hope that I, too, might get some response.

Senator Phillips, Senator Rossiter and I have been the overworked representatives of Prince Edward Island for the last year. When will we be restored to our full complement of senators with a new appointment to replace Senator Macquarrie, who did do his share of work? Perhaps we would not mind being so overworked, even on Sundays, if you could find out for us when we can expect his replacement?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I preface my response by heartily thanking Senator Bonnell for joining in our activities on Sunday as we were working on the legislation to put the railways back to work.

I suppose my friends opposite might argue that Senator Macquarrie is irreplaceable. However, this task will be accomplished, honourable senators, in the fullness of time, and I hope very soon.

NATIONAL FORUM ON HEALTH

REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS ON EXPENSES, BUDGETS AND CONTRACTS

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, I have three short questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. All of these questions deal with the National Forum on Health.

• (1500)

A panel of unpaid citizens was set up to advise the Prime Minister and the government on, and I may quote, "the reshaping of a system which is universal, accessible, comprehensive, portable and permanently funded."

For each member of the National Forum on Health, what is the total amount of all expenses paid or reimbursed by the government from the time the forum was announced to the date the question is answered?

Second, with respect to the $3.2 million budgeted for the National Forum on Health in the 1995-96 Main Estimates, how much of that budget is for personnel, transport and communications, information, professional and special services, operating costs, capital costs and other payments?

Third, has the National Forum on Health issued contracts for research, communications, or other professional and special services? If so, in each case, to whom was the contract awarded, what was the amount of the contract, and what was the purpose of the contract?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Doyle for his questions. I am sure the Department of National Health and Welfare will be tickled to get those detailed inquiries. I will send his questions to them immediately and get the answers back as quickly as I can.

SECOND READING— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Pierre De Bané moved second reading of Bill C-79, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1995.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I wish to raise a point of order with regard to Bill C-79, for which I seek a ruling by the Speaker.

Honourable senators, I am concerned that this bill goes beyond the scope of what is allowed for in a supply bill. Bill C-79 seeks authority for Supplementary Estimates (D). Paragraph 946 of Beauchesne's 6th Edition reads as follows:

Supplementary Estimates may be presented either:

(1) for a further grant to an existing service, in addition to the sum already appropriated.

(2) for a new expenditure on behalf of a newly-enacted statute.

(3) to meet the cost created by an unexpected emergency.

(4) to transfer funds from one Vote to another.

(5) to extend the purposes of a Vote.

In the schedule to the act, under "Canadian Heritage," Vote 76d reads as follows:

> Pursuant to section 12 of the National Museums Act and section 101 of the Financial Administration Act, to authorize the Canadian Museum of Nature to borrow otherwise than from the Crown in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the Minister of Finance... $1.

In effect, a $1 Vote is being used to grant unlimited borrowing authority. This does not fit any of the five criteria laid down by Beauchesne's. Rather, it attempts to do through the supply process something which should be the subject of a separate bill.

Beauchesne's paragraph 935 tells us that:

> A supply item ought not to be used to obtain authority which is the proper subject of legislation.

That provision is based on a ruling by Commons' Speaker Jeanne Sauvé on March 25, 1981. In her ruling, she cited several precedents, including the following from March 22, 1977:

> It is my view that the government receives from Parliament the authority to act through the passage of legislation, and receives the money to finance such authorized action through the passage by Parliament of an appropriation act. A supply item ought not, therefore, to be used to obtain authority which is the proper subject of legislation.

I have checked the two statutes cited in this quote. Section 101 of the Financial Administration Act does allow an agency Crown corporation to borrow money, but under two conditions. The wording is as follows:

> No agent corporation shall borrow money otherwise than from the Crown, unless the corporation is both
> (a) empowered by an Act of Parliament to so borrow money, and
> (b) specifically authorized by any Act of Parliament, including an appropriation Act, to so borrow money.

Presumably, section 12 of the National Museums Act is mentioned as condition (a); that is, that the Crown corporation be empowered by an act of Parliament to borrow money.

I have looked up that section. The only borrowing power the museum has concerns, and I quote from paragraph (d) of section 12, "exhibits, museum material, knowledge, or information." Nothing allows it to borrow money. Butterfly collections, dinosaur bones, plants, rocks and stuffed bears, yes, but no money. In effect, Parliament is being asked to grant a power that does not now exist. To my mind, that makes this Vote legislative.

Honourable senators, the second condition laid down by the Financial Administration Act is that the borrowing also be specifically authorized by an act of Parliament, including an appropriation act. Presumably Bill C-79 is supposed to meet this second condition. However, there are two problems here. The first is that while the current section 101 of the Financial Administration Act dates from 1984, it is at odds with parliamentary precedent as laid down in the 6th Edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules & Forms, published in 1989.

As honourable senators are aware, while Beauchesne's relates primarily to the operations of the other place, it is widely used as a procedural guide in this place. The 1989 version of Beauchesne's still treats as valid a December 9, 1975, Commons Speaker's ruling that struck borrowing authority from a supply bill based on Supplementary Estimates. By coincidence, that supply bill was also numbered C-79. It was introduced by the then Treasury Board President, Jean Chrétien.

What the Speaker said was that while borrowing authority could be part of a supply bill based on Main Estimates or Interim Supply, it could not be part of a bill based on Supplementary Estimates. The specific quotation is found in paragraph 969 and reads as follows:

> There is a historical justification for including in a supply bill based upon the Main Estimates, and even one based upon Interim Supply, a clause which relates to the borrowing power of the Government. An Appropriation Bill based upon Supplementary Estimates, however, may not include a clause which gives the Government the power to borrow money.

Honourable senators, while the Financial Administration Act does allow Crown corporations to borrow money through an appropriation act, parliamentary precedent would suggest that it cannot be an appropriation act based on Supplementary Estimates.

This is not the only restriction placed upon borrowing clauses. In 1981, the Speaker in the other place ruled that a clause granting borrowing authority could not be part of a tax bill. The reason cited in Beauchesne's, paragraph 970, is quite clear and worth mentioning in the context of my point of order.

> Borrowing authority is a substantive matter requiring specific notice, and lacking such notice, the borrowing provisions are to be struck from the bill.

I think there is another matter here which goes to the very root of parliamentary privilege.

We are being asked to grant an agency Crown corporation authority to borrow an amount that is not specified in the bill, for purposes which are not specified either. Parliament is being asked, through the device of a $1 Vote, to grant unlimited borrowing power. This Crown corporation need never ask Parliament to vote it funds again because, if it runs short, it will just borrow money under the Crown guarantee.

There is one other point I should like to make: The existing precedents refer to the power of the government to borrow money. Some may argue that since this is a Crown corporation, and technically it is not the government, the normal rules do not apply. In fact, this is an agency Crown corporation which is heavily dependent upon the government for funds. The government will be on the hook for every dime it borrows. To all intents and purposes, there is little difference between money borrowed for this museum and money borrowed to allow departments to operate.

Honourable senators, before we give this bill second reading, I should like to have a ruling from the Speaker as to whether this particular vote is in order. If it is not in order, I would ask that the Speaker order it to be struck from the bill.

I argue that it is not in order for four reasons: First, it does not fit the criteria for Supplementary Estimates as laid down by Beauchesne's.

Second, the National Museums Act does not allow the museum to borrow money. Parliament is being asked to authorize what is not permitted by law. I submit that this makes this vote legislative in nature and, in accordance with precedent, it must thus be ruled out of order.

Third, consistent with past rulings of the Speaker of the other place, it is not in order to seek borrowing authority in Supplementary Estimates. Borrowing authority is a substantive matter which requires more attention than is possible in a bill authorizing Supplementary Estimates. The role of Estimates, in any event, is to authorize spending, not borrowing.

Fourth, it is an affront to the privilege of Parliament to seek authority to borrow an unlimited amount of money for unspecified purposes, especially in a supply bill.

In conclusion, I emphasize the importance of the supply process to Parliament. It is at the heart of what we do. Parliament evolved in the first place because the government wanted to have some say over the way the Crown taxed and spent.

I ask the Speaker to consider this point of order and to render a ruling.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, the point of order which has been raised certainly is interesting and important. However, I do not think that a case has been made.

Much of the argument we have heard is to the effect that the House of Commons, which has sent us this bill, has ignored its own rules and the rulings of its own Speaker; in other words, that it ought not to have passed the bill.

Who are we, at this point in the legislative process, to set ourselves up as an authority to say that the House of Commons, which is the master of its own proceedings, broke its rules of procedure?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Like Bill C-22.

Senator Stewart: That is irrelevant.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is your question, senator. You are saying, "Who are we to interfere in what the House of Commons decides?"

Senator Stewart: My first point is that much of the argument made by the honourable senator deals with what already has been done by the House of Commons, which is a matter for the House of Commons.

The second point we should remember is that Beauchesne's is a work of description. It describes, for the guidance of members of the House of Commons — and to some extent members of the Senate — what the rules and practices have been. It is a descriptive work. It does not amend the Constitution of Canada. Consequently, it does not define or limit the powers of the Senate to deal with bills, specifically in this case, this bill.

The third point which the honourable senator made was that if the bill were to pass as the authority granted in the clause to which he made reference, that would have made an unwise grant of authority, and the corporation would have a rolling authority to borrow again and again an "unlimited amount." That may be a good argument on the basis of policy for disagreeing with what the bill asks. What it asks may be unwise, but that does not raise a point of order.

On these grounds, I think this point of order cannot succeed. We cannot say that the bill is out of order here because, in our judgement, it was out of order in the House of Commons. The question is whether the bill is in order here in the Senate. We are bound, not by Beauchesne's, but by the Constitution. Beauchesne's does not amend the Constitution in any way. If an argument could be developed that the bill is unconstitutional, then my honourable friend opposite would have a very good point.

In conclusion, I say that we cannot deal with policy questions, questions that concern the wisdom of what is in the bill, under the guise of a point of order.

Hon. Pierre De Bané: Honourable senators, I am surprised by the point of order raised by my honourable colleague because, as you know, on March 28 the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance studied this bill at a meeting presided over by Senator Doody. Tomorrow we will be studying the report on that bill made by Senator Doody. The official opposition in the Senate forms the majority on that committee. As you will see by the report signed by Senator Doody on behalf of our committee, the point raised today by my honourable friend is not included in the report.

To quote from that report, honourable senators:

> Vote 76d of the Canadian Museum of Nature under Canadian Heritage permits the Museum to borrow otherwise than from the Crown and will facilitate the consolidation of staff and holdings from eleven older buildings in the National Capital Region to a new building in Aylmer, Quebec.

Therefore, perhaps the person best placed to answer our colleague is the chairman of our committee.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I thank my honourable friend for mentioning my name three times in one paragraph. I think we have established another first in the Senate. It is almost as clever as imposing a borrowing authority through the use of a $1 Vote. I have never seen that before, either.

If honourable senators think that is the proper way to bestow borrowing authority on a Crown agency — not even the government itself, but on a Crown agency — that will indeed be a baffling leap of logic. That has yet to be demonstrated.

To answer more directly the point raised by my friend Senator De Bané, the fact that I am the chairman of the committee certainly does not preclude the right of any member of this house to rise when he or she so wishes, to raise a point of order, or to enter into any debate. The fact that I sit there in great impartial, judicial splendour at the head of the table certainly does not preclude even my humble friend from joining us from time to time.

Senator Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I was at that meeting of the National Finance Committee. Honourable senators who were there will know that I was quite interested in this particular item in Supplementary Estimates. I asked a number of questions about why it was included, and why they were borrowing the money. Having been here only a year and a half, I did not have the knowledge needed to question what was occurring. That is why I am asking the Speaker to rule on this point of order.

When I phoned some of my fellow senators and asked who the resident expert was here, Senator Stewart's name came up twice. I said, "I do not think I will phone him."

Is there a precedent in this matter? If this is accepted, any Crown agency can request unlimited funds through Supplementary Estimates. Every agency may approach Supplementary Estimates — rather than taking the legislative or Main Estimates route — and through a $1 Vote, vote itself all the funds it needs. How does Parliament govern the Crown's money?

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, the question just asked does not refer to the point of order.

Senator Tkachuk: That is my point of order.

Senator Stewart: Think about it, honourable senator. What you have now identified as your main point is whether it is wise to enact this measure. You state that if it can be done this time, it can be done again and again. That may be true, and it may be a good reason for opposing that particular provision in the bill.

However, if you oppose it for that reason, you should oppose it on substantive grounds, not procedural grounds. If is not a question of order, it is a question of whether the clause is wise as public policy. That of course is a question which you must answer yourself. That is not a question for the Speaker. That is a question which senators must answer for themselves. Is it wise to confer this kind of authority? That is not a question of order.

Senator Tkachuk: The question has been raised in the other place. It has been ruled out of order. For whatever reason, it arrived here anyway. I know what the reason is, but it should not be here in the first place. I am asking the Speaker to rule on this matter.

Senator Forrestall: There is nothing infallible about the other place.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, before I say a word, I would like to be sure that I know which Vote the point of order is directed at. Am I correct in assuming that the objected Vote is 76d?

Senator Doody: Correct.

Senator MacEachen: When I listened to the honourable senator referring to unlimited borrowing and conferring authority to receive any amount of money desired, I thought that maybe he has a point of order. However, the eleventh report of the National Finance Committee, submitted earlier today by Senator Doody, deals with the same Vote 76*d*. I refer honourable senators to Appendix II, additional explanations, category (c), miscellaneous $1 Votes. We come to 76*d*.

It states:

> Pursuant to Section 12 of the National Museums Act and Section 101 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize the Canadian Museum of Nature to borrow otherwise than from the Crown in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the Minister of Finance.

However, there is an explanation which seems to be quite different than the one which would confer upon anybody the authority to borrow unlimited sums of money. Presumably it will empower the building or the administrative authorities to enter into a capital lease in the administration of its holdings. The reason why that authority is sought is that under the financial administration regulations it is considered to be a borrowing.

The committee itself puts quotation marks around "borrowing," indicating that it is not really "borrowing" at all. It is a definitional change that is authorized by the $1 Vote. I do not see how changing or permitting an authority or administration to enter into a capital lease constitutes and confers the authority to borrow sums of money.

Therefore, the fears which the senator may have had initially may disappear if one looks at the explanation that is provided by the committee. That is my reading. If the chairman of the committee says otherwise, I shall agree with his conclusion because he has studied the matter carefully. The museum proposes to enter into a capital lease, which is considered to be a "borrowing" under the FAA regulations, with a private developer who will construct the building for occupancy in late 1996. I conclude from that that is what this dollar item will authorize.

Senator Berntson: It is worth more than a dollar.

Senator MacEachen: The dollar item will authorize a capital lease with a private developer. It does not confer the authority to receive unlimited sums of money for any purpose whatsoever. If that were the intent, Senator Tkachuk could have a legitimate grievance. Those of you who have made a profound study will I am sure be able to correct what I have said.

Senator Doody: The point being made here is that borrowing should be authorized through a borrowing bill and not through a legislative venture such as this. We are giving the minister the right to borrow an unspecified amount of money. There are explanations. However, they are not included in the legislation, which is the appropriation bill.

Does the Senate consider it proper to entitle ministers of the Crown to bypass Parliament under the guise of a $1 Vote and borrow money for whatever purpose? In this case it is a lease, but in another case it may not be a lease. If this is to become accepted procedure, then the Senate should certainly give it its blessing. One of the difficulties in this whole process is that the opposition in the other place does not question this sort of thing at all. It just goes down through on a nod. We have responsibilities here that perhaps we should not have to shoulder.

The appropriations bills for the Estimates are the responsibility of the elected body, as they involve the control of the public purse. No legislation gets less scrutiny in the other place than these huge amounts of money, which are voted every year on a wink and a nod.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Doody: If they are not questioned in this place, they will not be questioned at all. The way the Senate is asked to look at these things is itself a national disgrace. We receive the Supplementary Estimates three days before the government wants them back. We call a committee meeting. There are subheadings in here that we have not even seriously considered. They should be examined, but the rush is on. The Estimates must be sent back. We can pass the appropriations bill without the Estimates, but it would not be seemly to not have reported on the examination of the Estimates.

Therefore, at the eleventh hour in this case — not even the eleventh hour, quarter to twelve — we are given the Estimates to review. The appropriations bill will come up tomorrow. Today we received a borrowing authority bill. The committee certainly will not have time to examine that legislation properly, unless once again we place ourselves in the position of saying, "Hold it, stop. The Senate wants to examine this matter more thoroughly." Then we are accused of obstructionism. The unelected house, once again, is said to be standing in the way of the House of Commons. The government wants its bill. The House of Commons has passed these Supplementary Estimates without even looking at them. Now we are expected to do the same thing.

I congratulate my friend on having raised this issue because it will give us an opportunity to air some of these matters. Those who sit on the government side of this chamber are placing this whole chamber, themselves and the government in a very unfortunate position by going along with this mad rush to get this legislation through without giving it proper and in-depth consideration. I ask my honourable friends opposite to take this matter up with their counterparts in the other place to try to work out a system that would give us at least a week, ten days or two weeks to look at these very important matters.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: I thank the honourable senator for his impassioned appeal on the general way of treating Supplementary Estimates and so on. However, he has not yet explained how a definitional change authorizes anybody to borrow money. Even his own report puts the word "borrowing" in quotation marks, because it is not intended to mean "borrowing." It is intended to mean "authority" to enter into a capital lease with a private developer through this method.

If someone can tell me where the authority is to borrow, the sums and so on, then we might go on to the next step to see whether or not that is valid. I do not even think the authority to borrow is here. Its purpose is to achieve a definitional change, according to the explanation.

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, does Senator MacEachen think this is a good way to obtain authority?

[English]

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, if this is not a borrowing authority, then why is it phrased in such a way as to make us believe that it is a borrowing authority? It is a $1 Vote which authorizes the Canadian Museum of Nature to borrow otherwise than from the Crown in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the Minister of Finance. What they are saying is that the museum will have the authority to borrow, that the Minister of Finance will okay it, that Parliament will vote $1, and that is the end of it. That is exactly what it says. You can put in italics, quotation marks, underlines or anything else you want, but the legislation is quite clear.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I must say that I rely upon the report which has been submitted to us today by the chairman of the committee, who happens to be Senator Doody. Under Vote 76d, the report gives an explanation which tells us what it means. We have the explanation on the authority of Senator Doody who now, apparently, does not take responsibility for this report. The word "borrowing" is clearly in quotation marks, which is a signal to us that it does not mean "borrowing" in the normal sense. Otherwise why is it in quotation marks?

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, by his choice of words Senator Doody has indicated the kind of difficulty we have here. The word "proper" has at least two meanings. The word "proper" can be used to mean that something is in order, and it can be used to mean that something is wise — in this case, that it is good legislative policy. What has been raised here is not the second meaning but the first.

Senator Tkachuk has questioned whether the bill is in order in this house. That is the question on which we are being asked to assist the Speaker.

Most of the discussion that has taken place has not been on the question of the bill's propriety as a matter of order. Instead it has been on its propriety as a matter of good policy.

On certain aspects of what Senator Doody has said, I have a great deal of sympathy with him. However, on the narrow question of whether it is proper as a question of order, it seems to me that there really is not much to discuss, unless we want to change the Constitution and the rules of this house. That is another matter. We have not done so to this point in time.

Senator Tkachuk: Your Honour, I seek a ruling on this matter. I believe that you cannot do something through Supplementary Estimates which the law states must be done through legislation. Something cannot be taken through the back door when the law requires that it go through the front door. That is what has been done here.

There are clear precedents in the other place, as well as rulings of the Speaker, which say that they may not do this, that they require a legislative act or, in some cases, that they must go through the Main Estimates. They cannot go through the Supplementary Estimates.

If there is general discussion about the matter, we can always refer it to committee. I ask His Honour to rule on what I have laid out for honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a point of order has been raised by the Honourable Senator Tkachuk. Several senators have made speeches on the topic, which I have allowed because I think they were in the interest of this chamber. However, that is not in accordance with the rules.

I will take the matter under advisement and report back to the Senate at the earliest possible date.

Debate adjourned to await the ruling of the Speaker.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1995-96

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Pierre De Bané moved the second reading of Bill C-80, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1996.

He said: Honourable senators, Appropriation Bill No. 1, 1995-96, Bill C-80, provides for the release of interim supply totalling $13.7 billion for 1995-96. The Main Estimates, 1995-96, were tabled in the other place on February 28. They will be examined in committee with officials from Treasury Board on or about April 27, 1995.

[English]

These Main Estimates total some $164.2 billion in planned budgetary expenditures for the upcoming fiscal year. This includes $116.2 billion stemming from existing legislation and $48 billion in expenditures for which parliamentary authority must be granted.

The bill before us today, otherwise known as the interim supply bill, is seeking $13.7 billion in spending authority to provide for government expenditures up to the end of June 1995, while Parliament reviews the 1995-96 Main Estimates.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, we seem to be following rather unusual procedure at the moment. If I am correct, it has been the custom that we deal with the report of the committee and, after it is adopted, the appropriation bill usually goes through all stages very quickly, if the government asks for it, which is not without precedent either.

Here we are dealing with the Estimates before we have finished with the report, and I am quite at a loss to know — actually the Senate has it in its power to ignore the committee and to go ahead with the Estimates and appropriations, and pass the bill.

I think the best thing to do would be to adjourn the debate here and now. We can deal with the discussion on the Estimates tomorrow. By then, the Speaker may have arrived at a conclusion. Even if he has not, the debate itself need not be delayed; the conclusion of the debate may be delayed.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TAX CONVENTION ACT, 1984

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Michael Kirby moved second reading of Bill S-9, to amend the Canada-United States Tax Convention Act, 1984.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise today to say a few words about Bill S-9, a bill which will ratify the recently revised protocol to the Canadian-United States Tax Convention.

Canada currently has double taxation conventions in force with 52 countries, including the Canada-U.S. Convention which was initially signed in 1980. That convention has been changed only twice in the last 15 years, these current changes being the third set of changes.

Much of the current protocol that is before you in the form of Bill S-9 deals with technical issues of definition and clarification of existing rules including taxes on income and capital. There are also a number of important changes in this bill, however, which should deliver real benefits to Canada and to Canadians and enhance the fairness of the two tax systems as they apply to non-residents of both countries.

One of the most important elements of this new Canada-United States Tax Convention protocol is that it reduces or eliminates the rate of withholding tax that each country will apply to interest payments, direct dividends and certain royalties.

By reducing withholding tax rates, this protocol should facilitate the continuing growth of trade and investment between Canada and the U.S. This protocol also brings these withholding tax rates into line with those provided in the OECD Model Tax Convention, rates which are currently accepted by a majority of the 25 members of the OECD. In other words, the change in withholding tax rates provided for in this bill brings the Canada-U.S. Tax Convention in line with the tax conventions which currently exist among a significant number of the world's large industrialized countries.

In addition to a change in withholding tax rates, a number of other specific additional changes are contained in this protocol. First, under the protocol, the general rate of withholding tax on direct dividends will be reduced from its current level of 10 per cent to 5 per cent by 1997. Second, the rate of withholding tax on interest payments will be reduced to 10 per cent from 15 per cent, again moving these withholding tax rates into line with the OECD Model Tax Convention.

Finally, this agreement will completely eliminate the withholding tax on royalties on computer software, and on patent and technological information. Thus this protocol will have a significant beneficial effect of reducing the cost to Canadian companies of accessing technology from the U.S. and it will enhance the ability of Canadian high-tech firms to sell their products and services in the United States.

Another way that Bill S-9 will have a beneficial impact is by restoring fairness to the rules regarding the levy of U.S. estate taxes on Canadians holding property there. As many members of this chamber are aware, under current American law, Canadians who die holding U.S. property valued at over $60,000 in U.S. dollars, including winter homes, may be subject to U.S. estate taxes. This is a much lower threshold than American citizens currently face.

Under Bill S-9, however, Canadians will no longer be generally subject to U.S. estate tax unless the value of the individual's worldwide gross estate exceeds $600,000. In addition, special marital credits will be available with respect to property transferred to the spouse of the deceased.

Staying with the subject of estate taxes for a moment, Bill S-9 also puts into place an agreement by our government to provide a credit against Canadian taxes on U.S. source income to the estate of the Canadian citizen in cases where U.S. estate taxes are also levied. The United States, in turn, will grant a reciprocal credit for Canadian income taxes levied on deceased Americans.

This provision will be retroactive to deaths occurring after November 10, 1988, that being the date of the last set of major changes to estate tax provisions in the United States which affect Canadian residents.

It is important to note that these changes, although it may appear so on the surface, do not in fact represent a gift to wealthy Canadians. They effectively eliminate double taxation. Fairness clearly demands that neither Canadians nor Americans pay double taxes. It is the elimination of double taxation which lies at the heart of Bill S-9.

The changes agreed to by our nations recognize that both Canada and the U.S. impose death duties. These two taxes, however, are quite different in form. In the United States, there is an estate tax. In Canada, the government essentially applies a levy which takes the form of an income tax on any appreciation of a deceased's property over his or her lifetime. Harmonizing these different forms of death taxes or estate taxes has created a serious problem for many Canadians and, indeed, many Americans.

Canada, like most countries, has rules to prevent double taxation, but these rules do not cover a situation where the same type of tax is imposed, but imposed in a different form. Under the current rules, with these two different types of taxes attempting to do approximately the same thing, there could be a case where, without the benefit of Bill S-9, the estate of a Canadian with U.S. property would face combined Canadian and American taxes actually exceeding the value of the property itself. Obviously, this is absurd and this is not the kind of tax system wanted by anyone.

Bill S-9 therefore corrects this problem by allowing Canadians to credit U.S. estate taxes against Canadian income taxes on U.S. income and, correspondingly, it allows Americans to credit Canadian income taxes against their U.S. estate tax liability.

Another important aspect of Bill S-9 deals with social security payments made by one country to someone living in the other country. Under the existing tax convention between Canada and the United States, such tax payments are not taxable in the source country but are, in fact, taxed in the country where the recipient is living. Consequently, an Old Age Security (OAS) pension or Canada Pension Plan (CPP) payment to someone now living in the U.S.A. is not subject to Canadian tax. Further, only half the benefit is taxable in the other country.

Bill S-9 essentially closes that loophole because, once it is law, social security benefits will be taxable exclusively in the source country, or the country in which they are paid, rather than the country in which they are received.

I should also point out that once Bill S-9 is law, a number of amendments to the income tax act will be introduced to apply the non-resident withholding tax rules to withholding tax payments made by Americans located in Canada. These changes to the Income Tax Act will be forthcoming later this year.

Honourable senators, another provision in Bill S-9 allows for a better working of the rules concerning charitable organizations to tax-exempt organizations in the other countries. As you know, it is presently very awkward to claim credit for a charitable contribution made to a tax-exempt organization if you are a Canadian living in the United States.

Another provision provides for an arbitration mechanism for the settlement of difficulties over the interpretation or application of this convention.

Finally, the protocol introduces an article providing for assistance in the collection of taxes in the other country, and to improve the exchange of tax information between the two countries. These measures are useful steps in improving our government's ability to collect taxes owing, something that the Minister of Finance pledged that he would do in his February budget statement.

In summary, the purpose of this bill is clear. It is to introduce a fair system of taxation for Canadian residents who are also living and earning income in the United States and, conversely, for Americans who are working and earning income in Canada. It is also designed to eliminate double taxation, to close certain loopholes which have existed as a result of the way in which taxes have been applied and how they differ in both countries. It is aimed at improving the operation of the tax system in both countries by making them more similar and by introducing an element of fairness.

I urge honourable senators to support Bill S-9. Clearly, it is not a partisan bill. Historically, it is the type of bill which the Senate has dealt with expeditiously. I hope that this bill will receive the same treatment.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I thank the honourable senator for his explanation of Bill S-9. I accept his explanation on the facts as they relate to the bill. The bill is certainly not well understood in many quarters. I think the best place to get the answers to those misunderstandings, as it were, is in committee. Thus, we on this side are prepared to see it go to committee at this point.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kirby, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

NINETEENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the nineteenth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Supplementary Budget of the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide), presented in the Senate on March 23, 1995.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings moved the adoption of the report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

TWENTIETH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the twentieth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Supplementary Budget of the Senate Committee on National Finance), presented in the Senate on March 23, 1995.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings moved the adoption of the report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

[ Senator Kirby ]

TWENTY-FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE— DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the twenty-first report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Senate Estimates for the fiscal year 1995-96), presented in the Senate on March 23, 1995.

He said: Honourable senators, the Senate budget has decreased significantly over the past three years. It was reduced by 2.5 per cent in 1992-93; by 1.9 per cent in 1993-94; and by 1.4 per cent in 1994-95. This represents a total budget decrease of 5.8 per cent over the past three years.

An analysis of the actual expenditures from 1991 to 1993-94 confirms the idea that budgetary restraint has been a high priority here in the Senate. By voluntarily deferring projects, streamlining operations and reducing expenditures which were not considered operationally essential, the Senate has succeeded in reducing its expenditure from $45.3 million in 1991-92 to less than $41 million in 1993-94. In other words, actual expenses decreased by 10 per cent over this timeframe.

Examples of recent restraint measures are the deferral of projects to install a new sound system in the Senate chamber and to upgrade to the Senate's computer system. These are two projects which have been placed on hold and which represented a considerable expenditure.

The total Senate estimates for 1995-96 which were adopted in the Senate on December 15, 1994, amounted to $42,014,993 — virtually the same level as the previous year. After the approval of these estimates, it was decided by the committee that the Senate should continue to participate in the deficit reduction plan by reducing its budget by an additional 4.2 per cent, or $1.765 million, in the upcoming year.

In order to meet this reduction target, a number of cost-saving measures have been identified. If the authority requested of the Senate is given to the Internal Economy Committee, plans will be developed for implementing these proposals as early in the new year as possible.

The total budget reduction of $1.765 million will be divided between salaries and operational expenses. Every directorate within the Senate administration will be participating in the reduction plan. Senators, as well, will be contributing to the overall savings.

A number of key principles will guide the budget reduction process, especially with regard to reductions in the salary budgets. For example, the Senate's longstanding no lay-off policy has and will continue to be respected. Employees affected by the reduction in the salary budget will be offered a voluntary separation package. Those employees who choose not to accept the package will be redeployed elsewhere in the organization and provided any necessary retraining, counselling and salary protection deemed necessary.

Union contracts will be respected. Open communication with employees and their representatives will be emphasized to alleviate concerns and enable employees to plan accordingly.

This rationalization process will be undertaken in such a manner as to best position the organization for the future. Senior and middle management positions will be included in the exercise, thus reflecting an equitable approach to the cost savings.

Every attempt will be made to minimize the impact of these reductions on the work of the Senate itself. For example, resources most closely associated with committees have been left as is, or as close to "as is" as was possible.

With regard to capital funds, any expenditure for furniture, fixtures and construction will be limited to those related to health and safety issues.

The realization of the savings identified in the budget reduction plan is contingent upon several factors. Timing is a key factor. The total saving of $1.765 million is based upon the assumption that the measures will be effected April 1, 1995. Should implementation be deferred, however, the actual amount of savings realized will be less.

Implementation of the suggested cost saving measures will require a one-time expenditure for the provision of separation packages to eligible employees. The total cost of this program will depend upon the cost of the individual packages. At present, it is estimated that we will be able to find out about the program for the two fiscal years from budgetary savings, and the payback period will be less than three years.

Honourable senators, it is in light of these considerations that your committee is recommending that we be authorized to reduce the Estimates for the year 1994-95 by 4.2 per cent, in line with the provisions I have outlined to you this afternoon.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, I would ask Senator Hastings if he can give us a date upon which the committee will have completed its examination of this, the largest single cut that has ever been made in the budget of the Senate. It would be desirable to have an opportunity to discover what really is being cut — how many people are being cut, what kind of packages those who have agreed to leave are being given — before we say, "Yes, that is fine." Let us know what the facts are first.

Senator Hastings: The honourable senator is asking me how many employees will be affected, and so forth. This will depend on how many employees accept the offers being made. The figures will only be known early in April, at the beginning of a new fiscal year.

Once the Senate grants authority to the committee to proceed, we will do so with all haste to identify firmly those areas which we wish to cut for this coming year. However, to ask me today exactly how much and when, I cannot give you that assurance, senator. We will proceed with all haste to fulfil the reduction plan, because it is all dependent on timing, and we wish to move as quickly as possible.

Senator Doyle: Senator Hastings' committee has always had the power and the authority, when preparing a budget, to draw up figures and plans and then come to us with a list of them, and get our approval. There would be no problem in extending that program the same way. The committee can proceed, but when it has made its final recommendations, so that we know what we are talking about, that is, the names, numbers, and extent — then we can take these in the name or on the credit, along with Senator Hastings, for what is being done.

Is there some reason why we must give approval now? In that way, you have our approval before the exercise is launched. How will we collect this $1.765 million? We are talking about April. Is there some reason why, at some date in April, Senator Hastings cannot come back with a budget which says, "These are the cuts that we propose to make to achieve the goal we have set for ourselves"?

Senator Hastings: I cannot be clearer than I was with my previous answer. The reduction plan cannot be proceeded with until we have Treasury Board approval. Treasury Board cannot be approached for their approval until we have the approval of the Senate. After the plan has been approved by Treasury Board, then it will be put into force with respect to the employees, and then we will know.

However, for me to state today that "X" number of dollars will be spent on that reduction plan is impossible, but I do ask for authority to proceed. I hope there is enough confidence in the committee to let them proceed with the exercise.

Senator Doyle: I am not certain permission is needed to proceed. You can proceed, but approval of what you eventually do must come from this chamber. I do not understand this sudden need that arises for Treasury Board. How does Treasury Board have the right to approve a budget before we even see it? I am at a loss here. Please explain it to me.

Senator Hastings: Treasury Board must approve any retirement plan with respect to the employees of the public service. We must take them our plan, in the same fashion as the House of Commons had to go with their plan, to see that it is within the realm of our authority, and so forth. They must approve the reduction plan, and in order to qualify it must fulfil certain conditions. One condition is that the position will not be refilled, and therefore if you put your plan forward to the Treasury Board, they will approve it. The reason we must approach them is that they will assist by permitting us to pay for the pay-out packages.

Senator Doyle: When you approach the Treasury Board with this budget, will you not state, "It is our intention to give early retirement to X number of employees, or to give golden handshakes to Z number of employees. In the process of doing that, we will save Y number of dollars." You then receive their permission and come back to us when you are ready to put names on the list. It seems to be a very blank cheque you are offering us today.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, for the same reasons given by Senator Doyle, last week I asked for information through one of our colleagues who is a member of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. I have yet to receive this information. This same colleague told me — and I do not agree with the reasons behind this — that some senators and members of the staff of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration believe that the information I requested was protected. I must say I was very surprised to hear that.

Since I have yet to receive this information, I would like to ask Senator Hastings for a deferral of the motion to adopt this report to a subsequent sitting of the Senate. Perhaps this would give the staff time to prepare the information I requested.

In fact, the information I asked for was pretty straightforward. I asked for an itemized list, indicating the amount for each item, to help me decide whether the reduction of $1,800,000 was justified. I am putting my request now to the chairman of the committee, Senator Hastings. The Senate adopted its budget, maybe a month ago, for an amount approximately $1,800,000 in excess of the authority you are seeking today. Senator Hastings, could you tell me whether the cuts were made at the behest of the government? If not, could you tell me why we are considering an amendment to the budget for a total amount of $1,800,000?

[English]

Senator Hastings: The budget adopted in the Senate on December 15 was a zero-increase budget, which your committee felt was satisfactory after three years of reductions totalling 5.8 per cent. However, what was acceptable in December appeared to be unsatisfactory or unacceptable in light of developments in January and February. For that reason, your committee returned to the Estimates with a view of finding further reductions and to participating in the deficit reduction plan then under way. We felt that the Senate would want to play its part in that plan and continue the fiscal restraint and budgetary responsibility it had displayed in the three previous years. With that in mind, we returned to the Estimates and identified areas we felt could be adequately changed, modified, and reduced to fulfil the objective.

I will be glad to provide the honourable senator with the information requested.

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, I insist that I get this information. I want a point-by-point list of amounts for each of these items that make up the $1.8-million reduction. I have listened to the comments of Senator Hastings on how the committee saw fit to review the previous Estimates to deal with the new deficit figures. I do not know if Treasury Board, the Department of Finance or anyone in the Liberal cabinet thinks the Senate has done much in the area of cost reduction in the last three years. As the honourable senator says, we have done very well. I do not think the House of Commons has had similar reductions in the last three years. In reducing its budget by $1.5 million, I am afraid the Senate may be accused of giving in too quickly to the government's wishes.

We know that some ministers in the present government think that the Senate is not useful and does no work. We have been called all kinds of names lately by this infamous New Brunswick minister, among others. I am afraid we might be cutting our legs off by agreeing to any of those cuts. The Senate needs more information. Perhaps the public needs to know what is behind this cost-cutting exercise. I, for one, should like to put the items in this committee report aside for several weeks until this information is forthcoming.

Senator Hastings: Did I understand you to say that you are adjourning the debate for several weeks?

Senator Simard: Until I get the information I have requested. That is my wish.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the only motion before us at the moment is that of the Honourable Senator Hastings, who has moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, that this report be adopted now.

Is it the pleasure of honourable senators to adopt the motion?

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, in asking this question of the chairman of the committee, I thought it had the effect of standing the vote. The house may only have one motion in front of it at a time. However, I am sure that with unanimous consent, and if the question I have raised is considered serious enough by honourable senators, I can request that this debate be stood.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry, Senator Simard. The motion to adopt the report is before us. It is perfectly within your right to adjourn the motion. However, you have not made a motion to adjourn. You said that if you did not receive the requested information, you would like to stand the matter. It is your right to make such a motion.

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: You are making that motion, Senator Simard?

Senator Simard: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there a seconder?

It is moved by the Honourable Senator Simard, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doyle, that further debate on this motion be adjourned to the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

An Hon. Senator: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division.

THE BUDGET 1995

On the order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Spivak calling the attention of the Senate to the budget presented by the Minister of Finance on Monday, February 27, 1995.—(Hon. Senator Kinsella).

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators —

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, this inquiry was adjourned by Senator Kinsella. Has Senator Kinsella yielded the floor to Senator Bolduc?

[English]

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator Kinsella, he has conceded to yield the floor, with the provision that this item be stood in his name at the end of debate.

Senator Bolduc: Honourable senators, you will recall the disappointing 1994 budget tabled by our Minister of Finance, which put off urgent fiscal decisions until later. In February 1994, the state of our public finances undoubtedly warranted radical measures, which the Minister of Finance did not take.

Still euphoric after its election victory, the government which had already set out all of the desirable formulas for change in its Red Book decided to put off their implementation until later.

In addition, it misjudged Canada's situation. It thought that it could bide some time before getting down to work by forming working groups and waiting for the economy to recover from the economic shock treatment administered by the previous government, which was courageous enough to try to change its course — regrettably a little too late.

• (1620)

It was a bad guess. The Minister of Finance and his government were criticized, not so much by the media, which gave them the benefit of the doubt, but by the cold judgment of financial analysts from Canada and elsewhere; that is to say, by the informed public opinion.

The minister has tried to justify his status quo option of 1994 by underlining the coming necessary revision of our social security system, the necessity of keeping national standards in health matters, and the importance of safeguarding some provincial margin of manoeuvre for regional administrations already squeezed by the inappropriate fiscal structure of our welfare state, built partly by his father and his spiritual successors, some of whom sit in this very chamber.

While the Minister of Finance was trying to justify his February 1994 inaction and absence of courageous decisions, some economic agents reacted quite logically to this state of affairs, and the rigour, lacking in the actions of the government, was implacably felt elsewhere.

The consequences that I had predicted here last spring came during last summer and last fall. The increase in interest rates was such that we hit a historic spread with the rates of our neighbour to the south, and all that happened with a slipping Canadian dollar.

What is the score here? Look into this year's budget. There is $7 billion more for servicing the debt, which means that to maintain government expenditure of half a billion more in 1995-96 than in 1994-95, on a total of $163 billion, the government must cut $7 billion in governmental programs. This is not a drastic reduction, but it is a measure that will hurt various groups, while some public money, more than $20 billion, will be transferred to creditors outside this country. The impact of this is similar to killing jobs in our own active manpower structure in order to create them outside of the country.

It so happened that in the fall of 1994, the Minister of Finance began to change his mind and his speeches. The Progressive Conservative Party agenda, so much criticized in 1993, became more fashionable than the Red Book. For the Minister of Finance, now was the time to be realistic. He said, "Let's put order in our fiscal house." He said, "Let's tighten the belt of budgetary expenditures first; economic growth needs good public finance. An additional fiscal load would annihilate our business comparative advantages. We must increase our productivity if we wish to be competitive. Our prosperity calls for an increase in our external trade. Free trade is the key to our economic growth, and we must bring Latin America into NAFTA. The success of GATT and WTO is critical to the repair of Canada," et cetera, et cetera. Most of us thought Michael Wilson had come back, with all his economic wisdom.

Then the Minister of Finance gave himself the luxury of touring the country to consult the people, only to hear the self-evident, to hear echoes of advice he had already heard in this house in the spring of 1994. The minister took advantage of his tour to warn Canadians that they would be asked to make sacrifices: "I will make you suffer," he said, "but it is for your own good and for the good of your children."

The result was that this year's budget appeared relatively painless. I even heard people say: "We were prepared for tougher measures than this." Admittedly, the minister adroitly dosed the remedies: a slight economic recovery — he has no control over this however — to bring in additional government revenues; a pre-budget tax increase on tobacco; a tax increase on gasoline; cuts to transfer payments; cuts to subsidies for the farming and transportation sectors, among others; some planned privatizations; a leaner military; a partial transfer of the cost of the public service to the pension account — in short, nothing drastic, but a veritable collage of measures, none of which sticks out like a sore thumb.

The crowning glory is that estimates are multiplied by three to inflate the figures by banking on continued improvement next year and the year after. That is why the minister talks about $20 billion in cuts. In reality, honourable senators, just listen to this: in 1995-96, government spending will be the same as it was in 1994-95. In fact, it will even increase by half a billion dollars.

[English]

However, the minister's speech seemed to us dictated by the lenders. He has certainly listened to his creditors, and he has taken their advice.

I should like to tell the government, which seems to hold temporary favour after this budget, not to get carried away by its obvious satisfaction at apparently having won the challenge facing it. If it wishes to be positively assessed by historians, it should keep in mind that this move is just a battle, not the end of the war against the deficit.

I take the liberty of putting some food for thought on the table. I point out to the government that it is not by adding to the fiscal load of business to create jobs in a tough competitive world that we will solve Canada's problems. The banks have already delivered the message.

My second point is for Mr. Axworthy. We have been flooded with documents from the Minister of Human Resources during the last year. However, nothing concrete has emerged from his activities, either concerning additional flexibility of the labour market or the social security reform. Insofar as the direct services to Canadian manpower are concerned, it would be highly advisable to relinquish the management to the provinces who wish it, as their bureaucracies are smaller and therefore easier to monitor and control. The minister himself has recently described his various and numerous department programs as a mess. He has been in charge for the last year and a half, and he is talking about a mess in his own department. What is he doing?

Third, it is now fashionable to buy departures of professional and management people from the public service at a high cost. It seems to me that the rules should get legislative authorization and not just cursory executive examination if we wish to control abuses. Do not forget that quite often the process is only a transfer from the human resources budget to the pension account, plus cash benefits which decrease the real current budgetary compressions. Notwithstanding all the decisions of past governments in this matter, the federal establishment is still well over 200,000 employees; that is to say, the same as it was ten years ago.

Fourth, our policy towards the aboriginal people is unchanged. It is a disgrace to keep them under a paternalistic regime that has become more and more unacceptable for them and for us.

Fifth, international development programs are no more coherent than they were ten years ago. I will come back to this when I discuss foreign policy.

Sixth, last year, the Minister of Federal-Provincial Relations came to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, as did the Minister of Defence, to explain the bad decision of the government relative to CMR St-Jean. Look at the consequences now. There have been 50 per cent less francophone cadets recruited this year.

Instead of waiting for a decade of disastrous impact which would kill any legitimacy of our Armed Forces at home, I repeat my proposition of last year: The government should appoint a committee of wise men from diverse Canadian backgrounds to look carefully into the situation and to propose a reasonable solution.

Seventh, the minister for the public service has reviewed all the governmental agencies which constitute the federal administrative apparatus. That is fine, but if I understand his approach, he is ready to let the managers define their own new initiatives, as long as they do not overspend their budgets. I think this is not the cautious approach required by the difficult times in which we live.

Eighth, I note that the government wants to give the provinces back the responsibilities they enjoyed prior to 1945 in the areas of education, health and social assistance. In other words, before bankruptcy is declared, the move is to healthy federalism. However, the minister is taking down the house of cards built in large measure by his own father. I fear that this is not for virtuous reasons; the law is dictated by financial necessity.

I do not, however, wish to assign him any motives. It would not be right to do so. He is, after all, of another generation. Listening to Senator Kirby the other day defending the about-face of his Liberal friends, when he too had a hand in this adventure, I thought to myself that it was a good thing this about face occurred on a divided highway, since otherwise he would have died in a head-on collision.

In closing, honourable senators, I would like to note once again that the budget is cutting programs because we have to pay increased interest costs due in part to the government's negligence in its 1994 budget. We cannot escape our past, honourable senators, and we will talk about this again, next year, God willing.

[English]

On motion of Senator Berntson, for Senator Kinsella, debate adjourned.

REVIEWING CANADA'S FOREIGN POLICY

RESPONSE OF GOVERNMENT TO REPORT ON SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Gauthier, calling the attention of the Senate to the recommendations of the Special Joint Parliamentary Committee Reviewing Canadian Foreign Policy, tabled in the Senate on February 14, 1995—(Senator Andreychuk).

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Pearson.

Hon. Landon Pearson: Honourable senators, I rise today to comment on the report of the Special Joint Parliamentary Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy and the government response to it which was brought to our attention by our honourable colleague Senator Gauthier on February 28 last.

As a result of my long years of involvement in children's issues, I have developed a distinct perspective on the matters with which the committee was concerned. I look at foreign policy first through the eyes of the children whom it might affect: the 130 million school-age children who are not in school; the 10 million who are expected to become infected by the AIDS virus by the year 2000; the millions of children in refugee camps in war zones; children in the slums of Bombay and New Delhi; the boys in the streets of Rio and Sao Paulo; the little girls in the brothels of Bangkok. On behalf of these children I ask: How well does our foreign policy reflect the international commitment we have made to these and the rest of the world's children?

I would remind honourable senators that in September 1990, Canada signed the declaration and the plan of action which was produced at the World Summit on Children. In December 1991, Canada ratified the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. I was present on both occasions, accompanied by children who had been chosen by their peers to represent them there. On both occasions I felt proud to be a Canadian.

Let me explain why I consider these international commitments to be so important. For a large part of my adult life, I was a member of the Canadian Foreign Service, representing Canada in countries as disparate as France, Mexico, India and the former Soviet Union. I have known, directly or indirectly, many of the children I have just described.

In Mexico, and especially in India, I worked as a volunteer with children in difficult circumstances who helped me to understand their problems firsthand. My three years in Moscow led to the writing of a book on Russian children which was published in 1990. During my home postings, I was active in the local school system, and helped create a program on children's mental health, which still operates in Ottawa schools. At the same time, I was bringing up four daughters and a son, and learning from them about the special vulnerabilities of the young.

These two sets of experiences have convinced me of the indivisibility of childhood and the global nature of children's issues. The indivisibility of childhood means that there are certain conditions essential for the healthy growth and development of all children, no matter where they live; conditions that are fully recognized and addressed by the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child.

The globalization of children's issues reflects the reality that we all have a stake in the well-being of the world's children, and that global solidarity among children and adults alike is essential to the resolution of such problems as the economic and sexual exploitation of children, the degradations of extreme poverty, and the psychological impact of violence.

Canadians care about these issues. This is demonstrated by the existence of a large number of domestic organizations concerned with children, as well as by the fact that the largest international development organizations in Canada, like Save the Children or the Christian Children's Fund, focus on children's programming and feature children when they appeal for funds.

Although I worked directly with children for years, it was in 1979 when I was the vice-chairperson of the Canadian Commission for the International Year of the Child that I became politicized, for it was then, as we studied the situation of children at home and abroad, and as we travelled across the country, talking to children, that I became conscious of the degree to which children's lives are affected, sometimes inadvertently, by legislation and government action.

From then on, I decided all government policies affecting children, foreign policy included, should be studied from the point of view of how they impact on children's lives.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, when my honourable colleague Senator Gauthier was still a member in the other place and I was on the outside, I submitted a brief to the special joint committee on behalf of the Canadian Coalition for the Rights of Children, which I chaired. The members of the committee seemed sympathetic to our remarks, and, although the report did not deal specifically with our concerns, I feel that the overall structure of the recommendations, especially the objectives aimed at protecting our safety in a stable global context and promoting Canadian values and culture, can readily be adapted. The government's response to the committee's report indicated, at least with regard to foreign development aid and individual rights, that our international commitment to children and young people had been recognized.

[English]

On the whole and in the long term, I am hopeful that this government has accepted its obligation to care for the world's children, but how this obligation will translate into practice in the present fiscal climate remains to be seen.

In the meantime, like many of the non-governmental organizations who presented before the special joint committee, I would like to see a clear foreign policy statement on behalf of the world's children from the Department of Foreign Affairs and a strategic plan in the Canadian International Development Agency or CIDA, which gives children's issues globally the weight they deserve.

Such a plan should recognize the need to educate our own children about their contemporaries in the rest of the world in order to keep the Canadian population engaged, for the problems facing the world's children, including poverty, illiteracy, war and disease, go well beyond national boundaries and must be dealt with globally through the promotion of national and international partnerships.

The UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and the World Summit on Children, Declaration and Plan of Action, exist to provide a solid basis for coherent international action for children. For the first time in history, an internationally accepted framework exists with guiding principles and targets to guide overseas development policies and programs. This is the time to use it. CIDA is the obvious place to start.

Over the years CIDA has supported many excellent programs related to children, but it has never been clear that there is any coherent strategy. However, as new priorities are now being set by the federal government, a real plan could be developed on behalf of the world's children. Within such a plan I would see three sets of priorities: one for the short term, one for the medium term and one for the long term; priorities which reflect already established international goals.

The immediate priority is to make sure that young children do not die from easily preventable causes. Without a program for child survival, there is not much point in having any type of plan for caring for the world's children.

The medium-term priority is the development of policies and programs which lead to the protection of children in difficult circumstances from those forces which destroy their quality of life, rob them of their childhood, and even kill. Action related to the protection of children — in particular street children, sexually exploited boys and girls, child labourers, children exploited by the drug trade, children in war zones and in refugee camps and child soldiers — should be strengthened over the next one to three years.

The long-term priority is child development. Child development is human resource development, not welfare. Over the past 30 years, programs which support the basic health and education of children have demonstrated positive rates of return for the individual, the community and the country.

I applaud our government for signing the Declaration and Plan of Action at the World Summit on Social Development in Copenhagen two weeks ago. Canada strongly supported the 20-20 proposal which states that developed nations will commit 20 per cent of their official development assistance dollars to basic human needs. Receiving nations will also commit 20 per cent of their national income to basic human needs. Canada defines basic human needs as primary health care, basic education, family planning, nutrition, water, sanitation and shelter. Canada feels so strongly in investing in human resources that we are willing to commit up to 25 per cent of our ODA to basic human needs as a means of addressing the security of the individual.

I am sure we all agree that the deadliest short- and long-term enemy of the world's children continues to be poverty. Long-term measures which strengthen local economies and their infrastructures which promote local self-sufficiency and sustainability will always have a direct positive impact on the well-being of the world's children.

Honourable senators, I appreciate that you may still be wondering why in foreign policy considerations children should be given such a high priority. I should like to put forward two reasons, both of which relate directly to the principles enunciated in the special joint committee's report and reiterated in the government's response to that report.

The first is that to a very considerable extent our future security depends on the conditions in which children throughout the world grow up, conditions which are described in the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and which it guarantees but which do not yet prevail. There is progress. The convention has now been ratified by 167 countries. For a number of unhappy reasons, the conditions of childhood will probably always be fraught with danger.

I have lived long enough to have learned that the greatest tragedies of our contemporary world are the product not of natural disaster but of human failure. In my lifetime, I have known wars and rumours of wars, man-made famines and the proliferation of pollution-caused diseases. Yet, also in my lifetime, I have watched the collapse of communism, the miracle of the green revolution and the eradication of smallpox.

Last December, I was privileged to represent the Canadian government at the launching of UNICEF's 1995 State of the World's Children report, a report which demonstrated that the goals set by the World Summit on Children are not unrealistic, and that there has been measurable progress toward them. This says to me that when you plan properly, you can make a difference.

At the launching, it was my pleasure to announce that Canada would make a substantial contribution to the eradication of guinea worm disease in children, a mid-decade goal for the World Summit on Children, and the elimination of iodine deficiency in pregnant women, the cause of millions of cases of mental retardation. This is a condition that is easy to remedy by the addition of iodine to salt. However, without the goal set by the World Summit on Children, it would not have been possible to rally the collective action to ensure that that remedy was applied.

Helping children survive is not all we need to do. We must also protect them and improve the conditions of their lives. For if, as UNESCO's constitution says, wars are made in the minds of men, then it is in the hearts and minds of boys and girls that the seeds of peace must be sown.

This leads me to the second of the two reasons why it matters that we continue to care for the world's children. We should do so because it reflects fundamental Canadian values. We must not let our domestic concerns with the deficit, unemployment and the referendum, as well as the daily reminders of our shortcomings depicted so happily by the media, blind us to how we are seen by the rest of the world.

Honourable senators, our reputation is enviable. I know this from my own experience abroad and from the experience of my friends in the international development community. This reputation, a reputation for constructive work, for peace-making and for moral integrity, is based on the quiet contribution of hundreds of thousands of decent Canadians who have lived and worked in all parts of the world, as well as in the international institutions we so solidly support. It is also based on the generosity of Canadians at home of all political persuasions who consistently contribute money and time to international development especially for children.

This reputation is precious. In my view, it gives us more clout in the affairs of nations than either our economic or our military force. To sustain it, we must fulfil the obligations we have formally undertaken toward the world's children. Our own children deserve no less.

On motion of Senator Andreychuk, debate adjourned.

VIOLENCE IN SOCIETY

INQUIRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Anne C. Cools rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, March 22, 1995:

> That she will call the attention of the Senate to the issues of violence in society, within the family, and children at risk.

She said: Honourable senators, my intention today is to focus on children as recipients of violence in the family. I shall review some of the research and findings on the troubled family and the child at risk.

Before I go on to do that, honourable senators, I would like to commend Senator Pearson for her very first effort in this chamber and for her maiden speech.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Cools: It used to be thought that a new member's maiden speech was a difficult phenomenon and one for which they deserved support.

Honourable senators, the understanding of human development and the human psyche is still in its infancy. In 1793, a dramatic hospital reform occurred when Philippe Pinel, a famous French doctor, took over Bicêtre Hospital. Pinel released mental patients from their manacles and chains in which they had been kept. He followed his conviction that the mentally ill required fresh air, liberty of movement and less bondage. The concept that mental illness was a medical disease and not demonology or satanic possession was, indeed, revolutionary.

At the turn of the century, Dr. Sigmund Freud compelled a major shift in medical thinking. He introduced the concept of the unconscious. He introduced the concept that human beings are driven by strong, hidden mental forces. He introduced the theory of neurosis; that is, the notion that psychological states in human beings are related to disturbances and distortions and to developmental difficulties in psychic growth and maturation.

In 1992, the rate of violent crime in Canada was nearly double what it was in 1977. In 1977, the police reported 583 violent crimes per 100,000 people, whereas in 1992 they reported the number of violent incidents had increased to 1122 per 100,000 people — almost double.

At present, as in the past, male offenders are responsible for the overwhelming majority of all criminal offences involving violence in crime. Violent crime, relative to property and other criminal incidents, engenders high levels of public fear, anxiety and frustration. As a result, Canadians are increasingly expressing their concern about safety and security issues. They are expecting action from governments to bring about a demonstrable decrease in interpersonal violence. There is a growing recognition that existing levels of violence in society will not be reduced by hiring more police officers, building more prisons or developing more treatment programs for offenders. If the goal is personal and community safety, then the response to crime must seek to identify and prevent the causal factors associated with crime and violence.

Honourable senators, I should like to read from a 1979 article which appeared in The Globe and Mail, entitled, "How One Woman Works to Mend Broken Lives," written about my agency by Rabbi Dr. Gunther Plaut. I quote Rabbi Gunther Plaut quoting me.

> What's different about us, is that we...care about men as well. We don't just help women who are victims...We help the men, too...Violence is all around us...We're here to break the cycle in a few individual lives....We had a husband kick in three doors before we managed to calm him down, and finally the child emerged from the beast that he pretended to be. His greatest fear was that he would breakdown and cry. Well, we helped him to do just that.

When we look at crime and violence, the most obvious fact that leaps to the practitioner or to the student of human deviance is the fact that in the arrest, conviction, and detention of offenders, males outnumber females dramatically. Corrections Canada informs us that there are 14,500 male prisoners in the federal penitentiaries and 300 females. This ratio of almost 50 to 1 — that is 50 men to 1 woman — is either one of profound discrimination, or one that reveals a tragedy of enormous proportions that largely remains unexplained and unexplored. Some explanation and exploration are overdue.

Honourable senators, Dr. Fraser Mustard, President of the Canadian Institute for Advanced Research, recently asserted that the first three years of life are critical and important to a person's development. He said:

> The evidence is overwhelming...These problems are set before the kids hit the educational system. The wiring of the neurons of the cortex —

That is, the cerebral cortex.

> — occurs within the first three years. If you receive bad nurturing in that period you're not as well equipped... A very high priority has to be with the children...

Another great Canadian, Dr. D.O. Hebb, late professor of psychology at McGill University, in his book The Organization of Behaviour, in 1949, wrote:

> ...we do not know that juvenile delinquency, associated with broken homes, is due to the home environment and not just as much to the inheritance of the same emotional instability that broke up the home.

Honourable senators, on March 7, 1995, in a speech on International Women's Day, I suggested that comprehension of male abuse in intimate relationships should resist current feminist ideological constraints and should boldly and forthrightly examine the early childhood experience of the abusing male, with especial focus on the relationship between mother and infant son. I stated that mothers' abuse, that is child abuse, of infant sons has a powerful role in the formation of violent male adults. I have suggested, honourable senators, that men are of women born, both biologically and psychologically.

I have also suggested, senators, that mothers are the gate-keepers of children's emotional and mental well-being. The definition and identification of child abuse is difficult. The Minister of National Health and Welfare, Marc Lalonde, in the 1976 Report of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs entitled, "Child Abuse and Neglect," attempts a definition by saying:

> I would like to say at the outset that I am most pleased that the Committee's terms of reference include the neglected as well as the abused child. As many others who have studied the problems of children have recognized, it is neither easy nor desirable to separate physical abuse or battering from other, more subtle forms of child abuse and neglect...

> Child neglect, in the legal sense, constitutes all those conditions listed in provincial law and under which a court may find a child neglected, or "in need of protection." Thus the term child neglect covers the abused and battered children, as well as the child whose parents are unable or unwilling to care for him adequately...
> Child battering, to use a well-known analogy, represents the tip of the iceberg of child abuse and neglect.

In the same report, the Honourable Warren Allmand, then Solicitor General of Canada, stated:

> A first concern and one which plagues everyone dealing with child abuse is that of definition. What exactly is child abuse? Is it merely the physical abuse of a child? Does it include sexual abuse and exploitation? And what about the effects of long-term emotional abuse or sensory deprivation? It seems to me that a definition of child abuse as merely physical abuse of the child does not nearly go far enough. There is enough evidence at present regarding psychosomatic dwarfism or the "failure to thrive" syndrome to suggest that emotional abuse is at least as important as physical abuse...
> If we had to arrive at a common definition of child abuse, I would recommend that you consider the one used in the United States' Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act... where child abuse and neglect is taken to mean:
> ...the physical or mental injury, sexual abuse, negligent treatment or maltreatment of a child under the age of 18, by a person who is responsible for the child's welfare, under circumstances which indicate that the child's health or welfare is harmed or threatened thereby.

Both of these ministers were probing deeply.

Honourable senators, one of the great geniuses who first saw the relationship to violence and child formation was the author Charles Dickens. Dickens, in his great masterpiece Oliver Twist, wrote about the association between poverty, orphan children, neglected children, and their association with crime. In 1841, he explained his reasons for writing Oliver Twist saying:

> It appeared to me that to draw a knot of such associates in crime as really do exist, to paint them in all their deformity, in all of their wretchedness, in all the squalid poverty of their lives; to show them as they really are, forever skulking uneasily throught (sic) the dirtiest paths of life, with the great black, ghastly gallow (sic) closing up their prospects; it appeared to me that to do this would be an attempt to do something which was greatly needed and which would be a service to society.

Honourable senators, for 150 years, we have known about the relationship and association between poverty, child neglect, family instability, alcohol, and criminal behaviour. In 1889, street arabs, street urchins, guttersnipes, waifs and such neglected children were very visible on the streets of Toronto. Street arabs or waifs were abandoned children who lived on the streets; guttersnipes were children on the streets who begged, borrowed or stole for their troubled and alcoholic parents. It was estimated that these children on the streets numbered 600 to 700 boys and 100 girls. Honourable senators, I ask you to note again the ratio of boys to girls.

Toronto's John Kelso, instrumental in the Toronto movement for preventing cruelty to animals, was also instrumental in the movement for child protection. In the late 1880s, Ontario's efforts to protect children gained momentum. In 1888, under Liberal Premier Sir Oliver Mowat, Ontario passed the Children's Protection Act giving the authority to commit neglected children to authorized children's homes. Again in 1893, Ontario passed an act for the prevention of cruelty to and better protection of children.

John Kelso's work with child protection, with governments and with the Children's Aid in Society in Toronto and Ontario is legend. These activities advanced to 1908 with the passage by Sir Wilfred Laurier's Liberal government of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, which states in section 31:

> This act shall be liberally construed to the end that its purpose may be carried out, to wit: That the care and custody and discipline of a juvenile delinquent shall approximate as nearly as may be that which should be given by its parents, and that as far as practicable, every juvenile delinquent shall be treated, not as a criminal, but as a misdirected and misguided child, and one needing aid, encouragement, help, and assistance.

You will remember, honourable senators, that Laurier was a great admirer of great Liberal principles and was greatly influenced by Gladstone, a notable Liberal reformer.

• (1700)

Where a child was adjudged to have committed a delinquency, he was to be dealt with, not as an offender but as one in a condition of delinquency and therefore requiring help, guidance and proper supervision. Delinquency was a state or condition in the youth wherein the youth was deemed to require parental care.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senator Cools, I regret to inform you that your time has expired.

On motion of Senator Cools, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday March 29, 1995, at 1:30 p.m.

JUDY GINGELL

CONGRATULATIONS ON APPOINTMENT AS COMMISSIONER OF THE YUKON

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, a few minutes ago, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development announced the appointment of Mrs. Judy Gingell as Commissioner of the Yukon Territory. As you know, the role of Commissioner in the territory parallels that of Lieutenant Governor in the provinces.

Mrs. Gingell, who is presently Chair of the Council for Yukon Indians, is known to most of you through her tireless work on behalf of the Yukon aboriginal peoples, particularly during the passage of Bills C-33, C-34 and C-55 through this chamber in late 1994. The Yukon is very proud of Mrs. Gingell. I would like to thank Prime Minister Jean Chrétien for this great appointment.

I also want to thank our present commissioner, Mr. Ken McKinnon, for the fine work that he has done on our behalf during his term in office. Ken McKinnon and his wife, Judy, have worked hard, particularly during the 50th anniversary celebrations of the building of the Alaska Highway recently, and have been good ambassadors for our territory.

On behalf of all Yukoners, I say welcome to Mrs. Gingell and thank you to Ken and Judy McKinnon.

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: As Chair of the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples, I am sure I speak for the members of the committee in extending our best wishes and congratulations to Mrs. Judy Gingell.

The committee had the opportunity of working with her through the passage of the Yukon bills, which were very difficult, complex and contentious. Mrs. Gingell was at the end of her process as we were beginning ours. I believe that she brought to the Yukon issues a sense of caring, mission, and hard work, and she will carry that through to her work as commissioner. On behalf of myself and the committee, I extend best wishes to her in her new position.

TREATMENT OF ABORIGINAL VETERANS

REPORT OF ABORIGINAL PEOPLES COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the ninth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples concerning its order of reference on the treatment of aboriginal veterans following the First and Second World Wars and the Korean War. The report is entitled "The Aboriginal Soldier After the Wars."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Andreychuk: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and in accordance with rule 97(3), I move that this report be taken into consideration now so that I may say a few words.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Later this day.

Motion agreed to, and report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration later this day.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1995-96

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-73, to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1995.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave, later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Honourable senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, and bill placed on Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

TRANSPORT

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—AUTHORSHIP OF DEPARTMENTAL REPORT—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

answer to a question concerning a Department of Transport report dated November 4, 1993, touching on the Pearson airport agreements, the Minister of Transport replied as follows:

> What the honourable member might be better off doing is checking with the members of the staff at Transport Canada, including the deputy minister and assistant deputy minister...

— who, says the minister, were not privy to writing the report. Not only that, they —

> ...were sent home because the government that was there at the time the deal was done did not like the kind of advice it was getting from senior public servants at Transport Canada.

If this report was not sanctioned by senior Department of Transport officials, can the Leader of the Government indicate who the authors of this report are and who authorized its distribution under Minister of Transport letterhead?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will ask those questions directly of the Minister of Transport.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—INSTRUCTIONS TO MR. NIXON ON HIS MANDATE TO REVIEW—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to help the Leader in her search for information by asking the following question: The mandate of Mr. Nixon was provided for in a contract agreement between the Privy Council and himself, effective October 28. Honourable senators, on October 28, the Conservative government was still in office. Mr. Nixon's mandate was to review all factors relating to the agreement between Pearson Development Corporation and Transport Canada for the redevelopment of Terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport, and to produce a report by November 1, 1993. The report I previously asked about contains the background material for Mr. Nixon in preparation of his review. This is confirmed by one of the first pages in the report which states:

> Issue: Review the transfer of Pearson International Airport's Terminals 1 and 2 to Pearson Development Corporation under long-term lease.

This is a report submitted by Department of Transport officials to Mr. Nixon dated November 4, a few days after he was officially engaged under the previous government to look into the agreements.

How can the Minister of Transport detach himself from briefing notes which were authorized by his department to help Mr. Nixon, who had been hired by Mr. Chrétien, then Leader of the Opposition, to review the airport agreements?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take the comments of Senator Lynch-Staunton in the helpful way in which they were offered and seek to have a response for him as quickly as I can.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Cabinet solidarity can only take the Leader of the Government so far, I am afraid. We have here a blatant disregard for facts on the part of the Minister of Transport; something that has been going on for nearly a year. This is a public document, tendered by the Crown as an official submission of the Government of Canada to the court in Toronto. To have it dismissed by the present Minister of Transport in such a cavalier fashion is an insult to what government is all about.

Here are not only the briefing notes from Mr. Nixon, but also the options that he is given: Possible outcomes of review: One, cancel the deal; two, renegotiate or restructure the deal. There is nothing about a third option, in other words "agree to the deal."

Those who have been pointing to the flaws in the Nixon report have now found the greatest flaw of all: that Mr. Nixon was directed by the Government of Canada on what to say, even before he had a chance to review the agreements. I ask the Leader of the Government: Is that right, or is that not right?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I will seek the answers to my friend's questions from my colleagues.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—VERBAL STATEMENTS OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT—REQUEST FOR WRITTEN CONFIRMATION

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, regarding the statements attributed to the Minister of Transport yesterday in the House of Commons, I think it should be pointed out that the report in question is dated November 4, 1993, which, as my honourable friend will recall, was the day on which the Chrétien government took office. Thus the report would be the responsibility of the new government and of its officials.

That being said, I am naturally interested in and concerned with the statement that Mr. Young made, quoted earlier by the Leader of the Opposition:

> "What the honourable member might be better off doing is checking with the members of the staff at Transport Canada, including the deputy minister and assistant deputy minister..."
> They "not only were not privy to writing the report,"..."but were sent home because the government that was there at the time the deal was done did not like the kind of advice it was getting from senior public servants at Transport Canada."

• (1350)

The writer of the article in The Toronto Star then says:

> But Young appeared to backtrack later, denying he was saying the report was pre-cooked by his Tory predecessors.

Honourable senators, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate obtain, within the next day or two, a written statement from the Minister of Transport as to just what he did mean by those statements?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Murray for his question and comment. I will certainly ascertain from the minister what statements were made. I would prefer to do that, rather than take them from a newspaper.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—DEFINITION OF LEGISLATIVE SOLUTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, The Globe and Mail of last Tuesday reported that Liberal senators were stalling debate on the motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton to set up an inquiry on Pearson International Airport. I disagree. The writer did not understand. Standing the motion for a few days is a perfectly legitimate proceeding, obviously intended to give the government time for thought. The Honourable Leader of the Government in this place said that she would reply soon.

Surely it is not necessary to disabuse the honourable leader or her colleagues of any thought that legislative solutions, to which she referred yesterday — not once, but several times — are completely unrelated to the motion to set up an inquiry.

My question is: Can the Leader of the Government tell us what she means by a "legislative solution"? A solution to what?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my comments referred, as they always have, to the hope that, through discussions, we will come to a legislated conclusion on Bill C-22. There is nothing more complicated than that. I continue to maintain my hope and optimism that we will find a method through which to deal with that legislation and move on.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—REDEVELOPMENT OF TERMINALS 1 AND 2—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Since you will ask your colleague, the Minister of Transport, to answer a few questions, I would like to add five more to the list.

I am referring to the briefing document Mr. Nixon was given before he started his in-depth review of the terms of the contract to redevelop Terminals 1 and 2 at Toronto airport.

Yesterday, the Minister of Transport condemned the lack of quality and integrity of this briefing document. Why did he do so? That is my first question.

I am giving you these questions, but I do not expect an answer today. The answers could be sent later, like the one I received yesterday. I do not mind waiting a few days.

Second, did your government review this evaluation before tabling Bill C-22? I may remind the Leader of the Government that this document mentioned two figures for the potential revenues for the Government of Canada from the operation of Terminals 1 and 2 at Toronto airport.

These figures are as follows: If the administration and management of both terminals were the responsibility of Pearson Development Corporation for the duration of the contract, the net revenues for the federal government would be $843 million. The briefing document Mr. Nixon was given goes on to say that if the public sector continued to administer the terminals, revenues would be $595 million. Clearly, revenues would go up by $248 million if the private sector got to work and started redeveloping the two terminals.

Did your government review this financial data before tabling Bill C-22?

Third question: What new figures did you come up with if you did review this financial data?

Fourth question: Since you came to power, has your government taken into account the financial losses suffered by both terminals as a result of a lack of facilities at the two terminals?

My last question is perhaps more general in nature. Perhaps I should have started with this one. We are talking about a clear 42 per cent increase in net revenues from operating a terminal. When you nearly dismiss out of hand agreements that generate these increased profits, if I may use that expression, do you consider this to be in the interests of Canadians?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will add Senator Nolin's five questions to the list and respond to all senators on this matter as quickly as possible.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, my question is also directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is in relation to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. The minister responsible for ACOA has done it again. I have recently learned that the minister responsible for ACOA has removed the only francophone representative on the board from southwestern Nova Scotia and has named his replacement from the minister's own region of Cape Breton.

In addition to that, there has been some speculation about the distribution of funding by ACOA to specific areas of Atlantic Canada. I understand that my colleague in the other place, Elsie Wayne, has been attempting, for the last 179 days, to obtain a list of the projects which have been funded by ACOA, and she has yet to receive a reply.

Given that serious questions are being raised regarding the minister's apparent bias, I am sure that some members in this chamber would also be interested in receiving the list of projects.

Will the leader please advise us why the minister responsible for ACOA has refused to release public information while, at the same time, handing out over 183 projects in his own riding, totalling at least $17 million? If she cannot so advise, would she at least call upon her colleague to make that information available immediately?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be pleased to pass these questions on to my colleague and request answers as quickly as possible.

TRANSPORT

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—
IMPLICATIONS OF ALLEGED INVOLVEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, on December 6, 1994, I asked a question dealing with Mr. Chrétien's participation as a lawyer in a meeting between Lang Michener and the Matthews Group in the Pearson consortium. In a written reply, the Prime Minister stated:

> I never had, as a lawyer, any discussion about the Toronto Airport with any of these people.

If Mr. Chrétien did not attend the meeting as a lawyer, what was his function at the meeting? Was he a lobbyist, was he consultant, or was he a fund-raiser for himself?

• (1400)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I draw the attention of my honourable friend to remarks made by the Prime Minister on Monday in the House of Commons and repeated here yesterday by me, to the effect that the Prime Minister did not meet with representatives of that group on the issue of Pearson airport. He was present at a meeting, but the subject was not on the issue of Pearson airport.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What was it, then?

Senator Fairbairn: I undertook to find that answer for you yesterday, Senator Lynch-Staunton.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, did I understand the Leader of the Government to say that she would attempt to find out what this hour and a half meeting was about? Mr. Labarge of the same law firm was present with Mr. Chrétien, as was a representative of the Matthews Group. It is difficult to imagine a representative of the Matthews Group being present at an hour and a half meeting without mentioning their principal project.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, if my honourable friend will reread the response given by the Prime Minister, he will see that Mr. Chrétien said just that. Indeed, he consulted the lawyer who was present for confirmation of the fact that Pearson airport was not a topic of conversation at all at that meeting.

I do not know what type of lawyer-client relationship is involved here. However, I have undertaken to my friend Senator Lynch-Staunton to seek any clarification I can get as to the subject of the meeting. Both the Prime Minister of Canada and the lawyer who attended the meeting have been clear in stating that Pearson airport was not the subject of discussion.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Mr. Matthews also attended the meeting.

[ Senator Comeau ]

He said that they did discuss the Pearson airport. Is the Leader of the Government saying that the client and the lawyer are contradicting each other in terms of the topic that was brought up in the presence of Mr. Chrétien?

Senator Fairbairn: I am simply saying, honourable senators, that Prime Minister Chrétien, who attended the meeting, said that no discussion concerning the Pearson airport took place. His statement was confirmed by the lawyer who was also present at that meeting. That is all I am saying.

INSTITUTION OF PUBLIC INQUIRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Would the Leader of the Government consider speeding up the public inquiry process so that we can have these people testify under oath in order to determine who is telling the truth?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): The one commitment I can give to my friend is that I will certainly speed up the answers as fast as I can.

UNDERUTILIZED INFRASTRUCTURE AT CANADIAN PORTS—
NEED FOR PROPOSED NEW BERTHAGE AND CARGO SHEDS IN MINISTER'S RIDING

Hon. Erminie J. Cohen: Honourable senators, early in February of 1994, the Minister of Transport commented on the future of surface and marine transport in Canada, stating the following:

> If people want to hang on to all the railways and all facilities on the marine side and want to build new highways at the same time...that's just not in the cards.

Honourable senators, it is a well-known fact that there is an overcapacity in Canadian ports with too much underutilized infrastructure. As a representative of the Saint John Port Corporation stated to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Transport, on March 16, 1995:

> In many cases, the Federal Government as the shareholder of ports is competing against itself.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: Considering these facts and the minister's statements about restraint, how can the government justify spending $20 million on new berthage and cargo sheds in the Transport Minister's home riding at Belledune, New Brunswick, especially since there is excess capacity at the Port of Dalhousie, only 32 kilometres away?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I will be happy to seek a response to that question for the Honourable Senator Cohen.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS—REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with respect to delayed answers, I am somewhat curious. I know the title is self-explanatory, that answers will come at some later date and that written answers will come to written questions.

There are four questions on the Order Paper which stand in my name. Two are from January 1994, while the remaining two date back to October 1994. They are not terribly complicated questions. One is quite straightforward. It states:

> Has the Department of National Defence's A-310 Airbus been put up for sale?
> Have any purchase offers been forthcoming? If the answer is yes, what is the list of prospective buyers?

Those questions do not seem terribly complicated. Yet, I have been waiting for over a year for the answers. Can the leader or her deputy look into why it is taking so long to get answers to these seemingly uncomplicated questions?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I agree with my honourable friend. Those are written questions. I will do everything I can to get them answered more swiftly.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps I could add to the general confusion with respect to delayed answers. We are always urging the various departments to get the answers to us as quickly as possible. As a matter of fact, I received a note from Senator Oliver asking about a question he had put on the Order Paper in February. There are 18 or 20 parts to his question.

Senator Murray will remember that for a year or two I was asking questions about the LaPrade Fund when he was the Leader of the Government. They were particularly complicated questions and answers. I have yet to receive the answers. The situation has not changed really. I wish to assure members opposite that we are doing our best.

Today, I have three responses to questions. The first is in response to a question raised in the Senate on February 14, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Sylvain regarding disciplinary practices in the Canadian Armed Forces. The second is in response to a question asked on February 16, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Forrestall, regarding the abolition of the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance. The last response is to a question raised on February 22, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Stratton regarding the capital gains election.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DISCIPLINARY PRACTICES IN CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

(Response to question raised by Hon. John Sylvain on February 14, 1995)

> The action depicted in the Airborne initiation video has been thoroughly investigated. Appropriate measures will be taken to ensure that this type of action does not recur. Each member of the Canadian Forces is accountable to their superiors, subordinates and peers for their action or inaction. The decision to replace the Commander Land Forces Central Area was a decision made by the Chief of the Defence Staff on the basis of this principle of accountability. As pointed out in the reasons given by the Chief of the Defence Staff, there was a failure by the Commander, Land Force Central Area, to thoroughly review the videos and properly inform his superior of their content. This failure on his part misled the Chief of the Defence Staff and caused him, in turn, to mislead the Government. The Chief of the Defence Staff held the Commander, Land Forces Central Area, accountable for his actions and considered this incident to be sufficiently serious to cause his removal from command without the benefit of waiting for the public inquiry.
> The terms of reference of the public inquiry announced by the Minister of National Defence include the investigation and report on the conduct depicted on the video, the chain of command system, leadership within the chain of command, discipline, operations, actions and decisions of the Canadian Forces and the actions and decisions of the Department of National Defence and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, other matters related to the pre-deployment, in-theatre and post-deployment phases of the Somalia deployment.
> Discipline in the Canadian Forces is of paramount concern to all involved in defence matters. While discipline is the responsibility of everyone in the Canadian Forces, the heaviest burden lies on the shoulders of Commanding Officers who must enforce discipline on their subordinates. It is a duty that is taken very seriously and, needless to say, the responsibility for discipline and accountability for one's actions increases with increased rank in this domain, as in others.

TRANSPORT

ABOLITION OF ATLANTIC REGION FREIGHT ASSISTANCE— POSSIBILITY OF NOTICE TO STAKEHOLDERS

(Response to question raised by Hon. J. Michael Forrestall on February 16, 1995)

> The review of all subsidies under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport has been the subject of discussion in many fora since the February 1994 Budget. As early as June 1994, the Minister of Transport outlined in Thunder Bay the policy thrusts of these reviews, and the February 1995 Budget decisions represent the final step in the process, whereby the government has announced the mechanisms for repeal of the MFRA/ARFAA subsidies and a transitional adjustment program.
> As announced in the Minister of Finance's Budget speech on February 27, the government has decided that the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Program under MFRA/ARFAA will be eliminated. Transitional funding of $326 million will be provided to provinces over five years.

The program was subject to an extensive review by Transport Canada in 1994. An Information paper describing the results was widely circulated to stakeholders in July 1994. Since then stakeholders have been thoroughly consulted on the report and on the future of the program.

The decisions on the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Program are part of a comprehensive strategy to create an integrated and affordable national transportation system that is more responsive to user and community needs. This involves radical change to the historic practices of direct and indirect subsidy, in all regions and in all transport modes. To increase efficiency, reduce the burden on taxpayers, and shift the costs of providing transport services onto those who benefit directly from the system, broad subsidization will be replaced by focused and responsible investments in infrastructure and technology.

The transitional funding is intended to facilitate adjustment by users and provide equitable treatment of regions and modes. Agreements will be negotiated to transfer the funds to the Provincial governments, to be used by individual shippers, or for investments in highways or other transportation initiatives that enhance system efficiency.

INCOME TAX—CAPITAL GAINS ELECTION—EFFECT ON SENIORS

As was correctly pointed out, individuals who elect to utilize the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption on their 1994 tax return must include capital gains into net income and then take an offsetting deduction for those gains that are exempt.

The increase in net income resulting from the election may affect many benefits, such as the child tax benefit, the goods and services tax credit, the guaranteed income supplement, the old age security and unemployment insurance repayments, as well as a number of non-refundable credits. As a result, individuals of all age groups who benefit from the LCGE, including those over age 65, may be required to incur some costs in exempting their gains. This potential cost of using the exemption was clearly pointed out in the 1994 budget.

However, it is important to recognize that individuals would have been subject to the same measure had they actually disposed of their assets prior to the elimination of the $100,000 LCGE. In previous years, individuals who wished to utilize the exemption also had to include all gains into net income and then take a deduction for the exempt gains.

The exemption has been eliminated in a fair manner. Gains that accrued prior to the 1994 budget qualify for the exemption. The costs associated with using the election must be put within the context that individuals can realize up to $100,000 of accrued capital gains tax free. Tax filers must determine on an individual basis whether these benefits outweigh the costs associated with the election.

In light of the generous treatment already being provided to individuals with accrued gains, the government believes the current system is fair.

Revenue Canada has undertaken a number of initiatives to inform the public of the capital gains election and to provide information on how to claim a capital gains exemption in 1994.

In May 1994, Revenue Canada made a fact sheet available to the public in all tax services offices across the country providing basic information on the elimination of the capital gains exemption and the availability of a capital gains election. The fact sheet was also sent to all media in Canada and to the Parliament Hill offices of Members of Parliament. In addition, Revenue Canada made special efforts to reach clients through specialized media, including such publications as The Cottage Magazine, Canadian Stamp News, and Reader's Digest, as well as seniors' media. The fact sheet was also sent to certain associations, such as financial associations, tax preparers associations and cottagers associations.

Later, in August 1994, the Department issued an article to inform cottage owners of tax changes that could affect them. This article was distributed to over 300 local weeklies and cottage magazines.

Communications staff gave numerous interviews to print and electronic media on the topic over the year.

A Departmental release was issued in December 1994 to general and specialized media to announce the availability of two capital gains election packages. One package is specifically designed for seniors who have simple investments and who file the TlS-A Income Tax and Benefit Return. The other package is more detailed. The two packages contain information on the tax advantages and tax implications of filing an election as well as tax tips.

Revenue Canada has also set up a national toll-free service for people who need information and assistance on how to file an election. The numbers are: 1 -800-959-8281 for English enquiries and 1-800-959-7383 for French enquiries. People can also contact any tax services office for more information on capital gains. Revenue Canada enquiries agents have been trained and are prepared to answer any questions on this topic.

Information on the election has been added to all relevant Revenue Canada publications for the 1994 taxation year, including the income tax guides and the material distributed to our community volunteers. Information has also been added to Revenue Canada's Tax Information Phone Service. Messages advising the public of the changes, as well as the availability of the fact sheet and the election packages, have been placed on the Tax Information Phone Service bulletin board.

Studies have not been undertaken to determine the effectiveness of the measures in informing the public. However, Revenue Canada does consult clients on an ongoing basis to request input on the effectiveness of its information services, forms and guides. The measures put in place with respect to the capital gains election are as comprehensive as those undertaken concerning legislative changes of similar impact.

SECOND READING—POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING

On the Order:

Motion of the Honourable Senator De Bané, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Losier-Cool, for the second reading of Bill C-79, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1995.—(Speaker's Ruling).

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, yesterday a point of order was raised by the Honourable Senator Tkachuk. I am now prepared to give my ruling.

The point raised yesterday by the honourable senator concerned Bill C-79, primarily on the grounds that the bill goes beyond the scope of what is allowed in a supply bill. He argued that the bill is not in order for four reasons.

First, he argued that since Bill C-79 seeks borrowing authority for the Canadian Museum of Nature, it does not fit the criteria for Supplementary Estimates as laid down by Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules & Forms, 6th Edition as described in citation 946, page 260.

Second, he argued that since the National Museums Act does not allow the museum to borrow money, Bill C-79 contains an item which is legislative in nature, specifically, Vote 76d as described in the schedule to the bill. The senator referred to a ruling by the House of Commons Speaker on March 25, 1981, in which the Speaker took the position that it should not be permitted that "a supply item be used to obtain authority which is the proper subject of legislation."

Third, consistent with past rulings of the Speaker in the other place, the honourable senator stated that it is not in order to seek borrowing authority in Supplementary Estimates. The role of the Estimates is to authorize spending, not borrowing.

Fourth, Senator Tkachuk felt that it is an affront to the privileges of Parliament to seek authority to borrow an unlimited amount of money for unspecified purpose, especially in a supply bill.

May I be permitted to comment at the outset, in case there is any doubt by those observing our proceedings as to what is the role of the Senate in matters of supply. As far as I am aware, the Senate has never overturned the recommendations of the Ross Report of 1918, which was the report of a special committee of the Senate to consider the question of determining what are the rights of the Senate in matters of financial legislation and whether, under the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, it is permissible for the Senate to amend the bill embodying financial clauses. This report, which was adopted by the Senate on May 22, 1918, stated:

> The Senate of Canada has, and always has had since it was created, the power to amend Bills originating in the Commons appropriating any part of the revenue or imposing a tax by reducing the amounts therein, but has not the right to increase the same without the consent of the Crown.

• (1410)

The most recent case of the Senate amending a supply bill occurred as recently as May 11, 1989, when the Senate amended Bill C-14.

With regard to the first point raised by Senator Tkachuk, that the bill does not fit the criteria for Supplementary Estimates as laid down by Beauchesne's, I must observe that, in my opinion, Beauchesne's is discussing the business of supply from the perspective of the Standing Orders and practices of the House of Commons. The Commons has established a rather complex procedure for dealing with supply that is based on a series of rules which incorporate referring Estimates to various standing committees for specified lengths of time, procedures for the opposition to express grievances and motions of non-confidence before supply is granted, and the designation of specific time periods for disposing of the various types of appropriation bills. Very few of these procedures have relevence for the way supply is dealt with in this place. The Senate has only two rules in our rule book which deal with supply — rules 81 and 82. Rule 81 states:

[English]

> The Senate shall not proceed upon a bill appropriating public money that has not within the knowledge of the Senate been recommended by the Queen's representative.

Rule 82 states:

> A bill of aid or supply shall not have annexed thereto any clause the matter of which is foreign to and different from the matter of the bill.

It is my belief that neither of these rules have been breached by Bill C-79.

[Translation]

Senator Tkachuk's second point is that Bill C-79 contains an item which is legislative in nature. However, it appears to the Chair that this point is related more to a question of law than to parliamentary procedure. Whether or not the National Museums Act allows the corporation to borrow money and whether Vote 76d conforms to the provisions of the Financial Administration Act, are matters of legal interpretation. Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, 4th edition, page 180 states quite clearly that the Speaker "will not give a decision upon a constitutional question, nor decide a question of law, though the same may be raised on a point of order or privilege."

[English]

Concerning the third point of this argument, here again the Senate is referring to the procedures of the House of Commons. I am not sure it is wise to refer to rulings from the other place on matters where the procedures of the two houses are so different. With regard to the ruling of December 9, 1975, which Senator Tkachuk cited, in which the Commons Speaker ruled that a borrowing authority clause could not be included in a supplementary supply bill, among the reasons given by the Speaker, described in the book Selected Decisions of Speaker Jerome on page 78, was the following:

> Since a supply bill is concurred in without debate and without amendment, the strictest interpretation of the rules has to be applied to all clauses of the bill, that is to say, that all clauses of the bill must be based on estimates if the guillotine is to apply.

In the Senate, we have not established any specific guillotine or time allocation rules with regard to debating appropriation bills. They are treated like any other bills. Our procedure here is very different from that of the other place and therefore the reasons given by the Speaker, in my opinion, do not apply as far as the procedures of this chamber are concerned.

Finally, with regard to the point that the provisions of the bill are an affront to the privileges of the Senate, I am not sure that privilege is involved here. If it was, there is a specific procedure for raising questions of privilege in the Senate. I do not think it appropriate that the Senate should be rising on both a point of order and a question of privilege at the same time.

For these reasons, I think that Senator Tkachuk does not have a valid point of order. My ruling does not mean he or other senators who object to this vote have no other procedures for recourse open to them.

Hon. Pierre De Bané: Honourable senators, I move second reading of Bill C-79, Appropriation Bill No. 4, 1994-95, following the Speaker's decision.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

[English]

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, this is a most unusual procedure. The committee report has not been dealt with, yet we are moving second reading of the appropriations bill. If it were the intention of the house to move the bill through without reference to the committee report, in the first place, it would be pointless to send material to the committee to have it studied.

Honourable senators, to my knowledge this procedure has never before occurred in this place. The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance sat for a long time and made an effort to answer the questions raised in that bill. Now we will move on to second reading without reference to the committee report.

May I suggest, in the interest of sanity if nothing else, that we move ahead to the committee report, deal with it first, get if off the Order Paper, and then deal with second reading? This is a strange way of doing business.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I could not agree more with my honourable friend opposite. That is exactly the procedure I proposed in an earlier discussion with members opposite.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to move, with leave, that the Senate proceed to Reports of Committees, order number 2, to give Senator Doody a chance to report and speak on the report of the committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (D) ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the eleventh report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance concerning the examination of Supplementary Estimates (D), laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1995.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, I will not take much time. I said most of what I wanted to say yesterday.

Honourable senators, the report distributed yesterday is a rather comprehensive report and deals with Supplementary Estimates (D), which are the fourth and final Supplementary Estimate for the 1994-95 fiscal year.

For several years, the committee has attached to its report several helpful explanatory tables prepared by the Treasury Board Secretariat. The table entitled "Summary of Expenditure Framework and Estimates for 1994-95" shows for these and earlier Supplementary Estimates, and also for the 1994-95 Main Estimates, total expenditures which are broken down into budgetary and non-budgetary expenditures, as well as amounts to be voted and statutory items. I will not read those numbers into the record because they are already attached as an appendix to the Orders of the Day.

The report describes in more detail how projected budgetary expenditures of $162.9 billion — also known as the "expenditure framework" — were arrived at. Honourable senators will have noted that Supplementary Estimates (D) include several large positive and negative changes to statutory expenditures, including $290 million less for unemployment insurance benefits, and a net increase of $470 million in transfer payments to the provinces for health services, post-secondary education, social assistance and in transfers to individuals for various Old Age Security programs.

The largest item is a reduction of $2.3 billion in the Public Debt Program of the Department of Finance. This represents interest payments on the public debt which the government explains by stating that a forecast rise in interest rates occurred later in the fiscal year than predicted. Supplementary Estimates (B), reported earlier, contained an increase of $3.3 billion for public debt payments to take account of higher-than-forecast interest rates. Obviously, the government forecasts are vulnerable to swings in exchange rates, making the forecasting of these rates an uncertain science at best.

There were a number of other changes, pluses and minuses, in the Estimates which are outlined in detail in the report that we tabled yesterday. Honourable senators who are interested in the financial state of the nation should examine them. I will not go into any further detail right now. I commend the report to the Senate for its approval.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1994-95

SECOND READING

Hon. Pierre De Bané moved second reading of Bill C-79, for granting to Her Majesty sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 331, 1995.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill which is before you today, Appropriation Act No. 4, 1994-95, Bill C-79, provides for the release of credits in the amount of $1.5 billion, as provided for in Supplementary Estimates (D) for 1994-95.

The Supplementary Estimates (D) for 1994-95 were tabled in the other place on March 2. They were examined in committee with officials of Treasury Board on March 23, 1995, as was said earlier by the Chairman of the Senate Committee on National Finance, Senator Doody.

Net expenditures previously forecast by the Government of Canada have been reduced in the Supplementary Estimates by a total of $360 million. A-base expenditure forecasts which have already been approved by Parliament have been reduced by $1.9 billion. A sum of $1.5 billion, however, remains to be approved by Parliament by means of a supply bill.

[English]

Some of the major items provided for in this appropriation bill include, first, an amount of $530 million for the write-down of the investment in the Lloydminster upgrade by Natural Resources Canada, following the sale of Canada's interest to Husky Oil and Saskatchewan. The write-off had been anticipated and charged to the deficit in prior years. Second, an amount of some $260 million is provided for operating requirements in a number of departments and agencies, representing the 5 per cent operating budget carry-forward from 1993-1994. This initiative was announced by the Minister of Finance in his February 1994 budget. Finally, I should like to draw the attention of honourable senators to the $200 million for the civil reduction plan in the Department of National Defence.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, would Senator De Bané respond to a question? On page 6 of the bill, reference is made to that vote concerning the ruling we just received. Reference is also made to the Canadian Museum of Nature and section 12 of the National Museums Act.

Does Senator De Bané know whether or not that act is the correct act? Was that act not repealed and replaced with the Museums Act? Section 12 of the National Museums Act and section 12 of the Museums Act speak of different things. Is this an error? Have you checked into that?

Senator De Bané: Honourable senators, unfortunately I have not looked into this matter.

The Hon. the Speaker: It was moved by the Honourable Senator De Bané, seconded by Honourable Senator Hervieux-Payette, that this bill be read the second time. It is your pleasure, honourable senators to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator De Bané, bill placed on Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1995-96

SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator De Bané, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Pearson, for the second reading of Bill C-80, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1996.

Hon. Pierre De Bané: Honourable senators, I move second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, for the record, these are the Main Estimates — that is, the main supply bill for the coming year. They have been referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance and are being examined now. We will continue to examine them over the year. Our first meeting is on April 26 and we will hear the minister and the President of the Treasury Board at that time. We will continue on from there. However, that in no way precludes the passage of the supply bill as moved by Senator De Bané.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1995-96

SECOND READING

Hon. Dan Hays moved second reading of Bill C-73, to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1995.

He said: Honourable senators, Senator Olson had intended to speak to this bill today, but he is unable to be here today and I have agreed to give this speech in support of second reading.

Before I address the provisions of the legislation, I should like to put it in its proper context. As happens every year at this time, we are being asked to approve the amount of borrowing authority directly connected to the financial requirements set out in last month's budget.

It is important that this bill be passed as quickly as possible. If borrowing authority is not in place early in the new fiscal year, starting April 1, constraints will be placed upon the government's financing program.

The fact is that virtually all the remaining borrowing authority granted under last year's borrowing authority act will be cancelled at the end of this fiscal year. All that will remain is the $3 billion non-lapsing amount. Once this amount is depleted, the government would be limited to using section 47 of the Financial Administration Act to achieve its borrowing needs. This section restricts borrowing to short-term funds.

In such a situation, no bonds could be issued except to fund maturing issues, and there are two in the first quarter of 1995-96. This means that any delay in approving this important bill beyond the end of the current fiscal year, which is the end of this month, could be costly to the government and Canadian taxpayers. It would expose the government to an additional interest rate risk implied by increased short-term funding.

Given the government's large financing program, delaying bond financing could potentially be disruptive to the capital markets. This, in turn, could result in higher debt servicing charges to the government. You can see why it is critical that the borrowing authority be secured as soon as possible.

In asking for speedy passage, I do not suggest that we view this legislation as a simple piece of unremarkable pro forma business. The authority to borrow almost $29 million is a tremendous responsibility. There is no question that virtually unchallenged borrowing by the federal government over the last two decades has created the punishing burden of debt we now carry.

That is why, before focusing on the specifics of this bill, I wish to remind this chamber of the dramatic action plan set out in last month's budget. As pointed out by the Minister of Finance, it is a historic response to a historic challenge. This challenge is brought to our attention as we debate this bill. This country's economic future is put at risk by the $500-billion debt we have accumulated; a debt that leaves the government too vulnerable to the harsh impact of compound interest.

This impact is painfully illustrated by the fact that for the fiscal year just ending, interest costs on the debt will likely hit $42 billion. That is the single largest program of Canada's federal government. That $42 billion is almost exactly equal to what we have paid out on unemployment insurance and transfers to the province for education, health, and social assistance combined. That $42 billion is more than double our support for Canada's elderly. Therefore, in considering this legislation, we must appreciate the fundamental reform of government spending set out in the February budget.

The 1995 budget takes direct action to reduce government spending and refocus its activities on key priorities and deeds. The goal of this strategy is clear, concrete and compelling: to restore national fiscal health and reshape the role of government itself in order to bring about a stronger and more dynamic Canadian economy.

It is a budget about getting the government right so that it can do a better job of helping get the economy right, sustaining growth and confidence and creating new jobs, while preserving our ability to help those in need. To meet this goal, the budget delivers on our commitment to cut the deficit to 3 per cent of the economy in two years, despite the impact of higher-than-expected interest rates. If economic performance is stronger than the government's very prudent forecasts, the deficit should fall even more.

The government's fiscal actions will total $29 billion over the next three years, more than in any budget since post-war demobilization. In two years, program spending will be $10.4 billion lower than today.

Just as important, the budget also changes the structure of how government operates. This will ensure that spending will be restrained beyond the two-year target period. The deficit will continue to fall, reflecting the government's commitment to eliminating it completely.

In order to achieve these results, the budget takes fundamental action across government programs and operations. It implements the results of program review, a comprehensive examination of departmental spending. The government's objective is to focus on what is essential and do it better. The budgets of some departments will be cut in half in the course of this exercise.

The budget also acts on a new vision of the federal government's role in the economy, one that includes substantial reductions in business subsidies. These will drop from $3.8 billion this year to $1.5 billion in 1997-98.

The budget reforms major transfers to the provinces, modernizing the federal-provincial fiscal regime and making it more effective, flexible, and affordable.

These wide-ranging reforms mean a smaller public service. Some 45,000 positions will be eliminated. This difficult process will be managed as fairly as possible, including the use of early departures and early retirement incentives.

It is also essential to be fair to the taxpayer, and therefore the 1995 budget does not increase personal income tax rates. However, there are measures to improve tax system fairness, and some revenue initiatives were required to meet the government's vital deficit targets.

This is still clearly a budget that places an absolute priority on expenditure reduction, and it delivers nearly $7 of spending cuts for each $1 of new revenue over the period dealt with by the budget.

However, the most important point about the budget is the ultimate bottom line it delivers. Overall program spending will fall from $120 billion last year to just under $108 billion in 1996-97. Relative to the size of the Canadian economy, program spending in that year will be lower than at any time since 1951. With the measures the government is taking, there is no question that we will achieve our target of $32.7 billion in the upcoming fiscal year and $24.3 billion, or 3 per cent of gross domestic product, in the fiscal year 1996-97.

I should also point out that the government is backing up its prudent economic assumptions with substantial contingency reserves, namely, $2.5 billion in 1995-96 and $3 billion the year after. Looking ahead, the government's contingency reserve can do more than protect its targets. If it is not needed, it will not be spent but will go to reducing the deficit even further.

This underscores another benefit the government's prudent planning assumptions can deliver. If interest rates and growth do better than forecast, and just conform to the private sector average, the 1996-97 deficit could drop below $19 billion. That is $5.5 billion less than the February budget projects. Even if the government does no better than its projected targets, 1996-97 will be an important milestone, since the debt will no longer be growing faster than the economy. The debt-to-GDP ratio will have begun to decline, and that is the key to fiscal sustainability and putting Canada's debt ratio on a permanent downward track.

By that time, Canada's financial requirements, the new money it borrows from markets, will fall to $13.7 billion, a drop of more than $11 billion from the amount asked for in this bill. That will be just 1.7 per cent of GDP, down from 3.5 per cent of GDP in 1994-95 and 5 per cent of GDP in 1992-93.

In fact, based on the budget plans for 1996-97, Canada is projected to do better than the United States, Germany, Japan, and every other major industrial country. The contrast with the United States, honourable senators, deserves mention. In 1992-93 and 1993-94, Canada's fiscal requirements were about 1 per cent of GDP higher than the United States. In 1996-97, they should be 1 per cent of GDP lower.

That is the economic picture ahead of us. That is why we, on the government side of this chamber, ask all senators to support the request for borrowing authority before us.

Let me turn to the specifics of the legislation before us. Like the borrowing bill last year, this bill contains three basic elements: First, there is the provision for $24.9 billion of authority to cover Canada's anticipated borrowing to meet the net financial requirements set out in the budget.

Second, there is a provision to cover $1 billion of Exchange Fund Account earnings which give rise to additional Canadian dollar borrowing requirements. These earnings, although reported as budgetary revenues, are retained in the Exchange Fund Account. They are not available to finance the ongoing operations of the government.

Finally, there is the usual $3-billion non-lapsing amount, the same amount requested in borrowing authority bills in the last seven years. The non-lapsing amount can either be used during the course of the year to manage contingencies, such as unexpected foreign exchange requirements, or can be carried forward into the next fiscal year.

There are some minor technical provisions in the bill that more clearly link fiscal year borrowing authority with fiscal year borrowing requirements. One provision is that the 1995-96 borrowing authority may only be used after the new fiscal year begins. Another provision stipulates that for purposes of calculating borrowing authority usage, the effective date is April 1.

Until the bill is passed, the government may continue to use the $3 billion non-lapsing amount provided for in last year's borrowing authority act. Any portion of this non-lapsing amount that is used will be deducted from the basic amount of borrowing authority which is being sought today. This prevents the non-lapsing amount from effectively adding to borrowing authority next year. This bill will also cancel all borrowing authority remaining from the fiscal year 1994-95 once it is passed.

Before concluding, I would like to review the government's debt operations in the current fiscal year up to the end of February. So far, in fiscal 1994-95, the government has issued about $23.2 billion in marketable bonds, $600 million in Canada Savings Bonds, and $1.8 billion in real-return bonds. There were also net redemptions of $5.3 billion of treasury bills. This provides a total of $20.3 billion in net new market debt.

Regarding Canada Savings Bonds, I should also note that the government introduced two innovations aimed at revitalizing this program. First, a new three-year pricing feature was introduced to make these bonds more attractive to retail investors. Second, the government expanded the sales window, making CSBs available over a longer period of time. Canada Savings Bonds were priced competitively with other products in the market, and cost-effectively relative to other sources of financing. This helped produce sales of $7.5 billion, a 40 per cent increase over 1993. After accounting for redemptions during the fiscal year, the net increase in outstanding Canada Savings Bonds was about $600 million, as I indicated earlier.

Regarding foreign currency debt, outstanding Canada bills increased by US $2 billion to US $6.1 billion at the end of February. These are short-term U.S.-dollar denominated bills which are issued from time to time to the U.S. market to fund Canada's foreign exchange reserve. In July 1994, the government launched a $2 billion U.S. three-year Eurobond issue. The issue was used to increase reserves and diversify the sources of U.S. dollar funding of Canada's exchange reserves.

In conclusion, honourable senators, Bill C-73 is an established part of government operations and offers no unusual changes from previous years. I, therefore, urge this house to proceed with this legislation as quickly as possible, so that new borrowing authority will be in place at the beginning of the new fiscal year at the end of this month. The government's regular borrowing problem can then proceed as the fiscal year begins.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, first of all, I want to say a few words with respect to this urgency, which we hear about every year. In fact, I think that may be the same speech that I gave a couple of years ago!

Senator Fairbairn: And you meant every word of it.

Senator Perrault: I thought you destroyed all the copies?

Senator Doody: No, they should have self-destructed after I read them.

The government has $3 billion in funds to carry forward into the next year, yet they feel the need to pass this bill before the weekend? I know the rate of expenditure by this government is pretty intense, but I do not think even they could get rid of that much money so quickly.

Let us not delude ourselves that there is a vast urgency for this bill. As Senator Stewart well remembers, governments have been known to survive for weeks and weeks into a new year. They come up with amazing strategies to get around the various borrowing limitations in order to carry on with the normal business affairs of the nation.

I have no intention of delaying this bill. I think my colleagues are of the same mind. I do think it should go to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, and if we can arrange a meeting for tomorrow morning, we will.

Can my friend advise us how long the House of Commons spent studying this borrowing authority bill? Did this bill go to a committee? Did they spend any time working on it, or must we do it ourselves once again? That is the first issue.

I also note that among the borrowing requirements, there is $1 billion for exchange fund revenue. Can the honourable senator tell us why we have to borrow $1 billion to cover off revenue which we have earned on exchange? It is an interesting question. I just want to see how carefully the senator has studied his notes.

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, I am not sure how to interpret the statement that those opposite have no intention to delay — whether that means the end of the month or beyond.

I do remember when positions were reversed. Senator Stewart and others played a large role in a similar debate on a similar piece of legislation. I suppose it is unnecessary, but let me just observe that there were different circumstances prevailing at that time.

Senator Doody: Of course, we were over there. That was very different.

Senator Hays: As I recall, Bill C-11 was not as timely as this bill in terms of estimates. I will not comment on the urgency, because I interpret your comment as an indication that the opposition side will be cooperative in early passage of this legislation, in the context of what the government is requesting from this side of the house.

I cannot answer the question about how much time the House committee spent on this bill. I was briefed, but it is not something I raised, nor was it volunteered to me. I simply do not know the answer to that question.

You also had an interesting question on the Exchange Fund Account profits. Is that accurate, Senator Doody?

Senator Doody: Why are we borrowing $1 billion to cover revenue which we already have?

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, I think Senator Doody may know the answer very well, but he wants to confirm whether I might know the answer, and I am not sure that I do. This was explained to me. When this matter is dealt with in committee, that will be a wonderful opportunity for us to get an explanation.

In its simplest terms, the Exchange Fund Account has a number of uses. This account deals with our foreign exchange. I have some charts here dealing with fluctuations in that account. It is currently in the order of $12 billion. This is held in U.S. treasury bills and earns interest. That must be accounted for in the budgetary documents, and that is done by treating it as an expense item.

However, as I observed in the speech that I gave, those are not monies available for expense purposes. That is my attempt to answer the question of Senator Doody.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, my comment is that, fortunately, we do not earn very much money or we would not need to borrow even more. We earn $1 billion on foreign exchange interest, and we immediately need to go to the market and borrow $1 billion to offset it because we are not allowed to spend the money that we earn for the affairs of the nation. We borrow money to offset the $1 billion, which presumably goes back into the exchange account.

As Senator Hays suggests, we should take it up in the committee with the officials, as we do every year.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

TREATMENT OF ABORIGINAL VETERANS

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF ABORIGINAL PEOPLES COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the ninth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples, entitled "The Aboriginal Soldier After the Wars," tabled earlier this day.

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, I cannot underscore how important is this report to the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples. We were not the first to study the ill-treatment of aboriginal peoples after the First World War, the Second World War and the Korean War. In fact, there were attempts at studies as early as the late 1940s. However, nothing has ever come of those studies. The Senate initiated a resolution earlier, which subsequently bogged down.

I am pleased today that through the tenacity and commitment of the members of the committee we have come up with a report which we think is credible to the Canadian people and, more particularly, to aboriginal veterans. At this time, I wish to express my personal appreciation to members of the committee.

The process was a difficult one. It was not a normal study conducted on an issue to which there was easy access to documentation. When we first began our work we realized that we needed to define "ill-treatment." We needed to see what the issues were in such a way that we could substantiate any findings and recommendations that we would make.

Although aboriginal veterans were clear in stating that they felt they had been wronged, that they had not been treated properly as veterans, that they had not received their due for the price that they had paid in serving our country, we found it difficult to come to a conclusion on how to organize our work in such a way as to assist them in their claims. We began the process by inviting national aboriginal groups to appear to help us structure our work, and then we heard from departmental officials, both from Indian Affairs and Veterans Affairs. I thank them all for their assistance in framing our workload.

We then developed a strategy to attempt to reach aboriginal veterans. You can appreciate that the veterans are a disparate group, living in all sectors and segments of society, both geographically, professionally, et cetera. We wanted to hear from the veterans directly. We heard an awful lot of evidence at the start to the effect that aboriginal veterans did not feel that they had been treated correctly. Yet what we were hearing was all second hand. We felt that our task was to hear firsthand the concerns of aboriginal veterans. We developed a communications strategy to attempt to reach aboriginal veterans. In this case, we avoided the usual communications systems of Canada and tried to reach all the aboriginal networks, both verbal, written and via radio and television through their own programming.

As a result of our efforts through these channels of communication, we heard from some 100 aboriginal veterans. We then had some 50 to 60 veterans come forward. We held our hearings in the locations where they were centred, which was in Vancouver, Edmonton and Saskatoon, with the rest of the veterans coming to Ottawa for the sake of expediency.

We ended with our findings and conclusions. Although I am very tempted to do so, I will not take the time today to read the entire report and its recommendations. It is worthy of reading, and, at the least, the minimum that is needed to understand this issue.

We ran into a number of dilemmas. The first was that "aboriginal" is a term which came from the 1982 Constitution. Prior to that, during the First World War, the Second World War, and later, these people were not categorized as either "veterans" or "aboriginal veterans." They found themselves in the Métis community, the status Indian community and the nonstatus Indian community. Therefore, they were not easy to find, nor was it easy to determine the treatment they had received.

A second dilemma that we came to was the fact that the emphasis seemed to be on the Second World War. The majority of veterans who came forward were from the Second World War. Naturally, our report reflects that. There is no intention on our part to diminish the contribution of the aboriginal veterans of the First World War or the Korean War.

The third dilemma was that there was no paper trail. The aboriginals were either under the Indian Act, if they were status Indians, or they were veterans. Therefore, "aboriginal veterans" did not come out in the paper trail. It was very difficult to find out how these people were treated, what benefits were afforded to them, how they were processed and, in fact, what benefits they actually received.

The obvious dilemma was that time was passing. Many veterans have passed away. It is, perhaps, too late for them, although the committee hopes that this report will not be too late for their dependents, families, friends and their memories.

The committee centred on the the key point that because there was no paper trail, no documentation to substantiate or to disprove the allegations made, we would have to look at the oral history. That is what the aboriginal veterans gave us. They came to tell their stories. It is in keeping with aboriginal traditions that oral history is as valuable and should be taken into account in the same way as any documentation in the non-aboriginal sector. The committee, to a member, agreed that we would accept oral histories and give them the same weight as any documentation.

I shall simplify the findings and the issues on which, I hope, aboriginal veterans feel the emphasis should lie. In many cases, they simply said that they did not have to go to war, that there was no obligation on them. In fact, at times, there were legal impediments to their serving. Yet, they joined. They did so in significant numbers. In World War I, World War II and the Korean War, they gave their full dedication to this country. As they said, they joined, perhaps, for the same reasons as other Canadians.

They bought into the promise that if they defended this country and what it believed, they would together return and build a better, more just, fairer country in which their contribution would be recognized. Virtually every aboriginal veteran said that overseas they were treated equally. In many cases, they had grown into men while overseas. They felt that their contribution was recognized and that they were able to serve with dignity. They found very little to complain about as individuals in the service.

However, the minute they came back to Canada it was another story. The promise of fairness, equality and a new beginning is a promise unfulfilled to this date in the minds of the aboriginal veterans. The aboriginal veterans feel that they served honourably and it is time that the Government of Canada and the Canadian people recognized their contribution and the fact that they did not receive the benefits due them when they returned.

Simply put, many aboriginal veterans told us that, at this point, they want nothing more than for someone to apologize for overlooking their contribution. As a result of this oversight, they were put in the position where they had to fight to be recognized as equal veterans, and in the case of World War II veterans, this fight has been ongoing for 50 years. If you look at our report, you will see that we accepted the oral histories. We found nothing in the documentation to contradict them.

The committee recommends, and urges the government to accept, that the Government of Canada, on behalf of the Canadian people, recognize the special contribution of aboriginal veterans during the First and Second World Wars and the Korean War, and that the Canadian government, on behalf of the Canadian people, apologize to aboriginal veterans for the inequities and insensitive treatment they experienced after their return from these wars.

I encourage you to read in our report about the inequities and insensitivities they felt when they came back. They came back in soldiers' uniform and, though wanting to share a farewell drink with their buddies, were precluded from entering establishments. They left thinking that being an Indian would mean something when they came back. Instead, they came back to a paternalistic system that had not changed, despite their efforts.

Our other recommendations recognize this inequity and insensitive treatment. To remind us that it should never happen again, we suggest and recommend that the Canadian government establish a scholarship fund in the memory of aboriginal soldiers. We further recommend that aboriginal veterans be recognized with other veterans in Remembrance Day services.

We also suggest that the Departments of Veterans Affairs, Indian Affairs and Northern Development give prompt attention to improving the living conditions of aboriginal veterans. We found many of these veterans were very isolated. In fact, many of the support systems available to other veterans were not available to aboriginal veterans. It was only in the 1970s, when perhaps more politicization of the aboriginal veterans occurred, that they built their own support systems, with some support from the Canadian government.

We need to seek them out. We need to ensure that their contributions in the wars have not been forgotten. I cannot think of a better moment in history than the fiftieth anniversary of the Second World War to stop and pay tribute to the aboriginal veterans.

The report itself does not deal with all of the issues surrounding aboriginal veterans because we did not want to be part of the problem. Too many people have studied them. We want to be in a position of action and resolution. We hope that our small measure in bringing a spotlight to bear on the efforts of the aboriginal veterans will be recognized quickly and that something will be done by the Canadian government on behalf of the Canadian people immediately.

I urge all senators to support our recommendations, and I urge the Canadian government to follow through on the recommendations. We sent soldiers to all of these wars with fine statements by our Prime Ministers, but they were promises that were unfulfilled for aboriginal veterans. Surely, it is time that we fulfilled those promises.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I know all of us thank Senator Andreychuk for her comments regarding this interesting report.

I had the opportunity to serve on that committee during part of its deliberations. It was a moving and educational experience.

Last week, some of us were in Belgium fighting the fish battle with the European parliamentarians. Some of us later went to Ypres and the monument to all those in the British Empire and Commonwealth who fought in the First World War. Some of you have been to that monument, and some of you have been to Vimy, and some of you have been to our war memorials built to acknowledge and honour Canadian feats of arms in two world wars and other encounters such as the Korean War.

Every racial background in our country was represented among the names of those who died and were listed on that monument, not just of English or French descent. Every other race represented in this nation paid the price. There are many people of Indian descent whose names are on that monument.

During our committee deliberations, it was quite an experience to hear of veterans given full equality on the battlefield, being fired at by the enemy, as were the other Canadian people in battle, only to come back to a Canada which did not honour the democracy that had been won by them on the battlefield, and which placed them in the category of second-class citizens.

I commend this report to each and every member of the Senate. Read it carefully. Read this paragraph:

> Historian James Dempsey notes, "reactions from the white community and government offices were generally very supportive, if at times paternalistic."

This comment was made with reference to their service in the wars.

> Annual reports of the Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs praised the loyalty and magnificent record of Indian soldiers. There were also many newspaper reports of Indian soldiers going to war.

I suppose that "aboriginal" is a more exact appellation now, because there were people other than those of Indian descent among the aboriginals who fought in those wars.

> As a result of WWI, at least 300 Indians and an unknown number of other aboriginal soldiers died. Additional lives were lost to illness. Many aboriginal soldiers were taken prisoner and many decorated for bravery. One example is Métis veteran Henry Louis Norwest, from Saskatchewan. His courage and skills as a sharpshooter earned him both the Military Medal and bar. Communities were also recognized. When the Prince of Wales visited the Brantford area in October 1919, he presented the Six Nations community with a bronze tablet to commemorate the 88 members killed in action or as a result of the war. "In summary, the contributions of Indians in the military aspect of the war effort were comparable to that of other Canadians. The major difference was that Indians were not required or expected to serve, but they did so with gallantry and valour."

It came as a surprise to me to learn that people of aboriginal descent were not allowed to join the Navy until 1943. They had a regulation that one must be British-born and a British subject. It amazes me that people of aboriginal descent have been able to tolerate this obvious discrimination and have spoken so little publicly about it until fairly recently.

I should like to make some further remarks on this report. In the meantime, I would commend its reading to everyone who serves here. It is worth study. There are many documents that flood in on us from various directions, many of which should be consigned to the wastebasket earlier than others, but this is one which should be kept on the shelf and shared with members of our families.

People of aboriginal descent have laboured under quite a burden of unfair treatment, in my view. In the province of British Columbia, some of our most distinguished veterans are those of aboriginal descent. Courageous to a fault, they came back to a Canada which did not accord them the full citizenship that they deserve.

CANADA-CHINA RELATIONS

MOTION RESPECTING HUMAN RIGHTS IN CHINA AND TIBET— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino, pursuant to notice of March 2, 1995, moved:

> That the Senate urge the Government of Canada to express concern over continuing reports of violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms in China and particularly Tibet by local, provincial and national authorities and severe restrictions on the rights of citizens to freedom of assembly, association, expression, religion, as well as to due legal process and fair trial; and
> That the Senate urge the Government of Canada to encourage the People's Republic of China to take further measures to ensure the observance of all human rights, including the rights of women and children, and to improve the impartial administration of justice; and
> That the Senate request the Government of Canada to encourage the government of the People's Republic of China to allow foreign delegations to Tibet to study the human rights situation, the state of religious freedom, the status of women, the treatment of Tibetan children and prison conditions; and
> That the Senate urge the Government of Canada to extend support to Tibetan people in their struggle to regain their freedom and the presentation of their culture; and
> That the Senate encourage the Government of Canada to support the non-violent efforts of his holiness, the Dalai Lama, to resolve the issue of Tibet, particularly the Dalai Lama's campaign to make Tibet a zone of ahimsa, non-violence, through demilitarization and the protection of Tibet's natural environment; and
> That the Senate implore the Government of Canada to ask the Chinese authorities to commence negotiations with his holiness, the Dalai Lama, and to the Tibetan government in exile and representatives of the People's Republic of China on the future of Tibet without preconditions.

He said: Honourable senators, as many of you are aware, the Chinese occupation of Tibet has resulted in the destabilization of traditional Tibetan society and the destruction of Tibet's unique cultural heritage, leading to a denial of the human rights and fundamental freedoms of the Tibetan people.

Independent international organizations such as Amnesty International and Asia Watch have confirmed the continued abuse of human rights and the denial of fundamental freedoms in Tibet by Chinese authorities. These human rights violations have occurred in contravention of the obligations imposed on China by international law.

Honourable senators, every year, hundreds of Tibetans risk their lives by walking over some of the most dangerous passes in the world to bring their children to Dharmsala in northern India, the site of the Tibet government in exile. There they leave their children in the care of Tibetan refugees to learn the language and retain the culture of their forefathers. Parents are risking their lives and the lives of their children, only to leave their infants sometimes for 10 or 15 years, sometimes never to see them again. Such are some of the sacrifices being made. For us in Canada they are beyond comprehension — unnecessary sacrifices if the government of the People's Republic of China would chose to respect the rights of Tibetans.

During my visit to Dharmsala in March of last year, I was deeply moved by the community of Tibetans in exile but mostly by the sadness of the parents I met as they headed back to Tibet over the same dangerous Himalayan passes, satisfied that their children were in the care of a community whose responsibilities include the preservation of their language and their culture.

His holiness, the Dalai Lama, and the Tibetan government in exile have, over the years, proposed to the Chinese authorities constructive initiatives to solve the Tibetan problem peacefully. In addition, national parliaments in a number of countries have passed resolutions expressing their concern at the plight of the Tibetan people and urging the Chinese government to meet with his holiness, the Dalai Lama, to deal with this issue.

Honourable senators, it is in support of the relentless, non-violent efforts of his holiness, the Dalai Lama, to peacefully solve the Tibetan problem that I have placed this motion before you, a motion which proposes, among other things, that the Government of Canada promote and encourage the initiation of a dialogue without preconditions between the Tibetan people and the Chinese authorities in order to resolve the future of Tibet.

The motion I propose is one which I believe can be supported by all colleagues in this chamber on behalf of all those children, all the men and women who struggle every day for the fundamental freedoms and rights now being denied them. I appeal to all honourable senators to support this motion, a motion that goes some way in sending a message of hope to an oppressed land.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

CANADA'S PRESENCE AND INFLUENCE IN EUROPE

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, members of this chamber will recall that, last November, the Bosnian crisis deepened, and frustrations in the West became such that some began to counsel a Dunkirk-style retreat.

On December 1, 1994, I spoke in this chamber on the subject of the continuing presence of our peacekeepers in the region. I argued that a retreat would have the gravest implications, that the United Nations presence in the Balkans is a mirror of sanity in hell. Without that mirror of sanity, the people of that tormented region will lose all hope.

In the long term, a retreat from the Balkans would engender a crisis of failure in Western capitals, at a time when we need all our collective energies to fashion better decision-making institutions for the future, both at the regional and international levels. As we engage in debate here in Canada over the renewal of our mandate in the Balkans, I would like to emphasize my earlier conviction. I believe we must reflect seriously on the symbolism of a withdrawal from the Bosnian nightmare.

Honourable senators, Canada has traditionally taken the broad view of international peace and security. We have recognized that peace is a process and that global interests are served by keeping that process on track. That is why our great peacekeepers, our Canadian heroes abroad, are in Bosnia, in Europe's backyard. I might add that when we made the commitment to Bosnia we did not say that this was Europe's problem. We said, as we have said to Europeans many times in the past, that this is as much our problem as it is theirs.

Now, today, we hear some of our European friends telling us that we do not understand international law, although in their own backyard Canadian peacekeepers wage a daily war against the forces which, if unleashed, could lead to another European conflagration.

Perhaps European Union Fisheries Commissioner Emma Bonino and her supporters throughout the European Union should learn that Canada's commitment to peace and security is as strong in the Balkans as it is off the Grand Banks. As I said in a speech to this chamber on May 6, 1992, "Canada has been an unhappy witness too long to piracy of a central food supply."

Yet contemporary international law does not provide us with a balance between flag state liberty and the rights of coastal state jurisdiction over such straddling stocks. It is as though a page were missing in the vital subject–matter of fisheries jurisdiction. That, we must write — and are prepared to write — in collaboration with our European allies and friends.

Like tiny Iceland in the past, we are forced to take extraordinary action today in the interest, not only of our own nation, but in the interests of the global commons of tomorrow. We will all be judged by future generations for the steps that we take today.

I would remind those Europeans who are so quick to criticize Canada in these times that their future survival is partly contingent on the Canadian determination to resist aggression both on land and at sea. We have done this through our commitment to international law, not to a static series of commandments carved in stone, but to an evolving volume in constant transition. I say with the greatest respect, look in our own backyard, Ms Bonino, because that is where much of the new volume must be written.

LEARNING DISABILITIES ASSOCIATION

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as an honorary lifetime member, I am proud to give recognition to the Learning Disabilities Association of Canada and also to acknowledge and honour the hard-working branch of the Learning Disabilities Association of Saskatchewan, this being the end of Learning Disabilities Month across Canada.

Today, it is estimated that one in 10 Canadians suffer from a learning disability ranging from mild to severe. This complex disorder is caused by a dysfunction of the central nervous system which results in inaccurate information being received through the senses, much like a poor telephone connection or a fuzzy photograph.

Albert Einstein had a learning disability. He had difficulty with mathematics. Leonardo da Vinci, Thomas Edison and Winston Churchill were all learning disabled. These individuals, each a genius in his own field, managed to attain the highest of achievements by compensating and making the most of their abilities rather than focusing on their disabilities.

This year at the National Learning Disabilities Conference and annual benefit dinner, to be held in Saskatoon in October, the actor Henry Winkler will tell his story of successfully dealing with his learning disability.

The Learning Disabilities Association is a non-profit organization dedicated to advancing the education, employment, social development, legal rights and general well-being of people with learning disabilities.

I urge you all to become more informed about learning disabilities and to become more involved with your local provincial or territorial chapter. Your advocacy is needed and deeply appreciated.

[Later]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I congratulate Senator Berntson and second his comments on the Learning Disabilities Association of Canada and the work that it does. It has made a significant difference in the lives of many thousands of Canadians. I am particularly conscious of the work it does as a companion support system to those who have difficulty with literacy because that often goes hand in hand.

On a personal note, the first national conference I spoke to was in Saskatchewan when the group there hosted the national meeting. I wish the association the very best for their conference in the fall.

MASS MEDIA

EXISTING PRINCIPLES OF JOURNALISM— MOVEMENT TO ABOLISH

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, it was 26 years ago that I proposed and then carried out a two-year Senate study of the mass media. In those days, we were primarily concerned about the concentration of ownership, the quality of journalism and, of course, Canadian cultural survival.

Times have changed. I believe the quality has improved, and the concentration of ownership has moved in many new directions, allowing far greater competition and infinitely greater technology. Meanwhile, Canadian cultural survival is a continuing "must" for those of us who care passionately about Canada.

One of the people who helped us most in the Senate Committee on Mass Media was the late Borden Spears, one of Canada's most significant journalists. Since 1977, the Canadian Daily Newspaper Association, the CDNA, which represents 84 newspapers, established a set of principles at the behest of the late Borden Spears and the late Martin Goodman. That statement continues to this day to list the seven items. They are: ethics, freedom of the press, responsibility, accuracy and fairness, independence, privacy, and access. It was, in the words of George Bain:

> ...calculated to consider a minimum standard of good editorial practice that would apply in member papers generally.

Recently, however, a group of senior editorial managers has been seeking to abolish the newspaper industry's 18-year–old statement of principles. Those members who want to scrap the statement would do so, apparently, because of possible legal problems. In George Bain's words again:

> ...still in 18 years that seems never to have happened.

Thankfully, John Miller, Chairman of the Ryerson Journalism School, represents the only dissenting voice in this group which wants to abolish the existing principles.

On April 5, the CDNA directors, mostly newspaper publishers, will meet to reject or endorse this proposal. That meeting is closed to journalists. There is a much more open meeting scheduled for May 2 of all CDNA members, where the decision of the board could or could not be overturned. Unfortunately, even that "open meeting" is closed.

Allow me to express my final observation in the words of one of Borden Spears' salient comments:

> The marvel is not that newspapers get some things wrong...but that they have so many things right...The mistake is to believe that any one news report or any one newspaper contains the final truth. Every journalist knows that truth is cumulative.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, I stand to respond to Senator Davey's remarks. I listened with great interest to his description of the controversy over a code of ethics in the fourth estate. I must tell honourable senators that I have spoken to several of my former colleagues about this matter and, with rare agreement, they said "No comment."

NATIONAL FINANCE

NECESSITY TO RE-EXAMINE SYSTEM FOR APPROVING ESTIMATES

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, on Tuesday I raised a point of order concerning Supplementary Estimates (D) and argued that Canadian Heritage Vote 76d was beyond the scope of a supply bill since it sought to grant borrowing authority. At that time, I asked that it be struck from Bill C-79.

In support of my argument, I quoted extensively from rulings made by the Speaker in the other place. This vote appears to be at odds with several precedents as to what may or may not be done through the supply process. Had such a point of order been raised in the other place, this vote may well have been ruled out of order.

A supply bill should approve spending, and nothing more. In particular, given the tight time frame under which supply is examined, Estimates and Supplementary Estimates should not be used to legislate or to do what ought to require legislation. Borrowing authority, whether for the government or for a Crown corporation that depends upon the government for its budget, should be approved in a separate bill. This is especially true in cases such as this, where no dollar limit is specified on the amount that may be borrowed. The role of Estimates is to authorize spending, not borrowing.

His Honour, the Speaker of the Senate, has ruled that Canadian Heritage Vote 76d is in order under the Rules of the Senate. We do have our own rules and procedures, and I accept that decision. I also thank the Honourable Speaker for taking the time to carefully consider my arguments.

As His Honour noted, we do have the power to amend supply bills, and we do not face the same time allocation rules in supply as does the House of Commons. However, at least on this one occasion, one day before the end of the fiscal year, I do not want to be the one to delay supply.

Honourable senators, perhaps it is time Parliament, as a whole, took a serious look at the way in which we deal with supply. The House of Commons deals with its supply bills on a set timetable that cannot be altered. However, we in the Senate receive these bills at the last minute. While we have full power to amend such bills or to send them back to committee for further study, we are also reluctant, as senators, to hold up the supply process.

I would encourage all members of the Senate and the House of Commons to consider a thorough re-examination of the way in which Estimates are presented and approved.

REVIEWING CANADA'S FOREIGN POLICY

REPORT OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION CONCERNING MOTION TO PRINT VOLUME I OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—REPORT PRESENTED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the twenty-second report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration concerning the motion to print Volume I of the Special Joint Committee Report on Canada's Foreign Policy.

Thursday, March 30, 1995

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

TWENTY-SECOND REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the motion of the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C., moved in the Senate on February 21, 1995, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of March 2, 1995, considered the motion and now reports as follows.

Your Committee recommends, on division, that up to 500 additional copies of Volume I of the Report of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy entitled "Canada's Foreign Policy: Principles and Priorities for the Future" be reprinted by the most economical means at a cost not exceeding $7,500.

Your Committee also recommends that the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration be instructed to seek financial participation by the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons in this initiative.

Respectfully submitted,

EARL A. HASTINGS
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Hastings, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1995-96

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. C. William Doody, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report:

Thursday, March 30, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

TWELFTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-73, An Act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year, 1995-96, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, March 29, 1995, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

C. WILLIAM DOODY
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(b), I move that this bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FIRST NATIONS GOVERNMENT BILL

Hon. David Tkachuk presented Bill S-10, providing for self-government by the First Nations of Canada.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Tkachuk, bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading Tuesday next, April 4, 1995.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, April 4, 1995, I will move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine and report upon Canada's international competitive position in telecommunications, including the following: a review of the economic, social, cultural and political importance of the telecommunications sector for Canada; the impact of current developments in telecommunications on Canadian heritage and broadcasting and specifically on the role of the CBC; a review of issues relating to foreign investment in Canadian telecommunications; a comparison of regulatory frameworks in Canada and in other countries; and a review of the research and development necessary to enhance Canada's competitive position in telecommunications; and
> That the Committee present its report no later than December 15, 1995.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—EXTENT OF KNOWLEDGE OF MR. NIXON AT TIME OF REVIEW—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, until now I have basically been an observer to this lively debate on what I think we can now properly call "Pearsongate." However, with the unfolding of recent events and information in the press, the courts and elsewhere, I find myself uncontrollably drawn into the fray.

It has now become apparent that Mr. Robert Nixon knew that the agreements relative to Pearson were sound, and he said they were not. He knew that there was no misconduct during the bidding process, and he said there was. He knew that the deal was a good one for the government and the taxpayers, and he said it was not. He knew that the cancelling of the contracts meant the loss of 3,500 jobs, much needed in the Toronto area, and recommended the cancellation anyway. He knew that the cancellation would expose the Government of Canada to millions, potentially billions, of dollars in compensation and damages. He knew all of this, and yet authored a report totally to the contrary.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: What opportunity will Mr. Nixon have either to be held accountable or to clear his good name unless there is a public inquiry held on this whole affair?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Bernston for his question. I am not sure that I am enthusiastic about him finding himself being drawn into the fray.

Senator Berntson: Reluctantly.

Senator Fairbairn: However, I do not share his judgment of Mr. Nixon's report. The history of the government's view on the airport issue, going back to pre-election moments, is well known. Mr. Nixon has spoken for himself. He stands ready to speak for himself at any time. The one thing on which I would agree with my honourable friend is that it is a shame that events have come together in such a way as to prevent needed development in the Pearson airport area which would have provided, and will provide, jobs for Canadians.

FAILURE OF MINISTER TO PROPERLY BRIEF PRIME MINISTER ON REPORTS RESPECTING PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Minister of Transport, Mr. Doug Young, knew, or at least ought to have known, about the items I set out in my previous question as to the quality of the deal, the integrity of the bidding process, et cetera.

He ought to have known it because he is the minister to whom senior bureaucrats would have communicated on the report presented recently to the General Division of the Ontario Court, which talked about the process and how these decisions were reached. He would have been aware of the Underwood McLelland report. He would have been aware of the Deloitte Touche report. He would have been aware of the report from the auditor group from Montreal which dealt with the integrity of the bidding process.

Thus, he ought to have known that all the items which I just listed were in fact good, solid and to the benefit of Canadians and taxpayers and, in particular, Torontonians. He obviously failed to brief the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister accepted the Nixon report as gospel.

What recourse does the Prime Minister have? Would you not agree that the honourable thing, and the only recourse he has in the circumstances, is to ask the Minister of Transport for his resignation?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Prime Minister indeed asked Mr. Nixon to review the circumstances and details surrounding the Pearson airport deal. He had confidence in the report which he received from him and the information from which it was developed. As honourable senators will know, that is what led to the introduction, almost a year ago now, of Bill C-22. It remains the conviction of this government that this is the right way to go.

I continue to be hopeful. We have come a long way in this chamber over the past several months. I do not begrudge those months at all. We have wrestled with the complexities of this issue in the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I still retain optimism that we will continue to do that and reach a satisfactory conclusion for both the development of the Pearson International Airport and the best interests of the people of Canada.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—LEGISLATIVE SOLUTION—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, my honourable friend the Leader of the Government in the Senate has repeatedly invoked her hope and expectation for what she calls "a legislative solution" to these questions. Let us take a moment to "review the bidding process."

When Bill C-22 came to the Senate, the Senate amended it. Those amendments were voted down in the House of Commons. The bill was then referred anew to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. The government proposed some new amendments of its own to Bill C-22. The committee heard witnesses on those amendments. The weight of the witnesses' evidence was that new problems had been created and that problems of a legal and constitutional nature remain with the bill.

At one point our friend Senator Gigantès attempted to force a vote on the government amendments in the committee, acknowledging, as I believe he did, that the government would lose that vote. Meanwhile, our friend the chairman of the committee, Senator Beaudoin, invited the Minister of Transport, Mr. Young, to appear before the committee. He refused to come, and that is another issue which has not yet been addressed, the refusal of a minister to come to discuss government amendments to his own bill.

Senator Beaudoin also invited the Minister of Justice, Mr. Rock, to come and comment on the legal and constitutional matters which had been raised in the course of testimony. Mr. Rock has not refused to come, but he has not stated a date that would be convenient for him. We all understand that he has a full agenda. I think it is the disposition of the committee to accommodate his agenda. However, we have not heard from him. There the matter rests.

If the bill is being held up, it is really the responsibility of the government. The question I am asking the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: What does she have in mind by way of a legislative solution? Is the government preparing some additional amendments to propose to the opposition and to the committee? If not, where do we go from here?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend's accounting of the progress with respect to this bill, slow though it has been, is quite accurate. As I have said a number of times, at the conclusion of the last hearings of the committee, our honourable friend Senator Beaudoin, in summing up, suggested that he felt the areas of question and concern had narrowed down to three or four possible compromises.

The government has been working on those areas of compromise. I remain hopeful that one will be the legislative solution. I suppose my use of "legislative solution" is really "political-speak" for passing the bill. That is the ultimate goal.

Following along my honourable friend's suggestions, the Minister of Justice and his officials have been working on those areas. The Minister of Justice, as I am sure my honourable friend knows, has not given any indication that he would not attend a future meeting of the committee.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, to sum up, does my honourable friend agree that the ball is in the government's court?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I say to my honourable friend, as delicately as I can, the government, in a cooperative way, has been examining the suggestions put forward in the committee and, in a cooperative way, will try to solve this impasse.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—REQUEST FOR JUDICIAL INQUIRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I am in receipt of a letter addressed to both the Senate of Canada and the House of Commons from Mr. John H. Matthews who, I am sure honourable senators know, has been associated with the Matthews Group and the Pearson consortium. He is one of those many Canadians who have had their good name smeared during the discussion on the Pearson airport and particularly by the statements of the Minister of Transport.

The letter states:

> Issues of credibility have been raised in the debate over the privatization of the Airport. These issues can only be resolved in testimony, under oath, subject to cross-examination. I would be pleased to attend and testify in any inquiry relating to the privatization of the Airport and the cancellation of the Airport Contract.
> Respectfully,
> John H. Matthews

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate assure the Senate that people such as Mr. Matthews and others who have been smeared and maligned by this government will have the opportunity to state their case under oath and be subject to cross-examination at either a judicial inquiry or the inquiry proposed by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank the Honourable Senator Phillips for reading the letter from Mr. Matthews into the record. As he will know, I have also read into the record here in this house comments of the Prime Minister in regard to this situation.

Indeed, in the media today there are reports of statements from the lawyer who attended the meeting with the Prime Minister and Mr. Matthews. It is useful to have these statements on the record. The honourable senator knows that there are many opportunities in which we can hear witnesses in this place. I will take his suggestions to my cabinet colleagues.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I thank the Leader of the Government in the Senate for her answer.

I too read the statement of Mr. LaBarge in today's press. However, I would point out that Mr. LaBarge is a well-known Grit. Having read the Liberal Red Book of lies, I am a little hesitant about taking a Grit's word.

Senator Perrault: Don't get political now!

Senator Phillips: Would the Prime Minister or the Minister of Transport agree to make a similar statement and volunteer to appear before either a judicial inquiry or a Senate committee? I say "volunteer" because I believe it would be necessary for them to volunteer. I would be reluctant to see them summoned.

Senator Fairbairn: I know the honourable senator's politics run deep. However, if he is nervous about accepting comments from Mr. LaBarge, I would offer him the comments of the Prime Minister that the Toronto airport was not discussed at all at the meeting. I quote from the House of Commons Debates of March 27:

> At that time, I was not aware of the privatization plan.

Senator Phillips: Is the Honourable Leader of the Government suggesting that the Prime Minister is not a Grit? Or is she suggesting that he was not associated with the Liberal Red Book of lies?

Senator Fairbairn: Quite the contrary. I would say never was there a truer Grit than Prime Minister Jean Chrétien. He is also a person known across this country for his honesty, his integrity and his efforts to put before the Canadian people a broad discussion of the issues and of the Liberal agenda, which he packaged in a red cover during the last election campaign.

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and concerns the affair that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has so aptly named "Pearsongate." I will adopt his terminology.

Further to my question of last Tuesday, March 28, on the subject of the redevelopment of Terminals 1 and 2 at Toronto airport, could you tell this chamber why the Minister of Transport is not immediately launching the appropriate legal proceedings in order to cancel the subleases that, according to your government, are the reason why the urgent redevelopment work at this airport has not been started?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I appreciate the honourable senator's rhetoric. I think he is reaching somewhat with "Pearsongate."

Senator Perrault: "Torygate" is what it is.

Senator Fairbairn: I am conscious of the fact that my honourable friend has asked me the same question before. I have indicated that he is suggesting a course of policy action that might appeal to him.

The decision of the government and the Prime Minister was to bring forward Bill C-22 as the most appropriate means to settle the Pearson airport issue, to permit the proper development of that airport by the Local Airport Authority, and to protect the interests of the taxpayers of Canada. It is for those reasons that I continue to express the fervent hope that we will reach a conscientious settlement to permit the legislative option to move forward.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS ON REVENUE FROM SUBLEASES

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: My question is again about "Pearsongate." I agree with the Leader of the Government in the Senate that she chose this course of action for political reasons.

The Leader of the Government answered one of my questions in writing two weeks ago. This question mentioned that it was impossible for this local authority to start work on redevelopment of the air terminal because there were problems with certain titles.

In her reply, she said that although the main lease was terminated, there were still some minor subleases that had not been terminated. My question is this: If it is so urgent to proceed with redevelopment of the terminal, and I believe it is, why do they not ask the courts to terminate these minor leases?

I have a second question: What was the gross revenue generated by these subleases in 1994 for the Government of Canada?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will have to add that question to the many others I am having actively pursued for the honourable senator.

To answer the first part of the honourable senator's question, the Government of Canada chose to pursue a legislative course. That is the course we are pursuing. Again, I hope we will find a solution.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—PERSONAL KNOWLEDGE OF LEADER OF GOVERNMENT ON POLICY PROPOSAL

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

According to The Toronto Star, on or about October 6 or 7 of 1993 — when this paper quotes Liberals, one knows the quotes are probably correct — the Leader of the Liberal Party, Mr. Chrétien, said the airport deal should be delayed until after the election. That night, Charles Bronfman was in attendance at a meeting of the Laurier Club in Senator Kolber's mansion in Montreal. The Prime Minister said that he told him it was unacceptable to have a decision three weeks before the election. "I told him to his face, and it cost him a thousand dollars," he said.

When Senator Kolber heard this, I am sure his mouth must have dropped because he is a prominent fund raiser in Montreal. However, we must remember that the Bronfman family is rather close to the Liberal Party. I cannot imagine Mr. Bronfman saying, "Gee, thanks, Jean," after all of this and all of his years of support, but these decisions were made during the campaign. The Leader of the Government was the co-chair of the Liberal campaign, along with Mr. Ouellet.

Can the Leader of the Government tell us whether, before or on the dates of either October 6 or October 7, in a full or informal meeting of the campaign committee, she participated in a discussion of this very important policy proposal, which was to cancel or delay the Toronto airport deal?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, at the meeting of which Senator Tkachuk speaks, there was a clear indication of the Prime Minister's concern about this particular development deal in that it was immaterial to him who was involved. He was deeply concerned about the deal. This was a matter of public knowledge. I, of course, was aware of his concern, since we travelled together for seven weeks during the election campaign. This was a very open issue.

In fact, in the city of Toronto it was one of the most profoundly disruptive issues of the election campaign. Strong, publicly articulated concerns were expressed from every level of municipal involvement, as well as by the people in the city of Toronto over this particular deal.

Honourable senators, it was very clear to the Canadian people what course the Leader of the Opposition intended to pursue should the deal be signed. That is, in fact, what happened; he carried out the promises that he made during the campaign concerning Pearson airport. It is taking a long time to ultimately carry out the government's policy on this issue, perhaps because it is such a contentious, complicated, complex issue. Nevertheless, I still retain the hope that we will, as a chamber, be able to come to an agreement on the legislation.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—DISCUSSION HELD BY MEMBERS OF LIBERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I still do not know whether the campaign committee discussed this issue. It would seem to me to be an issue of such import to the city of Toronto, and to a major corporation with strong Liberal ties, that there would have been some discussion in the campaign meeting with respect to advising the Leader of the Liberal Party as to his direction. Perhaps an inquiry will help sort all that out.

There were some powerful campaign committee members described in The Toronto Star article of September 27, 1993. That article listed the members of the campaign committee, including Mr. Eddie Goldenberg, Chaviva Hosek, Jean Carle, Senator Kolber, John Rae, Andre Ouellet, and yourself, Senator Fairbairn — all described as being very close to the Prime Minister. Can you tell me whether any members of that campaign committee had discussions with members of the Bronfman family, for instance, about this matter before the Prime Minister — the then Leader of the Liberal Party — stated that he would delay the agreements on the Pearson deal and then later announced that he would cancel it?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend has wide knowledge of, and involvement in, election campaigns and political activities. He will know that the Leader of the Liberal Party always accepts wide advice from a great many people, in or out of campaign periods.

I am not entirely sure how the inner workings of the Liberal federal election campaign are of great interest to this chamber, any more than the inner workings of the national campaign of my honourable friend's party would be. Suffice it to say that the Prime Minister of today received very wide counsel and advice on the major issues that were developed for his party during the last election campaign.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—TRANSPORT CANADA STUDY—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and also concerns "Pearsongate."

On Tuesday of this week, Minister Young said that the November 4, 1993, Transport Canada study was a "rigged Tory document." However, he corrected himself later that day, indicating that this was not the case; that, in fact, the study was not a pre-cooked Tory document.

Yesterday, during a radio interview, Robert Nixon indicated that the report in question was indeed an analysis engineered by Tories.

Can the Leader of the Government shed some light on this situation by telling us what this document is? Also, could she inform this chamber if Mr. Nixon, like another Mr. Nixon of dubious fame, perhaps misspoke himself on this issue?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in our analogies in this house, I think we are extending a rather long reach into the American past. However, I will say that these questions about the documents were asked of me, I believe, two days ago, both by Senator Murray and by Senator Lynch-Staunton. I have undertaken to my friends opposite to try to provide the answers quickly. I would advise them that I could not get that material together in time for today's sitting. However, I have asked that the information be put together for me to present to this house and to honourable senators next week.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I will take 30 seconds of this house's time to tell my honourable friend that it is quite important that those matters be clarified, especially in view of the statement attributed to Mr. Robert Nixon a moment ago by our colleague Senator Di Nino.

The author of those documents, as we know from our access to information documents, is now representing Canada in his capacity as Deputy Minister of Fisheries at the discussions with the European Union on the turbot problem. One would assume that the government retains confidence in him and other officials concerned in this matter.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must point out that the time for Question Period has expired. Is there agreement that Senator Di Nino complete his questioning?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—REQUEST FOR COPIES OF ALL MATERIAL OR INFORMATION ON WHICH MR. NIXON BASED HIS REPORT

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, it was reported on the weekend that Mr. Nixon has attributed the discrepancies between his report and other available analyses of the subject on several nuances. Yesterday, he indicated that he had, in fact, other materials in his possession on which he relied in writing his report.

Will the minister table this new material or these other nuances within the next day or so?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I will add this question to the others on which I am working in order to get the information for my honourable friends next week.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I still have on my list quite a few senators' names. If it is agreeable, I will put them first on the list when we next meet. They are Senators Ghitter, Oliver and Forrestall. Is it agreed?

PRIVILEGE

Hon. Landon Pearson: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I hasten to say that I do not wish to make any comments, one way or the other, about the merits of the Toronto airport agreements.

Let me further say that I realize my honourable colleagues do not mean any disrespect. However, in my view a term such as "Pearsongate" is unacceptable, in as much as it dishonours the name of my late and honourable father-in-law. I would ask my honourable colleagues, please, to consider refraining from the use of that particular phrase.

Hon. Pat Carney: I rise on a similar question of privilege, honourable senators. I would suggest that the same remarks could be applied to Senator Perrault's use of the term "Torygate."

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1994-95

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-79, granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1995.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure honourable senators to adopt the motion?

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I want to say a word or two for the record on the Supplementary Estimates (D). It is a matter of great concern to this house, as was demonstrated by the discussion we had yesterday. The record should show the concern that the Senate has, and has demonstrated, for the strange and highly irregular use of Estimates as a cover for a borrowing authority.

It does not matter how you look at it or how you phrase it: the fact is that the Estimates have granted to the Canadian Heritage Vote under the subhead of the Canadian Museum of Civilization, under a $1 Vote, the right to borrow an unspecified amount of money for the purposes of their headquarters. To make matters even worse, there is no limit on the amount of money that this Crown agency can borrow. Indeed, it is to be an amount approved by the minister, not by an order in council but by the minister, somewhere down the road.

I feel that this is a serious matter. The government should be made aware of the fact that the Senate is very concerned about it. This is not the first time it has happened. We had a set of Estimates a while ago in which a borrowing authority was granted to the CBC for the borrowing of $25 million. When one thinks in terms of the amount of money that CBC gets from the government on a yearly basis, $25 million is not a very large amount of money. However, giving borrowing authority to a Crown agency through a set of Estimates is questionable, at best.

It seems to me to be a strange new departure — quite apart from the irregularity of it — for the Department of Finance to be passing borrowing authority to individual Crown agencies and departments. My experience in this field has been that the Department of Finance has jealously guarded borrowing authority rights. It has tried to concentrate and centralize the borrowing authority in its own hand so they would know exactly where they stood at any given time in terms of the rates being negotiated, the agencies with whom they were dealing, and the total amount of money for which they were responsible at any given time.

I feel strongly enough about this to ask that a message be attached to the bill bringing the attention of the government to our concern, but I will not press that at this particular time. I would serve notice, though, that I for one will certainly be prepared to do that, or take some alternate option, if this situation repeats itself.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps I could make a brief comment on the remarks of Senator Doody, as well as those of Senator Tkachuk.

I wish to assure honourable senators that every word uttered in this chamber on this particular issue will be transmitted directly to the ministers involved, together with a stated concern from myself that in the future they pay attention to this kind of procedure.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, at second reading, after the speech by my colleague Senator De Bané, I drew the attention of the Senate to the fact that there was what I considered to be an error on page 6 of the bill. I have had an opportunity to check the statutes, and I find that I was correct.

In reference to Vote 76d, the bill reads: "Pursuant to section 12 of the National Museums Act ..." That act has been repealed. I think it should read, "Pursuant to section 12 of the Museums Act ..."

Perhaps our Clerk could advise the Clerk in the other place that there is an error in the bill.

Senator Doody: Who is in charge on the other side?

Senator Kinsella: Who reads the bills?

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1995-96

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-80, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1996.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

TREATMENT OF ABORIGINAL VETERANS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples entitled "The Aboriginal Soldier After the Wars."—(Honourable Senator Perrault).

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a few additional remarks to make about a report which I believe has a great deal of merit.

In January of last year, our good friend and colleague Senator Len Marchand introduced a motion in the Senate to examine and report on the treatment of aboriginal veterans following the First and Second World Wars and the Korean War.

The unanimous committee report, "The Aboriginal Soldier After the Wars," provides illustrations of the difficulties that our aboriginal people faced following their return from active service. The product of lengthy consultation with aboriginal veterans, aboriginal organizations and departmental officials, the report sets out nine recommendations to the Government of Canada.

Many honourable senators had the opportunity to serve if only briefly on that committee, but it was a very good, cooperative effort, devoid of partisan feelings, and chaired in a way that gave us all confidence in the work of the committee.

The following summarizes the testimony presented at the committee's hearings, the committee's assessment of the grievances, and outlines the major recommendations of the committee.

Aboriginal veterans are hurt and disillusioned with the treatment they received following the completion of their service. They find it painfully ironic that they and many of their fallen comrades fought for freedom and equality abroad while not having been extended those same rights and privileges when they returned home. They spoke of the pride, the sense of accomplishment and equal treatment in the war effort, but returned to a place that had not changed much since they left home years before. They spoke not only of their difficulties in re-establishing themselves after the war but also of what they sensed as unequal treatment following the war. They spoke harshly of their difficulties in dealing with the Departments of Veterans Affairs and Indian Affairs after the war. They had literally scores of examples of the insensitive treatment received at the hands of administrators of the demobilization process.

I was struck by the fact that many of them who came to testify before the committee had come from hundreds of miles away at considerable cost and difficulty. I wish it had been possible to have more and longer hearings, but there has to be a limit on the length of committee hearings and on the number of centres visited, as we understand.

The aboriginal people, who participated in the war effort in greater percentages than any other group, feel their contributions have not been recognized. After World War I, access to land was restricted by the Indian Act, which then prohibited Indians from homesteading in the west. The full benefits of land and loans to establish themselves under the Veterans Land Act were not provided to the same extent as to non-aboriginal veterans. Benefits and other assistance were not effectively communicated to aboriginal veterans and thus assistance was not provided.

The delivery of benefits by Indian agents, together with the prevailing paternalistic attitude, did not afford Indian veterans with the same opportunities to make their own resettlement plans. Many veterans lost their status on the encouragement and mistaken assumption that they had to do so to serve in the Armed Forces. They were discriminated against because they were aboriginal. In the case of the Métis, they fell through the cracks, in a sense, as, although they were legally Canadian citizens, they were treated as Indians by society.

Many witnesses told us during the hearings that all they wanted before they died was for the committee and Parliament on behalf of the people of Canada to say, "I am sorry for the bad treatment you received after the wars" and to recognize the great contribution made by them to this country during the wars. An overwhelming number of witnesses had no big financial claim against the government. They just wanted some sort of recognition.

The committee seems to have been careful in its report to outline the limits of its inquiry and the nature of the hearings. It recognizes the differences between the spoken remembrances of veterans and the written record of department administrators. Given the length of time that has elapsed, the committee was careful to underscore the importance of the oral testimony of the veterans.

Generally, I think, the committee did not find much with which to take issue in the testimony provided by the veterans. There is recognition in this report that it could not alter the policies nor the societal attitudes of the post-war era, but nor would it excuse such attitudes. The committee agreed there must be an expression of deep and sincere regret, both for the inequitable and insensitive treatment of the returning aboriginal veterans and for the silence and the neglect of their needs by the Canadian government and society.

The report acknowledges that the Veterans Land Act did not take into account the particular needs or living situations of returning veterans and that prejudice. With regard to the administration of benefits, it acknowledged that the strictures imposed by the Indian Act left the door open for "malfeasance, misinformation and the undercutting of a relationship of trust and respect."

The report makes two major recommendations. The first calls on the Government of Canada on behalf of the Canadian people to recognize the special contribution of aboriginal veterans during the First and Second World Wars and the Korean War and apologize to aboriginal veterans for the inequities and insensitive treatment they experienced after they returned from these wars. The second recommendation could be described as a centrepiece of the recommendations. It states that a scholarship foundation should be established in the memory of aboriginal soldiers as a tangible and lasting acknowledgement of the veterans' contributions and as an indication of the seriousness of Canada's intention to build a better future.

The balance, as honourable senators will see, relates to recommendations to the Royal Canadian Legion to ensure a formal role for aboriginal veterans in Remembrance Day ceremonies; for Veterans Affairs to follow up on individual grievances; and to establish new procedures for dealing with aboriginal veterans, including the establishment of an independent investigator.

Finally, the report calls for prompt attention to improving the living conditions of aboriginal veterans and calls upon the Government of Canada to provide funding to the National Aboriginal Veterans Association and other established veterans groups.

Honourable senators, as I said yesterday, this is a first rate report. Credit goes to Senator Len Marchand for introducing his motion in the first instance, to the chairmanship of Senator Raynell Andreychuk for her good work and to all those who participated in the effort to give our aboriginal peoples a fair and decent hearing.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

SIXTEENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the sixteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (budget—study on the financial system in Canada).—(Honourable Senator Kirby).

Hon. Michael Kirby moved the adoption of the report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate of the Honourable Senator Cools, calling the attention of the Senate to the issues of violence in society, within the family, and children at risk.—(Honourable Senator Cools).

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, on Tuesday last, I had been saying that the Juvenile Delinquents Act of 1908 was to assist the child whose primary problem was a lack of proper care from his parents. It was preferable to prove delinquency in the child rather than delinquency in the parents; that is, neglect by the parents.

The government in its intervention assumed the role of the parens patriae — that is, the state as parent. The Juvenile Delinquents Act was also an initiative to bring these matters into federal jurisdiction, a very difficult constitutional question indeed.

Honourable senators, today my point is abuse and aggression in the family, its expression in the family and its consequences for society.

In 1978, a subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science undertook a study on childhood experiences as causes of criminal behaviour. The committee's report, "Child at Risk," a fine piece of work, concluded:

> Good parenting is of overwhelming importance to the developing personality of the child. Close affectional ties with an adult in early life and consistent loving and care and nurturance in the early years are essential to the optimal development of the child.
> It seems there is rarely no alternative to tender loving care. Whatever can be done to help parents to do the job of parenting well will at the same time be preventing future criminal behaviour.

• (1520)

Some citations from the 1980 Senate report "Child at Risk" are:

> The Committee has been convinced by expert witnesses that much of the violent crime committed by adults can be traced to a breakdown of parenting in the early childhood period...
> It is not only the battered child but the neglected one as well who runs a high risk of becoming a violent adult...
> Several psychiatrists who appeared before your Committee agreed that violent criminal behaviour is a direct result of abuse and neglect in the first three years of life...
> The unsocialized, aggressive child is likely to be the product of a home in which it is an unwanted or illegitimate child, and has met with rejection from the mother...
> It is generally accepted that "maternal deprivation has a detrimental effect on character development"...

Honourable senators, while it has not been determined that all abused children become violent adults, it has been established that almost all violent adults were abused and neglected children.

I should like to review some literature and share some findings which indicate that mothers are perpetrators of abuse upon children at least equally with fathers. The Health and Welfare Canada report of 1989 entitled "Family Violence: A Review of Theoretical and Clinical Literature" cites Breines and Gordon as having stated, in 1984, that physical abuse of children is the only form of family violence in which women are the perpetrators as often as men.

This report also states that Richard Gelles, in 1979, cited studies that the abusers are often female. In one 1969 study of Bennie and Sclare, this was found in seven out of ten cases examined, and in another of Steele and Pollock in 1968, in 50 out of 57 cases.

Other studies — Zalba in 1971 and Gill also in 1971 — showed women to be abusers in 50 per cent of the cases.

The Health and Welfare Canada report also states that Bell, in 1986, found evidence that mothers are more likely than fathers to be abusive; that Benedict et al, in 1985, identified the mother as the abuser in 38.7 per cent of cases and the father in 18.4 per cent, rising to 31 per cent when stepfathers and boyfriends are included; that Creighton, in 1979, found that mothers or mother substitutes are the suspected abusers in 44 per cent of cases and fathers or father substitutes in 46.5 per cent.

Ralph Weisheit, in a 1986 article entitled "When Mothers Kill Their Children," found in a study of 460 female offenders in prison between 1940 and 1983 for homicide that 39 were institutionalized for killing their children. Finally, Richard Gelles, in 1978, found that mothers' violence toward children was significantly higher than that of fathers. Seventy-six per cent of mothers, as opposed to 71 per cent of fathers, reported at least one occurrence of violence during the course of raising the child.

Dr. Craig Allen of the Department of Human Development and Family Studies at Iowa State University, recently sent me data from the Child Abuse Register of his home state of Iowa that shows that of the children abused by biological parents between January 1984 and June 1987, some 64.5 per cent were abused by mothers.

Closer to home, here are recent Canadian and Ontarian data on child abuse: On child abuse morbidity, University of Toronto's Dr. Cyril Greenland, in a 1986 analysis of 100 child abuse or child neglect deaths, or CAN, from 1973 to 1982 in Ontario, in an article from the chief coroner's office entitled "Identification and Management of High Risk Cases," reported that:

> Natural parents were the perpetrators in 63 per cent of the deaths; mothers were involved in 38 deaths, fathers in 13 deaths and both parents in 12 deaths.

About the child victims, he continued:

> The risk of death due to CAN is highest in the first year of life. The Ontario data, confirmed by most other studies, show that well over half of the victims...died before the age of 12 months. An additional 25 per cent...died before the age of two years. Only five per cent of the victims were over the age of five years.

The Toronto Institute for the Prevention of Child Abuse, in its 1994 report entitled "Ontario Incidence of Reported Child Abuse and Neglect," tells us that in 1993 there were 46,683 child maltreatment investigations by all 54 Children's Aid Societies. The study defines child maltreatment as any one of physical abuse, sexual abuse, neglect, or emotional maltreatment. The findings are as follows: Of the total substantiated cases of child maltreatment, mothers were perpetrators in 49 per cent and fathers in 31 per cent of the cases. In the category of child neglect, mothers were perpetrators in 85 per cent of the substantiated cases. In the category of child physical abuse, biological mothers were perpetrators in 39 per cent of the substantiated cases and biological fathers in 40 per cent of cases. In the category of emotional maltreatment, mothers were perpetrators in 79 per cent.

This study found that:

> ...boys were most strongly over-represented in the area of physical abuse, especially in the zero to three-year-old category, where boys accounted for 59 per cent of investigations...

and male children aged four to eleven years accounted for 55.5 per cent. The single largest number of investigated families, 35 per cent, was the single mother family.

Honourable senators, these data speak where these defenceless children cannot.

On the matter of mother-only families, Biller, in 1981, found that early father absence has a strong association with delinquency, committal to training school and recidivism among males. Wilson and Herrnstein report that a longitudinal research study of children in a predominantly black area of Chicago found that children raised in mother-only families were, by the third grade, more likely to be aggressive.

In 1989, Toronto's Peter Silverman's examination of abuse and neglect concluded that more physical abuse occurs in single parent households led by females. James Wilson, in an article in 1994 entitled "What to do About Crime," confirms this. He said:

> The evidence...is quite clear: even if we hold income and ethnicity constant, children (and especially boys) raised by a single mother are more likely than those raised by two parents to have difficulty in school, get in trouble with the law, and experience emotional and physical problems.

Honourable senators, violence and aggression are the nemesis of child neglect. Wilson and Herrnstein, the foremost authors on crime and violence in the United States, in their book Crime and Nature, wrote that:

> ...All the boys from quarrelsome families with erratic discipline, but only one-fourth of those from cohesive families with consistent discipline, were convicted of a crime. Interestingly...it was the mothers' behaviour that made the greatest difference in the boys' criminality.

Before our Senate Subcommittee on Childhood Experiences, Dr. Robert ten Bensel, Director, Maternal and Child Health at the University of Minnesota, said this about dangerous offenders:

> I have never met a violent juvenile delinquent who was not abused as a child...Secondly, all of the criminals at San Quentin prison who have been studied had violence upbringing as children.

That study was attributed to Gelles —

> Thirdly, all assassins, or individuals who have attempted assassinations in the United States during the past 20 years had been victims of child abuse: There is a 100 per cent correlation.

That, again was attributed to Gelles. About dangerous sexual offenders, he also testified:

> If you look at the problem of sex murder...you find that they all came from broken families and suffered cruelty and brutality, usually at the hands of a woman, plus acting out, as a child, vandalism, arson, and cruelty to animals. You see the pattern over and over again. There is cruelty to animals, cruelty to kids, and if a woman has beat up on you, then you are more likely to become a sex murderer.

This is not Anne Cools speaking; this is one of the foremost thinkers in the field.

Honourable senators, the impact of family aggression on these little people, little boys and girls, is immeasurable. The panic, fear and anxiety that awakens in their heads, minds, and bodies eludes most of us. Absolute terror grips them, and all of this in their precognitive and prerational minds. Their little crouched bodies, their little shoulders, taut as drawstrings, are filled with pain and anguish. As these little people's undeveloped psychological systems are strained, as their nerve endings are eroded by behaviours they cannot comprehend or control, the damage is inflicted by uncaring or uncontrolled large persons who tower over them.

Meanwhile, these little people acquire other sets of impulses, impulses which are largely ungovernable, impulses that operate quite differently as a function of their gender, impulses that in the male child become uncontrollable, violent and even homicidal. These little people's pain is incalculable. When these damaged little people become big people, the pain and suffering they will inflict on others is unspeakable. When all languages fail, the language of human suffering and tragedy will speak. I have seen the crouched person of the physically abused child and the blank, listless, unresponsive person of the neglected child.

Honourable senators, in the formative years, the child's mental and sensory stimulation is essential, and the child's personality structure is moulded. Aggression, physical and verbal, parents' emotional unevenness, and family instability play a major role in negative formation.

The responses to my statements on March 7, 1995, were overwhelming and supportive, including from many academics, psychologists, professionals, practitioners, field workers and researchers. Dr. Debra Pepler, Director, LaMarsh Centre for Research on Violence and Conflict Resolution at York University, wrote in support:

> Our research on children of battered women,... reveals that there is a wide range in the adjustment of children who have witnessed their mothers being abused. Some children exhibit extreme behaviour problems, whereas others are remarkably well adjusted in spite of substantial adversity. The factor that most clearly differentiates the well adjusted children from those who are poorly adjusted is the mothers' report of verbal aggression (e.g, yelling and screaming) to her children. As you have stated, we have found that mothers who can somehow manage to be loving, positive, and nurturant with their children even though they, themselves, are highly stressed, promote the healthy development of their children.

Dr. Reena Sommers of Family Violence Research, St. Boniface General Hospital, wrote in support:

> The real issue of family violence has been totally obscured by special interest groups headed by feminists. Their perspective... ignores... important elements of this serious social problem. Among these are the abuse of children by mothers as well as fathers, the abuse of women by other women, and as well, the abuse of men by women. General population research examining family violence has consistently shown that there is no statistical difference in the rates of abuse perpetrated by men and women against each other or against their children.

Dr. Andrew Brink, former Coordinator, Humanities and Psychoanalytic Thought Program, Trinity College, University of Toronto, wrote to me supportively saying:

> I completely agree with your remarks on mothering and violence in boys...Newer studies to support your statement are emerging from the Attachment Theorists, following from the work of the British psychoanalyst John Bowlby.

Dr. John Bowlby, honourable senators, was a major clinician and scholar. One of the major contributions Dr. John Bowlby left for humanity was a definitive study and work on maternal privation, which he did for the World Health Organization around 1950 or 1951. It was an exceptional piece of work.

Dr. Jim O'Brien, a psychiatrist in Nova Scotia, telephoned the CBC Radio program As It Happens on March 10, 1995, and said:

> I did a small prospective study. In a four year period, I asked every new female patient who came to see me if there was violence in the home. Fifty-five said yes. Of that 55, 55% said the violence came from their mothers and 35 per cent said that the violence came from their fathers and the rest said both.

In Toronto, CFRB Radio ran a talk show on March 8, 1995, about my remarks and held a survey. They put the question to their listeners: "When you were growing up, which parent was more abusive — your mother or your father?" Of 200 respondents, 62 per cent said mothers and 38 per cent said fathers. I was informed that 70 per cent to 80 per cent of the callers to the Lowell Green talk show on CFRA Radio in Ottawa agreed with me.

I am also informed that on March 9, 1995, Maclean Hunter Broadcast News placed a question to their viewers with regard to my remarks, "Do you agree"? Of the 273 respondents, 57 per cent agreed and 43 per cent disagreed.

Honourable senators, certain feminist ideologues, too few to number, claim insult and injury from what I said. Some even attacked me personally in brutish, Philistine and uncharitable statements. These loud persons, in their feminine aggression, are unaware that they have merely transported that peculiar aggression from the home to the workplace, even to politics.

The term "violence against women" is a term that has taken currency only in recent years. It is coloured and camouflages the real issues of aggression and all its ugliness.

Dr. Murray Straus, Dr. Richard Gelles, and Dr. Suzanne Steinmetz, foremost scholars on domestic violence, frequently report that violence is equally perpetrated by males and females against their children and against each other. The National Family Violence Surveys conducted by Gelles and Straus find this. However, I shall leave the issue of spousal violence for another day.

Honourable senators, I will close by urging balance in the family violence discussion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senator Cools, I am sorry. Under the rules, I am unable to let you continue unless leave is granted.

Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Cools: In recent years, the primordial, the primeval and the phylogenetic have been dominant in this discourse. This fact has been buttressed, if not engineered, by the tyranny of political correctness and its various consorts. In many instances, reason has been abandoned and sometimes even ceded to unreason. When unreason prevails, truth is the first casualty, if not the first fatality.

Honourable senators, sole proprietorship by gender of aggression, violence, love or charity is repugnant to human nature and to human intelligence.

I thank honourable senators for their patience.

On motion of Senator Haidasz, debate adjourned.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, pursuant to rule 135(4), the sitting is suspended until 3:55 p.m. I do now leave the Chair.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Beverly McLachlin, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in her capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bill:

An Act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1995 (Bill C-73, Chapter 8, 1995)

The Honourable David Kilgour, Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bills:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1995 (Bill C-79, Chapter 9, 1995)

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1996 (Bill C-80, Chapter 10, 1995)

To which bills I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the said bills.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

---

The sitting of the senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 4, 1995, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, April 4, 1995

The Senate met at 2:00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

FELICITATIONS ON THE APPOINTMENT OF THE HONOURABLE PERRIN BEATTY, P.C., AS PRESIDENT AND CEO

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, when I was growing up, my parents always taught me that when someone does something nice, you should say "thank you." Not much has happened since November of 1993 for which to thank the government until now. On behalf of members of this side of the Senate, and on behalf of all the people of Canada, I say thank you for appointing the Honourable Perrin Beatty as President and CEO of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. This appointment is in keeping with the traditions set by Prime Minister Mulroney of appointing eminent people from other parties.

Mr. Beatty is a man of great knowledge and integrity who is thoroughly respected in the communications field, and he is certainly no stranger to hard work. I had the pleasure of dealing with him in 1992 when the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications was carrying out its pre-study of Bill C-62, the Telecommunications Bill. He told the committee that as Minister of Communications he was willing to consider any of our reasonable suggestions for improvement of the bill. True to his word, all of our major recommendations for change in that bill were accepted, including the elimination of a departmental licensing scheme for telecommunications companies.

This appointment comes at a time when the Transport and Communications Committee is about to undertake its proposed order of reference which includes a complete study of the future of the CBC. I look forward to working on this study with Perrin Beatty in his new position as president of the CBC.

The fact that Mr. Beatty has not previously run a $1 billion corporation is not of major concern to me. Most of us have not. We do know that he has successfully run six major government departments. Canadians are indeed fortunate that he has accepted this assignment. He has the ability to guide the corporation through these uncertain times and the credibility to gain the confidence of the communications industry. I look forward to his early appearance before the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

GATINEAU

DONATIONS REQUESTED FOR VICTIMS OF RECENT FIRE

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am sure we have all either read or heard of the tragic fire in Gatineau last Friday. It left approximately 150 people homeless — most of them young, single mothers. They now find themselves in a situation where they are without a home, without memories, and without possessions. It truly is a tragic situation, and help is needed now.

Last Saturday, my wife Joan and I were out for a drive, and we found ourselves driving through that part of the city of Gatineau. The magnitude of this tragic event struck home. As we were returning home, Joan suggested that as soon as we got home we should rummage through our closets to see what we could contribute to this worthy cause. Before we got home, she also suggested that we should also look beyond our own closet. She then talked about starting a Tory caucus initiative at the Senate.

Being the partisan person that I am, I thought it was a great idea to talk to my colleagues in caucus about this tragedy. But being the fair person that I am, before I did so I talked to my counterpart, Senator Graham, who suggested that we should make this a non-partisan event so that all senators could participate in this worthy cause.

In order to make sure that we were not breaking any rules, we talked with the Clerk of the Senate, who suggested that we engage the whole Senate in this plan — that is, all the senators, their staff and the administration — to make it a cooperative effort for this worthy cause.

It appears that we have arrived at a means of doing just that. Honourable senators will be receiving later today no doubt, either by mail, fax or E-mail, a letter signed by Senator Graham and myself. It will encourage you to test your heart. There will be boxes mounted in the Senate foyer and at all other Senate entrances for clothing, linens, toys, small appliances, and canned and dried goods. For your convenience, Senate messengers have volunteered to pick up donations of all kinds. Please let your wallets speak for your heart, and give generously.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank and congratulate the Deputy Leader of the Opposition for his statement, and most especially, as I am sure all senators would agree, for the ideas contained within that statement. As I understand it, not all but most of the good ideas that emanate from the Berntson household come from Mrs. Berntson, who happens to be sitting in the gallery. I congratulate her as well.

In the letter you will be receiving, it is indicated that tax receipts can be issued for any donations of $10 and over. Honourable senators can either request the tax receipt, or can take the opportunity to see all the skeletons that the Berntsons might find in the closet which the senator said he was cleaning out.

This is a very worthwhile initiative, and certainly it has the support of the people on this side. I congratulate those responsible. I am particularly pleased that the administration and staff are responding in such a generous and wholehearted way. I hope it is something we will see more of in the future.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION FROM AUSTRALIA

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is with pleasure that I draw your attention to the presence in the Speaker's Gallery of a parliamentary delegation from Australia led by a senator, the Honourable Michael Beahan, the President of the Senate. Mr. Beahan is accompanied by three senators and three members of the House of Assembly of Australia.

ADJOURNMENT

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, April 5, 1995, at one thirty o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

STATE OF CULTURE IN CANADA

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday, April 6, I will call the attention of the Senate to the state of culture in Canada.

TRANSPORT

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—TRANSFER OF ADMINISTRATION TO LOCAL AIRPORT AUTHORITY—NATURE OF LEGAL IMPEDIMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, once again I must ask the Leader of the Government to interpret and explain another outlandish statement by her colleague the Minister of Transport.

Last week, the Minister of Transport was quoted as saying that Tory stalling tactics in the Senate are costing the Toronto area up to 15,000 potential new jobs at Pearson International Airport. He said that he would meet with members of the airport authority Tuesday, today, in Toronto to see if the 10,000 to 15,000 jobs can somehow be saved.

Honourable senators should know that the cancellation of the contracts led to the loss of 700 jobs. If the agreements were in force now, there would be some 3,500 people working on the site. However, I am not rising to question how the minister supports the difference between 3,500 and 15,000. The government and the Leader of the Government in the Senate repeatedly blame the delay in passing Bill C-22 for the delay in transferring Pearson airport to the Greater Toronto Regional Airport Authority. By the way, as Senator Murray very accurately pointed out last week, the delay in transfer is the responsibility of the government.

Can the Leader of the Government tell us what there is in Bill C-22 that has to be approved before the administration of Pearson airport can be transferred to the airport authority?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will check with my colleague on the question of the number of jobs and the figure that he has been citing. As I have previously indicated in the Senate, and in answer to written questions, the Toronto Airport Authority can only function in an advisory capacity until the successful passage of Bill C-22.

Senator Berntson: That is not right.

Senator Fairbairn: My friend says, "That is not right." I have repeatedly questioned those who have the responsibility for this file, and I am advised that that is correct. I will question them again, and I will do so in the context of my friend's question.

On the statement regarding the delay, I listened carefully to Senator Murray's question. This bill has had a lengthy path. Since coming to this house, it has gone back to the other House, come back to this house again, and then gone to committee. Obviously, the fact that it has not been passed has an effect on the creation of jobs in Toronto. Whatever the numbers may be, that does have an effect.

I am not in a position at this point in time to find fault, but I will say that efforts to work together and to obtain successful passage of the bill will continue. I sincerely hope we will be successful.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, the question was: What is there in the bill which prevents the transfer of the airport to the airport authority? The question was not answered directly. A direct answer would have been, for example, "There is a legal impediment because one of the parties has a lease which can be used to block the transfer of the title from one party to the other." That may be so. Let us assume that there is a legal impediment. All parties to the previous agreements, including the party which is subject to the so-called legal impediment, have said repeatedly — verbally and in writing — that they will not stand in the way of the transfer of the airport to the airport authority, whether or not there is a legal impediment.

This is the question I ask: Why does the government not take the parties at their word and proceed with the transfer immediately, if the lack of transfer is the sole item preventing the creation of 15,000 new jobs?

The parties are saying to the government: "Go ahead with the transfer. We will not stand in its way." The government says "There is a legal impediment." The parties then say: "Legal impediment or not, we accept the fact that the contracts were cancelled. Transfer, and do it any time you want." The government's reply is: "We will not."

This is a "Catch-22" situation created by the government, which can proceed with the transfers. Why are you not doing so?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, this is not the moment in time to go back over the lengthy history of this issue. This issue was not of the government's choosing, and that is clearly recognized. Indeed, it was clearly indicated during the last election campaign.

The government took a policy decision on the issue which resulted in a bill being placed before both Houses of Parliament. We are endeavouring to have that bill passed. We are also endeavouring to work through some of the legal and constitutional issues which have been raised by friends in this chamber, as well as people who have appeared before our committee. The solution to this issue is the passage of Bill C-22, and we are working very hard on that.

I would again say to this house that I remain optimistic that passage will be achieved, and we can then get on with the proper development of the greatest airport in this country, in the city that my friend Senator Doyle holds so dear. We will continue to try to reach a solution, in order to allow the proper development of that airport to proceed as quickly as possible.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Again, I wish the minister would get closer to answering the question, rather than making her vague answers.

Even if Bill C-22 were passed today, sent to the house and given Royal Assent before the end of the week, is it not true that there are no negotiations taking place on the lease right now between the government and the airport authority which has been created? The non-passage of Bill C-22 does not stop discussions from taking place, subject to the passage of that legislation. Is it not true that the chief executive officer who will be responsible for these negotiations has not yet been hired by the airport authority? Is it not true that a business plan, which is essential for the financing, is not even in place, and therefore the banks cannot be called upon to provide financing?

Finally, legal impediments or not, is it not the case that Transport Canada's own schedule provides for no transfer of the airport to the Greater Toronto Regional Airport Authority before April 1, 1996? This is Transport Canada's own schedule.

Why does the government not admit that what it claims as reasons for Bill C-22 being stalled are completely inaccurate? No matter what happens to Bill C-22, the government's own schedule sets out that the airport will not be transferred until, at the earliest, April 1, 1996. That is my information, and the difference between the information I bring to this house and the information brought by the Leader of the Government is that I get it from reliable officials at Transport Canada, whereas she must rely on her unreliable colleague the Minister of Transport.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I really must take exception to my honourable friend's last statement.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Fifteen thousand jobs?

Senator Fairbairn: The information with which I am furnished in order to respond to the questions of colleagues from either side of this house is provided to me by loyal public servants in the Department of Transport, working with the minister's office. There is no question, as my friend Senator Murray would know, that a tremendous amount of effort and care is put into the provision of such information so that members of this house will be informed accurately.

I will undertake, as I always do, to take my honourable friend's specific questions back to the Ministry of Transport and the Minister of Transport. I will endeavour to have for him tomorrow responses to the specific and detailed questions of colleagues which were asked last week. It is to be hoped that I will be able to add the questions of my honourable friend to that list and also provide him with responses tomorrow or on the following day.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): As a supplementary question, honourable senators, perhaps those good and loyal public servants in the Department of Transport are the same good and loyal public servants who allegedly rigged their internal report to the minister in favour of the Tories?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I am not at all aware of which public servants my honourable friend is talking about. My confidence is strong in the public servants of the Department of Transport. I, personally, thank them profusely for the assistance they have given to me and to this house.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LAWYER'S TIME DOCKETS RELATING TO MEETING WITH MATTHEWS GROUP

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, last week, as I directed questions to the Honourable Leader of the Government, she relied on the statement of a Mr. LaBarge, who at that time was associated with Lang Michener, in confirming the reply made by Mr. Chrétien to a question raised in the other place.

In a recent article in the Financial Post, Mr. LaBarge has changed his attitude somewhat. He now says that the Prime Minister is confused on the dates, and that he, Mr. LaBarge, was not present for the full meeting. Therefore, he is not able to confirm the topic of the meeting. It reminds me of Kato Kaelin, to some degree.

Mr. LaBarge said that he has checked his dockets for that time. My question is based on those dockets. The Matthews Group, in an effort to include Mr. Chrétien's fee in their expense claim, are proceeding through the Law Society in an attempt to obtain those dockets relating to Mr. Chrétien's fee.

I am sure the Prime Minister finds it rather embarrassing and degrading to have this affair dragged through the Law Society of Upper Canada, of which he is a member. I am attempting to get him out of that difficult situation.

I would ask the Honourable Leader of the Government if she would request that the Prime Minister please table those dockets in both this honourable chamber and the other place. Would she please request the Prime Minister to table those dockets? We will then have an idea of who is being factual — the Prime Minister or all those people who are contradicting him.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not relying on the word of Mr. LaBarge. I am repeating in this house the word of the Prime Minister of Canada, who has spent a lifetime in the service of this country with honesty, honour and integrity. I do not have to ask Mr. LaBarge to answer these questions for the Prime Minister of Canada. The Right Honourable Jean Chrétien has answered those questions himself. As always, I am more than pleased to pass on questions on this issue or any other issue to my colleagues in the other place, including the Prime Minister. I have no hesitation in accepting the answer of the Prime Minister of Canada and repeating it here in this house.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I am pleased to hear that the honourable leader will pass on my request. I repeat that the expressions of doubt are not only mine. There are many others involved who have expressed doubt. I am sure they would like to see the dockets as well as all those many thousands of Canadians who have doubt about the Prime Minister's reply.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—POSSIBLE REVISION OF REPORT OF ROBERT NIXON—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, my questions are about this same matter I dare not identify today.

Honourable senators, my questions concern the Nixon report: a recent article in the Ottawa Sun seems to raise some doubts about the existence of draft reports, which would have been submitted to the Prime Minister or one of his assistants. These assistants may have made changes to Mr. Nixon's draft report and the corrected version was later identified as Mr. Nixon's report.

Honourable senators, my first question deals with this assumption: Did the Prime Minister's assistant or assistants make changes to Mr. Nixon's report when they received it?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, along with my honourable friend's many other questions, I will add these to the list and endeavour to obtain answers for him.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—REQUEST FOR COPY OF STAMPED RECEIPT NOTATION ON MR. NIXON'S REPORT

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, to help me understand the sequence of events, could you obtain from the Prime Minister's Office — because the procedure has probably remained the same despite the change in government: any document sent to the Prime Minister's Office is received, taken out of the envelope and stamped with the time and date of reception as well as the name of the person who opened the envelope — a duly stamped copy showing that they received the first version of the Nixon report?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am quite prepared to refer the question of my honourable friend to the person who is in charge of stamping and delivery. I am sure there is no problem with passing on his comments. I am extremely interested in all the questions that my honourable friends are asking about this matter.

I will repeat, as I have on other occasions, that Mr. Nixon prepared a report for the Prime Minister. He gave it to him and it was made public. All of Canada knows what it contains.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RESTRUCTURING OF CANADIAN ARMED FORCES RESERVE—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, I wanted to ask this question last week before the month of March ended. It has to do with the undertaking by the Minister of National Defence to strike a group to review the reserve structure. If he could not do that, I wanted to know if he could at least bring forward terms of reference so we might learn what the objective of the government is all about.

The end of the month having come and gone without any word from the government leads one to question whether or not there is any sincerity behind the undertaking. I hope the minister will have an answer to my question, since it is now April 4. It is a relatively important matter.

COMPENSATION FOR CANCELLED EH-101 CONTRACTS—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, my question comes on the heel of the announcement by the government last week that it has agreed to pay the technology company UNISYS $166 million in compensation for the cancelled $1.3 billion contract it had to supply computer systems for the new helicopters. Keeping in mind that the government set aside $250 million in total to compensate for all cancelled contracts concerning the EH-101, could the Leader of the Government please update honourable senators on how the negotiations with other contractors are going, including the $1.4 billion contract that EH Industries Limited had with the federal government?

Honourable senators, my concern is that in light of the total amount of $250 million allocated for compensation, over half of it is now earmarked for one of these contracts. Can the leader say, given these self-imposed limits, how the government will negotiate the other outstanding contracts? When can we expect to have some kind of clarification? This issue continues to confuse and addle those who would like to participate in the replacement of those two very vital pieces of equipment.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can understand the concern of my honourable friend. I will seek the detailed information that he asks for which, obviously, I do not have at my fingertips.

I hope to have soon a response for Senator Forrestall with respect to his question about the reserves. I had hoped to have it last week. I will try to have it for him before we break.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have one delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 23, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Cohen regarding the status of women.

STATUS OF WOMEN

REQUEST FOR BREAKDOWN OF PROGRAM SPENDING FOR CURRENT YEAR AND NEXT FISCAL YEARS

(Response to question by Hon. Erminie J. Cohen on March 23, 1995)

The following provides program funding including salary and employee benefit plan, based on available information:

1994 – 1995

| Status of Women Canada | Women's Program | CACSW |
|---|---|---|

Budget 1995 – 1996

| Status of Women Canada | Women's Program SWC | CACSW |
| $3,927,000 | $11,289,000 | $2,000,000 |

The Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women (CACSW) budget is to be transferred to Status of Women Canada (SWC) as of April 1, 1995, in the amount of $2M. However, the CACSW will incur expenditures due to the Workforce Adjustment policy for all its employees, as well as wind up costs, which may in fact result in limited funds being transferred to SWC in the fiscal year 1995-1996.

As well, it must be noted that the Women's Program 1994-1995 expenditures do not include the operations expenditures applicable to the regional offices. Hence, the 1995-1996 budget for the Women's Program will also be reviewed to include the regional expenditures following negotiations with Human Resources Development.

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE—

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Spivak, calling the attention of the Senate to the budget presented by the Minister of Finance on Monday, February 27, 1995—(Honourable Senator Kinsella).

• (1440)

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, in rising to participate in the debate on the budget, one finds oneself faced with the question: What is the government's vision for the country? One will search the budget in vain to find that vision. If there is no vision for Canada to be found in the budget, perhaps one should turn one's attention to the infamous Red Book for that vision.

Honourable senators, the problem is that this little manifesto, which our friends opposite and their friends are wont to wave frantically about, has been reduced by the budget to "pulp fiction." The number of Red Book promises in the budget are legion and by now well known. Many of them were identified by questions by honourable senators in the past few weeks.

We know about the "eliminating" instead of the "increasing" of jobs, about expected higher interest rates this year instead of the promised lower rates, about the elimination of the Crow benefit, about the unilateral cuts to transfer payments instead of negotiating with the provinces, about the fact that there has been no mention of the promised 50,000 new child care spaces, and so on. There are many elements in the budget which we would support, but they seem to appear in a rather ad hoc fashion and without a sense of vision.

Honourable senators, beyond that, one aspect of the budget which is particularly troubling to me is the broken promises to consult with the provinces before changing Canada's social safety net and before making cuts in transfer payments to the provinces. This may be the government's idea of fiscal federalism, but it is certainly no one's idea of cooperative federalism. In fact, these arbitrary and unilateral changes to the economic and social fabric of Canada violate the essential meaning of federalism. I respectfully remind honourable senators that it is federalism which has been the essence of the Canadian government and the heart of national unity since Confederation.

This budget also represents a step backward, not forward, in social policy development. Generally, the evolution of social security in Canada corresponds with the responsibility for social provision shifting from churches and charity to municipal authorities, then to provincial levels and finally to the federal level. Under the leadership of successive federal governments, and with provincial cooperation, our country has developed a social safety net which has given the nation the reputation of being a progressive, caring and compassionate society.

Unfortunately, this budget represents a complete reversal of that progressive evolutionary process. Many of our colleagues opposite were league players in that process and, no doubt, many of them find it difficult to buy into this new philosophy that seems to be emerging.

In the budget, the Liberal government has co-opted the right-wing reformist agenda. It has unilaterally pushed the responsibilities for social programs down onto the provinces. With fewer dollars but more responsibilities, the provinces will in turn push many of these responsibilities down onto municipalities and local charities.

Through this process of devolution, we will return to the same conditions that prompted us to create a social safety net in the first place. If local charities and churches could not have adequately met the social needs of an industrial society in the first half of this century, why does the government believe that these measures will work now as we head into the 21st century?

Honourable senators, it is easy — perhaps too easy — for the Minister of Finance to stand in the other place and talk about reducing programs and transfers. He may cut the deficit, but there is another cut that occurs as well. In human terms, the $7-billion reduction in the social envelope will cut the heart and soul out of hundreds of thousands of Canadians. These cuts will force more families to rely on soup kitchens, food banks, used clothing depots and emergency shelters to obtain the basic necessities of life.

Can the Minister of Finance tell us how it will build citizenship and pride in being a Canadian if adults and children are forced to line up at soup kitchens or food banks to receive their daily bread? These cuts also mean many children will be put at risk because child welfare services will be reduced and the already unacceptable rate of child poverty will increase. More people will be put at risk through family breakdown because family services will be reduced. Women will be put at risk, as the cuts will decrease the number of battered women's shelters and rape crisis centres. Senior citizens will be put at risk because the number of nursing home facilities and services will also be cut back.

Honourable senators, this is social mayhem and social terrorism. It certainly is not the kind of liberal, social responsibility we knew in the past.

For all Canadians concerned with equity, social justice, national standards and citizenship, a particularly troubling feature of the budget is the establishment of the Canada Social Transfer. This action lumps together health, post-secondary education and social welfare programs into one consolidated fund. This represents an unprecedented transfer of financial and administrative authority to the provinces, greater than anything proposed either in the Meech Lake Accord or in the Charlottetown Accord. This unprecedented transfer occurred without any national debate and without provincial consultation.

The full impact of this consolidation should not be under–estimated, as it will effectively eliminate the role of the federal government in social policy within a matter of a few years. Presently, the federal government is able to withhold cash transfers to the provinces if they do not follow established standards in the areas of health and social services. The fiscal lever to influence these two areas is the cash transfer given to the provinces.

However, honourable senators, under the Established Programs Financing Act, within a decade we are headed for a cashless transfer, whereby tax points to the provinces will replace cash transfers.

The fact that the Canada Assistance Plan will be brought under the same diminishing cash transfer formula will clearly have serious consequences for social welfare services, as it will for health and post-secondary education. Once the Canada Social Transfer tax points replace cash transfers, standards will be absolutely unenforceable, and this should concern us. Even the Prime Minister has admitted:

> ...when you transfer tax points, you lose all leverage... because you don't collect the money, they —

— meaning the provinces —

> — collect the money.

Why, then, should Canadians be concerned about losing the national dimension in social policy? Because only the federal government can be responsible for a more equitable distribution of income across this great land. Only the federal government can create national standards and uniformity in social policy across Canada. Federal programs contribute to a sense of national community in our country.

Some of us who are involved with higher education have already had a taste of what we can look forward to, as a couple of provincial governments have hijacked money under the existing EPF arrangements in the name of provincial deficit reduction. The example of post-secondary education demonstrates how the federal government will lose its ability to affect social policy once it relinquishes its fiscal levers.

Currently, the federal government has no means to establish or enforce national standards, such as portability in post-secondary education, and no levers to ensure that money transferred for higher education is actually spent on colleges and universities. I believe that this same situation will apply to health care and social services once the cash transfers are replaced by tax points.

Presently, provinces are required to provide a basic safety net. The Canada Social Transfer that is proposed will do away with this requirement, and we should be very cognizant of that. The provinces will be able to refuse assistance to certain selected groups, as well as divert their cash from their tax points into any area they wish. There will also be competition among the health, post-secondary education and social sectors for the diminishing pool of resources contained in the Canada Social Transfer.

As in any competition, honourable senators, there will be winners and there will be losers. There is no doubt that the big loser will probably be the social service area. A more powerful upper and middle class, who believe they have more at stake in health and higher education, will be more influential, I submit, than the more fragmented and resource-poor populations who rely on social welfare services — 40 per cent of whom, by the way, happen to be children.

Honourable senators, the budget does nothing to help unification. It is not a unifying document. It is, instead, divisive. There is no vision for Canada. The Liberal government seems more concerned with credit ratings than it is with the hopes, aspirations and needs of Canadians — a dramatic change from the liberalism of the past.

Just as the Spanish fishing trawler, the Estai, cut loose its fishing net in panic, so too did the Minister of Finance cut loose our social safety net in panic. The financial markets and the bean counters in the Department of Finance have now decided what our social programs should look like.

Although the budget has satisfied these groups in the short term, how long will that situation last when there are no new deficit targets beyond 1996 as a credible plan to balance the budget within a fixed period? Working out a plan with the provinces to eliminate federal and provincial debts in this country would have done much more for national unity than imposing unilateral cuts in transfer payments.

Apart from deficit reduction, again I say the budget has no overall sense of direction. The broken promises and the reneged responsibilities have caused many Canadians to ask: What does the Liberal Party of Canada stand for today? Even several prominent Liberal members in the other place have publicly stated that this budget abandons the principles of the Liberal Party, that it breaks its campaign promises, and that it is contrary to what they said for nine years in opposition and to what they did during 20 years in government. We used to know what the Liberal Party stood for and what its vision was for Canada. Frankly, honourable senators, we can no longer say that. I am sure my colleagues opposite have a hard time recognizing the party they led so well in the past.

It appears that the traditional Liberal principles of a strong central government, welfare capitalism and principled pragmatism have been replaced by counter-federalism, callousness and political expediency. By dismantling the federal government as an effective instrument of social and economic justice, the Liberal government has rejected a primary truth about human nature: that we are social beings. This elementary and universal fact is the basis for creating, developing and maintaining a decent society. People grow, develop, interact, work, socialize and achieve in association with others. People who lose contact with others become isolated and alienated, and experience various personal, emotional and social problems. Given this social nature of people, it is incumbent in a democracy to develop institutions, structures and philosophies that facilitate all individuals in realizing their inherent human potential, and help them to lead fulfilling lives, free of domination, control and exploitation by others.

The central value premise of such a society is that every individual is considered to be of equal intrinsic worth, and should therefore be entitled to equal civil, political and social rights, responsibilities and treatment. This is the kind of society, honourable senators —

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Kinsella, I must advise you that your time is now up.

Is there unanimous consent that Senator Kinsella continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Kinsella: Thank you, honourable senators. My timing was close, for I conclude with this last sentence:

Rather than striving in the direction of the vision which ought to be there, this budget goes in the opposite direction. It tears apart our social fabric and leaves too many Canadians to hang out to dry. It does not recognize the legitimate needs of people, and the legitimate role of government to help meet those needs. It denies the essentially social nature of the individual, and because of this denial, life will be much more nasty and brutish for many Canadians.

This is not the kind of society I want for Canada and, honourable senators, I know it is not the kind of society that you want for Canada, either.

Hon. Landon Pearson: Honourable senators, I rise to join in this budget debate and speak to the implications of that budget for Canada's children.

I have listened with interest as my honourable colleagues, including Senator Kinsella, have spoken on this subject. Although I cannot say I agree with him about the budget, I know that we have a shared concern for Canada's children. Among the senators who have spoken I would like to commend Senator Kirby, who provided such a clear analysis of how the budget reflects the federal government's clarification of its constitutional role. He stated:

> This budget reflects the principle that the fundamental role of government in the 1990s and into the next century should to be set the broad policy framework within which other parts of society operate.

Guided by this general principle, and with the contents of the Budget Implementation Act, 1995, Bill C-76, which received first reading in the other place last week, and the 1995-96 Estimates Part II, I would now like to examine how the budget will direct governmental plans to care for Canada's children.

Four specific aspects of government policy are relevant. These are referred to either in the budget with reference to the Red Book or in Bill C-76 and the Estimates. The first intention is to reduce child poverty; the second is the commitment to provide more child care spaces; the third is the new Canada Health and Social Transfer; the fourth is the Child Development Initiative of the Department of Health. I will speak to each of these in turn, indicating how they might interact to form a coherent strategy for the well-being of Canada's children.

The first intention was to reduce child poverty. Over the years, there has been a growing concern among legislators and members of the general public alike about the number of Canadian children living in conditions of poverty. There has been, I think, a common recognition that growing up poor puts children at serious risk for social, emotional, physical and intellectual disorders. The question is what to do about it. One answer is to provide families with money. The 1995 budget responds to this by leaving the child tax benefit intact. A second answer, which is also addressed in the budget, is through job creation and economic growth. The number of children living in poverty will be reduced when the deficit is decreased and the national debt is reduced and when the economy is improved — leading to an increase in the number of jobs available to poor parents.

The relationship of the state of the economy to child poverty is revealed in the statistics. In 1986, at the end of the last recession, 17 per cent of Canadian children were living in poverty. In 1989, in more prosperous times, the numbers went down to 14.5 per cent. In 1991, when the recession from which we are now emerging was deepening, the figure was 20 per cent. In response to the growing number of poor children in Canada at that time, and to honour the departure of NDP leader Ed Broadbent, an all-party motion was passed in the other place on November 25, 1989, calling for the elimination of child poverty by the year 2000. While I have never thought this was a realistic goal, I do know there are certain things the federal government can do with the tax system and income support programs that will improve the situation. I see no reason why we should not set a goal to reduce child poverty below 14 per cent in the coming years and engage in the careful planning necessary to reach that goal. At the same time, we should be rethinking how to mitigate the effects of poverty on those children who will remain below the poverty line.

This brings me to our second commitment, child care. The Red Book promised that a Liberal government, if it could obtain the agreement of the provinces and territories, would commit to expanding existing child care in Canada by 50,000 new quality child care spaces in each year that follows a 3 per cent growth in GDP, up to a total of 150,000 new spaces. Last year, there was indeed a 3 per cent growth, and the money has been allocated for new spaces. Since the funding is conditional on reaching cost-sharing agreements with the provinces and territories, discussions with them are now in progress. This commitment was reaffirmed by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien in the course of a program on Radio-Canada on March 6. More child care spaces will be available when the agreements are reached with the provinces.

How does child care relate to child poverty? We have learned from the experience of Sweden that female heads of households do not have the same appalling poverty rates as in Canada, partly because enough daycare spaces are available to enable Swedish women to upgrade their education, train for new jobs, and become employed. At the same time, their children are being enriched in the secure and stimulating atmosphere of Sweden's high-quality daycare centres. The Red Book promise, combined with provincial-territorial commitment, should lead to a slow improvement in the daycare situation and in a subsequent reduction in child poverty rates.

What about the quality of the new daycare spaces that will be created? After all, child care should not be judged only by its importance to single parents or struggling couples. More importantly, it should be judged by its benefits for the children who are cared for. The evidence is that good quality daycare has positive effects on child development. The operative word is "quality."

This brings us to the new Canada Health and Social Transfer. The new Canada Health and Social Transfer was introduced in the budget to replace the Canada Assistance Plan and bring contributions to health, social programs, and post-secondary education into one block payment that provinces and territories can allocate according to their own priorities.

I agree with Senator Kinsella that while there are real risks associated with this new plan, it does represent a clarification of the federal government's role, a government that sees itself moving out of programs and into standard setting, pilot projects, research, and information sharing.

Will this new direction help children? My own experience is that social programs for children are always best designed by those who are closest to them, because they best understand the special needs and circumstances of the child. Over the years I have been immensely impressed by community groups and individuals, including provincial-territorial "fonctionnaires", who have created programs all over the country in response to local conditions, programs that are so appropriate to children. In fact, some, especially in Quebec, are so good that they deserve to be better known and adapted across the nation. I do not have any serious difficulty with more flexibility going to the provinces, but I do care whether the federal government maintains its capacity to ensure, to the degree possible, that there are equitable outcomes for all Canadian children.

This, honourable senators, represents a tremendous challenge to legislators and "fonctionnaires" alike. Nevertheless, there already exists an effective instrument and a mechanism to do the job. That instrument is the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child which sets developmentally appropriate standards in health, education, social welfare, child protection, and juvenile justice to which all jurisdictions can aspire. The mechanism is an outgrowth of the Department of Health's Child Development Initiative which was established as part of the federal government's response to the World Summit on Children. One of the components of this initiative is the community action program, a commitment of hundreds of millions of dollars over several years to establish community-based programs aimed at the healthy development of children from ages zero to six. Separate agreements have been signed with each of the provinces and territories to set criteria for the selection of suitable programs that correspond to the priorities of each province and territory.

This has resulted in the establishment of federal-provincial-territorial management committees, the federal government members coming from the regional offices of Health Canada. With this mechanism in place, the Liberal government was able to implement its Red Book promise of introducing programs aimed at the prevention of low birth weight babies and prenatal nutrition. The Child Development Initiative funding was not cut in this budget.

Yes, honourable senators, I recognize that, overall, there is less government money available for children. At the same time, I know that federal, provincial and territorial governments are carefully considering what they can either do separately or in cooperation with one another. For example, I see no reason why the federal, provincial, and territorial governments could not come together to set realistic child health goals for the year 2000 by building on the excellent profile published last year by the Canadian Institute of Child Health called "The Health of Canada's Children."

In June of this year, the federal government will appear before the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child to respond to the committee's questions about Canada's progress in implementing the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child since ratification in December, 1991. The committee will base its questions on an official report it received last June — a report which is a patchwork description of past programs in federal, provincial, and territorial jurisdictions. Unfortunately, this report is a backward look. It has no forward thrust. Now is the time to change that with the new government. Under the terms of the convention, Canada is required to report again in five years, in the year 2000. What we should now see, honourable senators, is a strategic plan developed with goals and objectives against which progress can be measured. We can then demonstrate to all Canadians that, in spite of our deficit, and perhaps because of our obligation to spend Canadians' money carefully, we are looking after the nation's future.

Over the centuries, honourable senators, families who have found themselves in dire circumstances have usually been ready to reorder their priorities so that they can invest in the future of their children. I should like to think that we as individuals and as governments at all levels are prepared to do the same.

TWENTY-SECOND REPORT OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION CONCERNING MOTION TO PRINT VOLUME I OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Twenty-second Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (reprint of Foreign Affairs Report), presented in the Senate on March 30, 1995. —(Honourable Senator Hastings).

Hon. Earl A. Hastings moved the adoption of the report.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I glanced at this report when it was circulated here a few days ago. The amount of $7,500 for 500 copies of the report works out to $15 a copy. That seems to be quite expensive for such a report. I should like to adjourn the debate on this motion until I have had a chance to ask some further questions about the report.

I have no problem with having extra copies printed, but $15 per copy is way out of proportion for this type of report. I could be wrong, but I will adjourn the debate until I find out.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, my instructions were to reprint the report at the most reasonable price possible.

TWENTY-FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 3, Reports of Committees:

On the Order:

> Resuming debate on the consideration of the twenty-first report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Senate Estimates for the fiscal year 1995-96), presented in the Senate on March 23, 1995.—(Honourable Senator Simard).

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, consideration of this committee report was adjourned by yours truly. Given that I have already obtained the information I was requesting I do not expect to have any more to say on this report. I think, however, that the information I requested could, in due time, be released and made available to the public as well.

[English]

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, perhaps I might add a couple of further comments. As the chairman of the committee will know, this is not an easy committee with which to be involved because from time to time it calls upon us to make some rather difficult decisions.

First, I should like to thank our colleagues who continuously challenge us to ensure that the information we provide to the Senate is appropriate and full. From time to time we may not provide all of that information, but we welcome the opportunity to explain our position further.

However, I wish to put on the record that the further reduction in the Estimates for the 1995-96 year to approximately 4.2 per cent will be achieved largely by creating an early retirement program similar to the one that the House of Commons instituted, as well as some efficiencies which have been arrived at by all department heads.

I want to go on record, honourable senators, to thank the staff, through the leadership of the Clerk, who have worked diligently, at the request of the chairman and the committee, in looking for additional areas in which to do our share of reducing the costs of government. I should also like to inform you that these efforts are continuing, and I wish to applaud the Clerk and his staff for the job that they have done.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

SECURITY AND INTELLIGENCE

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING SENATE COMMITTEE— DEBATE CONTINUED

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Kelly, calling the attention of the Senate to the desirability of considering at this time the establishment of a Standing Committee on Security and Intelligence. —(Honourable Senator Corbin).

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable Senators, on February 14, Senator William M. Kelly recommended the establishment of a Standing Committee on Security and Intelligence. Since then, a motion to set up an external and independent mechanism to monitor the operations of the Communications Security Establishment, which reports to National Defence, has been approved in the House. This mechanism would have a role similar to that of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service review committee. The initiative was taken by MP Derek Lee, with the support of Prime Minister Jean Chrétien. We will doubtless have to await the tabling of a future bill to see the structure of this mechanism and how effective it will really be.

This is not the first time we have recommended that parliamentarians get involved in matters of security intelligence. We will recall that the Keable and McDonald public inquiries into the activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police recommended a right of review for parliamentarians. In 1984, under the Trudeau government, Parliament adopted the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act. A special Commons committee carried out a difficult examination of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and its activities in its first five years of operation, as provided by the constituent act. The House of Commons currently has a Subcommittee on National Security, under the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

The idea that this kind of agency should be subject to a parliamentary review is not new. Former Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau said 15 years ago, and I quote:

> ... that, in principle...

...the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should not be obligated to report on its operations or methods on a political level. I remind you that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service was then under the jurisdiction of the RCMP. This opinion was perhaps justified at the time, but seems untenable today. The support for the motion introduced by Derek Lee seems to demonstrate the point.

Also, committees or mechanisms controlling or providing for the parliamentary scrutiny of security intelligence agencies exist in Australia and New Zealand as well as in Great Britain and the United States. We also know that other jurisdictions are considering giving themselves similar powers. The American Congress even published a brochure on this subject in October 1994, as much in reply to information requests from many foreign parliaments as to satisfy the legitimate curiosity of the American public.

We must also take into account the rising interest of the Canadian public regarding this kind of issue. Consider the number of publications available on the activities of the Canadian intelligence service, not to mention the increasingly analytical articles on the issue.

A basic question begs to be asked. Why not give Parliament the right to undertake this scrutiny? The answer is obvious. For the first time ever, the Solicitor General released to the public this year — last week to be precise — figures on the staff and the budget of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service.

Even though, theoretically, it is already within the purview of parliamentarians to enquire about the activities of security intelligence agencies of all kinds, in practice it is a most frustrating exercise because of the officials' reluctance to answer parliamentarians' questions directly and openly — when they agree to answer at all. Other security intelligence agencies are only accountable to ministers through an internal audit system within the departments, where officials report to other officials. The process resembles an air bubble trapped under a thick layer of ice, and the spring thaw is slow in coming.

Security intelligence agencies spend a considerable amount of public funds without being subject to a credible form of parliamentary scrutiny. Accountability normally comes with being a publicly funded agency. Why are these agencies not subject to parliamentary scrutiny as is the case for all other government agencies? If they do not have to report to anybody, to whom are they accountable?

To the government of the day or to themselves? Is it enough? I doubt it. Moreover, I think that an external monitoring mechanism cannot replace parliamentarians in their exclusive role and prerogatives.

Another reason in favour of parliamentary involvement is the protection of the rights and freedoms of Canadians that are guaranteed under the Charter. The United States and Canada both have a bill of rights or a charter of freedoms which protect citizens against any abuse of power.

It is imperative that security intelligence agencies be accountable in a democratic system. Otherwise, despite what the proponents of the status quo might say, there will always be the possibility of an increasingly covert control over Canadians, institutions, individual liberties and even Parliament, not to mention unjustifiable subversive activities. With new technologies, the possibilities of prying into the private lives of Canadians without just cause are endless.

Although it is true that the work of an intelligence agency is confidential, it is totally unacceptable to use confidentiality as an excuse to cover possible "mistakes." Accountability is a way to prevent this kind of problem. I come back to what Senator Kelly was saying:

[English]

> It is a question of credibility, of the right of all Canadians to have confidence in their institutions, particularly those institutions designed to protect their civil rights.

Finally, it is important to remember that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service is not the only agency dealing with security matters. There is also the Communications Security Establishment, the National Security Investigations Directorate of the RCMP, and several branches in many departments whose former names I will use like National Defence, Transport, Customs and Excise, Employment and Immigration and even the Department of Agriculture. How can we be sure that those agencies do not overstep their mandate when they are simply accountable to a minister of the Crown whose interest is, and understandably so, to minimize any incident?

The basic question is whether a Commons committee can adequately oversee the operations of intelligence services. We can have doubts about that for several reasons, at the risk of irritating members who remind people of their elected status when they disagree with the Senate.

Let the facts speak for themselves. It is a well-known fact that committees of this House are always pressed by too little time, a high turnover among members, too much work, elections with whatever they entail, and cycles unendingly repeating themselves. Hence, all the agencies that object to accountability towards the elected representatives have lots of leeway. I know what I am talking about since I was a member of the House for 16 years and some days.

There were, in the past, cases of reluctant, hesitant, tense and frustrating collaboration on the part of the security intelligence agencies, and, still today, they consent to minimal cooperation with Parliament.

For example, during the five-year review of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service in 1989, they refused straight out to give some essential documents to the members of the House. Some witnesses showed an evident lack of good will the Inspector General of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service refused to answer some questions. That would be funny if it were not so intolerably arrogant. The decision of the committee to hold public hearings, for the sake of transparency, could explain, if only in part, such reluctance. But there is more to it than that. I will quote George Rideout, then a member of the committee:

> When members of the Committee tried to examine the performance of that intelligence service, the first thing they were told... (by the director)... was they did not have sufficient security clearance so they could not get information on any of the events. To push things along, the president and the members had to be very resolute about obtaining what they wanted [...] this case is representative of this type of exceptional will we encounter once in a while.

What was the result of this exercise which required considerable work on the part of the members and other stakeholders? Mr. Rideout says:

> The Committee made 117 recommendations. The government acted upon two and one half of them.

A question comes to mind: What brought the government to reject the other 114.5 recommendations? Was the members' work intentionally scuttled?

Would accountability limit the effectiveness of security and intelligence services? That is the objection that is always raised. This would be true if we had to conduct all our work publicly. Yet, for the work that has been done, there was no leakage on the part of parliamentarians.

It is recognized that a monitoring parliamentary committee must never compromise the justifiable work of our security and intelligence services. In the spirit of cooperation and joint responsibility, these organizations must continue to help us respond to the great challenges facing Canada in the last years of this century. I am thinking about public and national security, as well as economic, technological and industrial spying, to name just a few. Yet, these services would benefit from having more confidence in the parliamentarians who, after all, are responsible to their constituents.

Would a Senate committee not be in a better position to undertake this type of work? You will argue that it would duplicate the work of the external review committee of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. I will respond to you that we must guarantee that rights are respected and demand from these services some evidence that they are effectively responsible for their actions. The Senate can very well make up for constraints facing members of Parliament, provided that we put in place a credible agreement that would not interfere with the legitimate undertakings of the organizations.

In the United States, there are four congressional committees dealing with these issues, besides presidential controls done through executive orders — since 1976. The current Order 12333 delineates the national effort in the intelligence sector, outlines the roles of each service and subjects them to a code of ethical practices. The procedures are quite strict. For instance, an intelligence agent must ask permission in writing to undertake some specific activities. The approval must be signed by the person giving it.

It follows that each reporting level is accountable and that a responsible officer can easily be summoned by a Congress committee. I believe it is possible to maintain mutual respect and confidence between security intelligence services and Parliament, as our neighbours to the south have shown.

Honourables senators, my time is up, but with your permission I would still need approximately three more minutes to conclude my speech.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is that agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Corbin: Thank you, honourable senators.

A Senate committee would appear to be the appropriate tool to keep an eye on security intelligence activities. Parliamentarians will not turn a blind eye to practices that could threaten the rights of Canadians as expressed in the Constitution, the Charter of Rights or other legislation. It is easier to prevent, and a Parliament committee is much less costly than a royal commission of inquiry in case of a scandal.

The Senate is able, by its very nature, to ensure the continuity necessary to a long-term study of such issues. Indeed, it can and it must stay above partisan quarrels. We could encourage a responsible participation of the public, but most important, as Senator Kelly said, we could help Canadians understand the role and importance of security intelligence services in our society.

Senator Kelly suggested that a Senate committee should have a very extensive mandate and I agree with him. I believe however that we should do some initial work before establishing a committee responsible for the surveillance of security intelligence agencies. First, a special committee would have to develop a realistic protocol for cooperation between the government, external surveillance committees and security intelligence agencies in order to determine the mandate of the committee. In short, it would be necessary to clear the ground to make sure that all actors know the rules of procedure before the establishment of a standing committee. It is preferable to start on a solid basis. It would be better for Parliament, the government, society, security intelligence agencies and democracy.

MEXICO

PRESENT STATE OF AFFAIRS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Peter Stollery rose pursuant to notice of March 21, 1995:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the situation in Mexico.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise to say a few words about the serious situation in Mexico. The gravity of the situation is not understood in Canada. I believe we must extricate ourselves from NAFTA, or face grave economic consequences.

I will read a few recent headlines from the Financial Times, the Wall Street Journal, and The Economist: "Mexican peso falls to new low against dollar." "Mexican peso hits new low." "Mexican peso tumbles on policy delay." "Peso weakness threatens targets." "Peso plunge hits ScotiaBank." "Mexico's Central Bank might raise interest rates even more to help peso." "The Mexican syndrome and how to steer clear of it." "What goes down may not come up."

The last two headlines are from The Economist magazine of London, which was such a promoter of the Mexican scheme that both the foreign editor and the chief statistician wrote me private letters when I protested to them, before the scheme, that the scheme would go wrong. What do they say now? "What goes down may not come up."

The promoters of the FTA understood the United States, at least inasmuch as the United States is an Atlantic country, a European country. When I lived in the African colonies as a youth, I understood myself to be a European coming from the other side of the Atlantic, as a Canadian. Those European values, inherited from time gone by, are values which we share with some Americans. The fisheries dispute and our popular support in Britain, and possibly some other countries which are now prepared to threaten the European Commission on our behalf, perhaps reawakens our awareness of those Atlantic roots. Canadians overwhelmingly supported Britain in the Falklands War, and the shock when the Sheffield was sunk was palpable.

The Monroe Doctrine is one principle we have never shared with the Americans, and I do not think we share it today. The concept of "Manifest Destiny" is another principle which we do not share. Because the Americans could not apply the Monroe Doctrine to Canada, we suffered "Manifest Destiny" less than countries to their south.

Mexico, though, has been on the receiving end of that different face of the United States — not the benign north and northeast, whose people are similar to us, but the violent, expansionist south and southwest, the slave states and the lawless frontier. Texas, Arizona, New Mexico, Nevada and California were all taken from Mexico by force of arms.

I will not take the time of the Senate to tell the history of 19th century Mexico, though it seems be something of which Canada and other promoters of NAFTA were woefully unaware. What concerns us here is the 20th century. Canada has become financially embroiled in events which have their genesis in the Madero revolution of 1910-11. The first stage of that Mexican revolution only ended in the taking of power of General Alvaro Obregón in 1920. That was the beginning of the awful internal politics of Mexico which are the major cause of today's financial crisis.

It is somewhat astonishing to read statements by such as Luis A. Viada, a managing director of the Standard & Poor's rating group, who should know better. He said that he was at a loss to explain why markets have not responded more favourably to President Ernesto Zedillo's plan, which he described to

The Washington Post as "one of the most Draconian adjustment plans we have seen. It had all the necessary elements to reassure the market that whatever measures necessary would be taken." That is because Mr. Viada does not understand that internal Mexican politics drives the crisis, and they do not care about him, Standard & Poor's, the World Bank, the IMF, or the value of the United States dollar, or world interest rates, or anybody or anything else. Internal Mexican politics murdered the incoming president, Mr. Colosio, because they did not like him.

I touched on the lutulent politics of Mexico in a speech I made to the Senate in 1993. At the time, I thought NAFTA would destabilize the dark forces of that country. I should like to give honourable senators a little more information about what I then described "as a secretive closed group of men and women who have enriched themselves successfully out of the society as a whole."

Madero, Huerta, Carranza, Zapata, Pancho Villa, Obregón — famous names. With the exception of Huerta, who died of alcoholism, they were all murdered. The killing of Madero by Huerta is what adds particular venom to U.S.-Mexican history.

There is little doubt that U.S. ambassador Henry Lane Wilson actively encouraged the murder of Madero in 1913 by Huerta, the most despised figure of those terrible days.

Allow me to refer to a book entitled, The Secret War in Mexico, Europe, the United States and the Mexican Revolution, which I read a few years ago. It is a well–known book and was awarded the Bolton Prize for the best book on Latin America studies.

It states:

> According to Ernesto Fernandez y Arteaga, one of the few Mexican officials who ever spoke to Francisco Cardenas, Madero's executioner, both questions can be answered affirmatively.

The question that interests us is the dispute over whether the murderers acted on orders from Huerta and whether Henry Lane Wilson was in any way involved or at least shared some responsibility for the murders.

When knowledgeable people talk about bad blood between Mexicans and gringos, that is what they are talking about. History increases the fury when the gringos demand collateral from Mexico before the agreement to loan Mexico $53 billion, which, to their even greater fury, goes mostly to U.S. financial institutions. I will provide more about that in a minute.

The PRI, the governing party of Mexico, was the solution to the revolution which became a civil war. Some 1 million people died out of a population of about 8 million. The system invented by Obregón and perfected by Plutarco Calles is actually modeled on Mussolini's corporative system which people have forgotten was widely acclaimed in the 1920s. As Gerald Brennan, the celebrated Bloomsbury figure, author of The Spanish Labyrinth, that classic study of Spanish politics the 1920s, observed, "fascism is the response by the middle classes to disorder."

The Mexican version involved buying off or shooting off so-called generals and giving them a stake in the action so that they could participate in robbing the state. Sometimes they bought them off and then shot them, as in the case of Pancho Villa who was murdered in 1923.

The organization developed. Sectors were doled out to this general and to that general. The generals could not actually administer, and gradually as they died off the administrators became the organization. Many people say that Mexico became the world's only dictatorship of bureaucrats outside the communist system. It is an old story in the accursed history of the Western Hemisphere. Canada is actually the only country in this entire hemisphere that has normal politics.

At any rate, there is a poor country where a group takes over. It usually calls itself the army. I always call it the Peasant Disposal Unit. Repression is the usual function rather than professional soldiering. In recent history, these PDUs have become professional business enterprises. It must be understood that only in the loosest sense is the PRI a political party. It is a successful business enterprise. It has made Mexico the only existing corporate state that I know of.

What does that mean? It means that in Mexico there is no independent judiciary. There is no free collective bargaining. The independent press is minuscule and self-censoring. Police maintain the system — and many people believe that the Mexican police are out of control. There is increasing evidence of "Colombianization", that drug dealers have great influence. The Board of Trade told me last June that in the previous 12 months between 1300 and 1350 business people have been kidnapped for ransom.

Last June, I visited Mexico with the Carter Centre as one of two political analysts. One of the things that stood out was on a Saturday, after most of the delegation had left, I spent the day at a meeting of the so called "political parties" who were setting ground rules for the upcoming election. The meeting was chaired by the Minister of the Interior, who was in charge of the secret police. What made my Saturday especially interesting was that I immediately realized that I was at a meeting of the interests — $2,000 suits galore, "Smooth City." This was not about an election; it was about money — big money. I remind senators that the average annual income in Mexico today is about $1700 U.S.

Let me give you some examples to explain what I mean when I say interests and money. Mexicans do not read newspapers. Yet, Mexico City has more than 30 newspapers, with a total circulation of less than 1 million. Mexico City has a population of 20 million people. The reason people do not read newspapers is that they know most of them are fakes. Interested parties start a paper. The PRI directs businesses that it owns to advertise. News stands have piles of newspapers with three inch headlines and almost no news. However, they are filled with ads. La Jornada, the only independent newspaper, had no advertising for its first year of publication.

I have in my hand a copy of Processo, the only independent magazine. The picture on the cover is the widow Colosio protesting about the lack of investigation of her husband's murder. It has very little advertising. As senators can see, it is all just type and exists on the money that you pay to buy the magazine, plus support from private interests. It states on the cover of the magazine that the widow Colosio is pursuing the case. By the way, the widow Colosio is now dead. Because they do not read the newspapers, some 90 per cent of Mexicans get theirs news from television. Of course, that is controlled by other PRI interests, the famous Telemedia.

After Obregón was murdered back in 1928, Calles came up with the secret of the PRI's success — the succession. Obregón was shot at a dinner party by a Catholic cartoonist after he was elected for a second term. The deal, until now, has been that you get one term. It is for six years and you have those six years to enrich yourself. Four years was not enough. You pick your successor and you leave politics and do not come back.

To enrich themselves, Mexican presidents are nearly always associated with a project, often a resort. Honourable senators will know Acapulco. That was Miguel Alemán's. When I first visited Yucatán 30 years ago, Cancún was a desert. That was before Miguel Echeverría. Honourable senators will remember him. He spoke to a joint session of Parliament some years ago. Because he presented himself as some kind of socialist and pushed the correct buttons, the New Democratic Party cheered him as a great fellow.

If you thought that you might learn about these things by hanging around the Mexican embassy, you could forget it. Every Mexican employee in every embassy in the world must be a member of the PRI. One is tempted to say, "of the mob" — and that includes everyone from the driver to the ambassador.

The arts are not excluded. El Espectador, the respected Colombian newspaper, has reported that Octavio Paz, world-famous poet, essayist and polemicist, has been paid $4,000 U.S. a month for years to promote the regime.

This is the political system driving a loan of $53 billion U.S. — driving what Michel Camdessus of the International Monetary Fund has called "the first crisis of the 21st century." When one looks at actions of the international financial genius community until a few months ago, the situation becomes very unsettling. Bank presidents, fund managers, and investors of all sorts rushed in to bet on this political system of the mob. They bought Mexican treasury bonds indexed to the U.S. dollar. The bonds originally paid a 3 to 4 per cent premium and went to 7 per cent to 8 per cent when things started to collapse. Any normal person would say, "Look, why are you paying me all this money? What great thing did I do? Or is this another Mexican scheme like the silver mines my father told me about?" Imagine so-called respectable financial institutions being caught up in a pyramid scheme so that the promoters of NAFTA could plump up the Mexican peso.

Worse, the scheme was sanctioned by government outside Mexico and by those international institutions, the IMF and the World Bank, that some think will protect us against ill-effects from globalization. If private citizens were caught doing this sort of thing, they would be called swindlers.

[ Senator Stollery ]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I regret to inform the honourable senator that his time has expired. Is it your pleasure to give the honourable senator leave to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Stollery: Honourable senators, the more one looks at this, the more I believe that the World Bank and the IMF and other international institutions are going to see the Grim Reaper when it is all over, as people other than myself ask questions about the way they supported this nonsense. Bonds in the amount of $17 billion are coming due in coming weeks, and then $18.5 billion. The sums are so large. Of course, people do not want to talk about it, and it is very difficult to get information. I did speak to someone in South America this morning who told me that the papers there were all saying today, "Where is the next $20 billion?" Apparently some bonds have come due, and the money is not forthcoming to cover them.

Bank presidents really are rubes. They go and meet a fellow who talks like they do. They have a few drinks and become enthusiasts. Pyramid schemes only work so long as no one asks for their money. Eventually, as in this case, they fall apart. Maybe it was the Zapitistas, maybe the killings, maybe the arithmetic. People did take their money and their interest and walked when their bonds came due. The peso went from 3.45 to about 5.5 when the Clinton administration strong-armed the international community to cough up a $53 billion aid package to which the U.S. would contribute, in all, $28 billion. Remember, this was not to bail out the Mexican mob but to pay off foreigners who gambled on Mexican bonds.

It does seem unfair to the disadvantaged in Canada that we are taking money from them and giving it to financial speculators who lost, but there is always a silver lining. Any senators who have Russian imperials or South American railway bonds hidden away in the family bible can keep the faith. If Canada has $1 billion to pay off Canadian banks and buy their worthless paper, can you be far behind?

The problem with the $53 billion bailout is that it has not worked. It has undoubtedly contributed to the decline of the U.S. dollar. It is said that they are having trouble coming up with their $28 billion. I do not know about that, but it does seem to me that the weakening U.S. dollar ensures high interest rates. Much of their $200 billion deficit is financed abroad, and they cannot pay holders of their debt in devalued currency for long. Given that 81 per cent of our trade is now dependent on the United States and the increasing economic linkages, I do not see how we can avoid continuing high interest rates. The Bundesbank has unexpectedly lowered its rate, probably to ease pressure on the dollar, but if the Mexican crisis continues, the dollar will surely be affected.

It is interesting to note that the Mexican peso closed last Friday at about seven to the dollar. Does that mean that the bailout of the bond holders that cost $53 billion at 5.5 pesos to the dollar now costs a peso and a half more on the dollar? Senators may want to reflect on the implications.

Let me briefly go back to the politics driving this situation. There are three parties in Mexico: the PRI, the PAN, and the PRD. The PAN is made up of people who were formerly on the right wing of the PRI, and the PRD is made up of people formerly on the left wing of the PRI. They are parties of "faller-outers" rather than followers. The PAN appears to be used as a stalking horse for the PRI, and so they are allowed to win state elections.

The PRD is led by a very clever senator named Porfirio Muñoz Ledo. He was formerly president of the PRI and then ambassador of Mexico at the UN. There was a sticky business in New York. Someone parked in the parking spot of Muñoz Ledo at the UN garage. He pulled out his pistol and shot out the car windows. He was recalled and is now the brains behind the PRD. He is an attractive personality and, as a former president of the PRI, he must know where the bodies lie. I should think that Porfirio Muñoz Ledo must be very careful of his personal security.

Honourable senators, in order to believe that Mexico will recover in the short term, you must believe that the interests will concede and give up their privileges. They will put aside their pistols, their hired gunmen, and their monopolies. I do not believe they will. They have been destabilized by NAFTA. The murders are those interests fighting back. Forget about all the phoney arrests and confused accusations. Do not believe a word of it. We are only being told what is in someone's interest to tell us. Mexico has one of the most secret power structures in the world today.

In my opinion, Mexico is on the verge of an explosion. There is the strong possibility of a civil war. NAFTA is dead, and we should get ourselves clear of the debris. This past week, two months after the aid-to-gamblers announcement, interest rates in Mexico approached 100 per cent. The Wall Street Journal quoted Labour Secretary Santiago Onate that the crisis will eliminate at least 1 million of the country's 26 million jobs, or roughly four times his previous estimate. The labour secretary is not telling the whole story, but I will not take the time of the Senate on that. How long can the interests intimidate a population of 90 million people? Serious rumours have it that the army nearly overthrew the current dictator a few weeks ago.

Honourable senators, NAFTA is dead. Get out while we can and do not pay anyone that $1 billion.

INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY RIGHTS AND THIRD WORLD AGRICULTURAL DEVELOPMENT—INQUIRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Mira Spivak rose pursuant to notice of March 28, 1995:

> That she will call the attention of the Senate to the document she tabled on Tuesday, March 28, 1995, on the subject of GATT, Intellectual Property Rights and Third World Agricultural Development.

She said: Honourable senators, I must admit that I became so fascinated with Senator Stollery's remarks that I have almost forgotten what I had to say. I would hope, Senator Stollery, that your intervention is not a one-shot effort. Maybe we can persuade you to do a serial. I can tell you that my pulse is racing.

Honourable senators, it is my pleasure to draw the attention of the Senate to a research paper I commissioned through the research allocation granted by the Senate.

Its subject matter, the GATT, Intellectual Property Rights and Third World Agricultural Development, will be of interest to many in this chamber — from those who have been engaged, as I have, in committee work examining the future of agriculture in our own country, to those who keep watch on Canada's commitment to foreign aid, and those who have concerns about the impact of the trade agreements and the ramifications of the United Nations Convention on Biological Diversity that Canada has signed and ratified.

I wish to express my thanks to Jonathan Silden, an exceptional young man whose education in environmental studies in Canada is combined with research and practical experience with non-governmental organizations in Latin America. His independent research and hands-on experience gave him insight and perspective that can benefit Canadians who want to know the real costs and the real benefits of the new world order of trade, agri-business and biotechnology.

Senators will recall the debate in this chamber five years ago when we had before us Bill C-15, the Plant Breeders' Rights Bill. At the time, witnesses appearing before the Senate and House of Commons committees voiced concern about the inherent unfairness of systems to reward plant breeders in industrialized countries, while no system existed to recognize or reward innovations and improvements made by Third World farmers. Some also raised concerns about the ethical, moral, economic and social costs of patenting forms of life. These concerns have not gone away with the coming into force of the last round of the GATT. They have intensified.

These concerns have not diminished with the ratification of the UN Convention on Biodiversity — the convention the previous government courageously supported at the 1992 Earth Summit in Rio and has been continued in government, despite the then opposition by the Bush administration. Canada was the first industrialized nation to declare its intent to sign the convention after the U.S. administration of the day refused to be party to it. That action opened the doors for others to follow.

The convention, now signed by 168 nations, including the U.S., and ratified by 114 of them, acknowledges the right of states to determine access to genetic resources. It also calls on industrialized nations to provide funds to developing countries to help them benefit from biotechnologies based on genetic resources they provide.

In mid-May, it is expected that the government will release its national biodiversity strategy. In it will be a commitment to international cooperation and a search for ways to ensure that agricultural communities and indigenous communities in developing nations receive an equitable share of the benefits that flow when others benefit from with the genetic resources they have nurtured and developed.

As the research paper makes clear, however, if Canada and other signatories to the convention are to honour their pledge, they face several daunting obstacles, not the least of which are raised by GATT. I will touch upon them and commend the full paper to those most interested in these issues.

The first point to be made is that GATT requires nations to liberalize trade. Who will be the winners and who will be the losers as export subsidies are reduced by 21 per cent and non-tariff barriers, turned into tariffs, fall further? This had been the subject of much speculation prior to GATT coming into force in January. The Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, for example, has predicted that by the year 2002 world prices for wheat, beef, dairy products and sugar will rise while prices for coffee, cocoa and rice will fall. The economies of nations that produce and export, or must import, these staples will rise or fall accordingly.

By OECD predictions, most industrial nations will win. Canada will remain stable, more or less, and real income will only fall by a minuscule amount. The fall in real income expected in Mexico or in the poorest of the poor nations of North Africa, however, will be considerably more. It is the underdeveloped nations that must import food that will suffer. There are 104 of them, according to a report published last year.

The opening of markets and the lowering of subsidies may increase Third World agricultural exports. However, even in those countries that export more agricultural product, Third World farmers will not benefit, nor will Third World agriculture gain productivity unless the price rise is passed on to producers. That is an old story. Wherever it is, it is likely that benefits will accrue only to rich farmers. It is not the poor farmer but the wealthy landowner who will import technology to take advantage of more liberalized trade. Poor farmers, left relatively poorer, will be forced from their land.

From a Canadian perspective, our development assistance policy is retarded by GATT, which will contribute to the worsening maldistribution of wealth in the Third World. The reduction in Canada's international assistance envelope announced in the recent budget could scarcely come at a worse time. At the very time that the poorest of nations will require more assistance, the budget of CIDA, whose main purpose is to support sustainable development in developing countries, will be slashed by 20 per cent.

There are other serious ramifications of placing poor farmers at a disadvantage while reducing foreign aid. It is aid agencies that help keep small producers on the land growing coffee and cocoa in many countries. These small farm owners, who farm steep slopes or tropical soils, are discouraged from growing annual crops that lead to soil erosion and declining fertility. Fail to assist them, and industrialized nations encourage worse alternatives: environmental degradation and a shift to the much higher-priced, illegal crops of opium poppies, marijuana and cocoa for the drug trade. Internationally, we reap what we sow.

On the other important issue raised by GATT, the requirement to enact intellectual property protection for new plant varieties, it is clear that the interests of multinationals, not the Third World, are being served. Developing countries have from four to 20 years to enact laws, but protection is extended only to new varieties. Varieties historically developed by traditional farmers will not be eligible. There is no recognition that most food crops grown today have their origins in Third World nations. It was only through the export of the Third World genetic resources that new, successful varieties have been bred elsewhere in past decades. Now that seeds are valuable, the rules have changed. Where is the spirit of equitable sharing that the Biodiversity Convention advocates?

Statistics on gene banks show clearly just how unfair is the new system. Gene banks in industrialized nations hold 68 per cent of all known plant species germplasm. Developing nations in Africa, Asia and Latin America have been donors to these 127 gene banks, donating more than 90 per cent of collections. Industrialized nations are the recipients, drawing germplasm freely distributed from the banks. But in the brave new world of biotechnology and intellectual property, traditional varieties that have helped to feed us all have no protection, while commercial varieties derived from them are patented and protected by trade policies in favour of the industrialized world. From the developing nation's perspective, the bird has flown the coop. What advantage is there in closing the door?

Third World farmers will continue to develop new plants, but they will be denied protection. Private seed companies in developing nations will gain protection, but experience has shown that they are concerned with adapting imported seeds to local conditions. Proponents of plant breeders' rights say that foreign varieties will not dominate Third World markets because of environmental specificity. Experience suggests otherwise. Mexico introduced a plant breeders'rights law. Now Mexico imports 90 per cent of all its vegetable seeds. Once it had the capacity to produce local strawberry varieties, now virtually all production is based on foreign varieties.

Looking into the future, there are legitimate concerns of biodiversity loss, genetic erosion and species extension as fewer plants are grown. There is also concern that farms in the Third World countries will become franchise operations and farmers who have very small holdings will be driven from their land.

What is the solution? There are growing calls for a UN fund to support genetic resource preservation, use and ownership in the Third World and training of researchers. Small seed improvement centres in rural areas, with farmers' cooperation, could help preserve unique varieties and defend traditional varieties of communities through national registries. Ethiopia's Seeds of Survival program, which involves farmers and agronomists in preserving and redistributing traditional seeds, can serve as a model to other nations.

Canadians not only have an interest in assuring that our trade policy does not severely undermine our aid policy — we also have an international pledge to preserve. I hope that all members of Parliament will keep this in mind — that is, that we have shown world leadership in the matter of preservation of biodiversity and that we have earned a reputation for fairness and compassion in matters of aid and international affairs. These are issues that might well be raised when Canada's environment minister hosts a meeting of environment ministers of G-7 countries in late April, a prelude to the mid-June summit in Halifax. On the Halifax agenda is a communiqué that commits the G-7 to revisit the biodiversity convention. Questions might also be raised in mid-May on the release of Canada's biodiversity strategy.

The insight and analysis in the research paper which I tabled the other day will be helpful to all of us who, after the government's failure to meet the climate change convention, do not want to see yet another of Canada's international pledges ring hollow.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before I proceed to call the next order, I draw your attention to the presence in the gallery to a group of young people. They are members of the national 4-H citizenship seminar, and they are here in Ottawa to attend a conference the theme of which is Youth Can Make a Difference. We welcome you to the Senate.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY TELECOMMUNICATIONS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Donald H. Oliver, pursuant to notice of Thursday, March 30, 1995, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine and report upon Canada's international competitive position in telecommunications including the following: a review of the economic, social, cultural and political importance of the telecommunications sector for Canada; the impact of current developments in telecommunications on Canadian heritage and broadcasting and specifically on the role of the CBC; a review of issues relating to foreign investment in Canadian telecommunications; a comparison of regulatory frameworks in Canada and in other countries; and a review of the research and development necessary to enhance Canada's competitive position in telecommunications; and
> That the Committee present its report no later than December 15, 1995.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise today to speak to the motion of which I gave notice last week to establish an order of reference from the Senate of Canada for the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. The purpose of this study relates to the information highway and to industry convergence.

At the outset, I want to make it clear that the Senate committee is not trying to reinvent the wheel. This is not a make-work project. We are not trying to study something that some other agency or group has already studied.

It is not the intention of your committee to duplicate the work of the advisory committee on Canada's Information Highway, the CRTC's current inquiry into the convergence of cable television and telephone networks, or the House of Commons Standing Committee on Canadian Heritage study of the mandate and funding of the CBC.

Rather, it is the intention of your committee to investigate facts and issues not adequately explored by these federal agencies, to complement their efforts, and bring forth more pertinent information and a diversity of views and perspectives to this matter of great concern to all of us.

Honourable senators, in the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, we polled all members of the committee to determine what areas of special studies they would like to engage. The drafting of the order of reference you have before you today is a direct result of that questionnaire and of the grass roots approach to the democratic process that is being used by this committee.

What is happening in the marketplace and what new developments are taking place in the telecommunications industry in Canada?

As many of you are well aware, the telecommunications industry in Canada and elsewhere in the world is undergoing a rapid transformation in the technologies it employs. No longer does it rely on communications by wire. Innovations within the industry have brought forth fibre-optic cable networks which carry information on a pulse of light, as well as wireless cellular and satellite systems which make use of the electromagnetic spectrum. These innovations have expanded the carrying capacity of telephone and cable television lines immeasurably. They can now incorporate interactive two-way voice, video, data, and graphics information forms. The new telecom products and services derived from these changes in communications include: video on demand, entertainment products, video conference services, and high-capacity data retrieval and processing services. They present Canadians and their businesses with many new commercial opportunities as well as a plethora of new ways of organizing and conducting their daily and business lives. Indeed, we are in the midst of an information revolution, and this revolution is forcing Canadians to rethink and redefine their business, social and institutional environment.

For example, these sophisticated telecommunications networks are integral to the efficient and timely movement of information in the modern business world. These networks enable people to take advantage of just-in-time inventory, electronic data interchange, airline computer reservation and electronic banking systems. All of these systems contribute to greater corporate and business efficiency through reduced inventory, overhead, market and distribution costs, shortened product development cycles, increased managerial scope and decentralized business operations which can lead to greater and faster responsiveness to consumer needs.

Therefore, it goes without staying that these new telecom products and services also present Canadian business with a serious challenge in adapting to the new knowledge-based society. This "information revolution" is indeed a double-edged sword. Success in meeting this challenge means the creation of new businesses and high-skilled, high-paying jobs that will bring prosperity to the country. Failure means lost opportunities and squandered resources. For Canada, this latter outcome would be unfortunate given the availability of shrewd entrepreneurship, highly-honed management, and the well-educated labour force of the nation.

I must further stress that the challenge facing Canada is not imposed only on individuals and their businesses, but also on the federal government. As the exclusive responsibility for providing public policy over telecommunications in Canada is federal, it is incumbent upon the House of Commons and the Senate to provide legislation and policy appropriate to the social, cultural, political and economic setting of the day. Policy designed to establish the broad ground rules for incumbent and new entrant telecom and broadcasting companies must not only fit today's circumstances, but it must be forward-looking. It also ought to be provided in a timely manner, particularly given the rapid and unrelenting pace of the development in telecommunications and broadcasting sectors, and in the competitive race that we find ourselves caught up in with our major trade competitor countries.

It must also be remembered that while the present day structure of the telecommunications sector has to a major extent evolved naturally, it has also been fashioned by government policy through the CRTC and other political means. Premised on avoiding duplication to the network infrastructure while restraining monopoly profits, the regulatory framework crafted monopoly fiefdoms in the telephone and telegraph industries, beginning with the Railway Act of 1905 and then in the cable television industry with the Broadcasting Act of 1968. However, technology developments in fibre-optic cable, digital switching and compression, wireless and satellite communications and computer software applications are leading these once-separate industries to converge and share a much larger common market.

These technologies are also overcoming the economic limitations of their predecessors, making it possible for a number of competitors to enter the industry without any adverse impact on economic efficiency; in fact, the reverse is more likely.

As stated by George Addy, Director of Investigation and Research in the Bureau of Competition Policy, to the commissioners of the CRTC in their hearings on the information highway and industry convergence:

> If Canada is to compete in the global information economy, its people, firms and institutions must operate to the maximum of their abilities. Free and open competition among content and distribution providers will ensure that the Information Highway operates in an efficient and effective manner to the benefit of all Canadians. At this time, one must look beyond the issue of protecting the regulatory entitlements of incumbents and focus on the new realities in technology, trade and consumer expectations.

He therefore concludes and recommends that:

> The significance of the Information Highway to the economic and social life of Canada transcends the commercial interests of the telephone and cable companies...

That

> ...competition can and should play an important role in the development and operation of the information highway; and

> ...the process of removing regulatory and other barriers to competition should begin now, lest we risk falling behind other nations in the development of an information-based economy.

The "Information Revolution" is not confined to Canada; it is truly global in nature and the stakes for Canada are high. The United States is poised to take full advantage of its emerging opportunities, as evidenced by its private sector commitment to investment — more than $200 million in new telecommunications technologies and services over the next ten years.

At the same time, the Japanese industry has committed $250 million in investment to construct its Information Highway by the year 2010. Deregulation and the promotion of convergence of telecommunications and cable television markets are now underway in both countries, as well as in Europe.

Canadian policymakers cannot afford to be complacent; time is of the essence. As Derek Burney, Chairman and CEO of Bell Canada International, recently remarked in a speech to the Canadian Club:

> Canada should not become, by default, a ramp running off someone else's super highway. Canadians should be able to obtain information and communicate with one another and the world easily, reliably, securely and cost-effectively in any form—voice, data, image or video. To that end, what is needed is a regulatory and policy framework which encourages private sector investment in the telecommunications here in Canada...We would welcome policy support for a more favourable R&D environment as well as continuing support for Canadian companies in their efforts to compete internationally.

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications is no stranger to issues of telecommunications. You will know that we did a major pre-study of the telecommunications act of 1993 and worked very closely with then-Minister Perrin Beatty to effect major and substantive changes designed to make sure that competition was a major component of the public policy being developed. When we did that study, we were painfully aware that more changes within that industry were coming and that new federal policies were needed. Convergence is bringing Canada's broadcasting and telecommunications policies to a crossroads. Indeed, these new technologies, which are engineering the increased fragmentation of Canadian radio and television audiences, are forcing policymakers, people here in Parliament, to rethink the traditional policy instruments they used to preserve and promote Canadian culture.

One of the things the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications wants to look at is to determine whether there is a Canadian solution to many of the pressing problems in telecommunications today. Our concerns are global but we have an obligation to look within our own country to find solutions to our problems. We intend to bring before us leaders in their industry such as Ted Rogers, Brian Canfield, John MacLennan and many others.

Cultural sovereignty is and will remain a high priority for any Government of Canada. However, past public measures meant to deal with the technological and economic realities of the information-based society have resulted in the growing deficits incurred by the CBC and the non-compliance of certain private-sector television stations with Canadian content rules.

Clearly, federal policies must be reworked, if not thrown out entirely, and replaced by more effective ones. Which measures should be discarded and which ones should replace them? What is the timetable for implementation? What is the role for the CBC, the CRTC, and the Bureau of Competition Policy? Who shall carry the burden of these policies? Should it be the taxpayer, the consumer, the content provider or the telecom/cable company? These questions and their answers are at the centre of the telecommunications-broadcasting controversy.

It has come to the committee's attention that these government agencies are delving deeply into the requisite issues, whether controversial or not, from a wholly domestic perspective. An international perspective is missing or is merely collateral to their focus. Your committee realizes that since these innovative technologies reconfigure telecommunications and broadcasting sectors along global rather than national lines, an international perspective that would include an investigation into the industrial policies and regulatory frameworks relating to the telecommunications industries of our chief trade competitor countries, such as the United States, Europe and Japan, are needed. What appears as the proper balance of telecommunications, broadcasting and cultural policies, the right mix of regulation and competition, and the suitable combination of private and public sector involvement from a national perspective, may not appear to be so far from an international perspective.

What happens in other countries profoundly affects Canada. By investigating and reporting on the international aspects of such Canadians policies, your committee on transport and communications will fill a void in the information required to make government policy. In doing so, your committee intends to paint a more complete picture of Canada's optimal transition path to and future prospects in the forthcoming global information-based society.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, would Senator Oliver entertain a couple of questions?

Senator Oliver: Yes.

Senator Kinsella: Senator, in your presentation you identified a few leaders in the industrial sector of communications that your committee would invite to participate in this study should it be approved by the Senate.

You did not mention which leaders or which ministries of the present government you would invite. It is my understanding, but correct me if I am off the mark, that presently the stakeholder departments are the Department of Industry, the Department of Canadian Heritage, perhaps the Departments of Public Works and Transportation as well.

Would it be the intention of your committee to invite all of those ministers to appear? What expectation do you have that they would come? Does the Department of Transport become a stakeholder as well, and, if so, would you invite the Minister of Transport?

Senator Oliver: I thank the honourable senator for his question. The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications has, in the past few months, had before it the Minister of Industry, the Honourable John Manley, and the Minister of Canadian Heritage, the Honourable Michel Dupuy. They have indicated a willingness to come back at a later time. It would be our hope, should this order of reference be granted by the Senate, that they would come back at the appropriate time.

The Minister of Transport was asked to appear before the committee tomorrow. The minister through his staff has written to our committee saying that he has only one priority and that is Bill C-22 and that he will not appear before this or any other committee until his legislation is passed.

On motion of Senator Bosa, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, April 5, 1995, at 1:30 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENT

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DECISION TO TERMINATE PRINTING OF COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, the proposal to stop printing the minutes of proceedings and evidence of Commons committees came as a shock to many people. I, for one, find it totally outrageous. This will have a negative impact on the Senate, the house of sober second thought.

To their credit, some members rose in protest. Time will probably prove them right. Unfortunately, there are none so deaf as those who will not hear.

Eliminating printed committee reports will further undermine Canadians' confidence in Parliament. This proposal seems to come from people for whom ideas, discussions, debate and intellectual exchanges have no civilizing value so long as they remain in power. As the temporary masters of Parliament, they are willing to sacrifice a valuable working tool at the altar of the almighty dollar. We must question their respect for the parliamentary values laboriously acquired over the centuries.

In my opinion, the current cybernetic revolution is very poorly served by proposing dubious alternatives in the name of bogus savings. In one fell swoop, they are restricting information access for thousands of people from the current generation and those that will follow. Those most affected will be the members of the House of Commons and perhaps to an even larger extent the senators themselves, along with academics, senior officials, researchers, historians and many non-governmental agencies, not to mention numerous citizens from coast to coast and even government opponents, who are essential to a healthy democracy.

I think that the authors of the proposal to stop printing Commons committee proceedings have declared bankruptcy and admitted their incompetence and inability to manage this issue. Instead of developing protocols, making wise choices and setting priorities — I agree that not everything needs to be printed — instead of removing or cutting where necessary, eliminating waste, duplication and useless chatter, they killed the patient. Instead of tackling abuse, exaggerations, the waste of valuable resources — in an effort to do better — they yielded to the temptation of the guillotine. It is crucial that we take some time to think about this.

We must also question the impact of this decision on access to information in both official languages, on the obligations under the Official Languages Act.

What are you waiting for, gentlemen — I hope that my female colleagues will forgive me for getting straight to the point — before you eliminate Hansard? After all, your debates are televised! Is the Senate safe from the hordes of barbarians?

The esteem in which I hold Parliament prevents me from going any further.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO CHANGE NAME OF COMMITTEE IN FRENCH

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, April 6, 1995, I will move:

> That the name of the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide be modified in French to "Comité spécial sur l'euthanasie et l'aide au suicide."

ALTERNATIVE FUELS FOR INTERNAL COMBUSTION ENGINES BILL

REPORT OF ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Leave having been given to revert to Presentation of Reports from Standing or Special Committees:

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the eleventh report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources which deals with Bill S-7, an act to accelerate the use of alternative fuels for internal combustion engines.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Kenny, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RESTRUCTURING OF CANADIAN ARMED FORCES RESERVE—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I was asked a question yesterday, for the second time, by my friend Senator Forrestall, and I undertook to get an answer for him as quickly as I could. I discovered today, just as I was about to enter the house, that the answer to his question has been made publicly available. My friend's question was with regard to the reserve commission.

Although I am not sure that this is procedurally correct, would honourable senators permit me to convey that answer to Senator Forrestall at what is for me the absolute earliest opportunity?

Senator Doody: Any answer is welcome.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Forrestall has a strong interest in the commission announced by the Minister of National Defence on the restructuring of the Canadian Forces reserves. The minister is today announcing that the commission will be chaired by the Right Honourable Brian Dickson, the former Chief Justice of Canada, and that he will be assisted by retired Lieutenant General Charles H. Belzile and by historian Jack Granatstein.

Although I do not have the specific terms of reference, it is noted that the commission will be free to examine all elements of the reserves but is expected to focus on the primary reserve and, to a lesser extent, the supplementary reserve.

I will try to obtain more details, which I will send to my friend, but I wanted him to have that information virtually as soon as I knew about it.

TRANSPORT

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—REFUSAL OF MINISTER TO APPEAR BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I received a letter from Margaret Penniston, Legislative Assistant to the Minister of Transport, dated April 3. That letter says:

> The Honourable Douglas Young, Minister of Transport, has asked that I respond to your letter of March 30, 1994 in the interests of timeliness, further to your request that he appear before the Senate Standing Committee on Transport and Communications this Wednesday, April 5, 1995.
> The Minister's focus in the Senate will remain Bill C-22 until such time as it has been passed. He has asked me to advise you that officials of the department will be available and I will be happy to coordinate their appearance before the committee.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Transport has already refused to appear before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, is it the position of the minister that he will not appear before our committee unless and until the Senate passes Bill C-22?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank my honourable friend for his question. However, I cannot give him an answer, having only just been advised of my honourable friend's letter and the response to it. I should like to discuss the matter with my colleague and report back to my honourable friend.

Senator Oliver: In view of the importance of the matter, is it too much to expect a reply tomorrow?

Senator Fairbairn: That will be my goal.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—MEETING OF PRIME MINISTER WITH MATTHEWS GROUP—REQUEST FOR DETAILS

Hon. Marjory LeBreton: Honourable senators, my question relates to Pearson airport and the infamous one-and-a-half hour meeting between Mr. Matthews, Mr. Chrétien and Mr. LaBarge at which "something" was discussed. Mr. LaBarge claims the meeting took place in mid-April of 1989; Mr. Chrétien's office has said that the meeting took place in January of 1990, which supports the claims by Mr. Matthews.

Mr. LaBarge is quoted in last Saturday's Financial Post as saying:

> I think he's —

— referring to Mr. Chrétien —

> — confused on the dates...

Last week, Senator Phillips read into the record a letter from Jack Matthews which stated that he would be pleased to attend any inquiry and testify under oath subject to cross-examination.

My question is threefold: What was the date of this meeting, April 1989 or January 1990, or were there, in fact, two meetings? Will the Prime Minister and Mr. LaBarge make the same commitment to appear as has Mr. Matthews?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I too have been curious about the dates. This is a tale of some interest.

The information I have is that the January 1990 date was first made public by Mr. Matthews, and the Prime Minister's office accepted Mr. Matthews' rendition of the date. However, upon checking his files, Mr. LaBarge discovered that the date of the meeting was, in fact, April of 1989. That is when the meeting took place. I am advised that there was only one meeting, and that is the story of the date.

REMOVAL OF EMERGENCY RESPONSE CAPABILITY
FROM SMALLER AIRPORTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The Minister of Transport has made numerous statements outlining his concern for Pearson International Airport. It appears, however, that his concerns are limited only to Pearson airport and not to the many smaller, local airports found across Canada.

We see today that the Department of Transport has completely removed the emergency response firemen from 15 airports across the country. In addition, the department has dramatically reduced the emergency response capabilities at a host of other airports, including London and Windsor, Ontario. The reason given is that this is a budget-related cutback. Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate indicate whether this trend of the government to sacrifice the safety of Canadians for the sake of deficit reduction has her support and that of her cabinet colleagues?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I must admit to the Honourable Senator Di Nino that I have had a certain preoccupation with Pearson airport in recent days and weeks.

I would not concede for a moment that the announcement concerning the emergency response at smaller airports in any way endangers public safety or the safety of those airports. However, I should like to obtain a detailed response for my honourable friend, which I will endeavour to bring to the house tomorrow.

APPLICATION OF INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION ORGANIZATION STANDARDS AT SMALLER AIRPORTS— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, major Canadian airports are not affected by these cuts. One reason is that, as a member of the International Civil Aviation Organization, Canada is obliged to maintain emergency response standards at a minimum acceptable level for those airports.

Will the Leader of the Government determine whether Transport Canada, while not obligated by international rules, is still using the ICAO standards as its reference for providing adequate safety measures for smaller regional and municipal airports?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will add that question by my honourable friend to the list about which I shall be making inquiries this afternoon.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—DISCREPANCIES IN NIXON REPORT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and concerns the Nixon report on certain agreements between the Government of Canada and the Pearson Development Corporation respecting the development of the airport in Toronto.

In his report, Mr. Nixon indicated that a deal was made at the discretion of the Prime Minister during the election campaign. In a memorandum to Mr. Nixon, the then Deputy Minister of Transport, Mr. Rowat, said that the government wrote to the consortium that approval had been sought from the Treasury Board and the Governor in Council to finalize the paperwork.

The agreements submitted to the Treasury Board were approved by the Treasury Board and the Governor in Council on August 27, 1993.

Madam Minister, Mr. Nixon was aware of this. Why did he not disclose these facts in his report to your Prime Minister?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question asked by the Honourable Senator Nolin is extremely detailed. I would like to reread it before passing it along for response, something I do with all of Senator Nolin's questions.

Senator Nolin: My supplementary again concerns Deputy Minister Rowat's memorandum to Mr. Nixon when he was preparing this report.

In his report, Mr. Nixon indicated that Paxport, one of the members of the consortium, was unable to demonstrate that its proposal was financially viable, and that is why Paxport went to Claridge so they could submit a joint proposal.

Mr. Nixon forgot to mention in his report, as Deputy Minister Rowat told him in his memo, that the Department of Transport had retained the services of the firm Deloitte and Touche to audit the statement of financial viability in the proposal made by the two parties.

Based on the report by Deloitte and Touche, formal negotiations started and were concluded at the time, in other words, in August 1993. Mr. Nixon, according to Mr. Rowat's memo which was made public recently, was aware of these facts. I repeat, he did not mention this to your Prime Minister in his report. Should he have done so, and if he did not, why not?

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I will convey those questions for responses as well.

STRENGTHENING NATIONAL HIGHWAY STANDARDS FOR TRUCK SAFETY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, my question is addressed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I want to thank her for the courtesy which she extended in regard to my question concerning restructuring of the reserves.

I am sure we were all somewhat saddened by the tragic death of a young Ontario man on the Queen Elizabeth Highway last Monday as a result of a truck incident. A similar incident occurred over the weekend in my own province with a massive truck tire left in the middle of the road.

My colleagues know of the differences as a result of different jurisdictions. Can the Leader of the Government find out from her colleagues whether the government intends to do something by way of strengthening national standards in this area?

Some measures are being taken with respect to jurisdiction in interprovincial trade. The same is true with respect to international trade. Yet, we sit idly by while the Conference of Provincial Transport Ministers wrestles with this question against the backdrop of fair trade among provinces. It is a difficult question for them. It is a much easier question for us. Does the government have any views as to how we might strengthen the standards so as to prevent tragedies such as I have mentioned from occurring again?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate the Honourable Senator Forrestall's question. I share his sadness and the sadness of people in this house as a result of the accidents to which he has referred.

It is a difficult question which the honourable senator has asked. Obviously, jurisdictional ramifications will have some influence. I will pass along my friend's suggestions and see what I can come up with.

Senator Forrestall: Honourable senators, there is some urgency attached to this matter in light of the desire of the minister's colleague not to spend too much time with senators. He is one of the few ministers who can answer some of our questions. Senator Davey, myself and others in the Senate, I am sure, would like very much to have the minister appear before us so that we might begin to look at some of these questions.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, with regard to this issue, I am sure that my colleague shares the concern expressed by Senator Forrestall and the rest of us. As I said to Senator Oliver earlier, I will pursue this matter with my colleague. I will add his question to the list of subjects of interest.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—REQUEST FOR APPEARANCE OF MINISTER BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, my question is addressed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is supplementary to the question posed by Senator LeBreton.

Honourable senators, it is obvious that the Prime Minister attended a meeting in Toronto. As a result of having read Hansard, I gather he indicated to the House of Commons that he was not acting as a lawyer at that meeting. Are the Prime Minister and Mr. LaBarge prepared to appear before an inquiry and give testimony under oath, as Mr. Matthews is prepared to do?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, obviously I cannot answer the question just asked by Senator St. Germain. However, it is clear from the answer that the Prime Minister has given in the House of Commons and elsewhere that he attended a meeting. It was not the Prime Minister's meeting; it was the meeting of Mr. LaBarge. As the Prime Minister has said repeatedly, the question of the privatization of Pearson airport was not discussed at that time.

HEALTH

TOBACCO DEMAND REDUCTION STRATEGY—DISTRIBUTION OF STUDY ON PLAIN PACKAGING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, the Minister of Health now has the benefit of a study concerning the packaging of tobacco products, including plain packaging and its impact on consumers, particularly young people. The study is part of the government's Tobacco Demand Reduction Strategy, which lost one third of its funding in the wake of the government's recent budget. Health advocates are eager to see the study's conclusions and, more important, the government's decision on whether to require tobacco manufacturers to adopt plain packages.

If that should happen, then another ongoing problem, the back-door advertising by tobacco companies through sponsorship of cultural and sports events, would largely solve itself.

My question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: Despite this year's $33 million cut to the Tobacco Demand Reduction Strategy, will she enquire of the Minister of Health whether she intends to widely distribute that study in order to ensure that there is public knowledge of the government's intent on the issue of plain packaging?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I would be pleased to obtain that information for my honourable friend.

CANADIAN HERITAGE

EXPO 2005—REPORT OF INDEPENDENT EVALUATORS—DECISION BASED ON POLITICS OR MERIT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, the Honourable Leader of the Government will be happy to know that I am not rising to talk about Pearson airport or to inquire about the absenteeism of the Minister of Transport from our institution. Rather, I will ask a question about something closer to home for the honourable leader and for myself. It relates to the contest between the cities of Calgary and Ottawa with respect to Expo 2005.

I understand that the government has now received the report of the independent evaluators containing their recommendations as to which city they favour as the Canadian candidate for Expo 2005. Can the leader advise the Senate as to when the government will be making that decision?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my friend is quite right; that report has been handed in to the Minister of Canadian Heritage. I have no information on the actual timing, but the views of the government will be conveyed when they are ready.

Senator Ghitter: Will the report of the evaluators be made public?

Senator Fairbairn: That is my understanding, honourable senators, but I should like to reaffirm that.

Senator Ghitter: Honourable senators, there is a feeling in Alberta that the decision will be made, based not upon the report of the evaluators but, rather, that it will be a decision made for political reasons. My friend from Ottawa is nodding his head up and down, and I see a few Albertans responding.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Ghitter: I judge from the reaction I am getting from the other side that the decision will definitely be a political one, and not based upon merit. However, my inquiry is not directed to those from Ottawa, who are nodding their heads up and down, but rather to my fellow Albertan across the way. I ask her assurance that the decision will be made on the basis of the evaluators' report, rather than for political reasons.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would say to my friend and fellow Albertan that I believe the decision of the government will be made cleanly and fairly, and not for political reasons.

Senator Doody: Just like Pearson?

THE HONOURABLE SENATOR WILLIE ADAMS

TRIBUTES ON 18TH ANNIVERSARY OF APPOINTMENT TO THE SENATE

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I wonder if the leader is aware of the fact that today in The Ottawa Citizen there appeared a very short article entitled, "Today in History." On this day in 1977, Willie Adams of Rankin Inlet was appointed senator for the Northwest Territories and became the first Inuit to sit in Parliament.

Senator Bosa: Perhaps the leader is also aware that, in order to make Senator Adams feel at home, Mr. Trudeau also appointed three members of other minority groups, namely Senator Olson, Senator Frith and myself.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I congratulate all of my honourable friends on the anniversaries of their appointment. I also congratulate Senator Adams as a trail–blazer in this institution. I have had the distinct pleasure of travelling to Rankin Inlet and visiting, not just with my friend Senator Adams, but with those whom he represents. I would report to this house that not only does Senator Adams represent them faithfully and well but, from their point of view, they regard his representation with great pride and affection.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

REMARKS OF SENATOR STOLLERY ON MEXICO—POSSIBILITY OF CANADA'S WITHDRAWAL FROM NAFTA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I heard part of Senator Stollery's speech on Mexico yesterday and read the rest of it today. Does the Leader of the Government, or another Liberal senator speaking on behalf of the government, intend to give the government's response to Senator Stollery's speech, in particular his demand that Canada should leave NAFTA?

I say that while recognizing that the adjournment of the debate was taken by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. I should like to know whether Senator Stollery's speech has been drawn to the attention of the Minister of Foreign Affairs and whether somebody on behalf of the government might wish to speak on that matter?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, business kept me out of the Senate yesterday afternoon. I, myself, have not read Senator Stollery's speech. However, I did tune in at the very end when Senator Spivak was expressing a great deal of interest in that speech. I will convey my honourable friend's questions to my appropriate colleagues after I have read it with interest, just as Senator Spivak listened with interest. Our colleague Senator Stollery is extremely knowledgeable and experienced in activities in that part of the world.

REMARKS OF SENATOR STOLLERY ON MEXICO—
RESPONSE FROM MEXICAN EMBASSY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Lowell Murray: In addition, would the leader let us know in due course whether the government has heard from the Mexican embassy, whose members are described by Senator Stollery as being part of what he calls "the mob"?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will also take that question as notice. The Prime Minister, as we speak, is winging his way to Dallas, Texas, where he will be meeting with the President of Mexico.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I believe this is the first opportunity I have had under the rules to raise a question of privilege. The question is a very simple one, but it was abused particularly badly today, which is why I raise it now. The preambles to questions asked during Question Period are supposed to be brief, and they were not.

• (1410)

Senator Olson: The rule book says that questions should be based on fact, and they were not. Rather, they contained opinion presented as fact. Senators Di Nino, Oliver and LeBreton are all equally guilty of this infraction of the rules. I would like these senators to know that we have noticed that they are not following the rules.

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE—INQUIRY—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Spivak, calling the attention of the Senate to the budget presented by the Minister of Finance on Monday, February 27, 1995.—(Honourable Senator Berntson).

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I have a few remarks to make concerning the budget, our fiscal standing and the general directions of policy of the Government of Canada.

Following Finance Minister Paul Martin's budget address on February 27 last, Dominion Bond Rating Service of Toronto advised its clients that:

> ...the government has demonstrated the necessary political will to make fundamental reforms.

Consequently, the DBRS maintained its AAA rating for the government's Canadian dollar debt. Standard & Poor's Corporation of New York also maintained its AAA rating on Canadian government debt. Prior to the budget on February 16, Moody's Investment Services of New York put Canada's debt under review for a possible downgrade, but has yet to announce its decision. These are all financial service companies whose business it is to advise investors, in particular, professional investment managers, on the value of debt issued by various governments and corporations.

What Finance Minister Martin undertook to present to Canadians in his second budget address was a credible plan to meet the interim 3 per cent deficit-to-GDP target in fiscal 1996-97. The general view of Canadians is that Finance Minister Martin has succeeded.

The budget plan carries out three strategic goals. First, it delivered expenditure restraint over tax increases by about a seven-to-one ratio. Second, it made cautious economic assumptions generally lower in expectation than is commonly held by the private sector. Third, it incorporated contingency reserves as a buffer against unforeseen events.

The reaction of the Royal Bank of Canada was to advise:

> We view the budget as positive for financial markets, with the positive tone likely to persist in the near term.

The Royal Bank also reported that they:

> ...view the 3 per cent target as a bare minimum, just sufficient to stabilize the federal net debt to GDP ratio at a hefty 73.5 per cent.

Under the plan of the Minister of Finance, the deficit is projected to fall from $37.9 billion in 1994-95, to $32.7 billion in 1995-96, and to $24.3 billion in 1996-97. The government considers this 3 per cent target as an interim step. Mr. Martin has been adamant that the most effective way to reach that goal is to present two-year rolling forecasts so that the concentrated effort of government is on actual and immediate results in deficit cutting. The question of deficit-to-GDP ratios for 1997-98 will be dealt with a year from now. However, it is clear that increased spending cuts, with some additional taxes, are in Canada's continuing budgetary future.

The core of the budget's direction is in the reduction of expenditures by some $17 billion over the three-year span from 1996-97. This involves the down-sizing of some 45,000 civil servant jobs, a 60 per cent cut in subsidies to business and a major down-sizing of some government departments, in particular Transport Canada, the regional agencies, Natural Resources and Industry. Only the Indian and Northern Affairs portfolio will receive increased funding.

Also important is the reduced transfers to the provinces, totalling $4.7 billion by fiscal 1997-98. Next year, a block grant will take the place of the present system under the Established Programs Financing and the Canada Assistance Plan. The provinces will be given greater freedom to set priorities, but with less money. The burden of the cuts is to be borne by Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

I mentioned the Minister of Finance's cautious economic assumptions. Key among them is the assumption of a sharp slow-down in the U.S. economy in 1996. The budget assumes that U.S. real growth will be only 1 per cent — a bumpy landing indeed. The minister also assumes that U.S. short-term interest rates will rise by another 150 basis points by the end of 1995. As to the contingency reserves which I mentioned, the budget holds $2.5 billion for 1995-96 and $3 billion for 1996-97. These reserves are set up to cover the impact of unforeseen events and are part of the government's prudent fiscal plan.

In general, the world financial community has accepted the February 27 budget as a solid move in the right direction. Since the budget, the Canadian dollar has traded in close track with the U.S. dollar. Admittedly there has been some volatility for both currencies as compared with the Deutschmark, the Japanese yen or the Swiss franc, but the Canadian dollar has seen a generally firming trend which many currency traders believe will continue until the next budget.

However, there are a few cautionary notes being played with respect to Canada. Both Moody's and the Canadian Bond Rating Service have proclaimed negative outlooks. After the budget, CBRS said that its negative outlook continued on the basis of Canada's debt size and GDP, and that it is particularly concerned about the debts of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. On February 16, Moody's put Canada's domestic dollar debt and its foreign currency borrowing on review for possible downgrade. Moody's also advised that a credible budget might not prevent a downgrade.

One of the leading financial services commented on Moody's possible concerns as follows: First, it stated that while Canada is a growth leader in the industrial world, it has been slowest to address the sharp rise in gross debt relative to income. Second, with taxes reaching absolute limits of voter tolerance, most restructuring must come on the expenditure side, something which will become increasingly difficult. Third, the large debt is at risk from any sharp economic downturn or from a political crisis, such as Quebec separation being approved in the forthcoming Quebec referendum.

Mr. Martin has said that the government will not let up. With the 65 per cent approval rating of the budget given by Canadians, it appears that Canadians themselves will not let up.

Certainly, there is encouragement from Canada's economic performance. Real GDP growth came close to 6 per cent in the fourth quarter of 1994, and business confidence is far higher than a year ago. The lower Canadian dollar and a robust U.S. demand are behind a remarkable surge in exports, including auto parts, machinery and equipment. Inflation in Canada remains well under control by any measure, and the Canadian economy is producing new jobs at an impressive rate. For 1995, the conference board expects that more than 300,000 net new jobs will be created, equivalent to a 2.7 per cent increase in total employment, and a similar increase is predicted for 1996. For 1994, the Bank of Canada has stated that the number of full-time jobs increased by over 460,000.

Along with most Canadians, I share the concern that Canada has made itself too vulnerable to the global currency phenomena that developed over the last five to 10 years. Money from Europe, North America and Asia is constantly and restlessly seeking optimum short-term returns. Some of the best-trained minds are playing the game of currency arbitrage by the minute, hour and day, with trillions of dollars in equivalent liquidity. One of the major challenges to achieve national stability, not only for Canada but also for all countries, is to find ways to reduce currency volatility while maintaining adequate flows to finance world trade and investment. From the point of view of the Canadian economy, Canada's debt denominated in foreign currency is one of the playthings of the gnomes located no longer only in Switzerland but virtually everywhere.

Debt in Canadian dollars is also sensitive to foreign perceptions, with billions held by foreign investors. Over $100 billion in Government of Canada bonds and bills is traded every day. Canada is not the most susceptible of nations to the winds of choice but we are susceptible. The cost in interest rates can be very high. Nearly every Canadian school child must know by now that 40 per cent of Canada's budget is paid out to the creditors of the Government of Canada.

One of the axioms of business is that if a financial hit is likely, the best time to take that hit is as early as possible in the decline curve. The earliest point is the least costly point. Many in Canada today wish that the Honourable Michael Wilson's budget of 1985 had been implemented by the government of the day or implemented in any of the years that that government was in office. In 1995, the task is more difficult and costly to the Canadian economy. However, the task must be and is being addressed.

I have said that the ratio of expenditure cuts to new taxes is about seven to one. Many Canadians are facing the removal or reduction of transfer payments that will affect the quality of their lives. Some are dependent on these payments; others find the support they are receiving a significant enhancement to what they and their families could provide. Canadians have a deep commitment to their social security system, health care, senior citizens pensions and payments, unemployment insurance, and programs for disadvantaged Canadians, to name a few. Most Canadians believe that the battle for a fairer, more caring and tolerant society defines the essence of the Canadian way of life.

There are commentators who have somehow discovered in Mr. Martin's budget that the government has started down the path of revolutionary change in Canada and that elements of social and economic Darwinism are being introduced into Canadian society. Some would even like to see it happen, but nothing can be further from the truth. It will not happen. It is not the Canadian value system. In supporting this budget, Canadians have not called for a change in the essential goals that Canadian society has pursued for so long. Canadians like myself have said, "Maintain these goals. But take into account that our prosperity, our fiscal sturdiness and our optimism must be the underpinning for a caring social policy." Trim our sails if we must, but keep a healthy crew and stay on course — the good winds will come again.

Canadians will never accept poverty as a feature of our social and economic life. We have worked for decades to reduce the number of Canadians living below the poverty line. This Senate has been a leader in studies and advocacy to achieve these goals. We can and we have debated whether, in reducing poverty and disadvantage, we are putting too much burden on the economy or having too repressive an effect on the motivation of our society at any given time. I do not believe that anyone in this house, or most Canadians, would want us to deviate from our long-held values and national policy goals.

It does not stand well for any Canadian to believe that he or she should have no concern for others. I do not believe most Canadians would fall into that category.

The challenge for Canadians today and the challenge which the Minister of Finance, Mr. Martin, took up in his budget is to promote Canada's economic strength by putting our public finances on a long–term, healthy basis; to promote economic growth by supporting an economy which creates value-added jobs and corporate growth which, in turn, improves our revenue base; to sustain and develop a healthy social environment that will maintain a united Canada; and to harness the effort of Canadians to develop our science, technology and innovation to keep us in the forefront of international trade and investment.

I am confident, honourable senators, that the government will stay the course in the years to come and that Canadians will support that course.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, with regard to the speech that Senator Austin has just made, I take it that he would agree that the best way to reduce our vulnerability to the money traders is to get out of debt. In that connection, how can my colleague defend the Finance Minister's approach of two–year rolling targets? Surely it would have a more stabilizing influence if the government would commit itself to a definite reduction not only in the deficit but also in the debt over a fixed period of time.

Senator Austin: The thrust of my comments, Senator Murray, centred on the thesis that reducing our debt exposure reduces our vulnerability and puts more control back in the hands of Canadians in terms of their economic and social goals. I think the Minister of Finance is correct in adopting the technique of two-year rolling targets. The critical part of the Canadian budgetary process, as it has emerged over the last few years, has been the credibility of the projections of the Department of Finance, which have been woefully off-target year in and year out and have led ministers of finance in the previous government to conclusions that proved not to be sustainable and, in some cases, were not even sustainable when they were announced.

Credibility is critical, and the Minister of Finance, the Honourable Paul Martin, has adopted two-year targets in order to be specific and focused in terms of expenditure cuts and to ensure that long term estimates are not the basis of our target setting.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that raises an interesting question. The honourable senator is correct to say that the forecasts went off the rails, notably in the case of revenues, under the previous government. Is my honourable friend suggesting that it is not possible to make forecasts with any accuracy beyond a two-year period?

Senator Austin: It certainly reduces the likelihood of accuracy to make forecasts beyond two years. The honourable senator need only look at the volatility in currency markets or at the yen-U.S. dollar trading that has taken place. For example, look at the unexpected impact on the Japanese economy. That economy now has a threatened recession which, in my view at least, is something of enormous concern to the trade stability and liquidity of Canada and other parts of the world.

It may be possible to be accurate beyond two years, but it is not necessary to stick your neck out so far when what you are doing is reducing your debt and your deficit in the first instance.

The previous government suffered serious disappointment on the revenue expectation side. I doubt that the previous government did all that it could with respect to expenditure reduction. The work of former minister Erik Nielsen was a remarkable exercise. I am not saying every recommendation he made should have been adopted, but the targetting was something that might have been pursued more aggressively.

Senator Murray: I do not want to hold up the Senate on this matter if there are other matters to be dealt with.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the time allotted for questions is over, but with agreement Senator Murray can continue. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Murray: Senator Simard indicates that he has one question, with a brief preamble is permissible.

The honourable senator has obviously done a lot of thinking about, and is concerned with, currency speculation. Does he have a view on the famous Tobin tax, named after the economist who suggested it, or indeed on the particular wrinkle to the Tobin tax that was suggested by Mr. Axworthy recently, which would be a tax levied on automated financial transactions, with a view to paying the costs of adjustments that take place in the financial services industry? If the honourable senator has thought about that, will he favour us with his view, either today or at some later date?

Senator Austin: I truly do appreciate this question, Senator Murray. I have given it some thought, and as Senator Murray is obviously aware, some of the members of this cabinet have kicked around the idea of the so-called "Tobin tax" — not Brian, but the famous American economist — with differing resultant views. It is an interesting item to debate.

When one has worked through all of the theory, the problem is that the allocation of those revenues would require the same kind of committee work that would pertain in a discussion of controlling the weather. The allocation would be based on the views of an international committee. Can you imagine what a debate that would entail? It would make federal-provincial relations timid, even kindergarten stuff.

The methodology to collect the tax does exist because of the electronic way in which money is now transferred. One can track a great percentage of the funds as they move around the world. This is not the difficulty. However, I doubt if we will see this tax seriously discussed for some time yet.

On motion of Senator Stratton, debate adjourned.

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY TELECOMMUNICATIONS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Oliver, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doyle:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine and report upon Canada's international competitive position in telecommunications including the following: a review of the economic, social, cultural and political importance of the telecommunications sector for Canada; the impact of current developments in telecommunications on Canadian heritage and broadcasting and specifically on the role of the CBC; a review of issues relating to foreign investment in Canadian telecommunications; a comparison of regulatory frameworks in Canada and in other countries; and a review of the research and development necessary to enhance Canada's competitive position in telecommunications; and

That the Committee present its report no later than December 15, 1995.—(Honourable Senator Bosa).

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I adjourned this motion yesterday afternoon because I wanted to give an opportunity to some of my colleagues to express their views, if they had any, and because I had not heard all of the remarks that Senator Oliver made in the presentation of his motion. I now understand that no one wishes to speak on this motion.

I have since glanced at the Debates of the Senate, and I am convinced that this is a good motion and that it should be allowed to go forward. I am looking forward to reading the report that will result, because I am sure it will be an interesting one.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have also looked at the reference and the very excellent dissertation that was given by Senator Oliver yesterday and, having participated in the examination of Bill C-62, both before and after it came to this place, I can only say that this is a very worthwhile subject. The terms of reference are very broad and very exhaustive, and I know that the committee will have an excellent study and a very interesting time in examining this subject.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

IMPACT OF DECISION OF HOUSE OF COMMONS TO CEASE PUBLICATION OF COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Inquiry:

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Friday next, April 7, 1995, I will call the attention of the Senate to the decision of the other place concerning the publication of committee proceedings and to the serious impact of that decision on the proceedings of the joint committees of the Senate and the House of Commons, in order to determine whether that decision is in compliance with the constitutional requirements of section 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

Since we were not consulted, as far as I know, and given the seriousness of the issue and its constitutional impact, I would like us to discuss that decision in this house.

[English]

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, April 6, 1995

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DECISION TO CEASE PUBLICATION OF COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS—IMPACT ON BILINGUALISM

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I would like to draw the attention of honourable senators to the role of bilingualism in the legislative process in the Parliament of Canada.

[English]

Section 133 of the Constitution Act of 1867 provides, inter alia, that the English and the French languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of the Senate and of the House of Commons.

The French version of the Constitution Act, 1867, uses the following words: "rédaction des archives, procès-verbaux et journaux respectifs du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes."

In the other place, it seems that, as a cost-cutting measure and on a trial basis, the transcript of speeches will be published only in the language in which they were spoken before the committees. This will be the only official version. On request, a transcript will be published of the simultaneous interpretation of speeches. This transcript, however, will have no official status. It seems to me this policy goes against section 133 of the Constitution. It would be worse than a mistake — it would be wrong, as Talleyrand once said.

The Senate must not follow suit.

How could the two legislative bodies in a bilingual federation not publish the official version of speeches and interventions before parliamentary committees in both languages? The Fathers of Confederation wanted a bilingual legislative process, and the Official Languages Act has further enriched this bilingualism. Furthermore, a solid body of constitutional jurisprudence has developed in this area in the past few years.

I earnestly recommend that we follow both the letter and the intent of the Constitution.

I note that my colleague Senator Corbin decided to draw the attention of the house to the general impact of this decision. Today, I am merely touching on one particular aspect. I earnestly hope that this problem will be the subject of an inquiry, and I look forward to taking part in the debate.

THE SENATE

MR. DUANE WILSON, PAGE—ON THE OCCASION OF HIS RESIGNATION—BEST WISHES FOR FUTURE

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I just heard that one of our Pages, Duane Wilson, will be leaving us today.

[English]

Duane has been with us since August of 1993. Having successfully completed his fourth year of a Bachelor of Administration program, he will be returning to Manitoba where he will continue to further his education on a part-time basis. I also understand that he will be getting married in August.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Hébert: I should like to thank you, Duane, for the wonderful assistance you have provided. Your efforts and dedication have been very much appreciated.

• (1410)

I also wish to thank you on behalf of all honourable senators. We wish you the best of luck in your studies and offer our congratulations and sincere best wishes for your upcoming marriage.

[Translation]

Duane, we will not soon forget your kindness, your good humour and your efficiency both in French and in English, your first language.

[English]

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I should like to join with my colleague Senator Hébert in extending our best wishes to Mr. Wilson as he leaves us. He has served as a Page to all honourable senators in a distinguished and dignified manner over the past couple of years. We trust that his experience in this chamber will prove promotive to his career.

The Page program is an excellent opportunity and experience for young Canadians to participate in the parliamentary process during their formative years.

We wish to express to you, Duane, our appreciation and thanks, and to wish you all the best. As they say in the academy, "ad multos annos."

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PAMELA WALLIN—CANCELLATION OF CONTRACT FOR PRIME TIME NEWS MAGAZINE

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Since the Leader of the Government is absent from the chamber for the moment, I hope that the Deputy Leader will transmit this comment to her.

I believe all Canadians will be deprived of the services of someone who has informed us well. I am referring to Pamela Wallin, who was co-host of CBC Prime Time. She is truly an excellent journalist. She was a print reporter for years and knows the job.

Ms Wallin was put in a situation where an executive producer was giving her assignments which were not compatible with her talent. As honourable senators may be aware, executive producers are really not newspersons but really showpersons.

Canada will now be deprived of her services because this particular executive producer did not know how to use her talents and took advantage of the gap between the regimes of two presidents of the CBC to do real damage to the flagship show of the corporation.

I appeal to the Leader of the Government to talk to the Minister of Heritage, before the arm's length relationship becomes too long, and make the suggestion that Pamela Wallin is an excellent reporter and should be restored to her former position, so that Canadians can receive some real information, whereas from Mr. Mansbridge we do not.

The only advantage I found with respect to Mr. Mansbridge was that when he was on at nine o'clock, he helped me get to sleep immediately.

SENATE FUND FOR GATINEAU FIRE VICTIMS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to take a moment to draw the attention of all honourable colleagues once again to the fund established for approximately 150 people who were left homeless as a result of a tragic fire last weekend in Gatineau.

On behalf of the administration, the staff, and most especially Mrs. Eric Berntson, the spouse of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition who is spearheading this effort, I want to report that already $1,500 has been raised in this building alone. I want to give special recognition to the Senate Protective Service Employees Association which, just at noon today, presented Mrs. Berntson with a cheque for $500. I mention that to illustrate the kind of spirit which can be generated in the Senate.

Donations of clothing, appliances and toys would be most welcome, and they can also be brought in over the weekend.

I also invite honourable senators to make a monetary contribution before they leave for the Easter break for this very worthwhile cause.

NATIONAL FINANCE

TOTAL FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SECURITIES, LOANS AND INTERNATIONAL RESERVES

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, it has been quite some time since we had a discussion about the total public debt of Canada, or indeed when it was borrowed. Now that we are several months past the date when all the figures are put together, we should place it on the record so that senators know the details.

There are many measures of federal debt and borrowing. One of them, which allows monthly assessment, is the Bank of Canada classification "Government of Canada direct securities and loans — total securities and loans outstanding." This might be referred to more briefly as total federal government securities and loans.

It is interesting to note that in September of 1984 — that is, the month when the previous government took office — the total federal government securities and loans stood at $154,652 million. By November of 1993 — which was at a time when Canada was still in that unfortunate era — this figure was $405,996 million. In other words, during that time the federal government had net issues, or issues less retirements, of $251,344 million.

This categorization is not the only one, and it is not the same as changes in net public debt or the accumulated deficit, but it is a good measure — and one which can be compared — of the amount of new borrowings done by the federal government. I believe it is important that this information be on the record.

Now for the good news: I would also advise the Senate that a communiqué from the Department of Finance arrived in all senators' offices yesterday, announcing that during March Canada's official international reserves increased by an amount equivalent to $277 million in U.S. dollars to a total of $14,807 million. Official government operations also decreased reserves by $638 million.

Details of the level and composition of Canada's reserves can also be found in this communiqué, which I am sure will be of great interest to all members of the Senate, particularly the Leader of the Opposition. They are composed of: $11.5 billion in U.S. dollars; in other foreign currency, $473 million; in gold, $212 million; in special drawing rights, $1.4 billion, and in a reserve position with the IMF, $1.195 billion, making a total of $14,807 million. That is one of the highest levels the reserves have reached for a long time.

DEPARTMENT OF CANADIAN HERITAGE BILL

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, presented the following report:

Thursday, April 6, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to present its

SEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-53, An Act to establish the Department of Canadian Heritage and to amend and repeal certain other Acts, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of February 21, 1995, examined the said Bill and now reports the same on division, without amendment, but with the following observation:

Your Committee noted that the Bill raised several concerns, such as the nature and priority of multiculturalism policy and programmes in Canada, that warranted further study. As such, the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology gives notice that it intends to review these issues within one year from today.

Respectfully submitted,

M. LORNE BONNELL
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

• (1420)

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, May 2, 1995, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, the motion for adjournment was done with the usual conditions of recall. We are taking the same two-week Easter break as the House of Commons. By mutual agreement on both sides of this chamber, the week of April 24 has been designated committee week. I wish to emphasize that point. The following committees have plans to sit that week: Legal and Constitutional Affairs; Social Affairs, Science and Technology; Banking, Trade and Commerce; Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, and the Special Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide.

I understand that other committee chairmen are reconsidering their agendas. I encourage all honourable senators to be present for these very important meetings.

PUBLIC WORKS

FUTURE OF HARBOURFRONT CENTRE—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, May 2, 1995, I will call the attention of the Senate to the failure of the federal government to deal with the future of the Harbourfront Centre, Toronto.

TRANSPORT

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—MOTION TO STRIKE SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO PRIVATIZATION CONTRACTS—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, now that we have agreed that we will not meet until the first week in May, which is three weeks away, I wish to point out to the Leader of the Government that there is still a matter on the Order Paper which is of great importance to some of us, namely a motion asking for the creation of a select committee to inquire into the Pearson agreements.

It has been over two weeks now since this item first appeared on the Order Paper. Can we anticipate that before we adjourn today, either the leader or a supporter of the government will speak to this motion?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am very conscious of my honourable friend's motion. I should indicate to the honourable senator that it has not been, nor is it, my intention to stall this motion, which is properly recognized by him and by Senator MacDonald.

I am not in a position to speak on this motion today. However, I understand from my honourable friend's speech that there are others on his side who may wish to speak on this motion, as well as senators on this side. I will certainly be in a position to speak to the motion when we return.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, this is an important question not only to us but also to more and more Canadians. If, after two and one-half weeks of being faced with this motion, the government is not prepared to speak to it, can that be interpreted as the government perhaps resigning itself to a call for a vote? If so, perhaps we could vote on it now and dispose of the motion.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would not agree with my honourable friend, as we are not resigned one way or the other. I have a desire to participate in this debate, both on behalf of the government and personally, but I am not in a position to do so today. However, I will be in a position to do so when we return.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Without pinning down the Leader of the Government, can we all assume that when we return on May 2, we will have a response on that day from the government so that we can proceed to a decision as soon as possible?

Honourable senators, what if the government refuses an inquiry? The Senate of Canada is the last resort for citizens who have been maligned by the Minister of Transport and others but require and need a forum to defend themselves. This is their last resort. Let us get on with it. The government must either be for it or against it. A decision must be taken. We could force a decision now, but we will not do that. However, when we return, we will.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—FUNCTION OF PRIME MINISTER AT MEETING WITH MATTHEWS GROUP

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is one of clarification. It relates to "Pearsongate" and the meeting which allegedly took place — as indicated by the Prime Minister by virtue of his responses in the other place — and, further, to the statements of Mr. LaBarge, who said that Mr. Matthews and the Prime Minister were left alone for 30 minutes. The Prime Minister said in the other place that he was not acting as a lawyer. For clarification, I wish to know: Was he acting as a consultant, a lobbyist, or a bagman for his own campaign?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will ignore the last part of my honourable friend's question. As for the first part, it has been made clear by Mr. Chrétien, the Prime Minister of Canada, that he did not discuss the privatization of Pearson airport with Mr. Matthews. The meeting he attended was organized by someone else. It was not his meeting. He did not discuss the issue of the Pearson airport privatization with Mr. Matthews. That is his statement, and I stand behind that statement.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—PUBLIC INQUIRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that there are conflicting statements on this matter, does the Leader of the Government not think that now is the time to go forward with a public or judicial inquiry, something with which the Minister of Transport threatened this side of the house?

Several people have made statements about this matter. There was Mr. LaBarge, as well as Mr. Wright from Lang Michener. Mr. Goldenberg, who also worked at the firm at the same time, has made a statement, as did Prime Minister Chrétien, who was part of the same law firm at the time. The reputations of the people involved are at stake, particularly the reputations of civil servants who put this deal together.

On numerous occasions, we on this side of the house have asked for an inquiry to clear, if nothing else, the names of those civil servants who worked in good faith to bring forward an honest and honourable agreement. Does the Leader of the Government not think it is now time to go forward with some form of public or judicial inquiry?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend again places emphasis on a particular meeting, a particular law firm and a particular group of participants at that meeting. It has been gone over time and again. I simply repeat the words of the Prime Minister, as I have done before: He was in attendance at a meeting. He did not discuss the issue that is consuming this house.

With regard to the question of an inquiry, my honourable friend knows that the preoccupation of the government has been, and certainly remains, the passage of Bill C-22.

Another aspect to this matter was raised by my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, in his motion before this house. As I have said, I understand the desire of my friends on the other side to reach an early conclusion on that motion. After we return, I may not hold myself to the May 2 date requested by my honourable friend, but I will certainly aim for it and, if not that date, immediately thereafter.

TIMING OF VOTE ON MOTION TO STRIKE SPECIAL COMMITTEE—REQUEST FOR RESPONSE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has complete discretion to reply on whatever date that she chooses. However, we have an obligation to force a vote on a date of our choosing.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in regard to my honourable friend's comment, if that is the date of his choosing, then we will respond on that date.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We are getting into a debate, Your Honour, and I apologize.

Honourable senators, we are not choosing a date. We have a motion on the Order Paper, where it has been for two-and-a-half weeks. The Leader of the Government, who is responsible for replying on behalf of the government, has said she will not even be ready in three weeks from now. We are saying that if no one is ready on her side, then let us get down to taking a decision on the issue. Whether it is that day or the day after, we are ready for a vote. We are ready to take a vote on it now, since no one on the opposite side is willing to speak to it.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, as I said earlier, there are individuals on this side of the house who are preparing to say a few words on the motion of my honourable friend. It is my desire to speak on the issue on behalf of the government. We will do so as soon as we get back.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, we, of course, look forward to the leader's speech. In the meantime, because she has had ample opportunity to think about a response, and because the government has had ample opportunity to consider it, can she send us home today with a word as to the government's attitude to this motion? Is it yes or no?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I will take advice from Senator Olson, who says that what is required is patience.

My honourable friend will concede that, whereas this matter may be a question of a yes, no or maybe on his side, it is a complicated issue. As my honourable friend will understand, it is an issue that requires thought and consultation with colleagues. I am conscious of the anxiety of this house to get on with it. It has been on the Order Paper for two-and-a-half weeks. I have no desire to prolong the issue. I will be in a position to respond to the motion when we get back.

CANADIAN HERITAGE

CANCELLATION OF CONTRACT OF PAMELA WALLIN WITH PRIME TIME NEWS MAGAZINE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, in the past, the Leader of the Government has been a great supporter of equal employment opportunity and equal pay for women, a position which I think most members of this chamber support. Last week, Pamela Wallin announced that her contract with the CBC had been cancelled or broken, while that of her co-host, Peter Mansbridge, was not broken. I think most Canadians feel that both of them should have been broken. Pamela Wallin indicated that she was seeing a lawyer to seek legal advice. I presume that will be followed by a claim for damages as a result of the broken contract. Can we expect Bill C-22-type legislation to settle Ms Wallin's claim?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, like any member of this house, I am not familiar with or knowledgeable about the background of the recent events involving the participants in Prime Time News and Prime Time News Magazine. Therefore, I would not presume to comment on Pamela Wallin's legal position or what action may be taken.

One comment I will make, though, and I make it with some feeling, is that Ms Wallin has made a tremendous contribution to journalism in this country, both written and broadcast. It is my hope that the people of Canada will see her in the months ahead continuing to use her talent and ability in a prominent capacity on television.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I am surprised that the Leader of the Government would want to deprive one of her fellow journalists of advantages such as those provided in Bill C-22, which include limited access to the courts and limited compensation. She seems to find that an advantage in Bill C-22. Why would it not be an advantage for Pamela Wallin?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have every confidence, not just in Pamela Wallin's journalistic skills and abilities, but also in her capacity to handle her negotiations and her professional concerns. I wish her well.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: In recent weeks, and particularly during this week which is drawing to an end, the Leader of the Government in the Senate took a number of questions under advisement concerning all the problems with the development of the Toronto airport. When might we expect answers to these questions?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I am pleased to tell my patient friend that my colleague has a fistful of answers which he will table later today. The answers to some of the questions that have been asked this week will not be in that pile, but there are approximately 13 answers. During the break, as we receive the answers to the other questions on this particular issue, I undertake to forward them to my honourable colleagues.

FROM SMALLER AIRPORTS—DIFFERENCE IN STANDARDS OF SAFETY—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, my question is also for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and relates to the question raised by my colleague Senator Di Nino yesterday regarding the elimination of firefighters at Canadian airports.

I, too, was shocked to learn that the Liberal government has ordered the removal of firefighters at 15 airports across the country. By cutting essential emergency response services at smaller airports, including Yarmouth airport in my area of Nova Scotia, the government has put in jeopardy the safety of the travelling public.

These airports will now be regulated to meet only the very minimum of Transport Canada's standards and requirements, as opposed to the more stringent ICAO rules that the larger international airports must follow. Depending on the municipal services to be provided, fire protection at many airports in Canada will place an unfair burden on these local services and threaten public safety.

Given that the Minister of Transport refuses to discuss any issues with senators, will the Leader of the Government advise honourable senators if what the government has now embarked upon is a system of double standards? In other words, depending on which airport is used, travellers may receive economy rather than first-class safety?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, let me say clearly that safety at federal airports will continue to be a top priority for the government. There is no question about that. Colleagues in this house should know that, and people across the country should know that. I would add that among the small airports affected by this policy is the airport in Lethbridge, Alberta, which is my hometown.

I understand from the information I have received that the criteria which will be applied to the smaller federal airports are the same criteria which are currently applied to non-federal airports in order for them to receive certification. I have also been informed that Transport Canada has conducted consultations with the industry and with the airport stakeholders to develop regulations for emergency responses and emergency response services at all certified Canadian airports, regardless of ownership.

In the future, the federal government will be regulating the level of emergency response services necessary at each airport, and this will be a requirement for certification. The same criteria are applied equitably and consistently across the country.

PUBLIC WORKS

RENOVATION OF WINDOWS AT LESTER B. PEARSON BUILDING—
CANCELLATION OF CONTRACT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, yesterday, I enquired about a response to a previous question I had put to the Leader of the Government in the Senate on February 14, 1995. Frankly, having reread the Debates of the Senate for that day, I am not sure that it is quite clear exactly what it is that I was hoping to hear from the government. Perhaps I may rephrase the question in a clearer manner.

Within the last three months or so, the Department of Public Works cancelled a contract for renovating the windows at the Lester B. Pearson Building, the headquarters for the Department of Foreign Affairs. It is the details of that particular contract which I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to provide, if she would be so kind.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I apologize for not having a response to the honourable senator's question of February 14. However, I will take the expanded question and seek out that information for him.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

INCREASES IN UNIVERSITY TUITION FEES IN NEWFOUNDLAND—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government may not be aware that the government of Newfoundland and Labrador reduced its funding for post-secondary education by 2.2 per cent in its budget last month. This cut comes prior to the reduction in federal transfer payments to the provinces which are scheduled for 1996-97 and 1997-98. Obviously there will be further cuts in education funding in the years to come.

Once again, I ask the Leader of the Government for the government's estimates of the amount of tuition fee increases students can expect to face over the next three years.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question my honourable friend has just asked is a very difficult one. I do appreciate her concern. The honourable senator has been extremely faithful in speaking out and supporting the cause of education in her province. I will take her question and try to provide an answer that will be useful.

Senator Cochrane: The federal government is also limiting its funding of scholarship programs. What are the estimates of the amount of debt load which students will face in the future when they graduate, taking into account the expected tuition fee increases?

Senator Fairbairn: I will take that question as notice as well, honourable senators. My honourable friend will know that this has been a roller-coaster year of discussion on these issues of post-secondary debate. The discussion and the debate is by no means over.

Indeed, the issue of income-contingent repayment is still a part of that discussion. It is also of great concern that students have an opportunity to pay their loans in a way that gives them the greatest opportunity to get their lives in order after they graduate. Those are questions that are very much current, and they will remain so over the next several months going into the fall.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO ABOLISH TAX—
TIMING FOR RESIGNATION OF DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, no matter what happens with respect to Pamela Wallin, I still like Mrs. Pringle.

The present situation reminded me, though, of another event in which Ms Wallin participated some 535 days ago now. There was a "town hall meeting" conducted by CBC just eight days prior to the last election, at which time the now Deputy Prime Minister, without equivocation, said:

> I have already said personally and directly that if the GST is not abolished, I'll resign. I don't know how clear you can get. I think you gotta be accountable for the things that you say you're going to do, and you have to deliver on them.

I could not agree more with the Deputy Prime Minister. Inasmuch as it is now 535 days since that statement was made, and the government still does not seem to have an answer to the GST, other than to continue to embrace it in one form or another, when will the Deputy Prime Minister resign?

• (1450)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I certainly would not wish the Deputy Prime Minister to be in a position of having to resign. We want her to stay. My honourable friend will know that that commitment was made by the Prime Minister. That commitment will be kept by the government.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: When?

Senator Fairbairn: My honourable friend asks when. I cannot give him a date.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You said within two years. It is in the book.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, one of the underpinnings to the issue of getting rid of the GST and working out a method whereby the Government of Canada will have access to comparable resources is that it will, in this case, be done through consultations with the provinces, which was not the case leading up to the GST. As my honourable friends know, discussions are ongoing between the Minister of Finance and his provincial colleagues. The commitment will remain, the Deputy Prime Minister will remain, and the GST will be gone.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I suggest that the Deputy Prime Minister will not remain but the GST will.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, if I were a betting person, which I am not, I would make a wager, but I have every confidence in the political longevity of my friend from Hamilton.

HARBOURFRONT, TORONTO—CLOSING DUE TO FUNDING CUTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to pose a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am not only saddened, but shocked, as are many other Torontonians and people across Ontario, that a world-class cultural centre, Harbourfront, Toronto, will have its budget cut by $2 million, as we learned in a letter from the Minister of Public Works to the Chairman of the Board of Harbourfront. The Chairman of Harbourfront has said that the cuts will ruin their programs for this year and they will have to close by September 15. They will also have to cancel a visit of their Imperial Majesties of Japan, who were supposed to take part in some cultural events at Harbourfront. That is very embarrassing to Canadians and should be embarrassing to the government.

Further, the President of the Treasury Board has said that it is not all true, only that there will be no money next year from the Ministry of Public Works. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate clarify these conflicting views and represent Torontonians at cabinet, on behalf of us senators, in order to keep Harbourfront going?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as you are aware, the Harbourfront Centre will be provided with $6 million in 1995-96. My honourable friend has asked me to clarify comments by the President of the Treasury Board and perhaps the Minister of Public Works. I will be pleased to do that for him. Harbourfront Centre has been a very important fixture in the great city of Toronto for many years. I will be very pleased to pursue the matter with my colleagues.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators may be aware that an independent study has concluded that Harbourfront Centre provides some $126 million in economic activity to the city of Toronto. These independent studies indicate that the Government of Canada, through taxation resulting from the activities at Harbourfront Centre, would earn well in excess of the some $8 million in contributions it has made in the past number of years. Harbourfront is, by the way, one of the top ten tourist attractions in the country.

The voters of the Metropolitan Toronto region, the region served by Harbourfront, elected 23 Liberal Members of Parliament in the last election. Is this their reward for having decided to support the Liberal Party?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, as I said to Senator Haidasz, I will be pleased to seek clarification from my colleagues as to the exact nature of the situation in Toronto. My honourable friend can rest assured that all 23 members from Metropolitan Toronto have expressed a great interest in this issue.

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, I have neither seen nor heard any of them on this point since Monday when the Chairman of Harbourfront announced the decision of the board, which was regrettable but absolutely necessary, in my opinion. If my honourable friend has some information to the contrary, that any of the 23 members of Parliament from Metropolitan Toronto has said something in support of Harbourfront, I would like to know about it.

Senator Fairbairn: I can tell my honourable friend that I have certainly heard about it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, Honourable Senators Haidasz and Corbin have indicated that they wish to ask further questions. Although the time for question period has expired, is it agreed that we conclude with those two senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, before we commence our Easter break, I would like to tell the Leader of the Government in the Senate that there are many senators here from Toronto and other places who would like the government to reconsider the $2 million cut in the budget of Harbourfront.

Senator Fairbairn: For many years, Senator Haidasz has been a very strong and outspoken supporter of the city of Toronto and the activities in that city. I will be pleased to pass on his representations and requests to my colleagues.

CANADA COUNCIL

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I apologize for rising at this time on this question, but since we are on the topic of art and culture, and since we are not returning before May 2, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if the decision to close the Art Bank of the Canada Council was imposed by the government.

If that is the case, could a directive go forward to the Canada Council to reconsider that decision, since the Art Bank is the only activity in that shop that has actually paid its way? The Art Bank served Canadian artists from the Arctic to the Atlantic to the Pacific and was one of the greatest resources ever put at their disposal. It was the idea of the wife of a former colleague of ours, Madam Suzanne Le Moyne. I think it is a shame that the activities of the Art Bank have been cancelled. It is a great loss for the Canadian artistic community.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be pleased to follow up on that question. Given the length of our break, I will provide an answer during the next three weeks.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I understood the agreement to be that Question Period was to end. There were two senators standing, and their questions would conclude Question Period.

Hon. Nöel A. Kinsella: I understood the agreement was that I was the last.

Senator Di Nino: Ask a supplementary.

The Hon. the Speaker: I already had two senators standing at the time, but if there is agreement, the honourable senator may proceed.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

TRANSPORT

ABANDONMENT OF HOLDINGS ON PARTRIDGE ISLAND, NEW BRUNSWICK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: The people of Saint John, New Brunswick, which as you know is the oldest incorporated city in Canada, have informed my office that apparently Transport Canada is declaring as surplus parts of its holdings on Partridge Island, which is an island in Saint John Harbour. Given the good working relationship that the Senate has with the Minister of Transport, the Leader of the Government would be in a better position than I to discover from that department exactly what it is they are abandoning.

Partridge Island has tremendously important historical value to the city of Saint John. It is where Irish immigrants were quarantined when they arrived from overseas. It is something about which the citizens of Saint John are concerned.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be happy to help my friend, but I believe he undersells himself. I believe he has a good working relationship with the Minister of Transport.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a number of delayed answers. I have responses to questions raised in the Senate on December 15, 1994 by the Honourable Senator Richard Doyle and the Honourable Senator John Lynch-Staunton regarding the tunnel between the East Block and the Centre Block; to questions raised in the Senate on February 14, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Pierre Claude Nolin and the Honourable Senator Consiglio Di Nino regarding the decision to build a new federal building in Sault Ste. Marie; to questions raised in the Senate on February 16, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Pierre Claude Nolin and the Honourable Senator John Lynch-Staunton regarding the construction of the East Block tunnel; to questions raised in the Senate on March 28, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Norman Atkins, the Honourable Senator John Lynch-Staunton, and the Honourable Senator Pierre Claude Nolin regarding the Pearson International Airport; to questions raised in the Senate on March 29, 1995 by the Honourable Senator John Lynch-Staunton, the Honourable Senator Lowell Murray, and the Honourable Senator Pierre Claude Nolin; and to questions raised in the Senate on March 30, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Consiglio Di Nino and the Honourable Senator Pierre Claude Nolin regarding Pearson International Airport.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Would the deputy leader read the replies to the questions asked by the Leader of the Opposition and myself on March 29?

TRANSPORT

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): The report was prepared by the then Associate Deputy Minister and the Senior Advisor of Operations and Coordination, Airport Group. Its distribution was authorized by the Associate Deputy Minister.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—VERBAL STATEMENTS OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT—REQUEST FOR WRITTEN CONFIRMATION

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): In June 1993 the then Deputy Minister of Transport was reassigned on very short notice, and previous to that time the Assistant Deputy Minister, Airports Group was reassigned to other duties for a period of time by the then Deputy Minister. Neither of these officials participated in the drafting of the brief submitted to Mr. Nixon.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I ask that the Deputy Leader also read the response to questions raised in the Senate on March 30, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Consiglio Di Nino and the Honourable Senator Pierre Nolin regarding the Pearson International Airport. I hope they will be more substantial than the previous one.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): We cannot proceed with a new lease, as there are outstanding legal and financial impediments, as per our response tabled on March 22, 1995.

As for generating income, the subleases have not generated any income as they have not been recognized by the government.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not know whether I can debate written answers, but I must say the government is really stretching it a bit when it comes up with these canards and fallacious answers regarding the inability of the Government of Canada to come into an agreement with the Greater Toronto Regional Airport Authority. There are no legal impediments. I know I am probably out of order, but if that is the kind of written answer we are getting from the government, I would suggest they not bother to answer.

PRECINCTS OF PARLIAMENT

TUNNEL BETWEEN EAST BLOCK AND CENTRE BLOCK—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

(Responses to questions raised by Hon. Richard J. Doyle on December 15, 1994.)

1. Tenders for the tunnel and watermain project closed January 26, 1995. There were thirteen bidders. The bid amounts were:

| $2,249,000 | $2,488,000 |
| $2,298,000 | $2,599,000 |
| $2,348,000 | $2,722,197 |
| $2,366,000 | $2,779,740 |
| $2,467,000 | |

A contract in the amount of $2,187,600 was awarded to Tristan Construction Limited — the lowest bidder — for the construction of the tunnel and replacement of a defective watermain. On February 13, 1995, the Minister of Public Works and Government Services Canada announced that the contract would be cancelled.

2. PWGSC received Effective Project Approval, for this project, from the Treasury Board in August 1994. As with all major construction projects, strict limits are placed on expenditures to ensure that project authority limits are respected.

3. No work is being undertaken in this area, at this time, due to the cancellation of the tunnel/watermain project. Should any future work be planned for this area, the Senate will be fully briefed in advance.

4. Yes, the utility tunnel continues to be used as a utility tunnel, with access being allowed only to trained maintenance personnel, following prescribed procedures.

5. The tunnel was intended to be completely underground.

(Response to question raised by Hon. John Lynch-Staunton on December 15, 1994)

The East Block Tunnel was originally an aspect of the 1910 Wing project. However, its construction was temporarily deferred. Final Treasury Board approval, for the construction of the tunnel, was granted to Public Works and Government Services Canada on August 2, 1994.

Consultation regarding the tunnel took place:

- In the original presentations of PWGSC's Long Term Construction Plan (supported by the Senate December 12, 1991)
- January 18, 1994 before the Subcommittee on Agenda and Procedure (Chaired by Senator T. Lavoie-Roux);
- March 24, 1994 before the Subcommittee on Agenda and Procedure (Chaired by Senator T. Lavoie-Roux);
- Notification August 18, 1994 to all Senators of final approval for the tunnel and intention to proceed (letter from Senator Earl Hastings, Chairman on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration).

There was no consultation with Senators before the cancellation of the project was announced by the Minister, PWGSC.

PUBLIC WORKS

DECISION OF MINISTER TO BUILD NEW FEDERAL BUILDING IN SAULT STE. MARIE—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF CONTRACT

This figure is based on the following: Once the move to the new facility is completed, the Government will realize annual net savings of $457,900. This is made up of: avoidance of lease payments of $857,000 minus the operating and tax costs for the new facility of $399,100.

More specifically, the current accommodations for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) and the Department of Human Resources Development (HRD) in Sault Ste. Marie are inadequate: RCMP have extensive security requirements including temporary cell facilities, secure parking and secure garage bays for prisoner loading. HRD has a ground floor requirement of 820 $m^2$.

There is no facility currently in the market to meet these requirements. No acceptable responses were received to a recent lease tender call. A subsequent market survey confirmed that the existing space in the lease market could not meet the accommodation requirements. The cost of constructing a new crown building is $11.9 million.

Extensive renovations would have to be made to any existing facility. As an illustration, if the Government were to acquire and renovate the current building at 390 Bay St., it would have cost the government $12,424,000 — as compared to the $11.9 million for the currently planned new facility. These costs include the purchase of the building and extensive alterations and replacements to the electrical and mechanical systems, major upgrades for handicapped accessibility, removal and proper disposal of PCBs, and the construction of an addition to the building to meet tenant space requirements. Further, purchase of this building would require PWGSC to temporarily relocate the Canada Employment Centre currently located in the facility, thereby incurring large fitup and lease costs.

Additional savings are anticipated from the consolidation through increased operating efficiencies.

(Response to questions raised by Hon. Consiglio Di Nino on February 14, 1995)

The contract for construction has not yet been let. At this point, the project has not yet entered the tendering phase, and will not without prior approval from the Minister. Construction estimates cannot be released by the department prior to contract award.

RECONSTRUCTION OF EAST BLOCK TUNNEL—STATUS OF PROJECT

On February 13, 1995, the Minister of Public Works and Government Services Canada announced that the contract for the new pedestrian tunnel would be cancelled.

DETAILS OF COSTS INVOLVED IN CANCELLATION OF PROJECT

The cancellation costs with the construction company are still under negotiation.

CONSULTATION WITH INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMITTEE ON CANCELLATION OF PROJECT

No.

CANCELLATION OF PROJECTS WITHIN PARLIAMENTARY PRECINCTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

The long term construction program is essential for the preservation of the Parliament Buildings and will not be cancelled.

However, to minimize the burden on our fiscal framework, the government is spreading these projects over a ten to twelve year period. As the government turns its attention to fighting the deficit, PWGSC is reviewing the relative priorities of the projects which make up the $265 million construction program in order to deal with the most critical projects and to have an allowance for unforeseen emergencies.

The Post Office area in the Centre Block was recently vacated for the construction of a new visitor welcome centre. PWGSC is designing and constructing this project on behalf of the House of Commons. Any questions regarding the visitor welcome centre should be addressed to the Speaker of the House of Commons.

TRANSPORT

(Response to question raised by Hon. Norman K. Atkins on March 28, 1995)

Transport Canada officials briefed Mr. Robert Nixon on several occasions regarding the T1T2 Limited partnership contracts. One briefing document contained a Transport Canada analysis of the monetary risk of cancelling the contract.

The government did not delay in creating the Greater Toronto Regional Airport Authority. Once it became evident that there would be a delay in passing Bill C-22 in the Senate, the government encouraged the establishment of the Authority, to act in an advisory capacity. It is not possible to negotiate the future financial terms and conditions of a lease agreement with the Authority when the potential liabilities of Pearson Airport are still outstanding vis-a-vis the leases and other agreements tied to the previous government's decision to turn over the control and management of the two terminals to private enterprise. The delay of essential works and jobs at Pearson International Airport is a result of the delay in passing Bill C-22.

As outlined in the response provided on March 22, 1995., the passage of Bill C-22 would eliminate all impediments to the development of Terminals 1 and 2. The transfer of control to the non-profit airport authority and the subsequent redevelopment cannot proceed until Bill C-22 is finally passed into law.

The National Airports Policy announced by the Minister of Transport last July established the policy whereby airports in this country will be managed, operated and developed by the people who are best equipped to so do. The Greater Toronto Regional Airport Authority, which presently can only advise the Minister of Transport, will be the body to implement change at Lester B. Pearson International Airport. That body, a non-profit group whose interests are clearly established to create the best environment for the growth and prosperity of this important facility, is ready to undertake the task before it. It would not be appropriate for the government to tie the hands of the Authority before it even commences their stewardship.

Those notes were written and authorized prior to November 4, 1993. The Minister of Transport was sworn in on November 4, 1993. As Senator Lynch-Staunton pointed out in his question, "on October 28, the Conservative government was still in office". The vast majority of work that went into the November 4, 1993 Department of Transport report was done well prior to October 28, 1993.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—REDEVELOPMENT OF TERMINALS 1 AND 2—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

The following is the full text of the exchanges in the House of Commons on March 28, which provide the exact words of the Minister of Transport, and the full context in which they were said.

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

It has been widely reported that the minister's own officials had prepared an extensive analysis of the Pearson airport transaction prior of its cancellation. It clearly established that the selection process was fair and transparent. It ruled out any role of patronage and indicated that the deal was much better in terms of returns to the government than anything the government's own advisers said could be expected.

Can the minister confirm that this document dated November 1993 exists, that he read it and that he passed it on to Mr. Nixon for his review?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately for the Reform Party, we do not have Stephen Leacock working at Transport Canada.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Young: I can say that the report in question, which was dated November 4, and an earlier report had been prepared prior to my becoming the Minister of Transport. I want to indicate to the hon. member that nowhere in that report did it indicate that the deal was one that should be supported by the government.

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Transport confirm that he read the Nixon report? If he did, did he advise the Prime Minister that it contradicted entirely the advice and analysis of the government's own officials and an outside adviser?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib): Mr. Speaker, it is a rather pathetic sight to see Reform Party members who talk of trying to save money for the Canadian taxpayer and who are very concerned about getting the facts bring up a matter like this. Not only did I read the report but I also read the Nixon report.

What the hon. member might be better off doing is checking with the staff at Transport Canada, including the deputy minister and assistant deputy minister, who were not privy to writing the report. Not only that, they were sent home because the government that was there at the time the deal was done did not like the kind of advice it was getting from senior public servants at Transport Canada.

The government reviewed many documents, including this one, as well as the Nixon Report, before making its decision.

No new financial figures were developed. If the figures in the November, 1993 document are reviewed, it will be discovered that the Crown construction option could be as lucrative as the private sector option, depending on the revenue growth. The private sector had obviously projected a high revenue growth, in part, no doubt due to their expected monopoly position.

The profit of the two terminals calculated at the time of the deal was entered into was approximately $23.5 million to the government. Revenues have been growing since then, due to the growth in passenger traffic and this government's initiatives, including the announcement of the Canada/U.S. Air Bilateral.

This government does not intend to hand over the most important economic generator in the National Airports System to a profit-oriented enterprise who would have had in effect monopoly control of this facility. The National Airports Policy, and its Canadian Airport Authorities, will serve the taxpayers of Canada and the users of Lester B. Pearson International Airport fairly and properly into the next century.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—
TRANSPORT CANADA STUDY—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Consiglio Di Nino on March 30, 1995)

Mr. Nixon received much information from the department and from all parties, including the proponents of T1T2 Limited Partnership. The document entitled "Terminal 1/Terminal 2 Privatization" and dated November 4, 1993, was a particular document prepared by the Department of Transport officials, which document was filed in the court in December 1994 and tabled in the House of Commons on March 25, 1995 by the Minister of Transport. Mr. Nixon reviewed the documents provided to him by various sources, prepared his report and presented it to the Prime Minister who made it public on December 3, 1993.

ALTERNATIVE FUELS FOR INTERNAL COMBUSTION ENGINES BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the eleventh report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources (Bill S-7, to accelerate the use of alternative fuels for internal combustion engines, with amendments), presented in the Senate on 5th April, 1995.—(Honourable Senator Kenny).

Hon. Colin Kenny moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise with a certain amount of humility and gratitude. I must say that I have received an awful lot of help in getting to this day. I should like to start by mentioning Senator Nolin in particular, who has been of great assistance with Bill S-7, as has Senator Ghitter. Senator Fairbairn and Senator Graham have also expedited things on our side.

The committee, including Senator Bacon, Senator Spivak, Senator Hays, Senator Adams, Senator Balfour, Senator Buchanan, Senator Ottenheimer, and, of course, our chairman Senator Carney, have been very helpful and very patient in moving this issue forward.

I also thank the leadership on the other side for their cooperation which has come from time to time. I want them to know that it has been appreciated.

I should also like to thank some senators here who are not on the committee: Senators Stollery, Petten, Lucier, Lewis, and Thériault, who helped finance a lot of the research that was required for this bill. They provided funds out of their research budgets to assist in moving this measure forward.

• (1510)

I would be remiss if I did not mention some of my staff who have been very helpful. They are Donna Routliffe, Jennifer Ryan and Gail Carroll of my office. I see in the gallery Pamela Huneault who did a great deal of work on the initial research for this bill.

Honourable senators, I will start by observing rule 100 of the Rules of the Senate and comment on the amendments which were put forward. The first amendment is as a result of an oversight on my part in drafting the bill. Internal combustion engines were referred to in the bill. Inadvertently, that excludes electricity as a fuel. As a consequence, we adjusted the phrase "internal combustion" to "motor vehicles" to ensure that we did not exclude one of the important alternative fuels.

The second amendment is the addition of the words "thereby promoting the replacement of petroleum-based fuels for transportation." This was in response to a brief from the Canadian Petroleum Institute which was not supportive of the bill. However, after hearing this presentation, the committee concluded that we should make clear that one of the objectives of the bill is to get away from the use of oil and to diversify fuels. We have made that as clear as we could by adding these words.

The next amendment relates to the words "to deliver direct propulsion energy" and was to accommodate electric motors which, inadvertently, was excluded.

The next amendment reads "thereby promoting the replacement of petroleum-based fuels for transportation." Again, this was in response to the refiners. We wanted to make the point that we were certainly trying to move away from gasoline.

The next amendment replaces the word "motors" for "internal combustion engines."

The final amendment was proposed by the chairman of the committee and relates to page 3, lines 24 and 25, where words were added to ensure that the Treasury Board would consult different interest groups before proceeding with regulations. Environmental groups and representatives of industry were added to that provision. That concludes the amendments that were made to the bill during the work of the committee.

The committee met for two full days. We had four sets of hearings with a broad range of witnesses, including representatives of refiners and fuel suppliers. All the suppliers of fuels covered in the bill had representatives speak to it. Representatives from the office of the Auditor General reported to us on the 1991 report that the Auditor General had made concerning purchasing within the government fleet. We had witnesses from Environment Canada and Natural Resources Canada. Environmental groups appeared before us; auto manufacturers and manufacturers of equipment used in alternatively fuelled vehicles appeared before us; fleet users appeared, including representatives from the City of Etobicoke, which has an alternatively fuelled fleet. Representatives from United Parcel Service, which has a large alternatively fuelled fleet, gave testimony. Representatives from the Niagara Police Force, which has a large fleet, appeared, and this was useful in our deliberations. We heard from Treasury Board and from Public Works, which buys the vehicles. We heard from the Minister of Natural Resources and the Minister of the Environment. The comments we heard were interesting and instructive. After hearing the witnesses, I think all the committee members came away with a better understanding of the issue. I know I did.

For those who are here and who are not entirely familiar with this bill, it deals with a conundrum which exists right now whereby auto manufacturers have expressed an interest in producing alternatively fuelled vehicles. They have said there was not a sufficient refuelling infrastructure to go ahead with significant numbers. On the other hand, fuel suppliers have said that they would be pleased to provide alternative fuels, but that there are not enough vehicles available to support an infrastructure.

It occurred to us that the federal government had the solution in its hands, inasmuch as there are 39,000 government vehicles on the road today, as we speak. With that sort of purchasing power, it seemed there might be a possibility of using the government's own fleet to start to break the cycle. We concluded that by converting 75 per cent of the government's 39,000 vehicles, we could save significant amounts of money and clean up the air at the same time.

The bill sets out a schedule for doing this. It sets out two years of study, followed by a five-year conversion program. The plan is to convert the fleet to alternative fuels gradually as new vehicles are being purchased. There is no intention to convert vehicles we own at this time, but as new ones are purchased, the intention is to buy alternatively fuelled vehicles.

Ultimately, it is the objective of the committee that the government buy only originally manufactured vehicles for this purpose. There are not enough of them right now. Until that happens, as a bridging step, the committee contemplated purchasing vehicles and then retrofitting them after purchase so that they could operate on alternative fuels.

During the five-year conversion period, it was calculated by the committee that the government could save as much as $7 million and reduce $CO_2$ emissions by 57,000 tonnes. It would then continue to save $7 million per year for every year after that and reduce emissions by 20,000 tonnes a year every year thereafter.

I have already mentioned that the bill covers five fuels: electricity, natural gas, propane, ethane and methane. The bill is fuel neutral; there is no intention here to pick a winner. The intention is for the fuels to emerge on their own. The selection should take place for economic and availability reasons. We anticipate that different regions of the country would choose different fuels. It is clear that some fuels make much more sense in some parts of the country than in others.

One of the interesting things that came forward as we got into the hearings was a significant response from the private sector to the bill. We heard from fuel suppliers from across the country. They wrote in number. There is a document available to honourable senators which lists the letters that we received from the private sector, in which there is an undertaking to spend between $33 million and $39 million to expand the refuelling structure in the event that the bill is passed. This is a very significant commitment. We were very pleased to have so many companies come forward and respond positively to the bill, with a promise of further spending to expand the infrastructure.

We also had some interesting proposals from some fuel suppliers who offered to convert the government fleet, and no cost would be incurred by the government. The proposal that both propane and natural gas suppliers came forward with was one that said, "We will absorb the cost for conversion of these vehicles and we will pay for the cost for that conversion out of the fuel savings that take place over the first two or three years." In essence there would be no outlay from the federal government as the program got rolling.

This program is similar to the federal buildings initiatives where someone from the private sector comes in, rewires a federal building, insulates it, pays for it themselves and recoups their expenses and a profit from future heating and electrical savings. The propane and natural gas suppliers have undertaken to do the same with the federal fleet where the vehicles warrant it.

One of the likely outcomes of Bill S-7 will be a smaller fleet. It will also mean fewer types of vehicles. We discovered that there are 106 different types of vehicles in the federal fleet. The committee felt that was bizarre. There is no need for the government to have so many types of vehicles. There is an opportunity to reduce significantly the number of types of vehicles, which is consistent with the Auditor General's report of 1991. He referred to the RCMP, who have the same vehicles from coast to coast. They experience significant savings when they purchase a vehicle and significant savings in maintaining it, as they keep records. The whole thing becomes more predictable and more economical.

During the course of our study, the government was good enough to table a report called the Bronson report. The Auditor General's suspicions in his 1991 report are quite true; namely, that the federal government has many vehicles that it does not need. I refer to vehicles which are driven too few kilometres to convert to alternative fuel and too few kilometres to keep them. The number of such vehicles could be as high as 10,000, out of a total of 39,000. Alternatives would include public servants using their own vehicles or taking taxis. The government does not need to have all the cars they currently own. The committee is convinced of that.

We had some interesting support for the bill from the Ford Motor Company. The president sent a letter with their representative who gave evidence before the committee. In their brief, Ford indicated that they felt the bill was laudable but that we were going too slowly. Ford sent a revised schedule suggesting that there was no more need to study this issue and that we should begin to convert the fleet immediately, not spend two more years studying it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I hesitate to interrupt Senator Kenny, but his time up. Is there unanimous agreement to allow him to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Kenny: I wish to remind honourable senators of our real commitment. As a nation, we have a commitment to reduce greenhouse gas emissions to 1990 levels by the year 2000. Obtaining that goal will be a significant step forward. Cleaning up the air is important to all of us. The committee has no doubt that this bill will help us accomplish that goal.

The committee has had significant support from members of Parliament. Over 70 people have written indicating their support for the bill. That has been helpful in terms of getting the government's attention. I want to thank those of you in the chamber who have been kind enough to write, and I encourage all of you who still have not done so to give the matter some thought.

This bill is important because it leads by example. It is not a bill that tells anyone to do anything. For a change, it is the federal government saying, "We will clean up our own act." By doing so it will give the citizens of the country an opportunity to go into a dealership and pick an alternatively fuelled vehicle, if they so choose. It is also an opportunity for the federal government to save money while it is cleaning up the air at the same time.

I should like to conclude, honourable senators, with a couple of thoughts about legislation or guidelines. There has been much debate concerning whether the government should proceed with legislation or put guidelines in place. Guidelines are a lot simpler. They are pretty straightforward for a government. It seems sort of American to impose legislation.

In 1991, however, the Auditor General's report pointed out that there had been guidelines in place for over a decade encouraging the use of alternatively fuelled or environmentally friendly vehicles. It was not very successful. In fact, when we asked witnesses from the Department of Supply and Services how many alternatively fuelled vehicles they had purchased in the past year, the gentleman involved said that he could count them on one hand. When we asked how many alternatively fuelled vehicles were planned for use next year, we were told that none were being planned.

This is in sharp contrast to what is happening in the United States. The committee received a letter from the assistant secretary of the Department of Energy indicating that they have legislation in place to convert 75 per cent of their fleet by the year 1999. That is five years ahead of us, and they have a significantly larger fleet. They have approximately 500,000 vehicles in their fleet. The letter we received from the assistant secretary was supportive of the legislation. It indicated that there was some sort of compatibility between the two pieces of legislation. This year, the American government is converting 35,000 vehicles in their fleet to alternative fuel.

Returning to the question of legislation or guidelines, on the one hand, the guidelines that have been in place until now have not worked. I would also be very interested if anyone can think of the last time they heard of a Treasury Board guideline or knew what it was about. On the other hand, legislation would indicate a real commitment by the government. It means that the government is putting itself on the line and is saying, "We will do this. The public will then hear about it. The public will stand up and say that this is the direction that we will take too." It is also important in terms of the private sector commitments.

I spoke about industrial benefits — that is, the $30 million to $40 million that they are prepared to spend if this bill goes ahead. Put yourselves in the mind of an investor in the private sector. Which would you prefer to invest in: Treasury Board guidelines or legislation from the Government of Canada?

In conclusion, I wish to thank this house for its indulgence in permitting me to conclude my remarks. I appreciate the support extended to me from both sides.

Hon. Wilbert J. Keon: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few comments and then I have a question for Senator Kenny.

First, I commend the honourable senator for addressing this extremely important subject. This is an area that will have a major economic impact on transportation the world over. I have had a long-standing interest in the development of portable energy over the years from the point of view of medical research and the powering of medical devices.

• (1530)

I would like to mention that you have left out one very important source of portable energy, and that is the electrochemical source; not the contention battery, about which you spoke in the rechargeable electric vehicles, but the other electrochemical power sources. I think this will become one of the major energy sources in the future.

Another area is fuel cells. This is an important area of development which I believe will have a huge market, particularly in California to begin with, and in other parts of the world very soon thereafter.

I think that the National Research Council or some of the private electrochemical institutes across the country should be consulted. Coupled with your initiative, there could be some very interesting scientific trials of high energy sources for powering vehicles.

Senator Kenny: Thank you, Senator Keon. The definition in the bill includes ethanol, methanol, propane gas, natural gas, hydrogen or electricity, but I should also point out that under clause 6, Treasury Board has the capacity to make regulations for the purposes of defining an alternative fuel. We left this in the bill because we do not believe that we can always see the future perfectly, and there should be room for managers to adjust as time goes on. It seemed like a mug's game for legislators to try to manage. There is, under clause 6, an opportunity for other fuels to be incorporated over time.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I should like to extend my congratulations to Senator Kenny as well for the remarkable achievement of getting his bill to this point.

I have a twofold question for him: First, with respect to legislation as opposed to guidelines, can you comment further on what you have done in the other place in terms of a sponsor and what hopes have you for the legislative mandate proceeding, as opposed to simply the guidelines?

Also, can you comment on the 10,000 surplus cars which the government owns, how they can be disposed of, and whether ministerial cars and cars allocated to people in Parliament are part of that?

Senator Kenny: I thank Senator Hays for his question. A variety of people have been kind enough to offer to sponsor the bill in the other place. I had hoped to meet with some of our colleagues there and discuss further with them who would be the appropriate person to do that. It seemed it was better for me to consult further on that, rather than suggest someone.

As far as the reduction in vehicles goes, I had not zeroed in on ministers' cars. Our minister seems to have left. I am sure her car is well driven. I just want to know whether it is alternatively fueled or not.

Senator Nolin had intended to comment further on the reduction of vehicles. Perhaps we could hear what he has to say on that. I am sure he will answer your question adequately because he had a great deal of interest in finding ways to reduce the size of the government fleet. He pursued those questions quite diligently with our witnesses. I suspect that your answer is coming momentarily from another source.

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Kenny a question, more on the legislative process than on the substance of the bill.

There appears to me to be an unfairness in the relationship of the two Houses of Parliament in dealing effectively with legislation which flows from the initiative of an individual member.

At this stage, however, we will be sending a message to the other House that a bill has been passed by this chamber so, in a sense, it is no longer an individual initiative but an initiative adopted by the Senate. It will find itself in the system along with other initiatives of individual members in the other place, whereas bills coming from the House of Commons to the Senate, although they may have been initiated by an individual member, when they arrive here are treated in a more expeditious fashion.

Would you comment on what I perceive to be a fundamental unfairness or lack of balance with respect to the decisions of one chamber, which is more than a proposition of an individual member?

Senator Kenny: I had an excellent and surprising briefing from the Clerk Assistant on this question. He brought me up to speed and acquainted me with the information which you are bringing. As I recall, I need to find a sponsor who will then go before the Committee on House Management. The sponsor will have five minutes to put the case to that committee. I may sit there in support. The committee will then decide whether the bill is a voteable bill. If it is not a voteable bill, it essentially gets assigned to oblivion. They may deal with it for a little while, then it disappears. If it is a voteable bill, it eventually works its way up the Order Paper three times, and then hopefully it is assigned to a committee.

You are quite right that it is not an equitable system. We seem to be travelling steerage over there, while they are travelling first class over here. There is only one way to handle that, and that is to ask them whether they would like to have a system here similar to what they offer us over there.

Senator Kinsella is quite right that it is inequitable. This is my first time through the process, and I am learning the process. I do not necessarily recommend private bills to everyone, but it is an educational process.

Senator Kinsella: Do you think that this house might benefit from some kind of initiative being taken, either by His Honour or, at the instruction of this chamber, by our clerks, to explore this area; to perhaps do some comparative research in other bicameral systems, whereby more equity is brought in the balance between the two Houses? In other words, rather than simply observing while this bill — or other bills — are assigned to oblivion, there really should be a better balance between the two Houses.

Senator Kenny: I have long been an advocate of balance between the two Houses in joint committees and on a whole range of other issues. I suspect that my bill will go through the system as it now exists, but I certainly would support an initiative which would cause representatives of this house to meet with representatives of the other house for the purpose of exploring whether the system can be improved. I think it is important that on all matters we remember that we have a place in the Constitution which is very clear.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, I had prepared a few notes, but my colleague, Senator Kenny, covered just about everything. I am also aware that there are other things on the agenda.

Since I do not want to delay the proceedings, I will start by providing some clarifications in response to the question raised by Senator Hays.

How fleet vehicles are used is of primary importance. This assessment must be done in reviewing the possibility and cost of conversion.

Several witnesses confirmed that, as we feared, use is important in this whole debate when we look at all the issues related to the government fleet.

Our colleague, Senator Kenny, referred to a study being prepared by the federal government, namely the Bronson report. This document only refers to the vehicles owned by the government, the vehicles under the responsibility of government departments and agencies. It does not include Crown corporation vehicles.

• (1540)

Honourable senators, when that report was released about a month ago, there were 25,146 vehicles in this category, in the federal government fleet. Several charts are available on this.

We realize at some point that there are, say, 11,290 vehicles whose mileage exceeds 20,000 kilometres per year, which leaves 14,000 vehicles with a mileage of less than 20,000 kilometres per year. This led us to put several questions to Treasury Board officials who were, I must admit, unable to tell us why there were so many vehicles with such low mileage.

I am convinced that we put more than 20,000 kilometres per year on our own cars. Everyone, starting with the Auditor General's representatives, agreed that there was a serious problem with the use of government vehicles. Of the 10,000 vehicles, there are perhaps 8,000 or 12,000 too many. One thing is for certain. If there are 14,000 vehicles whose mileage is less than 20,000 kilometres per year, I agree that, for geographical reasons and even if we tried to rationalize use, we would not be able to get rid of some of these 14,000 vehicles.

At least half, if not more, of the 14,000 are not needed. Here again, Treasury Board has never given us precise answers about this large number of vehicles. I do not know if this answers your questions.

I would like to go back to the comments of Senator Kenny on the reason for a statute rather than guidelines from Treasury Board. Treasury Board, and we will take this as a happy coincidence, has just authorized Public Works Canada to draft new rules governing vehicle purchases.

It is odd to see all of the documents on federal government vehicle purchases being reviewed in the past two or three months. I remind you that Bill S-7 has been under consideration in the Senate for about three-and-a-half months. This is normal. It has nothing to do with the colour of the political party in power.

In 1991, when the Auditor General's report was released, the other party was in power. Nothing has happened since then, except in the past three or four months. I have no problem questioning the real intentions of government officials. The famous guidelines Treasury Board distributed make absolutely no reference to alternative fuels. On the contrary, looking at the vehicle descriptions, which is a bit like looking at a catalogue, we see that all the vehicles are powered by unleaded gasoline. That is pretty straightforward. There is no mention of alternative fuel. Treasury Board certainly has policies because there has been great discussion about them since 1991. Treasury Board has a policy on environmental concerns in the purchase of vehicles. There is no link between the operational guidelines of Treasury Board, Supply and Services and Public Works.

I think we should follow the method you used, the American approach. It works in the United States. There are rooms full of Treasury Board guidelines, unfortunately. There are also rooms full of memos on how to avoid Treasury Board regulations.

We have to get on with things. It is unfortunate indeed that a bill, because it was originated by a single senator, will follow a different course once it reaches the House of Commons. I would hope the House will adopt this bill unanimously. We should discuss with our colleagues in the House how to proceed with bills that appear vital for the future. They should be given the treatment they warrant.

It has been a great pleasure studying this bill with my colleague Senator Kenny. I hope the house will support it unanimously.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, Senator Kenny moved, seconded by Senator Corbin, that this report be adopted now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Colin Kenny: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

STATE OF CANADIAN FINANCIAL SYSTEM

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON STUDY—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the thirteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, entitled: "Regulation and Consumer Protection in the Federally-Regulated Financial Services Industry: Striking a Balance," tabled in the Senate on November 22, 1994.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak on this order, I move that it be considered debated and dropped from the Order Paper.

Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

MOTION TO CHANGE NAME OF COMMITTEE IN FRENCH ADOPTED

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, April 5, 1995, moved:

> That the name of the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide be modified in French to "Comité spécial sur l'euthanasie et l'aide au suicide."

Honourable senators, before explaining the reasons why the French title should be changed, I would like to make two comments. First, I would like to thank Senator Corbin and Jacques Dubé, Revisor-Editor for the Senate, who assisted me in my research on this topic.

My second comment is less favourable. I am surprised that the Secretary of State, which is responsible for translation, is not more concerned with respecting the genius of the French language. It imposes literal translations like "suicide assisté" for assisted suicide, a literal translation, word for word, which does not really respect the spirit of the language.

This having been said, briefly, all of the various reference books we consulted, including Le Grand Robert, le Trésor de la langue française, le Grand Larousse de la langue française, state that, when the verb "assister" is used transitively, the subject and the object are always a person.

We can say in French that the witness "assists" the officer, that the guardian "assists" the minor, that the clerk "assists" the Speaker. There is always a person involved. When the past participle is used as an adjective in French, the meaning of the adjective, according to Le Grand Robert is "one who receives help, assistance."

There is one meaning of "assister" which applies to things, but, for the time being, it is only accepted in technical contexts. According to the Dictionnaire historique de la langue française, "assister" is found in many expressions copied from the English words "to assist or assisted," but the adjective is used in a slightly different way than the French verb, for example, "des freins assistés, une direction assistée" for power brakes and power steering in cars; "conception, traduction assistée par ordinateur" for computer-aided design or translation.

Obviously, this term cannot be used for suicide or for people. The expression "assistance au suicide" is just another variation of "suicide assisté." According to Le Grand Robert, in the above context, the action of "assisting" something in French can only be done by a system, a device facilitating a process, a device, "assistance au freinage, assistance à la création par ordinateur."

The only remaining solution is "aide au suicide," which creates no linguistic problem and has the advantage of being brief.

That is, by the way, the expression used in respected publications on the issue. The Law Reform Commission, for example, uses the term "aide au suicide" in its French publications and not "assistance au suicide," and is even less inclined to use "suicide assisté."

It is also the expression you will find in the encyclopedic vocabulary Les mots de la bioéthique, a book co-authored by Professors Hottois from Belgium and Marie Parizeau — I do not know whether she is Mr. Parizeau's niece — from Laval University. In these respected and well-written books, the expression "aide au suicide" is used. I will not dwell on this any longer.

I would like the Senate to help ensure that in any future committee work on euthanasia, that the French name of the Special Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide be modified to "Comité spécial sur l'euthanasie et l'aide au suicide."

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 2, 1995, at 2 p.m.

MANITOBA

PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE VICTORY IN PROVINCIAL ELECTION

Hon. Duncan J. Jessiman: Honourable senators, I rise to report the results of the Manitoba provincial election held on Tuesday, April 25. The results were that the Progressive Conservative Party of Manitoba, led by Premier Gary Filmon, was elected for a third term with an increased majority.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Jessiman: They retained all of the 29 seats which they held at the time the election was called and gained another two seats, one from the Liberals in the constituency of River Heights and the other from the NDP in the constituency of Rossmere.

The NDP won 23 seats, that being two more seats than they held previously. However, one of those seats they took from the Conservatives with only 28 votes.

Unfortunately the Liberal Party, led by Paul Edwards, lost four of the seven seats they held at time of the calling of the election, including that of Mr. Edwards himself.

SCHIZOPHRENIA

Hon. Sharon Carstairs: Forty per cent of those who have this disease will attempt to take their own lives, and 10 per cent of all those who attempt to take their own lives will succeed. What is this dreadful disease for which there is yet no cure? It is schizophrenia, a devastating disease of the brain, and unfortunately, to this date, there is still no cure.

More than 250,000 Canadians have this disease, and the costs to them and to their families cannot be measured. We do know, however, that it costs $2.3 billion each year in direct health care because about one in every 12 hospital beds in Canada is used by someone suffering from schizophrenia. In addition, $2 million in support services are used, and are required to be used, for those suffering from this disease.

I rise, honourable senators, to speak about schizophrenia today because although last week was actually the week set aside to inform Canadians about this dreadful disease, the Senate of Canada was not sitting. However, I was with two persons who suffer from this disease when they presented a bouquet of irises, the floral symbol of schizophrenia, to the Prime Minister last Thursday.

Schizophrenia is a lifelong illness. Unfortunately, it often strikes first when young people are in their late teens or early 20s. It is not caused, as some think, by childhood trauma. It is not the result of a split personality, as many mistakenly believe. It is not caused by lack of parenting skills, or by failures of the person, nor is it caused by poverty. Above all, it is not the person's fault.

It is, however, a very real disease caused by faulty brain biochemistry, and it does have clear symptoms, some of which are withdrawal from family and friends, inappropriate behaviour and, in many cases, poverty of thought and/or speech. There is no cure, but frequently it is treatable with the use of medication.

The stress on both those suffering the disease and their family members is enormous since diagnosis and prognosis are not easily determined. They need both the moral and financial support of Canadians as they meet this challenge.

I urge each and every one of you in this chamber to become more knowledgeable about this disease and to share this knowledge as best you can. I am sure that all of us have been in our discussions involving members of our families, friends or neighbours who have been touched by this disease. I urge you to reach out and help. Michael Smith, the 1993 Nobel Laureate for Chemistry and a Canadian, was clearly touched by the pain of others. He gave his entire prize money to the fight for this disease. Please do your part to inform, to educate and to help.

Hon. W. David Angus: Honourable senators, I too wish to underline and bring to your attention the devastating effects of schizophrenia — a nightmarish condition which, to varying degrees, afflicts one in 100 or some 270,000 Canadians and frequently wreaks havoc among their families and other loved ones.

For too long, this tragic and incurable brain disease, which literally rips families apart and profoundly disrupts millions of Canadians' lives, has not received the attention and support it requires. Over the years, schizophrenia victims have been stigmatized and even reviled. In thousands of instances, the condition has been simply swept under the rug or otherwise effectively ignored. The victims have been dismissed or marginalized as being "crazy" misfits. Care and support for these decent individuals, with some notable exceptions, has been totally inadequate. Public funding for the care, treatment, counselling, and medication of schizophrenics in Canada has been woefully insufficient. This situation is simply unacceptable in a prosperous and developed nation such as Canada purporting, as it does, to foster a caring, sympathetic, understanding and, dare I say, just society. Accordingly, I enthusiastically and emphatically endorse and support Senator Carstairs' statement this afternoon.

For those of us who have been touched personally in one way or another by the ravages of this illness, our awareness is acute. Society at large, and especially our public officials, now must be made equally aware. Special efforts must be undertaken now to obviate the fear and misunderstanding of schizophrenia which exists in Canada today.

The casual and derogatory use of the term "schizophrenic" needs to be redressed. Imagine how our sadly afflicted fellow citizens feel when they turn on the radio or the television or listen to other public utterances by the insensitive and perhaps the uninitiated and unaware who say "schizophrenic this" and "schizophrenic that" to describe various odd or troublesome behaviour or personality quirks demonstrated by otherwise healthy people.

The following words of Thomas Szasz, as written in 1973 in "The Second Sin," are of interest and instructive here.

> If you talk to God, you are praying; if God talks to you, you have schizophrenia. If the dead talk to you, you are a spiritualist; if God talks to you, you are a schizophrenic.

The Schizophrenic Society of Canada and its affiliate in the province of Quebec — AMI Québec — deserve great credit for the current public awareness campaign they are conducting. As well, these organizations deserve extensive moral and financial support across our nation.

I urge you all, honourable senators, to do what you can to raise the level of public attention to and the understanding of this tragic illness in the Canadian community at large. Schizophrenia can be controlled and treated following proper diagnosis and professional application of appropriate anti-psychotic medication. Our fellow citizens suffering from schizophrenia and its effects simply do not deserve to be ostracized and stigmatized by default because this illness is one that our Canadian society improperly fears and misunderstands.

FIREFIGHTERS OF NORTH AMERICA

TRIBUTES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few brief words about an organization the esteem for which cuts across all party lines. I am talking about the firefighters of Canada and the United States of America.

Members of the international association are doing most of the work in Oklahoma City to clean up that devastating, horrible and tragic incident. A number of the members of the International Association of Firefighters are here in Ottawa this week holding their Canadian legislative conference. Part of the conference is dedicated to meeting with various members of Parliament and consulting with them concerning the needs and wishes of the membership of the organization.

I had a chance to talk to them this morning, as have some other senators. The most dangerous aspect of firefighting is responding to incidents involving hazardous materials. Firefighters in Canada are especially hampered by a lack of available information concerning such incidents at the present time. Accurate, accessible information is crucial to saving lives and property at the scene, since the appropriate response for one hazardous material could prove catastrophic if another substance is present.

We have seen all sorts of chemical spills in the last five years in Canada. We have had incident after incident where railway freight cars were derailed, some of which have led to the evacuation of populations. In many cases, to move people to safety, the firefighter must go in, subjecting himself to the same real danger.

A variety of technologically advanced systems are available which enable firefighters to learn the exact nature of the hazardous materials present and provide guidance on responding to specific incidents. Such systems can be designed for both hazardous materials at stationery structures and hazardous materials in transit, whether it be by rail, air, road or marine.

The frequency of these incidents in the past five years points up the need for amendments to present legislation or a new bill to vastly improve the ability of our firefighters to identify dangerous goods and hazardous materials in transit. This issue, I know, would enjoy the support of all of senators.

There is a second problem. Exposure to infectious disease is another major reason why firefighting is one of the world's most dangerous professions. Much of the work of a firefighter involves going into a situation where someone is badly injured or unconscious. There is a high danger of infection to the firefighter who undertakes emergency medical treatment. Often they provide this treatment in unsanitary field conditions on patients about whom they know nothing, and in so doing are occupationally exposed to a variety of dangerous and contagious diseases. Firefighters who have been exposed to an infectious disease need to be informed of this fact so they can seek medical monitoring and modify their behaviour to avoid further transmission. The situation is all the more urgent because of the prevalence of AIDS in our community.

I invite the support of all members of the Senate for initiatives that will provide action and support for our firefighters, both in the area of infectious diseases notification and the identification of dangerous goods.

FIREARMS LEGISLATION

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, I rise today to address an issue that is causing considerable controversy across our land and one which I am certain many senators like myself find to be very challenging and confusing. I refer to the proposed firearms legislation which will be coming to us for consideration in the near future.

Honourable senators, rarely in political life do parliamentarians face such divided and deeply rooted opinions and such widespread misinformation and lack of information on both sides of the issue as has been exhibited across our land since Bill C-68 was introduced.

Personally, I have received over 800 written responses from Alberta alone as a result of my inquiries relating to this legislation, and this is not as a result of any planned lobby group, but an outpouring of viewpoints, focusing particularly on the gun registration requirements of the proposed legislation.

Let me say at the outset that I come to this issue with a bias against guns. I have never owned one and never will. I abhor violence of any kind, and any legislation that will reduce crime in a responsible and meaningful way will receive my unqualified support.

Canadians are deeply divided over the gun registration elements in Bill C-68. The Liberal caucus is deeply divided, as can be seen by the three members who voted against the bill, the three who abstained, and the 37 from the caucus who were absent. I regret, frankly, the punishment handed out to the dissenters in the Liberal caucus who were honourably representing their constituents, but that is another issue I do not intend to get into today.

Honourable senators, the outcry over this bill presents an important challenge to this chamber to understand and examine all its facets, both its merits and faults. It must not be examined on a partisan basis. Among the questions which need to be answered are: Is it needed, and is it right for Canada? We must not allow this bill to divide the country or bring disrespect to the law of our land.

To help honourable senators with the issue, I intend each day to rise during senators' statements to read into the record the views of members of the government with respect to the gun registration aspects of the bill. I hope that this exercise will help us all understand the varying views and opinions expressed by Liberal members of Parliament in the hope that their insights will help us in our subsequent deliberations.

I intend to be non-partisan and fair in my presentation. I personally have an open mind on the issue, and I trust that the same applies to all my colleagues in this chamber. I do hope that this intervention will assist honourable senators in achieving a greater understanding of this contentious legislation. Tomorrow I will read into the record some of the views of Minister Rock in support of the registration aspects of this bill.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION—PROPOSED ORDERS ON DIRECTIONS ON DIRECT-TO-HOME SATELLITE DISTRIBUTION AND ON PAY-PER-VIEW TELEVISION PROGRAMMING—DEPOSITED WITH CLERK OF THE SENATE

On Tabling of Documents:

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on April 26, 1995, two documents concerning proposed orders issuing directions to the CRTC on direct-to-home, or DTH, satellite distribution undertakings and on pay-per-view television programming undertakings were deposited with the Clerk of the Senate. This was done in compliance with Chapter II, section 8(1) of the Broadcasting Act and in compliance with our rule 28(1).

Pursuant to section 8(2) of the Broadcasting Act, the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications has an opportunity to examine these proposed orders. I know that Senator Oliver, the chairman of that committee, is interested in the issue and will be holding a business meeting with the committee this afternoon, where this matter will undoubtedly be discussed.

On behalf of all senators, I wish the committee well in its work.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

ANNUAL REPORT OF COMMISSIONER TABLED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the annual report of the Commissioner of Official Languages for the calendar year 1994.

NATIONAL PROTECTED AREAS STRATEGY

EXTENSION OF FINAL REPORT DATE—REPORT OF ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES

Hon. Pat Carney, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, presented the following report:

Tuesday, May 2, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources has the honour to present its

TWELFTH REPORT

Your Committee, which was authorized by the Senate on Wednesday, April 27, 1994, to undertake a study of the policy options available to the government to complete the network of pristine areas that represent Canada's natural regions and of the creation of a National Protected Areas

Strategy and to make recommendations thereon, respectfully requests that the date of presenting its final report be extended from June 29, 1995 to no later than March 31, 1996.

Respectfully submitted,

PAT CARNEY, P.C.
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Carney, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TAX CONVENTION ACT, 1984

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. John Sylvain, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Tuesday, May 2, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

SEVENTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill S-9, An Act to amend the Canada-United States Tax Convention Act, 1984, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of March 28, 1995, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN SYLVAIN
Deputy-Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Sylvain, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, May 3, 1995, at one thirty o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT BILL, 1995

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-69, to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions and the readjustment of electoral boundaries.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Graham, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 57(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—CONTINUATION OF MARKETING MONOPOLY—PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, I have a petition which reads as follows:

To the Senate in Parliament assembled. It reads:

We, the undersigned citizens of Canada, draw to the attention of the House the following:

That a very vocal minority of citizens are requesting Parliament institute a dual marketing system for wheat and barley to export.

Therefore, your petitioners request that Parliament continue to give the Canadian Wheat Board monopoly powers in marketing wheat and barley to export.

These petitioners are from the areas of Grenfell and Broadview in Saskatchewan.

FIREARMS LEGISLATION

REFUSAL BY HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMITTEE TO HEAR TESTIMONY OF RENOWNED FIREARMS EXPERT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, in order that Senator Graham will have additional work to do by way of further filings, I should like to propose a question.

The oft-quoted Red Book, which propelled the Liberal Party to office, in the chapter entitled "Governing with Integrity," speaks to the irritation of citizens with government that does not consult them, or disregards their views, or tries to conduct key parts of public business behind closed doors.

You will be comforted to know that I am not raising the issue of the Prime Minister's son-in-law in this question, at this point in time.

The section then concludes that open government will be the watchword of the Liberal program.

Open government obviously means government that listens to its citizens and gives them the opportunity to be heard. Honourable senators, I am concerned over the fact that, with respect to the firearms legislation, there is a question as to whether the public is getting an opportunity to make representations to Mr. Rock, as well as to the committee of the House of Commons.

Can the honourable leader advise us why an expert like Gary Mauser, Ph.D., from Simon Fraser University, a renowned expert on guns, author of many relevant papers including the Fraser Institute Paper, has not been allowed to speak before the House of Commons committee? Is it a matter of government policy? If you do not have the answer today, perhaps you would kindly advise us as to the actual rules on appearing before a government committee on matters of this importance?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend will appreciate that these hearings are taking place in the other place. As in this house, the activities of committees are within the purview of the committee itself. Nevertheless, I will certainly pass on the name of this gentleman to my colleagues and seek some response.

I do know that it is not the policy of the government to decide who will or will not be a witness before a parliamentary committee.

[ Senator Gustafson ]

CRITERIA AND SELECTION PROCESS FOR APPEARING AS WITNESS BEFORE COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, the chairman of that committee happens to be a Liberal, and the majority of the individuals on the committee are Liberals. Can we not regard their position as being related to government policy, since they decide who can and cannot appear before the committee?

Would the leader also please provide me with the criteria used in choosing witnesses for that committee, as well as a list of those who have made requests to appear before that committee and have been refused?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have two points to raise with my honourable friend. I would hope that the committees on the other side are managed by the majority party in that place with the same care, non-partisanship and openness as are the Senate committees. I will make the other inquiries as requested by my honourable friend.

Senator Ghitter: In response to that point of view, if we believe in open government, Canadians are being denied the opportunity of coming forward to that committee as well as to Mr. Rock to express their views. In the interests of non-partisanship and open-mindedness, it is important that the information be heard and that all Canadian citizens feel they can have an opportunity to be heard.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have taken note of the name of the individual mentioned by the Honourable Senator Ghitter. I will pursue the question for my honourable friend. I remind my friend, too, that we will have opportunities on this side of Parliament to examine the bill and to hear important witnesses with varying points of view from across the country.

TRANSPORT

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, I have a question which in some ways follows that of my colleague. My question deals with the diversion of some $26 million from the Nova Scotia-Government of Canada Highway Program. This money was allocated to upgrade the Wentworth Valley, a notoriously perilous strip of the Trans-Canada Highway. Funds have been diverted from this work to upgrade the Fleur-de-Lis Trail on Cape Breton Island. While that is a very worthwhile piece of work, it hardly measures up to the difficulty posed to users of the Trans-Canada Highway in Nova Scotia, particularly those who transit the Wentworth Valley region.

The provincial minister responsible for highways, Mr. Richard Mann, whose riding falls within the federal riding of Minister David Dingwall, has suggested to Nova Scotians, and has begun taking steps in this regard, that a private construction program calling for a toll road be implemented. It will be the first toll on the Trans-Canada Highway, all to satisfy Mr. Dingwall and offset the loss of funds.

This is an outrage not only to Nova Scotians but to all Canadians who have contributed to the development of a safe national highway of which we are generally very proud.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate make some inquiries of her colleagues to see whether, in retrospect, they could find some way to replenish those funds, to recall or withhold or even redirect funds in order to eliminate that perilous section of the Trans-Canada Highway which has claimed so many lives in recent years?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the honourable senator's question is a detailed one. It is very much connected to a part of the country with which I am not familiar. I would be pleased to take his question to my colleagues and to provide as complete a response as possible.

CANCELLATION OF EAST BLOCK TUNNEL PROJECT—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In a memo from the Senate's Director of Services dated April 11, 1995, senators were advised that the construction contract for the East Block-Centre Block pedestrian tunnel had, by ministerial direction, been cancelled and that negotiations are underway with the contractor regarding cancellation costs. Has this matter been resolved? At what cost? What amount was expended on this tunnel and its planning before cancellation?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as usual, I will take my honourable friend's question as notice and do my best to get an answer to him quickly.

ENVIRONMENT

MANITOBA—ORIENTED STRAND BOARD PLANT—POSSIBILITY OF HEARING BEFORE INDEPENDENT REVIEW PANEL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, in early December, Manitobans were concerned about a portion of their province equal in size to Prince Edward Island which had been handed over to a company known as Louisiana Pacific to harvest timber for the world's largest oriented-strand board plant. They wrote to the federal minister of the environment. They were most concerned that a licensing agreement had been signed without public review, without benefit of any environmental assessment, and urged federal intervention. To date, the Minister of the Environment has replied only with a letter of acknowledgement. The Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs has said he cannot call for a federal environmental assessment review.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: Will the minister directly address these very serious concerns to the Minister of the Environment and show the people of Manitoba that the new environment assessment laws, of which she approves, do not leave them defenceless and without the right to question the agreement before an independent review panel?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be pleased to raise this matter with my colleague Ms Copps.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have several responses to questions raised in the Senate. I have the response to a question raised in the Senate on February 22, 1995 by the Honourable Senator David Tkachuk regarding the definition of a tax loophole; the response to a question raised in the Senate on February 22, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Earl A. Hastings and by the Honourable Senator Lowell Murray regarding the incidence of tuberculosis; the response to a question raised in the Senate on March 21, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Norman Atkins regarding the purchase of Upholder class submarines; the response to a question raised in the Senate on March 22, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Consiglio Di Nino regarding the Immigration and Refugee Appeal Board; the response to a question raised in the Senate on March 22, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Janis Johnson regarding reform of child support systems; the response to a question raised in the Senate on March 23, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Gerald Comeau regarding the defence industry productivity program; the response to a question raised in the Senate March 23, 1995 by the Honourable Senator John Sylvain regarding peacekeeping tours of duty; the response to a question raised in the Senate March 23, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Janis Johnson regarding the implementation of a national child care strategy; the response to a question raised in the Senate on March 23, 1995 by the Honourable John Lynch-Staunton regarding the implementation of a national child care strategy; the response to a question raised in the Senate on March 28, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Richard J. Doyle regarding the National Health Forum; the response to a question raised in the Senate on March 29, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Erminie J. Cohen regarding the Port of Belledune; the response to a question raised in the Senate on April 4, 1995 by the Honourable Senator J. Michael Forrestall regarding the status of the cancellation of EH-101 related contracts; and the response to a question raised in the Senate on April 5, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Mira Spivak regarding the distribution of the study on plain packaging.

STATUS OF RRSP AS TAX LOOPHOLE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to a question raised by Hon. David Tkachuk on February 22, 1995)

The tax system follows the simple principle that, within clear limits, income set aside for retirement should be taxed when it is received, not when it is saved.

This principle has been followed ever since the income tax system was created during World War I. The same principle applies in most other industrialized countries.

In his Budget speech, the Minister of Finance affirmed the Government's commitment to this tax regime and to the need for fair limits on deductible contributions.

He said: "Providing tax assistance to encourage Canadians to save is an essential part of our retirement income security system. We are not prepared to compromise the integrity of purpose of that system."

He continued: "But equally, we must ensure that the benefits of tax assistance are shared fairly in these times of restraint, while also adhering to the key principles and purpose of pension reform."

To meet the latter test, the budget proposed a reduction in the pension and RRSP limits that will affect taxpayers earning over $75,000. It will ensure that tax assistance is provided only on earnings up to 2.5 times the average wage, as proposed under pension reform.

The budget also proposed measures to tighten some existing provisions. These included a reduction in the allowance for RRSP overcontributions from $8,000 to $2,000.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICE

INCIDENCE OF TUBERCULOSIS IN ONTARIO PENITENTIARIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Earl A. Hastings on February 22, 1995)

The policy of the Correctional Service of Canada (CSC) is that, as part of the inmate admission process, an active screening program for tuberculosis be conducted. Although CSC has no legal authority to conduct mandatory testing, correctional officials strongly encourage inmates to be tested, and ensure that all inmates are provided with the best medical information available.

If documentation is not available to determine that testing was completed in a provincial system, the Service provides skin testing (Mantoux), followed by chest X-ray if necessary, upon entry to the federal institution.

If an inmate refuses to be tested, the institutional physician makes a clinical judgement as to whether the inmate should be returned to general population or whether further action, such as isolation, is required as a precautionary measure.

CSC has also opted to provide annual re-testing of inmates with negative Mantoux (skin test). This allows identification of persons who may have had contact with the disease and are at risk of developing it.

CSC's policy on tuberculosis screening and treatment is consistent with, and has been approved by, the Laboratory Centre for Disease Control of Health Canada.

Tuberculosis screening programs are now in progress at Kingston Penitentiary for both staff and inmates. Offering treatment to those who are identified as infected with tuberculosis before they develop active disease will prevent those individuals from developing the form of tuberculosis which can be spread to others.

These screening programs are pro-active health programs designed to protect the health and well-being of participants. The current testing will provide valuable information to determine the rate of infection and to monitor any changes in the profile of the disease in the institution.

Information sessions on tuberculosis are being held for staff and inmates with experts from Health Canada and external medical consultants to discuss concerns and answer questions about personal health and to encourage participation in the screening program.

Only people with active tuberculosis can spread the infection to others. To date, there have been no confirmed active cases at Kingston Penitentiary. As of March 23, 1995, however, there are 5 presumed active cases at Kingston Penitentiary and 5 presumed active cases from other facilities in the Kingston area. Testing and analysis of the data will continue at Kingston Penitentiary to identify any active cases and to ensure that all affected staff and inmates receive appropriate medical treatment.

The testing of inmates in the Ontario Region is completed.

Health Canada, in conjunction with CSC, has embarked on an aggressive TB screening program for correctional staff at all institutions.

Assurance and advice from Health Canada officials has been given to the effect that there is no need for additional measures.

Correctional Service Canada and Health Canada have developed a National comprehensive approach to TB control and prevention in federal correctional institutions. The agreement calls for overall program coordination to be provided by a National Steering Committee composed of representatives from Health Canada and CSC and the Union of the Solicitor General Employees (USGE). An implementation plan is being developed to address all initiatives contained in the agreement. CSC is working closely with Health Canada and the USGE on this issue.

REFERRAL OF TUBERCULOSIS PROBLEM IN PENITENTIARIES TO MINISTER OF HEALTH—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Although Canada reports one of the lowest TB rates in the world, the Canadian TB rate abruptly stopped declining in 1987, ending decades of decrease. This change in trend has caused an intensive re-evaluation of the TB situation in Canada. From 1987 until 1992 (last national figures), the rate has stabilized at 7.2 to 7.4 cases per 100,000, i.e., 1,947 to 2,091 TB cases per year were reported.

The relatively low national TB rate obscures populations with high levels of TB infection. The Northwest Territories with its large aboriginal population reported the highest rate in 1992 (41.8 per 100,000) and Nova Scotia reporting the lowest rate (1.4 per 100,000).

A fundamental change has occurred in the risk groups for TB. In 1980, 49.4 per cent of TB cases occurred in non-aboriginal, non-foreign-born Canadians, 14.1 per cent in aboriginal Canadians, and 35.5% in the foreign-born. By 1992, only 25.3 per cent of cases occurred in non-aboriginal, non-foreign-born Canadians, 18.6 per cent in aboriginal Canadians and 53 per cent in foreign-born.

Fewer TB cases are now being reported in European immigrants and more cases are reported in Asian immigrants.

The estimated rate of TB in First Nation peoples is 8 to 10 times higher than the Canadian national rate.

TB rates are increasing among children in the 0-4 age group.

The number of individuals reported in Canada to have AIDS and active TB is small. However, the number of reported cases is underestimated. The Division of HIV/AIDS Epidemiology of LCDC reports that 4.1 per cent of reported Canadian persons with AIDS had a diagnosis of TB. British Columbia reports that 4.3 per cent of their identified AIDS patients have been diagnosed with active TB.

Canadians are at risk of developing drug resistant TB either because they have been partially compliant with treatment or because they have developed active TB after they were exposed to someone with drug resistant TB. Failure to recognize and isolate suspected TB cases and provide adequate anti-TB treatment has resulted in outbreaks of MDR TB in U. S. health care settings and correctional facilities among HIV-infected individuals and their care-givers. MDR TB has frequently and rapidly led to death in HIV-infected individuals.

To date, the number of cases of drug-resistant TB reported in Canada has been small, outbreaks of MDR TB have not been reported and there are no reports of individuals being co-infected with HIV and MDR TB. However, the possibility of MDR TB must always be considered in patients who were born in countries reporting high levels of drug-resistant TB or people who have lived or visited areas that have high levels of drug-resistant TB.

PURCHASE OF UPHOLDER CLASS SUBMARINES—COST TO GOVERNMENT

(Response to questions raised by Hon. Norman Atkins on March 21, 1995)

In the 1994 Defence White Paper, the government indicated its intention to explore the option to acquire four UPHOLDER diesel-electric submarines from the United Kingdom. This option is currently being explored and no decision will be made until the investigation is complete.

The actual cost of acquiring these submarines is still being investigated and as such, no accurate cost estimates can be provided at this time. As stated in the Defence White Paper, the UPHOLDER class submarines will only be acquired if it should prove possible to do so within the existing capital budget.

It is the intention of the government to explore the possible acquisition of diesel-electric powered submarines. There are no plans to investigate the acquisition of nuclear-powered submarines.

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD—QUALIFICATIONS OF NEW EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Fleury worked with CSIS for a period of two-and-a-half years as the Deputy Director of Human Resources and Official Languages.

He was sent to assist CSIS in the reorganization of their personnel functions.

Mr. Fleury was appointed to the IRB as administrator. He has thirty years of experience in the Public Service and will be working with the IRB as an administrator.

In all of the jobs he has held, Mr. Fleury has been involved with human resources.

The IRB is in need of skills in this area.

In preparing the biographical notes, the IRB included parts of Mr. Fleury's background that were most relevant to the position.

His entire resume, including his reference to CSIS was sent to the IRB. The preparation of the biographical note was done by the IRB.

REFORM OF CHILD SUPPORT SYSTEMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Government is currently reviewing the taxation of child support. The Supreme Court of Canada is also expected to release its decision on Thibaudeau in the near future.

The Minister of Justice released with provincial/territorial colleagues, the report of the federal/provincial/territorial Family Law Committee. Justice is currently consulting and receiving feedback on the proposals. It should be noted that the tax treatment is an integral part of the proposed child support formula.

Ministers of Justice, Human Resources Development, Finance and Status of Women Canada will be deciding shortly the timetable for the proposed reforms.

DEFENCE INDUSTRY PRODUCTIVITY PROGRAM— GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gerald J. Comeau on March 23, 1995.)

The DIPP Program is one of Industry Canada's continuing programs. However, there will be no new commitments made under DIPP in the foreseeable future.

DIPP will be the subject of Cabinet review in the context of technology development and the current fiscal reality. The government is well aware of the importance of these programs to the industry and to Canada.

With respect to DIPP, the Government can no longer afford to sustain it at current funding levels. To this end, Industry Canada officials will work with industry to identify innovative mechanisms whereby private sector funding could be leveraged to support research and development. It is expected that any new mechanisms recommended would be considered as part of the DIPP Cabinet review process.

LENGTH OF TOURS OF PEACEKEEPING FORCES— REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Major units on peacekeeping duties are rotated every six months. A six-month tour is considered to be the maximum time an individual, as part of a formed unit, should be removed from his or her family on an unaccompanied tour.

Canadian Forces Administrative Orders direct that individuals shall not normally be posted outside of Canada, without their dependants, within one year after returning from a previous unaccompanied tour. Normally, an individual shall serve three years in Canada between unaccompanied tours. An exception to the one year rule may be made by the National Defence Headquarters where an individual volunteers or service requirements exist.

At the present time, two battle groups are deployed continuously with UNPROFOR, in former Yugoslavia. Currently, the Land Force maintains a rotation base of 12 unites to support these deployments. The available units include six infantry battalions, three armour regiments and three artillery regiments.

The removal of the Airborne Regiment from the Canadian Forces Order of Battle will not affect the rotation base. The Airborne Regiment was tasked as the UN standby unit and while so tasked, remained in Canada for that purpose. In this role the Regiment could have been deployed for short-notice, short-duration deployments, such as Somalia. As a result, while it filled that role, the Regiment was not considered available for deployments to UNPROFOR. The task of UN standby unit will now be assumed, on a rotating basis, by a unit in the Land Force. At the present time the task is filled by the 1st Battalion, R22eR.

IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL CHILD CARE STRATEGY— GOVERNMENT POSITION

The federal government remains committed to the development of a child care program. It is true that the Red Book indicated the federal government would spend up to $120 million as their share of creating an expanded child care system. However, it is equally true that the Red Book commitment is based on a clear understanding of federal-provincial relationships and the knowledge that child care comes under provincial jurisdiction. The federal commitment was very exact in stating that they expected the provinces and territories to match this expenditure.

Every level of government is facing financial pressures and are being forced to find ways of improving the effectiveness of their services and the manner in which they are delivered.

Child care is a pivotal service in that it can support in a variety of ways the numerous financial and social objectives of governments. Child care allows parents to enter the labour force or to take educational and training courses that will improve their work skills.

Child care has an excellent track record of promoting child development and offering a variety of needed supports to the family. Consequently child care is an important tool to help alleviate and overcome child and family poverty.

Provinces and territories wish to consider the role of child care as part of their overall review before making specific proposals to the federal government.

Monies for the child care initiative are not specifically identified in the 1995-96 Main Estimates because funding will take place through the new Human Resources Investment Fund (HRIF). This fund is being created as a result of the review, consolidation and redirection of the Department's non-statutory funding programs. The fund initiatives will be focused on helping people find and keep jobs, combating child poverty and providing assistance to those who need it most.

The federal government remains steadfast in its commitment to child care and the monies required to implement the program are available within the fund. The amount spent on child care arrangements with provinces and territories will depend in part on the number interested in pursuing arrangements, and in the type and timing of the arrangements they seek.

The promises contained in the Red Book clearly stated that agreements with the provinces and territories would have to be reached and their financial commitment must match that of the federal government. The federal government is prepared to discuss financing arrangements with interested provinces and territories as they indicate that they are ready for discussion.

AMOUNT OF FUNDING AVAILABLE FOR CHILD CARE STRATEGY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

The Leader of the Opposition has based his comments on a statement attributed to the Prime Minister when he appeared on a Radio-Quebec program called "Droit de parole." What the Prime Minister actually said was that the federal government would fulfil its election promise to transfer $300 million to provinces in the coming years in order to create more child care spaces.

The Leader of the Opposition was correct in stating that the federal investment was to begin following a year of 3 per cent economic growth and that such would be the case this year, but not in his interpretation of the time frame for federal government investment. The period of investment as referenced by the Prime Minister during his television interview was not simply one year as suggested by the honourable senator. Furthermore, the government's child care commitment was predicated on agreement with provinces that have primary responsibility for the provision of such services. Provincial cooperation was to be an essential element of new investment arrangements.

While most provinces have expressed an interest in expanding and improving their child care systems, there is a reluctance on their part to commit to new investment.

This reluctance is understandable. All levels of government are attempting to put their financial houses in order. Most are reviewing existing programs to find ways of improving services and delivering them in the most cost effective way. Until these reviews are completed and until governments have a clearer picture of where they want to go, and what services they wish to support, decisions around child care or any other services will be deferred.

Despite this, the government remains committed to child care and will work with interested provinces and territories as they indicate that they are ready for discussion.

The actual amount spent on child care arrangements with provinces and territories will depend, ultimately, on the number of interested jurisdictions and in the type and timing of the arrangements they seek.

Federal funding for new joint investments with provinces and territories will be provided from the Human Resources Development Fund being created within the department of Human Resources Development, a fund referenced in the last budget.

UNDERUTILIZED INFRASTRUCTURE AT CANADIAN PORTS— NEED FOR PROPOSED NEW BERTHAGE AND CARGO SHEDS IN MINISTER'S RIDING

(Response to question raised by Hon. Erminie J. Cohen on March 29, 1995)

The Port of Belledune is managed by the Canada Ports Corporation which is a federal commercial Crown corporation. The port has two marine terminals which handle dry and liquid bulk cargoes for two primary users, Brunswick Mining and Smelting and the New Brunswick Power Generating Station. The port requires new facilities to handle forecast demands for bulk and general cargo.

After analyzing the traffic demand, the Canada Ports Corporation proposed the construction of a deep-water, multipurpose facility at an estimated cost of $32.2M. The proposal includes the construction of a 280 metre crib wharf, with a water depth of 11.6 metres at low tide, a 6500 $m^2$ shed and a paved open storage area of 6.5 hectares.

Construction is expected to begin in summer 1995 with completion by the end of 1997.

The new terminal will serve the industries of north-east New Brunswick and forecast cargoes include palletized gypsum, palletized fly ash, wood pulp, corrugated medium and lumber. It is estimated that traffic will total some 530,000 tonnes annually.

The project is a commercial decision by the CPC. It will be financed primarily through a $20.2M loan from the Canada Ports Corporation Interport Loan Fund, which is a fund established by Ports Canada ports to finance commercially viable capital projects. The balance of the funding will come from loans and non-recoverable contributions from federal government and the Province of New Brunswick through various federal/provincial/municipal agreements on economic development.

COMPENSATION FOR CANCELLED EH-101 CONTRACTS— GOVERNMENT POSITION

The Government and Unisys GSG Canada Inc. (formerly Paramax) reached a final settlement agreement on the Unisys claim arising from the cancellation of the EH101 Helicopter Program in December 1994.

The settlement agreement, which totals $166 million, includes the amount due to Unisys, its subcontractors and suppliers. Of this amount, $98 million is for work completed and paid for prior to termination. The balance, $68 million, is for work in progress at the time of termination and for termination related costs. It should be noted that only the $68 million portion of the settlement amount forms part of the $250 million set aside for program cancellation.

Negotiations with E.H. Industries, the second prime contractor, are ongoing. The outcome of these negotiations is not predictable at this time.

There are no other outstanding EH101 termination related claims.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT BILL, 1995

SECOND READING

Hon. Sharon Carstairs moved the second reading of Bill C-69, to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions and the readjustment of electoral boundaries.

She said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to speak in favour of Bill C-69, the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Bill, 1995. I should like to begin by reviewing the events that led to Bill C-69.

The current process of adjusting constituency boundaries by independent commissions has been in existence since 1964 when the Liberal government of Lester Pearson passed the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act for the very first time.

Before then, the House of Commons itself was responsible for electoral boundary readjustments, and the question impartially was rightly raised by the public. After some 30 years, the current process was in dire need of a thorough review and update. That is why the government suspended the ongoing process last year in order to allow for such a review.

That was not the first time that the work of boundaries commissions had been suspended.

[Translation]

Following the 1971 and 1981 censuses, the readjustment process was suspended in order to allow for the amendment of section 51 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which sets out the formula used to calculate the number of seats in the House of Commons, and to allow for some minor changes to the readjustment process.

[English]

In both cases, the process was suspended at a late stage when the House was considering the reports of the boundaries commissions.

The electoral boundaries readjustment process was also suspended in June of 1992 in order to give the government and Parliament time to reconsider the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform, otherwise known as the Lortie commission.

The special House of Commons committee on electoral reform, which was mandated to study the recommendations of the Lortie commission, issued two reports on electoral matters, one of which formed the basis of Bill C-114, which came into force on June 25, 1993.

[Translation]

The special committee had yet to examine the electoral boundaries readjustment process when Parliament was dissolved during the last election.

[English]

The electoral boundaries readjustment process started anew in September of 1993. Following the general election, the ongoing work of the boundaries commissions highlighted several problems with the current process. For example, boundaries commissions currently publish their initial proposals without having had a chance to obtain input from interested parties. In addition, although some commissions explain the reasons for the proposals, they are not required to do so. It is, therefore, difficult for a person who intends to make representations to a commission to know the reasons behind its proposals and to make objections or present alternatives in an effective manner.

Another problem is that the criteria used by the commissions in drawing the electoral maps are far too general. As a result, depending on the approach taken by each commission, the rationale for setting electoral boundaries can thus differ considerably from one province to another.

In light of these flaws, it is not surprising that the new electoral maps prepared by the current boundaries commissions were severely criticized by members of the public, by concerned municipalities and by members of Parliament, including members of various opposition parties. Moreover, it was obvious that the most opportune time to legislate changes to the current system would be early in the life of a new Parliament. That is why the government decided last March to introduce Bill C-18, the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Suspension Act, 1994, in order to suspend the ongoing process.

However, following the introduction of the bill, there was considerable concern that the proposed 24-month suspension would result in the next general election being held under the current set of ridings, rather than the new ridings based on the results of the 1991 census, if Parliament failed to legislate a new process during that suspension period. There was a particular concern that, in the absence of redistribution, Ontario and British Columbia would not get the extra seats to which they are entitled.

This concern was raised in the Senate. It was raised in British Columbia. It was raised at the biannual convention of the Liberal Party of Canada, which unanimously adopted a motion asking that the 1991 census boundaries be in place for the next election.

Although the government was proceeding quickly in reviewing the current process, it nevertheless took heed of the criticism and, recognizing that there should be a shorter deadline for adopting new legislation, moved an amendment in the Senate to reduce the suspension period from 24 months to 13 months. This would have guaranteed that new electoral boundaries based on the 1991 census would be in place by December 1997 at the very latest. That date, honourable senators, represented a government mandate of four years and two months.

During the past 35 years, every majority government has had a life span of at least four years and two months, so this amendment would have gone a long way to ensuring that the next regularly scheduled general election would be held on the basis of new 1991 census boundaries and that the provinces of British Columbia and Ontario would get the additional seats to which they were indeed entitled.

However, that proposal was rejected by the Conservative majority in this place, which is of course their right. Instead, the bill was amended in the Senate so that the activities of the commissions would be suspended only until February 6 of 1995. If new legislation were not adopted before that date, the commissions would be reactivated and would continue their work where they had previously left off.

Though the essence of the Senate's amendments was accepted by the government and by the House of Commons, on June 9, 1994 the date of February 6, 1996 was changed. That date did not offer sufficient time in which to complete all the stages necessary, in the government's view, for the adoption of new legislation by both Houses of Parliament.

For instance, the House of Commons, under its rules, was scheduled to be adjourned between December 16, 1994 and February 6, 1995. Consequently, that House would have been compelled to complete all of its work and send the legislation to the Senate by December 16, 1994, if there were to be any hope of meeting the deadline.

Although the House of Commons accepted our amendments, it proposed that the suspension end on June 22 instead of February 6. This modification was accepted by the Senate and, on June 15, 1994, Bill C-18 received Royal Assent.

[Translation]

Subsequently, the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs was given the task of reviewing the current process and improving it. The standing committee was also authorized to draft a bill giving effect to its recommendations.

[English]

The standing committee submitted its fifty-first report, including a draft bill, on November 25, 1994. The government considered the committee's proposals and brought forward Bill C-69, which is based on that report.

I think it is important for all of us to recognize that this is somewhat of a landmark bill. This bill came out of a committee; it was drafted by the committee, and it was accepted almost in its entirety by the government before it was introduced into the House of Commons.

I believe that this landmark decision by this committee, and by the government under the new House of Commons rules, implemented in February of 1994, may, indeed, give members of Parliament a new and very valuable function.

When I was in South Africa just a little while ago, one of the major discussions with the South African parliamentarians was the use of committees in the drafting of legislation. Could they do it and, if so, how could they do it? At that point in time, I must say, I did not have knowledge of this particular bill, which

I could have used to show that, in fact, it is a process still very much in its infancy in Canada and in the House of Commons, but I personally look forward to its further use in the future.

Some, such as the Reform Party, have argued that Bill C-69 does not significantly alter the current process, and therefore did not justify the suspension of the redistribution process last year. I do not believe that is the case. The standing committee successfully addressed the issues it was mandated to consider and proposed an improved electoral boundaries readjustment process.

Consider, for example, some of the more important changes that Bill C-69 would bring about: First, decennial redistributions will not be held in provinces where there has not been a significant population shift. The bill provides that boundaries commissions will no longer be established in provinces where the number of seats to which the province is entitled remains the same, and where none of the ridings vary by more than 25 per cent from the provincial quotient.

This is an important measure that will eliminate unnecessary redistributions and cut costs. For example, based on the results of the 1991 census, it is anticipated that there would be no redistributions in Saskatchewan, nor in my province of Manitoba or in Prince Edward Island. This would result in anticipated savings of roughly $1 million.

In addition, the bill would give those constituents living in those provinces a level of comfort with the constituency boundaries they presently have. Public criticism of the current process, highlighted by the frustration and inconvenience caused when ridings are changed for no apparent reason, would thus be eliminated. Constituents become accustomed to their ridings and, in the absence of important shifts in population, there is no valid reason to incur the cost and disruption of a redistribution. This is a perfect example of how Bill C-69 improves the current system.

The second major change is that Bill C-69 provides for quinquennial readjustments in addition to the current decennial redistribution. Quinquennial redistribution would take place in provinces where, following a quinquennial census, more than 10 per cent of the constituencies varied by more than 25 per cent from the provincial quotient. This would not affect the total number of seats in the house or the number of seats allotted to the provinces. It would, however, allow for the readjustment of boundaries within the designated provinces if there had been a significant population shift. By allowing for the readjustment of electoral boundaries on a five-year basis, the effects of major population shifts in certain provinces will be minimized.

Third, the appointment of boundaries commissions will be more transparent. The chair of each commission will continue to be appointed by the chief justice of the province. In appointing the other two commissioners, the Speaker of the House of Commons will have to publicize openings, solicit applications for positions, and consult widely before making appointments. These new requirements will make for a more open and, it is to be hoped, a more transparent process.

Fourth, more public participation will be encouraged. Bill C-69 requires that, at the beginning of the readjustment process, commissions publish a notice of population figures and also of their work plans, and invite submissions from the public. I am certain that this will encourage more public participation in the readjustment process.

In my own city, for example, the rivers form a very natural geographic boundary: The Red River goes north and south, and the Assiniboine goes east and west. It has always been of some confusion to Manitobans, and in particular to Winnipeggers, when constituencies bounce back and forth across the rivers, sometimes encompassing both sides of the river. It has always made more sense to consider the geographic highlights of the two rivers.

Fifth, the public will have alternate plans to consider. The bill requires boundaries commissions to prepare three alternate maps, instead of only one under the current process, showing how the ridings could be set out within the province. The commissions would indicate and justify their preferred options, giving reasons, but the other two additional maps would assist members of the public who wish to make submissions. I believe that these new requirements will favour more informed public debate and give the public a greater say in how ridings are devised in their province.

Sixth, a second set of public hearings can be held where necessary. When, in response to public comments, a commission makes changes to the proposed boundaries of a riding which would affect 25 per cent of the riding's population, Bill C-69 provides that a second set of public hearings would have to be held. This change recognizes and reflects the importance of public participation in the process.

Seventh, the discretion of the boundaries commissions to create ridings that go beyond the 25 per cent variance is limited. Recognizing that in exceptional circumstances there may be a need to allow for ridings that vary by more than 25 per cent from the provincial quotient, the bill maintains the authority of the boundaries commissions authority to create exceptional ridings.

Again, when I look at my own province, it is important for those of you who are familiar with Manitoba to realize that we have one riding, Churchill, which makes up two-thirds of the geographic area of the province. If we did not have a 25 per cent rule but accepted the 15 per cent rule recommended by the Lortie commission, the Churchill riding would make up 75 per cent of the geographical area of the province of Manitoba. It is already an extremely difficult constituency for any member of Parliament to represent adequately. If the geographic mass were increased, it would become that much more difficult.

However, the bill limits the exercise of that discretion to extraordinary circumstances where the population is more than 25 per cent under the provincial quotient and where the riding is isolated or not readily acceptable from the rest of the province. That certainly describes Churchill. In addition, the bill requires that the commission indicate the reasons for such a determination in its report. I believe that this will favour a responsible and consistent exercise of this discretion.

The eighth improvement is that the criteria to be used by commissions in drawing constituency boundaries are clearer. The bill sets out more detailed criteria to be used by the commissions in drawing the electoral maps, including community of interest, which is now clearly defined, manageable geographic size, and the probability of future population growth.

The ninth proposal which I think is worthy of notice is that the commissions' proposal will no longer be reviewed by a parliamentary committee. Considering that MPs should participate in public hearings like all other Canadians, the bill does away with the added scrutiny by a parliamentary committee of the boundaries commissions' proposal.

[Translation]

In the end, new ridings would come into existence more quickly than under current legislation. Bill C-69 provides that the process of electoral boundary readjustment would take a total of two years, that is, three months less than the current process.

[English]

By adopting Bill C-69 before the summer break, the Senate can thus ensure that new boundaries based on the results of the 1991 census will be in place by June of 1997, long before the next anticipated general election.

Honourable senators, this bill contains an impressive set of improvements that will result in a more open, effective and efficient process for readjusting electoral boundaries. The standing committee and the government have done a thorough job in bringing this bill forward, and Bill C-69 is a significant achievement.

I am confident that honourable senators will see fit to lend their support to this legislation.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, let me begin by thanking the sponsor of the bill, the Honourable Senator Carstairs, for having outlined so thoroughly and so well something of the background and history of this bill and its provisions.

She will perhaps not be surprised to learn that, on the basis of the same factual information which she has presented today, we on this side draw quite different — indeed, in some cases diametrically opposed — conclusions.

That being said, however, I do appreciate the clarity with which she has outlined the provisions of this bill, thereby saving me and the Senate some time in addressing its provisions in a detailed way.

There are three points that I wish to make at this stage of the bill. First, the improvements to the redistribution process contained in this bill are really quite insignificant when put forward as justification for trashing two years of work by the existing boundaries commissions and starting all over again and redoing the redistribution process of the 1990s. The honourable senator who sponsored the bill said that the government and the House of Commons committee had decided that the process was in need of a thorough review and update. I do not doubt that the process received a thorough review by the Commons committee. However, the changes proposed and the revisions to the act could hardly be described as extensive.

Second, there are some provisions in this bill which, in my opinion — and here again I differ with Senator Carstairs — are regressive. They are the result of a successful attempt by incumbent members of Parliament to tilt the process further in favour of retaining existing riding boundaries. Senator Carstairs sees considerable virtue in that. For my part, I believe that these provisions threaten to undermine the constitutionally protected right that each of us has as a citizen to a relatively equal share of voting power.

Third, I express disappointment that the Commons committee which drafted most of this bill and the government which has taken ownership of it have suffered such a failure of political will that they ducked two issues most conspicuously in need of reform. I refer to the 25 per cent maximum tolerance by which the population of a riding may deviate from the provincial quotient, a maximum which, in my opinion, should be reduced. I also refer to the need to limit the growth of the House of Commons. If either or both of those reforms had been contained in this bill, then it would be reasonable and proper to cancel the exercise of the 1990s and start all over again. As it is, there is no such justification in this bill.

Honourable senators, I wish to give you a very brief status report on the present boundaries commissions and where we stand. The boundaries commissions were appointed in September 1993. They drew up and published their preliminary maps. They had begun or were about to begin public hearings when Bill C-18 came along in the spring of 1994. Bill C-18, as honourable senators know, would have wiped out the whole process at that point. Thanks to the stand taken by the Senate on Bill C-18, the boundaries commissions completed their public hearings late last spring or early summer, and some time later they brought in the revised maps.

I wish to say something about that revision process. Senator Carstairs stated that there had been severe criticism of the preliminary maps brought in by the commissions. I think we all know where it came from. The criticism within the Liberal caucus is what gave rise to Bill C-18. Be that as it may, I invite honourable senators to take a look at what has happened since the preliminary maps were published. Public hearings were held. On the basis of those public hearings, very extensive revisions were made to the preliminary maps. I am informed, for example, that in the province of Ontario, the boundaries of 76 ridings were changed between the first map-making and the second. In Quebec, more than half of the ridings were changed in the revisions. In British Columbia, all but five of the riding boundaries were changed. I am aware of important changes that were made in Nova Scotia respecting Cape Breton and also the western end of the province.

The process that was put in place 30 years ago, the arm's-length, independent, objective process, providing, as it does, for public hearings, proved its worth again in the 1990s, as it has for the past 30 years.

Senator Murray: In the present process, 60 days are allowed for a House of Commons committee to discuss the revised maps, and a further 30 days are provided for the commissions to consider what was said in the House of Commons committee debate. It remains that we are 90 days away from the proclamation of final maps. We are being asked in Bill C-69 to trash the whole process and to go to the trouble and the expense of appointing new commissions, making new maps and having new hearings all over again. That is what we are being asked to do in Bill C-69. I ask you, what possible justification is there for taking this extraordinary step?

Senator Carstairs has mentioned some of the changes to the process. First, there is a change to the process of appointing the commissions. The present law provides that a judge will be the chairperson of each commission. There is no change there. The present law provides that the Speaker of the House of Commons will appoint the other two members of each commission. There is no change there. The only change is that before the Speaker appoints his two members, he has to call for applications from the public. He receives the applications, considers them and then makes his appointments.

Let me quote the provision:

> 9(5) The Speaker of the House of Commons shall make the appointments referred to in subsection (4) from among the applications referred to in subsection (2) that are received by the Speaker or from among such persons as the Speaker deems suitable.

I draw your attention in particular to the last part of that provision.

To say that this change is marginal is to dignify it. The fact that the Speaker can appoint whomsoever he pleases, regardless of the applications he has received, indicates how meaningless that change can be.

• (1510)

By the way, there is a provision in the present law requiring that you must be resident in the province for which the commission is appointed in order to be appointed a member of that commission. There is no such stipulation in Bill C-69. I prefer to believe that this was a mere oversight by the drafters of the bill, rather than that the government had anything sinister in mind. However, it is an important point, and we will want to have an official explanation before we finally dispose of this bill. It is a matter of detail, but a matter of important detail. Of course, it can be corrected by the Senate by way of a simple amendment. In that connection, I cannot forbear to remark that this is exactly the kind of correction that could be brought to a bill if the government would come to its senses on the question of pre-study. However, that is a matter for another day.

The other change — and this was described in more detail by Senator Carstairs — is the change to the way the commissions will operate. Presently, the commission is appointed, maps are drawn up, public hearings are held, revised maps are brought in. There is 90 days for parliamentary consideration and review thereof, and final maps are proclaimed.

Under Bill C-69, the commission will be appointed. The commission will put out a public notice with population figures indicating how they intend to go about their work. Written submissions are invited for 30 days. Then, three alternate maps in each province are brought forward, and the commission must indicate which is its preferred option. Public hearings are held, and then a final map is brought in. If the final map differs radically from the maps that were on the table in the first round, then there is a provision, as Senator Carstairs pointed out, for a second round of public hearings.

Honourable senators, these changes may well turn out to be more constructive than cumbersome, although cumbersome they are. I have no difficulty in supporting them. I hope they work. I support them on the basis of their stated objective, which is to increase transparency and to increase public participation in the process.

However, the question remains — and for the Senate it is the pivotal question here — whether the changes proposed in Bill C-69 are so profound, so fundamental, and so far-reaching as to warrant starting this process all over again for the decennial redistribution of the 1990s. I remind the Senate that, not only is there an expense of $5 million or $10 million involved here, there was considerable inconvenience to hundreds of Canadians across the country who came out or sent briefs to the boundaries commissions that met. Their representations, as I indicated earlier, were of some effect. Many revisions were made by the boundaries commissions in their second map.

I wish to draw the attention of honourable senators to two constructive changes made in the bill. One is the quinquennial census that would take place. It would not affect the number of seats to which a province was entitled but would result in a readjustment of boundaries in any province in which there had been dynamic population shifts between the time of the decennial census and the quinquennial census five years later.

The other change that I regard as quite constructive is the one that eliminates the parliamentary stage. I do not believe that members of the House of Commons are entitled to any more voice in this process than other citizens. I welcome that change in the bill. It is a welcome exception to the general orientation of this bill, which, as I indicated earlier, is to reinforce existing riding boundaries and thereby, in my opinion, undermine the concept of relative equality of voting power.

I ask honourable senators to bear with me for a few minutes on this subject. Experience shows us that there is a presumption, obviously, in favour of existing riding boundaries. The boundaries commission has to start somewhere, and it is going to start with the existing riding boundaries. It was not necessary for the government to instruct the House of Commons committee, as it did in the mandate, to consider whether the boundaries commission should start on the basis of existing riding boundaries. I think it is obvious that they do that already. The members of the House of Commons committee were quick to rise to the occasion and quick to grab the opportunity to load the process further in favour of existing riding boundaries, and they have an obvious conflict of interest in this respect.

Bill C-69 loads the process in favour of existing ridings in two ways. First, there will be no decennial redistribution in any province which has the same number of seats as it was entitled to at the previous census and in which none of the ridings deviate by more than 25 per cent from the provincial quotient. Senator Carstairs sees a great deal of virtue in this provision. Indeed, she welcomes a provision which will result in there being no redistribution in the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, as well as Prince Edward Island, on the basis of the 1991 census.

I wonder whether the sponsor of the bill, the Honourable Senator Carstairs, who represents the province of Manitoba and the city of Winnipeg in this place, has considered the implications of that for her province. I believe this provision illustrates why the 25 per cent maximum tolerance is excessively generous and ought to be lowered. You will have ridings bumping up against the 25 per cent limit and, yet, no remedy because there will have been no redistribution. Let me take the example of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. Manitoba will have 14 seats as a result of the 1991 census, the same number as it had after the 1981 census, but there have been noticeable shifts in population within the province of Manitoba between 1981 and 1991. Those population shifts led the boundaries commission for Manitoba to redraw the maps in such a way that the Winnipeg area, which has 60 per cent of the population of Manitoba, would have eight seats and the rest of the province six. That is what the boundaries commission for Manitoba recommended. Public hearings were held, and the boundaries commission for Manitoba stayed with that recommendation in their revised maps.

If Bill C-69 goes through, not only will those maps be cancelled, but there will be no new redistribution in Manitoba. Redistribution commissions will be appointed in seven provinces, but Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Prince Edward Island will have no redistribution. At the present rate of population change, by 1997, which is the most likely election date, Winnipeg South would be 32 per cent above the quotient; Winnipeg North would be 28 per cent above the quotient; St. Boniface would be 22 per cent above, while Dauphin—Swan River would be 22 per cent below the quotient; Winnipeg—St. James would be 16 per cent below; and Lisgar—Marquette would be 19 per cent below. The populations in those ridings in Manitoba will range from about 63,000 in Dauphin—Swan River to 107,000 in Winnipeg South.

I am curious whether honourable senators from Manitoba really intend these results from this legislation. It is true that, thanks to the provision for a quinquennial redistribution, these discrepancies are such that they will trigger such a quinquennial redistribution in Manitoba after the 1996 census. However, that redistribution will not take place in time to affect the next election. There will be serious and growing disparities in the province of Manitoba beyond the next election.

In Saskatchewan, the situation is not quite as dramatic. The shifts in population have not been as drastic. However, the shifts were important enough to warrant a redistribution when the boundaries commission met. Because of the shifts in population, the boundaries commission recommended the creation of four mixed urban-rural ridings in each of the Regina and Saskatoon areas to reflect the changes in population which had occurred between 1981 and 1991. To some extent, it was perhaps an attempt to anticipate the changes which would take place over the next few years.

The Saskatchewan maps, too, will be scrapped. There will be no redistribution, no commission appointed under Bill C-69 for the province of Saskatchewan. As a result, by 1997, Saskatoon-Clark's Crossing will be 27 per cent above the quotient; Saskatoon-Dundurn, 22 per cent above; Kindersley, 19 per cent below and MacKenzie 20 per cent below.

Contrary to the view expressed earlier today by the sponsor of the bill — let me say this, honourable senators — there is a national census every 10 years. There ought to be a redistribution commission appointed in every province every 10 years. That redistribution commission should take an objective look at the situation with a view to reinforcing relative equality of voting power. Maps should be produced; public hearings should be held. If, as a result of that process, it is determined that minimal changes ought to be made to existing boundaries, or that no changes at all should be made — and that was the case with Prince Edward Island this time — then so be it. That result will have been the outcome of a proper process.

However, it should not be possible, as it will be under Bill C-69, to simply cancel any redistribution process in a province on the basis of an arbitrary, mathematical criterion, especially one as excessively generous as the 25-per-cent rule.

There is another way that the House of Commons committee and the government are trying to tilt this process in favour of existing riding boundaries. They are writing into this bill provisions which will have the effect — and can only have been intended to have the effect — of undermining the application of the principle of relative equality of voting power.

They start off innocently enough in clause 19(1), where it is stated as a guiding principle that "effective representation" be the paramount consideration in drawing up riding boundaries. They then go on to stipulate that the population of each riding:

> ...shall, as closely as is reasonably possible, correspond to the electoral quota for the province....

So far so good, honourable senators. Then we get to clause 19(2)(b), where they instruct the commissions to consider a number of criteria in determining reasonable electoral district boundaries. They mention community of interest, a manageable geographic size, and the probability of a substantial increase in the population of a riding in the next five years. There is no objection to those criteria.

Then, in clause 19(2)(c), they give this instruction to the boundaries commissions:

> (c) the commission shall recommend changes to existing electoral district boundaries only where the factors considered under paragraph (b) —

— those are the criteria I mentioned —

> — are sufficiently significant to warrant such a recommendation.

Honourable senators, that clause is intended to modify further the principle of relative equality of voting power. It has the potential to frustrate that principle. When you combine that with the 25-per-cent maximum tolerance, the law states that less and less importance is to be attached to relative equality of voting power. More and more importance is to be attached to existing riding boundaries and various other criteria. As a layman, I must say, I wonder about the constitutionality of a provision of that kind.

What justification is there for an explicit bias in the law towards existing riding boundaries? With all due respect to our friends in the House of Commons, they have to be reminded that the redistribution law and the redistribution process are not intended primarily to serve the interests of incumbent members and their political organizations. There are more important principles and more important values to be respected in this process.

This attempt did not begin yesterday, nor did it begin with the present majority government in the other place. In fact, it has been going on for some time. This is another attempt to chip away at the principles of "rep. by pop." and of relative equality of voting power. It seems to me that members of Parliament who are concerned about the democratic system and its credibility and committed to its vitality should want to reinforce these principles rather than see to their erosion.

I mentioned a minute ago the constitutionality of this provision. I just want to share with honourable senators a couple of sentences from Madam Justice Beverly McLachlin when she sat on the bench of the British Columbia Court of Appeal. Granted, she was speaking about a situation in the British Columbia electoral map. In any event, I share this paragraph with you:

> It is impossible to justify many of the inequalities of the current British Columbia electoral map on the basis of other factors. While history probably plays a large part in many of the boundaries, the Attorney-General does not assert that history alone justifies anomalous populations within electoral districts; there are better ways of fostering a sense of history among people of different regions than perverting the electoral process.

In the same vein, honourable senators, I think it is regrettable that the Commons committee missed an opportunity, given in the mandate from the House, to deal with limiting the growth of the House of Commons. As matters now stand, there will be 301 seats in the House of Commons at the time of the next election. After the census of 2001, there will be 309 members. After the census of 2011, there will be 314 members. The Commons committee suggested that another committee be appointed down the road to look into this matter. I am the first to agree that this is a complex matter and factors such as the Senate floor provision are very difficult to change. The so-called Senate floor now maintains the representation of two provinces — Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick — somewhat higher than they would otherwise be. This provision can only be changed by constitutional amendment requiring unanimous consent of the provinces.

The Senate floor provision which, as I have said, now protects two provinces, was overtaken in 1985 by another amendment which provides that no province shall have fewer seats than it had after the 1970s redistribution. That amendment protects five other provinces at a level of representation somewhat higher than they would otherwise have, those being Quebec, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland.

The Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing said that the guarantee that no province's seats will ever fall below the number it had in 1976 cannot be justified with reference to any principle of representation. That provision could be changed by amendment to, I believe, section 51 of the Constitution by Parliament acting alone. No provincial consent is required.

Some provinces would lose seats, as I have indicated, but there are ways of cushioning the loss, short of sticking with the 1985 amendment. I think that that would be acceptable if pursued as part of an objective of limiting the growth in the House of Commons because, in my humble opinion, public opinion would respond quite positively to even modest steps taken in the direction of limiting the growth of the House of Commons.

Honourable senators, I believe that the disposition, certainly on this side of the house in Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, is to let this bill go to committee right away, unless some other honourable senator wishes to speak at second reading. That being said, I hope it is clear that we have quite considerable reservations about this bill. While realizing that there are time pressures associated with the bill, we do look forward to canvassing those reservations in the committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Carstairs, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

SECURITY AND INTELLIGENCE

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING SENATE COMMITTEE— DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Kelly, calling the attention of the Senate to the desirability of considering at this time the establishment of a Standing Senate Committee on Security and Intelligence. — (Honourable Senator Kelly).

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I think it is time for me to close the debate on this inquiry.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to remind you that if Honourable Senator Kelly speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on this inquiry.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I will be brief. I want to thank Senator Corbin for his intervention on this debate. I have always thought that the more we discuss these issues, the more we both demystify our security intelligence apparatus and come to grips with its relevance in today's world.

In closing the debate, allow me to review certain events which have occurred since I initiated this inquiry on February 14. Of course, there has been the shocking and tragic Oklahoma City bombing and the inevitable copycat bombings from California to Charlottetown. They have demonstrated once again that no one, anywhere, is immune from the senseless scourge of terrorism.

Oklahoma City was also a manifestation of a growing but particularly insidious and dangerous form of terrorism described as right-wing terrorism. Right-wing terrorism raises a panoply of new issues. It is domestic in origin and base. It arises not out of exotic foreign conflicts, but out of home-grown, economic and social issues. The ground on which it is nurtured is the middle class, your neighbours and mine. Right-wing terrorism is nurtured by the cleavages caused by the erosion in economic status and prospects that manifests itself in extreme anti-government feelings, ethnic and racial hatreds, et cetera. The line between right-wing terrorism and criminality is hard to define.

As the Senate terrorism committee observed, the police and security intelligence agencies have historically been more attentive to foreign and left-wing terrorism than to right-wing terrorism. Our knowledge base and our counter-measures — in other words, our overall readiness to respond — are, therefore, less developed.

Lest someone claim that Canada is immune from such things, Warren Kinsella — no relative of the Honourable Senator Kinsella — a recognized Canadian authority on right-wing terrorism, writes:

> Across Canada, in every region, in almost every town and city, the web of hate continues to spread.

I also wish to point out that in January, 1995, CSIS, through a remarkably prescient public report, forecast incidents such as the Oklahoma City bombing. The report pointed to the increasing threat from right-wing domestic groups and indicated that likely targets were non-military, non-diplomatic government buildings. The report suggested that car bombings similar to that used at the World Trade Centre presented the most likely scenario. I summarized the major findings of that report in a speech I made here on March 22. The CSIS report received no media coverage. Ironically, after the Oklahoma City bombing an excellent B'nai Brith report, which reached essentially the same conclusions, received considerable media attention.

Since my last remarks, we have also had the "discovery" by the media of Mr. Grant Bristow after SIRC stated to a committee in the other place that it did not know where Mr. Bristow was.

Finally, since my last remarks, the government has moved to bring the Communications Security Establishment under independent review.

My points, honourable senators, in conclusion are these: First, the threat of terrorism has not waned. Instead, it has metamorphosized into a different but potentially more dangerous form from which Canadians are not immune.

Recent events have demonstrated that, in many ways, CSIS at least is ahead of events in its threat assessments. What we do not know is to what extent those threat assessments are communicated and acted on throughout the government.

Lamentably, SIRC has not, at least in the public mind, covered itself with laurels as an effective and credible external review body during the tortuous meanderings of the "Heritage Front affair." Rightly or wrongly, SIRC may be beyond redemption as a politically and publicly credible review agency.

Finally, while the CSE is being brought under a review mechanism, accountability to Parliament has not been improved, nor have the remaining dozen or so organizations that constitute the federal security intelligence establishment been brought under external review.

For these reasons, I persist in the belief that we do require a parliamentary review mechanism with a mandate similar to the one I set out on February 14. For the reasons put forward by Senator Corbin during his speech on April 4, I persist in the belief that the Senate is the appropriate home for such a mechanism.

MOTION RESPECTING HUMAN RIGHTS IN CHINA AND TIBET— ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Di Nino, seconded by the Honourable Senator Keon:
> That the Senate urge the Government of Canada to express concern over continuing reports of violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms in China and particularly Tibet by local, provincial and national authorities and severe restrictions on the rights of citizens to freedom of assembly, association, expression, religion, as well as to due legal process and fair trial; and
> That the Senate urge the Government of Canada to encourage the People's Republic of China to take further measures to ensure the observance of all human rights, including the rights of women and children, and to improve the impartial administration of justice; and
> That the Senate request the Government of Canada to encourage the government of the People's Republic of China to allow foreign delegations to Tibet to study the human rights situation, the state of religious freedom, the status of women, the treatment of Tibetan children and prison conditions; and

That the Senate urge the Government of Canada to extend support to Tibetan people in their struggle to regain their freedom and the presentation of their culture; and

That the Senate encourage the Government of Canada to support the non-violent efforts of his holiness, the Dalai Lama, to resolve the issue of Tibet, particularly the Dalai Lama's campaign to make Tibet a zone of ahimsa, non-violence, through demilitarization and the protection of Tibet's natural environment; and

That the Senate implore the Government of Canada to ask the Chinese authorities to commence negotiations with his holiness, the Dalai Lama, and to the Tibetan government in exile and representatives of the People's Republic of China on the future of Tibet without preconditions. — (Honourable Senator Perrault).

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Honourable Senator Perrault when he intends to address this motion.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: That is one of the better kept secrets, honourable senators. The subject is being researched now. I will be delighted to apprise the honourable senator of the scheduled date of my speech in due course.

Senator Di Nino: That sounds like I will have to wait forever.

Senator Perrault: No, honourable senators; this is an important subject. I never wait "forever" when it comes to matters of human rights.

Senator Di Nino: I look forward to the response of the honourable senator.

Order stands.

TRANSPORT

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—MOTION TO STRIKE SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO PRIVATIZATION CONTRACTS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by the Honourable Senator Berntson:

That a special committee of the Senate be appointed to examine and report upon all matters concerning the policies and negotiations leading up to, and including, the agreements respecting the redevelopment and operation of Terminals 1 and 2 of Lester B. Pearson International Airport and the circumstances relating to the cancellation thereof;

That seven senators, designated by the Committee of Selection no later than two weeks after adoption of this motion, act as members of the special committee, and that three members constitute a quorum;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee have the power to sit during adjournments of the Senate;

That the committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical, stenographic and such other staff as deemed advisable by the committee;

That the committee have power to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings; and

That the committee present its final report to the Senate no later than one year following the striking of the committee.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I rise today to respond to the motion introduced in this place by the Leader of the Opposition to set up a special committee of the Senate to inquire into the whole issue surrounding the proposed redevelopment of infrastructure and services at Pearson International Airport.

As colleagues on both sides of the house will know, this issue has been before Parliament since Bill C-22 was introduced in the House of Commons on April 13, 1994. It has been before the Senate in one way or another since that legislation first appeared here on June 16, 1994.

To say the least, it is a tangled web which spreads over some six years, involving a broad area of private business interests, public servants, politicians and many lawyers. It involves the former government, which negotiated the deal, and the current government and its policy to cancel that deal and come up with a new arrangement to make the changes necessary to maximize opportunities for a great airport and the people whom it serves. It also involves a potential liability to Canadian taxpayers of several hundred million dollars.

This potent mixture of competing and conflicting interests and vast amounts of money, not surprisingly, has resulted in controversy and anger, in harsh words and bitterness on all sides, and in an overwhelming frustration that the object of the whole exercise — the airport itself — is suffering and falling behind.

When Senator Lynch-Staunton introduced this motion he said:

> I want to make it clear at the outset, honourable senators, that it is with little enthusiasm that I rise to ask support for this motion.

Honourable colleagues, today, whatever else our differences may be, I thoroughly agree and share with him that lack of enthusiasm. Clearly, this is not our initiative.

Senator Lynch-Staunton also said:

> Let me be absolutely clear and unequivocal about one thing. Whatever the ultimate fate of Bill C-22, it in no way has any bearing on the motion before us, as far as this side is concerned. Our challenge to the bill is on constitutional and legal grounds....There is, in our minds, absolutely no connection between Bill C-22 and the motion, and anyone suggesting one is barking up the wrong tree...

Honourable senators, I share that conviction with the Leader of the Opposition and repeat, as I have so often in this house, that I continue to retain a stubborn optimism that we can resolve outstanding issues on Bill C-22 and reach an accommodation among ourselves that will result in its passage as soon as possible.

The Leader of the Opposition succinctly described this motion as striking a special committee which would examine the policies behind his government's preparing a request for proposals for Pearson airport, the bidding process, the negotiations, the agreements themselves, their cancellation and, perhaps, from his point of view just as important, some critical statements with which he and his colleagues take considerable offence. That is what is before this house today.

Honourable senators, we on this side will not oppose this motion.

Senator Fairbairn: We will engage fully and actively in the committee study. We are in a minority in this house and in all of its committees. We will take our responsibilities seriously to ensure that the process is fair and balanced. We will seek to help to produce a result which will clear the air surrounding the Pearson airport issue. If it requires a year, so be it. If it can be concluded sooner, so much the better for everyone concerned. We on this side have a strong commitment to make sure that the taxpayers of this country have the greatest possible degree of protection in this dispute.

Honourable senators, as many of you have observed, it has taken some time for me to respond to this motion. It has not been a question of stalling, something which I think was recognized by Senator MacDonald at one point. Rather, it has been a question of studying very carefully the motion itself and trying to develop a realistic idea of what will be involved in this exercise. This is an intricate and complicated file. It must be pursued with care so that the wide-ranging objectives contained in the motion can be explored fully in order to achieve an understanding of the changes over the last six years which have resulted in concerns, in confusion, in controversy and in cancellation.

I do not intend to spend much time going over the ground that I have covered before in a speech in this house, as well as the answers I have provided in many, many Question Periods. We all know that this issue exploded during the election campaign of 1993. At the heart of that explosion was a fundamental objection that a deal of this size and this nature had been signed and sealed in the heat of the campaign rather than waiting a few more days for a new government — whatever its label — to deal with it and with the questions which had been raised outside the partisan glare of the election process.

Had that occurred, honourable senators, we might not have this motion before us today. However, in life and in politics, you cannot go back. Thus, we move ahead. We make sure that this particular exercise is carried out in a manner that maintains the credibility of this house in keeping with the strong tradition of the Senate committee system.

The special committee will be guided by the reference honourable colleagues opposite seek to have adopted. That reference calls for the Senate Committee of Selection to designate, within two weeks of the adoption of the motion, seven senators as members of the special committee. The reference then declares the powers that it seeks. The traditional words are familiar, but it is perhaps worthwhile to note the wide scope of their application on this particular issue.

The motion would give the committee the power to send for persons, which is a regular thing for a committee to do. This would include both current and former public servants, current and former Privy Councillors and people involved with the airport from the private sector. It would include the business people, the lawyers, the consultants and the lobbyists who were involved in the agreements or who have knowledge about them. The reference asks that the committee have the power to send for papers and records. Again, those are traditional things for a committee to do.

Honourable senators, there are over 100,000 documents dealing with the Pearson airport issue in the possession of the federal government. Undoubtedly, thousands of documents relevant to the matter are in the private sector in the files of various lawyers, business people, corporations, consultants, lobbyists, or even independent researchers. They would perhaps be of interest to the committee. This could also involve various municipal governments of the greater Toronto region, an area of relevance to the committee.

The reference also proposes that the committee have the power to examine witnesses under oath. I must confess that I do not know exactly why that is specified in the motion, because it is my understanding that section 10 of the Parliament of Canada Act already gives all Senate committees the power to administer an oath to any witness. I do not recall other occasions on which the Senate has formally included this power in a reference to a committee. However, it is there and it is an important part of the reference as well.

The reference also proposes that the committee have the power to sit through adjournments of the Senate. In view of the obvious magnitude of the task being assigned to it, the committee's members will have a special challenge, being active during scheduled adjournment periods.

The reference also states that the committee have the power to retain the services of professional and such other staff as deemed advisable by the committee. That is reasonable. In view of the complexity of the issue, the committee may find it desirable to consider retaining the services of legal counsel to ensure balance and fairness. Perhaps more than one counsel will be required.

Also, since so much of the discussion and the paperwork around the Pearson airport agreements involves complex financial matters, there could be a requirement for the services of an investigative auditor or forensic accountant, whatever the current word is.

Honourable senators, all in all, with this simple term of reference there is an enormous task ahead. I know, and the Leader of the Opposition made it clear in his remarks when introducing this motion, that this study is being conducted against a background of resentment on the part of colleagues opposite to statements made by some government spokespersons.

Honourable senators, on Parliament Hill we live in a political environment unlike any other in the country. Heated disagreements and actions very often provoke heated rhetoric which reverberates well beyond the corridors of this place. That is certainly not new to this house, and I can assure honourable senators that a number of regrettable actions and remarks from former government voices in recent years prompted very strong feelings of indignation among my colleagues when we were on the opposition benches. However, in all of these circumstances, the work of the Senate must go on.

The challenge of this special committee will be to maintain a process that is open, fair and thorough, to get the job done. In that respect, I refer to a clear and, I must say, reassuring statement by Senator Lynch-Staunton in a recent interview in which it was suggested that there might be some scepticism about the committee because it would be dominated by a majority from the opposition. He said the members:

> ...would have to bend over backwards to be unpartisan. We'll give everyone a chance to testify and make sure the report is fair to everyone.

Honourable senators, we on this side will do our part.

In concluding his introduction of this motion, Senator Lynch-Staunton quoted from Othello. I offer Hamlet. In Act I, Scene 3, Polonius sends Laertes out into the world with these words:

> This above all: to thine own self be true,
> And it must follow, as the night the day,
> Thou canst not then be false to any man.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, many of us on this side welcome the support of the Leader of the Government for this motion. Indeed, a tangled web it is. How much better it would have been had the government not refused to set up an independent inquiry to inquire into all aspects of the Pearson contracts.

However, we welcome the support of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, such that the Senate at least will not only be seen to be doing its duty, but indeed will to the best of its ability do its duty.

In that context, the question must be asked: Why is it imperative that the Senate act if the government has determined this matter not to be worthy of investigation? The answer to that question, honourable senators, flows directly from one's view of the role and function of this chamber in Canada's central Parliament.

From a review of the Confederation documents it can be concluded that the purposes of the Senate are, yes, to review legislation, but also to protect minorities and interests.

The Senate provides an institutional voice to small governments and perhaps to minority groups against the popular majority of the lower house. Indeed, we need look no further than the words of Sir John A. Macdonald who put forward a clear vision of the role of the Senate as a check on the power of the House of Commons when he said, during the Confederation debates of 1867:

> There would be no use of an upper house, if it did not exercise, when it thought proper, the right of opposing or postponing the legislation of the lower house. It would be of no value whatsoever were it a mere chamber for registering the decrees of the lower house.

• (1600)

It is, honourable senators, the role of this chamber to protect minorities, to be the protector of the people of Canada. Against what? Against the abusive exercise of power by the executive and by the House of Commons. That is why the Senate must act in this instance under the circumstances of the government failing to act.

It was Edmund Burke, who in a speech delivered in 1771 stated:

> The greater the power, the more dangerous the abuse.

A corollary of this statement would seem to then be, "The greater the need for a check on the abuse of power."

How can the Senate act to rein in the abuse of power? It has, as we know, a scrutiny of legislation role which it has exercised in relation to Bill C-22. The subject matter of Bill C-22 has become one of those cases where the exercise of political power by the cabinet has not been bridled or reined in by members of the other place.

Faced with what a December 15, 1994 editorial in The Globe and Mail described as "...one of the most arbitrary and arrogant pieces of legislation to come before Parliament in recent memory," members of the other place, not once but twice, failed to put a check on this extraordinary abuse of power by the government. Therefore, it has fallen on the Senate of Canada to do its duty and meet the responsibility as parliamentarians to scrutinize a piece of government legislation which, many have stated, finds the government attempting to overstep its constitutional limits.

Gerald Chipeur, chair of the Canadian Bar Association's constitutional and human rights law section, stated in an early December appearance before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs that the Senate has a duty to protect individual rights by refusing to pass laws that are unconstitutional. He said:

> I think Parliament has a duty to act consistent with the Constitution. Parliament has to take its duty to protect individual rights seriously.

Honourable senators will recall that our concern was the rule of law issue relating to the right to a fair and independent hearing. We have objected to the proposal in this bill that provided that any claims arising from the cancellation can only be evaluated and awarded by the government or the Minister of Transport.

It has been stated many times by members on this side of the chamber that, while we may not support the cancellation — and, indeed, there is evidence that this was a good deal, whereby for every dollar the consortium earned, the taxpayers of Canada would have earned two — we do not question the right of the government to proceed with the cancellation.

In mid-December, the government proposed amendments to Bill C-22 which would now allow some access to the courts. This new version of Bill C-22 is presently being studied by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. These amendments, although they allow court adjudication, still contain serious flaws. They restrict the matters for which claims can be made. This list includes claims for defamation. Surely a government which is attempting to reach a solution with clean hands would not have found this necessary. Even so, the Minister of Transport, Mr. Young, made it amply clear that he would not have made even these limited changes to the bill if the Tory majority in the Senate had not tripped him up.

We should not find it surprising that, when the Senate acts as a check on the power of the government, such action will not be popular, especially with the government of the day. It is unacceptable to this side of the chamber to allow to go unanswered a charge by a government member, such as that made by the Minister of Transport, that the Senate is opposing his Bill C-22 because the senators are motivated to help line the pockets of their Tory friends.

The record must be made perfectly clear as to why opposition senators are opposed to the provisions of Bill C-22. Opposition to Bill C-22 is on the grounds that it violates the rule of law and the Bill of Rights in its attempts to preclude adjudication by an independent tribunal or to limit matters on which adjudication may take place.

However, honourable senators, in the case of the Pearson airport contracts and the events surrounding their award, we are now dealing with more than mere scrutiny of legislation. We are dealing with the abuse of executive powers in a situation which has, indeed, become a web — a web involving maligning public officials and fabrications beyond anything seen in the history of this country. A vehicle had to be found to check this abuse and uncover the truth.

In normal circumstances, it is left to the courts or to Parliament to check abuse of power. Here, the use of the courts is to be precluded by Bill C-22. As well, the lower house of Parliament, because the Liberal majority is controlled by the executive, has failed as well. It is therefore left to the Senate to act by way of inquiry so that the facts can come out.

When the facts are known through an open inquiry process, then the public will also know. I underscore another terribly important reason for this inquiry to go forward, so that the public will know. The public will be able to see through that web, and the people can then act through this knowledge to protect their freedom. The people can unite to say, "No, we have had enough of deceit and innuendo. We will no longer suffer abuse of authority."

It has often been stated that the most important work of Parliament is that undertaken by its committees. The Senate committees have a good record for fine work, and there is little evidence of Senate committees conducting their work in a manner not fully respectful of the rights of all involved. That is especially true in relation to work with special studies or special inquiries. I believe it will be true in this case.

In fact, one of the great supporters of the work of Senate special committees was the former Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Honourable Paul Martin. In his memoirs, he noted that nothing prevents the Senate from setting its own course. The Senate, he argued, "...provides a useful forum for scrutiny and inquiry."

A Senate special committee of inquiry would, in reality, be an exercise in searching out the truth in relation to all matters concerning the Pearson airport contracts. This would seem to me to be an appropriate role.

Peter O'Keefe, Clerk Assistant in the Australian Senate, states in a 1992 article entitled The Scope and Function of Parliamentary Committees:

> Through their mobility, specialization, power, immunity, status, political skill and media attention, committees can draw to themselves information and confidence which others will not obtain. Adapting Aaron Wildarksy's great phrase, they can help truth speak to power and give voice to those who otherwise remain unheard by power.

I believe this is what we are trying to do in relation to the inquiry into the matters surrounding the Pearson airport contracts. In giving an opportunity for people to be heard, we must be careful not to stray into innuendo and the use of unsubstantiated phrases. Jerome Frank, one of the great American jurists, has likened the legal system to a search for truth. The truth, according to Frank, will emerge when two competent counsel are given the opportunity to question witnesses before an independent tribunal. This is the model the Senate committee might very well want to use. Senators from both sides of the house will be involved in this process. We will need to make sure that we maintain the search for truth as our guiding beacon throughout this inquiry.

Looking back over the history of this place, it is interesting to note that in 1932 a special committee of the Senate was established to review a report of a special committee of the House of Commons that had been established to investigate the Beauharnois power project in Quebec. The reason for establishing the Senate inquiry at that time was that three senators had been referred to in the House of Commons report. One was accused of having benefited financially from having used his influence as a senator to gain approval for the project, while two others were accused by the House of Commons report of securing large political contributions in exchange for their support of the project.

While the details of that case are not important, what is important and relevant to the debate here is the fact that the Senate was able to establish a special committee of inquiry, and that the Senate committee of inquiry was able to hold its hearings and render a report.

At that time, the committee retained legal counsel, as did the three senators whose actions were the subject of the committee investigation. All counsel submitted written briefs to the committee. Counsel for the committee and those representing the three senators were allowed to participate in the questioning. The committee sat between February 16, 1932, and April 6, 1932, hearing evidence. As well, it reviewed the exhibits presented to the House of Commons special committee and received a number of presentations of its own. The point is that the process seemed to work well, and the committee was able to complete its work and produce a report.

While every situation is different, there are similarities between the type of process used in the Beauharnois inquiry and that envisaged by the motion of the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, now supported by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Allegations have been made of wrongdoing. Names have been mentioned publicly. The name of at least one senator on the Liberal side has been bandied about quite openly in the press, while we on this side have been branded by the Minister of Transport as only interested in lining the pockets of our friends.

Departmental reports have recently come to light which should be the subject of scrutiny by a public body. The people of Canada should know what are the events surrounding the writing of the reports; who wrote those reports, and for what purpose; are their claims of great benefit flowing to the people of Canada from the Pearson contracts accurate? For example, the public servants maligned by the Minister of Transport as being sent home because the government did not like the kind of advice it was getting, they should have a forum in which to respond.

Honourable senators, this inquiry will be able to determine the truth of the statements being made that the actions of the senators on this side are holding up the redevelopment plans for Pearson airport; an allegation made often by the government seeking to blame others for its failed job strategy.

Honourable senators, a review of the Rules of the Senate indicates conclusively, in my judgment, that we have the procedures already in place to handle such an inquiry. The Senate can hold hearings of inquiry. It can summon witnesses. It can keep a transcript of its hearings. In that way, we can ensure that those who have been maligned — and this is important — have the opportunity to be heard, and we can demand the production of papers and documents pertaining to the contracts so that they can be reviewed. We can do all this in plain public view. We can review the evidence adduced, and we can write a report that would be made available to the public of Canada.

In conclusion, honourable senators, it is my belief that it is part of the role of the Senate to help keep in check the awesome power of government. This becomes a particularly important responsibility when the ministers of the government attempt to abuse the power of government in attacking the reputations of individual Canadian citizens as well as an institution of Parliament itself — this institution.

The Senate inquiry mechanism is a useful means that can be employed to examine the claim of the Minister of Transport that improper conduct was engaged in by the principals associated with the Pearson airport deal. As the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate has stated from the beginning, if there has been wrongdoing, then there should be an inquiry. Senator Lynch-Staunton has said:

> We have been calling for an inquiry since last April, but the government doesn't want to give us one.
> Better a Senate inquiry than no inquiry at all.

I believe that the Minister of Transport has abused his position, making accusations of wrongdoing and stating on national television that the opposition members in the Senate are holding up Bill C-22 in order to protect friends whose pockets have been lined by the previous government. This Senate inquiry, as proposed by Senator Lynch-Staunton, will provide a useful forum through which to get to the bottom of these serious charges and determine the truth, once and for all.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I will be very brief since we will probably get back to this very shortly. I must say that I am trying to understand.

First, independent senators are usually not very well informed, except when there is legislation. My thanks again to Senator Graham, who from time to time lets me know what is going on, including on those occasions when he needs unanimous consent.

In this particular case, I am told that the government, and that is its right, intends to accede to the request made by the opposition, which I regret. I realize that some people may not have appreciated the objections I raised on July 6 and 7. I think it would be helpful if I went back to what happened last summer.

[English]

It is good to look back at the debate which took place on July 6, 1994, especially for the new senators. On July 6, we were about to rapidly accept the report of the distinguished chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, almost without debate. I objected on that day. It was very difficult for me to give unanimous consent on a Wednesday during the summer. I objected, and we had to come back on July 7, the following day.

I listened attentively at that time, trying to understand and learn what the debate was all about. I came to the conclusion that we should make an amendment not to accept the report of Senator Beaudoin, but to return the report to the committee with the express demand of the Senate to call Mr. Nixon as a witness. I very clearly said then, and I repeat it today, that this should have been the course of action taken by the Senate at that time. You do not ask for a general inquiry until you learn a bit more about the details. If you are satisfied with the evidence of Mr. Nixon, then you do not ask for a general inquiry; if you are not satisfied with his evidence, then you ask for more information.

My proposal to return the report to the committee was rejected. I must say today again, and I know it will annoy some honourable senators, but I wish to thank the Honourable Senator Murray because he had the courtesy of seconding my motion to debate this issue. He was against the motion, but at least as the courteous man he is, he accepted to second it. He said he would second the motion so that he could speak against it. That is fair game.

During the debate, I was told that if we were to further study the matter and call witnesses, the issue should have been referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transportation and Communications instead of to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I said, "Fine."

As you know, honourable senators, my motion did not carry much weight. It was turned down by all senators. One must be careful when one thinks that he or she is the only one who is right. I humbly accepted the fact that the Senate, as a whole, rejected my proposal to call Mr. Nixon before the committee. He is a distinguished Canadian, and he was attacked. I thought it only fair to call him as a witness. After listening to him, I think we would have seen the end of debate. That will not be the case now.

Thus, my motion was put to a vote. It was rejected.

I am a learner, and I had to learn fast, since I was alone at that time in the debate. I was not well-informed by the government whip whose duty it is to look after independent senators, or so I was told. Therefore, I decided to move another motion. I learned from having listened attentively to the views of the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, who said, time and again, that it was the wrong committee to which I wished to refer my motion. He said that if it was any committee, it should be the Transport Committee.

Thus, I moved another motion. Again, the courteous Senator Murray seconded my motion. At that time, I said that, since it is the wrong committee, let us send it to the Transport Committee. I suggested that the committee call but one witness to start. There was no support for my motion at that time. Being wrong twice, I spent the summer in long reflection on what I had done wrong.

I regret that we are now about to start what I consider to be a very expensive enterprise. It will be a long process, and it will be divisive. It will probably be very disturbing for senators on all sides of the Senate. So be it.

I remember also at that time that if I had not pushed the debate further, we would have been deprived of a very excellent speech. I suggest strongly that my honourable colleagues read the debates of July 6 and 7 and, in particular, the intervention by the Honourable Senator Pitfield. He is a man whose is respected for his integrity. Because I pushed the debate and participated in it, he spoke to my motion. Every time he takes the floor it is clear. This is something that Senator Pitfield would not have done if I had not refused my consent to have one more day of debate.

I suggest that honourable senators read the French version of the Debates of the Senate of July 7 as reported at page 831. In reading that intervention, I realized that Senator Murray was in total disagreement with me. That is fair game. At that time, he said:

[Translation]

> As I have indicated, I believe that the public interest would be served by having a full examination of these matters and an impartial investigation. For the reasons that I set out in the committee the other day, I believe that the best forum in which to conduct that inquiry — and it would include, of course, Mr. Robert Nixon as a witness — would be a judicial inquiry set up under the Inquiries Act.

I must say I thought that is what would happen in the end, but I would prefer to hear Mr. Nixon first. If we are not satisfied, then we can go further, just like a lawyer building up his case with stronger evidence.

Honourable senators on both sides—

[English]

You have made your beds. I assure honourable senators that I will be very active in order that the debate will reach a good conclusion that will not be detrimental in terms of cost to the country. I am afraid that it will cost great sums of money if we are to do a good job. I do not know from where the money will come. The Leader of the Government will have to ask for it in Supplementary Estimates. If we are to do a good job, we need a lot of staff. The witnesses who appear will most likely ask that their lawyers be paid. I would not eliminate that possibility. So be it.

In the future it may happen that some senator will make a suggestion which makes sense. If that is the case, I hope that honourable senators will not deem it necessary to consider whether that senator is an independent, a Conservative, a Liberal, or a pain.

There is a debate going on in the House of Commons with respect to conflict of interest. Senator Graham will have to choose those senators who will sit on the committee concerning conflict of interest. There are 200 new members in the House of Commons who may not know exactly what it will mean. There are many senators who sat faithfully on the last committee. I was one of them. Because of the nature of the Senate, we will be unable to exercise our duty according to the experience we may have gained over the years.

I regret that honourable senators did not see fit last summer to accept my motion to have Mr. Nixon appear as the sole witness before the committee. Had that been the case, that would have been the end of it.

I say to senators on both sides of the house, remember the Stevens inquiry.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, we are launching out into what may well be troubled waters. So be it.

I want to ask Senator Lynch-Staunton to deal with certain questions before the end of this debate. They are questions which relate to the terms of his proposed resolution.

I address the attention of honourable senators to the paragraph relating to the composition of the committee. It states that the seven senators designated by the Senate Committee of Selection are to conduct the investigation. In the final paragraph we are told that the committee is to present its final report no later than one year following the striking of the committee.

Correct me if I am wrong, but my understanding was that the Senate Committee of Selection nominates and that, in effect, the Senate appoints by approving the report setting forth the nominations. The language of Senator Lynch-Staunton's motion does not seem to follow that pattern. Perhaps that is mere inadvertence. Therefore, my question to the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton — and I do not expect him to answer it now but to do so before he closes the debate — is this: Is it his intention that the senators will be appointed by the Senate on the nomination of the Senate Committee of Selection?

I think "nomination" is the term that is used in the Rules of the Senate of Canada.

My second question relates to this matter of examining witnesses under oath. It is a delicate matter because, presumably, there will be four Progressive Conservative senators and, perhaps, an independent on one side, and on the government side there will be three. Is it the intention that the committee will examine all witnesses under oath, or will the majority decide which witnesses will be examined under oath? I think Senator Lynch-Staunton will say, "Obviously, everyone will be treated in the same way."

• (1640)

Let me go on to a more difficult question: Will the authority that will be conferred upon the committee to examine witnesses under oath be a power superior to the oath taken by a Privy Councillor? Or will the former Prime Ministers, the present Prime Minister, and other Privy Councillors be able to plead higher commitment? Thus, the result will be that only ordinary mortals will really be subject to examination under oath, whereas former Prime Ministers, the present Prime Minister and other Privy Councillors will plead their Privy Council oath. I cannot say the fifth amendment, but the Privy Council oath.

I think that is a very important question which must be decided upon. Otherwise, we can spend a great deal of money and come up with a result that is satisfactory to no one, including the taxpayers.

Then, there is this question of money. I am not very good at the relationship between proposals for committees and the whole question of when the Internal Economy Committee examines a budget. I am looking for guidance from Senator Lynch-Staunton as to what will happen.

Given the dimensions of this undertaking and the services the committee will require, including lawyers and accountants — and we know what they cost — I am assuming that we are not talking about $50,000. We are probably talking about at least $1 million.

The question I raise is this — and I do not raise it as an objection: Will the Senate have, from Senator Lynch-Staunton at least, an approximate budget before we adopt the motion? Or, is it his view — and it may well be, and I do not say this critically — that the inquiry is so important that we ought to make this commitment, give this commission to the committee, tell them to get on with it and, in a sense, let the budget be dealt with after the fact; in other words, do we deal with the question of cost ex post facto? I do not say that this should hinder us from voting in favour of the proposed inquiry. However, I think if we are to do that, then we should at least do so knowing full well that this is what we are doing.

I put these questions to Senator Lynch-Staunton. I will vote for his motion, unless of course his responses are so astounding that I cannot bring myself to do so. However, I think we ought to have the answers to these questions before we deal with the motion.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I also have a question for the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, one to which I assume he will respond when he answers the questions of Senator Stewart.

In choosing this form of inquiry, I assume that Senator Lynch-Staunton decided that he did not wish to afford to witnesses a solicitor-client privilege?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I do not want to interfere with the debate. However, questions to Senator Lynch-Staunton are not in order at this point.

On motion of Senator Oliver, debate adjourned.

PUBLIC WORKS

FUTURE OF HARBOURFRONT CENTRE—INQUIRY WITHDRAWN

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, April 6, 1995:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the failure of the federal government to deal with the future of the Harbourfront Centre, Toronto.

He said: Honourable senators, last week the government announced a plan to keep Harbourfront in economic health, so to speak, for a further period of three years. I was pleased to hear that. I believe at this particular time an inquiry would take time from this chamber which could best be directed elsewhere. Therefore, for the present, I wish to withdraw my inquiry.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is there unanimous consent for Senator Di Nino to withdraw his inquiry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and inquiry withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, May 3, 1995, at 1:30 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, May 3, 1995

The Senate met at 1:30 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

CANADA REMEMBERS

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, as we begin the celebrations to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the end of the Second World War, I should like in a small way to pay tribute to the Canadian men and women who played such a pivotal role half a century ago.

I had the honour last fall to participate in ceremonies in Belgium and the Netherlands to mark the 50th anniversary of the Battle of the Scheldt, a critical campaign for the Allied Forces in October and November some 50 years ago. That campaign was followed by the Rhineland campaign, considered to be one of the harshest and most difficult of battles. It lasted over a month. That action alone, we should remember, took some 5,300 lives from our 2nd Corps.

Canada's role in World War II was an important one, with more than 1 million Canadians serving. The Canadian army was 170,000 strong and fought in northwest Europe, mainland Italy, Sicily and, of course, Hong Kong, ending with the liberation of Holland on May 5, 1944. The Royal Canadian Air Force not only defended Britain, it then went on to participate actively in the Allied air offensive against Nazi Germany. The RCN also played a major role in the Allied effort to keep the sea lanes open, which were so vital to the war effort in Europe.

In this regard, we must not forget those who served in the Canadian Merchant Marine. The merchant mariners risked their lives to move troops, materials and food that sustained Europe from 1939 to 1945. The Merchant Navy Book of Remembrance that was installed in the Memorial Chamber last fall is a fitting tribute to those brave individuals. Like so many others who worked so hard to achieve this goal, I am just a little sorry it was so late in coming.

Honourable senators, World War II, not only brought changes to Europe, but the countries participating in the war were also witnessing the effects of the war effort. Canada, in particular, was undergoing a massive transformation while our troops were engaged in battle. During those six years of the war, Canada turned into the modern industrial state that it is today. We were becoming a major industrial power with a significantly growing presence on the world stage.

More important, we must not forget the thousands of Canadians who did not get the opportunity to return home to experience this new Canada, those who made the ultimate sacrifice in the name of freedom. By the time World War II had ended in 1945, we had lost 42,000 Canadian men and women to the cause. Therefore, even though this anniversary is a cause for celebration and joy, it is also important that we pause and reflect on just what we lost — so many very precious lives.

I hope all Canadians, young and old, will take the time — and not just during this week — to honour veterans and to reflect on the loss of those who died on the battlefields, in the air and on the sea. We must never lose sight of the fact that it is to veterans, those who are still with us and those who lost their lives during the war, that we owe nothing short of the freedom that we enjoy today.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

LITERACY COURSES OFFERED IN FRENCH LANGUAGE

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, I have good news to share with you today! I will read an excerpt from an editorial in Le Droit, the French-language newspaper of the National Capital Region.

> Last Monday —
> —Monday of this week—
> — some 30 immigrants were enrolled in Vanier's new French literacy program, La Magie des lettres. This is unprecedented in Ontario.

This is the first time in Ontario that immigrants in a province like ours can take French courses. I have been trying for three years to persuade the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, which is responsible for the integration of immigrants into Canadian society, to offer French and English language courses in places where there is sufficient demand.

In all of the provinces of this country, the majority wins out. English is taught in all of the anglophone provinces, as if English were the country's official language and, obviously, French is taught in Quebec.

Being a French-speaking Canadian, I thought that we could offer a choice to our immigrants, especially Somalians or Haitians, whose languages are rooted in French. I will not tarry any longer on the topic, because the patois has its own legitimacy.

What I found upsetting was what we were saying to these Haitians, Somalians or other peoples. Why should these people, who have nothing in common with English, have to integrate into society in English and take linguistic training courses in English?

The answer to this question was: There is no demand in the nation's capital!

I knew there was a demand because immigrants were coming to me and saying: "Mr. Gauthier, my child goes to a French school. I an neither read nor write. I am an immigrant and have to learn English. I cannot keep up with my child because we have difficulty communicating."

I said to myself that we need to set up at least a pilot project here in the nation's capital which would give immigrants the choice between English or French.

Since last Monday, immigrants can approach La Magie des lettres, a literacy organization, for French courses in Ottawa, the country's capital. I think that is good news indeed!

Honourable senators, I would like to congratulate all who have worked over the past three years to convince departmental authorities to make courses available everywhere in Canada where there is enough demand.

THE HONOURABLE JOHN M. MACDONALD

TRIBUTES ON EIGHTY-NINTH BIRTHDAY

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it has just been brought to my attention that one of our distinguished and most senior colleagues, Senator John M. Macdonald, is celebrating his 89th birthday today. The headline in the Ottawa Citizen reads, "Last senator-for-life staying put, thanks."

Senator Macdonald has been our friend and colleague for many years. He was appointed here to the Senate in 1960. When I first came here in 1972, I asked Senator Macdonald for some advice, and he has never stopped giving it to me. The first question I asked him was, "John, what committees should I aspire to?" He said, "Well, of course if you are from the Maritimes, you must be on the Transport Committee." I took his advice and asked to be put on that committee. My request was granted, and I have been a member of that committee ever since. In fact, I had been having difficulty in trying to get off that committee until I got my present job. I am no longer an official member of that committee, but I am an ex officio member of that and every other committee in the Senate.

It was once said of someone that "His word is his bond. Whether it is given in public or in private, it can be relied upon absolutely." That description can also be applied to John M. Macdonald, at any time in his life. We rejoice in his longevity and in his remarkable good health. Unfortunately, by my count, I will not be around long enough to celebrate John M. Macdonald's 100th birthday in this chamber 11 years hence.

We have all benefitted from his wise counsel and are much richer by his friendship, his example, his marvellous contribution, and his eternal devotion to this place.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I wish to thank you for your recognition of my birthday and for your good wishes.

It is true that I have been asked on occasion, "How long will you stay here?" As a result of that question, it has been generally understood that if I make my 100th birthday, I will resign. However, I have changed my mind. I have decided that I will stay on.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Macdonald: I have been a member of the Senate since 1960 and I have enjoyed the friendship of everyone who has been here. I look forward to every day here. I still like it, and that is why I am staying.

Over the years, a particular friendship has grown between one senator on the other side and me. That senator celebrates his birthday May 2. I refer to Senator Peter Bosa. We have been exchanging birthday greetings over the years. I must tell him that he cannot hope to equal my record, but he is doing fairly well.

Again, honourable senators, I thank you for your good wishes. I assure you that I like the Senate, and I hope a good number of you will be here to help me celebrate my 100th birthday.

I read about Winston Churchill that on the occasion of his 90th birthday, one of the big London papers sent someone to interview him. After the interview, the reporter said good-bye. He then said, "Mr. Churchill, I hope I will be here next year again to speak to you." Churchill replied, "I do not see why not. You look to be healthy enough to me!"

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, our dear colleague is quick on his feet. He was way ahead of me as I tried to rise to join with our colleague Senator Graham in extending our very best wishes from this side of the chamber. We had occasion to do so at our Progressive Conservative Senate caucus meeting this morning. I simply wanted to underscore the point that you still have to be quick on your feet to beat Senator Macdonald.

Hon. Marcel Prud'Homme: Honourable senators, I wish to add a few words to the good wishes extended to Senator Macdonald.

Senator Macdonald has given me great advice. I have known him since 1960. Senator Graham just mentioned that the first thing he did when he arrived in the Senate was to ask Senator Macdonald's advice as to on which committee he should sit. Now I know my mistake. That is what I should have done when I came to this place. I should have gone to see Senator Macdonald to ask, "How can I get on a committee?" Since I now know what my mistake was, I shall correct it over the next few days.

I wish to say how happy I am to join with other honourable senators in wishing him well. I hope to still be here when he celebrates his 100th birthday.

We all know Senator Macdonald to be a fine gentleman. I always say to students at the University of Ottawa and the University of Carleton, "Why not stop by on Parliament Hill and ask Senator Macdonald about what took place in this country over the last many years?"

He has an unbelievable memory. I have often asked him about what took place in the 1940s or even in the 1960s. His mind is sharp. He knows and remembers events about which we cannot read in our history books.

Senator Macdonald, I wish you a very happy day and many good years to come.

ENVIRONMENT

LOW-LEVEL MILITARY FLIGHTS OVER LABRADOR— IMPACT ON HUMAN HEALTH AND WILDLIFE

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, if the Senate were to continue to exercise one of the functions traditionally ascribed to it — that is, the function of protection of human rights, especially minority rights — surely the cause that would merit such consideration is the situation of the Innu of Labrador.

• (1350)

On Monday, the Government of Canada decided that low-level military flights over the Innu territory will be expanded, perhaps to 18,000 flights annually and a 130,000 square kilometre area, despite the findings of a federal environmental assessment panel that acknowledged uncertainty about the impact of flights on wildlife and human health.

All over the world, the rights of aboriginal peoples are violated by disruption, dislocation and, worse, through logging, mining, dams, et cetera, in their traditional homelands.

The protesting Innu really do not want much, merely to be left alone in peace and quiet. They do not want the excruciating noise created by jets roaring up and down the river valleys at lower than 300 metres, disturbing children, caribou, eagles, et cetera, and disrupting the migration and feeding patterns of wildlife.

The Government of Quebec has called for a moratorium on flights until 1997. Survival International, a non-governmental organization, has made a submission on behalf of the Innu of Labrador to the United Nations Human Rights Commission. The Minister of Indian Affairs has admitted that the Innu, whose lives and livelihood will be disrupted by these flights, have legitimate concerns and territorial rights.

The report does not deny that environmental concerns and, therefore, by implication, the rights of the Innu, were overridden by the economic concerns of the communities servicing military operations. Indeed, the report recommends approval of a new target bombing range.

A column in The Globe and Mail recently joins the issue squarely: The moral values of the political and military people willing to allow economic activity, based on some military objectives, and the values of those suffering from this activity, including wild animals, were not fairly balanced or considered.

The government has demonstrated its view of the minority rights of the Innu. One can only hope that the Labrador Institute, which is to be set up to monitor and research the impact of the military training operations, will do its job so that justice can be done to the cause of the Innu.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the time for senators' statements has elapsed. However, I saw that Senator Ghitter had risen to his feet before the time expired. Is it agreed that Senator Ghitter be allowed to speak?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

REMARKS MADE BY HON. ALLAN ROCK

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, as I mentioned yesterday I wish to read into the record statements made by the Honourable Allan Rock on February 16, 1995 with respect to the gun registration aspects of Bill C-68 —

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I have no objection to what the Honourable Senator Ghitter said yesterday, nor will I object to what he is about to say.

However, my understanding of parliamentary procedure, which I have gained over the years, has taught me that once a bill is before the legislature, discussion regarding it should occur only when the bill is the subject matter of discussion.

Senator Ghitter: Honourable senators, in response to the comments of the honourable senator, I recall when I first took my place in this house the Liberals, on a daily basis, talked continually about the GST, as well as declarations by ministers. It was like a continuous statement, day after day.

The purpose of my statement today is this: The firearms bill is important legislation which will be coming before us for our deliberation and consideration. It requires the understanding of members of this place in order to assist in understanding this divisive legislation. In a preliminary way, and for the understanding of all honourable senators, I wish to bring to their attention what is being said about this matter and the reasons for it.

I await your conclusion, Your Honour.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, rule 22(4) of the Rules of the Senate of Canada states:

> (4) When "Senators' Statements" has been called, Senators may, without notice, raise matters they consider need to be brought to the urgent attention of the Senate. In particular, Senators' statements should relate to matters which are of public consequence and for which the rules and practices of the Senate provide no immediate means of bringing the matters to the attention of the Senate. In making such statements, a Senator shall not anticipate consideration of any Order of the Day and shall be bound by the usual rules governing the propriety of debate. Matters raised during this period shall not be subject to debate.

At this stage, the proposed bill is not an Order of the Day. Therefore, it is in order for the honourable senator to proceed.

I might add that the precedents in the Senate have been such that we have commented not on matters which are on the Orders of the Day but on other matters. I rule that Senator Ghitter may proceed.

Hon. Norbert L. Thériault: Your Honour, am I to understand from your ruling that once a subject matter is placed on the Order Paper, senators are prevented from discussing it?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am sorry to interrupt Senator Thériault. The rules do not provide for points of order to be raised under the rubric "Senators' Statements." The honourable senator may make a statement, but he is not allowed to raise a point of order.

Senator Ghitter may proceed.

Hon. Ron Ghitter: I anticipate that Your Honour will have the opportunity to make a further ruling at a later date.

On February 16, in relation to the question of gun registration, the Honourable Allan Rock said:

> May I deal directly with the issue of registration and how it is going to enable us to achieve the objectives of a safe and peaceful society, a more effective response to the criminal misuse of firearms and enhanced public safety.
> I will begin with the proposition that we live in a society in which all manner of property is licensed, registered or regulated in some way. All manner of activities are regulated either by legislation or administrative action to achieve a level of orderliness which is desirable in a civilized society. In that context, where cars, pets, and property of all description are registered or recorded for purposes of tracing ownership or reflecting transfers, surely the prospect of registering firearms is rationally justified by a society that wants to achieve a level of order....
> Those who engage in street crime tap into a market that is fed from one of two sources: guns that are smuggled into Canada and therefore are here illegally, or guns that are stolen from lawful owners and then traded in the underground....
> Surely we must choke off the sources of supply for that underground market.

• (1400)

> Surely we must reduce the number of firearms smuggled into the country. Surely we must cut down on the number of firearms stolen and traded in the underground. How do we achieve that? Through registration.
> The registration of all firearms will enable us to do a better job at the borders. We will never stop the smuggling of firearms entirely. There are 130 million border crossings per year....
> Last year approximately 375,000 firearms came into Canada. Almost all guns sold here are imported. We do not know where they are or how they got here....
> Registration will enable us to record what arrives and track it to the point of sale into the hands of a lawful owner. Registration will enable us to stop the kind of leakage that now occurs, to reduce the incidence of people illegally selling that which is legally imported.
> ...registration which obligates each of us to record the fact of our ownership of firearms will imbue the owners with a heightened sense of responsibility...
> ...Registration will reduce crime and better equip the police to deal with crime in Canadian society by providing them with information they often need to do their job....
> ...Registration will assist us to deal with the scourge of domestic violence....
> When firearms are registered, if it is necessary for a person to register and show proof of registration to buy ammunition, as it will be, the police will know what firearms are there. The police will be able to enforce those orders and lives will be saved....
> We have provided our estimate of the cost of implementing universal registration over the next five years. We say that it will cost $85 million....
> It is crucially important, in my judgment, that as we debate this question of registration, in respect of which there are strongly held views on both sides, that we do so on the real facts. Let us confine ourselves to the reality of the situation. Let us not hear that the registration system will cost $100 per firearm. Let us not hear that it is a prelude to the confiscation by the government of hunting rifles and shotguns. Let us not contend that it will cost $1.5 billion to put in place.

PEACE IN EUROPE

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, on this day, the 204th anniversary of the first Polish Democratic Constitution, I am happy to give notice that, on May 16 next, I will initiate an inquiry on the necessity for decisive leadership to preserve peace in Europe, 50 years after the end of World War II.

HUMAN RESOURCES

DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCES ON MANPOWER TRAINING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Notwithstanding the election in Quebec of a provincial government that openly plans to break up our country in return for a mirage that can only confuse Quebecers, who have shown on many occasions that they are willing to assert their pride in being both Quebecers and Canadians, is the Quebec government conducting negotiations on manpower training with your government?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as has been said in this house before, discussions with the provinces on these issues continue from time to time. I would need to ask my colleague whether there are any such discussions currently being held with the province of Quebec, or for that matter any other province, on that particular issue.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

AGREEMENT ON PARTICIPATION OF PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, similarly, has the Alberta government signed an agreement with the Canadian government to promote exports and generally expand international trade? Has such an agreement been proposed to or concluded with the Quebec government?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Bolduc is absolutely correct. The Alberta government and the Government of Canada, respectively represented by the Premier of Alberta and the Federal Trade Minister, Roy MacLaren, did sign an agreement just a couple of weeks ago in Calgary on cooperation in developing business export potential abroad.

This agreement was only the second such agreement that had been signed with a Canadian province, the first having been signed a while back with Ontario. Both Ontario and Alberta initiated these proposals, and both agreements were accepted readily by the Government of Canada.

I do not know what the future of such an agreement would be with the province of Quebec. At the moment, we have only those two examples.

[Translation]

Senator Bolduc: Does the Minister for International Trade or the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs intend to propose such an agreement to the Quebec government?

[English]

EXPO 2005

ANNOUNCEMENT OF HOST CITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise when Calgary will be announced as the location for Expo 2005, considering that the evaluator's report is now in and it clearly recommends Calgary over Ottawa?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend will know where I stand on this issue, but my answer to his question is a simple "no".

ORDERS OF THE DAY

CANADA-UNITED STATES TAX CONVENTION ACT, 1984

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved third reading of Bill S-9, to amend the Canada-United States Tax Convention Act, 1984.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

TRANSPORT

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—
MOTION TO STRIKE SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO PRIVATIZATION CONTRACTS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by the Honourable Senator Berntson:

That a special committee of the Senate be appointed to examine and report upon all matters concerning the policies and negotiations leading up to, and including, the agreements respecting the redevelopment and operation of Terminals 1 and 2 of Lester B. Pearson International Airport and the circumstances relating to the cancellation thereof;

That seven senators, designated by the Committee of Selection no later than two weeks after adoption of this motion, act as members of the special committee, and that three members constitute a quorum;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee have the power to sit during adjournments of the Senate;

That the committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical, stenographic and such other staff as deemed advisable by the committee;

That the committee have power to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings; and

That the committee present its final report to the Senate no later than one year following the striking of the committee. — (Honourable Senator Oliver).

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I stand today to speak in support of the motion of the Honourable Senator John Lynch-Staunton. I associate myself with the intervention made yesterday by Senator Kinsella. It gives me great pleasure to rise to speak in support of the motion to establish a special Senate committee to inquire into the Pearson airport contracts.

I was particularly pleased to hear yesterday during the intervention by the Leader of the Government that she is not opposed to such an inquiry. It is, in fact, in the public interest for such an inquiry to be held. We on this side of the Senate do not take issue with the government's right to cancel the Pearson airport contracts. Nothing in law prevents the government from doing this. What we do object to, and have objected to all along, is the way that the government has sought to deal with the consequences of its unilateral cancellation of the contracts.

This government has consistently sought to deny the principles involved in these contracts the right to have their damages adjudicated by an independent tribunal, the courts. This is against the rule of law, the Bill of Rights and in breach of Canada's NAFTA obligations. The arguments we have advanced have been endorsed and supported by noted constitutional authorities across this country and, most notably, by the Canadian Bar Association.

In response to the support for the position taken on this side of the Senate, the government introduced amendments to Bill C-22, but what did these amendments do? They allowed access to the courts and then limited the matters for which damages could be claimed to such an extent that the Canadian Bar Association was not moved off its original position.

Two matters stood out for me in my review of these amendments. First, I was concerned with the deadlines established. In order to qualify for compensation, all claims had to be submitted prior to June 30, 1994. The Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee could not be assured that all claims had in fact been submitted. As well, concern was raised by both committee members and witnesses about the exclusion for claims for defamation. This strikes home at one of the real issues in this matter.

During, as well as after, the election and right up to the present time, members of the government have spent a great deal of energy maligning those in the private sector who were part of the T1 and T2 consortiums. Then, to specifically exclude any claims for defamation, this seemed to mitigate against any possible compromise. It is, in fact, this refusal by the Liberal government to become involved in a meaningful compromise which led senators on this side to conclude that a Senate inquiry was the only solution.

This side had hoped that the government, if it believed in its own rhetoric, would establish a judicial inquiry. However, our calls for such an inquiry have fallen on deaf ears. Therefore, we are left with this motion we are debating today to establish a special committee of the Senate to obtain all the facts, to uncover the truth and the policies behind the letting of the contracts for the Pearson airport development and future management. This Senate inquiry will certainly be less costly than a full-fledged judicial inquiry.

Over the years, the Senate has received many compliments for the work of its investigative committees. Examples of this type of work by the Senate can be seen in reports on poverty, unemployment, inflation, aging, land use, science policy, relations with the United States and aboriginal issues. We are all anxiously awaiting the release of the report by Senator Neiman's Special Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide.

Professor Colin Campbell has commented favourably on this work stating:

> A type of social reformism has emerged in the work of the Senate. A number of members have become involved in special studies of fundamental social and systemic problems like poverty, inflation and non-responsive mass media....These studies are beginning to have an impact on the prepatory stages of the legislative process wherein problems are discussed before policy proposals are formulated.

I submit that some of the most important work that we do here occurs in special committees. In fact, Senator Stanbury in a speech to the Canadian Study of Parliament Group in 1979 stated:

> It is perhaps through the committee system, in the carrying out of investigations, that the Senate exercises that function which was planned for it by the Fathers of Confederation, for the protection of minorities and regional interests.

In his classic text on the Senate, F.A. Kunz argues that the third main function performed by Senate committees is the conducting of inquiries into some problem area of concern. In his book The Modern Senate of Canada, he divides inquiries into three main groups. There are economic inquiries relating to broad questions on the economy or dealing with some particular facet of the economic life of the country. The second group concerns matters of sudden incident and of an ad hoc nature demanding prompt inquiry. The third relates to aspects of government machinery, usually the operation and administration of certain statutes. Committees performing any of these three roles are valuable according to Kunz because they collect evidence, give advice in the form of recommendations and expose matters, which tend to educate the general public.

This positive view of the role of Senate investigative committees is reiterated by Professor Ned Franks of Queen's University in his book, The Parliament of Canada. Comparing Senate and House of Commons committees, he states:

> Senators are more knowledgeable and more familiar with their subjects and the potential impact of legislation. The Senate committees are more deliberative and willing to take time. In addition, questioning by the Senate is by issue....This allows them to focus the discussion, and give priority to a lead questioner.

The usefulness of a Senate investigative committee seems therefore to be beyond question. I believe it is important to put this inquiry in the context of Senate renewal. As I am sure all of you have heard more than once from me, I am an intense advocate of renewal. I believe it is important that the Senate become seized of this matter. It is important for the Senate and it is important for all Canadians. It is important for the Senate because it will be an opportunity for senators to show that the Senate really is a viable alternative to expensive, and generally lengthy, royal commissions.

It will be an opportunity to show Canadians that senators can deal in a civilized manner with a topic which is very much in the public eye. Senators can demonstrate that they can carry out an investigation not only into the entering into of contracts but also into the policy questions.

It will be important for the committee to discuss whether the privatization and renewal of facilities of the Pearson airport make sense from a transportation policy point of view.

In the end, such an inquiry should demonstrate all the good points that are usually associated with Senate inquiries; namely thoroughness, competence, frugality, resulting in recommendations which are easily understood, can be implemented, and deal specifically with all the hard issues.

However, there are those who will argue that this type of investigation lies beyond the scope of anything done in Senate committees to date. First, I believe there is ample precedent for this type of inquiry, without even arguing that it is beneficial to have an institution which can be innovative. I subscribe to the theory expressed by Professor Kunz that, "It is in order for the Senate to refer any matter in its discretion to any committee."

However, I know there will be those who will argue that special investigative committees usually deal with topics where there is little political controversy. Both political parties represented on the committee have no entrenched position they are trying to defend.

It has been argued that in a charged political atmosphere, it will be difficult to conduct hearings and obtain the truth. There will be arguments that the Rules of the Senate are not broad enough to allow us to conduct the thorough type of investigation that is merited and warranted in the circumstances.

Even though I have been here only four short years, that has not prevented me from looking at the work done in previous eras to determine what we, as senators, are allowed to do. I would like to draw the attention of senators to three situations which have occurred in the life of this institution, which may be helpful in adding support to this proposed inquiry.

On February 11, 1932, a special committee of nine senators was appointed to consider a report of the special committee of the House of Commons which investigated the development of the Beauharnois Power Project. Under the chairmanship of Senator Tanner, it was to investigate allegations in the House of Commons report on this subject as they related to the conduct of three senators. I will not go into that particular report any further because it was already addressed and referred to yesterday by Senator Kinsella.

In relation to Senator Andrew Haydon, the committee found that a fee charged by Senator Haydon's law firm was contingent on the passing of the Order in Council approving the power project. It concluded on page 28 that "Senator Haydon's conduct was conflicting and inconsistent with his position and standing as a senator of Canada.

The committee, in relation to a third senator, Senator Donat Raymond, concluded that it was impossible, because of the senator's denial, to do otherwise than accept his explanation that there was no influence directed by him which affected government policy.

That Senate report concluded at page 30 with the following statement:

> This committee feels it to be their duty to express the opinion that senators of Canada should not place themselves in the position of receiving contributions from or being interested in an enterprise dependent on specific favour, franchise or concession to be made by a government whose conduct is, under the Constitution of Canada, subject to review by both branches of Parliament.

• (1420)

It was obviously an inquiry into various serious and sensitive matters. It met from February 16, 1932 until April 6, 1932. It had counsel to help it with its investigation. As well, it reviewed 129 exhibits filed with the House of Commons committee, and it received 24 of its own.

Honourable senators, what I am about to say is the key of the remarks I make today: This committee presents us with a good example of an investigative committee working in a highly charged political atmosphere inquiring into dealings surrounding a public work.

My second example concentrates on the innovative use of the Senate's power. It relates to the dismissal of the Governor of the Bank of Canada, James E. Coyne, in 1961. As some may remember, when the governor refused to resign over a policy dispute between himself and the Diefenbaker government, the Senate allowed Mr. Coyne to testify before a Senate committee. The governor was given ample time to present his views and thereafter resign. The Senate, as pointed out by Professor Franks, was seen at that time as the protector of the rights of a senior public servant. For our purposes, it shows that the Senate can be used to provide innovative solutions to public policy issues. It is respectfully submitted that the Pearson airport matter requires an innovative solution to a public policy issue.

I would like to refer briefly to the actions of the Senate during the Meech Lake debate. There was no question that the Committee of the Whole which held hearings on the accord and its subcommittee on "Meech Lake and its effect on the North" were involved in a politically charged subject. The Liberal side wished to delay the constitutional amendments for the full time allowed by the Constitution, while the Progressive Conservative side wanted to see it passed quickly.

The subcommittee on the North acted as a special investigative committee, although there were opposing political views on the effect of the accord in Northern Canada. This demonstrates that, even recently, special committees or committees acting like special committees can divide along partisan lines but still carry out effective hearings.

Honourable senators, I believe the Senate is ideally situated to carry out this inquiry. The Senate has considerable powers under its rules to send for papers and needed information. It can, through the Senate, compel the attendance of witnesses. It can have these witnesses sworn, as was discussed yesterday. There is no restriction on rule 93 as to the subject-matter which can be investigated by a special committee. I would hope that when this committee is established, it will conduct its business in an orderly and workmanlike manner, searching out the truth. I hope it will be one of the committees that Professor Robert Jackson of Carleton University referred to when he commented:

> The Senate committees which do important and acclaimed work are those which are composed of specialists who engage in cross-bench influence and non-partisan behaviour.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Will the honourable senator allow a question?

Senator Oliver: Yes.

Senator Grafstein: First, I commend Senator Oliver for his interesting and thought-provoking research. It has obviously brought to mind a different vista of exploration for those of us on this side.

I am curious about his comment that the proposed inquiry would be less costly than a judicial inquiry. Since the Conservative majority in the Senate has requested and moved a motion to initiate this inquiry, which we on this side do not oppose, nor do we intend to oppose, and since the Conservative majority will have a majority on the committee of inquiry itself and, therefore, ostensible control of the committee's agenda, obviously the question of cost must have crossed Senator Oliver's mind, or that of the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate.

Could we have some indication, perhaps, if not today, in the leader's speech tomorrow, of the extent of those estimated costs? I think the public has a right to know what the costs will be, since the origination of this issue vis-à-vis these contracts by the government has, in part, to do with the question of costs to be borne by the taxpayer. Costs lie at the heart, or bear a very important part of the lis of this issue.

I raise this point in the context of the Leader of the Opposition's known concern about frugality, having in mind his recent comments with respect to Senator MacEachen's modest request for $7,500 to pay for Volume I of the report of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy. We on this side would like to have some indication of the extent of the proposed costs of this inquiry. Costs to Ontario for a recent inquiry, albeit a judicial inquiry, ran into the millions of dollars.

Senator Oliver: I thank the honourable senator for his question. I believe my leader will be addressing some of the honourable senator's concerns about finances in his closing remarks tomorrow.

The support for the remark I made is that I was involved with the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing, commonly called the Lortie commission, until I came to this place. As I understand it, the cost of that royal commission into electioneering in this country was some $26 million. It is my belief that this inquiry into the Pearson airport will cost nothing like that, and that is specifically what I was referring to when I made those remarks.

I have looked back in Hansard for remarks made by honourable senators from the opposite side. I came upon some comments by Senator Hicks on the costs of Senate inquiries. I will get copies of those remarks and make them available to the honourable senator so he may see what Senator Hicks had to say about the Senate providing funds to a committee to do its work.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, perhaps, at the same time, senators on the other side could give us some indication of other issues that would have to be sacrificed in order to bring this inquiry within the global undertaking that we made to the government with respect to the costs of this place.

Senator Oliver: I thank the honourable senator for his question.

Hon. John G. Bryden: Honourable senators, it is with some degree of hesitation that I stand to ask a question. Senator Oliver indicated that in his four short years in this place he has learned a lot. My term has been about four short months.

The honourable senator indicated the commendable work for which Senate committees have been noted. I am a little concerned that this Senate committee may not be a committee like all the others. In considering whether the Senate could fulfil its function adequately through this committee, I was wondering about the issue of compelling the attendance of witnesses on what is obviously a controversial situation.

I did a little research to determine if there have been situations where the Senate has been able to compel the attendance of reluctant witnesses. I refer to an extract from a paper entitled "Privilege in the Senate of Canada" presented by W. F. Dawson at an annual meeting of the Canadian Political Science Association in Sherbrooke. I can give the honourable senator a copy afterwards. Mr. Dawson said that there has been very little trouble with Senate witnesses over the years. Indeed, there are only four occasions in which people refused to give evidence. He points out two unfortunate situations, the first of which was perhaps the most unfortunate for the Senate. A special committee reported to the Senate that a witness refused to be sworn, as he contended that he was the co-respondent in a divorce case being heard. The committee decided otherwise, however, and when he persisted in his refusal, the Senate ordered that the Black Rod take him into custody. A week later, the Black Rod reported that the individual had left the country, or at least had secreted himself in some parts unknown. He was never apprehended and never punished.

One other attempt to obtain a witness was equally fruitless — and this may be more in keeping with what we are about to launch ourselves into. While investigating a private railway bill in 1891, the committee reported to the Senate that four witnesses had failed to appear. One had simply left the country before he could be formally summoned, although he knew he was wanted. Two others — a provincial minister and a provincial civil servant — were prevented from appearing by the provincial government. The fourth merely did not want to attend.

On this occasion, no action was taken since the Senate doubted that it had the power to enforce attendance on the provincial officers, and the third individual was physically beyond the reach of the Senate.

I raise those examples, which seem to be the only examples in our history, merely to enquire whether, in launching into these hearings, the mover of the motion can give us some assurance that we will be able to compel the attendance of witnesses, and all of them on the same basis?

Honourable senators, my point is this: If we are to require witnesses to attend before a committee of this place, then a legal secretary or an assistant director in a government department, or a present or former minister or a prime minister should all be required to give evidence on the same basis. Would that be the case? If so, how would we accomplish it?

It is my understanding that common law and parliamentary procedure does not require a privy councillor or others to give evidence. Old, complicated procedures may need to be invoked — I read somewhere about a bill of indemnity — in order to allow, let alone compel, privy councillors, ministers and prime ministers to give evidence before a body such as this.

Honourable senators, if we on this side of the chamber are to be as helpful in this inquiry as we would wish, perhaps those who have proposed the motion can give us some comfort that all witnesses will be treated on the same basis. It is my understanding that without an indemnity, these people may leave themselves open to charges under the Criminal Code.

What will be the relationship of the members of this house to the committee if they are asked to give evidence before the committee? Once again I am showing my ignorance, but it is my understanding that only two classes of individuals may claim privilege from giving evidence before this committee: one group would be members of the House of Commons, and the other would be members of the Senate. What will be the position of an individual senator called to give evidence before this committee? Will he or she be entitled to claim privilege? Or if we have this privilege, should we waive the right to exercise it before setting up the committee?

As the hearings continue, if a senator, sitting as a member of that committee, finds himself or herself being called to give evidence before that committee, what is that senator's continuing function in relation to the committee?

Honourable senators, this hearing may be completed in a week, but I doubt it. It may go on for a year. We may end up with recommendations to name senators to the committee and, six months from now, we may find that one of those senators, for whatever reason, is required to give evidence before that committee. Does that senator cease to be a member? Perhaps this does not matter.

As a novice, I would be entering into this process not knowing where it would ultimately lead, except that it would be open, far-ranging, fair and reasonable.

Under the rules, a Senate Committee of Selection nominates the members of select committees. Select committees include special committees. Therefore, a Senate Committee of Selection would nominate the members of this special committee and bring them before this place for approval.

In looking at the literature, however, there is precedent for this procedure to be done in another way. The procedure can be rolled together, and when the motion is ultimately put, it is put to the members of the Senate, and the Senate either accepts all of the nominations or none at all. Is it intended that the procedure be done in that way? If it comes to a vote, which will not necessarily occur, can the Senate approve six of the nominations, but not the seventh, and say to the Senate Committee of Selection "Go back and try again for another one"?

This house deserves the opportunity to air these issues before we launch into what may be the unknown.

Senator Oliver: I should like to thank the honourable senator for his many questions, and my comments are as follows:

First, some of the questions you asked are beyond my jurisdiction and power, and will be dealt with by my leader tomorrow when he speaks. Second, some of the issues you raise are issues that, in my view, should be dealt with by the committee, once it is struck.

Third, in relation to what happens if a senator on the committee is called later to give evidence, all I know is the law. The common law is that if a lawyer is engaged to represent someone in relation to a matter and that lawyer or his partner or an associate has an involvement, and they know or ought to have known that they may be called to give evidence, they have a legal obligation to immediately advise the court and withdraw. I would think that that same rule should apply here. Anyone with an interest in the Pearson airport deal, directly or indirectly, should not serve on the committee, and they should advise this honourable chamber accordingly.

In relation to the case of the provincial authorities who did not appear before the committee and could not be compelled to appear, from what you read — and you have indicated you will give me a copy so that I can read it, too — I was not sure whether those incidents were ever appealed, or whether it was ever tested by a court. If you refer to only those two cases and they were not tested by a court and you are seeking "comfort", I do not think you can ask for a great deal of comfort for this side, which remains judicially untested.

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: I have a question following on what Senator Bryden has asked. I do so knowing that Senator Oliver is a reputable lawyer himself.

What will the intention be? There seems to be little doubt as to the right of a Senate committee to compel witnesses to give evidence under oath or otherwise. I am curious as to what the situation will be in the case of a lawyer who might have been involved in the Pearson deal and who may be called before the committee and asked questions which, if answered, would have the effect of breaching the solicitor-client privilege. Would a lawyer in that situation be compelled to breach that confidence and, in turn, be liable to penalty if he refuses?

• (1440)

Senator Oliver: Honourable senators, I do not know the answer to that question. However, I think that solicitor-client privilege would pertain.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, this is new ground for me, which is why I am interested in learning what I can from those who know about these things.

Yesterday, I asked a question of Senator Lynch-Staunton in which I mentioned the problem associated with the oath taken by privy councillors. I gather that the honourable senator will deal with that question conclusively in his closing remarks.

Then, of course, there is the problem of the Official Secrets Act. How many civil servants will say, "You are talking now about information I gave to the Minister of Transport of the day."

If those two classes of oaths arise, as well as solicitor-client privilege and the whole question of incrimination, then we may well need a statute of indemnification to set those problems aside. It will be a very curious situation indeed if we have some witnesses, particularly from the private sector, who are obliged to testify, and the privy councillors can fold their arms and sit back. The members of the former government and the members of the present government, presumably, will proceed in the same way. If that occurs, then we will look very foolish.

These are important procedural questions to which we ought to have conclusive answers before we set out to sea. Can Senator Oliver help me?

Senator Oliver: I cannot help you a lot, Senator Stewart, with deep regret. I do not think that it behooves this side to provide conclusive answers to some of these questions because some of them will require a legal opinion from counsel who may be retained to answer these very questions.

This is something which the committee, once it is struck, will decide. Indeed, the committee will need to decide on how it will proceed and under what rules; it will need to decide what weight it will give to some of these issues. The members of that committee will find out what weight to give to such things after they have received the proper legal advice.

This is not the forum in which to give legal advice. It is up to the committee to amass its own legal advice and advisors, once the order is granted.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, am I to conclude that Senator Oliver is saying that if the committee finds, for example, that the privy councillors' oath, or the Official Secrets Act, prevents witnesses from responding, then the committee would then report back to the Senate that it could not do its work? Is that a reasonable deduction from what has just been said?

Senator Oliver: I do not think it is a reasonable deduction. It is certainly not the only recourse. There would be others. For the committee to report back that it cannot do its work would probably be the last recourse. It would behoove the committee to find other ways to do its work.

Senator Stewart: I hope you will be helpful, because I am looking for answers. Can you give us some suggestions as to those other ways? You are learned in the law. I am sure you have anticipated these problems. Could you be candid with the house?

Senator Oliver: There is nothing that I have said today that has not been candid.

Senator Stewart: Then carry on, and be candid.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, perhaps the honourable senator might indulge me with respect to another question because I find the discussion between my colleagues on this side and Senator Oliver fascinating.

As a lawyer and counsel, there is another issue which I think was raised by Senator Oliver in his comments by way of historical analogy, and that was a reference to the Beauharnois affair. He touched on the fact that a member of this chamber was involved and thus suffered, I assume, some consequences because of wrongdoing, which appears to be one of the central, if not collateral, issues of this proposed inquiry.

I may be wrong about this, and perhaps either Senator Oliver or Senator Lynch-Staunton will respond to my question. Section 13 of the Charter, which came after the Beauharnois inquiry, as I recall, provides that incriminating evidence provided to a parliamentary committee may not be used directly or indirectly in subsequent criminal proceedings, except in a prosecution for perjury or the giving of contradictory evidence.

Is the purpose of this inquiry in some way truncated by the fact that if wrongdoing is ascertained by the committee, then no consequences would flow from its findings, save for perjury or providing demonstrably false evidence to the committee? Is that a consequence of this provision?

I return to the comments of my colleague Senator Bryden. I think it is appropriate for the Senate to be fully aware of all the possible outcomes before we embark on this costly inquiry. Having said that, however, I may find that this could be a very interesting and historic exercise.

Senator Oliver: I thank the honourable senator for his question.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators I, too, should like to ask a question. As everyone knows, I am not trained legally. However, I am curious.

It seems to me that all of these questions need to be answered. Setting aside the fact of the committee that we presently envisage looking into this matter, does the fact that such questions exist suggest to us that it would not be possible to have an independent royal commission?

The fact remains that serious allegations have been made. Serious suggestions of wrongdoing have been made. It is logical to me that those allegations and suggestions should be investigated. Those who made those allegations must have evidence which I have not seen. I do not think anyone has seen that evidence. Yet, the allegations persist.

None of the questions raised today would have ceased to exist if the government had decided to appoint a royal commission. I ask: Why are we in any different circumstance? We have already stated that we would have preferred a judicial inquiry. The only way left to us is an inquiry by the Senate.

I am not here to criticize anyone, but I am puzzled by all these questions. Of course these questions are legitimate, but are they offered as a reason for not proceeding? If they are, then how else do we proceed?

Senator MacEachen: Let us pass the motion.

On motion of Senator Berntson, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2:00 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

VICTORY IN EUROPE

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY COMMEMORATING THE CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, during the next few days, here in Ottawa, across the country and around the world, Canadians will be commemorating the fiftieth anniversary of the Allied victory in Europe — V-E Day. The sense of jubilation and relief felt by Canadians on May 8, 1945, was immense, and those feelings will be played out again and again across our country and throughout Europe this week and in the days ahead.

We will remember the final push made by the Canadian army to rout out pockets of enemy troops in the area surrounding Antwerp, to breach the German's Siegfried line and reach the Rhine River, and to advance steadily and relentlessly along the northern coastal areas of France and Holland. We will remember all those who gave their lives. We will remember with undiminished horror, rage and grief as a result of the revelations of the death camps, which forever surpass and defy comprehension.

Our armed forces overseas played a critical part in the liberation of Europe, particularly in the Netherlands where Canadians negotiated a truce enabling the Allies to bring in desperately needed relief supplies for the civilian population even before the German army finally surrendered. Our arrival there, we are told, was met with joy and tears of relief by those beleaguered people.

In the words of a Dutch teenager in the Hague that day:

> As the first tank came nearer...there was a big hush over all the people, and it was suddenly broken by a huge scream, as if out of the earth. And then the people climbed on the tanks...and they were crying. And then we were running with the tanks and the jeeps all the way into the city.

Liberation, honourable senators, was not achieved without great cost to Canada. Between September 1944 and May 1945, more than 7,000 Canadians had died in the effort to free the Netherlands. Since that time, Canadians have felt a very special kinship with the Dutch people, not only because of our role in the liberation, but also because from 1940 to 1945 Canada was home to then Crown Princess Juliana and her two daughters, current Queen Beatrix, and Princess Margriet, who was born here in Ottawa at the Civic Hospital.

Recognizing and appreciating this special relationship, the Prime Minister is leaving for the Netherlands today to participate in the V-E Day celebrations. On Saturday, Mr. Chrétien will be laying a wreath at the Groesbeek Canadian War Cemetery in Holland, where 2,338 Canadians are buried. He will be accompanied by a parliamentary delegation, including about 100 veterans who have made the trip to remember events half a century ago, to pay tribute to their fallen comrades and to renew friendships with many of the people they helped to liberate.

Honourable senators, on May 7, the Dutch will have a national parade at Apeldoorn with thousands of veterans present, during which paper maple leafs made by Canadian school children will be dropped over the ceremony. Here, on May 8, as all senators know, a commemorative ceremony will be held at the National War Memorial, where paper tulips made by Dutch children will be dropped over the Cenotaph.

As we pay our tributes over the years, we realize that our men and women in the Canadian forces did much more than help to restore freedom to Europe. They also ensured freedom for Canada and helped give to Canadians a great sense of our abilities, strength and spirit as a nation. In fact, they gave us a future.

In his address to his troops at the end of the war 50 years ago, Canadian General Henry Crerar said:

> 'Each for all' has been the guiding principle of the Canadian army in battle. That same principle is the essential one to which we must adhere if we are to assure the life and growth of democratic government in the world....Soldiers of Canada have worked [for] it in war; citizens of Canada can do no less in peace.

Today, honourable senators, we remember with pride, sadness and immense gratitude.

HALIFAX MKVII BOMBER

RECOVERY AND RENOVATION OF AIRCRAFT SUNK IN LAKE MJOSA, NORWAY, DURING WORLD WAR II

Hon. John Sylvain: Honourable senators, in the early hours of April 24, 1945, a Halifax MKVII, the type flown by crews of the Alouette Squadron 425, was engaged in a supply drop to the Norwegian resistance. The bomber was hit by German flak and was forced to ditch in Lake Mjosa. Fortunately, the crew escaped unharmed. The aircraft sank 700 feet into a very cold, Norwegian, watery grave.

The important fact about the Halifax bomber is that of the 39,000 combat sorties carried out by Canada's heavy bomber squadrons, 28,000 were flown on "Hallies," as they were called. The Halifax is now one of the rarest of all the "war birds." There exists only one, the Halifax MKIII, at a museum in Elvington, England.

Some few years ago, through underwater sonar imaging, the Halifax at the bottom of Lake Mjosa was located and found to have suffered minimal damage. A young commercial airline pilot, Karl Kjarsgaard, heard about it and took the initiative with Fred Jeffrey, DFC, and others, to found the Halifax Aircraft Association. A plan was developed to raise the Halifax, bring it to Canada, rebuild it and display it at the RCAF memorial museum in Trenton as a tribute to all Canadians who served so valiantly in the RCAF.

As a veteran of the RCAF during World War II, and even though I served with the RAF Transport Command instead of RCF Bomber Command, I was anxious to help Senator Jack Marshall, who became involved in the project, and to continue helping as honourary director of the project.

So many people contributed time, effort and money: the Norwegians, in recognition of our wartime help, have facilitated the acquisition of rights and permits through the help of our Canadian ambassador, Robert Pederson; Candive Marine Limited of B.C. will provide their deep dive technology to raise the aircraft; Norwegian companies are providing other technical assistance "for the Canadians, no charge"; the Department of National Defence will provide a Hercules aircraft to fly the aircraft remains home.

Furthermore, the Department of Veterans Affairs, Canadian Heritage and the Prime Minister's office have been of material assistance and enthusiastic support. A number of generous companies are making significant contributions to the cost involved, as well as a number of veterans' associations that are raising funds across the country.

When the Halifax MKVII bomber is finally brought to Canada, restored to its former glory and put on public display, Canadians will have before them a beautifully restored link to their glorious past.

The young men with whom I joined up more than half a century ago, like Sam Grant, who did his tour of operations on the Halifax and survived, and Dick Vature, who did not survive, as well as hundreds of others with whom I served, deserve this memorial as a tribute to their honour and their valour.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

WARS AND REMEMBRANCES

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE VICTORY IN EUROPE

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, celebrating the 50th anniversary of the day the big war ended has the approval of the folks who run Ottawa's war museum. They wondered aloud the other day who would be around to celebrate the 75th anniversary.

You might think that that is a good point, until you are drowned out by the loud harrumphing from veterans of World War I, who are still alive and still remembering after 77 poppy days along that winding long, long trail.

Like most veterans of most modern wars, the survivors of Passchendaele, Ypres and Vimy Ridge use anniversaries to promote determined efforts to set straight the record of what happened to them in their war. If anything keeps them going, it is their last gasps of reluctance to leave a true no-man's land to be captured by revisionists: revisionists who build their careers on self-serving interpretations of the principles and motivations of the dead, and depend for credibility on high school students who have never heard of the battles they fought.

A few days ago, funeral services were held in Toronto for J. Douglas MacFarlane, a veteran of the war that began for us in 1939 and ended in 1945. The job that MacFarlane undertook in that dreadful conflict was the scotching of rumour, fear, and on-the-spot revisionism among Canadian troops overseas. "Improvement of morale" was the purpose set forth by the military for The Maple Leaf, the newspaper of our army. However, MacFarlane, as The Maple Leaf's editor, saw a wider role, a more demanding purpose, and a more rewarding — if irreverent — role for himself and the writers and editors who worked under him. Thus instructed, The Maple Leaf loaded its cameras, typewriters and drawing boards in the saddlebags of a liberating army more than 50 years ago.

For a time when the war was over, MacFarlane worked as city editor of The Globe and Mail. In its obituary column the other day, The Globe and Mail article noted that, in 1945, the commander of the Canadian Forces in the Netherlands had removed MacFarlane from the editorship of The Maple Leaf "after he was critical of Canada's repatriation policy."

Like everything else written about this Essex Scottish officer's military career, that was an understatement. In his flagrant duel with the MacKenzie King government's posturing, MacFarlane and his helpers had not only been truthful about the messing about with the boats to take the soldiers home, they had published mean-spirited tributes to the people who had harboured the boats.

Beware of soldiers bearing poetry! While I was waiting in a Nissen hut at York for a boat to take me home, the following lines appeared on the front page of my copy of The Maple Leaf:

> Come fill the cup with atrabilious liquor,
> And drink to our Empire wide across the flood,
> For blood, as all men know than water's thicker,
> But water's wider, thank the Lord, than blood.

It was a long, ascending road that took J. Douglas, the parson's son and journalist innovator, to tasks as editor-in-chief of the old Toronto Telegram and editorial director of The Toronto Sun. His story fits no precise or handy classification of veteran this or veteran that. Each man or woman I knew in Canada's wartime forces had his or her own story to tell. For some, service was a lark, an adventure, and is a golden memory. For others, it was an agony, a burden, and is a nightmare still. However, for most, service was a duty reasonably expected of them and something that changed their lives.

On this day, 50 years ago, in a village called Witchford, near the city of Cambridge, a Canadian pilot named Robert Bradford, with a Canadian navigator named Robert Jackson, flew in Bomber Command. Their crew included these Britons: Roy Woodroffe, Denis Mattravers, Ken Syratt and Alan Cooper. Together, they dropped bombs on Germany, carried food to the Netherlands, and ferried Canadian soldiers back from Nazi prison camps. The only remarkable thing about them was that they trusted each other as they never had trusted people before. That was the beginning of lifetime friendships that cost them plenty of dollars and pounds sterling, flying back and forth across the Atlantic to check up on and pronounce upon each other.

Who was the seventh member of that Lancaster crew? That was me. Happy Anniversary.

MAURICE BOLDUC—FELICITATIONS ON ELECTION AS PRESIDENT OF L'ASSOCIATION PROFESSIONNELLE DES STÉNOGRAPHES OFFICIELS DU QUÉBEC

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sure you will join with me as I take a moment today to congratulate our Assistant Editor of French Debates, Maurice Bolduc, who received a very special honour in Montreal last weekend.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, he was unanimously elected president of the Association professionnelle des sténographes officiels du Quebec at its annual convention. This association, established in 1965, comprises 150 reporters working in French, English and bilingually. It has members in 14 law societies across Quebec and a board of directors of 10.

[English]

Mr. Bolduc first arrived on the Hill in 1966. He has spent 29 years as a key player in French Debates.

I am certain all honourable senators will join with me and with all of his Senate colleagues in extending him our warmest congratulations for achieving this honour.

[Translation]

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am pleased to join with the government leader in congratulating Maurice Bolduc on his rising to the presidency of his association. It is all to his credit, and I am sure that if he were entitled to speak, he would be the first to praise those on his team and share the honour with them.

We may be justifiably very proud — and I will take the opportunity today to say so — of the work of the Senate reporters. They work efficiently and quickly under particular conditions that are not always easy. Today I have the opportunity not only to congratulate Maurice Bolduc, but to thank all those he works with as well.

TWENTY-THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Thursday, May 4, 1995

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, has the honour to present its

TWENTY-THIRD REPORT

Your Committee has examined and approved the budget presented to it by the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources for the proposed expenditures of the said Committee for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1996, with respect to the continuation of its special study of National Protected Areas Strategy, as authorized by the Senate on Wednesday, April 27, 1994, Tuesday, November 29, 1994, and Tuesday, May 2, 1995. The budget is as follows:

|---|---|
| Professional and Other Services | $46,900 |
| Transportation and Communications | 16,185 |
| All Other Expenditures | 2,000 |
| TOTAL | $65,085 |

Respectfully submitted,

EARL A. HASTINGS
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(g), I move that the report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I assume that there is nothing terribly urgent about this report. In the ordinary course of events, it would be dealt with at the next sitting of the Senate, which is when I suggest we deal with it.

On motion of Senator Hastings, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

TWENTY-FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Thursday, May 4, 1995

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, has the honour to present its

TWENTY-FOURTH REPORT

Your Committee has examined and approved the budget presented to it by the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry for the proposed expenditures of the said Committee for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1996, with respect to the continuation of its special study of the future of agriculture in Canada, as authorized by the Senate on June 7, 1994 and on March 21, 1995. The budget is as follows:

|---|---|
| Professional and Other Services | $1,000 |
| Transportation and Communications | 10,100 |
| TOTAL | $11,700 |

Respectfully submitted,

EARL A. HASTINGS
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Hastings, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

TWENTY-FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Thursday, May 4, 1995

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, has the honour to present its

TWENTY-FIFTH REPORT

Your Committee recommends, notwithstanding the Procedural Guidelines for the Financial Operation of Senate Committees, three-twelfths of all committee budget applications received no later than May 31, 1995 be approved.

Respectfully submitted,

EARL A. HASTINGS
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Hastings, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

TWENTY-SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the twenty-sixth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration which deals with the 1995-96 budgets of Parliamentary Associations.

Honourable senators, this represents the first report with respect to the operation of the Joint Committee of the House of Commons and the Senate on the Administration of Parliamentary Associations. The report contains the budget established for the associations for the coming year.

In seeking the widest possible transparency for these figures, I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, May 9, 1995, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

EXPENDITURE MANAGEMENT SYSTEM

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AND REPORT UPON PROGRAMS AND OTHER DOCUMENTS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, May 9, 1995, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon Program Priorities and Expenditures as presented in Departmental Outlook and other public documents emanating from the new Expenditure Management System of the Government of Canada.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXTEND DATE OF FINAL REPORT

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move:

That notwithstanding the order of the Senate adopted on Wednesday, March 1, 1995, the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide, which was authorized to examine the legal, social and ethical issues relating to euthanasia and assisted suicide, be empowered to present its final report no later than May 31, 1995, and that the committee retain all powers necessary to publicize the findings of the committee contained in the final report until June 14, 1995.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—
COMMENTS OF MINISTER ON DELAY IN RENOVATIONS
ON TERMINALS 1 AND 2—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday the Minister of Transport was quoted as saying that a Senate inquiry into the Pearson agreements would delay the much-needed renovation work on Terminal 1 and Terminal 2.

It is certainly not the intention of anyone in this chamber, and certainly not on this side, to be party to a delay in any essential works at Pearson.

Perhaps the Leader of the Government could explain to us in what way a Senate inquiry into the agreements would, according to the minister, delay the much needed renovation work.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I must confess that I have not seen those comments by the Minister of Transport, and would certainly wish to see them and ask him about them before commenting.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Along the same lines, the leader's colleague has stated, in a written answer to the Senate, and the Leader of the Government has repeated that statement, that the adoption of Bill C-22 is necessary before renovations can begin because of certain legal impediments which only the passage of Bill C-22 would remove. On the other hand, every participant in the consortium, including those affected by so-called legal impediments, has agreed that they will not stand in the way of any renovations.

Why is the government not taking advantage of this and proceeding immediately to having the essential work carried out?

Senator Fairbairn: As I have said before in the Senate, it has been the policy — and the hope — of the government to clear the decks, as it were, on the whole question of the Pearson impediments, or whatever you wish to call them, through the legislative process. That has been the goal of the government and remains the goal of the government. I hope we can make progress on it.

In the past, my friends have suggested other avenues that might be approached. I would still suggest to my friends that the way in which the government has chosen to proceed — the cleanest way it has chosen to proceed — is the route of legislation by way of Bill C-22.

Senator Berntson: And the most unfair.

Senator Fairbairn: I hope we will make progress on that bill.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Finally, even if there were no Bill C-22, no inquiry and no legal impediments, is it not a fact that by cancelling the Pearson agreements, the government itself has caused a delay in the renovations of Terminal 1 and Terminal 2? That is a delay which may well last over a year, since any agreement between Transport Canada and the Greater Toronto Airport Authority will not be signed before April 1, 1996 at the earliest. Until then, no substantial work can take place.

Will the government spokesman here not agree that the cancellation of the agreements, while perhaps politically astute at the time it was taken, but not so astute in view of new facts that have come to light since, has also caused a delay in essential works because the government has absolutely no way to replace what the consortium was willing to do? We must now wait at least a year before the lease is agreed to between the airport authority and Transport Canada.

In other words, how can the Leader of the Government and her colleagues continue to deny, when faced with such convincing evidence, that the government itself is responsible for the delays through its bumbling and its ineptitude? How can they continue to maintain that, by delaying the passage of a heinous bill, we are responsible for these delays?

Senator Fairbairn: With great respect to my honourable friend, I would not share his definition of "convincing evidence." I would repeat again that the government took the position, well over a year ago, that it was the policy of the government at that time that the cancellation of the Pearson airport agreements and all of the obligations therein by way of this piece of legislation was the preferred option of the current government. That remains the policy today.

This bill also represented an effort to achieve, on behalf of the Canadian taxpayer, some protection against the potential loss of hundreds of millions of dollars that could occur without the passage of Bill C-22, and that also continues to be the position of the government.

PUBLIC WORKS

CANCELLATION OF BUILDING CONTRACT IN DORVAL, QUEBEC—SUBSTITUTION OF RENTAL AGREEMENT—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, this morning's issue of La Presse announced that the Department of Public Works has decided to exercise its option under a lease agreement for a building in Dorval, Quebec, which is occupied by the Department of the Environment.

According to La Presse's calculations, the exercise of this option would mean that the federal government is paying $175 per square foot for the building, when the cost of space in this class of building in Montreal is around $65 to $75 per square foot. That is a difference of $100 between the market value and the value of the option which the government just exercised.

An official, a certain Mr. André Godin, of Mr. Dingwall's department, Public Works, was willing to answer the questions of La Presse reporters. He explained that the department had done a financial analysis. This analysis, he said, demonstrated that:

> It is clearly and without a doubt to the government's advantage to acquire this building.

He would not allow La Presse to consult the analysis in question, saying that the transaction had not yet closed. He recommended that the paper attempt to obtain the document under the Access to Information Act.

My question, honourable minister, is clear. Can you reveal to us your calculations, your iron-clad evidence that the government should have exercised the option for $175 per square foot although the market value of a square foot in this building is only $75?

• (1440)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is all news to me. I will be pleased to follow it up with my colleague Mr. Dingwall.

Senator Nolin: In order to ensure a complete answer to my question, would the Leader of the Government ask her colleague to please provide all financial arguments, not merely a one-page written answer? What was the rationale behind the decision to acquire a building for $175 per square foot instead of $75 per square foot?

Senator Fairbairn: I will take the information my friend has provided and see what I can do for him.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—MEETING OF MINISTER WITH BRITISH COUNTERPART—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In Canada's foreign service magazine, bout de papier, spring edition, 1995, is an article entitled "Minister Maclaren Comes to Town," which raises certain questions, particularly as a result of the following statement:

> In the afternoon, High Commissioner Eaton accompanies the Minister to the meeting with his British counterpart. The cancellation of the Pearson airport contract...are discussed.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate please provide clarification by either responding to, or obtaining the answers to, the following questions: What was the date of this discussion? Who requested that this topic be placed on the agenda, and why? Could you please provide the minutes of the meeting? Was a follow-up to this discussion requested by anyone attending the meeting? Last, but not least, perhaps most important, were any British firms involved in the Pearson airport contract? If so, will they be treated in any way different from Canadian firms?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I will convey my honourable friend's questions to my colleague and seek a response.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

FUTURE OF PEACEKEEPING FORCES IN FORMER YUGOSLAVIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

The Hon. the Speaker: The Honourable Senator Ottenheimer.

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Approximately a month ago, Canada renewed —

Senator Cools: You should say "honourable senators," not "Mr. Speaker."

Senator Ottenheimer: I will speak the way I wish to as long as I am in order. The honourable senator will speak the way she wishes to. The Honourable Speaker recognized me, and I said, "Thank you, Mr. Speaker." I shall say it again: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Approximately a month ago, as honourable senators are aware, Canada renewed its peacekeeping commitment in the former Yugoslavia. The Minister of National Defence was careful to indicate that this was not an open-ended situation and that it was expected that progress towards peace would be made.

Honourable senators are aware that unfortunately, in the last number of days, there has been what one could call an "escalation" of the dangerous situation in that area. Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate in a position to provide the Senate with any update respecting Canada's intentions in the former Yugoslavia?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, to my honourable friend, I believe the Prime Minister responded in the House of Commons, in a very strong manner, about the renewal or outbreak of hostilities. He has indicated that the attack launched by the government troops in Croatia runs contrary to the efforts of the international community, including Canada, and therefore is forcefully condemned, as well as the retaliations by Croatian Serbs against civilian targets in Zagreb.

As always, the outbreaks in this area are of considerable concern to the government in terms of the security of our troops and also the threat to the civilian population there. We hope that the parties involved will not again resort to military operations, including attacks against civilians, to secure their aims. As my honourable friend will know, the government has commented on the rotation of troops in that area.

I have nothing more to add today.

Senator Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, the Honourable Minister of National Defence, speaking in the other place on March 29, mentioned the possibility that the United Nations may wish to alter Canada's mandate sometime in the future and may not wish to have Canada continue in both theatres — Bosnia-Hercegovina and Croatia — but rather to concentrate on Croatia.

The minister said:

> ...perhaps with a reformulated mandate in Croatia and a heightened Canadian presence there, we may be able to more effectively contribute in that area.

Is the minister in a position, now or at some future time, to provide details and parameters with respect to what the government has in mind, the nature of this reformulated mandate, and the extent of this heightened Canadian presence?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I am not in a position to do so today, but I certainly will speak with my colleague the Minister of National Defence to see how those considerations and discussions are progressing.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENT—LEGISLATIVE SOLUTION TO DISPUTE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I have a question that I do not think she will need to put to any of her colleagues. It is a question from one politician to another.

We have come quite a way in the last year and a half with regard to Bill C-22. There have been a tremendous number of developments in the court by way of appeals and damages sought by certain people. We have had meetings of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, albeit narrowly focused on constitutional issues and other grounds which have not been settled.

We are about to approve a motion to set up an awesomely hard-working committee which does not really know where it is going, but is searching for the truth, and with which the Leader of the Government agrees. However, she continues to refer to some type of legislative solution that would take place in the midst of all of this activity.

Could I ask the honourable leader what evidence she has to justify her confidence that a legislative solution will prevail? Why should we proceed with Bill C-22 in the face of such confidence?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it has certainly been clear from the comments of our colleague Senator Lynch-Staunton, and indeed from my own comments, that the discussions on Bill C-22 and the procedure on the inquiry are two completely separate tracks. We have approached the issue in this way, as has my honourable friend.

When I use the term "a legislated solution" — and my friend Senator Murray has queried me on this — I admit I should be less vague and simply say the passage of Bill C-22. Passage of the bill is still the preferred option of this government. That is a clear, unequivocal statement.

My optimism rests on the conviction that we in this house can work our way through the issues being dealt with in the hearings of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Chairman Beaudoin indicated that he believed, as do we, that there is room for agreement on the legislation. That, honourable senators, is my position. I continue to be optimistic, and I will not ask you today whether I should continue to be so. I hope we will be able to see our way clear in this house to approve that legislation in the same continuing manner of cooperation.

As far as the inquiry is concerned, as I indicated clearly on Tuesday, we are not opposing it. The inquiry covers a multitude of very important issues. We will participate and we will cooperate in such an inquiry. It is to be hoped that, at the end of the day, the Canadian people will have a much better understanding of what this issue is all about and how it has developed over a period some six years now.

In a nutshell, I see the two issues as being separate. We are committed to this bill. We would be delighted, through cooperation in this house, to achieve a successful conclusion and passage of it. I will stop talking about "legislative solutions" and stick clearly to "the passage of Bill C-22."

Senator MacDonald: I, too, agree that the two are separate. However, though you talk about giving the people of Canada an understanding of what is happening on this issue, I would be curious to discover what their reaction would be if a Senate inquiry, lasting a year more or less, were continuing, while, at the same time, something was happening that would induce this side to pass Bill C-22. That would restrict the actions of those seeking recourse and would, in turn, cause the people of Canada to realize that the bill already has been passed, and thus to ask: "What are they up to now? What are they doing? Will they spend the next year looking after just the reputations of people who may have been aligned or may not have been aligned? Are they studying some broader subject now?"

In the unlikely event of the passage of Bill C-22 before the report of this committee, is it not your opinion that that would cause even greater confusion in this country?

Senator Fairbairn: With great respect to my friend Senator MacDonald, I do not concur with his view. I do not see the possible passage of the bill as being something that would be an issue of great confusion. Following the election, it was very clear what the views of the government of Canada were on the issue of Pearson airport. That was very clear in the middle or towards the end of the election when the deal was signed in full view of the Canadian people and amid tremendous controversy.

In any event, the deal was signed. The election took place. A new government was elected. That new government undertook its responsibility to declare its policy on the signing of the deal. It produced a tough piece of legislation, one that has been steadfastly opposed by my honourable friends.

I am not arguing with my honourable friend. That is his right. That is the responsibility which the opposition has taken unto itself in disagreeing with this piece of legislation.

However, there is surely no disagreement as to the responsibility of the Government of Canada to make its policy decision on how to deal with this situation. The decision was made and the bill was drafted. The bill then came into the House of Commons; it was passed; it came here to the Senate. On the suggestion of the Senate, the House of Commons amended the bill and sent it back to the Senate. That bill is now before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, where it has been since last September.

We have held hearings. We have heard witnesses. The government has made proposals and has taken very seriously the concerns which have been raised in that committee — very seriously indeed. We are seeking the passage of Bill C-22, as it is the responsibility and the policy of this government to do by its decision. I do not see any confusion there at all.

We are now embarking upon an inquiry on the background of how this whole process took place, and why it happened. That is quite different from the issue of the cancellation of the deal, and the right of the Government of Canada to make that decision and to pursue it.

Where will it go from here? This afternoon, my honourable friend has given me a fairly obvious clue, and I will ponder that.

Senator MacDonald: Would you not agree that, as far as Bill C-22 is concerned, the ball is still in your court?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, the bill is before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. That committee can meet; they can discuss this bill further, and they can take a decision. On the floor of this chamber, I will not discuss with my honourable friend the proposals from either side as to how we should proceed. The fact of the matter is that the bill is before the committee. It is there to be discussed, to be debated by both sides, to progress and — presumably and hopefully — to be passed.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alastair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have two delayed answers, honourable senators.

Hon. Pat Carney: I hope one of them is mine. I have been waiting for months for an answer.

Senator Graham: I am sorry, Senator Carney, I do not have a response to your question.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): In connection with Senator Carney's question, I have received half of a response, and I am awaiting the other half.

Senator Graham: I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on March 21, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Cochrane regarding the scholarship program; also a response to a question raised in the Senate on April 6, 1995, also by the Honourable Senator Cochrane, regarding tuition fee increases.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

CANADA SCHOLARSHIPS PROGRAM—EFFECT OF CUTS—POSSIBILITY OF REPLACEMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Ethel Cochrane on March 21, 1995)

The Canada Scholarships Program (CSP) was created to encourage top students, particularly women, to study in science, engineering and technology, at a time when science & technology enrolment was declining.

Recent statistics show that enrolment of students in science & technology, particularly women, has increased steadily since 1988 when the CSP was introduced.

This is positive reinforcement pointing to the fact that the CSP has successfully fulfilled its objectives. These trends will continue without the added incentive of the CSP.

The CSP will not be offering new scholarships starting in 1995-96, but the federal government will honour its commitment to the existing scholars who meet the eligibility and renewal criteria.

As well, the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada and the Association of Canadian Community Colleges are working in conjunction with Industry Canada to explore the possibility of private sector sponsorships.

INCREASES IN UNIVERSITY TUITION FEES IN NEWFOUNDLAND—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Ethel Cochrane on April 6, 1995)

Canada has one of the best and most accessible higher education systems in the world. This reflects our very high level of financial support for universities and colleges. In fact, a recent OECD report, Education at a Glance, ranked Canada first among all members in the proportion of its GDP allocated to post-secondary education (2.4%).

The Government of Canada has long played an important role in supporting post-secondary education to further the achievement of a wide range of national economic, social and cultural objectives. In 1993-94, of the $15.2 billion spent on post-secondary education in Canada, federal support reached over $8 billion, or over half of the total support. Despite the important role played by the Government of Canada in supporting post-secondary education, it is essential to understand that provincial governments are responsible for the financing and management of their college and university systems, and in particular, for setting the level of tuition fees.

Provincial jurisdiction, together with the fact that federal transfers to provinces for post-secondary education are unconditional, means that there is no direct connection between federal transfers and provincially-set tuition. This is demonstrated in Newfoundland by the fact that university fees were raised by over 112% between 1984-85 and 1993-94, even though federal transfers in respect of post-secondary education have increased by more than $27 million during this period. One consequence of this arrangement is that the federal government cannot accurately predict the level of tuition fees in future years in Newfoundland or any other province.

Moreover, like many other provinces, Newfoundland has in recent years somewhat restrained its support for post-secondary education as part of a general effort to control provincial expenditures. Hence, the announcement of a further reduction in the province's latest Budget was not altogether a surprise.

As for the question of future debt loads experienced by Newfoundland students, they will, of course, depend in part on the level of tuition. As already pointed out, this is a matter for the provincial government to determine.

It should be noted, however, that the federal government has substantially improved the Canada Student Loans Program (CSLP) in the past year, increasing the maximum weekly loans from $105 to $165 per week. This will help greatly in a situation of rising student costs.

With respect to the reduction in federal funding of scholarship programs, Industry Canada will phase out the Canada Scholarships for science and technology students over the next few years, as part of that department's reductions in program spending.

Much as this Government regrets its elimination, this program only helped a very small percentage of students, and its disappearance will have little effect on the overall situation of post-secondary students. By contrast, the Canada Student Loans Program helps over 300,000 students per year.

The federal government is committed to supporting post-secondary education, and federal assistance will continue principally through the three established channels of transfers to provinces, aid to students, and university research funding.

As announced in the February 1995 Budget Speech, the new Canada Health and Social Transfer (CHST) will provide provinces with ongoing support for health, post-secondary education and welfare and allow them greater flexibility in addressing their priorities.

The Minister of Human Resources Development will be working with the provinces to develop appropriate principles and objectives to guide the CHST and continuing federal-provincial cooperation in the areas it covers, including post-secondary education support. The department will also continue to work with provincial authorities, as well as stakeholders, to further improve the Canada Student Loans Program as circumstances evolve.

CANADA COUNCIL

CLOSURE OF ART BANK—GOVERNMENT POSITION—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, does the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate anticipate an early response to a question I asked concerning the closing of the Art Bank of the Canada Council?

I ask the question because I wrote some weeks ago to the minister who answers in Parliament for the Canada Council. I have had no reply. I have also written to the director of the Canada Council. I have not received a reply. The council is in the process of terminating the art bank. We do not know what is happening and I would like an early reply.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have asked for a full report on all outstanding questions and I am pressing for appropriate answers. I will do my best to obtain them between now and the next sitting.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—
MOTION TO STRIKE SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO PRIVATIZATION CONTRACTS ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by the Honourable Senator Berntson:

> That a special committee of the Senate be appointed to examine and report upon all matters concerning the policies and negotiations leading up to, and including, the agreements respecting the redevelopment and operation of Terminals 1 and 2 of Lester B. Pearson International Airport and the circumstances relating to the cancellation thereof;
> That seven Senators, designated by the Committee of Selection no later than two weeks after adoption of this motion, act as members of the special committee, and that three members constitute a quorum;
> That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;
> That the committee have the power to sit during adjournments of the Senate;
> That the committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical, stenographic and such other staff as deemed advisable by the committee;
> That the committee have power to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings; and
> That the committee present its final report to the Senate no later than one year following the striking of the committee.—(Honourable Senator Oliver)

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators —

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to remind the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on his motion.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, while listening to the Leader of the Government speak to this motion on Tuesday, I could not help but be reminded of a quote by Shakespeare in Macbeth:

> Is this a dagger which I see before me,
> The handle before my hand?

After reading her remarks with the attention they deserve, however, I found that the quotation was most inappropriate.

Our friends on the other side, by the admission of their leader, have bowed to the realities of the makeup of this place. "We on this side will not oppose this motion" is how Senator Fairbairn put it. That is not exactly a ringing endorsement, particularly as she did not come out and actually support the inquiry. This being said, her commitment "to participate fully and actively in the committee study," to use her words, is both most welcome and reassuring.

As Senator Oliver pointed out yesterday, the strength of this place lies in its committees. Whether engaged in routine reviews or special studies, Senate committees make major contributions to the improvement of legislation and the formulation of policy. An invaluable escalation of public awareness of faults and virtues in the law-making process and purpose is an added dividend of labours so carefully undertaken. We must all be aware, however, that we will be agreeing to engage here in a totally different committee activity than we are used to; namely, one that can be compared to the duties of a judicial inquiry or even a royal commission.

I agree with Senator Bryden that we may be venturing into the unknown and I admit to some apprehension as we approach such responsibilities. On the other hand, from what has been said about the Pearson agreements from the very day the Liberal government was sworn in — and relentlessly replayed, and repeated again only yesterday — I will spare my colleagues a catalogue of the invective calumny and bile; the words are all too familiar to us — this government itself has the full responsibility to initiate a thorough investigation into the terrible allegations that its ministers and members continue to spew in the other place.

Here is what the Minister of Transport is quoted as saying only yesterday concerning the Pearson agreements.

> Unless a person is blind or stupid or both, they have to know it stinks.

When asked to substantiate this repeated assertion, the mouthpiece of the party in power refuses, referring us instead to his favourite muckraking author.

What kind of society will allow libel to be equated with truth, pitiful ravings with profound thought and brutal assaults on reputations with acceptable public policy?

Excessive political rhetoric during election campaigns, however offensive, is part of the heat of the moment. However, when it is repeated and embellished endlessly in chamber, committee room and meeting hall by members of the Government of Canada, then we say that the bounds of decency have been overstepped, particularly when innuendoes and accusations of just about every reprehensible activity one's imagination can conceive are never supported with a single shred of evidence.

What is the result? What has come of what has been said again and again for over a year by supporters of the government? The reputations of hundreds of people in the public service and in private enterprise have been soiled since we have heard grave accusations, including many directed at members on both sides of this chamber.

Rather than attribute its claims to regrettable rhetorical excess, the government thrives on the canards that can only lead one to conclude that they are deliberately crafted and explicitly broadcast by party spin doctors. Senator Fairbairn dismisses this by saying that when the Liberals were in opposition here they were subjected to "a number of regrettable actions and remarks from former government voices." This may be so, but did a Conservative minister ever challenge the motives of Liberals sitting on a committee? Did a Conservative minister ever go to a Senate committee and tell the Leader of the Opposition that he was there to defend the interests of a particular group rather than to study the legislation before that committee with the serious thought it deserves?

I ask you to check the transcript of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs at its first meeting on Bill C-22.

Senator Stanbury: Those are nasty remarks.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Nastiness is one thing; libel and calumny are something else.

Were Liberals ever accused of lining their friend's pockets; of having executed the biggest ripoff in Canadian history; of delaying legislation to the advantage of political supporters? If an inquiry is not held, Canadians will understandably keep on questioning and doubting all those involved in the Pearson agreements. Certainly, some will even believe that we have been conniving to raid the public purse. Let's face it: An inquiry is long overdue.

The Leader of the Government reminded us that I introduced the motion with little enthusiasm. Now that we have been assured by Senator Fairbairn that she and her colleagues will not object, it is still with little enthusiasm that I close the debate.

Honourable senators, mark my words: A Senate inquiry of the nature proposed is not the best way to proceed. The committee will be made up of members of two political parties which naturally have a vested interest in the outcome. No matter how circumspect their participation, the neutral approach which I hope they will take will naturally be suspect.

There is a much better way to proceed, one which we have promoted repeatedly in recent months and which I urge the government to adopt. It would be to the advantage of all, including that of the government, to establish an inquiry under the Inquiries Act and to appoint one or more persons to conduct it with the same terms of reference as in the motion before us. Non-partisanship would then not only be assured but also — and more significantly — it would be perceived to be assured.

Surely the government has a an obligation, now that it has abandoned its opposition to an inquiry, to assure that the examination is conducted under the most auspicious circumstances possible. The Inquiries Act allows this, and we are so supportive of this approach that I will be the first to propose that this motion be rescinded once the government accepts to invoke the Inquiries Act.

Let us be clear on what the committee's mandate. It is to look into every aspect of what led to the conclusion of the Pearson agreements and their cancellation and to report their findings on the agreements themselves and all those involved in them. This is neither an exercise in whitewashing nor in mud-slinging. It is a study of certain events which have been condemned by the government and its advisors as favouring a select few at the expense of Canadians as a whole. Why anyone would refuse an independent examination of such serious allegations is beyond many of us.

Failing a judicial review which only the government can institute, I do not envy those who will accept to serve on the Senate committee. They will be asked to devote many long days and nights to an analysis which, more often than not, will be tedious and tiring. Theirs is a heavy responsibility, but I am confident that it will be carried out in the best of Senate tradition.

Questions have been raised regarding the attendance of witnesses, solicitor-client privilege, and the status of privy councillors and members of Parliament. I have no ready answer to any of these, or to any other legitimate concerns regarding the committee's methodology. I could quote from the Parliament of Canada Act and from Beauchesne, but I would prefer that the committee itself explain its procedures to senators when its budget is submitted to us for approval by the Internal Economy Committee. As senators know, once a committee has been charged with a specific mandate, it must submit a budget to the Internal Economy Committee, which then makes the appropriate recommendation to this place. At that time, a full discussion on the questions raised by Senators Bryden, Grafstein, Stewart, Prud'homme and Kelly can certainly take place to the satisfaction of everyone.

As for the budget, I have no doubt that, faced with the reality of the fiscal strait-jacket in which Canada finds itself, its members will be ruthless in their preparations, while insisting that economy is not an excuse for work neglected or undone.

Let us at all times never lose sight of the circumstance which has brought us to this solemn course of action: the insupportable, unacceptable calumny which has been spoken as truth, and spread as unfounded rumour, against good men and women in the consortium, the public service and this chamber.

Again I lean on William Shakespeare to express what gravely troubles us, with the clarity of expression which is his alone. Shakespeare said this about the wickedness of rumour in Henry IV, Part II:

> a pipe...
> of so easy and so plain a stop
> That the blunt monster with uncounted heads,
> The still, discordant, wavering multitude
> Can play upon it.

Senator Stewart raised the point that in the motion the word "designated" is used regarding the role of the Senate Committee of Selection. He is quite right; the word should be "nominated." I am willing to make the appropriate motion that the word be changed so that we are very clear that the Senate Committee of Selection will be asked to nominate the members of the committee and then submit a report to this chamber for ratification.

On that note, honourable senators, I urge the adoption of this motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that, in paragraph 2, the word "designated" be changed to the word "nominated"?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

THE SENATE

IMPACT OF DECISION OF HOUSE OF COMMONS TO CEASE PUBLICATION OF COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier rose pursuant to notice of April 5, 1995:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the decision of the other place concerning the publication of committee proceedings, to the serious impact of that decision on the proceedings of the joint committees of the Senate and the House of Commons, and to the issue of whether that decision is in compliance with the constitutional requirements of section 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

Honourable senators, this inquiry is a result of the decision by the other place to significantly amend the way minutes, testimony and committee proceedings in general are kept or transmitted.

During its meeting of February 28, 1995, the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons unilaterally adopted measures designed, among other things, to discontinue the editing, translation and printing of all deliberations of the parliamentary committees for one year, on a trial basis, as of April 1, 1995.

This new policy is dealt with in a declaration signed by the Speaker of the House of Commons, which reads as follows:

> The format of the minutes will be changed and the transedited transcript of the original text and its translation will be available in separate French and English versions. (Transedition is a process which allows for limited control by eliminating overlaps in the tapes, repetitions and quotes.) A bilingual table of contents will be annexed to each transcript, instead of an index. Members of Parliament, researchers and members of the parliamentary press gallery will have access to the minutes on PubNet, the service providing electronic broadcast for House of Commons documents. However, the text of the transcript will not be officially published.

This decision was made public on February 28, 1995.

This policy, which was adopted unilaterally by the House of Commons, will impact on the activities of the Senate. Indeed, the two houses have four joint committees, three of which are administered by the House, and one by the Senate. These committees are the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages, the interparliamentary board, the Standing Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament, and the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations which, as we know, is under the authority of the Senate.

Consequently, if the other place refuses to continue to bear the costs related to the translation and printing of the proceedings of these committees, the Senate will have no choice but to bear them until a consensus is reached by the two Houses.

In fact, it would seem that the management of the House of Commons offered this house to provide the service, with costs to be shared between the two Houses in the usual way, that is to say on a 70-30 per cent basis for the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages, and a 50-50 split was agreed on for the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations.

By imposing this new service charge on the Senate, is the House of Commons not overstepping its authority? Moreover, did the Senate consider adopting a position similar to that of the Commons and no longer having the minutes of proceedings of its committees translated and printed? In that case, the Senate must ask itself if Parliament has a legal, constitutional and moral right to do so. On the one hand, there are financial and organizational considerations and, on the other hand, the constitutional argument.

Section 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867, states that:

> Either the English or the French language may be used by any Person in the Debates of the Houses of the Parliament > of Canada and of the Houses of the Legislature of Quebec; and both these Languages shall be used in the respective Records and Journals of those Houses..

Subsection 18(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, 1982, reads, and I quote:

> The statutes, records and journals of Parliament shall be printed and published in English and French and both language versions are equally authoritative.

Subsection 4(3) of the Official Languages Act passed by the Parliament of Canada in 1988 could not possibly be clearer. It reads as follows:

> Everything reported in official reports of debates or other proceedings of Parliament shall be reported in the official language in which it was said and a translation thereof into the other official language shall be included therewith.

Section 5 of the act goes on to state the same thing about journals and other records of Parliament. And, as we know, pursuant to Section 3 of the Official Languages Act, Parliament is subject to this act.

In a press release dated March 22, the Board of Internal Economy indicated this decision would result in savings of $4.8 million a year. This estimate is grossly exaggerated because, according to the experts I have consulted, fiscal year 1994-95, a post-election year, was a record year in terms of the translation of minutes of proceedings of committees, the annual average having been exceeded by six million words. This is understandable. During an election year, the House does not sit; therefore, there is no translation and no heavy burden on the services.

If cuts are indeed necessary — and I am convinced that they are — must they necessarily be made at the expense of this country's linguistic duality, one of our intrinsic strengths? Institutional bilingualism is what permits all of us to communicate with each other, without necessarily being bilingual. This is what unites us and brings us together.

Honourable senators, rather than jeopardizing national unity, I think that the whole point of transcribing our debates is that historians, journalists, and people interested in the Debates of the House of Commons and the work of its committees should be able to obtain an accurate report of what was discussed in the committees.

That is not exactly what will happen. This annoys, irritates and worries me! I will tell you why.

We can expect a good interpreter, at the best of times, to be accurate and reliable approximately 70 per cent of the time. Hence, 30 per cent is lost in the interpretation!

When they are dealing with senators or members of Parliament, who speak quickly, who do not always articulate as they should, who sometimes use technical terms, who may not have had the time to organize their thoughts in a logical manner and who may be rambling on a bit, interpreters can only transmit 60 per cent of what was said.

This would mean that the transcripts in the years to come would not be accurate or reliable. These documents would be neither reliable nor exact renderings of what senators or members of Parliament have said.

I am still referring to the four committees for which we share responsibility with the House of Commons, the joint committees. The House of Commons has already made a decision regarding the other ones — I hope that this House will not make such an unfortunate decision! Should such a decision be onsidered, it would have to be debated. For the moment, it has not come to that.

We have a problem with the four joint committees. I would like this house to take a position on the issue and to mandate a committee to examine the appropriateness of translating and revising the texts from our committees and of using the traditional cost-sharing ratio of 70-30 for some committees and 50-50 for others.

My question is this: What message is the House of Commons' new policy sending to the provinces of Canada, which are already not keen on official languages? How can we hope to protect and promote the country's two official languages when we ourselves are sending out mixed messages? How can we impose on all federal agencies and institutions laws which the Senate and the House of Commons do not even respect?

We require that agencies translate documents, but now, here in the Senate and in the House of Commons, we are saying that we are going to get around this obligation placed on us by the Official Languages Act, which was adopted by Parliament in 1988.

Honourable senators, I asked the question: Why continue to translate a ton of documents, which will gather dust sitting on the shelves of the Department of National Defence, for example? They are technical documents and cost millions of dollars to translate. All we are going to save in the Parliament of Canada with this policy is $1 million and not $4.8 million.

The $3.8 million are for translation services, paid for by Public Works, will save money because no more contracts will be given out.

Honourable senators, I am raising the question. I think we must give serious thought to the appropriateness of following the route taken by the House of Commons. I would like this house to decide fairly definitely and directly that we will continue to do what we have always done, which is to give Canadians an exact translation of the debates in this institution.

Here is an extract from a letter sent to the Speaker of the House of Commons by the president of the Ordre des traducteurs et interprètes agréés du Québec:

> Simultaneous translation meets the need for immediate communication. Unlike translators, who usually have longer to translate, research and revise their texts, interpreters must process information on the spot, as they receive it and without reference material. They can neither request details nor backtrack. Their first translation is always their final one. While, orally, the translation of a professional interpreter, with all the expression and intonation he or she can muster, serves communications needs well, the transcription of it is a whole other matter. It may well lack details and contain omissions, thus failing to convey the spirit of the message.

Honourable senators, I warn you and guarantee you that, both here and in the other place, points of order will be raised regarding the interpretation given in committees as to what a member or a senator allegedly said. We will have to deal with a whole host of things we never had to deal with in the past.

I submit to you that we could avoid it all by adapting our own organizations. I contend, in all honesty, that if we want to save money, if that is the objective, we must look at the question honestly.

We have organizations we should perhaps look at here and in the other place. There is overlap, duplication and unnecessary expenditures. We have two transportation systems, two sets of clerks, two security systems. We have terrible duplication.

If we really want to start telling Canadians we intend to save money, I think we should take a good look at our own administration.

I can give you some examples. I have been here only four months, but I am still amazed at how we duplicate services we have in common, such as procurement. Purchases are made by the House of Commons and the Senate. No consultation!

As far as daily communications are concerned, certain procedures here in the Senate duplicate what is being done in the House of Commons. We could make a whole list of activities to be examined very carefully so we can eliminate what can be eliminated. Instead of coming down hard on official languages, perhaps we could improve management to make it more effective and efficient.

Honourable senators, I do not want to take up too much of the Senate's time, but in concluding, I would like to say that we must not go along with the theory that the interpretation is satisfactory. I know people will argue that the interpretation is what a unilingual person hears when he or she has to vote on a matter. In the end, what a senator or a member of the House of Commons does is vote on matters of national importance.

I have been told that if it is enough for a senator or a member of the House of Commons to hear the interpretation in order to vote on a matter, we should consider that in committee the interpretation may be adequate for the purposes of understanding the evidence.

This is such a lousy argument that I do not want to waste too much time refuting it, but I just want to say one thing. If this argument stands, then we should also be able to argue that everything that preceded the vote is predicated on this not very precise, not very reliable "maybe."

I know that is not true. I know that both senators and members of the House of Commons realize that. Before they decide which way they vote, the whips are there to provide information to those who need it more than others. The House leaders are also there to advise their caucus on the subject and scope of a particular vote before the House.

That is the only argument I have heard which, according to the experts, might persuade this house to make a decision similar to the one made by the House of Commons. Honourable senators, I submit that this argument is flawed and that we should stand tall, and tell the House of Commons: "We will not go through with this; we will not take action that is so retrograde; and we will continue to publish and translate the testimony we hear in committee, for as long as this will be necessary."

I think it is penny wise and pound foolish to tell Canadians that we are actually saving money. Just imagine, we saved a million dollars, when I know perfectly well that we could save one, two, three or four million dollars by streamlining our services in the House of Commons and the Senate to make them more effective and more efficient.

Honourable senators, I have one last comment. If the Senate agrees, I would like to see this question debated. I understand that we, in this place, need motions in order to take any kind of action.

I would move a motion to refer this question to committee. I do not know how to do this because I am new to the Senate, but I will try to see how this works.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: You cannot proceed like this, Senator Gauthier. You need a notice of motion.

Senator Gauthier: I know we have to give notice of a motion, but it is possible to do things differently, with leave of the Senate. In that case, I intend to move, notwithstanding rule 58, later on if necessary, the following motion:

> That the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders consider and report on:
> (i) the effects on the Standing Joint Committee(s) of the decision by the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons concerning the editing, translation and printing of Committees Issues; and
> (ii) the need for the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons to consult the Senate before making decisions on matters that concern both Houses of Parliament.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, if you please, I would like to ask Senator Gauthier a question. I will have to get used to using his title; after all, he is a former colleague of mine from the House of Commons!

He alluded several times to the overlap between the administration of the two Houses. He did not specify where the overlap occurred. Would the honourable senator give us pertinent examples?

Senator Gauthier: Honourable senators, I will begin by thanking my colleague, Senator Corbin. There are many examples, and I will begin with the clerks. There are two different sets of clerks, one for the Senate and one for the House of Commons. A clerk is a clerk, as far as I am concerned!

Senator Corbin: Are you talking about a Clerk of Committee?

Senator Gauthier: Yes, Senator Corbin. A Clerk of Committee is a Clerk of Committee! The Rules of the House and of the Senate may differ slightly, but this is not a serious issue. One could become accustomed to it. They are well-paid, so they will adjust! We could rationalize and combine the two to make one Clerk for all of Parliament.

Now let is discuss transportation on Parliament Hill: There are buses for the Senate and buses for the House of Commons. We could create one bus system for all of Parliament.

With regard to security, if you want to go to the East Block, at 5:30 p.m., honourable senators, do not attempt to enter by the Senate door because it is locked! You have to take the East Block's south door, the one for the House of Commons.

If guests coming to see you — please let me use a bit of humour here — go to the House of Commons entrance, they are not allowed in and they must use the Senate entrance. Hence, even if they wanted to, your guests would not be able to sign in or to enter the East Block by the House of Commons door. They must go back outside, walk back to the other end of the East Block and go in the Senate door, which is locked by 5:30 p.m.

If your guest happens to be handicapped, there is an entrance with wheelchair access, and that is the entrance for the Senate. Security has to be called to open the door.

These are all working conditions I consider obsolete and hardly acceptable if we want to be efficient.

Take, for instance, the issue of purchasing. The procedure here is not the same as that for the House of Commons. Yet, we buy the same items: paper, pencils and everything else we need to run Parliament.

I know something about security procedures in this place, because I have been on Parliament Hill for 22 years. I believe that a joint security service for both Houses of Parliament would be far more effective and much easier to control at a time when we may be faced with some very difficult situations. A single security system would be sufficient and, I think, far more effective.

I could go on, if you like, but I think I said enough to give you some idea of what I have in mind.

On motion of Senator Beaudoin, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, there is a point I would like to clarify.

Senator Gauthier mentioned a motion. According to the Rules of the Senate, advance notice must be given that a motion will be tabled. Does His Honour consider that what Senator Gauthier has said can be considered notice as required by the rules?

The Hon. the Speaker: Unfortunately, I cannot accept this as notice because it came in the middle of a debate on an inquiry.

One of the senators would have to move that we revert to Orders of the Day under "Notices of Motions"; Senator Gauthier would then be able to table his notice of motion and the motion could be discussed two days later.

If anyone wishes to suggest this, this is, of course, a possibility.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR COMMITTEE TO STUDY AND REPORT UPON DECISION OF HOUSE OF COMMONS TO CEASE PUBLICATION OF COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motion:

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, I give notice that, on Wednesday next, April 10, 1995, I will move:

> That the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders examine, for report purposes:
> (i) the consequences on the joint committees of the decision by the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons regarding the revision, translation and publishing of committee issues, and
> (ii) the need for the Senate to be consulted by the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons, prior to its decisions, on matters relating to the two Houses of Parliament.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 9, 1995, at 2:00 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, May 9, 1995

The Senate met at 2:00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE LATE HONOURABLE JOHN BLACK AIRD, Q.C.

TRIBUTES

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I rise today in sadness to pay tribute to a former senator and Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, John Black Aird, who passed away Saturday, just one day after his 72nd birthday.

The list of John Aird's achievements is long and distinguished, but many senators here would remember him as a Liberal senator from Ontario, a fine colleague, and a good friend who was appointed to this place back in 1964 and resigned 10 years later to become Chairman of the Institute for Research on Public Policy.

In his first speech in this place, John Aird said with great humility that he would do his best to justify his appointment and dedicate himself to the full and proper discharge of his duties in this chamber. He certainly did that in this house, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, as an active member of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, and as chairman of the Canadian section of the Canada-U.S. Permanent Defence Board, which he carried on even after he had left this place.

When he resigned from this chamber in 1974, John Aird had certainly more than fulfilled his duty. He went on to carry out that same steadfast commitment to public service which he brought to all of the other positions he held throughout his lifetime.

His achievements stretch from serving as a lieutenant in the Royal Canadian Navy from 1942 to 1945 during the Second World War to serving as Ontario's Lieutenant Governor from 1980-85, with many other accomplishments in between and beyond.

A lawyer and a businessman, John Aird was former Chancellor of the University of Toronto and Chancellor Emeritus of Wilfrid Laurier University. He held six honourary degrees, numerous corporate directorships and founded the Lieutenant Governor's Games for Disabled Children.

As Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Ontario, he truly took that office to the people. During his tenure, his concern for physically challenged children was profound and he became a champion of their needs. He took up sign language so that he could communicate with deaf people. Some honourable senators may remember his personal and unprecedented appeal for a liver transplant for three-year-old Lindsay Eberhardt in 1985.

During the tributes given to John Black Aird upon his retirement from this place, it is interesting to note the comments from his friends not only on this side but also on the other side, particularly a fellow Torontonian, then Senator David Walker, who said:

> Senator Aird is a delightful person, and an unusual person to be in politics. He is shy and modest, two characteristics very seldom seen in political figures... He is conscientious... He works hard at whatever he does.

Former Senator Jacques Flynn said:

> His counsel is much sought after and his opinions enjoy the respect of everyone....a man of ideas and actions — one of the best, in fact.

Honourable senators, an old friend of his, Senator Perrault, referred to him on that occasion as a "modest man of many talents." That would be echoed by those who have known him over the years.

His contribution to public life was rich. We extend our condolences and our very best wishes to his wife Lucille and his family.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, one evening not long after I came to this place, I found myself seated for dinner at a table where the guests included a half dozen of the most accomplished and influential people in Canada. The best-looking one of the men — the one who looked most like my calculation of what a gentleman senator should look like — was John Black Aird. By then, of course, he was no longer a senator. He had given up the hectic pace of the Upper Chamber for the prestigious post of Chairman of the Institute for Research on Public Policy.

• (1410)

As we have already heard from the Leader of the Government in the Senate, John Black Aird was a veritable compendium of important responsibilities. To be a captain in the Queen's Navy would be accomplishment enough for your average overachiever, but add senior partner in a famous law firm, premier benefactor of the Canadian Institute for Advanced Research, Chancellor of the University of Toronto, Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Ontario — add all of those together and you begin to get the profile of John Aird. Peter Newman, the acknowledged authority on such matters, described him as the man who possessed more titles than almost any other Canadian.

It would be wrong to leave the impression of a man consumed with the "big ticket" items of a lifetime of service to private and public institutions. I knew him best for his capacity to become visibly excited and publicly enthused with the discovery of yet another way in which he could contribute to the health and happiness of disadvantaged kids in great need of a wise and willing friend in high places.

We are not surprised that he was a director of the Lester Pearson College of the Pacific, but who would have expected him to turn up as the Honorary Patron of the City of Toronto Children's Network?

For members of this chamber, John Black Aird is proof that there can be a useful life after the Senate. Like a multitude of Canadians who have reasons of their own, we are grateful.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I wish to associate myself with the well-deserved tributes by Senators Fairbairn and Doyle to the late John Black Aird.

His beloved wife and his closely knit family will be devastated by his loss. One of his most attractive attributes was that he was a family man, and he extended his compassion for his family to the disadvantaged children of the community.

John Aird was a Liberal "bagman" and suffered all the opprobrium afflicted by the media on him and many of his colleagues who have fulfilled that responsibility from time to time. John saw that role as a respectable civic duty and carried it out with unquestionable integrity, as he did the raising of funds for so many other worthy causes.

Mr. Aird was one of the pillars of the revitalization of the Liberal Party under Lester B. Pearson in the late 1950s and early 1960s. His 10 years in the Senate were an example of productive energy and superb service.

Much has been written in the last few days about the marvellous impact on the province of his stewardship as Lieutenant Governor of Ontario. My own observation is that it has not been at all overstated.

John Aird was a great lawyer, a great Liberal, a great senator, a great Lieutenant Governor, a great counsellor, family man and friend. I know, honourable senators, that we are all grateful that he lived, and deeply saddened by his death.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, those of us who had the privilege of serving with John Black Aird will remember him as one of the most admired and respected members of this chamber.

As has already been documented by those who spoke before me, Senator Aird, after leaving this place, enjoyed a remarkable and varied career in public life and served two great Canadian universities as chancellor. He was a man of deep conviction. He was a man of uncompromising principles. As was indicated by Senator Stanbury, he was a devoted husband and father, a great family man. He led by example.

To me, personally, John Aird was always a source of advice and, indeed, of inspiration. Over the years, he raised millions of dollars, not just for his own political party but for many worthy causes. However, it was a small, perhaps insignificant, story which touched me very personally.

I go back to the year 1987, when I was chairing an international conference on human rights. John Aird's daughter Katie was very much involved with that work, acting as an executive assistant. She talked to her dad every night by telephone. One night, she told her father that Al Graham needed a new bicycle. In his usual quick, generous, magnanimous, very thoughtful way, John Aird responded "Well, he can have my old one," which he had driven on only one occasion. It is an old Raleigh. Any honourable senator who would like to ride around Ottawa may borrow it. I ride it generally very early in the morning, and sometimes late at night, or on weekends if I happen to be in Ottawa.

I raise that as being a human story about the very human qualities of our late friend as exhibited on all occasions.

I am sure all honourable senators join me in extending to his wife, Lucille, and members of his family, our condolences and our very sincere and deep sympathy.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, May 10, 1995, at one thirty o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SPECIAL ECONOMIC MEASURES (HAITI) REGULATIONS, 1993

REPORT REFERRED TO FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

> That the report on the operation of the Special Economic Measures (Haiti) Regulations, 1993 made by Orders in Council in 1993 and 1994, tabled in the Senate on May 4, 1995, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

• (1420)

LOBBYISTS REGISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-43, to amend the Lobbyists Registration Act and to make related amendments to other Acts.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday, May 11, 1995.

HEALTH

CANADA HEALTH ACT—PLAN TO AMEND—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Duncan J. Jessiman: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Recently, the Prime Minister announced his government's goal to reduce health care expenditures in relation to GDP by 2 per cent to 3 per cent. He also said that he does not believe that Canadian standards for health care will fall, even though the provinces which deliver the services will receive less money.

Someone once called this kind of thinking "voodoo economics" — cut federal expenditures, cut federal influence, cut federal dialogue with the provinces and, in the process, send a clear signal to the provinces that the federal government intends to act unilaterally or not at all in regard to changes to the Canada Health Act.

When will the Prime Minister outline his government's plan to amend the Canada Health Act?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend Senator Jessiman knows that the Prime Minister has stated over and over again his commitment to preserve medicare in this country and to maintain the five principles set out in the Canada Health Act. He has been clear in his statements about protecting and maintaining the best health act in the world.

The Prime Minister's concern, that of provincial governments across the land and that of the Minister for Human Resources Development, is that the resources be used in the best possible manner to protect the fundamentals of the Canada Health Act and the services provided through it to Canadians. Also, he has initiated a longer-term study into health services and the health system of Canada through the Canada Health Forum which is currently in progress.

My honourable friend talked about the government or the Prime Minister working in isolation from the provinces. That is not the intention at all. The intention is to work closely with the provinces to maintain the best standards and the best services for Canadians.

Senator Jessiman: Honourable senators, is the answer that there is a plan to amend the Canada Health Act or that there is not a plan to amend the act?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, the answer is that the government has stated firmly that it is committed to working with the provinces and the territories to improve the efficiency and the effectiveness of our health system within the five principles of medicare as contained in the Canada Health Act.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS

CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCES ON MATTERS CONCERNING FISCAL TRANSFERS

Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I would remind the minister that the conditions she is talking about in connection with health insurance, that the system must be public, universal and portable, were agreed upon by the Government of Canada and the provinces during the 1960s.

Secondly, the minister knows that, in Bill C-76, the government intends to impose principles and objectives — the actual words of Bill C-76 — not only in the area of health, but also in post-secondary education and income security programs — and ultimately, even theoretically, for other programs such as a day care network — which come under provincial jurisdiction.

I believe that the Minister of Finance gave an opening during debate in the House of Commons saying that he wanted to clarify the bill.

Is the aim of a good understanding of Canadian federalism not to be able to come to an agreement — negotiated freely between the Government of Canada and the provinces, with the parties coming to terms freely — so that the national objectives in these areas of provincial jurisdiction may be met, instead of having, as Bill C-76 provides, the federal government simply consult the provinces in areas under their jurisdiction and then ultimately decide unilaterally, if no agreement was reached, on the objectives in these areas of activity?

In other words, does the government intend, in these very important areas of activity, to follow the letter and the spirit of the Canadian Constitution, which provides that these areas come under provincial jurisdiction? Canada's provinces have no need of the opinion or the dictums of big brother federal government in deciding what is good for their people.

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend appeared to indicate at one point in his question that there was a view within the federal government of imposing principles and objectives on the provincial governments. My interpretation may be as a result of the translation.

The government has been clear that in the proposed transfers, which are a combination of tax and cash, the federal government will maintain the standards that are already in place within the Canada Health Act. It will protect the mobility standard under social assistance.

Anything else that is discussed between the provinces and the federal government would be to the end of working out an agreement which is mutually beneficial to the provinces and the federal government. There is no question of the federal government imposing on the provinces.

It has been clearly stated that the purpose of the negotiations and the discussions that will take place in this important area is to determine whether there are mutually beneficial objectives that can be achieved in the other areas.

As my honourable friend knows, in the area of education no guidelines or standards exist. The government's principle is to work through negotiation in those areas while protecting the five principles of health care and the mobility principle of social assistance.

[Translation]

Senator Rivest: I understand the government's intentions, as expressed by the minister. I would ask the minister to consult the text of this specific clause of Bill C-76, which states that the Canadian government would have the power, in areas other than health — in the other areas that I mentioned — to impose principles after consulting the provinces.

The minister tells us that this power would only be used if there was mutual consent, but that is not what the text of the bill, as it stands, says to the Canadian public. As you know, many concerns have been raised regarding this issue, not only in Quebec, but also in other parts of Canada.

• (1430)

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: I would be pleased to receive advice on the text of the bill. My understanding of the government's position is as I have stated and as has been stated repeatedly by the Prime Minister, as well as Mr. Axworthy and others.

UNITED NATIONS

NUCLEAR NON-PROLIFERATION TREATY— VOTE ON REAFFIRMATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: This coming Friday at the United Nations in New York, there will be a crucial vote on the reaffirmation of the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty. If this vote is rejected, it could lead to widespread, rampant abuse of nuclear power, abuse which could include development for violent purposes rather than the peaceful generation of energy.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate enlighten us as to what Canadian policy has been leading up to with respect to this vote? Have we been lobbying? What have we been doing to ensure the reaffirmation and reratification of this treaty?

In the event that the reaffirmation fails, what contingency plans or what mode of operation would the government foresee? What plans does the government have in the event of that development?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators should know that this government, as with the governments preceding it, has been in the forefront of activism on this important issue.

I should like to seek further details for my honourable friend concerning the background to the activity preceding this vote. I will attempt to have those details for him before the vote takes place.

Senator Forrestall: Honourable senators, by the time that information is relayed back here, the vote at the United Nations will be a fait accompli. I thought my question might have been interpreted as a gentle prod to whoever is responsible in New York to make sure that the vote does not fail.

Senator Fairbairn: My honourable friend's comments, which I will certainly pass on, can provide that prod. Our people in New York are working as hard and as diligently as they can.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

RELATIONS WITH EUROPEAN UNION—
IMPACT ON LOCAL INDUSTRIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of recent actions that we have had to take as a nation in regard to the fishery, and now that we have a slight problem with respect to our relationship with France, how will the government react in dealing with our exports to Europe in the future? These exports are critical to the region that I represent. The countries within the European Union have been impacted by some of the actions that we have had to take and by some of the inadvertent statements that have been made.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Prime Minister has made various comments during the last few days of his travelling in Europe. These travels by the Prime Minister have been important for Canada, for remembrance, and to represent our veterans in the V-E day ceremonies.

At the same time, these travels have provided an opportunity to meet with the leaders of a variety of countries in Europe, and as the Prime Minister stated yesterday in France, now is the time to look forward and not back. I believe he, and other leading spokespersons in Europe, will be looking beyond the events that have occurred in which Canada certainly took a vigorous and aggressive role, such as the fishing dispute. However, our links with Europe are strong. Our exporting channels to Europe are strong. It is the intention of this government to strengthen our European ties further so that opportunities will be given to the industries that my honourable friend has mentioned, as well as to the many other industries seeking markets in that area.

Senator St. Germain: Honourable senators, there is a resurgence of the issue dealing with the export of furs, which directly impacts a major portion of the northern region. Our pulp and paper industry has also been impacted. Will there be a program put in place to deal with these irritants that have developed? Is there a deliberate course of action planned, apart from simply stating that we will look to the future?

The recent parading of a stump through Great Britain had a definite impact on our pulp and paper industry in British Columbia. Millions of dollars were spent attempting to set the record straight in Europe that our forestry practices are above reproach, and that improvements can always be made in certain areas. However, when compared to the practices in the world in general, ours are above, or as good as, any standard that exists. These are my concerns.

Will an actual program be put in place to deal with the impacts that these incidents have had on our markets in Europe? I am not being critical; I am attempting to be constructive in asking this question because I am concerned about my region which relies so heavily on its exports.

Senator Fairbairn: I realize my honourable friend is trying to be constructive. We know the recent history of the pulp and paper industry, and of the fur issue in Europe. The difficulties for Canada are prompted from outside the government, from groups who share a certain point of view which they have paraded on a number of occasions through European countries.

I will check with my colleagues, and particularly the Minister for International Trade, to try for a more detailed response to my friend's specific question. However, I can assure him that, as far as the government is concerned, the aforementioned areas are extremely important in any trading strategy with that part of the world.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on April 5, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Ghitter regarding a report of the independent committee on Expo 2005, and to a question raised in the Senate on April 6, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Corbin regarding the closure of the Canada Council Art Bank.

I also have answers to several written questions: No. 79 asked by the Honourable Senator Forrestall, No. 83 by the Honourable Senator Tkachuk, No. 88 by the Honourable Senator Tkachuk, and No. 93 also by the Honourable Senator Tkachuk.

(Response to question raised by Hon. Ron Ghitter on April 5, 1995)

In response to Senator Ghitter's questions on Expo 2005 and the report of the independent committee, I wish to point out that the report became public on April 10.

I would like to reaffirm that the Government will make its decision in the near future in the spirit of fairness.

CANADA COUNCIL

(Response to question raised by Hon. Eymard Corbin on April 6, 1995)

The decision to close the Art Bank of the Canada Council was not imposed by the government. The Canada Council operates independently from the government. The decision was made by the Canada Council Board, after a strategic review of its operations and programs.

The Council's strategic plan states that priority will be given to programs which support creation, production and dissemination of the arts, with a particular emphasis on dissemination to greater numbers of Canadians across Canada. The plan also speaks of the Council's determination to reduce its administrative and program delivery costs by 50 per cent over the next three years, while ensuring that as much of its Parliamentary Appropriation as possible goes directly to the arts.

Viewed within these objectives, the Art Bank, although a unique and valuable program of support to the visual arts, was considered not to fit within the plan, for several reasons: its costs of operation — said to be $1.9 million net of costs (after deducting revenues from rentals) for a purchase program of some $750,000 constituting its direct support to artists; and its program of dissemination, largely limited to government office spaces. The Canada Council believes that there are more effective ways to support the visual and media arts, and they will be working closely with the museum, gallery and visual and media arts communities to develop appropriate programs of support.

The Council will establish a committee of senior professionals in the visual and media arts to make recommendations concerning the future of the Art Bank's collection of artwork. The Council is aware of the repercussions of its decision, and will try to ensure whatever the disposition adopted for the works at the Bank, it remain sensitive to the milieu and to the context of the contemporary art scene in Canada.

We will ensure that the Council is aware of the senator's views and we will pay close attention to the consultations process now under way.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Question No. 6 in my name has been on the Order Paper since January 18, 1994. Question No. 22 has been on the Order Paper since February 22, 1994. Neither question is terribly complicated.

In the case of Question No. 22, it simply asks if the Department of National Defence's A-310 Airbus has been put up for sale. That does not sound terribly complicated. The second part of the question is whether there have been any offers forthcoming. That does not sound terribly complicated either. However, it has been a year and three months waiting for an answer.

I raised the matter of these long outstanding questions approximately two months ago. I thought there would be action then, but obviously they are busy with other things. I wonder if the deputy leader could take a look at those for me.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate the concern and, indeed, some of the frustration expressed by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. Other honourable senators have been waiting for some time for answers as well, and I will endeavour to take it up with those responsible in a very expeditious and, I hope, effective way.

FIRST NATIONS GOVERNMENT BILL

ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill S-10, to provide for self-govenment by the first nations of Canada.—(Honourable Senator Tkachuk)

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, I have a point of order with respect to this item.

The Hon. the Speaker: I will listen to the honourable senator's point of order, but I should point out that the bill is not before us as yet. Second reading has not yet been moved. However, if it is a point of order, I will listen.

Senator Gauthier: Honourable senators, I have been looking at Bill S-10 since its first reading, and I have some procedural concerns as to the admissibility of the bill. I should like to delay my comments on this legislation until tomorrow, if possible, as I have some information coming to me which has not yet arrived. Tomorrow, if possible, I will bring forth the arguments that I believe are important concerning the royal recommendation that I think is required for such a bill. I ask permission of the Senate to have until tomorrow to prepare and put forth my arguments.

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I have no problem with that request. I thought that perhaps this issue may arise and I have prepared myself accordingly. We have to work together on this bill and this issue. If there is a point of order, I do not mind waiting until tomorrow. If there are issues that the honourable senator might want to share with me by tomorrow, I would be happy to share some of the research that I have been doing as well.

I do not know where we go from here.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the bill is not yet before us. Senator Tkachuk, the sponsor of the bill, has not yet moved second reading. If it is Senator Tkachuk's wish not to proceed today, the order will stand.

Senator Tkachuk: I have waited six sitting days; I can wait another day.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I am ready to speak on this debate today. I expected that someone would raise this problem, although I did not know that it would be my friend Senator Gauthier. If Senator Tkachuk is willing to wait until tomorrow, I cannot very well say that I am not willing to wait until then.

Senator Gauthier: Honourable senators, let me make it absolutely clear that I am not talking about the substantive part of this bill. At no time am I questioning the value of the bill. I support self-government for first nations.

Perhaps I am naive. I am new to this place. I wish to know whether this bill should be accompanied by a royal recommendation as a result of the expenditures involved therein. I raised the matter because I understand that had we started second reading it would probably be too late. I wish to inform this house that I have strong reservations, and I want to discuss my reservations as to the admissibility of the bill at second reading with the Chair. That is why I raised my point of order before the sponsor could move second reading.

Hon. William M. Kelly: I suggest that all sides of this argument quit while they are ahead. I think the matter is pretty well settled now.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): In any event, the matter stands.

The Hon. the Speaker: It stands.

Honourable senators, to be clear: I do not think a point of order can be raised on a matter that is not yet before the Senate. The bill is not before the Senate. Until such time as Senator Tkachuk moves second reading, it is only on the Order Paper. It is not really before the Senate.

Senator Berntson: Thanks for tipping your hand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Tomorrow, if Senator Tkachuk moves second reading, points of order may be raised at that point. I gather we will have an interesting debate. The matter stands for now.

Order stands.

TWENTY-THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the twenty-third report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (budget of Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources for special study), presented in the Senate on May 4, 1995.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, the report we have before us is from the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources. It covers an expenditure of $60,000 to complete a study that committee had commenced the previous fiscal year. The committee recommends the approval of their budget.

Therefore, I move the adoption of the report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

• (1450)

TWENTY-FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the twenty-fourth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Budget — study on the future of agriculture in Canada), presented in the Senate on May 4, 1995.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

As in the previous report, this one covers a budget expenditure of approximately $11,000 for the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to complete a study commenced in the previous fiscal year.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

TWENTY-FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the twenty-fifth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Budgets of Committees), presented in the Senate on May 4, 1995.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

REVIEWING CANADA'S FOREIGN POLICY

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hastings, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, for the adoption of the twenty-second report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (reprint of Volume I of the Report of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy), presented in the Senate on March 30, 1995.—(Honourable Senator Doody)

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in reading the transcript of the meeting of the Internal Economy which discussed this issue on March 30, I was struck by the fact that some of the concerns which were brought up here as we debated the motion were also shared by certain members of the committee.

I will not go into all of them, but I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether he has been in touch with anyone in the House of Commons who could give him the answer on whether the House is willing to share the costs of a reprint of part of a report which, as everyone knows, is the result of a study of a joint committee.

The argument is that since this expenditure was originally a commitment of a joint committee, any additional costs, for whatever reason, should be shared in the same proportion as was originally set out.

My question to the Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee is: Has the House of Commons been made aware of the request of Senator MacEachen? If so, is it willing to share in the costs of the reprint?

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, by way of response to the Honourable Leader of the Opposition, it would be presumptuous of me to contact the Board of Internal Economy in the other House prior to the approval of this report by the Senate. I do not wish to proceed until the wishes of the Senate are made known. If and when the report is adopted, then we will proceed to canvass the views of the Board of Internal Economy concerning the possibility of them sharing in this initiative and undertaking a review of the best price available for the printing of the report.

The Leader of the Opposition will note that the report says "up to so much money." It does not specify the amount of money. It would have been presumptuous of me to take any action until the wishes of the Senate are made known.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, let me see if I can add to the confusion. It is my understanding that our colleagues in the other place have rejected any appropriation for the costs of reprinting the report.

During our deliberations in the committee, I suggested that we approve our proportionate share of the expenses. I stand to be corrected, but I believe we were informed that the other place has rejected the appropriation of funds.

Honourable senators, this is not an issue of muzzling one of our colleagues. On the contrary, he should be congratulated as someone who is prepared to put forth an effort to promote and distribute the good work of the Senate. However, the issue concerns sending the right message to Canadians, especially during these difficult economic times.

We are being asked to approve 100 per cent of the costs required to reprint this report, while colleagues in the other place have rejected such a request. We should be concerned about spending public funds at any time, but, in these times, I am concerned about the message we would be sending to the public; namely, that the Senate has more money than the other place and that perhaps it cares less about how it spends funds.

I am prepared to move an amendment to the effect that we approve the expenditure based on the original proportions — I believe it was 30-70 — on the condition that the House approves its proportion as well.

[Translation]

Senator Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, is there an amendment before the house?

[English]

Senator Di Nino: I do not want to cause a lengthy debate. I would be prepared to introduce such an amendment, if that is the wish of my colleagues. If it deals with the subject, I will move the amendment.

Senator Gauthier: Honourable senators, concerning that point, can a senator move an amendment to a committee report? If so, what are the rules that prevail?

I believe that a committee report belongs to the committee. You can accept it, refuse it, or return it to the committee and say, "We are not satisfied. Do something with it." I do not think we can amend a committee report in this house, but I may be wrong.

Senator Di Nino: I will need to seek direction on that question. I am not sure what the answer is.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I understand that there are precedents where committee reports have been amended in the past in the Senate.

Senator Gauthier: What are the precedents, Your Honour?

The Hon. the Speaker: I do not have the precedents at hand, however, we can obtain them quickly.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: If we cannot amend them, we can certainly reject them.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, if I could "borrow" your ears for a moment, it is my impression that this debate, as every hour, day and week goes by, is becoming less and less pertinent. There was a study. There was a report. There was a request for a reprinting of the report. The clock is ticking. At the rate we are proceeding, by the time we agree to proceed with the request, the report will probably be dépassé.

We all agree that the report is important. We feel that the public is entitled — that is, as many of them as are interested in reading the report — to a copy of it. The time for a decision has come. Personally I should like to have the question put so that we can proceed with this matter while there is still interest in it and then move on to other matters.

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, if there still existed a joint committee, and if Senator MacEachen were requesting this in his capacity as co-chairman of the joint committee, then there would be a lot of logic in returning to the other place and saying, "You pay your share." However, Senator MacEachen is not chairman of the joint committee and there is no joint committee in existence.

What we have here is one of our colleagues asking for permission to reprint a report that he finds valuable in his work. We should consider it in that context. We get drawn off the point when we start talking about shared costs with a committee because that committee does not exist.

We are looking at a question of facilitating one of our colleagues in distributing some material that is useful for his work. I would urge you to consider the matter in that context.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, that is probably the worst circumstance in which to consider this matter. In effect, Senator Kenny is suggesting that any time a senator finds a document useful to his work, he can come before the Senate for special credits to have that work reproduced outside of his own discretionary budget.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, why not, if that is what the Senate decides?

Senator Kenny: Think about it for a minute.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is clear in my mind: One senator feels that part of a certain report is valuable to his personal work and, therefore, the Senate should grant him copies for distribution of that report at his own discretion. I find that proposal to be way beyond the guidelines of the Internal Economy Committee. There are facilities in this chamber for reproducing papers which are already available. The reproduction may not be a $15 copy, with four colour reproductions, glossy print and bond paper, but I cannot believe that we would go beyond the guidelines set forth by the Internal Economy Committee and create a precedent where anyone can come before this chamber and say, "I need to copy a certain publication, "X" number of copies, to help me in my work. Grant me the credits." Were does this appear in our budget? Perhaps there is an item in the budget for such requests. If so, we should all know about it so we can take advantage of it.

Senator Kenny: Honourable senators, with respect, the Internal Economy Committee's report has recommended just that. The Internal Economy Committee is controlled by the honourable senator's side, and they have recommended this expenditure. It fits in with what the Internal Economy Committee is suggesting and it makes perfectly good sense.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I wish to add to Senator Kenny's point that this issue is of importance not only to one of our colleagues but also to Canadian citizens. An important report on foreign policy will not be distributed to Canadian citizens because of the opposition.

Those in opposition would say, "Even though we have sent a committee across this country, for many months and at great expense, to investigate the future direction of Canadian foreign policy, and even though interest in the report has been such that no further copies are available, we should not make this report available to any other interested Canadian citizens. They seem to be saying that we should not further publicize this completed work. I find that to be a very irresponsible attitude. I have never heard the like during my 23 years in Parliament.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I share the view of Senator Stollery that this is really an item of national importance. If I recall correctly, an estimated $1 million of Canadian taxpayers' money was expended on this study. Now we are asking for up to $7,500 to provide Volume I, which is now out of print, to the Canadian taxpayers who are requesting it. I understand that copies of Volumes II and III are available.

Having spent that amount of money on a joint committee study on a subject as important as foreign affairs and having tabled a very important report, should we not consider very carefully any restriction that would demand shared costs from the other side? The committee is dead. We are attempting to act expeditiously and practically. We ask that all honourable senators use their common sense.

I attended the meeting of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration when this matter was discussed. If I recall correctly, and I do not have the minutes in front of me, 12 honourable senators were present at that meeting. This issue was debated fully. All of the points raised at that time by the members in attendance were taken into consideration. The report was rendered on division.

After full discussion, only one honourable senator present at that time voted on division. Those who were present will recall that all other senators, including opposition members who were in the majority at that meeting, voted in favour of the motion.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, let us not belabour this point. However, if this is such a question of national importance, how is it that the elected representatives of the House of Commons felt so indifferent to it as to turn down our request for a relatively few dollars compared to the total cost of the report and, in doing so, showed a lack of respect for the integrity and the importance of the work done by that joint committee?

In any event, I have a final question for the chairman of Internal Economy: During the debate, Senator Kenny questioned the cost of $15 per copy, on the assumption that all $7,500 would be spent, and asked whether this could not be printed more cheaply? The director of financial services, Mrs. Aghajanian, replied that she did not know how big the document was and suggested that perhaps some savings could be had by printing in-house. Has Mrs. Aghajanian or the committee discovered whether we can have the same product printed in-house at a much cheaper cost than suggested in the motion? Could we also identify the printing of this document as falling within the guidelines of the Internal Economy Committee?

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, our options are open. We may print in-house. We may have the document printed by the Canada Communications Group, the successor to the Queen's Printer. A third option would be to canvass for two or three external quotations. We have done nothing on this matter as yet; we are awaiting your decision. If it is positive, we will proceed with the cheapest method possible.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Di Nino, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton:

> That the report be not now adopted but that it be amended by adding the following words at the end of the second paragraph, after the figure "$7,500":
> ...provided that the costs of reprinting the report are shared on a 30-70 per cent basis with the House of Commons.

Honourable senators, a point of order has been raised. Do you wish me to deal with the point of order at this point?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: The point of order was raised by Senator Gauthier. He is correct insofar as Beauchesne is concerned. As you know, Beauchesne basically deals with the House of Commons practice.

Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Sixth Edition, citation 889(4) at page 244 states:

> A report from a committee may not be amended in a substantive matter by the House; it must be referred back to the committee.

However, I refer honourable senators to the Rules of the Senate, page 56, rule 49(1):

> When a question is under debate, a motion shall not be received unless it is a motion to amend the question, to refer the question to a committee...

We have a matter under debate. Under the rule, we can receive a motion to amend the question.

I also refer honourable senators to the Journals of the Senate for September 30, 1988, page 3479:

> Pursuant to Order, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the Sixteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs (Bill C-147, An Act to establish the International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development, with two amendments), presented in the Senate earlier this day.
> The Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough) moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Turner, that the Report be adopted.

That is the stage we are at now, the adoption of the report.

> After debate,
> The Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C., moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that the Report be not now adopted but that it be amended as follows: ...

Then several lengthy amendments were set out. Debate ensued and the amendments were accepted. On this basis, we have a precedent in the Senate for this practice.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, speaking to the amendment proposed by our colleague Senator Di Nino, I point out that his amendment is the same as the argument he made before the committee during its discussions on the matter, and which was rejected by the committee. As was pointed out, only one member opposed the proposed report, that being the deputy chairman.

Honourable senators, during our discussions, we focused on the request of a colleague. In the discussion, we did not deal too much with an application from a joint committee because the joint committee no longer exists. We simply dealt with the request of a colleague who sought assistance to communicate his work and that of the Senate to his constituents. After spending more than $1 million on a study, it seemed very short-sighted not to provide our colleague with the ability to communicate his work and the work of the Senate to constituents.

Using the rubric of sharing printing costs, honourable senators, is tantamount to saying that we will not be printing this document. The senator would then be deprived of the ability to communicate with his constituents.

Honourable senators, we spend a great deal of money every year on senators' newsletters. We spend a great deal of money every year on telephone, telegraph and other means of communications. It might be that we should do a lot more communicating to the people. The message to be communicated to the people here is worthwhile. It is not a signal to the people that we are throwing money away.

It is in that light that we adopted the report that is before honourable senators. I believe it is a worthy objective and that the amendment should be rejected.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I feel I ought to put this particular question in context. It means more than a request for additional printing. In a sense, it is very much related to the broad political situation we face in Canada at the present time.

The Official Opposition in the House of Commons is dedicated to the breakup of Canada. That party participated actively in the work of the special joint committee. At the end of our sessions, members of the Bloc Québécois and the Reform Party indicated to the co-chairs their intention to put forth dissenting opinions. Of course, dissenting opinions are provided for in the Standing Orders.

However, as we were ready to go to print, we received from the Bloc Québécois, not dissenting opinions in the normal sense, but a separate, stand-alone report, which we viewed as the foreign policy of a new, independent Quebec. I suggest honourable senators read it to decide for themselves whether it is a dissent from the main report or whether it is a stand-alone foreign policy for a new country with its capital in Quebec City.

Honourable senators, because committee members were away from Ottawa, the co-chairs thought that it would be inappropriate to include as part of the main report, which would be distributed not only throughout Canada but throughout the world, a stand-alone foreign policy for a new, independent country which is now part of Canada. We made the decision to produce the main report, which was adopted unanimously and supported by the three members of this house from the Conservative Party. They were the Honourable Senators Kelleher, Andreychuk and Comeau, each of whom participated in our discussions and whose suggestions and amendments, from time to time, were incorporated into the report. However, that main report was adopted by everyone.

Therefore, the decision was made to have the dissenting opinions separate from the main report. It was decided that if there was a desire to distribute a stand-alone foreign policy for a new, independent country, then it should be done not by the committee as a whole but by the dissenting group. That is what we did. We had Volume I, Volume II and Volume III. Volume III was made up of the particular studies we had commissioned.

In the House of Commons, the Bloc Québécois raised hell at this particular decision of the co-chairs, which we regarded as being fully within the rules because we had consulted widely with procedural authorities. It was at that point, in response to the objections of the Bloc Québécois, that the Speaker of the House of Commons said, "If this report is reprinted, it shall be reprinted in a different form and the dissenting opinion, the stand-alone foreign policy for a new country, will be part of the main report."

Honourable senators know the rest of the story. I raised a point of order in this place in which I asked, "How is it that the Speaker of the House of Commons can decide unilaterally the disposition of a report which is the joint product of two Houses?" There was a ruling from the Speaker in this regard.

As we were leaving the chamber, Senator Kelly said to me, "Why do we not do it ourselves? Why do we not have that main report printed by the Senate?" I acted upon that suggestion and consulted with Senator Kelleher, who was the member of the steering committee from the Conservative Party. He agreed. I thought that I had done all the necessary groundwork to put the motion before the Senate.

Honourable senators, this is not my work. This is the work of the special joint committee, including senators on the other side and Liberal Senators Gigantès, Perrault, myself and some others who came in from time to time, as well as many Canadians and many experts who spoke about foreign policy in their testimony. The report is non-partisan. It is unanimously adopted. Everything was adopted by the Conservative members from one end to the other.

We ran out of copies. I thought it would be a good idea to have additional copies for the future as requests come in from other countries and embassies who want to keep in touch with what is happening in Canada.

Given the political situation in the House of Commons, the matter is dead in that place. I think the Speaker then decided, subsequent to our point of order in the Senate, that this issue should go to the Board of Internal Economy. I am sure it will rest there in limbo for a long, long time. In view of the political situation in the House of Commons, I do not think there is a chance at all that a request to share will be received, unless it is agreed that the stand-alone foreign policy of a new country become part of the main report.

That is why I came to the Senate in response to Senator Kelly's suggestion and said, "Let us reprint the main report so that it will be available for Canadian citizens and others abroad interested in Canadian foreign policy." It is the work of us all.

I would very much regret it if we had to divide over this matter and send a message to the House of Commons asking for 70 per cent, when we know perfectly well, because of the political composition of that House, that such a request will get nowhere. That is the background on this issue.

This is Canada's foreign policy. I regard it as most important that this report be available, in as much as it was supported by every party in this house and in the other place.

• (1520)

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a comment to make with regard to Senator Di Nino's proposed motion in amendment.

His Honour the Speaker referred to a proceeding which took place on September 30, 1988. This reference requires some attention. If you look at the specific precedent which His Honour sought to apply in this case, you will see that it was not the text of a report which was amended, but rather the text of a bill that had been reported to which amendments were moved.

Honourable senators, I submit that, at some point, consideration ought to be given to that situation. It is one thing to follow in this house what the House of Commons does, namely move amendments at the report stage of a bill. That is what was happening here on September 30, 1988. It is another thing to take a substantive report such as the one being discussed here and rewrite it in this chamber.

I wanted to say this on the record because we might not want to look upon this as a precedent without at least considering its relevance.

Senator Gauthier: I would hate for us to be divided on this issue. However, it could be that we will all vote in favour. I hope we do, because that would be the sensible thing to do.

As Canadians, we have spent over $800,000 to complete this study. It is a good report. I would hope that all of the members of this house would support the spirit of this motion and that we will reprint the report.

Senator MacEachen's arguments are convincing: he has made it clear to us that a political situation exists in the other House that would make it difficult for Canada as a whole if that ruling were endorsed by the present opposition in this house. If that were to happen, I think it might be misunderstood. I would not want that to happen.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I hope that Senator Di Nino withdraws his amendment. I have a feeling that the Senate wants to have those copies reprinted, and I beg the senator to withdraw his amendment.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I can certainly go along with Senator Thériault in that request. The argument has been well made, and I hope that the Internal Economy Committee appreciates the concerns that have been raised on both sides.

We recognize the value of the report and that there is some advantage to only part of it being presented or to be distributed. I do not accept, though, that because the official opposition in the House of Commons is made up of people with whom we have violent disagreements, their views should not be disseminated through official channels. We must remember that they were elected overwhelmingly in the province of Quebec. They are duly elected representatives of Quebecers, and it would be injurious to those electors to be told that because their views are not compatible with those of the majority in the House of Commons, we will do all we can to stifle them.

We should not be afraid of views which are diametrically opposed to ours, which is why we are concerned with this motion. Some people evidently feel so strongly about the Bloc's views that they would distribute only that part of a report which was more compatible with the government's view and ours, and not include with it those parts with which they violently disagreed.

The point has been well made, and the economies we are attempting to achieve are shared by all. However, there are certain principles worth discussing here. If Senator Di Nino would agree not to put forward his amendment, I would certainly be agreeable to approving Senator MacEachen's motion.

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, the most difficult task for the Internal Economy Committee is to sit in judgment on our peers. That is never an easy task, but it is one that we take seriously, as I am sure all of my colleagues would agree.

In agreeing to this motion, we would be setting a precedent; a precedent which we might have to apply to future actions which might result in expenditures of funds which, in the opinion of some, might not be totally appropriate.

Honourable senators, we should congratulate our colleague who wishes to distribute this report further. This is a good and valuable report, and will probably increase the prestige of this country abroad among those, at least, who take the time to read it. I certainly would not wish that my comments or my amendments be taken in a way other than that which I have just described, namely that it was a question of principle and setting a precedent that I had concern about, but I think the point has been made. The issue has been well debated and, honourable senators, I withdraw my amendment.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Di Nino may withdraw his motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Given that a point of order was raised, we should establish clearly what the rule is for the future. The basic rule which we adhere to is our red book, the Rules of the Senate of Canada. The red book is clear at rule 48(1):

> When a question is under debate, a motion shall not be received unless it is a motion to amend the question...

That is the only rule we have in our red book that refers to the whole matter. Under this basic rule, indeed we can amend a motion.

Senator Stewart raised a point. He is an old parliamentarian, and he would not be debating a speaker's ruling, but he did raise a point.

In the future, so we are clear, I wish to point to another precedent from May 27, 1993. I will read directly from the Journals of the Senate, Page 2079:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, seconded by the Honourable Senator Spivak, for the adoption of the Thirty-fourth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (supplementary budget—Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, Financial Institutions), presented in the Senate on 29th April, 1993.
> And on the motion in amendment by the Honourable Senator Kenny, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hastings, that the Report be not now adopted, but that it be amended by deleting the sum of $5,250.00 from Transportation and Communications and substituting therefor the sum of $1,000.00.
> After debate,
> The question being put on the motion in amendment, it was adopted.
> The question then being put on the main motion, as amended, it was adopted.

Therefore, there is a clear precedent of an amendment being made to the report of a committee. It has nothing to do with a bill. I simply point that out so that, in the future, we have clearly before us what our rules and precedents are in this house. We refer to Beauchesne when our own rules do not provide.

We are now back to the main motion by Senator Hastings, seconded by the Honourable Senator Corbin, that this report be adopted now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, before we proceed, may I take a moment to express my appreciation to the Honourable Leader of the Opposition and all of my colleagues. We shall take your advice carefully in the performance of our duties, and since you have expressed your concerns, those concerns will be taken into consideration.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Spivak, calling the attention of the Senate to the budget presented by the Minister of Finance on Monday, February 27, 1995.—(Honourable Senator Stratton).

Hon. Terry Stratton: Honourable senators, I rise today to take part in the inquiry on the budget which was tabled by the Finance Minister on February 27, 1995. My comments today will focus on three areas: Debt and deficit reduction; the fairness of the budget; and, finally, the cuts in transfer payments to the provinces and their possible impact on Canada's health care system.

It is my sense that Minister Martin's recent budget demonstrates that his government is committed to fighting the deficit in this country. However, I feel quite strongly that if he were totally committed to attacking Canada's growing deficit problem, the minister would have set out a long-term plan for deficit reduction that went beyond 1997. His failure to do so raised some concerns in my mind, and in others as well, many of whom have been in contact with my office.

The Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants of Canada is one of the many groups of Canadians who have expressed their concern that the 1995 federal budget had no long-term plan for deficit reduction. The Liberal budget only goes so far as to set an interim deficit target of 3 per cent of GDP, or $25 billion, by 1997. The CICA issued a press release which stated their concerns, and I quote from that release:

> We are concerned that the government has failed to set firm targets for the reduction of the deficit after 1997. Achieving a $25 billion deficit in 1997...is not sufficient.... We need a long-term plan to bring government spending under control.

During a federal pre-budget round table, held in Manitoba on November 3, 1994, Mr. John Granelli, Chair of the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce, expressed his view that tough action is needed to reduce the deficit. Mr. Granelli had the following to say at the hearing:

> ... we believe that there is a general acceptance now by the population that the national debt is a significant problem. Government should therefore provide leadership in fiscal responsibility....We believe Mr. Martin's target of an annual deficit of 3 per cent of gross domestic product is not aggressive enough....The time is now to seize the opportunity to reduce the deficit, eliminate annual borrowings when interest rates are low and the economy is in recovery.

In addition, a submission from the C.D. Howe Institute to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance made the following points:

> ...expenditure reductions should be sufficient to move Canada past the 3 per cent target to a balanced budget within the next two fiscal years, ensuring that the dynamics of debt reduction would replace the dynamics of debt compounding in advance of the next downturn in the economy.

Honourable senators, all of these groups called for stronger measures to be taken against the deficit. There is a definite feeling out there that during this period of economic growth in Canada, the federal government should be taking further measures to aggressively attack the deficit. The Finance Minister's target of cutting the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP is just not good enough.

The International Monetary Fund has also joined the chorus, stating that the federal government's plans to cut the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP by the 1996-97 fiscal year are not ambitious enough. At that level, they believe the debt-to-GDP ratio would still be very high. The IMF and many leading economists believe that the federal government should take advantage of our expanding Canadian economy and make deeper cuts.

Strong deficit reduction measures are needed if the federal government is to avoid the risk of having its plans thrown off target by another recession. The deficit must be brought under control and, if it is not, a potential financial crisis could surely be the result.

The lack of long-term fiscal planning for deficit reduction will continue to make the financial markets nervous. What Canada desperately needs is a clear plan for deficit reduction, one that goes beyond 1997. Surely this is something the Liberals can provide to Canadians. Rather than using political rhetoric in saying that there will be new targets to set, Mr. Martin should just get out there and set them.

Honourable senators, in case the other side has forgotten, when the Conservatives came to power in 1984, we inherited a real financial mess from the Liberals. We worked to clean it up and made substantial progress. In fact, it was the Tories who made fiscal responsibility a matter of law by passing the Spending Control Act which limits how much Ottawa may spend on most programs.

The PC government cut the growth rate of program spending from 13.8 per cent a year during the Trudeau years to 3.6 per cent during the PC mandate. As the economy was expanding at the time, the result was that program spending fell from 19.6 per cent of GDP in 1984 to 16.9 per cent in 1993. Furthermore, the growth of total government spending was cut from an annual average of 14.6 per cent under the Liberals to 4.2 per cent during the PC mandate.

Under the Tories, Canada's deficit fell from 8.6 per cent of GDP in 1984 to 5.9 per cent of GDP by 1993. Without the measures taken by the PC government, Canada's deficit would have been at least $80 billion in 1993.

Honourable senators, there was a significant decline in interest rates during the mandate of the Progressive Conservative government. One result is that the monthly payments on a $100,000 mortgage fell by $380. Over five years, that is enough to put a new car in a driveway. In addition, 1 million more homes were owner-occupied at the end of the PC mandate than at the beginning. Annual inflation fell to its lowest level in a quarter century under the PC government. Canada's economy grew by 23 per cent, after inflation, between 1984 and 1993.

The PC mandate saw a significant increase in exports, including a 72 per cent boost in the value of our exports with the United States. More than 1.6 million jobs were created in Canada between 1984 and 1993.

In addition to this strong economic record, the PC government said in 1993 that they would balance the budget within five years. How many years will it take before the current Liberal government balances the budget? Perhaps the Finance Minister would like to tell Canadians.

During our recent break, Canadians learned some bad news that affects us all. Moody's Investors Services Inc. of New York downgraded Canada's triple-A credit rating. Moody's cut the domestic currency rating to Double-A1 from Triple-A and the foreign currency debt to Double-A2 from Double-A1.

The long-term effect of Moody's downgrading will be an increase in the cost of borrowing for the Canadian government. The higher rates will add to federal debt payments, which are already the single largest expenditure, more than $40 billion annually. I read that a one-percentage-point increase in interest rates would cost the federal government an extra $1.7 billion a year in borrowing costs. I also read that Moody's decision to downgrade was based on the level of uncertainty in forecasting the medium and long-term fiscal position of the federal government.

Honourable senators, had the federal government presented a clear plan for deficit reduction in the February budget that included long-term goals, Moody's may not have reduced Canada's credit rating and Canadians would not be in the position they are today. Undoubtedly we will be faced with increased borrowing costs, borrowing costs which can be paid only by the taxpayer.

The Minister of Finance said, that the government is firmly committed to putting and keeping the debt-to-GDP ratio on a permanent downward track and that the government's "ultimate goal" is a balanced budget. I applaud the government for its efforts, but there is a real urgent need to go further. Where is the federal government's plan of action to achieve that ultimate goal of a balanced budget?

Our leader, the Honourable Jean Charest, said in the House on March 14, 1994:

> The objective of reducing the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP is not good enough. There should be a clear enunciated objective of balancing the books within a precise timeframe. Three years is a reasonable timeframe.

I support what Mr. Charest has said. I feel that Canadians have a right to know just when the budget will be balanced.

• (1540)

Honourable senators, while there are some things in this budget I support, there are some other things which will clearly have a negative effect on many Canadians, particularly on Western Canadian farmers. The budget eliminates the $560 million annual Crow benefit. This is a benefit that has kept the family farm in business. In return, they will receive a transition measure, a one-time $1.6 billion payment. However, this transition payment is for landowners only. That creates a problem: What about the 40 per cent of farmers who rent land and will not get a cent according to this budget measure? This is very unfair and the end result will be a reduction in farm income across the prairies.

Added to all of this is the fact that funding for the agricultural safety net programs will be cut by 30 per cent. This includes the Net Income Stabilization Account, Crop Insurance and the Gross Revenue Insurance Program. Furthermore, three of 11 agricultural research stations in Western Canada will close. Those affected are in Regina, Vegreville and Prince George.

Clearly, the Canadian farmers deserve better than what they are getting from the current Liberal government in Ottawa. The results of the recent provincial legislation in Manitoba — an almost unprecedented third term for a sitting premier — elected a majority Progressive Conservative government. This was made possible with strong support from rural Manitobans. This is a clear indicator that the federal Liberal budget did not go over too well with farmers in Manitoba.

Honourable senators, the budget is unfair to all Canadians, who will now have to pay $3.7 billion more in tax increases over the next three years, including the $500 million "tax grab" through gasoline for the federal purse.

The federal budget breaks many of the promises that the Liberal government made in the Red Book. It is clear to me that the Red Book of promises has been tossed out completely. How is this fair to Canadians? The Liberals have ignored their promise to talk to the provinces before changing the social safety net. They promised no unilateral cuts in transfer payments to the provinces. However, they have introduced billions of dollars in unilateral cuts in this budget and in the last one. The Liberal government's new approach to federal-provincial fiscal relations, coined the "Social Transfer," outlines a plan that will see funding to provinces and territories reduced. The Liberals claim this gives governments more flexibility — flexibility that may be wanted at the provincial level, but not at any cost.

Payments to the western provinces for health, education, and social assistance will be cut by $780 million in 1996. In Manitoba, the reduction is $107 million. These cuts are unfair for provincial governments which have been working hard to balance their books. Clearly, Finance Minister Paul Martin is unable to get his own house in order and is simply offloading his problems onto the province and inevitably onto the taxpayer. We must always remember that there is only one taxpayer.

I am deeply concerned about the effect of the estimated $7 billion decrease in federal transfer payments which support social programs. Just what will happen to medicare? During a recent two-day conference of provincial health ministers held in Vancouver, these issues figured prominently in the news headlines. The Globe and Mail reported on April 12 the following:

> 'The federal government's recent reductions in transfer payments for health care have created concern among Canadians,' the provincial ministers said. 'These cuts pose a threat to sustaining provincial and territorial health reform initiatives.'....The provinces said Ottawa is undermining medicare by pushing through 'unilateral' spending cuts with little thought to their impact.

During a recent interview on Canada AM, the Ontario Health Minister made a key point when she said:

> Unilateral actions by the federal government have put at risk the partnership...

She was referring to the partnership between the federal government and the provinces.

> ...unique to the health care system.

Honourable senators, this historic partnership must not be sacrificed. The unilateral action taken by the federal government is in my mind clearly unfair to the provinces and to Canadians. It is unfair for Canadians because the spending cuts could push us towards a two-tier health care system in Canada. Provinces and territories need to be consulted if universal health care is to survive in Canada.

Health care is a fundamental part of the fabric of the Canadian identity. The high standards of health care in this country have made us the envy of the world.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senator Stratton, unfortunately I have to advise you that your time is up.

What is the wish of the Senate? Shall we allow the honourable senator to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Stratton: To protect medicare, we must get our deficit under control. It is quite evident that higher national debts would threaten medicare's ability to survive.

Honourable senators, other promises in the Red Book have been broken as well. For example, the Liberals promised in the Red Book that:

> ...their government would be committed to stable multi-year financing for national cultural institutions such as the Canada Council and the CBC.

Instead, the budget reduced funding to the CBC, the National Film Board and Telefilm Canada. The Red Book promised that if the economy grew by more than 3 per cent last year — and it grew by 4.5 per cent last year — 50,000 child care spaces would be created the following year. The Liberals and the government are still silent on this issue.

With this budget, the Liberal government has broken many of the promises they made in the Red Book. What hope has the budget provided for the more than 1.4 million unemployed in Canada? This, all in less than two years with a Liberal government in Ottawa.

What can Canadians expect in the next few years of a Liberal administration? In the days following the budget, Paul Martin assured investors on Wall Street that pensions are the next to be tackled, and the Prime Minister said that medicare is too generous. Canadians should be very wary of this government.

Honourable senators, the federal government announced the closure or reduction of 12 defence facilities, of which five are in Western Canada, including Air Command Headquarters in Winnipeg. The role of Air Command is to provide combat-ready air forces to meet Canada's defence commitments, air search and rescue, and to support other government departments as mutually arranged. Air Command elements are organized into Fighter Group, Maritime Air Group, 10 Tactical Air Group and Air Transport Group. All of these were under the command of the headquarters in Winnipeg. Plans to consolidate a number of the groups above into a new group, the Air Combat and Mobility Group, were announced in last year's budget. Why could that not come to Winnipeg?

The changes to Canada's military operations announced in the 1995 budget included a reduction in defence spending of $2.8 billion over the next four years. It has been reported in the news that the total number of military personnel in Winnipeg will be reduced by about 1,000 and that this will leave around 2,200 military and 500 civilian positions in the Winnipeg area.

I am deeply concerned about the closure of the Air Command Headquarters in Winnipeg and the jobs that will be lost. The Air Command's shutdown represents the biggest single job loss of all the defence closures in the budget.

Honourable senators, the federal government did not hold any consultation or studies with employees and local citizens regarding the closure of Air Command as was promised in the Liberal Blueprint for Defence Conversion, which is a supplementary document to the Liberal's Red Book. This is yet another example of a broken promise by this government.

Honourable senators, in closing, the 1995 federal budget breaks many of the Red Book's promises, provides little hope for the unemployed in Canada, introduces tax increases, raises concerns about the future of health care, and fails to deal with the deficit in a tough manner. Surely Canadians deserve better from their government in Ottawa.

On motion of Senator Berntson, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, May 10, 1995, at 1:30 p.m.

WINTER OLYMPICS 2002

CANDIDACY OF QUEBEC CITY

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, I would like to bring to your attention the importance, for my region and for all of Canada, of a decision which will be made on June 16 in Budapest. It is the decision regarding which of the four cities in the running will host the Winter Olympics in the year 2002.

This project was begun in Quebec over 20 years ago. Since then, our city has hosted 75 international sporting competitions. Not only have our people been practising how to manage this kind of competition, but we already have almost all of the infrastructures required to host an event of this scope, which covers 64 sporting disciplines and requires 14 different sites.

The IOC requires 24 different written guarantees, mostly regarding project and construction financing, security measures, health care facilities, transportation, lodging, telecommunications and computer systems.

Quebec City met all of the requirements for its candidature to stay in the running and, in December 1992, it was selected as the one city that Canada would put forth as a candidate. I would like to thank all Canadians, especially people from the west and, in particular, from Calgary, whose collaboration in this project was magnificent.

Then, last January, the four finalists were chosen in Lausanne, and, by now, the 100 members of the International Olympic Committee have already paid their visits to each of the cities to evaluate them. We will know the results in one month.

I would like to point out that two successive Canadian and Quebec governments and the municipality of Quebec City have been very cooperative in this endeavour.

It will be an important event for the young people of the world who strive towards the olympic ideal. The performances of their role models will be broadcast to 1.5 billion people all over the world.

If we are chosen, it will be marvellous for Quebec and for all of Canada.

I thank the 700 volunteers who, under the direction of René Paquet, have devoted the past few years to this endeavour. We hope that their bid will be successful.

[English]

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, as a Canadian, it is an honour and a privilege for me to rise today and support Quebec City's efforts to host the Winter Olympics in the year 2002.

As a British Columbian, I can speak from direct experience when I say what a positive impact events of this nature have on a city, a province and a country. Expo 86 established Vancouver, British Columbia, as an international destination. Vancouver was a beautiful city prior to Expo 86, but during that fair, it was "discovered" by the world. The numerous benefits that have resulted from that discovery are mind-boggling. B.C. Place, the former Expo site, has attracted sports, business and performing arts events. The economic benefits have been truly significant, both during the development stage and afterwards with the permanent jobs that were created as a direct result of the exposition.

It is in this spirit that I urge all Canadians to put their best efforts behind this very credible cause for Quebec City, one of the most beautiful cities in the entire world. Quebec City is steeped in the history of our nation and surrounded by communities that have played a part in the development of our great country. Quebec, as a province, has shown its commitment to excellence in providing the atmosphere to develop some of the greatest athletes in the world.

[Translation]

Canadians from coast to coast have felt the same pride at the extraordinary successes of our athletes — the Bédards, the Lamberts, the Brasseurs and the Brassards — to name but a few.

[English]

Therefore, honourable senators, for those who have achieved gold and for those who aspire to achieve gold and excellence, we owe our support for this worthwhile cause, this great effort by Quebec City. This effort cannot be isolated to any one region or province. This is a Canadian effort which should be supported by all Canadians. If Quebec City wins, we are all winners, so let us all go out and win for Quebec City.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand Roberge: Honourable senators, I am very proud indeed to rise today to talk to you about Quebec City's application for the 2002 Winter Olympics.

As you no doubt know, the International Olympic Committee will make known its decision at a meeting in Budapest on June 16 — in a little over a month's time. With this fine city's designation in Lausanne in January as one of the four finalists, I am convinced that the hundreds of people involved to date will see their efforts rewarded and work even harder until the games are held.

In addition, I would point out the financial commitment the Mulroney government gave to this project. The Right Honourable Brian Mulroney guaranteed Quebec City federal funding in September 1992 if it became the Canadian applicant.

Through the work of the organizers and through careful planning, Quebec City met the three conditions set by the IOC. First, it proposed competition sites that met the requirements set by the seven international winter sports federations, all of which approved the sites required.

Second, it showed it was capable of funding the games. It did so through a credit arrangement made possible by a tripartite agreement involving the Government of Canada, the Government of Quebec and Quebec City, not to mention the 66 per cent contribution of private industry.

Finally, Quebec City obtained the people's support for its proposed application — at least 71 per cent of them. In this regard, I would also like to point out, as Senator Bolduc did earlier, the significant contribution made by the 700 or so volunteers working on the project, not to mention the public support already expressed by some 100 groups and organizations.

With the 2002 Winter Games being held in Quebec City, the entire international community will have an opportunity to admire not only the splendour of a Quebec winter, but the talents of major athletes from around the world including and especially those, unequalled in our hearts, of our own Canadian athletes. We will never forget the exploits of the likes of Isabelle Brasseur, Lloyd Eisler, Myriam Bédard, Susan Auch and many, many more.

I am also proud to thank publicly in this august house, on behalf of the people of Quebec and Canada as a whole, the Quebec City Organizing Committee for the 2002 Winter Olympics, and its chair, Mr. René Paquet. I would also like to offer all my encouragement to the young athletes who will reach new heights before our very eyes in Quebec City in 2002.

• (1340)

[English]

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, I, too, rise to express my congratulations and best wishes to Mr. Paquet and his committee in their endeavours to achieve the status of hosting the Winter Olympics in Quebec City. I do so as a Calgarian who was very much involved in the 1988 Winter Olympics which were held in our city. I know the excitement and the thrill the people of Quebec City are going through, as well as something of the challenges that they face as they progress toward that moment in time when all their years of work come to fruition and when, I hope, their city is selected as the location for the Winter Olympics. If that end is achieved, these people will bring incredible experience to their area, their region and our country.

The Winter Olympics are not only an occasion for sport; they are an occasion for culture and the arts. I had the opportunity to chair the arts festival aspect of the Winter Olympics in Calgary. Calgary will never be the same. Thousands of volunteers came forward to participate. Immense pride was created as a result of hosting such a wonderful world-class event.

A marvellous legacy was left to our area in terms of the funds set aside from the profits of the Winter Olympics, which were allocated to future athletic endeavours. We were left with incredible facilities which are being used by everyone in Calgary, Alberta.

In conclusion, I wish the delegation well and every success. I hope you get it. When you do, for a time you will be in the heart of the world, as everyone will come to Quebec City and know of Quebec City. It will be marvellous for Canada at large. Congratulations.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest: Honourable senators, I had the privilege of representing a riding in the Quebec City area in the Quebec National Assembly, and I am delighted to welcome here today the members of the Quebec City Organizing Committee for the 2002 Winter Olympics.

With my colleagues who spoke before, I want to wish Mr. Paquet and his many co-workers the best of luck, and I also want to say, in a more Canadian perspective — and I know that if Mr. Paquet were given the floor he would say this himself before this assembly — that the tremendous success of the Calgary games has been a major factor in maximizing the chances that Quebec City will be successful in its bid for the Winter Olympics.

I know that, throughout this process, people in the Quebec City area were able to rely on the very close cooperation they had with people in Calgary, who helped Quebec City prepare its bid for the Winter Olympics.

In concluding, I would like to say that like all Quebecers and all Canadians, we will be there in spirit, with Mr. Paquet and his co-workers, hoping that Quebec City, Quebec and Canada will again be able to host the Olympic Games and once more show the world the value of our culture and civilization, as well as the exceptional qualifications of the young people on Canada's Olympic Team.

Good luck, Mr. Paquet.

[Later]

[English]

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to say at the outset that I was not aware that the Quebec City Olympic Committee would be visiting here today. Together with all honourable senators, I should like to welcome them most heartily, and wish them well in their endeavours. I cannot imagine a more beautiful part of Canada or a more fitting place in which to hold the Olympics.

Honourable senators, I recall the excitement and the pride generated by the Olympics in Calgary. Senator Ghitter has properly pointed out the wonderful facilities that are left behind as a legacy of an undertaking of that magnitude. I cannot imagine anything that could contribute more to national unity than to have the Olympics in a place as diversified and beautiful as Quebec City. I wish the organizing committee well in their undertakings.

VICTORY IN EUROPE

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION CEREMONIES— ALLEGED REMARKS OF PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Marjory LeBreton: Honourable senators, I was born in 1940 and have vague childhood memories of the day the war ended. However, I have always been keenly aware of, and have sought to inform myself of, the considerable contribution made to the war effort by Canadians, both overseas and at home. As well, teachings in schools in the 1940s and 1950s were quite extensive. It is sad to say that this is not the case today.

Most of us knew, or were related to, someone who contributed to the war effort or, indeed, who made the ultimate sacrifice. These courageous Canadians fought for our freedom. They also fought to end the tyranny, the horror and the human suffering and degradation of so many innocent victims — men, women and children — who were incarcerated and exterminated for no other reason than their race and religion.

The 50th anniversary of V-E day reminds us all of the tremendous loss and suffering. Honourable senators can therefore imagine my shock and dismay when I read in The Globe and Mail of yesterday how the Prime Minister of Canada described these horrific and horrible times.

The story in The Globe and Mail by Paul Koring of the European Bureau states that Mr. Chrétien:

> ...described Hitler's dream of conquering all of Europe, exterminating the Jews and enslaving other non-Aryan populations as 'a system of political ideas that prevailed at the time, that were not good and we hope will not come back.'

To have the Prime Minister of Canada so lightly characterize the motives of the enemy in the Second World War as "a system of political ideas that were not good" should be cause for great concern to Canadians who should expect more from their Prime Minister. Frankly, I am embarrassed.

HOMAGE TO RESISTANCE MOVEMENTS

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, since we have been celebrating the 50th anniversary of V-E day, I would like to draw your attention to the contribution and made by thousands of resistance fighters in Europe.

At ceremonies to commemorate the anniversary of D-day, it was said that resistance fighters had played a crucial role by limiting the number of Allied soldiers in the liberation forces at the end of World War II.

During the first two years of the war, resistance movements had been organized in countries that were invaded by Hitler's troops.

A refusal to submit to domination by foreign troops, memories of the Great War, rejection of the ideas and measures espoused by the Nazis, respect for the ideals of peace, freedom and equality were all reasons that led women and men, old and young, to risk their lives at the hands of the invaders.

I would like to recall the courage of one woman who was obliged to board Nazi officers in her home and meanwhile provided hiding places for Jewish refugees and Allied paratroopers — including Canadians — on their way to England. She decided to do this despite the risk to herself and her three children.

I also would like to recall the strong feelings that moved an elderly man, who had been an officer during World War I and who, when the Nazis started invading Belgium, wanted to enlist. When he was turned down because of his age, he joined the resistance, where he was active until his death in a Nazi concentration camp.

Finally, as we heard during an excellent program on CBC on Monday, May 8, I would like to recall those young men and women who decided to go to the Vercors region in France to organize a resistance group and were massacred by Hitler's troops.

I also want to pay tribute to those men who took a very active part in the resistance movements and during the post-war period led their countries towards reconciliation and a more open view of the world. I am thinking of Adenauer, de Gaulle, Gomulka and Tito, to name only a few.

We must not forget the millions of soldiers and resistance fighters who gave their lives to make the world a better place for us and our children.

CANADA REMEMBERS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I am prompted by some of the earlier interventions to say a word about the Canada Remembers program. It consisted of various events commemorating the end of World War II and, of course, Canada's part in it. I attended a few of the events, and I know several people who attended others.

From time to time, I have been in touch with the Department of Veterans Affairs for the purpose of obtaining material on this program. I simply wish to say that an absolutely suberb job was done by everyone, at every level, who was involved in organizing and carrying out this program, principally — though not exclusively — the people in the Department of Veterans Affairs. They are deserving of our heartiest thanks.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

Wednesday, May 10, 1995

The Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

THIRD REPORT

Your Committee notes that at the last emergency recall of the Senate in March of this year, certain senators experienced problems with regard to being informed that the Senate had been recalled.

Your Committee recommends that the Rules of the Senate be amended as follows:

That Rule 17(1) be deleted and substituted with the following:

17. (1) During any adjournment of the Senate, if the Speaker is satisfied that the public interest requires that the Senate meet at an earlier time than that provided in the motion for such adjournment, the Speaker may call such a meeting. In so doing the Speaker shall send a notice by the most effective method of communication to each Senator at the address last filed by the Senator with the Clerk of the Senate and to the Senator's office in Ottawa. Such notice shall indicate the time of the meeting of the Senate and the purpose.

Respectfully submitted,

BRENDA M. ROBERTSON
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Robertson, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

NINETY-THIRD CONFERENCE, MADRID, SPAIN— REPORT TABLED

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the report of the Ninety-third Inter-Parliamentary Union Conference held in Madrid, Spain, from March 27 to April 1, 1995.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION—PROPOSED ORDERS ON DIRECTIONS ON DIRECT-TO-HOME SATELLITE DISTRIBUTION UNDERTAKINGS—NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE ELECTRONIC COVERAGE OF COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Thursday, May 11, 1995, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be empowered to permit coverage by electronic media of its public meetings with respect to the examination of the proposed orders issuing directions to the CRTC on Direct-to-Home Satellite Distribution Undertakings with the least possible disruption of the hearings.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

NINETY-THIRD CONFERENCE, MADRID, SPAIN— NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, May 16, 1995, I will draw the attention of the Senate to the Ninety-Third Inter-Parliamentary Union Conference held in Madrid, Spain, from March 27 to April 1, 1995.

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would inform the Senate that the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, Leader of the Government in the Senate, is attending the funeral of our former colleague the late John Black Aird in Toronto this afternoon. Unfortunately, she is unable to be with us this afternoon, and senators opposite have been so informed.

I would be happy to take as notice any pressing questions. In any event, I should like to inform you that Senator Fairbairn will be in her usual place tomorrow afternoon.

PRECINCTS OF PARLIAMENT

LOCKING OF EAST BLOCK DOORS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, my question concerns the East Block and the fact that the doors are locked at 5:30 in the afternoon. When I try to exit after 5:30, the door is locked. I am sure that this poses a fire hazard. No municipality in Canada would allow the doors of a building which still has a lot of people in it to be locked.

I should like the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate to inquire as to how this question can be revisited before we experience an accident. Apart from the fact that it impedes senators who are working in their offices and conducting their parliamentary business, it also poses a serious safety hazard to the employees of the Senate.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I take this question very seriously. I was not aware of that situation. I recently vacated the East Block. Perhaps it was just in time. Obviously, I locked the door on my way out.

An Hon. Senator: Did you turn out the lights?

Senator Graham: No, I did not turn off the lights!

I will be happy to take this question as notice. This was probably done as an economic measure, perhaps an ill-considered one. If other honourable senators who occupy offices in the East Block have concerns, we should also hear from them. I will certainly bring this situation to the attention of the appropriate authorities.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a couple of questions raised in the Senate on March 1, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Spivak regarding the elimination of the western grain transportation subsidy; a response to a question raised the Senate on April 6, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Kinsella regarding the abandonment of holdings on Partridge Island, New Brunswick; and a response to a question raised in the Senate on May 2, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Ghitter regarding the refusal by House of Commons committee to hear testimony of renowned firearms expert.

If I may add, honourable senators, I know there are outstanding questions both written and oral. Senator Oliver has just raised his hand. I pressed again on your question this morning, Senator Oliver. I am attempting to reorganize the situation with respect to expediting answers to both written and oral questions. I ask honourable senators to bear with me. We lit a few fires in a few places. It is to be hoped that the results will be fruitful and we will have some early responses.

ELIMINATION OF CROW RATE SUBSIDY—MAINTENANCE OF GRAIN ECONOMY IN MANITOBA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Mira Spivak on March 1, 1995)

The western grain transportation reform package will help improve both the efficiency of the grain handling and transportation system and the competitiveness of Prairie agriculture while more effectively meeting our international obligations.

Regarding help to the sector for value-added processing, there are several initiatives in the package to help the sector ease into the new business environment. An ex gratia capital payment of $1.6 billion will be provided to Prairie farm land owners in recognition of the impact on land values that may result from the termination of the long-standing freight rate subsidies. The use of this payment is not directly tied to future marketing or production decisions. Landowners may use the funds to offset the increase in freight costs, to change crop mix, to change operations, to get out of agriculture altogether, or to create value-added processing.

In addition to the payment, there is a multi-year WGTA Adjustment Fund of $300 million, to become available beginning in the 1996-97 fiscal year, to help Prairie agriculture make the necessary transition to the new economic environment. One of the priorities for the Adjustment Fund is assistance for a transition period to producers affected by changes to the freight cost pooling system changes. The majority of these changes could be in Manitoba. Other uses of the Fund are to be developed in consultation with the industry. If it is the desire of the industry, some of these funds could be used, as the honourable member suggested, for assistance to development of value-added processing. The details have yet to be developed with the industry.

Furthermore, the changes create a more stable operating environment which could foster increased investment in the sector. For example, the canola industry has already indicated that significant investment in crushing plants will proceed now that the WGTA is reformed. Prairie grain companies have also stated that they could spend more than a billion dollars to upgrade Canada's grain handling system in the next 10 years.

With respect to the grain export economy, the government will provide new and additional export credit guarantees on up to $1 billion worth of sales to non-sovereign buyers around the world, in recognition of the ongoing importance of bulk grain and other agri-food exports and to help meet foreign competition.

ELIMINATION OF CROW RATE SUBSIDY—POSSIBILITY OF ASSISTANCE FROM WESTERN ECONOMIC DIVERSIFICATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

The Department of Western Economic Diversification (WD) has no direct responsibility for the issues in question. Cancellation of the western grain subsidy, and matters directly related thereto, fall within the purview of the Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food.

With implementation of changes in the Western Grain Transportation Act (WGTA) and the National Transportation Act, WD supports the Churchill Task Force recommendation that there be public commitment to preservation of the transportation infrastructure and services of the Port of Churchill. A marketing agency to be entitled "Gateway North" is proposed to be established by government and private-sector stakeholders.

WD's contribution to economic diversification in western Canada is broad-based. To better serve small business, WD is now focusing on increasing access to capital leveraged from the private sector; developing targeted capital funds in cooperation with commercial lending institutions; developing strategic alliances with the provinces, industry and financial institutions; single-window service to business; community economic development; and representing western interests nationally.

As a key focus of this new direction, WD is working cooperatively with other departments, provincial governments and interested stakeholders to establish investment funds targeted at leveraging private sector capital for key economic growth sectors, such as agricultural biotechnology, environmental industries, tourism and agricultural value-added products.

The Community Futures Program has also been transferred from Human Resources Development to WD; this will open up a further network for diversification and support to small business in the rural regions of the West.

WD has also undertaken discussions with representatives of provincial governments and other federal government departments, such as Agriculture Canada and Human Resources Development, to achieve wherever possible the integration of services to business and to provide more efficient service via a single point of access.

TRANSPORT

ABANDONMENT OF HOLDINGS ON PARTRIDGE ISLAND, NEW BRUNSWICK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Noël A. Kinsella on April 6, 1995)

The Canadian Coast Guard owns the whole island. Following the automation of Partridge Island lighthouse in 1988, CCG declared most of the island as excess crown property and Public Works & Government Services Canada (PW&GSC) was requested to dispose of this property in 1991. CCG would retain only the lighthouse, the fog alarm building near the lighthouse, helipad, radio beacon tower site, right-of-ways and easements for access and power supply and dispose of surplus land, the three dwellings, the old fog alarm building, wharf facilities and other miscellaneous structures.

Real property no longer required for program purposes must be disposed of at market value according to the Federal Real Property Act, Regulations and Treasury Board Policy. Surplus federal real property must first be offered to other federal departments, Crown corporations, provincial governments, municipalities and finally to the public through a public tendering process.

No expression of interest was received from any federal government departments including Heritage Canada. The Province of New Brunswick confirmed on February 22, 1995 that they had no interest in acquiring this property. The Port of Saint John had originally expressed interest in the island but later withdrew their offer. The City of Saint John was approached as well but has not responded as of April 19.

The lightstation was established on Partridge Island in 1791. Other uses of the Island throughout history range from an immigration/quarantine station during the Irish immigration period, a military role during both World Wars and approximately 600 immigrant burial plots which are dispersed over the island.

Given the fact that Grosse Ile in the Province of Quebec, a site with similar characteristics, is being developed by Heritage Canada, the Canadian Coast Guard intends to contact Heritage Canada to determine if they would consider acquiring the surplus real property at Partridge Island.

FIREARMS LEGISLATION

REFUSAL BY HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMITTEE TO HEAR TESTIMONY OF RENOWNED FIREARMS EXPERT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Ron Ghitter on May 2, 1995)

Beauchesne, 6th edition, citation 760 (3) provides:

Committees are and must remain masters of their own procedure.

Citation 852 provides:

Only the committee can make a decision as to which witnesses should be called.

The criteria that was used by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for selecting witnesses was a matter for the committee itself to determine and is not within the responsibilities of the government.

If Bill C-68 is approved by the House of Commons, one of the Senate's committees will have the responsibility of determining which witnesses should appear to present evidence on the legislation. That committee may wish to consider hearing from some of those who did not have an opportunity to make a presentation before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

VISITOR IN GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before I call the Orders of the Day, I wish to draw your attention to the Speaker's Gallery where we are honoured to have Dr. Alfred Sant, the Leader of the Opposition in the Parliament of Malta.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

ORDERS OF THE DAY

FIRST NATIONS GOVERNMENT BILL

SECOND READING—MOTION TO DEFER ADJOURNED TO AWAIT RULING OF SPEAKER

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill S-10, An Act providing for self-government by the first nations of Canada.—(Honourable Senator Tkachuk).

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(e), I move:

That the order for the second reading of Bill S-10, providing for self-government by the first nations of Canada, be postponed until the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples, to which is now referred the subject-matter of this bill, has presented its report on this order of reference to the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Tkachuk, seconded by the Honourable Senator Twinn, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(e):

That the order for the second reading of Bill S-10, providing for self-government by the first nations of Canada, be postponed until the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples, to which is now referred the subject-matter of this bill, has presented its report on this order of reference to the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators to adopt the motion?

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a question of clarification on this matter. Senator Gauthier wishes to raise a point of order. Does the motion actually include a reference to the committee?

The Hon. the Speaker: I will read the motion again. It states:

That the order for the second reading of Bill S-10, An Act providing for self government by the first nations of Canada, be postponed until the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples, to which is now referred the subject-matter of this Bill, has presented its report on this order of reference to the Senate.

The motion is to refer the subject-matter of the bill to the Aboriginal Peoples Committee.

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, who was the speaker? I want to debate that motion. That motion was just put to us.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is certainly a debatable motion. I asked whether there was agreement, and no one rose. However, if it is the agreement of honourable senators to revert, the Senate can do so. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to revert?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Carried. Senator Gauthier, please continue.

Senator Gauthier: I apologize, Your Honour. I heard you say "Does the senator have leave?" I thought that was leave to introduce the motion. I must have been distracted.

I was aware that Senator Tkachuk wished to introduce his motion today. He told me yesterday that he intended to move a motion to have the subject-matter of the bill referred to committee and that he had no intention of debating this bill at second reading. That is an intelligent way of handling this bill at this time.

My training does not allow me to take the same kind of liberty that the Senate seems to have with this kind of bill. In the House — and I apologize again for referring to my past experience — when a motion is made to send the subject-matter of a bill to a committee, the bill is dropped from the Order Paper. I understand that the Senate has different rules and that we can leave the bill on the Order Paper at first reading while referring the subject-matter of that bill to a committee. That means that the house has two similar items before it. I do not know whether that is in keeping with the rules of order or whether it makes good sense, but that is the way the Senate operates, and I will accept that.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: You will get used to our procedures here.

Senator Gauthier: I want Your Honour to confirm that the bill still stands on the Order Paper at first reading. If it does still stand at first reading and if Your Honour's ruling is in the affirmative, then I would like to debate that question at first reading.

The impact of that bill requires a Royal Recommendation. I do not care if the bill is at first, second or third reading; it will have to be debated. I would have preferred that the whole subject be cleared up before the said matter went to the committee, rather than afterwards. If it needs a Royal Recommendation, then we will have lost a lot of time and will have put people to a lot of trouble and needless debate on the matter when this house could have had a prior, intelligent discussion to determine whether this bill should be appropriately endowed with a Royal Recommendation. If it does not need a Royal Recommendation, fine, but if it does need one, we would be well advised to include it.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, that motion was totally unnecessary. The so-called subject-matter is a technicality that was invented some years ago to allow members in either house to debate the contents of a bill in advance — that is, the subject-matter.

Senator Gauthier is entirely correct that in the House of Commons the order is simply discharged. Nevertheless, the committee proceeds with consideration of the subject-matter. It is just common sense that if the subject-matter is now in the hands of the members of the Aboriginal Peoples Committee, this house should not revisit the issue until the committee has reported on that matter. It is as simple as that.

That is why today's procedure is not only unusual but also uncalled for and unnecessary, unless I am not aware of some tactics behind this move. If there are those types of intentions, then the house should be brought into the confidence of the honourable senator who made the motion.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps I can shed some light on the "tactics." As Senator Graham and I have discussed on several occasions, it became apparent that many members in both our caucuses were not really knowledgeable about what was happening with this bill.

Based on my discussions with my counterpart opposite, one of the alternatives I presented to Senator Tkachuk was to put the subject-matter before the committee prior to the vote on the principle of the bill, which takes place at second reading. There is nothing more to it than to allow senators on both sides of the house an opportunity to familiarize themselves with the bill while it is in committee. Perhaps once senators are more familiar with the details of this legislation, they will be able to vote on the principle of the bill.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Berntson. I refer to the intervention by Senator Gauthier, where he rather tentatively raised a question of order implying that there was a possibility that the bill, as it now stands, would be out of order because we cannot introduce in this house a bill which requires a Royal Recommendation, the implication being that this bill does require a Royal Recommendation.

If I heard Senator Gauthier correctly, he requested a ruling from Speaker Molgat. I am trying to avoid that terrible expression from the other place, "His Honour," as if the Speaker of the Senate were a minor court judge.

If Senator Gauthier's request for a Speaker's ruling still stands, perhaps we ought to have some discussion before the Speaker undertakes to fulfil that obligation. On the other hand, we could delay the question of whether the bill is in order as it now stands until the committee has done its work. Either way, I do not want a situation to occur where the Speaker is giving a ruling without having heard some argument from honourable senators.

Senator Berntson: Honourable senators, I had hoped not to be drawn into a debate like this, but here I am. I am anything but an expert on procedural matters, but it is my understanding that such a point of order may be raised at any time during the course of the passage of the bill, at first reading, second reading, or third reading. Not being an expert myself, whenever it is raised, I am quite prepared to let all the arguments flow and to accept the ruling of the Speaker.

Having said that, if I understand where we are, the motion to refer the subject-matter to the committee has been passed and we are now dealing with a point of order. I may be wrong but that is my understanding. I do not foresee any potential damage from that course of action either, primarily because I believe this to be a very important debate in any event. Someone could raise the question of a Royal Recommendation requirement at some future point, and that would be fine.

In the meantime, as the committee goes on with its work, perhaps we will discover what this thing called aboriginal self-government is all about.

Senator Stewart: I want to be quite sure on this matter. You are saying that, to your understanding, the Speaker has not been asked for a ruling on the need for a recommendation. The question of whether the bill itself is in order will be left in abeyance. Is that correct?

Senator Berntson: I am not clear on that matter at all. I do not know whether Senator Gauthier stood up and raised a point of order or whether he stood and attempted to get into the debate. I suppose the only person who is really sure about that is Speaker Molgat.

Senator Stewart: Then we ought to be enlightened. We do not want the Speaker to feel he must give a ruling when there has been no opportunity for honourable senators to discuss the point.

Senator Berntson: My impression is that Senator Tkachuk moved a motion, that the Speaker called the question and that it was passed. Senator Gauthier intervened. Whether that intervention constitutes a point of order or an attempt to engage in the debate, I leave that determination in the hands of the Speaker.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Senator Gauthier is still suffering from the effects of 21 years in the House of Commons.

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, it is my very clear perception that the motion was moved, the question put by the Speaker, and we voted on it. The matter was passed, from what I understand. It seems to me, then, that if Senator Gauthier has questions to raise — and I have no doubt that they are very important and poignant questions — perhaps they should be raised during the study by the Senate committee.

Senator Gauthier: May I clarify my question? There seem to be many experts here. May I speak for myself?

Senator Cools: It is not what he said; it is when he said it.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I understand very clearly that, indeed, Senator Cools could be right. Yes, the question was called. Yes, Senator Gauthier asked to revert and, yes, we agreed to revert. Because the Senate did not object to reverting, we are in order. It is very clear.

The subject-matter of this legislation is of such importance that many countries are talking about it. Debate is ongoing in British Columbia. Presently I am involved with a northern tribe of that province and I am giving them my full support and consultation. I will write a letter to the Prime Minister of Canada about that matter, which he has been talking about for 22 years.

Honourable senators, the Senate could do some of its best work at this juncture. I often raised objections in the House of Commons, as did my friend and colleague Senator Gauthier, so that matters would be sent to committee before second reading. In that way, we can learn about the subject, change the bill and return for second reading with a totally different product than may have been put forth at first reading.

I would urge my colleagues to give consent to send the subject-matter, as proposed and agreed to, to committee. I have had no part in discussions between the two parties, as usual. We should agree to put the subject-matter before the committee, where I will be active as a non-voting member.

I see Senator Stollery laughing, but that is okay. I take that with great pleasure.

This subject-matter is presently very important in this country. We will learn much. We will exchange views. When we finish, we may have found a new way. That would be a good result for the Senate rather than being stuck for long hours discussing Royal Recommendations.

I am of the opinion that this Royal Recommendation could be used to bury the Senate or to bury any discussion on any subject which requires some funding. Therefore, I submit that Speaker Molgat has correctly handled this matter. He should now put the question so that we can, again, give unanimous consent.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, I want to make it perfectly clear that we are not discussing tactics, strategy or the merits of the legislation here. It is true that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition and I discussed the options, and the results of those discussions were transmitted clearly to Senator Tkachuk.

One of the options discussed was to have Senator Tkachuk make the motion that he has made today — that is, without second reading; in other words, the Senate would not approve the bill in principle at second reading stage, but would send it to the appropriate committee for study. Therefore, I ask for clarification on this motion.

Another option presents itself: Serious concerns have been expressed and questions asked by the parties represented on both sides of this house with reference to the constitutionality and admissibility of the motion. Rather than have the bill sent to committee for examination of its subject-matter at this particular time — and we have no objection to the bill being sent to committee at the appropriate time — a sufficient number of concerns have been raised that perhaps His Honour might wish to consult with the appropriate officials in order to determine if our concerns with respect to the constitutionality of the legislation are valid, and whether or not such a motion requires a Royal Recommendation, or involves "peace, order and good government," or whatever.

In other words, at this particular point in time, we thought it might be useful for us to have the Speaker's opinion on this matter, and if at the appropriate time he rules that the motion is not in order, then we will understand where we stand.

However, if we allow this motion and refer the subject-matter to the committee without first having a ruling from the Speaker, it could happen that the senators on the committee might be wasting their time if we find, when the matter is returned to the Senate, that indeed the motion may have been out of order in the first place. Depending upon the Speaker's ruling, there may be accommodations that can be made with respect to the legislation so that it could be acceptable.

I merely make those points in order that Senator Gauthier may be allowed, in turn, to make his points now, since we have reverted to this motion. There may also be other honourable senators who may wish to raise some points.

Senator Tkachuk: Honourable senators, a number of issues had been raised concerning this Bill S-10, not only in my own caucus but also by honourable senators opposite. I had discussions with Senator Berntson and subsequently asked that the matter be handled in this manner.

I deliberately left this item on the Order Paper for a long time for a purpose: so that if there were any issues to be discussed, they could be discussed. Although in fact it has only been there for six or seven sitting days, the matter has been on the order paper for a month.

I was listening to what Senator Gauthier had to say. He asked His Honour whether the question of a Royal Recommendation can be raised as the bill proceeds. I am not intending to speak for His Honour at this time, but my understanding is that the answer is yes, it can, and it can be dealt with at that time. It should go to the committee for study because the bill is a complex one. It has certain repercussions for our country matters which are being discussed right now, behind closed doors. Those matters are being discussed by departmental officials, by particular groups, by aboriginal groups, and so on, and it seems that parliamentarians are to have no say in the matter.

Although this bill was brought with some purpose, namely to develop a framework for self-government that could be applied to aboriginals with territory across the country, it also allows us to fully debate the matter here in the Senate, no matter what happens.

If we had proceeded to second reading of this bill, I do not think there is anyone in the Senate who disagrees with the principle of the bill, which is self-government for aboriginal peoples, a principle which was laid down in the Red Book at the time of the last election. Our party fully supports that principle and has acted upon it during our term in office. We are committed to self-government for aboriginal peoples.

It then comes down to the fact that this is a very unusual and, perhaps one might say, an elegantly written bill that was drafted in a very unusual manner. A group of nine reserves from Treaty 8 in Northern Alberta, in the Lesser Slave Lake region, actually paid for the research, did all the sweat equity and all of the background work, with both myself and Senator Twinn. They then worked with the legal staff in the Senate to draft the bill. It was not undertaken in the usual manner where people are paid to do this work by the Government of Canada. In this case, the initiative was taken by the parties to develop this particular bill.

As I mentioned previously, the bill was elegantly written and carefully drafted by eminent drafters under the leadership of James Ryan, who is known to many honourable senators. We now have an opportunity, before the bill goes to second reading, to study the subject-matter of that bill and then allow it to proceed through the legislative process, if we so desire.

Whether or not something requires a Royal Recommendation is a question that can be raised at any time. In this instance, I do not believe that one is required, but that is something to be decided down the road. However, this motion will allow us an opportunity to discuss the bill in committee and to debate these very important issues without first having to deal with those matters at this time. In fact, we can deal with those matters at any time before the bill leaves this place.

I would ask honourable senators to support this particular motion. I know that Senator Berntson has been tearing his hair out over it, and I am sure Senator Graham is tired of the phone calls. However, let me say that I do appreciate the time he has spent with Senator Berntson on trying to work out some kind of solution.

I would therefore ask honourable senators to agree to this motion and let this issue proceed so that we can carry out our duties as parliamentarians and do the work that is expected of us by the Canadian people, rather than arguing about whether the matter should go to this committee or to that committee. Taking the long view, it is not a very important matter whether this bill goes immediately to second reading, or whether the subject-matter is first referred to a committee. We will go about doing our work on the bill, and thereafter we will proceed, in a professional fashion, to bring it forward, or change it, or make amendments. Anything can happen in this process of study.

Senator Gauthier: My question, originally, was whether the bill was still before the Senate, notwithstanding that the subject-matter of said bill had been referred to a committee — and let me repeat, it was the subject-matter that was referred and not the bill; the bill is supposedly still before this house. That is what I want the Speaker to rule on, and confirm for me that, yes, the bill is still before this house. If it is, then I may have something else to do. But right now, I do not know its status.

In my prior life, it would not have been; it would have been withdrawn. Now I am told that it is different here. That is what I am dealing with. Is it before the house, yes or no. That is a simple question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, first, I am always pleased to hear points of view from all sides whenever a question is raised. Let me try and put forward my understanding of where we stand at this point. If I am not correct, then I would appreciate your opinion.

As I recall the circumstances, when I called the order in the first place, after having read the proposed motion by Senator Tkachuk, a vote was held. After that, Senator Graham rose, as did Senator Gauthier almost simultaneously. I asked honourable senators if they were prepared to revert. The Senate agreed to revert. In my view, that wipes out the original vote.

Therefore, what went on in the interval disappears. We are therefore back to the motion of Senator Tkachuk.

At that point, Senator Gauthier rose. I did not hear him say, "I rise on a point of order." He said, "My wish is to debate." In the course of those remarks, he asked a question. He has repeated it now. My understanding is that he was not raising a question concerning a Royal Recommendation. That came later in the discussion. To my knowledge there is no point of order on that issue before us.

The question now is: Did Senator Gauthier raise a point of order, or did he ask a question? In his first statement, I understood him to ask a question. In that case, in my view, that is not a matter on which I need to rule. It is a question which I will undertake to review because it is an important point.

The question is: Is the bill still before the Senate at some stage in between first and second reading and at the same time in committee? Frankly, I am not sure. I want to review the precedents in that regard.

That is where we stand, honourable senators. We have a question, which I will look into, but the motion is still before us. As such, no point of order has been raised. If Senator Gauthier tells me he has raised a point of order, then I will take it under advisement and the matter will stand for now. Without a point of order being raised, I will call the question on the motion once again. If a point of order is raised, I will take it under advisement.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps we should have clarification on whether, by passing this motion, it has the effect of dropping the bill from the Order Paper. The motion states that second reading be postponed — not that the bill be dropped. Therefore, by implication, it should remain on the Order Paper.

I believe Senator Murray would remind us that there have been bills and/or subject-matters referred to committee before second reading. Unless Senator Tkachuk wants to persist, perhaps we should have the ruling before the motion is voted on.

The Hon. the Speaker: In the interests of the Senate, and if it is agreed, I believe we should leave the matter until tomorrow. I do not want to delay the bill in any way. To be sure from the point of view of the Senate as to where we stand, I think it would be advisable to delay it, rather than to proceed and establish a precedent which we might regret at a later date.

If it is agreeable to honourable senators, we can let the matter stand. I will try to provide an answer tomorrow. If that cannot be done, then I guarantee that I will provide one when we meet the following week.

Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Senator Corbin: On the advice of the Chair, does that mean that Your Honour's statement tomorrow, or on a subsequent day, would preclude any further debate on the topic?

The Hon. the Speaker: Whether there can be debate will depend on what is before us. Rulings of the Speaker are not debatable. Whether the issue itself will be before us, I am not quite sure. That will depend on my final ruling. That is to say, it depends on whether Senator Tkachuk's motion is accepted, or whether his motion will have the effect of removing the bill from the Order Paper. However, we will still have the motion for second reading before us.

I am not quite sure, Senator Corbin. I assume that, with the usual understanding we have here in the Senate, we can resolve the matter to the satisfaction of everyone and carry on with a debate.

Senator Stewart: Your Honour, I am pretty sure I have understood what you said. What Your Honour said is that we will not now have to deal with the question of a Royal Recommendation, that question not having been raised formally. However, we are not precluding anyone raising it. I do not intend to raise it because I happen to think that the bill probably is in order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, that is correct. I have not been asked to rule on the question of Royal Recommendation, and I do not intend to do so.

I must tell honourable senators that in anticipation of this occurrence, the Table staff and I have been working on the matter, and are examining it carefully. It is an important point.

I hope to come back with an answer to the question: When we send the subject-matter of the bill to a committee, does it then mean that the original bill is temporarily withdrawn? I understand that this is the question.

In the meantime, this item will remain on the Order Paper.

Motion adjourned to await ruling of the Speaker.

THE ENVIRONMENT

SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Janis Johnson rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, February 22, 1995:

> That she will call the attention of the Senate to the environment and the issue of sustainable development.

She said: Honourable senators, I rise today to share with you my growing concern about the environment and the issue of sustainable development. I do so not as an expert but as a parliamentarian who is most concerned with the future of our planet. It is also rather timely considering what our country has just experienced with the European Union in the fishing dispute on our eastern coastline.

I strongly believe that we as senators should devote more energy to the principle of sustainable development. According to the report of Canada to the United Nations Commission on Sustainable Development, to be presented this month in New York:

> There is no one government or institution that is exclusively responsible for sustainable development, all Canadians are.

Some work is being done by the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, whose efforts I applaud. Senator Carney's committee is working on projects such as the National Protected Areas Strategy; and Senator Kenny has placed Bill S-7 before us, which aims to accelerate the use of alternative fuels for internal combustion engines.

However, I wish to draw the attention of this house to the fact that 600,000 Canadians, 300 organizations and most senior governments support the idea of establishing a network of wilderness lands across Canada. If achieved, this plan would protect areas which represent each of the country's natural regions. The total area protected would amount to 12 per cent of Canada's land mass.

This network would guarantee a critical mass of protected habitat for endangered wildlife, forests and fish species. The committee will recommend specific actions for achieving that goal.

• (1440)

Wildlife conservation and habitat preservation may seem less pressing than some of the more controversial issues of contemporary society. However, one day these controversies and burning issues will fall into perspective and become the quaint minutia of daily politics at the end of the 20th century. If we scattered this minutia like iron filings on a sheet of paper and passed them over the magnet of history, I believe that a greater and much more disturbing picture would emerge. This picture would show who we are; it would show where we are going; and it would show clearly that warfare, viral epidemic, urban blight and environmental destruction are growing threats to the human race. It would show us that these frightening problems may become intractable by the time our children and grandchildren inherit them.

In my work as a senator, I have devoted considerable energy to studying the global environmental crisis. The more I learn about this subject, the more I am convinced that its importance overrides all other political concerns.

Honourable senators, the Canadian Senate has a long and distinguished tradition of thoughtfully examining issues as various as child poverty, banking, education, communications, and soil erosion. During the upcoming year, I ask you to think about dedicating that same wisdom, energy and social influence towards solving the very serious environmental crisis ahead of us. For my own part, I will consult with leading experts in the environmental field, and periodically I will report back to this chamber on the results.

I have no desire, my honourable friends, to waste your valuable time with idle speculation or with hand-wringing prophecies of doom and gloom. I hope, instead, to define our environmental problem and then to survey our best experts for reasonable strategies for resolving them.

The question, of course, is where does one begin? Do we look at the famine and disease that afflict so many countries in the third world, at the destruction of tropical rain forests, or is it more appropriate to begin right here at home with the destruction of our own resources? There is no shortage of crises before us. They all cry out for individual solutions. When we sketch in other domestic woes — unemployment, urban crime, the national debt, and so on — the shear complexity of the problem can overwhelm a person's will to act.

Honourable senators, some might choose to face these issues with cynicism and denial, both easy temptations when you live in this urbane, peaceful city in the most envied nation on earth. However, denial will not change the fact that the world's population has doubled since 1950 and will continue to do so with accelerating rapidity. It will not change the fact that this year we lost an average of one species per hour to extinction, or that millions of children died from preventable disease and starvation.

Denial will not change the future. Most experts agree that the world's population will hit the 10 billion mark sometime early in the next century. Around the same time, about 30 nations will simply run out of water. Virgin forests will be razed to the ground, converted into lumber, paper and unproductive farm land. Animals like the black rhinoceros and Siberian tiger will only be a sad memory.

By the mid-point of the 21st century, wildlife issues and forest conservation will seem like mere luxuries. Nation states will fall like dominoes, and as we saw recently in the case of Somalia and Rwanda, these devastated nations will become no-no zones, borderless waste lands commanded by war lords and their armed gangs.

As the human population continues to climb past the 12 billion mark, these crises will continue to multiply and gain momentum, driving the world towards the brink of global war, uncontrollable viral epidemics, and perhaps even the collapse of the human species.

In short, honourable senators, the environmental crisis is not a bad dream. It is real. It lies ahead of us just as ominously as an iceberg blocks the path of a supertanker. This ship of state reacts ponderously to changes, and I respectfully submit that the time to take evasive action is not at some undefined point in the future, but now.

As senators, can we change anything? I believe that we can. I truly do. Canada has built for itself a respected role as an international peacekeeper. With our wealth of natural resources and respected reputation in the field of diplomacy, we are well equipped to become environmental lobbyists in the international community.

Honourable senators, the United Nations will mark its 50th anniversary in 1995 and, very soon, sustainable development will become one of the UN's top priorities. By 1997, the Committee on Sustainable Development, or CSD, of the United Nations will meet to monitor progress on 39 issues relating to environment and development. Termed "Agenda 21," the plan will see what progress we are making as governments around the world begin to recognize that conservation is not just a motherhood-and-apple-pie issue. Natural resources make up the very foundation of the world economy, and without resources, we have no future.

My honourable friends, the air we breathe is our most basic resource. We tend to take it for granted because it is free, but the ancient Greeks regarded air as one of the four essential elements. Today we know that without air, there can be no life. The earth's reservoir of nurturing air is called the "troposphere," a thin, moist envelope of warm air surrounding our planet. The troposphere is not as vast and limitless as we tend to believe. The upper limit of the troposphere is about six miles above our heads, no further than from here to Gatineau Park.

In the 1970s, a British scientist named James Lovelock identified the buildup of gases called CFCs in the atmosphere. In 1984, a team of British scientists realized that these CFCs had burned a whole in the atmosphere above the Antarctic. This hole in the so-called "ozone layer" was about the size of the United States. With a depleted ozone layer, increased levels of ultraviolet-B radiation pour through the atmosphere creating higher risks of skin cancer. Canadian weather broadcasters now issue "ultraviolet radiation bulletins" during danger periods in the early summer. In nature, even 1 per cent is a large number, and in some parts of Canada, scientists have measured UV-B radiation levels that are 15 per cent above normal.

Honourable senators, within the framework of the United Nations, Canada helped establish the very first laws to protect air quality. In response to the alarming destruction of the ozone layer, the international community met in Montreal in 1987 to draft the first "law of the air" — the so-called "Montreal Protocol" — which committed signatory nations to a strict timetable of reduction in CFC usage. Since then, alarming information has continued to surface, and the Montreal Protocol has been amended to implement a total phaseout of CFC products by 1995.

The Montreal Protocol was a landmark example of international diplomacy, and it gives all nations a model that we can draw upon in the future. What was the secret of its success? Greater public knowledge was a key factor. The United States was an important diplomatic player, but perhaps the single most significant component was the creation of a fund to help poorer countries switch over from CFCs to less harmful substances. The Montreal Protocol showed that the southern hemisphere is quite willing to go along with large-scale environmental initiatives as long as wealthy northern nations help pay the bill.

Can we continue in this positive direction? The first step, my friends, is to recognize that the crisis is not as complicated as it might seem. There are not thousands of environmental crises or hundreds or even a dozen. There is really only one.

Honourable senators, we refuse to live within the laws of nature. That is the bottom line.

Does that mean we should be striving for zero consumption of resources? No. We are not required to go back to the Stone Age. Technology is not inherently harmful to nature. Witness the sail boat, the wrist watch, the bicycle, even the computer in your office. Technology may have a good, bad, or neutral impact on the environment. Nor is it necessary for us to strive for "zero impact" on natural resources. The earth produces a surplus of natural resources every year, a usable bounty of fish, plants, and forest products that we can use now and for all eternity without diminishing the principle. This is called the "sustainable harvest." The sustainable harvest varies with all species. In the marshes of Lake Winnipeg near my home, trappers are able to harvest up to 80 per cent of the muskrat population every year without depleting the population. In higher, more long-lived animals like whales, the sustainable harvest may be as low as 5 per cent. Even crude, 19th century whaling boats were able to harvest a higher portion of the population than 5 per cent. Apart from moral considerations, whaling is simply a non-sustainable activity.

None of this is very mysterious. We have an abundance of highly dedicated scientists who are generally eager to share their information with anyone who will listen. Scientists, of course, are not always right, but accuracy of scientific information has never been our primary problem.

"Sustainable development" means designing corporate activity that falls within the limits of natural systems. If we learn to live within the principles of sustainable development, we can conceivably develop the entire world community to a high standard of living with no lasting damage to the environment. However, if sustainable development is to work, we must do more than just dress up the same old system with a new coat of paint.

Under the current model, resource-based industries are planned, first of all, as business enterprises. Politicians, engineers, bankers, accountants and lawyers are in charge of determining whether a business enterprise is feasible. If the numbers look attractive, the project moves along. At some point, nature's point of view may be included. This is called the "environmental impact study," and it normally bangs along at the tail end of the process like a tin can dragging behind a limousine.

Today, investment opportunities, regional employment targets and countless other narrow focus issues are given far more weight than environmental considerations. If sustainable development is to have any effect on our worsening global crisis, we must move it from somewhere near the end of the line to somewhere near the front.

The Montreal Protocol established a good precedent for Canada, but air quality is not as serious a problem in Canada as in other nations. How do we Canadians perform when our own interests are at stake? Look at water management. Water is central to the history of this country. It defines our borders, creates our agricultural and forestry wealth, and, not long ago, provided our principal transportation thoroughfares. Canada has almost 10 per cent of the world's fresh water, more than any other nation on earth.

Just as we can take clean air for granted, Canadians tend to believe that clean, abundant, inexpensive water is their birthright. Water management is carried out by a patchwork of federal, provincial and municipal agencies. Near my home, real estate developers are permitted to build new structures on the very shore of Lake Winnipeg. This reduces wildlife habitat, damages fish spawning beds, and, of course, creates a danger of pollution from sewage run-off. Only an hour's drive to the east, the Province of Ontario applies a very different set of regulations.

This same patchwork approach applies to our creeks and rivers. In some parts of Manitoba, the provincial government has funded efforts to channelize creeks and drain wetlands, a practice extremely destructive to plants, wildlife and farmland. Now many districts are experiencing drought, and others are appealing to their government to finance expensive irrigation systems to repair the damage done by their neighbours.

Honourable senators, we must recognize that political boundaries are in fact arbitrary divisions imposed on vast, interconnected, whole natural systems. Biologists have long argued for a systematic management plan that governs entire watersheds, otherwise the efforts of one jurisdiction will forever cancel that of another.

Another important issue in the coming years will be water exports. In a few decades, many nations around the world will be running short of potable water, and Canada will be tempted to sell it in bulk to other countries. The United States in particular would be an obvious market. Large scale water exports would, however, be a short-term prospect. Canadian water resources are finite, and even the enormous reservoirs of the Great Lakes quickly show the effects of large-scale drainage to the south. Reduced water levels in Canada would damage shore line environments and deplete fish and wildlife.

For these and countless other reasons, large-scale water sales to the United States, no matter how tempting and profitable, would be a gross violation of sustainable development principles. One would like to believe that Canadian policymakers would argue for the wise course of action with our water supplies, but history gives little indication that our actions are inherently noble when profits or votes are involved.

The tragic destruction of the North Atlantic cod fishery has shown that Canadians are willing to destroy their own natural resources as vigorously as any other country. Assorted scientists warned the federal government that the cod harvest was too high, but again the principles of sustainable development use were put at the bottom of the priority list and the result was the destruction of a species.

Can we learn from our mistakes? Perhaps we can start by admitting that we have made them. The destruction of the northern cod, for example, was not an unemployment story. It was not about jobs any more than the extermination of the bison was about a sudden lack of employment for buffalo hunters. It was about profits. Fisheries are businesses, and we cannot blame them for seeking profits, but it is the job of government to protect our natural resources. Whenever government ignores that responsibility for the sake of political expedience, tragic stories like this are the inevitable result.

Now that the East Coast fishery is devastated, our attention will shift to the West Coast where the same folly is underway. This fall, the attention of the world turned to the legendary migration of the sockeye salmon, but approximately three-quarters of the run failed to materialize on the spawning grounds of the headwaters of the Adams River. Two-and-a-half million salmon simply disappeared.

Many user groups exploit the sockeye, including offshore drift netters, Alaskan commercial boats, Canadian commercial boats, and various aboriginal tribes operating under the virtual carte blanche of the Sparrow decision. All these user groups have denied any responsibility for the missing salmon. Fisheries managers have tried to diffuse the situation by explaining that their projections for the run were perhaps too optimistic.

Will British Columbia salmon populations continue to decline? Yes, they will as they will in California, Oregon, and Washington once abundant salmon runs have been utterly destroyed for the sake of short-term profits. As the salmon disappear, so do the orcas, seals, grizzly bears, dolphins, eagles and other wild species which rely on the salmon for survival. This modern-day buffalo hunt is now moving north. As long as the Canadian government tolerates overfishing, we will no doubt soon be facing a so-called unemployment crisis in the B.C. fishery as well.

As a nation, we must start getting serious about sustainable development. That is my message to you. In my next speech, I will be presenting some examples of projects and initiatives that have made a positive difference and have moved us closer to the goal of true sustainability in our resource industries. In the meantime, I look forward to your response to these important issues.

On motion of Senator Bosa, debate adjourned.

ONTARIO COURT GENERAL DIVISION

MOTION TO STRIKE SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AND REPORT UPON THE CONDUCT AND BEHAVIOUR OF CERTAIN OFFICERS AND JUSTICES— POINT OF ORDER—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Anne C. Cools, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, March 1, 1995 moved:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be constituted to examine and report upon the conduct and behaviour of certain justices and barristers of the Ontario Court of Justice (General Division), raised by the Honourable Senator Cools in her speeches on Parliamentary Privilege in the Senate in terms of:

(i) failing to take judicial notice of the Law of Parliamentary Privilege, the Constitution of Canada, and the laws of Canada pertaining to the Senate;

(ii) failing to uphold and enforce the said laws and the immunities and privileges of the Senate;

(iii) interfering with and frustrating the enjoyment and exercise of the said laws, immunities, and privileges;

(iv) inducing failure to observe and comply with the said laws, immunities, and privileges;

(v) impeaching proceedings in Parliament;

(vi) threatening sanctions on the vindication of the said laws, immunities, and privileges;

(vii) their conduct and behaviour generally relating to the Law of Parliamentary Privilege, the Constitution of Canada, the independence of the judiciary, constitutional comity, the dignity of the Senate, and the due administration of justice;

That the committee be further empowered to consider and report upon related matters which may concern the privileges of the Senate;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee be composed of seven members, four of whom shall constitute a quorum; and

That the Committee of Selection be instructed to decide and report upon the membership of the Special Committee.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order concerning the motion of Senator Cools, notice of which was given on March 1, 1995.

The motion proposes that a special committee of the Senate be constituted to examine and report upon the conduct of the behaviour of certain justices and barristers of the Ontario Court of Justice (General Division) raised by the senator in her recent speeches on parliamentary privilege and certain other factors relating to the privileges of the Senate.

Honourable senators, my point of order is to seek guidance from the Chair on two questions: First, whether this motion is properly worded; and second, whether, in the interests of parliamentary decorum, it is appropriate for the Senate to debate the conduct and behaviour of certain judges and other officers of the court who are not identified in the motion and whom our parliamentary authorities traditionally refer to as "protected persons."

Honourable senators will remember that on October 4, 1994, Senator Cools raised a question of privilege concerning her attendance on July 14, 1994 before the Ontario Court General Division. The senator alleged that she was forced to attend, even though, as she admits in her statement to the Senate on October 4, she was appearing in court as a litigant.

On November 16, 1994, Speaker LeBlanc ruled that her question of privilege did not comply with rule 43 which states that a question of privilege, in order to have priority, must, among other criteria, be raised at the earliest opportunity. He concluded that he was not satisfied that the question was raised in the Senate at the earliest opportunity as "even a gap of a few days may invalidate the claim for precedence."

It should be noted that rule 43(2) goes on to state:

> If the matter is not raised at the earliest opportunity, the Senator raising the matter may put it on notice, but the matter cannot be proceeded with under the terms of this rule.

It would appear that Senator Cools is availing herself of this procedure. However, the motion before us does not deal exclusively with the question of privilege which the honourable senator raised on October 4, 1994. It does not ask the Senate to determine if a breach of privilege occurred. Instead, her motion appears to presume that the Senate's privileges have been breached. It states that a committee be established to examine certain judicial behaviour in terms of a number of accusations which relate to parliamentary privilege and the failure of the court to uphold those privileges.

It would seem to me that, before proceeding to decide whether the conduct and behaviour of certain justices and barristers should be examined, the Senate must first establish whether there was indeed a bona fide question of privilege raised by Senator Cools in her speeches on parliamentary privilege.

Senator Cools' motion seems to include two related, but quite separate, questions which in normal parliamentary practice is not permitted. Beauchesne's Sixth Edition, page 172, citation 557(1) states:

> A motion which contains two or more distinct propositions may be divided so that the sense of the House may be taken on each separately. The Speaker has a discretionary power to decide whether a motion should be divided.

I submit that Senator Cools' motion is not in proper form since it contains two distinct propositions.

The second matter I wish to raise concerns parliamentary decorum. Beauchesne's Sixth Edition, citation 493(1) states:

> All references to judges and courts of justice of the nature of personal attack and censure have always been considered unparliamentary, and the Speaker has always treated them as breaches of order. Members have been interrupted in Committee of the Whole by the Chairman when they have cast an imputation upon a judicial proceeding.

Beauchesne goes on to state in citation 493(4):

> The Speaker has cautioned Members to exercise great care in making statements about persons who are outside the House and unable to reply.

Bourinot's Fourth Edition, page 358-359, states essentially the same thing:

> All references to judges and courts of justice and to personages of high official station, of the nature of personal attacks and censure have always been considered unparliamentary and the speakers of the British and Canadian houses have always treated them as breaches of order. They have always insisted that, 'Such expressions should be withdrawn' and that 'When it is proposed to call in question the conduct of a judge, the member desiring to do so should pursue the constitutional course of moving an address to the Crown.'

Presumably, here Bourinot is referring to section 99(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867 which states:

> ...the Judges of the Superior Courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor General on Address of the Senate and House of Commons.

The motion of Senator Cools is not in the form of an address, nor does it request that certain justices and barristers, whom she does not specifically name, be removed; only that their conduct and behaviour be examined. It appears that her motion is of "the nature of a personal attack and censure," as described by Bourinot, and therefore should not be allowed to proceed.

I am aware that, with regard to the practices of the British House of Commons, as described in Erskine May's 21st Edition, page 380, the British Speaker has ruled that:

> ...reflections on a judge's character or motives cannot be made except on a motion, nor can any charge of a personal nature be made except on a motion....Any suggestion that a judge should be dismissed can only be made on a motion.

However, I doubt very much that, given the form of Senator Cools's motion, in which she does not specifically identify the justices or barristers in question, it would be permitted in the British house.

I am almost certain that, even if a British Speaker had previously ruled that the allegations made by an honourable member did not constitute a breach of parliamentary privilege, that Speaker would not permit a motion of this sort, which essentially calls for an investigation into an alleged breach of privilege to be set down on the Order Paper for debate.

Honourable senators, I would ask Your Honour to rule on my point of order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I will be pleased to hear argument on the point of order.

Senator Cools: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on the point of order. My motion is not only in order and appropriate, but it is also fitting and necessary.

I quote British Prime Minister Sir Campbell-Bannerman who, in similar circumstances, said:

> Therefore this motion is not only in order in a Parliamentary sense, but is perfectly justified and perfectly natural in the circumstances.

The intention of my motion is to ask the Senate of Canada to examine particular circumstances where I believe that the law of parliamentary privilege has been breached by: first, the instituting of court proceedings for the adjudicating on parliamentary privileges, and their success and reward; second, the threat of an exercise of judicial sanction and censure in the exercise of a senator's privilege; third, the compulsion by the Ontario Court (General Division), by court orders, of a senator's attendance in court on Senate sitting days, including during actual Senate sittings; and, fourth, the compulsion by the Ontario Court (General Division), by court orders, of service of any court documents and legal processes requiring personal service in the precincts of Parliament without leave of the Speaker of the Senate of Canada.

That the law of privilege is a part of the public law in Canada is established by the British North American Act, 1867 and the Parliament of Canada Act, R.C.S. 1985.

• (1510)

All senators are bound to defend the privileges of Parliament, the high court of Parliament, the "grand inquest" of the nation. Parliament is the only body which may institute and conduct inquiries into the discharge of judicial functions and receive petitions therein. Parliament, also, is the sole court that may hear and adjudge breaches of privilege or contempts of Parliament. The collective privileges of Parliament and the rights of Parliament to exercise its function are coincidental with the public interest.

In 1837, Lord Viscount Howick reported to the British House of Commons that:

> As the Privilege of each House respectively is derived from and identified with the collective Privilege of Parliament, it becomes essential to bear in mind the basis upon which it rests;...the protection of the public interest as connected with the discharge of the duties and the maintenance of the authority with which Parliament is for public purposes invested.

Senator Robertson surprises me in her capricious treatment of this subject. First, she suggests that Parliament's privileges are not important and that they should be surrendered to the courts, overlooking Parliament's historical experience in this matter and long insistence that, again, as Lord Viscount Howick reported:

> The instant these Privileges are subject to any other jurisdiction than that of Parliament, all security for their existence is at an end; a new element of power is introduced into the State, and the Legislative Assembly of the Nation is no longer supreme.

In other words, honourable senators, for the public good and in the public interest.

Parliament, again as per that same report of 1837, has always asserted that:

> ...the paramount authority of Parliament over the Courts of Law must never be forgotten.

Second, Senator Robertson has suggested that my course of action should have been an address to the Governor General for removal of a judge; that I should pursue the judge to destruction; that I should initiate the most extreme penalty of deprivation of office; and all of this without the benefit of a solemn inquiry.

Honourable senators, the removal of a judge is the ultimate proof of Parliament's supremacy. The framers of our Constitution were sensible, prudent persons. The actual drafting of the British North America Act was a meticulous piece of work. Lord Thring, one of the ablest legislative drafters of the day, was most attentive and diligent to its writing, and our Constitution to this day remains one of the most ably written in the world.

The Act of Settlement of 1701, as enacted by the sovereign, decided for all time the relationship between the courts and Parliament. That act states:

> ...judges' commissions be made quamdiu se bene gesserint (during good behaviour),...but upon the address of both Houses of Parliament, it may be lawful to remove them.

Canada's British North America Act, 1867, section 99(1), is most loyal to the Act of Settlement of 1701 and recites it.

Honourable senators, this power of removal is the most grave in the penal code and is a power of some severity and solemnity. The exercise of this power is not to be taken lightly nor undertaken in any facile way, as Senator Robertson suggests.

I have asked that the Senate of Canada examine this matter in a manner consistent with due regard to the independence of the judiciary, the principles of natural justice, and the issue of public confidence in the administration of justice.

Honourable senators, responsibility is ours, and we should not shrink from it.

I have not asked the Senate to examine these individuals because they have erred either in law or in fact, which matters properly belong to the courts. I have asked the Senate to examine these matters because I believe a terrible thing has happened, that a high breach of Parliament's privileges has been occasioned; that conduct has occurred that is prejudicial to the constitutional order of Canada; that conduct has occurred which corrupts the constitutional order and which lowers the dignity of Parliament and also the dignity of the courts.

Honourable senators, when Parliament's privileges are offended, Parliament can pursue no minor course. When the offending conduct involves courts of law, there is no competent jurisdiction, other than Parliament, to examine these matters. I have felt a great difficulty in approaching this task, but it is a task from which I cannot shrink.

Sir William Blackstone once said:

> The jurisdiction of courts of law in Parliamentary Privilege is one of the most embarrassing questions of constitutional law...

As I have said here before, institutional comity between the coordinate institutions of our Constitution, between Parliament and the courts, is the foundation on which our Constitution is built and the reason for its success. The independence of Parliament and the independence of the judiciary are planks of our governance and our Constitution. The abandonment by an honourable justice of these conventions, in concert with suspected or alleged contempt of Parliament, immediately places an honourable justice into investigation by Parliament. This is enhanced by that fact that this matter has lain on the Order Paper for quite some months without animadverting and that the mentioned persons, unnamed in the Notice of Motion yet easily recognized, have not seen fit to come forward to Parliament or the Senate of Canada by petition or by any other means to clear any suspicion around themselves.

Honourable senators, one of Senator Robertson's complaints is that the individuals were unnamed. I should like to place those names on the record now.

My complaints are directed against Mr. Justice Theodore Matlow of the Ontario Court General Division, and barristers Anne Molloy, Bruce Drake, Eva Frank, and Robbin Basu. The complaints against Anne Maloy touched two other judges — Judge Lee Ferrier and Justice Douglas Lissaman.

Honourable senators, I would be pleased to adjourn my comments so that we can all go off to our committees and to carry on tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Other senators may wish to speak on this matter.

Honourable senators, when a point of order is raised, I should deal with the point of order. I believe we have a precedent whereby a point of order can be raised, and I can defer the matter. Therefore, is it agreed that Senator Cools be allowed to complete her comments now?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Grimard then wishes to speak on this matter.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I doubt that a point of order can be raised on a point of order. I suspect not.

We meet on Wednesdays at 1:30 p.m. on an understanding — there is no rule — that we will adjourn at three o'clock to let committees do their work. One committee was supposed to convene three minutes ago. If we are to continue this procedure of meeting at 1:30 p.m. on Wednesdays in order to rise at approximately three o'clock so we can get on with important work in the committees, we cannot allow the work of the committees to be abbreviated by carrying on here even though the work before the Senate may be extremely important, as it is in this instance.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am in your hands. Is it your wish to ask Senator Cools to complete her comments quickly, hear Senator Grimard and then adjourn?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I believe senator Stewart is correct when he suggests that there can be no point of order on a point of order. A point of order is before us.

Senator Cools: Honourable senators, I am prepared to continue tomorrow. Perhaps I misunderstood. I thought the consensus was to adjourn.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the point is well taken. Once you start a point of order, you should complete it. However, given the constrictions of time, there is agreement that we should postpone the continuation of the point of order until tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: The Senate is always able, by unanimous consent, to do as it wishes.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adjourn debate on this point of order in the name Senator Cools?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Cools, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

VICTORY IN EUROPE

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION CEREMONIES— PRESENCE OF PRIME MINISTER

Hon. John G. Bryden: Honourable senators, yesterday in this chamber a senator made a statement which appears on page 1614 of the Debates of the Senate relating to the celebration of the victory in Europe.

Like that senator, many others in this chamber, and many in this country, I was not old enough to fight in World War II. However, I was old enough to remember my father enlisting at the beginning of the war and my eldest brother becoming old enough to enlist in the last six months of the war.

I remember the first numbers I learned. They were G27915 — my father's regimental number in the New Brunswick Rangers, which I learned from the letters that were read over and over again to us boys at home.

Over the years, since the return of my father, my brother and some of our neighbours, and in particular since my father's death, I have thought of what their sacrifice and the sacrifice of millions of others during that time has meant to me, my children and my grandchildren. Of course, it means many different things to different people. Perhaps the most important and lasting thing for me and my generation is that for 50 years we have not had to make the choice that the members of their generation had to make; that is, whether or not to go to war.

To me, this is one of the greatest legacies that they in their generation left to their fellow Canadians. For 50 years we have not had to choose between fighting and not fighting, to kill or to be killed, in order to protect liberty, civility and humanity. In my opinion, this is one of the most important things being celebrated in the V-E day celebration in Europe.

I cannot be there to honour my father, my brother and their comrades. However, I am proud to be represented there by my Prime Minister, who is a statesman, a world leader and, above all, a Canadian of great humanity.

In that regard, I should like to quote from a column authored by Anthony Wilson Smith which appeared in the May 8 issue of Maclean's magazine. After citing a number advantages of foreign travel to national leaders, the writer states:

> But there is one traditional travel advantage that Chrétien does not need: if respect and affection were what he craved most, he would do as well to stay at home. Virtually alone among leaders of Western democracies, his popularity has grown rather than shrunk since coming to office.

The writer then goes on to discuss a number of tactics which he thinks have helped the Prime Minister's increasing popularity. He then cites a very revealing incident:

> And along with tactics, consider this: last June in Normandy, Chrétien attended ceremonies marking the 50th anniversary of D-Day at the Canadian military cemetery in Beny-sur-mer. The memorial service ran late, largely because of the tardy arrival of French President François Mitterand —

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I hesitate to interrupt the honourable senator, but statements by senators are to be no longer than three minutes in length. Therefore, the Honourable Senator Bryden's time has expired.

Is it the wish of honourable senators that Senator Bryden be allowed to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bryden: I thank honourable senators.

The quotation continues:

> — and Chrétien was visually exhausted. After it ended, the French delegation left at once, as did the buses containing Canadian officials and the media. But one straggler was Chrétien, who slipped into the crowd to greet often frail veterans and their families. Each time one thanked him, Chrétien said emphatically: 'No Sir, thank you.' He stayed for close to an hour, leaving only after all the veterans were shepherded aboard their charter buses. At Beny-sur-mer that night, you did not need a pollster or a pundit to understand why Canadians like Jean Chrétien.

• (1410)

The Prime Minister does not need a member of this chamber, nor anyone else, to instruct him on the significance of what happened in Europe 50 years ago and on what my father, my brother and their comrades fought and died for. He, at least, seems to understand that the forgiveness and the reconciliation must continue if our grandchildren are to be spared the awful choice my father and his generation had to make to defend humanity.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

MANITOBA ACT

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Terry Stratton: Honourable senators, tomorrow marks a very special day for Manitobans and the province of Manitoba.

May 12 marks the 125th anniversary of the giving of Royal Assent to the Manitoba Act, which paved the way for Manitoba to join Confederation. The passage of the Manitoba Act on May 12, 1870, was the first step leading the way to the transfer of Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territory from the Hudson's Bay Company to the Dominion of Canada. The transfer was completed on June 23, and the act was proclaimed on July 15, another very important day in the history of Manitoba.

Honourable senators, Manitoba was the fifth province to join Confederation, and it is a province which is extremely proud to be part of Canada. Please join me in wishing my home province a happy 125th birthday.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

STRATEGY FOR G-7 SUMMIT—RECOMMENDATION OF JOINT COMMITTEE REVIEWING CANADA'S FOREIGN POLICY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to a particular recommendation made by the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy.

Looking forward to the summit, which is to take place next month in Halifax, and taking into account the difficulties and the criticisms which are directed against certain international financial institutions, the committee recommended that the government prepare an overall strategy which would be tabled in Parliament and debated prior to the summit.

The purpose of this strategy would be to increase Canada's profile at the summit by making a coordinated proposal with respect to the World Trade Organization and the Bretton Wood's institutions. We thought it would be a good idea to give Parliament a chance to debate the strategy of the government.

In its response, the government stated that ministers would brief and seek the views of Parliament in advance of the summit. However, there is not a great deal of time left. I hope that someone is giving some thought as to when ministers will appear before the appropriate committees, not only to seek views of members of the Senate and Parliament, but also to give some advance indication of the position which the government will take at this important summit in Halifax.

COMMENTS OF LIBERAL MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Your Honour, I propose to read into the record the views of another Liberal member of the House of Commons with respect to gun control and in particular the gun legislation.

These remarks are by Mrs. Rose-Marie Ur of Lambton—Middlesex, a Liberal. She says:

> Canada has had a long history in the monitoring and controlling of firearms. Canada has had laws restricting the possession and the use of firearms since 1877. These were a nation-wide permit system for the carrying of small arms in effect in 1892. All handguns have had to be registered since 1934. In 1951, a centralized registry for restricted firearms was established under the control of the commissioner of the RCMP....
> Bill C-68 includes provisions for the initiation of universal firearms owner registration where the current FAC will be replaced with a graduated firearms possession certificate,...
> As the second half of the proposed universal registration system, the bill would require every Canadian to register his or her firearm individually. Each firearm is to be identified by make, model, manufacturer, serial number and other identifiers, and a special firearms registration card,...
> We should not be surprised that law-abiding firearm owners are deeply resentful over this registration proposal, which can only be described as intrusive and cumbersome....
> It should be obvious by now that criminals do not register their firearms. A universal firearms registry, even if it were fully subscribed to by all legal firearm owners, will not reduce criminal activity involving firearms, nor will it improve public safety. Neither law-abiding firearms owners nor other taxpayers deserve to be burdened with any expense or inconvenience that has no demonstrable effect on reducing crime or improving community safety....
> Non-firearm owning Canadians are beginning to understand that additional gun controls will only serve to penalize responsible firearm owners unnecessarily and will not reduce crime....
> If we are prepared to spend more money on gun control, let us spend it wisely. It has been suggested by the solicitor general of Ontario that a national task force on firearms smuggling be set up at key border points. I strongly support this proposal....
> I sincerely hope the justice committee will insist upon an objective, dispassionate examination of the utility of a national registration system as set out in the bill. I hope that at the end of its study it would conclude that the current system requiring a firearms acquisition certificate is more than adequate and that if anything has to be done to curb the criminal use of firearms, the work has to be done at Canada's borders and in our court rooms.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the third report of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations which deals with the revocation of sections 23, 41 and 42 of the National Capital Commission Traffic and Property Regulations, C.R.C. 1978, c. 1044.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Lewis, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, May 23, 1995 at eight o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, by way of explanation, even though the Senate itself is not sitting next week, it will certainly be a "committee week." Several of the committees that have legislation before them at the present time will be sitting. In particular, I understand from the chairman that, by agreement, the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee will be meeting to deliberate on several important pieces of legislation, as will other committees.

Another reason we are not sitting next week is that we are awaiting further legislation from the other place. We have no indication at this time as to when that may be forthcoming.

• (1420)

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXTEND DEADLINE FOR SELECTION OF MEMBERS OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators will recall that when we approved the motion setting up an inquiry into the Pearson Airport Agreements, one of the terms of reference was that the Senate Committee of Selection was to nominate the membership of that committee within two weeks of the adoption of the motion. The deadline for those nominations was May 18. Since we will not be sitting next week, and regardless of whether the Senate Committee of Selection meets or not, those names cannot be brought forward until the following week.

Therefore, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move:

> That notwithstanding the Order of Reference adopted by the Senate on May 4, 1995, the period for nominating Senators to the Special Committee on Pearson International Airport Agreements be extended to three weeks.

This means, honourable senators, that the deadline for nominations will be extended to May 25, 1995.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: When will a budget for that committee be forthcoming? This committee will require quite a lot of money to complete its deliberations.

Am I to understand that when the committee is properly set up, it will attack this issue and provide a report to the Senate?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I do not know whether I am in order in answering the question, but until I am ruled out of order, I will answer the question.

A committee is given an order of reference and then goes before the Internal Economy Committee with a budget pertaining to that reference. The Internal Economy Committee then comes before the full Senate for approval of that budget.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXTEND DATE FOR FINAL REPORT

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move:

> That notwithstanding the Order of Reference that the Senate adopted on April 27, 1994, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which was authorized to monitor and report on the implementation and application in both countries of the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement, and on the implementation and application in Canada, the United States and Mexico of the North American Free Trade Agreement, be empowered to report no later than Thursday, December 14, 1995.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, May 23, 1995, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have the power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills, subject-matters of bills and estimates as are referred to it.

TRAINING INITIATIVES PROGRAM

AMOUNT OF FUNDS AVAILABLE FROM HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Janis Johnson: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate regarding funding for the Training Initiatives Program, known as TIP, which is now being administered by the Cultural Human Resources Council.

As honourable senators will know, the Cultural Human Resources Council was established after an announcement by the Minister of Human Resources Development, Lloyd Axworthy, on January 19, 1995, and the council began operating over a month ago on April 1.

Honourable senators, the council has received many applications from individuals and groups across Canada for funding under the TIP program. This program has been around for approximately three years and gives access to skills upgrading to self-employed individuals who are cultural workers. The deadline for applications to the program was March 31, 1995. The decision of the council on the applications and who will receive funding is expected to be announced on May 15. This date was specified on the application form.

To my knowledge, honourable senators, the Minister of Human Resources Development has not yet announced how much money will be given to this program for the current fiscal year. My question is: Given the fact that May 15 is fast approaching, perhaps the Leader of the Government can find out for me when an announcement will be made by the government as to how much money TIP will receive this year from Mr. Axworthy's department.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be pleased to seek that information from Minister Axworthy. As we will be off for a few days, if I can obtain an answer for my friend in the interim, I will have my office transmit that answer to her.

Senator Johnson: By way of supplementary, are there any indications that this funding could be cut in any way?

Senator Fairbairn: I do not have that information, Senator Johnson. However, I will seek it out and convey it to you.

ENVIRONMENT

ORIENTED STRANDBOARD PLANT IN SASKATCHEWAN—EXTENSION OF ENVIRONMENTAL REVIEW TO COVER DOWNSTREAM EFFECTS IN MANITOBA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, a Crown corporation of the Saskatchewan government, Saskatchewan Forest Products Corp., and MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. recently announced plans to build a $150-million oriented strandboard plant that would rely on the forest resources in the northeastern portion of that province.

These forest resources share watersheds with Manitoba in a region where Louisiana-Pacific is already planning to harvest timber for another large oriented strandboard plant. Many citizens of Manitoba are already concerned about the environmental impact of the proposed Louisiana-Pacific plant. In fact, I asked a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate about that matter last week.

Repap Forest Resources in Manitoba is also planning to produce oriented strandboard. Industry spokesmen expect the product, which is pressure-treated with chemicals, will replace plywood. They also expect plant capacity for that product in Canada to double in the next three years.

Under regulations of the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, a comprehensive study is required of proposed large-scale plants that manufacture wood products pressure-treated with chemicals. The plants proposed for Manitoba and Saskatchewan will be the largest in the world.

My question is: Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate ask her colleague whether the government will ensure that any review of the Saskatchewan development also considers the transborder, downstream impact on Manitoba, where water that drains into the Assiniboine River ultimately finds its way?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I would be pleased to do so, honourable senators.

ORIENTED STRANDBOARD PLANTS—CUMULATIVE EFFECT OF HARVESTING ON BOREAL FORESTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, piecemeal, plant-by-plant studies will not give us sufficient warning of the potential harm to this natural resource that extends across several provinces.

Would the honourable minister also inquire whether the government will examine the cumulative impact on our boreal forests of industry plans to harvest it for these and other oriented strandboard plants?

• (1430)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Again, I would be pleased to do so.

DEFENCE

REASONS FOR ACQUISITION OF UPHOLDER CLASS SUBMARINES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Before I ask my question, I would like to indicate that I am pleased to see that cabinet is looking after former presidents of her party. Michel Robert has been appointed a judge in the Quebec Court of Appeal. Having been a past president of a party, I too qualify for an appointment. I just wanted to let the honourable senator know that.

It appears the government will shortly take a position regarding the acquisition of second-hand British Upholder class submarines, at an expected cost of $800 million. It is interesting to see that the Liberals, now that they are in government, are getting into the submarine business, after they so strenuously opposed previous submarine ventures by the former government.d

Why is the government entering into the acquisition of submarines at this point? Is there a reason for considering this acquisition at this point?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in the report of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy is a list of equipment necessary to the armed forces, and included in that list are these types of submarines.

The Minister of National Defence, as a follow-up to that committee report, has been looking at the recommendations, and he will bring forward his own recommendations at the appropriate time.

PROTECTION OF ARCTIC SOVEREIGNTY—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The government, in the Red Book, said that they would look at submarines in light of the cause of Arctic sovereignty. However, my information is that these particular submarines are not operable in under-ice conditions. Why is the government making an acquisition of this nature? Having said that Arctic sovereignty will govern their equipment acquisitions, they are now making an acquisition which does not meet this requirement.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Minister of National Defence, in his review and follow-up to the joint committee report, will be reviewing equipment needs for all the armed forces. He will seek equipment which best supports the needs of the Canadian military, and undoubtedly it will be equipment which covers more than one function. It is no secret that he has been looking into these acquisitions. He will review the operational and cost benefits of each acquisition, and then make his decision in the most efficient and effective way.

LOBBYISTS INVOLVED IN ACQUISITION—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Are there any lobby firms interested in this "interesting" contract? If so, would the minister provide me with the names of the lobby firms and/or the lobbyists?

[Senator St. Germain]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will look into that question and report back.

ACQUISITION OF NUCLEAR-POWERED SUBMARINES—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Senator St. Germain mentioned that the Liberals had opposed prior purchases of submarines. That is true. Those were nuclear submarines. Would the Leader of the Government confirm that we are not now speaking about nuclear submarines?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Government of Canada has no intention of purchasing nuclear-powered submarines.

HUMAN RIGHTS

HIRING BY CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY OF FORMER GUATEMALAN GENERAL AS CONSULTANT—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, my question today relates to the human rights record of the government.

During his European tour, the Prime Minister made much about his intention to express Canada's displeasure with Mr. Yeltsin over his government's handling of the Chechen situation. We then read that he stated to President Yeltsin that the slaughter of civilians in Chechnya will not stop Canada from trying to improve trade relations with Russia. We are all aware of the government's position on China.

CIDA has now hired a former Guatemalan general, a known perpetrator of gross human rights violations, who was convicted last month in an American court of masterminding a campaign of murder and torture against the citizens of his country. Former general Hector Gramajo is now an employee of CIDA, honourable senators. The Canadian government's human rights record is slowly falling down.

Why has CIDA hired this man as an advisor to Canada, a man who has offended human rights and dignity throughout his home country?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be pleased to take the question of my honourable friend as notice and obtain an answer for him.

CANADA HEALTH AND SOCIAL TRANSFER

EFFECT ON SPENDING OF PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, on May 4, the Canadian Teachers' Federation and the Canadian School Boards Association made a joint appearance before the House of Commons Finance Committee to make a presentation concerning Bill C-76. Those associations raised a common concern about the implementation and administration by provincial governments of the funding which will be received under the Canada Health and Social Transfer beginning in 1996-97.

One of the conclusions in their brief was:

> ...strictly enforced health care standards, that are not accompanied by standards established for other social services, would likely accelerate cuts in those areas because of reduced overall federal funding. This would eliminate some social services which currently help to alleviate child poverty, as well as some post-secondary programs and institutions.

I ask the Leader of the Government: Won't the requirement that provincial governments adhere to national health care standards put severe pressure on them to make drastic cuts in expenditures in other areas, such as social services and post-secondary education?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as Senator Cochrane quite rightly points out, the government has been clear in its determination to adhere to the five principles of the Canada Health Act in respect to Medicare in the Health and Social Transfer. As Senator Cochrane will know, the only other part of that transfer which comes bearing a standard is mobility rights under social assistance plan provisions. The other parts, including post-secondary education, have never carried with them standards governing how the provincial governments should spend this transfer money, and perhaps they should have.

I will seek answers from my colleague to the questions raised by the Canadian Teachers' Federation. However, I think that all of us in this house are cognizant of the strong pressures on provincial governments to keep their levels of contribution to post-secondary education assistance and social services at a high level.

• (1440)

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION BILL, 1995

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS TO ESTABLISH STANDARDS FOR HEALTH AND SOCIAL TRANSFERS

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, I am not sure that that will happen. As a result of us only having national standards for health care, I can hardly imagine that they will be encouraged to retain the present standards for social services and post-secondary education. There will be drastic cuts. From my province alone, millions of dollars will be cut next year.

In any event, honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The Canadian Teachers' Federation and the Canadian School Boards Association have recommended that the government withdraw the provisions of Bill C-76 concerning the Canada Health and Social Transfer. Instead, they suggest that a new bill incorporating these provisions be introduced after the federal and provincial governments have negotiated an agreement to establish national standards regulating all health and social assistance programs.

Would the Leader of the Government care to comment on that recommendation?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my friend has raised an important point, namely federal-provincial negotiations. As she knows, and as the Minister of Human Resources Development has repeated in the other place, the health and social transfer will be the subject of intensive discussion with the provinces in an effort to arrive at an agreement on mutually beneficial national objectives in the areas where such agreement does not currently exist.

The key here will be the federal-provincial discussions. Until those discussions take place, the allocation of any transfer funds will not be set. As soon as this bill is passed, the minister will be engaged in a series of significant negotiations with the provincial governments.

CANADA COUNCIL

REDUCTION IN STAFF IN ATLANTIC REGION— EFFECT ON PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. There seems to be a disturbing trend in the mission of the Canada Council to reduce the importance of the regions. I will not go into details on that today for, as the honourable leader knows, I intend to launch an inquiry into that and other matters relating to the Canada Council at a later date.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform us as to the number of representatives of the Canada Council, the number of programs of the Canada Council, and the number of positions that have disappeared over the last three years, or will disappear, in light of the announcement made earlier this week in the so-called Atlantic region — that is, in the provinces of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland — where there were so few programs, positions and representatives to begin with? Keep in mind that the original funding for the Canada Council was established out of the succession duties of two famous Maritimers.

The reduction of ten jobs at the head office of the Canada Council in Ottawa, or ten jobs in Montreal, or ten jobs in Toronto may have important consequences in terms of the delivery of services and programs offered by the council, but having no jobs in an area such as the Atlantic region is disastrous.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will seek detailed answers to that question.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION BILL, 1995

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO REFLECT NATIONAL STANDARDS— REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, my question is supplementary to that of my colleague Senator Cochrane.

Mr. Martin, the Minister of Finance, indicated a few days ago that the government intends to propose amendments to Bill C-76 to clarify certain aspects of that bill relating to the question of so-called national standards.

Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate in a position to tell us what the gist of those amendments is or when the public might expect to see them?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not in a position to enlighten my honourable friend. I do know that Mr. Martin's statements were intended to signal that he would be clarifying language in a section of the bill. However, I will look into that matter for my honourable friend.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised on May 9, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Forrestall regarding the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

For those of you who may not know, the final decision-making process is scheduled to begin today, Thursday, May 11. I received this answer yesterday only after the Senate had adjourned for the day, so I called Senator Forrestall and transmitted the answer in advance by facsimile.

I also have three answers to written questions: Number 84 to the Honourable Senator Tkachuk, number 91 to the Honourable Senator Tkachuk, and number 22 to the Honourable Senator Berntson.

UNITED NATIONS

NUCLEAR NON-PROLIFERATION TREATY—
VOTE ON REAFFIRMATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. J. Michael Forrestall on May 9, 1995)

The NPT Review and Extension Conference in New York is now in its final and most decisive week. The following constitutes the most current information available from our NPT delegation with respect to the progress that is being made towards our goal of indefinite, unconditional extension.

SUMMARY

In the face of a confirmed numerical majority, the inevitability of the indefinite extension of the NPT has now been accepted by even its most irreplaceable opponents. As a result, the focus of the Conference has now shifted to whether an acceptable package of non-binding, subsidiary undertakings on enhancing the NPT review process and a statement of principles can be drafted that would allow for a consensus decision. On Friday, May 5, Canada presented the draft decision on indefinite extension which was co-sponsored by 104 states parties. The final decision making process is scheduled to begin on Thursday, May 11.

CURRENT SITUATION

1. The momentum in favour of indefinite extension now appears to be unstoppable. The question now remaining is how large the eventual majority will be or, indeed, whether the increasingly marginalized hardliners, such as Indonesia, Egypt and Iran, would be prepared to block what could be a consensus decision.

2. The Canadian delegation has been very active on several fronts.

- Canada was requested by the Western and Eastern Groups to introduce the draft decision on indefinite extension and to compile the list of co-sponsors. The resolution was introduced last Friday and contained a list of co-sponsors which numbered 104.

- In Main Committee II, we are vigorously defending supplier controls and advancing practical suggestions with respect to strengthening international safeguards.

- As a Conference Vice-President, we are directly involved in the ongoing efforts of the President to negotiate a consensus decision based on indefinite extension.

- We continue to meet with representatives of the NGO community both to explain the Canadian position on extension and to brief them on Conference developments.

3. South Africa, which announced at the outset of the Conference its unconditional support for the indefinite extension option, is spearheading efforts to gain support for a non-binding, "Declaration of Principles for Nuclear Non-Proliferation and Disarmament." This "Declaration" attempts to address the concerns of a variety of states parties, particularly those for whom the achievement of a strengthened review process will be an important consideration in securing their support for indefinite extension.

4. The Indonesians and Iranians have been attempting to solicit co-sponsors for a draft extension decision based on the original twenty-five year roll-over proposal first advanced by Venezuela. Our information is that this effort has met with little success. In fact, we are told that this draft decision has been formally endorsed by only slightly more than 10 states parties.

5. In contrast to its previous role as a leader of those states parties opposed to indefinite extension, Mexico has now assumed a much lower Conference profile. Our delegation has had several formal sessions with the Mexican delegation, the most recent of which was immediately after the recent Canada-Mexico JMC meetings. While there are areas where cooperation with the Mexicans is possible, primarily in efforts to strengthen the NPT review process, they remain rhetorically committed to the need for what they call "elements of comfort" before they will consider embracing the indefinite extension option. The Mexican delegation has circulated a draft decision which outlines these "elements of comfort" but which leaves the extension option blank. They have not actively pursued co-sponsors and efforts are now under way to convince them to withdraw this proposal.

6. During the opening week of the Conference some of the radical NAM states pressed for the extension decision to be taken by secret ballot. While this prompted some initial concern among supporters of indefinite extension, this has now dissipated somewhat in the face of the significant and growing level of support for our preferred extension option. At the urging of the Conference President, consultations on this question have been suspended. It is our hope that this debate can be avoided with agreement for a consensus decision.

7. Finally, voting on the extension proposals is currently scheduled to begin on Thursday, May 11.

LOBBYISTS REGISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Landon Pearson moved the second reading of Bill C-43, to amend the Lobbyists Registration Act and to make related amendments to other Acts.

She said: Honourable senators, I am proud to rise today to speak on a piece of legislation that will help restore public trust in the integrity of Canada: Bill C-43, to amend the Lobbyists Registration Act. I am confident that honourable senators on both sides of this chamber will support this bill.

You may recall that the original Lobbyists Registration Act was introduced by the previous government and came into effect in September 1989. The impetus to improve the act also came in the last Parliament. In its closing weeks, a committee in the other place, chaired by Mr. Felix Holtmann, tabled an all-party, unanimous report recommending a series of amendments to the act that were aimed at more disclosure and more transparency.

This sense of unanimity continued with the Red Book commitment to implement the recommendations of the Holtmann committee, and the former Prime Minister's announcement that her government would also strengthen the Lobbyists Registration Act.

The bill introduced by the current government essentially implements the Holtmann recommendations. It seeks the same basic objective: transparency of the lobby process so that Canadians can have trust in the integrity of their political institutions.

This bill was introduced as part of a comprehensive package of initiatives to restore trust in government. Honourable senators may recall that it was the Prime Minister himself who introduced the package in June of last year.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the first item in this series of initiatives is the revised and strengthened Conflict of Interest Code, which applies to ministers, parliamentary secretaries and senior officials.

As you all know, it was recently proposed in the other place that a joint parliamentary committee be struck, comprising 7 members of this house and 14 members of the other place, in order to elaborate a code of conduct.

This code would help senators and members of Parliament to reconcile their official responsibilities with their personal interests. In particular, this committee would have to come to an agreement with lobbyists during its discussions.

[English]

• (1450)

A second element of the package to restore trust involved changes to the government's procurement process. The use of success or contingency fees to reward lobbyists for securing a federal government contract, grant or contribution is now effectively eliminated. A third element of the package of initiatives to restore trust is that the government has appointed an Ethics Counsellor with responsibilities for conflict of interest and lobbying.

Finally, the government introduced the changes to the Lobbyists Registration Act, now before us. The legislation represents a promise to restore trust in the political process, not only in its content but also through the process by which it was passed in the other place.

In the Red Book, the Liberal Party made a commitment to give members of Parliament a greater role in drafting legislation. That commitment has been fulfilled through the committee work which has gone into the legislation before us.

A subcommittee of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Industry studied this bill before it went to second reading. Members from all parties had considerable flexibility and influence in amending the legislation. In the end, the committee made 13 improvements to the bill.

The spirit of openness and flexibility continued as the legislation proceeded to second reading in the other place. The Reform Party proposed that the requirement asking organizations to indicate any government financing they receive be extended to clients of consultant lobbyists and to corporate in-house lobbyists. The government felt that this made a useful improvement to the bill in terms of raising transparency, and the bill was so amended.

The legislation was amended through the committee process and in second reading. However, the fundamental principles of the bill have stayed the same. They are the same principles that guided the Holtmann report in the previous Parliament. The first principle is that all Canadians have a right to approach their government without employing lobbyists. This is a statement of principle we included in the Red Book. The second principle is that even though no one should feel they have to hire a lobbyist to meet with this government, lobbying is a legitimate activity. The third principle is that lobbying must be transparent so that Canadians can have confidence that decisions are based upon merit. The public has a right to know who is attempting to influence government decisions.

The legislation before us draws a distinction between three types of lobbyists. The first type is consultant lobbyists, who work on specific tasks under contract at arm's length on behalf of a client. Unless they file detailed reports of the nature of their client's interests, there can be no transparency regarding their specific activity. The second type of lobbyists is corporate in-house lobbyists; that is, employees of corporations who pursue corporate interests in order to make a profit for their company. The third type is the organization in-house lobbyists; that is, employees of associations or not-for-profit organizations who pursue, over time, the common interests of their members or their target group.

Honourable senators will also be aware that the current law also distinguishes between two levels of lobbyist. Tier I lobbyists are consultants, while Tier II are in-house lobbyists.

The government considered carefully the recommendation of the Holtmann report, that the two tiers be eliminated entirely so that all lobbyists would be obliged to provide the same information. To resolve this question, in 1993 Industry Canada prepared a discussion paper based upon the Holtmann recommendations and sent it to some 175 organizations which would be affected by the changes to the act. These represented more than 50 per cent of registered Tier I and Tier II lobbyists.

The department met with representatives from 45 organizations — Tier I lobbyists, as well as a wide range of organizations represented by Tier II lobbyists, including broad-based business associations, sectoral trade associations, individual companies, organized labour, social action groups and organizations representing the financial and legal sectors. The department also received 75 written briefs.

During these consultations, lobbyists told the government that they agree that lobbying should become more transparent. They accept the need to provide more specific disclosure, and they recognize that information filed under the existing Lobbyists Registration Act is not adequate.

Organization in-house lobbyists also made a strong case that their work is significantly different from that carried on by consultant lobbyists and corporate in-house lobbyists. Organization in-house lobbyists work either for organizations that represent the professional interests of their members, such as La Fédération des communautés francophones et acadienne du Canada, or the interests of specific groups, such as the Native Council of Canada. These lobbyists may also come from advocacy groups who speak out on behalf of children or the handicapped, or other groups of Canadian citizens who, on their own, are relatively powerless. These organizations and associations pursue their objectives on an on-going basis, and their activities are well-publicized. One has only to look at the name of the organization to know the issues in which they are interested.

Honourable senators will know that I have devoted much of my life to voluntary and non-governmental organizations, the kind of associations which are included in the category of organization in-house lobbyists. I firmly believe that the existence of hundreds of not-for-profit organizations, all interacting with legislators and policy makers, is essential to a healthy democracy.

Canada has a long tradition of mutual assistance, partly because people have had to work together to survive and prosper in our harsh but beautiful land. We have hunted and fished together, raised barns together, harvested crops together, and generally helped one another out. That tradition has evolved into volunteering in hospitals and schools, operating food banks, teaching people to read, helping immigrants to settle, raising money for the arts and charities, and assisting the disadvantaged in the developing nations of the Third World, especially children. By some estimates, during the course of a year, Canadian volunteers contribute over 1 billion hours of their time and many millions of their dollars.

Our Canadian tradition of supporting the vulnerable and of giving one another assistance has also evolved into the creation of a multitude of not-for-profit organizations which focus on the concerns of particular groups of Canadians with the aim of speaking up on their behalf to legislators and decision makers. This not-for-profit sector deserves to have its voice heard in the corridors of power in Ottawa, and it does not need more hurdles to jump over or hoops to jump through. I have paid particular attention to Bill C-43 to make sure that this sector would not be unfairly handicapped by it, and I am quite satisfied that it will not.

The bill before us requires organization in-house lobbyists to register retrospective and prospective information semi-annually. This is a reasonable demand when we consider that the lobbying goals of such organizations do not change much over the course of a year. Thus I believe that the requirements in Bill C-43 are not too onerous and can be fulfilled easily by not-for-profit organizations. I have checked with several and they agree.

This is true even though, like consultants and corporate in-house lobbyists, organization in-house lobbyists will have to disclose — in addition to the broad subject-matter of their lobbying activities — the specific legislative proposal, bill resolution, regulation, policy, program, grant, contribution or other financial benefit that they are attempting to influence. This only has to be done twice a year and, in any case, the information typically forms part of their annual planning. For consultant lobbyists, disclosure must also include any contracts for which they are lobbying.

Registration for organization in-house lobbyists would be undertaken by the senior paid officer of the organization and would include the names of employees who lobby. Where corporate in-house lobbyists register the employer's business activities, organization lobbyists would provide a general description of the membership and association activities. If there is no paid officer in a voluntary organization, or if all lobbying efforts on behalf of an organization are undertaken by its volunteers, then no registration is required.

All Tier I and Tier II lobbyists will have to register the name of the departments or other governmental agencies to be contacted, the type of communication techniques they will use and the true beneficiary of their lobbying efforts. For example, a parent company or its subsidiaries which hope to benefit from lobbying efforts, as well as the name of corporate members and organizations of coalitions, will need to be registered.

All lobbyists will benefit from electronic filing which will improve the efficiency of the registration process both for lobbyists and the registrar.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, under Bill C-43, consultant lobbyists and in-house corporate lobbyists will be required to report their activities, or any change to such activities, to the registrar, within 30 days. Any change will require the reporting of new information, such as the specific titles of bills tabled.

The legislation also provides that lobbyists will not have to register as regards answers directly relating to a written application for an advisory opinion. The government is aware that this exemption should not be so general as to defeat the spirit of the legislation. This is why the bill gives the registrar the explicit authority to issue interpretation bulletins.

[English]

• (1500)

Honourable senators, one more aspect of the legislation before us deserves special attention, the evolving role of the ethics counsellor. You will recall that the position was created by the Prime Minister as part of the original ethics package announced last June. Mr. Howard Wilson has been named to the post.

Under the initial ethics package, the ethics counsellor was responsible for developing a lobbyist's code of conduct. The legislation before us requires the code of conduct to be reviewed by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Industry before it becomes effective. Moreover, as a result of the amendments made in the other place, it will be mandatory for lobbyists to comply with the code. The ethics counsellor is required — not just empowered — to investigate and make a public report on alleged breaches of the code. He will have all the powers of a "superior court of record" when it comes to conducting an investigation. He will be able to summon witnesses and compel them to produce documents. He will draw his own conclusions. The report of his investigation must be tabled in Parliament.

One of the committee's recommendations requires the report of an investigation by the ethics counsellor to include his findings, conclusions and reasons so that there is a full public account. In his report, the ethics counsellor will have the power to publicly disclose information on fees and disbursements associated with any lobbying activity — not just government contracts. The ethics counsellor will also prepare an annual report with regard to his activities on lobbying. All reports must be submitted in their entirety to both Houses of Parliament, and those concerning investigations must provide details on findings, conclusions and reasons. There is no discretion here whatsoever.

Honourable senators, the legislation before us gives teeth to the powers of the ethics counsellor. It makes lobbying more transparent by obliging lobbyists of all types to provide more detailed information about their activities.

At the same time, this bill also strikes a good balance between the rights of Canadians to know who is attempting to influence the government, and the need to preserve a healthy democracy by not restricting access to legislators and policy-makers.

The lobbyists registry provides Canadians with information on who is being paid to lobby on what and for whom. However, we do not want to add to the administrative burden of not-for-profit organizations in order to obtain information for the sake of information. More information is not necessarily better information. We want more meaningful information that is easy to retrieve and understand.

Bill C-43 strikes the appropriate balance, and I sincerely hope that my colleagues will join me in supporting it.

On motion of Senator LeBreton, debate adjourned.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the third report of the Standing Senate Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders, presented on Wednesday, May 10, 1995.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson moved the adoption of the report.

She said: I hope honourable senators will allow me a brief explanation before the motion is put. Your committee has asked me to explain a little to the honourable senators regarding this change in rule.

If you read this supplementation or the replacement for rule 17(1), you will notice that the changes are very small, involving the most effective method of communication and the purpose of the recall.

However, what the committee wanted to bring to your attention was simply this: At the last recall of the chamber, there seemed to be some confusion, perhaps, on the part of the staff who had been instructed to make the recall. Many senators did not receive notice of the recall in time to get here, and that caused some unhappiness. Many of the offices did not receive a notice.

We did not feel, at this point, that it was appropriate to recommend further changes to this rule than what is here, but it should be brought to the attention of the staff in particular that some senators did not have adequate notice in order to attend the Senate at that particular time.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I am surprised that this matter is again before the Senate, although I welcome the report.

This matter was taken up in the Standing Committee of Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration several years ago. The matter was debated and the procedure was agreed to. The gist of it was that when the Senate was recalled, whoever was the messenger had to ensure that the message got to the senator in person, and not left to a child, an employee, a maid or whomever. That worked well for a while.

However, I have also noticed in recent years and months that the agency which is charged with relaying the order, the decision of Your Honour, has not been reaching me directly. The trend of leaving the message with someone at the house or someone at the office has begun to develop again.

I find it regretful that we must again remind people, especially agencies who are paid to get messages out to senators, that they are not following the procedure which was approved by the Internal Economy Committee many years ago. I endorse the comments of the Honourable Senator Robertson. I would certainly appreciate that things be done properly and adequately in the future.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

ONTARIO COURT GENERAL DIVISION

MOTION TO STRIKE SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AND REPORT UPON THE CONDUCT AND BEHAVIOUR OF CERTAIN OFFICES AND JUSTICES— POINT OF ORDER—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the motion of the Honourable Senator Cools, seconded by the Honourable Senator Carstairs:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be constituted to examine and report upon the conduct and behaviour of certain justices and barristers of the Ontario Court of Justice (General Division), raised by the Honourable Senator Cools in her speeches on Parliamentary Privilege in the Senate in terms of:

(i) failing to take judicial notice of the Law of Parliamentary Privilege, the Constitution of Canada, and the laws of Canada pertaining to the Senate;

(ii) failing to uphold and enforce the said laws, and the immunities and privileges of the Senate;

(iii) interfering with and frustrating the enjoyment and exercise of the said laws, immunities, and privileges;

(iv) inducing failure to observe and comply with the said laws, immunities, and privileges;

(v) impeaching proceedings in Parliament;

(vi) threatening sanctions on the vindication of the said laws, immunities, and privileges;

(vii) their conduct and behaviour generally relating to, the Law of Parliamentary Privilege, the Constitution of Canada, the independence of the judiciary, constitutional comity, the dignity of the Senate, and the due administration of justice;

That the Committee be further empowered to consider and report upon related matters which may concern the privileges of the Senate;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee be composed of seven members, four of whom shall constitute a quorum; and

That the Committee of Selection be instructed to decide and report upon the membership of the Special Committee. — (Debate on the Point of Order—Honourable Senator Cools)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before Senator Cools proceeds, I should like to remind all honourable senators that the debate is on the point of order raised by Senator Robertson. Specifically, it reads:

> First, whether this motion is properly worded; and second, whether, in the interests of parliamentary decorum, it is appropriate for the Senate to debate the conduct and behaviour of certain judges and other officers of the court who are not identified in the motion and whom our parliamentary authorities traditionally refer to as "protected persons."

I ask all honourable senators to address strictly the point of order and to avoid discussing the body of the motion. I hope that all honourable senators will stay within those bounds.

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, I propose to carry on exactly from where I left off yesterday.

Historically, Parliament has been preoccupied with intrusion by the courts.

In 1843, Lord John Russell, reciting the famous 1837 U.K. Commons resolution upholding Parliament's Privileges said:

> That by the law and privilege of Parliament, this House has the sole and exclusive jurisdiction to determine upon the existence and extent of its privileges, and that the institution or prosecution of any action, suit or other proceeding, for the purpose of bringing them into discussion or decision before any court or tribunal elsewhere than in Parliament, is a high breach of such privilege, and renders all parties concerned therein amenable to its just displeasure, and to the punishment consequent thereon.

Another famous 1837 U.K. Commons resolution read:

> ...That for any court or tribunal to assume to decide upon matters of Privilege inconsistent with the determination of either House of Parliament thereon, is contrary to the Law of Parliament, and is a breach and contempt of the Privileges of Parliament.

Honourable senators, these celebrated resolutions passed in response to actions of the courts.

In 1843, the U.K Attorney-General, Sir Frederick Pollock, urged Parliament that:

> ...whenever it was necessary to resent any injury done to its privileges, to assert them... that the House of Commons, possessing this power within itself, should not adapt its conduct to that of the courts...

In 1843, U.K. Prime Minister Sir Robert Peel declared that:

> ...the constitution places us as a controlling power over the courts of law. The functions which, in this respect, we may have to discharge, and have a right to discharge, must naturally attract the jealousy of the courts of law.

Parliamentary debates reveal that every government in its turn will shrink from the difficulty and responsibility of maintaining the true station and authority of Parliament. They inform that there would be no ground for shrinking from the performance of our duty.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Lowell Murray: I beg the honourable senator's pardon. I am sorry to have to intervene on a point of order.

Honourable senators, what we are hearing, interesting as it is, is a speech on the substance of our friend's motion. I do not think the Speaker's admonition to honourable senators to address themselves to the two points raised in Senator Robertson's point of order is being followed. We are well away from the point of order raised by our colleague.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, unfortunately, I cannot accept another point of order at this stage because we are debating a point of order. There cannot be a point of order to a point of order.

However, I note the comments of Senator Murray and would ask the Honourable Senator Cools to please take note of them.

Senator Cools: I have taken note, honourable senators, and wish to make it quite clear that I am speaking expressly to the point of order Senator Robertson raised.

During a famous debate on this issue of parliamentary decorum to do with judges, U.K. Prime Minister Campbell-Bannerman said:

> But the Judges have the respect of the country because, and insofar as, they respect themselves. When a Judge whose proper function it is to try a case steps down into the lower sphere, and assumes the right to use the position which he occupies and the advantage he possesses of not being answered...he is as open to our criticism as any man in the street. If we think any Judge by such conduct is lowering the dignity of the Bench and is introducing other evils also, it is our duty to express our reprobation of such conduct.

Most debates have been firm that both Houses of Parliament have a controlling power over the judges of the land. Many debates record that this controlling power had been expounded by no fewer than four U.K. prime ministers — Sir Robert Peel in 1843, Lord Palmerston in 1856, Mr. Gladstone in 1872, and Sir Campbell-Bannerman in 1906.

Honourable senators, my motion is straightforward and in order: to examine and to inquire. Constitutionally, a Senate committee has no power to do more than investigate and report its conclusions to the Senate, by whom it is appointed — the intent of my motion.

In a petition to the Lords in 1828 on behalf of Sir Jonah Barrington, the only judge removed by address of Parliament, legal counsel, Lord Denman, who later became Chief Justice, said:

> ... The Petitioner humbly suggests, that there are Four distinct Modes of Procedure applicable to the Case of a Judge holding his Office by Patent, during good Behaviour; first, in Cases of Misconduct not extending to legal Misdemeanour, the appropriate Course appears to be by Scire facias to repeal his Patent, "Good Behaviour" being the Condition precedent of the Judges Tenure; secondly, when the Conduct amounts to what a Court might consider a Misdemeanour, then by Information; thirdly, if it amounts to actual Crime, then by Impeachment; fourthly —

This is the point I am raising.

> — and in all Cases, by the joint Exercise of the inquisitorial and judicial Jurisdiction of the House of Lords...

It is our inquisitorial powers in the form of a study by a Senate committee that is the intention of my motion. This committee would afford the individuals involved full and sufficient opportunity to meet the accusations.

Honourable senators, we have a situation where an honourable justice and barristers of the Courts of Ontario are under accusation from a senator regarding conducting improper, vitiated, and unconstitutional court proceedings. These honourable justices and barristers are under, at least, a suspicion of breaches of the law of privilege and contempt of Parliament and impeachment of proceedings in Parliament. They are under, at least, a complaint of an offence against Parliament. Such offences undermine the honour and the credit of the courts and the administration of justice. An honourable justice is under, at least, a complaint that he did something to distort and pervert the course of justice.

Parliament has a duty to examine the complaints in a committee appointed for this purpose. This impropriety is of a constitutional nature and one of contempt of Parliament, lowering the dignity of Parliament.

Honourable senators, the practices regarding judges in Parliament do not anticipate that any honourable justice will, flagrantly and willingly, commit a contempt of Parliament. Parliament expects judges to uphold and observe the law and to proceed as the law directs. Consequently, Parliament, in regards to offences and contempt against Parliament, is bound in its investigation of same, only by those limitations imposed by itself and the Constitution.

Honourable senators, on November 16, 1994, the Speaker of the Senate, Senator LeBlanc, stated that my questions are important. The Speaker proposed that the Senate consider intervening in the court case, as in the Donohoe case, saying:

> The Senate's... interests may well be served by an intervention to speak to the limited issue of the Senate's right as an institution...

Our Constitution invests Parliament with the guardianship of the bench and the administration of justice. To suggest otherwise is to confound and distort. Public confidence in the administration of justice requires the moral and intellectual integrity of honourable justices, courts and barristers, and demands that they proceed as the law directs. Independence of the judiciary is important. When honourable justices abandon judicial ground and tread onto political ground; when an honourable justice commits a judicial excess or abuse of power; when an honourable justice rules on Parliamentary Privilege; when false accusations are made under oath in judicial proceedings without judicial censure, independence of the judiciary and judicial decorum requires that Parliament's powers be invoked.

There are extant several court orders and judgments written by Mr. Justice Matlow. These, without parliamentary action, will form precedents in case law. That that judicial power and the courts were enlisted to interfere with the performance of a senator's functions is an offence against Parliament and against justice itself.

After careful study on this matter of parliamentary privilege and of inquiries concerning judges by Parliament, I proposed my motion in the form that my study instructed was the most fitting to the issues, the principles, the persons, the offices, and the institution.

A great Canadian jurist and politician, probably the most able jurist who has ever served in the Parliament of Canada, Edward Blake, former Minister of Justice, during debate concerning a judge in 1883, said:

> There is no function of ours of higher importance or greater consequence to the public weal than the function that we hold of enquiring into or censuring, or dealing with the conduct of the Judiciary.

Edward Blake continued:

> ... What was the cause ... which could properly bring this Judge's action under our consideration? It was ... not that the Judge erred, for all may err in judgment, but that he > degraded his office, betrayed his trust, wilfully and knowingly did a wrong thing, perverted justice and judgment ...

Honourable senators, we must vindicate our privileges, and we must insist on the independence of the judiciary and the judiciary's non-interference in Parliament. This motion is in order in a parliamentary sense, and it is perfectly consistent with the historical treatment of this subject-matter.

Honourable senators, I will close by referring to Speaker Molgat's remarks that it is important that we speak only to the issue of the point of order. We should be diligent and vigilant that we do not use this opportunity to speak against the motion under the camouflage of a point of order.

[Translation]

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, following the point of order raised by Senator Robertson, I would like to say a few words in particular on parliamentary jurisprudence.

In her point of order, Senator Robertson says the following:

> It would seem to me that, before proceeding to decide whether the conduct and behaviour of certain justices and barristers should be examined, the Senate must first establish whether there was indeed a bona fide question of privilege raised by Senator Cools in her speeches on parliamentary privilege.

I listened to what she said. Obviously, she carried out a very in-depth study of the issue. She quotes from the Resolutions of 1906, 1837, 1843 and even the Act of Settlement of 1701.

Nevertheless, I would like to reference some more recent examples. I would first like to refer the senator to what Joseph Maingot, an eminent specialist on procedure, had to say on the matter. In fact, he is the only one ever to have written a complete volume on the subject. Section 4, page 164, of the French version reads as follows:

> Un député ou un sénateur peut-être poursuivi en tout temps à titre personnel et ne peut donc pas obtenir le renvoi d'une action civile.

In legal language, the term "renvoi" means "adjournment" or "postponement." In addition, the English version of Maingot's text is unequivocal.

[English]

> A member of the Senate or House of Commons may at any time be sued in his personal capacity, and thus may not postpone a civil action.

[Translation]

Maingot refers to the case of Pelletier v. Howard, which is particularly interesting. It was heard by the Superior Court in Sherbrooke and is reported at 43 Que. P.R. 258. In the case of Mr. Pelletier's suit against Senator Howard of Sherbrooke, Mr. Justice White said the following, which is a summary:

[English]

> The Court having heard the parties on the merits of defendant's petition to have proceedings in the case stayed until twenty days after the prorogation of Parliament, and having deliberated:
> Considering that Chapter 147 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, section 4 provides:
> > The Senate and the House of Commons respectively and the members thereof respectively, shall hold, enjoy and exercise such and the like privileges, immunities and powers as, at the time of the passing of the British North America Act 1867, were held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom:
> Considering that these privileges do not apply to mere civil actions in which there is no question of arrest of the Member of Parliament.

[Translation]

That is why the judge decided that a member of the Senate who was involved in a civil suit could not ask for an adjournment of the case. From the proceedings it is clear that Senator Howard had drafted a motion requesting that the suit be adjourned for up to 20 days after Parliament was prorogued.

Honourable senators, I think this judgment is important because, as Senator Robertson said, before deciding whether the conduct and behaviour of certain justices and barristers should be examined, we must first establish whether there was indeed a bona fide question of privilege raised by Senator Cools in her speeches on parliamentary privilege.

I think we should realize there is a big difference between the precedent I just described and the position of Senator Cools, who, in her case, was the plaintiff. I think that courts of justice in all provinces also make a significant difference between plaintiffs and defendants.

I would also draw the attention of honourable senators to Maingot at page 134:

> While service of a subpoena upon a member of either House of Parliament could be considered as a breach of privilege, "it is doubtful, however, whether under present usage the actual service would be so treated unless affected within the precincts of the House while the House was sitting."

Honourable senators, it would be useful to refer to a number of citations in Beauchesne, because I do not want to prolong the debate. I would refer you to page 128, and more specifically section 91; to the 21st edition published in 1989, at pages 100 and following. And finally, to Odgers' treatise entitled, Australian Senate Practice, 6th edition, at page 1012.

This may seem somewhat dry, although perhaps Senator Beaudoin will appreciate the legal references. I believe that the point of order raised by Senator Robertson is well founded.

I would like to add that there have been only two cases in the entire history of the Senate where a senator has asked the Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders to intervene. The first time was in 1904, while the second case was in 1993 when we examined the case of Senator Carney. In other words, before ruling on such cases we must be extremely prudent.

Thus far, only two senators have ever asked the Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders to intervene, which means that this only happens in exceptional cases. I do not think that the case made by Senator Cools in her presentation and her notice of motion should be dealt with in the way she sees fit.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other senators wish to speak, I will take the notices I have received under advisement and report on the point of order at a later date, as soon as possible.

THE SENATE

IMPACT OF DECISION OF HOUSE OF COMMONS TO CEASE PUBLICATION OF COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Gauthier, calling the attention of the Senate to the decision of the other place concerning the publication of committee issues and its serious impact on the Senate and House of Commons joint committees' proceedings and whether the decision is in accordance with the constitutional requirements of section 133 of the Constitutional Act, 1867. — (Honourable Senator Beaudoin).

The Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I am pleased to participate in the debate on the inquiry of my colleague Senator Jean-Robert Gauthier concerning the decision made by the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons regarding the translation and printing of the proceedings of parliamentary committees. Let me remind you that, on a trial basis, the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons decided to cease reviewing, translating and printing parliamentary committee proceedings. The transcription of debates will only be published in the language the statements were made before the committees. This will become the only official version. The transcription of the simultaneous interpretation of presentations will be published, on request. However, this transcription will not be considered official. It appears to me that this policy contravenes section 133 of the Constitution, subsection 18(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms of 1982, which is part of Canada's Constitution and, lastly, subsection 4(3) and section 5 of the Official Languages Act.

Section 133 stipulates that in Quebec's legislature and the Parliament of Canada, either the English or the French language may be used and that both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those Houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada. Lastly, this section makes it mandatory for the Quebec and the federal governments to print and publish all acts in both English and French.

Subsection 18(1) of the 1982 Canadian Charter reads as follows:

> 18(1) The statutes, records and journals of Parliament shall be printed and published in English and French and both language versions are equally authoritative.

Subsection 4(3) of the Official Languages Act, which is not part of the Constitution, but which is quasi-constitutional legislation, I would say, organic legislation, provides that:

> 4(3) Everything reported in official reports of debates or other proceedings of Parliament shall be reported in the official language in which it was said and a translation thereof into the other official language shall be included therewith.

It is very clear.

Section 5 of the Official Languages Act provides that:

> 5. The journals and other records of Parliament shall be made and kept, and shall be printed and published in both official languages.

On the whole, the case law of the Supreme Court of Canada on section 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867 has been generous — as should be the case.

At page 182 of the decision in the famous matter of Jones, 2 S.C.R. 1975, the Supreme Court of Canada considered section 133 a constitutional guarantee. The federal Parliament could not contravene the provisions of this section. Nothing prevented it from going beyond these provisions, which set out the minimum standard, and according more. Section 133 provides a constitutional right to use one or the other language in the areas and locations set out in section 133.

The Parliament of Canada recognized the same statutory rights after 1867. In 1968, mindful of the Constitution's considerable deficiencies with respect to official languages, Parliament passed the Official Languages Act. Section 2 of the act puts French and English on an equal footing in all institutions under the jurisdiction of the government and the Parliament of Canada. Both languages enjoy equal rights and privileges with respect to their use in the institutions of Parliament and the Government of Canada.

In the Thorson decision, Chief Justice Bora Laskin, speaking on behalf of the majority, commented as follows on the scope of the Official Languages Act:

> It is both declaratory and binding with respect to the use of French and English by and within federal bodies and agencies, including the courts, and as regards the provision of services to the public by means of communications in both languages by these bodies and agencies, in the National > Capital region, or at their main office or headquarters in Canada or in each of their main offices within a federal bilingual district as defined under the act.

Subsection 18(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms has yet to become the subject of a decision by the Supreme Court of Canada, however, it does complete and clarify section 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

We should point out that one cannot separate the proceedings of Parliament and the proceedings of parliamentary committees for the purposes of making only the former subject to the provisions of section 133 of the Constitution, subsection 18(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and subsection 4(3) and section 5 of the Official Languages Act. As Joseph Maingot reminds us at page 40 of his book Parliamentary Privilege in Canada:

> A committee of either House of Parliament is an arm of the House because it derives its existence and its authority from the House.

Similarly, we must remind the authorities concerned of the principle developed by the Supreme Court of Canada in the decision Sinclair vs. Quebec (P.G). [1992] 1 S.C.R. 579, at page 593:

> The requirements of s. 133 cannot be circumvented by the disingenious division of the legislative process into a series of discrete steps, and then claiming that each of these steps, when examined in isolation, lacks a legislative character.

Honourable senators, I must conclude that the decision of the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons of Canada to discontinue the editing, translation and printing of the proceedings of parliamentary committees is unconstitutional, considering section 133 of the Constitution, subsection 18(1) of the Charter, which, I repeat, is part of the Constitution, and subsection 4(3) and section 5 of the Official Languages Act.

One cannot justify on financial grounds a decision that is clearly unconstitutional. We earnestly hope that the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons will restore the status quo in this area. We must conform to the letter and the intent of the Constitution and the Official Languages Act of Canada.

In closing, I would also draw attention to the fact that Senator Gauthier, in his motion, requested that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration or some other committee.

At the risk of appearing prejudiced, I think that, since the problem is a legal and constitutional one, it should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

I say right off that I will be accused of being prejudiced, but one thing is certain, this problem should not be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. To my mind, this is not about saving $1 million. The issue is very simple: Is this measure constitutional, is it legal?

• (1540)

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I listened to Senator Beaudoin's learned speech. I must say that I found it quite convincing; so convincing, in fact, that, read together with Senator Gauthier's speech, I conclude there is little point in sending the question itself to a committee. It is almost what could be called an open-and-shut case, as far as the law is concerned.

However, I go beyond that. I am assuming that what the Honourable Senators Gauthier and Beaudoin have said is correct. Thus, I come to a practical question, which is raised by Senator Gauthier in his Notice of Inquiry, wherein he referred to the decision of the other place and:

> — its serious impact on the Senate and House of Commons joint committees' proceedings —

Does Senator Beaudoin imply, or even state, that it would be improper, illegal and unconstitutional for the Senate and its committees to participate in the work of joint committees if those joint committees conform to the newly adopted practice of the House of Commons?

Senator Beaudoin: The Parliament of Canada is composed of two Houses which are independent of each another. However, both are subject to the same Constitution. Obviously, this house will not do what the other house is doing. In that sense, then, we comply with the Constitution of Canada.

The question is: Should we refuse to participate in a joint parliamentary committee because the other house is not complying with some provisions of the Constitution of Canada? That is a difficult question because there is only one legislative process at the federal level: it is Parliament.

There is nothing more bilingual in this country than the laws and the legislative process. Of course, trials before the federal courts and at the provincial levels in Quebec, New Brunswick and Manitoba are also bilingual.

I am not ready to say that we may refuse to participate in joint committees. However, we are on very solid ground when we try to impose on the other house respect for our Constitution, which is the heart of the legislative process.

Honourable senators, I will not go further than that today because I am a little surprised by the honourable senator's question. It is a good one, about which I will certainly think. If I am allowed, I should like to reply to it in the week after next.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, I have a question for my friend and colleague Senator Beaudoin.

I proposed that this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders because this committee already has a subcommittee dealing with the other place on a related issue, namely the rules governing special joint committees which, as you know, do not have specific rules.

There is still a question as to which rules apply: those of the House of Commons or those of the Senate? We have two clerks, and it is not exactly clear which set of regulations should apply. A subcommittee is currently dealing with this issue.

To get back to the matter at hand, that is, committee issues, I am happy to hear Senator Beaudoin say that committees are creations of Parliament and are therefore part of the parliamentary system.

Legal advisers have told us that committees are not part of Parliament. I am happy to hear one of my good friends, a great jurist, tell us that they are in fact part of the parliamentary system.

The House of Commons administration has already entered into negotiations with the Senate administration. The clerks of the two Houses have met and exchanged notes and suggestions.

The House of Commons has already suggested, through its administration, that the Senate take over the editing, translation, transcription and printing of joint House of Commons and Senate committee issues.

Hence, the House of Commons recognizes that there is an obligation and that it may have erred by not consulting the Senate on this issue. I think that the House of Commons has made a serious mistake in reaching a unilateral decision without consulting the Senate. In my opinion, by doing this, we have destroyed what has kept this country united that is, institutional parliamentary bilingualism, which allowed all Canadians to understand and communicate with one another in either of the two official languages in this country.

My question for Senator Beaudoin is this: Given that the management of the House of Commons and that of the Senate are presently negotiating formal or informal agreements providing that the Senate pay 30 per cent of the cost and the House of Commons the other 70 per cent, does he not think — he told me that it was certainly a good thing for committees to continue their work — that we should settle this matter as soon as possible among senators and members of Parliament, instead of waiting for it to be dealt with at the administrative level and then come back to us?

Senator Beaudoin: I certainly do not object to referring the matter to a subcommittee or a committee which is already dealing with the relationship between the two Houses of Parliament.

What I would not want to happen is for the matter to be settled at the administrative level if that is not where the problem lies. I cannot conceive, or even think of a legal expert who would not agree with what was just said. It is so obvious.

Canada entrenched bilingualism for the legislative process in the 1867 Constitution. In 1982, realizing that there was room for improvement, it entrenched it in section 18 of the Canadian charter. New Brunswick has set an amazing example for the other provinces by also entrenching legislative bilingualism. In Quebec, it existed from the start. It existed in Manitoba as well. A Manitoba act was ruled to be ultra vires by the Supreme Court 89 years after being enacted. I figure that there is certainly nothing in the Canadian Constitution more bilingual than the legislative process, legislation and the courts. There is nothing more bilingual than that.

I have no objection to settling the matter elsewhere, but I was prepared to have it referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs as, perhaps for the first time, not one expert could be found to disagree with this principle. This is rather unusual when dealing with legal or other matters. We could not find a single one, even if we tried!

Let us refer the issue to that committee. You can be sure that if the answer is not absolutely positive, I will resume the debate. This time, we will refer the matter to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and we will receive a report that the decision is ultra vires.

Senator Gauthier: I have a supplementary.

I readily accept Senator Beaudoin's proposal to the effect that this is a constitutional matter and that it should be referred to that committee. However, we are told that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs is overworked and that it could take several months before it can review the matter.

This is why I am hesitant. Indeed, this is a timely matter, and I would like a decision to be made as quickly as possible. The committee has to look at some important constitutional issues. However, there are also other issues, and I should like to mention a few.

Does the word "translation" mean "interpretation"? Do these two terms have the same meaning? We often use the expression "simultaneous interpretation." That is not the same as "translation." We should perhaps define the term "translation."

Do the words "committee proceedings" — I asked the question earlier — mean that the section refers to committee proceedings as well as to testimony? I think so, but it seems that we should get a clear and definite answer.

Is the House of Commons avoiding its obligations regarding official languages and the Senate by not publishing the proceedings of its committees?

I think that you are absolutely right, Senator Beaudoin, in saying that the Senate and the House of Commons both have an obligation to continue to print committee issues.

The House of Commons will have a system called "Pubnet" will give access to these transcriptions via a computer terminal. The Senate is not hooked up to Pubnet. We in the Senate will not be able to read and keep up with what is going on in the House of Commons. We will not know what is happening in the committees. These committee issues are very important to senators. Without them, we will be reinventing the wheel! Every time we examine a new bill, we will have to start hearing witnesses all over again. I think that what witnesses say before the committees of the House of Commons are a source of inspiration for the Senate.

Does Senator Beaudoin not agree that committee issues are used in the work of the Senate and that, if we cannot access them on the House of Commons's Pubnet system, we senators will be ill-equipped to defend ourselves?

Senator Beaudoin: I am working from a principle that all jurists accept, which is that the committees of the Senate and of the House of Commons are part of Parliament. Senate committees should be as bilingual as those of the House of Commons. Nobody disagrees with that!

They say that committee proceedings can be reproduced on the Internet, on any computer screen. That cannot be! It is as if you were to say to me that Canada's laws would only be available on the Internet! The Supreme Court would quash that in 10 minutes. Not everyone has access to the Internet. Not everyone has access to a computer.

Just as the laws must be printed and published in both official languages, because of section 18 of the Charter and the Official Languages Act, committee reports must also be printed and published in both official languages.

If you ask me, there is no getting out of this. In any case, I would very much like to see a Supreme Court ruling that would say the opposite.

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO PERMIT ELECTRONIC COVERAGE OF PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Donald H. Oliver, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, May 10, 1995, moved:

> That the Senate do empower the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to permit coverage by the electronic media of its public meetings with respect to the examination of the proposed orders issuing directions to the CRTC on direct-to-home satellite distribution undertakings, with the least possible disruption of the hearings.

He said: Honourable senators, the motion for the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to broadcast its proceedings with regard to its examination of the proposed orders issuing directions to the CRTC on direct-to-home satellite distribution undertakings falls within the general framework of the Senate's oft-stated desire to make the work of Senate committees better known.

• (1600)

There are numerous precedents of Senate committees broadcasting proceedings: During this session of Parliament, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and the Special Joint Committees on Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy and on Canada's Defence Policy have done so. Our own committee televised its meetings with the Minister of Industry, the Honourable John Manley, on December 7, 1994 and with the Minister of Heritage, the Honourable Michel Dupuy, on February 15, 1995.

In this particular instance, there is a great deal of public and media interest on the issue of direct-to-home satellite distribution. We held our first meeting on this subject yesterday with the Assistant Deputy Ministers of both Industry Canada and Heritage Canada involved. We intend to invite a number of other witnesses before the committee from industry and from the public sector.

We are, in fact, in a position to hold a number of hearings on the proposed orders in the next few weeks before the Canadian Heritage Committee of the House of Commons does so in mid-June. This will undoubtedly heighten interest in the work of our committee and the testimony it will receive.

Honourable senators, the broadcasting of the proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will afford an opportunity for the Senate to render more visible some of the excellent work done in Senate committees. Therefore, I move the adoption of the motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Oliver, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald:

> That the Senate do empower the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to permit coverage by the electronic media of its public meetings with respect to the examination of the proposed orders issuing directions to the CRTC on direct-to-home satellite distribution undertakings, with the least possible disruption of the hearings.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Oliver. Will the broadcasting of the proceedings be direct in terms of immediate transmission, or is it proposed that the proceedings would be retransmitted later that day or on the weekend? We often see that type of program being broadcast sometimes days after the event takes place. Do you have information to that effect?

Senator Oliver: I thank the honourable senator for his question. I do not have direct information on his question, but the cable Parliamentary channel called CPAC carries out the broadcast for us at no cost. Sometimes it is direct, and sometimes it is rebroadcast. We do not know whether they will be available to do it each and every day we have a hearing, but the request is that it be done whenever they are available to do it.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 23, 1995, at 8:00 p.m.

WINNIPEG

CONGRATULATIONS ON EFFORTS TO RETAIN JETS HOCKEY TEAM

Hon. Terry Stratton: Honourable senators, I rise today to speak about community spirit, and in particular that emanating from the heartland of Canada, being Manitoba and Winnipeg.

The events that occurred recently in Manitoba, and particularly in Winnipeg, with regard to the retention of our NHL hockey team, the Winnipeg Jets, tell a remarkable story about the efforts of thousands of individuals, from corporate leaders down to the grassroots. The story is mainly about the ordinary citizens of our province who raised close to $13 million in small contributions for this purpose, from the child contributing from his piggybank on up.

Allan Fotheringham, in his recent article in Maclean's, called Winnipeg a city of survivors. We survive winter, we survive mosquitoes, and we will survive in the NHL, thanks to these citizens of the heartland.

By the way, our other wonderful community-based organizations, such as our ballet, our symphony and our football team, will also continue to thrive.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, May 24, 1995, at 1:00 p.m..

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS REVIEW AND APPEAL BOARD BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-67, to establish the Veterans Review and Appeal Board, to amend the Pension Act, to make consequential amendments to other Acts and to repeal the Veterans Appeal Board Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Graham, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 57(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

JOINT PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION TO BRAZIL

REPORT TABLED

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to table the report of the Joint Parliamentary Delegation of the Senate and the House of Commons on its official visit to Brazil from April 15 to 21, 1995.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

SIXTH REPORT OF CANADIAN NATO PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION TABLED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the sixth report of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association of the Standing Committee meeting of the North Atlantic Assembly (NATO Parliamentarians), held in Marmaris, Turkey on April 8, 9 and 10, 1995.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Joan Neiman, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(a), moved:

> That the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide have power to sit at 8:30 p.m. tonight, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

JOINT PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION TO BRAZIL

OFFICIAL VISIT—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday, May 25, 1995, I will call the attention of the Senate to the official visit to Brazil of the Joint Parliamentary Delegation of the Senate and the House of Commons from April 15 to 21, 1995.

TRANSPORT

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—CANADA-NOVA SCOTIA AGREEMENT—DIVERSION OF FUNDS TO CAPE BRETON PROJECT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, I ask you to revisit with me for a moment the reprehensible and somewhat dangerous precedent-setting act of diverting funds under a Canada-Nova Scotia highway agreement from its purpose, which is the development of safe highways, to the much narrower objective of paving some trails in Cape Breton, as much as I love that part of our province.

• (2010)

Honourable senators, the Minister of Transport has stated twice that this decision to divert funds was made solely by Nova Scotia's provincial government. I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate: Is that in fact the case? If she does not know, could she find the answer for me?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank the honourable senator for his question. He has undoubtedly reviewed the answers of the Minister of Transport in the House of Commons in which he has stated, on more than one occasion, that under this program the responsibility for highways lies with provincial governments, and, indeed, the reallocation of funds is made on the advice of the provincial government to the federal government.

The Minister of Transport has mentioned on one occasion that, by consensus, funds for highway construction can be reallocated. This procedure has been followed in a number of provinces on the initiative of the respective provincial government. That has been my colleague's response to such questions.

In Nova Scotia, a large percentage of the money spent has been spent on Highway 104.

Senator Forrestall: Honourable senators, I have a copy of the agreement in my hand. Without quoting from it extensively, I should like to reassure the Leader of the Government in the Senate that, under the terms of the agreement, both federal and provincial governments must agree before there can be a diversion of funds. Deliberate action must be taken by both levels of government.

Clearly, what the minister has done is at odds with the agreement. Apart from looking for some justification — we can always find justification for doing whatever we want — I suggest that the Leader of the Government consider the precedent that is being set here. I ask that she bring the question of this precedent and the danger it creates to the attention of her colleagues in government.

If toll highways are established on the Trans-Canada Highway in Nova Scotia, what is to prevent British Columbia, Quebec or Ontario from setting up toll highways? Does Bob Rae want toll roads? Will the honourable senator's colleagues, if elected to govern in other provinces, want toll roads?

It is a dangerous, precedent-setting decision. It is important to the people in the communities of Nova Scotia who are concerned with the number of deaths on their highways. People who move from one part of their community to another will have to pay tolls. That is bad enough, but what will happen if someone thinks that this is a great idea and wants to turn the Trans-Canada Highway into a toll road? Was that the original intention?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, without commenting one way or the other on the honourable senator's suggestions, I would be pleased to take his further questions to my colleagues, particularly on the notion of setting a precedent that might affect provinces across the country.

Senator Forrestall: Honourable senators, perhaps the Honourable Leader of the Government will ask as well how the government intends to respond to clause 11 of the agreement, which deals with communications. Concerning the toll highway, what will the sign read, "A joint Nova Scotia-Ottawa capital development project"? Let your imaginations run wild. How will the communications program be effected? I would like to know the answer to that question.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I prefer not to let my imagination run wild. However, I will obtain from my colleagues the information the honourable senator seeks.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—DIVERSION OF FUNDS TO CAPE BRETON PROJECT—POSSIBLE INTERPRETATION BY AUDITOR GENERAL OF CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, by way of a supplementary question, the controversy arose because the Auditor General of Nova Scotia said that the Fleur-de-lis Trail, the project to which the funds were diverted, does not meet the criteria for funding under the Federal-Provincial Strategic Highway Improvement Program. Would the minister consider asking the Auditor General of Canada for his interpretation on that matter?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will pass that suggestion along to my colleague.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—NOVA SCOTIA— RETURN OF FUNDS TO DESIGNATED PROJECT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: My question is on the same subject, honourable senators. Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate aware that Nova Scotia now ranks with Newfoundland as the province with the lowest rate of economic development in the country? Regardless of how we love our Newfoundland colleagues and fellow country people, I am sure we would not like to have the same distinction.

The leader must agree that diverting the Trans-Canada Highway funds to Minister Dingwall's re-election campaign will act as a barrier to economic development for the entire province. Why would a manufacturer invest inside a toll zone when doing so would increase the costs of shipping products to outside markets?

My question to the leader is this: Will she join with us in calling upon her colleagues in the other place and in Nova Scotia to return the funds for the "death valley" highway project, where they were intended to go in the first place?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, without agreeing in any way with the preamble of the honourable senator's questions, I will pass the substance of his questions along to my colleagues and seek a response from them.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—CHANGES TO METHOD OF REPORTING COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS—AVAILABILITY TO SENATORS OF COMPUTER LINK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, my question is addressed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Perhaps the Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee may wish to take note of my concern as well. It relates to the changes in the other place regarding how the proceedings of committees are now being reported. This is a serious matter which alters the availability of their committee transcripts. As a result of the change, which was part of a cost-cutting measure, the House now provides only an electronic copy of their committee proceedings. The medium on which this information is provided is a computer system known as PUBNET.

The trouble is that PUBNET is only available in the offices of members of Parliament, as well as on one terminal in the Library of Parliament, if requested.

• (2020)

For those of us who like to follow what is going on in committees in the other place for the purpose of our own research, the problem is that the Senate system of computers will not accommodate PUBNET, which makes access to House of Commons committee transcripts difficult and time consuming. It is my understanding that in order to acquire a transcript of a House committee, senators or their researchers must request the Library of Parliament to access PUBNET on its single terminal, and then print a copy of the requested proceedings. The answer to my question is, therefore, of interest to all honourable senators.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate undertake to provide to this chamber an update on the current situation regarding senators' access to House committee transcripts? Would she also undertake to provide a report on the measures in progress or under consideration in an attempt to ameliorate this apparent problem?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank my honourable friend for his question. This matter is certainly of interest and concern to members on both sides in the Senate, and has been drawn to my attention by colleagues.

If I may, I might ask my colleague Senator Hastings to give an update from his position as Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has been following closely developments in the House of Commons in relation to the printing of proceedings of their committees. As of today, we are moving to go on line with them. I should warn honourable senators that this will mean a considerable expense for the Senate in 1995-96. Close to $2 million may be required to bring us on line and up to the scale we would be expected to maintain.

The Senate cannot remain behind the times. We must move ahead with the available technology. A Senate committee is presently at work studying this matter, and will report to the Senate within a month.

[Translation]

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

ACCESS OF FRANCOPHONES TO INTERNET NETWORK

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, my question is for the government leader in the Senate. Are you aware that Internet operates primarily in English, in particular for something as important as the Royal Military College in Kingston. The first few pages are in both languages, but if you go on for more information, the French disappears.

This is unacceptable. The Minister of Defence must be told that this is unacceptable. I do not want to rise here and play nationalist on this matter, but it really disgusts me. I hope the leader will take serious action on this matter. I have been here seven years. I have put up with many breaches of the rules of bilingualism to avoid slowing down committee work. In fact, I had the opportunity to practice my English. It was not so bad. Eventually, however, it gets to be tiresome, especially for those students who would like to go to the college. I have said that people from the Province of Quebec would not go to the military college. This is what will happen with your system. Try to ensure that our people can get service in their own language. If we keep going on this way, the Defence department will no longer have any legitimacy in our province. This is serious. I would ask the leader to give this matter the attention it deserves.

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I take the honourable senator's question seriously. It is a problem that I will refer directly to my colleagues. The situation is not acceptable. I will see what can be done about it.

Hon. John B. Stewart: I wish to ask a supplementary question, honourable senators. I do not wish to suggest that the statutes enacted to institute the process which is now being followed in the other place are tainted by reason of the fact that the committee reports are not available in printed form in both languages. I suppose a case could be made following the Manitoba —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It was made by Senator Gauthier and Senator Beaudoin.

Senator Stewart: I do not want to follow that because I assume that formal minutes of the committees of the other place are available in both languages.

My comments are directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. As Senator Bolduc has now implied, it is not satisfactory — although it may be technically sufficient — to have the records of proceedings available in only an obscure way.

Assuming the statutes are not invalid, what the House of Commons does is its own business. However, I hope that the Chairman of Internal Economy did not intend to imply that we should regard what the House of Commons is doing as the cutting edge of progress. Surely, however, the Senate must do things in a way that is right and proper for its purposes.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: Does she think that I have misstated the point?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would never accuse my colleague of misstating a point.

I take my colleague's point. Senator Bolduc was merely concerned about information being available only in an obscure way and with great difficulty, in both official languages. That is a fundamental concern of this chamber and any other institution associated with the federal government.

With respect to Senator Stewart's request, I would ask our colleague Senator Hastings to add to his remarks and, indeed, his study. This is not a situation wherin we must simply regard the other place as the sole arbiter of excellence and progress.

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, by way of supplementary, the current situation is that the Senate, jointly with the House of Commons, has established standing joint committees of the Senate and the House of Commons on Official Languages, the Scrutiny of Regulations, the Library of Parliament, and the Joint Inter-Parliamentary Council.

In that regard, my supplementary questions are for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Has any thought been given to the particular situation in which the Senate finds itself where it may need to continue with a formal printing of the reports of these committees? Until this chamber has decided otherwise, I think we must maintain such a practice. Has anyone advised the House of Commons that the Senate will continue printing, as we have done for years, the proceedings of our committees and joint committees, regardless of what the House of Commons has decided in relation to its use of computer systems?

I would remind honourable senators that this computer system is not even installed in the Senate. In fact, it will be July before the system is installed in the House of Commons. How long will it be before that system is available to all senators?

[ Senator Stewart ]

Honourable senators, will the Leader of the Government consider making the decision soon as to whether the Senate will continue its normal practice of publishing, printing and distributing the proceedings of our committees, as we have done in the past with respect to the special joint committees with the House?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, as I understand it, there was some discussion on this issue as the Senate was conducting an examination of its budget for this year, and the decision taken was that we would continue with the publication of the written transcript, as we have done historically. This question has very important and broad implications for all of Parliament. It is a question that can and should be raised, perhaps not just through our committees and the connections we have with the other side of the building, but also in other manners as well. On behalf of this house, I would be pleased to convey the concerns to my cabinet colleagues on the other side of the building.

LOBBYISTS REGISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Pearson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hervieux-Payette, P.C., for the second reading of Bill C-43, to amend the Lobbyists Registration Act and to make related amendments to other Acts.

Hon. Marjory LeBreton: Honourable senators, I am pleased to join in the debate on Bill C-43. This legislation has arrived in this chamber at an interesting time. We are about to begin an inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the government's decision to cancel a contract awarded to a private consortium to redevelop and operate Terminals 1 and 2 at Toronto's Pearson International Airport. Serious charges have been made by the government concerning the role lobbyists played in the awarding of the contract, and therefore the discussion on this piece of legislation has particular relevance.

Election campaign chickens nesting in the Liberal Red Book are coming home to roost, and more than a few feathers are fluttering about. The skills honed over many years by lobbyists during past Liberal administrations are being reworked by a new generation known by the more discrete title of "government relations consultants." However, this bill calls them what they are: "lobbyists," plain and simple. Lobbyists, like politicians, are engaged in a legitimate and honourable business and, as a body, they do not deserve such a negative image nor the slings and arrows directed their way.

Referring back to the years of past Liberal administrations, particularly the period from the end of the war until the 1980s, had there been on the books such legislative and regulatory vehicles as Access to Information and the Lobbyists Registration Act, imagine the stories that could have been dug up. Those were the days of close camaraderie between a privileged few in the Press Gallery, their friends in cabinet, the senior ranks of public service and the lobbyist fraternity. Discretion, not revelation or exposure, seemed to be the watchword. The conversations over the dangling fishing lines and tinkling ice cubes were as guarded as the private fishing camps in the Gatineau Hills at which guests were lodged.

I do not object to lobbyists. I have many friends who are lobbyists and consultants. They perform a useful function in bringing the interests of their company, employer or client to the attention of the public service, the policy-makers and the politicians. They have been involved with government in one form or another from the outset of parliamentary democracy as we know it in this country. In many instances, they have contributed to a better society, as Senator Pearson pointed out in her address on May 11. However, one practitioner overstepping the bounds of the profession can tarnish the whole profession, hence the establishment of Bill C-82 under the previous Progressive Conservative government and now Bill C-43. This legislation can be a useful guide to those who work in this particular field.

At the same time, the work of the proposed joint special committee to establish a code of conduct for senators and members of Parliament should be useful in more clearly defining the parameters of conduct which should be followed by members of both chambers in their dealings with the public.

From the first years of the Trudeau government in 1969 to 1985, no fewer than 20 private members' bills calling for regulation of the profession were tabled in the House of Commons. It is interesting and revealing to note that the Trudeau government stood still in this area, preferring the status quo. In 1985, Prime Minister Mulroney announced that his new government would establish a registration system for lobbyists. The former Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs subsequently issued a discussion paper on lobbying. It outlined four principles respecting the registration of lobbyists, and they are worth reviewing, for they remain the basis of the legislation now before us. The first principle was openness, to be accomplished through a publicly available record of paid lobbyists, their clients and any other additional information considered desirable to demonstrate the government's commitment to transparency and integrity in its relations with the public. The second principle was clarity. In order to reinforce the principle of openness, the regulation should be clear and precise. There should be no doubts about who should and who should not register.

The third principle was access to government, the requirement that paid lobbyists should not act as a barrier to access to government. The fourth principle was administrative simplicity. The administrative requirements in the system of registration should be held to the minimum required to accomplish the system's goals. Registration should not discourage lobbying by anyone with modest means or create a large bureaucratic system.

The discussion paper was referred to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedures, and in 1987 the government introduced Bill C-82, the Lobbyists Registration Act. This bill was designed to create a registration system for paid lobbyists whereby government officials and members of the public would know who was attempting to influence government. The bill was given Royal Assent in September 1988 and proclaimed on September 30, 1989.

The act also provided for a review of the act by a parliamentary committee three years after it came into force. Such a review was conducted by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations in 1993.

Honourable senators, as Senator Pearson acknowledged during her remarks on this bill, as reported in the Debates of the Senate, at page 1637:

> The impetus to improve the act also came in the last Parliament.

She pointed out, quite correctly, that a committee chaired by a Progressive Conservative Member of Parliament tabled an all-party, unanimous report recommending a series of amendments aimed at more disclosure and more transparency. She even acknowledged Prime Minister Campbell's intention to strengthen the act — an act, I repeat again, which was originally passed by the Mulroney government.

Parliament was dissolved for a general election before the government could table a response to the committee's report. However, the Liberal Party had comments to make, and it set them out in its famous, or infamous, Red Book for the election campaign. It was refreshing to note that Senator Pearson states:

> This sense of unanimity continued with the Red Book commitment to implement the recommendations of the Holtmann committee...

This is an interesting acknowledgement that the Red Book had many authors.

The Red Book begs the question that, in part, flows from the presentation of this particular piece of legislation. During the election campaign and in the post-election period, the Prime Minister promised to restore integrity to government, a typical example of Liberal arrogance feeding on public cynicism, which is not unique to Canada, to suggest that only they possess integrity. According to The Concise Oxford Dictionary, "integrity" means wholeness, entirety, soundness, uprightness, honesty. Looking at this bill, at the Red Book, and at the performance of the government to date, I have to ask: Prime Minister, whither integrity?

Let me refer to the Red Book and its statement and pledges on lobbying reform. It begins on page 94, should my honourable friends opposite care to examine the text. The Red Book notes:

> The lobbying industry has expanded enormously in Canada during the nine years of Conservative government.

• (2040)

The industry did indeed expand beyond the confines of the long-established relationships that certain firms had with previous Liberal governments, to include new organizations ready to establish their credentials with a new government, although "enormously" is an overstatement, and an example of Red Book rhetoric.

The Red Book goes on to say:

> The integrity of government is put into question when there is a perception that the public agenda is set by lobbyists exercising undue influence away from public view. The cosy relationship between lobbyists and the Conservative regime has contributed not only to public cynicism about politics but also to the sense of the Americanization of Canadian government.

Let us look at this last statement in the context of the current controversy in which the government now finds itself over its direction to the CRTC on the awarding of licences for direct-to-home satellites. Speaking of cosy relationships! This is integrity?

In the next breath, the Red Book says:

> Serious concerns have been raised in the minds of Canadians about some of their political representatives and some of the companies and individuals who lobby or otherwise seek to influence government decision-making.

Truer words were never spoken!

The Red Book says that Canadians have the right to meet with elected officials and senior public servants without employing lobbyists. That is true. Any busy MP or senator will attest to the fact that they work directly with constituents and other groups in assisting them in their dealings with government at all levels. However, if a person is totally unfamiliar with how government works, or how to approach elected officials and senior public servants, it does help to have available the services of someone who knows what legislative changes have been made, or more simply who knows what is going on, how the system works, and through which channels one can move to achieve a particular purpose.

The Red Book continues:

> Although Canadians have the right to be represented in their dealings with government, no one should be required to pay fees in order merely to arrange meetings with ministers or senior officials.

One cannot argue with that. The operative word here is "required." The arrogant Liberal inference was clear: they would have you believe that the public had no access without a fee. That is totally dishonest on their part.

The Red Book makes much of the appointment of an independent Ethics Counsellor to advise both public officials and lobbyists in the day-to-day application of the Code of Conduct for Public Officials. Senator Pearson devoted a good portion of her remarks to this position. The problem is that the Red Book promised something quite different, namely:

> The Ethics Counsellor will be appointed after consultation with the leaders of all parties in the House of Commons and report directly to Parliament.

However, without so much as a blush of embarrassment, the Prime Minister went ahead and chose the Ethics Counsellor himself! The Counsellor will report not to Parliament but to the Prime Minister!

Wholeness? Entirety? Soundness? Uprightness? Honesty? Integrity? Integrity, indeed!

I was pleased to read a recent editorial in The Ottawa Citizen which took the Prime Minister to task. This is a newspaper that is not unfriendly to the present government, to put it mildly. Quite the opposite. It had this to say:

> Regulating lobbyists is not all there is to protecting integrity in government, or preserving Jean Chrétien's reputation. Much more needs to be done to oversee the conduct of office-holders — senior public servants and cabinet ministers — to establish public confidence in the government's conflict of interest code.
> But the work of lobbyists must be exposed to public scrutiny far more forthrightly than this bill allows. Otherwise, the public will inevitably begin to suspect the worst of Chrétien and his government.

Honourable senators, any lingering suspicions that any thinking Canadian might have will readily be dispelled by having another look at the Liberal Red Book of Hypocrisy, as I call it. As my seat-mate very aptly put it recently, "The Red Book should be in the blue box!"

I urge honourable senators to read page 22 of the Red Book. What is contained on that page should bring a blush to the face of the Leader of the Government, whom honourable senators will remember so well for her musical renditions and those of her colleagues in this chamber during the so-called debate on the GST:

> A Liberal government will replace the GST with a system that generates equivalent revenues, is fairer to consumers and to small business, minimizes disruption to small business, and promotes federal-provincial fiscal cooperation and harmonization.

The kazoos are silent. Dignity prevails. Integrity is restored in the Senate chamber. Thanks are due to senators on this side, who have respect for this institution and for the intended role of the Senate. There are no hunger strikers, kazoo blowers, or generally rowdy behaviour on this side of the chamber.

Then, honourable senators, only two pages on, at page 24 — hardly time to clear one's throat — the Red Book states:

> The Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and the North American Free Trade Agreement are flawed. A Liberal government will renegotiate them.

Amigo Chrétien! Renegotiate, indeed!

I list only these two examples to underline why we should not be surprised to see their lofty claims with respect to such matters as lobbying legislation now look quite different in reality. I could list many more, such as child care, health care, unemployment insurance, social programs and human rights, but I will keep those for another day.

Here we are, less than two years later, and the question we need to ask of this government is: What has the government done to change this perception that the Liberal Party so cleverly crafted as its election manifesto? Where is the integrity that was supposed to set this government above those that preceded it?

Our leader, the Honourable Jean Charest, summed it up neatly at our recent convention when he said:

> What the Liberals fought for nine years, they have now adopted...Free trade, NAFTA, tax reform, the Conservative government's energy policies, deregulation, privatization, deficit reduction.

What is next on their policy shoplifting spree? Helicopters? Of course, we could add lobbying legislation.

I go back to the beginning of these remarks: Liberal election campaign chickens are coming home to roost. They have no clear agenda, and we on this side of the chamber will continue to remind them of this fact. Political expediency, yes. Integrity, no way!

The discussion in this chamber and in committee on Bill C-43 should be enlightening for honourable senators. I hope those in the lobbying industry will avail themselves of the opportunity to present their arguments for and against the legislation, particularly those who might feel their profession has been maligned by critics within the government itself.

In presentations to various committees in the other place, industry representatives have demonstrated that they are honourable men and women in an honourable profession. They themselves recognized the degree of responsibility that they must accept in conducting their business with members of the public service, elected representatives and members of this place. They have adopted the idea of policing their own industry through a formal association, and we should commend them for this move. They have put forward constructive ideas that have been incorporated in this proposed legislation.

As representatives of the party on this side of the chamber, a party that, while in government, led the way in encouraging regulations and orders for a burgeoning industry, we will be more than interested in the comments from the government side of the chamber. Comments about "wholeness, entirety, soundness, uprightness and honesty" — in a word, "integrity," a word that seems to have lost its coinage of late.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Pearson, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

TREATMENT OF ABORIGINAL VETERANS

REPORT OF ABORIGINAL PEOPLES COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Ninth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples, entitled: "The Aboriginal Soldier After the Wars," tabled in the Senate on 29th March, 1995. — (Honourable Senator Berntson).

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak this evening on the aboriginal veterans report. On the last occasion that I spoke, I think I made the comments that were appropriate on behalf of the committee.

• (2050)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to advise the Senate that if Honourable Senator Andreychuk speaks now, her speech will have the effect of closing the debate on this item.

Senator Andreychuk: Honourable senators, when our report was released, it was disseminated to all aboriginal veterans who appeared before the committee and to any veterans whose names were put forth to the committee. We also disseminated the report to all known sectors of the aboriginal communications network. I am pleased to say the report received adequate coverage by those sources. It is rather disappointing, however, that the national news services have not seen fit to publicize this report and the stories which lie behind it to give due honour to the aboriginal veterans, particularly during the recent celebrations to commemorate VE day.

The committee report was well reasoned. The comments were very careful and measured, being mindful of present-day society and of the fact that the aboriginal veterans themselves were very measured and reasoned in their requests and their responses.

I simply want to underscore again that the aboriginal veterans fought valiantly to help build a fair and just society to which they thought they would be returning. It would be only fair for this Senate, the House of Commons and the Government of Canada to respond in the same measured and reasoned way to the aboriginal veterans.

In a small way, our report has already had some effect. Many young aboriginals are now aware of the sacrifices made by aboriginal soldiers. They are beginning to realize that aboriginal soldiers were valuable role models for their communities. There seems to be an awakening by aboriginal youth to the positive impact they can have on their own society. The fact that the broader society has, in some measure, responded to their concerns is a positive show of good faith for which aboriginal youth have been waiting.

In Regina, on June 6, 1995, a ceremony will be held to commemorate the achievements, accomplishments and sacrifices of aboriginal veterans. The aboriginal community will come together on that day to honour its veterans. It is my hope that, tonight, by your show of support for this report, we in the Senate can show our respect and our gratitude to aboriginal veterans.

Honourable senators, on behalf of the committee and particularly for aboriginal veterans, I move that this report be adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE SENATE

IMPACT OF DECISION OF HOUSE OF COMMONS TO CEASE PUBLICATION OF COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry by the Honourable Senator Gauthier, calling the attention of the Senate to the decision of the other place concerning the publication of committee proceedings, to the serious impact of that decision on the proceedings of the joint committees of the Senate and the House of Commons, and to the issue of whether that decision is in compliance with the constitutional requirements of section 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867. — (Honourable Senator Corbin).

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, on March 5, I drew the attention of the Senate to the decision by the House of Commons to stop printing the proceedings of the committees in both official languages.

On April 5, Senator Jean-Robert Gauthier made a major speech in the Senate on the matter. His speech was followed by another major speech by Senator Beaudoin which drew our attention to the legal and constitutional scope of this decision. It is not my intention to add to the debate. There is nothing I could add of any importance to the debate this evening.

However, honourable senators will remember that Senator Gauthier gave notice of motion on May 4 to the effect:

> That the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders consider and report on:
> (i) the effects on the Standing Joint Committees of the decision by the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons concerning the editing, translation and printing of Committees Issues; and
> (ii) the need for the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons to consult the Senate before making decisions on matters that concern both Houses of Parliament.

I do not intend to debate the notice of motion. Senator Gauthier will introduce the motion in due course. It is his motion.

I do concur, however, with the recommendation made by Senator Beaudoin on Senator Gauthier's original inquiry to the effect that the entire matter should, in his opinion, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

I am rising tonight in support of Senator Beaudoin's proposal. Constitutional issues are not transient matters like Canada geese that fly north in the spring or the snow geese that fly south in the fall. This is rather fundamental and its repercussions on all printed parliamentary proceedings should be considered very carefully.

Today, printed matter has a broader meaning. It is defined as the characters that appear on a television screen. I am not quite convinced that this kind of printed matter must exclude the traditional definition in use since Gutenberg invented movable type several centuries ago. I see this as a basic constitutional issue.

When Senator Gauthier is ready to debate his notice of motion, I intend to move an amendment to his proposal that the whole issue of printed parliamentary proceedings, as provided for in the Constitution of Canada, and not only the issue of joint committees of the Senate and the House of Commons, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, as proposed by Senator Beaudoin. That is why I rose tonight, and in due course, I will move my amendment.

NINETY-THIRD CONFERENCE, MADRID, SPAIN

Hon. Peter Bosa rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, May 10, 1995:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the 93rd Inter-Parliamentary Union Conference, held at Madrid, Spain, from March 27 to April 1, 1995.

He said: Honourable senators, it is my privilege to present the report of the 93rd Inter-Parliamentary Conference held in Madrid from March 27 to April 1. My distinguished colleague Senator Cochrane and I attended this conference, along with five members of the House of Commons. They were Madam Madeleine Dalphond-Guiral, Ms Pierrette Ringette-Maltais and Messrs Eugene Bellemare, John Finlay and John Harvard.

Before speaking about the deliberations at the conference, I would like to mention a few points about bilateral relations with our host country. In June 1977, Spain held its first free elections in 40 years, and a referendum the following year approved a new democratic constitution. The Spanish parliamentarians are very proud of their political system and make frequent reference to the principles and values enshrined in their constitution.

Since 1986, when Spain joined the European Community, Canadian exports to Spain have expanded dramatically. Total bilateral trade between Canada and Spain amounted to some $821 million in 1993. Spain is Canada's tenth largest export market in Europe and the twenty-first in the world. Our trading relationship has been mutually beneficial and trade continues to grow. The major Canadian exports to Spain include raw materials such as mining products, pulp and paper, mineral fuels and wood. Major Spanish exports to Canada include rubber, footwear, minerals, fuels and oils, optical devices and organic chemicals.

However, Canada and Spain have had a decade-long difference over fisheries issues. As honourable senators may recall, this conference took place during the dispute over the allocation of Greenland halibut, or turbot, and the seizure of a Spanish fishing trawler off the Newfoundland coast by Canadian officials. Prior to our departure, officials from the Departments of Foreign Affairs and Fisheries provided us with comprehensive background briefings on the dispute and the events leading up to the seizure of the vessel. Likewise, during our time in Madrid, the Canadian embassy continued to give us up-to-the-minute information on the latest developments.

I wish to report that our visit to Madrid and our participation in the conference proceeded smoothly. The Spaniards are a hospitable and cordial people. They treated us with the utmost gentleness and generosity. I was pleased, as the chairperson of the Twelve Plus, to be able to express, at the end of the conference, on behalf of our group, our thanks to the Spaniards for the kind hospitality that was accorded to us during our stay in Madrid. While in Madrid, I was interviewed a number of times by the Spanish media, and each time I stressed the importance of conservation of fish stocks.

During the conference, some encouraging things happened that had not been anticipated and that bode well for the future. At a meeting of the Twelve Plus Group, the caucus of western democracies, the Canadian delegation proposed as an item for the agenda of a future conference "the conservation of world fish stocks in order to ensure an important source of protein as well as continued viability and economic stability of fishing around the world." The leader of the Spanish delegation, Mr. Miguel Angel Martinez, with whom I have a good working relationship, not only supported this proposal but also suggested that our two parliamentary groups jointly sponsor the proposal.

I think this example demonstrates the importance of a continuing dialogue among parliamentarians. Even though our governments were engaged in a heated dispute, we, as parliamentarians, were able to meet and discuss the issues and try to work toward a resolution of the outstanding issues. In fact, I spoke to Mr. Martinez about increasing the dialogue at the parliamentary level, perhaps through a friendship group. He was very supportive of the idea, but, as the Spanish Parliament does not have a mechanism for friendship groups, we agreed that we should do so under the auspices of the IPU.

We have a lot in common with the Spanish people. There are sizeable fishing industries in both countries and it is in our joint interest to preserve fishing stocks in order to ensure that our fishing communities, even though reduced in size, will be able to pursue employment for years to come.

While maintaining contact with our Spanish colleagues is important, I believe we should expand this dialogue beyond Parliament by encouraging contacts between Canadian and Spanish fishermen. This is the constituency that is directly involved in the industry. It is through such initiatives that each side will gain a better understanding and appreciation of the situation of the other. Through such contacts, we might be able to avoid the kind of confrontation that both sides have experienced in the past.

The same approach applies to Portugal.

I would now like to turn to the conference itself. At the outset, I would like to express our thanks and appreciation to the officials from Foreign Affairs and International Trade Canada, the Canadian International Development Agency and Fisheries and Oceans Canada, who briefed our delegation prior to its departure, and as well to the researchers in the Library of Parliament who provided background papers.

I would also like to pay tribute to the Canadian ambassador, Mr. David Wright, and his colleague Mr. Paul Willox, First Secretary, for their assistance and support during the conference. At the beginning of our work, Mr. Wright and other staff members provided a comprehensive and informative briefing on Spain in general and on the fisheries dispute in particular. Our ambassador also hosted a reception during the conference in order for us to meet some Spanish business people interested in Canada.

[Translation]

The first item on the agenda was, "The international community and the challenges raised by the disasters resulting from armed conflicts and natural or man-made catastrophes: the need for a coherent and efficient response through the implementation of political and humanitarian measures and mechanisms adapted to the situation."

Messrs Harvard and Bellemare participated in the plenary debate and represented Canada at the meetings of the committee considering the issue. Twenty-three countries, including Canada, put forward draft resolutions.

The second item on the agenda was, "Bioethics: an international challenge for the protection of human rights."

The speech by our colleague Senator Cochrane dealt with the innovative work done by the Canadian Senate committee on euthanasia and assisted suicide. After her presentation, several delegates asked us for more information about this committee and for copies of its final report. Senator Cochrane and Mr. Finlay, the other Canadian speaker to address this issue, represented Canada on the committee responsible for reviewing the 20 draft resolutions, including the one put forward by the Canadian group.

[English]

At each conference there is an opportunity to vote on a supplementary item to be included on the agenda. Subjects are selected because they are topical and of international concern. A year ago, the Canadian group, for example, successfully proposed "adherence to the obligations of the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty." This subject was debated and a resolution detailing the importance of an indefinite extension of the NPT was adopted by consensus. North Korea, which had been threatening to leave the NPT, participated in these deliberations and agreed with the final resolution.

This is one activity where the IPU carries out valuable work. An examination of the voting patterns of these supplementary items is a useful guide in plotting shifts in international latitudes and, ultimately, policy decisions.

At the recent conference, the Iraqi group proposed a debate on lifting the economic sanctions imposed on that country. At six of the last seven conferences, the Iraqi group has submitted this subject, but on the first three occasions the leader of the delegation had made a short speech and withdrawn the proposal without forcing a lengthy roll call vote. At both the Paris conference in March 1994 and the Copenhagen conference in September 1994, the support of the Iraqi proposal was around 200 votes, but at the recent conference this support increased by almost 50 per cent to 290. It is instructive to note that new support came from North Korea, Indonesia and Uzbekistan, which cast all their votes for the Iraqi proposal, along with some support from Bulgaria, China, Ghana, Malta, Pakistan, Philippines and San Marino.

On this occasion, there were eight proposals for the supplementary item, including one from Canada on "The importance of literacy and education in achieving equality for girls and women." Our delegation decided to amalgamate our topic with one submitted by Australia on "Parliamentary action for women's access to and participation in decision-making aimed at achieving true equality for women." The forthcoming World Conference on Women, to be held in Beijing in September of this year, had influenced both our delegations to propose a subject relating to the status of women. Happily, I can report that our joint subjects were selected as the supplementary item. Ms Ringette-Maltais served as the Canadian representative on the drafting committee.

At the Madrid conference there was also debate on "The general political, economic and social situation in the world." Madame Dalphond-Guiral, representing the official opposition, spoke about nationalism in the world context.

I used this opportunity to speak about the importance of reforming the United Nations Security Council. Among the issues raised in my address were the basic criteria for membership in the Security Council. I believe that the council should include, at least in some capacity, those countries prepared and able to contribute to emergency situations. It seems only fair and reasonable that countries which support and participate in peacekeeping operations ought to be involved in the decisions affecting their troops.

Throughout 1995, all eyes will be turned to the United Nations as its 50 years of achievements are recognized. Reform of the Security Council will be a tangible way to celebrate this fiftieth anniversary.

I would also like to mention the report of the IPU Committee on the Human Rights of Parliamentarians. As you are aware, the Canadian group has been very active in the work of this committee. Our colleague Senator Neiman, who was instrumental in its establishment, was a member for a number of years. During the Madrid conference, the violations of the rights of 66 members or former members of Parliament in 11 countries were brought to the attention of the delegates. The 66 cases were: one from Albania, one from Bulgaria, one from Burundi, six from Columbia, one from Honduras, one from Indonesia, two from the Maldives, 21 from Myanmar — formerly Burma — six from Nigeria, three from Togo and 23 from Turkey.

The Inter-Parliamentary Union was established in 1889 to promote the concept of peace and cooperation among all peoples. One of its fundamental objectives is to foster contact, coordination and the exchange of experience among parliamentarians. Although we have always tried to encourage parliamentary dialogue at these international fora, I believe that our recent experience at the Madrid conference demonstrates the value of parliamentary associations. During a time of confrontation among our respective governments, we were able, as parliamentarians, to build bridges with our Spanish colleagues and to continue to seek constructive links with them. Such is the merit of these international meetings.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

TELEFILM CANADA

CUTS IN FUNDING OF ABITIBI-TÉMISCAMINGUE INTERNATIONAL FILM FESTIVAL

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, under its new action plan, Telefilm Canada intends to divest itself of the Abitibi-Témiscamingue international film festival over a three-year period. The festival receives an annual subsidy of $50,000.

This top calibre film event has proven that a region can play a prominent role in the cultural scene. This festival is the expression of a collective action and of success that extends well beyond borders. It has earned its place on the calendar of Canadian festivals. The festival's approach to things has made it, with time, a formidable economic, cultural and touristic vehicle for the region, for which I have a special fondness, having lived there for 45 years.

The action plan confirms Telefilm Canada's lack of interest in audiences outside metropolitan areas. Telefilm Canada is putting more effort and money into developing markets for Canadian film abroad than into developing audiences in medium and small cities in Canada.

Its ambitions to globalize Canadian cinema should not be at the expense of the Canadian public in the regions. True culture must first take root within its own country. These measures fail to take into account a huge potential market — taxpayers who have the misfortune not to live in the major urban centres.

Telefilm Canada's decision to withdraw progressively from this event reveals real disdain for regional audiences. This decision sounds the death knell for 19 years of small victories gained through the efforts, volunteer support and imagination of people who believed in the life and growth of their region.

The amounts Telefilm Canada contributed to the Abitibi-Témiscamingue international film festival were peanuts in terms of its overall budget. Everyone has to do their part; it is a matter of justice and fairness. Some festivals, which are heavily subsidized, remain, others go. This festival, however, is a long-standing one, which has served the Canadian film industry well, at little cost. If cuts are to be made, they should be made to all festivals equally. That is just good common sense.

Canada's regions are far from the offices of Telefilm Canada. Such offices are often built out of wood from Abitibi-Témiscamingue and decorated with copper objects from there as well.

FIREARMS LEGISLATION

COMMENTS OF LIBERAL MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, today's reading of comments by Liberal members in the House relative to Bill C-68 is from Ethel Blondin-Andrew, Secretary of State (Training and Youth), who says the following:

> Aboriginal people, for instance, are worried about the potential infringement on their treaty rights. Shooters are concerned with the restrictions placed on their sport and outfitters are worried about the impact the legislation will have on their business. These are all serious concerns which if not addressed could pose some serious hardships in the North and of course in other parts of Canada.
> The potential infringement the legislation could have on treaty rights and its impact on the traditional aboriginal way of life are threats that aboriginal people have sought to prevent since the signing of their treaties. Treaties were signed to ensure the protection of aboriginal rights that were then entrenched in the Constitution under section 35 of the Charter.
> As treaty rights go or as rights go in aboriginal country, rights are considered and treated as absolute but in the reality of the political world and in the name of concessions, compromise and goodwill we are looking at some half-measures.
> According to the Sparrow decision of 1990 hunting and fishing rights have been recognized by the Canadian government. It would appear to be damaging to the fragile relationship being forged between the aboriginal people and the Government of Canada if the bill infringed on these rights.

This is the concern being expressed. However I have assurances that the legislation will not infringe on these rights. Special considerations have been given to sustenance hunters and in particular aboriginal hunters who make up a large portion of all sustenance hunters.

Let me, for instance, express the concerns brought forward by Mr. Sam Gargan, member of the Legislative Assembly for the Northwest Territories for Deh Cho, who said:

> ...I also believe that the legislation, as it now stands, violates treaty rights as guaranteed in the Charter of Rights and may well be in contradiction of the Sparrow decision—To this end I can virtually assure you that should this legislation proceed as written, there would be a court challenge from Canada's aboriginal community.

• (1340)

These are the words of a member of the Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories, the majority of whose constituents are aboriginals...

Through consultations with First Nation Métis and Inuit, it is my hope that an amendment can be made to eliminate the cost of transferring and registration of firearms by sustenance hunters, as these costs would be an economic hardship on people who cannot afford to buy their food and use their firearms as a tool to feed themselves and their communities.

It is felt that it would be an additional economic hardship in a community that already has quite a large group of unemployed people who rely on other sources to continue living and surviving.

The minister goes on to state:

> There are many hunting, outfitting and tourist businesses in the North and other parts of Canada that depend on hunters from other countries for their business. They have voiced several concerns that Bill C-68 will impose further restrictions on the entry of those foreign hunters and are concerned that they will choose to go to another country to hunt where the laws are not so restricting.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I think we have just witnessed a most unusual procedure. For a number of sittings now, Senator Ghitter has read into the Senate record a series of statements made in the House of Commons on a topic relating to legislation that is currently before the House of Commons. I do not quarrel with raising such a matter as an issue before the Senate when it is done properly. What I do find unusual is that we are now in a period of our work called Senators' Statements. Senator Ghitter is not making a statement or a series of statements arising from ideas he has sifted through his brain, or which originated in his brain. He is merely placing on the record a series of quotes.

I would not object if, in the course of picking his brains, Senator Ghitter gave occasional quotes from newspapers and statements from the other place. However, the very notion of Senators' Statements is being prostituted by the way in which Senator Ghitter uses this period. We can all read the House of Commons record. We can all read newspapers. We want to know what Senator Ghitter thinks. Does he think? That is what we wish to know.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry, honourable senators, but a senator's statement is not a subject for debate.

Senator Ghitter: Honourable senators, would a point of privilege be recognized?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

TRANSPORT

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN MINISTERS ON DIVERSION OF FUNDS FROM NOVA SCOTIA HIGHWAY PROJECT—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, about a week ago in the other place, the Minister of Transport, under some pressure from the Leader of the Conservative Party, admitted that he and his colleague the Minister of Public Works had indeed had certain conversations and discussions with respect to the diversion of funds from the critical highway project in Nova Scotia to a highway project in Minister Dingwall's riding.

So that there is no confusion, and that we not get led too far down various paths, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate arrange to have tabled before us, or brought to our attention, all of the relevant documents, internal memoranda, and correspondence associated with those discussions and the ultimate decision to divert funds from one program to another?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be pleased to take my honourable friend's request to my colleagues for whatever relevant material might be available. I am not exactly sure what he is referring to in terms of conversations, but I will be pleased, as always, to pass his questions on to my colleagues.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—PROPRIETY OF INTERVENTION BY MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, the Minister of Transportation in Nova Scotia, Richard Mann, is on record as stating the following about Minister Dingwall's role in initiating the diversion of funds from the so-called "Death Valley" area of the Trans-Canada Highway to the respective ministers' ridings, and I quote:

> He talked to us about it, and we talked with him about it, and we all agreed it's a worthwhile project to do.

"A worthwhile project to do", of course, is the diversion of funds from one program to another — quite illegally, I would think.

Given the position of Mr. Dingwall and Mr. Young that this is strictly a provincial matter, notwithstanding the fact that 50 per cent of the money comes from federal sources, is Mr. Dingwall's intervention in this matter appropriate and proper?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I believe I indicated last evening, the Minister of Transport has said in the House of Commons that throughout the duration of these agreements with Nova Scotia and other provinces, it is not uncommon to have a provincial government come to the federal government seeking a reallocation of the funding. That is not an uncommon procedure at all, since it is the provincial governments who hold the responsibility for setting funding priorities under this program. It is done through a consensus of the appropriate ministers. I believe the Minister of Transport indicated that very thing to the other place in his responses on May 16.

However, as I did last night and as I will do again today, I will refer my friend's questions to the Minister of Transport and do my best to come up with a comprehensive answer.

• (1350)

Senator Forrestall: A management committee, comprising federal and provincial appointees, was charged with the responsibility of managing the expenditure of those funds and of determining what is a proper expenditure with regard to cost sharing and so on. Would the leader obtain the documents and correspondence, so that I may determine whether the management committee's opinion in this matter was sought, and, if so, whether they agreed or dissented?

The difficulty that many of us see is that we could have a spate of toll roads on the Trans-Canada Highway from one end of this country to the other, if we are not careful.

Senator Fairbairn: I appreciate my honourable friend's concern, and I will again seek whatever is available to satisfy his questions.

My friend will know that the question of private participation in highway development has been raised in British Columbia and I believe is currently under consideration with regard to a stretch of highway in Ontario. This proposal is not precedent setting.

The primary issues with regard to Highway 104 of concern to all members of this house are safety and the swiftness with which the upgrading and development can take place. I am advised that a public-private partnership can accelerate the speed with which this highway is repaired and upgraded to meet the safety standards, which is the most fundamental and desirable outcome to be achieved from these discussions.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—INTRODUCTION OF TOLL BOOTHS ON TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, my question concerns the privatization of the Trans-Canada Highway in Nova Scotia. Subsequent to the diversion of the strategic highway improvement program funds from Highway 104 to the riding of the Minister of Public Works and Government Services, the provincial government passed legislation which will see the introduction of a toll road to finance the upgrading of that stretch of the Trans-Canada Highway.

If my understanding is correct, this is the first time in Canada that the Trans-Canada Highway will have a toll booth on it. Would the leader confirm if that in fact is the case?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): As I said in my earlier response, the question of tolls has been raised in British Columbia and in Ontario, but I shall check to verify the parameters of my friend's question.

Senator Comeau: Honourable senators, I want to be absolutely specific on what I am asking. I am not questioning whether any province has the right to put toll roads in place. In fact, quite a few provinces do have them. I have no quarrel with toll roads.

My understanding is that, according to the original agreements, the Trans-Canada Highway would not have tolls. It was to be a highway linking Canadians from coast to coast, and there would be no tolls.

My question is: Has there been a change in policy and is the Government of Canada now authorizing tolls on the Trans-Canada Highway? Is this the start of the privatization of the Trans-Canada Highway?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, as my honourable friend will know, I am not an expert on this particular question. Rather than speculating, I shall obtain a factual answer for him.

On the question of the highway concerning us, I believe that two-thirds of the money in the program has gone towards the improvement and the upgrading of Highway 104.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—FULFILMENT OF RED BOOK PROMISES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, if some see this matter of the "Death Valley" highway as a regional concern, I see the problem as a national concern.

Although the Leader of the Government is perhaps not an expert on highways, she is probably an expert on the Red Book promises. I would like to quote a section of that Red Book from Chapter 6, and the title of the chapter is very telling: "Governing with Integrity."

> People are disappointed by and irritated with the poor quality of services provided by many public institutions, given the cost of government and the taxes that governments are taking out of citizens' pockets.

That is a fair comment.

In light of Nova Scotia's toll road response to the "Death Valley" diversion initiated by the federal Minister of Public Works, will the Leader of the Government ask that minister to remain true to Liberal election promises and have the "Death Valley" fund diversion reversed?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will certainly pass on my honourable friend's comments to the ministers who are concerned with this issue.

The state of that highway is of great concern to all of us, as it would be were it in any other part of the country. The objective is to get that highway upgraded as quickly as possible. That is the fundamental concern of the Minister of Transport and, I assume, of all of those connected with this issue in the Nova Scotia government.

[Later]

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—NOVA SCOTIA—RETURN OF FUNDS TO DESIGNATED HIGHWAY PROJECT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, my question is supplementary to questions already raised by Senators Forestall and Comeau. It deals with the "Death Valley" diversion project. Could the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate give assurances to this house that the $26 million will be returned for its original intended purpose and for the particular project?

I might remind the honourable leader that there is a precedent for this in relation to the National Defence Adjustment Fund. She will recall from the media that $10 million was removed from that fund. Under pressure from many of the members of Parliament from Nova Scotia, those funds were returned. Can we have a similar assurance in relation to the "Death Valley" diversion project?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the assurance I can give to my friend is that I will pass on his plea to my colleagues.

JUSTICE

GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION—AVOWAL BY THE PROVINCES NOT TO FINANCE REGISTRATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest: Honourable senators, on the weekend, the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Jean Chrétien, was in Quebec City. He called on my friend the separatist mayor of Quebec City, Mr. L'Allier. Mr. Chrétien made some remarks I am in full agreement with, because he defended the administration of justice as a matter of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

My question concerns the bill on firearms. You know that the Government of Quebec has already indicated its intention not to pay for the registration process provided by the bill. Three other provinces today endorsed the position taken by the Government of Quebec. Through its premier, one of the provinces, British Columbia, indicated that it would not participate in financing the firearms registration system either.

Is it still the policy of the Government of Canada to impose this financial aspect of the implementation of the bill on the provinces when, to date, four provinces, including Quebec, have refused to spend additional sums in order to implement this bill?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to check with the Minister of Justice on this question. I believe that in the past there have been agreements and arrangements on financing for gun control or these kinds of issues, and those arrangements will probably be extended in the future. However, I would like to get the facts for my friend.

• (1400)

GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES PRIOR TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, by way of supplementary, may I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to report to us on what consultations were conducted by the Minister of Justice with the provinces before presentation of his bill, which would require the cooperation of the provinces in its administration?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Minister of Justice, over an extended period of time, undertook widespread consultations across the country. I will try to get a precise reading on his discussions with provincial colleagues.

GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION—FINANCIAL SELF-SUFFICIENCY OF REGISTRATION PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, when the Leader of the Government is making inquiries relative to the gun control legislation, could she determine whether or not the program is to be self-sufficient? A number of the debaters in the House have suggested that the program will be self-sufficient, which means that, on registration, the gun owners will pay sufficient moneys to cover the cost of the project. Other arguments indicate that that will not be the case. I would appreciate knowing whether it is intended that the program should be self-sufficient, or whether the taxpayers will be paying anything with respect to registration for the gun control program.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is an area where the comments have been wide-ranging. The Minister of Justice has spoken precisely on this issue, and I will obtain a copy of his words for you.

GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION—COMMENTS OF PRIME MINISTER ON PROVINCIAL RESPONSIBILITY—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate could clarify a statement made by the Prime Minister recently. He said that it was the responsibility of the federal government to pass criminal laws, and that it was the responsibility of the provinces to enforce those laws without question, even in cases where there is a huge financial question mark. My question is in line with that of Senator Rivest's. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate give us some clarification on this point? Is it the position of the Prime Minister he will not negotiate with the provinces? In other words, that the provinces must do this, regardless of cost or consequences?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will add my honourable friend's question to my list.

It is the policy of this government that, on the various issues that require federal-provincial cooperation, there is continuing negotiation, discussion and consultation with the provinces.

THE ENVIRONMENT

FEDERAL MANAGEMENT OF RADIOACTIVE WASTE MATERIAL— REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL OF CANADA— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Janis Johnson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government about the recent report of the Auditor General of Canada on federal management of radioactive waste, the conclusions of which are very disturbing.

The report indicates that Ottawa has so far spent $370 million on research to find a safe way to dispose of high-level nuclear waste. Yet, after having spent this money and conducted research for many years, no disposal technique has yet been approved. As was stated in the report, decisions must still be taken in Canada on whether and how to proceed to a disposal solution. The report also indicates that Canada lags behind other countries in this area, including Sweden.

What are the government's plans for the disposal of high-level radioactive waste in the future? Does the government have any plans for moving Canada's high-level radioactive waste program forward after March 1997, when the current federal funding to the program runs out? It is all very blurry right now. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate clarify any of this for me?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be pleased to take my honourable friend's question to the Minister of the Environment and try to obtain a specific answer for her.

HEALTH

REPORT ON TOBACCO PACKAGING—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, my question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate relates to an interesting publication prepared at the request of Health Canada and released last week — a publication which contains interesting photos and even more interesting observations. It is under the title "When Packages Cannot Speak: Possible Impacts of Plain and Generic Packaging of Tobacco Products. Expert Panel Report Prepared at the Request of Health Canada."

My question has three parts: First, how much did the Department of Health pay the panel of experts to produce this report? Second, contained in the report is what they call a visual image study. Can the leader find out who conducted that study? Third, how much were these experts paid for conducting that study, which incidentally contains a photograph of an honourable member from my province who sits in the other place.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be pleased to obtain the answers to my honourable friend's questions. I know the concern and urgency that he feels.

VISITOR IN GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before I call the Orders of the Day, I would like to draw your attention to the presence in the gallery of the distinguished Minister of Justice for the Yukon Territories, the Honourable Doug Phillips.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

ORDERS OF THE DAY

VETERANS REVIEW AND APPEAL BOARD BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Anne C. Cools moved the second reading of Bill C-67, to establish the Veterans Review and Appeal Board, to amend the Pension Act, to make consequential amendments to other Acts and to repeal the Veterans Appeal Board Act.

She said: Honourable senators, I am very pleased today to begin second reading on Bill C-67, a bill that promises to bring many benefits to Canada's veterans.

Honourable senators, one year ago a commitment was made to veterans by the Secretary of State for Veterans, the Honourable Lawrence MacAuley, that the government would reduce by half the time that it takes for a veteran to receive a disability pension. While numerous administrative change were made in the last few years to streamline the process, the legislation before us represents a giant step towards achieving the objective of reducing processing time. Bill C-67 will effectuate the measures needed to make the pension system more efficient and deliver pension benefits to veterans in half the time.

Before I describe the bill in greater detail, I should like to begin by giving a summary of how the veterans disability pension system came into being. Dating back to the First World War, the Government of Canada has a proud history of recognizing its obligations to servicemen and women injured in the line of duty.

Since the advent of a disability pension system for veterans, there has always been a laudable preoccupation with fairness and generosity. This was best expressed by the 1971 changes to the Pension Act, which developed the pension system that is in place today. While today's system is complex and slow, it was designed to be fair, to allow veterans ongoing access to the system through a two-level appeal process, and to resolve any doubts about the validity of a claim in the veteran's favour. An unfortunate result, however, is that the system has proven inadequate in dealing in a timely manner with the more complex and urgent needs of an aging clientele.

Honourable senators, in recognition of the fact that the system needed improvement, several studies were conducted, including the McCracken study in 1982, that of the Marin committee in 1984, another by the Nielsen task force in 1985, and a major pension evaluation study in 1992.

• (1410)

As recently as October 1994, the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology studied the issue of disability pension reform. Under the chairmanship of Senator Jack Marshall, whose work on behalf of veterans is renowned, that committee heard from many veterans' organizations and officials. They expressed frustration that a system designed to be generous and fair had become so complex and unworkable.

Our committee examined the current problems with the pension system, and also assessed the reform proposals from the Department of Veterans Affairs. These proposals form the basis of this bill.

A number of recommendations on pension reform were made in the report entitled, "Keeping the Faith". I am pleased to say that several of the most significant reform proposals made by the subcommittee are incorporated into this bill. I will draw these to the attention of honourable senators during the course of these remarks.

I want to describe for honourable senators the substance of this bill and how it will address the needs of veterans. It will reduce the time by half in which veterans will know if their applications for disability pensions have been approved. This legislation gives Veterans Affairs Canada the authority to make first level decisions. Area counsellors from the department, the same people who now counsel veterans on their health care needs, will be in a position to help veterans begin their applications for a disability pension. Staff from the district office will then either take the initial work of the counsellor or, in response to a request from a client, prepare a full and complete application for a disability pension.

Under this new system, there is greater awareness that first applications must be as complete as possible and that all relevant evidence must be collected. This is one of the key reforms the government hopes will reduce not only turnaround times but the number of appeals. Having the department rule on first decisions is a priority for the Secretary of State for Veterans, a measure which is supported by a recommendation in the report of the Senate subcommittee.

This bill also focuses the efforts of the lawyers in the Bureau of Pensions Advocates on preparing appeals for veterans. Lawyers can add to the appeal process their expertise where there may be complex legal issues involved. This reform more closely allies Canada with the veteran disability pension systems in the United States, Australia and the United Kingdom.

Honourable senators, I want to stress that the disability pension process was never meant to be a legal debate. A disability pension application is based on proof of service, a medical report on the claimed disability, and a statement or record linking the disability to the service. A lawyer is not needed to compile that information. However, since the client may — and often does — require counselling and assistance in collecting information, the department will continue to provide that counselling and help. Legal expertise is only required if and when there is something to challenge, namely, an unfavourable decision.

Another major component of this bill is the merging of the Canadian Pension Commission and the Veterans Appeal Board into one appeal body with two levels of appeal. This new board will be called the Veterans Review and Appeal Board. This key reform is also supported by the recommendations of the Senate subcommittee on Veterans Affairs.

Honourable senators, the government has consistently maintained that, despite the dramatic reforms being proposed, all veterans' benefits will remain intact. This bill will not take away any of those benefits. Veterans still have the right to a two-tiered appeal process. They can still count on the free help and expertise of qualified lawyers if their application goes to appeal. In making the appeal system more efficient, we will reduce the amount of time that it takes for veterans to receive their pensions.

Honourable senators in this chamber are well aware of the debt of gratitude that Canada owes its veterans. Over the past year, it has become obvious that Canadians from all walks of life and from all across the country are taking time to reflect on what our veterans have done to provide the freedom that we sometimes take for granted today. Many members will have noticed, for example, the cover story from the recent issue of Maclean's magazine entitled, "The War Generation". The cover reads, "Celebrating the Canadians who won the Second World War and Went on to Build a Nation".

The article tells the story of some of the individual men and women who served their country during those terrible years; Canadians who recall fighting Nazi submarines in the North Atlantic; Canadians who recall how they had to crawl through minefields prodding the ground with bayonets; Canadians who faced death in the skies over far-off countries; Canadians who reminisce about losing childhood friends to the horrors of war; Canadians who endured months in prisoner-of-war camps.

Honourable senators, one cannot help but be moved by these stories. It is very important during this fiftieth anniversary of the end of the Second World War that we encourage our veterans to share their stories. Their dedication and their sacrifice will inspire future generations.

However, at the same time that we honour our veterans and ask them to share with us their experiences, we must not forget our obligation to them as well. Canada has a pension system designed to help veterans cope with the disabilities they received in the war. Many veterans have now reached a point in their lives when old war wounds are causing problems. They have reached the age when a disability pension will make a big difference in their quality of life.

Honourable senators, the legislation before us will help ensure that veterans get their pensions sooner. That is a worthy objective; one I know that all senators on both sides of this chamber share.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I congratulate Senator Cools on her exposition of Bill C-67.

Bill C-67 deals with the reform of the system of benefits put into place to aid those veterans seeking financial assistance as a result of injuries or disabilities incurred while serving their country during time of war and, more recently, during peacekeeping activities in different parts of the world.

As Senator Cools has pointed out, Canada has a long and proud tradition of looking after its people. Its veterans' pension system is an example for all the world. Over the years, adjustments have been made and reforms adopted in a continuing effort to ensure prompt, courteous and empathetic service.

Despite any reservations I have about Bill C-67, it is part of that tradition. However, while Canada's veterans' pension system is an example for the rest of the world, it is not perfect. Like any other bureaucratic system, it has its problems and its drawbacks. The most important of these is the amount of time it currently takes to receive and process a pension application. This ranges anywhere from 18 months to 36 months.

Honourable senators may or may not be aware that the average age of today's World War II veterans is almost 75. With this in mind, you will perhaps agree with me that obliging these people to wait for a minimum of a year and a half before a decision is rendered on their pension application is a little much. The need for some sort of reform is clearly here. The question is what kind of reform and how best to implement it.

You will forgive me here if my remarks seem somewhat truncated. I do not wish to get into a detailed explanation of the workings of the veterans' pension system at this point. I simply wish to outline as succinctly as possible the main principles of the bill and where I feel some of its major shortcomings are found. Other matters can be discussed in committee.

To address the problems of delay in the veterans' pension system, the government is proposing three main changes: First, it proposes to transfer the overall responsibility for veterans' pensions from the semi-independent Canadian Pension Commission to the Department of Veterans Affairs. Second, it proposes to restrict the activities of what is known as the Bureau of Pensions Advocates. Again, this is a semi-independent organization which provides veterans with independent, confidential counselling and advice concerning pension applications, as well as representing them in cases of appeal. The government wants to limit the activities of pension advocates to the appeal process only.

The third change involves merging the present Canadian Pension Commission and the Veterans Appeal Board into a new entity to be called the Veterans Review and Appeal Board. This body will be responsible for hearing appeals concerning veterans' entitlements to financial assistance, as well as disputes over the amounts awarded. In a nutshell, honourable senators, that is what Bill C-67 is all about. The government hopes that, together, these changes will streamline the veterans' pension system and reduce the present backlog of over 13,000 cases. It is a laudable goal and one with which I agree.

However, I am not entirely convinced that the government has chosen the best method to achieve that end. I am not alone in this. I have read the debates and the testimony in the other place. It is clear that there are genuine concerns as to whether this bill can accomplish its purpose of saving time. When pared to its essentials, this debate becomes one of structure versus process. Should the government be proposing, as it is, to restructure the pension system, at least in its visible parts, or should the government be striving to ameliorate the process of delivery by reducing overlap, setting attainable targets, insisting on greater efficiency and so forth? This, I think, is the essential question for the committee.

I am also concerned about the proposed concentration of discretionary power in the hands of the minister. It was precisely to get away from such a situation that semi-independent bodies like the Canadian Pension Commission were organized in the first place. Now the government is proposing to return to the old ways of doing things. In so doing, it is opening the door to outside interference, including the possibility of political manipulation and economic pressures related to a particular government's agenda. This in turn jeopardizes the integrity, impartiality and principles of the veteran pension system.

Another concern I have is that the government is pushing ahead with this bill before all the changes necessary to ensure its success have been properly implemented. I take as an example the form filled out by all veterans seeking assistance. Everyone agrees it needs to be redesigned. Yet, according to the testimony in the other place, only "a very preliminary draft has been pulled together." This leads me to wonder just how many more examples there are. If they are numerous, why is the government pushing to get this bill adopted?

My final concern is in regard to the human cost of this bill. I mentioned earlier that there are presently some 13,000 veterans awaiting decisions on their pension applications. Will the government's new system result in a significant saving of time? Will this bill really help speed things up, or will it result in further bureaucratic delay as a new system and new people are put into place?

That is not a purely academic question. I have before me a copy of The Legion magazine for April 1995. In the back is a rather sad section entitled, "The Last Post". I counted this morning and, as recorded in April, 765 veterans are no longer with us. I think my point is clear; the number of veterans is diminishing with each month and each year. There are 10 veterans of World War II in this chamber. There are none in the House of Commons.

Before adopting this bill, we must take a serious look at the provisions in order to ensure that, once it is in effect, it works as reliably and efficiently as possible. In the meantime, I reiterate my support for the principle of the bill, despite my concerns with certain of its provisions. Once in committee, we will discuss and develop our concerns.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I would like to thank Senator Cools for her introductory remarks.

I am left in the very awkward position of following my colleague Senator MacDonald who always delivers a most interesting address.

During World War II, over 1 million men and 50,000 women served in Canada's armed forces. They served with distinction in all theatres of war. Today, approximately 500,000 veterans survive. As Senator MacDonald pointed out, their average age is approximately 75. Their numbers are decreasing rapidly.

Veterans Affairs Canada has 150,000 "clients", as they prefer to call them. Of that number, 96,000 veterans are in receipt of some form of disability pension or pension as prisoners of war. Sixty thousand clients are survivors of deceased veterans. To emphasize how rapidly the number of veterans is decreasing, it is expected that by the turn of the century survivors will exceed the number of veterans receiving disability pensions.

Officials in Veterans Affairs Canada, or DVA as I still prefer to call it, have told me that by the end of this year they anticipate 5,000 fewer veterans will be drawing benefits than at the beginning of the year. These statistics show the need to act quickly. However, in our urgency to pass legislation to assist, we must take a careful look at what we are doing.

Many bureaucrats, especially those who are involved in the restructuring of government departments, suggest that DVA will not exist as a separate entity in three to five years' time. Rather, it will become an appendage to some other department. In this regard, I have some concern about the tendency to link Veterans Affairs with the Department of National Defence.

Military brass have a great deal on their plate now as they try to purchase new equipment on a reduced budget. I do not foresee them spending a great deal of effort on the problems of veterans and their survivors. It is my preference that the department remain in existence as long as possible. However, if a change must be made, Veterans Affairs Canada should be linked with Health Canada. That department has much experience in health care which would greatly assist the further success of the Veterans Independence Program. As our veterans grow older, their wartime injuries become more aggravating and painful. In many cases, this added stress can bring on mental problems.

Politicians are often faced with the difficult task of explaining a particular situation to an individual who is affected by it. For me, the most difficult subject to address is that of pension rejection. A veteran will recite for me his record of service. He tells me that he gave up four or five years of his young life, that he is now 75 and living in pain. He needs help but he feels no one gives a damn. I have never been able to give a satisfactory answer to any veteran with those concerns. If anyone knows of a proper response, I would certainly appreciate learning about it.

Presently, a backlog of 13,500 cases is waiting to be adjudicated, plus an anticipated 15,000 who have been refused on previous occasions. With passage of this bill, those veterans who have been refused will reapply, in the hope of receiving better treatment.

Presently, a veteran may write a note stating that he is applying for a pension. That note is then passed to the Bureau of Pension Advocates. First, a file must be created, which takes about 10 weeks. I believe that period of time could be shortened. The medical records are stored in Ottawa. Most medical records consist of 150 to 200 pages. The Bureau of Pension Advocates then requests the records, and a group of people photostat the entire file and forward it to Charlottetown. The advocates then review the file, and decide whether or not there is basis for a claim on one condition or possibly more.

The application then passes to the précis writers, who review the file and make notations on it. The précis is then passed to a medical advisory board, consisting of 12 physicians, who then make recommendations. Later, I will discuss both groups further, but they require, on average, a total of three months for their deliberations.

What follows then is the entitlement decision. The case comes before the Canadian Pension Commission, which requires approximately one month for its deliberations. This is followed by a medical assessment. The veteran who has received a pension attends the regional office. The medical officer examines him and decides whether he is 20 per cent or 40 per cent disabled. However, even that decision is not enough. The matter must then be referred back to the medical advisory board in Charlottetown, and in turn, that board checks on the assessment of the regional medical officer. Here again, time is wasted.

Veterans Affairs Canada takes approximately one month to act upon the recommendations of the medical board, and recommend the payment due to the veteran. This recommendation is then forwarded to Supply and Services Canada, who takes approximately one month to forward the cheque to the veteran.

In appeal matters, two to two and a half years can be added to the delay. Therefore, there is a delay of a year and a half, and in the case of an appeal, two and a half years, and the average age of the veteran is 75. At those rates of delay, many veterans will not see their claims processed.

The précis writers and the medical advisory board have been favourite topics of mine for years. The précis writers look through a file to determine the particular condition or disability under which that veteran is applying for a pension. If they do not find it, and there is a comment at the end of the file which says, "No complaints on discharge", then the veteran must fight for his pension.

What seems to have been forgotten is that, at the time of discharge of most veterns, the medical officers were extremely busy tending to the wounded and the sick. They did not have time to keep a complete set of records. It is quite common to find items missing. It certainly is no fault of the medical officers in the field.

After the war, people were being discharged at the rate of about 3,000 a day. Those who were released early had the best hope for a job. Those who were returning to college or university wanted to be discharged in time to go to college in September, and the veterans who were buying farms or fishing gear wanted to get their fall ploughing done and get their gear ready for the next season. Here again was a reason for saying that there were no complaints.

The medical officer on discharge often would look at the veteran and say, "Can you see me?" The veteran would reply "Yes," and the eyesight would be checked off as being in order. The medical officer would then lower his voice and say, "Can you hear me?" When the veteran would respond "Yes," the hearing would be checked off as being in order. Veterans were rushed through that procedure, in many cases. On the other hand, if a complaint was registered, the examination and referral to hospital was excellent.

The medical advisory board is a small, incestuous group who make up their own rules. They report to no one. They pass on their recommendations. They have never seen the patient, and yet they will overrule the regional medical officer, who has seen the patient, as well as the outside specialists who have seen the patient. Each medical officer on the medical advisory board is expected to review at least 1,000 cases per year. In each case, they write up a report to be passed on to the Canadian Pension Commission. They proofread it, sign it, and send it on.

Those who have served on the medical advisory board tell me that, with all of their other duties, they are lucky if they have 45 minutes to deal with a veteran's file. This is most unfortunate. After all these years, a veteran should be entitled to receive more than a 20- or 45-minute consultation from a medical officer who is making such a decision. I often say that the opinion of the précis writer and the medical advisory board is as unchangeable as the laws of the Medes and the Persians.

Honourable senators, I have several concerns with Bill C-67. The first one relates to the power granted to the minister. I will not go into any further detail on that today because Senator MacDonald beat me to the punch, except to mention that the minister is given a great deal of power, and there is no right of appeal. I think it is wrong to grant that much authority to one individual and make no provision for appeal.

Clause 5(1) of the legislation states, in part, that:

> ...the Minister has full power to decide on all matters and questions relating to the award, increase, decrease, suspension or cancellation of any pension or other payment under this Act and to the recovery of any overpayment that has been made.

Here I see an opportunity for political interference. The Canadian Pension Commission was established to prevent this from happening. However, around election time, I can see a Liberal member taking the Secretary of State for Veterans Affairs out behind the curtain and saying, "Look, things are a bit tight in my riding. I need the support of this family, and one of them is very annoyed because he did not get his pension." The Secretary may say, "Well, I cannot do much about that." The Liberal member then says, "Oh, yes, you can because the bill gives you the final say in any award." If that clause remains in the bill, I think we will lose a lot of the equality and fairness that exists in the act.

Perhaps I am being unduly pessimistic, but as the government attempts to reduce the deficit and balance the budget, all departments will be cut back. No government will want to say it lopped $100 million off Veterans Affairs. However, the Minister of Finance will call the Secretary of State and say, "I want the $100 million taken off, and here is how you can do it. In the month of June, 1,000 clients died. Now you can replace —

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Honourable Senator Phillips that unfortunately his time has elapsed.

Honourable senators, is there unanimous agreement that the honourable senator be allowed to continue with his remarks?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Phillips: I thank honourable senators. I have attempted to condense my notes, but when I look at my headings, I keep expanding. I will attempt to cut back on my expansions.

The Minister of Finance will say, "A thousand clients died in June. Replace them with 800, but do not replace them until September or October. That way we will hide the decrease."

I have a name for clause 47. I call it the "Major Douglas McGowan M.C. clause." Major McGowan was divorced. Five years later he married the widow of another Military Cross recipient. In 1991, I believe the second wife was declared the widow for pension purposes. However, the matter kept coming back and coming back. It is of some interest that Major McGowan's daughter, Rose Ellen, is the wife of Premier Ghiz. Recently, the Canadian Pension Commission divided the pension between them. Major McGowan did not receive his disability until his second marriage.

I will be raising this matter in committee, but I want to make this observation to the Senate: A court settlement was reached in 1981. After all this time, I do not think Veterans Affairs should be altering that court decision. If we start doing that, we will lose a lot of time that could be spent clearing up this tremendous backlog. I hope that we will escape that scenario.

The next point I wish to touch on is the removal of the involvement of the pension advocate in the first application. The pension advocate does a tremendous amount of research. For example, navy Corvettes did not have doctors on board, but rather medical technicians, who perhaps did not know a great deal about record keeping. Pension advocates are able to search ships' logs, find out who else was on the crew, and trace them to provide proof of the injury. The same service applies in army cases of shell shock or where shell fire damaged the hearing of an individual. Pension advocates can find out from the regimental diary or the archives whether these events did occur and quite often are able to obtain letters from the surviving officers to support the case.

I had better not forget the air force. Those on coastal command developed hearing problems. The Wellington bomber was taken out of service as a bomber and put in the coastal command. They flew at low altitudes. The Wellington leaked like a basket. The end of the propeller was only eight to ten inches from the head of the pilot. As a consequence of the long flights, they experienced a great deal of damage to their ears.

The Bureau of Pensions Advocates will still be available for appeals. However, pension advocates have been removed from the chain of command. They have no way of knowing whether the status of an application is positive or negative. I can find nothing in the act that requires that the veteran be notified that he can go to the BPA on appeal.

The department is gearing up to put this legislation into effect July 1. I have one question in that regard, and the sponsor of the bill may want to leave it for the committee: What happens to cases already in progress? The pension advocate has been working on these cases for three to four months. Does he quit on July 1? Does the veteran lose that benefit? These are things that we will find out at the committee stage of the bill.

One veteran pointed out to me that it is rather odd that Canada can provide free legal service for criminals, whether it is for murder, rape, theft or illegal immigration. Last year, the Province of Ontario spent $19 million in legal fees to assist illegal immigrants. Surely veterans are entitled to the same free legal assistance that is afforded to criminals or to illegal immigrants.

Bill C-67 replaces the members of the Canadian Pension Commission and the Veterans Appeal Board. Last year — and Senator Cools will remember this — Ms Whalen, Chairperson of the Veterans Appeal Board, stated that it takes one and one-half years to train a new member, and two years before she would trust a new member to chair a hearing. This bill removes all of the present members. That causes me some great concern. I should like to see the government retain some experienced members so that they can help out with the training of new members.

Honourable senators, I have a copy of the draft here to which Senator MacDonald referred. Some of the questions that were asked will be almost impossible to answer. This is an 11-page application. They ask for the names of the doctors visited and any specialists visited. I do not think too many members of this chamber could recall that information. Our population is very mobile now. The applicant may have lived in New Brunswick for two years, for 10 years in Ontario, and spent the rest of his time in Western Canada. He may have forgotten the name of the doctor, or in many cases the doctor has retired or is deceased. I had thought that we were to depend on the family physician's report, not the whole history from the time of discharge to the present time. I hope that we can get a better application form than the draft proposal that I am talking about here.

Presently, 30 per cent of the pensions are awarded on the first hearing, 70 per cent are awarded by the Canadian Pension Commission and 10 per cent are awarded by the Veterans Appeal Board. The hope is that 70 per cent will be awarded on the first application. However, I do not see that magic formula in this bill. I hope it is there, but I have gone through the bill thoroughly a number of times. I would hope that when the minister appears before the committee he will show us where that magic formula is, and how we can reverse the number.

Thank you, honourable senators, for granting me that extra time. When we get to committee stage, I hope that those of you who are not members of the committee will still feel free to attend.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Briefly, honourable senators, I wish to join with Senator MacDonald, Senator Phillips and Senator Cools to say a few words about this bill and the possibility of cutbacks.

I have been talking to people in the department, and I am concerned. Rumours are rife that the VIP program will be slashed. Many veterans have reached the age and the time of life when they cannot stay at home, and must be placed in nursing homes or in veterans homes. For those pensioners, the costs of those homes have increased from what it was seven or eight years ago. It has increased from $300 to $500 to $740 per month, and absorbs almost all of their old age pension — that is, if they have no other income and no war pension. Even if they had a Veterans Allowance pension, that does not count, because the Old Age Guaranteed Annual Income erases the Veterans Allowance income.

I am concerned about doing away at the first instance with the Bureau of Pensions Advocates. From the work that I have tried to do on behalf of veterans — and I must now do this myself, since Jack Marshall, who used to look after these matters for me, has retired — I must agree with Senator Phillips that the bureau is of great assistance to the older and less informed veterans. We were extremely fortunate that they went to war on our behalf 50 years ago and more.

When the committee begins its study of this bill, the members of that committee will hear from the minister. I would beg them to ensure at that time that monetary assistance is still available to the veterans. Ever since I became a legislator, I have had concerns about the power given to ministers. However, I have no concern about the Secretary of State for Veterans Affairs. I am sure that he will do all that he can on their behalf.

Those of us who remember our veterans must keep in mind that more and more the people in the bureaucracy are younger, and more and more of the people in the other House are less aware of the veterans' experiences during and after the war. As someone has said, there are no veterans left over in the other place, and without their presence, we soon forget. At the most, there are only 10 or 15 years left for those veterans. Some of them have only three, four or five years left. I have hesitated to speak on behalf of veterans because I felt at times that I was in a conflict of interest situation. I had two brothers who were veterans, but they have both died over the last two years.

I hope this house will ensure the protection of our few remaining veterans to whom we owe so much before this bill returns to the other place. I have had the pleasure of accompanying veterans to Korea, Holland and Belgium over the last few years. I am able to appreciate what those people went through. We must ensure that, in this day of budget cutting, this right wing agenda, whether it be a Liberal or a Conservative agenda, does not affect those surviving veterans today.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, there is a group of 200 veterans who presently reside in England. They are being asked to return to this country in order to receive their benefits. That may be a mistake, since they would cost us more in hospitalization here than if they stayed with their families in England. If it is a question of making sure they are still alive and are entitled to their benefits, this small number of 200 can easily be checked by diplomatic authorities in England. That should be done. These people have been asking for help for so long, and they should get it.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Cools, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

FIRST NATIONS GOVERNMENT BILL

SECOND READING—MOTION TO DEFER SPEAKER'S RULING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Tkachuk, seconded by the Honourable Senator Twinn, that the Order for the second reading of Bill S-10, An Act providing for self-government by the first nations of Canada, be postponed until the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples, to which is now referred the subject-matter of this Bill, has presented its Report on this order of reference to the Senate. — (Speaker's Ruling)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, on Wednesday, May 10, during proceedings on Bill S-10, Senator Gauthier initiated a series of exchanges among senators by asking what seemed to be two simple questions. As I understand it, he wanted to know where Bill S-10 would be if the motion of Senator Tkachuk were adopted. He also wanted to know if he would have an opportunity to raise a point of order respecting the bill.

After Senator Gauthier raised his questions, the Senate decided to revert to the point where Senator Tkachuk had obtained the leave of the Senate to move his motion, effectively nullifying the actions just taken by the Senate to postpone the second reading of the bill while its subject-matter was being examined by the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples.

Let me try now to address the questions raised by Senator Gauthier, and some other issues which also came up during the discussions that day.

Should the Senate decide to adopt the motion of Senator Tkachuk, it would be resolved that the bill stand on the Order Paper and remain there notwithstanding the provisions of rule 23, until such time as the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples reported on the bill's subject-matter. The order for second reading of Bill S-10 would be suspended, and it would be out of order to proceed to second reading before the committee reports, unless the Senate should decide to further amend its order.

Had the adoption of Senator Tkachuk's motion not been nullified, Senator Gauthier could not have raised his point of order at this stage without the consent of the Senate. This is because there would have been nothing before the Senate to which he could link his point of order. Having decided what to do for the time being with Bill S-10, the Senate would proceed to another item of business.

However, since the Senate has yet to dispose of Senator Tkachuk's debatable motion and it is still before us, Senator Gauthier would be within his rights to raise his point of order during debate on it. I trust that I have successfully answered the two questions posed by Senator Gauthier.

[Translation]

Certain other comments were made May 10 regarding these proceedings. They relate to the procedural acceptability of Senator Tkachuk's motion to refer the subject-matter of a bill to a committee while retaining the order for second reading of the same bill on the Order Paper.

According to one point of view, the proper procedure would be to order the discharge of the bill at the time that its subject-matter is referred to a committee. In support of this position, references were made to the practices of the other place.

It is my understanding that, when this procedure is used in the other place, it ordinarily takes the form of an amendment to the second reading motion of the bill, which seeks to refer the subject-matter and discharge the second reading motion from the Order Paper.

What Senator Tkachuk proposed on May 10, in this house, was a different procedure. When the Order of the Day for the second reading of Bill S-10 was called, he rose and asked for leave to move a motion that the bill's subject-matter be referred to the Aboriginal Peoples Committee and that the second reading of the bill be suspended until the committee presented its report. This type of motion, being an order of reference to a committee to examine the subject-matter of a bill, normally requires one day's notice according to Senate Rule 58(1)(e). However, since leave was requested and given, the notice requirement was waived.

As to the procedural acceptability of such a motion, I can find nothing in the Rules of the Senate which would prohibit it. To the contrary, I have found examples of various kinds in which the Senate referred the subject-matter of a bill to a committee while keeping the reading motion of the bill on the Order Paper and not discharging it.

[English]

I refer honourable senators to the decision of this house made in November, 1982 with respect to Bill S-31, to limit shareholding in certain corporations. During debate on second reading on November 8, an amendment was moved to not read the bill a second time now, but to refer the subject-matter of the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. The amendment was adopted and the bill remained on the Order Paper; it was not discharged. In subsequent discussions on this point several days later, on November 16, other examples were cited to support the notion that this was an established practice in the Senate. In fact, one precedent mentioned dated back to 1946.

[Translation]

I also refer honourable senators to the Debates of the Senate of March 3, 1993 regarding Bill S-13, a private bill that sought to incorporate the Dai Al-Mutlaq as a corporation sole in Canada. Again, an amendment was proposed and adopted without objection to refer the subject-matter of the bill to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Consequently, the bill remained on the Order Paper and was not called for debate while the committee studied the issue. As it happened, no additional action was ever taken with respect to this bill, because Parliament was dissolved before the committee reported on the subject-matter.

[English]

These examples are meant to prove just one point — that it is possible, according to the practices of the Senate, to refer the subject-matter of a bill without discharging the second reading motion. The motion of Senator Tkachuk is probably without precedent in taking the form of a motion, rather than an amendment. This fact, however, does not mean it is out of order.

Needless to say, it is also possible to move a motion to refer the subject-matter of the bill to a committee and discharge the reading motion. It is an option that the Senate can use when considering what to do when a bill has reached second reading.

[Translation]

Indeed, this is what happened initially with Bill S-8, an Act to prohibit smoking in public places, after it was called for second reading in May 1986, but the situation did not end there. Some days later, by unanimous consent, the Senate modified its decision to permit the restoration of the bill to the Order Paper at the second reading stage, once the committee had reported on its subject-matter.

[English]

In the final analysis, it is up to the Senate to determine how it wishes to proceed. Depending on the circumstances, the decisions may not always appear consistent. Be that as it may, it is not the role of the Chair to obstruct the evident will of the Senate in the way it decides to pursue its deliberations.

With respect to the motion proposed by Senator Tkachuk, the Chair has no objection. If the Senate agrees, the bill would continue to be on the Order Paper, and it would not be called for debate at second reading until such time as the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples has reported on the subject-matter of the bill.

Debate could then proceed on Senator Tkachuk's motion.

SECOND READING DEFERRED

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: The order before us is:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Tkachuk, seconded by the Honourable Senator Twinn, that the Order for the second reading of Bill S-10, An Act providing for self-government by the first nations of Canada, be postponed until the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples, to which is now referred the subject-matter of this Bill, has presented its Report on this order of reference to the Senate.

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, I know it is Wednesday, and thus I am conscious of the fact that there are committees that wish to meet this afternoon. Therefore, I will not take this opportunity to debate the points which I believe arise in regard to the motion for second reading of this bill.

It seems to me there are some implications with regard to Bill S-10 which need to be discussed and debated in this house. I believe the house would benefit from advice from the Table as to the acceptability of this bill. However, I will reserve my right to speak on this matter until the bill is brought back, if it is brought back, for second reading debate.

I understand now that we are debating the motion of Senator Tkachuk to refer the subject-matter of this bill to committee and not the motion for second reading.

The Hon. the Speaker: Are honourable senators ready for the question?

Hon. Senators: Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion of Senator Tkachuk?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-CHINA RELATIONS

HUMAN RIGHTS IN CHINA AND TIBET—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Di Nino, seconded by the Honourable Senator Keon:
> That the Senate urge the Government of Canada to express concern over continuing reports of violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms in China and particularly Tibet by local, provincial and national authorities and severe restriction on the rights of citizens to freedom of assembly, association, expression, religion as well as to due legal process and fair trial; and

That the Senate urge the Government of Canada to encourage the People's Republic of China to take further measures to ensure the observance of all human rights including the rights of women and children and to improve the impartial administration of justice; and

That the Senate request the Government of Canada to encourage the Government of the People's Republic of China to allow foreign delegations to Tibet to study the human rights situation, the state of religious freedom, the status of women, the treatment of Tibetan children and prison conditions; and

That the Senate urge the Government of Canada to extend support to Tibetan people in their struggle to regain their freedom and the preservation of their culture; and

That the Senate encourage the Government of Canada to support the non-violent efforts of His Holiness, the Dalai lama, to resolve the issue of Tibet, particularly the Dalai lama's campaign to make Tibet a zone of ahimsa, non-violence, through demilitarization and the protection of Tibet's natural environment; and

That the Senate implore the Government of Canada to ask the Chinese authorities to commence negotiations with His Holiness, the Dalai lama and to the Tibetan government in exile and representatives of the People's Republic of China on the future of Tibet without preconditions. — (Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, this motion relates to Canada and the human rights situation in China and, in particular, Tibet.

China invaded Tibet in 1949. An open resistance to the Chinese occupation escalated into a 1959 uprising which was crushed. The Tibetan leader, the Dalai lama, fled to India where he now resides with the Tibetan government in exile.

When Canada established diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China in 1970, it recognized the PRC as the sole legitimate Government of China. The Canadian government has taken a neutral position on Chinese territorial claims; it neither challenges nor endorses them. Canada does not recognize the Tibetan government in exile, led by the Dalai lama and based in Dharmsala, India. However, Canada recognizes the Dalai lama as a spiritual leader who earned the Nobel Peace Prize in 1989 for his dedication to peace and human rights.

In his capacity as spiritual leader, the Dalai lama met Secretary of State for Multiculturalism Gerry Weiner in September 1990. Former Secretary of State for External Affairs, Barbara McDougall, also met the Dalai lama during his visit to Canada in June 1993. This visit was seen by Canada as a strictly private one made by a spiritual leader.

While Tibetans practise their religion without interference from the Chinese government, the human rights situation remains grave. Mixing religious and cultural affirmation with public expression of Tibetan nationalism brings swift and harsh responses from Chinese authorities. Canada is deeply concerned about the human rights situation in Tibet. Our concerns have been regularly raised with Chinese authorities at all levels in bilateral meetings, with multilateral organizations and in international venues.

Canada established diplomatic relations with the PRC in 1970. At that time, Canada recognized the PRC as the sole legitimate Government of China. Canada has taken no position about specific Chinese territorial claims. It has neither challenged nor endorsed them. Canada does not recognize the Tibetan so-called "government-in-exile", led by the Dalai lama and based in Dharmsala, India.

Canada recognizes the Dalai lama as a spiritual leader who earned the Nobel Peace Prize in 1989 for his dedication to peace and human rights. The great mass of Tibetans is free to practise their religion without interference from the Chinese government, and do so. However, the human rights situation remains grave. As I have said, mixing religious and cultural affirmation with public expression of Tibetan nationalism brings swift and harsh response from Chinese authorities.

Canada is deeply concerned about the human rights situation in China, including Tibet. Canada is aware that these conditions have not improved in recent years. Canada believes that the human rights situation in Tibet will not improve until the general PRC human rights do so. Canada's policy regarding Tibet is a two-tier policy pressing both for greater respect of human rights in China in general but also Tibet in particular.

Canadian concerns regarding human rights in China have been raised regularly with Chinese authorities at all levels. They were raised at the most senior level of the Chinese government during Prime Minister Chrétien's visit to China last fall. Mr. Chrétien explained that Canada intends to maintain a constructive dialogue with China on human rights issues.

Canadian concerns have also been expressed in international bodies, such as the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, or UNCHR. During the last meeting of the UNCHR in March, Canada clearly expressed to Chinese authorities that many of their human rights practices are not acceptable and do not conform to internationally accepted human rights standards.

Canada believes that the establishment of the rule of law based on international principles of human rights is the best means to accomplish this goal. To this end, Canada, in cooperation with Chinese authorities, is developing and implementing several projects intended to strengthen China's judicial structure. The Prime Minister signed several agreements on these projects during his November visit. I believe this approach will ultimately contribute to the development of democracy and the rule of law in China.

Canada will continue to make its views on human rights known to the Chinese leadership. At the same time, Canada is undertaking specific and progressive initiatives to engage Chinese decision-makers at all levels in programs that will facilitate positive changes in China, including Tibet.

In conclusion, I wish to point out some examples of Canadian projects related to human rights and the rule of law and implemented in China. One such example is the linking of the University of Ottawa and Beijing University of International Law. The objective of this project is to foster the development of joint research and education in the area of human rights, international law and human development in China. The project, which is just getting under way, will consist of mainly joint research, training, scholarly exchanges and seminars.

Would members of the opposition vote against such an initiative? Of course not. They would be enthusiastic supporters of such a project.

A project between the Canadian and Chinese Bar Associations is aimed at supporting reform of the legal system and promoting the rule of law in China. This project will bring Chinese lawyers to Canada to familiarize them with Canadian legal practice, particularly the concepts of judicial independence and the rule of law.

A project entitled, "Technical Assistance to the Revision of China's Criminal Law Procedures" will help China prepare a plan to reform its criminal law in order to better protect the rights of the accused. The program is conducted jointly by my alma mater, the University of British Columbia, and the Beijing University of Politics and Law. The project aims to improve Chinese understanding of foreign criminal codes by sending foreign criminal procedures experts to lecture Chinese scholars and bringing Chinese scholars to Canada to carry out follow-up research.

Another initiative is the Women's Law Program, something which I know members of the opposition would support. The objective of this program is to work with the All-China Women's Federation in promoting awareness of China's women's law and strengthening the network of women's law advisory groups through training and technical assistance, thereby enabling Chinese women to defend their interests.

Honourable senators, it is with pride that I make this statement today on behalf of the government.

Hon. Lowell Murray: I thank the honourable senator for his statement and, in particular, for indicating that what he has just placed on the record is the authorized policy of the Department of Foreign Affairs. May I ask him whether he knows if that statement was drafted before or after the announcement by Mr. Ouellet of the government's new policy, equating the linkage of human rights to other activities with "boy scoutism," and eschewing for Canada the role of boy scout?

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator is well aware that any suggestion that human rights are being abandoned for commercial benefit is a gross exaggeration and distortion of the facts. No one is more committed to human rights in the Parliament of Canada than the Right Honourable Prime Minister and his associates.

Senator Murray: Would the honourable senator do us the service of bringing in and reading into the record the statement of Mr. Ouellet on the subject of human rights and "boy scoutism" made recently in Vancouver?

Senator Perrault: It is encouraging to note the avid interest in the statements and pronouncements made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Foreign Affairs. I am sure that we could provide copies of several of his recent speeches to further edify the honourable senator.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: The honourable senator made reference to human rights and women in the People's Republic of China. Does the honourable senator agree with the Government of China's decision to move the international non-governmental forum next fall 40 miles outside of Beijing?

Senator Perrault: I have no information on that matter. The question should properly be directed to our respected Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Kinsella: Perhaps the honourable senator, in light of what he has said today, might wish to tell us his views as to the Government of China's decision in the past couple of days to place under arrest a large number of Chinese nationals who participated in the Tiananman Square incident a few years ago.

Senator Perrault: I have no information on that subject. May I suggest the member place his question on the Order Paper or that he ask it during Oral Question Period.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment, might I remind honourable senators that several committees are due to begin their hearings today at 3:15. I know witnesses have been called. I urge all honourable senators to proceed immediately to their respective meetings. Accordingly, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2:00 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, May 25, 1995

The Senate met at 2:00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I will ask Senator Corbin to take the Chair and call for Senator's Statements, since I wish to make a statement on this occasion.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin (Acting Speaker), in the Chair.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE LATE HONOURABLE DOUGLAS L. CAMPBELL

TRIBUTE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Speaker of the Senate): Honourable senators, I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to an important event which was to take place this Saturday, May 27, 1995.

I refer to that date which would have been the birthday of the Honourable Douglas L. Campbell, a distinguished Manitoban and a distinguished Canadian.

Mr. Campbell was the Premier of Manitoba for 10 years, a cabinet minister for 22 years, and sat continuously in the Manitoba legislature for 47 years — from 1922 until 1969 — a Commonwealth record for unbroken service. Unfortunately, Mr. Campbell died one month ago. He died in his ninety-ninth year in the eleventh month. So, to our great regret, we Manitobans will be unable to celebrate this significant birthday.

Mr. Campbell, during his period as premier and as minister, did great things for his province. He was known by many Manitobans for a great project of rural electrification in the post war period. As a result of that project, every farm and home in Manitoba was serviced with electricity ahead of any other province.

He ran a very efficient government. When he left office, the province was debt-free — I am not saying deficit-free, but debt-free — except for those utilities which had self-sustaining debts.

Mr. Campbell viewed as his most important contributions to Canada two outstanding pieces of legislation which he initiated and which were subsequently adopted by many of the other provinces and, notably, by the federal government. I refer to the Independent Electoral Boundaries Commission, the first in Canada. The choice of boundaries was removed from the hands of politicians and put into the hands of an independent commission. Ottawa followed this practice many years later. The other piece of legislation which is lesser known but of equal importance — and I have said it in this house on a number of occasions — is the creation of the Scrutiny of Regulations Committee. He established the first committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations in Canada. Subsequently, the idea was taken up here in Ottawa, and we now have a joint committee to deal with regulations. This was an important democratic course of action.

We Manitobans regret that we will be unable to celebrate the one-hundredth birthday of this great Manitoban on Saturday. We extend to his family our sincere condolences.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S MEDAL OF BRAVERY

FELICITATIONS TO RECIPIENTS

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, I rise today to pay tribute to seven individuals from my region of Digby County who are recent recipients of the Governor General's Medal of Bravery.

On November 30, 1993, a fishing boat went aground on Dartmouth Point, Long Island, in Nova Scotia. The crew called for help and two boats risked dangerous sea conditions to respond to the call. Clifford and Clint Tinker, along with Carl Barnaby, were able to manoeuvre their small boat closer to the rocky ledge, while Roy Graham, Rosalind Graham, James Swift and Vance Dixon, who were in a larger vessel, were able to assist in pulling three men to safety. Sadly, the captain of the stranded boat drowned that day in the rugged waters of the Atlantic. Thanks to the heroic actions of these seven Nova Scotians, it was possible to save the lives of the remaining crew members.

Those who spend their lives on the rough seas of the Atlantic are never far from danger. There is no hesitation when one is called upon to save the lives of their fellow fishermen, despite the enormous risk to their own lives.

For those brave individuals from Digby County who were willing to sacrifice their own lives to try and save the lives of others, may I extend sincere congratulations on their heroic efforts and our thanks.

THE HONOURABLE LANDON PEARSON

FELICITATIONS ON RECEIVING HONORARY DEGREE

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, tomorrow one of Canada's great universities, Wilfrid Laurier University, whose President is the Honourable Lorna Marsden, a respected former member of this chamber, will confer an honorary Doctor of Laws degree on one of our most esteemed colleagues, the Honourable Landon Pearson.

Long before Landon Pearson graced this chamber with her presence, many of us knew of her work with and on behalf of children in many countries around the globe. Only a few examples of her involvement will serve to illustrate the broad scope of her commitment to children of the world.

In 1979, she was the vice-chairperson of the Canadian Council for the International Year of the Child. She later became chairperson of the Canadian Council on Children and Youth, and subsequently was a founding member of the Canadian Coalition on the Rights of Children. Senator Pearson has spearheaded preventative programs in children's mental health here in Ottawa as well as innovative new centres for children at risk.

Many honourable senators may know that her book, The Children of Glasnost, was a remarkable accomplishment, not only because of the windows that she opened on the Soviet educational system on the eve of and throughout the Gorbachev period, but, perhaps even more important, because of the insights the reader could gain on Landon Pearson herself.

I personally found it fascinating to learn that Senator Pearson studied a whole generation of Soviet students, beginning in the early 1980's with her initial contact during first grade at Public School No. 59. She met them for the last time during grade 10 in their final year of secondary school. She lived with them and their system over a fascinating decade in the history of the U.S.S.R. She met with their parents and educators. She studied the Soviet childhood experience in the classrooms, at the summer camps, on the farms, in the hospitals and in their homes.

She found a society in the dawning hours of democracy, not hard and rigid, as many of us in the West might have thought, but an entire people who care deeply about what Senator Pearson called "childhood in promise".

Although this was a country where the educational system had been designed on the precepts of scientific socialism, she was able to look clearly at a far deeper reality. She was able to uncover a society in which she discovered monumental efforts were being made, in some ways perhaps more significantly than in the West, to create a more compassionate and humane society for the children of the future.

Senator Pearson wrote of the children of School No. 59, of this remarkable generation, with clarity and with depth but most important with hope and with great sensitivity to the events which unfolded around her.

I want to quote directly from one of her writings:

> Watching these children, so ordinary, so normal, so like children I had known in other countries, I found myself looking at them with hope.
> But neither I, nor any other foreign observer, speculating about the future of the Soviet Union in those dismal days, foresaw what is happening there now; the astonishing opening up of the Soviet society under Gorbachev.
> These children were more fortunate than we knew. Every generation represents a new chance for its nation, but this one is more likely to fulfil its promise than any other since the revolution. If it does, then the Soviet Union will be richer — and so will the rest of us.

Honourable senators, it is true that every generation does represent a new chance for its nation. In that sense, all countries are in a state of continuing glasnost. However, there are always those very special people who help open up our minds and our hearts to the promise of childhood.

When Senator Pearson receives an honorary doctorate from Wilfrid Laurier University tomorrow, it will be a reminder, not only of the extraordinary pathfinder role which she has played on behalf of children around the world, but also of the fact that the road to a better future, for the generations yet to come, is still incumbered by many painstaking obstacles and that much work lies ahead for all of us.

In the name of all honourable senators, congratulations, Senator Pearson. We are all very proud of you.

THE HONOURABLE JEAN-LOUIS ROUX

FELICITATIONS ON RECEIVING HONORARY DEGREE

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I would like to join with Senator Graham in congratulating my colleague Senator Pearson on the well-deserved honour accorded her.

At the same time, I will take the opportunity to inform you, in case you did not already know, that the University of Ottawa will be awarding an honorary doctorate on Saturday, June 23 to another of our eminent colleagues, Senator Roux, one of Canada's most outstanding men in the theatre.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

DISSOCIATION FROM A STAND TAKEN BY A MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, more than 25 years have passed since Parliament adopted Canada's first official languages legislation, which followed from the recommendations of the Laurendeau-Dunton royal commission of inquiry and which established a program of language equality for the two founding peoples. Since 1969, consistent progress has been made in ensuring that both official languages are given due respect in Canada.

Here are some examples: federal funding of post-secondary education in the minority language; bilingual labelling on all consumer products; the parliamentary resolution of 1973 reaffirming the principles of the Official Languages Act and setting out the conditions for public servants to perform their duties in the official language of their choice; the use of French in air traffic control operations; the amendment to the Criminal Code to enable parties in litigation to request a trial in one or other official language; the establishment of a parliamentary committee on official languages; the inclusion of sections 16 to 20 in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which enshrine in the Constitution the official and equal status of English and French within federal institutions; and, more specifically, the inclusion of section 23, which accords linguistic minorities the right to receive instruction and to manage their schools; and the establishment of the Court Challenges Program. I could go on.

The reason I raise this matter today is that, in the other House, a Reform Party member took a resolution I had tabled last year and retabled the resolution or motion in the House with the same wording, but with the following preamble, and I quote:

> I would ask honourable members to give careful consideration to the wording of the motion without making hasty judgment. Whatever your personal opinion or your party's guidelines on official languages, I think we would all do well to have another look at the Official Languages Act.

Honourable senators, I never advocated a review of the Official Languages Act. What I requested last year was that we examine the application of the legislation across the country. It goes without saying that I dissociate myself from the interpretation the member intended for this motion. My original intent was to review the application of the Official Languages Act as adopted by this Parliament. Certain parts of it, and I could name a few, are not in effect in the country, in certain provinces, particularly with respect to school administration. In my province of Ontario, for example, school administration does not yet comply with Canada's Constitution.

I want to make sure that official languages legislation is applied according to the letter and the spirit of the law and not contorted as the Reform Party would have it. They are saying, in an effort to frighten Canadians, that this legislation, adopted in 1969, is the source of all of Canada's problems.

NATIONAL MISSING CHILDREN'S DAY

Hon. Landon Pearson: Honourable senators, I am very grateful to all of you for your support. I had no idea that this honour was about to be bestowed upon me when I prepared my statement for today, which happens to be National Missing Children's Day. My interests remain unchanged.

I rise today to recognize National Missing Children's Day, which is being celebrated in conjunction with Child Find's Green Ribbon of Hope campaign. National Missing Children's Day was first proclaimed in 1986, and is recognized by the Solicitor General of Canada.

Nothing leaves a greater hole in our hearts than the idea of a child gone missing. At any one time in Canada, there are approximately 1,600 missing children listed on the RCMP Missing Children's Registry. Children do not simply disappear. They either run away or they are abducted. In either case, they are torn away from their homes, schools and communities. Sometimes they end up living on the street, or living on the run. They are always children at risk.

The UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, which Canada ratified in 1991, states in Article 35:

> States Parties shall take all appropriate national, bilateral and multilateral measures to prevent the abduction of, the sale of or traffic in children for any purpose or in any form.

In addition, Article 11 declares that:

> 1. States Parties shall take measures to combat the illicit transfer and non-return of children abroad.
> 2. To this end, States Parties shall promote the conclusion of bilateral or multilateral agreements or accession to existing agreements.

To this end, Child Find Canada, in partnership with eight provinces, has developed a network of cooperative agencies, working together in the common mission of assisting in the location of missing children. Through this network, Canadian and international policing agencies, international social services, immigration agencies and Canada Customs — under Project Return — and U.S. Customs, as well as other legitimate searching agencies, assist one another in reuniting children with their lawful parent or guardian.

For this purpose, Child Find maintains a national toll-free number and has just gone on-line with Internet and SchoolNet. Each provincial Child Find organization also delivers education and programs pertaining to children's safety, and works to prevent future abductions and the exploitation of children through child fingerprinting clinics, the publication of pictures of missing children and the recognition of Missing Children's Day.

Honourable senators, Child Find Canada is a non-governmental organization which embodies the best of Canadian values — compassion, cooperation and effectiveness. Incorporated in 1988, this organization depends to a great extent on the commitment and energy of its volunteers. It receives no government funding for its programs, relying instead on the support of the corporate community, concerned individuals and the Green Ribbon of Hope Campaign.

The Green Ribbon of Hope is recognized as a symbol to remember missing children and to seek their safe return. It is also used as an expression of our thoughts for missing children, their families and friends. The concept of the Green Ribbon of Hope was originated by the students and faculty of Holy Cross Secondary School in Ontario, following the abduction and subsequent murder of one of the students, Kristen French. In memory of the tragedy, the students and faculty have generously agreed that their idea of the green ribbon may be used exclusively by Child Find.

On National Missing Children's Day I wish to remember the families who do not know where their children are, and the children who, for whatever reason, are separated from their families. I should like to acknowledge the valuable work of Child Find Canada and all the other organizations which work for and assist in the safe return of missing children and in the reunification of broken families.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, it has been 13 months since Nelson Mandela, a former captive of a rather repressive regime, cast his ballot for the first time, joining with millions of other first-time voters in creating the new South Africa. How wonderful! What a marvellous example of perseverance and bravery, and a testament to the international community's steadfast responsibility to human rights, and the former Canadian government's efforts as well.

The glare of international scrutiny, the mobilization of the Commonwealth, La Francophonie and many others, and linkage of human rights and trade unseated a horrendous regime which purported to be a democracy.

The cry of democrats throughout the centuries, "Let freedom reign" echoes around the world. Elections in the new South Africa and in the Ukraine, and elections in El Salvador last year after more than a decade of civil war in that country, bode well for the community of nations.

What does not bode well is the Canadian government's odd behaviour in relation to human rights, and Canadian support of democratic ideals. Last year, the Prime Minister made a statement in China about being unable and unwilling to be a big shot in China on the human rights front. He said:

> Sometimes you can have influence and other times you cannot have influence, so you have to measure where you can play a role.

How does the Prime Minister measure that? He has said that he will continue to raise the question of human rights but that the issue will not stand in the way of attempts to do business. What measurement system does he employ? On what criteria does he base his judgments?

Democratic freedom is a very particular sort of freedom. It is tempered by responsibility and by centuries of hard wisdom stretching from ancient Attica to the modern Western metropolis, to odd statements by the Prime Minister and callous ones by his Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Civic lore tells us that human beings are not only capable of great deeds, of courage and selflessness, they are also tempered by power and weakened by cowardice.

The struggle for fairness and representation and the struggle for democracy is a massive responsibility. It is a responsibility that we on this side of the chamber share with South Africans, El Salvadorans, the students in Tiananmen Square, Ukrainians, and, indeed, with all Canadians who see a positive and active role for Canada in the international sphere. It is a responsibility shared.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION

FOURTH REPORT PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Hon. Jacques Hébert, Chairman of the Committee of Selection, presented the following report:

Thursday, May 25, 1995

The Committee of Selection has the honour to present its

FOURTH REPORT

Pursuant to Rule 85(1)(b) and the orders adopted by the Senate on May 4, 1995 and May 11, 1995, your Committee submits the list of the senators it has designated to sit on the Special Committee on Pearson Airport Agreements:

Hon. Senators Bryden, *Fairbairn (or Graham), Hervieux-Payette, Jessiman, Kirby, LeBreton, *Lynch-Staunton (or Berntson), MacDonald (Halifax) and Tkachuk.

*Ex officio members

Respectfully submitted,

JACQUES HÉBERT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(g), I move that this report be now adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday, June 5, 1995, at eight o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, I should explain that this decision was taken a very short time ago, in consultation with the leadership opposite, because at this time we have received no new legislation from the House of Commons.

However, next week is designated as a committee week. Already, honourable senators will have received notice that various committees will be sitting next week, such as the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee, the Foreign Affairs Committee, the Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations, and perhaps the committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide.

In view of the fact that the Senate is not sitting, and because of the time available, it may be that other committee chairs will see fit to call meetings of their committees as well.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

LOBBYISTS REGISTRATION BILL

REFERRED TO STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE

> That the order of the Senate made on Tuesday, 23 May, 1995 that Bill C-43, an act to amend the Lobbyists Registration Act and to make related amendments to other acts be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be rescinded and that the said bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, as chairman of Committee on National Finance I really have no objection to dealing with that or any other bill. However, there used to be a tradition in this place that sometimes the chairman of the committee would be consulted. Invariably, the chairman would accede to the request.

Things seems to be handled differently now. We are ruled by fiat or dictate. The message comes down from on high, and we are all expected to comply and agree. A streak in me objects to that type of thing. I would have preferred a phone call or some consultation.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, I wish to assure Senator Doody and all honourable senators that I personally would not have made any pre-emptive strike without having first consulted the leadership opposite.

This particular move was made at the request of members of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. They already have extra burdens with respect to the legislation before that committee. After consultation on this side of the chamber and with the leadership opposite, we agreed to move Bill C-43 from the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance for consideration.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I have no doubt that the request is a reasonable one and that many senators have discussed such a transfer. I am merely saying that the members of the committee and its chairman were not consulted.

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance met this morning. Had we known about this referral, we could have made arrangements to sit next week to deal with this bill, because the committee is not busy at this point in time. Having said that, we will certainly deal with the bill when it arrives.

On behalf of my colleagues on the committee, I simply wish to place on the record that we are equal members of this chamber and we ask to be considered as such.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, there was discussion among the leadership that this change should take place. There was no objection from the leadership on this side. Having said that, since Bill C-43 is government legislation, it would be the responsibility of the government to consult with the chairmen of the various committees.

I do not think this change was made out of ill motive, but simply that the chairman was not consulted inadvertently. I hesitate to say that it was tacky because I know that it was not deliberate. It ought not to happen, and in the future when we do consult, we will ensure that it does happen.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, having survived that shot across my bow, I hope the Honourable Deputy Leader of the Opposition sees fit to withdraw, at some future time, the word "tacky" from his comments.

Senator Berntson: I said I would not say it was tacky.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ENVIRONMENT WEEK

MOTION COMMITTING SENATE TO MAXIMUM RECYCLING

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), and in view of the fact that we are not sitting next week, I move:

> That, in recognition of Environment Week on Parliament Hill, June 5 to 9, 1995, and in the spirit of respect for the environment, honourable senators and Senate staff commit themselves to maximum recycling of the paper disposed of by them in the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

VISIT BY CANADIAN BRANCH TO HONG KONG—REPORT TABLED

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the report of the Canadian Branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association concerning a visit to Hong Kong, March 13 to 17, 1995.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ACT JOINTLY WITH HOUSE OF COMMONS PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS COMMITTEE ON EXAMINATION OF OPERATION OF JOINT COMMITTEES

Hon. Brenda Robertson: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move:

That the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders be authorized to act jointly with the House of Commons Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs with regard to its examination of the rules and practices governing the operation of joint committees.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—NOVA SCOTIA—DIVERSION OF FUNDS—REQUEST FOR EXAMINATION BY AUDITOR GENERAL OF CANADA—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, I give notice that on June 5, 1995, I will move:

That this house urge the Auditor General of Canada to examine every aspect of the diversion of funds from the Strategic Highway Improvement Program in order to fund the Fleur-de-lis tourist trail in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, and to report to Parliament on this matter at the earliest opportunity.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 58(1)(f), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples have the power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills, subject-matters of bills and estimates as are referred to it.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE VARIOUS CONSEQUENCES OF EUROPEAN UNION

Hon. John B. Stewart, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 58(1)(f), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to examine and report on the consequences of the economic integration of the European Union for the national governance of the member states, and on the consequences of the emergence of the European Union for economic, political, and defence relations between Canada and Europe; and

That the Committee present its final report no later than March 31, 1996.

Motion agreed to.

• (1440)

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Joan Neiman, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(a), moved:

That the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide have power to sit at 3 o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXTEND DATE FOR FINAL REPORT

Hon. Joan Neiman, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), moved:

That, notwithstanding the Order of the Senate adopted on Thursday, 4th May, 1995, the Special Committee of the Senate on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide, which was authorized to examine the legal, social and ethical issues relating to euthanasia and assisted suicide, be empowered to present its final report no later than 7th June, 1995, and that the Committee retain all powers necessary to publicize the findings of the Committee contained in the final report until June 21, 1995.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR COMMITTEE TO EXTEND DATE FOR FINAL REPORT

Hon. Eileen Rossiter: Honourable senators, I give notice that at the next sitting of the Senate, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries which was authorized by the Senate on April 28, 1994, to examine and report upon the Annual Report of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1991, tabled in the Senate on 23rd March, 1993 (Sessional Paper No. 343-906) and other matters relating to the fishing industry, respectfully requests that the date of presenting its final report be extended from June 29, 1995 to no later than December 20, 1995.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

NECESSITY OF EVALUATING THE LAW—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, I give notice of an inquiry with regard to the necessity of totally evaluating the application of the Official Languages Act in this country, further to the motion to be debated in the House of Commons, which will probably be a votable item. I would like the Senate to be involved in this debate.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—NOVA-SCOTIA—DIVERSION OF FUNDS FROM DESIGNATED PROJECT—KNOWLEDGE OF TRANSACTION BY PRIME MINISTER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and concerns comments made yesterday by the Prime Minister during a press conference. In responding to questions concerning this most serious issue of diverting funds from Highway 104 to the Fleur-de-lis Trail in Nova Scotia, the Prime Minister tried to absolve himself of any responsibility by stating that this is strictly a provincial matter.

Perhaps the Leader of the Government could suggest to the Prime Minister that he check with the Minister of Public Works who, along with Transport Minister Doug Young, was instrumental in this decision to divert the money to Mr. Dingwall's riding.

As well, the provincial Transport Minister, whose riding also benefited from this decision, stated yesterday that changing the highway agreement takes the approval of two ministers, and that is exactly what happened.

In light of this information, can the leader tell us whether this divergence of money was done, not only behind the backs of Nova Scotians, but also without the Prime Minister's knowledge?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have collected a fair number of questions in the last two days on this issue, and I am in the process of passing them on through the proper channels.

My friend will know that the Prime Minister, in his statements yesterday, was not absolving anyone of anything. The Prime Minister was stating the facts of the case, the same facts that have been repeated in the House of Commons on a number of occasions.

The federal government makes money available under certain programs for building roads or other projects in the provinces, and it is up to the provincial governments to decide on their priorities and, in some cases, to seek reallocation of funding when those priorities change. This has happened not just in Nova Scotia, but in other provinces as well.

The Prime Minister's point was that, in the case of Nova Scotia, the initiative was a provincial initiative. The federal government, as he noted, finds itself in the position, on the one hand, of being asked to be cooperative with the provinces and, on the other hand, of being asked to overrule them.

In this case, the Minister of Transport has responded to provincial concerns, not just in Nova Scotia, but elsewhere, in an area that is of their jurisdiction.

Senator Comeau: It should now be very clear to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that Nova Scotians are simply not accepting the diversion of funds from a project that is intended to enhance the safety of Nova Scotians to a tourism trail. It is now becoming a question of the Prime Minister's integrity.

In order to save his integrity and the integrity of his Public Works minister, would the Prime Minister instruct his Public Works Minister to do the proper thing, which is to return the funds to where they were meant to be, thus enhancing the safety of Nova Scotians, rather than tourism trails?

Senator Fairbairn: I do not believe that the integrity of the Prime Minister is at issue here. Indeed, the operation of these policies comes not within the aegis of the Minister for Public Works but that of the Minister of Transport. I make those observations because that is the way the program works.

My honourable friend and others have raised this issue very vigorously in the last two days, and I can assure them that every word they have uttered is being transmitted to those who are interested in, or have involvement with, this issue. The question that he specifically raises about the funds is among those questions which will be passed on, and I will seek an answer for my honourable friend and his colleagues.

• (1450)

One point that I did make yesterday, and will make again, is that the question of safety and improvement to the highway is of fundamental importance. I am still seeking an answer, I believe in response to a question raised by my honourable friend, as to whether or not toll fees were levied on other parts of highways that would be considered part of the national highway system. I know the question of tolls is relevant in some provinces.

One of the suggestions is that, indeed, tolls would help to provide the funds needed to speed up improvements to Highway 104 by as much as three years, improvements which would enhance safety on that dangerous stretch of road.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—NOVA SCOTIA—DIVERSION OF FUNDS FROM DESIGNATED PROJECT—ALTERNATE METHODS OF FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, I have some brief questions about this diversion of funds in Nova Scotia.

The response by the Leader of the Government in the Senate to my question yesterday left me with the clear impression that she was aware of other significant national highways with respect to which such agreements between the provinces and Ottawa have been reached, agreements involving federal funds earmarked for upgrading Canada's national highway to four lanes. From her comments, I drew the assumption that she was talking about significant Canadian highways, possibly even significant connectors to the Trans-Canada Highway, such as the extension of Highway 16 from Ottawa to Highway 401.

Perhaps behind all this is a major change in national policy with respect to the Trans-Canada Highway. Did the Leader of the Government intend for us to infer from her remarks yesterday that the government is considering an alternative, that being, of course, the upgrading of highways paid for in part by federal-provincial funds, and with the rest of the money being raised by way of collections at tollbooths?

Does the Leader of the Government know specifically where, on the Trans-Canada Highway between St. John's, Newfoundland and Campbell River, British Columbia, another tollbooth is located? I have driven that highway, and I have never paid a toll at any such booth, but if one exists, I would like to send my quarters there.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it was precisely because I did not want the honourable senator to make that assumption that I indicated yesterday I would try to obtain a specific explanation as to where tolls are being collected. They are being collected in more than one province. I wanted to be clear, so I stopped there. I said that I would consult to find out exactly the nature of those highways.

[ Senator Fairbairn ]

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENTS CURRENTLY IN FORCE—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should know the answer to the question which I am about to ask, but I do not. Therefore, I shall ask the Leader of the Government to have the research done for me.

Reference was made the other day to the original Trans-Canada Highway agreement, which came into effect some 40 years or more ago and which related to cost sharing, standards and all kinds of other details.

What agreement or agreements are still in force relating to the Trans-Canada Highway as we know it binding the provinces with respect to standards or other details, such as the right or otherwise of provinces to impose tolls on the Trans-Canada Highway?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Murray asks a good question.

My friend Senator Stewart tells me that the original agreement was signed in 1949.

I will inquire as to the evolution of that agreement, and what still remains of it. As the honourable senator would know, there are other agreements, such as the one we are talking about now, having to do with strategic highway improvements. Indeed, one such program was initiated by the honourable senator's former colleague Mr. Mazankowski. I will be pleased to seek information on my honourable friend's question concerning the continuing specific relevance of the original legislation governing national highways.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—NOVA SCOTIA—DIVERSION OF FUNDS TO PROJECTS NOT COVERED BY AGREEMENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, there have been many highway agreements between the federal government and the provinces. Senators Robertson, Simard and myself, along with others, are familiar with the agreements that existed under the highway subagreements with New Brunswick. The Leader of the Government seems to be suggesting that, once an agreement of that kind is signed, it is open to a province to take funds out of it and apply them to projects not covered in the agreement.

The Auditor General of Nova Scotia seems to think that the diversion to which Senator Forrestall referred was an improper use of those funds, which is why I have asked, and Senator Forrestall is preparing to move a motion to the same effect, that the opinion of the Auditor General of Canada be sought.

Is it the position of the Leader of the Government that within a federal-provincial highway agreement a province is free to divert moneys from such an agreement to other highway projects not covered in the agreement?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the information I have received indicates that under these agreements a province is free to request a change in the agreement that would rearrange a priority list. As I said yesterday, I am not an expert in this area. I wish to obtain precise information for my friend.

I note that the Honourable Jean Charest has written in this regard to the Auditor General of Canada, who, as my friend knows, is not in the country at the moment. These matters certainly fall within his area of responsibility. Thanks to the efforts of Senator Gauthier, the Auditor General has an opportunity to present reports more frequently to Parliament than was the case before. It will be up to him to decide how quickly he will proceed.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL ON FOREIGN SERVICE TRAVEL DIRECTIVES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who will be aware of the strange accounting procedures revealed by the Auditor General's special examination on travel under Foreign Service Directives.

It is not acceptable here to take up senators' valuable time with a lengthy preamble that would hardly begin to detail the opportunism, collusion, conspiracies and trickery that have produced unbelievable cash bonuses for scores of Foreign Service employees in the practice known as "ticket cashing".

• (1500)

My question, therefore, will be direct. Is the press correct when it argues that the government has remedied the situation by legalizing the practices rather than putting a stop to them?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as one who travels infrequently in foreign lands, these are new areas for me to probe. I will try to find an answer concerning whether or not the interpretation of the media is accurate.

NEW DIRECTIVES ON FOREIGN SERVICE TRAVEL DIRECTIVES—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The Minister of Foreign Affairs, André Ouellet, said in the House of Commons that the situation had been corrected. The Treasury Board Secretariat said that policy changes will be discussed in a conference in the fall of 1995.

Can the minister tell us exactly when foreign service directives 45 and 50 were changed, and what the new directives involve?

CONFLICTING STATEMENTS BY FOREIGN AFFAIRS MINISTER—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, at a recent meeting in Vancouver with a group known as ASEAN, involving six Asian countries, the Minister of Foreign Affairs made statements which would appear to show a fundamental shift in Canada's long-standing foreign link between trade and human rights. The minister declared that Canada should pursue trade with countries irrespective of whether they have dictatorships or political governments which do not espouse our own beliefs.

Having worked long and hard as a member of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canadian Foreign Policy to have respect for human rights treated as a Canadian foreign policy priority, I find Minister Ouellet's statements and comments disturbing.

In a recent response to the recommendations of that special joint committee issued by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, it was stated that the Government of Canada will make effective use of all of the influence that our economic, trading and development assistance relationships gives us to promote respect for human rights. Only last month, the Liberal Party signed an international declaration here in Ottawa saying increased trade does not always benefit human rights in democracy.

Are these two statements not, in fact, directly contradictory to the minister's recent comments in Vancouver? Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate please offer some clarification in this regard?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would underline, as I believe I have before — and this is consistent with the approach of both the Prime Minister and Mr. Ouellet — that human rights are fundamental to Canadian values. They are critical to the promotion of international peace, and they are integral to our foreign policy. I do not believe that anything that Mr. Ouellet or the Prime Minister have indicated strays from that fundamental premise.

The goal of the government is to influence other governments to respect their human rights obligations. Both of the gentlemen been referred to have indicated that we seek to do that through a variety of bilateral and multilateral efforts at diplomacy, through business, which is not a regressive but a progressive word, and through assistance to other governments in building democratic institutions.

There is nothing in the policy of the government to indicate that increasing our trade and our contacts with various countries in the world should not go hand in hand with the protection of human rights, education, and the bringing out of countries from isolation and into the world community, the result of which places pressure on the respect for human rights. That is fundamental to the government's policy.

I do not agree with my honourable friend that there is a divergence from that policy by either the Minister of Foreign Affairs or by the Prime Minister, as he very clearly said yesterday.

Senator Andreychuk: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. It would seem that certain editorials would disagree with the leader's assessment that there has been no divergence here. In fact, the minister stated that he would pursue trade with countries irrespective of whether they had dictatorships or political governments that do not espouse our beliefs. In the area of international foreign trade, is the minister not precluding different responses for different situations? How can we know today all the uncertainties that there will be in the future?

I consider it dangerous for the Minister of Foreign Affairs to make a blanket statement that represents a significant shift in our foreign policy. How can the minister possibly foresee situations that have not yet occurred, and insist that Canada will trade with all nations regardless of their respective policies? Again, I would ask for the leader's comments.

Senator Fairbairn: On a regular basis, the Minister of Foreign Affairs and the Prime Minister have made statements that are always couched with a connecting link. That connecting link is that Canada vigorously protests — as government leaders in the past have done, and as the Prime Minister has done on every journey he has taken in the last year, whether it was to China, South America, or Latin America — perceived abuses and recorded abuses of human rights. The Prime Minister has consistently and vigorously protested these directly to the leaders of those countries.

At the same time, he has not unilaterally taken the step of ceasing to encourage connections of trade and commerce with these countries, which opens their access and the access of their people to some of the values that we consider to be important in the field of human rights. That has been fundamental to the Prime Minister's conduct of international affairs and to that of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Ouellet.

POSSIBILITY OF IMPOSING EMBARGOES ON TRANSGRESSOR COUNTRIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us whether or not the government is contemplating imposing an embargo on any country in the world?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot answer that question, but will seek an answer for the honourable senator.

No matter what government was in power in this country, for many years Canada has been in the forefront in imposing sanctions, boycotts, and embargoes, in concert with other countries, including the United Nations.

As one voice alone, the Prime Minister has been trying to say that yes, he protests, and the example that always comes up is China. His response is, "No, we have not boycotted, but we have tried in every way we can." This policy goes back many decades in Canadian history, where there have been attempts to open up China, and to bring China and other countries into line with the rest of the world, so that the pressure from countries that are worried about human rights can have an impact on that nation. Honourable senators, with the lengthy history of a country such as China, it is certainly not something that happens overnight.

However, Canada is taking an active role in combining a strong and fundamental belief in human rights with a strong effort to trade, to offer assistance and to provide education and encouragement for democratic processes. That is what this government will continue to do.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Does this government have a concern for human rights across the world? Obviously it does not, based on comments made by the Prime Minister, who, in a pathetic way, said that we are too small to have an influence. Imagine Lester Pearson hearing that! Imagine Mr. Ouellet in Vancouver completely abandoning human rights in favour of trade!

At the time of the massacre in China six years ago, the Conservative government was faulted by the Liberals for not being severe enough in the sanctions imposed and in the cancellation of certain exchanges. At that time, we were told, "That is not enough; go further."

Now we are seeing in China, on the eve of the anniversary of the massacre, the arrest of dissidents who want to hand out tracts reminding their fellow countrymen of the terrible event that took place, an event which we all deplored at the time.

Yet there has not been a word from this government decrying the present-day arrests. The Chinese government is throwing people in gaol and hiding them from the rest of the world. By its silence, the government is acquiescing to that kind of behaviour. Why has the government not made some statement denouncing what is going on?

TRANSPORT

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—POLICY ON DIVERSION OF FUNDS TO UNDESIGNATED PROJECTS—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I, too, have a question following on those posed by Senators Comeau and Murray on the new highway policy.

It seems to me, from Senator Fairbairn's comments, that the federal government has a new highway policy. It seems that now a provincial government can take money allocated in joint federal-provincial agreements and move it to a project with solely provincial benefits.

For example, it is election time in my province, so the graders are out in full force on Highway 11, running between Prince Albert and Saskatoon. Under this new federal government policy, it seems that Saskatchewan could take money earmarked for the federal interest in the Yellowhead route and apply it to Highway 11.

If I am correct about this new highway policy, I would like to know whether the other provincial ministers responsible for highways have been informed? Do they know about the policy which Senator Fairbairn enunciated just a minute ago? Do provincial highway ministers know that they can now access cash from joint agreements for other highway projects in their respective provinces? If they were notified of this new policy, did that notice go out prior to the movement of money from the Trans-Canada Highway in Nova Scotia to the Fleur-de-lis Trail? If such a memorandum were issued, would the leader table it in the Senate for the information of all highway ministers in the country? I am sure they would like to have access to this new-found source of cash.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thought I had made myself clear when I addressed Senator Forrestall's question. Perhaps I was mistaken. I will repeat the answer.

I did not enunciate any new policy today nor yesterday nor the day before. I have indicated, as has the Prime Minister, as has the Minister of Transport, that highways are a provincial responsibility. There are cost-sharing agreements between the two levels of government for improving many highways, not just those in Nova Scotia.

Periodically, there are requests from provincial governments for a shift in priorities on how the money is designated. That is not a new policy. It has taken place before. The Prime Minister, at the press conference yesterday, said that, fundamentally, the federal government is trying to be as flexible and helpful as it can be for any province in this country.

The provincial governments jurisdictionally control the highways and they are in a much better position to make decisions on priorities than is the federal government sitting here in Ottawa far away from the ground where these highways exist.

Senator Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I was always under the impression that while provincial governments build highways, the federal government is responsible for interprovincial highways. From time to time, federal and provincial governments will come to a mutual agreement to jointly fund improvements to a specific highway which has some national importance. One example would be the Yellowhead Trail which runs from Winnipeg to Jasper National Park and which has become a very important tourist route.

If such a contract were in place to improve the Yellowhead, under this new policy, presumably the province could advise the Prime Minister that Highway 11 needs some work and that some Yellowhead Trail funds will be diverted to that project, no matter that the province had lobbied for money to improve the Yellowhead over 20 years or so. Election Day looms and Highway 11 is the new priority.

The province cannot do that, unless perhaps the federal government has appointed a new minister of highways without telling us. Perhaps from now on the federal Department of Highways will be in the business of funding highways. If that is so, there must be a letter somewhere from Minister Young advising the provincial ministers on the new policy and letting them know that they can now take all the money from the joint agreements and spend it on whatever highway they choose. I should like to see that letter. Please table it here in the Senate.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, there is no new policy. I will provide whatever documentation I can on the continuing highway policy, and I will add it to the fundamental policy in which Senator Murray is interested. Then we shall see the development of the policy and the true situation which exists today.

EFFECT OF CUTS TO SOCIAL TRANSFER PAYMENTS ON UNIVERSITY ENROLMENT

Hon. Ethel M. Cochrane: Honourable senators, yesterday, it was reported in The Globe and Mail that applications for admissions to universities for next year is down by 5 per cent in some regions and by more than 10 per cent in some institutions. Part of the reason, as was stated in the report, is demographic and part is concern on the part of students over the job market and the value of a degree. University officials also say that the cost of education is definitely a factor. York University has even advertised in several newspapers to tell prospective students that tuition fees have not yet risen dramatically.

Does the Leader of the Government have any projections or predictions about what will happen to enrolments at post-secondary institutions over the next few years when tuition fees will rise dramatically because of the government's cuts to funding under the Canada Health and Social Transfer?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have predictions or projections. I will undertake to see if such exist.

All of the issues mentioned by my honourable friend are underlying factors in some universities. Other universities are still being oversubscribed. It is not a uniform situation across the country. I will be pleased to see if I can find any such information for my honourable friend. Again, we are in a period of fiscal restraint, as outlined in our most recent budget.

Yes, there are cutbacks. The purpose of the social transfer is to be able to protect, as much as possible, the cash transfers to provinces.

The federal government has no control over tuition fees. That is a provincial responsibility and it is a judgment which each province has made for many years, sometimes in peculiar fashion according to their own particular priorities. It would certainly be the hope that the tuition fees can be kept, as much as is possible in the current climate, at a level that is affordable to students across this country.

REINSTATEMENT OR REPLACEMENT OF CANADA SCHOLARSHIPS FUND—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ethel M. Cochrane: Honourable senators, in the same report, The Globe and Mail says that many universities are being forced to dip into their budgets to provide additional scholarship funds in order to attract students.

In light of this problem, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate, in her ministerial capacity, consider making a case to have the Canada Scholarships Fund either reinstated or replaced?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will certainly follow the suggestion of my friend in terms of putting those concerns, which she has raised previously in this house, before my colleague, the Minister for Human Resources Development.

COMMITMENT TO INTERVENTION WITH TRANSGRESSOR COUNTRIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, coming back to the human rights issue, will the government intervene bilaterally on any human rights issues which may occur in the future? If it will, what determinants or guidelines will be used? In a multilateral sense, when and under what circumstances would the government take leadership on the issue of human rights and related democratic development issues?

I realize that the Leader of the Government may not be able to answer this question today, and I would appreciate a written response.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will certainly endeavour to get a response for my honourable friend. I know the senator will appreciate that there is a certain hypothetical quality in her questions.

However, I reiterate the assertion that the federal government and its ministers do not shy away from bilateral discussions on human rights wherever they arise. The Prime Minister has made this very clear during his travels around the world in every case where the situation exists: in Asia, the Pacific, South America and Latin America. That channel exists, but I will take the broader aspect of my friend's question and see what response I can get for her.

Senator Andreychuk: Honourable senators, perhaps the written response could include what alternatives, procedures or actions the government will now employ, from the quiet, diplomatic ones through to the obvious ultimate one of severing any bilateral relationship. There are a host of human rights mechanisms available. Which ones would be used in a bilateral sense and which ones would be used in a multilateral sense, and what determinants would lead to those alternatives?

Senator Fairbairn: I will try to get a response to my honourable friend.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on March 28, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Spivak regarding the Birdtail Sioux First Nation. I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on March 28, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Spivak regarding legal action against the Canadian National Railway. I have a response to questions raised in the Senate on April 5, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Di Nino regarding facilities at smaller airports, and a response to a question raised in the Senate on May 11, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Ghitter regarding the hiring by the Canadian International Development Agency of former Guatemalan General Hector Gramajo.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CLEAN-UP OF CANADIAN NATIONAL TRAIN WRECK DEBRIS ON BIRDTAIL SIOUX RESERVE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Mira Spivak on March 28, 1995)

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development shares the concerns of the Birdtail Sioux First Nation with regard to the potential impact of the train wreckage, from the April 23, 1968 derailment of CN #409, on the environment and members of the First Nation. No formal agreement was ever entered into between CN and Birdtail Sioux First Nation to allow CN to bury or leave their train wreckage on reserve land.

DIAND has a fiduciary responsibility to assist the First Nation in effecting the clean-up of the contamination on their lands. Consequently, the First Nation, the Department, and CN began talks in September of 1993 to resolve this environmental issue.

In October 1994 CN made their final offer of $125,000 to the First Nation for the clean up of both sides of the track. This amount was not considered satisfactory due to the nature and extent of the damage. The negotiations with CN terminated with the receipt of a letter dated January 24, 1995. In their letter, CN stated they would fund the project but only if given full supervision and control of the work done and if standards for the clean-up were set solely by CN — a response unacceptable to the Birdtail Sioux First Nation.

Consequently, the First Nation was asked to submit a proposal to DIAND (Manitoba Region) to undertake the clean-up of the southwest quadrant of the crash site. The value of the proposal was listed at $402,000. Phase 1 of the project commenced on March 14 and is expected to be completed shortly. The project will be fully documented.

LEGAL ACTION AGAINST CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to a question raised by Hon. Mira Spivak on March 28, 1995)

CN operates as an independent Crown Corporation and has a mandate to operate in a cost effective manner and in accordance with sound business principles.

CN counsel has written legal counsel for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and stated that "should you or your client wish to re-open discussions which could lead to a reasonable and amicable settlement of this matter, I wish to make it clear that CN remains prepared to participate."

TRANSPORT

REMOVAL OF EMERGENCY RESPONSE CAPABILITY FROM SMALLER AIRPORTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to a question raised by Hon. Consiglio Di Nino on April 5, 1995)

The removal of certain fire fighters from Transport Canada airports was initiated after an extensive study into the risks and efficiency of providing on-site aircraft fire fighting services at airports across Canada with varying levels of passenger activity.

Airports affected by this action will now operate in a manner similar to more than 250 other airports in Canada which currently have and continue to receive some form of commercial passenger traffic without on-site fire fighting services. All of these airports are required to be certified by Transport Canada which means they must comply with various safety related requirements, one of which is the requirement to have an airport emergency plan. This plan details the available resources from the community, including police, ambulance and local fire fighting agencies, that will be called upon in the event of an airport emergency. Transport Canada inspectors are responsible for auditing and ensuring compliance with such requirements.

With respect to the concern dealing with reducing emergency response capabilities at airports such as Windsor and London, Transport Canada will be replacing the existing fire fighting trucks with new larger trucks which will be more efficient to operate and require fewer personnel. The new trucks meet the recommended International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO) technical requirements for fire suppression capability.

In addition to the airport certification requirements, the federal government is also proposing a regulation to tie the provision of aircraft fire fighting services to the level and type of air traffic, and not to ownership of the airport. The regulation will ensure that Canada's largest and busiest airports, which currently handle 94 per cent of the travelling public, have a consistent level of safety.

APPLICATION OF INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION ORGANIZATION STANDARDS AT SMALLER AIRPORTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Consiglio Di Nino on April 5, 1995)

With respect to the application of ICAO standards for ensuring adequate safety measures for small, regional and municipal airports, Transport Canada, to the extent practicable, continues to base most of its basic airport standards on the ICAO standards and recommended practices.

HIRING BY CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY OF FORMER GUATEMALAN GENERAL AS CONSULTANT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to a question raised by Hon. Ron Ghitter on May 11, 1995)

Hector Gramajo is not an employee or a contracted advisor to CIDA.

In November 1994 and January 1995, CIDA organized an information-gathering exercise to help officials understand the rapid changes in Latin America and the Caribbean. Many participants were invited to meetings held in Costa Rica, Barbados, Chile, Ecuador, the United States and Canada.

Former Guatemalan military general and Defence Minister, Hector Gramajo, was invited to attend two meetings with CIDA officials in Costa Rica and Ecuador.

CIDA very much regrets this. The decision to invite the former general was taken without the full knowledge of Mr. Gramajo's background. If officials had been more fully informed, Mr. Gramajo would not have been invited.

CIDA has taken steps to ensure that this kind of incident does not occur in the future.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Honourable Deputy Leader of the Government in relation to delayed answers. I have questions on the Order Paper that have been there for substantially longer than 3 months. I have written to my friend and asked him when I can reasonably expect answers. The questions were not esoteric; they were not obscure; they were not particularly difficult. I am getting the impression that my questions are being treated as though they are unimportant and unworthy of notice.

Could I have an answer to my questions by June 5, when we next return? If not, could I have a written reason for why my questions will not be answered?

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am quite conscious of the concern which Senator Oliver has raised. It is frustrating for him as well as for the one who is responsible for providing those answers. The questions which have been raised by Senator Oliver involve several ministries. In view of the fact that the House of Commons is not sitting this week, I can only ask for his indulgence. I hope to be able to provide those answers. If I cannot provide them in the chamber, I will attempt to provide, either personally or by letter, the reason those answers have been delayed.

Senator Oliver: I noticed that the responses my honourable friend gave today were to questions raised in April. This is the month of May. My questions were asked a considerable time before that. That is one of the reasons why I rose and put my question. An inordinate period of time has gone by, in my submission.

Senator Graham: I want to assure Senator Oliver that as late as yesterday I asked for further clarification on his questions. We will continue to press for the appropriate answers.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY AND REPORT UPON DECISION OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS TO CEASE PUBLICATION OF COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, May 4, 1995:

> That the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders examine, for report purposes:
> i) the consequences on the joint committees of the decision by the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons regarding the revision, translation and publishing of committee issues, and > ii) the need for the Senate to be consulted by the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons, prior to its decisions, on matters relating to the two Houses of Parliament.

He said: Honourable senators, I am happy with the May 17 decision by the House of Commons to change course and resume translating the proceedings of parliamentary committees. I nonetheless think that, had the matter been carefully thought through beforehand, many problems could have been avoided.

As you may recall, on March 22, the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons announced that parliamentary committee proceedings would no longer be revised, translated and published. On April 5, I gave notice of an inquiry in this chamber. On May 4 was launched a debate in which Senators Beaudoin and Corbin participated; Senator Stewart raised a question. I thank them for their participation. During that debate, I gave notice of the motion before us today. Allow me to explain, since some of us may see the motion as no longer relevant, although I think it is topical and deserves to be debated.

During the inquiry debate, some of us — the majority, I think — felt that the March 22 decision by the House of Commons was unconstitutional under section 133 of the 1867 Constitution Act and subsections 18.(1) and 18.(2) of the 1982 Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, violated sections 4 and 5 of the 1988 Official Languages Act, and superseded Standing Order 108.1 of the House of Commons and rule 91 of the Senate, which authorizes standing committees to print papers and evidence submitted at their meetings.

In my May 16, 1995 letter to the Minister of Justice, the guardian of the Constitution of Canada, I asked the minister for a written, precise interpretation of section 133 of the Constitution and for his opinion on the application of this section. The minister sent me an acknowledgement saying that he was taking the matter under advisement and that he would send me a written reply soon.

I also asked the Commissioner of Official Languages, the guardian of the Official Languages Act, to give me legal advice on sections of the Act, given the decision made by the House of Commons. In his letter of May 16, 1995, the Commissioner told me, and I quote:

> Further to our request to look into the transcription of proceedings as they appear on the screen of PubNet users, we have been given an example of the unedited record of the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. We conclude from our examination that the quality of the French text (most of which is the transcription of the interpretation) was markedly inferior to that of the English text (most of which is from the floor). As a matter of fact, the text we reviewed contained so many mistranslations that any translated speech must be considered unreliable.

The Commissioner of Official Languages tells me that he is waiting for further information before he can complete his legal examination of the issue.

Given the recent decision by the House of Commons and the follow-up on the correspondence with the guardians of the law and the Constitution, I think that it would be best, at this point in time, not to refer my motion to the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, as recommended by Senators Corbin and Beaudoin, but instead refer the issue to the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders. I think it would be more appropriate under the circumstances.

Indeed, with the about-face made by the House of Commons over the translation of committee proceedings and the upcoming legal decisions, there is no longer any urgency to determine whether the decision by the House of Commons was unconstitutional.

For the time being, it would appear much more urgent to follow up on the second item in the motion before us, which is to have the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders consider and report on the need for the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons to consult the Senate before making decisions on matters that concern both Houses of Parliament. I emphasize this last point: that it would be on matters that concern both Houses of Parliament. It seems to me that it is necessary and urgent to find common ground in order to prevent in future the House of Commons from acting unilaterally on questions affecting both Houses.

For example, the House of Commons is responsible for the parliamentary restaurant and cafeterias. However, when we telephoned last week to ask if we could make reservations at the parliamentary restaurant, we were told that Parliament was not sitting this week. I said: "Listen, this is absurd; Parliament is sitting; the Senate is sitting". I was told that this is beside the point, that the restaurant was closed. However, the Senate is sitting this week. Next week, the House of Commons will be sitting. Will the restaurant be closed next week since half of Parliament will not be sitting? This does not make any sense.

I referred the matter to certain officials of my party, the whip and the Leader of the Governement in the Senate. They contributed to having the decision changed, and certain arrangements were made. The situation was a bit different from what it is usually. A room was made available to senators this week, and this room was, shall we say, occupied yesterday and today.

Honourable senators, a number of matters remain pending and require my motion to be considered urgently. It would be difficult for the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to do so because of its very heavy schedule. In addition, the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders already has a structure in place, which was in fact approved today in this House. A subcommittee composed of representatives of the House of Commons and the Senate will examine the matter of common concern with regard to the regulations necessary for standing joint committees of the House of Commons and the Senate on very specific matters.

Should the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs wish to consider the matter, it think it could do so on its own initiative, in its own time and as it sees fit.

For the time being, the Senate must examine the following matters quickly. I will list some of them. The House of Commons will no longer print testimony taken before committees. Such testimony will now be available only on PubNet and Internet. Neither the Senate nor the majority of Canadians, I repeat, have access to them at the moment. On request only, the House will produce an English or French photocopied version.

Committee deliberations will have to be obtained from the Library of Parliament. Furthermore, the House of Commons has not resumed indexing of committee deliberations. Are senators' and Canadians' rights being respected? Have our rights as parliamentarians been interfered with and reduced? I think so.

We used to have access to the proceedings of parliamentary committees. We will no longer have access to them in the usual printed, conventional, and translated version. Is the House of Commons, in an attempt to play both sides against the middle, instituting half measures for committee proceedings? What is the point of having a transcription of what a given speaker said and a faithful translation by the interpreter, if they are not to be published and if there is no index to permit reference over the years? It is like writing a book and having it published, but not distributing it for lack of money.

What will the Senate do with respect to the standing joint committees? The administration of the House of Commons suggested that the Senate print the proceedings of Senate committees. Does the Senate have the facilities and human resources necessary to take over the printing? Should the House of Commons not have consulted with the Senate before making such a decision? By imposing this new responsibility on the Senate, is the House of Commons not overstepping its authority? Will the Senate not be tempted as well to adopt similar policies in order to reduce operating costs? I hope not.

If this decision by the House of Commons had been carefully thought through, months of futile debate, which only bring us back to square one — but with only a partial printing of House committees proceedings — would have been avoided. As I said on May 4, instead of cutting for the sake of cutting, should we not carefully examine the operations of the House of Commons, the Senate and the Library of Parliament, and eliminate overlap and duplication between these institutions?

The Special Committee on House Reform, headed by James McGrath, said in its 1985 report:

> There seems to be very little coordination or consultation between the three bodies in charge of services to the Parliament, namely the Senate, the House of Commons and the Library of Parliament.

It noted in the same report that certain services seemed to be duplicated, especially in the area of automatic data processing, research, and administration, and it recommended that the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons look into these matters in order, and I quote:

> To eliminate duplication and to provide members of Parliament with prompt and satisfactory service.

It also recommended that a joint committee be struck to deal with common administrative issues. So far, nothing has been done.

In 1990, the Special House Committee on the Review of the Parliament of Canada Act stated that many services to both Houses were being duplicated.

Again, to my knowledge, no action has been taken.

In a December 1992 report to the Senate and House of Commons on matters of common interests, the Auditor General of Canada recommended:

> A closer cooperation through three key units, namely an executive task force that would deal with ongoing matters of common interest; a joint security committee whose membership would include, among others, representatives of the RCMP, which would be in charge of security matters; and a Parliament buildings council, which would be an independent external advisory group mandated to make recommendations regarding building maintenance and facilities upgrading projects.

For example, while the Auditor General did not recommend a complete merger of services, he did feel, and I quote:

> That both Houses could save more than $100,000 a year in operating costs if they only increased cooperation on messenger, courier and postal services.

Another proposal was to establish one single integrated security service, responsible for all internal and external security.

Those are some of the reasons why I proposed that this motion be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders. Why that committee? I imagine that some would have preferred the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration which is responsible for the administration of the Senate, but I prefer a committee which already has a clear mandate under our Rules, which has a subcommittee dealing with the other place, and which will probably be able to review this very important issue. In my opinion, this issue goes far beyond the administrative matters normally referred to Internal Economy and could be lost in the shuffle in other committees that already have a very heavy workload. That is why I maintain my proposal that this motion be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders. It already has all the necessary infrastructure and a joint subcommittee that is well aware of the responsibilities of both Houses.

I think this question is important and I hope this house will support rapid adoption of this motion.

On motion of Senator Graham, for Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, June 5, 1995, at 8 p.m.

HUMAN RIGHTS

CHINA—SIXTH ANNIVERSARY OF TIANANMEN SQUARE MASSACRE

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, six years ago, on June 4, 1989, hundreds, more probably thousands, of men, women and children were brutally massacred during an unprovoked attack on young and old alike who had dared speak up in defence of fundamental rights and freedoms. This night of infamy, the massacre at Tiananmen Square, will be forever remembered as the pivotal point which will eventually lead to the Chinese people's day of freedom. As the Dalai Lama said, "Brute force, no matter how strongly applied, can never subdue the basic human desire for freedom."

Honourable colleagues, the massacre at Tiananmen Square unleashed a chorus of protest both in and outside China. This tumultuous chorus of voices will not be silent until the Chinese authorities relent and repent. China will one day join the world as an equal and free nation. We can help make it happen sooner by joining our voices with the untold millions of others all over the globe in support of those who are in the dangerous front lines of the battle to restore democracy and dignity to all the peoples living under Chinese oppression.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

ANNUAL REPORT OF LIBRARIAN TABLED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the annual report of the Parliamentary Librarian for the 1993-94 fiscal year.

FARM IMPROVEMENT AND MARKETING COOPERATIVES LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-75, to amend the Farm Improvement and Marketing Cooperatives Loans Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Wednesday next, June 7, 1995.

THE BUFFALO AND FORT ERIE PUBLIC BRIDGE COMPANY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-81, to amend an Act respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Company.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Wednesday, June 7, 1995.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO EXTEND DATE FOR FINAL REPORT

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Tuesday, June 6, 1995, I will move:

> That, notwithstanding the Order of the Senate adopted on October 26, 1994, the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, which was authorized to continue its special study on the report of the National Transportation Act Review Commission, entitled Competition in Transportation, Policy and Legislation in Review, tabled in the Senate on March 23, 1993 (Sessional Paper No. 343-912), and other matters relating to transportation, be empowered to present its report no later than December 31, 1995.

TRANSPORT

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—NOVA SCOTIA—RESTORATION OF FUNDING TO DESIGNATED PROJECT—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, regretfully, once again I rise to bring back the question of Highway 104 and the diversion of funds for the completion of that part of the Trans-Canada Highway to the Fleur-de-lis Trail in Cape Breton. My question is particularly pertinent, given the outrage now being expressed in Nova Scotia about this action.

Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate know whether the Prime Minister has given any direction to the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Transport to restore funding to the Highway 104 program?

• (2010)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not aware of communications between colleagues but to my knowledge the information regarding funding for that stretch of highway remains the same as it was when we recently discussed the issue.

Senator Forrestall: Honourable senators, I understand the leader to be responding in the negative, to say the least.

Is the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate aware of the extent to which many Nova Scotians are upset by this apparent change in government direction and apparent development of new policy with respect to the SHIP program? Has it come to her attention? Is she aware of the outrage?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, by way of the comments made in this chamber by senators opposite, I am clearly aware of the views they hold regarding this highway. I am also aware, however, of the concern expressed regarding the need to underline the safety factor for Canadian citizens using Highway 104 as quickly as possible. That was made clear in Nova Scotia as well as here.

One underlying point made by the Minister of Transport was that in order to considerably accelerate the improvement of this highway and the safety factor, the provisions suggested and asked for by the Government of Nova Scotia have been concurred in by the Government of Canada. The purpose is to increase the fundamental safety of citizens travelling on that highway. That is being done in Nova Scotia.

Senator Forrestall: Honourable senators, I am surprised and a little disappointed by the honourable senator's response.

Has the Leader of the Government in the Senate or any member of the government, including Minister Dingwall, Minister Young, or, for that matter, any other government representative, asked Canadian banks whether they are prepared to fund this project? If so, on what basis will they fund it?

Has the Leader of the Government considered what would happen if the people of Nova Scotia decide to boycott the new highway and continued to travel on the old highway; and what would be the effect on any funds advanced by a bank? There is no question that the highway will be built either through public funding or privately by private sector enterprise. That is not the issue.

For the Leader of the Government to suggest to this house and to me that it will be built two, or three, or four years quicker by the private sector is absolute nonsense. If the leader is not prepared to back up that statement with some demonstrative expressions of support from the banking industry in Canada, may I ask what her intentions are?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I cannot respond to Senator Forrestall concerning the intentions of the banking institutions in Canada. However, I would point out to him that the improvements on the stretch of highway that is of such great concern to him and to every person in this house are a combined effort involving the province of Nova Scotia, the Government of Canada and the private sector in an attempt to remedy the situation as soon as possible.

As others have said — and my honourable friend will be aware — by this method we can accomplish improvements to this highway in two years that could otherwise have taken 10 or 12 years.

Senator Forrestall: Honourable senators, is the Leader of the Government suggesting to Nova Scotians that this present Liberal government would withhold Trans-Canada Highway funding projects for up to 10 or 12 years?

Senator Fairbairn: Absolutely not. I am not suggesting that at all.

Senator Forrestall: Then why would she make such a statement?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I am suggesting to my honourable friend that, in the cost-sharing arrangements between the Government of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia, the requirements of the task are such that, without additional assistance, the length of time to implement these improvements would have been increased.

Hon. John Buchanan: Honourable senators, by way of supplementary, I must make the comment that I do not know where those figures come from. In the agreements reached over the years dating back to 1987 and up to the 1993 agreement, the amount of federal money allocated under those agreements would have been available over five years. However, the expectation was that the road would be built within two years. A supplementary agreement was then discussed whereby the federal moneys would be made available within four years.

At that time, the Government of Nova Scotia was prepared to fund the interim amounts of money required to complete the task in two years. It would have cost a little over $1 million dollars in interest. However, the road would have been completed in two years. I do not know where the figure of 10 years comes from, because it was always contemplated that it would be a five-year funding agreement with the probability of it being reduced to four years.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, Senator Buchanan is undoubtedly much more aware of the details of the provisions than I am. However, I am quite prepared to seek out details to provide him with an answer.

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, again, this evening, the Leader of the Government in the Senate gives the reason of inadequate funding as the rationale for the government privatizing that section of Highway 104. Therefore, it justifies the diversion of the $26 million that was in the kitty to build a portion of this road, or, perhaps I should say, to pave Mr. Dingwall's tourist trail.

• (2020)

I am not sure whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate is aware that recently, through an Order in Council, federal-provincial supplementary funding for the Canada-Nova Scotia Cooperation Agreement on Economic Diversification was granted, and that amendment will provide additional money to projects in the area of transportation, infrastructure and information technologies.

My question is this: Would the honourable minister consider advising the government to redivert the $26 million to Highway 104 and to use portions of the money allotted by the supplementary agreement to complete the Highway 104 section known as "Death Valley"?

Of course this proposal would be contingent on putting the $26 million back where it was intended to be and receiving funding from the supplementary agreement. Would the leader consider this angle as a way of getting out of these problems, which I am sure her government would like to solve?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would be pleased to pass on my honourable friend's suggestion to my colleagues. It goes without saying that this is not a one-sided agreement. It is a partnership between the two levels of government.

PROTEST OVER GRANTING OF VISA TO TIAWANESE OFFICIAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, I read with interest today a headline in the Montreal Gazette which read: "Canada-China Row". I picked it up because I thought it must describe the Canadian government at odds with China over the sixth anniversary of the Tiananmen Square massacre and that country's continuing abuse of human rights. Instead, it was a report stating that a senior Chinese official had chastised the Canadian government for having granted a visa to the Vice-Premier of Taiwan.

The Government of China has referred to this matter as a "grave incident" and has taken Canada to task for having issued the visa. To this official reprimand, Canada's Minister for Asia-Pacific responded, "I don't think it's going to have any long-term impact, and I expect it to blow over."

Would the Leader of the Government table before this chamber Canada's representation to the Chinese government on this matter that has produced this "grave incident"?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will certainly convey my honourable friend's question to my colleagues and obtain for him any response that is forthcoming.

DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATIONS TO CHINA ON SIXTH ANNIVERSARY OF TIANANMEN SQUARE MASSACRE—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: While obtaining a response to my initial question, perhaps the minister might also obtain a copy of the diplomatic representation Canada surely must have made yesterday on the sixth anniversary of the grave event at Tiananmen Square. It is to be hoped that the Chinese response did not mimic that of Canada's Raymond Chan, that it would blow over.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): We are too small a country to do that; much too small. We will pick on Haiti but we would not pick on China. Read your foreign policy report on human rights. I read it on the weekend.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I have stated before in this house, the Canadian government and the Prime Minister of Canada have spoken strongly on the question of human rights in China.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: When?

Senator Berntson: Where?

Senator Fairbairn: The Prime Minister spoke to officials in China while he was there. He has spoken publicly and privately on this matter.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Oh, privately.

Senator Berntson: In whispers.

Senator Fairbairn: The occasion of this anniversary is of great concern to the Canadian government. As my friend said with some emotion earlier in this session, the circumstances which occurred in Tiananmen Square six years ago indicate how very far that country has to go in terms of the observation of human rights.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We will do a little trade and they will come around.

HUMAN RIGHTS AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and has to do with the same subject.

When she is speaking to the Leader of the Government in the other place on the subject of being stern with China, will she please obtain enough information that we can forward some of it to that newspaper in Toronto which keeps harping away at the subject and insists that Canada has been poignantly silent on China's repression of its citizens?

This newspaper was, in older, happier days, perhaps the leading authority on the subject of Canadian relations with China. It cannot be right now. Could the leader, in responding to Senator Di Nino's question, get just enough information that we may placate, not only Senator Di Nino, but also The Globe and Mail?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I know that my colleague has a particular affinity for that publication, and we will do our best.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

DIRECTIONS TO CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION ON DIRECT-TO-HOME SATELLITE DISTRIBUTION—COMMENTS OF MINISTER OF CANADIAN HERITAGE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

On Monday, May 29, 1995, the Minister of Canadian Heritage, the Honourable Michel Dupuy, addressed the annual meeting of the Canadian Cable Television Association in Halifax. In his remarks, he stated that the government:

> ...set up a special panel to advise the Government on DTH. Following receipt of the DTH panel report, the Government tabled a direction to the CRTC in the House of Commons, in accordance with the direction power under the Broadcasting Act.

He went on to state:

> The Standing Committee on Heritage is expected to consider the direction in June. It will come into effect in its present form, or an amended form if the government so decides, forty sitting days after tabling.

The honourable leader will know that her deputy leader has also tabled those orders in this house, as is ordered by law. The matter was also referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. The first witness before that committee was the minister's assistant deputy minister.

My question to the Leader of the Government is this: Why does the minister treat this chamber and, indeed, the Parliament of Canada with such contempt by refusing to admit that this matter was tabled before this house and is being dealt with, according to law, by the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Minister of Canadian Heritage is very much aware not only that the directives were tabled in the Senate of Canada, but that they are the subject of a vigorous examination and debate within our Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. My honourable friend has read a quote here in this house. I assure him that there is no doubt in the minister's mind of the importance of the proceedings in the Senate.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Another honest mistake, no doubt.

VALIDITY OF STATEMENT ON FREEDOM OF RELIGION IN TIBET—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, thank you for this second opportunity to ask a question. This one relates to Senator Perrault's response to a motion which I have on the Order Paper. It deals with what he has suggested is the government's position, that Tibetans are free to practise their religion as they wish.

Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. A Toronto Star article on May 30, 1995, states:

> Amnesty International said today that Chinese police have jailed hundreds of Tibetan Buddhist monks and nuns, including dozens of child novices as young as 12, torturing many to extract confessions.
> 'Tibetan children accused of political offences have been tortured or ill-treated, held with adult prisoners and forced to do hard labour,' said a report compiled by the London-based human rights organization.

Surely, the government's position cannot be that Tibetans are free to practise their religion when reports are coming in almost every day from different organizations. Surely that statement must have been wrong. Please clarify this for me.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will endeavour to contact my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs and clarify the report and the incident to which he refers.

[Translation]

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

RESPECT OF HUMAN RIGHTS AS CONDITION OF CONTINUING MEMBERSHIP—GOVERMENT POSITION

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, some of my colleagues raised the issue of human rights. I want to take this opportunity to ask the following question. Canada and its NATO allies have considered and will continue to consider the possibility of widening the circle of allied members of NATO to include certain countries that have now been freed from the communist yoke.

One of the criteria now being examined is respect for human rights. Does the leader think that not only should respect for human rights be one of the criteria for membership in NATO but failure to respect human rights could be a reason for losing NATO membership?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend will agree that Canada's partners in NATO share these concerns on matters of human rights. I will pursue his question as to the considerations on the entry of new members into NATO and see what kind of a response I can get.

Senator Nolin: Honourable senators, what does the Leader of the Government have to say about those present member countries of NATO that do not respect human rights? Will the government agree to raise questions concerning this problem? Some of our allies, such as the United States, are questioning the attitude of Turkey toward the Kurds, for example.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would be pleased to take that specific example to my colleague to ascertain what his position is on the issue raised by my honourable friend.

One would wish, perhaps, to have a more precise comment from my honourable friend than one which, in some ways, is hypothetical.

[Translation]

Senator Nolin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask another question if I may. I could go into details and other colleagues can certainly provide details. The Turkish government has set out in a rather conspicuous way to destroy whatever shred of democracy it had recognized for the Kurdish minority found within its country. I cite the example of mines being laid on purpose in Kurdish territory.

Together, we could invite democratically elected Turkish members of Parliament who used to represent this Kurdish minority but were virtually expelled from their country, and who are now living in exile. If it is details the leader is looking for, I can give her some. I am asking a precise question: Is your government considering the possibility of raising with its NATO allies the issue of Turkey remaining a member of the Alliance?

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I will enquire of my colleague.

HUMAN RIGHTS

RELATIONSHIP TO TRADE—REQUEST FOR DEBATE

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I would say that human rights is an area of continuous concern to honourable senators.

[English]

With respect to this question, my father always said, "When you talk about human rights, you cannot pick and choose. If you believe in it, then you believe in the universality of it."

I think the time may have come for honourable senators on both sides of the house to re-examine the question of human rights. I am not being partisan when I say this. For many, it is a matter of human rights or trade, while for others it is a matter of trade or human rights. For me, it is a matter of trade and human rights.

I refuse to pick and choose. My honourable friend has made mention of what is going on between the Kurds and the Turks, and there was an earlier mention of the conditions in Tibet. There are other more general principles involved. The fighting which resulted in a civil war today may help some Liberals remember comments that were made in caucus about choices having to be made between civil war and the imposition of military law.

I suggest that there should be a debate on this subject. I do not know what form such a debate should take. However, it is important that a general debate on this issue be held, since the issue resurfaces from time to time.

We are all being lobbied constantly on behalf of one cause or another. If we have particular policies for some and different policies for others, then great ambiguities can ensue.

Perhaps we could continue this debate by speaking to the motion moved by the Honourable Senator Gauthier calling our attention to the recommendations of the Special Joint Committee of Parliament Reviewing Canadian Foreign Policy, upon which committee the honourable senator worked so diligently with the Honourable Senator MacEachen. It would be useful for honourable senators to spend an afternoon discussing this question of human rights.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I hear the honourable senator's request. However, it has never been difficult to raise an issue of this importance in the Senate, and to have a full discussion in this house which can extend beyond just an afternoon. That is one of the benefits of the procedures of this place.

I agree with the honourable senator when he says that this is not an issue on which one can pick and choose. It is an issue of fundamental importance to this country and to this government, and one which is worthy of debate in this chamber.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on March 28, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Doody regarding the actions of the Film Review Board on adult films; a response to a question raised on February 14, 1995 and revised on April 6, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Di Nino regarding the renovation of windows at the Lester B. Pearson Building; a response to a question raised on May 2, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Spivak regarding the Oriented Strand Board Plant; a response to a question raised on May 2, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Doyle regarding the cancellation of the East Block tunnel project; a response to a question raised on May 11, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Corbin regarding the Canada Council reductions in staff in the Atlantic region; and a response to a question raised on May 11, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Johnson regarding the Training Initiatives Program.

CANADIAN HERITAGE

ACTIONS OF FILM REVIEW BOARD ON ADULT FILMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. C. William Doody on March 28, 1995)

The Film Review Board in question is the Ontario Film Review Board, which operates under the jurisdiction of the Ontario Ministry of Consumer & Commercial Relations. The film classification process is a provincial responsibility and as such, this enquiry should be directed to the Government of Ontario. The federal government has no authority in these matters, unless Criminal Code provisions are implicated.

The Supreme Court of Canada, in Butler, held that any depiction of sex which is dehumanizing, degrading or violent is in contravention of the obscenity provision of the Criminal Code and has an adverse effect on women's struggle for equality.

RENOVATION OF WINDOWS AT LESTER B. PEARSON BUILDING—CANCELLATION OF CONTRACT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Consiglio Di Nino on February 14, 1995 and April 6, 1995)

The construction contract was awarded on August 14, 1994 to a Mississauga firm at a cost of $1,199,000. At this time, negotiations for termination are still under way.

The current estimate for construction costs of material and labour, in the original contract was $744,500. Consultant costs come under a separate agreement for which the current cost estimate is $155,500.

At the time of cancellation about 25% of the work had already been done. The department has purchased about 2,500 windows which had been ordered already by the contractor when the contract was cancelled. These will be put into storage in the Lorne Building and a warehouse and used as replacements only as required over the coming years. Approximately 532 of the 3,796 windows have been replaced to date.

ENVIRONMENT

MANITOBA—ORIENTED STRAND BOARD PLANT—POSSIBILITY OF HEARING BEFORE INDEPENDENT REVIEW PANEL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question by Hon. Mira Spivak on May 2, 1995)

The conditions of the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act apply in situations where agencies and departments of the government of Canada have a direct decision-making responsibility. With respect to the forest management agreement reached between Manitoba and Louisiana Pacific, no such direct decision-making responsibility exists. Management of the forest resources is a sole responsibility of the provinces. The reaching of an agreement for harvesting of the forest resources is not, in itself, a project as defined under the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

The Minister of the Environment advises that, at present, Louisiana Pacific is preparing a ten year forest management plan in accordance with conditions of the noted agreement. As well, we are advised that under the Manitoba Environment Act, an environmental impact assessment of that plan is being conducted and will be vetted publicly.

In accordance with the Canada-Manitoba Agreement on Harmonization of Environmental Assessment, Manitoba will be providing to the Canadian Environmental Assessment Agency, for review, copies of the Assessment Report and ten-year plan in order for federal departments and agencies to determine their on-going responsibilities.

When Louisiana Pacific develops its detailed operational plans, federal departments and agencies will again review the documents. It is anticipated that at that point sufficiently detailed information will be available to determine if a responsibility under the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act exists. If this is the case, appropriate action under the Act will be taken by the responsible authority.

CANCELLATION OF EAST BLOCK TUNNEL PROJECT—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

(Response to question by Hon. Richard J. Doyle on May 2, 1995)

This matter has not yet been resolved. Discussions aimed at negotiating a settlement acceptable to both parties are currently ongoing between the contractor and the department.

The amount of settlement has not yet been agreed upon. A total of $303,300 was spent for design and tendering.

CANADA COUNCIL

REDUCTION IN STAFF IN ATLANTIC REGION—EFFECT ON PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Eymard G. Corbin on May 11, 1995)

The Canada Council is represented in the regions through its Board, juries and Arts Advisory Committee membership. Historically, the Council has only had agents in the Atlantic Region (Halifax and Moncton). In June of last year, the Council decided not to renew their contracts as part of a $2.4 million reduction to its administrative budget. In addition, the Government has indicated its intention to reduce the Council from 21 to 11 members. This is in accordance with the Government's announcement regarding the reduction of appointees government-wide. Despite these reductions, which resulted in fewer members from across the country, representation from the Atlantic Region has been retained. Currently, one representative, Patricia Grattan from Newfoundland, who is Head of the Canadian Art Museum Directors' Organization and Director of the Gallery at Memorial University, represents the Atlantic Region.

Following a strategic review of its operations and programs, the Canada Council announced significant changes to its structure. However, in its announcement, the Council made strong reference to better serving the regions of the country. The Council operates independently from the government and the changes announced were decisions made by the Council according to the strategic plan it had developed and approved.

The strategic plan states that the primary goals of the Council are to preserve its grants budget and to maintain service to the arts community which includes service to the regions. To obtain this goal, therefore, the Council will reduce its number of positions from 238 positions to 162. This is the first phase of the restructuring process. The Council will now move into the next phase which is program re-design. Although the number of programs, which currently stand at 100, will be reduced, they will become more flexible and the criteria for application will be enlarged.

We will ensure that the Council is aware of the Senator's views and we will pay close attention to the program re-design phase which is now underway.

TRAINING INITIATIVES PROGRAM

(Response to question raised by Hon. Janis Johnson on May 11, 1995)

The Cultural Human Resource Council (CHRC), announced on January 19, 1995, to oversee the implementation of a wide-ranging human resource strategy in the cultural sector, was established on May 1 rather than April 1, 1995, as was indicated by the Honourable Senator Johnson.

CHRC has recently requested $1.5 million for Training Initiatives Program (TIP) strategic training and development activities for 1995-96. CHRC has been inundated with over 200 TIP applications, about twice as many as last year. These applications have now been reviewed and prioritized. Recommendations were made to, and approved by, CHRC's Chairperson and Executive on May 19, 1995. These recommendations were approved and have been forwarded to HRDC for final approval.

Departmental officials are processing the proposal, and a decision is expected shortly. Following this, contract negotiations for TIP will commence with CHRC.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

CONSIDERATION OF THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the third report of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations (Report no. 57 — Disallowance), tabled in the Senate on May 11, 1995.—(Honourable Senator Lewis).

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I should like to draw to your attention the third report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons for the Scrutiny of Regulations, which was tabled in both Houses of Parliament on May 11, last.

As honourable senators will see, this third report, which is entitled "Disallowance", reports on a resolution by the joint committee that sections 23, 41 and 42 of the National Capital Commission Traffic and Property Regulations, C.R.C.1978, c.1044, be revoked. The report is tabled in this chamber for the information of the Senate.

The authority for the making of such a report is provided for in Standing Order 123 of the House of Commons which empowers the joint committee to make a report to that house containing a resolution which, if the report is concurred in, would be an order of the house to the ministry to rescind a specified regulation or other statutory instrument which the ministry has authority to rescind.

There are rules as to how the report is to be dealt with in the House of Commons leading to its adoption or otherwise. It may interest senators to hear that since being granted this power of disallowance in 1986, the joint committee has only resorted to its use on four occasions.

• (2040)

The third report deals with a review by the joint committee, which started in February 1985, of regulations made by the National Capital Commission. As a result of this review, the joint committee came to the conclusion that section 23(b) of the regulations was ultra vires the National Capital Act, and that sections 41 and 42, purporting to grant powers of entry, search and seizure, had been made without clear grants of legislative authority. The text of the provision is to be disallowed and the committee's reasons for the disallowance are set out in Appendices A and B respectfully of the report, to which I direct your attention. Section 23(b) attempts to add, by way of regulation, powers which were not expressly granted to the commission by the statute under which the regulations are made.

Turning to the powers of entry, search and seizure granted under sections 41 and 42, these clearly intrude on the rights and liberties of citizens, and to be effective should certainly not be enacted without clear and express grant from Parliament. The committee's view was that they were not.

The joint committee brought these serious concerns to the attention of the National Capital Commission with the suggestion that the regulations be revised accordingly. The commission advised, in March 1985, that they would be addressed in revised regulations by August 1986. Despite much correspondence between the commission and the joint committee, the commission has failed to submit the promised revised regulations. Accordingly, although the committee feels the revocation of the illegal provisions of these regulations should long ago have been effected by the National Capital Commission itself, the committee has decided that there is no alternative but to resort to its powers of disallowance, hence the tabling of this report.

It remains to be seen how the report will be dealt with in the other place.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other senator wishes to speak, this order is considered debated.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise to give notice that I intend to raise a question of privilege regarding an entry in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate concerning the tabling of a report by the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders, inasmuch as the Senate, in my opinion, has improperly adopted a suggestion from that committee, in the sense that that has not been done in accordance with the required forms of the Senate.

I will attempt to raise that question of privilege at the earliest opportunity.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—NOVA SCOTIA—DIVERSION OF FUNDS—REQUEST FOR EXAMINATION BY AUDITOR GENERAL OF CANADA—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall, pursuant to notice of Thursday, May 25, 1995 moved:

> That this house urge the Auditor General of Canada to examine every aspect of the diversion of funds from the Strategic Highway Improvement Program in order to fund the Fleur-de-lis tourist trail in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, and to report to Parliament on this matter at the earliest opportunity.

He said: I rise tonight, honourable senators, because this matter has taken on national proportions. In other words, what has happened in Nova Scotia could very well happen in every province in Canada. Indeed, I cannot envision, as one Liberal member of Parliament has suggested, taking the tollbooth out of Nova Scotia and putting it at the border. Frank McKenna, the Premier of New Brunswick, would not want such reciprocal arrangements — and you know how far it is to Mike Harcourt in British Columbia, and how far it is to Campbell River.

I rise to address a motion which urges the Auditor General to take a look at the legal aspects of this issue. This is a diversion of public funds subject to the Financial Administration Act of Canada, and subject to the existing federal-provincial Strategic Highway Improvement Program. This diversion has been made in order to support the development of the Fleur-de-lis Trail.

I have no objections to money being spent on such a project. As in every province, that trail is part of the development of roads to resorts. Some honourable senators have been around here long enough to remember when the Honourable George Nowlan proposed a program of "roads to resources". It got a little misconstrued by government, and some people asked, "Did he says 'roads to resources' or 'roads to resorts'?" George Nowlan, that distinguished Nova Scotian, was very quick to respond, "Of course, a resort is a resource." Senator MacEachen will recall that incident, as will others. That was the beginning of the development of a series of comprehensive agreements between Ottawa and the provinces with respect to a national program on highways.

I understand that my colleague Senator Comeau will enter into this debate in some detail with respect to that aspect of the issue. He is becoming somewhat alarmed, as am I and many others in Nova Scotia. I am sure that he will have more than a few things to say about this subject.

I should like to explain to honourable senators why I believe it is imperative that the federal Auditor General look into this matter at the earliest opportunity.

Given the responses from the Leader of the Government, I am compelled to mention that this whole event constitutes political opportunism at its worst. For those senators who are unfamiliar with the issue, I will explain.

It was recently discovered by the Auditor General of the Province of Nova Scotia that funding contained in the Strategic Highway Improvement Program for the construction of Highway 104 in the area of Wentworth, Nova Scotia had been diverted from that project to the Fleur-de-lis Trail in Cape Breton. In his annual report, the Auditor General of Nova Scotia uncovered the diversion scheme and outlined his reasons for concern in his report:

> The agreement notes that all projects undertaken are to be part of the National Highway System.

Although the Fleur-de-lis Trail is important to tourism in Nova Scotia, it is not part of the Trans-Canada Highway system. It is neither a significant part, nor a significant connector.

To understand the importance of this decision, one has only to drive over that portion of Highway 104. Some refer to it as "Death Valley". There is ice in the winter and fog in the spring and fall. These are only two of the obstacles motorists must endure on this highway. To say the least, it is winding and it requires additional twinning to what is already in place to afford more safety to drivers.

The road which is part of the main Trans-Canada Highway route into our province from New Brunswick and Canada has taken the lives of over 40 individuals since 1986. It cannot be overstated how incredibly dangerous this portion of the Trans-Canada Highway is. This is a highway that many local residents, for example, use daily to go to work or to travel back and forth to New Brunswick. Many of these individuals are university students.

Truckers must also endure this stretch of road. Anyone who has travelled on our national highway system with the truckers knows the peril, the danger, and the upset of having to tolerate that type of traffic for long periods of time.

Honourable senators, the aim of the strategic program was to twin the Trans-Canada Highway to ease this burden. The movement away from rail to truck has been startling and significant in the last 15 years. There is nothing on the horizon to suggest any turn around of this trend. Reversion to railway transportation does not appear to be an option which is being considered for the movement of our goods and products.

Honourable senators, this is not just a situation where you have a few ministers deciding to divert a pot of money to their own particular little project to enhance their election prospects. I am not joking. Minister Dingwall and Minister Mann share the constituency to which these funds have been diverted.

Honourable senators, I fought eight elections in Canada and was successful in seven. I am proud of that record. Today, I am beyond cynicism. I am now hopeful. However, I am bashed down on the rocks by the likes of this.

Honourable senators, I would suggest that Canadians who use our Trans-Canada Highway network, tourists and regulars, resent the loss of this money because it has increased the time between now and when Highway 104 will be a four-lane highway and, therefore, when it will be safe.

Decisions are now being taken respecting building highways which will be used exclusively by trucks and highways which will be used solely by automobiles. Surely, this is not the time to play games with a program that has been time-tested through a series of governments, both Conservative and Liberal. Now is not the time to alter the rules. Now is not the time to change the policy. I suggest this is a new policy.

Honourable senators, I agree with the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and I agree with everyone else, that the sooner the highway is twinned, the better for everyone.

Earlier today I made the suggestion to the Honourable Minister that he should approach the lending institutions and banks in an effort to persuade them to come forward with funding. I am informed that they will not. What would happen if everyone were to boycott the new highway? How would the debt be repaid if no one were to use the highway? Everyone who travels along the existing route is conscious of its hidden potential to cause serious, life-threatening situations.

This raises important questions, honourable senators. John Savage cannot escape ramifications of the decision that has been taken. He must have approved it.

This is a federal-provincial program, renegotiated and signed behind closed doors, without public debate. The Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate knows what I am talking about.

The Strategic Highway Improvement Program came into effect on April 1, 1993. It flowed from the Strategic Capital Investment Initiative announced by the then Minister of Finance, Don Mazankowski, on December 2, 1992. The guiding principle for this program was the recognition of the need for Canada to improve its transportation infrastructure as a means of achieving both short- and long-term economic benefits for the country as a whole. I ask, will tollbooths help to achieve that goal?

It was a basic formula: for Canada to be competitive in the new global economy, we had to ensure that our physical infrastructure was up to speed. That meant our national highway system had to be upgraded and expanded to guarantee the easy and safe shipment of goods across the country and, ultimately, to markets in the south.

Section 2 of the agreement signed by the Government of Nova Scotia clearly states what these funds will explicitly provide. It states:

> The purpose of this Agreement is to enable Canada and Nova Scotia to jointly finance certain improvements of the Nova Scotia National Highway System, in accordance with strategy as outlined in Schedule "A".

Schedule "A" explains the strategy, as follows:

> The projects identified in this program will continue the focus in Nova Scotia to upgrade national highways to four-lane facilities. These highway improvements will directly reduce the number of highway accidents and fatalities and added to this benefit is also the reduction in the cost of property damage that results from such highway accidents.

The Hon. the Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt Honourable Senator Forrestall, but I regret to inform him that the 15-minute period has expired.

Senator Forrestall: Perhaps honourable senators will allow me to continue.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Forrestall: Honourable senators, not only were the needs of Nova Scotians ignored by this decision, taken in camera, so too was the intention of the program disrupted. As quoted from the agreement a moment ago, the criteria clearly state that the money was to be used on highways that are part of a national highway system. Perhaps one should not be too surprised at the rather questionable use of infrastructure money. One must call into question the integrity of the Red Book, given some of the decisions that have been made, this one not the least important.

To add insult to injury and to rub a little salt in the wound, the Savage government of Nova Scotia and its overzealous ministers have attempted to deal with the problem, as I have suggested, and have come up with a proposal respecting Highway 104 funding. Perhaps Senator Comeau will deal with that in more detail.

The integrity espoused by the government in the Red Book was taken seriously by most Canadians. Some of us, including myself, hoped that the government would be able to live up to those ideals. I agreed with only some of the contents of the Red Book; much of it I did not. Integrity is a most important part of dealing with the public generally. We do ourselves no favours in terms of exploiting, developing and expounding our seriousness with the Canadian public when we do things such as this. Canadians, particularly Nova Scotians, would be well served if the facts surrounding this matter were brought to the fore by the Auditor General of Canada. I agree that we must discuss any new policy, but if there has been no change in policy, then I call upon the Auditor General to make recommendations that the funding be restored from national federal funding as soon as humanly possible because it is sorely needed.

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on the motion moved by my colleague Senator Forrestall urging the Auditor General to review the decision by the federal government to divert $26 million from the Highway 104 project to the Fleur-de-lis Trail in Nova Scotia.

The leader of our party, the Honourable Jean Charest, has written to the Auditor General asking for an investigation at the earliest opportunity. I concur with our leader's decision that a full review of this decision is necessary if Nova Scotians are to obtain the answers they deserve regarding all aspects of the decision to divert the funds.

For weeks we have listened to denials and flip-flops on who is to blame for the decision to take money from Highway 104 and use it on the Fleur-de-lis Trail. For weeks the Minister of Public Works said nothing, hiding behind the Minister of Transport who initially denied any involvement by the federal government. After repeated questioning by Mr. Charest in the other place, the Minister of Transport finally admitted that he had been involved, but only to approve a request that had been made by the Province of Nova Scotia. Even the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Prime Minister were using the same line attempting to absolve federal Liberals from any wrongdoing. If that were the case, perhaps the government could explain why the provincial Minister of Transportation indicated time and again that it was Mr. Dingwall who approached the province about diverting the money to their respective Cape Breton ridings. Canadians deserve to know the truth.

In attempting to defend his actions, Mr. Dingwall argued that an agreement in principle was drawn up before he announced the funding for the Fleur-de-lis Trail in February 1994. I am sure Nova Scotians would like to review the documents that relate to this agreement in principle.

It also seems strange, honourable senators, that it took until May of that same year to formally amend Schedule "B" of the Strategic Highway Improvement Program. Perhaps the government could shed some light on the reasons for that delay. At the same time, perhaps the government could explain to Nova Scotians why it took another six months before Minister of Transport, Doug Young, gave his approval in writing for the diversion of the money.

With so many unanswered questions, it is imperative that the Auditor General undertake an in-depth review of the circumstances surrounding the blatant abuse of power on the part of the Minister of Public Works.

There is also the issue of tolls mentioned briefly by my honourable colleague Senator Forrestall. A proposal has been drawn up and legislation passed to undertake an arrangement with the private sector to have a toll placed on Highway 104 in Nova Scotia. Honourable senators can certainly understand why the people of Nova Scotia are angry and upset. First, they learn from the Auditor General of Nova Scotia — not from their government — that funding for Highway 104 was stripped away to pay for Mr. Dingwall's tourist trail. Then they were hit with the plan to charge a toll on this highway as a means of recouping the money given to Mr. Dingwall to build his road.

The decision to put tolls on Highway 104 has far-reaching implications. Make no mistake about it, honourable senators, we are witnessing the first toll to be placed on the Trans-Canada Highway system in this country.

It is most surprising that the person who made a mockery of the provisions of the SHIP agreement to suit his own political needs has, until recently, been silent on this whole issue. The minister did surface last week to indicate his full support for the tolling proposal, going so far as to say that, like it or not, privatizing the Trans-Canada Highway system is the Liberal way of the future.

I assume this must be news to the Leader of the Government in the Senate who, in a recent response to questions from my colleague Senator Tkachuk, denied vehemently that the Liberal government had instituted a new policy of privatizing the Trans-Canada Highway. However, according to her cabinet colleague, the Minister of Public Works, that is exactly what is taking place. The plan to toll the new Highway 104 is just the beginning, as the Liberal government puts Canada's national highway up for sale and tollbooths start appearing from one end of the country to the other.

We perhaps should not be shocked that such a major new policy has been adopted by the government without any concern whatsoever for the public. Having no opposition in the other place leads to complacency and being a little too relaxed. This is another example of the resulting Liberal arrogance that Canadians have become accustomed to over the past few months.

I do question the motivation behind this decision to privatize the Trans-Canada Highway. Is this simply another example of government by reaction, which we have seen over the last 18 months? Was this shift in policy a well thought-out decision or just a reaction to a mess created in Nova Scotia by an overzealous minister?

Try to picture it: David Dingwall and Richard Mann decide they want the Fleur-de-lis Trail paved. Where will they get the money? "There is the money in the Highway 104 'Death Valley' highway project. We can take that money, put it into our own riding, and then charge the motoring public a toll to recoup the funds that we took in the first place."

Whatever the motivation, Canadians are justified in being concerned. Take, for example, the reaction in Nova Scotia to this proposal. The Nova Scotia Chamber of Commerce, for once, is warning of the detrimental effect that placing a toll on the country's main link to the province will have on our provincial economy. Transportation costs will increase, the prices of consumer goods will go up, and the economy, already in a vulnerable state, will be further weakened. Add to that the devastating impact this toll will have on our tourism industry, which makes up such a significant part of the Nova Scotia economy, and you have a real mess.

It is not only the business community that is speaking out. Individuals and groups, young and old, are voicing their opposition to this Liberal scheme. Local residents who will be affected on a daily basis, as well as Nova Scotians from across the province, have joined together to demand that the $26 million taken from the Highway 104 project be returned immediately. "Terminate the toll" phone lines have been set up. Letters are being written. Petitions are being signed. The arrogance of this government in trying to divert money without public knowledge was bad enough, but now to try and push through a brand new policy that will allow for user fees to be charged on our highways without having public consultation will not be tolerated by the people of Nova Scotia.

The only voices not being heard in Nova Scotia are those of the 11 Liberal members of Parliament from that province. I ask honourable senators, where have they been, and why are they not speaking on behalf of their constituents? They are obviously more concerned with toeing the party line and taking their marching orders from Mr. Dingwall than properly representing the people who sent them to Ottawa in the first place.

We have heard from only two Liberal members of Parliament from Nova Scotia on this issue, one being Mary Clancy, who was extolling the virtues of having a cover charge for admittance to the Trans-Canada Highway. The other is the Honourable Member of Parliament whose riding Highway 104 runs through, Diane Brushett. She has tried to convince her constituents that she is on their side in fighting this decision as vigorously as they are, but then describes her lobbying efforts as "shouting and screaming — quietly." Perhaps this is the Liberal Party's new approach to representing their constituents: shout and scream, but do not do it loudly enough that anyone can hear. Walk softly and carry a small stick.

In a letter to Mr. Dingwall, the MP for Cumberland Colchester came up with her own toll proposal, placing a tollbooth at the border coming into New Brunswick. I have not yet heard Mr. Dingwall's response to his colleague's idea. He has said that toll roads are inevitable. Could that mean the government is possibly considering charging fees for motorists entering Canada's "Ocean Playground"?

Given everything we have heard in the past few weeks, extending the user fee policy to border crossings between provinces would not be much of a reach for this government. It does, however, fly in the face of comments made by Finance Minister Paul Martin and Foreign Affairs Minister André Ouellet who, just a few months ago, denounced suggestions by American President Bill Clinton to have a border tax levied at crossing points between Canada and the U.S. Would the same not apply within Canada?

It is hard to imagine that we are even considering the notion of placing a surcharge on Canada's national highway system. I do not believe that this is what our predecessors envisioned when the highway was built to link this vast country from east to west. In the years since then, when the provinces and the federal government have entered into arrangements to fund our highways, the idea of using tolls has never been discussed, and the reason is probably quite simple: Why would there be a toll placed on a road that was already receiving money from Canadians through their tax dollars?

In fact, the SHIP agreement states clearly in section 6.1 that this program is to be funded 50/50 between the provinces and the federal government. Charging tolls on this highway will mean a reduced contribution from the province. Does the federal government plan to decrease their funding proportionately to be in compliance with the SHIP agreement?

Honourable senators, in bringing this issue before this chamber, I hope we have been able to communicate how important it is to the people of Nova Scotia and equally important to the people of Canada. There are many unanswered questions that must be answered. I hope the Auditor General will be able to provide Nova Scotians with the answers they deserve.

It is equally disturbing to watch the Liberal government move along this path of privatizing our national highway system. I only hope that Canadians will be afforded the opportunity to have their voices heard on this subject.

However, we must first hear from the Auditor General. I trust that our colleagues opposite will agree that this investigation is warranted and join with us in support of this request.

Hon. John Buchanan: Honourable senators, I have a few words to say on Senator Forrestall's motion.

Members on the other side from Cape Breton and other parts of Nova Scotia are familiar with what this debate is all about. I am the first to agree that the Fleur-de-lis Trail is an important highway project and has been so for many years. Over those years, from time to time, we have tried to put money together to complete the Fleur-de-lis Trail. I drove down to Cape Breton not too long ago to talk to some people about the situation there. I was in Port Hawkesbury, St. Peters and Grand River, which are in Richmond County. It is interesting to talk to very reasonable people about a situation such as this. They are anxious to have the Fleur-de-lis Trail completed from Highway 4 into Grand River and then from Grand River on to Fort Louisbourg.

• (2120)

On the other hand, it is interesting that the number of people to whom I spoke said that it was not correct to take money from the Highway 104, Folly Mountain and Folly Lake area. As Senator Forrestall has already mentioned, approximately 40 people have been killed there since 1986. One gentleman to whom I spoke in St. Peters said that his daughter was in a serious accident there a few years ago, and that he would have preferred to have the money go to Highway 104 rather than to the Fleur-de-lis Trail.

Other people who are anxious to have the highway finished will say that this is a political matter between two levels of government and opposition parties. They just want their road completed.

On the other hand, many people in Port Hawkesbury think that the money should have gone toward upgrading Highway 4 and Highway 105. You will find that in every situation. Over the 24 years that I was in that provincial legislature I found that different people in different areas wanted different things. That is politics.

Approximately three weeks ago, honourable senators, I had occasion to drive from Halifax to the Amherst shore to speak at a noon-hour luncheon for the installation of the new Chancellor of Mount Allison University. From there, I went on to Mount Allison, arriving at five o'clock in the middle of a snow storm. In places the highway was covered with up to five or six inches of heavy, wet snow. I left Mount Allison at around 9:30 on Sunday night to drive back to Halifax. Coming across the Tantramar Marsh the snow was so heavy — and this was the first week of May — that it was all I could do to see a few feet in front of the car. There was a lot of snow both in Nova Scotia and on Cape Breton Island that weekend.

On the way across the marsh, it suddenly became evident to me that I may have some difficulties getting through the Wentworth Valley, particularly in the Folly Lake area and over Folly Mountain. I called the RCMP in Truro on my car phone to find out what the situation was there. I was told: "If you are asking me if you should continue to Halifax tonight or stay in Amherst, I will tell you right now to stay in Amherst." That night there was a serious accident at Folly Mountain. Two police cars were dispatched. One of them could not even get up to the scene of the accident. I immediately pulled into the driveway of my former Minister of Agriculture, Roger Bacon, and stayed the night with him. I am glad that I did.

Any who have driven that road from Amherst, particularly from Oxford to Masstown, will know what I mean. In the middle of winter that road is probably the most treacherous piece of highway in any part of Atlantic Canada.

That road carries all of the transport trucks that come out of Newfoundland, Cape Breton and Eastern Nova Scotia, and probably 80 per cent of the trucks that come out of the Halifax-Dartmouth area heading for Central Canada or the United States. You can imagine the problems on a highway — and if you have ever been there, you will know what I mean — that is treacherous not only in the middle of winter, but all year round. I have seen on that road cars hydroplaning and big transport trucks jackknifed across the road. It is no wonder so many people have been killed on that highway.

Honourable senators, back in 1988-89 we planned to build a new highway from Truro to Amherst. We actually commenced the twinning of the highway from Truro to Masstown in 1989-90 and, concurrently in 1989-90 commenced twinning the road from Amherst to Oxford. The missing link was from Masstown to Oxford, because we did not want to build the road next to the existing Trans-Canada Highway as you would still have to go over Folly Mountain, which is the most treacherous part of the road.

The plan was to go either west or east of the existing Highway 104 with a new, twinned highway. At no time was it ever considered that it would be a toll road. It was never even thought that it would become a toll road, far from it. Nor did we think it would be done by private contractors who would then set up tolls and run a toll system. That was never thought of at all. That is a new concept in Nova Scotia and probably everywhere else in Canada, except for some bridges.

Honourable senators, the funding that was put together back in the late 1980s was for the 100 series highways. We passed a bill in our legislature to add one cent to a litre of gas. It was then increased a couple of years ago to two cents per litre for new highway construction and highway improvement, including Highways 104, 102, 101 103, and so on. Some of those highways are now under construction, but let us concentrate on the treacherous area of Highway 104, namely, Folly Mountain.

In 1993, the SHIP agreement was signed. That agreement, together with one in New Brunswick, was to complete the Atlantic highway system. The moneys included in the Nova Scotia agreement and in the New Brunswick agreement — which were separate agreements — were specifically for the national highway system. That is, for national transportation use or international transportation use to do with the Free Trade Agreement and later NAFTA. That money was to be used specifically for the Highway 104 twinning.

Some say, "No, that money was to be used for Highway 101." That is not correct. The Highway 101 money, for the most part, came from the special fund set up under legislation and some federal money from the SHIP agreement. There was never any question that the moneys in that agreement were to be used for anything other than the Highway 104 and 100 series highways.

I know what happened when Richard Mann and Doug Young signed an amendment that allowed them to proceed with some of those moneys from the Fleur-de-lis Trail, but it contradicted the original agreement. There is no question about that. Anyone in this chamber who knows about the situation knows that it contradicted the original agreement.

Here we are with a situation in Nova Scotia that when finished will be unique in Canada. However, that is a provincial matter, and I will not get involved in provincial matters. Nevertheless, it will be unique in Canada to have a toll road.

I know Dianne Brushett and I like her, but I could not believe it when I read on the front page of the The Chronicle-Herald that she was suggesting that they take the tollbooths from Oxford and put them at the Nova Scotia-New Brunswick border. What an incredible situation that would be! Tourists would then say, "I will not go to that province because you have to pay to get in. I will stay in New Brunswick." Doug Young would be happy about that. However, that is exactly what would happen. Tourists would be told, "You have to pay to go to Nova Scotia, but you do not have to pay to enter New Brunswick. You can stay here and we will look after you."

Doug Young, the other federal MPs and Premier Frank McKenna would be happy with that situation, but you can see how ridiculous it would be to put tolls at the Nova Scotia-New Brunswick border to pay for one section of highway. That is just as ridiculous as it would be to put tolls at the Oxford end so that anyone in Cumberland County living in that Oxford area who wanted to go to Halifax would not have the choice of going by old Highway 104 or the new twinning. They would have to pay the toll regardless of which way they were going. Similarly, truckers would not have an option, and would have to pay the toll.

• (2130)

That is how ridiculous the situation is in Nova Scotia right now.

It is incorrect to say that the federal funding was spread over ten years. It was, in fact, spread over five years. In 1993, the Minister of Transportation wanted the federal government to provide the money over two years but the federal government decided that it would be spread over five years.

With some negotiation, that situation could have been corrected. Over the years, Nova Scotia has negotiated all kinds of agreements, as have New Brunswick and PEI. Being unsatisfied with the five-year time-frame, perhaps it could have been reduced to four years, with the province paying the interest for the two years before the federal funding is received.

That money could have come from the $84 million that Nova Scotia would have received as compensation for the loss of the maritime freight rate subsidies. I would never advocate that we should use all of that money for one section of highway because that money should be used to benefit the whole province of Nova Scotia. However, certainly, a few million dollars could have been used to look after the interest costs of financing the federal portion until it was payable at the end of the fifth year. Then the highway would have been built, there would have been no need for tolls, and it would have been a truly federal-provincial highway.

As to the Fleur-de-lis Trail, I mentioned to a few people in Nova Scotia, who are on my side of the political fence, that if they were anxious to work on the Fleur-de-lis Trail, the province could fund much of the work over a period of years. The federal and provincial governments could take a small amount out of the federal-provincial tourism agreements to fund the remainder. There is no question that it would be a tourism road.

Everybody in Cape Breton would be happy. Everybody in Cumberland County and Colchester County would be happy. The name of the game is to keep people happy at a minimal cost which, in this case, means funding from the two levels of government.

Senator Graham: Why did you not do it when you were premier?

Senator Buchanan: I was not in office when the last agreement was signed.

Honourable senators, this problem must be solved. When I was in Cumberland County over the weekend, the chambers of commerce of the area voiced bitter opposition to what has occurred. The municipalities have sent resolutions to the Prime Minister, to the Minister of Transport, to Minister Dingwall and to provincial officials in total opposition to what has happened.

In spite of the fact that the agreement was amended to include highways other than the national highway system, the federal government should be specific about where their money is to be spent. If it is for tourism purposes, fine; if it is for national transportation, fine; but that should be specified. The Fleur-de-lis Trail should be a tourism road, funded partially by federal funds and partially by provincial funds.

On motion of Senator Hébert, debate adjourned.

FISHERIES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXTEND DATE FOR FINAL REPORT

Hon. Eileen Rossiter, pursuant to notice of May 25, 1995, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries which was authorized by the Senate on April 28, 1994, to examine and report upon the Annual Report of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1991, tabled in the Senate on 23rd March, 1993 (Sessional Paper No. 343-906) and other matters relating to the fishing industry, respectfully requests that the date of presenting its final report be extended from June 29, 1995 to no later than December 20, 1995.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Donald H. Oliver, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon tomorrow, Tuesday, June 6, 1994, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we have granted leave, but it is unfortunate that we were not aware of this motion earlier. It is a legitimate request, but I should like to point out that the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide will table its report tomorrow. While the committee itself will then cease to exist, the committee members will assemble to hold a press conference following release of the report. As a result of their attendance at another committee meeting, some honourable senators will be unable to attend that conference.

Normally, when we grant leave for committees to sit while the Senate is sitting, we give such leave to only one committee at a time. In this particular case, although I understand the situation, I would ask that senators be notified earlier in order that we may better arrange our program.

Having said that, as far as we are concerned, we are quite prepared to support the motion.

Senator Oliver: Honourable senators, I will briefly explain the reason for this request. The committee continues its hearings on the government's draft orders giving directives to the CRTC with respect to direct-to-home satellite broadcasting, and tomorrow the committee will be hearing the evidence of Mr. Keith Spicer, chairman of the CRTC.

Unfortunately, due to other commitments, Mr. Spicer is unable to appear before the committee at any other time during the month of June. As a matter of fact, the Committee on Canadian Heritage in the House of Commons is meeting tomorrow morning solely for the purpose of hearing Mr. Spicer. The House committee will be hearing all of its other witnesses only next week.

Mr. Spicer's testimony is essential to the work of the Senate committee, given the comments and criticism of the CRTC by various witnesses who appeared before the committee.

Senator Stewart: Must Parliament accommodate Mr. Spicer?

Senator Oliver: It is the only day during the entire month when he is available. He is leaving the country.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, June 6, 1995

The Senate met at 2:00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

PAGES EXCHANGE PROGRAM WITH HOUSE OF COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is my pleasure to introduce two House of Commons Pages who have been selected to participate in the first exchange program of Senate and House of Commons Pages, which will last for the next two weeks.

With us is Meaghan Beaton from Sydney, Nova Scotia. Meaghan is studying journalism at Carleton University. As senators will no doubt discover, Meaghan is proficient in her second language, having been a French immersion student during her last five years of high school.

[Translation]

She also studied in Lévis, Quebec, through a student exchange program and took part in immersion camps at the Université Sainte-Anne, in Nova Scotia. Meaghan did volunteer work at the Fortress of Louisbourg National Park.

[English]

Also with us is Roger Lebel from Port Elgin, Ontario. Roger has spent the last year studying political science and history at the University of Ottawa. Roger is also fluently bilingual.

[Translation]

He participated in a Rotary Club exchange, which led him to live in France for one year and to participate in a youth pilgrimage to Yugoslavia in 1990.

[English]

Two of our own Pages from the Senate, Catherine Berger and Carol Ann Taylor, are currently in the House of Commons as part of this exchange.

FIREARMS LEGISLATION

COMMENTS OF LIBERAL MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, today I would like to read from the House of Commons Debates of March 13, 1995. Mr. Réginald Bélair, the honourable member for Cochrane—Superior, stated:

The government is right to introduce legislation containing tougher sanctions against individuals convicted of murder and to step up efforts to deal with the smuggling of firearms. Such measures are necessary if we want to control crime and prevent an increase in the crime rate. We must ensure compliance with existing legislation on the wrongful use of firearms and their proliferation in our society. However, I have serious reservations about some of the points proposed in the bill.

In my riding, being a rural one, almost everyone owns a rifle or a shotgun, yet the incidence of violent crimes involving firearms is practically non-existent. They are responsible and law-abiding citizens including natives, trappers, sustenance and sports hunters, gun club members and gun collectors, who have all proven their ability to own and use a firearm. Stricter gun control will not necessarily result in a decrease in the number of crimes involving firearms in this rural part of Canada. These law-abiding firearm owners should not be burdened or inconvenienced with additional gun control measures that will not reduce crime or improve public safety...

My constituents have been asking all along that the bill be divided into two parts: legislation that directly affects law-abiding gun owners and legislation that affects the criminal use of firearms. They have, as I have, also requested a free vote on the issue. We know that this will not be the case and therein lies my dilemma. I am wrenched between the loyalty to my party and representation of the views of my constituents. It will not be an easy call.

Eighty-five million dollars was forecast by the government to implement the national firearms registration system. The federal government has pegged the number of guns in circulation to be registered at 7.5 million. This number differs by a wide margin with the Ontario Federation of Anglers and Hunters calculations of 15 million as well as with those of the National Firearms Association. That is why the projection is unrealistic while I find the cost still prohibitive...

Countries that have tough firearms legislation have shown an increase in the rate of violent crimes. Countries whose citizens have a healthy cultural life and have very close family ties have the lowest rate of violent crimes committed with firearms, whether such arms are available or not. There is no evidence that more regulations have reduced the number of violent crimes...

I am reserving final judgment on this bill until I am given an opportunity to study the forthcoming amendments. I owe it to the 6,000 constituents who have taken the time to write, to sign petitions, or to verbally express their views on this controversial issue. Hopefully the speeches heard in this House will serve to enlighten the members on their final vote.

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the final report of the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide, which deals with the legal, social and ethical questions related to euthanasia and assisted suicide.

I would ask leave of the Senate to make a few remarks in connection with the tabling of this document.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators should have their own copies of this report on their desks very shortly, and I hope that they will take note of the size of it. It is of considerable size, and represents a great deal of work over the past 16 months.

I wish to point out to honourable senators that when this committee was authorized by the Senate 16 months ago, it was originally to be composed of seven members. I can confess to you now that at that time I was not exactly overwhelmed with applications for membership on that committee. I suspect that some senators thought that it might be a time-consuming and arduous task. In fact, it was all of those things.

I wish to commend very highly the work and devotion to duty of all members of this committee. They have been an exceptional group to work with over this past many months. The same may be said, too, of our staff. We have had a wonderful staff. We also had great assistance from our own assistants. Everyone has worked long hours to produce what I hope will be a useful report, not only for the Senate but also for parliamentarians and the public as a whole.

I do not want to take a great deal of your time today, because I am sure, once you have had a chance to look at the report, most of you, whether committee members or not, will probably want to speak to it. However, I want to say at this point that although our intention when we started off was to study the legal, social and ethical aspects of just euthanasia and assisted suicide, we quickly found out that the issues that we had to explore and consider went far beyond those particular questions.

You will find that the report contains a number of chapters on peripheral issues. One of the first, and perhaps most important, is palliative care. That is a subject which was endorsed by almost every witness who came before us, whether they supported changes to the law or opposed them. Everyone felt strongly that we needed more and better palliative care in Canada, and that it should be available to all Canadians.

The report will demonstrate that we do not have the kind of palliative care that we should like to offer to everyone today. That is one of our strong recommendations, namely that more and better palliative care be developed in Canada.

As honourable senators will appreciate, we found that both the criminal law, which we were considering in the context of changes regarding euthanasia and assisted suicide, and the health laws, which were very much a part of our study, are what I would call a divided responsibility between the federal government and the provinces. Although we enact the criminal law, it is the provinces or territories which administer its provisions. With respect to health, the primary jurisdiction rests with the provincial governments but we do have some overlapping powers in general aspects of health.

In this report, all of our recommendations go beyond federal responsibilities in order to deal with the subject adequately. We have phrased them in such a way that, hopefully, the provinces will appreciate that we are trying to get everyone to work together. This is very much a subject that requires the cooperation and input of many levels of government — that is, their institutions, their teaching professions as far as health care is concerned, and the medical profession and other health services.

We had to study the subject of pain control, because pain is something that individuals very much fear. We found again that although it is administered in many areas, the system is still far from adequate. That has given rise to a lot of worry on the part of persons who are considering the prospect of their loved ones or even themselves facing intractable problems of pain in the future.

We also dealt with some of the medical practices that are considered acceptable today in many areas, such as the withdrawing and withholding of treatment. However, once again there are grey areas that need to be clarified by way of government action, and with the input of the medical profession and other health care professions.

When it came to the crux of this matter, and of the study of the subject-matter of assisted suicide and euthanasia, as you may have heard, there was no consensus or unanimity on any of the points. However, we concluded that the greatest service we could give to the Senate, and to the people who would be considering and debating this subject, would be to lay out as clearly as possible the arguments of those who opposed changes in the law, and of those who supported such changes. You will find them all contained in our report. I hope that such arguments will give you some indication of why this debate must continue, because the issues are so complex.

There are many things that need to be resolved, but with the cooperation of different levels of government and of the medical profession, there is a way to solve a great number of them.

In the end, we found that certain people said that palliative care and other methods of pain relief would not be sufficient for them. Therefore, there will always be a certain number of people in society who are dying, or terminally ill, or have painful chronic diseases, for which those practices will not be the answer.

The question is open. The challenge has now been made for everyone to study the report. I hope that you will peruse it. This report contains a great deal of information and data, particularly in the appendices which form part of the report. That information will help us all as we consider these problems in the future.

[Translation]

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I would like to take a few minutes to join Senator Neiman in thanking the entire team that helped us in our work during the past 16 months and was very patient with us. I think they can handle whatever comes their way, after working with the committee during all this time.

From the outset, we became aware of the very complex issues connected with euthanasia and assisted suicide. We had to consider so many aspects of life and death; life as a fundamental value of society; autonomy as a personal value; suffering, as a reality generally associated with dying; and the interdependency of the patient with the family, the social environment and the health care team. We reached unanimous conclusions on a number of points but in other cases, as Senator Neiman pointed out earlier, the answers were not as obvious.

I simply want to add a word of thanks to all the witnesses who appeared before the committee. Without their testimony and their well-prepared briefs, we would have been unable to produce this report today. They inspired us to think a great deal and to refine our positions. I think we could say that the members of the special committee and the public — everyone likes to refer to the public nowadays, you can see that in Quebec — produced this report together. Had they not presented us with such well-prepared briefs, once again, we would have been unable today to table a report, which I think is fairly comprehensive, albeit incomplete in certain regards. We will have an opportunity to come back to it.

I would also like to thank my colleagues on both sides of the house for their considerable perseverance and their help in preparing this report. Their contributions were significant, whether, in the case of Senator Beaudoin, to legal matters, or, in the case of Senator Keon, to more medical matters. I would add that Senator Corbin was the watchful custodian of palliative care. He made a very direct contribution by writing, to all intents and purposes, the section on palliative care.

I would also like to mention Senator Carstairs, who showed herself to be a professor emeritus. Apparently, her previous career was in teaching. She helped us not only with analyzing matters, but with pulling them together in an English that was clearly better than mine.

I would also mention Senator DeWare, who remained with us almost to the end as well and whose contribution was highly appreciated. Together with Senator Corbin — perhaps more so Senator DeWare, because she lives there all year long — she represented the point of view of the Maritimes, where we unfortunately did not visit. Nevertheless, some witnesses from the Maritimes came here.

Finally, I would like to thank the committee chairman, Senator Neiman. We did not always agree, but I think we eventually found a middle ground so that this report is really the fruit of the labours of the seven senators who sat on the committee.

The seven senators who sat on this committee worked very hard. I will long remember this working committee whose work, I hope, will lead to something concrete that better serves people who are dealing with the very thorny problem of the end of life.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Neiman, report placed on Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, June 7, 1995, at one-thirty o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

INCLUSION OF CHILE—INFLUENCE ON EXISTING AGREEMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, tomorrow in Toronto, representatives from Canada, Chile, Mexico and the United States will begin talks aimed at bringing Chile into the NAFTA.

Can the Leader of the Government tell us whether these discussions include the reopening of the agreement, or will they be limited to the question of Chile's membership in the NAFTA in its present form?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will get a more detailed answer from my colleagues. However, my honourable friend knows that the entrance of Chile into the NAFTA group was initiated by the Canadian government.

Senator Carney: The Conservative government.

Senator Fairbairn: By both governments. This initiative has been strongly followed by the Minister of International Trade and the Prime Minister in their discussions over recent months and, indeed, during the Prime Minister's trip to South America.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I was not asking about the government reluctantly taking credit for the NAFTA, given that, not too long ago, they threatened to tear up that agreement. However, if their conversion is so complete and unrepentant, so be it.

An Hon. Senator: Is that a question?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is a comment on a non-answer. My question is based on the fact that Canadian investments in Chile total some $2 billion, and another $3 billion have been committed over the next few years. It is important that Canada's investments in Chile be well protected.

Can the minister assure us that, should the NAFTA be reopened, the government will not agree to any changes in those clauses which protect foreign investments from unfair expropriation, discrimination and confiscation of profits and capital?

Senator Fairbairn: I will certainly pass those questions to my colleagues on behalf of the Leader of the Opposition, even though he may consider the responses to be non-answers. The issues he has raised are important. Overarching those issues are the discussions which will lead to and prepare for the entrance of Chile into the NAFTA family.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The government is entering into negotiations with two partners of NAFTA to discuss the possibility of Chile's acceptance of the agreement as such. The question is very simple: Will the discussions include the reopening of NAFTA? Surely the government has a position on this matter.

In the United States, some Republican Congressmen are attempting to reopen NAFTA in order to make a compromise with President Clinton, should he want to fast-track the entrance of Chile. The question is: Would Canada go along with the reopening of NAFTA?

That is not a question which need be asked of colleagues, since surely the cabinet must have taken a decision on this fundamental point. Will Chile's acceptance into NAFTA be under that agreement as it presently stands, or will the discussions with Chile include the reopening of that agreement?

• (1430)

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I repeat, I will seek the details from my colleagues who are part of these ongoing discussions. I wish to be precise in my answer.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I should like to conclude. Obviously, answers in this place are becoming harder and harder to get.

There are presently provisions in NAFTA to avoid unfair expropriation, discrimination and actions taken by one government against nationals of another country which would lead to the loss of capital and profits. Canada has agreed to those provisions. I hope that, during the negotiations, Canada will continue to persist that these clauses remain to protect our investments in Chile. Is that or is it not the government's position?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, again, I will seek the precise information that the honourable senator seeks from the Minister for International Trade.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

REMARKS OF SENATOR STOLLERY ON MEXICO— POSSIBILITY OF CANADA'S WITHDRAWAL FROM NAFTA— REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, will the minister say when she or someone on her behalf and on behalf of the government will be taking part in the inquiry initiated by Senator Stollery and replying specifically to Senator Stollery's speech, in which he recommended that Canada withdraw immediately from NAFTA? At the same time, would she or the Deputy Leader of the Government see what has happened to the question I asked some time ago as to whether we have received any protest from the Mexican embassy, whose members were characterized by Senator Stollery as belonging to a Mafia mob?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think the Prime Minister has made it clear that Canada is an active partner in NAFTA.

Senator Stollery is a very experienced member of this house. He has made a presentation to this chamber which is based on his views. His views are as important as the views of any other individual senator in this house.

In response to the precise question my friend has asked, I will certainly work with Senator Graham to see if I can get a precise answer to his question.

Senator Murray: I take it from the answer given by the Leader of the Government that the government repudiates the analysis and the recommendation made by Senator Stollery concerning NAFTA?

Senator Fairbairn: That was not the answer that I gave my honourable friend. The answer I gave my honourable friend is that Canada is an active participant and an important partner in the NAFTA agreement.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

CO-MANAGEMENT AGREEMENTS IN SASKATCHEWAN— REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, my question concerns the co-management agreements with aboriginal peoples that the Liberal Party scripted into the Red Book during the last election campaign. My understanding is that the government is proceeding with a number of so-called management agreements in the Province of Saskatchewan with the Montreal Lake Band, the Keeseekoose Band and a number of other bands. I should like to know the Liberal government's definition of the term "co-management agreements". When the government talks about co-management agreements with aboriginal people, exactly what is meant?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be pleased to obtain a response from my colleague Mr. Irwin. As my friend knows, the minister has been travelling extensively across this country discussing with native bands improvements, arrangements and the broader question of self-government, which is of great interest to my friend. As to the particular discussions he has had in Saskatchewan, I would be pleased to follow them up and get an explanation pertaining to the agreements mentioned by my friend.

Senator Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I am not asking about something that the bands in Saskatchewan have talked to me about. This is something on which Minister Irwin has initiated negotiations. The Liberal Party talked about co-management agreements in their Red Book.

The negotiations to which I refer began about a year ago in Saskatchewan. A number of questions have been asked in the other place about this issue. I want to know the actual meaning of "co-management agreement" as defined by the Liberal government. I also want to know what they are intending to do in regard to these agreements.

This matter has nothing to do with self-government on the reserve. This involves other territories outside the reserve which they want to manage with other governments. I want to know what powers are being given to these management groups and exactly what the Liberal government is intending to do in so many square miles of Saskatchewan.

Are there any other provinces in which the government is trying to do the same thing, or is it just isolated to Saskatchewan?

Senator Fairbairn: I will be pleased to obtain a response for Senator Tkachuk.

EXPO 2005

ANNOUNCEMENT OF DECISION ON HOST CITY—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, I rise on a matter that I have raised before in this chamber. It stems from a growing anger in my city and my province relative to the inactivity of the federal government in deciding the location for Expo 2005.

It has been estimated that in the city of Calgary alone some $400,000 in volunteer time has been spent working toward the presentation of the material, always under the understanding that whoever won the evaluator's support would receive the benefit of their labours by having their city chosen as the home of the Expo site.

The mayor of the city of Calgary, the premier of Alberta and others are stepping forward expressing their displeasure by the inaction of the federal government to make the decision. Once again, for probably the fifth time in this chamber, I rise to ask the same simple question: When will the decision regarding the selection of Calgary for the Expo site be announced?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot give my friend a one-word answer, other than to say I hope it will be soon.

Senator Ghitter: That is the same answer I got last time.

[Translation]

THE CABINET

LIBERAL ELECTION PROMISES ON REDUCTION IN SIZE—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, upon my return a few months ago to this house after an absence of several months for health reasons, I had intended to wait until the fall before raising my first question.

Undoubtedly, the prayers and encouragements from the senators from both sides of this house helped me out! It is my good fortune to be 90 per cent recovered, and I give you all my thanks.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Simard: This having been said, my return to health had nothing to do with the health of the Conservative Party in Ontario!

Since the sessions of this house are not televised, and contrary to the Liberal members of Parliament who are trying to make a campaign headquarters out of the House of Commons — as witnessed this week — in an attempt to influence the results of the elections, which will give us the definitive answers this Thursday, I will now my first question.

It concerns the Liberal Party's Red Book, which states something like the following: the Liberal government would be much leaner —

[English]

The Prime Minister promised that he would start with a leaner cabinet. There are still 33 cabinet ministers, if we include nine secretaries of state, a position which Prime Minister Campbell abolished. That is equivalent to 1.5 more cabinet ministers than when the Liberals took over in 1993.

The Prime Minister announced on November 4, 1993, at the time of his swearing in, that legislation would be brought forward in the new Parliament to formally establish this new category within the ministry. A year and a half has passed. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate say when the government expects to bring forward such legislation? Canadians suspect that a cabinet shuffle is imminent. No doubt the Prime Minister will be talking and thinking about this legislation.

Second, will the government admit that the cabinet, with the inclusion of the secretaries of state, is composed of 33 ministers, making this the largest government since 1993, and thereby breaking another promise contained in the Red Book? No wonder Mrs. McLeod is having a problem with her Red Book.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): First of all, let me say to my honourable colleague that I have missed his questions. I am glad that he is now back on his feet and asking them, and I must tell him that all senators in this house rejoice in the hearty condition which he has happily achieved in the last several months.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Fairbairn: The question was: Would I admit to this being the largest cabinet? The answer is no. The Prime Minister and others, I am sure, will produce appropriate legislation, and I hope that that legislation gets to us more speedily than it has in past months.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—NOVA SCOTIA—FREEZING OF FUNDS TO AWAIT OUTCOME OF INQUIRY OF AUDITOR GENERAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate on the diversion of the $26 million in funds from the so-called "Death Valley" stretch of highway in Nova Scotia.

In light of the Auditor General's revelations earlier today that indeed an inquiry is now under way into the appropriateness and propriety of this move, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate ascertain whether or not the Prime Minister has asked that the funds be frozen and not diverted until such time as Mr. Desautels has, in fact, reported?

This inquiry has an important implication with respect to tollboothing the Trans-Canada Highway from St. John's to Campbell River. Would the leader ascertain from the Prime Minister whether or not he might ask the Minister of Transport and other appropriate government ministers to make sure that that does not happen until we know the parameters of the Auditor General's report, and until such time as a national policy has been developed and put on the table so that we might all discuss it? If the Leader of the Government could find out those two things for me, I will probably leave her alone until the fall.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be pleased to put those questions forward. The matter is at the moment under review by the Auditor General, who will report issues of major concern to Parliament.

PEACE-KEEPING IN FORMER YUGOSLAVIA—WITHDRAWAL OF TROOPS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. John Sylvain: My question is one of clarification concerning Canada's peace-keeping policy in the former Yugoslavia. A year ago, while touring the region, Prime Minister Chrétien stated quite categorically that "We must have a quite clear indication that there is a will toward peace" before Canadian troops are brought home. That was a year ago. In the past year, unfortunately, we have witnessed many developments in the former Yugoslavia. It is difficult to say that a will toward peace can be listed among them.

In response to the most recent situation, the Prime Minister indicated that Canadian troops would remain in place because they are making sure that medication and food gets to the population.

My question to the Leader of the Government is this: What is the current policy governing our peace-keeping activities in the former Yugoslavia? Is it still the "will to peace" doctrine as espoused a year ago by the Prime Minister, or is it now the delivery of humanitarian aid, irrespective of the future prospects for a peaceful conclusion to hostilities?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): The government is very pleased that some of our Canadian peace-keepers were released in recent days, and is very hopeful that the remainder will be released quickly.

With respect to the continuing Canadian presence in the former Yugoslavia, as the Prime Minister has stated, despite the dreadful situation in that part of the world, the United Nations force there has continued to provide protection and humanitarian services, as it has attempted to do throughout its mission, often in areas which are not, and do not become, newsworthy.

A number of discussions are on-going among the ministers of the countries which are involved in that area and the United Nations as to what the immediate future of that participation should be. Canada is very much a part of those discussions, and it is premature at this point to see exactly how the new role that is being suggested for the force in the former Yugoslavia will be worked out, and exactly what our participation will be.

At the moment, the Prime Minister has indicated clearly that we are continuing to serve in that area, along with the other countries who are part of UNPROFOR, and we are doing so, as always, to the very best of our ability.

Senator Sylvain: I presume that means the necessity for having a clear indication that there will be peace before our troops will come out is no longer operative?

Senator Fairbairn: I am a little confused by my friend's question. Obviously there have been discussions as to various possibilities, should the time come when a withdrawal would take effect or be the policy. However, it is not now the policy. At whatever stage of these types of operations, Canada will certainly play its part.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

EXTENSION OF AGREEMENT TO INCLUDE CHILE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, my question to the Leader of the Government will be short and sweet. Why does her government support Chile's admission to NAFTA?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): The Canadian government is strongly of the view that to advance trade and the cooperation of countries, not just in North and South America but in Europe and Asia as well, the North American Free Trade Agreement is absolutely fundamental to the economic stability and prosperity of Canada and of our partners.

Chile is one of the countries in the South American hemisphere that is most enthusiastic, and in a position to take part in this particular trading alliance. This type of initiative deserves serious consideration, as do the other discussions and proposals that are being put forward in a variety of ways in other parts of the world on freedom of trade.

• (1450)

[Translation]

Senator Nolin: Honourable senators, I shall use the same tactic. I assume that the government supports Canadian investments abroad, including in Chile. What kind of protection system do you suggest Canadian businesses investing in Chile, for when Chile is a member of this North American economic space?

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, as I indicated to Senator Lynch-Staunton, I will seek further information and direction on this issue from the Minister of International Trade, who is deeply involved in these discussions.

In answer to the earlier point raised by the honourable senator, yes, the Canadian government is actively supportive of cooperating with businesses in Canada to seek the best and widest opportunities abroad for our companies. Indeed, there are agreements now in place with various provinces, Ontario is one. A few weeks ago the Province of Alberta signed an agreement with the federal government to enhance business trading relations.

DIVERSION OF FUNDS FROM DESIGNATED NOVA SCOTIA HIGHWAY PROJECT—ABUSE OF PRIVILEGE BY MINISTER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gérald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, my question concerns the abuse of power by the Minister of Public Works in diverting funding from Highway 104 to a tourism trail in his riding. The Auditor General has recognized the need for an in-depth examination of the circumstances surrounding the decision to divert money from a program intended for work on our national highway system to a tourist trail in Cape Breton. Since the investigation into this controversy involving Mr. Dingwall has now begun, can the Leader of the Government inform us whether her colleague, the Minister of Public Works, will act honourably, decently and appropriately and resign?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will not respond to the latter part of the question, other than to say that the minister is vigorously carrying out his responsibilities in the cabinet.

As colleagues have noted, the Auditor General of Canada is responding to concerns expressed by the Auditor General of Nova Scotia, and will review the situation and report in the manner of his choice.

GOVERNMENT SERVICES

REFUSAL OF AIRLINES TO NEGOTIATE DISCOUNTS WITH GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who, by the way, I must thank for the answer yesterday to an earlier question having to do with the cost of the new East Block tunnel of blessed memory. The amount spent was $303,300 and cancellation costs are still to be received. We will need to fire at least nine and a half barbers to pay for that. However, I must not digress.

My question has to do with a house affairs subcommittee report tabled last month in the other place. The nub of that report reveals that Air Canada and Canadian Airlines have once again refused to negotiate discounts with their biggest customer, the Government of Canada.

Considering the fact that no alternative air services are available on many of the routes used by government customers, is there a likelihood that the Bureau of Competition Policy in Industry Canada will take a closer look at a situation in which the Government of Canada very often seems to be the only customer banned from seat sales?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is a very serious question, particularly to those of us who travel great distances back and forth across the country and know the costs involved. I will be pleased to pass it on for a response.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on May 2, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Forrestall regarding funds for the Wentworth Valley Highway Project.

TRANSPORT

NOVA SCOTIA—FUNDS FOR WENTWORTH VALLEY HIGHWAY PROJECT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to a question by Hon. J. Michael Forrestall on May 2, 1995)

Highways are a provincial responsibility. Provincial governments establish their priorities for highway expansion and upgrading regardless of any federal contribution of funds. Consistent with this principle, the reallocation of funds from the Wentworth Valley project was undertaken at the initiative of the Province of Nova Scotia.

When multi-year federal-provincial highway programs are developed, there is usually a tentative list of projects referenced in the resulting agreement. For many reasons, this project list often changes over the life of the agreement. It is difficult to forecast what may happen as an individual project matures. There may be delays due to design problems, completion of environmental assessments, changes in provincial priorities and/or changes in cost.

The project list that was attached to the Nova Scotia Strategic Highway Improvement Program (SHIP) Agreement was developed, on an urgent basis, in early 1993 as part of an initiative to provide an immediate stimulus to the economy to spur economic growth and job creation. In 1994, the Province of Nova Scotia requested a change to the SHIP Agreement. This change reallocated some funds from a portion of the Hwy 104 project, that was not yet ready to start, to the Fleur-de-lis Trail. Even so, by 1998, when the two existing highway programs currently underway in Nova Scotia have ended, there will have been approximately $215 million spent on Hwy 104 from a total $337 million available.

The Province of Nova Scotia is not unique in exploring the concept of tolls as a means to fund highway upgrades. Several provinces are actively investigating the option of private-public partnerships as one means of advancing highway projects in the present economic environment. Ontario is constructing Hwy 407 in Toronto as a toll facility with private partners. British Columbia has had the Coquihalla Highway open as a toll road for several years (although no private money is involved) and is considering the replacement of the Lions Gate Bridge, in the Vancouver area, with the participation of private partners. Likewise, the fixed link to Prince Edward Island is an example of the federal government forming a partnership with the private sector to accomplish infrastructure goals. While it is not necessarily the most preferred option, private-public partnerships may, in some cases, be the quickest way to upgrade certain sections of the National Highway System. Also, given current fiscal pressures, most provincial governments can be expected to give serious consideration to this approach.

Additionally, the Province of Nova Scotia has available $86 million of the $326 million which the federal government is providing to offset the elimination of transportation subsidies under the Maritime Freight Assistance Act and Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act. These funds are available on a matching dollar basis for shipper transition assistance or highway investment at the discretion of the province. Were the Province of Nova Scotia to choose to dedicate all these funds to highways, it would result in a $172 million program.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

SPECIAL COMMITTEE—FELICITATIONS TO MEMBERS ON TABLING OF REPORT

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I read with admiration the report of the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide. I listened to the various interviews of our colleagues who are members of the committee. I think they did "great good" for the Senate. They honoured all of us by their wisdom and their eloquence. I wish to thank them.

YOUTH, EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Rose-Marie Losier-Cool: Honourable senators, on April 22, 1895, the first Acadian senator, the Honourable Joseph Octave Arsenault, of Prince Edward Island, gave his maiden speech in the Senate. One hundred years later, on June 7, 1995, as the first Acadian woman appointed to the Senate, I have the honour to address the Upper House.

Honourable senators, during the months of May and June, it is graduation time for many secondary and post-secondary students, for thousands of young Canadians who recognize the importance of education.

In 1992, there were 260,500 graduates of secondary schools in Canada. About 22 per cent of these students went on to post-secondary studies in order to graduate from one of the 278 universities or other institutions of the country. Close to 9.2 million Canadians have undertaken post-secondary studies. Nearly 65 per cent of these Canadians have received a certificate, a diploma or a degree from a post-secondary institution.

[English]

This year the number of university students in Canada was as high as 581,000, an increase in enrolment of almost 8,000 compared to last year. Furthermore, a growing number of Canadians continue their education in a collegial institution. Students who register in such an institution represent 38 per cent of all full-time post-secondary enrolment. More students also registered for professional training programs. They constitute 69 per cent of post-secondary students studying in an establishment other than a university. In fact, 8.1 per cent of young Canadians between the ages of 18 to 21 attend an institution other than university.

[Translation]

In 1995, 389,000 students were enrolled in a community college. Enrolment in job training programs offered by colleges has almost doubled. During this 20-year period, colleges have awarded more than 1.4 million diplomas.

Honourable senators, many of these highly educated graduates are now entering the labour market. Are we ready to make room for them? Do they have a chance of finding a job in their field? The present situation seems to indicate a strong demand for specialized labour, particularly in the high technology and informatics fields.

In a speech delivered on April 25 of this year, the Honourable David Dingwall, Minister of Public Works and Government Services, said that young Canadians are more and more concerned about their future. Employment opportunities are scarce, and the government must help these young people find their place in the labour market. The federal government is counting on post-secondary education to achieve this goal.

Honourable senators, for several years, the federal government has given support, including financial support, to post-secondary institutions through various departments and agencies.

On average, tuition fees paid by Canadian students more than doubled between 1981 and 1991, but, during the same period, enrolment in university programs in Canada increased by 38 per cent. By offering scholarships, loans and grants, the federal government gives many young Canadians the opportunity to continue their education.

• (1340)

In 1994, the total federal financial assistance to post-secondary education amounted to $8 billion, 50 per cent of the total cost. Provincial governments contributed more than $8 billion. There has been a 59 per cent increase in the number of students receiving aid from the Canada Student Loans Program.

[Translation]

There are also federal programs which aim to help young people assume responsibility for their future. For example, most large Canadian cities have student employment centres. Other programs coordinate projects which give them work experience and offer them maximum personal development. For example, Canada's youth program offers young people an access to the job market.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senator Losier-Cool, I regret to interrupt you, but the length of senator's statements must not exceed three minutes.

Is leave granted, honourable senators, to allow Senator Losier-Cool to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Losier-Cool: Increased competitiveness and the realization that education is increasingly becoming the key to obtaining work have made governments treat education as a priority. All existing assistance programs try to make post-secondary education and the job market more accessible, with the goal of training a more efficient and specialized workforce.

[English]

According to the Honourable David Dingwall, one of the most fundamental failures of public powers would be their incapacity to find employment for all those who are apt, healthy and willing to work.

Honourable senators, by putting the accent on better education and training, and by creating jobs for young Canadians, we enhance their optimism. That is the key to getting our economy back on track. By becoming more optimistic, young Canadians will be less likely to depend on government assistance.

[Translation]

Dropping out of high school has serious repercussions. A greater number of drop-outs than graduates are unemployed. They are more dependent on the social security net.

We could reform the school system to include more specialized programs and more productive training, to better prepare young people for the job market.

[English]

FIREARMS LEGISLATION

COMMENTS OF LIBERAL MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, in order to show balance in my approach relative to Bill C-68, I wish to quote today from the House of Commons Debates of February 27, 1995, a speech of Mrs. Carolyn Parrish, Member of Parliament for Mississauga West, who speaks in favour of the bill on the following basis:

> For many years Canadians have watched in horror the increasing use of handguns, assault weapons and rifles in the commission of crimes. In recent years our North American society has become increasingly immune to daily doses of violence, death and injury. Television newscasts and videos feed Canadian viewers a steady stream of carnage. Some of us are shocked; many have become numb as we grow accustomed to the daily onslaught....
> Thirty years ago a domestic dispute in the city of Toronto would rarely if ever involve a handgun. Now police approach every situation as potentially lethal. Thirty years ago police officers did not need SWAT teams, bullet-proof vests or increasingly powerful service revolvers against suspects who are routinely better equipped with the latest weaponry. Just this past week Metro Toronto police received permission to carry shotguns inside their cruisers instead of in the trunks of their cars.
> There is no doubt whatsoever that our society is becoming more violent than Canadians will tolerate. But how are we different from our friends to the south? What makes us want to take charge of this situation and return order to Canadian streets?
> ...From across Canada, this government and every member of this House has heard the message: Get the guns off the streets....
> Three million Canadians own seven million firearms, 1.2 million in the restricted category. Vast numbers of illegal, smuggled and unregistered guns add to this arsenal. Between 1974 and 1993, 65,000 firearms were reported missing, lost or stolen, and have never been recovered....
> A highly efficient computerized system will distinguish legal from illegal firearms and will track them. Police officers when approaching a reported domestic dispute will know if there are weapons in the house. Responsible safe storage by registered gun owners will become a necessity.
> Will violent crime cease immediately? No one is foolish enough to believe that. Criminals will not register their firearms or produce a licence to purchase ammunition. But the underground market fed to a great extent by smuggled and stolen firearms will begin to dry up....
> Registration should not pose any threat to legitimate, responsible gun owners. In fact, they should welcome it. Only the most paranoid of individuals have expressed the fear that big brother is watching.
> In reality, orderly registration will deter theft and smuggling and will assist police. Ultimately, registration will bring the responsible gun owner into a partnership with the enforcement agencies. It will be a partnership based on trust, competence, access to information and accountability.

THE ESTIMATES, 1995-96

VOTE 25—REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ON OFFICIAL LANGUAGES PRESENTED

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the second report of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages on Privy Council Vote 25 in the 1995-96 Estimates.

Wednesday, June 7, 1995

The Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages has the honour to present its

SECOND REPORT

Pursuant to the order of reference of March 16, 1995, your committee, to which Privy Council Vote 25 in the 1995-96 Estimates was referred, has studied the said vote and now reports on it.

Respectfully submitted,

GERALD J. COMEAU
Co-Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Comeau, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION BILL, 1995

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-76, to implement certain provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 27, 1995.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Graham, and notwithstanding rule 57(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

OPPOSITION TO AMENDMENT—PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, I have a petition addressed to the Honourable the Senate of Canada, which states:

WE, THE UNDERSIGNED CITIZENS OF CANADA, draw the attention of the Senate to the following:

WHEREAS a majority of Canadians believe that the privileges which Society accords to heterosexual couples should not be extended to same-sex relationships;

AND WHEREAS societal approval, including the extension of societal privileges, would be given to same-sex relationships if any amendment to the Canadian Human Rights Act were to include the undefined term "sexual orientation" as a grounds of discrimination;

THEREFORE, your petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the Human Rights Code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same-sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the Human Rights Code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination, the undefined phrase "sexual orientation".

The petition is signed by over 400 citizens in Saskatchewan.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COMPENSATION FOR CANCELLED EH-101 CONTRACTS—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, my question arises from a delayed response to a question I asked earlier. That question had to do with the cancellation of the helicopter program and the award of compensation to UNISYS.

In response to my question, asked on April 4, regarding the status of these compensation claims, the government indicated that the $166 million awarded to UNISYS for cancelling the contract the company had been given to install computer systems in the new helicopters did not include a payout of $98 million. The reason is, according to the government, that the $98 million was for work already completed and paid for prior to the cancellation.

The question is this: Would the leader provide honourable senators with a complete list of the work that had been produced prior to cancellation of the contracts?

I am sure that Canadians would like to know what happened to the $98 million. As well, given that the government has already indicated that $98 million has been paid to UNISYS for work completed, I should like to have the government leader confirm that the $98 million and any other costs in this same category will be added to the total cost of the new helicopters. This will ensure that there are no artificial barriers to understanding what this new equipment will cost the taxpayers.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am glad to see Senator Forrestall has not missed a beat in going from one issue back to another one of great interest to him. I shall do my best to get that information for him.

THE ECONOMY

UNACCEPTABLE LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Senator Losier-Cool delivered during Senators' Statements a fine first message in this house. In that spirit, I have a question in regard to job creation.

According to recent reports, we have had very little improvement in the employment situation, particularly in Ontario and Quebec. The only increases in jobs have been in my province of British Columbia, and in Alberta, because of the leadership of Ralph Klein, lower taxes and a better atmosphere in government for business. The only reason for an increase in jobs in B.C. is because of immigration.

Canada now has the highest level of exports to the U.S.A. due to the free trade agreement. This government is now a supporter of free trade and NAFTA. Given that the minister responsible for the further negotiations of NAFTA has talked about job creation as a result of the possible entrance of Chile, and that the government is now a strong proponent of the GST, my question is: With a recession and a possible downturn in the economy on the horizon, does the government find the lack of improvement in the level of employment in this country to be acceptable at this time?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, for reasons of time, I will not repeat all the elements of the preamble that my honourable friend offered, other than to say that he and I disagree on just about every one of them.

Employment in Canada has not improved enough, not by a long shot. It has improved over the last 18 months for a variety of reasons associated with the economy, and the strength of the fundamentals of our economy. Given the strength of growth in the economy last year in Canada, it was almost predictable that such growth could not be sustained at those high levels.

One of the major areas of concern in the economy has been unemployment. Other statistics have improved over recent months, but that particular issue, which is a hold-over from the recession, has been very hard to budge. The government takes no comfort in the statistics. Obviously, no one in this house does either. Statistically the numbers have gone down. However, the number of individuals seeking jobs in this country is far too high and not acceptable to any of us.

I would not concur with my honourable friend that the Canadian economy is going into a recession. The IMF and the OECD recently indicated that Canada will have the strongest growth rate in the year ahead.

Senator Berntson: They are anticipating a Mike Harris victory.

Senator Fairbairn: The strength of the Canadian economy has been proven in the last year and a half. It has certainly slowed in the first quarter of this year, but, nonetheless, in relative terms it is still fundamentally strong. It remains the intention of this government to meet the challenge and to focus strongly on the issue of jobs and job creation, in partnership with the private sector.

Also, this issue is near the top of the agenda of the discussions between the G-7 countries which begin next week in Halifax.

FAILURE OF INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM TO CREATE JOBS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I have listened carefully to what the cabinet minister has said. However, the question of the strength of the Canadian economy is based on influences of the last ten years and the control of inflation, as has been aptly pointed out by others.

The downturn in the U.S. economy, where a major portion of our exports go, is a major concern. Consumer confidence is down again this month in this country. I do not take any enjoyment from raising this issue either. I should like to see unemployment at 4 or 5 per cent as opposed to the 9.5 per cent that we are looking at.

During the election campaign, the Prime Minister waved his little Red Book, and spoke of the infrastructure program and said that the big trucks driving around in the streets would create activity. Ralph Klein has clearly shown by example that less intrusion by government in the entire process creates confidence and generates investment in the province. We could probably take that as a good example for our job creation strategy. Since this is the home province of the minister, she knows how well this is working.

It seems to me that the infrastructure program was an election ploy, and another promise broken. Warren Allmand pointed out adeptly this morning on television that the Liberals are not living by the Red Book. They have obviously found some other book to live by, and they are flying by the seat of their pants, as an honourable senator has suggested.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): As interesting as Senator St. Germain's preambles always are, I again would take strong issue with him.

The infrastructure program has proved to be a great success all across this country. Since the honourable senator chose to refer to the Province of Alberta, let me point out that there is no place in this country where the infrastructure program has worked more cooperatively, more smoothly, and more beneficially for citizens of that province, whether they be in the largest cities or the smallest villages, than it has in Alberta. I believe that our colleagues in the Alberta government would agree with me. I would also remind my honourable friend that there have been great upheavals and increased activity in that province, to which there have been adverse side effects.

With respect to the infrastructure program and the government's determination to continue to maintain jobs as the fundamental issue in this country, there is no movement away from that intention. The one thing with which my friend will agree is that before surging ahead in those areas, strong fiscal measures must be taken to bring down the deficit.

That is the companion equation of this government. It was clearly the underpinning of the last budget, the main thrust of which was to deal with fiscal restraint and at the same time, reorder and restructure systems so that Canadians can continue to have strong services and supports for a growing economy. That is the motivation of this government.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

EFFECT OF ENFORCEMENT PROVISIONS OF AGREEMENT ON INTERNAL TRADE IMPLEMENTATION BILL ON INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Fernand Roberge: Honourable senators, at least three provinces, Alberta, British Columbia and Quebec, have problems with the enforcement provisions of Bill C-88, the internal trade bill. They state that this bill may give Ottawa powers that go beyond what was agreed to last year. For example, there is a worry that Bill C-88 will allow the government to apply any federal law to a province and take any measure that the cabinet feels is necessary. While the Minister of Industry may disagree with their interpretation, those concerns do exist, and the provinces have put this matter on the agenda for today's meeting of the internal trade representatives.

In the interest of removing irritants that may delay passage of this bill before the July 1 target date, would the Leader of the Government inquire of the Minister of Industry whether he is prepared to make amendments to address those provincial concerns?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will certainly undertake to my colleague to put those questions to the minister and seek a response from him.

HEALTH

IMPLEMENTATION OF EXPERT'S REPORT ON PLAIN PACKAGING OF TOBACCO PRODUCTS—CONSULTATIONS BY MINISTER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, very recently the Minister of Health, upon releasing the report of the expert panel on the plain packaging of tobacco products, enunciated the bottom line. I quote:

> ...'all other things being equal' — plain and generic packaging of tobacco products would likely depress the incidence of smoking uptake by non-smoking teens, and increase the incidence of smoking cessation by adult smokers.

Tobacco companies began their rearguard action against plain packaging well before members of Parliament had the opportunity to review the study's findings. They began to register as trademarks virtually everything that appears on cigarette packaging. The words "additive free" or "100 per cent Canadian tobacco without additives" are now deemed to be trademarks of Rothman's Benson & Hedges new brand. Next I suppose we will see a trademark of something called a "healthy cigarette."

The Minister of Health has stated that she wants to consult with other departments and await the Supreme Court ruling before moving ahead. Will the Leader of the Government ask her colleague the Minister of Health whether she will ensure that those consultations begin promptly, and are not used to justify the protracted delay that public health advocates fear, so that we have to wait another three or four years before implementing this good, solidly researched report.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be very pleased to do that.

I notice that the honourable senator made a reference to some company considering the advertisement of a "healthy cigarette." She and I are on the same wavelength on this issue. As a reformed smoker from my misguided youth, I do not believe there is such a thing as a "healthy cigarette."

Senator Spivak: Will the Leader of the Government consult with the Minister of Health to ascertain whether she will make it a priority of those consultations to devise means to dissuade and, if necessary, prohibit tobacco manufacturers from subverting any move to plain packaging through the Registry of Trademarks?

Senator Fairbairn: I would be pleased to take up the issue with my honourable colleague and any other questions on the issue of plain packaging that the honourable senator may have. It is a matter that is dear to the heart of the Minister of Health.

FISHERIES

COLLAPSE OF ATLANTIC FISHERY—LONGER-TERM PROVISION FOR LAID-OFF WORKERS UNDER THE ATLANTIC GROUNDFISH STRATEGY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, when the Atlantic Groundfish Strategy was announced, the Minister of Fisheries talked about funding of $1.9 billion over five years. The bulk of that money was to go to the Human Resources Department to support the Income Support Adjustment Strategy. That strategy would include training, work projects and mobility. We now know from public reports that those projects have not been particularly successful. However, the $1.9 billion funding for five years was an interesting figure at the time.

The Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries was advised last evening that in 1990-91, the fish stocks had declined by 90 per cent; in 1991-92, the remaining stock had declined by another two-thirds, even after cessation of fishing groundfish; in 1992-93, the remaining stock had dropped by another three-quarters, and in 1993-94, by another four-fifths. As a result of information the scientific division now has, and assessing these deplorable results relating to the stock, we were told last evening that, even in an optimistic light, they do not expect the groundfish — the cod stocks — to return for 14 years.

We know that $1.9 billion is not overspending on a five-year average. That has been raised in the other place. We also know that between 35,000 and 40,000 people are unemployed because of the collapse of the fishery. I should like to know what Minister Axworthy intends to do to help those people. What will we do with them for the next 14 years following the expiry of TAGS? What are the plans of the government? Obviously, whatever they are, they are not working, since the reports on the initial endeavour are not very good.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the issue raised by my honourable friend is obviously one of enormous significance and tragedy to her region of the country, and to the country as a whole.

As my honourable friend knows, the TAGS program is in its first year, and I understand that there have been difficulties. Despite the initial projections, many more people have applied for TAGS than had been anticipated. This has led to higher demands for counselling, training, and income support.

The Minister of Fisheries, Mr. Tobin, and the Minister of Human Resources Canada, Mr. Axworthy, are currently reviewing the TAGS strategy with a view to changing it to meet in the most productive way the circumstances underlined by my honourable colleague. I will certainly seek more details for her from both ministers.

In my view, it would be premature to indicate that the TAGS program has been a failure. It may have been overwhelmed initially by the demand, but the program has produced positive results in the area of training, and the preparation for training. This is a part of the program in which I am very much interested.

Senator Robertson: By way of supplementary, does the leader expect a long-term policy for these people? When can we expect the two ministers to make an announcement in this regard? The regional population of Atlantic Canada is waiting for significant responses.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I will try to ascertain a precise timing or direction with respect to the question posed by Senator Robertson.

As I indicated a few minutes ago, the program is under review. Clearly, in the Atlantic provinces, the long-term impact of the problem is a challenge which this government and governments at every level must combine to meet. TAGS has been an initial attempt to solve the problem. It is not by any means a failure. In a sense, the services offered have been successful or helpful enough to attract a greater number of people than had been anticipated.

Honourable senators, there is clearly a need for a long-term strategy. I will seek more information on timing, and any other information that I can find for my honourable friend.

AID FOR LAID-OFF WORKERS UNDER THE ATLANTIC GROUNDFISH STRATEGY—REQUEST FOR STATISTICS

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I would not expect the information which I now seek to be available immediately. However, I will put the leader on notice that when we return in the fall, I would hope to receive statistical evidence from her that will show how many of the 35,000 or 40,000 unemployed have been helped in a permanent manner by this strategy.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): In response, I can only say that I will do my best to see what I can ascertain from the minister.

THE ECONOMY

CREATION OF JOBS FOR WOMEN THROUGH INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

Hon. Marjory LeBreton: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and is a follow-up to the question posed by Senator St. Germain about the infrastructure program and the issue of jobs.

I realize there have been strange definitions of "infrastructure", but I should like to know how many long-term, real jobs have been provided by the infrastructure program.

As a supplementary, I would ask, how many infrastructure jobs have gone to women?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be very happy to attempt to find that information for Senator LeBreton. In terms of long-term jobs, I will ask the President of the Treasury Board what information he can give me.

The honourable senator will appreciate that, initially, the underlying purpose of the infrastructure program was to get things moving. As the honourable senator will know, jobs are short-term in a great number of construction projects across the country. These jobs will last only for the duration of the project. However, the view of the programmer behind the program was that this activity, in itself, would prompt more activity in Canada in terms of producing a greater number of long-term jobs.

Many projects were put on hold for some years, and were thought to have been on hold indefinitely, especially in smaller areas. Given the three-way partnership involved, these projects have been able to produce activity which has been extremely helpful, not only in the number of jobs created, but in the ripple benefits throughout these communities.

In terms of actual statistics, I will be pleased to see what I can obtain for the honourable senator. However, the infrastructure program does operate within a larger context, which I am sure my honourable friend appreciates.

HUMAN RIGHTS

RELATIONSHIP TO AID AND TRADE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Earlier this week, several honourable senators attempted to ascertain from the government its policy on human rights and aid, as well as the policy of the government on human rights and trade. These questions are terribly important. More important, of course, is a clarification of what is the policy of the Government of Canada.

Senators on this side of the chamber are not the only people who are asking these questions. Today's Toronto Star — a newspaper with much affection for the other side — reports in an article by Allan Thompson that Amnesty International has accused Canada of being an accomplice to human rights abuses because of the Liberal government's reluctance to publicly condemn trading partners who are guilty of human rights violations.

Honourable senators, this is not a figment of our imagination. Here is a newspaper of some import which has a great affection for the policies of the other side, but it questions the governments policy as well.

I have two simple questions. First, is the policy of the present government that our foreign trade has been delinked from the human rights records of receiving countries? Second, is it now the policy of this government that our trade will not be shaped by the human rights records of those countries with which we trade?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be pleased to take the specific questions of my honourable friend and try to obtain a comprehensive response for him. By way of the exchanges we have had in this chamber over recent weeks and months, he knows that government policy is not one thing or the other. As articulated by the Prime Minister, government policy has been that we are committed to human rights.

However, in trading with these countries, we are also very critical of human rights violations. We continue to deal with these countries, not only in terms of merchandise but in terms of services of support that Canada offers — projects on legal and judicial reform, women's issues, and democratic institutions. Bringing countries whose record may be open to criticism into greater contact with countries such as Canada is a tool in promoting human rights. It brings human rights abuses into greater focus around the world.

I would repeat to my honourable colleage, this government's policy is not on one side or the other, and we have discussed this matter before. I will, however, undertake to attempt to obtain a comprehensive and more eloquent response for my honourable colleague than I have offered.

Senator Kinsella: I thank the leader for her reply. I know that she and many of her colleagues opposite were leaders in developing the Liberal Party's policy in terms of human rights and foreign policy over the years. However, it has been reported by people outside of Parliament that there has been a slippage away from that policy. That may not be so, but that perception seems to exist. It would be good for Canada, and certainly for parliamentarians, to understand whether there has been a shift in policy, and that we have an articulation of same.

REPORTS ON RECORD OF VARIOUS COUNTRIES COMPILED BY FOREIGN AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: My supplementary question relates to a question that I asked sometime in March. Even in the human rights field, we must be able to measure results and effects. If the government's stated policy of using quiet diplomacy and trade contacts is to be the methodology, that may work, but we will only know that if it can be measured.

It is for that reason that I asked my question last March, and I have not yet received an answer. Has the Department of Foreign Affairs established protocols for the Foreign Affairs officers in overseas posts, and also for trade officials overseas, whereby they are required to report to Ottawa on the contacts they have made in the course of their trade relations, or aid relations, or foreign relations, in raising questions on human rights? For example, do we have a report from any official of the Department of Foreign Affairs having raised, last week in Beijing, the question of the incarceration of a number of Chinese nationals whose human rights activities are displeasing to the government of that country?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I will be pleased to try to accelerate a response to my honourable friend on his most recent question, and on his other concerns in terms of the question of protocols.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on May 4, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Pierre Claude Nolin regarding the Canadian Meteorological Centre in Dorval.

PUBLIC WORKS

CANCELLATION OF BUILDING CONTRACT IN DORVAL, QUEBEC—SUBSTITUTION OF RENTAL AGREEMENT—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin on May 4, 1995)

The Department of Public Works and Government Services Canada has evaluated all reasonable options and determined that the purchase of the facility that houses the Canadian Meteorological Centre in Dorval at this time represents the best value for the Crown and the Canadian taxpayer.

Under the terms of the existing 20-year lease, the Crown has the right to purchase the building after 10 years. That benchmark has just been reached and the Crown is going to exercise this option.

The purchase price for this option, in accordance with the terms of the lease which was signed in 1985, is $8.7 million. This sum is predetermined by the terms of the original lease signed with the owner of the facility. Although the market value was appraised to be $5.2 million, for the Crown this facility has a value of $25 million, this being the sum total of $5.2 million (fair market value of the building), $12 million for special improvements which have already been made to the building to house the Canadian Meteorological Centre, plus $8 million in cost that would be required to return the building to its original state (as would be required under the terms of the existing lease) as well as moving and associated costs.

As the Auditor General pointed it out in his 1985 report, the Crown is basically a "captive tenant" in this facility due to its investments in this building and the prohibitive costs of relocation. The Auditor General also stated that "such a complex computer installation must be in a crown-owned building."

As PWGSC is currently in negotiations with the owner of the building, no information on the purchase process, including the proposals and cost-benefit analysis, can be divulged at this time.

FARM IMPROVEMENT AND MARKETING COOPERATIVES LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. H.A. Olson moved second reading of Bill C-75, to amend the Farm Improvement and Marketing Cooperatives Loans Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few comments about this bill. I have a short version and a long version. In view of the time, I will take the shorter version and just deal with the facts.

The purpose of the bill is to increase the five-year aggregate principal amount of loans which can be guaranteed under the act from $1.5 billion to $3 billion. This bill amends the Farm Improvement and Marketing Cooperatives Loans Act.

When the act was last amended in 1988, the need to seek periodic program extensions was removed by fixing the aggregate principal amount of all the loans made under the current fiscal year, plus the four preceding fiscal years, to a maximum of $1.5 billion. Loan activity has increased dramatically since 1990-91, and, as a result, the $1.5 billion cap could be reached by June of 1995. If we do not proceed with this suggested amendment, lenders would have to stop making loans to farmers under the program once the cap is reached.

Annual loan registrations under the act have more than tripled to $424 million in 1993-94 from $118 million in 1991-92. In the first three quarters of 1994-95, an additional $422 million has been registered. This trend is expected to continue for the next several years. Sustained lower interest rates, an improved farm debt situation, approximately 600 new designated lenders including credit unions in Saskatchewan and caisses populaires in Quebec, and better marketing of the program have contributed to this increase in loans under this act.

Under the act, once the five-year $1.5 billion loan limit is reached, the federal government would no longer be in a position to guarantee the loans made by lenders. This would make further new loan activity under the Farm Improvement Marketing Cooperatives Loans Act impossible. This amendment to the act will increase the five-year loan limit to $3 billion. The department has agreed to move toward cost recovery and will soon be discussing this with the stakeholders, being both the people lending the money — the cooperative institutions — and the farmers borrowing the money.

The program facilitates access to credit for farmers and farmer-owned marketing cooperatives, particularly in rural areas, for a wide range of farm improvement projects. Borrowers benefit from advantageous interest rates and lower equity requirements. The program encourages investment in new machinery and technology, and it facilitates investment in alternate farm initiatives.

Honourable senators, that concludes my remarks for today, although there are some other vital statistics in which some members may be interested. Perhaps they could wait with questions on that matter until they have an opportunity to ask questions of the officials in committee.

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, the remarks I have prepared are along the same lines indicated by Senator Olson. I rise to indicate our support for this bill.

This program has been in operation for 50 years, and it has been pretty successful. We have had many programs in relation to agriculture under different governments. Some have worked out very well and some have not worked out so well. However, this particular program has been a good one.

One important matter in relation to this bill is the timing. The agricultural industry, as a whole, is expanding in several areas. There is a great deal of diversification. Value-added marketing is coming into play. These are important initiatives which have been stimulated both by the former and the present government.

Honourable senators, there is a need for this additional financing. This is not government money lent; it is government money guaranteed. The banks and the credit unions lend it, and they act as the administrators of it. It is also important that we have a representative in every community so that there is no added expense to government on that part of the program.

• (1430)

I cannot emphasize the diversification enough. Let me give honourable senators one or two examples of that. In Saskatchewan, canola has become the crop to produce. It is being sought after internationally, particularly by countries like the U.S. and Japan. The Senate Agriculture Committee just met in Winnipeg with the Canadian Canola Association. They indicated to us the importance of being able to supply canola to the Japanese market, the German market and other markets. It takes additional funds to raise these kinds of crops and to diversify from the traditional wheat crop that we have grown for years.

We support this program fully. Farmers have used it for such things as expanding livestock herds, fencing, buying additional land, operations in diversification, and so on.

Honourable senators, we on this side of the Senate support the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Olson, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

THE BUFFALO AND FORT ERIE PUBLIC BRIDGE COMPANY ACT

Hon. Colin Kenny moved second reading of Bill C-81, to amend an Act respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a simple bill which contains two objectives. The first objective is to increase the borrowing power of the Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Authority from $15 million to $100 million or such greater amount as the Governor in Council may fix. The second objective of Bill C-81 is to transfer administrative responsibility for the legislation from the Minister of Finance to the Minister of Transport.

The Peace Bridge is one of four bridges spanning the Niagara River. It is the second busiest link between Canada and the United States. More than 300 million vehicles have crossed the bridge since it opened in 1927.

In recent years, commercial traffic on the bridge has been running into problems. There are difficulties with congestion on both sides of the bridge and in the plazas that house the customs operations for both countries.

The increased borrowing authority will allow the project, referred to as the Gateways Project, to go ahead, which costs in the area of $114 million Canadian. This capital investment program will take place on both sides of the border, improving the facilities that are congested. It will have a positive economic impact in terms of the work involved and, more to the point, it will expedite border crossings.

The purpose of giving the Governor in Council authority to fix the borrowing limit at $100 million or greater is simply to avoid having to return to Parliament in the event that further improvements will be made to the facility, such as twinning the bridge, which is likely to occur sometime fairly soon.

There are no costs associated with this piece of legislation, as the bill specifically protects the government from liability for the authority's debt, even in the event of default.

The transfer of legislative responsibility between ministers will correct what can only be considered an administrative anomaly. The Minister of Transport has primary responsibility for coordinating international crossings, and it is more logical to concentrate the responsibility for all of the crossings with the Minister of Transport than to have the responsibility for one with the Minister of Finance. Transport Canada assumes certain responsibilities associated with these crossings, such as policy directives, systems planning, granting construction and operating permits, environmental assessment, and so on.

It is a reasonably straightforward administrative bill, honourable senators, and I urge the house to support it.

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, it is a pleasure for me to rise to speak to Bill C-81. I appreciate the lucid and clear explanation given by Honourable Senator Kenny.

I have had an opportunity to get a briefing book from the department, and departmental officials have given me background information on this particular bill.

As has already been pointed out, the Peace Bridge is the second busiest cross-border highway link between Canada and the United States. It carried almost 8 million vehicles in 1984, of which over 1 million, or 14 per cent, were trucks. Approximately $20 billion in trade crosses over that bridge each year.

It has also been pointed out by Senator Kenny that the amendments will allow the authority to finance the Gateways Project, which he described, by increasing its borrowing power from $15 million to $100 million, corresponding with the 1993 change in New York law, or such greater amount as the Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Transport, may suggest.

I am told that the authority intends to market approximately two 30-year bond issues in the United States totalling $70 million U.S. in 1995 and 1997 to take advantage of the lower borrowing costs offered by the pre-tax exempt bonds and to use its toll revenues to service that debt. I am sure that many Canadian municipalities would like to be in the same position.

Finally, we on this side support the purpose in giving the Governor in Council power to fix the authority's borrowing limit at amounts greater than $100 million. That is to achieve greater efficiency by avoiding the need for further legislative amendments. We are in favour of having this bill sent to committee where, with the assistance of the minister and other officials, we hope to complete our review and return it to the Senate without amendment so that it can receive Royal Assent.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kenny, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Consideration of the Final Report of the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide, entitled: "Of Life and Death", tabled in the Senate on 6th June, 1995. — (Honourable Senator Neiman).

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I ask that this order stand in the name of Senator Beaudoin.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands in name of Senator Beaudoin.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY AND REPORT UPON DECISION OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS TO CEASE PUBLICATION OF COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Gauthier, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hervieux-Payette, P.C.:

That the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders consider and report on:

i) the effects on the Standing Joint Committees of the decision by the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons concerning the editing, translation and printing of Committees Issues; and

ii) the need for the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons to consult the Senate before making decisions on matters that concern both Houses of Parliament. — (Honourable Senator Corbin).

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourables senators, I rise on the motion of the Honourable Senator Gauthier to refer the following matters to the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders:

i) the effects on the Standing Joint Committees of the decision by the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons concerning the editing, translation and printing of Committees Issues; and

ii) the need for the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons to consult the Senate before making decisions on matters that concern both Houses of Parliament.

When I spoke on the inquiry of Senator Gauthier during the debate on the motion, I gave notice that I intended to present an amendment to his motion. I will take a few moments to more or less repeat what I said at the time or, in any case, to repeat my reasons for presenting the amendment, which I will read to you in a few moments.

When the matter of ceasing publication of proceedings of House committees was raised, I was the first person in this house to condemn this decision. I condemned it as an attack against the printed word.

Today, people want to computerize everything. For anything to be worthwhile, to be credible, to have any weight at all, it has to appear on the video screen. Printing, which dates back to the fifteenth century, with the invention of moveable types by Gutenberg, is becoming obsolete.

I think this was not an informed decision by the House of Commons. It was a hasty decision. Not enough thought went into it. There was certainly no consideration given to the way we work as parliamentarians in the Senate and the House of Commons. No thought was given to the work being done by many people outside Parliament, and I am thinking first of all of students, academic researchers, writers, and there are many more, including all the witnesses who, at some time or other, over the years, have gone to the House of Commons to make presentations and are interested in receiving the printed version of the proceedings of the committee before which they appeared. They want to follow the subsequent debate in committee, in the House of Commons and, finally, in the Senate, all the way up to the stage where the bill is passed, where a resolution is adopted or a major issue is dealt with.

Not everyone has or can afford a computer to plug in to the electronic networks. I cannot afford one, and like many senators, when I am interested in a certain matter, I take the committee proceedings or the Debates of the Senate, put them in my pocket and read them when I have time, often while I have my morning cup of coffee. I may put a few copies in the car because I know I will have some time to myself at night or on weekends in New Brunswick.

Therefore, while the decision to "computerize" — and I use the term loosely — the deliberations is in itself praiseworthy, it did not compensate for certain shortcomings nor meet certain desiderata or even obligations in the Constitution Act, the Official Languages Act and the rules of the House of Commons, since we are talking about the House. I think that we should think twice about the repercussions of such initiatives on the way things eventually will be done in the Senate.

I certainly do not want to argue with my friend, Senator Gauthier. I cannot support the method he has proposed to the Senate in his motion. I think that he has come to the Senate still dragging the House of Common's ball and chain on his ankle. He is fence sitting between two traditions, the tradition of the House of Commons and the way things are done in the Senate, which is to soberly think things through.

In the Senate, we take the time that is needed to thoroughly review a matter, to let something simmer for a while, when necessary. There is no rush whatsoever. God knows that the Senate has been known to delay House of Commons initiatives.

What I find surprising is that my friend Senator Gauthier, who so tenaciously, vigorously and aggressively defended the entrenchment of the rights of francophones in the Canadian Constitution and wanted to entrench them even more, this time seems to want to go easy on the issue, deferring the issue to the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders. I do not agree.

An issue that is enshrined in the Constitution deserves our attentive review and reflection. I, for one, will not be satisfied otherwise. I do not mean to criticize in any way the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders. It is quite capable of fulfilling the mandate with which the Senate has entrusted it. However, what is of capital importance in Senator Gauthier's motion is that we are dealing with a constitutional issue.

Where are constitutional matters considered in the Senate? In the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Traditionally, it has been this committee. My good friend Senator Gauthier has said, to all intents and purposes, that the House of Commons has learned its lesson. It is water under the bridge. They acknowledged that, constitutionally, they were wrong. I do not think this is enough.

This type of error is unfortunately repeated from time to time. I think that there is cause to consider the nature of the protection the Constitution accords official languages and the obligation to print the deliberations and minutes of committees and of the two Houses in both official languages. It is not, in my opinion, a waste of time to refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. It is fundamental.

Fortunately, the Senate was watching this time. Fortunately, senators rose to criticize what was happening in the House of Commons. We want to make sure this does not happen again. This is why the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will look into the matter in detail and decide, once and for all, what rights, protection and obligations are enshrined in the Constitution.

To this end, I propose the following amendment to the motion by Senator Gauthier:

> That the motion be not now adopted but that it be amended in the first paragraph by striking out the words "Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders" and substituting the words "Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs"; and
> That the following paragraph be added:
> "(iii) the constitutional obligation to print the deliberations and minutes of the standing, joint and special committees of the two Houses of Parliament in both official languages."

The text is in both languages. Unfortunately, I have only one copy. Perhaps we should make some for those who wish to speak.

The Hon. the Speaker: Could you give me the name of the seconder of your motion?

Senator Corbin: It is Senator Petten.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Senator Corbin, seconded by Senator Petten:

> That the motion be not now adopted but that it be amended in the first paragraph by striking out the words "Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders" and substituting the words "Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs"; and
> That the following paragraph be added:
> "(iii) the constitutional obligation to print the deliberations and minutes of the standing, joint and special committees of the two Houses of Parliament in both official languages."

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, right now, without referring to my notes on this subject, without preparation, I wish to give my full support to Senator Corbin, without necessarily withdrawing my support for all past, present and future actions taken by an individual I have always considered to be the champion of the rights of francophones outside Quebec.

This debate is so fundamental that I am very honoured to see the Senate defend these fundamental rights. This, incidentally, is part of the Senate's mandate. This is one of my many speeches which annoy some senators, whenever I say: What are we doing in the Senate? When we talk about defending minorities, we are referring not only to all minorities but also to the French question.

In a little while, I will give you a report on my travels. I have just returned from Czechoslovakia, where I spoke about the very issue of minorities, as I did in Albania and in Kiev and as I will soon do elsewhere.

Personally, I do not consider myself a member of a minority. I do not suffer from a minority complex. If there are minorities in Canada, we French Canadians are not one of them. We are a people, we know who we are, and we have rights.

This issue is so fundamental that I debated this for 30 years in the House of Commons, in the federal Liberal caucus and in committees. It is always the French Canadians who must ask and almost beg on bended knees for respect for what should be vested rights. This is not normal. Either these rights exist or they do not. I could tell you, Your Honour — and you are in a good position to know this — how often we sit quietly saying that there is no time for translation. We get the minimum. If even one MP or senator asks for translation, he or she is not appointed to the committee, so that it can work in English only, thus speeding things up and saving money. That is clearly no way to build a country.

I am always furious whenever a parliamentary committee — this does not occur as frequently in the Senate because of the events of which you are all aware — asks whether an exception can be made. The onus is always on French Canadians to object and take it upon themselves to annoy their colleagues, who are somewhat intimidated and who know deep down that things should not be done this way. That is part of the Senate's mandate.

I am very happy that I rose spontaneously to participate in this debate, because it will prevent me from going a little too far. A little too far because one cannot sit for 30 years in this noble institution, whether it is the House of Commons or the Senate, and get actively involved without accumulating stories to share with you.

This does not make me less of a federalist. Be assured that I remain fully convinced that this country belongs to us, to Senator Hervieux-Payette, Senator Bacon, Senator Gauthier, Senator Prud'homme and Senator De Bané, as much as to all the others. I have never understood why speaking French is seen as a problem. Whenever I hear someone talk about the "French problem", I am appalled that, in 1995, there are still people who do not understand what Canada is all about.

As I said, I cannot go to Slovakia and give conferences on the protection of the Hungarian minority or to Albania and Kiev to speak on the protection of the Russian minority and then, back home, show no feelings for our own minority.

We are not a minority in the sense that we are inferior. It is just that our numbers are smaller. There is no reason to be ashamed. We have constitutional rights. These rights exists in writing and are clearly spelled out.

I regret that it is always the same people, namely us, who have to stand up and say these things. There are honourable senators who have been sitting in this place for 20 or 30 years, who are great fans of Liberal regimes of the past and who fundamentally believe in bilingualism across Canada. There is a will, at the federal level, not to impose bilingualism on those who have no need for it, but why should the French Canadians always be the ones who are bilingual?

I am not asking honourable senators who do not speak French to become bilingual. I am not suggesting that. It is up to them, not to me.

When I was first elected to Parliament, I was not bilingual. I decided to become bilingual; it was a personal choice. My other option was to remain a unilingual francophone, the same way other senators have gladly remained unilingual anglophones. It is their privilege. That is what Canada is about.

Nonetheless, as this country faces an identity crisis, you will find people who will spontaneously jump to their feet, as I just did and have always done, to say that if this country is to exist, direction must come from here, in Ottawa, Canada. I even asked that the name of the province be removed from my calling card, which read: The Senate, Ottawa, Ontario, Canada. I urge you to do the same to show that you belong to Canada, not a province. Ottawa, Canada, is our home. It is your home, Senator Spivak, as well as yours, Senator Cohen. Ottawa, Canada, that is us.

There are fundamental rights. Looking at my friend, Senator Watt, and Senator Adams, I am reminded that they have even more rights than I do in this country. This should be recognized. It is the kind of thing that makes a country a model for the rest of the world.

Your Honour, you have travelled extensively. What does the parliamentary union keep hearing all the time, all over the world about Canada? What does Mr. Chrétien, the Liberal leader and current Prime Minister say about this country? They say that we have the greatest country in the world. To what do we owe that? To the fact that we have respect for our institutions, starting with the monarchy. I respect the monarchy. I say so in French as well as in English and no one objects. I hope that this will come to an end someday, in a calm and orderly fashion.

We have two official languages in Ottawa. They must be respected and there can be no compromise in that regard. Listen to me, I am speaking as if I were still a member of the Liberal caucus.

[English]

• (1500)

That is the speech I used to give in the national Liberal caucus every second year for 30 years, while senators and members of the House of Commons listened attentively.

This is the kind of concern which should be brought to your attention. You should be the artisan; you should be — as is written in the Bible — the witnesses of what you know is best for this country.

Canada is so respected in the world because we adjust, we respect, and we talk. We are different. I have one style of speaking and my friend Senator Petten has another. We are different, but we are no less Canadian for it.

To see Senators Corbin, Gauthier, Bolduc and Beaudoin, as well as myself, joining in spontaneously should send a message: There is no partisanship in this reaction.

[Translation]

It is a nation which is talking to you. It is a nation which is telling you that it has some rights in this country and in this Parliament. There can be no exception. Of course, we can still have lunch together and speak only in English.

[English]

Of course we could do that, but it must be understood at the lowest official level. Please do not put us continuously in the embarrassing situation of having to be the "party poopers," as you say in English.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate has a responsibility to ensure that no exceptions are made. No exception should be made, but we should not be...

[Translation]

— the ones who always claim something which should come naturally. Look at the young people who come here.

[English]

I spoke in the House of Commons to the model parliament of Queen's University from Kingston. Those young people are way ahead of us in understanding what Canada is all about. We should speak to young people more often. They are way ahead of us in understanding that the world is looking at us for reasons other than simply that we are well-fed and well-dressed. They are looking at us because of the way in which we have come to terms with each other, as difficult as that may be. One of the greatest sources of pride in my life is telling the rest of the world how, at the end of the day in Canada, we come to terms with each other.

I do not hesitate to express my views in English, a language which I respect tremendously. Internationally, it is used more than is French. It is a commodity. I have no inferiority complex about that. I attended a meeting in Czechoslovakia last week which was conducted in English. The participants were from ten different countries, and we used English. Indeed, I tell young French Canadians from Quebec to learn English.

I reiterate that this country is so worth saving for humanity that we should disregard petty stuff like this from people who are shortsighted in relation to what Canada is all about. Yes, it costs money, but cut somewhere else. As chairman of the Members' Services Committee in the House of Commons, I was well known for cutting, but not on something so fundamental to us.

I am pleased to give my full support to Senator Corbin.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: I wish to thank the three honourable senators who have spoken so eloquently on this issue in the last few days.

I should like to know whether the Province of New Brunswick is represented on the House of Commons Board of Internal Economy. If there is no one from New Brunswick on that committee, where were the members of Parliament from New Brunswick during the debate on this matter in the other place?

New Brunswick is the only officially bilingual province. Why did the members from New Brunswick let something like this slip through? I do not understand this. Once again, the Senate must clean up what was left undone in the other place. I find that difficult and objectionable, and I should like the leader to tell her colleagues in the other place how objectionable it is.

We have a responsibility to watch out for such things, but surely we should not need to second-guess the House on every single issue. However, it seems that unless we do so, they expect us to close our eyes and allow things to happen.

Surely, even if there are no members of Parliament from New Brunswick on the House of Commons Board of Internal Economy, there are at least some in the Liberal caucus. I would appreciate it very much if the Leader of the Government in the Senate would obtain that information for me. I again thank our three colleagues for their contributions.

I support Senator Corbin. I believe that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, to which he is suggesting this matter be referred, has better resources to deal with it than has the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders. However, if the Senate decides that the matter should be referred to our committee, we will certainly do the best we can.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be pleased to attempt to obtain that information for Senator Robertson.

On motion of Senator Gauthier, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the normal practice is that we adjourn at 3:00 p.m. on Wednesdays in order that committees can organize properly for their meetings at 3:15. In view of the fact that several committee are scheduled to sit and that several witnesses have agreed to appear at 3:15, I move that all remaining orders and inquiries stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is that agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2:00 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, June 8, 1995

The Senate met at 2:00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

NATURAL DISASTERS IN ALBERTA

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, today I want to draw your attention to my home rovince of Alberta and the two natural disasters which are testing the resolve and the determination of Albertans, both in the far north and in the deep south.

As senators will know, for two weeks now, 1,600 fire fighters have worked non-stop to battle some 20 fires in North-eastern Alberta. The latest word indicates that eight of these fires continue to rage out of control there and in the territories despite the tremendous effort and commitment of these dedicated crews. Of particular concern at this time is the fire near Marinara Lake which covers some 78,000 hectares.

A more hopeful sign is the success of the burning control operation around Highway 63, which is the only road link between the city of Fort McMurray and the South. This highway is now open and traffic is flowing.

The courage and determination of the residents of northern Alberta, the fire fighters, and the officials in the face of this natural disaster merits the admiration and respect of those of us who live in the comforts of large urban centres.

While fire blankets much of the north, the southern part of my province is being swept by floods created by extremely heavy rainfall in the foothills of the Rockies and an unusually late melt of large mountain snowcaps. Some 15 water courses, including the Oldman, the Bow, and the South Saskatchewan Rivers have or soon will be cresting, causing the flooding of communities like Eden Valley Reserve, the Blood Reserve, the Peigan Reserve, the Crowsnest Pass, Pincher Creek, Bragg Creek, Black Diamond, Redwood Meadows, High River, Fort Macleod, Waterton Lakes National Park, Taber and Medicine Hat, where 5,000 people are currently being evacuated.

It is not only the towns that are being affected but the surrounding countryside, which includes some of the most productive farmland in the Province of Alberta. My own hometown of Lethbridge is experiencing the crest of the flood as I speak.

Local emergency operations in all communities are responding heroically, and as of today the response assessment appears to be working effectively. As senators will know, the provincial governments take the lead in the response to and operations of emergency situations. However, through the offices of Emergency Preparedness Canada, the federal government stands ready to provide whatever assistance Alberta or other provinces may request.

At this moment, however, my thoughts are with the very human stories that are unfolding around these emergencies, and they are stories of compassion and cooperation that bind communities together in times of distress and define the tenacity and shared values of the people who inhabit this country.

ABORIGINAL WAR VETERANS HONOURED

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, I wish to draw to your attention an event that occurred on Tuesday, June 6. For the first time in history, all aboriginal veterans in Saskatchewan who fought in the First World War, the Second World War and the Korean conflict were honoured by the aboriginal community through a combined effort of the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations, the RCMP and many corporate sponsors, including many government officials. It was an historic day because this was the first time that so many aboriginal veterans were noted by the community at large, and also by their own aboriginal community.

After a rather full day there was a banquet honouring them where an historic medal that had been crafted was presented to all the aboriginal veterans and their families. May I say that in a room of 1,000 people it was a rather moving experience.

It was also rather moving to have had the Senate honoured for conducting a study into the plight of aboriginal veterans after the three conflicts. The contribution of the Senate, the work that we have done, spurred people to reflect on aboriginal veterans and their commitment to Canada and to the war effort.

All of us would have been proud, as I was, to have attended that event.

The elders in an aboriginal setting are very important to the attitude, the vision and the education of aboriginal peoples. The aboriginal veterans were noted because it was their examples and their sacrifices that have spurred aboriginal young people to accomplish many of the wonderful things that they are involved in today, both for themselves and their communities.

The evening, in a hushed room of 1,000, was probably most poignant when Grand Chief Gordon Ahenakew indicated that the way to teach in the aboriginal community is by passing on from one generation to another significant, meaningful stories and lessons. As an aboriginal veteran the lesson that he said was important to him and made him feel like an equal soldier in the war effort was told by his grandfather. He said something to the effect: "Never let yourself be one step behind the white man; but again, never let yourself be one step ahead of the white man. Walk hand in hand and share. This will be the only way that Canada can truly prosper, and aboriginal people can prosper." He ended by saying that that lesson is more worthy of note today than it ever has been.

The evening ended with a tribute to Canadians, all veterans and, in particular, aboriginal veterans. I was pleased to have been a part of it on behalf of all senators.

THE LATE CHARLES STEWART ALMON RITCHIE

TRIBUTE

Hon. Landon Pearson: Honourable senators, I rise to pay tribute to a great Canadian who passed away last night, much to our regret. Charles S.A. Ritchie was a diplomat, an author, a diarist, a bon vivant, a friend, and a truly special and great man.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT BILL, 1995

REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Tenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs concerning Bill C-69, an Act to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions and the readjustment of electoral boundaries.

I ask that the report be printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be adopted?

Senator Beaudoin: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(g), I move that the report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: I have no objection to speeding up the process in the Senate, but this is a very important bill. I attended a number of committee meetings, and I think we are really proceeding very quickly. There are several stages in the Senate, and I was approached very courteously by both sides, which asked whether I would let the bill go ahead. Everyone on both sides of this chamber is aware of my interest in this legislation. I made it clear to the committee that I did not feel like letting the bill go ahead that quickly. It has to be discussed and analyzed. I know what all this is about, not because I am so smart, but because I was at the committee meetings and spoke there, without being a member. Other senators as well should know what this bill is about.

For the time being, I am willing to consider the report stage of this bill. When Senator Beaudoin, a respected colleague, takes the floor, I certainly intend to speak as well, and we will see about the remaining stages. We should leave enough time for the Senate to absorb all the information. I know we can absorb a great deal, but it takes time to understand all the implications of a bill which, I think, is unnecessary and costly. However, to speed up the process, I am willing to give my friend Senator Beaudoin and Senator Petten leave to consider the report stage, as requested. Then we will see about the remaining stages. I would appreciate it if we were told exactly what the amendments are, for the benefit of all other senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: I assume that the Senate has given leave to proceed with consideration of this report.

It is moved by the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, that, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 58(1)(g), this report be adopted now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Beaudoin: Honourable senators, Bill C-69 was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on May 2, 1995. After a presentation by Parliamentary Secretary Peter Milliken, three expert witnesses — professors John Courtney and Ron Fritz from the University of Saskatchewan and Peter Aucoin from Dalhousie University — appeared before the committee to give us their views on Bill C-69. Parliamentary Secretary Peter Milliken appeared again before the committee on June 5.

Considering the shortcomings raised by our three experts, a majority of the committee believes it would be appropriate to propose several amendments to Bill C-69.

The first amendment I will consider is a technical one. Its purpose is to add place of residence to the criteria that should be considered when selecting commissioners.

[English]

In his appearance before the committee, Mr. Peter Milliken, Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader, said that the absence of a residency requirement was simply a matter of oversight. He said that there was no intention on the part of the government or the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs to exclude this requirement or to have non-residents appointed. Mr. Milliken said he was sorry that that requirement was omitted, and that this is something that could be amended in the bill.

[Translation]

Accordingly clause 9 should include a new subclause to this effect.

The second amendment is intended to establish an electoral commission in each province following each decennial census. Bill C-69 proposes the establishment of a commission in a given province only if there is a significant change in the population in the province as a whole. This fails to take into account the fact that there may be changes and movement within a province requiring a redistribution of electoral boundaries, even though the total population has changed only slightly or not at all.

• (1420)

Section 51 of the Constitution Act, 1867 mandates the interprovincial distribution of seats after each decennial census. While it does not deal with distribution within a province, it is possible that an argument could be raised on the basis of section 51 or constitutional convention that intra-provincial readjustments should be made at least every 10 years. To avoid litigation and uncertainty, all provinces should have an electoral boundaries commission established at least every 10 years.

[Translation]

Accordingly, subclauses 16(3) to 16(6), paragraphs 4(1), 4(2)(a) and (b) and clause 5 must be repealed.

The aim of the third amendment is to prevent 20 members from challenging and overturning a decision by the Speaker of the House of Commons on the choice of commission members. Not every province has 20 members. Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba and Saskatchewan do not. Members from these provinces wishing to dispute the choice by the Speaker of the House of Commons would have to find allies in other provinces, allies, who, by definition, are not affected by the Speaker's choices. The potential for abuse and bargaining seems fairly high. Accordingly, subclauses 9(7) to 9(12) should be repealed.

The fourth amendment involves replacing the definition of "community of interest" in subclause 19(5) with the one in the report by the Lortie Commission, recommendation 1.4.6A, which seems fairer, more comprehensive and more appropriate.

The fifth amendment would eliminate the provision whereby a commission would recommend changes to existing electoral district boundaries only if the factors identified in paragraph 19(2)(b) are significant enough to warrant it. This provision was criticized as being vague and ambiguous.

[English]

According to Professor Courtney, this clause confines or restricts the powers of commissions. It means that they are to start from a different operating principle — preserving the status quo rather than seeking relative voting equality.

[Translation]

Paragraph 19(2)(c) should therefore be repealed.

Finally, the sixth and last amendment proposed by the committee is the most important, in my opinion, as it deals directly with the right to vote and the relative equality that goes with it. In light of the reference to Saskatchewan electoral ridings, the Supreme Court appears to recognize that the legislator may, in certain circumstances, justify a difference of up to 25 per cent between ridings.

The committee feels that this difference is much too large and proposes that it be reduced to no more than 15 per cent. Electoral power equality is an ideal that we must try to attain, and in a case like this one, nothing prevents Parliament from having tougher requirements than the Supreme Court of Canada. Although he dissented in the reference to Saskatchewan electoral ridings, Mr. Justice Cory made some remarks that are full of wisdom and invite reflection:

> ...The right to vote is synonymous with democracy. It is the most basic prerequisite for our system of government.
> ...Every vote must be relatively equal to any other vote.
> ...Free people have always sought the relative equality of electoral power.
> ...If the right to vote must have real meaning for the individual voter, the vote of each individual, subject only to reasonable differences based on geographic considerations and on community of interest, must be as equal as possible to the vote of any other voter in any other riding. Any significant reduction of this right to relative equality of electoral power will inevitably make voters frustrated with and distrustful of the election process.

How can one disagree with this statement by Mr. Justice Cory? We should move away from the "one person, one vote" principle only in exceptional and extraordinary circumstances. The committee feels that, although a 15 per cent difference may be acceptable in some cases, the 25 per cent difference is much too large. That is why the committee proposes amendments to subsection 3(2) and paragraph 19(2)(a).

Honourable senators, those are the explanations behind the committee's proposed amendments to Bill C-69.

[English]

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I intend to make a speech on this matter — not a long one, but a speech nonetheless. I do not wish to delay Routine Proceedings any longer. I thought that I might adjourn the debate until we came to government business, at which time the Leader of the Government in the Senate could recall the item, or I could make my speech at third reading later this day. I think we could adopt the report now. Perhaps Senator Carstairs could move third reading and we could adjourn the debate until later today, if that is satisfactory to Senator Prud'homme, whom I see rising.

Senator Prud'homme: It is not a question of Senator Prud'homme being satisfied. We are jumping the gun today.

Senator Murray is saying that Senator Carstairs may like to speak on third reading, as would he. Not only are we not at third reading stage, but permission has not yet been granted to move the bill to that stage. We are still at the report stage, and the report has now been presented by Senator Beaudoin. There should have been a delay. I could have said no.

I do not wish to be difficult. I have followed this bill since day one.

• (1430)

There are many great arguments to be made for consideration by honourable senators, one of which is a savings of $5 million. I do not like to give consent that fast when we are in the process of considering saving so much money.

However, at the moment, we are at the stage where Senator Beaudoin has read his report, and I am happy. I have been consulted, and I agree with Senator Murray that we suspend this debate until after the Orders of the Day so that we can continue the discussion at the report stage. That is what I understood would occur; not to have a motion for third reading.

If we finish this step today, people will have to go according to the rules. If there is permission for third reading today — and, if I understand the rule well, then we will consider each step one at a time. I think we are jumping the gun.

Frankly, I am confused. We are being asked to do first this and then that. I am ready, but please do not confuse our other colleagues. I am confused enough already, and I followed the bill. If I understand well, Senator Murray and I agree that Senator Petten should return to the Orders of the Day and, more particularly, to the debate at the report stage of this bill, because permission was given to do so today.

If there is no other speaker at the report stage, we shall then consider when the third reading will be done. If it is today, fine. If not today, that is too bad. The House of Commons will have to learn not to dump on us at the last minute bills that are of great importance, just to satisfy their egos.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald, that further debate on this item be adjourned until later this day —

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the one item on which there is agreement is that the government will call this item when we get to "Government Business."

The Hon. the Speaker: Debate on the matter will then be adjourned until later this day. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Murray, debate adjourned until later this day.

LOBBYISTS REGISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Lowell Murray, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report:

Thursday, June 8, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

THIRTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-43, An Act to amend the Lobbyists Registration Act and to make related amendments to other Acts, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, May 25, 1995, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

LOWELL MURRAY, P.C.
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Petten, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. William J. Petten (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(h), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, June 13, 1995, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2, 1995-96

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-97, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1996.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Petten, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

TRANSPORT

PENSIONS OF ROUTE CANADA EMPLOYEES—DELAY IN RESOLUTION OF DISPUTE—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and concerns the serious delay in the government's response to the former employees of Route Canada with respect to the status of their pensions.

During the election campaign, as the leader will recall, the government assured the workers that the issue of their pensions would be resolved following the bankruptcy proceedings concerning Route Canada, formerly Canadian National Express, that were then before the courts. It is my understanding that that issue has now been concluded.

I should like to know from the Leader of the Government whether or not there are any further matters which are pending with respect to a court action which might stand in the way of a resolution to the growing and difficult pension problem for these people.

Can the leader tell us what the status of this situation is, if she knows? If not, perhaps one day next week she can let us know, and more particularly, the 250 Nova Scotians, former employees of Route Canada, just where that situation now stands.

As honourable senators can well understand, the former employees of Route Canada are very anxious that this situation be resolved. Approximately two or three years have now passed. This is a difficult financial time for many of them.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand the honourable senator's frustration and urgency of his concern. I will endeavour to obtain an answer for him next week.

AUDITOR GENERAL

DISPUTE WITH DEPARTMENTS OVER UNREPORTED LIABILITIES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate. There is a difference of opinion between the Auditor General and the government on unreported liabilities.

In his recent interim report, the Auditor General took the government to task for failing to include any of the potential cost of environmental clean-ups in the Notes to the Financial Statements. This included about $2 billion for cleaning up toxic waste on federal property. I understand that there are approximately 1,000 sites out of 3,000 that might be contaminated, and about $850 million would be Ottawa's share of cleaning up radioactive waste.

In its response, to be found in paragraphs 2.4 and 3.138 of the interim report, the government says that it will not change its accounting practices to record partial costs.

For years, the Auditor General refused to sign off the books of various governments without a qualifying opinion. The Progressive Conservative government became the first government ever in history to get a clean bill of health for its financial statements.

• (1440)

Would the Honourable Leader of the Government report back as to whether there is any danger that this difference over numbers might result in the Auditor General refusing to sign this year's books without a qualifying opinion? Is that clean bill of health about to disappear?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I would hope not, honourable senators. I will seek information from my colleagues in that regard.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ABORIGINAL VETERANS—REQUEST FOR ACTION ON REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: My question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Earlier today, I made a statement regarding an event that I had attended in Regina for aboriginal veterans. The veterans were impressed that the Senate had unanimously adopted the report of the Aboriginal Peoples Committee, and they asked me to find out from the government when it will be in position to respond to that report.

Their plea was that the response be made as quickly as possible, due to the age of most of the remaining veterans. Since this is a significant time of celebration, they wish an answer from the government to our report. Would the Leader of the Government pass that message on to the government?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I will indeed do that, honourable senators. I will pass the message on to my colleagues the Minister of Veterans Affairs as well as the Minister of Indian Affairs.

I listened with interest to the honourable senator's statement earlier today. I commend all colleagues who participated in that committee's study. The resulting report was a most important one.

Senator Andreychuk makes the very poignant point that this is a group of people who are at risk. I will do everything in my power to accelerate a response to the report of the committee.

Again, I thank all honourable senators, in particular the chairman of the committee, for not only working on the report but for encouraging participation in such events as the one in which the Honourable Senator Andreychuk took part.

CONDITION OF CARPET IN SENATE CHAMBER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a very mundane question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The entrance to this chamber is in a disgraceful condition. One senator tripped on the frayed carpet yesterday. If it requires a fundraising drive to restore the carpet, I would be glad to head it, but the carpet should not remain in its present condition, namely threadbare, frayed, and worn out. Now is the time to take some action.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I accept the question of my honourable friend. I am distressed to hear that there was some difficulty yesterday. I am sure the Senate staff will have heard the question and will ensure that the matter is rectified. I would prefer not to get into the larger issue of carpet at this point, if you do not mind.

The Senate, as all other institutions, is most conscious of restraints and fiscal responsibility. We did make a conscious decision to defer the refurbishing of our chamber in certain respects; a gesture which was much appreciated. However, we will certainly attempt to keep our facilities in good working order.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I thank the Leader of the Government in the Senate for her gracious reply.

I hope there is a remnant of the carpet up in the attic which we can use to get the job done. I have had some amateur experience in laying carpet. I would be glad to do it myself in order to save the Senate some money.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, how could we refuse such a gracious offer? At any rate, I am sure it has been noted, and we will pursue the matter.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION BILL, 1995

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin moved seccond reading of Bill C-76, to implement certain provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 27, 1995.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to have the opportunity to open the debate at second reading on Bill C-76.

The objective of this bill is to implement all of the non-tax measures contained in the February 1995 budget, which is an historic budget for reforms and for renewal.

Thanks to a return to its basic priorities and needs, the government has been able to propose considerable savings in this budget, which will allow it to reach its deficit reduction objectives. The cumulative savings over three years will reach $29 billion, $23.5 billion of which will result from spending cuts. These cuts, honourable senators, were soberly thought out. They go hand in hand with structural reforms which will produce durable and irreversible savings.

[English]

As a result of the government's action, by 1996-97, program spending — that is, everything but debt charges — will fall from $120 billion last year to just under $108 billion. Moreover, the debt will no longer be growing faster than the economy; the debt-to-GDP ratio will have begun to decline. From that point, the government will continue to take whatever action is necessary until the deficit is eliminated entirely.

I wish to turn now to the specific elements of the bill before us today, honourable senators. As the provisions of this bill have already been discussed at some length in the other place, I will simply focus on a few highlights.

One of the most important elements of the bill is the reform of transfers to provinces. The federal government wants to create a transfer system that functions better and is fiscally sustainable.

[Translation]

The cornerstone of this reform is the replacement, beginning in 1996-97, of established program financing for health and post-secondary education and of the Canada Assistance Plan with a single consolidated block transfer program called the Canada Social Transfer.

The Canada Special Transfer for health and social services is a more flexible and mature approach to federal-provincial relations. However, in the present economic conditions, any new system must also be less expensive than the existing one. That is why, when the Canada Social Transfer becomes fully operational in 1997-98, the aggregate of the main transfers to the provinces will total about $4.5 billion less than what would have been transferred under the existing system.

To keep that in perspective, this reduction in transfers will equal about 3 per cent of aggregate provincial revenues. The federal government has imposed stricter demands upon itself.

[English]

• (1450)

Let me turn now to another major area dealt with in this bill, assistance to business. Overall, the government is proposing to cut business subsidies by 60 per cent, including agricultural and transportation subsidies which were designed decades ago. The bill proposes to repeal the Western Grain Transportation Act and to terminate the western grain transportation subsidy paid to railways.

The reform of the Western Grain Transportation Act will result in savings of $2.6 billion over the next five years. It will also encourage the development of value-added processing and the production of higher-value crops. It will result in a more efficient grain handling and transportation system. It will help maintain our market access for grain sales in foreign countries and comply with our obligations under the agreement establishing the World Trade Organization.

A number of further initiatives will facilitate the transition to the new system. These include a payment of $1.6 billion to owners of prairie farmland, plus a $300 million transportation adjustment fund.

The bill also provides for the regulation of maximum freight rates which can be charged by railway companies to move grain from the prairies. During a review in 1999, the Minister of Transport will determine whether these maximum rates should be removed.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the bill also proposes to eliminate the assistance provided under the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act and under the Maritime Freight Rates Act. This measure will result in savings of close to $100 million per year. To help ensure that the elimination of these subsidies will contribute to a better transportation system, the government announced in its budget a five-year, $326 million transportation adjustment program.

[English]

The measures contained in this bill mark the transition to a more focused, effective and frugal federal government. By the time the 1995 budget actions are fully implemented, federal employment is expected to decline by about 45,000. Because the government appreciates the valuable service that its employees provide, it is committed to managing the reductions in a way which is fair to both the taxpayer and the affected federal employees. The bill, therefore, proposes changes to the Public Sector Compensation Act which will allow for an early departure incentive. Other provisions in this bill will permit more efficient and flexible terms of employment, leave and staffing arrangements.

The bill also includes amendments to the Workforce Adjustment Directive so that surplus employees in "most affected" departments who decline departure incentives will cease to be paid after six months and will be laid off one year after that, unless alternative employment is found. This will give such employees a reasonable, but not indefinite, period to find employment elsewhere in the public service.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the President of the Treasury Board recently reached an agreement in principle with public service unions to help employees affected by the downsizing. The government will, through joint employee-management adjustment committees, help these employees find work outside the public service. The bill before us today is a significant step toward financial responsibility and government renewal in Canada.

Canadians have expressed their support for the budget because they know that it will promote fiscal consolidation, as well as a stronger economy. We have an obligation to Canadians to support a bill which will bring into realization the laudable goals stated in the budget.

Given all these considerations, I urge my friends and colleagues in this house to support the bill.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT BILL, 1995

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Tenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented in the Senate earlier this day.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, with this bill, the House of Commons will be putting the country to the unnecessary expense and trouble of a new redrawing of electoral boundaries two years after the present process has been started and 90 days from its completion.

If we pass the amendments proposed in the committee report, we will be saying to the House of Commons, "Very well, have your will, have your unnecessary redistribution, but we will not allow you to subject the process to political manipulation, as you are seeking to do in several provisions of this bill."

Thirty years ago, Parliament, acting on the initiative of the Pearson government, finally gave Canadians a redistribution process that they could respect, a process in which they could have some pride and confidence. That process is soundly based on democratic principles. It is independent of partisan politics. It has been marked by fairness and sensitivity. For 30 years it has worked successfully.

The key democratic principle in that process is that each of us as a citizen has a right to an equal share of voting power. That is the primary value enshrined in our redistribution law. It is the highest priority of the process; it is the objective of the process. This principle is explicit in the act. It was reinforced by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in 1982 and has been further defined in jurisprudence of the Supreme Court of Canada.

• (1500)

Honourable senators, the House of Commons is trying to monkey with that democratic principle in several provisions of this bill. They are trying to tilt the process to serve their own political convenience rather than the democratic principle of voter parity. They are trying to subject this process to manipulation, a process which, for 30 years, has been objective and non-partisan.

In this bill, honourable senators, is a provision whereby 20 members of the House of Commons can challenge, and the House of Commons can ultimately revoke, the appointments made by their independent, elected Speaker to these redistribution commissions.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader in the House of Commons, Mr. Peter Milliken, could not have been more candid than he was in explaining this provision of the bill when he came to our committee. To him, and to the government, this provision is a trade-off. Members of the House of Commons, under this bill, will no longer have the right to challenge, in committee, the revised maps put forward by the redistribution commissions. As Mr. Milliken told us, they wanted to have an opportunity for some say in who is appointed to the redistribution commission. In other words, if they cannot manipulate the process at the end, they wanted the opportunity to manipulate it at the beginning.

Honourable senators, this provision is wrong. It should not be in the bill. One of our amendments would remove it from the bill.

There is also a provision whereby the decennial redistribution can be cancelled in any province where none of the ridings deviate by more than 25 per cent from the provincial quotient. I dealt with some of the implications of this matter, particularly as it relates to Manitoba and Saskatchewan in the present situation, when I spoke on this bill at second reading. I will not repeat now what I said then. All I can add is that three expert witnesses who appeared before the committee told us that this provision is certain to provoke a constitutional challenge.

Two provisions in the bill blatantly instruct the commissions to give preference to existing riding boundaries. Clause 19(2)(c) would permit commissioners to touch existing boundaries only where certain factors are "sufficiently significant." Clause 19(4) defines "community of interest" as including "existing or traditional boundaries." We are moving to delete these provisions. In the case of clause 19(4), we would substitute the definition of "community of interest" recommended by the Lortie Commission.

Finally, our amendments would lower from 25 per cent to 15 per cent the maximum permissible deviation of any riding from the provincial quotient, as recommended by the Lortie Commission. It has been recommended by virtually all of the expert witnesses who have appeared before Commons committees or the Senate committee on this matter. The House of Commons has never quite been able to bite the bullet on this one. I believe we should give them another opportunity to do so. Therefore, in the amendment contained in the report of the committee, we are providing for this reduction from 25 per cent to 15 per cent as the maximum permissible deviation.

Honourable senators, the offending provisions in Bill C-69, the provisions we wish to delete from this bill, would undermine the democratic principles of the act first passed in the 1960s, which the Charter and the courts have reinforced over the years. The offending provisions are contrary to the spirit and the letter of the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing. They have almost no basis of support in the testimony on these matters at House of Commons committees or at Senate committees. They were attacked in virtually every case by the three expert witnesses who appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Honourable senators, in allowing this bill to go forward in any form, we in the Senate are compliant in an abuse of legislative authority by the House of Commons. This unnecessary redistribution will take place because some Liberal backbenchers and some in other parties over there find the proposed new maps politically inconvenient. That is the reality of the situation.

If the Commons must have its way and launch a new redrawing of the maps, the very least we can do is try to stop them from manipulating and subverting a process which for 30 years has earned the confidence of Canadians for its fairness and independence.

That is the purpose of our amendments, honourable senators.

Hon. Sharon Carstairs: Honourable senators, the amendments to this bill were not supported by both parties in this house, in particular by the Liberal senators sitting on the committee. We think the bill, as it presently reads, has merit.

I want to go through some of the comments made by Senator Murray. First, Senator Murray made a plea for a 30-year process that he said was based on the principle of an equal share of voting power. Honourable senators, let us be realistic about what that equal share is. It means that the smallest constituency in the Province of Prince Edward Island has a population of 30,058 people. The largest constituency in the Province of Ontario has a population of 233,302 people. That is hardly equity. The principle is a valid one; it is a good one. However, it is not the only one by which we have, over the decades and over the generations, developed constituency boundaries in this very special nation of ours.

The reality is that we have constitutional limitations in this country. They are powerful and good constitutional limitations. We recognize that our smallest province can never have fewer seats in the House of Commons than it has in this chamber. That is why its populations for individual constituencies are so small.

We also recognize that, particularly in the Province of Ontario and, more specifically, in the city of Toronto and the city of Vancouver, there has been tremendous population growth. Therefore, the number of voters in each of those constituencies has risen rapidly.

In a number of pieces of legislation across the country — I note Manitoba's legislation — distinctions are made. In Manitoba, for example, in the last legislation passed with respect to boundaries, we differentiated between those south of the 53rd parallel and those north of the 53rd parallel. Those south should have a differential of no more than 10 per cent, but those north have a 25 per cent variance, because of their geography and their community of interests.

When the law in Saskatchewan was taken to the Supreme Court of Canada, both the majority and the minority recognized that there would be some discrepancy and that it did not conflict with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In fact, Madam Justice McLachlin said:

> Relative parity of voting power is a prime condition of effective representation. Deviations from absolute voter parity, however, may be justified on the grounds of practical impossibility or the provision of more effective representation. Factors of geography, community history, community interests and minority representation may need to be taken into account to ensure that our legislative assemblies effectively represent the diversity of our social mosaic. Beyond this, dilution of one citizen's vote as compared with another's should not be countenanced.

She went on to say that we should, whenever possible, use the concept, but it is not always possible.

Justice Cory, in his dissenting opinion, went on to say, however, with respect to the two northern ridings:

> The creation of the two northern ridings met all the requisite conditions of the Oakes test, —

Even though they were over 15 per cent.

> — and was justified under s. 1 of the Charter. Geography and demography demonstrated a pressing and substantial need and the creation of these constituencies was rationally connected to the concept that they have effective representation.

We have recognized that equality of one voter for another is not the only condition. I have in my province an extremely large geographical constituency known as Churchill. Churchill is 480,460 square kilometres. It is larger than the entire Province of Newfoundland. It is larger than the maritime provinces put together. If one took all of Nova Scotia and all of New Brunswick and all of P.E.I., the Churchill riding would still be larger. It is four times the size of those three provinces combined. It is 31 per cent the size of Quebec. It is 45 per cent the size of Ontario. It is 73.9 per cent of the size of Manitoba, the province in which it is located. It is 73.6 per cent the size of Saskatchewan. It is 73 per cent the size of Alberta and 51 per cent of the size of British Columbia.

This is an enormous constituency. If it were allowed to continue this way, it would shortly fail to meet the tests of 15 per cent. It has become so enormous because boundaries commissions, over and over again, in my province have insisted on playing as close a part in that role as they possibly could.

I am convinced that in the future Electoral Boundaries Commissions will use the 25 per cent rule judicially, cautiously and carefully, as they have done in the past. Therefore, it does not concern me that that provision would remain part of the legislation.

One of the other amendments proposed is that two members of an Electoral Boundaries Commission should be residents of the province in which the electoral commission is established. Mr. Milliken, the member of Parliament who represented the government before the committee, stated that this was a technical oversight.

Mr. Kingsley, the Electoral Boundaries Commissioner said that he did not believe that it was something we should worry about. He said that it was unlikely that there would ever be the political will in this country for the Speaker to nominate to the Electoral Boundaries Commission of a province people who did not live in that province. I think that is true. No matter what province for which he or she was making recommendations, no one would tolerate someone from outside of that province being given an appointment of that nature.

Another concern of the honourable senators was the sense that the Speaker of the House of Commons could be challenged on the appointments. I read that particular clause differently. I thought that it gave the minority in the House of Commons additional powers. If a Speaker chose to act unwisely and with some partisanship and appointed only people from the majority party, then 20 members of another party could say, "You have shown partisanship and we must hold you accountable. Therefore, we will challenge the individuals that you have put forward". It is a safety factor to ensure that the Speaker only puts forward people who are non-partisan. and would do this job to the very best of their ability, as have boundaries commissioners over and over again in this country for many years.

Senator Murray said that it was wrong for some provinces not to automatically have a decennial census and that this might be challenged. That is true. When asked that question, Professor Fritz said that he thought that was not likely under section 51, that because the Constitution dealt primarily with interboundaries and not intra-boundaries that such a challenge might well not be valid.

However, on the basis of constitutional precedents, if we look at the judgment with regard to the Province of Saskatchewan and the boundary legislation in the Province of Manitoba, violations of the 25 per cent rule or the plus 15 per cent rule were acceptable to the courts.

When the court looks at the decennial legislation, again, it is questionable whether they would be concerned about the intra-provincial boundaries. If we are interested in saving money, what is the point of redrawing boundaries? What is the point of having a boundaries commission, as they did in P.E.I., if they respond and say that there is no need to redraw the boundaries because the population has not moved?

Ask citizens in this country what constituency they live in and most will not be able to tell you, because they change so often. Changes are often necessary because of population shifts, but when they are unnecessary why would we do it? Why would we insist that it be done if it is not necessary?

In my province of Manitoba I have heard from no one. It has been quite public that I have supported this piece of legislation. I have not heard one citizen. I have not heard from an academic. I have heard from no one in my province say, "We want a boundary review. What are you doing supporting this piece of legislation, which will not allow us to make changes in the Province of Manitoba?"

In terms of redefining community interest, the clause that seems to have stuck with members of the committee is the one which talked about present and traditional electoral boundaries as if, somehow or other, "present and traditional electoral boundaries" was a dirty phrase.

Honourable senators will find that the history of most provinces involves electoral boundaries, both traditional and present ones. In committee I spoke about Fort Rouge, a constituency in my province that had existed from 1870 until the last electoral boundary commission decided to toss out the name. Why? It decided that it no longer reflected the people who lived in that constituency, and it did not, because the people were divided into four other constituencies. History will show that there is no such thing as traditional electoral boundaries.

Does it give an advantage to the incumbent? Let us not be naive, the incumbent normally has the advantage. We have seen examples in our political history where that advantage did not hold much sway; 1993 was an example, but to be fair, so was 1958. In the United States 90 per cent of incumbents are returned to the House of Representatives and the Senate, so there is an advantage. However, let us not deny the historical nature of boundaries as they exist. It is not the only condition, nor should it be, although it is a valid one and should be considered.

Honourable senators, the amendments do not enhance this bill. Clearly, the Senate will do what it will do and the House of Commons will then make a decision. I would ask that honourable senators look at the legislation and the amendments in some detail, and evaluate whether or not they enhance the legislation. I think they do not.

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: What would be the effect of a Speaker being challenged by 20 members of the House of Commons?

Senator Carstairs: That is an interesting question. I must say that the other day in committee I made a mistake about the practices of the House of Commons. I stated that the Speaker was challenged, because in my province the Speaker is challenged fairly regularly and I assumed there was a similar rule in this place. Speaker's rulings are probably challenged 20 or 30 times in a session in the Manitoba Legislature and it has no impact on the respect we have for the Speaker. However, in order to avoid such a challenge, the Speaker will ensure that his appointees are good and valid. Therefore, he will not seek to be challenged in such a way.

[Translation]

Senator Nolin: Honourable senators, I am not an expert on the House of Commons. Many among you are better informed than I am, but it seems to me that there should be a procedure, at any rate, in the House of Commons whereby the Speaker's decision can be contested, whether or not this act makes provision for it. I would like to have the opinion of my colleague, Senator Prud'homme, on the issue, but it seems that including a provision in this bill to allow 20, 25 or 10 members of Parliament to contest the decision of the Speaker of the House could seriously compromise the Speaker's credibility, who only recently began being elected by secret ballot. It seems to me that this is a step towards having a non-partisan Speaker in the House and I think that it is our duty to protect this progress.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I must say that I listened attentively, as we all should, to the statements of the honourable senators.

First, I have difficulty understanding why are we trying to redeem this bill if it is unacceptable. Senator Murray tried to demonstrate and explain the amendments that are being made to this bill, which they neither like nor want.

I am trying my best to believe that, if that is truly the case, the best solution would be to vote against the bill. What is more difficult for me is understanding Senator Carstairs' line of thought. Almost everything she said would lead me to believe that, in reality, not only are the amendments unneeded, but the bill never should have been tabled in the House and we should have stuck with the first bill.

[English]

Let the universe unfold. The Liberals know very well how the universe should have unfolded.

I feel sad about this because beating around the bush has never been my forte. We all know the reason for Bill C-18, the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Suspension Bill. We all know why we are stuck with the amendments that were passed, because of the opposition majority in the Senate. I agreed with the purpose of the discussion. We all know it will eventually be referred to the House of Commons. There is a deadline with respect to this bill.

It is obvious that members of the House of Commons will be vulgar, as they are usually, when talking about the Senate. I can tell honourable senators that I intend to respond, word for word, to every insult that is thrown at us from members of the House of Commons. I was a member of that place for 30 years and never knew that I would end up in the Senate. I was known to be highly respectful of the Senate, because it is an institution of Canada. I am sick and tired of hearing members of the other place insulting us, including those in the majority, but more so in the opposition. From time to time members in the other place should be given a lesson on what this country is all about.

I am opposed to Bill C-69 in its present form and as amended. I was opposed to it, I am opposed to it, and I will be opposed in the end. Honourable senators may ask why. It is because some people in the House of Commons did not do their homework. Some members panicked. It is clear, and they have said so themselves. I will not quote every member who stated that he or she did not like it. Four times the boundaries of my riding were changed. I thought for a while there was a conspiracy to get rid of me. I went to court, where I won and I lost. I won my seat anyway. That is the way it should have been. It started with the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson. I am a Pearson boy and a Pearson boy I will die. That should be clear, I have said it often enough. It was a good reform process when it was established, and it is still good. There should be no tampering with this bill by members of the House of Commons. Do I make myself clear? They have a vested interest in this bill. We have succeeded over the years with a law that functions well.

New members, for whom I have great sympathy and affection, panic and say, "I am losing my seat." As far as I am concerned, there is no such thing as "my seat." Rather, one should say, "the seat I have the honour to represent."

This country is a country of exceptions. In this regard, I totally agree with Senator Carstairs.

The Honourable Mr. Justice Cory, for whom I have great respect, states:

[Translation]

...in exceptional or extraordinary circumstances.

[English]

This country is exceptional and extraordinary. New Brunswick should have seven members. They have 10 because they are protected by the Senate. Nova Scotia should have nine members, but they have 11 because of a past redistribution. I need not remind Senator MacEachen that he is the one who arranged to have one more seat in Nova Scotia. They should have nine, but they have 11 because of the Senate. Prince Edward Island has four, when it should have one. They are protected. Someone created an historical grandfather clause so Manitoba and Saskatchewan, which should have 11 seats each, have 14.

• (1530)

We recognize the constitutional, parliamentary and historical elements of the practice. It is a country of exceptions. Why not have 25 per cent, plus or minus? I categorically reject the amendment concerning the 15 per cent because it denies Northern Ontario their due seats. This is a country that has functioned well. It functions well today. It will continue to function well. As I said yesterday on another matter, it is a country in which we have learned to give to each other.

I was chairman of the members' services committee. We allowed more money for geographical and demographical reasons. Everyone is equal in the House of Commons as far as their budget, but some get $20,000 more for geographical reasons, and others get $26,000 more for demographical reasons. That is the way this country functions.

Panic took place in the other place. Because of that panic, people said, "Don't worry, we will scrap the customs." In order to scrap those customs, a new bill would have to be put in place. They invented this monster, Bill C-69, which is before us now. We cannot simply scrap what has functioned well. If we must replace it with something so different, then we must know that it was a good thing to scrap the process in the first place.

If we proceed with Bill C-69, there will be no electoral map ready before June 1997. It is getting worse. Not only will the new commissioners have to produce one proposed map after hearings, they will have to put three maps on the table. Senator Carstairs talked about the confusion this could create. I can certainly understand that confusion.

Is it asking too much of Canadians for them to know the name of the riding in which they live, whether it be municipal or federal? We are spoonfeeding them. They have the responsibility of knowing where they live. They have the responsibility to take part in the political process. Citizenship judges ask new Canadians who their member of Parliament is, who the Governor General is, and who the premier of their province is. We ask that of new Canadians, but it seems that people born in Canada do not need to know the answers to those questions. That is sad.

I take no lessons from the Bloc Québécois in the House of Commons. Senators should be aware of their attack against the Senate. They seek to gain political points in Quebec, so they say we should keep 25 per cent for Quebec. I said that very thing to them this morning in committee. Someone had already insulted the Senate by the time I had arrived. They said, "Senator Prud'homme is here. We will ask him. Did you accept the 25-per-cent clause for Quebec in the Senate?" I said, "No, but I am glad you are in favour of it. You should have accepted Mr. Pierre Elliott Trudeau's Victoria Charter, because he offered 25 per cent forever plus a veto, so thank you very much, friends." I do not think they will ask me any more questions on that issue.

The net effect, honourable senators, is that if we accept the bill, amended or not, there will be no new map before June of 1997. It will cost $4.3 million to redo the same thing that is in existence now. I find that sad.

This morning I was at a meeting of the committee studying the Pearson agreements. To my surprise, it was agreed unanimously — I would have expected a division — to ask the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration for $300,000 to do that study. This is after we cut our employees by 4.2 per cent, so we cannot hire staff this summer to replace staff who are on vacation. We are asked to depend on the floating staff who speak only one language. That is not correct. However, there goes $300,000. I hope this will be stopped by the Internal Economy Committee on Tuesday, if not by this house when it comes before us for debate.

If we do not do anything, if this bill dies a natural death by June 22, I understand we will stay with what is already in place. There shall be a new electoral map ready and functioning by no later than December, 1996.

It is written in the Senate chamber that nothing is well ordained that is hasty and precipitate. That is our duty.

Senators Gauthier, Perrault, Bosa and Stewart, who were with me in the House of Commons, have dealt with this issue once before. As young members of Parliament, we were proud to participate in that debate. It was Liberals in action getting away from the manipulators of our time. Thirty years later, we are falling back into the trap of returning to the past. Do not ask me to be part of that process. I respect what I did and what I fought for. What we did was good, and it is sad to have to revert to the old practice. I cannot be part of that.

I do not wish to comment further on the amendments because they will lend credibility to a bill I am against. I am convinced we are putting the Speaker of the House of Commons in an extremely difficult and embarrassing situation. It is a dangerous bill for the Speaker.

• (1540)

Honourable senators, I am sorry to take up your time, but this is our duty. If it was Friday I would be upset for you, but it is only Thursday.

There are things in this bill that trouble me. I am usually cheerful, but something is troubling me about this bill. I do not know if "trouble" means the same in English as it does in French, but I am troubled.

[Translation]

First of all, chances are that the Speaker of the House of Commons will see his integrity thrown to members only looking to destroy our country. Is that clear?

[English]

They will enjoy this and will challenge it since the Bloc Québécois does not want to have a Canada as we know it — that is, unless they make a deal. Of course, it would be even worse if they were to do that, because it is bound to known. If they do not make a deal and if they do not make a presentation and put no names forward, they will certainly challenge the names put forward by His Honour. This places the Speaker of the House of Commons in an embarrassing position before the House. He is above that.

At this time we need two speakers — the distinguished one here and the distinguished one in the other place. They must be above this danger of being perceived as part of a cabal or part of a redistribution of candidates by appointing people. Therein lies the danger, namely by reopening what is already in existence.

I feel strongly about this. When I feel strongly about something I do not apologize because that is my way of explaining myself. I mean what I say and I believe in what I say.

When Senator Gauthier, the former Liberal Whip in the House of Commons, was stuck he could always depend on me because he knew that I sat on many committees. I was always there. All of them pertained to the same thing. I attended several committees, such as the committee that dealt with integrity, lobbyists, and conflict of interest. Your successor did likewise. On the committee dealing with the Parliament Act I gave up my time during evenings and weekends for one year.

This bill is bad. Will someone bring this to the attention of the other place? I hope that the Leader of the Government in the Senate will do that. It is not too late. We could let the clock go. It is too bad and so sad for those who expect the bill to pass, but if it does not, we will return to what was good. The history of electoral reform was good and we will stick to it.

The Hon. the Speaker: It was moved by the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, that this report be adopted now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Carried.

Senator Prud'homme: On division!

Motion agreed to and report adopted, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill, as amended, be read a third time?

Senator Carstairs: With leave, now, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Senator Prud'homme: Again, it is Thursday night. It is unfair to count the bodies in the Senate.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt. Of course, with the permission of the Senate, we can do whatever we please. However, normally, when permission is requested, it is a yes or no question. Again, if the Senate wishes to hear the honourable senators, I certainly have no objections. What does the Senate wish to do? Is it the pleasure of the Senate to hear Senator Prud'homme?

[English]

Senator Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I have the right to be heard, that is for sure. The question is: Should I or should I not give my consent to third reading? If honourable senators are impatient, I can say "no" and we can study it next week, but I am in the mood to proceed.

The question is not upon third reading; the question is if leave is granted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes. The question is: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(b), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Carstairs, seconded by the Honourable Senator Gauthier, that this bill, as amended, be read a third time now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Prud'homme: I am sorry, Your Honour. I may have misunderstood. Your Honour asked for permission to proceed with third reading, is that right?

The Hon. the Speaker: That is correct.

Senator Prud'homme: I suppose the question now is: Is there any discussion on third reading?

The Hon. the Speaker: The motion for third reading is now under discussion.

Senator Prud'homme: There must be a sponsor for this bill. Surely, someone must have something to say on third reading for a major piece of legislation such as this. I like to listen to arguments, but I hear none.

I gather that no one wants to participate in the third reading debate. If you do not, I will.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed, on division.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—NOVA SCOTIA—DIVERSION OF FUNDS—REQUEST FOR EXAMINATION BY AUDITOR GENERAL OF CANADA—ORDER WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Forrestall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Comeau:

That this House urge the Auditor General of Canada to examine every aspect of the diversion of funds from the Strategic Highway Improvement Program in order to fund the Fleur-de-lis tourist trail in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, and to report to Parliament on this matter at the earliest opportunity. — (Honourable Senator Hébert)

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, events have overtaken the reason for putting this item on the Order Paper. I have a note here from my colleague Senator Forrestall, who has come to believe that this item is now redundant, offering to withdraw it from the Order Paper.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators, to have the item withdrawn?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order withdrawn.

EXPENDITURE MANAGEMENT SYSTEM

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AND REPORT UPON PROGRAMS AND OTHER DOCUMENTS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. H.A. Olson, pursuant to notice of May 4, 1995 moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon Program Priorities and Expenditures as presented in Departmental Outlook and other public documents emanating from the new Expenditure Management System of the Government of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I, too, regret that some anticipated items have caused us to be running later than we expected. I press on with this motion today. It is important to the Senate that this motion be passed or at least that debate begin, so that the matter is addressed before we adjourn for the summer.

This motion arises directly from the government's new expenditure management system which is described in chapter 5 of Part I of the 1995-96 Estimates, as well as in a document released earlier this year by the President of the Treasury Board entitled, The Expenditure Management System of the Government of Canada.

The changes included in the new system represent the most fundamental overhaul of expenditure management in the federal government since the Policy and Expenditure Management System, known as PEMS, was introduced in the late 1980s.

The principal aim of the new system is to enable the government to plan and announce publicly its multi-year expenditure targets not simply at an aggregate level but also for individual departments and agencies. The so-called authorized spending levels, while subject to modifications in the planning process in future budgets, provide a detailed picture of the government's intentions regarding the control of expenditures and the reduction and elimination of the budgetary deficit over a three-year planning period.

Honourable senators will have already observed that chapter 6 of the budget of February 27, 1995, entitled, "Profile of the Federal Departmental Spending", presents authorized spending levels by ministry, and in some cases, by individual department and agency for 1995-96, 1996-97 and 1997-98 fiscal years.

An important part of this long-range expenditure planning is that existing programs and delivery systems will be scrutinized on an ongoing basis to determine whether they remain efficient and effective.

Under the new system, there are no longer any central policy reserves. Consequently, the appropriations requested in the Main Estimates should be viewed as approved ceilings on the resource levels available to ministers and departments.

One likely consequence for the Senate and the National Finance Committee is that the Supplementary Estimates will include few, if any, requests for new funds and more proposals to transfer funds from one vote to another within departments. Indeed the description of the new system states that "all new initiatives, as well as cost increases in existing programs, will be financed through reallocations from lower-priority programs". The only exception will be for statutory programs such as transfer payments for which unanticipated cost overruns caused by changing economic and demographic conditions will be covered by a contingency reserve controlled by the Minister of Finance.

Decisions on new initiatives and spending reallocations required to finance them will normally occur during the budget and expenditure planning process. Parliamentarians and Canadians will be consulted and their input solicited during this process.

Each year following the presentation of the budget and the tabling of the Main Estimates, departments and agencies will prepare business plans for submission to the Treasury Board and will set out their detailed strategies for achieving the government priorities and expenditure targets announced in the budget.

While these business plans will be confidential documents, the departments will prepare summaries of the plans known as "Outlook on Program Priorities" for public release. The outlook will describe the key strategies that departments will pursue to adapt to the financial and policy environment and will be provided to the standing committees of the House of Commons. It does not say the Senate, though.

The committees will use the departmental outlooks as the starting points for their reviews of future expenditure trends and priorities and past performance in the context of their examination of the estimates. They will report their conclusions before the end of June as part of the budget and expenditure planning cycle.

Decisions on new initiatives and spending reallocations required to finance them will normally occur during the budget-planning process rather than on an ad hoc basis at any time of the fiscal year.

Of particular interest to the National Finance Committee is the emphasis in the new expenditure management system on improved information and accountability. A process has been launched by the Treasury Board to revise the form and content of the Estimates, particularly of Part III documents that provide the expenditure plans of departments and agencies.

Your committee has noted over the years that the information on program effectiveness in Part III tends to be incomplete and of very uneven quality.

Departments will now be expected to strengthen their evaluation practices significantly to meet the need for informed reviews of existing programs and decisions on the reallocation of resources.

As well, the evaluation plans and the results of program evaluations will be made available to parliamentarians and the public. In its 1991 report, The Program Evaluation System of the Government of Canada, the National Finance Committee called for improvements to the evaluation practices and for a more sympathetic use of evaluation information in decisions on the allocation of resources to programs and departments.

Honourable senators will note in my comments that, despite the long history of the National Finance Committee in examining the Estimates and its important role in studying questions of the government's financial accountability to Parliament, the descriptions of the new expenditure management system are silent on the roles of the committee and, indeed, of the Senate.

Since the terms "House of Commons standing committees" and "parliamentary committees" are used interchangeably, I believe this omission should be regarded as a bureaucratic oversight rather than part of some conspiracy to eliminate the Senate from the process.

In the course of its review on the Main Estimates, your committee may well decide to address questions to ministers and officials regarding the authorized spending levels for future years that were published in the 1995 budget. I, therefore, urge honourable senators to support this motion which will enable the committee to examine future program priorities and expenditures on a more systematic way using the departmental outlooks and other public documents emanating from the new expenditure management system.

Honourable senators, in conclusion, this is not entirely new. This was tried in 1979, very briefly, by Minister de Cotret in the Clark government. It was followed in the Trudeau government by the set-up of the so-called envelope system. There were allocations and reallocations on both policy and, indeed, funding in many respects during that period. Of course, it was discontinued in 1984 by the Turner government.

In my view, it was an extremely useful process because it gave an opportunity for parliamentarians to examine, along with senior bureaucrats in all departments, the expenditure programs and planning.

The important part here, though, is that when they went to this system, they simply left the Senate out. That is the reason for my motion. If other members do not pick up on this attempt to have the matter sent to the Senate for examination by the National Finance Committee, well so be it. I cannot help that. You either support it or you do not.

It must be drawn to the attention of honourable senators that, in an otherwise good process, someone forgot that the Senate is an important part of Parliament in this new program review system.

The motion is before honourable senators. Do with it as you will. It might be a good idea to remember that we have a function to perform.

On motion of Senator Berntson, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 13, 1995, at 2 p.m.

The Senate met at 2:00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

COMMENTS MADE IN HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, you will be happy to know that, inasmuch as Bill C-68 will be coming to us very shortly, this will be the last time that I will rise in this chamber to remind you of some of the comments that have been made about this legislation in the other place.

Today I am reading from the House of Commons debates of March 28, 1995. Rex Crawford, a Liberal member, as reported at page 11105 of House of Commons Debates, stated:

> I also want to congratulate the whip and Minister of Justice for enabling me to put my views on the record. It is a good sign that members of the government with a different view can join the debate.
> I want to put my perspective, my point of view and my bias on the table. I am a gun owner and have been for over 50 years. I bought my first gun when I was between eight and nine. I am a gun collector and have been for over 30 years....
> We are the many thousands of legitimate law-abiding safety conscious and honest citizens. I and other gun owners applaud two of the four principal aspects of Bill C-68. I totally support the first one on criminal sanctions. It is well known that Canada already has some of the toughest gun laws in the world. The justice system does not enforce the laws we already have on the books....
> With respect to registration some have made the statement in the House that cars are registered and have asked: Why not guns? We are comparing apples with oranges. It is the same as the lady in California who drove down a sidewalk killing 19 and maiming two dozen people. The car was registered. Should any further models of the car be removed from production?....
> The minister stated that in rural areas there have been quite a few suicides committed with guns. Who is to blame? I blame the government. I know of several suicides which occurred when interest rates rose to over 24 per cent and young families could not compete....
> Along with my own personal sincerely held views, I will be voting against the piece of legislation. I should like to take a minute to quote a letter:
> I wish to take this opportunity to thank you for all your help in the past. Whenever I have come to you with a problem or concern you were always there to offer support and assistance. Although we believe that you have been, and continue to be, the best candidate to represent this area, I can not in all good conscience support your party in the next election.
> I have received hundreds of such letters.

I now wish to quote Mr. Leonard Hopkins from Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke. In the last of his comments, as reported at page 11115 in House of Commons Debates, he stated:

> I have voted over 2,000 times in the House of Commons and on only one occasion have I voted against the government. If further changes are not made to this legislation, I am afraid I am going to have to see the second time that I will vote against my own government. That does not sit well with me personally because I am a loyalist and a constructive worker trying to get things done. I do not want to vote against this bill, but if I must, I will. My constituents are not part of the problem with their hunting and their sports clubs that operate throughout the area.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, surely Senator Ghitter knows that making extended quotations from the debates of the other house is absolutely against the rules here — at least, I hope he knows that. If he does not, he should look it up in the Rules of the Senate of Canada.

• (1410)

Senator Ghitter: Honourable senators, I am glad to be advised of that at this point in time, and I promise not to do it again on Bill C-68.

THE LATE CHARLES STEWART ALMON RITCHIE

TRIBUTE

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words about Charles Ritchie. He was our ambassador to West Germany. He was our ambassador to the United States. He was our high commissioner in London. He was our permanent representative to the United Nations and to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. His funeral was last Saturday, in Ottawa. He was 88.

Charles Ritchie was the quintessential diplomat, joining Canada's foreign service in 1934 as part of a team that was, at that time, and still is, considered to be the golden age of Canadian international activity in the 1950s and 1960s.

I first met Charles Ritchie in London during the war, in 1944 at a reception for army officers at the Canadian High Commission. Vincent Massey was our high commissioner. Lester Pearson was our first secretary. Charles Ritchie was the second secretary. The military attaché was General Georges Vanier.

I last saw Charles Ritchie one month ago when we both anticipated our plans for Chester, Nova Scotia, where, as neighbours, we spent our summers together. It will not be the same without him.

Charles loved the social life and, as you would expect, he was very much in demand, He was a natural raconteur, unpretentious, elegant, always friendly, ever sincere, charmingly diplomatic, with a magnificent sense of fun.

For those of you who have not read his diaries, you owe it to yourselves to seek them out. He began writing as a hobby after he retired from the public service and completed four books: The Siren Years, Diplomatic Passports, Storm Signals, and An Appetite For Life. In those four diaries he revealed that he was that rarest of treasures, a man whose public and private life had been very much worth the living.

I send my sympathies to his wife, Sylvia, and his niece, Elizabeth.

FARM IMPROVEMENT AND MARKETING COOPERATIVES LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Dan Hays, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 13, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has the honour to present its

SEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-75, An Act to amend the Farm Improvement and Marketing Cooperatives Loans Act, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, June 7, 1995, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

Daniel Hays
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Hays, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Finlay MacDonald, Chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Pearson Airport Agreements, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 13, 1995

The Special Committee of the Senate on the Pearson Airport Agreements has the honour to present its

FIRST REPORT

Your Committee, which was authorized by the Senate on Thursday, May 4, 1995 to examine and report upon all matters concerning the policies and negotiations leading up to, and including, the agreements respecting the redevelopment and operation of Terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport and the circumstances relating to the cancellation thereof, respectfully requests the approval of its budget application.

Pursuant to Section 2:07 of the Procedural Guidelines for the Financial Operation of Senate Committees, the budget submitted to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration and the report thereon of that Committee are appended to this report.

Respectfully submitted,

FINLAY MACDONALD
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator MacDonald, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(h), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, June 14, 1995 at one thirty o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO PERMIT ELECTRONIC COVERAGE OF PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move:

> That the Senate do empower the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to permit coverage by the electronic media of its public meetings with respect to its special study of Canada's international competitive position in telecommunications, with the least possible disruption of the hearings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(a), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have the power to sit at 2:30 p.m. tomorrow, June 14, 1995, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I have nothing against this committee in particular. It is just that there are more and more committees sitting or requesting permission to sit at the same time as the Senate.

Last week, very important, I repeat very important, legislation was discussed in the Senate, and several senators could not participate in the debate here because they attended committee meetings at the same time. I will grant leave, but I think this is setting a dangerous precedent.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Prud'homme, you could make this point once the motion is open for debate. At this stage, it is only a matter of knowing whether leave is granted or not.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(a), it was moved by the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bolduc:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have the power to sit at 2:30 p.m. tomorrow, June 14, 1995, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Senator Prud'homme, do you wish to speak?

Senator Prud'homme: Without repeating what I just said, I certainly have no intention of targeting one of the Senate's most active committees, but the fact remains that this is an increasingly dangerous precedent.

Very serious issues are debated in the Senate, and I notice that, while many senators attend the Senate, not enough participate in these important debates. Before this session is over, very important bills will be sent our way and very important decisions will have to be made. For example, the debate on the budget of the special committee to review the Pearson Airport contracts will be held tomorrow, since our distinguished chairman, Senator MacDonald, has given notice to that effect.

I would hope that the honourable senators will attend to watch, listen and allow themselves to be swayed, unless there is nothing more to say and all that is left to do is vote, in which case I do not see the point of researching issues and trying to convince the honourable senators that our arguments are well founded. This does not mean that what we say has to be what is ultimately decided.

Leave will no doubt be granted. I am sure Senator Beaudoin is not requesting this leave for no reason. Nonetheless, this is a dangerous precedent and I wish that this power of the Senate not be abused, but rather, reserved for urgent and very specific matters.

• (1420)

Senator Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I will respond. I do not think that the Legal Affairs Committee has abused this power in the past. This is the first time I have asked for leave. Our witness has to rush back home tomorrow afternoon and, since he has testified three times before us, I think that, under the circumstances, we owe him the courtesy of this special leave, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

FUTURE OF AGRICULTURE IN CANADA

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO POSTPONE DATE OF FINAL REPORT

Hon. Dan Hays with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), moved:

That notwithstanding the order of the Senate adopted on Tuesday, March 21, 1995, the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, which was authorized to continue its special study on the future of agriculture in Canada, be empowered to present its report no later than August 31, 1995, and

That notwithstanding usual practices, if the Senate is not sitting when the final report of the committee is completed, the committee shall deposit its report with the Clerk of the Senate, and the said report shall thereupon be deemed to have been tabled in this chamber.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FIREARMS BILL

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by several dozen people from the Province of Nova Scotia which states:

The petition of the undersigned citizens of Canada humbly showeth that Bill C-68, a bill concerning firearms and other weapons, is unwarranted and intrusive legislation which needlessly targets law abiding firearms owners and which attacks the very foundation of the democratic principles of this country.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

G-7 SUMMIT IN HALIFAX—POSITION PAPER NOT SUBMITTED FOR PARLIAMENTARY DEBATE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gérald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and is in relation to the G-7 summit being held this week in my home province of Nova Scotia.

Many will recall the statement made by Senator MacEachen on May 11, when he reminded this chamber of one of the recommendations of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy. That recommendation called on the government to prepare a position paper on issues that will be addressed at the summit, and to debate it in Parliament prior to the G-7 leaders meeting. In particular, that committee was anxious to look at Canada's strategy on the issue of international financial institutions.

Although I realize that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs is meeting this week and that the topic of discussion is the Halifax summit, I do not believe that this would constitute the level of debate that Senator MacEachen had envisioned.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate please advise why Canada's position at the G-7 summit has not been the subject of parliamentary debate, as requested by her colleague?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand that the Foreign Affairs Committee will be meeting tomorrow afternoon and will be hearing a report on this matter. I would agree with my honourable friend, and with Senator MacEachen, that it is late in the day to be receiving this type of briefing. Nonetheless, that briefing will take place, and I hope that there will be a full discussion and that interested senators will be able to put their questions and receive answers through this encounter.

Senator Comeau: As an example, we have seen a copy of a final communiqué that dealt with deficit employment. Could it be that the government has already decided on its position, and wished to avoid having to debate it in Parliament?

Senator Fairbairn: No, I do not believe it could be taken that way. Obviously a great deal of background planning is done for these meetings. The final position of governments will come out as the meetings progress in Halifax.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INITIATIVE OF NATO CONCERNING PEACEKEEPING IN BOSNIA—PARTICIPATION BY CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and concerns Canada's role in the war in Bosnia.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate confirm whether or not the government has, in fact, taken a decision with regard to participating in the United Nations' Rapid Deployment Action Force and in the Canadian-named COBRA operation, under NATO's Operation Determined Effort?

If the Leader of the Government can confirm that a decision has been taken in that matter, can she then explain why this decision was taken without some form of parliamentary debate?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government has made no decision on joining the rapid reaction force, and any reports to the contrary are incorrect.

Senator Forrestall: Honourable senators, I assume that the leader is indicating to us that no decision has yet been taken.

TRAINING OF FIRST MECHANICAL BRIGADE FOR NATO EXERCISES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Will the Leader of the Government answer a question concerning the First Mechanical Brigade? Can she confirm whether or not that brigade, which is based in Edmonton, is currently training to assist in the NATO operations, and will be ready to undertake specific duties as of July 1? Will this operation include, for example, the use of some 2,650 ground forces personnel and 12 Hercules, as well as a Canadian naval supply vessel?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable Senators, I will seek further information from the Minister of National Defence. Although Canada is not a member of the contact group of countries which have been meeting non-stop on some of these questions, our Minister of National Defence has been in Europe and has been part of the discussions there.

• (1430)

Canada, of course, has been making a major contribution to the situation in the former Yugoslavia and is looking at the options that may come forward. In addition, the Canadian government, like all other governments involved in that area, has been part of the discussions on possible needs, should the situation occur that we would be involved in withdrawal processes. However, making a decision on anything of that nature is completely premature.

The discussions continue in the former Yugoslavia on the diplomatic front as well as on the rapid reaction force, and Canada, at this point in time, has not made a decision.

[Translation]

PEACEKEEPING IN BOSNIA—POSSIBILITY OF INCREASING SIZE OF FORCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, my question is supplementary to that of Senator Forrestall. Before putting my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, I will take this opportunity to formulate a short preamble.

Last week, the Honourable Jean Charest, Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, asked your colleague, the Minister of National Defence, for a briefing session on the increase in the number of Canadian peacekeepers in Bosnia.

The Defence Minister had the Honourable Jean Charest briefed by members of the military and by his legislative assistant, a member of the minister's office, who is supposed to know about the latest policies and to keep abreast of any developments in his minister's position.

During that meeting, CF members told Mr. Charest — and the defence minister's legislative assistant confirmed — that the Canadian government had made the decision to send additional troops to Bosnia.

Did the legislative assistant lie to Mr. Charest or did Minister Collenette knowingly mislead Mr. Charest when that information was provided to him last week?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, obviously I cannot comment on any meetings or briefings that were conducted with the leader of the honourable senator's party at which I was not present.

My understanding is that Canada has made no decision in terms of increasing the size of that force. I would be very pleased to talk to the Minister of National Defence and find out from him exactly what is the position of the Canadian government on that matter.

Senator Nolin: The decision of the government on the involvement of the Canadian Armed Forces in Bosnia will be official by the end of the G-7 meetings in Halifax. Will that decision be made public during the meetings in Halifax?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I cannot answer that question. I will check with the Minister of National Defence. In any event, the Bosnian issue will be of considerable interest and discussion at that meeting. Whether announcements of any decisions would come from that particular meeting, I cannot say at this time. As has been made clear, the Canadian government is supportive of that operation, but has not yet made a decision as to our own particular situation vis-à-vis the size of our force. Whether any such decision on that matter will be made public in Halifax, I cannot say.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

CONDUCT OF SECURITY SERVICES IN QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, we all know that the next few months will be a very busy period in Canada, following the regrouping of the separatist forces, as they should be called, and the signature this past weekend, of their agreement, which we saw on television. From now on, each move made by the federal government will be very closely scrutinized.

Last evening, Mr. Lester said on CBC's French network Radio-Canada, that at one time, the RCMP infiltrated Radio-Canada to listen to the various political opinions expressed inside the network.

[English]

In dealing with the RCMP at that time, it seemed that it was necessary for everyone to speak English. They even had the gall to translate an interview with Michèle Tisseyre into English so that the exchange could be understood. Anyone who knows Michèle Tisseyre knows that she would not have said anything detrimental to Canada. It would be like accusing Senator Roux of having made himself available to the separatist forces in the old days. I consider those individuals two of the great pillars of federalism in Canada.

In view of this very disturbing news of what took place at the same time as the other unfortunate events leading to the election of the Parti Québécois in 1976, will the minister give assurance to this house that she will convey to cabinet, in the most vigorous terms, the message that from now on every gesture of the security services of Canada should be under the strictest control, and that they should be given absolute directives. They could be given strict instructions that, while still remaining at arm's length, they should keep within the law of Canada.

Too many bad events took place in the old days, and we are all aware of them. If there is a debate, I will express my views on all of them. Some of us know a little more about those issues than do others, especially those of us who sat in the House of Commons during those days.

Will the minister give us her absolute assurance that there will be supervision of who should and should not work at the French network of the CBC, and who is saying what in the corridor? For those of you who may be hearing about this matter for the first time, it is quite the news item of the day, and action must be taken to ensure that this type of event will not take place again in any way, shape or form.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am at a disadvantage with my honourable friend because I am not aware of the broadcast of last night. I will make myself aware of it, and I will draw my honourable friend's comments in this house to the attention of my colleagues.

ENVIRONMENT

CANCELLATION OF REPORT ON STATE OF ENVIRONMENT—POSSIBILITY OF DISCUSSION ON SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT AT G-7 SUMMIT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, Sheila Copps, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, delivered a speech at Columbia University in late April. In that speech she stated, "In the year and a half that I have been environment minister, I have been hard pressed to find a pro-environment question asked by the English-speaking opposition in Canada." I presume she was speaking of the House of Commons. However, I am not sure what she meant by "a pro-environment question."

To err on the side of caution, I would like to pose a couple of questions for the honourable minister: First, why did the minister allow the report on the state of Canada's environment to be among the budget cuts? Had the government then made a judgment that we do not need to know the state of our environment? What will replace this report, and who has been assigned to do that work?

Second, has the Deputy Prime Minister used her good offices to ensure discussion of sustainable development at the upcoming meeting of the G-7 countries?

• (1440)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): In answer to Senator Spivak's question, honourable senators, I am sure that the Deputy Prime Minister, the Minister of the Environment, was referring to the opposition in the House of Commons, the other place. She knows that there is not a lack of questions in this house on environmental issues, thanks primarily to my honourable friend. I will remind my colleague of this matter as I relay my honourable friend's questions to her.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PEACEKEEPING IN BOSNIA—REQUEST FOR PARLIAMENTARY DEBATE ON INCREASE IN SIZE OF FORCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, I should like to return to the series of questions and responses that started Question Period today, having to do with Canada's plans with respect to Bosnia.

We all know that the House will adjourn on June 23 for the summer. The Senate will be away the following week, apparently, and then back for a week to clean up work sent to us from the other place.

Would the leader take a moment to reflect upon the seriousness of Canada sending troops into what has now become a ferocious war zone without the benefit of debate in the two chambers of Parliament?

We have had many experiences over my short lifetime of failing to take advantage of opportunities to debate issues. We must then live with the regret that we did not discuss these matters beforehand. Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate impress upon her colleagues in the government the urgency and necessity of public debate in the two parliamentary fora before the summer break?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, decisions to do with the future and continuing involvement in Bosnia are of deep importance and concern to the Canadian people, to Parliament, to the government and to the Prime Minister. A number of debates called "take note debates" in the House of Commons relating to this issue have occurred over past months. Indeed, there was a discussion two weeks ago.

A debate and discussion of this nature would certainly be welcome in the Senate. I would encourage such a discussion as events unfold.

As far as the other place is concerned, I will again draw this matter to the attention of my colleagues. There has been a great openness to discussion on this issue in the other place, to draw from the views of members. I am sure we could facilitate a similar discussion in this chamber.

Senator Forrestall: By way of a supplementary question, should the government exercise its option and choose the venue of the G-7 discussions in Halifax to make announcements to the extent suggested, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Deputy House Leader cause such discussion or debate to take place before we adjourn for the summer, even if for only one day?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would be happy to discuss that proposal with my honourable friend and the leadership opposite. Senator Forrestall will know that the inquiry procedure can be used as well in this house, but I would be more than pleased to discuss this possibility with the leadership on the other side.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

RETURN TO DEMOCRACY IN NIGERIA— EFFORTS OF DEPARTMENT

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, those Canadians who are keeping a watch on foreign policy and human rights were pleased with the government's announcement on the weekend, through the Canadian embassy in Lagos, Nigeria, to the effect that the Department of External Affairs has expressed concern with the slow pace of return to democratization in Nigeria. When things are moving in the right direction, we wish to underscore that fact.

However, the Minister of Foreign Affairs has stated that Canada would consider ways to help persuade the military government of that country to return more speedily to democratization. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate share with us what some of those measures might be?

Second, while we are pleased to see this creative and proactive approach in viewing human rights principles and foreign policy by the government, one also needs to ask whether there is a double standard here. While we are prepared to take such action in a country such as Nigeria, we seem to be reticent to do the same with a country such as China.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be pleased to speak with my colleague Mr. Ouellet on the precise question raised by my honourable friend today. I reiterate to my friend what I have said a number of times before: that the question of human rights has been raised with the Chinese by the Prime Minister and other ministers.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on March 2, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Comeau regarding the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency; a response to a question raised in the Senate on March 21, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Comeau regarding the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency; a response to a question raised in the Senate on April 5, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Forrestall regarding the national highway standards for truck safety; and a response to a question raised in the Senate on March 29, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Comeau regarding the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

I should note, honourable senators, that this last question asked by Senator Comeau requested a list of the projects funded by the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency between a given date in 1993 and another date in 1994. It is similar to a question asked in the House of Commons. I am tabling the answer that was given at that particular time because it is exactly the same.

I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on May 11, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Murray regarding the Budget Implementation Bill, 1995.

INEQUALITY IN FUNDING TREATMENTS OF ATLANTIC AGENCIES

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gerald J. Comeau on March 2, 1995)

Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation's base parliamentary appropriation stood at $9,038,000 for 1995/96. This amount will be reduced by 28%, or $2,530,640, over the next three years, starting April 1, 1995, as a result of the February 27 budget.

The $7.2 million increase cited in ECBC's Main Estimates reflects a one-time transfer of funds from ACOA in the amount of $8.5 million, and refers to the 1995/96 fiscal year only.

In June, 1994, Treasury Board approved this transfer of funds from ACOA to ECBC, to assist the Corporation in the funding of various strategic initiatives designed to address economic conditions in Cape Breton further exacerbated by the downturn in the fishery.

When the transfer was approved, ECBC's parliamentary appropriations stood at $10,362,000 for fiscal 1994/95. Subsequent reductions (in grants and contributions and in administrative costs) brought the parliamentary appropriations to $9,038,000 for 1995/96. (This reduction in the actual reference level — $1,324,000 — accounts for the discrepancy between the $8.5 million transfer and the $7.2 increase cited in ECBC's Main Estimates).

CUTS BY MINISTER TO NATIONAL DEFENCE ADJUSTMENT FUND—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gerald J. Comeau on March 21, 1995)

On April 11, 1995, the Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency (ACOA) confirmed that the Base Closure Adjustment Program would be maintained at its original $30 million value. This will be achieved through savings identified in other areas of Agency programming over the next three years.

TRANSPORT

STRENGTHENING NATIONAL HIGHWAY STANDARDS FOR TRUCK SAFETY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. J. Michael Forrestall on April 5, 1995)

Under the Motor Vehicle Safety Act, Transport Canada sets safety standards for new vehicles manufactured in, or imported into Canada. In this regard, there is already an extensive set of regulations governing many aspects of heavy truck design and manufacture.

These regulations are currently being strengthened in the areas of conspicuity markings, automatic brake slack adjusters, anti-lock brake and stopping distance, and cargo tie-down requirements. The earliest of these are expected to be published in a few months, with some expected by the end of the year.

It should be noted that, from information available to federal and provincial officials on the recent heavy truck incidents, the problem of wheel detachments is not the fault of the wheel design or construction but of poor maintenance, or operating practices including overloading, or a combination of these misuses. These matters fall within provincial jurisdiction. Several provinces have substantially increased monitoring and inspection procedures in this regard.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gérald J. Comeau on March 29, 1995)

The information sought by Senator Comeau on March 29, 1995, namely a list of the projects funded by the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency between November 4, 1993 and October 7, 1994, was tabled in the House of Commons on April 6, 1995.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION BILL, 1995

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO REFLECT NATIONAL STANDARDS—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lowell Murray on May 11, 1995)

The amendments which Mr. Martin referred to were introduced in the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance on May 18 and subsequently adopted when Bill C-76 was reported to the House. They are incorporated in the Bill passed by the House on June 6.

These amendments made slight changes to the way the purpose of the Canada Health and Social Transfer (CHST) was described. They were intended to address concerns raised by the Official Opposition by removing any ambiguity about the purpose of the CHST.

Specifically, the amendments:

- changed the description of the Canada Health Act in this bill to make it more closely follow the language of the Canada Health Act itself;
- made it clearer that the social assistance mobility condition is a legislated standard in this bill, which is not the case for shared principles and objectives arising from the consultation process to be led by the Minister of Human Resources Development;
- ensured that the reference to "mutual consent" which the Minister of Human Resources Development will seek in his consultations with provinces is described in the same manner in both French and English;
- made the English and French versions of the Bill more parallel in terms of presentation in paragraphs.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Honourable senators will recall that, on June 5, I gave notice that I would rise to raise a question of privilege regarding an entry in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate concerning the tabling of a report by the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders inasmuch as the Senate, in my opinion, has improperly adopted a suggestion from that committee in the sense that it has not been done in accordance with the required forms of the Senate. In stating that I rise on a point of order, I am transforming my question of privilege to a point of order. I should like to state briefly what the point of order is all about.

• (1450)

I remind honourable senators that, on May 25, the Honourable Brenda Robertson rose in the Senate and, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), moved:

> That the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders be authorized to act jointly with the House of Commons Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs with regard to its examination of the rules and practices governing the operation of joint committees.

Leave was granted, and the motion was agreed to.

I was present in the house when this proceeding took place, and it took place rather rapidly. No explanations were given as to the reasons behind that request, so I thought I should inquire by way of an examination of the deliberations and the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders.

The only relevant passage that I could find was contained in the proceedings of that committee dated May 4, 1995 on page 8:5. I wish to quote these two brief paragraphs, as I believe they are relevant to my point of order. The chair, Senator Robertson, was reporting on the deliberations of the steering committee of that committee, and she said:

> We talked about the informal committee with the House of Commons. I have a letter from Mr. Milliken in that regard. They want an informal committee struck on the joint committee problems brought to our attention by Senator MacEachen in the chamber and other problems that have occurred over the years with the operation of joint committees. They want the informal committee to start working right away.
> Senator Grimard has agreed to represent the opposition in the Senate on this informal committee. We suggest that Senator Gauthier represent the government on the committee because he has extensive experience on joint committees. He was to speak with his leader to see if he had her approval, a matter which he will report on when he arrives. I assume that committee will start working right away.

Senator Robertson went onto explain other matters which arose out of the deliberations of the steering committee.

After concluding her presentation, she said:

> Honourable senators, that is a brief report of the meeting of the steering committee. If there are other issues you wish us to consider, perhaps you could raise them now so Mr. O'Brien ...

—the clerk of the committee—

> ... can put them on the agenda for the next meeting of the steering committee.
> Perhaps we should have a formal motion to approve the work of the subcommittee. Is there such a motion?
> Senator Ottenheimer: I so move, Madam Chairman.
> The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?
> Honourable senators: Agreed.

The motion was to approve the work of the subcommittee. Senator Robertson did not seek the authorization of the committee to report the decision of the committee to set up the subcommittee, and I think that would have been required under standard and normal procedure. When one checks the record, there was no motion to the effect that Senator Robertson, as chair of that committee, should report to the Senate and seek due and proper authorization to join with the corresponding committee in the other place.

I have already read the text of the motion she made, namely:

> That the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders be authorized to act jointly with the House of Commons Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs with regard to its examination of the rules and practices governing the operation of joint committee.

That is, of course, a far cry from seeking authorization for the subcommittee. However, in an umbrella way, if the full committee is authorized to sit with a committee from the other place, then subcommittees may also sit with the committee.

I find it strange that all this came about by way of an exchange of letters. Honourable senators surely recall that when we wish to set up working committees with the other place, we do in fact pass or adopt a motion in proper form in this place and then request that a message be sent to the other place seeking the concurrence of the members of the House of Commons. In this instance, that was not done. In my opinion, it ought to have been done. That is the gist of my point of order.

As an addendum, to my knowledge, another committee of the Senate attempted that procedure in the not too recent past. I do not have the specific references before me, but I have it from an informed source that the committee on Agriculture sought, in the very same fashion, to set up a joint working relationship with a committee of the other place. It did not go very far because, when they requested funds for travelling, those funds were refused to them, and the exercise collapsed. That is the only other instance of which I know.

We should jealously guard the privileges of this house. It must be for a good reason that, when we do want to join forces and our efforts with members of the other place, we proceed by way of a polite and courteous message, leaving each house entirely free to decide on its own. The general reference or powers given to committees do not include the power for them to sit with committees of the other house. They would normally be required to come back to the house and seek that authorization. The message ought to be sent to the other place in proper form.

We learn from my reading of the proceedings of our Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders Committee that it was by way of a letter from the chairman of the committee in the other place that this whole thing got off the ground. Is that the catholic way of doing things? I question it.

Your Honour, I seek your ruling on that procedure.

In conclusion, I certainly have no objection to our committees joining forces with committees of the other place to discuss and examine real problems. In fact, that has been done in the past, by way of the correct procedure. In my opinion, procedure was not respected in this instance. In spite of the fact that the Senate adopted the motion presented by Senator Robertson, it may have been done quite improperly as the chain of procedural sequence was incomplete. It was incomplete between the committee and the motion in the house, and incomplete in the adoption of the motion by the house and the possibility of those two committees working together.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, if I rise to speak regarding this point of order — I would have preferred that Senator Robertson do it, because she introduced the motion — it is because I almost feel obliged to act, as deputy chairman of this committee.

We must bear in mind that the House of Commons made this proposal regarding certain members of the Senate in order to review and possibly propose a regulation regarding the joint committees of the House of Commons and the Senate.

As you know, currently no regulation covers the joint committees of the House of Commons and the Senate. This causes problems.

You will recall the issue of the photocopying and the reprinting of the latest report of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy. The House of Commons evoked Standing Order 86(2), if my memory serves me correctly, to allow the Speaker of the House of Commons to put his grain of salt into this debate and to stop the printing of the famous report, which had cost close to one million dollars.

This was not well received by the Senate, because the Senate was not consulted first. Some of us — Senator MacEachen and I co-chaired — found that this issue needed to be resolved, and eventually a motion was passed and the issue was settled.

• (1500)

That does not take away from the fact that we still do not have a joint regulation. We are still without a uniform regulation, one regulation for the Parliament of Canada, which applies as much to the Senate as it does to the House of Commons. This very serious issue merits an in-depth study.

Mr. Milliken, the chairman of the House committee, wrote to the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders, to ask him informally whether two senators could meet with two members of the House of Commons to open up dialogue on the possibility of drafting a regulation which would apply to joint committees in the future. That was as far as I got. I did not pursue the issue any further.

Afterwards, I saw that the senator tabled a motion, which was passed by the House. Personally, I think that Senator Corbin was right. No official message went between the House of Commons and the Senate inviting the other to take part in discussions, because the original idea was to avoid imposing a traditional structure on the group of four or five people. We wanted to avoid clouding the discussions with too many formalities.

If the Speaker of this House believes that the motion is out of order, perhaps he should say so. Otherwise, I can assure you that meetings between two senators and two members of the House of Commons to discuss a coming regulation or a regulation to be proposed for joint committees is not the end of the world. Such a regulation would be very useful in the future in ensuring that the deliberations and the decisions made in meetings are in accordance with the rules and are acceptable.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other senators wish to take the floor on this point of order, I will take the issue under advisement.

LOBBYISTS REGISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-43, to amend the Lobbyists Registration Act and to make related amendments to other Acts.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION BILL, 1995

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Corbin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lewis, for the second reading of Bill C-76, to implement certain provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 27, 1995.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I rise to speak again on Bill C-76.

After two decades of wildly inaccurate economic predictions by various finance ministers, and promises to eliminate deficits which only resulted in a dramatic increase in the national debt, Paul Martin's second budget was awaited in some quarters with the anticipation usually reserved by the faithful for the coming of the Messiah.

The money markets, the speculators, the money-lenders, the credit raters, Canada's central bank, much of the business community and the financial press had been telling Canadians for some time that we faced one over-arching problem: government deficits and the growing national debt.

The consensus of these interest groups, apparently shared by the government, is that the cause of the debt problem is overspending on government programs, especially social programs. That this analysis is faulty obviously made no difference to the remedy applied. Thus, this budget represents the most extensive cuts to health, education and social programs that we have seen. The Caledon Institute of Social Policy in its excellent budget analysis entitled, "How Finance Reformed Social Policy", has said it as clearly as anyone. The bottom line to this budget is obvious:

> The 1995 federal budget represents a fundamental turning point in Canadian social policy. It was the Liberals who > created the foundation of our social security system in the 1950s, the 1960s and the 1970s... It is now the Liberals of the 1990s who are shaking that foundation to the core — making it smaller and extracting the cement that holds the essential building blocks in place.

With this budget the government ends the Canada Assistance Plan, and thus, ends cost-sharing of the social safety net that sets Canada apart from other nations as a compassionate and tolerant place to live. It will hand over to the province the lion's share of responsibility for assisting the poorest and most vulnerable of Canadians through welfare and social services. It will also end the Established Programs Financing which gives Canadians the security of good health services, no matter their income, and gives young Canadians the opportunity to build a better future for themselves and others by acquiring a post-secondary education.

In place of CAP and EPF, the government has created the Canadian Health and Social Transfer, or CHST, which is a new scheme of block funding. This scheme means both a withdrawal of federal funds and a withdrawal of the federal presence from the social arena.

When it is put in place in 1996-97, the CHST will pay the provinces $26.9 billion — $2.5 billion less than the $29.4 billion that would have been spent under the present system. In its second year, 1997-98, the CHST will send the provinces $25.1 billion — $4.5 billion less than the $29.6 billion they would have received under the old system. These reductions amount to 8.5 per cent for 1996-97 and 15.2 per cent for 1997-98.

What does this mean province by province? In my own province of Manitoba, for example, the figures touted by the Human Resources Development Minister suggest the province will receive just $7 million less next fiscal year — a 0.3 per cent reduction. However, the province's analysis suggests that the move to block funding will mean Manitoba will receive $105 million less for welfare, health and education. That is a big chunk for Manitoba. The difference was explained by whether or not equalization payments are factored into the equation.

Ontario's Treasurer and Mr. Martin were poles apart in their interpretations of what the budget would mean to the "have" provinces. Ontario predicted it would cost the province 90,000 jobs by 1996. An impartial judge, a senior financial analyst with the Dominion Bond Rating Service Ltd., has said that, even with the equalization payments factored into the equation, provinces will see a net loss of $5.3 billion over three years ending in 1997-98.

The four richest provinces — Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia and Alberta — will absorb 95 per cent of the loss. Ontario will be hit with a 43 per cent share of the cut — almost $2.3 billion. Only Newfoundland will see a gain as a result of the combined effect of the CHST and equalization. Manitoba will suffer a 2 per cent cut, which amounts to $105 million.

Not only will federal transfers to the provinces decline substantially, no matter how they are calculated, but the way in which the transfers are made will profoundly affect the ability of the government to exert pressure on how the money is spent. The Caledon Institute analysis projects that:

• (1510)

> In 1994-95, the total entitlement under EFP/CAP was $29.4 billion, made up of $17.3 billion in cash transfers (59 per cent of the total) and $12.1 billion in tax points (41 per cent of the total); by 1996-97, the total entitlement under the new Canada Social Transfer will have fallen to $26.9 billion, of which $12.9 billion will be in the form of cash transfers (48 percent of the total) and the remaining $14 billion (52 percent) in tax points. The cash portion of the total entitlement will fall from 59 percent in 1994-95 to 48 per cent by 1996-97. While the total entitlement in 1996-97 will be 9 per cent lower than in 1994-95, the cash portion will fall by a much larger 25 per cent during the same period.

Early in the next century, 2007-08, it is anticipated that the cash transfers to the provinces will dwindle to zero.

Although the Minister of Finance contends that the Canada Health Act and the protection it provides Canadians will survive this budgetary assault, common sense denies this scenario. The federal government can enforce the conditions of the Canada Health Act that guarantee a universally accessible, comprehensive health system only by withholding dollars for non-compliance — and these dollars will soon be gone. The other problem is that transfers with no enforceable conditions give no guarantee that federal funds allocated for specific purposes will actually be spent for those purposes; that funds for human services or health care will not be spent for highways or debt-servicing charges.

Professor Banting of Queen's University called the quiet erosion of cash transfers a "stealthy" abandonment of the Canada Health Act. He urged the Finance Minister to sever the link between the tax points and the cash transfers and reaffirm the government's intent to continue to be a financial contributor to social programs.

In fact, he suggested that section 36.1 of our Constitution commits the federal government to, among other things, provide equal opportunities for the well-being of all Canadians and essential public services of a reasonable quality. Professor Banting went on to say:

> This component of the Constitution itself is a powerful moral message that the federal government is committed, and should always remain committed, to ensuring that it is involved in the protection of well-being of all Canadians.

The Finance Committee of the House of Commons also recommended that the Finance Minister make the same commitment. It agreed that without cash transfers to the provinces, the federal government will be unable to enforce the Canada Health Act, or prevent the imposition of residency requirements for social assistance. In the committee's brief but sane report, "the committee urges the government to commit that there be a cash component to CHST in the future, and that it will be sufficient to enforce compliance."

The impact of the way in which provinces may deal with a shortage of health dollars is illustrated in my own province. A proposal now before the Manitoba Medical Services Council would see Manitoba follow the example in some other provinces and de-list eye examinations. As a Winnipeg optometrist explained, "This is short–term gain for long–term pain" — that is, in the sense that preventive measures may be abandoned if they are not insured services.

The prospect of diminished levels of funding will also have dire consequences for accessibility to post-secondary education in Canada. Mr. Guy Caron, National Chairperson of the Canadian Federation of Students, during his appearance before the House of Commons Finance Committee, put it bluntly:

> There will be a generation of students with huge debts acquired getting an education and the prospects of no jobs on graduation to pay it off, because the CHST prompts huge increases in university tuition.

What of welfare and social services under the CHST? First, lumping all the money for welfare and social services — not highly regarded programs in these workfare times — in with education and health care raises the danger of these funds getting lost in the mix. Second, the repeal of CAP, the Canada Assistance Program, repeals the welfare rights that CAP guaranteed — the right not to be forced to work for benefits; the right to assistance to anyone who can demonstrate need; and the right to an appeals process. Only the no-residency requirement remains under the CHST. This is a major shift in social policy. The loss of capital will also mean the loss of built–in cyclical protection when the economy is in recession since the federal government will no longer match funds for needed services.

Cost-sharing under CAP also required the provinces to make an initial upfront contribution to social services. That requirement is gone. Most important, although Bill C-76 speaks of shared principles and objectives to be negotiated with the provinces, how will they enforce these so-called "standards" when cash transfers are declining to zero? What if the provinces and the federal government do not agree? It has been known to happen. We are then back to a patch-work quilt of programs such as existed in the "Dirty Thirties" and far from those obligations, beyond the interregional laundering of money and those obligations that Canadians feel for each other and that represent a defining quality of our nationhood.

The irony of this budget is, as I mentioned at the outset, that Canada's social programs are not the culprit of our deficit woes. The Royal Bank's chief economist John MacCallum, that well-known left winger, acknowledged in a recent report that "the highly restrictive stance of Canadian monetary policy" was one of the major causes of steady decline in real per-capita, after-tax income in Canada in every year of this decade. The made-in-Canada recession and the excessively high interest rates have contributed to our deficit woes. Mr. Crow's single-minded insistence on battling inflation without regard to the consequences on unemployment and growth played a crucial role in driving us into the recession of the early 1990s, and in the process, greatly exacerbating our debt and deficit problem.

Linda MacQuaig's book, Shooting the Hippo, has been called satirically by Andrew Coyne "Hooting the Dippo" — he is a "dippo" himself because he has not heard of the Copernican revolution. He stated that Linda MacQuaig was absolutely outside of the consensus. Well, so were the people who did not believe in Copernicus. Linda MacQuaig reminds her readers of the work in Statistics Canada that shows that only 1 per cent of the debt growth is due to unemployment insurance costs; only 4.5 per cent of the growth is attributed to welfare programs across the country; only 3.4 per cent to housing programs; and 6 per cent to pensions. Family benefits contributed not at all. In fact, after 1975 they were cut back so severely that the cut helped reduce the debt growth by 11 per cent.

It is spending in non-social areas and, more important, the obstinate war on inflation through a high interest rate policy that has prolonged the recession. That is the real culprit.

Canada's interest rates have been higher than other countries. For example, last July it stood above 6 per cent; France had 4 per cent; the U.S. rate was under 3 per cent; and Japan's rate was under 2 per cent. This is the view, not of marginal crackpots, but of a number of mainstream economists, and it is reflected in the following paragraph:

> Economist Pierre Fortin estimates that $20 billion of the $49 billion deficit at all levels of government in 1992 was due to lower tax revenues resulting from high unemployment, and another $10 billion was caused by higher social assistance costs.

The Council of Canadians, in its budget analysis, shows that federal debt serving charges have risen from $25.4 billion in 1985-86 to more than $42 billion last year. In two years they are expected to rise to more than $50 billion. The council rightly concludes that "without addressing the underlying problem of overinflated interest rates, only the most drastic cuts to program spending imaginable will have any sustainable impact on the government's fiscal problems."

As a representative of Western Canada, I cannot let this opportunity pass without speaking briefly about one other historic change taking place with this budget: the demise of what was known as the Crow benefit with the repeal of the Western Grain Transportation Act. Prairie Pools Inc., representing Western Canada's largest farmer-owned cooperatives, estimates the first effect of the loss will be an immediate average increase of $16.43 per tonne in the cost of transporting grain and oilseeds. That means a direct decrease in the price farmers receive for their grain — a decrease of more than 10 per cent of the expected price of wheat.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture says that for a number of farmers close to the Manitoba-Saskatchewan border, it will mean increased transportation costs of up to $25,000 annually. It will also mean that farmers who are captive to railways will lose regulatory protection that, in the absence of competition, helped to ensure that they received adequate service and a share of the savings that result from greater efficiencies. It will mean deregulation in the absence of competition.

It will also mean a decrease in the value of land in Western Canada. No one knows to what extent. The $1.6 billion proposed compensation payment to owners of prairie farm land is certainly far less than the $7 billion detrimental impact that farm groups in the west argued the end of the Crow would bring about.

The National Farmers Union has said the "shock therapy" proposed in the budget will hinder western diversification, will leave farmers with less money to change to cattle and specialty crop production and will hurt, not help, the farm economy.

The Finance Committee of the House of Commons heard very clearly that the compensation package was developed with an ex gratia payment notion — not in recognition that there is any liability on the part of government because it has changed its policy.

Honourable senators, this budget process contains some disturbing elements from the point of view of Canadian social policy. First, the Department of Finance, not the Department of Human Resources, has taken the lead position in the government in directing social policy. Second, the Government of Canada is withdrawing its presence and its influence from the direction of social policy. With diminishing federal cash transfers to fund post-secondary education, health care and social services, discussions with the provinces around the issue of national objectives or principles will proceed with a federal government that is without much fiscal or moral leadership.

The most likely result of all this is a country not only with a much lower investment in human resources — about the 1950s level — but with a system of social services which does not have basic, minimum national standards. Bill C-76 also opens the door for the federal government to remove itself from the responsibility to enforce national standards.

Putting the three programs together — health, education and social welfare — will make it less likely that the government will ever use the withholding of money for enforcement. That would just make too many voters angry. Certainly, many critics have indicated that this budget spells the end of medicare as we know it. Thus, these particular cuts will affect the entire social infrastructure of civil society in our country.

In its recommendations to the House of Commons Finance Committee, the Council of Canadians had some very sensible recommendations: for example, that the federal government should continue its federal cash transfers to provinces, perhaps tying them to such indicators as CPI, population growth, unemployment and poverty rates; that CAP not be repealed; that the federal funding for health care, post-secondary education and social services be kept in separate envelopes; and that the federal government retain the authority, in order to ensure that funds allocated to the provinces for specific purposes are spent for those purposes.

Without these safeguards, this may turn out to be the most regressive budget in recent memory.

Hon. Wilbert J. Keon: Honourable senators, I rise to speak to those provisions of Bill C-76 that deal with health care funding. This bill combines existing programs that support health, education and social assistance into the new Canada Health and Social Transfer. In the process, federal support for these worthy objectives will fall by some $7 billion over the next two years.

Honourable senators, at this time, the Canadian health care system is probably the best in the world. Over the past quarter-century, it has been my privilege to be a part of that system as a doctor, as an academic researcher and as an administrator. Our system does not need to be scrapped, as some would suggest, but it must be changed to address some serious problems.

It is because of my faith and belief in our system that I am driven to make some of the strong statements that follow. Ours is an aging population. The first "baby boomers" are about to turn 50. The number of Canadians over the age of 65 will double in the next quarter-century. As a result, the need for health services of all kinds will grow significantly in the years ahead.

Here in Canada, one of the richest nations in the world, people are dying because they cannot access the care they need when they need it. Equally important, people are suffering unnecessarily as they wait months for operations such as hip replacements, cancer treatments and heart surgery. It is not because they cannot afford care, but because they cannot get care in a timely manner at any price.

No one is willing to accept the responsibility for the problems in our health care system. Patients and health professionals point their fingers at the provinces. The provinces point their fingers at the federal government for not spending enough and declare that doctors are seeing too many patients. Ottawa, in turn, declares that the provinces are not respecting the basic principles of medicare.

Honourable senators, it is time to take a very close look at the Canada Health Act. The act sets out five criteria which the provinces must meet in order to receive federal health care funds. These include public administration, comprehensiveness, universality, portability and accessibility. The act goes on to prohibit user fees and extra billing. Timeliness is not one of those basic principles, but it should be.

Honourable senators, I believe that all Canadians have a right to receive health care when they need such care. Very simply, health care must be accessible and affordable. That does not mean that the state has an obligation to pay for all of the health care costs of all citizens under all circumstances. Certainly, the state does not have the right to deny health care under the guise of preserving a universal system.

Indeed, we do not have a universal system. If you have $50,000 and need heart surgery, you can hop on a plane and get it tomorrow in the United States — no waiting needed; no questions asked. The full cost to the health care system of that same operation in Canada is about $15,000. Many people could afford all or a portion of this if they had the option. Most people, given the choice of a six-month wait for life-saving treatment and an affordable expenditure, would choose the expenditure. Under our current system, however, no one has that option.

If governments are unwilling to adequately fund health care, the money must come from somewhere. That may mean allowing private clinics where there are no waiting lists so that we can take the pressure off the public system. It may also mean allowing hospitals and health professionals to charge something to those who can afford it, so that the system can continue to provide services to those who cannot afford it.

Honourable senators, let me present a perspective on the debate over access to health care which I do not think has been raised before, and that is a constitutional one. Both the Canadian Bill of Rights and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms explicitly recognize the right to life. Indeed, it is the very first principle enumerated in the Bill of Rights where section 1(a) recognizes:

> the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law.

Section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees that:

> Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

My chosen field is medicine, not constitutional law. I cannot comment on whether denying patients the right to purchase life-saving health care violates the letter of the Bill of Rights or the Charter, although I would not be surprised to learn that it does. However, I would submit that it certainly violates the spirit of those two cornerstones of our legal system. There is no fundamental justice when life-saving or pain-relieving medical services can neither be delivered in a timely manner by the public sector nor purchased from the private sector.

Michael Bliss, a respected Canadian historian, put it this way in the Ottawa Citizen on May 14:

> What do you do if you've promised to supply people's needs for something and then find out you can't afford to do it anymore?
> You have two choices: You can fund only a certain percentage of everyone's needs, say 75 per cent. Or you can fund the needs of those who have nowhere else to turn, while asking the well-to-do to fend for themselves.
> In the first scenario, no one's needs get fully satisfied. In the second scenario, everyone's do.

Mr. Bliss' comments are certainly food for thought.

• (1530)

Honourable senators, let me deal with another issue, that of the federal commitment to health care funding. The stick Ottawa uses to enforce the Canada Health Act is the threat that transfer payments may be withheld.

Unless there is further federal injection of funds, the declining cash payments provided in this bill may soon make the Canada Health Act irrelevant. For example, it is estimated that in the case of Ontario these payments will run out within 15 years. In its presentation to the House of Commons Finance Committee on Bill C-76, the Canadian Medical Association noted:

> If the federal government is to have an active and credible role in this debate, as it should, then its long-term financial commitment to medicare must be known.

I think the House committee must have been listening. In its report on this bill, it urged the government:

> To commit that there will be a cash component to the CHST in the future, and that it will be sufficient to enforce compliance.

If you listen to the Minister of Health, the Canada Health and Social Transfer will save medicare. I do not understand how taking $7 billion out of the provincial health care and social affairs budget will save medicare.

I do think that it is time the government cleared the air on the matter of health care funding. We have heard the Prime Minister say that we need to cut our health care spending to 8 per cent of gross domestic product from 10 per cent. We have not heard him say how he expects the provinces to cut their health care spending by $16 billion. We have heard the Minister of Health threaten Alberta with financial penalties for mixing private and public medicine, without saying what is essential and what is not.

The Prime Minister must be commended for the establishment of the National Forum on Health and for the appointment of excellent people. However, it will be some time before the recommendations come forth and are implemented, and I believe there are problems which require addressing now.

Honourable senators, I think it is time to have a real debate on the future of health care in this country. It is time to ask Canadians what kind of health care system they really want, and to then determine the best methods to achieve it at the least cost. It is certainly time to stop pretending that the system can continue without change.

SECOND READING

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier moved the second reading of Bill C-97, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1996.

Honourable senators, the bill before you today is Appropriation Bill No. 2 for 1995-96, which provides for about $34.4 billion in new spending authority or the balance of the Main Estimates for 1995-96. That is a lot of money!

The Main Estimates for the current year, as you may recall, were tabled in the Senate on February 28, 1995 and subsequently referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Out of the total Estimates, which this year represent $164.2 billion, the government is seeking parliamentary approval for $48 billion, the remaining $116.2 billion being statutory payments which have already received parliamentary approval.

The Main Estimates include $2.3 billion of $4.3 billion in spending cuts achieved through the government's program review. As you may recall, last fall the federal government conducted a comprehensive review of all its programs to identify its core roles and responsibilities and reallocate resources to priority sectors in the interests of increased effectiveness and efficiency.

Program review is doing well. In fact, the process has now ended, and I think it was more extensive than previous initiatives for across-the-board cuts in spending, at least in my experience. In the departments, the process resulted in a series of decisions to reduce spending and reallocate resources, as shown in the 1995 budget brought down by the Minister of Finance, Mr. Paul Martin. The results testify to the government's commitment to reduce spending, streamline operations and make drastic changes in terms of availability and delivery.

Briefly, we are determined to rethink government. I imagine honourable senators are keen to talk about a subject that is all the rage in the United States, and I am referring to re-inventing the government. There is an interesting book on the subject I read last year, which talks about the new administration and how its main concern should be those two big words: effectiveness and efficiency.

The Main Estimates tabled this year so far total $164.8 billion and provide for parliamentary approval of $48.2 billion, of which $48 billion is budgetary and $200 million non-budgetary, as well as $116.6 billion in statutory payments, of which $116.2 billion is budgetary and $400 million is non-budgetary.

[English]

For those of us who want to know what is a budgetary expenditure and a non-budgetary expenditure, I asked the department to give me a brief explanation. A budgetary expense is a day-to-day expense of government, such as salaries and wages of public servants, travel, accounting, et cetera. That means everything that affects income. A non-budgetary expense is what the government loans, buying shares that will bring a return, such as loans to Crown corporations, loans to Indian bands and others.

Bill C-97 is Appropriation Bill No. 2 for the period April 1, 1995 to March 31, 1996. It asks for the approval of the difference — around $34 billion — between the expenditures contained in the budget and the amount already approved by Parliament March last; which was three-twelfths of the budget, and approval of the other nine-twelfths is what we are looking for today in Bill C-97

Honourable senators, having made those remarks, I rest my case. If I understand this process, usually it is rather dry and technical. If anyone has any questions I will try to answer them, but I would prefer to take them as notice so that I can look into all the papers that I have been given and perhaps explain further some of the intricacies.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, as Senator Gauthier has pointed out, this bill, when passed, will provide the government with the amounts covered by the Estimates tabled in both houses some months ago. These Estimates are currently before the Senate Standing Committee on National Finance for study, which has begun and will continue over the months ahead. The members of the committee will decide which items in the Estimates are worthy of closer consideration or in-depth consideration, and the committee will report to this house in due course. It has not been the custom of this house to delay appropriations bills. Indeed, it has been our custom to cooperate with the government in trying to get them through as quickly as possible.

If Senator Gauthier, or the leadership opposite, can assure us that this bill is in the standard form and contains no hidden surprises or sticky curves, we will be most pleased to accede to the passage of the bill. This does not preclude any other senator who wishes to speak on the bill from doing so, but I am simply saying that this side has no intention of delaying the bill.

Senator Gauthier: Honourable senators —

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if Honourable Senator Gauthier speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill, unless he is replying to a question.

Senator Gauthier: Honourable senators, I am replying to a request rather than a question. The assurance I was given by the authorities is that, indeed, the bill contains some traditional presentations and the usual clauses. It has no glitches.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other senator wishes to speak, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Gauthier, seconded by the Honourable Senator Losier-Cool, that this bill be read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

THE ESTIMATES, 1995-96

VOTE 25—REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ON OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages (Privy Council Vote 25 — The Estimates, 1995-96), presented in the Senate on June 7, 1995. — (Honourable Senator Comeau)

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, I have just a few thoughts concerning the committee. The Joint Committee on Official Languages is a committee of parliamentarians from both the House of Commons and the Senate. This committee reviews programs aimed at protecting and promoting Canada's linguistic minorities. It meets with ministers and officials from Heritage Canada and Treasury Board, with the Commissioner of Official Language, and with many others.

The main goal of the committee is to examine how responsible departments and agencies comply with constitutional requirements and other language provisions, and with sections 41 and 42 of the Official Languages Act. The joint committee is important because it is a formal group. It must be noted that not all parliamentarians on this committee agree with the constitutional and legislative provisions aimed at ensuring the survival of minority language communities, particularly anglophones in Quebec and francophones outside Quebec.

In both the Senate and the House of Commons, are many parliamentarians representing regions or ridings outside Quebec with significant francophone communities. Our Speaker himself represents such a region.

Senator Louis Robichaud was the first senator to join this parliamentary group in 1992, and the group has been meeting regularly ever since. I see that Senator Robichaud is present and I take this opportunity to thank him.

The members of this group, called the Robichaud Group after him, have an information and consultation forum on the challenges facing the francophone and Acadian communities. Individual members remain free to act according to their personal beliefs or party lines.

The group meets informally with groups involved in the development of francophone and Acadian communities in Canada to share and exchange ideas. Issues are varied and important. I cannot list them all but there is the military college in Kingston, RDI, the devolution of services to the provinces, the enforcement of sections 41 and 42 of the Official Languages Act, to name a few.

I think this sharing amongst parliamentarians from different political parties is essential and that the dialogue that ensues with representatives of the communities can only be productive.

I had promised to make it short, honourable senators. That is it.

Honourable senators, I move that this report be adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt this report?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the final report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide, entitled: "Of Life and Death", tabled in the Senate on June 6, 1995. — (Honourable Senator Neiman)

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, to speak on life and death is quite a challenge; few things are more difficult. The debate is philosophical, medical and legal; in short, it is a societal debate. I will deal mainly with the legal question.

Our report deals mainly with matters coming under federal jurisdiction like the Criminal Code and criminal procedure, but also with provincial matters, like the administration of justice, the Civil Code of Quebec, living wills and the domains of hospitals and health.

We have analyzed the relevant case law, in particular the Nancy B., Latimer and Brush cases. We have considered also the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms of 1982. We have, of course, studied in depth the Sue Rodriguez case.

We have also made a comparative law study on euthanasia and assisted suicide in the U.K., U.S.A., France, Australia, Germany, Holland, Sweden and Switzerland. The situation may differ from one country to another. In all these countries euthanasia is prohibited, in principle, except in one northern territory of Australia. In Holland, however, the courts have created the exception of medical necessity. Assisted suicide is not legalized, in principle, except in Germany and Switzerland, under certain conditions, and in one or two states of the United States, where assisted suicide remains a little bit in limbo.

The first thing we did was to draft a lexicon, a vocabulary. There is no use talking about such difficult problems, if we do not agree on the terms and definitions to start with. The lexicon was agreed to by all members. We devoted long hours to it.

We did not consider assisted suicide and euthanasia only. Early on, we discovered that it was essential to study palliative care, total sedation, treatment aimed at alleviating suffering that could shorten life, witholding and withdrawal of life-sustaining treatment. We were unanimous on those subjects. This may go a long way to solve our problems.

Each act may be qualified as voluntary — done in accordance with the wishes of a competent individual or a valid directive given in advance; involuntary — done against the wishes of a competent individual or a valid directive given in advance; and non-voluntary — ignoring the wishes of a competent or of an incompetent individual.

We all agree on the necessity of legislation on living wills. We have in Canada two systems of private law: the Civil Law in Quebec and the Common Law in the other provinces. Living wills are an excellent initiative. In Quebec, section 11 of the Civil Code deals with the mandate. So far, Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba and Nova Scotia have legislated in this field. British Columbia has passed legislation; it is not yet proclaimed.

It became obvious that we have to propose amendments to the Criminal Code. Patients and health practionners need legal protection. People should know what they can and what they cannot do. In our report, we have referred to about 20 sections of the Criminal Code and about 15 articles of the Quebec Civil Code.

We all agree that provincial Crown attorneys have a major role to play in prosecution. In law, they have discretion. We have suggested that guidelines be enacted by the provinces. We invite them to play their role.

[English]

In the field of health, which is primarily a provincial domain, we suggested that provincial legislatures amend their existing legislation.

• (1550)

Honourable senators, the Chapter on assisted suicide was no doubt the most difficult. Suicide and attempted suicide are no longer in the Criminal Code. On one point, we are unanimous; on some others there is a majority and a minority. We all want the act of "counselling" someone to commit suicide to remain a criminal offence, as stated by section 241(a) of the Criminal Code.

With respect to section 241(b) of the Criminal Code, aiding suicide, a majority — of which I am part — would like the section to remain as it is for all the reasons explained in the report. Certain reasons are of the same nature as those expressed by Mr. Justice Sopinka in the Sue Rodriguez case; others are innovating. However, a minority would favour a legal exemption along the guidelines developed in our report. Again, they are numerous. The guidelines suggested by the minority are close to the ones developed by Chief Justice Lamer in the Sue Rodriguez case, where he is dissident with three other judges. The opinion of Chief Justice MacEachern of the Court of Appeal of B.C. must also be taken into account.

With respect to euthanasia, honourable senators, there is unanimity to reduce the sentence when compassion or mercy killing is an essential element of the offence. We studied the Latimer case and the Brush case in particular. We need an amendment to the Criminal Code, either for a third degree murder or for the creation of another kind of offence. However, we insist upon one fundamental point: the Parliament of Canada should take the initiative to fix the penalty in such a case, and the Courts should be guided by precise federal legislation.

We all agree that involuntary euthanasia should not be decriminalized.

On the question of voluntary euthanasia, a majority of the committee is against legalization and a minority is favourable to it, but with precise guidelines.

In our report, honourable senators, we make the appropriate distinctions between the Nancy B. case — withdrawal of instruments and/or treatment — and the Sue Rodriguez case — assisted suicide. Those two cases differ in law. We always kept in mind the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. That Charter has been a key player in Canadian constitutional law since 1982.

Honourable senators, our mandate was to study euthanasia and assisted suicide and to make recommendations to the Senate. We devoted time, discussion and energy to reasoning; the arguments pro and con were always considered and expressed. Committee members have the greatest respect for the opinions of their fellow colleagues.

It is up to the government to decide whether legislation should be adopted by the Parliament of Canada. We invite the provincial legislatures to enact legislation, if they so wish.

Honourable senators, we all agree that the research shall continue; a "societal" debate is likely to take place in Parliament, in the press, and in the public. To the best of our knowledge, we have established parameters. Let us hope they will be useful.

It has been my good fortune to work with six other committee members. I wish to thank all of them: the Chairperson, Senator Neiman, the Deputy Chair, Senator Lavoie-Roux, Senator DeWare, Senator Carstairs, Senator Corbin and Senator Keon. We were given a difficult issue to study, but a very fascinating one.

On motion of Senator Lavoie-Roux, debate adjourned.

MOTION TO STUDY AND REPORT UPON DECISION OF HOUSE OF COMMONS TO CEASE PUBLICATION OF COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Gauthier, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hervieux-Payette, P.C.:

That the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders consider and report on:

(i) the effects on the Standing Joint Committees of the decision by the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons concerning the editing, translation and printing of Committees Issues, and

(ii) the need for the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons to consult the Senate before making decisions on matters that concern both Houses of Parliament. — (Honourable Senator Corbin).

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, I considered the amendment by Senator Corbin unacceptable right off because it considerably expanded the scope of the motion I had tabled and accordingly contravened subsection 579(2) of the sixth edition of Beauchesne.

Had it been tabled elsewhere but here, I can assure you that the debate would have been quite clear and that the amendment would, I believe, have been considered inadmissible. I will read you this section of Beauchesne, which provides that:

> An amendment may not raise a new question which can only be considered as a distinct motion after proper notice.

• (1600)

The motion I tabled makes no mention of the constitutionality of the decision by the House of Commons or of the fact that the speech by Senator Beaudouin confirmed that our motion concerned a constitutional matter.

In the motion we also did not want to interfere with the parliamentary affairs of the House of Commons, so we asked the Senate specifically to take note and to act accordingly.

The scope of Senator Corbin's motion, in my opinion, goes beyond the intent of the motion I tabled on a number of points. It should, if we are to be strict, be deemed inadmissible under subsection 579(2).

However, I agree with Senator Corbin that when I tabled the motion, which contains two separate parts, if you will, the problem had not been resolved. The House of Commons had not decided to continue to have the committee proceedings translated. The matter was still current.

Now that the House of Commons has reversed its April decision, the matter is not so topical but the constitutional issue still remains. It could easily be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I have no objection to that, and I think that the point is a valid one.

Senator Corbin used a compelling argument, saying that we should know once and for all what sections 123 and 16 through 18 of our Constitution actually mean. How important are they with regard to decisions made by either House of Parliament?

The other part of my motion dealt with a provision that bothers me a great deal, namely that the Senate is sometimes ignored when the House of Commons makes decisions affecting both Houses of Parliament. This, in my opinion, is unacceptable.

That is why the second part of my motion calls for the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders, chaired by Senator Robertson, to consider this whole issue and report on whether it is appropriate for the House of Commons to take, without prior consultations, measures affecting Senate operations. My motion had two parts.

I did not talk about the Constitution. I simply said that, in my opinion, it was totally unacceptable for the House of Commons to make such a decision without first consulting the Senate.

I would ask that, in the future, the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons consult the Senate before making a decision affecting both Houses of Parliament. Consulting means coming to see us, sending us documentation, meeting with the Board of Internal Economy of the Senate and with senators, explaining the scope of the proposed measure, and finding out whether the Senate agrees or disagrees before proceeding as though they were the decision–making authority in parliamentary matters.

Parliament includes both the Senate and the House of Commons. There are two Houses but a single Parliament. As far as I am concerned, we cannot function if we continue to make such unilateral decisions as the House of Commons did with regard to the printing of committee proceedings.

In fact, they later came and asked us if we could take on the responsibility for having the proceedings of joint committees of the House of Commons and the Senate translated, interpreted and published. Who will pay for this? They say they will pay their fair share, that is to say about 70/30.

I know I am in a procedural bind. On the one hand, I find that Senator Corbin's motion makes sense and should perhaps be deferred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. On the other hand however, my own proposal, which is also topical, could perhaps be more important in that it addresses the activities of both Houses and should therefore be reviewed, not by the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, but by the Standing Senate Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders, as it can deal with both Houses.

I will go no further, honorable senators. All I can tell you is that, as far as I am concerned, I would at least like to see the motion divided into two parts. You could then say that this part will be referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee and the other to Senator Robertson's committee responsible for privileges, standing rules and orders. Since this cannot be done, I will vote for Senator Corbin's motion. However, I give notice that I will be back with the second part of my motion very shortly.

[English]

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

NECESSITY OF EVALUATING THE LAW—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, May 25, 1995:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the need to carry out a comprehensive evaluation of the implementation of the Official Languages Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the reason for this inquiry is quite simple. The House of Commons has, once again, debated a motion I put before the House of Commons before being appointed to the Senate.

It was taken up by a member of the Reform Party, who is now distorting the very essence of the motion in question.

The motion read as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, and as the anniversary of the original Official Languages Act approaches (1969-1994), the government should thoroughly assess the way the Act is applied in Canada, by appointing some individual to carry out a detailed and balanced review of the work done so far, and reaffirm Parliament's commitment to a just and adequate policy on official languages.

This is the wording I used in this motion. It has been used word for word by Mr. Ringma, a member of the Reform Party representing the riding of Nanaimo—Cowichan in British Columbia, but it has been taken out of context and distorted.

I would like a review of the way the act is applied. It is not applied equitably and fairly throughout the country. For reasons I do not understand, there is still resistance today, 12 years after the adoption of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and some 25 years after the adoption of the first official languages act.

Unbelievably, there are still several areas in this country that are not completely in compliance with the act or the Constitution.

"Perhaps," I said to myself, "if someone with the right credibility" — I had certain people in mind — "could travel across the country and report back to Parliament that problems exist in certain regions, and explain why, that would be a positive thing and would help, in a general way, to restore a certain degree of linguistic equity to the country." Now we have the Reform Party saying that they want to review the act. Never did I say anything about that. The act is fine. It was passed by Parliament in June 1988. It is a good act, which was reformulated by the Conservative government of the time with my approval as official spokesman for the motion.

I am in no way opposed to the present act. It is clear. To misrepresent someone's intention is dishonest. To say that what Mr. Gauthier had in mind was a review of the act, not the application of the act, is simply not true.

I have come to the Senate to ask you to block a motion which will be voted on in the House of Commons. It is a votable motion which will be put before 295 elected representatives. I would like them to know that the bottom line is that, if they vote in favour of Mr. Ringma, they will have been entirely mistaken regarding the scope of the motion.

I simply wanted to review how the act is applied, not rethink the whole act.

I could get into a speech, honourable senators, on the development of the Official Languages Act. I know it by heart! I will not get into it this afternoon, because I know that committees will be sitting later and that the one to which I must go, the Foreign Affairs Committee, is probably waiting for me to arrive before commencing.

All that I wanted to achieve today by appealing to the Senate on this issue is to make it very clear to everyone that a person, like Mr. Ringma, who misrepresents someone else's intentions is not honourable. I find that utterly unacceptable.

HEALTH

IMPACT OF THYROID DISEASE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Erminie J. Cohen rose pursuant to notice of Monday, June 5, 1995:

> That she will call the attention of the Senate to the impact of thyroid disease in Canada and all its ramifications.

She said: Honourable senators, the month of June has been designated as Thyroid Awareness Month by the Thyroid Foundation of Canada. I think it is appropriate to pick up that theme here in the Senate and outline some of the trend–setting initiatives and research work supported by the Thyroid Foundation of Canada in its efforts to find treatments and cures for the various forms of thyroid disease that affect so many Canadians.

I recently accepted the honour of acting as this year's Honorary Chair for the foundation's National Fundraising Campaign in New Brunswick. It is a cause I have no hesitation in supporting. In these days of government cutbacks in research into health issues, the valuable work of this hardworking, non-profit foundation, and others like it, often gets overlooked. Government and public attention tends to focus on new and more dangerous diseases like the Ebola virus, as well as the natural priority given to fatal diseases like Cancer and AIDS.

We have known about thyroid diseases for a long time and yet they are not well understood, either by those suffering from them, the doctors treating them, or by the medical research establishment.

The lack of public profile given to thyroid disease is evident in the low priority it has been given by such funding agencies as the Medical Research Council. Granted, it is a very small field with a total of only $3 million or $4 million spent annually on thyroid research. I might add that this work is carried out in some 15 centres across the country. Because of the size of the field, funding cut-backs have a particularly strong impact. They threaten not only the important progress already made but also the highly respected status Canada has achieved internationally through past initiatives in this specialized area.

A recent government decision to reduce by 20 per cent the number of doctors getting into each medical field also had a significant impact on thyroidology. This reduction in a country this large has meant that a great many people across Canada cannot be referred to thyroid specialists in their local areas.

I am happy to say that these set-backs have not dimmed the enthusiasm of Canadian thyroid researchers. For example, after being turned down year after year for funding by the Medical Research Council, one research team located at the Lawson Research Council, a part of the St. Joseph's Hospital Health Centre in London, Ontario, refused to give up. They carried on with a shoestring budget scraped together by the National Thyroid Foundation and by the dedicated people at the institute itself. Their perseverance paid off, and in 1993 the Medical Research Council awarded funding for three years' work to this particular research team. Those involved in this field of research are not willing to sit and wait for government handouts. That is why the national foundation was created and why its work continues to be vital to the continuation of this valuable work.

At present, there are 1,500 individual members of the Thyroid Foundation of Canada with 19 chapter offices spread throughout almost every province. In New Brunswick, we have chapters in Saint John, Newcastle and Moncton. There are two paid staff people at the national level and the rest of the work is done by 180 volunteers spread across the country. Since its inception, the foundation has published a quarterly bulletin for its members, summarizing the latest research findings in the field.

I think any profile that thyroid disease has acquired is largely due to the efforts of the foundation. It was created in 1980 in Kingston, Ontario, by a thyroid patient named Diana Maltzer Abramsky who was suffering from Graves' Disease and who was born in Saint John, New Brunswick. She has a wish list of what she wants the foundation to accomplish. It is part of what the foundation provides in its mail-outs to raise public awareness of its goals.

I would like to read it into the record today, honourable senators, as it provides a kind of mission statement for the foundation, as well as some insight into the frustration of Canadian Thyroid patients. These are:

Diana's Wishes

I WISH for earlier diagnosis and treatment of thyroid gland malfunction.

I WISH for improved doctor/patient communication vis-à-vis understanding thyroid disease and treatments.

I WISH for more thyroid clinics across Canada where, without referrals, people could have their symptoms evaluated by thyroid specialists.

I WISH hypothyroid screening, which has helped prevent mental retardation in infants, would be expanded to include adolescents and adults in high risk cases.

I WISH thyroid research were not so seriously underfunded; that it would become a more visible target for private donations and bequests, as well as for corporate and government funding.

I WISH the cost effectiveness of government-sponsored thyroid education update programs, for health care professionals, would be realized.

I WISH for a continuation of national media coverage of the Foundation's thyroid awareness programs, which inform the public-at-large about serious medical problems that may result from an untreated, malfunctioning thyroid gland.

I WISH for talented leaders and members at the Chapter level to continue promoting the Foundation as a recognized source of thyroid information, for all age groups and all segments of society.

I WISH for dynamic leaders and members, who will inspire the public-at-large (lay and professional) to become thyroid conscious; to "THINK THYROID RESEARCH!" and "SUPPORT THYROID RESEARCH!"

I WISH for caring, dedicated leadership in our growing network of chapters, to continue to accept new tasks and challenges, with the same warmth towards thyroid patients, and with the same heart and soul of our early days.

I WISH for a World Thyroid Foundation with chapters in every corner of the globe, where the universal problems of thyroid patients may be addressed.

Since its creation in 1980, the Thyroid Foundation of Canada has provided monies for summer research scholarships and fellowships. Since 1989, 13 fellowships of $20,000 to $30,000 each have been awarded totalling $340,000. Since 1985, a total of $109,000 has been awarded to summer research students working in universities and major hospitals across the country.

The Thyroid Foundation of Canada has also been instrumental in establishing links between the small number of endocrinologists working in this field in Canada and their counterparts in other countries. One example of this is the work being done on autoimmune thyroid diseases, particularly the genetically caused syndrome of post-partum thyroiditis. Using the latest technology, Mount Sinai and Toronto hospitals, along with the University of Toronto Medical School, are collaborating with researchers in Germany on this important work.

Much of the research done in this field is carried out at the molecular level. So how do you describe thyroid disease in language that we laypeople can understand? It is commonly thought of merely as a disease that affects one's ability to lose or gain weight, but that is far too simplistic a picture.

In fact, a malfunctioning thyroid is more common in older people. I am sure we all know at least one older person who suffers from some form of it. At the same time, it causes mental retardation in one out of 3,500 infants if it is not diagnosed within the first several months after birth. It is also the leading cause of growth retardation in children. This kind of growth retardation is also curable but only if diagnosed properly.

One thyroid disease that is not curable at the moment is known as Graves' Disease. It is an inflammatory eye disease caused by a breakdown in the immune system which then affects the thyroid gland. Researchers at Montreal General Hospital have focused their attention on this particular disease and are optimistic that their research will eventually result in the ability to treat and prevent this disease altogether.

Thyroid malfunction can cause mental and emotional disorders such as paranoia and depression, not to mention infertility. Thyroid disease can be the cause of high cholesterol and, therefore, the clogged arteries and angina that can result. If there is not enough thyroid hormone in the system over a period of years, heart attack or stroke can occur. On the other hand, too much thyroid hormone causes an irregular heartbeat that can lead to cardiac arrest. The symptoms of thyroid disease can also be mistaken for senility or Alzheimer's disease.

For as yet unknown reasons, irregularities in thyroid gland function are more common among women than men and affect one in ten women at some point in their lives. When looking at the population as a whole, 5 per cent of Canadians suffer from some form of thyroid disease.

For older people, the effects are too often blamed simply on old age. This lack of consideration leads to needless suffering for many people. They experience a loss of energy, poor memory, poor concentration and excessive intolerance to colds. For those who are already suffering, or who have a family history of such diseases as diabetes or pernicious anaemia, the symptoms of thyroid problems are often thought to be a result of those diseases. However, if thyroid malfunction is the real problem, and doctors are aware of available testing and equipped to diagnose it, the testing procedures are very accurate.

Thyroid disease can be very serious, but if it is diagnosed and treated early enough, it can be controlled, if not cured altogether. Given the serious effect thyroid disease has on the quality of life for many people in this country and around the world, it strikes me as crucial to raise awareness about it among doctors, researchers and the public.

Canadian researchers, with the financial assistance of the Thyroid Foundation of Canada, are conducting research into the interactions of insulin-like growth factors and their effect on the development of the thyroid gland, as well as the relationship between faulty immune systems and the effect that can have on an originally healthy thyroid gland. Canadian research has also been conducted on the prevention of mental retardation in infants and genetic screening for thyroid cancer where there is a family history of it.

I think it is important to note that the Thyroid Foundation of Canada was the first such organization of its kind in the world and has acted as a prototype for the development of sister organizations in many other countries. One recent project undertaken by the Canadian foundation was to send copies of all its research collection to a medical library in India, where there is a growing awareness of the disease among the medical establishment.

This year, an International Congress will be held at the Sheraton Centre in Toronto on September 10 to 15. It will bring together leading experts from the Latin American Thyroid Society, the European Thyroid Association and the Oceanic Thyroid Association, which includes Australia and Japan. It will be 20 years before this congress is again held in North America.

To capitalize on this opportunity to raise awareness of thyroid disease, the Thyroid Foundation of Canada will be holding its annual general meeting just prior to the congress and hosting a free, public education meeting on Sunday, September 10 at 2:00 p.m. Out of this gathering, the foundation hopes not only to educate people about the disease and the important research being carried out in Canada to combat it but also to promote the creation of an international association to facilitate broader understanding and sharing of information.

I am very proud to be associated with this organization. It demonstrates what persons of initiative can accomplish in education and fundraising where public funding is just not available. At the moment, the foundation has a shortfall in its education budget. This will affect the number of scholarships that can be awarded. It will mean cutbacks for some very important research if our goal is not met. As long as we can continue to educate Canadians about this disease, I have every confidence that we will meet our target.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before I move the adjournment of the debate, I wish to congratulate Senator Cohen for bringing such a timely and important topic to the attention of the Senate. I hope that her speech will be distributed widely.

Once again, I applaud her for the initiative that she has undertaken in this respect and for her appointment as honorary chair of this year's fundraising efforts in the province of New Brunswick.

On motion of Senator Graham, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, June 14, 1995 at 1:30 p.m.

FIREARMS LEGISLATION

RELUCTANCE OF NOVA SCOTIA PREMIER TO TAKE POSITION

Hon. Gérald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, I rise to express my concern at the recent revelation by the Premier of Nova Scotia that he would not disclose his position on Bill C-68, the gun control bill, to the people of Nova Scotia. The premier's justification for silence on such an important issue currently on the political agenda is that this is a federal matter, and that "party discipline" prevents him from speaking out.

Hiding behind the excuse of party discipline, as the premier has done, suggests that the Liberal caucus in Halifax is split on the issue of gun control. In the midst of a review of his leadership, the last thing the premier wants is to offend any of his caucus members by making it clear where he stands on this contentious issue.

Is this the same type of situation as we had after the federal election in 1993, when Premier Savage admitted that although he was in support of the purchase of the EH-101 helicopters, he deliberately chose not to speak out in order not to embarrass his federal leader. We had hoped that the premier would have recognized the perils of playing political games, particularly as we have watched a number of Sea King and Labrador helicopters crash in the last few months.

Premier Savage's claim that the gun control legislation is strictly a federal matter illustrates an inexcusable lack of leadership on his part. As many of the premiers who have spoken out on Bill C-68 have understood, the implications of this legislation for provincial governments are overwhelming. It is therefore not surprising that we have heard from the Premiers of Manitoba, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, and yesterday from Quebec, making their positions clear.

Some have suggested, including Nova Scotia PC MLA Brooke Taylor, that the reason for Mr. Savage's silence is that a promise has been made by the federal government to establish a national gun registration centre in Nova Scotia. If that is the case, Nova Scotians will never know where their premier stands on the issue of Bill C-68. He is more interested in garnering political points than in standing up for the people of his province.

I do not question the premier's right to hold a position one way or the other on this issue. However, if he is truly representative of the people of Nova Scotia, he must be prepared to take a leadership role. If he supports the bill, he must say so. If he does not, then he should explain why. Either way, the promise of a registration centre should not stand in the way of his speaking on behalf of Nova Scotians.

BETWEEN THE LINES

COMMUNITY LITERACY RESOURCE PROGRAM

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to draw your attention to a literacy resource program, produced by the national association active in criminal justice, which was launched on Parliament Hill earlier this week with the participation of some members of this chamber and the other place, including Senator Cools, Senator Pearson and the Solicitor General, Herb Gray. Titled "Between the Lines"/"Entre les lignes", the program kit was designed to be a resource for literacy workers and criminal justice workers to enable them to raise the literacy levels of individuals who are incarcerated or at risk with the law.

It is evident that there is a direct connection between low literacy levels and crime. There are some shocking statistics which members of this chamber should be aware of: An estimated 65 per cent of those entering gaol for the first time in Canada have trouble reading and writing, and an estimated 67 per cent of Canadians in federal prisons have literacy problems.

We were told that where programs exist to help, they raise the education and literacy levels of law breakers, and the recidivism rate is reduced. In addition, fewer people return to gaol or to crime because they now have a chance for personal choices.

These in-house programs in our prisons were introduced during the time that our colleague Senator Kelleher was the Solicitor General and have grown in leaps and bounds ever since. The program announced in Ottawa this week is a community program. It is a call to action that will move crime prevention, rather than crime itself, into the centre of community attention.

The kits are available to all parliamentarians. I would encourage members in this chamber to use them and distribute them in their areas. This is an important part of not just the literacy program in this country but also of the safety of Canadians in every community in Canada.

ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the Twenty-fourth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources entitled "Report of the Committee's Fact-Finding Mission to Washington, D.C., March 6-9, 1995".

NATIONAL PROTECTED AREAS STRATEGY

REPORTS OF ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, two further reports: the Twenty-fifth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, which deals with the committee's travel to British Columbia sites, under its mandate on the National Protected Areas Strategy, from March 20 to 24, 1995; and the Twenty-sixth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, which deals with the committee's travel to Nova Scotia sites, also under its mandate on the National Protected Areas Strategy, from May 8 to May 11, 1995.

THE IMMIGRATION ACT THE CITIZENSHIP ACT THE CUSTOMS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Eighth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science And Technology, concerning Bill C-44, to amend the Immigration Act and the Citizenship Act, and to make a consequential amendment to the Customs Act.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day, and that it form part of the permanent record of this house.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Bonnell, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

FIREARMS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-68, respecting firearms and other weapons.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I ask that this bill be read the second time on Tuesday next.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I may intervene at this stage, there have been a number of suggestions within the last few days that certain senators on this side would use the rules of this place and other procedures to delay this bill for whatever reason. I wish to assure all honourable senators that this is not our intention. Our intention is to give this bill the thorough study it deserves.

As evidence of our willingness to cooperate, if the other side so suggests, we would be willing to waive second reading at this stage and send the subject-matter of the bill to committee, in order that we can get down to the topic immediately, as we have done in the case of Bill S-10 and on several other occasions.

Honourable senators, this is a government bill, but we are willing to cooperate in accelerating study of the bill. I suggest that this is one way in which we can do so.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, there have been discussions between the government and the opposition on this matter. It was our intention to seek leave for the sponsor of the bill, Senator Carstairs, to speak tomorrow. However, I understand that Senator Ghitter will not be present tomorrow, and since he will be the lead speaker for the opposition on this bill, it would appear that the most convenient time for both Senator Carstairs and Senator Ghitter is Tuesday next, and we have agreed accordingly. I understand that Senator Ghitter wishes to be in the chamber when Senator Carstairs speaks.

It is our desire to follow the normal procedure and have second reading. Then, after all honourable senators who wish to speak on the subject at second reading have spoken, the bill will be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: As I understand it, then, it is the government's intention not to give any particular priority to this bill, and to let it proceed in this place in the ordinary way. In that event, if there is undue delay, we will not be the ones to blame.

Senator Graham: On the contrary. The Leader of the Opposition will understand that this bill has the highest priority.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Then let us get on with it.

Senator Graham: If it is so desired, Senator Carstairs is prepared to speak on second reading, with leave, tomorrow.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We are willing to send the bill to committee today. However, it is your call.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the motion proposed by Senator Graham was that the second reading take place on Tuesday next. Do I gather that Senator Graham now wishes to amend his motion and proceed, with leave, tomorrow?

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, I think the Leader of the Opposition has made his point. If the Leader of the Opposition were to agree to second reading today, we would proceed to have second reading today, and send the bill to committee today.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think both sides have made their points. In trying to accommodate everyone, including the sponsor of the bill and our point man, it has been agreed that since the government is unwilling to move to committee before second reading, Tuesday is the best option.

On motion of Senator Graham, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next, June 20, 1995.

CANADA COUNCIL

CLOSURE OF ART BANK—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I give notice that, on Wednesday next, June 21, I will bring to the Senate's attention that, for all intents and purposes, artistic and cultural groups unanimously opposed the announced closure of the Art Bank of the Canada Council.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PEACEKEEPING IN BOSNIA—PARTICIPATION IN UN RAPID DEPLOYMENT FORCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, I take the Leader of the Government back to the growing tension and difficulty in Bosnia. As all Canadians await word on the 11 Canadians being held hostage, the Canadian government's position is still somewhat unclear with respect to the situation in the former Yugoslavia.

Contradictions with respect to our role in the UN reaction force, despite confirmation last week by senior military officials that Canada would be participating in the UN rapid deployment force, leaves some concern in the minds of all of us. Yesterday, the Prime Minister indicated, in the face of that commitment, that he was not terribly enthusiastic about Canada being involved in that initiative.

Could the leader clarify the position of the Prime Minister? Are we to take from that comment by the Prime Minister that he may be ready to indicate that Canada should not participate or that we probably will be participating but with some degree of reluctance?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I have nothing new to offer Senator Forrestall today, but I will repeat what I said yesterday: The Canadian government has made no decision to join the rapid deployment force at this time.

Senator Forrestall: Honourable senators, I will not pursue that matter. However, perhaps someone on the government side could take five or ten minutes and give the leader an up-to-date briefing. I know more about what is going on than she does, and that is regretful.

As the G-7 leaders gather tomorrow at the summit conference in Halifax, can we anticipate that the Prime Minister will place before that group some clarification of what, until now, has been a somewhat muddled picture? Will he clarify and indicate to the other leaders whether we intend to participate in the force? If not, has Canada taken a position at all?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, there is no muddle in the mind of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister and the government are considering the situation of Canada vis-à-vis that force. No decision has been made, so there is no need for clarification of the Prime Minister's position. That is his position, and that is the position of the government at this point. It is considering whether or not Canada will participate in that particular force, should it be set up. That is quite clear.

I cannot anticipate what the discussions will be about at the G-7 summit, nor the conclusions of those discussions.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PROJECTED COST OF G-7 SUMMIT IN HALIFAX—REQUEST FOR DETAILS

Hon. Marjory LeBreton: Honourable senators, my question is for the government leader. The G-7 summit in Halifax is to begin tomorrow. The "Chevrolet summit", as it has been dubbed by the Prime Minister, has taken on the mythical but false image that its costs will be less than those in the past and that the government is doing things on the cheap. Indeed, if they could get away with it, they would have one believe that the Prime Minister is staying at the YM/YWCA — that this is an ordinary event on the same scale as the Chevrolet among automobiles. The Prime Minister may be able to carry off this myth of staging low-key events by comparing this summit with the Naples summit last year.

However, according to press reports, this is a souped-up Chevrolet. In actual fact, the projected cost of the summit is $37 million, as opposed to the $28 million the government claims, or the final figure of $29.3 million spent in Toronto in 1988.

Honourable senators, my question is simple, and you can be sure I will be asking questions on the Order Paper afterwards: What is the projected true cost of the Halifax summit?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I look forward to seeing the honourable senator's questions on the Order Paper, and I shall await the conclusion of the summit before responding with a figure.

Senator LeBreton: I asked for the projected cost. Surely the cabinet has a projected cost. They would not go to Halifax without a figure in mind.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—MEETING OF MINISTER WITH BRITISH COUNTERPART AT G-7 SUMMIT IN HALIFAX—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gérald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, on May 4 of this year, Senator Di Nino raised a question regarding a meeting between Minister MacLaren and his British counterpart. It was reported that at a meeting in Toronto, the issue of government's cancellation of the Pearson airport agreements had been discussed.

I have two questions. My first question is: When will the Leader of the Government in the Senate respond to that question raised by my colleague Senator Di Nino?

My second question is an addendum to the first, and has to do with the pending G-7 meeting in Halifax. Since many government ministers are to be meeting their G-7 counterparts this week in Halifax, including Minister MacLaren, could the leader indicate whether the subject–matter of the cancellation of the Pearson airport agreements will be on the agenda, either formally or informally?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in answer to the first question, I am conscious of the outstanding question by Senator Di Nino, and recently I asked that I might receive the information necessary to answer that question.

As far as the G-7 summit is concerned, vis-à-vis Bill C-22 and Pearson International Airport, I simply do not know.

ABOLITION OF ART BANK—ROLE OF MINISTER

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government. On June 9, the Minister for Canadian Heritage, the Honourable Michel Dupuy, in answer to a question from Madam Suzanne Tremblay, the Bloc member for Rimouski—Témiscouata, who was inquiring whether the minister had taken part in the decision of the Canada Council to abolish the Art Bank, said:

> ...the Art Bank is the exclusive responsibility of the Canada Council. It is up to that organization to decide what it wants to do with the bank. However, I would be very pleased if arrangements can be made with the private sector and other interested parties to ensure the survival of the bank.

• (1400)

The Art Bank of the Canada Council could not have been set up without the approval of the government of the day and without the approval of Treasury Board. I have in my hands a document from that era. In fact, it is a document from Treasury Board that happened to be in the files of the Canada Council, which states very emphatically:

> The program will not be terminated without consultation with the government through the Secretary of State.

The successor to the Secretary of State is the Minister of Canadian Heritage. Surely, if the approval of the Secretary of State of the day was required to set up the Art Bank, the approval of the current responsible minister must have been required for its closure.

I am not suggesting that Mr. Dupuy deliberately deceived the House, or that he attempted to insinuate that he had no say in the matter. It is quite possible that he was in total ignorance of the requirement.

What I want to know from the government leader is whether, in fact, the Minister of Canadian Heritage was consulted, and if so, whether he said "yes" or "no".

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am aware of my honourable friend's interest in this issue. I will endeavour to obtain a response for him to that question.

WINTER OLYMPICS 2002

CANDIDACY OF QUEBEC CITY

Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest: In light of the decision that will be taken at Budapest, which is very important for Canada and Quebec, in particular for Quebec City, will the minister inform this house of the efforts that the Canadian government is making to support Quebec City's bid?

Even though the Canadian flag is not flown at Quebec City's city hall — we were passed up for the G-7 summit for this reason — will the Government of Canada forget this incident in this case and continue to support Quebec City's submission?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Government of Canada has been enthusiastically supportive of the Quebec bid, and is very hopeful that that city will be the site for the competition.

[Translation]

Senator Rivest: Will Minister Dupuy be part of the Canadian delegation?

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: I believe that Mr. Dupuy will be there, yes.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question on this issue.

We live on a very troubled planet, and it would help very much if some pressure were put upon the mayor of Quebec City, Mr. L'Allier, to tell people that they would be more than welcome in Canada in the year 2002. Perhaps I should not ask the minister to pressure him, because I know that Mr. L'Allier does not like pressure, but a strong representation could be made to him, in any event.

Perhaps my friend Senator Rivest could also try to convince Mayor L'Allier that it is to Canada that they will all be welcomed. Those who are about to vote understand the great country — I do not like the word "nation" — that is Canada. It would certainly help if everyone could join us in this respect. I would suggest that the minister also ask everyone here to join in our efforts to ensure that this great event takes place in that very fine, French-speaking, historical city, Quebec City, Canada.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Prud'homme for his suggestion. I would certainly encourage anyone in this chamber on either side who has a friendship with or any influence on the mayor of Quebec City to broach this matter with him, while offering the enthusiastic support of all of us for this particular bid.

There is no question that the Quebec region and all of Canada would enjoy significant benefits, be they economic, social or cultural, from the choice of this beautiful city and the area surrounding it for these games. That city would also be a tremendous showcase not only for the youth of Canada but for the youth of the world in terms of participation in this event.

As I have said before, the Government of Canada has endorsed this bid enthusiastically. Any extra encouragement that senators in this place could give would be much appreciated.

EXTERNAL RELATIONS

COMMITMENT OF FRANCE TO CONTINUING NUCLEAR TESTING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, my question is for the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate. In light of the fact that your government has continued to press on the extension of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, which is very commendable, and in view of the recent announcement by the President of France that that country will continue underground nuclear testing, what is your government's position on that announcement? Will this issue be raised at the upcoming G-7 meeting with the leaders?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that question was in my mind early this morning. I ran out of time before I could seek an answer to it, but I will do so this afternoon. I, too, have been aware of the indications from France, and will try to get an answer for the honourable senator.

THIRD READING

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved third reading of Bill C-97, An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1996.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FARM IMPROVEMENT AND MARKETING COOPERATIVES LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved third reading of Bill C-75, to amend the Farm Improvement and Marketing Cooperatives Loans Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION BILL, 1995

SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Corbin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lewis, for the second reading of Bill C-76, to implement certain provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 27, 1995.

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few remarks concerning Bill C-76. As an omnibus budget measure, this bill contains a wide range of provisions to implement a variety of government budgetary initiatives.

I will focus my attention on the proposals in the bill concerning the Canada Health and Social Transfer, or CHST, and particularly on the implications of the CHST in relation to the future funding of post-secondary education.

The elimination of Established Programs Financing and the Canada Assistance Plan and their replacement by the CHST will involve a reduction in transfer payments for these programs to the provinces of $2.5 billion dollars next year and a further $4.5 billion the following year.

Like many others, I noticed with interest last week that one prominent member of the government caucus in the other place voted against this bill on final reading because of the negative effect it would have on the future of social programs and because, as he put it, "We are betraying what we promised in the Red Book".

Honourable senators, this was not the only government member to voice concern about CHST. The nine government members of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance tabled their sixteenth report on May 19. This is what they said:

> Numerous witnesses have suggested that insuring compliance with...the national criteria and conditions in the Canada Health Act and the prohibition against residency requirements for social assistance, will require an on-going cash component to the CHST. Accordingly, the Committee urges the government to commit that there will be a cash component to the CHST in the future, and that it will be sufficient to enforce compliance.

In short, honourable senators, a significant number of elected representatives of the government has already publicly expressed concern about the future funding of health, social assistance and post-secondary education if Bill C-76 is passed.

On the other hand, the emphasis on maintaining national standards of compliance causes me some concern. The government assures us, and Bill C-76 provides, that national standards of medical care under the Canada Health Act will continue to be enforced and that residency requirements for social assistance will continue to be prohibited. However, we do not have any national standards to enforce in the field of post-secondary education. This makes education the easy target for funding cuts under the CHST.

On May 4, the Canadian Teachers' Federation and the Canadian School Boards Association made a joint appearance concerning Bill C-76 before the House of Commons Finance Committee. They concluded:

> ...strictly enforced health care standards, that are not accompanied by standards for other social services, would likely accelerate cuts in those areas because of reduced overall funding. This would eliminate...some post-secondary programs and institutions.

The post-secondary education system is already seriously threatened because of the government's actions over the past year and a half. My province of Newfoundland and Labrador reduced its funding for post-secondary education institutions by 2.2 per cent this year because of cuts in transfers in federal budgets. To give you just one example of the effects of that action, Westviking College in Stephenville will be laying off 27 faculty and staff at the end of this academic year. That will surely affect the quality of education of their students beginning in the fall.

I emphasize, this is prior to the serious funding cuts that we can expect when the CHST comes into effect.

Last year, honourable senators, the government passed legislation increasing maximum loan amounts for full-time post-secondary students by 57 per cent, raising it from $105 to $165 per week. For part-time students, the maximum was raised by 60 per cent from $2500 to $4000 per year. This year the government eliminated the Canada Scholarship Program.

With this bill, there will be tremendous pressure on provincial governments to reduce funding for universities and colleges. In turn, that will force those institutions to dramatically increase tuition fees, and that, in turn, will force students to take on a much larger debt load under the new loan system to finance their education. Estimates for future tuition fees range anywhere from $5,000 to $12,000 per year, forcing more and more students to take out even larger loans.

The implications of these changes are very alarming. Many potential students will consider the prospect of huge debt loads after graduation and simply decide not to take post-secondary education. That is already happening, as we can see from reports across the country of declining applications for university enrolments. Yet this is happening at a time when we are trying to encourage Canadian youth to get more education and more training. Potential students are already wondering about the wisdom of accumulating all that debt. When they graduate, will the government offer them better prospects than the current youth unemployment rate of nearly 20 per cent nation-wide and over 40 per cent in my province of Newfoundland and Labrador? Student groups, including those in my own province, have expressed serious concerns about taking on the kinds of debt loads which they will be forced to carry by legislation such as Bill C-76.

I have a concern about the effects of larger loans and higher fees on one group in particular — adult students. The Minister of Human Resources Development stated in the other place last year:

> ...increasingly, Canadians born in the fifties and sixties are also returning to school...This means that we must provide substantially better support for part-time students or for adult returning students.

That is very much an understatement. In fact, the government is actively encouraging older workers to retrain and get better education to qualify for other jobs and careers. In the case of fisheries workers in Atlantic Canada, the government is forcing them to do so. Coming reforms to UI and welfare programs by federal and provincial governments will force more people into training.

It is a frightening prospect for young students in their twenties to graduate with debt loads of $20,000, $25,000, or higher if they continue on to post-graduate work. Then they must begin looking for a job in a stagnant economy in order to gradually pay off that debt. It is even more frightening for an adult, aged 40 or 50, with family responsibilities and a mortgage to pay. How can they take on that same debt, knowing that there may be only 15 or 20 working years left to repay the debt and still save money for retirement? This is the kind of situation I see arising if Bill C-76 is passed.

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, I am pleased to make a few remarks on this bill because it directly affects grain transportation, particularly in the area which I serve in Saskatchewan.

As you may know, the House of Commons Crow debate was the longest-sitting debate in the history of that House, with the exception of the Sailor debate in 1918.

This bill represents major changes in grain transportation particularly for Saskatchewan and the rest of Western Canada. It also affects the feed assistance program in the Maritimes.

It appears to me that the government has run ahead of itself. In the GATT negotiations, Canada probably gave up more than some other countries, particularly the U.S. We hoped that if we got rid of our western grain transportation program the U.S. would remove their export enhancement program. Quite frankly, the U.S. kept their program and we dumped ours.

Recently I received representatives from CPR in my office. They are really concerned about this legislation: Is this fish or fowl? What is the government doing?

I can remember Alvin Hamilton saying, years ago: "Condemn the government and you will be elected. If that does not work, go after the CPR."

I am not a great defender of the CPR but they handle the grain out of the provinces and out of the farmers' yards. They have an important point. If the government is not prepared to commit to a market system — which is what CPR thought it was all about — then the government should, at least, allow such a system to be tested. Otherwise, it may very well find itself locked in a transition with no indictment to go forward or to go backward. In other words, we are locked into a situation that some have named "Crow 2".

• (1420)

My personal view is that perhaps we were a little too jumpy, and that the government is bringing in a bill that will deal with some of the mistakes it made in its February budget. In this way, we will not be caught, as it were.

According to figures released recently from the Canadian Wheat Board, the increased freight rate in effect for Estevan, Saskatchewan will be $35 to $40 per tonne. That is the highest increase anywhere in the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. We do not know how this situation will work out. I can tell honourable senators that farmers are concerned about this matter.

On the other hand, we have a situation in which $1.6 billion will be paid out to farmers. There is a great deal of concern as to how this money will be paid out. With respect to those who rent land from landowners — the real farmers — I understand that the money will be paid to the landowners. It will be left up to the renter and the landowner to make an agreement as to that payment, if possible. In many cases, that will not be possible. Thus we will face another problem which I now put on the record.

I understand that there is a five-year ceiling that will apply to the railroads. This bill moves in a direction which makes that ceiling indefinite where it concerns grain transportation. Does this leave the opportunity for a free market area or does it not? Will it enhance investment by those who would invest in different areas of agriculture on the Prairies and in Western Canada?

This legislation is indefinite. It gives a great deal of power to the minister. In my opinion, it covers up some of the mistakes that were made along the way. In the minds of Western Canadian farmers, there is a great deal of apprehension as to what will come out of Bill C-76.

I wanted to put my comments on the record today. I could mention other matters, but I do not want to belabour the point. I just do not want the government to feel that there are no questions being asked by Canadians. These questions need to be answered. Perhaps we can obtain some answers when officials appear before the Agriculture and Forestry Committee.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean–Claude Rivest: Honourable senators, I have a few comments on Bill C–76. My colleague Senator Gustafson has mentioned some problems in the agricultural sector.

I would like to touch on another problem and a very important one in connection with this bill, which, as the Minister of Finance said — I realize honorable senators are well aware of this, but I want to remind them just the same — initiates some substantial changes in our federal system, especially in programs that cover the areas of health care, social services and post–secondary education.

Honourable senators, Canadians are particularly proud of the quality and range of the services in health care, social assistance and education they have been able to develop over the years.

Of course, provincial governments and the federal government have contributed to a considerable extent. The current financial situation and social circumstances in this country have made it necessary to proceed with a thorough review of the services we have enjoyed for so many years while providing safeguards for the system of social programs available to Canadians.

As the Minister of Finance indicated in his budget, we must try to fine–tune the efforts of various levels of government in this area and, above all, to make better use of the public money invested in these programs so that across Canada, health care and social services can be delivered more efficiently.

The Minister of Finance has said that the federal government wants to withdraw from these areas to give all provincial governments greater flexibility and more room to manoeuvre. All provincial governments and, more specifically, the Government of Quebec and all Quebecers have applauded this objective and the determination shown by the Minister of Finance.

However, honourable senators, I would like to draw the attention of this house to a number of problems connected with the approach chosen by the Minister of Finance to achieve this goal.

Clearly, when we are talking about health care, social services and education, we must go back to the very essence of our federal system. Our system, and this is the principle of federalism, provides for a sharing of powers between the federal and provincial levels of government.

The areas we are discussing here — education, health care and social services — are clearly matters for which the provinces are responsible and over which they have jurisdiction, and for a very simple reason. The provincial governments are closer to the people and are in the best position to establish systems, methods and mechanisms for the delivery of quality health care and social services to their citizens. That is why, when they created the federal system, they gave the provinces exclusive power over this area.

That does not mean — as the Canadian experience has proven — that the federal government must take no interest whatsoever in these important sectors of activity, on the contrary. In the past, the federal government assumed full responsibility for redistributing this country's wealth and ensured that the provinces had the money they needed to meet these important responsibilities that they had towards the public.

I do not think that we should necessarily change the order of things in our federal system, but I do think that, given the Canadian government's financial situation, we should admit and acknowledge that there will be less and less money available for the provincial governments to assume these important responsibilities.

That is why, honourable senators, I find it a bit odd that the federal government, which is backing out of its financial responsibilities in the current bill and in its overall policy, continues to impose criteria, objectives, principles or standards on provincial governments, which most probably will really be in keeping with the financial and budgetary reality that the provincial governments will be facing in the wake of federal cuts.

I understand the Prime Minister of Canada's point, and I, of course, agree with him when he says, for example, regarding health care services, that Canada must uphold the principle of a public, universal and accessible health care system. I suspect that the majority of Canadians agree with that statement, and the principle is applied in the bill currently before us.

We must, however, be realistic. If the federal government puts less money at the disposal of the provinces to meet these requirements, which the Prime Minister of Canada and the current government want to impose, and the bill confirms it, it is quite obvious that the result of the overall review of health care services will be that the provinces will no longer have the financial means to meet all of the requirements they say they want.

There is something extremely unrealistic about saying that Canada will keep its past ambitions, keep functioning at the same level, for all Canadians, while financial resources are going to be considerably reduced.

Furthermore, it is obvious that, in many provinces, in Quebec and elsewhere, the public has already gotten the message — in Quebec, things have been extremely tense these past few weeks. Even though the review of the health care system is just beginning, the bottom line, and in fact the only way this review can be interpreted, is that the quality of health care and social services is going to drop.

Honourable senators, this is an extremely important issue that all Canadians must think about. Fewer resources necessarily means fewer public services.

Of course, we could reorganize our institutions, cut out the inefficiencies in our current system, but the bottom line is that we are still going to be moving in that direction and we should be all the more conscious of this fact.

• (1430)

This is why I say that, if the federal government is cutting its resources, it must do more than just give the provincial governments the option and ability to make their own choices about the health, education and social services they will make available to their people.

In carrying out their constitutional responsibilities in this area, the provinces are not accountable to the federal government. They are accountable only to their people. If the provinces make poor decisions in organizing their health and social services, the federal government is not in a position to grade them or to judge their attitude. It is up to the people of each province to decide how well the province is managing.

The bill is full of warnings that, if the provinces fail to do a particular thing, the federal government can take certain action. It can sanction them and cut their funding.

I would describe this approach as paternalistic, and, in my opinion, it flies in the face of the spirit of Canadian federalism, which makes me really angry. Of course, I believe that, federally, provincially and individually, we can indeed agree on certain shared objectives, standards and principles in the areas of health, social services and post-secondary education.

Given that we have a political and economic union in Canada, there should be some equality in the way we resolve our social and educational problems. We must still respect Canada's constitutional order, and the government must not impose on the provinces its standards and principles.

This is why I strongly oppose the provisions of Bill C-76 to do with these standards and principles, where the government says it wants to promote shared objectives and principles developed in all social programs, including post-secondary education. The bill provides simply that the federal government must consult the provinces. We know very well that, if the consultation does not lead to firm agreements, the federal government will decide unilaterally what the standards, principles and objectives should be in the areas of health, social services and education — areas of provincial jurisdiction.

If the federal government had been willing to push our federal system toward a real partnership between the Canadian and provincial governments, it would have recognized in this bill the need for national principles and standards. It would have specified that these standards must be approved by all provincial governments and recognized them as responsible governments, which care about the well-being of all their people as much as the federal government does. That is why I think that these provisions of Bill C-76 are totally inadequate.

From a Quebec perspective, at a time when debates that will have a major impact on the future of Quebec and Canada are being held, I would have liked the Canadian government to take this opportunity to review all our social programs, to show Quebec people that Canadian federalism can move in the direction of respect for provincial entities or the Quebec entity as such and that, in an area as crucial and important to our society as health and social programs, the Canadian government will respect the decisions made by democratically elected provincial governments with regard to education, health care and social services.

If these provincial governments make decisions that people feel go against their best interests, their actions should be sanctioned not by the federal government but by the people in each province. I think that although the Canadian government did open the door and demonstrate its willingness to be more flexible with provincial governments by withdrawing funds, it missed an excellent opportunity to show all Canadians and Quebecers in particular on the eve of the referendum that federalism can indeed evolve toward respect for the decisions made by each province, for the identity and needs of each region, and for Quebec's identity in particular.

If Quebec wants to shape its future, it has the constitutional power to do so within the federal system. If it wants to have its own education system, as well as health and social services which reflect its own reality, the federal government should not go against the will of Quebec's National Assembly by imposing rather bureaucratic standards. It is up to the National Assembly, and to the legislatures of the other provinces, to look after these issues. Quebec and the other provinces can, with the federal government, act like responsible governments and agree to harmonize their respective policies and programs, so as to come up with principles, standards and objectives which will be suitable for every region, including Quebec.

I am speaking on this issue because provincial governments, particularly the Quebec government, will never accept the imposition of such standards. There is, however, a will, from both the government and the population of Quebec, to agree with the rest of Canada on common objectives. Again, I simply want to remind honourable senators that I deeply regret the fact that, in this bill, the federal government enshrined and approved a certain form of status quo for Canadian federalism, which is extremely costly, not only in terms of credibility, but also in terms of efficiency and understanding of the federal system in which we live.

[English]

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I will take only a few moments. I wish to build upon what our colleagues Senator Rivest and Senator Gustafson have said. Because time allocation was imposed in the other place, it is impossible to know how many honourable members there opposed the provisions of this bill.

As Senator Corbin said and Senator Rivest underscored, it does indeed radically alter the federal-provincial landscape, perhaps in an irreversible manner.

The objective of the bill is, as we know, to implement all the non-tax measures contained in the February budget. As Senator Corbin stated at page 1729 of the Debates of the Senate:

> The cornerstone of this reform is the replacement, beginning in 1996-97, of Established Programs Financing for health and post-secondary education...

• (1440)

Are we to believe that by cutting billions in funds to the provinces for health needs and post-secondary education research and development, this government has a clear policy that is wise and prudent? What we have here is not a clear policy vision, at least not one that has been clearly articulated, but rather one that is based on flawed thinking and the promotion of a false economy. Certainly, as Mr. Allmand has underscored, it is contrary to the publicly enunciated vision that was contained in the Red Book and contrary to the principles that many colleagues opposite, who are pioneers who helped build the infrastructure of this country over the years through successive governments, have been able to set in place. There is a turning away from those principles. That is the policy implication that underlies the bill, and it has not been adequately addressed.

On May 11, 1995, I read in The Globe and Mail and The Toronto Star that the Minister of Finance told Parliament:

> ...the language of Bill C-76 will be amended to make it clear that his government has 'no intention whatsoever to impose anything [i.e. national standards] on the provinces.'

That is one statement coming from the Minister of Finance. Yet, on May 9, the Leader of the Government in this place said, in reply to a question from Senator Jessiman on the government's position on amending the Canada Health Act:

> ...the government is committed to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of our health system within the five principles of medicare as contained in the Canada Health Act.

Honourable senators, which is it? We have a statement of no standards being imposed by one minister and a statement of maintaining standards such as those in the Canada Health Act from another. Will there or will there not be national standards? There is need for some certainty in this matter. The Liberal cabinet appears to be either meandering aimlessly about vital health policy reform or imprudently and unilaterally axing the provinces' ability to maintain the principles of medicare.

Honourable senators, the sixteenth report of the Standing Committee on Finance in the other place emphasized and urged the government to commit itself to the maintaining of a cash component to the Canada Health and Social Transfer. Numerous witnesses suggested to that committee that ensuring compliance with such national principles and objectives, as well as compliance with the national standards and the national conditions in the Canada Health Act and the prohibition against residency requirements for social assistance, will require an ongoing cash component to the CHST.

Aside from the fact that with the disappearance of the cash component to the CHST will go the federal government's major lever for ensuring or facilitating the assurance of compliance with principles of the Canada Health Act, the only conclusive statement one can make is that the present government has sent a clear signal that it intends to act unilaterally or not at all in relation to maintaining federal standards in health care.

There is no doubt Ottawa must address the deficit issue. However, social programs, among them health and post-secondary education, have been disproportionately slashed.

Edwin West in Ending the Squeeze on Universities, stated:

> The heart of our wealth is the knowledge and skills of our population. Our economic development, measured both domestically and against the success of our major trading partners internationally, depends to a great degree on our abilities to harness our human resources.

An honourable member and a real Liberal in the other place, Warren Allmand, stated:

> ...social programmes in this country are not the cause of the deficit. In a question to the Minister of Finance approximately two weeks before the budget in February, a member of this House asked him whether social programmes were the cause of the deficit. The Minister of Finance said "No". As a matter of fact he said that social programmes were the same percentage of gross domestic product today as they were 20 years ago in 1975.

The Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada has said that budgetary decisions relating to higher education and research appear to have been taken purely for fiscal reasons without any clear policy objectives. The Red Book describes the Liberal agenda as "premised on an integrated and coherent approach" to public policy. Integration and linkage and common sense, if you will, do not appear to have made their way into this bill. I agree with Senator Rivest that that has some very unfortunate consequences.

The observation that Canadian universities are in a state of serious crisis is now commonplace. One hears this on every campus one visits across the country. No one agrees more with this notion of fait accompli than university administrators, faculty members and certainly the students. By the by, if this government had a strategy for our economic future, it would have been a little more selective in where it chose to cut. There are three types of spending: spending which should not occur under any circumstances; spending that is warranted where one can afford the expenditure; and spending that clearly must be made because of the consequences of not making them.

To my mind, research and development fits the "must" category. If we do not invest in research today we will pay a heavy price tomorrow.

Again the infamous Red Book stressed that our technological prowess, the sophistication of our infrastructure, the ability to innovate and the education and skill levels of our population are those things upon which Canada's competitive advantage is hinged.

What would Bill C-76 ensure? Further reliance on foreign innovation. In a world that is changing rapidly, we already lag behind our G-7 friends in our commitment to research and development. Research cuts are short sighted. David Crane, the economics editor of The Toronto Star, wrote:

> ...it seems clear that Ottawa will have much less capacity to help Canada become an innovative economy for the 21st century — and in particular, to partner with industry in developing the new products we need for jobs and growth.

If Canada is to address its deficit and debt issues, it must have stronger economic growth to expand its tax base. This means more emphasis on science, technology and innovation, certainly not less. The Red Book promised stable funding for the government's research councils.

Last December, the House of Commons Finance Committee told the government in its prebudget report not to cut the three granting councils. Instead — and we should be getting used to this — the Liberals decided it was wise to cut $77 million from the budgets of National Science and Engineering Research Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. That means 14 per cent less funds available to facilitate and contribute to the university community's research activities. The Medical Research Council's budget will be pared by 10 per cent.

Indeed, the budget of the NRC, home to many of the government's scientific and engineering laboratories, has been cut by $76 million or 17 per cent. I am reminded, honourable senators, of something that John Diefenbaker once said of the Liberal Party:

> The Liberals are the flying saucers of politics. No one can make head nor tail of them and they are never seen twice in the same place.

Other research cuts, honourable senators, include the slashing of environmental research by 36 per cent; forestry, mining and engineering research by 38 per cent; and agriculture research by 9 per cent. The industry department says that by 1997 the cuts in science and technology will exceed $1 billion, or a 20 per cent cut in research support in our country. That is hardly preparation for the world of the 21st century.

• (1450)

Exactly what are the government's priorities? What are its policies? The Red Book has long since ceased to be the government's guiding light, as promise after promise has been broken. Robert Pritchard, President of the University of Toronto, said that:

> While few doubt the necessity of Ottawa to get its fiscal house in order, it is important that we clarify the government's priorities. These must include a commitment to vigourous and competitive research.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate speaks so enthusiastically about the Liberal's infamous Infrastructure Program. What about the human infrastructure? The government's Throne Speech stipulated that economic growth required an "investment in people". Across the country, there are about 1.5 million full-time and part-time university and community college students. University enrolments are almost double what they were 20 years ago, and 50 per cent higher than they were 10 years ago. Canada still enjoys excellent accessibility to post-secondary opportunities. However, with Bill C-76 placing on young people the burden of affording the education that person will need to fully make his or her contribution to Canada, accessibility is now put at great risk.

Senator Cochrane mentioned that phasing out the Canada Scholarships Program is directly at odds with the Red Book. This scholarship program was very successful in encouraging young people, notably young women, to pursue studies in engineering, mathematics and the natural sciences. It was an affirmative action program in the academic environment that was workable.

In early February, the House of Commons Standing Committee on Human Resources Development highlighted the importance of funding university research in Canada and, significantly, the infrastructure that it supports. In the committee's words, the federal government certainly has to recognize the importance of adequate infrastructure to the effective use of direct federal grants in support of research.

In Canada, the federal government has, in the past, indirectly supported university research infrastructure through the EPF-PSE transfers. This "thinking person's" infrastructure is vital to university-industry linkages and knowledge transfers. It is clearly of international importance for our country.

Canada's universities must have the infrastructure necessary to sustain high quality research and to attract and retain researchers of an international calibre. Canada must have the capacity to develop and sustain national initiatives in research. To quote from the brief of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada to the House of Commons Finance Committee regarding this bill:

> Canada must have the capacity to develop and sustain national initiatives in research. Neither can be guaranteed if decisions regarding the provision of infrastructure support — the key to sustained high performance in research — are devolved to the provinces. The importance of research transcends provincial boundaries.

In other words, there is a national and international dimension to it.

The Canadian Association of University Teachers or CAUT, representing some 32,000 university teachers across the land, stated that they believe that the Liberal plan — and I use the word "plan" advisedly — "will seriously affect the accessibility to and the quality of higher education." CAUT summarized its thoughts on this matter in this way:

> 1) Maintain an explicit federal presence in the funding of post-secondary education;
> 2) Designate separately the funding for health, post-secondary education and social assistance within the proposed new transfer arrangements.

Again, to quote Mr. Diefenbaker from the House of Commons Debates of May 26, 1966:

> If you ask this government what they are going to do, you get the stock answer that this matter is receiving the most careful and continuing consideration. One does not have to be a linguistics expert to understand what that means.

The biggest issues facing our universities in this country today are, in short, excellence, accountability and accessibility. Universities foster the dual purpose of research and training. Often they are asked to meet other roles, such as public education and advocacy. To accomplish these things effectively, universities must consider how to précis their activities in order to maintain solvency because, as we all know, the funds available to universities are limited.

The clear need to restructure will present many difficulties to universities and administrators across Canada. Tangible benefits await us all when the kind of thoughtful restructuring in which universities inevitably engage takes place. Unfortunately, I do not think that Bill C-76 is a help in this matter, but rather may be a serious hindrance.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Corbin speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing debate on second reading of this bill.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to thank honourable senators opposite who took part in this debate, especially Senator Spivak, Senator Keon, Senator Cochrane, Senator Gustafson, Senator Rivest and Senator Kinsella.

At this point I could, of course, start a debate since I do not necessarily agree with everything that was said. However, I must admit that honourable senators opposite were very sincere. There were differences in perspective as to the future of federal-provincial policies and programs. As Senator Rivest pointed out, Quebec continues to demand more autonomy.

I have no quarrel with this statement. I heard it, and I must admit it is true. However, the Minister of Finance made certain commitments, after pointing out to the provinces in a previous budget that he intended to take that route, and has again promised to consult with the provinces and discuss ways to develop the best possible agreements.

I do not think it would be useful to add anything else at this stage. The members of the National Finance Committee, to which this bill will be referred, already have a bulky information document they were given by the Department of Finance through the clerk of the committee. I believe the chairman of the committee intends to call a meeting of the National Finance Committee this afternoon in order to begin a more thorough study of this bill.

Very briefly, I want to thank all those who made such a vigorous and sincere contribution to this debate.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Corbin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lewis, that this bill be read the second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

[Translation]

Hon. Senator Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I move that Bill C-76 be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

[English]

Hon. Lowell Murray: Before the motion is put, perhaps I may be permitted a word in my capacity as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

I confirm what Senator Corbin said a few moments ago. In the hope and expectation that this bill would be sent to committee this afternoon, we have alerted members of the committee to stand by this afternoon and this evening for meetings. We have convened a meeting at 5:15 this afternoon in room 356-S.

• (1500)

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance will be present, as will senior officials from half a dozen or more government departments whose legislation is repealed or amended in this bill — that is, from the departments of Agriculture, Transport, Finance, Veterans Affairs, and others. That will be at 5:15 this afternoon.

At seven o'clock and eight o'clock tonight we will hear from Professor Judith Maxwell and Professor Keith Banting respectively, who will focus on the proposed Canada Social Transfer. Tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock, we will meet again to hear from several public service unions and from the National Council on Welfare. All this has been done in consultation with the deputy chairman of the committee, Senator Olson, and Senator Bolduc who, together with the chairman, make up the steering committee.

I wanted to confirm to members of the committee and to all senators who may be interested in these subjects, that the committee will begin its deliberations on this bill at 5:15 this afternoon in Room 356-S.

On motion of Senator Corbin, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE— DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the First Report of the Special Senate Committee on the Pearson Airport Agreements (Budget), presented in the Senate on June 13, 1995. — (Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax)).

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator MacDonald, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, that this report be adopted now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, forgive me for taking a few minutes of your time but I will be quick. I attended the proceedings of the Internal Economy Committee, which reviewed this budget. I asked a few questions and I want some answers to my concerns.

This $298,000 budget includes legal advisers' fees for 65 days at $2,000 per day for a total of $130,000. We are told that the contract was signed for a six–month period from June 6, 1995 to October 31, 1995.

The budget sets aside $65,000 a year for the period between June 6, 1995 and March 31, 1996 for two senior research officers hired for six months. What is the difference between a legal adviser who will work until the end of October and a person who will do research for the committee and whose contract runs until the end of March? Why is there a difference between the two?

[English]

Senator MacDonald: Honourable senators, we were given one year from the time that this committee was established to bring in our report. I consider that the report will be brought in much sooner than that. However, the committee will have to determine that, so I cannot give the honourable senator an exact time.

In order to tie down one of the best lawyers in Canada, a resident in Ottawa, we entered into a contract for a period ending in October. If it is necessary to have Mr. Nelligan beyond that time, we will enter into a new contract with him. In the case of the matter of a researcher referred to by Senator Gauthier, that contract can be terminated at any time, but we have taken it to the end of the fiscal year.

Senator Gauthier: Honourable senators, I should like to ask another question. I understand that we are in a tight situation in this house, and I have heard continuously in the last six months about how the finances of the Senate have been subject to cuts and more cuts. We even had a 10 per cent cut to our budgets. That represents a $4.2 million cut, although I have read in the report tabled by the Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee, Senator Hastings, that a supplementary estimate will be requested for these expenditures, if necessary.

Can the honourable senator tell me where he is getting the money to run this committee right now when everyone is trying to tighten their belts here? Where are we finding $300,000 to finance this study? Does he know, or will we ask for a supplementary estimate?

Senator MacDonald: Is the honourable senator directing his question to me or to Senator Hastings?

Senator Gauthier: It is directed to you.

Senator MacDonald: I have a lot of sympathy for the members of the Internal Economy Committee. They are doing a great job trying to cut the expenses of this place. That is causing a certain amount of inconvenience to certain senators and to certain people who have heretofore been employed. However, there has been no suggestion that there will be any reduction in the amount of money required to meet the burden placed upon a committee of this house. Preparing for what would be expected to be spent on committees in any given year is an inexact science, and it is hoped that many of these budgets will come in under the approved amount.

However, this special committee is dealing with something that we could not plan for. If the work of this Senate and its committees are to depend upon money, we must find that money by way of supplementary estimates.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, a day of reflection will be very helpful. According to rule 51, page 57, I now move the adjournment of debate.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Prud'homme, could you give me the name of the senator who is seconding your motion?

[English]

Senator Prud'homme: I realize my difficulty in being the solo banjo player for the time being, until the hallelujah chorus joins in, but perhaps a volunteer would like to have one day of reflection concerning this matter. This motion will be seconded by Senator Carstairs.

I want to be very fair. I will not drag my feet beyond tomorrow. Usually we do not need to say as much. However, I will debate the issue tomorrow. I hope that we can take 24 hours for reflection, now that the budget is in front of us. Committee members may then ask questions concerning how will it be done and so on. I only ask for 24 hours. I am being very reasonable. I could drag my feet until next week, but I will not. I will be here tomorrow and I will participate in the debate at that time.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Thank you, Senator Prud'homme. You will understand that it is not up to the Chair to decide.

It is moved by the Honorable Senator Prud'homme, seconded by the Honorable Senator Carstairs, that the debate be adjourned until the next sitting.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

[English]

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, this came up suddenly and I am not clear about the implications here. I do not object to a 24-hour delay.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I ask for a ruling from the Chair. The motion was seconded. I did not see any opposition, and now we are reopening the discussion.

The Hon. the Speaker: That is correct, and the motion was passed. I presume that Senator Stollery is speaking on a point of order. I saw no one on their feet.

Senator Stollery: Honourable senators, I do not want to try the patience of my colleagues, but the subject just came up. Before I had a chance to intervene, the motion was passed. To say that I am reopening the debate is unfair. The debate only started about five minutes ago. I just wanted to participate in the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Stollery, a motion to adjourn a debate is not a debatable motion. One can vote against it or for it, but it is not a debatable motion. I put the motion to the Senate. There was no objection and, I regret to say, the motion passed.

On motion of Senator Prud'homme, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Before moving the adjournment motion, it being 11 minutes past the hour of 3:00, I would like to remind honourable senators that this is a committee day. As has been pointed out by Senator Murray, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will be meeting this afternoon and this evening; the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs is presently meeting; the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy commenced at 3:00 p.m.; the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will commence at 3:15; the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs also commences at 3:15.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Do they have permission?

Senator Graham: Perhaps I could complete the list and then explain to honourable senators.

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will commence at 4:00; the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will commence at 4:30; the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples will commence at 5:45; the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will meet again at 6:00 p.m.

As has been the tradition here for the past number of years, we sit on Wednesday at 1:30 p.m. hoping to adjourn at three o'clock. Sometimes because of the type of debate, such as the one we had this afternoon, we run over the three o'clock hour.

I understand the valid point raised by Senator Stewart. I am not aware that any committee is sitting that did not have permission to sit while the Senate is sitting.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, before the adjournment motion is put, may I draw to the attention of honourable senators the information displayed in the Senate Reading Room. Officials from the Department of Public Works, the team that is on hand with respect to the upgrading and rehabilitation of Parliament Hill, are there to answer any questions and to assist any senators with information as to the project.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2:00 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, June 15, 1995

The Senate met at 2:00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

CANADIAN NATIONAL EXHIBITION

LLIQQUSIVUT, INUIT SPIRIT OF THE ARCTIC PAVILION

Hon. Charlie Watt: Honourable senators, at four o'clock this afternoon the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada will be holding a press conference on the front lawn of Parliament Hill to unveil the Iliqqusivut, Inuit Spirit of the Arctic pavilion at this year's Canadian National Exhibition. Federal, territorial and provincial Inuit leaders will be attending to celebrate the announcement of this historical event.

For the 18 days during the Canadian National Exhibition, Inuit will bring a piece of the Arctic to Toronto in their pavilion, Iliqqusivut, Inuit Spirit of the Arctic. In light of the United Nations' announcement of the commencement of the International Decade for Indigenous Peoples, the CNE has chosen Inuit culture as the feature presentation. This decision could not be more appropriate as Inuit are one of Canada's first indigenous peoples, inhabiting one-third of Canada's land mass.

The Inuit pavilion will allow the annual 1.8 million visitors to the Canadian National Exhibition to enter into the Arctic, to hear our famous throat singing, to see our drum dancers and unique Inuit fashions, to participate in Inuit Arctic games, to taste our northern food of char and caribou, to become acquainted with our business and economic development and to purchase unique Inuit carvings, prints, ivory jewelry and clothing.

We know that because of the high cost of transportation, most Canadians will never be able to afford a visit to the North. That is very unfortunate. We therefore bring you our culture — yours to discover. We are trying to bring the North to the South rather than bringing southern people to the North.

The special project will be significant in establishing a better awareness in this house and in Canada about the Canadian Arctic. The Spirit of the Arctic pavilion will highlight Inuit regional identity and will demonstrate the strong Inuit presence in Canada. It will link Inuit with other Canadian citizens, businesses and government in a high profile event in an effort to increase Canadian and international awareness of the cultural, economic and political aspirations of Inuit.

I should like to encourage every senator and all Canadians to take part in this exciting project.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

INFORMATION COMMISSIONER

ANNUAL REPORT TABLED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the Annual Report of the Information Commissioner for the period 1994-95.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION BILL, 1995

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Lowell Murray, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report:

Thursday, June 15, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

FOURTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-76, An Act to implement certain provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 27, 1995, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, June 14, 1995, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

LOWELL MURRAY, P.C.
Chairman

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to take just one moment of the Senate's time to say a word on behalf of the committee. We intend, on Monday next, to present a brief report, a narrative, commenting on some of the policy issues raised by Bill C-76. The committee heard some very important testimony on these matters from various sources, including the government, over the past several days, and we think it important to place some comments on these matters on the record of the Senate, with a view to providing food for thought for third reading debate and beyond.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

• (1410)

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

32nd Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration;

33rd Legal and Constitutional Affairs;

34th Library of Parliament;

35th Scrutiny of Regulations;

36th Social Affairs, Science and Technology;

37th Transport and Communications;

38th Official Languages;

39th Veterans Affairs.

(For text of reports, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall these reports be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Di Nino, reports placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

STUDY OF STATE OF CANADIAN FINANCIAL SYSTEM— REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the eighteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which requests that the committee be empowered to incur special expenses pursuant to Procedural Guidelines for the Financial Operation of Senate Committees.

I ask that this report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Kirby, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

THE BUFFALO AND FORT ERIE PUBLIC BRIDGE COMPANY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, Deputy Chairman, of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the following report:

Thursday, June 15, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications has the honour to present its

EIGHTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-81, An Act to amend An Act respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Company, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, June 7, 1995 examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

DONALD H. OLIVER, Q.C.
Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, with leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday next, June 19, 1995, at four o'clock.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Deputy Leader of the Government. Will he explain to honourable senators why four o'clock was chosen, when it is physically impossible for my colleague Senator Perrault and I to be in Ottawa at that time on Monday?

An honourable senator suggests that I should leave on Sunday. That is not an option because sometimes there are other forms of transportation that are not available. The earliest plane does not arrive in Ottawa until half past four or five o'clock in the afternoon.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, I appreciate the concerns expressed by Senator Carney. We have discussed this matter in the past, in person and by long-distance telephone to her home in British Columbia.

Originally, it was anticipated that the Senate would be called back for 8 p.m. on Monday evening. It was then suggested by the leadership on the opposite side that we consider Monday afternoon at 2 p.m. A compromise, at the request of the opposition, of 4 p.m. Monday afternoon was reached.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the fact of the matter is that, from time to time, in the management of the business of the house compromises have to be made. In this case, we worked out a compromise. We tried our level best to accommodate every honourable senator.

I had the same problem as that expressed by Senator Carney when I had to fly to Ottawa from Regina. I resolved my problem by moving to Ottawa. I do not expect that that is a solution for everyone.

Here we are, and I hesitate to use this phrase, all of us with spring fever, trying to get the business of the chamber done in a timely manner as we approach our summer break. We make accommodations where we can. Unfortunately, we cannot satisfy everyone's needs every time. However, I think this is a fair compromise. In any event, I have given an undertaking to my counterpart opposite that we will do our best to function in this way. While I apologize that we cannot accommodate everyone, I make no apology for the compromise.

• (1420)

Senator Carney: It is not a matter of accommodating individual senators; it is a matter of recognizing that this is a country that extends from sea to sea to sea; a country that involves regions, and that this is the house of the regions. Thus, all of us should have an equal opportunity to participate, whether we hail from Montreal, or from the far West Coast, or from the maritimes.

When you set the opening of the Senate at a time when it is physically impossible for some of us to get here because of time zones, then there should be more than an apology given. This is the house of the regions, and it should sit at times when all of the regions can participate.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Over the years, I have found that, by and large, there is a lack of understanding on the part of all parties in Ottawa with respect to the travel problems of those who live in the extremities of the country. I recall many occasions when a meeting was scheduled in Ottawa for early in the morning following some major public day such as Remembrance Day, or some other similar event. It is often totally impossible for westerners to completely fulfil their regional obligations and, at the same time, meet the demands of the parliamentary schedule.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, this is an opportunity for me to voice a grievance.

From time to time, the Senate does not sit for a week, and we are told that the committees are free to sit during those weeks. If you happen to be on a committee that is having one meeting during a week when the Senate is not sitting, that means that you must come from wherever you happen to live, be it Vancouver, Newfoundland or Rankin Inlet, for that one meeting. I do not wish to exaggerate, but this amounts to a kind of practical amendment of the Constitution in favour of those senators who happen to live in Montreal or Toronto, and for those senators who, like the house leader for the opposition, have decided to live in Ottawa.

Let us realize what is actually happening here: once in a while, Senator Carney and I disagree. On this occasion, I agree with her most emphatically.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: I am delighted with this debate. Senator Carney has put her finger on exactly what this Senate is all about: a chamber of regions. That is a good reminder for those of us who live in Montreal or Toronto and can appear on a few hours' notice.

However, I should like to make another point on this issue. We hear today, Thursday, that we will sit at four o'clock on Monday. If Senator Carney had made an appointment for Monday in Vancouver, she did so taking for granted that she could still fulfil her duty to be here. If a senator wants to live in Ottawa, that is fine, but each senator decides that on his or her own. Senator Carney has obligations.

The difficulty is that, every Thursday, we hear whether we will sit next week or adjourn for two weeks, or whether we will come back on Monday at two o'clock, six o'clock or eight o'clock. It is impossible for those of us who represent regions to be active when we do not know the schedule ahead of time.

This exchange could be a positive one if we listen to each other and take the point raised by Senator Carney. I agree with her and with Senator Stewart. I am glad that, once in a while, people from opposite sides can agree. The three elements of the Senate now seem to be in agreement, so there must be something there to reflect upon.

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I should like to put this into focus. Last year, we only sat for 70 days. This is not an overworked chamber. The arrangements that we are putting in place are to accommodate getting us out of here for the summer.

Senator Carney: Where do you live?

Senator Stewart: He has to come all the way from Ottawa.

Senator Kenny: If senators came once a week or on a regular basis, they might have a case, but if they are just coming periodically, I am much less sympathetic.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I must protest. The senator who has just spoken has suggested that we only sat 70 days last year. I have news for him. As a member of the Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide, I must say that we sat at least twice that much, and probably more.

Senator Kenny is alluding to sittings of the house. He does not include committee work, and I think that is a distortion of the facts.

Senator Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I should like to respond to the comments of my friend Senator Kenny. I think it is wrong to perpetuate the thinking that we only sat 70 days.

I am here, by choice, five days a week. When the Senate is not sitting, I am in the gallery of the House of Commons, learning about the bills that will be coming to this place. For instance, this morning they discussed Bill C-69 on redistribution. You should follow that debate attentively. They are also discussing Bill C-41 and gun control. I see many colleagues who attend at the other side. I call that work.

While it may be true that we sat for 70 days in the Senate chamber, as Senator Kenny has stated, we should stop perpetuating the myth in the public's mind that we are only working 70 days. Some senators are attending committee meetings while others are following committees of the House.

I invite colleagues to examine the committees of the House. You would be surprised how helpful it can be with respect to our discussions here.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

DISPUTE WITH EUROPEAN UNION ON NEWSPRINT— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and concerns the trade showdown between the European Union and Canada.

On Monday, the EU supported a compromise tariff reduction package for Canadian newsprint. That same package, which will see rapid tariff reduction kick in only at the end of the 10-year timetable, had been rejected earlier by the Canadian delegation in Brussels, who argued that it did not go far enough. Canada has threatened retaliatory action against the EU unless an acceptable offer is forthcoming.

Could the leader advise this house whether or not this decision by the EU is the first of what might be many hard-line decisions that will be taken against Canada in retaliation for the turbot war that our government initiated earlier this year?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would want to talk with my colleague, the Minister of International Trade, to find out what the background is on this matter. Until doing so, I would not concur with the honourable senator's suggestion with respect to the reasoning behind that decision. In any event, I will attempt to obtain some further information and convey it to this house.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SALES ABROAD OF CANDU REACTORS—REQUEST FOR STATUS REPORT ON ENVIRONMENTAL AND FINANCIAL CONCERNS

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: My question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and concerns the sales abroad of Canada's nuclear technology, specifically its CANDU reactors. It is well documented that some of Canada's efforts internationally have had problems, both from an environmental viewpoint and from a financial one. Two countries which come to mind are Romania and India.

In Romania, cost overruns are in the hundreds of millions of dollars, which have been met by additional Government of Canada loans, and still the reactors are far from complete. India has had a more successful completion record. However, serious operational and safety concerns have recently surfaced, prompting one AECL official to state:

> I guess if we were neighbours, we would be very concerned.

That was reported in The Globe and Mail Report on Business.

My question to the leader is this: Could she provide to this chamber a status report on Canada's involvement in these two countries, and the state of our CANDU reactors there? Let me say that I do not expect an answer immediately.

Further, does it concern the government, and in particular the Minister of Foreign Affairs, that the two countries on the potential sales list for Canadian nuclear technology, and rumoured to be in negotiation with Canada, Indonesia and Egypt, were vocal opponents to the signing of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, while another, China, has been a conscientious non-practitioner of the accord? Could the Leader of the Government find the information for us on those two questions?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I would be pleased to obtain that information for Senator Atkins.

FIREARMS LEGISLATION

STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO PRIME MINISTER IN CAUCUS ON VOTING OF DISSENTING MEMBERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. David Tkachuk: My question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Since the time of Confederation, members of Parliament have discussed their role as to whether they represent their constituents or the national interest. Oftentimes, the debate is within their conscience as to how they should vote or perform.
