However, on Bill C-68 I noted that a number of members of Parliament — nine, I think — voted against the bill. I am not sure of the exact number of Liberal members who absented themselves.

A recent newspaper articule mentioned a Liberal caucus meeting. At first, I did not really believe that a newspaper could have a full report of a caucus meeting, until I noticed that the newspaper in question was The Toronto Star. It was then that I understood that what had been reported was probably true.

That newspaper report states, in part:

> Chrétien went on to praise MPs such as Ethel Blondin, Jack Anawak and Andrew Mitchell who voted for the bill against the very strong wishes of constituents who fiercely opposed the firearms law.

I would agree with him there. However, the article goes on, quoting a source:

> He said "I know it was hard for them. But I have more respect for them and the ones who stayed away than I have for the ones who bucked us."

Is that the same view that the leader has on this issue?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): As the honourable senator will know from his experience, both here and back in Saskatchewan, the discussions that take place within any caucus are closely held within that caucus, and that is the case, I am sure, with his caucus, as it is with ours. I have no intention of commenting on reports in The Toronto Star or any other newspaper on matters that may or may not have been discussed in the Liberal caucus.

Senator Tkachuk: Let us move it to a more philosophical and hypothetical plane and say that none of this may have happened in the caucus meeting, although I believe it did.

Would it be the leader's view that when members do not agree with the position of their party on an issue, they should shirk their responsibility to their constituents by simply not showing up in the House of Commons in great numbers, rather than voting one way or the other?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I am sure that all of us could have interesting philosophical discussions outside of this chamber. However, what occurs in the other place, or within any of our caucuses, is not the business of this house. It is the business of the individuals who represent their various parties. I have absolutely no comment to make on such hypothetical questions.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PEACEKEEPING IN BOSNIA—STATUS OF CANADIANS HELD HOSTAGE—POSSIBLE DISCUSSION OF SET-UP OF UN FORCE AT G-7 SUMMIT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate in relation to the events in Bosnia today, and the fate of the remaining Canadian Armed Forces personnel who are still being held hostage.

News reports continue to indicate that Bosnian government troops have taken up their positions around Sarajevo, and that the Canadian base near Visoko has been barricaded. Against that backdrop, we have 12 Canadian peacekeepers still being held captive by the Bosnian Serbs.

Although there have been repeated denials, every indication would seem to be that the Prime Minister will announce to the G-7 summit, that is being held across the harbour from Dartmouth, that Canada will join Britain, France and the Netherlands in the rapid deployment force.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs has played down somewhat the urgency of taking any action. However, given the events of this morning and last night and the probability of further deterioration tonight and tomorrow in that country, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate bring us up to date and give us an indication of what happened today? It is now 11 p.m. in Bosnia, and the activity of the day has pretty well calmed down. Is there any intelligence or indication of the well-being of our armed forces personnel?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank my honourable friend for the notice that he sent to me of his intention to ask this question today.

As of when I came into the chamber this afternoon, the news was still that 12 of our Canadian peacekeepers are currently prevented from returning to their base at Visoko; 11 of them at last report were still in Ilijas and one, Captain Rechner, is still in Pale. They are all reported to be in good condition.

However, based on the escalation of this situation yesterday, both the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Foreign Affairs have made vigorous diplomatic interventions with their counterparts on behalf of our peacekeepers.

The Minister of National Defence called in the Yugoslav chargé d'affaires in Ottawa to urge the Serbian authorities to use their influence with the Bosnian Serb leadership to free all Canadian hostages immediately, and a similar message was transmitted through our embassy in Belgrade. At the same time, the Honourable André Ouellet, Minister of Foreign Affairs, has contacted his Bosnian counterpart to express our grave concern over the Bosnian government's plans to launch an offensive around Visoko and Ilijas at a time when Canadian peacekeepers are still being detained. He has called on the Bosnian government to allow the return of all of our hostages to their base. The same message has been passed on to the Bosnian chargé d'affaires in New York.

The government is obviously extremely concerned about the actions in that part of the former Yugoslavia. We are doing everything in our power and using every pressure point we can to effect the release of those Canadians.

On the question of the rapid reaction force, I can only say to my honourable friend — which may well frustrate him, but my sources have been the Prime Minister and the Minister of Foreign Affairs — that no decision was taken prior to going to the summit. There will be active discussions there among the countries involved. Canada has questions. The Prime Minister has questions that have to be answered before a decision can be taken. This was reiterated today by the Minister of Foreign Affairs in media interviews in Halifax.

At this point I cannot indicate to my honourable friend whether or not that decision will be taken in Halifax at the summit. There are outstanding questions to which the Canadian government would like some answers before committing the force further in this direction: Who would command the force? Where would the force be located? What type of force would this group be empowered to use and have the authorization to use? Until there is clarification of some of those issues, and there may be others as well, there will be no Canadian decision.

Senator Forrestall: Honourable senators, surely there must be some linkage in the sense that the rapid deployment force would be one of the instruments available to the UNPROFOR and anyone else on the scene there to protect those hostages. Surely there is a linkage in that sense.

May I ask to what contingency plans the Leader of the Government in the Senate may be privy to ensure that these 12 hostages, 11 in particular, will not be used as human shields by the Bosnians?

Perhaps the Leader of the Government could also give us some indication as to whether or not there has been any response to the position put forward by Canadian officials in Canada, at the United Nations, and in the former Yugoslavia as to why Canadians are the only hostages being detained?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, this morning I was involved in a number of conversations and calls and by two o'clock when I came into the chamber I had received no response. To say the least, the situation in that area is extremely unstable with troop movements, the peacekeeping involvement, and the build-up of forces in that area.

The Canadian government, along with other countries involved, has obviously discussed on a contingency basis possible plans for withdrawal procedures. At this point in time, I cannot give any guarantees to my honourable friend, and I am not sure that on-the-ground guarantees can be given at this point. Everything that is humanly possible militarily and diplomatically, is being done by this country and by other countries.

I am not sure, as my honourable friend stated, that Canada is the only country to have its peacekeeping troops detained.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on May 4, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Di Nino regarding the meeting of Minister MacLaren with his British counterpart.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS—MEETING OF MINISTER WITH BRITISH COUNTERPART—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Consiglio Di Nino on May 4, 1995)

Minister MacLaren's meeting with his British counterpart took place on June 2, 1994, during a visit to London. The purpose of the meeting was to provide an opportunity for the minister to become acquainted with Michael Heseltine, the British Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, and to exchange views on a broad range of issues.

The Pearson Airport contract was brought up by the British Trade Secretary. A British firm, Allders Ltd, is involved.

A follow-up to the discussion was not requested by anyone attending the meeting.

Allders will not be treated in any way differently from the other firms involved. The Canadian legislative objective is to have a fair and expeditious settlement with all concerned parties, as soon as possible.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

POINT OF ORDER BY SENATOR CORBIN—
RESPONSE BY CHAIRMAN

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I ask permission to participate in the discussion of the point of order raised by Senator Corbin earlier this week with regard to the activities of the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders and its recent initiatives to study the problems related to joint committees.

I realize that Your Honour has taken the point of order of Senator Corbin under advisement, but I think it is important to expand upon the background of this issue before making a ruling.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that we should hear Honourable Senator Robertson?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

• (1450)

Senator Robertson: Honourable senators, as you recall, the Speaker made a ruling last February on the point of order raised by Senator MacEachen respecting a ruling made by the Speaker of the other place concerning the report of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy.

In his ruling, the Speaker of the Senate suggested that the Standing Senate Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders may wish to undertake an examination of the procedures and practices of joint committees, given that some difficulties have arisen in recent times with respect to their operation.

Subsequently, the Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders Committee discussed whether or not it would be appropriate to make such a study. As honourable senators are aware, that committee is empowered under the Rules of the Senate to study proposed amendments to the rules on its own initiative.

Following suggestions from members of our committee, on March 16, 1995, I wrote to the Chairman of the Procedures and House Affairs Committee of the House of Commons. I should like to read into the record both my letter to Mr. Milliken and his response to me. My letter to Mr. Peter Milliken states:

Dear Mr. Milliken:

On Tuesday, February 14, 1995, the Senate Speaker made a ruling on a point of order raised by the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C. with regard to the report of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canadian Foreign Policy.

In his ruling, a copy of which I am enclosing, our Speaker suggested that the Standing Senate Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders may wish to consider proposing, in consultation with a committee of the other place, a set of rules governing the operation of joint committees.

Since your Committee is mandated with reviewing the procedures and practices of the House of Commons and its Committees, I am writing to you for your views as to whether such a study would be appropriate. As a basis for discussion, may I suggest the following as examples of issues which may be of concern to both Houses regarding the operation of joint committees:

1. The powers of joint committees and whether identical powers must be given by both Chambers.

2. Voting procedures (e.g. the casting vote of the chair).

3. Rotating the chairmanship of meetings between the co-chairs.

4. A procedure for reprinting reports from standing and special joint committees.

5. The format of such reports and dissenting opinions.

6. The orders of reference of joint committees, i.e. Should they be identical? Should both Houses concur in them before they take effect?

7. The quorum of joint committees.

8. Meetings and meeting rooms, i.e. ensuring that the division bells of both Chambers may be heard, allowing televised broadcasting.

9. The financial administrative procedures of joint committees.

10. The procedure to be followed by joint committees in unprovided cases.

My own view is that, as opposed to a formal joint study by our two committees, perhaps this study could best be handled by creating an informal working group of Senators and Members of the House of Commons representing both committees which could review these matters and report back.

Thank you for considering this suggestion....

On April 18, I received a letter from Mr. Milliken which stated:

Dear Senator Robertson:

Thank you for your letter of March 16, 1995, regarding the operation of joint committees.

Your letter was considered by the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs at its meeting on Tuesday, March 28, 1995. At that time, the Committee concurred with your suggestion that an informal working group of Senators and Members of the House of Commons representing both committees be established to review these matters and to report back to our respective committees, and adopted a motion to this effect. The motion also requested that committee staff from both Houses assist this informal working group.

I am in the process of consulting the members of the Standing Committee, and hope to have the names of the members of this informal working group shortly. I would expect that the group would be in a position to meet shortly after the Senate returns after the Easter break, and would expect that a meeting could be set up by the clerks of the two Committees.

However, honourable senators, it was my original intention that the senators who would serve on this informal working group would not necessarily be members of the Senate Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders. I believe it to be important that the senators who meet with members of the other place have experience on joint committees and be familiar with their operations. However, as it turns out, the senators whom our committee has chosen are Senators Grimard and Gauthier, both of whom have had extensive experience on joint committees, and both of whom are members of our committee.

Again, as my March 16 letter indicates, it was not our intention that this be a formal joint study. If it were to be a formal study, I would agree with Senator Corbin that the normal procedure should be followed, namely, that there should be a motion of the Senate authorizing such a study, and ordering that a message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that they join with us in that particular study. However, we did not feel that this was necessary at this point in time as ours was to be an informal study in which a small group of members from both Houses would examine specific issues and make suggestions to both committees, which would then consider the recommendations.

Last month, just before the group was to meet for the first time, some doubts were expressed to me about whether our committee had all the necessary powers to conduct the study. I therefore proposed a motion on May 25, 1995 that the Standing Senate Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders be authorized to act jointly with the House of Commons Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs with regard to examination of the rules governing the operation of joint committees.

This wording followed very closely that used by the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in its order of reference adopted on June 7, 1994, respecting the future of agriculture in Canada, as well as the wording found in the order of reference dated June 29, 1983, with regard to the creation by the Senate of the Special Committee Reviewing the Security Intelligence Bill, which committee was chaired by Senator Pitfield.

Again, I reiterate that this is not a formal study by a joint committee. The report issued will be in the form of recommendations to the respective committees. Mr. Milliken, in his April 18 letter, agrees that this will be an informal working group. I might advise the house that this group has already met, and is pursuing the directions of both committees.

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to thank honourable Senator Robertson for her comments, which will assist me in making my ruling on the point of order raised by Senator Corbin.

As the matter has been reopened, do any other senators wish to make comments on the point of order?

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I gather this is not a new point of order. Therefore, I am precluded from commenting upon it. Is that the case?

The Hon. the Speaker: This is the point of order that you raised the other day, and which I took under advisement. Unfortunately, Senator Robertson, the Chairman of the Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders Committee, was not present in the chamber at that time, and asked leave of the Senate to make her comments today. Leave has been granted, and she has made her comments. As the matter has been reopened, it is only fair that if other members wish to participate, they should do so.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I have one concern relating to the subject–matter of this informal study. It is not a concern that is intended to undermine the importance of the study, but as I listened to the senator, I wondered whether the question of the representation of each House on joint committees would be reviewed.

As I understand it, the practice is that there is often a majority from the House of Commons on joint committees. Inasmuch as there will be an informal study, that raises the question as to how the equality of the Houses is respected — that is, if there is a majority from the House of Commons or a majority from the Senate.

We have gone over the ground frequently here with respect to the legislative powers of the Senate. With well-understood exceptions, the legislative powers of the Senate are identical to those of the House of Commons. Therefore, how do we face this question? If we acknowledge that there must be a majority from the House of Commons on the membership of joint committees, it puts the Senate in a permanent subordinate position.

Senator Robertson: I thank Senator MacEachen for his comments. Although not specified in the reference that I mentioned to you a few moments ago, I notice that Senator Gauthier and Senator Grimard are here. As our representatives on that informal committee, you can rest assured that your concerns will be well expressed. We shall report back in due course.

Senator Corbin: I wish to thank Senator Robertson for her explanation. It would have been most useful — that is, since I was present here at the time she made the motion — for me to have requested that she explain the reason behind her motion. In any case, honourable senators, we have that explanation before us now.

I only wish to add that, on the basis of what Senator Robertson has said, if what is proposed is an informal study by a group of persons not necessarily members of the committee, is the permission of the Senate then required? On the other hand, if permission is required, should we not proceed in accordance with the standing practices and traditions of this house in its normal conduct of business with the other place?

• (1500)

Senator Robertson: Honourable senators, I can appreciate Senator Corbin's concern. I thank him for raising this issue.

As I have identified, it is an informal structure right now. Our members are from the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders. At some point, we will be bringing back to this chamber information from that informal study, and we will see what ensues. I wanted to bring this information to the house before the Speaker made his ruling.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other honourable senators wish to participate in this discussion on this point of order, I thank those who have for their comments. The matter remains under advisement and I will make my ruling at a later date.

CANADA COUNCIL

CLOSURE OF ART BANK—REVISED NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Inquiry:

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I wish to revise my notice of inquiry of yesterday by changing the date of Wednesday next, because it will be a short sitting to allow for committee work. Therefore, I give notice that on Tuesday, June 20, I will bring to the Senate's attention that, for all intents and purposes, artistic and cultural groups unanimously opposed the announced closure of the Art Bank of the Canada Council.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreeable, honourable senators, to make this change?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

IMMIGRATION ACT
CITIZENSHIP ACT
CUSTOMS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Peter Bosa moved the third reading of Bill C-44, to amend the Immigration Act and the Citizenship Act and to make a consequential amendment to the Customs Act.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, prior to making some brief remarks, I wish to thank the committee for the courtesies extended to me as a temporary committee member while dealing with this bill. Members were more than fair and I would like to express my appreciation.

I rise today to speak to the changes to the Immigration Act in Bill C-44 and, more specifically, the issues of concern which were raised at meetings of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

I was both surprised and disturbed when almost all of the witnesses who appeared before the Senate committee stated that their organizations were not consulted by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration or his officials regarding this bill.

The Canadian Bar Association, the Quebec Bar Association, the Canadian Council for Refugees, the Canadian Police Association, and the customs and immigration unions, among others, stated that they were not consulted and were not aware of the changes contained in this legislation prior to its introduction in Parliament.

For a government and a minister who constantly assert that they listen and consult interested Canadians prior to modifying legislation, they appear to have neglected their pledge in this instance.

The bill that the Senate committee has examined over the past three months, in concert with these professional associations and other interested Canadians, concerns only one, yet consequential, aspect of immigration: That of enforcement. The Immigration Act clearly states that the protection of Canadian society is a key principle of all changes to the act, and all changes to the act should reflect this principle.

The commitment to safeguard Canadians must remain a paramount concern of our immigration policy. We must not forsake this obligation in the interest of placating those few who would tear down our borders, who would seek to break our laws, and who would abuse our generosity and compassion.

Although there are only a few who attempt to erode our legal and immigration systems, the government must ensure that our protection is not diminished. To abdicate this responsibility will contribute to a less tolerant and a less generous immigration policy.

Bill C-44 is an extension of the former government's substantial overhaul of the Immigration Act in Bill C-86. In fact, a number of the amendments serve to further define the original objectives of Bill C-86. To that extent, I support the general thrust of Bill C-44.

It is somewhat ironic that we now have a Liberal government that, when in opposition, criticized and voted against Bill C-86 and, whilst in power, has borrowed many of the chief objectives formulated by the previous government.

That being said, I must generally lend my support to the provisions within Bill C-44, including those that deny day passes to or temporary release of foreign offenders awaiting deportation. I am also in agreement with providing more powers to customs and immigration officials in order that they may prevent the entry of fraudulent documents and contraband.

However, there are some aspects of this bill which should be amended and, in fact, tightened. To this end, the Senate committee has identified three major areas of concern. The first and most significant is related to the appeals offered to serious criminals who wish to remain in Canada. The government has neglected to ensure that terrorists, war criminals, and spies are denied the avenue of appeal to the appeal division with respect to humanitarian and compassionate consideration. They have admitted that this is the case.

In other words, if you hit someone in a bar-room brawl, you are denied an appeal on equitable grounds. However, if the Canadian government has reason to believe that you are a war criminal, you are allowed access to the appeal division for compassionate consideration. This is completely unacceptable. It is not acceptable to me as a member of the Senate, and, I would imagine, it is not acceptable to Canadians.

We have been assured by ministry officials that this oversight will be addressed in the near future by way of further changes to the legislation.

The second concern involves the fundamental right to due process, the fact that we are all innocent until proven guilty. The bill contains a particular provision dealing with the importation of fraudulent documents. This provision appears to set a reverse onus in that, if someone receives documents which turn out to be fraudulent, he or she may be required to prove that he or she did not intend to receive the documents.

The officials tell us that they believe the onus is on the Crown to prove intent. I am still uncomfortable with that provision. We are asking the minister, through a recommendation, to ensure that innocent Canadians are not exposed to embarrassment, cost or suffering because of this clause.

The third concern involves the amount of time an individual will have in which to proffer submissions for humanitarian and compassionate consideration to the minister. Many witnesses outlined the fact that 15 days was not sufficient time to complete their case. The committee would like to see that time period extended to 30 days. This would also be consistent with other parts of the Immigration Act. Officials have assured us that, in practice, the 15-day period is regularly extended to accommodate reasonable requests.

We have suggested other recommendations. The first is directly related to the first concern regarding the denial of appeal rights to serious criminals and serious offenders. Bill C-44 states that those who have committed serious criminal offences punishable by 10 years or more will be denied appeal. In our opinion, there are many other serious criminal offences — such as, importing a restricted weapon, public incitement of hatred, advocating genocide — which are not liable to 10 years or more of incarceration. One must question the viability and the usefulness of such a high threshold.

Frankly with all of the emphasis this government is placing on gun control, I am surprised that this legislation is not more indicative of their stated priority.

Therefore, we have suggested that other serious crimes, such as the ones mentioned above, be included in the list of crimes which will be denied appeal rights, thereby indicating the level of protection that Canadians want reflected in their immigration policy.

We have also recommended that the minister provide written reasons why an individual will be disallowed an appeal and also that the minister provide an annual report to Parliament on the number of danger-to-the-public certificates conferred within that year. As in the issuance of ministerial permits, the government must be held accountable to Parliament for its actions. Accountability is vitally important when legislation provides such wide and discretionary powers.

The Senate committee also recommends that the government review and amend the Canada Customs Act and the Canada Post Corporation Act in reference to the fact that customs and immigration officials are powerless to stop the importation of fraudulent documents or contraband if it arrives in Canada in mail weighing less than 30 grams. Many identity and immigration documents weigh less than 30 grams. This represents a serious loophole in Bill C-44 and existing customs and Canada Post legislation. If the government is serious about stemming the tide of abuse of our immigration system, it must act to secure our borders and mail systems from all fraudulent documents and acts.

The final recommendation, and clearly the most important one, is that the government give priority to ensuring that those charged with the responsibility to administer the act are given a clear mandate and sufficient resources to carry it out in order to protect our citizens. This may seem like a simple and straightforward concept which should already exist in law and practice. However, enforcement has become the forgotten child of immigration. It is not politically correct to discuss enforcement and immigration in the same breath. Internal documents have painted a frightening picture of the lack of leadership and structure with respect to the immigration enforcement branch.

I caution my colleagues and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration that if this ministerial and departmental neglect is allowed to continue, regardless of legislation like Bill C-44, there will be more abuse and more victims. The support of Canadians for immigration will be seriously weakened if they perceive that criminals and undesirables are being allowed to enter Canada. The few who abuse the system must be dealt with sternly and quickly.

I am an immigrant to Canada, like many of my colleagues here in the Senate, and I do not wish to see the immense contribution immigration makes to this country eroded. This can only be avoided if our government does not abandon the protection that Canadians expect and demand.

Honourable senators, Bill C-44 is not the panacea for all that ails the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. In the absence of a clear commitment from the government to immigration enforcement, I can only hope that it is a step in the right direction. The minister and his officials have taken the time to review the recommendations suggested by the committee. These recommendations were formulated with a view to strengthening the provisions of Bill C-44. Given that the minister has signalled his intent to address our concern, we are now prepared to support this legislation.

Departmental representatives have responded to our questions, clarifying some issues. Most important, they have assured us that our concerns will be dealt with within future legislative initiatives. We support the main thrust of Bill C-44 and do not want to delay the implementation of its important provisions. Therefore, we are prepared to give our endorsement to this bill.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to revisit the debate on Bill C-44, to amend the Immigration Act, which has been both wide-ranging and fruitful. However, I wish to say that the government believes this legislation will help to restore some of the public trust in our immigration system which may have been lost by an unrelenting focus on criminality. I hope that the legislation before honourable senators today will shift the focus of immigration away from criminality and back to where it rightfully belongs — immigration as an engine of the economy.

During consideration of the bill in committee, a number of concerns came to the surface which are now part of the recommendations appended to the legislation. Among those concerns are four specific ones which preoccupied members of the committee; the phrase "danger to the public", reverse onus, perceptions about the loss of appeal rights, and the seizure of documents, as well as perceived Charter problems.

There was intense scrutiny on these topics, and some amendments were contemplated. However, with the help of the offices of the department and our Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel, we were able to get clarification on the points which troubled us most.

Some of the recommendations request that, in its upcoming legislation, the government modify the appeal provision, deal with the concern that the criterion of "danger to the public" may not be applicable to most war criminals, revisit the reverse onus provision, and ensure that the minister report to Parliament once a year on the cases dealt with under this legislation.

I would be remiss in my duty, honourable senators, if I did not take this opportunity to thank the chairman and all the members of the committee for their hard work and attention to detail. I should particularly like to thank Senators Di Nino, Jessiman, Cochrane and Lavoie-Roux for their insight and thoughtful analysis.

The recommendations which have been made have isolated certain slight anomalies in the bill and will help strengthen the legislation in the next round of amendments. I know that these recommendations will be taken seriously. I am very pleased that the bill was reported without amendment. This illustrates what the Minister of Immigration has been saying all along: this is good legislation which must be implemented quickly.

On behalf of the minister, I should like to thank honourable senators for having given this bill speedy passage.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, for the adoption of the first report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Pearson Airport Agreements (Budget), which was presented to the Senate on June 13, 1995.— (Honourable Marcel Prud'homme)

Honourable Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, true to my words of yesterday, I will not abuse the situation by unduly delaying a decision concerning this committee which is examining an issue which we in the Senate have already studied long enough, I think.

[English]

You will remember that at almost this time last year, we had a debate in the house on report stage of Bill C-22. I am still grateful to Senator Murray for having given me a chance to put my views forth to the Senate. I moved that the report not be adopted at that time but be returned to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, presided over by the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, with the proviso that he should call before the committee Mr. Robert Nixon. Mr. Nixon made a very short report subtitled "Pearson Airport Review", dated November 29, 1993. Many people in the press seem not to have read that report.

It was the wish of the Senate not to proceed with my motion at report stage. I was convinced then, and I am more so today, that that would have been sufficient. However, it was indicated by some senators that I may be moving to send it to the wrong committee. Not being stubborn, the next day I proposed that the bill not be read the third time. Having listened to the good advice of Senator Lynch-Staunton and others, that I may have chosen the wrong committee, I proposed that the bill be sent back to the Transport and Communications Committee, presided over by Senator Oliver. No instruction was issued to call in Mr. Nixon. After all, the debate today is as a result of Mr. Nixon's report. At that time, in its wisdom the Senate did not see fit to utilize my solution, which I am sure would have terminated the debate.

We carried on with our amendments which were conveyed to the House of Commons, which House rejected them. Therefore, the "Pearson affair" is still in committee.

My doubts as to the wisdom of having the committee inquire into this matter at this time are many. My first concern is that the matter is being studied by two different bodies. It is still before the Senate committee chaired by Senator Beaudoin and it is still before the courts. For some, that should be enough.

I understand that the Minister of Transport, with whom I am friends, did not help in terms of his rapport with some senators. At times, I found myself wondering if his anger was not directed at the Senate as a whole. I hope that is not the case. We are now faced with a difficult situation in which we are asking a Senate committee to study the so-called Pearson "affair".

The business in the House of Commons proceeds most rapidly. If honourable senators do not believe that is the case, all they have to do is attend in the Senate Gallery in the House of Commons to watch the proceedings. The business of that place is being steam-rolled by the government, which expects the Senate to rubber-stamp everything next week. We may have some news for them, I do not know.

Honourable senators, we in this place are at least more orderly. It was the wish of the majority here, to which I bow, to strike a committee to study the Pearson airport agreements. However, the matter did not stop there. The duty to strike a committee of seven members was given to the two Whips in this place, Senators Hébert and Kinsella. That is their responsibility.

This decision has to be accepted by the Senate. I like that. There is more openness here than exists in the House of Commons.

We approved the names of those distinguished senators who will sacrifice their summer, if the committee sits this summer. They met and elected a very able and pleasant chairman in Senator Finlay MacDonald. The next step was to take the matter before the Internal Economy Committee to ask for money. The committee put forward a budget. They say that this committee will cost some $298,000. However, they are careful in their motion. They were not so sure about the cost and they therefore ask, if necessary, for a supplementary budget.

I am of the opinion that a lot of indirect costs are not being taken into account here, although I was told otherwise by staff. However, my experience has taught me that we will need messengers who otherwise would be on vacation. We will need clerks and other personnel. These indirect costs are not being taken into account at the moment.

My attendance at the Internal Economy Committee meeting was most educational. Honourable senators know that I am not a member of any committee, something which I hope will be solved eventually. I show my interest by attending almost every meeting of the committee.

While the Internal Economy Committee was dealing with the budget for the Pearson Committee, it was considering the budgets of the standing committees. The members of the committee took their decision rapidly. To my surprise, it was a Liberal who proposed the adoption of the budget for this committee.

Honourable senators made their appearances before the committee in order to present their budgets. After all, it is in the committees of the Senate where the real activities take place.

I look around and see the distinguished chairman of my favourite committee, the Foreign Affairs Committee. I refer to the Honourable Senator Stewart. Perhaps one day the Senate will see fit to make me a member of that committee. However, I will not go on my knees begging to become a member of that committee.

Senator Stewart presented his budget before Internal Economy. We all know that he is a serious man. He was told, "No problem. We have no need for an explanation. We will inform you later on as to your request." In other words, he should not begin any activities or start spending money with respect to the affairs of the committee.

The chairmen of other committees presented their budgets to the committee. The Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, Senator Kirby, seconded by Senator Rizzuto, of course, presented his budget. This is serious stuff. Senator Kirby was told, "Thank you. We will advise you if we accept your budget or not." I find the whole thing rather strange.

Senator Sylvain, a very distinguished gentleman, presented his budget for his committee and was told the same thing.

The Honourable Pat Carney from British Columbia presides over the Energy Committee. She appeared before Internal Economy and described the activities of her committee. She was told, "Thank you. We will advise you as to your request."

I could name other committees and their chairmen. I am surprised that the chairpersons of these committees are told, "We will advise you."

As for the Pearson Committee, the budget was approved right away. We still have not found the money. That is another of my arguments. We do not know where the money will come from. The Senate has asked that the committee show some restraint in its expenses.

Honourable senators, I was very happy when Senator Neiman produced the report of the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide. A lot of work was done, faithfully on our behalf, by Senator Carstairs, Senator Neiman, Senator Corbin, Senator Lavoie-Roux, Senator DeWare, Senator Beaudoin and our famous cardiologist, Senator Keon. Did we ever agonize over finding the money for something that is a pearl for us, such as that committee? I have spoken on radio programs regarding the seriousness of this issue. They indicated that that report was important, and that it is good to start this important discussion.

[Translation]

"A societal debate" are the words you used, Senator Lavoie-Roux, on television: It is the start of a societal debate.

[English]

No one really expected the Senate to come out in favour of euthanasia. The committee has opened up the discussion in Canada, and the money spent on that report is money well-spent. However, for the Pearson Committee, we do not know that it would not be money well-spent. I question the sagacity of spending a minimum of $300,000. It is open-ended.

It is like untendered contracts.

[English]

We know how it will start, but we do not know how it will finish. The committee is on a great fishing expedition. Regardless of how tough the chairman will be, he will be unable to stop people from fishing. It is impossible. It is in the nature of politics to make points, and points will be thrown in each other's face. I would bet on that.

Honourable senators, is $300,000 money well-spent when we do not have the money?

[Translation]

We talk about scraping a few pennies together, when, as good administrators, we should have some money put aside for rainy days. We would like to have studies on other important subjects such as euthanasia, like the Young Offenders Act and where these young people will be imprisoned.

[English]

Listen to what is going on in the House of Commons. It is unbelievable what is being said on les jeunes contrevenants by the Reform Party. It is unacceptable. They are ready to throw everyone in jail forever. I am sure the Senate would like, eventually, to —

[Translation]

In French, we talk about looking into the question.

[English]

Did anyone listen to the sickly debate taking place? I am ready to stand for anyone who wishes to speak up. Parliament is a place for freedom of thought. However, the speeches made last night, yesterday and the day before on Bill C-31 are enough to make you throw up. I am sure the Senate will study these matters in its gentle and quiet manner.

The Senate does not have the money. The Senate is the master of its own rule. The Senate may have decided yes, it is a good idea, let us have the committee. However, on reflection, they may decide that we should not go ahead with the spending of money we do not have. That is an immense amount of money, and as a good administrator, I think we should reflect on the matter once more.

The Hon. the Speaker: It was moved by the Honourable Senator MacDonald, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, that this report be adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Prud'homme: On division.

Motion agreed to and report adopted, on division.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Final Report of the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide, entitled: "Of Life and Death", tabled in the Senate on 6th June, 1995. — (Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux)

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I am pleased to have this opportunity today to say a few words about the Report of the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide.

I will not repeat all the recommendations in the report, which were already mentioned by the Chair of the committee and, yesterday or the day before, if I am not mistaken, by Senator Beaudoin.

Today, I would rather touch on the arguments put forward by the proponents of euthanasia, not exhaustively, but at least my perception of these arguments, and on those against euthanasia, and why I supported the latter in my final conclusions.

In the course of their work, members of the special committee became aware of the very complex issues connected with euthanasia and assisted suicide. We had to consider numerous aspects of life and death; life as a fundamental value in any society; autonomy as a personal value; suffering as an experience generally associated with the end of life; the relationship between the patient, his family and community environment and the health care team.

We had some long discussions that, I must admit, were not always easy, though I hope necessary. Through our attempts at mutual understanding and our resolve to interpret correctly some 150 presentations that were made before the committee, we were able to reach a consensus on a number of points.

First, I want to say that all members of the committee agreed there was a fundamental difference between deliberately causing death and not prolonging life. That is why we made a distinction between euthanasia and assisted suicide, which are deliberate, and measures to alleviate suffering and the cessation or non-initiation of treatment.

We reached a consensus on the development of palliative care and the need not only to develop this kind of care but also to increase research on the alleviation of pain.

We also recommended amending and clarifying the Criminal Code with respect to non-initiation or cessation of treatment. It is a fact that although cessation of treatment or what is also called aggressive treatment has become more readily acceptable, there is still a great deal of what I would call ambiguity about when a physician may do this, under what conditions and in what circumstances.

We have asked for the Criminal Code to be amended but we are also asking for the development of guidelines so that we can have more or less common standards and people will know when and how to act.

Assisted suicide and euthanasia are basically acts whose purpose is to provide a solution by causing death. Two main arguments are generally used to support euthanasia and assisted suicide.

[English]

• (1540)

Personal autonomy and dying with dignity were the two main arguments brought to our attention by the various witnesses and the pro-euthanasia members of the committee.

"Personal autonomy cannot exist in isolation from the imperatives of life in the community." I would like to refute this argument, or tell you why I did not accept it. Personal autonomy cannot be absolute. We all need other people if we are to achieve our aspirations, and each of us has an impact on our immediate circle and our community.

Dr. Louis Dionne, Director General of Maison Michel Sarrazin in Quebec City, a home for dying people, stated at page 13:12 of the testimony:

> The principle of self-determination, of the patient's autonomy, goes hand-in-hand with interdependence. We can't have one without the other. We are individuals living in society, a community, and the community has rights when it comes to an individual member's behaviour. Our whole society is based on this...

Dr. Nuala Kenny, at page 20:44 of the testimony, stated:

> Euthanasia and assisted suicide are not private acts of individuals. They require — indeed oblige — the participation of others.

Professor Bernard Keating of Laval University stated:

> Autonomy in isolation from other people is just an abstraction.

In formulating a policy applicable to an entire country, it is important to foresee its repercussions both on individuals and on society as a whole. The public interest does not permit society to condone the exercise of personal choice by a small number of people if those choices would create a situation of insecurity for the population as a whole.

Dr. Elizabeth Latimer was also involved in palliative care, and she told us:

> The prohibition of euthanasia and assisted suicide recognizes that the public good outweighs the interest of the individual patient, even though this prohibition may represent a limitation on individual self-determination.

Moreover — and this is more from a social point of view — legalization of assisted suicide would also convey to the general population an ambiguous message, thereby causing a problem for educators. In their brief, the National Coalition for Concerned Mothers clearly expressed their concern in this regard, and I quote:

> We believe Canada's current debate over the legalization of euthanasia and assisted suicide will have a significant impact on our families. Removing any of the prohibitions against killing in Canada will begin an irreversible erosion of the dignity and quality of life we extend to people who are suffering in circumstances beyond their control. Legalizing euthanasia and assisted suicide will create new options which will ultimately teach our children that it is preferable to end life rather than to expend the energy and resources necessary to display our interdependency and concern for others.

We must also take into account the impact that legalized assisted suicide would inevitably have on the social conscience or our social fabric. If we legalize assisted suicide, are we not sending the message to all the adolescents in difficulty, all the people struggling with depression or problems that seem to be insoluble, that suicide is all right — exactly the opposite of the message we would like them to hear? Is one form of suicide linked to another — at least by the bond of increased acceptance? I think we can witness this in our society.

What would be the foreseeable consequences of legalizing assisted suicide? Some people who consider euthanasia ethically unacceptable believe that assisted suicide could be acceptable because, in their eyes, it is primarily the sick person's responsibility. However, in practice, the assistance provided by the doctor or anyone else might well be perceived as implicitly condoning "death as a solution". They would be helping to trivialize the act of causing death. There would then be only one more step to take to reach the practice of voluntary euthanasia. Assisted suicide could also be used as disguised euthanasia.

Furthermore, once active termination of life becomes a choice for competent people, the grounds for excluding non-competent people from such treatment becomes difficult to defend. Even with the best of safeguards, there will be abuse. For example, how can we truly recognize that someone has not chosen assisted suicide because they feel they are a burden, or because there is pressure from the family or caregivers? Can we hope, realistically, that carefully worded guidelines could prevent this slide toward euthanasia, first voluntary and then involuntary?

The Dutch experience is far from conclusive in this respect. There is considerable controversy over the statistics contained in the Remmelink report that was done in Holland on the practice of euthanasia and assisted suicide. Without pretending to have settled the debate, one can say, in light of the testimony we have heard and read, that in a good many cases the guidelines were not followed. People were euthanized without their consent. Death certificates were also falsified. Euthanasia was not listed as the cause of death, or simply not reported, and the mandatory consultation with another physician, which is one of the safeguards, did not take place.

Moreover — and this is when we talk about the danger of legalizing euthanasia — initially, only terminally ill patients suffering unbearable pain could be euthanized, and only if they so requested, but, gradually, other categories of patients have been included: handicapped newborns, persons with dementia, and so on and so forth.

The Dutch experience with euthanasia has not been going on for long, but so far it offers little reassurance to those who fear that society cannot adopt a policy favourable toward assisted suicide and euthanasia without starting a process that might be hard to control.

The second argument that is often used — and I respect it because our own debates were conducted in respect of each other's point of view — is the famous argument of "dying with dignity". This catch phrase was popularized by the opponents of heroic measures. It meant the refusal of pointless or excessively painful treatment that would only prolong the dying process to no purpose. "Dying with dignity" also meant that the sick person's well-being and the alleviation of any pain he or she might suffer would take precedence over any desire to prolong life, no matter what the cost.

In regard to this first meaning of "dying with dignity", in a common accord we agreed that this should be corrected, and the Criminal Code should be corrected in terms of clarifying the question of therapeutic harassment.

More recently, the phrase has taken on a different connotation. It is sometimes understood to mean "being exempt from living through the terminal stage of life at all". Other users of the phrase claim that enabling the patient to control the moment of his or her death is what gives a certain quality to that death, gives it its dignity. This brings us to the notion of absolute autonomy, which would place freedom to choose above any rule without regard to the nature of the choice.

It is obvious that each of us has a subjective idea of "dignity", whether in life or death. We also have subjective ideas of "happiness", "comfort", and "wealth", and we have considerable latitude to try to obtain what represents for us a successful and worthwhile life. Yet, there are objective standards — for example property rights — that are indispensable in protecting the human rights of all, even if they result in certain limits to individual freedom.

The protection of human life is one of the fundamental rights guaranteed to all — that is, objective values — and it imposes a limit on the freedom to choose subjective values.

The right to "die with dignity" that is universally valid is the right to receive, up to the end, the care needed to relieve one's suffering and to be surrounded by human attention and compassion. It is the right to feel that one still has value as a person.

I would like to quote here the Thomas More Lawyers' Guild. They said:

> The killing of the terminally ill, even at their own request, does not confer dignity. Rather, it suggests that the terminally ill form a group having so little value to society that the lives of its members do not merit the protection extended to all other persons.

[Translation]

I would now like to develop a little the arguments of those who were against euthanasia — I was included in that group —. The first is respect for human life.

Respect for life is one of the most universal values running through all societies. It is governed by strict rules which, when broken, generally necessitate criminal proceedings. None of the countries which share our democratic values endorses assisted suicide and euthanasia, except one territory in Australia, which legalized euthanasia on May 25.

In a diverse society, the right to respect for life is a societal value which transcends various religious and cultural values.

As we know, the issue was studied in-depth by the House of Lords in England. While acknowledging that there are individual cases in which people are in agonizing pain at the end of their lives, this committee unanimously concluded that:

> Individual cases do not justify a weakening of the ban on intentional killing, a principle which protects us all.

[English]

I had a quotation that I wanted to pass on to you from a study that was carried on in New York State that goes along the same line, but I have lost it in my papers. I am sorry.

[Translation]

I would now like to talk about the arguments that should discourage us from agreeing to euthanasia. I would first like to talk about protecting the most vulnerable.

Particularly in a sick and weakened state, people depend a lot on those around them and on the system — and, by system, I mean the medical system —. Because of their situation and often unwittingly, they give them more and more control over their lives. Accordingly, even for competent individuals, it is difficult to determine whether their choice is free and informed.

There is a whole side to this issue we did not, unfortunately, have the time to consider, such as cases of depression and so on, which should be given more serious and perhaps longer consideration.

In a context of legally and socially acceptable assisted suicide, would the expectations of the people around the individual not possibly be a determining factor in the individual's decision.

> People with a terminal illness and their families are extremely vulnerable, and the potential for abuse in such instances is extremely high. Will there ever be a system or a legal principle to really protect patients and other vulnerable individuals? We doubt it.

That is a quote from testimony by Elizabeth Latimer, whom I mentioned earlier. She continues:

> In a world where no attempt is made to find a positive side to old age and suffering, it will become normal to want to have done and abnormal to want to continue living despite the subtle pressures of the community. One's own survival will therefore have to be justified.

Lastly, I would like to quote Dr. David Roy of the Institut de recherche clinique de Montréal. He spoke of various illusions, and I am referring to the last one. He said:

> The last illusion is doubtless the most significant and the most damaging. It involves believing that quality care can still be given to persons who are vulnerable, poor, suffering and abandoned once legislation providing that euthanasia is socially and ethically acceptable has been passed. It would be naive to think that such legislation, adopted by good people with the best humanitarian intentions, would not lead to intolerable abuse by others whose intentions were not the same.

To illustrate the perception of persons with a disability — unfortunately, perhaps we have not listened to them often enough — permit me a somewhat stinging quotation:

> Canada has noted a problem of suicide among young people and has reacted with the question: How can we avoid this? Canada has noted a problem of suicide among native people and reacted with the question: How can we correct this? Canada has noted a problem of suicide among the disabled and reacted with the question: What can we do to help them kill themselves?

That quotation is from Professor Dick Sobsey of the University of Calgary Developmental Disability Centre.

How can we avoid turning too readily to assisted suicide and euthanasia in the context of insufficient financial and institutional resources?

The reality is that our health institutions are faced with major constraints, which will not be eased in the foreseeable future, especially in a society where the proportion of old people is growing rapidly.

• (1600)

I was referring to the context of scarce finance and institutional resources. The Canadian Nurses Association expressed respect and support for the chronically ill and disabled. They also expressed worry that euthanasia could be covertly linked to limited health care resources. Surely, no public policy on euthanasia would ever be proposed on the basis of saving money but, if such a policy were in place, who can say whether financial concerns would not become a consideration within facilities and agencies or even within families.

The Nova Scotia Palliative Care Hospice Association stated:

> We are living in an age of limited resources. Physicians and health care systems face increasing pressures to practice more efficiently and more cost-effectively. Difficult choices will in part be influenced by available funding. If euthanasia were to be an available option, almost certainly there would be a bias toward earlier death for patients who were seriously ill and unlikely to survive.

These are just a few of the representations made to us during the committee's meetings. Several others expressed great concern about euthanasia and assisted suicide in a time when resources are so restricted.

In conclusion, all these arguments weighed heavily against legalizing assisted suicide and still more so against euthanasia. I realize that situations will still happen where individuals will die alone or abandoned or in physical pain which cannot be adequately controlled.

If I had more time, I would read the testimony of Dr. Morrisette from Laval University, who works with AIDS patients. All through our hearings, we were particularly concerned with AIDS patients. Is euthanasia the answer for them or is the answer to give them more resources and to accept them better than we have in the past? There has been some progress but this is still a problem. They have experienced rejection not only from the medical body in its largest sense but also from their families and from society in general. Life is very difficult for AIDS sufferers. My concern remains for those individuals who may die alone.

Can we find the answer to the needs of such people in the legalization of euthanasia and assisted suicide, or would we create a serious risk for the most vulnerable among us and threaten the fundamental values of our life in society? Rather, should not the answer be a greater reliance on positive measures, such as better training for the personnel who work with the terminally ill, more intensive research into pain relief, greater emphasis on palliative care programs?

On those particular recommendations, everyone in the committee was unanimous. Various witnesses, for and against euthanasia, were in agreement on the need for greater palliative care.

If we really want to respect the dignity of the dying, it is urgent that we make available to them the resources that would allow them to live to the last, surrounded by the consideration, respect and affection of their family and caregivers. It is urgent that our health care policies be reoriented in this direction.

I said earlier we had many discussions. We did not always agree and at times it was a very difficult debate. Dr. Mount of the Royal Victoria Hospital is a pioneer in relation to palliative care. His words were full of wisdom and sagacity:

> I do not think that this is a national debate about death with dignity because I would suggest that people who would come down on both sides of the question would favour death with dignity.

All members of the committee agreed.

> Second, I do not feel this debate is helpfully characterized by either pro-life or pro-choice alternatives. Again, I feel that people on both sides of the question would see themselves as holding both views. Third, I think this debate is not about discontinuing or withholding inappropriate life-prolonging treatment, an issue that has been under debate in our country and others for some three decades and on which consensus has largely been reached....

Again, the committee agreed.

> Fourth, this debate is not about double effect. That is the risk of shortening life as a consequence of treatment given for the purpose of alleviating suffering. That may happen as a consequence of good palliative care and it is unrelated to euthanasia or assisted suicide.

The intention is not to kill, but to relieve the pain.

> Fifth, I think this debate is about the best response and the best way for Canada as a nation to respond to the sort of suffering we have heard about.

We have put on the table a great deal of information. I would particularly thank everyone who came before the committee, answered our questions and explained their thoughts. This is also their report. I hope this gives some food for thought for whoever will take over following the tabling of this report.

Hon. Sharon Carstairs: Honourable senators, I, too, participated in these hearings. I came to quite different conclusions than those expressed today by Senator Lavoie-Roux.

Rather than a weakness, I see that as the real strength of this report. It adds to the debate in this nation of the very important issues surrounding death and dying in Canadian society. We all brought to this debate different backgrounds of experience, some personal, some practical.

Before I begin today, I want to pay special tribute to the Chair of this committee, Senator Neiman, who will be retiring from this chamber in September of this year. She was participating in her last major project in this chamber. She did so with enthusiasm, with an incredible desire for hard work which pushed us all. She did it with humour. She did it sometimes when I knew she had very severe bronchitis and should have taken to her bed. Her example gave me a wonderful introduction to this chamber.

I was attending committee hearings on euthanasia and assisted suicide before I had even been sworn in, in September of last year.

The other members of the committee also contributed in ways which reflected their own expertise, whether it was Senator Beaudoin and his knowledge of the law, Senator Dr. Keon and his knowledge of health care issues, Senator DeWare and her wonderful experience in social services, Senator Lavoie-Roux and her knowledge as an administrator and a minister of health or Senator Corbin and his years and years of parliamentary experience.

There was another senator who attended frequently, sometimes as a replacement and sometimes just because he developed a wonderful interest in the committee's work. That was Senator Desmarais, who is not with us these days because he is dealing with his own very serious health problems. I want him to know that he was a part of this report. We heard him, we listened to him, we knew what he thought and what he felt. All of our hearts, best wishes and prayers are with him at the present time.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Carstairs: I have said that we all came to this debate with a base of personal experience. Honourable senators, I will not forget the phone call that I received in May 1980 in which my mother asked if I would return immediately to Halifax because my father was in a coma.

• (1610)

When I arrived at the Victoria General Hospital — a hospital that my father helped construct when he was Minister of Health in the province of Nova Scotia — it was clear that he was dying. When I returned to visit with my mother, she made a very simple request. She said, "Sharon, go to the hospital, do what must be done. Tell them not to prolong his life beyond its natural end." I did. I requested that they disconnect the machines. In those days that would have been considered passive euthanasia. We have evolved, we have changed. We have new procedures in our society.

Little was I to know that seven months later, in Winnipeg, I would have to go to the Grace Hospital in our city to do the same for my mother.

Yes, I came with that experience to this committee and I shared some of that with the members of the committee.

When we debated these issues of euthanasia and assisted suicide, we recognized very early that it would involve much more than only those two final issues. While I will discuss those, I want to celebrate for a few moments the unanimity that this committee arrived at on so many critical issues facing the Canadian health care system and the issues of death and dying.

We know that there are Canadians who are not receiving palliative care in the moments when they need it, and that is intolerable and unacceptable; some, because they live in rural and remote communities, some because they do not know how to access the appropriate forms of palliation, sometimes because some members of the health care professions are concerned about issues such as perhaps they will become addicted to drugs, as if that is of any consequence to a dying person. We know that there are people in Canada who are dying in pain, without support and without love, and that is not acceptable.

We must develop better palliative care services in the home, in hospices and in hospitals. That challenge must be taken up by governments at the provincial and federal levels to ensure that real change is effected in this nation, and as soon as possible if we wish to continue to think of ourselves as a civilized society.

I say to honourable senators and to the members of the other place, read the recommendations on palliative care. Listen to those recommendations, think about them, respond to them. Respond to the concerns that we expressed about pain control. We have clearly stated that no one should suffer pain. Let us teach our medical students, nurses and homecare workers how to provide adequate amounts of pain relief. There is no excuse not to do so.

If there are requirements to change the Criminal Code, and clearly there seem to be — at least, to the extent of ensuring that the Criminal Code is well understood — then we must do so in order that no doctor or nurse feels that he or she is in violation of the law by providing enough medication for that patient to be relieved of agony. We know that for perhaps up to 5 per cent of patients, we do not have the technology to relieve their pain. We know that for 95 per cent of patients we do, and to do otherwise is not acceptable.

We also made strong recommendations about the withholding and withdrawal of treatment. We again said that if the Criminal Code needs to be amended and adjusted, then let us do so. If we have any understanding of autonomy in this nation, surely autonomy means that if I do not want a treatment, I do not have to have that treatment; or, if I want treatment, that is my right. If doctors are not doing that because they are fearful of legal ramifications, we must ease their concern so that the autonomy of Canadians in this respect is absolutely protected, that there is no question.

We also spent a chapter talking about the need for advanced directives, often called "Living Wills." We know that some provinces, such as Manitoba, have one. One was recently passed in Ontario. Quebec has had one for a long time. Other provinces do not. We also know that there are no protocols between provinces. I question whether, if I was to be hit by a car today in Ontario, my signed, advance directive from Manitoba would be considered valid. I hope it would be, but I have no knowledge or understanding that that would be the case.

All of these recommendations were unanimous. There was no question, no doubt in the minds of the senators that these changes must be made. That is what we should celebrate. We should celebrate those accomplishments of our committee here in presenting our report. We must be unanimous in pushing forward those recommendations to whatever authority, provincial or federal, which must act to ensure that those changes come into force and effect.

I would not do justice to the report or to my views if I did not spend some time discussing with you my concerns about assisted suicide and euthanasia and why I believe that it should be permitted in very limited and very controlled circumstances in Canada.

Honourable senators, I know that people are dying in intolerable pain for which there is no relief. When I think in terms of issues that are obviously human, I have to always look towards those for whom I have the greatest love; certainly my daughters, but above all my husband. I do not want him to die in intolerable pain. I would not allow him to die in intolerable pain. It is as simple as that. I would not allow it, if I could do anything in my power to prevent it. I believe in an expression uttered by Sue Rodriguez, who said, "Whose life is it anyway?" It was her life. It was her autonomy. It was her equality. For her reasons, she no longer wanted to live. They were not my reasons, they were her reasons. She was a rational, competent, warm, caring human being with a 10-year-old child. In her book she said with such passion: "I want to go when he remembers me with some joy in my life. When I can no longer hug him, when I can no longer touch him, I do not want to be here."

Sue Rodriguez made that decision for herself. I think she had the right to make that decision. We will not know, ever, I suspect, whether Sue Rodriguez was euthanized or whether she had an assisted suicide, because everything would depend on her physical capacity at that moment. That is why I not only accepted assisted suicide, but also euthanasia. How can I say to one person, "You can have assistance in your suicide, but if you are too handicapped to assist in your own suicide, then I can do nothing for you." If one accepts assisted suicide in those limited cases, then one must also be prepared to accept, in the spirit of equality, euthanasia for those people, very few in number, who cannot assist in their own suicide. Autonomy and equality of individuals are critical to me.

The powerful argument which is frequently made about changing the law with respect to euthanasia and assisted suicide is that somehow or other we would start on a slippery slope. I suggest to you, honourable senators, that we are already on a slippery slope. In my opinion, it is a far more dangerous slippery slope than a change in the current law would be. I know that acts of assisted suicide and euthanasia are taking place in Canada today, with no rules, no controls and no guidelines. Some people have access; some people do not. There is nothing fair or equitable about that.

In addition, it is dangerous. I suggest that it is dangerous to have the medical profession forced to make decisions of this nature. This is not a decision to be made only by physicians. This is a decision to be made by society and by societal values.

We heard from physicians about the frequency of assisted suicide and euthanasia. We heard from clergymen that it is indeed taking place. I have no doubt that it is taking place in Canada, and I think it should be carefully controlled.

Finally, what I found most interesting in the study of the Dutch experience was that the reason for wanting assisted suicide and euthanasia was rarely pain. The reason given most often by those who requested it was lack of dignity, loss of control over bodily function, dependency upon others and lack of beauty in their life. They had simply had enough. They did not want to live any longer and they thought it was cruel and unusual punishment to be forced to continue in an existence that they no longer wanted. Those were the arguments which touched me greatly in the development of this report.

Honourable senators, this is only the beginning. This report has laid before you and the people of Canada all of the arguments, to the best of our ability. You may be surprised to know that toward the end there was such collegiality that Senator Lavoie-Roux was trying to improve my arguments and I was trying, on occasion, to improve hers. We did that because we wanted a report which truly reflected all the views on this issue, in order that it would not sit on some shelf, unread. We want it to be read and debated, with all of its ramifications.

I thank this chamber for giving me the opportunity to serve on this committee, and I thank the members of the committee for sharing with me their pain, their agony, their thoughtfulness and their effort.

On motion of Senator Bernston, for Senator Keon, debate adjourned.

CANADA-CHINA RELATIONS

MOTION RESPECTING HUMAN RIGHTS IN CHINA AND TIBET ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Di Nino, seconded by the Honourable Senator Keon:

That the Senate urge the Government of Canada to express concern over continuing reports of violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms in China and particularly Tibet by local, provincial and national authorities and severe restrictions on the rights of citizens to freedom of assembly, association, expression, religion, as well as to due legal process and fair trial;

That the Senate urge the Government of Canada to encourage the People's Republic of China to take further measures to ensure the observance of all human rights, including the rights of women and children, and to improve the impartial administration of justice;

That the Senate request the Government of Canada to encourage the government of the People's Republic of China to allow foreign delegations to Tibet to study the human rights situation, the state of religious freedom, the status of women, the treatment of Tibetan children and prison conditions;

That the Senate urge the Government of Canada to extend support to Tibetan people in their struggle to regain their freedom and the presentation of their culture;

That the Senate encourage the Government of Canada to support the non-violent efforts of his holiness, the Dalai Lama, to resolve the issue of Tibet, particularly the Dalai Lama's campaign to make Tibet a zone of ahimsa (non-violence) through demilitarization and the protection of Tibet's natural environment; and

That the Senate implore the Government of Canada to ask the Chinese authorities to commence negotiations with his holiness, the Dalai Lama, and the Tibetan government in exile and representatives of the People's Republic of China on the future of Tibet without preconditions. — (Honourable Senator Berntson)

On motion of Senator Berntson, for Senator Di Nino, motion adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senator, we have reached the end of the Order Paper. I propose, pursuant to rule 135(4), that the Senate suspend its sittings until approximately 5:10 p.m., while we await the arrival of the representative of the Governor General. The bells will ring to recall senators.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable John Sopinka, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Acting Speaker, the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate said:

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to cause Letters Patent to be issued under his Sign Manual and Signet constituting the Honourable John Sopinka, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, his Deputy, to do in His Excellency's name all acts on his part necessary to be done during His Excellency's pleasure.

The Commission was read by a Clerk at the Table.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to establish the Department of Canadian Heritage and to amend and repeal certain other Acts (Bill C-53, Chapter 11, 1995)

An Act to amend the Lobbyists Registration Act and to make related amendments to other Acts (Bill C-43, Chapter 12, 1995)

An Act to amend the Farm Improvement and Marketing Cooperatives Loans Act (Bill C-75, Chapter 13, 1995)

An Act to amend An Act respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Company (Bill C-81, Chapter 14, 1995)

An Act to amend the Immigration Act and the Citizenship Act and to make a consequential amendment to the Customs Act (Bill C-44, Chapter 15, 1995)

The Honourable Robert Kilger, Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1996 (Bill C-97, Chapter 16, 1995)

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the said bill.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

---

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, June 19, 1995, at 4 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE SENATE

EDITORIAL IN OTTAWA CITIZEN

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I wish to bring to your attention the editorial which you have on your desks today. I am not concerned whether the opinion expressed therein is for or against gun control. What I am concerned about is the way in which the editorialists chose to make their arguments, belittling this place.

Too often, we ignore attacks on our colleagues or on this institution, in the belief that responding to them is not worthwhile or that our critics will go away. I am of the school which professes that we should respond to criticism such as this every time we feel that there is an unreasonable or unfounded attack on this institution.

I have tried to do just that in the letter that honourable senators will find reproduced on the over side of the editorial. I should like to encourage my colleagues to do the same when they see the Senate being attacked in this way.

THE LATE ROBERT LLOYD WENMAN

TRIBUTES

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I rise to inform the Senate of the passing of a great Canadian who dedicated his life to the service of his community, his province and his country.

Robert Lloyd Wenman passed away peacefully at his home on June 13 after a lengthy illness. He was born on June 19, 1940 in Maidstone, Saskatchewan. Robert Wenman grew up in a small prairie town where he learned the values of self-sufficiency and independent initiative, coupled with a humanitarian concern for others.

Robert Wenman had a distinguished academic career, attending universities in Saskatchewan, Florida, California and Washington. After completing his academic career, he began his professional life as a high school teacher in British Columbia.

In 1966, at the age of 25, Robert became the youngest MLA ever elected to the British Columbia Legislature. In 1972, he retired from provincial politics but continued to serve his community as an alderman, devoting himself to community service projects.

In 1974, Robert Wenman was elected to the House of Commons as the member for Fraser Valley West. He was re-elected in this riding four times until his retirement in August of 1993.

Robert Wenman had a successful parliamentary career. As a member of the provincial legislature, he introduced the province's first greenbelt legislation and continued to work on behalf of environmental issues throughout his legislative career.

As a member of the House of Commons, he served as a member of the Standing Committee on External Affairs, where he was recognized by many for his expertise in Middle Eastern affairs. He was also instrumental in shaping Canada's response to the refugee crisis in Southeast Asia, where his work helped bring aid to thousands of refugee orphan children.

Honourable senators, here is a classic example of where a working parliamentarian contracted a horrific illness while working for his country. He made the ultimate sacrifice, and when I visited him in his final weeks, never once did he complain or criticize.

Robert Wenman was an eternal optimist. He was always concerned about the well-being of others, and constantly put their interests before his own. He was a true leader and a visionary. I recall his interest in environmental issues in British Columbia long before it was fashionable to be working to protect areas such as the Carmanah Valley. Many of us at the time questioned his positions, only to realize later the vision that he possessed.

Robert Wenman is survived by his wife of 32 years, Donna, and their four children Ken, Jill, Kiven and Kraig. He will be remembered for his unselfish service to his fellow man. He brought honour and distinction to all who knew him. He will be missed.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I would like to add my words to those of Senator St. Germain. I sat with Mr. Wenman. I am most grateful for having had the opportunity to work with him to create the association known today as the Asia-Pacific Parliamentary Forum. I had the honour of being among those chosen by Speaker Fraser, to go to Singapore with Mr. Wenman.

[English]

We had to determine whether it was a viable organization.

On our return, our report to Mr. Fraser was not with respect to the worthiness of the association, but rather, whether or not Canada should join it. In any event, the Speaker was still unsure of this new organization, and sent us back to Singapore to attend a second organizational meeting. I can assure honourable senators that Bob Wenman and I were one voice representing Canada in Singapore.

Last but not least, we attended the inaugural meeting of this same organization in Japan. After that, other members took over, and I disappeared quietly from this organization.

I was happy to participate with Bob Wenman in the meetings of this organization because, even though I was from Montreal, I wanted to show that, in my opinion, the Pacific Rim was extremely important. We encouraged each other. As a result of travelling together, we became good friends. I got to know him quite well. Everything said by Senator St. Germain about him is true. I join with other honourable senators in offering to his wife,Donna, and his family my sincere condolences.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION BILL, 1995

SUPPLEMENTARY REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, on Thursday last when, on behalf of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, I presented our report on Bill C-76 without amendment, I indicated to the Senate that there was a companion piece being prepared which is really a narrative of the committee's deliberations, with some comments on the bill. I should like to table that report now, for the purpose of providing some food for thought before the debate on third reading.

Therefore, I have the honour to table the fifteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance respecting Bill C-76, to implement certain provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 27, 1995, which was reported to the Senate without amendment on June 15, 1995.

Copies of the report are being distributed to honourable senators in both official languages.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-41, to amend the Criminal Code (sentencing) and other Acts in consequence thereof.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Graham, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 57(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

ONTARIO

PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE VICTORY IN PROVINCIAL ELECTION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, any doubt about modesty being one of the many notable characteristics of a Conservative in Canada must by now be totally dispelled by the fact that not one of my colleagues from Ontario has yet risen to draw attention to the magnificent PC victory in their province on June 8, now 12 days ago.

After 10 years of mismanagement, first by a disastrous Liberal-NDP alliance, then an out-of-touch Liberal government, and finally a surreal NDP, Ontario has now returned to its traditional place on the political spectrum.

The election of Mike Harris is a welcome event, not only for his province but for the entire country, for as Ontario goes, so goes Canada.

Mr. Harris has already proferred a hand of cooperation to the national government and to every provincial government, for he is not a prisoner of dogma but a realist in an evolving society. We should all welcome his accession to the premiership of Ontario. It augurs well for us all and reconfirms, in a most tangible fashion, that Conservative values are alive and well in Canada, and not even a blatant attempt by Liberals in Ottawa and elsewhere to adopt them for political survival, rather than deep conviction, will distract Canadians from knowing where they are best protected and nurtured.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

FOREIGN POLICY

HUMAN RIGHTS IN RELATION TO TRADE

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I wish to register profound disappointment in the government's new foreign policy which severs human rights considerations from trade or foreign aid.

I wish to outline briefly this government's changing position on these issues. The Red Book promised Canadians that this government would "lead the international community in revitalization of human rights as a principle for action and enforcement."

Just six months ago, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, in a newly issued policy document called "Canada in the World," proclaimed:

> A priority field of international concern and action for Canadians has been and remains that of human rights.... An effective human rights policy requires us to make use of positive levers of influence as well as the various forms of sanctions at our disposal.

The ink had barely dried on that document before the minister was hinting to a conference of international organizations that a wind shift was approaching. After some pious thoughts that good intentions alone are not sufficient in the field of human rights, and an acknowledgement that Canada "must seriously consider the value of assistance to regimes that do not respect the rights of their own citizens," the minister suggested where he would draw the line. In matters of trade, there would be no line drawn at all. Canada would not cut itself off from countries "even if we do not like their human rights records."

The honourable minister explained that Canada was pursuing trade in a number of countries "irrespective of their human rights records." His rationale was that trade isolation does not help the people of repressive regimes; that foreign trade is the best way of spreading democracy.

Earlier this month, the Minister for International Trade announced that Canada and its NAFTA partners officially launched negotiations aimed at bringing Chile into the North American Free Trade Agreement. Canada already imports some $100 million worth of Chilean fruit and nuts, and another $34 million in wine and food-waste products annually.

I wish to highlight this fact because the fruit is picked by hundreds of thousands of temporary workers, mostly women, some as young as 12 years of age. They work 16 hours a day for as little as $2.50. The orchards and vineyards are sprayed with chemicals which the World Health Organization has linked to birth defects, infertility and cancer. The government of Chile takes 20 per cent of the very meagre wages of these young women for health care, but cares little for their health. It refused to publish a study which showed alarming rates of miscarriage and gross deformities in babies born to these workers. Given the new policy of the Government of Canada, these are not likely matters for discussion in the NAFTA negotiations.

We do not hear the government speaking out against the bonded labour of 80 million children throughout Asia, or the recent murder of the 12-year-old Pakistani boy who tried to bring it to international attention. Instead, this government speaks of enhanced trade, reduced barriers, greater efficiencies and competitiveness.

Some observers are already predicting that by tearing down trade walls and turning a blind eye to our trade partners' abuse of young women and children, we will invite the return to North America of working conditions that prevailed here a century ago. At that time, child labour was not only tolerated, it was lauded by the elite and by the clergy.

Honourable senators, in the long run, if the government stays its new course, it will be Canadians who will suffer. If we set profit high above human rights for people of other nations, we lose much of our power to defend these rights at home.

THE YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT
THE CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Tuesday, June 20, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

ELEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-37, An Act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, March 21, 1995, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment but with the following observations.

OBSERVATIONS

1. In addition to making observations on specific provisions of Bill C-37, your Committee wishes to draw attention to a number of issues affecting the operation of the Young Offenders Act, in light of the fact that existing difficulties relate not only to the implementation of the Act, but also to systemic changes in contemporary society.

BILL C-37 AMENDMENTS

2. Some members of your Committee are not convinced that so-called "presumptive" transfer to ordinary court of 16 and 17 year old youths charged with certain serious offences is either necessary or advisable at this time. Because of the concern that Canadian laws be consistent with both the letter and the spirit of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, some members are uneasy about this encroachment on the special jurisdiction created by the Young Offenders Act. As the Minister and his officials have pointed out, transfer is available now for young persons in that age group who commit the prescribed offences. However, some members are particularly concerned that those young persons will have the onus of proof in future transfer hearings. They fear that presumptive transfers could simply exacerbate the problem of systemic delay, while offering no assurance of any greater protection for society. Consequently, your Committee urges the Minister of Justice, immediately upon implementation, to act on his assurances that the new transfer provisions will be monitored in order to evaluate their impact on offenders, on the system and its resources, and on the timeliness of proceedings.

3. Some Committee members also have concerns about the weakening of restrictions on the sharing of information about young persons involved in the youth justice system. While not opposed, in principle, to those reforms, the members question the adequacy of the legislated limitations on the use and further dissemination of that information, either by the courts or by schools and other authorities. For that reason, your Committee urges the government to undertake a careful evaluation of the operation and consequences of information sharing in order to determine whether the privacy and legal rights of young persons are adequately protected.

BROADER ISSUES OF IMPLEMENTATION

4. Several witnesses maintained that legitimate public concerns about youth violence must be met with accurate information about actual crime rates and about the operation of the youth justice system. Your Committee believes that common misperceptions concerning the incidence of violent youth crime, in particular, as well as the range of legal consequences, serve neither young persons nor the public at large. Those misperceptions may foster unfounded fears and demands for increasingly punitive measures that may do little to address the actual causes of violent youth crime. Consequently, your Committee urges the federal government to develop a comprehensive and effective strategy aimed at informing and educating Canadians about all aspects of youth crime, including the circumstances of the young persons involved and the kinds of penalties imposed by Youth Courts.

5. Many witnesses agreed that amendments to the Young Offenders Act, alone, can never fully address the problem of youth crime. The National Crime Prevention Council advocates a social development approach to the problem of youth crime that would provide timely intervention for youth at risk, in addition to effective rehabilitation and treatment for those who have already come into contact with the criminal justice system. Your Committee acknowledges that crime prevention is a very important and necessary component of any comprehensive youth justice scheme and commends the research and consultation process undertaken by the National Crime Prevention Council, on issues of diversion and alternate measures. With this in mind, your Committee urges the federal government to strengthen its commitment to the prevention of youth crime by ensuring that future cost-sharing arrangements with the provinces and territories provide sufficient resources for the kind of community-based services that may, in the long run, offer the best hope of achieving public safety.

6. Because of the constitutional division of powers, the Young Offenders Act simply provides a framework for youth justice that must be implemented in and by provincial and territorial jurisdictions. As a result, existing and potential regional disparities can further complicate the process of reform. Your Committee believes that the federal government could, in the spirit of cooperation and in the context of cost-sharing negotiations, take a greater leadership role in youth justice. For example, the provinces and territories should be encouraged to provide alternatives to incarceration for young offenders and to take a broad societal approach to youth crime that includes appropriate and timely child welfare intervention. As noted in the "Jasmin Report" from Quebec, the flexible allocation of resources is necessary to the effective administration of the Act. Without adequate alternatives to incarceration, Bill C-37 proposals, such as those aimed at replacing custodial sentences with community-based dispositions for non-violent crime, are unlikely to achieve their desired effect in all jurisdictions.

7. Finally, Bill C-37 proposes fundamental changes to the Young Offenders Act, in advance of a second or later phase of study that would assess the adequacy of the legislative scheme. Like many witnesses who appeared on Bill C-37, some Committee members question the wisdom of this reaction to public concerns prior to a broad-based review that may or may not justify some of the measures proposed in Bill C-37. In effect, the Senate is being asked to support reform that may further erode the spirit and purpose of the Young Offenders Act, in the absence of a full and meaningful evaluation of the existing system. Consequently, your Committee seeks a moratorium on further amendments to the Young Offenders Act, pending the Minister of Justice's promised second phase review so that Parliament is not, once again, faced with a piece-meal approach to legislative reform with little or no knowledge of the need for or possible impact of proposed changes. Furthermore, some members of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs wish to offer their services and indicate their desire to participate in a broad-based youth justice system examination and review process through a Parliamentary task force or other appropriate venue.

Respectfully submitted,

GÉRALD-A. BEAUDOIN
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Stanbury, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before we proceed to other items on the Order Paper, I wish to draw your attention to some distinguished visitors in our gallery. I refer to the Honourable Stephen Kakfwi, Northwest Territories Minister of Justice, and Mr. Dennis Patterson, a member of the Northwest Territories Legislative Assembly.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(h), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, the June 21, 1995, at 1:30 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CODE OF CONDUCT

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—
NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Wednesday, June 21, 1995, I will move:

That seven Members of the Senate and fourteen Members of the House of Commons be Members of the Committee;

That the Committee be directed to consult broadly and review the approaches taken with respect to these issues in Canada and in other jurisdictions with comparable systems of government;

That the Committee have the power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have the power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have the power to retain the services of expert, professional, technical and clerical staff;

That the quorum of the Committee be eleven Members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented, and that the Joint Chairpersons be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, whenever six Members are present, so long as both Houses are represented;

That the Committee be empowered to appoint, from among its Members, such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of its power, except the power to report to the Senate and House of Commons;

That the Committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting of any or all of its proceedings;

That the Committee present its final report no later than October 31, 1995;

That, notwithstanding usual practices of this House, if the Senate is not sitting when the final report of the Committee is completed, the report may be deposited with the Clerk of the Senate and it shall thereupon be deemed to have been presented to the Senate; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

QUESTION PERIOD

UNITED NATIONS

PEACEKEEPING IN BOSNIA—PARTICIPATION IN RAPID REACTION FORCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. As honourable senators are no doubt aware, recently a report commissioned by and submitted to the United Nations Secretary General with respect to reform of the United Nations was made public. Among the recommendations is one calling for the establishment of a United Nations rapid reaction force under the aegis of the Security Council.

Canada has historically supported the creation of such a force. Is this still the position of the Government of Canada? If so, would the minister be in a position to indicate the parameters of Canada's participation in such a reaction force?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Canada supports the establishment of this type of force as a way to help United Nations peacekeeping efforts, particularly in the current situation in Bosnia, to both defend and carry out missions more effectively.

Canada has not made a decision about participation in the operation that has been suggested in recent days. There were detailed discussions with respect to this matter at the G-7 Summit in Halifax. Many details concerning the mission of that type of force have not been finalized, and the government has not taken its decision.

POSSIBLE CHANGES TO APPLICATION OF VETO— GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, my supplementary question relates to another recommendation of the report commissioned by the Secretary General of the United Nations. That recommendation is that the veto in the Security Council be limited to matters of peacekeeping and enforcement. There are others, as honourable senators are aware, who have recommended the abolition of the veto.

• (1430)

Would the minister inform us as to the government's policy with respect to either the continuation or abolition of the veto? If it is to be continued, what is the view of the government with respect to any modifications or changes in the veto?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am unable to give Senator Ottenheimer a response to his question. I will undertake to seek from the Minister of Foreign Affairs information on that issue and on other items that were outlined in the report of the Secretary General.

NATURAL RESOURCES

NEW FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL SILVICULTURE AGREEMENT— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, the recently announced Silviculture Improvement Program funded by the New Brunswick provincial government and by private woodlot owners — according to the Minister of Natural Resources of New Brunswick and the President of the New Brunswick Federation of Woodlot Owners — is predicated on the hope that there will be federal government participation and that it will form the basis of a new federal-provincial forestry development agreement to replace the agreement which expired April 31, 1995.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate inquire and report back to the Senate on whether the Minister of Natural Resources and the minister responsible for ACOA support a new federal-provincial silviculture agreement, which could be a vital force in sustaining New Brunswick's forestry industry and protecting and enhancing our rural economy?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be pleased to ask my two colleagues to respond to the question of the honourable senator.

HEALTH

REORGANIZATION OF BLOOD SUPPLY SYSTEM—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate will be aware of the anxiety building around the capacity of the Canadian Red Cross Society to provide hospitals and clinics with an adequate supply of blood during the current period. The changing reputation of that society is seriously hampering contributions donors are willing to make to the organization. Donations have fallen by more than 12 per cent in the past year during the Krever commission's investigation into the 1980's contamination of the national supply.

What step or steps is the federal government taking to totally reorganize the blood supply system in a way that will restore the badly battered public confidence?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will ask my colleague Ms Marleau for a detailed response to this question. There have been responses to some of the recommendations of the interim report of the Krever inquiry. In overall terms, the government would reassure Canadians of the safety of their blood supply.

Senator Doyle: Honourable senators, are there any plans that might be made for an overall system that are of particular interest at the moment?

Could we look forward to a program that could be activated when the Krever commission's final report is received, studied and, to whatever degree, implemented? Are there any plans in the works that would relieve the shortages in Montreal, Vancouver and Toronto where delays in elective surgery are now commonplace?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, the urgency to the questions by Senator Doyle is obvious. I will attempt to obtain a quick response for him.

Senator Doyle: Is this one of the problems receiving the attention of the Prime Minister's $12 million Health Forum?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I will attempt to get a response for my friend that would be more immediate than the overall study being conducted with the Health Forum, which is of a longer–term nature.

COMMUNICATIONS

SATELLITE BROADCASTING—CONSULTATION WITH CRTC
AND WITH BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, I would like to obtain information regarding the opinion that the government requested from the CRTC yesterday on television broadcasting by satellite, which your government specified it wished to receive before Parliament finished reviewing this decision. As the honourable senator is the government's representative, I would like to hear her explain why this request for opinion from the CRTC is justified?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the committees of both the Senate and House of Commons are undertaking vigorous hearings on this issue. The general consultations between the government and the CRTC continue. Obviously, the responses of the two committees studying this matter will be of great interest to the government. At the moment there are no definitive conversations taking place outside those hearings. There is a continuing exchange of information.

[Translation]

Senator Nolin: Honourable senators, if you please, I will read you an excerpt from section 3 of the Broadcasting Act. That section says, among other things, that the Canadian broadcasting system is a single system and that the objectives of the broadcasting policy for Canada, which, by the way, are listed in the same section, can best be achieved by providing for the regulation and supervision of the Canadian broadcasting system by a single independent public authority, namely the CRTC.

How can the honourable senator justify consulting the CRTC while your government is preparing to table an order to override one of its decisions, a move unprecedented in the history of the Broadcasting Act?

How can the leader justify this when the act stipulates that the CRTC is an independent authority, which must regulate broadcasting in Canada?

How can the Leader of the Government explain that her government is communicating with the CRTC in an almost cavalier way when one of its decisions is currently under review by committees of both Houses of Parliament and the matter is urgent?

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, the government is following an open and transparent process provided for under the Broadcasting Act, and the policy directions of the government will not be finalized until that process has been completed.

HEALTH

CLOSER CONTROL ON TOBACCO PRODUCTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, new evidence has emerged in the United States that from 1966 to 1981 the world's largest tobacco company studied nicotine and tobacco and its pharmacological effects on the brain and behaviour of smokers. It was studied in the same manner as a drug.

The Phillip Morris Company manipulated nicotine levels in test cigarettes and, according to one of its former scientists, looked for a way to reduce the tar but increase the nicotine content of cigarettes, realizing the effect of the drug on the brain.

Perhaps not coincidentally, in Canada, as that research was winding down, the tobacco industry funded Agriculture Canada to develop new breeds of tobacco with much higher levels of nicotine, and it succeeded in 1981.

Last week the Minister of Health spoke to a group of physicians who she said must deal with "the effects of tobacco addiction." She promised that the results of her department's studies on changes in nicotine content of Canadian cigarettes over the years will be available shortly.

• (1440)

Will the government finally acknowledge the drug property of tobacco and control its use? Will it include tobacco products under the Hazardous Products Act, which would allow regulation of nicotine levels? Alternatively, will the government introduce much needed new legislation that would fill this and other crucial gaps in the current Tobacco Products Control Act?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I know that this subject-matter has been a primary, ongoing item of concern for Senator Spivak. It is also a primary matter of concern for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

I will take my honourable colleague's detailed question to the minister and try to obtain a response for her.

HUMAN RIGHTS

PROMISED AMENDMENTS TO ACT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, will the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform us as to when the government's promise to bring in legislation to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to increase the grounds of prescribed discrimination in that act will be fulfilled?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That was in the Red Book.

Senator Kinsella: It was in the Red Book and in the Speech from the Throne. This legislation has been promised for some time. We read reports in the media today that there is a certain degree of divisiveness in the government caucus around this matter. However, that promise was made, and it is part of the government's program. When might we see legislative action in this regard?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yes, there is a commitment in the Red Book that my colleague Senator Lynch-Staunton is so fond of, and it was mentioned in the Throne Speech. It is a commitment that will be fulfilled by the government. I cannot give Senator Kinsella a precise time frame, but action on this matter remains a strong commitment of the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is either before or after the GST.

ESTABLISHMENT OF CANADIAN RACE RELATIONS FOUNDATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: I have one supplementary question by way of a domestic human rights issue which relates to the promised establishment of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation.

Senator Berntson: Is that in the Red Book, too?

Senator Kinsella: Is there any indication as to when an announcement of its formal status will be made?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I will try to obtain that information for my honourable friend.

The Leader of the Opposition is quite correct; there may well be a connection between human rights and the GST.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: They are both not to be believed.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

REMOVAL OF PROGRAMS FROM BLOCK FUNDING TO PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. We are all familiar with the government's announcement concerning the block funding to the provinces for higher education and programs covered under the Canada Assistance Plan. I might add that there has been a great deal of controversy over this matter.

I now note from serious sources that the government is contemplating removing the Canada Assistance Plan programs from the block funding. Can the leader verify whether the government is indeed planning this action, or will these programs remain within the block funding transfer?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): The Canada Health and Social Transfer has been outlined by the Minister of Human Resources Development as including medicare, the Canada Assistance Plan, and post-secondary education. That is the intention of the government. As the minister has indicated, the details of that plan will be the subject of federal-provincial negotiations.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on March 23, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Noël A. Kinsella regarding reports on records of various countries compiled by the Foreign Affairs department.

HUMAN RIGHTS

REPORTS ON RECORD OF VARIOUS COUNTRIES COMPILED BY FOREIGN AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

(Response to question raised by Hon. Noël A. Kinsella on March 23, 1995)

On assuming office, the Government gave immediate priority to its commitment to conduct a review of all aspects of Canadian foreign policy, taking into account views of all interested Canadians. The role of human rights in foreign policy was among the central issues addressed in the recently concluded review: it was considered carefully by the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons; and the Government's response strongly supported the various Committee views and proposals on this question.

The Government affirmed that human rights, good governance and democratic development will find central expression in Canadian foreign policy and that efforts in this regard will rely on a variety of means. These include: bilateral dialogue and engagement aimed at influencing other governments; aid and trade measures to address extreme situations; assistance to enhance thecapacity of developing countries to protect human rights; leadership on human rights issues in multilateral institutions including the UN, the OSCE, the Commonwealth, la Francophonie, the OAS, the World Bank, IFIs and various aid donor groups.

In all of these efforts, Canada will continue to work with a broad range of partners, including governments, Parliamentarians, NGOs and multilateral organizations. The new Global Issues Bureau in DFAIT has been tasked with bringing greater coherence to Government action on a range of important issues including human rights; and it will work closely to this end with other agencies of Government. The International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development will continue to play an important role in the advancement of Canadian objectives.

Regular and systematic reporting on human rights and democratic development is an integral part of the work of Canadian diplomatic missions in support of these and other objectives set in the foreign policy review. Based on such reporting, the Department of Foreign Affairs prepares briefing notes for annual consultations with Canadian human rights NGOs on situations of particular concern to them. During the policy review, the view was widely expressed that such government-prepared material should be regarded at most as a supplement for relevant information and analysis from other independent sources; it could not and should not seek to compete with or substitute for material produced by NGOs and other organizations.

With this in mind, the Department of Foreign Affairs and interested Canadian NGOs have together been encouraging the United Nations to strengthen the presentation of reporting by its human rights monitors: assessments by such authoritative international bodies should be at the heart of Canadian deliberations on international human rights questions. Considering the wealth of valuable information and analyses available from such sources, and the finite resources government is able to dedicate to its priorities, the Government has concluded that this represents the most effective and efficient approach to the human rights information needs of Canadian foreign policy.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION BILL, 1995

THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved third reading of Bill C-76, to implement certain provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 27, 1995.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few comments about some of the provisions in Bill C-76 that came to light when we were discussing the matter in the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

To be more specific, and to enable honourable senators to identify what I wish to talk about, I am referring to page 4 of the fifteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, the first full paragraph in the observations that were introduced in the Senate.

That paragraph states:

> Your Committee believes that the fundamental principle governing the transition payments, for which a $1.6 billion appropriation is requested in Bill C-76, should be that the money is paid to the same person who is losing the WGTA benefit.

From the replies given in the committee to our questioning of some officials — but not the minister — that is not the intention of the government in making these transitional payments.

The paragraph continues:

> Therefore, the actual producer should have the right to the payment, not the provincial governments or any other creditors such as the banks and the FCC. In addition, your Committee would be loath to see the PFRA become, in effect, heavily involved in the business of collecting debts owed by farm operators to the provincial governments and other creditors.

As stated in this narrative, what is involved here is a very fundamental principle: making a compensatory payment during a transition period to the same people who lose the benefit. In this case, it is the payment of part of the freight that is being lost by withdrawing the funding of $560 million for that purpose.

It is the operator of the farm who will lose the money — the producer who grows the wheat and has the permit book, who delivers the grain to the country elevator and then ships it to the export position.

Senator Berntson: You guys stuck it to them.

Senator Olson: Just a minute. We are advocating that what is just and right be done. I should hope that Senator Berntson would be fully supportive of the action I am advocating.

He said that we stuck it to them. If I talked about all the things that happened during the 10 years from 1984 to 1994 when he did not look after these things, we could be here for quite sometime. However, I will not do that.

There is an injustice, in my view, that is about to be committed, and we should help avoid that injustice. As I said, if you make a compensatory transition payment, surely it should be made to the people who will lose because of the change that is taking place.

I think Senator Berntson agrees with that principle. However, that is not what they will do.

Senator Berntson: Who stuck it to them in the first place?

Senator Olson: Why do you keep bringing that up?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Who is making the change now?

Senator Olson: There was no such thing when the Tories were in office.

Senator Berntson: I agree with you.

Senator Olson: This heckling will not do the producers much good. Why not make a comment that will be helpful to the people involved?

• (1450)

I am not advocating that the government change the policy but that the government change the way in which it will set the formula regarding who receives payment. In this case, they will base it on lands — and I asked specifically about this — that are rented from provincial governments. I do not know how much land that involves in Saskatchewan, but it is a lot in Alberta. It amounts to thousands and thousands of acres and involves thousands and thousands of farmers.

I was told that the payments will be made to the landowner — that is, the provincial government, the Farm Credit Corporation or the banks holding title to the land.

It was then explained to us that the farmer, the renter, the leaseholder, or whatever you want to call him, can apply for a reasonable amount of that money under his rights as renter. Honourable senators, in my view, "his rights" should mean that the farmer should get it all, because he stands to lose it all. What is wrong with that? Senator Berntson will understand that.

Senator Berntson: I agree with you.

Senator Olson: I know you do.

It is only a matter of changing the instructions to the PFRA, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Association, which is to administer the program, so that the person who holds the permit book — that is, the farmer or the producer — is the rightful recipient of this transition payment.

The creditors, whoever they are — for example, the banks, the Farm Credit Corporation, provincial government, or to whomever he owes money — can then collect what was previously agreed to in the land transaction.

What will happen if they pay the money to these so-called landowners and the renters have to plead with them to receive payment? It is putting ownership in the wrong entity. Therefore, I advocate that they change this system — that is, if the answers that were given by some of the officials to the committee are true; namely, that they will pay the primary owner or the landowner in these rental arrangements.

My suggestion should not be construed as a serious criticism. Perhaps they do not understand how these arrangements work. If a renter or a producer owes any creditor money, they have methods of collecting it. One of them, of course, is to take the title to the land and rent it back to the person who owned it in the past. There are different arrangements. The Alberta government has four or five different arrangements it can make with people who lease or rent land for producing grain.

That producer — that is, the permit book holder — should be the primary owner of the transition payment. That is the point that I am trying to make. From the answers that I received, I am afraid that that is not the intention of the Department of Agriculture in giving its instructions to the PFRA to distribute this $1.6 billion dollars.

The other thing that concerns me is that the PFRA will become a massive debt collector for all these financial institutions. I do not believe that the PFRA should be responsible for collecting overdue payments or any kind of payments owed by the farmer to the banks, the Farm Credit Corporation, or anyone else. There is already plenty of law in place for them to collect that money themselves.

To give it to the creditor first is like garnisheeing the farmer's wages. He then has to go, cap in hand, to try to get some of it back. They tried to persuade me that if the farmer is not satisfied with the kind of arrangement he is being offered by the creditor, he can complain to the PFRA and have it corrected. In other words, the farmer is being put in a secondary position when he should be in the primary position of receiving the payment. The creditor should come to him and say, "You owe us this much money, now pay it." In other words, "Comply with the arrangements that were made before."

Perhaps it will not turn out that way. I think that it is up to the Senate, in the face of an injustice such as this, to stand up in this place in defence of the person who is actually doing the production and selling the grain. I hope that there will be some attempt to persuade — and perhaps my speech and Senator Berntson's speech will also help — the Minister of Agriculture to change or to give effect to changing the instructions to the PFRA to ensure that the actual producer is the primary owner of this transition payment, not the creditors to the land.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I agree in large part with what my honourable colleague has put on the record today. If he were prepared to put forward an amendment to that effect, then we would happily support and accommodate him in any way we could to aid in its speedy passage, perhaps to the point of sending it back to the House of Commons so that it could be returned here before we break for the summer.

Having said that, honourable senators, I have at least one other colleague who is interested in speaking to this bill on third reading. Therefore Senator Murray will move the adjournment of this debate later.

I agree in large part with my honourable friend's remarks, and I hope that he is prepared to move an amendment to that effect.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to make a brief comment. What I am advocating is not part of the bill. There is no place for an amendment. It is part of the administrative detail. I should think that the honourable senator would have understood that. I tried to make that clear in my remarks.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, two of our colleagues who wish to take part in this debate on third reading are not here at the moment. They will do so tomorrow. It might save us some time if I might make my small contribution to the debate now.

To begin with, I want to thank Senator Olson for elaborating, from his very considerable knowledge and background in these matters, on a section of the National Finance Committee's report dealing with transport matters and grain transport in particular.

As deputy chairman of the committee, Senator Olson contributed to that part of the report and he discussed the matter, as he indicated, during the committee's deliberations when the representatives of the government were present.

Senator Gustafson also alluded to this matter when he spoke to the bill at second reading, and he put some questions to the officials in committee. I presume he is the colleague to whom the Deputy Leader of the Opposition referred, who will want to speak further on this matter tomorrow.

I want to deal with several other aspects of the report that I tabled, which contains a narrative of the deliberations of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

• (1500)

There was very good attendance of honourable senators at that committee, both members and non-members. That fact reflects the wide range of issues raised by this bill and the importance of those issues.

I will comment first on the measures affecting the public service which are contained in Parts I and II of the bill.

This is the latest chapter in a story which began in October of 1991 when Parliament, at the initiative of the Mulroney government, passed Bill C-29 to bring an end to a strike by the Public Service Alliance of Canada. That bill suspended collective bargaining for the entire public service. It extended the collective agreements then in force by two years. Further, it imposed a zero-per-cent wage settlement in the first year of that two-year extension and a 3-per-cent increase in the second year of those extended collective agreements.

As a trade-off or a compensation to the unions for having accepted this quite severe action in October of 1991, the government and Parliament offered changes to what is called the "Workforce Adjustment Directive". As a result of these changes, the government accepted severe restrictions on its right to lay off surplus employees. Whether that commitment on the part of the government of the day was a prudent one to make is irrelevant to the present discussion.

The commitment was made by way of a compensation to the unions because of the severe action the government took to end their strike, suspend collective bargaining and impose a settlement for several years into the future. The unions believed, and had every right to believe, that the government of the day and its successors would abide by that commitment.

In June of 1994, during the present Parliament and at the initiative of the Chrétien government, Bill C-17 was passed extending the suspension of collective bargaining for a further two years. The government made no provision for any wage increases over that period.

Today, in Bill C-76, we are proposing to amend the Workforce Adjustment Directive. The government is doing so unilaterally and over the opposition of the public service unions. We will be removing, in large part, one of the trade-offs given to the unions in 1991 for having imposed a regime on them. We are taking that away from them against their will.

At the committee meetings, representatives of the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada and the Public Service Alliance of Canada spoke on these matters. They made many recommendations, some of which would have involved amending Bill C-76. The committee set those aside. Other recommendations would have involved considerable increased cost. The committee set those aside. However, there were several recommendations, and they are on the record, which seemed to us to be reasonable and sensible and which, in any case, deal with the implementation of the policy which is contained in this bill.

There is some confusion as to how this policy is being implemented. It is clear that it is a moveable feast. It is work in progress. The implementation of the policy is still evolving. There is some resistance on the part of the government to suggestions coming forward from the unions which might not cost any money but add up to some administrative inconvenience for the managers. This should not stand in the way of taking a more accommodating position toward the representations of the union.

The committee's concern is with the longer-term harmony of labour relations in the public sector in this country. I trust we will return, sooner or later, to normal collective bargaining. Meanwhile, it is clear from testimony before the committee and from other public comments by management and union alike that the atmosphere is stressful and tense between the government and the public service unions.

The government must take special care to try to accommodate the unions' concerns wherever possible. They should not allow distractions on problems of "turf" between one department and another or problems of mere administrative convenience to prevent such accommodation.

The role of Treasury Board is to act as manager. It will act, as managers always do, primarily with the interests of management in mind. However, there is a wider responsibility on the part of the government not only to maintain decent relations with the unions in the federal public sector, but to try to provide an example to the rest of the country in this respect.

Treasury Board managers should not have the last word on these matters when it comes to government policy. There is a Minister of Labour and a Department of Labour both mandated to promote harmony in federal public sector labour relations, and in labour relations in the federal jurisdiction generally. I must say that in my limited experience, their advice on these matters has always been sound.

The point I am making is that the government, as a whole, should assert its political leadership on a matter of this kind and see to it that Treasury Board does not always have the last word when it comes to public sector labour relations and, in particular, when it comes to the implementation of the policies laid out in Parts I and II of Bill C-76.

Senator Bolduc is vastly experienced in public sector labour relations. He intends to speak tomorrow on this aspect of the legislation.

Senator Olson has already dealt with transportation matters as they affect grain transport in Western Canada. The committee report does not mention the repeal by this legislation of the Maritime Freight Rates Act and of the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act. That was dealt with here in questions; during the debate on the Speech from the Throne; and following the budget. I will not repeat what senators from the Atlantic provinces had to say.

Some members of the committee posed questions about the purpose of a $326-million fund. This is a transitional fund to be paid out over four years in the four Atlantic provinces. Perhaps this is not an enormous sum of money in the overall budget but, to most of us, $326 million is still a substantial sum.

• (1510)

The purposes for which this fund is to be paid out are extremely vague. There will be federal-provincial agreements. Perhaps the money will be spent on infrastructure. Perhaps some of the money will be spent on special hardship cases among shippers.

Senator Thériault: Highways.

Senator Murray: Highways, indeed.

Without putting too fine a point on it, the question which occurs to me is whether this will be another "Dingwall fund". No one knows. The officials, who tried to be forthcoming, finally indicated that $326 million is a way of buying our way out of this subsidy.

At the risk of having my maritime loyalties questioned, I have to express some concern that the government has $326 million rattling around in its jeans to commit to a non-existent program for which no criteria have been established, and to no clear purpose of public policy. I am sure that better use could be found for $326 million than simply buying our way out of the subsidy and creating a fund for some uncertain use over the next few years.

It seems to me that bad old habits die hard, and that the culture of fiscal restraint still has a long way to go before it takes hold in this government.

Finally, honourable senators, a word about the Canada Health and Social Transfer. I would draw your attention to the discussion that took place in the committee, which you can read in the verbatim transcript, when Professor Judith Maxwell was present and, shortly thereafter, Professors Keith Banting and Robin Boadway of Queen's University. Their presentations enabled the committee to focus on the long-term implications for social policy, federal-provincial fiscal relations and national unity given this major change in terms of the federal government's involvement in social programs. In any event, there are many important issues to be pursued. I hope that the Senate, in one committee or another, will find time and a way to pursue them soon.

In that connection, and as a final word, I wish to draw the attention of honourable senators to two important statements which were made to the committee on behalf of the government by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, Mr. David Walker, MP for Winnipeg North Centre.

First, he stated that the consultation process, which is supposed to lead by mutual consent to a set of shared principles and objectives for certain social programs, would not be used by the federal government to try to impose conditions on the provinces against their will. That matter was stated quite clearly in response to concerns raised during questions that had been asked by a number of senators.

Second, the parliamentary secretary gave a very strong indication that there will continue to be a cash component in the federal transfer to the provinces for these programs. With that cash component, the federal government will always have some influence and at least a leadership place, one hopes, at the table in discussing standards for these programs across the country.

A strong indication was given by the parliamentary secretary, on behalf of the minister, that the government will not let the cash component disappear entirely.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of Senator Murray. He indicated in committee that he was advised that the government would not impose programs that were not wanted. Did I understand him correctly in that regard?

Senator Murray: With regard to the programs dealt with in Bill C-76: health care, post-secondary education and welfare, health care, as we know, is now covered by the Canada Health Act. I think it is accurate to say that there is no change to that program in Bill C-76.

With regard to the other transfers, however, the Canada Assistance Plan, as we know it, is disappearing. Post-secondary education is also to be included in the new Canada Health and Social Transfer.

The bill provides that the Minister of Human Resources Development will undertake to establish, with the provinces and by mutual consent, a set of shared principles — I am not quoting directly, I am paraphrasing — for social programs other than medicare covered by conditions now set out in the Canada Health Act.

Senator Robertson: Honourable senators, I wish I could be more positive. However, that suggests to me that without the imposition there would not be a commonality of standards in many of these programs.

Senator Murray: I should point out, in fairness, that the one condition remaining with regard to social assistance, as I understand it, is that a province will not be able to impose a residency requirement. After all, these are programs — as my friend knows, having administered them in New Brunswick — that are exclusively within provincial jurisdiction. Given the financial constraints on it, but also given the realities of a federal system, the federal government is seeking to arrive at a consensus with the provinces as to what basic standards might apply across the country, I suppose starting with portability. The days of imposing, by parliamentary fiat, conditions on the provinces seem to be over.

Senator Robertson: I thank the honourable senator for his comments. I will read the transcript of the committee meeting in order that I can better grasp the issues. It will be very difficult to have any national standard as that money is withdrawn.

Senator Murray: I do not share my honourable friend's pessimism. That money will not be withdrawn. If we can rely on the commitment made by the parliamentary secretary, there will always be a cash component. The government intends to continue that. Judith Maxwell's testimony was that even if, in global terms, the cash component amounted to only 10 per cent of the $90 billion that is spent by all governments on these programs, that would give the federal government a place and some reasonable clout at the table, which is as much as it could hope to have in arriving at standards that will be applicable across the country in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

Senator Robertson: I disagree.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I may not have understood Senator Murray's point with respect to the $326 million which was put aside for programs in the Atlantic provinces because of the decision not to subsidize transport. Is that what the honourable senator was saying?

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Thériault: On the weekend, the Premier of New Brunswick and some ministers of the federal government signed an agreement for $100 million, $80 million of which would come from that fund, for the building of the Trans-Canada Highway in New Brunswick. Is the honourable senator opposed to that?

Senator Murray: I do not know how they arrived at the figure of $80 million from the federal government to begin with, because it is $326 million to be divided among four provinces over four years, based on a proportion which relates to the proportion of the old subsidies that were going into these provinces.

No, I am not opposed to that. I am saying that the government decided to get out of the MFRA and the ARFAA, and then simply picked a number out of the air. That number is $326 million. They said, "Here it is." However, they had no programs in mind; they had no criteria in mind; they had nothing in mind. They simply said that there would be federal-provincial agreements.

I think this is a pretty loose way to deal with $326 million in the present straitened circumstances of the government. If they want to set up another highways agreement, then let them do so. However, they have not done that.

Honourable senators, this is a grab bag. Perhaps the money will be used for a good purpose in New Brunswick. I accept my honourable friend's word that it will. However, perhaps it will not be used for a good purpose elsewhere. Picking a number out of the air with no criteria and no programs seems to me not a very sound way to do business.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I am not about to defend the intention of the government because I am not familiar enough with what the subsidies would be over the next 10, 20 or 50 years. I do not think any logical government can expect to deal with what will happen 25 years down the road. One of the mistakes governments have made over the years has been to budget for 5, 10 and 15 years.

For some reason, they must have arrived at the decision that the amount allocated was probably not enough. Based on the financial situation of the country, I suppose that is the best they could do.

However, someone has not asked the proper questions, because although the bill was not even passed, an announcement had already been made in New Brunswick that $80 million from that pot of money would be spent on a fifty-fifty basis over the next few years. The agreement is $170 million or $340 million — fifty-fifty, federal-provincial — but $80 million will come from that amount of money.

Senator Murray: What they are doing is creating a pool of cash from which they will draw, and apply it to top up various programs, if the New Brunswick precedent to which my friend refers is any example.

Senator Thériault: I do not think you have the right question.

Senator Murray: Well, I think I am giving you the right answer.

On motion of Senator Berntson, for Senator Bolduc, debate adjourned.

FIREARMS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Sharon Carstairs moved the second reading of Bill C-68, respecting firearms and other weapons.

She said: Honourable senators, in our careers as politicians, we are often asked to speak on a number of bills. Sometimes we are persuaded to do so by our party colleagues. Then, sometimes there is a bill that has such favour in our eyes that not only do we want to speak to it, and welcome the opportunity to speak to it, but we seek the opportunity to speak to it. That is the case with me in respect to Bill C-68.

Honourable senators, it is with the greatest of pleasures that I speak today in favour of Bill C-68, respecting firearms and other weapons. I believe in safer streets and in safer homes, and I believe that that is something held in common by all law-abiding Canadians. I believe in the goals of crime prevention. I think that, too, is a common belief among all law-abiding Canadians. The government believes that these can be enhanced significantly through tougher gun laws, and I wholeheartedly agree.

Honourable senators, our country enjoys a very enviable reputation throughout the world for its peaceful qualities and civilized nature. It is true that we enjoy this reputation, but we must recognize that we do not come by it through accident or, indeed, by chance.

It is also true that Canadians have chosen not to follow the approach taken by our very good neighbours to the south when it comes to firearms. For example, Americans have in their Constitution the right to bear arms. It is an important and significant part of their history, through their Constitution and otherwise. Unfortunately, honourable senators, I believe that it has also led to the existence of a gun culture in that nation. That is a truly unfortunate circumstance, and it is one that we do not wish to espouse in this country.

Canada's Constitution contains no such provision, and it is reflected in our history. For us, the Wild West is primarily a notion of American films; it is not a reality for Canada. It has never been the reality for Canada. It is not part of our heritage.

In 1995, Canadians do not want a country whose citizens feel that they must own a firearm to protect themselves. This is why, from the very beginning, Canada's approach to firearms has been different, and will hopefully remain different. While it remains different, I think it is something we should celebrate.

Honourable senators, just last week Senator Ghitter and I were on an open-line radio show together. A man called from south of the border. He had grown up near Moose Jaw. He called to say that there were two things he missed about Canada: the first was our health care system, and the second was our tough gun laws. He encouraged us on that program to strengthen both.

Honourable senators, the issues surrounding this bill are bigger than just the defining of ourselves as a society different from our neighbours to the south. This is a people issue.

There are two main parts to this bill: The first is the strengthening of the penalties for using a firearm in the commission of a crime. Unfortunately, we have heard very little about that aspect of this bill. The second is the establishment of a universal firearms registry, a system similar to those in place in Belgium, Germany, Greece, Great Britain, Ireland, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and Switzerland. Therefore this new firearms registry will not be unique to Canada. It is an adaptation of a system used by other nations.

Honourable senators, let me speak for a moment about the provisions in the bill for strengthening the penalties for using a firearm in the commission of an offence. I believe that the most important objective for all Canadians is to create a society in which the criminal misuse of firearms is dealt with severely. I think all of us are in agreement with that objective.

Bill C-68, honourable senators, introduces tough new penalties for 10 specific crimes, including robbery, attempted murder, manslaughter and sexual assault. This will now mean mandatory minimum prison terms of four years and a lifetime prohibition against the possession of restricted firearms. Bill C-68 also provides for minimum mandatory prison sentences for the possession of stolen firearms, and for the possession of a hand gun without a licence if it is loaded or if ammunition is near at hand.

This government starts from the principle that only those firearms that we agree, as a country, are appropriate for legitimate purposes should be available for private ownership. On this basis, beginning on January 1, 1996, if this legislation passes, 21 types of paramilitary firearms, comprising more than 200 models, are prohibited. I say, well done.

The second significant aspect of this bill, and certainly the most controversial one, is the aspect of registration. Bill C-68 for the first time provides the government with the legislative authority to establish a universal firearms registry. The government knew this measure would be a controversial part of this bill. Why would they not? Every time a registry has been suggested, the same arguments have been used against it.

There have been amendments to statutes with regard to guns in 1934, 1977, 1992. Every time the possibility of a registry has been raised, we have heard arguments about rights and freedoms. We have heard about the confiscation of weapons. We have heard about the creation of a police state. Yet, the 1934 legislation did not bring these things to pass, nor did the 1977 legislation or the 1992 legislation. Honourable senators, the 1995 legislation will not create these situations either.

Why do I passionately believe in the registration of all guns in this country? Let me tell honourable senators why. Since 1970, 425 children have died as a result of having been accidentally shot by a firearm. Those are unnecessary, tragic deaths — one child or more a month in Canada.

Each year, approximately 1,100 Canadians commit suicide with a firearm. One-third of them are young people between the ages of 15 and 25. Most of them are young men. They are usually young people who act on impulse. They find a weapon; they find the ammunition; they load it and use it.

For anyone like myself who has taught teenagers, as I did for a period over 20 years, will know that they, all too often, turn to suicide to cope with their problems, problems they think are insurmountable. Often they are not. However, it is not whether they are insurmountable or not, it is what the child believes. They use a variety of methods. They overdose on aspirin or sleeping pills. They slash their wrists. They hang themselves, or they put a gun to their heads.

In my very first year as a teacher, I worked in Massachusetts in a private girls' school. A young girl came to see me on a Saturday afternoon. She told me that she was considering taking her life. She was from the mid-west. Elaine was 13, bright and beautiful. I spent three hours with her that afternoon and I thought that I had persuaded her not to consider such a thought as suicide. However, that night, she took an overdose of sleeping pills. Fortunately, she was found and sent home to her loving parents. She received the counselling she needed and she is now a bright, young adult. If she had had access to a gun, the success that she has achieved would probably not have occurred, because many young people who attempt suicide with a gun are all too often successful. If they are not successful, the damage that is done is so irreparable that they are never quite themselves again. This was a cry for help, and that is what young people do so often. That is why I believe in registration.

On average in this country, one woman is shot to death every six days. This is not the wild west. This is happening in 1995 in Canada on the streets of our cities and villages, in our homes and on our farms. The shooting occurs, almost always, interestingly enough, in the home, and is committed, almost always, by someone she knows. Almost all of the firearms used are legally owned, and almost all of them are rifles and shotguns.

Family violence is a tragic reality in Canadian society. It is more dangerous for a woman to live in rural Canada than it is for her to live in urban Canada. That is why I believe in registration.

On average, some 3,500 guns are stolen from private homes of law–abiding citizens and responsible gun owners each year. Many of these guns have been improperly stored and are far too readily visible and accessible to the burglars, but without a system of tracking these firearms, police are unable to differentiate between guns stolen from private homes and those smuggled across the border. For these reasons, I believe registration is not only necessary, but essential.

I believe this legislation will result in many gun owners who have guns thrown in the back of their closets or in a drawer which they have not used for a long time carefully considering whether they need these guns. If they come to the decision that they do not, they will not register them because they will turn the gun in to appropriate authorities. These are the guns that are often stolen and used in criminal acts. These are the guns which are readily accessible to a suicidal person.

If they decide to keep it and to register it, watch what human nature will do. It is strange, but when we must pay for the privilege of something, it is often valued more. It is my hope that if they are forced to ensure their guns are stored in a safe place because of registration rules, they will be more responsible in their actions. It will not work for everyone. There will always be irresponsible human beings. However, if we can create more responsible human beings, then some of the tragedies that I suggested earlier will be averted.

Each year 13,000 prohibition orders empowering the police to seize guns are issued. Do you know how they have to learn about these guns? They have to ask the person if they own one. If you have been guilty of a criminal act or you have been involved in a domestic violence dispute, will you willingly inform the police that you own a gun? I think not. If we had a registry, then it would be simple for the police to call up those names and make sure that those guns were confiscated, as lawfully ordered. This procedure is critical to police doing their job effectively and to the protection of innocent citizens throughout this country.

Registration of every firearm entering Canada is one part of a series of measures taken by the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General and the Minister of National Revenue. Such registration will help stop the practice of using Canada as a transit point for delivery of weapons to countries that do not allow their direct entry.

Bill C-68 requires that all shipments of firearms arriving in Canada must be accompanied with a permit issued in advance. It will enhance inspections and enforcement at the borders; and it will strengthen the enforcement mechanisms through new criminal offences and stiff penalties. Registration will allow authorities to trace guns that disappear from bulk shipments and follow every firearm back to the point of its sale.

Not too long ago, there was a murder in Toronto in which a woman was killed in a restaurant and the weapon was left behind. Had that weapon been appropriately registered, it could have been tracked down to its owner in a matter of minutes. As it was, it could not be so quickly traced. It took weeks for that tracking to be done. Presently, firearm acquisition certificates are left in the hands of the dealers; therefore, all the dealers have to be tracked. With a computerized system the information necessary to quickly track these weapons will be available to all police officers: rural, urban, and national.

I should like to take a moment to talk about how the registration system will work. Honourable senators should understand that it will be both simple and efficient. The first step will be the registration of the owner. Beginning on January 1, 1996, if this bill passes, new documents called "firearms possession certificates" will be introduced and then phased-in over a period of five years. A nominal fee to a maximum of $10 will include all the costs involved in obtaining this certificate. At the end of a five-year period, the owner will be asked to renew this certificate for a further five-year period. The cost will be $60, which means, in fact, it will cost only $12 a year since the certificate need only be renewed once every five years.

In comparison, in Manitoba it costs me $23 every year for a driver's licence. I might add that it is only $23 because I have the maximum number of merit points. If I did not, it would cost me much more.

Current owners of rifles and shotguns will have to fill out an application. That may be done by mail. The procedure will be simple, honourable senators. The owner can pick up the form at a post office, community office, or government office, and mail it in. The owner will undergo a simple police check to verify there are no outstanding court orders prohibiting him or her from owning a gun. In the first five years, until 2001, a sliding fee scale will apply to encourage gun owners to register early.

When the system is fully in place, all firearm owners will be required, by law, to have a firearms possession certificate which uniquely identifies them as an owner of one or more firearms similar to the driver's licence we now carry.

The second step is the registration of the firearm itself. This is done only once. When a firearm is registered, it remains registered for the lifetime of that firearm unless ownership is transferred to another person. Again, it will cost a nominal fee from zero to $10 and that will cover up to 10 guns. I am not talking about an onerous provision: It will be done only once. By this procedure, we will register the model, make and serial number of every firearm. This registration will be completed by the year 2003.

A uniquely numbered firearms registration card will be issued for each firearm. This card will be valid for the lifetime of the owner or until the firearm is sold, destroyed or modified in any manner. If the gun is transferred, a nominal fee of $10 will apply.

Honourable senators, I should now like to address the concerns of farmers, gun collectors, target shooters and our aboriginal people, all of whom use firearms for their legitimate uses.

I come from Manitoba, a province where hunting and trapping are integral economic activities. The use of a gun is an essential component of those endeavours. I would not give my support to any legislation which would hamper the use of firearms for those legitimate purposes. However, this legislation will not hamper the right of those individuals to use their weapons for legitimate purposes.

The question that will be asked of all of us who participate in this debate is: Do you own a gun? The answer is no, I do not. I have never wanted to; and I doubt if I ever will.

My daughter owns a gun. Why? Because she is a farmer. She raises horses. Unfortunately and tragically, she occasionally has to put down an animal. Sometimes she has to kill a rodent that is among the horses because the only way to prevent the horse from damage is to deal with the rodent. She asked me to tell you today that she has no difficulty in registering her gun. She has it for a lawful purpose and will only use it for a lawful purpose. She, like many other farmers, the ones that we have not heard from, find no difficulty in registering their guns.

The problems of our aboriginal people are special and unique, and they must be dealt with as such. That was the reason I was absolutely delighted with the amendment passed in the House of Commons which clearly stated that in no way does this legislation abrogate their treaties. That was an important statement to make. Our aboriginal people have every right to fear that we will abrogate their treaties; we have done that all too often.

There are other provisions in this legislation which are also sensitive to the needs of aboriginal peoples. For example, those aboriginal and non-aboriginal peoples who are sustenance hunters will pay no fee at all. They will be forced to register and obtain a certificate, but they will not be asked to pay a fee. Aboriginal languages will be used to promote the legislation within their communities. Training will be developed in the communities so that it is sensitive to the community needs. This training may be the responsibility of the elders of those communities to ensure that there is no thought of threat to aboriginal rights.

I believe that type of sensitivity will not only be welcomed by our aboriginal people but will make this legislation much more acceptable to them. It must be culturally sensitive, and it must be brought to the local level. I believe it will be.

Honourable senators, I am not naïve about what this bill will do. I know that it will not prevent every single child from taking his or her life with the use of a gun. I know that it will not prevent domestic violence which is, unfortunately and tragically, endemic in our society. I know that children will, in all likelihood, continue to die accidentally by weapons that discharge. Yes, those things will continue to happen, but I believe they will happen less frequently as a result of this legislation than they are now happening in our communities.

I believe that this legislation will lead to a decrease in the risk of violence and death. I believe from the depth of my being that this legislation will help to protect vulnerable people because, for me, Bill C-68 represents a significant step toward safer streets and safer homes in the best of our Canadian tradition.

• (1550)

Bill C-68 represents the legitimate uses of firearms because it respects them while ensuring that public interest and public safety come first. In this desire, the Government of Canada does not stand alone: It stands with the rank and file of police officers throughout this country; it stands with the chiefs of police; it stands with the victims of violence; and it stands with the vast majority of Canadians who believe and support this legislation.

Honourable senators, I urge you, too, to support Bill C-68.

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, I rise today to direct some comments to Bill C-68, respecting firearms and other weapons. I do so with the frank admission at the outset that I do not profess to be an expert on firearms. As they say, a little superficial knowledge can be a dangerous thing, but at least I warn you at the outset.

I suspect that my colleague Senator Carstairs finds herself in the same position as myself, as she, like me, has never owned a gun, unless water and BB guns are included in that category. I thank Senator Carstairs for her very clear and concise explanation of the bill before us and the very appropriate way in which she addressed her viewpoints with respect to it.

If a pollster called me today — I never seem to hear from them, although I suspect some Canadians do — and asked me if I supported gun control, I would answer, "Absolutely." If someone had asked me a few months ago whether I supported the registration of all firearms in Canada, I would have answered, "Why not? What is all the fuss about? What could possibly be controversial about the simple act of registering a dangerous weapon?"

I was intrigued by the storm of opposition that was building up throughout my province and throughout many regions across this nation, by the rallies of unprecedented numbers that were taking place in cities and towns, such as Wainwright in my province where it all started to happen, and by the many phone calls that were made to my office. I know many senators have certainly received the same response. Those calls were from irate citizens, not only rural Canadians, but professionals, office workers and retirees.

I was intrigued by the countless letters I received from a cross-section of Canadians. I expected letters from lobby groups, but I also received countless letters from individuals who were more concentrated in rural and northern communities, but the letters also form a strong representation from our cities.

To me, it was like the response one would expect on abortion or capital punishment issues, and, frankly, I did not know why. I was fascinated by the phenomenon and decided that, if this was such a big issue in my province, I was obliged in my duties to this chamber to inform myself. I thought I could then explain the situation to Albertans by saying, "This is no big deal. Relax, and let's deal with more substantive matters."

Frankly, some of the arguments I was hearing, particularly from the more vociferous lobby groups opposed to the bill, were difficult for me to accept and were more within the concept of the American tradition than the Canadian. We do not have a tradition in Canada that allows for the right to bear arms. I am thankful for the wisdom displayed by our forefathers in that regard.

I have also sensed a tendency to paranoia in some of the arguments presented by the gun lobby. They propose that it is the ultimate intention of the government to seize all guns and leave Canadians helpless and defenceless to the whims of government. I have not met the Honourable Mr. Rock, but I respect him as a wise and fair parliamentarian, and I doubt very much that the Machiavellian tendencies attributed to him are appropriate and that he has ever harboured a hidden wish to own all the guns in Canada.

Canada is not, as a result of this legislation, as some allege, becoming a Nazi state. I would recognize such tendencies if they were evident. Although I have deep concerns over our wavering commitment to human rights in this country, both internally and externally, in the province of Alberta and in the federal government, I do not hold up Bill C-68 as evidence of such tendencies.

As I embarked upon my journey into the world of crime control and guns and their registration, I did so somewhat skeptically and with some of the arguments opposed to registration being totally unpersuasive to me and, in my view, of little substance. What is of concern to me, as I am sure it is to all honourable senators, is the issue of public safety. What is of concern to me is the creation of sound public policy which is supportable from a cost-benefit point of view. What is also of concern to me is that laws be constitutional, respected by Canadians, and that they be practical and administered on an even-handed basis throughout the land.

I also must state at the outset that, as I started my investigation, I had a particular perspective that evolved when I was chairman of a task force set up by the mayor of Calgary to examine family and community violence which resulted in a personal experience of some 18 months of sadness and an enhanced awareness as to what is happening in our urban communities; why streets are perceived by women, correctly, I might add, to be unsafe; and what steps must be taken to make our communities safer.

I hasten to add that, in hundreds of meetings, public and private, and within our deliberations and our final report, there was not, to my recollection, any reference to gun registration as a beneficial approach to reducing crime, an observation I make because I have mused that circumstance on a number of occasions. In all of the meetings when the ladies' groups appeared before us, in all of the private meetings we had, and during all of the recommendations we discussed, not once did any group suggest that gun registration would in any way solve any of their problems.

Let me share with you my travels as a middle-of-the-road Progressive Conservative. The word "progressive" was important for me to keep in mind as I tried to inform myself over the past weeks and months on the intricacies and complexities of Bill C-68.

My first stop was to visit some members of the Calgary police force so that the existing gun laws in Canada could be explained to me. I discovered, to my surprise and comfort, that Canada is regarded as having some of the most stringent gun control legislation in the world today.

We have restricted and monitored the use of firearms in Canada since 1877. We have had a nation-wide permit system for the carrying of small arms in effect since 1892. Registration of hand guns has been the law since 1934. A large number of guns are prohibited in Canada or require special licensing. In 1977, further important controls were put in place with the creation of the requirement for the firearms acquisition certificate, the FAC.

What I did not know at the time, but do now, and what in my opinion the vast majority of Canadians do not know, is that it would take four to six months for me to legally buy a long gun today. I would be required to take a course which would cost up to $200 and write an examination. I would be required to fill out a long, blue form which contains personal questions relative to my criminal record, my love life, my wife, and my violent tendencies, if I have any. This and other information is collected and would then be verified by the police. Once that procedure had been completed, I could then go to the local gunshop and buy a gun legally.

I also learned, however, that if I wanted to buy a gun illegally, even a stolen registered handgun or a prohibited firearm, I could do so immediately. The police told me where I could acquire a gun in this way. They knew where they were. I could buy an illegal and registered firearm at a reasonable cost.

I also discovered the following facts which I found to be enlightening, and I will now share them with honourable senators. All gun owners are required by law to keep their guns in safe storage. That, the police tell me, is one of their biggest problems. That, the police tell me, is more significant than anything else. If they could only encourage Canadians to follow the law and keep their guns in safe storage, many of the horrific accidents that Senator Carstairs aptly described would certainly not occur. I have also been advised that an estimated 375,000 guns are smuggled into Canada each year, predominantly from the United States of America, during some 130 million border crossings between our two nations.

My police friends also told me that gun registration, in their opinion, would not have an impact on the reduction of crime, a statement that I have heard time and time again. The real problem they face is a lack of ability to enforce existing laws due to inadequate funding.

I was also told by judges whom I know and respect and who deal with crime on a daily basis that in their opinion the cost of registering guns is unwarranted and that the money would be better spent in assisting 10- and 12-year olds whose needs are crying out for help but who have no resources behind them and will likely turn to crime and violence.

My next stop in my journey was the statistical records to try to understand just how serious illegal gun use has become in Canada. Considering the publicity violence has been receiving and the tragedies we have experienced in Canada involving guns, the low point has to be the killings in Montreal at École Polytechnique and Concordia, and, I might add, one of the handguns used was not registered.

I discovered the following: Crime is not on the increase in Canada. In fact, in a number of categories it is decreasing. In some regions, it has decreased dramatically. In Edmonton, new and innovative programs related to community policing have reduced crime in the past two years by 38 per cent.

These additional statistics were also noteworthy: Only 31 per cent of homicides involved the use of guns. Stabbings and beatings are not far behind. Canada, by international standards, has a very low homicide rate. In 1993, 630 homicides were reported in Canada, 2.2 per thousand, compared to 9 per thousand in the United States; and in the lowest countries, England, Switzerland and Norway, it was one per thousand. The rate of homicides in Canada has in fact declined significantly since the late 1970s. Lastly, I noted that most suicides are committed by methods other than the use of firearms, with less than one-third of 3,700 suicides involving firearms.

That is not to say that we should not be concerned with crime and violence in our community. Of course we should. Women are afraid to go out at night in many areas of our nation. Many crimes of violence are horrific. Violence involving our youth is of great concern, and too many Canadians are falling through the cracks and have no resources to assist them. There are great needs in our communities, which are crying out for help in this period of fiscal restraint. The questions we must examine are: Where can we, with our limited resources, move so that we can best allocate these resources to reduce crime; and, is gun registration an appropriate priority? These are valid and important questions.

My next stop was the pollsters in Calgary whom I know and whose findings supported the comments of the Minister of Justice that Canadians supported gun control. The response I received from the pollsters was "Yes, most Canadians have and do support gun control, but they have very little knowledge of the existing gun laws. They want more severe penalties where crime is committed." When they were asked whether or not they support gun control they said "yes"," just as I would have said "yes" then and as I would say "yes" today if I were asked if I supported gun control. I was also told that more women than men support the legislation, which is understandable because, sadly, women often face the other end of the gun barrel. We can certainly understand the tragedies that women in our society have faced as a result of violence, including that by guns.

My personal observations since getting into this subject are the same. Most Canadians do not know the laws as they exist today. When I tell them, and when they are advised that it would take four to six months in some areas of the country to buy a gun legally, they are very surprised, as I was.

What was particularly odd to me when I examined the issue was that many supporters of the legislation readily admit that gun registration aspects of the bill will not reduce crime. According to polls, approximately 75 per cent of Canadians share this point of view.

When Bill C-68, was finally presented to Canadians, it brought forth an outcry of opposition and quiet majority support. As could be expected, those against are always more vocal and organized than those in favour, and certainly the gun lobby has considerable experience in issues of this nature considering their impact on public policy in the United States.

Frankly, I think that many Canadians are turned off by the gun lobby and their arguments, which have polarized the substantive issues that the bill brings forwards and have turned the debate into a rhetorical, emotional argument rather than a reasoned discussion over the merits and cost benefits of registration.

Unfortunately, the easily supportable aspects of Bill C-68, those involving crime control and other important provisions, are mixed with the controversial gun registration sections. There is no doubt in my mind, as Senator Carstairs has stated, that the crime control aspects of the bill are supported across the land and would easily receive passage in this chamber.

What are the arguments we hear on both sides of the issue? Why are so many citizens upset? Why have three premiers, likely with more to come, and the leaders in the Northwest Territories, who are here today, the Yukon and our aboriginal communities opposed to the registration provisions? Why is it that almost every premier in this land has taken the point of view that they would only find gun registration acceptable if the federal government picked up all the costs, because the provinces have higher priorities? Why has it become an election issue in provincial elections? Why in all likelihood will the new Premier of Ontario also argue against the bill?

Some of the arguments on both sides are simply ill–founded, in my view. I mentioned earlier the paranoia of the gun owners, but I find just as superficial some of the arguments by the proponents of the bill. The Prime Minister has attempted to find some linkage with gun registration and the tragedy in Oklahoma City. Others have raised emotional arguments based on the deaths of Canadians by guns. Senator Carstairs has dealt with some of those tragedies today, but gun registration is no guarantee that those tragedies will not occur in any event.

Others have argued that we register our pets and cars, do we not? I have heard that one from the Prime Minister. Those are provincial powers. The powers and the obligation to register our cars are designed basically to raise revenues, to locate valuable assets for insurance purposes and to identify traffic violations. Everyone buys their licence plates in order to insure their vehicles. They will be easily spotted by the police if they do not have a licence for their car. In the case of gun registration, it will be surprising if even 60 per cent of Canadians actually register — that is, if you follow the precedents in other jurisdictions where gun registration is a requirement. Australia and New Zealand have not achieved 60 per cent compliance from the point of view of registration. It is easy to avoid registering a gun; it is nigh on to impossible to avoid registering a motor vehicle. The comparison of the two when they say "We register our cars, do we not", is not analogous. We are talking about apples and oranges.

Undoubtedly gun registration will be another useful tool for our police forces in determining the whereabouts of some guns. However, the other argument, my police friends tell me, is unsupportable, the oft expressed viewpoint that the police will be forewarned of a crime and where a gun is located when they go to a crime scene, particularly in matrimonial violence situations. I am told by my police friends that, because of the unreliability of gun registration and because of all the smuggled, illegal guns that will remain in our society, a policeman would be foolhardy to go to a scene of a crime and assume there is no gun there because they have checked the records and cannot find a registration. They suggest to me that anyone going to the scene of a crime will assume there is a gun there, registration or not. Those who argue that it will help the police in that regard are presenting a rather weak and invalid argument.

There are also valid arguments in support of the legislation suggesting that the requirement of registration may result in the shrinkage of the number of guns in Canada and that it will make guns easier to trace thereby helping to enforce the laws respecting the smuggling of guns. All of these arguments should be examined by the Senate committee when they start their deliberations next week to analyze the workability, efficiency and cost benefits of the gun registration elements in Bill C-68.

It is in the area of the cost of gun registration that I would invite the Senate committee to shed some light. How much will it cost, and I mean to all levels of government? Who will pay? There have been conflicting statements from the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice as to who will pay the costs. The provinces, the Yukon and the Territories, it appears, will be saddled with the costs of administration, which, the Minister of Justice in Alberta tells me, will be at least $500,000 per year for that province alone. He says he will not pay it.

Mr. Rock, as I understand it, has said that the administration costs would be the responsibility of the jurisdictions. How can you have an effective and even-handed law where those who are charged with the administration of the law refuse to do so or are not committed to the law they are obliged to enforce? How much will it really cost? Mr. Rock has suggested $85 million. Credible analysts suggest, in all likelihood, the costing will be closer to $500 million.

Recently, Mr. Rock clarified his assumptions and now maintains that registration will only involve the submission by the gun owner of a simple card and that there will be little examination of the background and the stability of the gun owner, as in the case of an application for a firearms acquisition certificate. All of that will not be required, unfortunately, from the point of view of anyone who wishes to register as a gun owner.

On that basis, and on the basis of the more recent clarifications submitted by the honourable minister, I believe the figures presented by the opponents to the bill are questionable, although, even now, credible analysts still suggest that the costs will run into the hundreds of millions of dollars. We must know what the cost will be. At this point in time, we do not have that information. Would Canadians be as accepting of the legislation if they discovered the cost to be in the hundreds of millions of dollars? I will want to know the costs to be incurred not only by the federal government but also the provinces and the municipalities, for it all comes from the same taxpayers' pockets.

I am told by one Alberta mayor that, in his view, they will have to pay for two more RCMP officers to administer the paper work if registration becomes a reality. Does this mean more police officers punching computers and fewer on the streets performing their main function of reducing and catching criminals? If that is the case, the committee must look at that and we must learn the circumstances.

A thorough analysis of the costs were not conducted in the other place due to the pressures of time imposed upon the process. The large number of last-minute amendments and the minister's most recent explanations relating to the costs of the program were neither raised nor debated there. Indeed, the bill was debated under the threat of closure.

We must not be rushed in the Senate as we examine this bill. Honourable senators, there is no rush. The legislation does not come into full effect for eight years. We owe it to Canadians to clearly bring focus to the costs of this program so that they will be able to make their judgments on facts, not on "maybes" or on best bureaucratic estimates.

I suggest that committee members should also keep in their minds the concept that there may be better ways to spend the money and direct our energies. If crime reduction is the purpose of this bill, then I suggest that there is a better shopping list for how to reduce crime in our society. There are two reports, honourable senators, which have come forward in Canada in recent years. Many of you are familiar with this report called, "Changing the Landscape — Ending Violence, Achieving Equality, and "The Canadian Panel on Violence Against Women". The taxpayers of Canada spent approximately $10 million on this excellent report. Women's groups had tremendous input into its creation. Many recommendations are given for ways and means to reduce violence in our society, ways and means by which women will find our streets safe, ways and means to avoid the battering of women and the abuse of children which, sadly, is occurring in our society.

I was involved peripherally in this committee, just as I was involved in producing the report of the mayor's task force with respect to community and family violence in Calgary, as I mentioned earlier. No recommendations in these two reports related to guns.

If it is our purpose, as it should be, to reduce crime in Canada, I will give Minister Rock a shopping list of how to reduce crime in Canada. Frankly, an expenditure of public funds on gun registration will not be a high priority on the list I would bring forward from the point of view of valid, proven, guaranteed ways to reduce crime and violence in Canada today.

I suggest that in times of tight fiscal restraint, we owe it to Canadians to look at the proper allocation of funding and at where taxpayers can achieve the maximum ability to reduce crime in proven and successful ways.

There are many other issues which will require the examination of the committee. At a lunch recently with the Minster of Justice of the Yukon, I was told that the gun registration provisions are totally unworkable and unrealistic in the Yukon and the Territories. I am sure I will hear at lunch tomorrow from my friends in the Territories the very same thing, as they explain to me the impact it will have in their region by virtue of it not relating to the way of life in Northern Canada.

I have received legal briefs that suggest that the legislation is unconstitutional and illegal from the perspective of our aboriginal communities. This must be examined by the committee.

I am also told that the search-and-seizure provisions are unconstitutional, along with the confiscatory provisions of the bill. There is a great unfairness to law-abiding gun owners whose collections, by one stroke of the legislative pen, will be rendered near valueless and will be subject to confiscation by regulations if one is to read section 117.15(2) correctly. I invite Senator Beaudoin and his committee to look at those sections.

There are also comments on the application of the proposed penalties for non-registration that suggest they are impossible to enforce, the now watered-down provisions of that section. For if gun registration is a valid priority, as some suggest, then it must be enforceable. Recently, the minister weakened those provisions of enforcement, and I am told it will now be immensely difficult to enforce those provisions against those who refuse to register their firearms.

There is much work to be done by the committee. Many individuals, groups and organizations will want to be heard and are entitled to be heard. Many were denied the opportunity to be heard by the House of Commons committee. Unfortunately, the government does not wish to split the bill, which would make deliberations easier to conduct. However, I accept the argument that the provisions of crime control and gun registration are so intertwined in the bill that splitting the bill would, in itself, be very complex and time-consuming.

Many have suggested to me that the real strength of the bill is symbolic, that it sends out a message to Canadians that the government is committed to dealing with crime. Senator Carstairs has alluded to that point.

I do not underestimate for a moment the importance of symbolism. However, symbolism in and of itself is not enough. Vaclev Havel wrote in his book Living Truth:

> ...no evil has ever been eliminated by suppressing its symptoms...we need to address its cause...it's no different than an ugly man trying to get rid of his ugliness by smashing the mirror that reminds him of it.

I hope this bill is more than mere symbolism. I hope it is more than just a placebo to make Canadians feel good, more than just a mirror that we wish to smash but which will not remove or even diminish the ugliness of crime in our community. We must attack the root causes of crime.

To our aboriginal communities, that means programs and resources to deal with alcoholism, lack of training and the feeling of desperation. To our youth, that means hope for a future and resources in our schools and communities where there are none. It means jobs and training. To women who are threatened and feel unsafe, it means community-based police and application of the many valid and important recommendations enumerated in the two reports to which I referred.

This bill must be more than feel-good legislation designed to avert attention from the real and substantive causes of crime in Canada today. These solutions may not be found in gun registration or by building bigger and better jails, as some would suggest. They will be found back in our communities where too many people feel abandoned and disillusioned that the great Canadian dreams of opportunity, jobs and optimism are being shattered by a rapidly changing world which they do not understand and in which they cannot participate.

I challenge the Senate committee to study all aspects of this bill, give it a full and complete airing, so that members can come back to this chamber with their well-considered and incisive recommendations.

The Senate, in the finest tradition of this chamber, has an obligation to hear Canadians, to clear the air, to bring thoughtful, unemotional and civil dialogue to this issue, to heal the wounds if possible, and to bring forth rational and non-partisan considerations to an inflammatory situation.

To those who suggest that the Senate should merely rubber stamp this bill, who allege that all the arguments have been made, that we are only playing politics with the legislation, and that an unelected body has no right to delay this legislation, let me say that I, as one senator — and I know I speak for every senator in this chamber — take my oath of office and my responsibilities in this chamber very seriously. I will not be steamrolled or intimidated by arguments which are unrelated to the work at hand or editorial comments in The Ottawa Citizen that do not recognize the obligations of this chamber and do not recognize the excellent traditions of this chamber when senators do their excellent work.

My fellow senators, we have work to do. This bill is surrounded by question marks and division. We must, in our deliberation, help erase the question marks, ease the divisions in our country, and bring clarity and understanding to a very complex and divisive situation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I will not support or vote in favour of Bill C-68 as it is presently written.

Taking a position opposed to my party on this legislation is difficult. What makes it even more difficult is the fact that I support a great majority of the proposed legislation in Bill C-68.

When the Senate was dealing with the GST legislation, I felt very strongly that it was, first, bad, unfair legislation for Canadians, and, second, even more unfair to Northern Canadians.

When I speak of Northern Canadians, honourable senators, I speak not only of the people "north of sixty". As I have previously stated in this chamber, Northern B.C., Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec are just as remote and sparsely settled and with as different a lifestyle as those people living north of sixty.

I can remember being rather harsh towards my colleagues on the other side trying to point out why I felt they should not support the GST because I felt it was unfair legislation. I am sure many of you wish you had now listened to me.

In my opinion, Bill C-68 has placed me in the same position honourable senators opposite were in. It is unfair legislation as far as the people I represent are concerned. They have expressed their views to me in very strong terms. I have heard them, and I will vote against Bill C-68 as they have requested.

Honourable senators, pages and pages of statistics — and they will be quoted here again and again — regarding Bill C-68 can be used to defend any position one wants to put forth. My main objection, and I believe the main objection of most people, is the registration of rifles and shotguns. It appears to me that, if a hoodlum in Toronto shoots someone in a restaurant with a shotgun, suddenly everyone from Iqaluit in the Northwest Territories to Old Crow in the Yukon has to register his or her rifle. They have never committed an offence with a gun; they never will.

If a person commits an offence with a gun, gun owners want that person to be severely dealt with. That has never happened in the past, despite the laws presently on the books which, for 15 years, have made such offences subject to compulsory prison terms — offences that are continually the subject of plea bargaining by prosecutors or ignored by judges.

A person who recently entered a bar in Whitehorse with a sawed-off, loaded shotgun was apprehended by police. He was sentenced to one day in jail. The judge thought he was having a bad day. Why would anyone take gun laws seriously when this is the case? This is not an isolated incident, by the way.

These situations are dealt with ineptly by the courts. Surely, if we are to be serious about gun legislation, the courts must take gun legislation seriously. They have not done so in Canada; they never have. What must be the reaction of a police officer who faces someone with a sawed-off shotgun, survives the ordeal, and sees a one-day sentence being imposed? If we want to support our police forces — and I strongly feel we should — let us seriously enforce the laws we presently have instead of dreaming up new ways of harassing legitimate gun owners who are law-abiding, fair-minded people and who never have used and never will use their guns to commit offences.

I and most Canadians believe our police deserve strong support in their work. Registering shotguns and rifles is not the way to accomplish this goal. Supporting them in the courts will send the proper message to people who commit offences with guns.

As I stated earlier, honourable senators, pages and pages of statistics can be used to defend any position one wants to take regarding gun control and Bill C-68. The cost of registration, which has just been pointed out by Senator Ghitter, is one of the prime examples. One group can show the cost will be $85 million; another group, whose data appears to be just as valid, says the cost will be $500 million. In my opinion, both figures are too high for registration that will not work during these times of serious restraint. Forcing honest, law-abiding citizens to register shotguns and rifles will not keep our police safer or prevent domestic violence. A criminal or a deranged person will not check a registration number on a weapon before committing an offence.

Mr. Bruce K. Dunne, a Calgary businessman and former city police officer, recently wrote an interesting article in the Calgary Herald regarding lost or stolen firearms. Statisticians tell us that 3,000 firearms per year are lost or stolen, with 40 per cent or 1,200 firearms reported as lost. Of the remaining 1,800 firearms, 70 per cent, or 1,260 of these, are actually lost but are reported stolen so an insurance claim can be made. We now have approximately 540 firearms per year reported as legitimately stolen for one reason or another.

Interestingly, 80 per cent or 432 of the 540 firearms mentioned above are recovered by the police. Instead of 3,000 guns per year, we are now speaking of 108 legitimate stolen firearms per year. It seems to me like an awful lot of legislation to keep track of 108 firearms.

Mr. Dunne goes on to make many other good points in his article, but I feel the above figures may help to show how misleading statistics can be on both sides of this debate.

Much has been said during the long debate on Bill C-68 about the "gun lobby", the "NRA" and "red-eyed, frothing gun nuts" who walk around with Uzis and AK-47s and bandoliers of ammunition over their battle fatigues which they purchased from the Army and Navy Store. Honourable senators, these people may or may not exist, but it must be repeated that the people who have taken the time to write, call or make their objections known to me personally on Bill C-68 have never belonged to a gun club. They are just folks who have always had a gun, have never hurt anyone and never will.

I cannot imagine anyone in Toronto or Montreal feeling safer because a farmer in Saskatchewan or Alberta, an Inuit in Cape Dorset, or an aboriginal person in Old Crow has now registered his or her shotgun or rifle. Since 1934, we have had registration of handguns, restricted weapons and assault-type weapons. We have firearms acquisition certificates that cost $50; require a $100, three-hour examination; a minimum 28-day waiting period which Senator Ghitter says will probably be closer to four to six months. If you do acquire a gun or rifle to use for hunting, a licence must be purchased. Do we need another layer of expensive, unworkable, aggravating legislation such as registration added to that? I think not. Enough is enough.

In closing, honourable senators, I once again want to say that, while I will vote against Bill C-68, I take no pleasure in doing so. I know many people, including many Yukoners, support Bill C-68. Their case will be put forward by others.

• (1630)

I would take this opportunity to thank my leaders, Senator Fairbairn and Senator Graham, for being very fair and understanding of my position. It would not have worked anyway, but they have never attempted to have me change my mind.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your attention. I look forward to the committee that Senator Ghitter has described which will ask some very serious questions and get some real answers on what this legislation is all about.

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Will the honourable senator take a question? I have not made any decision on the substantive issue. However, the reasons put forward by Senator Lucier with respect to Northern Canadians would be applicable also in Labrador, and perhaps even the Great Northern Peninsula of Newfoundland. Would that be your assessment? I ask you because you are more familiar with the subject of guns and the effect that these programs would have. Would the arguments the honourable senator has put forward be equally applicable in Labrador and the northern parts of lower Newfoundland?

Senator Lucier: Yes. I am probably remiss in not mentioning Labrador and the northern parts of Newfoundland. I used exactly the same arguments on the GST, that people living in those remote areas should not be punished for what takes place in the larger centres. That is what happens with this type of legislation. Your contention that this bill will have the same effect in Labrador and in northern parts of Newfoundland, particularly, are very true. They are very applicable to the same areas.

Hon. Charlie Watt: Honourable senators, I speak to you on an issue of vital importance to the Inuit and to the aboriginal peoples of Canada. Parliament must ensure that Bill C-68, in its letter, spirit and the process of enactment, complies with the federal government's fiduciary duty to the aboriginal peoples of Canada. This bill must also respect the government's commitment to recognize and help implement the inherent right of self-government.

The importance of the Crown's fiduciary duty to respect, recognize and affirm aboriginal and treaty rights cannot be overemphasized, particularly in the exercise of legislative jurisdiction that affects our aboriginal rights to hunt, our cultures, and our self-government rights.

It should not be left to litigation, not to mention criminal prosecution, to determine the many unanswered questions relating to the scope, extent and nature of the impact of this bill on aboriginal peoples.

The task of ensuring that aboriginal and treaty rights are not unnecessarily and unfairly infringed upon involves consultation with aboriginal peoples. Unfortunately, it is not clear yet, as just one example, that the constitutionally entrenched requirements for consultation with hunters and trappers committees, wildlife management boards and other entities established by land claims agreements have been fully complied with.

Honourable senators, there is a general public interest in the rational control of the possession and use of firearms, in particular handguns and prohibited weapons, and in penalties for the use of firearms in violent crimes such as sexual assault. Aboriginal peoples have been practically unanimous in endorsing gun control of this type.

However, the federal government is establishing a universal licensing and registration system that, for the first time, would include long firearms used for hunting by aboriginal peoples. If the government's objective in including hunting weapons of aboriginal peoples is purportedly aimed at the prevention of crimes and public safety, then it must be recognized that the causes and patterns of crime have some very important distinguishing features in the North.

In the North, aboriginal peoples come in contact with the criminal justice system very often as a direct result of outside interference in our hunting based cultures by laws such as this one. This critical fact must be taken into account, and that can only be done by allowing sufficient time to consult with aboriginal peoples on the potentially invasive impact of this bill. We must also ensure that any firearms legislation of general application can be reconciled with the constitutionally protected hunting and cultural rights of aboriginal peoples.

It is true that the bill before us does contain some recent amendments that attempt to address some of the concerns of aboriginal peoples. For example, a recent amendment to proposed section 33 of the bill attempts to exempt some hunters from overly restrictive provisions regarding lending and borrowing of firearms. Unfortunately, the bill will create different classes of aboriginal hunters, and this is cause for concern in the aboriginal community.

In addition, the proposed non-derogation clause for existing aboriginal and treaty rights in this bill does not really give any more protection than provided under section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The reality is that the requirements for public safety in the North and in Inuit communities are different. How can we make the people of the South understand how different we are? Inuit perspectives on public safety and firearms regulation are very different than those expressed in this bill.

Senator Carstairs speaks of public safety, in the sense that owning a firearm could be harmful to another person, depending on how that weapon is being used. How can I describe to you, honourable senators, that for us, a firearm means survival. For us, having ownership of a weapon is also a public safety issue. Those are our tools, not our weapons. They are tools, just as farmers use sledge hammers from time to time, and forks. That is important to you. We do not have captive animals that we can utilize for food in the same fashion as you can. We must go out and hunt in order to survive; in order to feed ourselves.

The economy in this country is not getting much better, although it may be moving slightly upwards now. The people in the North are doing everything possible to feed their families, and they are having a hard time. This bill will further restrict them in that aim. I do not think that this is acceptable in this country today.

Honourable senators must recognize the differences between the South and the North. We do not try to impose the law on you. Neither do we expect you to impose the law on us. At least if there is to be an attempt, let us sit down together and figure out exactly what that piece of legislation will be that will apply to us.

The Northern reality is not accommodated by the proposed amendments. The Inuit need for fresh, nutritious food is dependent on harvesting country food. Inuit needs and rights will be negatively affected by this bill. Inuit culture and tradition will be, once again, invaded and diminished. Once again, we will have to rely on the government to increase welfare, since unemployment insurance will be further restricted now. The only thing that will be available to us now is welfare. Is that what you want? I do not think so. For those reasons, this bill cannot and must not apply to the Inuit. In addition, the Inuit interest in regulating firearms matters in our own communities must be recognized. The government is committed to the recognition and implementation of the inherent right to self-government. This right includes non-ethnic and ethnic forms of self-government.

Honourable senators, even with a narrow understanding of aboriginal rights, the inherent right to self-government certainly extends to hunting activities and related matters. Regulation and control of hunting tools is a related matter necessary to the full enjoyment of aboriginal hunting rights. Hunting firearms are tools of the trade for the Inuit. Therefore, gun control is a vital concern to our right of self-government. The Inuit right to possess firearms is recognized and protected under the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement and other Inuit land claims agreements.

The fact that there is not yet a revised federal self-government policy does not preclude the government from seizing opportunities like those presented in Bill C-68 to act on self-government. This would be consistent with the recognition of the inherent right of aboriginal self-government as an existing aboriginal right.

At a minimum, the bill must provide some further exemptions with respect to aboriginal peoples living in claims settlement regions as defined under the agreements, and the area claimed by Labrador Inuit, as well as aboriginal peoples living in remote and rural areas of the country. In short, Bill C-68 fails to account for aboriginal realities that have motivated and compelled aboriginal peoples to stand up for themselves and claim their inherent right of self-government.

As Rosemarie Kuptana, the President of Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, said:

> We have no desire and no intent to tell southerners how they should govern themselves on this important safety issue. We have no desire to deprive the public of protection from criminal or irresponsible use of firearms. But do southerners have the rights to pass laws that work for them but not for us? Bill C-68 is simply not workable in a hunting culture. It seems obvious to us that there will be serious problems of non-compliance in Inuit communities. We object to our traditional activities forever being criminalized by southern decision-makers who are imposing a made in the South solution for Northern communities. It is not fair. It does not make sense.

Likewise, the Minister of Justice of the Northwest Territories, the Honourable Steven Kakfwi, has informed the federal government in very strong terms that non-compliance in the North will be a serious problem for aboriginal peoples and others involved in a hunting lifestyle in his jurisdiction. This is very true. Minister Kakfwi shared his opinion based on his own understanding and years of experience as a legislator and cabinet member in the North, as a member of the aboriginal community, and based on conversations with law enforcement officials in the North. They are the people who have firsthand information about this matter. Not only do they have firsthand information, they live with it on a daily basis. It is they who are telling members of this place how important this issue is.

As aboriginal peoples, we support the legislation, provided it applies only to the South and urban communities such as Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa. It is important to understand and recognize that now is the time to start focusing on this issue. If this bill cannot apply to aboriginal peoples in remote areas, then what can we do to have proper legislation for the North? We are capable of designing regulations and laws for ourselves. However, an opportunity to do that has never been given to us. We would like to have such an opportunity. We are prepared to compromise and to sit down and negotiate. In this way, there will be hands-on development of the law to be. It will be something of which we will be proud.

Senator Lucier referred to the time when there was confrontation between the two parties in this place. I remember when we were sitting around the clock. We strongly tried to make recommendations at that time. Unfortunately, we were not quite successful. Perhaps if we had succeeded at that time, we would have learned something. Perhaps this legislation could have been the second step in the recognition of differences between the South and the North.

There is grave concern among Inuit and other aboriginal peoples about the potential impact of this legislation on aboriginal peoples' cultural practices relating to the use, giving, lending and borrowing guns and to what extent following our cultural practices will expose us to criminal liability. There are serious concerns about how the numerous and complex provisions of this bill will affect the ability of aboriginal peoples to efficiently hunt, and about the added expense of obtaining a hunting licence and registration certificates for the 10 or so rifles the average hunter needs for different game.

There are concerns about how aboriginal language speakers will be able to qualify for a test designed for southerners and whether they will be offered in aboriginal languages and made accessible to aboriginal communities. I suppose that it will be up to cabinet to decide whether or not there will be some money for that purpose. I do not know how many aboriginal languages these forms will have to be translated into.

There are concerns about the effect of the provisions on businesses and individuals involved in outfitting and tourism in Northern communities. These are matters best addressed by aboriginal peoples themselves through negotiated agreements with the federal government.

The number of tourists who go through my community are mostly American. They bring in approximately $3 million on an annual basis in a short season that lasts for the months of August and September. That economy will be affected. I do not have the figures applicable for Labrador and the Northwest Territories.

In summary, the solution does not lie in the proposed non-derogation clause. Equally important, the solution does not lie in giving regulatory power to the federal cabinet to determine the precise application of this bill to aboriginal peoples. The solution will be providing some exemptions respecting the use of hunting firearms by aboriginal peoples until the issue of self-government is fully addressed.

Honourable senators, as you can see, we are not disregarding the importance of this bill. We are merely asking honourable senators to recognize the reality on the other side. When I say "the other side," I am talking about people who live in the North and in remote communities. This law is designed for the South and not for remote or isolated communities. While I am talking to you today, I can see where my people are and what they are doing. It is easy for me to say those things but to try to translate those into a reality step by step is almost impossible.

I see an old lady by the shore waiting for the tide to come in and for her husband to return from hunting. Perhaps the old lady is looking after her grandchildren. Her husband, the provider, does not leave her behind without equipping her with tools. One of the tools is a rifle. That tool is necessary when alone in case a bear or a wolf were to come into that camp. Therefore, it is for survival.

One could say that that situation could be taken care of even with the registering of rifles. Maybe so. How many of those people will understand and be able to comply with that law to protect themselves from becoming criminals? If it is simply registration, perhaps we do not have too much of an argument, even though that bothers us because we have to wait.

Let me give another example of what could happen. I am not saying that it will happen, but it could happen. I am getting ready to go out and I have gone down to the beach to my boat, when I realize that I have forgotten something. I look around to see who can help me. I may see someone who might or might not be related to me, but who does not have a certificate and does not have the right to purchase anything. If I ask him to go to the store and pick up something and he gets caught by law enforcement officers on the way to pick it up or on the way back to deliver it to me, he becomes a criminal because he did not do exactly what the law tells him to do.

I could use many examples when carrying my rifles in snowmobiles, canoes or boats. While travelling along I may meet an animal that may endanger my life. Where is my rifle? It is locked up in the sled. I would first have to unlock the sled before I could protect my life. Those are some examples of situations we may face. That is why, if a law is to be made for the north, it has to be made by the North and not imported from the South. Neither do we expect a law for the North to be exported to the South, because it would not work. This is what our people are saying. This is what our Northwest Territories Minister of Justice is saying. This is what oour President, Rosemarie Kuptana, is saying. I know senators will do the honourable thing.

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I rise today after listening carefully to the thoughtful speeches of Senators Carstairs, Ghitter, Lucier and Watt. This is an emotional issue for many of us. I know it is for Senator Watt. It is something that tears at the heart and soul of this man and his people, people in the North and people in remote parts of this country.

Honourable senators, I am a strong proponent of gun control. Those of us who live in a culture and have a background or grew up with guns are all strong proponents of gun control. We would never want to shirk our responsibility in this area, nor would we want our people or our children to do so.

I also support the crime control aspects of Bill C-68. It is very important that we reassess our laws and make certain that those who misuse guns in our society, whether they are handguns or long guns, are brought to justice and face the heaviest of penalties.

Over the last few weeks I have met with people on both sides of the issue. Some have said this is a right-left issue. I do not agree. This is not a question of being left, right, Liberal, Conservative, socialist or non-socialist. This is a question about people and the make-up of this great country.

Manitoba, the area that Senator Carstairs represents, is diverse and beautiful. It is my home province, where I grew up. I grew up in a society similar to that of the Honourable Senator Marchand from the Okanagan. My father was of Métis background. He trapped muskrats and beavers, which is how I managed to pay for my education. I grew up with guns and I have the deepest of respect for them. In the same breath, I can also fully understand those in society who have no idea what guns are all about. Some of those who live in downtown Toronto or Vancouver, who have never had guns, some of whom are my friends, think there should be no guns. I can understand why they believe that. Honourable senators are being asked to understand some of the issues that have been put forward so adeptly by both sides.

Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, Ontario, the Yukon and Northwest Territories will all have problems putting this legislation into effect, if it is passed through this place and receives Royal Assent.

Today I met with Wendy Cukier, head of the Gun Control Coalition. She said it is important that I hear from both sides and from the leaders of those who have taken the issues to task across the country. As Senator Ghitter pointed out, there has been no marked change in violent crimes. As a matter of fact, I believe there has been a reduction.

It behooves me to ask why, from out of nowhere, this legislation has come forward in the manner that it has. I have asked on numerous occasions if there is any documented proof that gun registration will reduce crime. You hear the extremes on both sides, but when it is analyzed, there is nothing documented that would prove this.

New Zealand is a living example. I received a briefing book from Minister Rock, and I thank him for this. The New Zealand issue was brought forward. The briefing book, in discussing this issue, says that the reason the national registration in New Zealand was suspended is that they did not have the technology to run the register. I find it very strange that the Microsofts of this world could not quickly make a program available that would do this task.

We then discussed the rural/urban split, the North, the South and the remote areas. Mainly, I discussed the impact this bill will have on the aboriginal peoples and those who maintain their livelihood from hunting and trapping.

Unfortunately, a vast percentage of our prison population today is aboriginal people. This is a very sad fact that I think we must deal with. I believe that by making it a criminal offence not to register a firearm, this legislation will expose more of these people who have suffered at the hands of each one of us from the South because we failed to understand what we were dealing with. We still do not seem to understand what we are dealing with, whether we are Liberals, Conservatives, New Democrats or whoever; we just do not seem to understand.

The Department of Indian and Northern Affairs, God bless them, most likely had the best intentions from day one, but they have not accomplished what they set out to do. The horrific problems that exist in these communities will be further exacerbated by penalizing these people for failing to register their firearms — something with which they often make their livelihood, something which is part of their life — making them criminals and incarcerating more of them.

I was a police officer for six years in Manitoba and Vancouver. Believe me, there are over-zealous people in all professions. As Senator Watt said, think of the abuse of the system that could arise in the North with people moving around with guns but without the proper locking devices on them, and becoming criminals automatically for failing to register. Honourable senators, let us take some time to think about the impact this bill will have on a people with whom, in the past, we have not been that fair.

In this chamber today we have discussed the aspect of the minister's statement that at one time he felt that only the police and the military should have guns, and only after speaking to some of his colleagues did he change his opinion. I can understand why he would think like that, because many of my friends with whom I play golf in Vancouver and various other places also think like that. However, since he is the minister spearheading this particular initiative, I would hope that he will listen carefully to Senators Ghitter, Watt, Lucier and others as they put their cases forward on this important issue.

We have heard the analogy that registering a gun is like registering a motor vehicle. Colleagues, I can have warehouses full of cars, and I do not need to register them. That analogy was used in the briefing book as well.

Senator Carstairs, I believe, used the analogy of the driver's licence. I can have all the cars in the world and I do not have to register a single one unless I drive it on the highway. If I fail to register a motor vehicle and I drive it on the highway, I do not become a criminal. That is what is so horrific about this legislation. It makes criminals out of people for failing to do something.

Honourable senators, I have listened and I will continue to listen. If it can be proven to me that public safety can be increased and crime reduced, I would look at some form of legislation with greater scrutiny. This past weekend I was in Hamilton. I do not know how correct this is, but the information I was given is that Hamilton has 33 less police officers on the street this year than they had last year as a result of restraints. Possibly the millions of dollars the government will be putting toward gun registration would be better spent on more police, better technology, better equipment, better understanding, and better community policing and training.

I spoke to a young police officer just last night here in Ottawa. Even though he is a great supporter of the government in power today, he agreed with me that this is where the focus should be.

I believe we must look at the technical side of the bill, the constitutionality of it, and whether we can split the bill. Senator Ghitter said that it would be very complex to split the bill, but we should still consider doing so. Senator Ghitter talked about the ugly guy. I am the ugly guy. I look in the mirror but I have never broken it, and I do not intend to do so. I think we should look in the mirror; look at the legal aspect, the parole side, the judicial side of things, and the penal system in general.

Senator Watt did not put it this way, and I do not want to attribute the words directly to him, but I think this is Bay Street, Howe Street and Sherbrooke Street trying to foist their requirements on the little back havens of Main Street. I would hate to think that we might need to go through another National Energy Policy scenario, or high interest scenario, as a result of doing what Toronto, Vancouver and Montreal want.

Senator Watt also referred to the GST debate. He said that should have been step number one. I was not here for that debate, but I understand that it was quite feisty, and very controversial. If it was not possible to make the GST the first step in this side and that side working together for a better, safer and fairer Canada, let us make this the first step.

Honourable senators, you have my commitment that I will listen. I am prepared to learn, but I want fairness, and I want the people of Canada to come out of this debate as the winners. I want to see a country where governments do things for people, not to people.

On motion of Senator St. Germain, debate adjourned.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Honourable Lise Bacon moved that Bill C-41, an act to amend the Criminal Code (sentencing) and other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time.

She said: Honourable senators, the need to reform Canada's sentencing process has been pointed out several times by judges, parliamentarians, partisans of legal reform and members of the legal profession. In fact, for 20 years now, various organizations, one royal commission and the Law Reform Commission of Canada have been calling for this reform.

More recently, in 1987, the Canadian Sentencing Commission issued a report containing several recommendations. Then, in 1988, the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and the Attorney General made recommendations regarding changes to be made regarding sentencing, conditional release and corrections.

Agreeing that reforms were needed, the Liberal Party promised in the election campaign that it would overhaul the sentencing process, a promise it followed up on in its Throne Speech at the opening of the new Parliament.

Bill C-41, which was tabled in the House of Commons on June 13, 1994, received third reading on June 15, 1995. I recommend today that this house approve this bill in principle.

This bill makes history, because it is the first time that the public has expressed its wishes regarding the objective and the principles of sentencing through the parliamentary process. No such statement exists at present in the Criminal Code. Judgments by the courts tend to identify certain broad principles, but these may vary from province to province. Parliament's role to date insofar as sentencing is concerned has been limited to setting maximum penalties for very specific offences.

The changes proposed in this bill have been broadly accepted by criminal justice professionals, by the provinces and by the territories.

Another aspect implicit in the bill is harmonization with federal corrections legislation. The purpose and principles set forth in Bill C-41 are compatible with the Corrections and Correctional Release Act.

I believe that sentencing practices in Canada must consistently reflect the values that Canadians have told us are important to them in the treatment of offenders. Considering the fact that criminal sanctions provide for one of the most serious intrusions by the state into the lives of individuals, it is quite remarkable that no policy statements have been forthcoming from their representatives in Parliament.

Through this bill, Parliament provides the courts with clear guidelines. The bill provides that the purpose of sentencing must be to protect society, to rehabilitate offenders and promote their sense of responsibility, to provide reparations for harm done to victims or to the community, and to deter offenders from repeating.

The bill also defines various sentencing principles. For instance, the sentence must be proportionate to the gravity of the offence and the offenders' degree of responsibility. When appropriate, alternatives must be contemplated, especially in the case of native offenders. The establishment of a statement of the purpose and principles of sentencing has been endorsed by the Canadian Sentencing Commission, the Standing Committee on Justice, the House of Commons and the Law Reform Commission of Canada.

This bill is too vast and too detailed for me to analyze all of its clauses. I would, however, like to stop at those I find particularly important.

The statement of purpose and principles augments the normal sentencing practice of considering extenuating factors.

• (1710)

First, an aggravating circumstance is considered to be the fact of abusing a position of trust or authority in relation to the person. The matter of abusing trust has been covered by many recommendations, along with acts of violence against children, women and other vulnerable persons. Statistics Canada's investigation of violence against women in 1993 revealed that nearly one woman in two had experienced violence by men known to them. The 1984 Badgley committee called for the protection of children from persons they already know and perhaps trust. By including the aggravating circumstance, Parliament has shown it wants criminal law to also protect persons who are vulnerable.

[English]

Proposed section 718.2 is part of a statement of purpose and principles about sentencing that would provide direction to the courts on the fundamental purpose of sentencing: To contribute to the maintenance of a just, peaceful and safe society. Proposed section 718.2 says that when an offence is motivated by hate based on race, national or ethnic origin, language, colour, religion, sex, age, mental or physical disabilities or sexual orientation of the victim, it must be considered an aggravating circumstance by the judge when he or she is determining a sentence.

It should be emphasized that the Crown Attorney must prove that the crime was motivated by bias, prejudice or hate against the victim. This motivation is an additional element that must be proven to the court, and it cannot simply be deemed to exist.

Every person has a right to personal security but the record shows that if you belong to certain groups in our society, you may be less secure than the rest of us.

Crime motivated by hatred against identifiable groups is increasing in Canada. For example, Metro Toronto police have seen a 61 per cent increase in reported hate crimes in that city between 1993 and 1994. B'nai Brith reports that there are now over 40 organized hate groups in Canada. Responding to this growing problem, police forces across the country have established hate crime units devoted exclusively to investigating and acting on hate crimes.

When people are targeted for hate-motivated crime, it is almost always because of the factors identified in proposed section 718.2; namely, race, nationality, colour, religion, sex, age, mental or physical disability or sexual orientation.

The bill recognizes an important societal value. When a crime is motivated by hate, the victim is not limited to those who are directly affected. Hate crimes hurt all members of the group to which the victim belongs by making them feel vulnerable and afraid. The sentences for these crimes must reflect our collective condemnation as a society of crimes not only targeted against individuals, but against groups as a whole.

Indeed, Canadian courts have already recognized the principle that hate motivation should be taken into account in sentencing. Bill C-41 would legislate a principle that now exists in case law and would ensure uniformity across Canada in sentencing practices related to hate-motivated crimes.

Notwithstanding the assertions of some of its critics, there are a number of things that Bill C-41 does not do. The bill does not extend special rights to any one group, nor does it condone or recognize any particular lifestyle. All Canadians are represented in the list of grounds in section 718.2. No one is given special status. Rather, Bill C-41 is an important part of the government's efforts to protect the right of all Canadians to participate fully in the social and economic life of their country.

Some have suggested that there is a need to define sexual orientation, which is one of the listed grounds. The inclusion of the term in the bill does not set a precedent in federal legislation. "Sexual orientation" is not a term that is new to the law. It has in fact been used in Canadian legislation since 1977. For example, it appears in provincial human rights legislation in eight jurisdictions within Canada, including Ontario. Courts and tribunals examining sexual orientation issues have never had difficulty understanding or interpreting the meaning of the term which, as set out in case law, is unambiguous. It does not and could not include criminal acts such as paedophilia, which are clearly described and provided for in the Criminal Code.

Terms are defined in legislation for a purpose, usually to add clarity or to remove confusion. Where there is no confusion, as is clearly the case here, definitions are not justified or required.

Others have questioned why we need to include a list of specific grounds at all. There are two reasons for this. First, the section lists the grounds on which hate crime is almost invariably motivated, based on the facts as we know them at present. It simply makes sense to spell out these characteristics directly. Second, the Supreme Court of Canada has signalled in its decisions concerning hate crimes that if hate-related legislation is not carefully tailored, including identifying the target groups that it is intended to protect, then it could be vulnerable to legal challenges under the Charter for being overly vague. If legislation protecting vulnerable groups is to be preserved and effective, it must spell out the groups it is meant to protect.

The bill does not create a new hate crime or expand existing hate provisions in the law. It would not affect freedom of expression, conscience or association. The provisions of the bill do not and cannot prohibit people from holding beliefs or from talking about them within their churches or communities. Rather, the bill deals with people who commit crimes.

Finally, the bill will have no effect on the issue of same-sex benefits. The issue of same-sex benefits under the Canadian Human Rights Act and the Charter is already before the courts and human rights tribunals. Bill C-41 will in no way change the present state of the law in this area.

Bill C-41 is an important part of the government's efforts to protect the safety and security of all Canadians. Proposed section 718.2 of the bill is exactly what it appears to be — a provision in the Criminal Code intended to guide courts in determining the appropriate sentence for criminal offences.

The bill in no way detracts from the importance Canadians place on strong, healthy families. Rather, it recognizes that families thrive best in an environment where all citizens enjoy the same protection and the same opportunity to contribute to their community.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, we must never neglect the suffering of victims of criminal acts, and the bill paves the way significantly in this regard. The statement of purpose and principles specifically indicates that objectives for sentencing include the provision of reparation for harm done to victims or the community and the promotion of a sense of responsibility in offenders, an acknowledgement of the harm done to victims and the community. This is not all.

The bill also provides that any information provided by the victim is taken into account during the hearings held under section 745 of the Criminal Code. It sets out a new set of measures respecting restitution developed cooperatively by the federal government and our provincial colleagues. There is a priority given to restitution. If a court finds it appropriate to award both a fine and restitution, the priority will go to the victim. Provision is made to ensure that restitution orders can be enforced by civil courts. Finally, the Criminal Code will specifically state that any restitution ordered by a criminal court will not limit a victim's right to sue for damages in the civil court.

At the present time, nearly a third of the people liable to incarceration in provincial jails are in that situation because they did not pay fines, and statistics have shown that natives are the most at risk. The bill tries to remedy this situation as follows. The new provisions state that the court must be convinced that the offender can pay the fine contemplated before imposing it. In case a fine is not imposed because the offender would not be able to pay it, the offender will be liable to other penalties such as probation or community service. Measures are provided in the bill to help provinces collect outstanding fines. Provinces will be able to use the same mechanisms to enforce fines under the Criminal Code as they use for provincial statutes. Provinces will be able to refuse to issue or to renew permits or licences until a fine is paid. Incarceration would be retained only as a final enforcement. Ultimately, these proposals will result in less crowded institutions and should decrease the costs for the system without compromising the effectiveness of criminal justice.

[English]

Honourable senators, I should like to emphasize a new proposal in this bill called a conditional sentence. Where a court imposes a sentence of imprisonment of less than two years and is satisfied that serving the sentence in the community would not endanger the safety of the community, it may order that the offender serve the sentence in the community rather than in an institution. Offenders who do not comply with these conditions can be summoned back to court to explain their behaviour and to demonstrate why they should not be incarcerated. If the court is not satisfied with the offender's explanations, it can order the offender to serve the balance of the sentence in custody. This section is aimed at less serious offenders who would otherwise be in gaol but who could be in the community under tight controls.

This provision would promote protection of the public by seeking to separate more serious offenders from the community while providing less serious offenders with effective community-based alternatives. It also means that scarce funds can be used for incarcerating and treating the more serious offenders.

There is a provision in this bill requiring reasons for sentences, to be given in all cases. This measure will encourage well-reasoned decisions, will assist courts of appeal and will serve an educative function. Giving reasons will assist in making more clear what is intended by the courts and should enable the public to relate what is done in sentencing to the policy approved by Parliament. These changes should help to deal with the confused view of sentencing held by the public as described in the report of the House standing committee and by the Canadian Sentencing Commission. This change should help us to evolve sound government policy in criminal justice with broad, better-informed public support.

[Translation]

All of these proposals are designed to increase public accessibility to the law concerning sentencing, to make it more understandable and to make it more predictable. The bill includes a complete restructuring of Part XXIII of the Code. It brings together most of the provisions relating to sentencing now in the Code and presents them in such a way as to make them more logical and more accessible, both to criminal justice professionals and to the public.

Honourable senators, with this bill and with other initiatives, the government is providing a balanced and comprehensive approach to crime. Sanctions will not solve all our social problems, but the bill will contribute, along with other crime prevention initiatives, to respect for the law and the maintenance of a just, peaceful and safe society. Aspects such as the denunciation of unlawful conduct, deterrence of offenders and other persons and separation of offenders from society, are emphasized in the case of offenders in whose case such sanctions are necessary.

On the other hand, this bill creates an environment which encourages community sanctions, the rehabilitation of offenders, reparation to victims and the community and promoting a sense of accountability. It is not simply by being more harsh that we will achieve more effective criminal justice. Most offenders are not violent, and most offences do not require severe sentences. This bill relies on the strength of our criminal system and our communities and makes the penal system more sensitive to the needs of Canadians. We emphasize the rights but also the responsibilities of individuals. The passage of this bill will represent a significant development in law reform sentencing in Canada. It is a measure of which Parliament may be proud.

On motion of Senator Jessiman, debate adjourned.

CANADA COUNCIL

CLOSURE OF ART BANK—INQUIRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday June 14, 1995:

> That he will call to the attention of the Senate that, for all intents and purposes, artistic and cultural groups unanimously opposed the announced closure of the Art Bank of the Canada Council.

He said: Honourable senators, the Art Bank of the Canada Council is the largest collection of modern visual and media art ever assembled in the history of this country. It must be preserved as a unique heritage. The Bank's programs are authentically Canadian. This time, others are copying us.

In the preface of the blue book entitled "Vers une nouvelle perspective — A design for the future" one can read the following:

> Cultural activities are now an important industry which directly or indirectly accounts for close to half a million jobs—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please!

Senator Corbin: I do not know whether it is because I speak French or talk about the Art Bank.

As I said, in the preface of the blue book of the Canada Council, which is entitled "Vers une nouvelle perspective - A design for the future", one can read the following:

> Cultural activities are now an important industry, which directly or indirectly account for close to half a million jobs. However, our artists and artistic institutions still remain in a precarious situation.

The president of the Canada Council, Donna Scott, and the director, Roch Carrier, announced the decision to end the Canada Council Art Bank program.

In the March 1, 1995 press release, they said:

> From now on, we will distribute the funds through direct assistance to visual and media arts activities and we will call upon recognized professionals of visual and media arts to form a committee which will make recommendations on the future of the Art Bank collection.

I know for a fact that some professionals, and important ones at that, refuse to take part in this burial ceremony.

The announcement of the demise of the Art Bank had the effect of a thunderbolt in the visual arts environment. The press reacted swiftly. The artistic circles showed their indignation and grieving through letters of protest and briefs.

Personally, I would never have imagined that someone would have dared to simply do away with the Bank without first holding real consultations with the parties concerned. There has been no consultation in the real sense of the word. The meetings (I have it from a well-informed source) have been stormy and negative. No one had recommended the closure of the Art Bank. According to the press, the meetings that were held in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver were catastrophic. These were workshops organized hastily. The staff of the Art Bank was never consulted.

How did we get here?

First, a few words about the history of the Art Bank. Three years after its creation, Robert Fulford wrote that...

> ...it is one of the most inspired notions in the history of public cultural patronage.

[English]

> ...one of the most inspired notions in the history of public cultural patronage.

[Translation]

It was Suzanne Rivard Le Moyne, an artist and teacher, who, back in 1971, had the bright idea to create an art bank. Informed people from the Secretary of State, the Canada Council, Treasury Board and the Cabinet then gave their wholehearted support to the project.

In a submission to Treasury Board made on December 30, 1971, it was clearly established that the mandate of the Bank was as follows:

[English]

> Development of a collection of works of art (art bank) for use in federal offices and public buildings on a rental basis... This proposal is made by the Secretary of State Department to complement Treasury Board's guidelines on furniture and furnishing, and will be implemented by the Canada Council.

[Translation]

Furthermore, it is said in this document that the program will not be abolished without consultation with the federal government through the Secretary of State. Today, the Council is telling us that its role is not to decorate the walls of federal buildings. Of course, the Art Bank does more than that. This is to misunderstand the varied effects of the activities of the Art Bank, first of all on the artists themselves, the ones who are the most seriously affected by the Bank's termination.

On May 19, 1972, the Honourable Gérard Pelletier announced the creation of the Art Bank. This was a government decision and Canada Council was, and I quote:

> ... responsible for the implementation and administration of the project.

Clearly, by accepting the innovative and original proposal to create an Art Bank, the government was designating the Canada Council as its representative. The House of Commons, acting in the name of all Canadians, approved the votes necessary for the implementation of the project, as it has done ever since. The bank evolved over the years. It experienced a few minor crises (including an independence crisis), but on average, it grew and enjoyed a great success, according to successive councils and an artistic community generally very happy with the results. There was so little for visual arts, mere peanuts, and now they decide to get rid of something that was running so smoothly!

Honourable senators, I must sadly skip the historical background of the Art Bank for lack of time. However, for those who are interested, I strongly recommend an excellent master's thesis on the Canada Council Art Bank by Mrs. Marianne Hegveitt. See how thick it is!

I also recommend the collection catalogue published for the Art Bank's 20th anniversary, in 1992. I equally recommend the very recent report of the Canada Arts Conference on possible alternatives, published after the shutting down of the Art Bank.

It would be useful to remind senators that all governments since 1971 have supported the Art Bank. As recently as 1992, in April, to be more precise, a new Treasury Board directive on works of art on federal properties became the policy to be followed by federal departments and agencies. This policy, which supports the objectives of the Bank supporting and recognizing Canadian artists, requires that works of art displayed in government buildings be rented from the Art Bank. Loans also have successfully gone beyond federal buildings over the years. The bank is also a very rich source of information and resources for the public, researchers, historians and many others.

We must then ask the question today: By what right can the federal minister decide to abolish this program? Did the current government give him permission to do so? Was the Minister of Heritage "consulted", as was required by the Treasury Board directive? Did he agree to the bank's demise, since he had approved its creation, or must we rely on the statement that he made on May 9, 1995 in the House of Commons, to the effect that, and I quote:

> The Art Bank is the exclusive jurisdiction of the Canada Council. It is for the Council to decide what to do with it. On the other hand, I can tell you that I would be delighted to see some arrangements with the private sector and other stakeholders to ensure the bank's survival.

In light of my earlier statements regarding the willingness of governments to create and maintain the bank, and of the unique role played by the Department of Canadian Heritage, which took over the former Secretary of State's responsibilities for arts and culture, I must tell you that I was flabbergasted to read this in the House of Commons Debates.

Unlike some elected parliamentarians, I am not using this inquiry for partisan purposes. My goal is not to score political points. I am denouncing a laissez-faire, almost iconoclastic policy of indifference, which has been eroding our cultural and artistic institutions for some time in the sometimes dubious hope of achieving petty, sordid savings.

This is not the first time I have had to oppose this kind of decision, since I questioned the National Film Board's actions in the Eastern provinces when I was a member of Parliament. I clearly remember than my friend Jean-Robert Gauthier supported me at the time.

I think along the same lines — which is the line of fire and not necessarily the most popular position — as some of my colleagues across the way who, on June 10, 1993, opposed merging the Canada Council with other human research and science organizations. I remember the commendable gesture by these senators torn between a longstanding loyalty to their party and the defence of an idea, a principle that prevailed in the end: the Honourable Senators Atkins, Chaput-Rolland, Johnson, Macdonald (Halifax) and Marshall voted against the legislation to merge the Canada Council, while three others — the Honourable Senators Carney, Everett and Forrestall — also showed true grit by not voting. I know for a fact that at least one other senator did not even show up for the vote to protest against the bill.

The difference this time is that there is no legislation before the Senate to reverse, or allow the honourable senator to reverse, the decision to shut down the Art Bank.

The situation is nevertheless critical. Time is of the essence, as we say. The council refused to reconsider. It cannot use the arm's length pretext in this case, although it will, because this is a cultural property that belongs to us.

The Art Bank belongs to all Canadians. We must do something. I call upon as many of my colleagues on both sides of this chamber as possible to show their concern.

All it takes is a dozen or half a dozen senators who feel up to meeting the challenge and we could help overturn the decision to abolish the Art Bank. Otherwise, one could rightly point a finger at our indifference and lack of conscience. The fact is that nothing was done in the other place about this. If half a dozen or more senators — the more the better — got together, we could ask that a committee look into this issue and report back to the Senate and government. It is up to us. This is something we can do, with leave of the Senate.

Before closing, let me quote from a few papers, briefs and letters that denounce the closing of the Art Bank.

First of all, I take this opportunity to challenge one of the recommendations made by the Canadian Conference of the Arts' expert advisory committee in its report. It recommended that the Arts Bank not be dismantled but rather continue to exist as a complete collection as an integral part of the Arts Council. In my opinion, the committee should have gone no further, because by adding in the same breath:

> ...that the Council will retain ownership of the collection while at the same time entering into a management and administration contract with one or more non-profit organizations

It has emasculated the first part of its fifth recommendation and weakened the first four.

Apart from this serious flaw, the group of experts has done an excellent job, given the time and means at their disposal, and I congratulate them.

The coalition for the defence of the Montreal Art Bank, which includes artists and their associations, as well as those working to advance the promotion and study of the arts in museums, art centres, exhibition halls, galleries, and universities declared that:

> The Canada Council says it wishes to work with the visual arts community in deciding on the fate of the Art Bank. The coalition takes this at face value and refuses purely and simply to accept the decision to get rid of this exceptional heritage. In particular, it is not happy that the closure was announced without prior consultation with the arts community, as this veritable national contemporary art museum belongs not just to the Canada Council, but to the whole country.

In the May 18, 1995 issue of the Globe and Mail, Bronwyn Drainie wrote:

• (1750)

> ...the council...has made three big mistakes since announcing its new strategic plan in March...it has closed down the Art Bank...indicate(s) a profound misreading of how art and artists are developing in Canada in the mid-nineties and what they need to survive and prosper....the Canada Council decided to axe the entire Art Bank in the name of "getting back to the mandate" and "protecting grants to artists". But what ...is the point of giving grants to artists to create art that doesn't get sold or seen? The federal government, through the Art Bank, was an important purchaser and displayer of Canadian art, and increasingly artists in this country are viewing those functions as just as crucial to their success (if not more) than a B grant every couple of years.

[Translation]

Lilian Rodriguez, who is the president of the association of contemporary art galleries in Montreal, made the following statement in the April 2, 1995, issue of La Presse:

> It is with sadness that we realize that, in 1995, it is still necessary to point out not only the extreme importance of the symbolic and identifying role of culture in our society, but also its obvious usefulness as a tool to gain knowledge and reflect on the world, as well as to promote personal and social development. To seal with one signature ... the fate of Canada's most important contemporary art collection is to spread the idea that Canadian art is not worth collecting.

In the March 2, 1995 issue of Le Devoir, Laurier Lacroix, a museology professor at the Université du Québec in Montreal, is quoted as saying that the decision to dispose of this collection is "rather disastrous".

On March 25, 1995, La Presse printed this huge headline:

The closing of Canada's Art Bank: A catastrophe!

On March 7, a national dispatch from the Canadian Artists' Representation had this title:

[English]

Canada Council Strategic Plan A Disaster for the Visual Arts. Many artists are upset about the total lack of consultation surrounding this decision. The artists, the advisory committee, arts organisations, dealers, section heads and staff were kept in the dark. One can only surmise the "consultation" of last December (1994) with no mention at all of the Art Bank, was more of a farce than it seemed at the time. This decision is being rubber stamped by a Board (which at the time was) only half filled, and lacks (at the time) representation from the visual arts.

That post has since been filled.

I am going beyond my time. I should like the indulgence of honourable senators to continue. I have but a few remaining minutes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is that agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: In a letter sent to the Canada Council director, René Blouin of the Galerie René Blouin, in Montreal, wrote:

Most disturbing however is the way the decision was made ... This organized improvisation...

I do not know how one can organize improvisation but these are the words of René Blouin.

... is confirmation that the impact was not measured...

And there is more.

Vera Frenkel, who, a few years ago, received the prestigious $50,000 Molson award from the Canada Council, wrote this in a letter to the council's director:

[English]

Council is attacking precisely those means by which Canada's visual artists communicate with the public and with each other, and through which their expertise is remunerated and valued.

[Translation]

In a March 27 letter to the Canada Council director, Lynne Cohen, an internationally recognized Ottawa photographer, wrote, and I quote:

[English]

...I did not expect one area of the Canada Council to assume such a large share of them, (cuts) surely some sort of restructuring would have been better than completely closing this important institution.

[Translation]

On April 24, 1995, that same person who, incidentally, is not only a competent photographer, but also a visual arts teacher at the University of Ottawa, wrote this to the same director:

[English]

I have just seen the Canada Council strategic plan...

This is the little blue book to which I referred earlier.

[English]

I have just seen the Canada Council strategic plan ... and am distressed by what I read. I am especially troubled by the suggestion that the system of peer review is to be undermined... I have never participated in a process which could be said to more democratic, fair and efficient.

I could go on for hours, honourable senators. I think you have the gist of the problem and the scope of the disaster for Canada's visual artists in particular and the sense of ridiculous loss for Canadians generally of one of the brightest ideas and the best damn program ever to exist within Canada Council. What a pity. What a tragedy.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I am nearing my conclusion. This time, they have attacked the Art Bank. Before, it was the exploratory program of the Arts Council. They have also hit the NFB and the CBC. Certain ministers, and I will not name any names to avoid embarrassing them because I have nothing against them personally, and, I repeat, I am not after political points because we are simply debating principles; as I was saying, certain ministers have reduced all cultural and artistic activity, at least they perceive it as a cultural industry, to a commercial value to be marketed or even to be exported. I am not opposed to this in principle, but I would like to say that art is much more than this. Capitalism and art have sometimes gotten along well in the past. They continue to do so. Currently, the almighty dollar appears to be king. The artist is taken for a peon.

We have evidently lost all notion of north and south, east and west. We have all but forgotten all of the efforts that this country made over the forty five years following the Massey commission to find its soul and its heritage whose value is priceless. We have demolished without just or justifiable cause the shining successes of our predecessors: the only thing we are proceeding with today are funerals.

We must make haste to stop this bloodletting, this anti-intellectualism. It seems to me that the government should establish an independent commission presided over by a celebrity to review its policy on funding the arts and culture without delay. We are currently in an acute state of crisis. We must act now.

If there is no evidence of any will to do this, in my opinion, the Senate should seriously consider the possibility of thoroughly reviewing the issue and issuing a report as soon as possible. If there is the will to do this, I would be prepared to draft an official motion to this effect after consulting any interested colleagues who may come forward, and I suspect that some of them will.

Honourable senators, I would like to thank you for being so courteous as to grant me an extension of time and for your attention.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is six o'clock. Under the Rules of the Senate I am to leave the Chair and return at eight o'clock. However, if it is your wish that I not see the clock, we can continue.

Is it your wish, honourable senators, that I not see the clock?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I wish to ask the honourable senator if he would accept a question before the debate is adjourned.

Senator Corbin: I would be delighted to attempt to answer the honourable senator's question.

Senator Carney: I do not wish to delay either Senator Kenny's amendments or your dinner, Your Honour, but I, too, am a great supporter of the Art Bank of the Canada Council and have in my Senate office a work of art by a BC artist who is well established, Annie Popperwell. I am told that I cannot renew the lease on this painting. In discussing the matter with the artist this weekend, she has no idea what will happen to her work. It is not clear whether I am allowed to buy it or what will happen to it.

In your deliberations on this issue, will the honourable senator seek to clarify what will happen to the art in the Art Bank of the Canada Council if we are not allowed to continue to lease it. The artist is not allowed to sell it. It is in our interest to support the artist and to keep the art in a public place.

Senator Corbin: I thank Honourable Senator Carney for her question. I think I have some element of an answer for her. Under the arts bank program, artists can purchase back the art originally bought by the Art Bank. Any artist can buy his work back at cost plus a small administrative overhead for the time that the bank has had it. That is one avenue the honourable senator could explore if she likes that work of art so much; namely, contact the artist. I do not believe any one but artists are entitled to purchase from the Art Bank at this time.

I met with the director of the Canada Council last week. He emphatically told me that the council has no intention of reversing its decision. The mandate of the group of professionals that they are putting together to examine the disposal of the Art Bank does not include purchases by the public at this time. However, they may decide to recommend that some of the art that has never been rented be purchased.

I understand that over the years, over 80 per cent of the collection of 17,000 pieces of work has been rented out. The honourable senator is correct in that the lease contract will be allowed to expire. That is the end. Unless the artist purchases that work of art, it will remain in the bank in whatever shape or form it will have in the future, if Parliament does not decide to take this tiger by the tail.

On motion of Senator Roux, debate adjourned.

ALTERNATIVE FUELS FOR NTERNAL COMBUSTION ENGINES BILL

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN COMMONS AMENDMENTS— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Colin Kenny, pursuant to notice of earlier this day, moved:

> That the Senate concur in the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill S-7, to accelerate the use of alternative fuels for motor vehicles, without amendment; and
>
> That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

He said: Honourable senators, it is a happy day for me. I am pleased to see that that happiness is shared.

I want to thank both sides for their assistance with this bill and, in particular, Senator Nolin, who has worked very faithfully to help get the bill through the other place.

The work throughout on this bill was non-partisan. All members of the committee were extremely helpful, and different members of this house have helped me in individual ways for which I am very appreciative. I am conscious of how little one can accomplish by one's self here in Parliament, but it is incredible how much one can get done with the cooperation and the help of one's colleagues.

All of the amendments that came back from the other place were originally recommended by me when I appeared before the committee over there. They are operational in nature and designed to provide managers with the ability to implement the law effectively.

My view is that the role of legislators is to provide general direction and point the way. However, we cannot predict the future with any clarity. We do not know, for example, what changes are likely to come to technology or to the fuels themselves. It is important that managers in the future who are implementing this law have the capacity to manage and to take into account the changes that technology will bring.

If I may, I will briefly go through the amendments that came back so that you might have a better understanding of them.

Clause 2 is the first sheet of paper available.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I rise on a point of order? I am a little surprised at the procedure we are following here. Although it is not a government bill, it is still a bill which goes through the normal procedure. Is it expected that we will discuss the amendments without going to committee? That may be Senator Kenny's idea, but is it the Senate's understanding that this bill will be treated in this most unusual way; namely, that the sponsor of the bill will explain to us the amendments which have been proposed on the government side, and we will dispose of it without any more discussion? In other words, this bill will not go back to committee where it has already spent some time and received serious study from the government ministers involved? I find this extremely unusual and wonder why we are proceeding in this way.

Senator Kenny: Honourable senators, if this seems to be a singularity, it is because not many bills appear to go this way. There seemed to be some possibility that this matter would proceed through the other place. I consulted the Table officers and inquired as to how one handled a bill of this nature. I made a point of asking in particular that I not do it in an unusual or peculiar way.

The procedure that I am following today is precisely the procedure that was outlined to me when I consulted the Table for advice.

Since then, Senator Carney has raised the same concern, and, after meeting with several members of the committee, it is my understanding that she will ask for the adjournment of the debate when I am finished explaining these matters. She will then bring the issue back again tomorrow to continue the debate or to conclude the debate. That was the agreement arrived at with Senator Ghitter and Senator Nolin. It was my understanding that Senator Carney was also a party to that agreement. If I may, I will continue with the explanation.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I want to know whether we are in agreement that we will forego one of the vital steps in the study of legislation, being the committee stage, either a Committee of the Whole or, in this case, the Energy Committee? Are we to simply listen to the explanation, which I am sure will be very convincing, and then tomorrow rapidly pass the legislation?

Why do we want to skip the committee stage? Will we not hear from the minister responsible who influenced what I think is a major change to the original bill? He should explain to us why the government has asked for these amendments, and whether or not they are approved by the sponsor. This is not the bill with the amendments we passed here originally.

Senator Kenny: I am sorry, sir. The government has not asked for these amendments. There is no indication, in fact, of the government asking for them. The amendments that you see here, as I was endeavouring to explain, were proposed by me in my remarks to the committee in the other place. There is a transcript available of that meeting. I put forward these proposals to the committee.

As the honourable senator is aware, the procedure there is such that I could not actually move the amendments, although they did invite me to sit at the table throughout their hearing on the bill. The actual amendments were moved by Mr. Reed in the other place after consultation with me, and upon our agreement on the wording. If you are looking for the person responsible for these amendments, he is standing before you. If you want to hear from the minister, that is another matter, but he is not the originator of what you see here.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Be that as it may, whoever the sponsor of the amendments is, the impact on this bill makes it a far different bill than the one we approved in this house.

Why is it being suggested that we pass a bill as amended, with the amendments changing the nature of the bill drastically, without going through the ordinary process of committee stage?

Senator Kenny: The honourable senator's argument suggests that the bill has been drastically changed. I maintain that the bill has not been changed; it has been clarified.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: This discussion should be held in committee, and not in the full chamber.

Senator Kenny: If I can continue; in my view, the bill has not been significantly changed. It has been clarified, and been rendered more workable, perhaps. There is nothing in these amendments to the bill that significantly or fundamentally changes it, in my view.

If I may, with the indulgence of the chamber, I will continue and describe the amendments. Perhaps senators can judge for themselves if my views are correct.

The amendments that you see on the first page, clause 2, have to do with Crown corporations, and provide the government with the ability to remove Crown corporations after consultation with their board of directors, which would be done in a public manner. There has been, throughout the process, some debate about the Crown corporations and it makes sense to make them part of the bill. This provides some flexibility in that regard.

Clauses 3, 4 and 5 I will deal with together because they all have the same effect. They each have inserted in different parts the words "cost effective and operationally feasible."

It was always the intention that the alternative fuels process be cost effective, and that it not cause extra burden on the Crown. It was always the intention of the legislation that we not force things in a way that would not work. "Operationally feasible" in this instance would mean situations like the availability of fuel or the opportunity of operators to get to the fuel.

Finally, the last set of amendments, clause 6(a) and (b) are virtually identical to what was in the act. Clause 6(c) provides for an opportunity to define cost effectiveness and operational feasibility. Clause 6(d) is a catch-all to provide managers an opportunity to bring in regulations which were not thought of in drafting the bill.

Clause 6(1) is more of the same. It says that the Treasury Board may make such measures as it considers appropriate to give effect to the purpose or any provision of this act. Once again, that is for the purpose of taking care of the unforeseen that we could not anticipate when we were drafting the legislation.

Honourable senators, I really do believe that the changes included here, which I did propose when I was appearing before the committee in the other place, do not significantly change the intent of the legislation. In fact, I do not believe they change the intent at all. They provide the assurance that those who must act upon the legislation will have the ability to do so in an effective way. I do not see any point in passing legislation here that will stymie people down the road where they cannot put it into effect, or where it will cause unwanted effects such as running up costs unduly, or expecting people to use alternative fuel where there is none available in the local area.

I urge honourable senators to support these amendments.

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I wish to respond briefly to these amendments. First, I think we all want to pay tribute to Senator Kenny for his accomplishment in bringing forward a very worthwhile piece of legislation, and accomplishing that rare feat of getting the bill through both Houses of Parliament. As he points out, he could not have done that without the cooperation of his colleagues on the Senate committee and without the cooperation of the other place. We think he has made a major contribution that few senators have the ability to do. Only those of us who have been ministers can perhaps appreciate the thrill it is to actually see a piece of legislation that you sponsored pass through the House. Some of us are still waiting to see some of our pet projects actually get Royal Assent. We pay tribute to Senator Kenny in this regard.

As he points out, this is a rare accomplishment. One problem is that we have very little experience in how to deal with this kind of situation. Senator Kenny has assured me, and I accept it without qualification, that he sought the best advice of the Clerk on how to proceed, and that he followed that advice faithfully.

The dilemma that arises is that, as chair of the Energy Committee, I was unaware that this matter was being brought forward, as were other members of the committee. We had a three-and-a-half hour committee meeting this morning, but we were not advised of this matter. We have really not had an opportunity to explore these amendments to a bill which was passed by our committee.

Further, we are troubled by the fact that our Energy and Environment Committee meeting tomorrow has been usurped, if that is the word, by a Liberal caucus meeting. Since we do wish to see this bill achieve Royal Assent, we must deal with the issue of how we can explore the amendments and their impact on the nature of the bill. For that reason, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Carney, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, June 21, 1995, at 1:30 p.m.

CANADA COUNCIL

CLOSURE OF ART BANK—POSSIBILITY OF REVERSING DECISION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, three years ago, the twentieth anniversary of the Canada Council's Art Bank was celebrated with great enthusiasm. All things considered, the bank was a great success. After 20 years during which it carried out the mandate it was given by the government in 1972, it was assumed that the bank would continue to play a vital role in promoting Canadian visual artists by purchasing and exhibiting their works.

Despite this sucess the Art Bank has been obliterated. Surprise, indignation and disappointment — these were the sentiments expressed by contributing artists, clients, staff, professionals in the arts and culture community and Canadians who care about true Canadian art and culture.

Why close the Art Bank? Why should this jewel of the Canada Council's crown fall victim to the cost-cutter's axe?

As an institution that operated on sound democratic principles, impervious to petty and shameful political patronage, the Art Bank had constantly refined its jury membership and processes.

The twentieth anniversary catalogue of the Art Bank lists 16,172 works by 2,440 artists purchased between September 1972 and April 1992. These works include 2,026 paintings, 912 sculptures, 6,286 graphic works, 2,932 drawings, 1,995 photographs, 18 films,92 videotapes plus textile art, wall sculptures, installations.

During the same 20-year period, the Art Bank spent more than $14 million on purchasing art. In 1995, the value of the collection is estimated at around $30 million.

The Art Bank, its collection, its contributing artists, its high quality services and its revenue-generating rental program — supported by the government, constituted a national treasure. Many works in the collection have appreciated in value to such an extent that their creators, who are permitted to buy back their work, cannot afford to do so.

Why was a decision made to close the Art Bank? Why not display the courage to reverse that decision? We will continue at the next sitting of the Senate, honourable senators.

LA BAIE EN JOIE

CONGRATULATIONS TO DANCING TROUPE

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, this afternoon I would like to pay homage to a group of young Acadian women dancers from La Baie Sainte-Marie, Nova Scotia. The name of the group is La Baie en joie.

Since 1979, under the direction of Anne Marie Comeau, these young women have been the talented ambassadors of Maritime Acadian pride. They all come from the region of Clare in Nova Scotia and have travelled to make Acadia known to Canadians from coast to coast. They have also performed on the international stage in France and Louisiana.

I would also like to point out that they danced as part of the G-7 festivities in Halifax last weekend in a show broadcast by Radio-Canada. These young Acadian women, aged between 13 and 18, are full of talent and charm. Dancing to the lively rhythm of the jig, they use such items as wooden spoons, a fishing net and the Acadian flag to recall their history.

On July 7, a special evening held as part of the festivities of the fortieth anniversary of the Festival acadien de Clare will be organized to draw attention to the tremendous work by Ms Comeau and the vast contribution by these young dancers by highlighting their accomplishments over the past 16 years.

I would like to thank these young Acadians for their contribution to the cultural life and to keeping the Acadian heritage alive in Nova Scotia.

ETHICS OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Marjory LeBreton: Honourable senators, I wish to draw to your attention the whole question of government and cabinet integrity, and the hypocrisy and double standard we have witnessed for the past 19 months. We have the Prime Minister going around the country bragging that in the 18 months he has been Prime Minister, he has not had to fire a minister. That is easy for the Prime Minister to say.

Honourable senators, who has set these standards? Well, of course, the Prime Minister. He has raised the limbo pole to new heights. He has set the standards. He says everything is "A-Okay", and we are expected to accept that unchallenged. The Liberals repeat the mantra, and the media seem not to care. "Aye-aye, Prime Minister, whatever you say."

He names an ethics commissioner answerable only to himself, and not to Parliament as promised in the Red Book. He reprimands backbenchers for voting on principle, another broken Red Book promise, and tolerates indiscretions in his cabinet.

If the same ethical standards were to apply to this government and the Prime Minister as were followed under the previous government, and if the opposition and the media demonstrated just a quarter of their righteous indignation, this is what the situation would be today: The Minister of Heritage would be out of the cabinet; the Ministers of National Revenue and Public Works would be under a serious storm watch; and the Minister of National Defence would have been shuffled down or out because of sheer incompetence.

Honourable senators, I again ask the question I asked in this chamber when I made a speech a few weeks ago: "Wither integrity, Prime Minister?"

HMCS WINNIPEG

COMMISSIONING OF NEW FRIGATE

Hon. Duncan J. Jessiman: Honourable senators, I wish to bring to your attention that on Friday, June 23, 1995, a new Canadian naval frigate will be launched for commission as the HMCS Winnipeg. This will be the second commissioning I have witnessed. The last one was when we commissioned MTB-462 in South Hampton in February 1944.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT BILL, 1995

MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that a message has been received from the House of Commons, which reads as follows:

ORDERED—

That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this House agrees to amendment number 4(a) made by the Senate to Bill C-69, An Act to provide for the establishment of electoral boundary commissions and the readjustment of electoral boundaries, and this House disagrees with amendments numbers 1, 2, 3, 4(b), 4(c), 5, 6, and 7 for the following reasons:

The bill was, in accordance with the new procedures of this House, prepared by a Committee of the House. While amendment number 4(a) corrects an omission, the other amendments address points, each of which were supported by Members representing at least two of the three parties officially recognized in the House. Taken together, the bill represents a balance aimed at improving the responsiveness of the system of readjusting electoral boundaries both to rapid shifts of population and to the operative realities of effective representation of the people, a balance that, in the opinion of this House, requires:

(a) in view of the varied Canadian geography and demography, the retention of a variation of up to 25% from the electoral quota of each province (addressed by amendments number 1 and 6(a));

(b) the avoidance of unnecessary electoral boundary adjustments in provinces where shifts of population do not require them (addressed in amendments number 2, 3, 5, 6(b)(i) and 7);

(c) clear acceptance of the non-partisan status of members of commissions through the provision of parliamentary oversight of appointments (addressed by amendments number 4(b) and 4(c));

(d) the retention of the definition of "community of interest" developed on a non-partisan basis by currently serving elected representatives, through a consensus of all parties, in the House of Commons Standing Committee rather than the substitution of another definition (addressed by amendment number 6(b)(ii)).

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

NINTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the ninth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, which requests that the committee be empowered to incur special expenses pursuant to the Procedural Guidelines for the Financial Operation of the Senate.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate.)

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Oliver, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION—PROPOSED ORDERS ON DIRECTIONS ON DIRECT-TO-HOME SATELLITE DISTRIBUTION AND ON PAY-PER-VIEW TELEVISION PROGRAMMING— REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Donald H. Oliver, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the following report:

Wednesday, June 21, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications has the honour to present its

TENTH REPORT

Your Committee, which was authorized, pursuant to section 8(2) of the Broadcasting Act, to study the Governor in Council Orders issuing directions to the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission with respect to Direct-to-Home Satellite Distribution Undertakings and pay-per-view television programming through Direct-to-Home Satellite Distribution Undertakings, has proceeded with that inquiry, and now presents its final report.

Respectfully submitted,

Donald H. Oliver, Q.C.
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Oliver, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

LIGHTSTATIONS

FINAL REPORT OF AD HOC PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE—TABLED

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the final report of the Ad Hoc Parliamentary Committee on Lightstations.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT BILL, 1995

NOTICE OF MOTION TO CONCUR WITH MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to advise the Senate that later this day, I will move:

> That the Senate do not insist on its amendments 1, 2, 3, 4(b), 4(c), 5, 6 and 7 to Bill C-69, An Act to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions and the readjustment of electoral boundaries to which the House of Commons has disagreed; and
> That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I rise simply to ask for some guidance from the Chair or from honourable senators. A procedural issue arises in accordance with the rather unusual notice of motion — if that is what it is — that has been tabled by my friend the Deputy Leader of the Government. The procedural issue is whether longer notice is required for a motion of that kind. I would like to make some arguments on that matter.

The guidance that I seek from the Chair or from honourable senators is whether you wish to hear me on that matter now or later this day when Senator Graham intends to bring forward his motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: What is the wish of honourable senators, to hear Honourable Senator Murray now or later this day?

An Hon. Senator: Later this day.

• (1350)

The Hon. the Speaker: There could be a problem, however, in having Honourable Senator Graham proceed with the motion if indeed notice is required. When we reach that item, before I call on Senator Graham to proceed, I will call on Honourable Senator Murray to make his point, and then we can decide where to go from there.

Senator Murray: I appreciate the admonition of the Chair on this matter. I did not wish to interrupt Routine Proceedings. With the understanding that Your Honour has stated, we can deal with the matter later.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that we will hear from the Honourable Senator Murray prior to proceeding with the actual motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

CN COMMERCIALIZATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-89, to provide for the continuance of the Canadian National Railway Company under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the issuance and sale of shares of the Company to the public.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO TABLE FINAL REPORT ON FARM SAFETY AND FARM RELATED HEALTH ISSUES

Hon Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday, June 22, 1995, I will move:

> That, notwithstanding usual practices, if the Senate is not sitting when the Final Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is completed on its special study on farm safety and farm related health issues, the Committee shall deposit its Report with the Clerk of the Senate, and said Report shall thereupon be deemed to have been tabled in this Chamber.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PEACEKEEPING IN BOSNIA—STATUS OF TROOPS DETAINED IN VISOKO—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, my question concerns some 550 Canadian peacekeepers in Bosnia who are unfortunately being detained at their base. The Bosnian government troops are refusing to allow Canadians to leave their base. The peacekeepers are surrounded by road blocks, anti-tank weapons, and mines. They are unable to deliver or supply food and water to their fellow Canadian peacekeepers in the three outlying UN observation posts. Delivering humanitarian aid, one of their primary roles in the region, has become somewhat unlikely, if indeed possible at all.

Defence Minister Collenette's response to this situation keeps changing as time progresses. He was first counselling that there was nothing to worry about because Canadians were being fed pizza, and then he became very angry and incensed. Yesterday, he advised the press that the government had demanded and expects an immediate response from the Bosnian government about this intolerable situation.

Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate in a position to bring the members of the Senate up to date on whether the defence minister or the government has received a response to the minister's request? If so, what was the nature of that response?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as Senator Forrestall has stated, all UN forces, not just Canadians, located in Bosnian government-held territory are subject to restrictions. Very vigorous diplomatic action has been taken with the Bosnian government, protesting in the strongest possible terms the intolerable situation and the need for immediate relief.

I am advised that some results have been achieved. A liaison officer from the Bosnian government is now in Camp Visoko to make arrangements to restore freedom of movement, including the resupply of our troops.

I do not have any further details than that, but there has been some movement.

Senator Forrestall: It sounds as though a little bit of progress has been made. I take it that the government is not actively reconsidering Canada's position, on an hour-to-hour basis, with respect to the Canadian troops. Do I understand that we will be content to let the matter take its course for the balance of this day and perhaps into tomorrow?

Senator Fairbairn: To my knowledge, and I spoke to the Minister of National Defence this morning, the Canadian government is holding a constant watching brief and liaison on the development of activity in that area.

As I said, our representations have been very strong and aggressive on the situation. I do not wish to go beyond what I know at this time. I have been advised that some positive results have been achieved, and there is at this point an initiative to restore freedom of movement to the troops and to permit the resupplying of food.

Senator Forrestall: Do I take it that there is no discussion within government or cabinet at this point in time about converting the role of Canadians in Bosnia from peacekeepers and deliverers of humanitarian aid to that of peacemakers?

Senator Fairbairn: At the moment, the preoccupation of the Canadian government is to restore the movement of its peacekeepers.

A number of discussions took place on a wide range of issues in Halifax during the G-7 summit among the leaders of the various countries involved, and Canada was a very active participant in those discussions.

At this point in time, our preoccupation is to deal with the situation at Camp Visoko, and I have been following that situation for the last 24 hours. I will broaden the inquiries for my honourable friend.

• (1400)

PEACEKEEPING IN BOSNIA—ABILITY OF TROOPS TO WITHDRAW FROM VISOKO IF RECALLED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. If the Government of Canada took a decision to withdraw the troops from Bosnia, the same troops we are discussing, would they be free to go? A simple "yes" or "no" would suffice.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot respond to that hypothetical question.

TRANSPORT

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—PROPOSED TOLL BOOTHS IN NOVA SCOTIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gérald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, my question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerns the tolls proposed for the Trans-Canada Highway in Nova Scotia.

The Government of Canada has announced that it will add $49 million to improve New Brunswick's Trans-Canada Highway system. Given that New Brunswick will not need to toll its highways as a result of this new federal money, can the leader confirm whether the same courtesy will be extended to Nova Scotians, and that the mess created by the Minister of Public Works will finally be resolved?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will seek that information for my honourable friend.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

G-7 HALIFAX SUMMIT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF PERTINENT DOCUMENTS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the Leader of the Government on the Halifax G-7 summit.

Would the Leader of the Government undertake to table in the Senate the communiqués that were issued at the conclusion of the summit? Also, could she table a list of the specific proposals that were made to strengthen the Bretton Woods institutions and the United Nations?

While I am on my feet, honourable senators, I wish to compliment the people of Halifax and Nova Scotia for their conduct and for their conspicuous hospitality during the summit proceedings.

The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, Mr. John Major, speaking in the House of Commons on Monday of this week, said:

> The people of Nova Scotia gave the summit a conspicuously warm welcome. This helped to make it a friendly and productive meeting without the over-elaborate formalities that have characterized some previous summits.

That was worthy praise from the British Prime Minister.

Finally, I wish to ask the Leader of the Government to convey to the Prime Minister of Canada our congratulations for his outstanding leadership at the summit in Halifax.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, to answer the last part of Senator MacEachen's question first, I would be very pleased to convey those congratulations to Prime Minister Chrétien.

Senator MacEachen read the comments from one of the G-7 leaders who attended the summit, namely British Prime Minister Major. Indeed, our Prime Minister chose a very fine place to hold this international meeting. The response of Haligonians and Nova Scotians in general did a great deal to set the atmosphere and the tone of those discussions.

I would be pleased to table, as quickly as possible in this house, the communiqués involved at the conclusion of the summit, as well as the Bretton Woods and UN proposals to which Senator MacEachen has referred.

USE OF BOVINE GROWTH HORMONE SOMATOTROPIN— DELAY IN INVESTIGATION OF HUMAN HEALTH RISKS— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I want to raise a question which I think is rather urgent in terms of timing. More than 200 organizations in Canada are now opposing approval of the bovine growth hormone Somatotropin. On June 15, the House of Commons called for an extension of the current moratorium on the use of this hormone at least for two years in order to examine more carefully the human health risks.

One of the reasons for this request is that officials at the drug company which manufactures this drug, Monsanto, and officials at Health Canada and Agriculture Canada were supplying MPs with inaccurate information.

Bovine growth hormone will hurt the dairy industry and many animal and human health issues remain unresolved. The European Union has a moratorium on this drug until the year 2,000.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate use her good offices to support the House of Commons Health Committee and ask the Prime Minister to extend this moratorium? If the Prime Minister's office does not do this before Parliament adjourns, Canadians could easily have unlabelled BGH milk in the stores before fall.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be pleased to pass on Senator Spivak's urgent concerns. This is a matter of urgent concern among a great many people here on Parliament Hill and elsewhere in the country.

Health Canada is continuing its evaluation of rBST for safety and effectiveness. Until this evaluation is completed and a decision has been made, this substance cannot be used legally in Canadian dairy herds, but I will take my honourable friend's specific question on the moratorium to the minister.

Senator Spivak: Did I hear correctly what the Leader of the Government said, namely that this undertaking cannot go forward until Health Canada has completed its evaluation? The information I have is that unless Parliament deals with this matter — that is, in the Prime Minister's office — the project can, indeed, go ahead.

Since the House of Commons committee has suggested that both the drug company and officials at Health Canada and Agriculture Canada were supplying the members of Parliament with inaccurate information, could we have some information on this aspect of the matter relayed to this house?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I will try to get that information for my honourable friend. I will transmit all her questions today, not only to the minister but also to the Prime Minister's office.

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, my question is supplementary to that of Senator Balfour. The Leader of the Government in the Senate has replied that his question is hypothetical. Honourable senators, this is not a hypothetical situation when the lives of our soldiers are at risk.

Men and women who are serving in the Bosnian campaign are truly at risk, if the reports that we are receiving are reliable, which I have no reason to doubt. The lack of world leadership is incredible. In the years of George Bush and Margaret Thatcher, we would have had a decision on this situation. It is incredible how the UN has failed, and failed miserably, in providing direction for the troops who have been asked to serve in this campaign. It is a campaign more than it is a peacekeeping mission.

We have a situation where the Chief of the Defence Staff had one opinion on a particular incident that had occurred, and the Minister of National Defence had another opinion. The Chief of the Defence Staff was overruled, which I am sure truly destroyed the morale in our armed forces and in the military as a whole.

I think the government has a responsibility to let Canadians know exactly what is the position of our government: Could those serving in Bosnia leave or could they not, if they had to do so at this present time — that is, if they were recalled home?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would repeat to Senator St. Germain what I said to Senator Balfour, that this is a hypothetical question which I cannot answer today. I can say to him, and as everyone in this house will agree, that no contribution has been greater or more profound in this troubled area than that of the Canadian peacekeepers.

The government has not stood aside at any point and watched events transpire in Bosnia without being very aggressively involved in the situation in which our peacekeepers find themselves.

My honourable colleague will know that the countries in Europe involved in peacekeeping in that area have been developing contingency plans for some time. Should events result in the question of withdrawal being raised, there are contingency plans, but at this point in time, as I said to Senator Forrestall, we have a situation in Visoko where it is quite clear that Canadian peacekeepers are restricted in their movements. That is clear. Very aggressive and persistent diplomatic efforts at all levels have been fiercely conducted in recent hours and days to break that situation, to restore movement and to bring in supplies to our troops. That is the preoccupation of the government and the ministry right now. That is what the leaders of various countries were involved in last week. There seems to be some movement today. The efforts will continue as strongly as they possibly can.

Senator St. Germain: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. We are looking for some reassurance that there is a plan in place to evacuate these troops in the event it becomes necessary. We have mothers, brothers, fathers, sisters, friends all across this country watching their loved ones being taken hostage, being released, being confined in their movements within the country.

Is there a plan in place? I am not asking for the government to publicly describe the plan, but what comfort can we offer the people who are watching their loved ones in the military being subjected to this inhumane, virtually unheard-of treatment?

Senator Fairbairn: As I have said to Senator St. Germain on other occasions, contingency plans, through the United Nations and our other allies, have been drawn up. Canada is involved in those plans. However, the most important issue at this moment — and it is the methodology by which our 12 peacekeepers were released — is the concerted aggressive pressure of all our allies. That pressure won the release of those 12 peacekeepers and will, I hope, win the removal of the restrictions upon our troops in Camp Visoko and the relay of supplies to them. Every effort possible is being made at every level to secure that situation.

Senator St. Germain: Honourable senators, I have a very short supplementary question.

As Senator Balfour just mentioned, we have secured the release of 12 soldiers, and now they have 300 more. Why are we not taking a decision and showing leadership in either getting out of this thing or solving it?

Honourable senators, Canadians have asked me this question, but I cannot give them an answer because, personally, I cannot see where the leadership stands on this issue. We seem to be flip-flopping at the whims of the parties on the other side of the problem which exists over there, as opposed to showing definitive leadership.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, with respect, I would disagree with the approach Senator St. Germain is taking on this issue. This issue has been debated in the House of Commons. There was a suggestion from Senator Forrestall last week that, as we continue our work in the Senate — and who knows how long that will take — we, too, should take the time to get involved in a discussion on this issue. I am sure that people on both sides of this chamber can arrange that.

The Prime Minister has made clear, as have our allies, that we are still in the former Yugoslavia to help save lives, to help with humanitarian assistance. Discussions are ongoing in the United Nations to strengthen the rapid force requirements in the area. These issues were very much at the core of discussions at the G-7 Summit. This is not a situation where nothing is being done and no preparations are being made.

We believe in this country, as do others, that right now we are still of great value to the civilian population of that area. Our troops must be able to do the job for which they were sent. That is our preoccupation at the moment — to enable our troops to do their work while ongoing discussions continue in the United Nations and among the allies as to the further configuration of the military presence in that area.

CANADIAN HERITAGE

CATALOGUE OF NATIONAL SPORTS EVENTS— FAILURE TO PUBLISH IN FRENCH—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In the next few days, over 7 million Canadians will celebrate a day which has been commemorated for over 1,000 years by francophones the world over, Saint-Jean-Baptiste Day.

There will be no shortage of French Canadians celebrating this day. Unfortunately this year, Canada's political realities will overshadow the event.

Madam Minister, your colleague the Minister of Canadian Heritage admitted yesterday that he had once again failed to do his duty in enforcing the Official Languages Act. He admitted that his department almost allowed the Canadian Sport Administration Centre to publish a guide called Édition estivale du guide du sport canadien in English only.

The authorities of this para-public organization said something that I consider, at the very least, very insulting for French Canadians — that they did not have enough money to publish the French version this year. When your colleague said yesterday in the House of Commons that this was an important issue and that he would deal with it immediately, what exactly did he mean, Madam Minister?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will certainly pass on Senator Nolin's question.

On the question of the guide that was issued solely in English, every senator in this house knows that that is not acceptable. Guidelines for contributions to national organizations clearly stipulate the responsibility of recipient organizations to make available in both official languages any documents for the general public relating to their activities, programs and projects.

The Canadian Sport and Fitness Administration Centre is bound by these conditions and should have produced this documentation in both official languages. Undoubtedly, my colleague in the House of Commons is looking into this matter. I will put Senator Nolin's specific question to my colleague, but this is not something that is in any way condoned by the government. The guidelines are clear and the guidelines should and will be followed.

[Translation]

Senator Nolin: Honourable senators, I almost agree the leader. However, the problem can be stated as follows: the minister in question is responsible for both the Official Languages Act and the organization which publishes the guide. The minister gave it the grant and there were others who received similar grants. Are we to be subjected to these kinds of insults all this year, as all of the para-public organizations whose grants have been reduced attempt to publish their documents in English only?

[English]

• (1420)

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I can only repeat to my honourable colleague that the policy is clear. The guidelines are clear. It is the policy of this government that they will be respected.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

CUTS IN DEPARTMENTAL BUDGET—DEMISE OF WINNIPEG FRESHWATER SCIENCE TEAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Janis Johnson: Honourable senators, I was troubled today when I read, in a report by the Honourable Charles Caccia, about the budget cuts which will affect the government's commitment to the environment. It points to the fact that the government is not living up to its environmental promises as stated in the Red Book.

Of particular concern to me is a cut-back in the area of freshwater science. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans is facing a three-year, 70-per-cent reduction target for freshwater science. Two freshwater research teams in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans will be affected by these cuts. One of them is the Freshwater Institute, located in my home city of Winnipeg. That institute is slated for a considerable reduction.

The work carried out by the institute in Winnipeg is of crucial importance. In a recent Winnipeg Free Press article it is stated:

> The main focus of the Winnipeg team is experimental manipulation of small lakes to study long-term, whole lake responses to human stresses.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate find out from the minister just what the plans are for continuing this work in the area of freshwater science in Canada? Where is the commitment by the government in this area?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be pleased to do so, both with regard to the question of freshwater science and its specific application to the Freshwater Institute in Winnipeg.

MEMORANDUM OF UNDERSTANDING TO TRANSFER FRESHWATER SCIENCE TEAMS TO DEPARTMENT OF ENVIRONMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Janis Johnson: Honourable senators, the article to which I referred also states that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister of the Environment signed a memorandum of understanding to facilitate the transfer of the two biological teams affected by the cuts to the Department of the Environment. However, no action has been taken.

When the Leader of the Government is seeking out information regarding my last question, would she also determine whether or not this transfer is still being considered? If this MOU was signed by the ministers, why has nothing happened to date? I would appreciate some information on this subject, which is critical to my province.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I will do that, honourable senators.

ENVIRONMENT

CHANGES TO WEATHER REPORTING SERVICE ADVERSELY AFFECTING RURAL AND ISOLATED AREAS— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, as is the case in other parts of the country, Ottawa has been experiencing a heatwave in the last week or so.

It has been brought to my attention that Environment Canada has changed its weather reporting services to the Canadian public. There is now a 1-800 number which Canadians can call to obtain superficial weather forecasts. I say "superficial" because we all know that the forecasts can change from moment to moment. If further information is wished, one has to dial a 1-900 number, to which a cost is attached.

Weather forecasting services are essential for people living in isolated rural areas. In rural areas people travel long distances to go to schools, to pick up vital supplies and to go to their jobs. This measure means that Canadians will be precluded from free access to this weather forecasting service. They will be required to pay a fee to ensure their own security and survival in rural and isolated areas.

Can the Leader of the Government tell me why the government has taken what I believe to be a thoughtless approach to the safety of citizens? What kind of monitoring and analysis is being put forward? I remind honourable senators that, soon, it will be minus 30 and not plus 30.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Andreychuk has asked some detailed questions. I would be pleased to check with my colleagues to obtain a complete and proper answer.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

POINT OF ORDER BY SENATOR CORBIN—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, on June 13, 1995, the Honourable Senator Corbin rose on a point of order concerning a motion passed by the Senate on May 25, authorizing the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders to act jointly with the House of Commons Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs with regard to its examination of the rules and practices governing the operation of joint committees. Senator Corbin was wondering if this was the proper procedure to set up joint committees with the other place.

[English]

On June 15, the Chair of the Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders Committee, the Honourable Senator Robertson, expanded upon the background of this issue, explaining that the arrangement with the corresponding committee in the other place was to be informal. As Senator Robertson said in her letter to Mr. Milliken from which she quoted:

> ...that, as opposed to a formal joint study by our two committees, perhaps this study could best be handled by creating an informal working group of Senators and Members of the House of Commons representing both Committees which could review these matters and report back.

Senator Robertson stated that she agreed with Senator Corbin, that if the study was to be a formal one, the normal procedure should be followed, namely, that there should be a motion of the Senate authorizing such a study and ordering that a message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that they join with the Senate in that particular study.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, it seems to the Chair that this issue has been settled. Since, for the moment, the rules and operation of joint committees are to be examined by an informal parliamentary task force with no official status, I cannot see what I could do. Given that no rule or practice of the Senate was breached, I cannot follow up on this point of order. I wish to thank the honourable senators, both Senator Corbin and Senator Robertson, however, for bringing this issue to the attention of the Senate.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT BILL, 1995

MOTION TO CONCUR WITH MESSAGE FROM COMMONS— VOTE DEFERRED ON MOTION TO ADJOURN DEBATE

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would ask that Motion No. 28 be now called.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if we to proceed to Motion No. 28, which is how we began this afternoon's sitting, it has been agreed that the Honourable Senator Murray will speak first.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, the procedural issue which is raised here is whether a motion such as that outlined and presented by the Deputy Leader of the Government requires rather longer notice than the — I was going to say the "ersatz" — notice he gave earlier this day. It is rather unusual that he would give notice of a motion for "later this day".

I intend to divide my representations to the Chair into two parts. In the first part, I will present some precedents from the previous Parliament and the present Parliament for the situation with which we are now faced. In the second part, I will focus briefly on the rules which I think apply to this situation.

First, with regard to precedents: On September 2, 1987, in the previous Parliament, a message was received from the House of Commons disagreeing with certain amendments which the Senate had made to Bill C-22, an act to amend the Patent Act.

In answer to the question from the Chair, "When shall this message be taken into consideration?" I moved that it be done "now". At that point, Senator MacEachen and I engaged in a brief, not very vigorous and not very conclusive argument as to whether notice was required.

Senator MacEachen made the point that he thought such a motion as I was contemplating was a substantive motion which required 24 hours' notice. I was able to resurrect one precedent from the year previous in which we had moved immediately to deal with such a motion. Senator Frith said, however, that his recollection was that the government had asked for, and received, leave before proceeding.

In any case, there was no ruling from the Chair. Speaker Charbonneau said that he had not been asked for a ruling, and would not give one, but he did put the motion which, I suppose, implicitly suggests that the motion to proceed at once was not out of order.

An identical situation arose on November 17, 1987, when we received a message from the House of Commons disagreeing with certain amendments we had made to Bill C-22, an act to amend the Patent Act. In answer to the question from the Chair, "When shall this message be taken into consideration?" I said "Now" and then presented a motion along the lines of that which Senator Graham is presenting today. Indeed, we proceeded to deal with the motion at once. Hansard does not report that I asked for or received leave. The indication is that no objection was raised to proceeding at once.

I recognize that I am presenting precedents against my case, but I might as well put them on the record.

Further, on May 18, 1988, a message was received from the House of Commons relating to Bill C-60, an act to amend the Copyright Act, et cetera. In answer to the question, "When shall this message be taken into consideration?" some honourable senators said, "Now". There was then a motion presented by Senator Doyle, which was debated for a very few minutes, followed by an adjournment of the debate proposed by Senator Sinclair.

On July 13, 1988, we received a message from the House of Commons relating to Bill C-84, an act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976, et cetera. In answer to the question, "When shall this message be taken into consideration?" Senator Nurgitz moved a motion, but asked to have it stand in his name until the next sitting of the Senate.

Similarly, on May 16, 1989, in response to a message from the House of Commons disagreeing with certain amendments we had made to Bill C-14, Senator Doody moved that the Senate not insist on its amendments. Senator Stewart did not object to this, but rather, proceeded to debate it.

Those precedents, honourable senators, indicate that there was no objection to proceeding immediately, in identical circumstances, to the kind of motion which Senator Graham has presented today.

On the other side of the argument, on February 4, 1988, a message was received from the House of Commons relating to Bill C-84, an act to amend the Immigration Act and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, et cetera. Senator Doody then moved that the message be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

On July 19, 1988, a message from the House of Commons was received concerning Bill C-103, an act to increase opportunity for economic development in Atlantic Canada, et cetera. In answer to the question from the Chair, "When shall this message be taken into consideration?" Senator Doody replied, "With leave, now", indicating that leave was necessary in order to proceed at once with such a motion.

In this Parliament, we have two precedents. The first is of June 9, 1994, when a message was received from the House of Commons disagreeing with one of our amendments to Bill C-18, an act to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act. Immediately, Senator Fairbairn, the Leader of the Government, gave notice that on Tuesday next she would move that the Senate concur in the amendment made by the House of Commons.

The second precedent is from October 4, 1994. On that day, we received a message from the House of Commons concerning Bill C-22, the Pearson International Airport agreements bill. Whereupon, on the same day, Senator Fairbairn gave notice that tomorrow, Wednesday, October 5, 1994, she would move that the Senate not insist on its amendments, indicating that 24 hours' notice was required for such a motion.

Honourable senators and Your Honour, I readily acknowledge that the precedents are mixed on the question of how much notice is required for such a motion. Therefore, I hope and expect that Your Honour will derive more comfort, if that is the appropriate word, from a close examination of the rules which I think apply in this situation.

The rules which apply to notice for motions are rules 57, 58 and 59. Rule 57 lists the motions for which two days' notice is required. There is no reference to a motion to insist or not to insist on amendments which have been rejected by the House of Commons.

Rule 58 lists the motions for which one day's notice is required. There again, there is no reference to a situation in which the Senate is insisting or not insisting on amendments which had been rejected by the House of Commons.

Rule 59 lists the motions for which notice is not required. There again, there is no explicit reference to the situation in which we now find ourselves.

There are listed, under rule 59, motions for which no notice is required. Rule 59(8) reads:

> Consideration forthwith or at a future sitting of Commons amendments to a public bill.

With regard to that matter, I do not believe that covers the situation which we are in this afternoon. I think it is clear that the "public bill" referred to in rule 59(8) is a Senate public bill.

• (1440)

That would cover exactly the situation we were in yesterday afternoon when Senator Kenny's Bill S-7 was returned from the House of Commons with certain amendments, and we moved immediately to deal with a motion on the matter.

Where do we seek guidance on this matter? I suggest that the most persuasive argument is to be found under rule 58(1) which states:

> One day's notice shall be given of any of the following motions:

I draw the attention of honourable senators to 58(1)(i), which states:

> for the making of a substantive motion;

—which I think this is. Indeed, I can do no better than to quote the statement of the Honourable Senator MacEachen in 1987 when he stated, "This is more than an amendment to a bill. This is a message from the House of Commons which is manifestly substantive because it is asking the Senate to take a significant step."

Our situation is covered by rule 58(1)(i), "for the making of a substantive motion". If it is not, I suggest, then, that rule 58(1)(j) applies. Rule 58(1)(j) requires one day's notice of a motion:

> for any purpose to which neither rule 57 nor rule 59 applies.

There you have it, honourable senators. The precedents are mixed. There may be others which honourable senators have been able to find. The rules that cover the situation are clear enough to warrant a ruling that one day's notice is actually required to proceed with a motion of this type.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): As all honourable senators know, I am not yet in the "expert" category with respect to the rules and proceedings of this chamber. However, I would like to make a few observations.

The first observation is that from the number of rules, sections and subsections covered by Senator Murray, we are not clearly covered in a situation of this type under the new rules that were introduced by the other side when they were in government. The rules of this place are silent with specific reference to this particular case.

I took careful note of the nine precedents that were cited by Senator Murray. If I heard him correctly, on only one occasion did Senator Doody ask for leave when he was the Deputy Leader of the Government. That was on July 9, 1988, dealing with Bill C-103 respecting ACOA.

However, on other occasions, leave was either not sought or demanded. I presume that those who asked that the bill or the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting wanted to do so because they were either not ready or because there was plenty of time to do so.

I want to make specific reference to one of the precedents cited by Senator Murray. That is the one of May 16, 1989, Appropriation Bill No. 1. The Senate received from the House of Commons a message disagreeing with an amendment made by the Senate to Bill C-14, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1990. The message was read by the Speaker, who then asked, "Honourable senators, when shall this message be taken into consideration?"

Senator Doody, the Deputy Leader of the Government, rose and stated, without leave and forthwith:

> Honourable senators, I move:
>
> That the Senate do not insist on its amendment to the Bill C-14, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending 31st March, 1990, to which the House of Commons has disagreed.

Following which, Senator Stewart began the ensuing debate which covered some 20 pages in the Hansard of that day.

I remember the debate very well. I was in the chamber and I can remember crystal clear that I was sitting on that side and Senator Murray was sitting next to Senator Doody and later participated in the debate.

The critical point is that Senator Doody moved his motion without seeking leave. As I mentioned, he moved his motion without seeking unanimous consent and, in all probability, Senator Murray was sitting squarely behind him, in front of him and beside him. I say that because the record shows that Senator Murray participated in the debate which ensued.

Honourable senators, we have a clear precedent established by the former government and the leadership in the Senate at that time, Senators Murray and Doody. It is a precedent that provides that no notice is required to deal with a message from the House of Commons expressing disagreement with amendments made by the Senate to a piece of government legislation. It is a precedent for the situation in which we now find ourselves with respect to Bill C-69. This precedent is a clear and unequivocal indication of Senate practice.

Honourable senators, we have this clear precedent: no notice is required to deal with a message from the House of Commons expressing disagreement with amendments made by the Senate to a government bill.

I would also like to point out that if this procedure was entirely satisfactory and acceptable and employed by members opposite when they formed a government, surely they do not wish to reverse themselves by arguing that the procedure is proper only when advanced by a Progressive Conservative administration. It was good enough for Senator Murray and Senator Doody and his colleagues in 1989, surely it is good enough for them today.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I wish to add a few words to the debate on this interesting procedural question.

Parliamentarians make a distinction between a substantive motion and an ancillary motion. A substantive motion is one which, if adopted, will stand on its own; it is independent. A motion in amendment is not a substantive motion; it could not stand without the body of the motion which it proposes to change. I believe that that deals with Senator Murray's contention that we ought to have a look at rule 58(1)(i), which would require one day's notice for the making of a substantive motion.

Then there are ancillary motions. Ancillary motions refer to the motions put in the process as a bill moves forward through either the House of Commons or a comparable legislative body.

For practical purposes, the second reading motion is assumed to be the beginning. That is when you really get down to it. Once the second reading motion has taken place, all the other motions are ancillary motions. They are part of the follow–up process.

That distinction is helpful to us in understanding our rules. The motion that Senator Graham tells us he will move is an ancillary motion. It comes under rule 59(8), which states:

> Consideration forthwith or at a future sitting of Commons amendments to a public bill.

That, I submit, is not a substantive motion. It does not stand on its own. It is not independent. It is part of the legislative process.

Senator Murray has been most helpful in adducing the various precedents he has brought forward. They show that our practice has been very mixed. I suppose the explanation is that, for a long time, the Senate did not send amendments over to the House of Commons. When the Senate came alive and started sending amendments, we were not fussy as to precisely how we dealt with the messages that came back from the House of Commons.

At a certain point, honourable senators, something happened. Some members of the Senate decided that we had to clean up our procedure. Consequently, not so long ago, a new set of rules were brought forward. The effect of those rules is to make many of the practices to which we adhered history and not very helpful to us as guidance today.

I do not know if there are cases where the Senate has not followed the interpretation of the new rules in the way I am suggesting they ought to be followed. If there are such cases, I suppose it is a hangover from the bad old days before we got the rules.

By way of conclusion, I would argue that what we will have if Senator Graham goes ahead and moves his motion, which he says he intends to move, is an ancillary motion. It is part of the legislative process. It is not a substantive motion. Rule 59(8) applies, as Senator Graham's motion requires no notice.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): In your ruling, Your Honour, I know that you will differentiate between precedents which have been quoted under the old rules and precedents which have been quoted under the new rules. There is a substantial difference in what we are working under now and what we tried to work under in the old rules. The old rules were casual and eventually became unworkable, but our new rules are more comparable to those of the other chamber. The question is whether rule 58(1)(i) applies here because we have before us a substantive motion, one which stands on its own. In our estimation, rule 58(1)(i) should apply. It is a question of whether rule 58(1)(i) existed in the old rules.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Do other honourable senators wish to participate in this debate before I proceed to rule? If not, I am prepared to rule at this time.

Honourable senators, I have listened carefully to the presentations. I thank all honourable senators who joined in the discussion.

As Senator Murray has clearly pointed out, our rules are silent on the specific point of how to deal with messages from the House of Commons. Senator Murray pointed out a number of precedents, and there are precedents for and against. It would not be wise to conduct our practices based on the numbers on either side. I propose, therefore, to take a logical look at the rules and their purpose.

Before I do that, however, I wish to deal with the question of substantive motions. I refer honourable senators to rule 4(7)(e) of the Rules of the Senate. It states:

> "Substantive motion" means an independent motion, neither incidental to nor relating to a proceeding or order of the day already before the Senate;

The Senate has before it a proceeding or an order of the day in the form of a message from the House of Commons. The message is before us. Hence, the motion now is not a substantive motion.

Honourable senators will understand that "substantive" does not mean "important" here. Obviously the subject is important, but the meaning of "substantive" in this instance is "standing by itself". The motion we may hear from Senator Graham hangs on the message; hence, it is part of the proceeding.

Therefore, I rule that rule 58(1)(i) does not apply.

What is the purpose of giving notice? The purpose of giving notice is to enable honourable senators to know what is coming so that they can have an opportunity to prepare. Why else would there be notice? They must have an opportunity to get themselves ready for the discussion. It is not meant to delay the work of the Senate. It is simply meant to bring order.

Honourable senators, I refer you to rule 59(8). It states:

> Notice is not required for:
>

In other words, no notice is required to deal immediately with amendments to a public bill from the House of Commons. No notice is required at all.

What are we dealing with here? We are dealing with amendments the Senate passed some weeks ago. They are not new amendments. The subject–matter is well known to the Senate. We are prepared, under our rules, to deal immediately with new amendments coming from the House of Commons. Therefore, it does not appear logical that we should insist on notice to deal with amendments which are from this house in the first place.

Honourable senators, I rule the motion in order.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move:

That the Senate do not insist on its amendments 1, 2, 3, 4(b), 4(c), 5, 6 and 7 to Bill C-69, An Act to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions and the readjustment of electoral boundaries, to which the House of Commons has disagreed; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

• (1500)

Hon. Sharon Carstairs: Honourable senators, I rise today to urge you to accept the message that has been sent to us by the House of Commons and to support Bill C-69 in its present form.

Following the passage of Bill C-18, the government fulfilled its obligations to bring forward substantial improvements to the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act. These improvements were devised in a unique way by the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs, in most cases with all-party consensus. The end result is a bill which would give Canadians a more open, more transparent and more effective process of readjusting electoral boundaries.

We have already debated the contents of Bill C-69, both here in this chamber and in committee, and I will not go over that ground again. Rather, I should like to explain to honourable senators why they should accept the message from the House of Commons with respect to the Senate's proposed amendments to Bill C-69.

It is no great shock to us that these amendments are being returned to us. When we proposed these particular amendments at the committee stage, we were informed that the government looked favourably upon amendment number 4(a) but did not look favourably on the others. As was our right, we sent the amendments to the House of Commons anyway, asking them to give the matter some sober second thought.

Indeed, honourable members, they did acknowledge their oversight in not ensuring that the legislation contained a clause stating that all members of boundary commissions must be resident in the province for which the commission was established. They have accepted that amendment. I believe that even if the bill had not been amended in this way, the Speaker of the House of Commons would never appoint someone to a boundary commission of a province if that person did not live in that province. However, it is always wise to dot the "i's" and cross the "t's", and that is what is happening in their acceptance of this particular amendment.

However, the House of Commons has indicated that it cannot accept the other amendments that this chamber has proposed because they believe that those amendments would repeal the most innovative sections which have been carefully drafted, each of which were supported by at least two of the parties represented at the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs. These amendments would thus upset the balance which had been carefully struck by the standing committee in approving the system for the readjustment of electoral boundaries. Accordingly, the House disagrees with amendments 1 and 6(a), which would reduce the maximum deviation from the electoral quota for a province from 25 per cent to 15 per cent.

The Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs spent considerable time on this issue. On balance, it concluded that the extremes in the geography and demography of our country more than justify the variance at 25 per cent. The members of that committee believed that that figure reflected the legitimate concerns with the need for flexibility in drawing boundaries in order to respond to the needs of the people whom they will represent, particularly with respect to rural ridings, Northern ridings, and remote ridings.

It should be noted that a similar provision withstood the scrutiny of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Carter case, and is now contained in the legislation of at least two provinces, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and perhaps others.

The House of Commons also disagrees with amendments 2, 3, 5, 6(b)(i), and 7, which would repeal the provisions that would avoid unnecessary electoral boundary adjustments in provinces where shifts in population do not require them.

The Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs was concerned with unnecessary changes being made to ridings in provinces where there has been little or no change in population — in other words, a boundary review just for the sake of a boundary review, and without a real purpose. The standing committee was aware of the frustration on the part of citizens and municipalities who quite frankly find the readjustment of ridings and provinces with only minor shifts of population an unwarranted act.

The standing committee devised a safeguard allowing for the establishment of a commission at the discretion of the Chief Electoral Officer and the Speaker of the House of Commons in a province where the population in some ridings falls just short of the 25 per cent threshold which would trigger such a boundary review. They felt that that was adequate protection for those particular provinces, and I agree.

Should the Senate insist on making these amendments, redistributions would automatically take place in every province. This would negate the anticipated savings of $1.1 million which would result from not holding redistributions in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and P.E.I. under Bill C-69.

Amendment 6(b)(i) would eliminate the provision that a commission will only recommend changes to existing ridings where the factors set out in clause 19(2)(b) warrant them.

The Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs was concerned with unnecessary changes being made to existing ridings. They noted that boundary commissions are not infallible. The standing committee was given examples of strange changes being made to ridings without any basis in demography, geography, or community interest, and I think we can all point to constituencies that had boundary changes that reflected no real change.

Clause 19(2)(c) simply seeks to ensure that ridings are changed in conformity with the criteria set out at clause 19 which, in turn, reflect Justice McLachlin's comments in the Carter case.

The House of Commons also did not accept amendments 4(b) and 4(c) which would eliminate the provision of parliamentary oversight for appointments to electoral boundaries commissions. The Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs had legitimate concerns with the possibility of partisan appointments to commissions, or at least the appearance of partisanship in the absence of any checks and balances. They believe that their provision provides for a safeguard which fits in the overall scheme of an open and transparent process for appointments as set out in the bill.

Finally, the House disagreed with amendment 6(b)(ii) which would redefine "community of interest" by incorporating the definition recommended by the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing. This amendment was recommended by the former director of research for the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing.

The Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs carefully developed its definition of "community of interest" on a non-partisan basis and with all-party consensus. In so doing, it culled material from several sources, including the Royal Commission's recommendation.

Honourable senators, Bill C-69 is an important achievement under the new rules which authorize committees to draft legislation. We are already acquainted with the improvements which Bill C-69 would bring about if adopted in accordance with the message from the House of Commons. Many of the provisions which would be affected if the Senate insists on making the proposed amendments were devised and agreed upon by all parties represented on the standing committee, and based on their research and the views of their witnesses.

I ask, therefore, that you carefully weigh whether, in your opinion, you should insist on making these amendments against the considered recommendation of the House of Commons. Adopting Bill C-69 would ensure, I believe, that a more open, more effective, and indeed a more efficient process for readjusting electoral boundaries is in place in time for the next general election in this country.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I have a few words to demonstrate to you the importance of this bill moving forward at this time. I thought it wise to speak now in case it was the intention of anyone on the other side, or on this side, to adjourn the debate. Our time is very limited and both sides have understood those time limitations all along.

As we consider the message that we have received from the House of Commons on the Senate's amendments to Bill C-69, we should appreciate exactly why we are being asked to deal with this matter on such short notice. Part of the answer lies in what occurred in the House of Commons, but an even bigger part lies in what happened in this chamber last month.

The House of Commons passed Bill C-69 on Tuesday, April 25. The Senate was adjourned that week, so we did not receive the legislation till Tuesday, May 2. Pursuant to an understanding reached earlier by all parties, the Senate gave first and second reading to the bill and then referred it to our Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs that same day, namely May 2, 1995.

Everyone understood that time was a precious commodity as far as this legislation was concerned. In her speech on May 2, Senator Carstairs described how, under Bill C-18, the previous bill, the suspension of the current electoral boundaries commissions would end on June 22. In his remarks, Senator Murray acknowledged that "there are time pressures associated with the bill".

Notwithstanding these "time pressures", it cannot be said that the committee consideration of the bill moved forward with any sense of urgency or speed. It was nine days before the committee held its first meeting on, Thursday, May 11, when it heard from Mr. Peter Milliken, Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons.

The committee waited a full week before it met again to hear from Mr. Kingsley, the Chief Electoral Officer, on Thursday, May 18. A full 11 days elapsed before the committee again convened on Bill C-69.

On Monday, May 29, it heard from Professors John Courtney, Ronald Fritz and Peter Aucoin. At the end of that meeting, Senator Murray announced that he was considering moving some amendments to the legislation, but that he needed time both to draft them and to consult with his caucus colleagues. He suggested that the committee be reconvened in one week, namely, Monday, June 5, but that he would try to accommodate an earlier schedule with a meeting as early as Thursday, June 1, if all went well. In any event, Monday was the date he was most seriously considering.

Senator Murray assured all the members of the committee that it was not his desire to hold up the bill and that "there are time constraints with regard to this legislation which I think we all understand". He also stated that:

> If there are amendments, you will still be in a position, I believe, to report the bill on Monday night when the Senate meets.

We all know that none of that took place.

The committee was informed, through its clerk, that Mr. Peter Milliken was available to appear before it on Thursday, if Senator Murray wished to move ahead with his amendments on that day. That offer was not taken up, but copies of the amendments were circulated late that week by Senator Murray.

The committee met on Monday, June 5, with Mr. Milliken before it as the only witness. He went through the proposed amendments and explained why they were not viewed favourably by the government. However, instead of moving the amendments at the end of the meeting, as we had been expecting and certainly led to believe, Senator Murray added a new wrinkle to the story. He offered to move the amendments only if the government members on the committee, as well as Senator Prud'homme, gave assurances that the amended bill would be waived through the Senate. Senator Murray said:

> I would be willing to move the amendments, but there would be no point in it unless the government were willing, and Senator Prud'homme was willing, to give leave to waive the usual notices, let the amendments go through and then they would be in the hands of the House of Commons to decide as of tonight or tomorrow. But I do not think you are prepared to adopt that position at the moment.

I ask all honourable colleagues to contrast this statement with what Senator Murray told the committee one week earlier, on May 29. He said:

> If there are amendments, you will still be in a position, I believe, to report the bill on Monday night when the Senate meets.

Monday, June 5 came and amendments were proposed, but Senator Murray refused to move them. The committee did not report the bill, and the Senate, when it met later that day, had no report to consider. Senator Murray had suddenly added a condition to his proposal, a condition that he had declined to mention while providing his comforting words of assurance to the committee members on May 29 when he said:

> If we do have amendments, I would want the government to have maximum time to consider them and decide what to do about them before the clock runs out.

That provision of "maximum time" was now conditional on a proposal that he did not put forward until the dying moments of the committee meeting. In fact, it was a proposal he made only after suggesting, at the conclusion of Mr. Milliken's testimony, that the committee adjourn. The proposal was never advanced by Senator Murray to any Liberal senators, including the leadership, at any time before those final moments of that meeting.

The committee adjourned and met again on Thursday, June 8. By then, timing had become a truly critical issue. The government agreed to waive notices and allow an amended bill to be passed by the Senate, on division, if the committee reported on that day. That was done. With the leave of all senators from both parties, and Senator Prud'homme, a message was sent to the House of Commons on Thursday, June 8, informing that chamber that Bill C-69, as amended, had been passed by the Senate.

Those three days between Monday, June 5 and Thursday, June 8 loom very large as we deal with the matter before us. Those three days represent the difference between what Senator Murray said he would do on May 29 and what he actually did on June 5. They represent the difference between giving the government adequate opportunity to deal with the amendments and forcing it to the wire.

In the House of Commons, the government moved expeditiously. On Tuesday, June 13, they gave notice of a motion responding to the Senate's message on Bill C-69. On Wednesday, June 14, that motion was moved and debate began. An amendment to the motion was proposed by a member of the Reform Party and debate was adjourned as the sitting concluded.

On the following day, Thursday, June 15, after debate resumed, another Reform Party member moved a subamendment. When that was put to a vote, a recorded division was requested, and then a deferral of that division was asked for by the whip of the official opposition. The Speaker ordered the division be deferred until 11:30 p.m. on Monday, June 19. This meant no debate could take place on the motion for the rest of Thursday and during the next two sitting days — Friday and Monday. Almost three full days of House time that could have been used to deal with the motion on Bill C-69 were lost because of the deferral of this vote.

On Monday night, the vote on the subamendment was held; and on Tuesday, June 20, the House of Commons devoted the entire day to dealing with the motion responding to our message. That motion was adopted on Tuesday evening at 11:30.

There can be no doubt that the House of Commons has dealt as expeditiously as it could with our message on Bill C-69. It received our message on June 8 and sent a message in response 12 days later. This is only two days more than the time between Senator Murray said he wished to move amendments, and the day he actually did so.

We now have the message from the House of Commons before us. That message contains the response of both the government and the House of Commons to the amendments adopted by the Senate at Senator Murray's urging. The only question remaining is whether the Senate will deal with that response on a substantive level, or whether it will insist upon strict procedure.

If this bill is to become legislation before the end of the suspension to June 22 provided by Bill C-18, it must have Royal Assent this evening.

All parties know the nature of the bill, the time constraints, and the fact that the government is opposed to all but one of the amendments, which was accepted. All senators now have the opportunity to decide the fate of the bill on its substance or on the simple failure of the Senate to give consent to its disposition.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I am completely mystified by the involved and convoluted account that my honourable friend has just placed on the record concerning the legislative history of this bill. What on earth is he trying to prove? There should have been no misunderstanding and, until this very moment, I had no reason to believe there was even the slightest misunderstanding about what I and my colleagues on this side were trying to do.

I was trying to follow a practice we followed on a number of occasions when the Conservative government was in a minority position and while I was its leader in this place. On a number of occasions, amendments to a government bill were brought forward by a committee. Rather than debate such amendments at length, rather than take up time with votes or deferred votes, as Leader of the Government, I indicated that, while we on the government side disagreed with the amendments proposed by the majority in this place, we would expedite their passage to the House of Commons so that the majority in the House of Commons would have the maximum time to consider and deal with the amendments.

The problem with this bill arose, frankly, when the Senate did not sit during one fairly crucial week.

Be that as it may, I suggested that we follow the same procedure which I have just outlined. I believe it was on a Friday that I informally advised senators that we had some amendments in mind, and I undertook to provide copies of those amendments in advance to honourable senators opposite as soon as they were drafted. The drafting was completed later that morning and I saw to it that my friends opposite had copies of the amendments, even before they were shown to my colleagues on this side as a whole.

When I say the amendments were delivered into the hands of my honourable friends on the government side, I am not referring to Senator Stanbury who, as I recall, was not a party to any of these discussions.

The Senate met on the following Monday. I was prepared to move the amendments, pass them through the committee, and bring them into the evening sitting when Senator Beaudoin would be given leave to present his report. The report could then be debated and the amendments sent off to the House of Commons for their consideration.

It was indicated to me, through the usual channels, that my friends opposite were not interested in such a proposal, for whatever reason. I did not pursue it.

In any event, Mr. Milliken came at the first opportunity. He was well prepared for my amendments because they were already in the hands of the government. He answered our questions and I then formally proposed the amendments. Later that day the amendments were sent, with leave, to the House of Commons.

What happened next is that four days were lost. My friends opposite agreed on the Thursday to the same proposal I had made to them for the Monday. That decision was in their hands.

I would need to read all of Senator Stanbury's comments to answer them in detail, but that is the essence of what we were trying to accomplish. The Senate lost four days by not being in a position to deal with the matter.

Honourable senators, on two occasions in this chamber and for some time in the committee, you have listened to me on the subject of this bill with considerable patience. I will not impose on your patience for long. Let me only say that this is a terrible bill. The only rationale for this bill is that a handful of rookie backbenchers in the House of Commons on the Liberal side did not like the maps that were drawn up by an independent arm's-length commission following the 1991 census. They have therefore moved to have those maps torn up; to have new commissions appointed for the same census of 1991; and to spend $6 million or more to draw up new maps on top of the $5.8 million, I am advised by Senator Lynch-Staunton, which has already been spent on the work that the present commissions have completed. That is the only justification. Thus does the government, thus does the House of Commons, seek to manipulate a process which has served this country well for more than 30 years.

This is, perhaps, not quite relevant but I cannot forbear to mention that, if a Tory government, at any time over the previous nine years, had dared to bring in a bill of this kind, there would have been a firestorm in the media and in opposition political circles, but that is another question.

If there are some improvements to the process contained in this bill, they could well wait for the next redistribution.

Honourable senators, a message has been sent back to us, for whatever reason. I cannot comment on how the House of Commons conducts its business or how the government organizes the business of the House of Commons. The bill comes back to us with the clock ticking and we are told to pass it now. Honourable senators, this is no way to do business.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by Senator Robertson, that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): I wonder, honourable senators, do you want to have the vote now?

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, pursuant to rule 67(1), after a standing vote has been requested, pursuant to rule 65(3), either whip may request that a standing vote be deferred as provided below. Rule 67(2) states:

> Except as provided in section (3) or as otherwise provided in these rules, when a vote has been deferred, pursuant to section (1), it shall stand deferred until 5:30 o'clock p.m. on the next day the Senate sits.

I so request.

Vote deferred on motion to adjourn debate.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION BILL, 1995

THIRD READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Graham, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rizzuto, for the third reading of Bill C-76, to implement certain provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 27, 1995.

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, I will deal with two aspects of Bill C-76: first, the elimination of jobs in the public service and the related administrative process, second, the transfer payments made to the provinces.

Honourable senators, I will make five comments regarding the budget cuts affecting the public service. First, I notice that, with this bill, the right of workers to negotiate working conditions no longer exists.

Second, it seems that some 45,000 jobs will be eliminated, or about 20 per cent of the total number for the public service. However, that 20 per cent is not the result of cuts made throughout the public service. Rather, it affects specific sectors. Consequently, the government is proposing a voluntary early retirement scheme, but only for those affected, and not for the public service as a whole. I will come back to this issue.

Third, nobody knows what the net effect will be on the budget. During the hearings, we asked how much the severance packages would cost, for example, because we know that people who leave the public service always get packages. We were not able to obtain these figures, but obviously, there will be costs involved.

Secondly, labour costs. We have seen that, as the public service shrank, the amount of money spent on contract work has increased. At the end of this exercise, who knows what the budgetary situation will be.

Why is this measure not coupled with an interdepartmental management plan whereby the surplus staff from one department could apply for positions at another department where people want to leave of their own accord? The Professional Institution of the Public Service, for example, has presented us with the case of two electrical engineers, where the one working for the Department of Transport is declared surplus and the one at Public Works decides to take an early retirement, leaving a position open. Currently, there is no way to coordinate and cancel things out between departments.

Treasury Board told us that it gave responsibility for budget and staff cuts to departments individually. I believe that this makes no sense. This is an inhumane way to treat people. When people want to work for a department where other people are prepared to leave their positions, it would seem to me that it should not be difficult to offer those people transfers, especially when they have the same professions.

I am not talking about replacing an economist with a sociologist. I am talking about economists in two different departments. The current policy makes no sense to me. I would ask the minister responsible for the public service, the President of the Treasury Board, to look into this situation. In provinces where they went through similar exercises, they managed to deal with these situations. It is feasible.

There is also a fourth element. There are statutory restrictions that apply after employees leave the public service. If these restrictions are too specific, at some point it will be impossible for a public servant in Ottawa to earn a living, because the federal public service is the largest employer in the area. If we impose restrictions after the employee leaves the public service, he will never be able to find another job in the area. For instance, he will not be able to work on contract for a company, because the company may deal with the government.

There are a number of situations that do not make sense. The minister should take a long, hard look at this. There is a way to deal with this on a housekeeping basis. There is a way to change certain rules. It is feasible. It was done in the case of Bill C–29, in 1991 or 1992. When the government decided to legislate changes in the terms of employment of employees, in turn it agreed to negotiate with its employees on a formula for early retirement. I will stop here.

As far as transfers to the provinces are concerned, we see that a simple budget speech has brought about profound changes in two areas.

First, the government is redefining and redesigning Canada's social policy, a very broad term which includes health care policy, social services and issues connected with post–secondary education. All this is being changed using the budget as a kind of decree.

Second, at the same time the government is making crucial changes in how the federation is financed. This is a serious matter. Without discussions with the provinces this is very serious, because Mr. Axworthy goes around the country, holding meetings and doing studies. He wants changes, consults with everybody and has meetings. The Minister of Finance meets people across the country. In the end, all we know is there have been some crucial changes in the way the federation is financed. As honourable senators know, $87 billion is involved.

Furthermore, social policy is profoundly changed. However, in the area of social policy, the criteria on health policy remain unchanged. I have the bill before me, which provides that the public administration, comprehensiveness, universality, portability and accessibility of the health care system will be maintained. These are fine words. This aspect will remain unchanged. At the same time, the resources given to the provinces to put the system into effect will be cut. I say to you that we cannot go on indefinitely saying we are cutting transfers and maintaining criteria. Things are going to happen at the provincial level to make this unacceptable.

Also, the government talks about increasing the flexibility of the provinces with the Canada Social Transfer. This is the new system. At the same time, contributions to the provinces are being cut. So on the one hand, the government cuts contributions, on the other, it says candidly that the provinces will have more flexibility, and yet we know there were no federal standards on post-secondary education and there were no federal standards either on social assistance. So, I do not see how flexibility can be increased with resources cut. This is not a responsible way to talk in a budget speech. In 1993, at the time of the Mazankowski budget, transfer payments to the provinces amounted to $36 billion.

In 1997-98, according to the minister's budget, the figure will probably be $25 billion. This amounts to $11 billion less on a debt that is reducing, because it is expected to reach $25 billion in 1998. This means that more than half the deficit reduction in the next four years will come from cuts to social programs. I contend, and it is well known that I am not the greatest social democrat on this side of the house, but I contend that this is a lot. It is too much, as a matter of fact.

This cannot be called budgetary discipline. The federal government is being very paternalistic and is dumping the matter onto provincial shoulders.

This amounts to cutting the ground out from under Mr. Axworthy in the area of social policy, and it will be very difficult for him to meet the provinces in good faith to reach an agreement with them as the bill provides. According to it, he will invite representatives of all the provinces to consult and work together to develop, through mutual consent, a set of shared principles and objectives on social policy. I wish him good luck.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Motions:

Hon. John B. Stewart, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 58(1)(a), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon, today, Wednesday, June 21, 1994, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Wednesday being the day many of our committees sit, we normally try to adjourn at 3:00 in order that committees can sit at 3:15. Today is very unusual in that only one committee, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, scheduled an in camera meeting to continue drafting its report. Therefore, no other committee is being inconvenienced by our prolonged sitting. We understand the concern and anxiety of the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee to get on with the business of that committee.

At the same time, we have much legislation before us at the present time and we are anxious to proceed. It is fortunate that we have that opportunity today since other committees are not sitting.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The other fortunate situation, honourable senators, is that we have a very cooperative opposition in this chamber. We are happy to move this legislation forward and to accommodate Senator Stewart and his committee.

Motion agreed to.

THIRD READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Graham, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rizzuto, for the third reading of Bill C-76, to implement certain provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 27, 1995.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I ask your indulgence in that I have already spoken on this bill twice in this chamber. I rise to draw attention to an outcome of the budget with regard to my home province of Manitoba. Senator Johnson raised this matter during Question Period and it has been referred to in the press and in an address last week to the Canadian Federation of Biological Sciences in Saskatoon.

I refer to the 70-per-cent budgetary withdrawal — one can scarcely say "cut" — in freshwater research in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans over this and the next two fiscal years. In concrete terms, this means that the staff of the Freshwater Institute of the Fisheries Research Board at the University of Manitoba and its world-renowned Experimental Lakes Area observatory will dwindle from 64 to 16. Decades of research on 46 pristine lakes in northwestern Ontario which serve as a living laboratory will evaporate. It will mean that a counterpart team at the Canada Centre for Inland Waters will shrink from 35 to 11. It will mean the impoverishment of Canada's capacity to address the freshwater fisheries and environmental and public health problems which both research groups have addressed so successfully for decades, to their own and Canada's great credit.

To use a cultural analogy, the evaporation of federal support for freshwater science is tantamount to closing 70 per cent of the National Gallery of Canada, not merely losing Harbour Front. In sports terms, it would be as if Canada had decided that it could no longer afford to send 70 per cent of a hockey team to compete in the Winter Olympics; just a goalie and two forwards.

This is not hyperbole. Even a brief review of what these research groups have accomplished can convince anyone. Their successes include setting the scientific basis and laying out the policy options for: control of phosphate pollution of the Great Lakes, which success was recorded in the State of the Environment Report — phosphorous concentration by the mid-1980s was less than half its level in the mid-1970s, before the control — control of acid rain in North America; the ecosystem approach to environmental management; environmental health controls on PCBs, mercury, insecticides, lead, dioxins and other persistent toxic chemicals which affect the 60 million people living around the area of the Great Lakes, including some senators opposite.

The work of the Burlington team at the Canada Centre was recognized in 1986 when Richard Vollenweider was awarded the prestigious Tyler Prize for his research on the causes and control of eutrophication. Rhodes scholar David Schindler, who created the ELA research team in northwestern Ontario, also convinced politicians in both Canada and the U.S. to take action against phosphate contamination of fresh water. A very graphic aerial photograph of a whole-lake experiment at the ELA — half of the lake blooming with algae caused by phosphates — effectively settled the political argument. That photograph has been reproduced in 400 textbooks.

Dr. Schindler's work on the impact of acid rain and other pollutants has taken him to Washington several times to appear before congressional committees. It also won for him, and for Canada, the first-ever awarded Stockholm Water Prize in 1991 — the equivalent of a Nobel Prize in his field.

It is the ELA's 25-year record of data, its long-term research on the biological impact of climate change, and its work on flooding of wetlands for hydro–electric projects which makes it a national treasure; in fact, an international treasure.

When Bo Krantz, Secretary General of the Stockholm Water Foundation, visited the ELA campsite he reported back:

> There is no other experiment or project of this length and magnitude going on anywhere in the world. It must be of infinite value to any limnologist to be able to draw on the data base from full-scale experiments that have been collected during almost a quarter of a century. ... The ELA has brought Canada to the forefront of water science.

To Mr. Krantz, the continuation of the ELA work was not only a question of national concern, "it has wide international and, for that matter, intercontinental impact."

Not only have the Stockholm Water Foundation and past politicians found the ELA work invaluable; last year, while the Department of Fisheries and Oceans spent $2.2 million to operate the camp and its science program, universities throughout North America and other government departments and agencies used it to conduct projects valued at $4.6 million. AECL, Hydro Quebec, Manitoba Hydro and Columbia University's prestigious Lamont-Doherty Geological Institute have all asked scientists to work at the ELA.

Why would the Department of Fisheries and Oceans abandon a research group that has produced so many practical solutions and brought Canada such prestige? The truth is that it is abandoning even more than this. Late last year, to meet budget cut targets, it decided to become an "oceans only" department. It wants to hand over to the provinces and territories the responsibility for habitat management under the Fisheries Act, a responsibility which properly belongs to the federal government under section 91 of the Constitution.

It wants Environment Canada to be solely responsible for freshwater research and aspects of the administration of the Fisheries Act. It even wants the Government of Ontario to be responsible for certain international obligations, such as sea lamprey control on the Great Lakes.

Neither the provinces nor Environment Canada has picked up those responsibilities, because the Department of Fisheries and Oceans does not want to hand over enough money to sustain them. It wanted Environment Canada to assume freshwater research, including research at the ELA, for only 30 per cent of its 1993 level of support of those programs. Naturally, Environment Canada has balked and so the Department of Fisheries and Oceans has begun its 70-per-cent reduction plan. This is unconscionable.

The Fisheries Act is, without question, the most powerful piece of environmental legislation in federal statutes today. It gives the Minister of Fisheries power to intervene when dams, pulp mills or logging practices threaten fish habitat. With this budget the government is abandoning the scientific base to interventions and preparing to leave derelict the enforcement of the Fisheries Act in freshwater. With this budget it is preparing to abandon the best living laboratory in the world that could explore and solve other freshwater problems and that could give us the best ecosystem hard data on how climate change is affecting our natural world, all in the name of minor budgetary gain.

At the very least, the two ministers who have made public pronouncements on the importance of fish habitat on climate change and on biodiversity should sit down and resolve their budgetary dispute. That is the least the government can do. They should proceed beyond the memorandum of understanding drafted last fall, allow for a transfer of the ELA program to Environment Canada and give it the funds to continue its work.

At the same time, the government must not abrogate its constitutional responsibility for freshwater fish habitat. In offloading it to the provinces and territories, the government would gut the most powerful environmental law at its disposal.

The more we know about this budget the more we see how corrosive it is. It is eating away the country, its social safety net that I spoke of earlier, its support of a healthy agricultural community in Western Canada. Now we see that it is eating away the government's own best defence against environmental degradation and the science to protect our invaluable freshwater resource.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I wish to draw your attention to an omission in Bill C-76. I am not sure whether it was a sin of commission or omission.

I am sure that all honourable senators have received a copy of a letter from the Royal Canadian Legion addressed to the Right Honourable Prime Minister on March 31, 1995. I can best and most briefly summarize the situation by reading two or three paragraphs from that letter, which states:

> Several areas of the 1995 budget will impose hardships and in some cases even intolerable affronts to the dignity and debt of gratitude owed to our veterans. One area arises with respect to the proposed changes to the Last Post Fund eligibility criteria and associated benefits. The Last Post Fund is a scheme to provide burial and associated assistance to veterans. The introduction of a new means test with a combined estate exemption based on family income and the reduction of the newly combined total exemption by more than 50 per cent (to $12,015) puts the estate exemption at an amount that is far below any poverty level. Furthermore it is clearly inequitable in that in the case of a married spouse all financial resources will now be considered in the figure of $12,015, the new proposed estate exemption, while in the case of a single veteran who holds finances jointly with another person that other person's assets will not be considered. The existing exemption is already inadequate but represents the minimum that should be retained.
> If this and other new regulations affecting the Last Post Fund are implemented as proposed, the original intent of giving a veteran a frugal but dignified funeral and honourable burial with an appropriate marker on the grave, will be lost to the shame of our country.
>
> Over the years needy veterans have been able to rely on the legitimate expectation that neither they nor their survivors would have to worry about an undue burden in respect to provision of a decent burial. Accordingly, these individuals have been able to make financial plans to take this into account. Now, at their eleventh hour they are to have this legitimate expectation frustrated at a point where they no longer have the time or the flexibility in their lives to plan around this unexpected and unwarranted change.

Copies of this letter were sent to the Honourable David Collenette, Minister of National Defence and Veterans Affairs, the Honourable Lawrence MacAulay, Secretary of State (Veterans) and Mr. David Nicholson, Deputy Minister of Veterans Affairs Canada. To date, the Legion has not received a reply.

The Estimates state that the recommendations require legislative or regulatory changes. These are currently under consideration.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate or the sponsor tell us what state these proposed changes are in, and if any consideration is being given to meeting the reasonable request of the Royal Canadian Legion? I would be delighted to have a reply from either the Leader of the Government or the Deputy Leader of the Government.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

COMPLAINT ON TRANSLATION OF SPEECH

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise to complain with regard to the translation of the speech I made in the Senate yesterday afternoon on the Art Bank of the Canada Council. The English translation leaves a lot to be desired. I do not intend to take any more time of the house today, but I have also heard complaints about translations from English to French.

This cannot be allowed to continue. Our statements are sometimes distorted to a point beyond recognition. I do not know who does the translation. It certainly is rushed. It is not done with an intelligent understanding of the original text, and I protest as loudly as I can in the hope that this incompetence will end. It is unbecoming to the status of the Senate to have such poorly done work which then forms part of the permanent record of the Senate. I am really flabbergasted!

VETERANS REVIEW AND APPEAL BOARD BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Anne C. Cools moved the third reading of Bill C-67, to establish the Veterans Review and Appeal Board, to amend the Pension Act, to make consequential amendments to other Acts and to repeal the Veterans Appeal Board Act.

She said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to speak today at third reading of Bill C-67. Bill C-67 is a bold initiative by our government to reform the system of delivering veteran's pensions. It is an effort to respond to time considerations in the interest of that group of Canadians, the veterans of Canada, for whom time is short.

• (1600)

In 1939, Canada declared war. This declaration came on September 9, 1939 in the form of parliamentary approval of the Speech from the Throne. In the Throne Speech of the special war session of the Eighteenth Parliament here in this Senate chamber on September 7, 1939, his Excellency Governor General Lord Tweedsmuir said:

> ... all efforts to maintain the peace of Europe have failed. The United Kingdom, in honouring pledges given as a means of avoiding hostilities, has become engaged in war with Germany. You have been summoned at the earliest moment in order that the government may seek authority for the measures necessary for the defence of Canada,...
> I need not speak of the extreme gravity of this hour...The people of Canada are facing the crisis with the same fortitude that today supports the peoples of the United Kingdom and other of the nations of the British Commonwealth. My Ministers are convinced that Canada is prepared to unite in a national effort to defend the utmost liberties and institutions which are a common heritage.

Canada was in a state of war.

Canada did indeed respond to the crisis with fortitude, as the history of the period recounts. Our forces did not shrink from their task. Several times in this century, tens of thousands of men and women from across this country volunteered to fight with our allies. In addition to our forces overseas, countless other Canadians contributed here at home, supplying the war effort and caring for the wounded. Those who served us so proudly and so well at war are now in need of our great attention. C.P. Stacey described the characteristics of some of these young men who went off to faraway lands to fight and, for many, to die, as follows:

> Sound sure and intelligent command at all levels; competent and painstaking staff work; expert and energetic support by the technical arms and the services; and, above all, consistently resolute and skilful fighting...

They served us well. We, in turn, must endeavour to serve them well in the later years of their lives.

This year, nearly 148,000 veterans and their dependents will receive over $1 billion in disability pensions from Veterans Affairs Canada. This represents Canada's resolute commitment to our veterans, a commitment of which we are all very proud. These figures are indeed impressive; however, they conceal some serious inadequacies in the system which delivers these benefits to our veterans.

Currently, there is a backlog of some 13,000 applications for disability pensions. The processing time required for a veteran to receive a pension can be anywhere from 18 months to two and a half years. Today the average age of veterans is 73 years. The current system is clearly inadequate. It is a large, bureaucratically complex system that is simply too slow. Many veterans have died before knowing if they qualified for a pension.

The current process dates back to 1971. Individual segments of the pension process have been studied and changed since that time. However, there had been no real systematic approach to the overall process until now. The result is that an already complex process has become even more burdened.

The measures contained in Bill C-67 will simplify, shorten, and streamline the process from start to finish. Some of the proposed changes in Bill C-67 include: the making of first-level decisions by the Department of Veterans Affairs; the reduction in the number of individual organizations dealing with disability pensions from four to two; the dedication of the Bureau of Pensions Advocates to appeal preparation; and the merging of the Canadian Pensions Commission and the Veterans Appeal Board into one administrative tribunal renamed the "Veterans Review and Appeal Board". This new board will still have two levels of appeal.

This government is making a commitment to reduce by half the processing time required for a veteran to receive a decision on a pension application. I emphasize that veterans will continue to have access to a two-level appeal process and legal advice where necessary.

Bill C-67 has been before Parliament for over six months. The proposals contained therein have been thoroughly examined and considered in the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. In the subcommittee proceedings, the Secretary of State and his officials ably responded to senators' and witnesses' concerns. The government sincerely believes that Bill C-67 will be of great benefit to veterans. Our veterans have waited long enough.

I am convinced that the department is committed to reducing processing times by half. To this effect, the Secretary of State (Veterans), Mr. Lawrence MacAuley, and his deputy minister, Mr. David Nicholson, have assured the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs that the department will continually attempt to reduce processing times and is committed to the continued facilitation of the process for veterans. Veteran's organizations have responded to this positively. Mr. Clifford Chadderton of the National Council of Veteran Associations assured us that his organization will continue their watch on the department's treatment of these matters.

I should like to take this opportunity to commend Secretary of State MacAuley and the Department of Veterans Affairs for their efforts in the planning and execution of these changes that will be made under the new system. That turn-around times will be reduced from the current 18 months to 9 months is an enormous undertaking and one which has been planned with a clarity of vision. When the Secretary of State appeared before the subcommittee, he and his deputy minister laid emphasis on the thoroughness of the department's planning. Our subcommittee was assured that all the necessary administrative changes to the system had been planned for and were ready to be put in place.

Secretary of State MacAuley further assured the subcommittee that, in the making of appointments to the Veterans Review and Appeal Board, due attention and care would be paid to continuity, experience, and qualifications.

Support for the initiative to shorten the time process has been noted among veterans' organizations. The subcommittee heard from representatives of the Royal Canadian Legion, the National Council of Veteran Associations, the Canadian Merchant Navy Association, and the Army, Navy and Air Force Veterans in Canada, to name a few.

Many veterans expressed a deep satisfaction about the existence of the Senate subcommittee and noted that this subcommittee is the only committee in the Parliament of Canada devoted exclusively to veterans' issues, needs, and concerns. They praised the existence of the subcommittee throughout its hearings and urged its continued life.

Bill C-67 is a timely response, given the increasing health needs and agedness of our veterans.

Over the years, the Senate subcommittee has had an impact on government policy under the chairmanship of Senator Lorne Bonnell and Senator Jack Marshall. Senator Jack Marshall, himself a veteran of World War II and one of the Senate's great veterans' protectors, chaired the subcommittee in the late 1980s and 1990s. The 1994 report Keeping the Faith — into the Future examined the future direction of the Department of Veterans Affairs and made 53 recommendations, many of which are answered in Bill C-67.

Senator Orville Phillips, another World War II veteran from Bomber Command, currently chairman of our subcommittee, guided us through our thorough deliberations on Bill C-67. I thank Senator Phillips for his leadership in our examination of this bill. His knowledge of these issues is comprehensive. His concern for the veterans is consistent and persuasive, as is his devotion to seeing these aging veterans well served.

At this point, I should also like to mention Senators Jessiman and MacDonald. These two senators are also veterans. All these senator veterans are themselves among the thousands of young men who volunteered to join the war effort. These senators' insights and experiences as veterans added a completeness to the subcommittee's considerations. They have been most sensitive to the urgent needs of our veterans.

Senator Bonnell, the Chair of the Standing Senate Committee of Social Affairs, Science and Technology, also deserves special thanks. Though not a veteran, he certainly has the heart of one. Senator Bonnell was responsible for the creation of the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs in the early 1980s.

I should like to add a personal mention of certain veterans who are unknown to members of this chamber. I am speaking of some West Indian veterans, that is, British West Indians. These veterans, both black and white men, were recruited and screened in the West Indies for service in the Canadian Forces. They included at least 150 from my birth place of Barbados. I have personal knowledge of some of them, some of whom were friends of my family. These Barbadian men, these British West Indians, most of whom became Canadian citizens, fought for Canada in the air and on land, and on the beaches of Normandy and in Sicily.

Honourable senators, I will conclude by reading two stanzas from Lawrence Binyon's poem, For the Fallen — to be exact, the third and fourth stanzas. It is the fourth stanza from which the act of remembrance is taken. I read:

> They went with songs to the battle, they were young,
> Straight of limb, true of eye, steady and aglow.
> They were staunch to the end against odds uncounted,
> They fell with their faces to the foe.

> They shall grow not old, as we that are left grow old:
> Age shall not weary them, nor the years condemn.
> At the going down of the sun and in the morning
> We will remember them.

"We will remember them" are words that most Canadians have heard, considered and contemplated this past year.

Honourable senators, the best way for us to remember our veterans is to serve them as well as we can in the last years of their lives. Bill C-67 strives to do this. I urge all senators to agree to pass this bill before us.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Cools for her remarks and also for her participation and attendance in the committee hearings.

The committee had two major concerns. One was the appointment of the membership of the new Veterans Appeal Board. Senator Cools has mentioned that the Secretary of State (Veterans) gave the committee the assurance that at least the majority of the appointments to the new board will have experience. It would defeat the whole purpose of Bill C-67 if we brought in an entirely new board who would take two to two and one-half years to become qualified in handling appeals.

Honourable senators, the other matter that was of great concern to a number of us, myself included, was the fact that pension advocates are no longer available on the first application. I readily admit that they are not needed in every case. If someone walks in who has lost an eye, a hand or something of that nature, it should be obvious. There should be no delay in granting a pension of this nature.

The suggestion is that they should not be necessary for simpler cases. Then the thought occurs to me, "Surely, 50 years later, the simple cases have all been settled." If there are any "simple cases" that are unsettled, then we have been neglectful in looking after our veterans. I am of the conviction that cases with technical and legal problems will need assistance from the pensions advocate. I am also concerned for the group who are of the age where their memory has gone. For example, say a veteran comes into the pension office to seek assistance and says, "I forget whether it was before the crossing of the Rhine, or during the crossing of the Rhine, or after the crossing of the Rhine, but somewhere in there I think I was injured." That type of individual will need the assistance of the pensions advocate.

Honourable senators, it was my intention to move an amendment allowing the minister or the Secretary of State (Veterans) to provide the services of the Bureau of Pension Advocates to these individuals. However, he has sent us a letter stating that he would do that. The committee has accepted his assurance, because we felt that if the bill were returned to the House of Commons, it might be lost. So, we passed it with that assurance, but also with a recommendation that the subcommittee monitor the situation. That is one of the aspects that we will be monitoring; namely, the number of people who request pension advocate assistance and the number who receive assistance.

I hope that you will all take notice of these two particular aspects that Senator Cools and I have mentioned and that you will also assist the committee in any way that you can.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved the third reading of Bill C-37, to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code.

Hon. Landon Pearson: Honourable senators, I rise today to speak to Bill C-37, which is before us for third reading, by addressing a fundamental issue related to the youth justice system that so many of the witnesses who appeared before your Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee raised. This is the issue of how to prevent serious criminal behaviour in young people and, if it occurs, how to prevent the young person from becoming entrenched in his or her ways.

The perspective I bring both to the YOA and to the issue of prevention is framed by the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and formed by my lifelong study of child development. The UN Convention states in article 40, section 1:

> State parties recognize the right of every child alleged as, accused of, or recognized as having infringed the penal code to be treated in a manner consistent with the promotion of the child's sense of dignity and worth, which reinforces the child's respect for the human rights and fundamental freedoms of others and which takes into account the child's age and the desirability of promoting the child's reintegration and the child's assuming a constructive role in society.

However, what happens, honourable senators, when the child has no sense of worth? The element that struck so many of us so forcibly in much of the testimony that we heard was the degree to which young offenders arrive in the system because they have such a low opinion of themselves. Betty Fraser, retired Director of Youth Services from the province of Saskatchewan, told us that the word "rehabilitation", when describing programs for young offenders, is a misnomer because that implies they come from a good situation in the first place, and they do not. She said that "the vast majority of young offenders have never possessed the life-skills and attributes to function successfully." She went on to say:

> ...99.9 per cent of the girls who end up in open and secure custody have been severely sexually abused, severely physically abused, severely emotionally abused and heavily into drugs, alcohol and solvent abuse. Many are under the control of pimps.

Dr. Dan Offord, from the Centre of Studies for Children at Risk at McMaster University, told us about the "burden of suffering" the casualty class of youngsters he deals with as a child psychiatrist are carrying. He said, sadly, that even if he could increase his case load and see two or three more kids a day, he could scarcely make a dent in the dimension of the problem: the misery of these unhappy children.

Then the National Crime Prevention Council reminded us that children who are victims of violence, exposed to parental discord or neglected and unsupervised are at high risk for delinquent behaviour.

What we were hearing, honourable senators, is that, individually and collectively, many of us as adults are failing to carry out our responsibilities to our own and to other children and that, as a result, many children are turning to violence and other criminal behaviours to inflict upon society the pain they themselves have experienced.

What can society do? Almost none of our witnesses suggested that federal legislation alone, however good it is, can solve or even diminish the problem of young offenders. In committee, our discussions often turned to prevention.

It is the prevention of criminal behaviour in the young, honourable senators, that I would like to focus on today. In recent weeks, two excellent studies were made available to your committee to give some direction with respect to convention. One is "Au nom et au-delà de la loi", known as the Jasmin report, a study of the application of the Young Offenders Act in Quebec. The other is "Youth Crime and the Youth Justice System in Canada: A Research Perspective", by Anthony Doob, Voula Marinos and Kimberley Varma. Comments by the Prevention and Children's Committee of the National Crime Prevention Council are also very helpful.

Honourable senators, I will admit that the basic assumption underlying all prevention work with children, the assumption that there is a natural pathway for human development that, uninterpreted, will lead to competent, caring and responsible adulthood is a hopeful one. After all the years I have spent in the field of child development, I am convinced that optimism is justified.

As Dr. Offord said colourfully:

> ...growing up in Canada is like being on a train track. You start off and you just go. The fact is that at one time or another every kid gets off somewhat. It is just part of growing up. However, they get right back on track again. When you are thinking about what to do for kids, it should not just be in terms of where the kid is now but how to pull the kid around so that they are likely to go back to the middle. If the kid gets off track a bit, you want to ensure that what you are trying to do to help the kid does not push him or her further out. The intervention has to be some type that will bring the kid back to the middle.

[Translation]

In the Jasmin report, prevention is described not only as important but as a duty of society. It goes on to list three categories of prevention.

First, there is primary prevention. Crime is tied in with various social problems, such as poverty, unemployment, academic failure and a violent environment. Primary prevention consists in policies and programs aimed at alleviating these problems in the hope that this will make those affected less socially vulnerable and consequently reduce the incidence of delinquency.

As for secondary prevention, various research has established certain links between behaviour and other factors in children and participation in significant delinquent activities in teen years. Of course, we cannot predict with any degree of accuracy which kids will engage in delinquent activities in their teens, but we can certainly identify some who seem more likely to do so than others. Secondary prevention is designed to try and prevent young people considered at high risk from getting involved in delinquent activities.

The third category is tertiary prevention. It encompasses the actions taken to prevent young offenders from becoming repeat offenders. For example, the focus of the Young Offenders Act is on tertiary prevention in that the act takes reasonable measures to prevent criminal behaviour in teenagers.

[English]

Primary prevention — the attempt to modify the social circumstances that are known to cause damage to children as well as to strengthen children's own inner resources — is most effective when programs commence in early childhood. All of the research confirms that the years from birth to six are critical for healthy child investment and this includes good prenatal care.

To address problems at this stage in a constructive way requires measures that support families in their childrearing responsibilities and measures that enhance children's own development. A number of programs have been shown to be effective at reducing predicted rates of criminal behaviour in the population at large by combining these two thrusts. Typically, these programs, which do not necessarily have delinquency prevention as their primary goal, include home visiting before and after birth to help parents understand their responsibilities to their new baby and to help them develop the skills and the confidence to carry them out.

Many young parents these days are overwhelmed by the experience of being a parent, particularly those who lack reliable social and economic support. However, home visiting is only one component of a successful primary prevention program. Once a child is older, Head Start and other good early childhood education experiences become vital to the child's development.

There is no quick fix. Programs that work effectively must continue for some time, often many years. A good start is important for every child, but if we are to improve the life chances of our most vulnerable children and keep them on track, our efforts on their behalf must continue through to the end of adolescence.

This will involve interventions in the category of secondary prevention. Studies have identified four predictors of delinquency for individual children that can be modified: Poverty, poor performance at school, poor parenting, and temperamental impulsivity.

Secondary prevention is most effective with children in situations where these factors interact. One factor alone may not put a child at risk, but more than one will do so, since research has shown that a second factor multiplies the effect of the first one, and so on. Secondary prevention programs concentrate on reducing the risks to which children are exposed.

There is an excellent model in Montreal under the direction of Dr. Richard Tremblay involving boys identified at the age of four as aggressive. He and his colleagues have worked with them for the past 12 years with significant, positive results compared to a control group. These interventions are broadly based and multi-faceted, dealing with problems at home, at school, with peers, and so on.

While such programs are often successful, there are simply not enough of them, and so some young people, in spite of all the hints they have given, eventually end up in the youth justice system. RCMP Commissioner J. P. R. Murray, in a speech in Regina in April, referred to recent studies of young offenders incarcerated for serious offences between the ages of 15 and 17. On average, these youth started showing dysfunctional behaviour before age 4 and, over the years, averaged 19 separate interventions and 8 incarcerations. How many more signals can a child send?

It is when the young offender is actually in the system that tertiary prevention should come in. Programs for youth convicted of offences ought to provide them with the opportunity to break the habits of criminal behaviour they have unfortunately acquired. For even at this stage, there is hope. Boot camps do not help, but many other measures do.

Section 1(2) of Bill C-37 amends the Young Offenders Act to emphasize this by stating:

> ...the protection of society, which is a primary objective of the criminal law applicable to youth, is best served by rehabilitation, wherever possible, of young persons who commit offences and rehabilitation is best achieved by addressing the needs and circumstances of a young person that are relevant to the young person's offending behaviour.

Other sections support this positive thrust. For example, Dr. Alan Leschied of the London Family Court Clinic expressed satisfaction that the repeal of section 22 of the old Young Offenders Act will now allow a judge to send young people to treatment when Dr. Leschied's assessment has indicated they could profit from a specific program.

However, your committee heard concerns from several witnesses about inadequate resources for community-based services that would assist in tertiary prevention. We urge the federal government to strengthen its commitment to the prevention of youth crime by ensuring that further cost-sharing arrangements with the provinces and territories provide sufficient resources for the kinds of community-based services that may, in the long run, offer the best hope of achieving public safety through rehabilitation.

Honourable senators, we must not give up on the youth of Canada. They are too important to us, both now and in the future. We were told that it costs between $80,000 and $100,000 to retain one young person in custody for a year. Even then there is no guarantee they will emerge at the other end "habilitated," especially if they have had to serve time in the adult system.

Surely we could spend that money more wisely if we insisted on investing it in prevention at all levels. We would not succeed with all children but we would certainly succeed with some. I believe, along with Dr. Dan Offord that:

> If anti-social behaviour could be reduced markedly in childhood and adolescence, it would be significantly reduced in adults within one generation.

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, I rise today to speak to Bill C-37, to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code which is now before us at third reading.

Since I spoke to the bill on second reading and stated my concerns and reservations, many excellent and well-researched witnesses have appeared before the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Also, some highly pertinent reports have been made available to us recently, including the report of the ninth session of the United Nations committee studying the rights of the child, the Jasmin report, and the working document of the Department of Justice entitled, "Youth Crime and the Youth Justice System in Canada: A Research Perspective."

First, I should like to thank members of the committee for their concerns and response to Bill C-37 and for their patience in hearing me out on this issue of prime importance. In addition, I extend my appreciation to the witnesses who appeared before our committee for their helpful testimony.

We, in the committee, understood that it is often difficult for both the workers involved in the system and for the victims of crime to express themselves on issues which obviously affect them so profoundly.

Honourable senators, I was once told that if we want to look at how well a society is doing, we must look at the laws it passes for its children. The obvious question then is: What have we learned as a result of our experience in dealing with this piece of legislation? How do we rate in our attempts?

I have learned five essential points that I feel are worth highlighting. First, it is evident that we are not in the midst of a youth crime crisis. Although the sensationalization of a few spectacular cases in the media make it appear so, empirical data shows that youth crime has not increased significantly over the last number of years. However, this should not imply that violence is not a problem or that there are no problems with youth. On the contrary, I suggest that a crisis looms for youth if we continue in the direction in which we are heading as a society, and if we do not address some serious societal ills.

Second, I continue to realize that we must make young offenders accountable in a realistic manner. Young offenders, whether they be of the most violent stripe or the least offensive, deserve our attention and resources. We must ensure that they receive, at this malleable stage in their development, the kinds of responses that are consistent with youth in the 1990s.

The working document of the Department of Justice to which I referred earlier states:

> Each generation, it seems, manages to rediscover youth crime while simultaneously forgetting about the nature of its own youth. And, of course, we tend, as our parents, grandparents and great-grandparents did, to look to the criminal justice system...and much less frequently to other state institutions to find an answer.

If we were to adopt a multi-discipline and integrated systems approach to youth which looked at the roots of the problem rather than at the results, we would have a better chance for success. In so doing we could yield youths who are more productive and ready to contribute positively to society.

Third, society must balance the needs of all and understand its special responsibility toward children. We need a society that is tough when it seeks to show its displeasure. However, toughness alone does not make for an adequate response. Above all, there is a need for us to be fair as we seek to discipline. A tough lesson does not have to be a punitive one. Our goal should be a better, more productive society, not a society of retribution and throw-aways.

Fourth, as Canadians, we have been misinformed, misguided and misled into believing that getting tough with young people is equivalent to reducing the number of crimes committed and thereby protecting society. All one has to do is consider for a moment the available statistical information to conclude that quite the contrary is true. Getting tough with young people is likely to have adverse repercussions on society as a whole. As Dr. Alan Leschied from the London Family Court Clinic pointed out, we actually contribute to crime by overpenalizing.

The crisis that exists with regard to youth in Canada is rooted in the society in which we live. The solution, then, also lies in the greater societal context. This crisis is not properly addressed in Bill C-37, which simply serves as a placebo for a real issue which is not being addressed. In fact, we may be hindering the long-term process by not now looking at the broader context.

Given a chance to study the available data and examples, it is revealed that just getting tough is not the appropriate response. Quite frankly, it cannot and will not work.

One need look no further than the Department of Justice's own working document to recognize the failure of this legislative response. Although I am tempted to read the whole document, I will limit myself to a few relevant passages. The first one cites the work of the highly regarded Australian criminologist, John Braithwaite. It states:

> John Braithwaite summarizes very succinctly the factors that, for the most part, are agreed to be important correlates of crime across a large number of studies carried out in a wide range of countries. The first ten "facts" about crime (other than "white collar" crime) that he lists are as follows:

1) Crime is committed disproportionately by youth.

2) Crime is perpetrated disproportionately by 15-25 year-olds.

3) Crime is committed disproportionately by unmarried people.

4) Crime is committed disproportionately by people living in large cities.

5) Crime is committed disproportionately by people who have experienced high residential mobility and who live in areas characterized by high residential mobility.

6) Young people who are strongly attached to their school are less likely to engage in crime.

7) Young people who have high educational and occupational aspirations are less likely to engage in crime.

8) Young people who do poorly at school are more likely to engage in crime.

9) Young people who are strongly attached to their parents are less likely to engage in crime.

10) Young people who have friendships with criminals are more likely to engage in crime themselves.

What is probably important about this list, honourable senators, is that, for the most part, it deals with factors that probably reflect complex socialization effects, for example, gender and age, or interactions with other normal parts of society. Reducing crime, then, is likely to mean that we should focus on what these factors mean and how social interventions might take place.

This is not to say that there is no role for the youth justice system in the prevention of youth crime. It is only to suggest, in terms of crime prevention, that the role is limited.

Another passage contained in the same document hits the nail on the head when it cites a research report edited by Richard Harding concerning the initiatives put in place in Western Australia. The report states:

> This Research Report is about Western Australian experience and the failure of the legislative response. But it is more than this. In reality it is a case study into why and how such responses will always fail. Selective incapacitation will never work; court dispositions, coming at the very end of the delinquency continuum, will never significantly affect what happens at the beginning or in the middle of that continuum; flagrant breaches of international standards, which represent hard-won universal wisdom as to optimum strategies in the less than optimum world of juvenile dislocation and dysfunction, will always backfire.
>
> The only philosophy that consistently offers hope is one that attempts to draw multi-problem youth into society rather than drive them out. In applying that philosophy, of course, it will continue to be necessary to identify and isolate some youths for some periods. But that must be done in a subtle and conscientious process, not an indiscriminate and crude one. And it must be done with compassion and understanding, not rage and revenge. Long-term juvenile crime prevention is demanding and difficult and often dis-spiriting; and unlike short-term punitive responses, it offers no illusory "quick-fixes" to its proponents and practitioners.

Honourable senators, the transfer provisions contained in Bill C-37 are hardly subtle, nor are they selective and indiscriminate. On the contrary, they are crude and discriminate. They run counter to the best data available. How is this acceptable or even explainable? Further, how can we not feel insecure and scared when the government says it will get tough until data and information collected to prove or disprove its theories is found? Yet, since February the government has been in possession of a working document it had commissioned which strongly, and with good empirical data, disproves their approach. Unfortunately, the government does not see fit to file this important document with the committee members until after the committee's deliberations, which ended last Thursday. One wonders.

The Jasmin report from Quebec is to be commended. It touches on all aspects of youth crime and the protection of society. It provides a good analysis and blueprint for the proper approach to be taken with youth in Canada. It is incumbent upon the government to acknowledge its responsibility in bringing the true facts to the public and the media. A strategy is urgently required.

Honourable senators, the option chosen by the government to fight crime is known to be unworkable, and it is the most costly option available. In these times of restraint, when every dollar counts, high-priced incarceration with no probability of making our society safer is wasteful.

My difficulties with Bill C-37 have nothing to do with those aspects which seek to improve the administrative workings of the Young Offenders Act. It is expected that improvements will be required from time to time. Instead, my difficulties stem from two concerns I have with the legislation. First, I cannot bring myself to support the aforementioned transfer provisions. In fact, if this matter were put to a vote, I would have to vote against it.

Second, as a Canadian, I am concerned about the general direction we are taking with the Young Offenders Act and with youth issues in general. I am concerned as to what our youth justice system will look like when we head into the 21st century.

First, by reversing the onus regarding transfers to adult court, clause 8 of Bill C-37 represents a significant change in the way Canada deals with youths. Whereas it is currently up to the Crown to show why a youth, 14 years or older, charged with an indictable offence should be proceeded against in adult court, Bill C-37 would shift the burden of proof onto the shoulders of youths. The proposed amendments amount to a presumptive transfer that would send all youths charged with violent offences to adult court, unless the youth can demonstrate that he or she should be kept in youth court.

I think this approach is dead wrong. It is not only unfair, but it is time-consuming and expensive. Furthermore, there are no assurances that it will have the desired effect. In fact, much of the research shows that it is a regressive step which will result in more crime, not less crime.

If we had hoped to deter youths from criminal activity through transfers, an analysis of the empirical data shows that we are clearly on the wrong track. The Department of Justice's working document cites U.S. examples to prove this point when it states:

> ...changes in the likelihood that a young person will be dealt with in adult court do not seem to have an impact on youthful offending.

Furthermore, it finds that the "perceived personal likelihood of apprehension" might serve as a better deterrent.

The same case was made by the Jasmin report as it concluded that accountability can be better tied to expediency and speed of intervention. Shifting the onus onto the shoulders of the youths will only exacerbate the problem of systemic delay, further straining our already overburdened justice system in terms of both time and cost.

Honourable senators, we created the children and the society in which our young people live. Their problems are our problems. If we believe that some young people should be incarcerated, then it is the responsibility of adults to decide which ones, and not young people.

It was decided long ago that it was because youths are immature and do not fully understand the consequences of their actions that adults must be responsible. Now we are abrogating our safety and the protection of children to a segment of society which has shown itself to be the least capable of making the right choices and sound decisions. I am referring to violent offenders. Essentially, it boils down to Canadian youths being forced to prove that they are worthy of our time and our resources; being forced to prove that adults should have some responsibility towards them. Why should youths have to prove to us that they should be treated as young persons? It will be the first time in Canada that they have had to convince us as to their value.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Andreychuk, I hesitate to interrupt you, but your time is up. Is it your wish, honourable senators, to allow the Honourable Senator Andreychuk to finish?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Andreychuk: Furthermore, the proposed transfer provisions run the risk of punishing the crime and not the criminal.

The transfer provisions also raise some poignant questions about the fundamental principles of justice. We must consider the ramifications of a court deciding the fate of a young person before a guilty verdict has been rendered. What about the young person who has been wrongly accused and is innocent?

We must also consider whether or not it is desirable for children to be placed in custody with adults. Indeed, the United Nations committee report expressed relatively strong reservations with respect to this point. Simply put, it is not in the interest of rehabilitation and it is certainly not in the long-term interests of societal protection.

Honourable senators, as Dr. Dan Offord, a child psychiatrist who directs the Centre for Studies of Children at Risk said:

> One would expect that putting teenagers in the adult system would lessen the possibility of a good outcome... If we exclude them more than we must, I will feel safer, but the evidence is clear that my children and grandchildren will be in bad trouble unless something is done about it.

In other words, short-term retribution does not mean long-term safety. Furthermore, it is dangerous and counter-productive to encroach on the special jurisdiction we created when we implemented the Young Offenders Act. We can only expect young people to come out worse from their experience.

I am also concerned that the Canadian public has been misled into the misperception that Canada is, in some way, soft on crime. It ties into the myth that society can be protected simply by toughening the Young Offenders Act. These myths must be dispelled.

I defer to Senator Pearson who has already quoted RCMP Commissioner Murray, who has disproved the myth that there is an acceleration of crime and who has quite rightly pointed out the fact that interventions must come early.

Clearly, by western standards, we are already tough. Now Bill C-37 is being sold for political reasons as a means of protecting society through the use of tough measures. The government is pushing the notion that, by locking up youths, communities will be safer. Somehow, we are to believe that getting tough is equivalent to increased public protection. If this were indeed the case, I would feel much differently. However, I again state that this is a myth.

We, as legislators, must be wary of feeding that myth by passing pieces of legislation such as this one and saying to people, "Look what we have done to reduce crime. We have toughened sentences." By so doing, we are only raising expectations. Is it any wonder that the public clamours for tougher measures when they are frightened and fearful of crime? When legislating, one must look to the long-term effects and consequences. Sending young people to jail for long periods does not reduce the incidence of crime, thereby protecting society. If retribution is our aim, then we are succeeding. However, if rehabilitation and the long-term safety of our communities is our goal, we have missed the mark.

As Betty Fraser, the former Director of Youth Services in Saskatchewan put it, "Everybody gets out of jail sometime." What do we expect the kids who have been locked up to be like? I would argue — and many of the witnesses who appeared before us would back me up — that more incarceration serves only to breed criminal behaviour rather than deter it. Youths will come out of prison angry, embittered, more violent rather than less violent, and more dangerous rather than less dangerous. How is this protecting society?

The truth is that we are incarcerating more people than ever. It is my fear that we are only widening the net. Not only does getting tough and increasing incarceration not work for the protection of society, it is also terribly costly. It is essential that people come to understand that money would be better spent at the front end of the continuum, rather than at the back end where youths are already violent.

With regard to costs, I will only reiterate that it is the most costly way to deal with young people.

It is clear from the increasing incarceration rates that the root of the problem does not lie simply in ratcheting up the punishments in the Young Offenders Act. We must, instead, look at the broader societal context to find the real solution. When considering society, we must ensure that we do not make the mistake of going back to responses that worked for us. The truth is that society has changed greatly, especially for youths. For youths to respect the laws that we make for them, we must first consider the origin of the young people's value systems.

Honourable senators, when we were youths we learned our values from traditional institutions such as the family, the school, the church and the community. These traditional institutions no longer perform the same valuable functions, or at least not to the same extent. Youths now get their values from the worldwide information systems we have created. One has to question the values being taught by television, Internet, video games, shopping malls and popular music.

A recent Globe and Mail article highlights this very point. It cites a prominent U.S. researcher who has concluded, after many years of study, that the link between television violence and aggressive behaviour is as strong as the link between cigarettes and lung cancer. Perhaps just as interesting is the fact that the link is strongest for kids eight years of age but non-existent for 19-year-olds.

The problems facing young Canadians are numerous and increasingly complex. In recent years, youth unemployment and child poverty have increased. What awaits these children is an increased prominence of drugs and other negative influences. We, as adults, have given young people more freedom, less structure, more mobility and more information, both positive and negative. If the net is widening, it is because we have created a society where youths have been given access to some very negative tools.

Further, this legislation and this approach do nothing to address the disproportionate number of incarcerated youths who are aboriginal, members of urban youth gangs, or immigrant youths. The UN report on the rights of the child sounds a warning on these issues and others such as child poverty and suicide.

Honourable senators, if we really cared about our young people, we would not have bankrupted them. We often refer to young people as the future of our nation. Why then have we left them such a deplorable legacy? Consider the debt and deficit for a moment. Where are their jobs? Socially, what do they have to turn to in terms of popular culture? What are youths to learn from a society that consistently cuts back on education and health care while increasing the number of gaol beds?

As research suggests, 90 per cent of young people break the rules at one time or another. It is part of growing and developing. The vast majority of young people come back into the fold. Dr. Offord spoke of young people following pathways through their development and maturation, some sticking to the track, some falling off and later getting back on, and a few being lost for good. The working document of the Department of Justice makes a similar case. They both recognize the danger of allowing increasing numbers of young people to stray from the mainstream for too long. As is evident, youths alone should not serve as scapegoats for society's ills. They must be responsible for their share, but their share only. There is need to make others accountable as well.

The thorough and comprehensive review promised by Minister Rock must be carried out, and soon. However, we would be missing the mark if we constrained ourselves to the study of the Young Offenders Act or of the youth justice system as a whole. We must look beyond the youth justice system at everything that impacts on young persons' lives if we really intend to help children and put a serious dent in youth crime.

As a committee, we felt it necessary to include in our report on Bill C-37 some important observations. Although I would have worded the observations somewhat more strongly, I support their motive and content. I challenge Minister Rock to take account of our observations, as they follow from promises he has already made. When he appeared before our committee, Minister Rock stated, with regard to the funding of Bill C-37:

> ...it states that we should look at alternatives and provides a foundation upon which I can work in renegotiating those shared cost arrangements with the provinces to work in partnership with them to make the original objectives of the statute a reality.

These are nice words butthat is all they are. As Priscilla De Villiers of CAVEAT told us when she quoted Macbeth, "it is full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." We are talking about placebos here; the appearance of change rather than real change.

With respect to the intentions of Minister Rock, I do not doubt them, but experience has taught me that such promises often get lost in the shuffle. One need only look back to promises of resources by federal ministers responsible for the Young Offenders Act.

As early as discussions surrounding the YOA in 1981, then solicitor general Bob Kaplan made similar promises of studies and negotiations for funding. He promised an in-depth study to follow implementation of the act. We have not yet seen a study or increased funding. We are still waiting.

We are not at a loss when we consider alternatives for incarceration for young people. There exists a host of possible sanctions. They can range from sentencing circles to wilderness camps to community policing.

Brian Scully from the Ontario Social Development Council highlighted another interesting example for us, that of Dr. Jerome Miller, who said that, with $60,000, he could assess a child and send him or her on an innovative program. Dr. Miller has been very successful in rooting out deviant behaviour. In addition to that, he proved that it could be done in a more cost-efficient manner than by simple incarceration.

It is clear that now is the time for imaginative and innovative approaches. It is also essential that the approach be integrated so that all aspects of society may contribute and benefit. It is time we did something for youth in Canada. We cannot allow them to be further corrupted. After all, the protection of society is at stake.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, I ask you to bear with me for a few more minutes. Many of the things I will say have already been addressed by my colleagues, Senator Pearson and Senator Andreychuk. In talking about the future of our country, I believe some of those words are worth repeating and I trust that I may be able to add one or two new thoughts to this debate.

I rise to speak on this bill, not only as a senator from Toronto, but particularly because of my ongoing involvement in the issue of youth rehabilitation through an organization headquartered in Toronto called Operation Springboard. As the largest metropolis in the country, Toronto has the dubious distinction of being in the vanguard of youth crime, both violent and property related.

As I have listened to the debate in the Senate, the House of Commons and the media, I have been struck by several things, the most important being how this legislation seems to lose sight of the youth in this issue and focus solely on the crime aspect.

One of the other impressions that I have been left with is the seemingly regressive nature of the bill. There are elements within it that sound more like the old Juvenile Delinquents Act than the Young Offenders Act proclaimed in 1984. These troubling aspects of the debate force me to ask the larger question that must be answered, and that is whether society is made safer from young offenders by this bill and the approach that it takes.

While it is true that we are continually horrified by individual incidents of crime as they are reported in the media, statistics do not support the commonly held view that we are seeing an increase in violent crimes by young people.

While the public perception is that youth crime and violence is rampant and on the increase, according to the Department of Justice, only 15 per cent of all crimes committed by young people in 1992 were violence related. Of those, only 13 per cent were violent in nature.

Furthermore, while the rate of violent crimes by young persons has risen, the recorded increase is largely in minor acts of aggression between kids of the same age. These are the kinds of acts that would not have prompted intervention by the justice system as recently as 10 years ago. During 1991, one-quarter of violent charges against youth involved the more serious offences of aggravated assault with murder, manslaughter and attempted murder, amounting to less than 1 per cent. Between 1986 and 1991, the murder rate remained constant for young offenders.

Despite these facts, public opinion surveys show that Canadians believe that violent offences account for 30 per cent or more of all crimes in this country, rather than the actual figure of 10 per cent. We could place a lot of the blame for those misconceptions on media sensationalism. The other factor experts point to is that public fears are heightened by their own economic uncertainty and the resulting sense that society is falling apart. That is certainly a failure for which the government must take some responsibility.

Many of the witnesses who appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs also pointed a finger at government as the guardian of society's best interests when they spoke of the need to educate both Canadian youth and adults about the real situation of youth crime and what could be done about it. What we are seeing in Canada is a global trend toward using the justice system to solve social problems.

The question must then be asked: Will the tougher measures urged by a skewed public perception of the problem address the reality of the youth crimes committed, or act simply as a political panacea while the government searches for a larger vision?

Increased punishment has been the highlight of this bill, for which the government has been applauded in the media. In the committee hearings, however, the views have been somewhat different. There we have heard that even though we now have more police officers, lawyers, prisons and prison guards, we have not created safer communities. Traditional responses such as tougher sentences are not reducing crime, or reducing the chances of a young offender reoffending. Short-term safety has been achieved, but at what long-term human and fiscal cost?

How can traditional responses deal with the sensational new kinds of crime we are seeing in Canadian cities? A little over a year ago, Nicholas Battersby was killed in a drive-by shooting in Ottawa. That is an example of the type of violence that used to be unheard of in this country. In Toronto, we hear of gangs of young people swarming passers-by in shopping malls to rob them. We hear of home invasions that too readily call up images from the futuristic movie of the 1970s that honourable senators may remember, A Clockwork Orange. These are but a few of the examples of the new horrors out there. They appear in the cities first, and certainly that is where the fear is most prevalent.

What do we do about the fear and loneliness of so-called latch-key kids who get home from school at 3:30 while their parents do not get home from work until close to 6 p.m.? Why should we be surprised when a lot of bored and isolated children turn to gangs of their own age to get some of the attention and sense of belonging that is impossible for their parents to provide at home?

The rise of youth gangs is linked to larger issues, such as poverty, a history of neglect or abuse, the lack of stable family and community support for young people. In recent years, we have seen children under the age of 12 become involved in gangs. A 1994 study in Ontario noted that membership is also starting to cut across income levels.

There have been over 5,000 gang-related arrests since 1989, according to information provided by the Solicitor General's Department. Violence has too often been a feature of gang-related criminal activity, even though most gang-related crime consists of property offences. I would ask the government why property crimes have not been highlighted for consideration and study? While Bill C-37 urges the courts to look at non-custodial sentences in crimes that are not violence related, how are they to do so when so few alternatives to incarceration exist?

Having read the minister's request for a review of youth justice, sent to the chair of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs in the other place, I wonder what the real purpose of the study is? While the minister has asked the committee to examine, among other things, the age range of the act and the issue of transferring offenders to adult court, Bill C-37 already deals with these matters. I understand the review will take place later this year, and I question the timing of this bill in light of the review timetable. It is not as if there will be statistics on the effect of this legislation available to them as part of their review.

While I appreciate that this bill was introduced as a result of a consultation process begun by the previous government, I am mystified by this government's approach to the issue. The legislation aside, the government's idea of process seems obscure, to say the least. What is the point of asking for public input in a national study after the government has already passed new young offenders' legislation? The government's new direction is evident in this legislation before us today, and another expensive study seems unlikely to change that direction.

As my colleague Senator Andreychuk has so eloquently pointed out, reversing the onus of the decision to transfer a young offender's case to adult court negates the equalizing nature that was one of the features of the legislation in the first place. One of the benefits of the Young Offenders Act that came into force in 1984 was that it normalized the age by which young offenders were to be determined. Some provinces had previously set the age at 14, some at 18. The current amendment reintroduces the old arbitrariness as well as giving judges more sentencing latitude, both elements of the old Juvenile Delinquents Act. Is the government response to the new types of youth crime simply to turn back the clock?

Another problem with the legislation is the lengthening of the legal process for youth. By making offences punishable by five years or more, young offenders now have the right, guaranteed by the Charter, to a jury trial and perhaps to a preliminary hearing. Both of those consequences are contrary to the original intentions of the Young Offenders Act.

The changes made by the last two Progressive Conservative governments adhered to the basic principles of the Young Offenders Act. This legislation introduces philosophical changes in what seems to be a politically motivated reaction.

Why are we doing this if incarceration does not work? Canada already has one of the highest rates of young offender custody in the world, and that rate is continuing to rise. The rate of incarceration has risen by 21 per cent in seven years, and the cost of keeping a youth in custody and receiving treatment is estimated by the Department of Justice to be $95,000 a year, nearly double what it is to keep an adult in jail. As Senator Andreychuk noted in committee, 80 per cent of our available resources are spent on custody.

What kind of return are Canadians getting for that investment? Not a great one, it would seem, with nearly two-thirds of inmates staying the same or getting worse as a result of treatment. Yet, stiffer sentences is what the government says the public wants and is willing to pay for. Can we afford this kind of shortsighted, short-term approach to public safety?

Naturally, I am sympathetic and do not quarrel with the kind of public rage that erupts when something like the home invasion murder of Robert Llewelyn in North York takes place. The young offender in that 1993 murder has not even been caught, although his 19-year-old partner was sentenced to 14 years in gaol last Monday. Some young offenders cannot be helped, but that is no reason to pass legislation for so few. Why not make legislation for the majority of kids who can be helped?

Certainly, there are some custody programs in place that offer structure and stability, elements which may have been missing from family life for too many young offenders. However, when custody ends, support ends. There is little or no support available once young offenders are released.

I vividly remember a visit I made to a rehabilitation centre in Oakville. In talking with social workers at the centres, they emphasized education in areas that contribute to self-respect and self-reliance. Young people need to be taught basic life skills, skills that give them an opportunity at self-reliance such as useful job training. One of the clinicians suggested doing away with most sociologists and clinicians and replacing them with auto mechanics, plumbers, carpenters, computer programmers and the like. Providing young people with positive role models and mentors will do far more for them in the long run than incarceration.

In gaol, the only thing these kids will learn is more about crime. I strongly believe that gaoling kids creates more criminals. I can give you all sorts of statistics to back up that belief. The point that we as legislators must understand is that legislation such as Bill C-37 will not make Canadian society safer in the long run. In fact, it may have the opposite effect. Custody becomes the only choice because there are so few other choices. Cost is not an issue that can be considered by judges but should be one that we as legislators consider. It was one of the suggestions made very persuasively in committee.

Operation Springboard is an organization with which I am very proud to be associated. It has been operating throughout Ontario but mainly in the Toronto area for 25 years now and offers the kind of integrated assistance that young offenders need to change their lives. Not only do they operate six court-mandated group homes, they also run three employment centres for ex-offenders, a rent-geared-to-income housing development, and community-based programs in 14 locations throughout the province. One of the programs sends rehabilitated kids into the school system to talk to other kids about their experiences — what got them into crime, and what happened when they got caught. Operation Springboard was designed as a one-stop shopping centre for young offenders in need of ongoing assistance to stabilize their lives. I am proud to say that, for many young people, it seems to be working.

At committee, there were many witnesses from Quebec, and the example of that province provides striking testimony to the benefits of an integrated approach to welfare and custody services as well as community support and preventative measures. You have heard Senator Pearson talk about that scheme.

Gone are the days, at least in our more transient urban communities, when very young children caught stealing candy from the corner store were well–known enough to the store owners that all they had to do was 'phone their parents for action to be taken. This kind of intervention at the community level went a long way in socializing children as to appropriate social conduct. Nowadays, urban transience has become the norm, and everyone is touting a law and order agenda. As a result, Canada has become a less tolerant society with unrealistic ideas of the justice system's socializing capabilities.

In a recent cover story in The Globe and Mail, programs were highlighted which aim at identifying youngsters in danger of behavioral problems by home visits. According to behavioral experts, problems can be detected as early as age three, and dealt with before they become entrenched, which usually happens by age eight. Research has shown the rising prevalence of youth gangs in elementary as well as secondary school-age groups, which adds to the urgency for early identification and intervention. These are the years when preventive measures can have the greatest effect, and where social structures must be in place to assist families.

Witnesses here and before the House of Commons called for a change in society's understanding of our responsibilities towards children and their families. The National Council on Welfare, in their most recent report, has shown that, as of 1993, the number of children living in poverty in Canada surpasses the number of seniors living in poverty. Those Canadians complaining that any change to the social welfare programs will spell the end of the social safety net need to look again. The net has already failed.

It is not the fault of families that most parents have to work outside the home to meet —

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senator Di Nino, I regret to inform you that your time for speaking has lapsed.

Senator Di Nino: I will be guided by my colleagues. I have about five minutes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Senator Grafstein: I have no problem with granting leave; however, the time is approaching 6 o'clock. A number of speakers have gone well beyond their time. I have no problem with granting consent, but 6 o'clock is the time we would like to be completed today and there are a number of us who would like to speak, including myself.

The Hon. the Speaker: I gather leave is granted?

Senator Grafstein: With some sensitivity.

Senator Di Nino: I will shorten my comments.

The trend towards community policing will probably do more to reduce youth crime than all the legislation that this government can devise. It is certainly a feature of the Quebec experience and seems to be spreading, however slowly, in other provinces. We need leadership in coordinating and streamlining the efforts of all social services and justice vacancies.

While there are elements of Bill C-37 that are worthy and make its passage in this chamber inevitable, it appears to be a mere tinkering, a procedural piece of legislation. Larger aims are included in the bill, but the means to achieve them are not. I think many of us are sceptical of the epidemic of studies unleashed by this government. Enough studies have been done. Youth do not need a make-work project for federal bureaucrats; they need action-oriented planning and legislation. If that means a new Young Offenders Act, then let us get on with it. Four years ago, when I sponsored Bill C-12, I was told then by Department of Justice officials that a new young offenders act was expected shortly. Where is it, honourable senators? I hope to see it in the reports of these various committees and task forces.

I suggest that if these studies are to be of any use at all, they not limit themselves to the justice system but set out guidelines for integrated public policy in the areas of social security and community services. Previous studies have already told us that that is the only way to go if we are serious about helping kids in the long term. Not only that, we need to see a commitment of funding alternatives to incarceration. At present, only 10 per cent of justice funding goes to alternatives. If the government is serious about the lofty principles outlined in Bill C-37, let us see it back up those principles with some serious money.

If society is to be safeguarded, we must understand and respond to the new types of crime. More attention needs to be paid to the new individualized rehabilitation programs which are designed to target the causes of crime, be they poverty, abuse, neglect, or learning disabilities. Such a program aimed at first-time offenders in London, Ontario, reports a 96 per cent rate of success. If the kids are helped early on, they will not re-offend.

While the old Juvenile Delinquents Act was criticized for a lack of national standards and denial of basic legal rights to young people, its philosophic orientation was more towards ensuring child welfare than arbitrary punishment. Its downfall came when the highly discretionary powers given to justice officials contributed to the neglect of the interests of the young people it aimed to serve. The act was having no deterrent or rehabilitative effect.

The Young Offenders Act streamlined the system and emphasized the rights as well as according a certain measure of responsibility for the criminal actions of 12- to 17-year-olds. Obviously there are problems with this approach as well, or we would not have this bill before us today.

Responsibility and accountability are a two-way street, and it is time that our social responsibility for children is emphasized in the policy-making process.

• (1720)

One thing criminologists agree on is that youth crime is committed by damaged children who turn into violent adults. The high incidence of violent and sexual abuse in the background of young offenders suggests that a policy is needed that goes beyond mere tinkering with the Young Offenders Act. Evaluations of programs that focus on enriched child care, early education, improved parenting skills and reducing violence in the schools have shown the social and economic benefits of assisting children rather than punishing offenders. Much of this lies within provincial jurisdiction but the problem of who is acting in the best interests of children exists at both federal and provincial levels. There is a need, as was heard in committee, for a centralizing of authority to coordinate the actions of departments which deal with children's rights and problems.

Evidence shows that institutionalization does not reduce crime. Short-term protection will not diminish public concern over youth crime. Only a coordinated crime prevention strategy that reduces criminal opportunities will lower crime rates, enhance personal and community safety and eliminate the fear.

I think this debate has highlighted many of the concerns that need to be addressed in the House of Commons committee's review of the Criminal Code this summer as well as a study by the federal-provincial territorial task force. I assure the government that we will be watching their efforts closely.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bacon, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roux, for the second reading of Bill C-41, to amend the Criminal Code (sentencing) and other Acts in consequence thereof.

Hon. Duncan J. Jessiman: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on Bill C-41, which was introduced in the House of Commons on June 13, 1994. The Senate has received this large, comprehensive bill a mere few days before the house is scheduled to adjourn. I will return to that point later.

Honourable senators, this subject has been studied and restudied. I thought originally that it was for 16 years, but Senator Bacon did some research and found out that it was 20 years. My assistant, Donna Lock, who was giving a paper yesterday on just one aspect of this bill, found that it went back 30 years.

In 1965, there was the Ouimet report, an order in council to study the broad field of corrections. In 1972, there was the Hugesson report, which is the product of The Task Force on the Release of Inmates, established by the then Solicitor General of Canada; in 1974, the Goldenberg report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, Review of Parole and Sentencing; in 1976, the Law Reform Commission of Canada report on Disposition and Sentencing; in 1979, a comprehensive review of the Criminal Code, agreed to by the federal and provincial governments; in 1982, a publication called "Criminal Law in Canadian Society"; in 1984, a white paper announcing the government's policy statement on sentencing, along with proposals for reform; and on February 7, 1984, the Liberal government introduced Bill C-19, dealing with the same subject. It was introduced in the Commons but it died on the Order Paper when an election was called.

Later in 1984 the new Conservative government appointed a Canadian Sentencing Commission which reported to the government in 1987 with a number of reform suggestions. Also in 1984, the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General reviewed various aspects of sentencing, corrections and conditional release. From this came a document entitled "Taking Responsibility".

Between 1985 and 1989, a Royal Commission on Sentencing produced what has been called the Archambault report, which itself was reviewed by a parliamentary committee in 1988. In many ways, its recommendations advocate that particular attention be paid to the role of the government. Finally, in 1990, the government published a three-volume green paper on sentencing, corrections and conditional release entitled, "A Framework for Sentencing, Corrections and Conditional Release".

Although none of the above studies were unanimous as to what should be done to correct the system, there were a number of recurring observations and concerns regarding the sentencing process. For example, first, the lack of clearly stated policies or principles of sentencing as a contributing factor to the unwarranted disparities between sentences imposed for similar offences; second, the effectiveness of the available options were questioned; and, third, Canada's relatively high incarceration rate.

In 1992, Bill C-90, dealing with sentence reform, was introduced in the House of Commons. It was similar to Bill C-41, except it did not have the provision respecting crimes motivated by bias, prejudice or hate, as is contained in section 718.1(a)(i) and (ii). I will deal with those particular subsections in more detail later. Bill C-90 also died on the Order Paper when the election was called in August of 1993.

There is no doubt, honourable senators, that Bill C-41 has some interesting, innovative and useful changes to the law, including a statement of purposes and principles. I will not read many sections, but a number of the people who gave evidence at the House of Commons committee said a lot about a statement of purposes and principles and said that it was important to include something in the bill along these lines. It states:

> 718. The fundamental purpose of sentencing is to contribute, along with crime prevention initiatives, to respect for the law and the maintenance of a just, peaceful and safe society by imposing just sanctions that have one or more of the following objectives:
> (a) to denounce unlawful conduct;
>
> (b) to deter the offender and other persons from committing offences;
>
> (c) to separate offenders from society, where necessary;
>
> (d) to assist in rehabilitating offenders;
>
> (e) to provide reparation for harm done to victims or to the community; and
> (f) to promote a sense of responsibility in offenders, and acknowledgement of the harm done to victims and to the community.

Although that has been well written and well thought of by some, Mr. Frank Schultz, Executive Director of the Canadian Chiefs of Police, said this when he gave testimony in the House of Commons:

> ...the most important part of this bill should be the declaration principle. We submit that it does not receive the prominence it should. We very much support the concept of inclusion of a declaration of principle, and to that extent we applaud the efforts of the draftspeople. We do think, however, that they have it wrong. We strongly recommend you take a good, long, hard look at the wording of the declaration of principle.

• (1730)

Honourable senators, there are other parts which I would support. A court which imposes a sentence shall take into consideration certain general purposes and principles: Sentences should be similar to those imposed on similar offenders for similar offences. When consecutive sentences are imposed, the combined sentence should not be unduly long or harsh.

One witness said they thought that clause was going too easy on offenders.

In an attempt to lessen incarceration rates, the principle is put forth that:

> ...if less restrictive sanctions may be appropriate in the circumstances; and
> (e) all available sanctions other than imprisonment that are reasonable in the circumstances should be considered for all offenders, with particular attention to the circumstances of aboriginal offenders.

The present incarceration rate in Canada is 1.5 per 1,000 adults. About 1 in 6 persons incarcerated are aboriginals. In 1993-94, the average number of inmates in correctional institutions was 32,800, 13,300 in federal custody and 19,500 in provincial custody. Outside the territories, the proportion of aboriginal inmates was highest in the prairie provinces; 56 per cent in Saskatchewan; 48 per cent in Manitoba; 24 per cent in Alberta. The provision to try and find another way is most welcome.

Honourable senators, other matters were interesting and worthy of mention. There is a system of alternative measures. There is also a provision for conditional sentences to be served in the community, and subject to compliance of certain conditions imposed by the courts. Fines are not to be imposed on persons who cannot afford them. I have read that 51 per cent of inmates are there because of unpaid fines. Other material puts the figure at 33 percent, as Senator Bacon mentioned.

Victim statements can be considered before sentencing and in parole decisions. Reasons for imposing sentences are to be given by judges and recorded for others to see. That will be expensive and time-consuming but it will probably be worthwhile. The probation program will have a fine option program. Rather than doing their time, those who could afford to pay would be fined. Some criticized this section because it may create a law for the rich and another for the poor.

Another innovative section has a victim fine surcharge for those people who commit crimes under the Food and Drugs Act or Narcotic Control Act. They could be surcharged at 15 per cent of any fine. If no fine is included in the sentence, the surcharge is $10,000.

Restitution was introduced. There is much material on that. As I was reading in the related literature that the goal is to instill in Canadians who commit crimes that they must be responsible and pay back what they have stolen, I could not help but think of the Pearson airport agreements.

All of the above provisions are worthy of support. Although some of them will be expensive to implement, if it will reduce the number of inmates in our prisons, it will be worth the extra initial expense because it could save millions in the future.

I now want to deal with paragraphs 718.2(a)(i) and (ii), the most controversial sections. Of the 165,000 letters received in opposition to this bill, most referred to these paragraphs.

This clause does not seem that bad when you read it. I do come down on the side of the minister, but I want you to know the background behind this controversy.

That clause reads as follows:

> A court that imposes a sentence shall also take into consideration the following principles:
>
> (a) a sentence should be increased or reduced to account for any relevant, aggravating or mitigating circumstances relating to the offence or the offender, and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing,
>
> (i) evidence that the offence was motivated by bias, prejudice or hate based on race, national or ethnic origin, language, colour, religion, sex, age, mental or physical disability, sexual orientation or any other similar factor...

Those words are almost identical to the section of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, except for the addition of the words "language" and "sexual orientation".

> (ii) evidence that the offender, in committing the offence, abused the offender's spouse or child...

This paragraph was not in the original bill. It was added by the House of Commons committee. I think it has merit.

> (iii) evidence that the offender, in committing the offence, abused a position of trust or authority in relation to the victim shall be deemed to be aggravating circumstances.

Some people objected to the addition of "sexual orientation". This clause is based on protection of the homosexual community. Over the years, from 1970 or perhaps a little earlier, homosexual acts could be committed legally behind closed doors between consenting persons 21 years of age or older. That age limit has now been reduced to 18 years of age. Prior to that, homosexuality was illegal; it was contrary to the Criminal Code.

The objection was made that this clause opens the door for not only homosexuals but for people of other sexual orientations, such as paedophilia, to request special protections. The minister answered that paedophilia is against the law. Some people are concerned that that, too, will change some day.

I can remember, as a child, that people who lived together out of wedlock were considered to be living in sin, and that was unacceptable to most of society. Yet today, common-law relationships are acceptable and recognized under the law.

Now we have moved further ahead — or behind, I do not know which. We are recognizing homosexuals. People are concerned that using the phrase "sexual orientation" without adding any definition, without limiting it to homosexuals, heterosexuals or bisexuals, could eventually lead to inclusion of paedophilia, narcissism, necrophilia, asexuality, transexuality, you name it. People are seriously concerned about this. I do not necessarily agree, but I want to express the point that they were trying to make.

This all started with the equality of rights in the Charter, which states:

> Every individual —

It does not say "any group of individuals".

> — is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular —

It does not say "in particular, without limiting the generality of the things we will state here." It simply states:

> — in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

In a booklet which contains the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, it states that the notes therein are for explanatory purposes only and should not be taken as legal interpretation of the provisions of the Charter. I refer honourable senators to the explanatory notes with respect to section 15 of the Charter, which state that the list of grounds of non-discrimination and the list for affirmative action is not exhaustive, which may enable the courts to apply further grounds of non-discrimination where the distinctions drawn are considered unacceptable.

I wish to refer honourable senators to the case of James Egan and John Norris Nesbitt v. Her Majesty the Queen in the Right of Canada and Attorney General of Quebec, Canadian Human Rights Commission, Commission des droits de la personne du Québec, Equality for Gays and Lesbians Everywhere, Metropolitan Community Church of Toronto, Inter-Faith Coalition on Marriage and the Family and Canadian Labour Congress. The case was reported on May 25, 1995. It was a five to four decision by the Supreme Court in which the justices discussed the changing mores of our society and how we have come from recognizing married couples to recognizing those living common-law. They did not go that far for the homosexual plaintiffs in this case. However, I point out that they were only one vote away from doing so.

The fact that the courts have held that gays and lesbians are protected under section 15 of the Charter, although they are not mentioned in the list of particular groups, and now inserting the word "sexual orientation" in the Criminal Code to produce increased sentences for those attacking gays and lesbians, some claim, including I think five Liberal MPs in the House of Commons, may be another stepping stone in having homosexual and lesbian couples recognized as couples like any heterosexual couple. I do not necessarily agree with that. However, I wanted to put it on the record because that is what a lot of other people think.

This bill has been in the House of Commons for almost a year. It took closure to get it passed. It is now before the Senate. This is a serious bill. We on this side hold the majority. This problem has been studied for 30 years. There were two other pieces of legislation in a vein similar to this bill, one brought in by a Liberal government and the other by a Conservative government. They were never passed.

There is still a problem with one clause in this bill. I am not against it. However, I want to point out that many people are.

On balance, the House of Commons wants this bill passed tomorrow. It will be referred to committee tomorrow. No one will look at it.

If I were the one determining this issue, I would vote in favour of the bill. That is what I am recommending. I know the government is anxious to see it passed.

We do not know when the referendum will be called. We do not know when this session of Parliament will be prorogued. Should we take the same stand with respect to this bill as we have taken on the firearms bill, which we could do with justification? This is important legislation. I know that there will be a lot of people out there saying we are not doing our job of taking a sober second look at this bill. However, on balance, we have waited too long. We have to get these measures into force. If there have to be some changes later, so be it.

I suggest that we refer the bill to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee as soon as possible with a view to passing it before we adjourn for the summer.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Bacon, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

CHEMICAL WEAPONS CONVENTION IMPLEMENTATION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein moved the second reading of Bill C-87, to implement the Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production, Stockpiling and Use of Chemical Weapons and on their Destruction.

He said: Honourable senators, we are less than five years away from the millennium, the end of the 20th century. Thoughtful observers have already labelled our century, the 20th century, the "killing century".

Some have calculated that over 167 million people have been slaughtered in this century. Most are victims of the modern nation state. Most died in the aid of the nation state. Most deaths were taken by the creative collaboration of modern science and technology — the divine in the hands of the demons.

The nation state and the 20th century have become synonymous with the unbridled use of state power and the violent drenching, if not drowning, of the rule of law. Sometimes the 20th century mirrors more the Middle Ages rather than the millennium. Nowhere has the unholy alliance between the state and the death industries of science and technology brought greater havoc or horror than through the deployment of modern chemical warfare. It was the horrors of chemical warfare during the First World War that instigated and propelled the international community to adopt the Geneva Protocol in 1925, some 60 years ago, banning, for the very first time, the use of chemical and bacteriological weapons of war.

But from the first moment of its adoption, the restrictions and limitations of the 1925 protocol were apparent and transparent. No limits in the protocol were placed on the development, production, transfer or stockpiling of such weapons. True, the use of chemical warfare was prohibited, but little else was done to ensure that the states would not engage their public and private might in the projection of these weapons of horror.

After World War II, the public agenda geared to curb chemical warfare was crowded off by the nuclear scare which so obsessed and preoccupied Western leadership. It was not until 1968 that chemical and bacteriological weapons were even placed back on the agenda of the United Nations Conference on Disarmament in Geneva. Finally, in 1972, a biological weapons convention was adopted and opened for signature. However, negotiations on chemical weapons lagged behind.

Twenty years later, in 1992, after a decade of complex and painstaking negotiations, the Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production, Stockpiling and Use of Chemical Weapons and on their Destruction was adopted.

This startling new form of treaty, this pre-emptive strike against these inhumane weapons, will be administered by the Organization for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons in The Hague. Unfortunately, it took the horror of chemical warfare in the late 1980s, through Iraq's use of these weapons against Iran, and through Iraq's use of these weapons against its own Kurdish population, which we all saw displayed on TV, to push and shove chemical warfare back to the top of the public agenda.

With the advent of the Persian Gulf War, a fresh sense of urgency crystallized, convincing the international community to finally complete and implement a global chemical weapons ban. On January 13, 1993, the convention was opened for signature in Paris. Canada, along with 130 other nations, signed the treaty. The convention, however, comes into force after ratification. Sadly, as of May 1995, fewer than 30 nations had filed notice of ratification with the UN Secretary General.

Canada must lead the way. Canada has a long and grand record of quiet, painstaking, intensive, diplomatic efforts to limit chemical weaponry, dating back to our ratification of the 1925 Geneva Protocol. Canada has participated in negotiations from the outset. Over the years, our governments have made a number of useful and important contributions.

Canada's special interest has been verification, which obviously involved the most crucial and significant aspects of the convention. Canada has submitted working papers, instigated meetings, and commenced trial inspections to investigate and resolve verification issues. In 1991, Canada co-sponsored two resolutions at the United Nations General Assembly, both of which were adopted by consensus.

The convention represents an unprecedented advance for the cause of disarmament and world peace. It is a startling, historic document for a variety of reasons. Let me list just a few: It is the first disarmament agreement to be negotiated within a multilateral framework; it is the first treaty to be implemented under universally applied international control; it is the first treaty that will lead to the elimination of an entire category of weapons of mass destruction; it is the first disarmament agreement in history wherein major obligations also fall upon the private industry.

Like God, the genius of this convention lies deep in its detail, down in the detailed provisions for the destruction of weapons and the facilities within time lines, all under the scope of intrusive verification. There is a comprehensive regime within the convention for monitoring the chemical industry through declarations and inspections. Each signatory state must establish a national authority to liaise with the international organization in The Hague. The practical work is supported by a technical secretariat, alive and armed with information-gathering powers and penalties for non-compliance. Detailed lists of chemicals, special investigations, regulation of trade — all of these are incorporated with great specificity.

Bill C-87 is a full faith and credit implementation of the convention as required by Article 7 of the treaty. The bill arms the federal government with the necessary authority to fully meet the requirements of the convention. This bill is unique in its unheralded support by the private sector associations, while being fully aware of the cost and burden that reporting and inspections may pose to the private sector. They have prepared enthusiastically to support these obligations.

When the chemical weapons convention finally enters into force, the frail hopes of every generation of the 20th century will have been fulfilled finally, from Canadian soldiers who suffered the horrors of mustard gas in the trenches of Ypres in World War I, an incident which is amply demonstrated and illustrated on the paintings that decorate the walls of this chamber, to the innocent men and women in northern Iraq in the recent past, to the future generations who will look back on this moment as a watershed event in global disarmament and in world history.

With the passage of this bill, Canadians will light more than a small candle against the darkness and the miseries of this decade and this century. We will ignite the hope that painstaking effort, consistency of thought and the power of purpose may yet cause the "rule of law" to emerge as the principal actor of international justice.

Honourable senators, the Prime Minister reminded us recently that next year we can celebrate the 100th anniversary of the coming to power of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Laurier said that the 20th century belonged to Canada. The 20th century has been a disappointing century in so many ways; destructive of so many hopes and so many dreams. Yet the consistent effort of Canada's diplomacy to inculcate the principles of the rule of law in this turbulent world remains the highlight of Canadian leadership in this century. Canada can lead. Canadians can triumph.

I commend this bill to you for speedy passage.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Before recognizing any honourable senator, I should point out that according to rule 13 of the Senate, at 6 o'clock it is required that I leave the Chair and come back at 8 o'clock, unless there is agreement to ignore the clock. Is it agreed to ignore the clock?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I am pleased to reply to the motion for second reading of Bill C-87. This is a straightforward bill and has been well presented by the sponsor.

Bill C-87 is required in order to implement Canada's obligations under the Convention on the Prohibition and the Development, Production, Stockpiling and Use of Chemical Weapons and on their Destruction.

There is little need for me to repeat the detailed and excellent presentation of the sponsor. However, I want to take a few moments to give some history on the use of chemical weapons during and since the Great War.

It is particularly fitting for Canada to be an early signatory to this convention. It was against Canadian and French troops at Ypres in 1915 that a chemical weapon, namely mustard gas, was first used in warfare. I note with pride that regardless of the casualties inflicted, the Canadian lines at that time held. French lines to the right of the Canadian position broke, and the troops bolted.

Mustard gas subsequently became a feature in the war, and was used regularly by all combatant nations. In 1925, the Geneva Protocol banned the first use of chemical weapons in war. However, several countries continued to develop and stockpile chemical weapons to use as a second-strike capability. Mussolini used chemical weapons in the Abyssinian campaign in 1938, leading many to conclude that chemical weaponry would be a major aspect of any war with the Axis powers.

As a consequence, U.S., Britain, France, and several other countries hastened to produce and stockpile a range of chemical weapons and a sophisticated delivery system.

Canada was one of the leaders in the development of chemical weapons and protection mechanisms; gas masks and the like. Canadian research and development took place primarily at McGill University, the National Research Council and the Suffield test centre at Medicine Hat, Alberta.

By the time the U.S. entered the war after Pearl Harbour, it had a huge inventory; tens of thousands of tonnes of mustard and other types of gas. Canada had also accumulated its own stockpile of chemical weapons, albeit on a much smaller scale. Remember that all of these stockpiles were created as defensive measures. I am reliably informed that Canada began to dispose of its arsenal some time ago, incidentally, and no longer has any chemical weapons on hand.

Ironically, Adolf Hitler, because of his own experience with gas as a German corporal in the trenches in World War I, refused to authorize German forces to use gas in any theatres during World War II. Winston Churchill, on the other hand, seriously considered using chemical weapons to forestall the advance of German forces against the British Expeditionary Force in Western Europe during the early days of the war. He asked his chiefs of staff to develop a plan for their use in the event of the invasion of the British Isles, and considered their use to clear the beachheads for the Normandy invasion.

During the latter stages of the Pacific war, the United States considered chemical weapons to speed the process of clearing Japanese troops from the islands they held across the South Pacific. Canada, and specifically the National Research Council, did everything in its power to dissuade the Americans from doing so, and the idea was dropped.

More recently, chemical weapons have been used in the Iran-Iraq war, as Senator Grafstein pointed out, and by Iraq against its own Kurdish population. The same chemical — Sarin — used by Iraq, was released against Japanese civilians a few months ago by a Japanese terrorist organization, adding a new weapon of horror to the terrorist arsenal.

Negotiations toward the convention began in 1983 through a committee chaired by a Canadian official, Ambassador Donald McPhail. The complex and arduous negotiations were completed in late 1992 and the convention was opened for signature in Paris in January, 1993. As has been said, 130 states have signed the convention. Obviously, the convention that this bill is designed to implement is a huge leap forward. Senator Grafstein very thoroughly covered the contents of the bill and I will not repeat what he said.

Honourable senators, no convention is perfect, especially one which deals with a highly technical area and has been the subject of complex negotiations for well over a decade. It is lamentable that certain states have not signed the convention; states such as Iraq, Libya and North Korea. Not surprisingly, these are the renegade states which are most likely to resort to chemical weapons.

Many countries will have difficulty disposing of their stockpiles of chemical weapons and their manufacturing facilities. The cost of doing so is staggering. It costs roughly ten times as much to dispose of weapons and manufacturers as it does to set them up, if long-term environmental problems are to be avoided.

I understand that the United States estimates the cost of safe disposal of their arsenal to be in the range of $8 billion. Russia is estimated to have 40,000 to 60,000 tonnes of substances of which the convention requires them to dispose. Given the current financial state of Russia, one wonders how quickly or how safely the job will be done. Doubtless, the international community will be asked to provide financial and perhaps technical assistance. The convention refers to sanctions which apply to states that do not abide by their commitments under the convention, but does not detail what those sanctions might be or how they might be enforced.

In view of the experience in Bosnia and Somalia, one wonders if the UN could ever mount and maintain effective sanctions.

Further, the convention will not stop terrorist groups from using chemical weapons, although it would be increasingly difficult for such groups to obtain them. Speaking personally, I worry about the percentage of some countries' disposal programs, which may include sales to terrorist groups, thus converting costly disposal into opportunities to earn hard currency, but that is a concern which perhaps only I have.

Notwithstanding these reservations, Bill C-87 represents a huge step toward a more decent and humane world free from the threat of weapons of terror and mass destruction. I congratulate those who have done the work toward the convention, and subsequently this bill, over the past decade. I congratulate both this and the previous government for their initiative and determination in pushing this measure forward.

Honourable senators, I believe this bill deserves our full support.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I did not think that, at this somewhat late time, we would review this very important legislation.

I want to say that good things do happen in the Senate. It is very rare that honourable senators can celebrate their birthday on the same day, but there are three today.

First, there is our former Speaker, Senator Charbonneau, whom I really like. He is not here today, but it is his birthday. Then there is the Honourable Senator Simard, who is here and who is also celebrating his birthday.

Finally, how could I not mention that today is also the birthday of the former vice-president of the Quebec Liberal caucus, with whom I worked very closely for at least some 20 years, and who is now the chief government whip? I am referring of course to Senator Hébert, who is also celebrating his birthday today. I invite the honourable senators to join me in wishing all three a very good end of day. Congratulations to the two honourable senators who are here with us.

Now coming back to this bill—

[English]

— I will be very brief. I strongly support this bill.

I wish to draw to the attention of members who may be interested a fascinating debate which took place in the House of Commons on June 19. I was extremely impressed by a speech made by Dr. Keith Martin, Member of Parliament for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca and a member of the Reform Party. I hope honourable senators will be curious enough to read the speech. It was of the same tenor as the speeches made earlier in this debate by Senators Kelly and Grafstein. Dr. Martin's speech is evidence that there are people in all parties who are highly devoted to these types of issues.

I have been studying the Middle East for 30 years. Politically, I was totally destroyed by that. I was pushed around politically, intimidated politically and threatened politically. I wish to put that on record for the first time. Now that I know the rules of the Senate a little better, I will some day give notice that I shall draw to the attention of the Senate the true situation in the Middle East.

I was in Lebanon two weeks ago. That was my second visit to Lebanon since January. Lebanon is a fascinating country which is getting back on its feet. There are unbelievable parallels there with Canada. Instead of a multicultural country, they have multi-confessions. They have 17 confessions. There are the Maronites, 11 Christian confessions, 5 Muslim and the Jewish faith. They are trying to build a country next to countries which do not like multi-ethnicity or multi-religions. I include every country in the region.

I know it is fascinating for honourable senators to win a debate. I am totally unprepared, but I will try to put some views forward for future reference and debate.

I had occasion to meet someone in Lebanon who said that, with my great interest, I should read a book entitled, Profits of War: Inside the Secret U.S.-Israeli Arms Network, by Mr. Ari Ben-Menashe. By the way, that person called me today. I had met this man who came from Montreal, but he gave that book to someone in Lebanon, who offered it to me. If honourable senators read that book and do not feel ill, there is nothing on earth that could offend them. It describes the underground and peddlers of arms who do not care what they sell, or to whom they sell it.

The "whipping boys" of the Americans, and some others, are terrorists in Libya and Iraq, and now in Iran. Yesterday, I met with the Iranian ambassador and had a long discussion. I know some senators will meet with him tonight. I do not see why we should not put that on the record. I will not mention names, only my own.

I want to suggest that we go to the root of the problem and find out who has sold chemical weapons. Who produced chemical weapons in Iraq, which were then used against Iranians or against their own people? Who produced those chemicals? Where do they come from in Latin America? Do they come via the CIA? We must read about that, and not be intimidated to speak out loudly and clearly, because if we want to have sanity on earth, the time has come to call a spade a spade. These peddlers of arms turn around and use our men. I remember that.

I do not want to debate the Iraq-Kuwait situation again. For many years, Iraq was well liked by the United States, espeially when it was useful in its fight against Iran. If anyone wishes to read my speeches of the past, I would be more than willing to provide copies. They are not great pieces of literature, but they are quite accurate. Who created the monster that did so much damage in Kuwait? Who used chemical arms against his own people, against his neighbour? Who, today, is still holding 690 missing persons from Kuwait?

There are so many people missing from Cyprus that a committee was formed. I hope to eventually suggest that there should be a committee to look into the issue of those people who are missing from Kuwait.

I am very concerned about the issue we are debating. It is a great step forward, as Senator Kelly said. I would say to Senator Grafstein that I totally disagree with his views on the Middle East. That fact is well known, and I do not see why I should hide it. However, I agree with his views on this bill. However, it is not enough. We have to talk about what creates instability in the Middle East and those people who believe in the balance of terror.

Recently, I was asked to see my friends in certain countries and beg them to sign the non-proliferation treaty on nuclear arms. What do we do with those who do not sign? All of that is a non-subject and one does not talk about it. There are those who may be set free by not signing, such as Iran, India or Pakistan. We trade very happily with those countries and do not pressure them.

Everyone knows that the element that creates instability in the Middle East is the fact that Israel is in possession of nuclear arms. I was destroyed for saying that 20 years ago, 15 years ago, 10 years ago, and today they still will not admit that they have them. We do not say a word, and they do not sign. We pressure Lebanon to sign, we pressure Egypt to sign, and we pressure everyone else to sign the treaty, but we do not put any pressure on those who possess those arms.

Who was in at the beginning of that new race? Many countries, including Libya, say "The Israelis have them, so we want them." The same process took place in 1945, when the Soviet Union said that the United States had nuclear arms and that they also wanted them. Then the United States discovered that the Soviet Union had nuclear arms and said that it needed bigger nuclear arms. Then the Soviet Union wanted bigger arms. From bigger to bigger yet, we arrived at a time when there were 30,000 possibilities to destroy Planet Earth. There was total craziness because of that race, and the same race is again taking place.

I can draw the same conclusion in the Middle East: "You have it, I want it." Who is helping those who say, "I want it too"? We should do some soul-searching. Canada may not be part of it, but certainly the United States is. Eisenhower said in one of his last speeches that the greatest danger to world peace was the immense danger of the military industrial complex. That is a great danger because of the need to produce arms. These arms must be used on infrastructure so that infrastructure can be rebuilt. If infrastructure is rebuilt, it must be destroyed by the most sophisticated arms in order to fabricate more sophisticated arms. That is craziness.

If this bill brings a little sanity, I am more than willing to support it. I am more than willing to pay homage to those who worked faithfully to put it forward. I am more than willing to give total agreement to both senators who introduced it in the Senate.

In the spirit of rapprochement, may I suggest that honourable senators read the speech of Mr. Keith Martin from British Columbia. He is probably English-speaking and I am French-speaking from Quebec, but perhaps I can help him and the unity of Canada by drawing the attention of honourable senators to that speech. He went further, and said that the next step should be to start looking into the peddlers of arms who are at the disposal of anyone.

We should also look at what is happening in Croatia. Recently, I travelled to Albania and heard who is selling arms. Who are the peddlers of the small arms and bombs that cause so much damage to citizens and maim people? They are available by the millions in certain countries in the world. Who is producing them? I certainly wish to tell Mr. Martin that I will give him absolute support.

If we want a sane planet, we must address every question. We must be unafraid to talk about those who refuse to sign the non-proliferation treaty on nuclear arms and then tell us to our face that they do not have them. How can I stand here and say that I believe them? I do not. They create instability in one part of the world. They create immense instability between Pakistan and India. The peddlers of those arms know what they are selling. Where do they come from?

I suggest honourable senators read some of those books. They are very enlightening because of the names that are mentioned and the events that are described. I am a curious man. I do not take anything for granted, and I am sure that my Liberal colleagues know me.

I am a French–Canadian and, being of both Breton and Norman ancestry, I am very suspicious and equally stubborn.

[English]

However, I totally support this bill. I hope it is only the first step toward more study of the peddling of small arms, which creates so much instability in many places of the world at the moment. Nuclear arms should also be studied, because the Senate could help bring more sanity to our planet.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Céline Hervieux-Payette moved the second reading of Bill C-70, to amend the Income Tax Act, the Income Tax Application Rules and related acts.

She said: Honourable senators, I rise to seek your support for Bill C-70, to amend the Income Tax Act. This bill will implement a number of measures introduced in the 1994 budget. It also implements a number of other measures announced by the government during the course of last year.

The dual goals of this bill are deficit reduction and enhanced tax system fairness. These are objectives that Canadians clearly want their government to pursue. They are the principles that have guided this government, and it has worked to restrain its spending.

Instead of imposing general tax hikes on Canadians in 1994, this government took direct aim at unsustainable tax preferences in its budget plan. With regard to the corporate tax regime, the 1994 budget sought to ensure that corporations paid their fair share of the tax revenues needed to fund government programs and to prevent certain businesses or sectors from taking undue advantage of certain tax provisions.

Accordingly, the 1994 budget proposed a number of measures to the rules governing the taxation of business income, designed to increase tax fairness and ultimately improve the competitive position of Canadian business. Bill C-70 is a key component of the measures that were taken.

One of the key issues with which Bill C-70 deals is the tax treatment of debt forgiveness and foreclosures. Under the old provisions of the Income Tax Act, many transactions involving the settlement of debt were not recognized in any meaningful way for income tax purposes. The new rules provide a comprehensive basis to deal with debt settlement. In general, they provide that forgiven debt amounts will be applied to loss carry-forwards and expenses, or partially included in the debtor's income. There are special rules contained in Bill C-70 that minimize any undue hardship from the new rules regarding debt forgiveness.

Another key area with which Bill C-70 deals is how it changes the rules regarding the tax treatment of securities held by financial institutions. Until now, the Income Tax Act has not provided specific rules regarding the tax treatment of such securities. The measures proposed in this bill seek to reduce uncertainty in this regard, and also to ensure that the income derived from such securities is measured appropriately.

The amendments provide that certain securities will be marked for market. This means that the appreciation or depreciation in the value of securities held by financial institutions will be recognized in each year instead of on disposition. To be fair, the amendments include a transitional rule that allows increases in income resulting from the new rules to be spread over five years, and the new measures are only effective after February 21, 1994.

In addition, Bill C-70 provides new rules for debt securities that are not required to be marked for market. These rules deal with the measurement of income while the securities are held, and the treatment of gains and losses on disposition.

A large part of Bill C-70 deals with reforming the rules in the ITA regarding foreign affiliates. Bill C-70 amends the rules for the taxation of resident shareholders of foreign affiliates. The changes expand the categories of income of foreign affiliates which must be reported as income of their Canadian affiliates. They also prevent the use of a foreign affiliate's active business losses to reduce Canadian shareholders' income. This last change protects the Canadian tax base.

These three measures that I have just described all flow directly from the 1994 budget. Bill C-70, however, also contains other tax changes announced during subsequent months. The key changes in this category include changes to how funeral arrangements, real estate trust and mutual trust are taxed. In addition, Bill C-70 proposes new rules to speed the resolution of tax objections and tax appeals, particularly by large corporations, and it deals with the rules regarding dividend compensation payments.

Briefly, under the heading of "funeral arrangements", Bill C-70 addresses the issue of eligible prepaid funeral and cemetery arrangements. Under this legislation, individuals making such arrangements would not have to declare interest on the deposits up to a $15,000 maximum contribution as income, provided the deposit is not withdrawn for other purposes. The provider of eligible funeral and cemetery arrangements is, however, required to include in income the full amount received from an eligible arrangement.

Under the heading "real estate trusts", Bill C-70 proposes that real estate trusts with publicly traded units be allowed to qualify as mutual fund trusts. This measure will assist the real estate sector in expanding the available methods of financing real estate.

Under the heading of "mutual trusts", Bill C-70 seeks to help mutual funds reduce overhead costs and improve service to investors. These amendments allow mutual fund corporations to convert to mutual fund trusts on a tax-free basis and also allow tax-free mergers of mutual fund trusts.

Significantly, under the heading "objections and appeals", Bill C-70 proposes new rules to speed the resolution of tax objections and tax appeals. Under Bill C-70, large corporations will now have to specify the issues under dispute, the amount of relief sought, and the facts and reasons for objecting.

The rules also limit the ability of large corporations to raise new issues in a notice of objection where the objection relates to a reconsideration of an assessment. However, new issues raised by Revenue Canada on such reconsiderations may still give rise to notice of objection. In addition, this legislation will ensure that the new requirements relating to notices of objection will not apply to assessments which have been appealed to court before this legislation receives Royal Assent.

The final measure I wish to highlight in Bill C-70 deals with the tax treatment of dividend compensation payments and other amounts connected with securities lending. The Income Tax Act currently provides that the lender of securities not be treated as having disposed of the security under these arrangements. As well, payments to the lender as compensation for dividends are treated as dividends in the lender's hands.

While these dividend compensation payments are generally not tax deductible, a special rule established in 1989 allows securities dealers to deduct two-thirds of such payments.

This legislation extends the use of the two-thirds rule, thus ensuring that our securities industry remains competitive. The deduction of these payments will be somewhat limited, but it is the government's intention to monitor these measures to make certain that they operate effectively. Other changes clarify the effects of certain dividend rental arrangements and the meaning of securities dealers registered or licensed to trade in securities for purposes of the Income Tax Act.

In closing, let me express my confidence that any objective appraisal will confirm that Bill C-70 amends the Income Tax Act effectively and equitably. It clearly aims at targeting tax assistance to certain business sectors on a more efficient basis while, at the same time, broadening the tax base.

This is an important step in sustaining government revenues, so that our deficit-reduction goals can and will be met. The legislation contained in this bill also clarifies a number of important issues related to the act. In considering the measures before us, I have no hesitation in encouraging all my honourable colleagues to support this bill.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, as the honourable senator who moved the second reading of the bill indicated, this bill is coming to us late in the day. I guess it is better late than never. In fact, it arises from measures announced in the 1994 budget.

Unfortunately, this is another bill that will not be given due consideration, for it was referred to us in the past few days, as the session draws to a close, along with several other bills.

All the same, I hope that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will review it. As I will explain later, this is not so much a routine bill as one that will have the effect of consolidating considerable revenues, certainly much more considerable than what the government seems ready to admit at present. I will give you some examples in a moment.

The bill contains measures arising from the 1994 budget that were not covered by an earlier bill, namely last year's Bill C-59.

[English]

Yes, Bill C-70 deals with other changes announced in 1994, unrelated to the 1994 budget, such as prepaid funerals, real estate investment trusts, mutual fund reorganization, income tax objection and appeals, and security lending. I will limit my intervention to some of the substantive changes found in this bill and their effects on the revenue of government.

Bill C-70 pertains to measures taken in the infamous 1994 budget — infamous because, on the expenditure side, the government did not do what was expected and, therefore, the budget is "well thought of" as a lost opportunity in terms of getting an early handle on controlling the deficit and the debt.

Despite the failures inherent in the 1994 budget, the substantive budget measures found in this bill include debt forgiveness following failures in financial institutions, as mentioned by the sponsor of the bill.

Let us deal first with the so-called housekeeping measures. Yes, Bill C-70 tackles the tax rules which apply when debt is settled by forgiveness or foreclosure. Yes, this bill expands the classes of foreign-affiliate income which Canadian shareholders must report. Last, this bill makes several changes to the rules concerning securities held by financial institutions. For example, such a firm will now report gains and losses in securities held in the ordinary course of business on their income, rather than on their capital account, and report profits and losses on certain securities on a market-to-market basis.

Thus, honourable senators, as you can see, Bill C-70 is such that it may be considered a housekeeping bill by some. In fact, it will not surprise many in this chamber to learn that the minister himself appears to regard this bill as such. It is his way of having Canadians swallow the pill without feeling the effects immediately.

However, I and other Canadians are interested to know what tax revenue implications will result from this Bill C-70 becoming law. Undoubtedly, the good investigative work of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will reveal the extent of increased tax revenue resulting from this bill, and the truth will come out.

I am sure many of my colleagues on the government side are of the mind that their government holds the line on taxes. I beg to differ. Taxes are clearly rising under this Liberal government. Bill C-70 is taking us in that direction.

Fellow senators, let us not forget that the combined effect of the 1994-1995 budget was to raise personal, business and sales taxes by more than $3 billion per year. We are back to the infamous Liberal years, "tax and spend" years.

Today, taxpayers in some provinces pay an unfortunate combined rate of federal-provincial personal income tax, as high as 54 per cent. Since October 1993, taxpayers have witnessed the elimination of the $100,000 lifetime capital gain exemption, the effect of which is most severe on seniors, many of whom will not receive their old-age supplement in this new tax year because this government required that they report their capital gains as income without having actually disposed of the asset in order to use the now-eliminated capital gains exemption.

What further tax grab have taxpayers witnessed since this government took office? This Liberal government has reduced the age credit for seniors with incomes above $26,000. This Liberal government has eliminated the exemption for employer-provided life insurance benefits.

I read the fiscal part of the Red Book as recently as last week. These new taxes and lost exemptions were not to be found in that Red Book. Many Canadians say that this Red Book is outdated. They are almost begging, at least in New Brunswick, for the 1995-96 version of the Red Book because the other one is obsolete.

I hope the government and senators on the other side will urge Mr. Chrétien to send to print the new Red Book, which I am sure is even now circulating on the benches of ministers in the other place and in other circles.

I am not in the mood for kidding or laughing because this is a serious matter. We see examples every day of $200,000 and $300,000 expenditure programs. These are expenditure programs that are dreamed up, announced or implemented by civil servants or ministers, programs for which there is no need. I suspect ministers on the government side do not know the magnitude of the deficit or the problems associated with having such a high deficit.

I wish civil servants, ministers, Liberal members and senators would bring to the attention of the Prime Minister the fact that every $200,000 program which is not needed is money wasted. They all add up. If they were to do this, then, perhaps, they would not have to resort to measures to do away with the $26,000 tax limit which applies to senior citizens.

We are all in this together, honourable senators. Canadians have been asked to make sacrifices for the last three to four years. They know that they will have to make more sacrifices for the next three to four years. Yet, we have people in the Liberal government who keep dreaming up, announcing and implementing programs galore. They say, "It will only cost $100,000," or, "It will only cost $200,000."

I am aware of one program which will see two plaques placed on a wall, which plaques show the names of the members of Parliament and senators since Confederation. The government says that it will only cost $180,000. We do not need that kind of expenditure.

I wish all of us would ensure that the government follows the Red Book, or that it writes a new Red Book. After all, the Red Book advocates lower taxes and lower expenditures, depending on the real needs of Canadians.

The Liberal government has eliminated the exemption of employer-provided life insurance benefits. It has increased excise taxes on gasoline by 1.5 cents per litre. For those Canadians who choose to fly rather than drive, the government has increased taxes on airplane tickets.

As for increases for businesses and corporations, this Liberal government reduced the deduction for meals and entertainment from 80 per cent to 50 per cent of costs. That was a good measure. However, our business people have to compete with business people from other countries. They must think about this measure. Perhaps there was another way to deal with those expenses. Certainly, this measure, although it has a good side to it, places Canadian businessmen at a comparative disadvantage with other countries competing for the limited number of businesses and corporations looking to set up business or relocate in Canada.

This Liberal government has reduced tax incentives for regional investment. Write-offs for pollution reduction equipment have been lowered, something which appears to go against the global trend to encourage investment in such equipment.

Businesses and corporations have witnessed increases in the large corporations tax, capital tax and corporate surtax, which are driving a further competitive wedge between Canada and other trading nations.

In closing, this Liberal government in its recent budget is discouraging entrepreneurs by changing the tax reporting of self-employed individuals, many of whom are Canada's ticket to the information age.

As demonstrated, this Liberal government cannot claim that this bill is revenue neutral. No, this is not a routine bill. This is a bill that will generate revenues — too much revenue. However, as I said, I encourage senators to conduct a proper assessment of this bill when it is referred to the Banking Committee. If we cannot finish the job for next week, then we can always come back in October and deal with it. After all, we have waited for it since the spring of 1994. We can wait until the fall of 1995.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

CANADIAN DAIRY COMMISSION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Dan Hays moved the second reading of Bill C-86, to amend the Canadian Dairy Commission Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a somewhat technical bill which is necessary at this time to comply with our trade obligations, specifically those that we have entered into in the new GATT-WTO agreement.

Given that strict international deadlines are involved in the issue being addressed by these amendments in Bill C-86, it is important that we expedite our discussions and, if at all possible, expedite the passage of this bill for reasons that I will explain.

In just over one month, Canada will no longer be permitted to export dairy products or products containing dairy ingredients to the United States, if the price of those products has been supported by producer levies or other forms of export subsidies. By the year 2000, this prohibition under both the NAFTA and the WTO, which replaced the GATT at the beginning of this year, will also apply to other world destinations.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, these exports are very important to our dairy industry. Producing these cheeses, bakery products, confectionery products, and other products that could be affected starting on August 1 provides employment for thousands of Canadians across the country. The aggregate value of milk production in Canada contributes $8 billion to the economy each year.

At present, Canadian milk, dairy products and products containing dairy ingredients are marketed in Canada or elsewhere according to a very fair, well-defined and proven system which was developed by our dairy industry over the years. Bill C-86 will introduce a new approach to price setting and the pooling system of market returns, which will offer similar advantages. These, too, were developed by the dairy industry.

National representatives of Canada's 26,000 dairy farmers and some 300 dairy processors and marketers appeared before the Commons Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri-food recently to clearly express their strong support for Bill C-86. Without impinging on current provincial jurisdiction or involving any cost to governments, Bill C-86 provides the federal legislative authority needed to allow the Canadian Dairy Commission to continue to work in Canada with the provincial milk marketing boards and agencies. Through their cooperative effort, a new national milk pricing system, with the pooling of producer market returns from different classes of milk use, will be put in place.

This new approach fully conforms with our trade commitments under the NAFTA and WTO agreements. Through the new system, the Canadian dairy industry can continue to supply and possibly expand its export and domestic markets for dairy products and products containing dairy ingredients while maintaining the equity which is a large part of the current supply management regime.

Under the current system, levies on every litre of milk produced in every province except Newfoundland are collected from milk producers by provincial marketing boards and agencies and remitted to the Canadian Dairy Commission. Always considered a necessary part of managing the milk marketing system in Canada as a whole, the dairy sector wishes to retain the principle of equity which has been achieved through the levy system. This wish is clearly reflected in the new pricing and pooling approach which emerged from the intensive consultations and negotiations among dairy stakeholders undertaken over the past two years, and which is enabled by Bill C-86.

Bill C-86 will allow the replication of the levy system as it applies to milk marketed in inter-provincial and export trade. Special milk classes will be created, and prices set at competitive levels according to the end use of the milk. Bill C-86 also enables the Canadian Dairy Commission to recover pooling administration costs from the funds generated by the pool itself, establish a special bank account to deal solely with producer monies entering and leaving the pool, allow the commission to return any excess fees or levied funds to producers, permit the commission to establish a line of credit to ensure continuity of producer payments, and finally, strengthen the enforcement provisions of the act.

The authorities provided to the Canadian Dairy Commission by Bill C-86 do not represent any erosion of federal or provincial powers. They allow the dovetailing of federal and provincial authorities needed for the implementation of an industry-sponsored and industry-funded new system. This system will help the Canadian dairy industry to successfully face the stiff competition ahead in the new international trading world.

Honourable senators, I urge you to add your support to this commendable industry-driven initiative.

Hon. Eileen Rossiter: Honourable senators, I rise to express the support of this side of the house for Bill C-86, which will allow the Canadian Dairy Commission to implement a national pooling system of market returns from exports of milk and dairy products.

There are two milk markets in Canada: fluid and industrial milk. Fluid milk is table milk and fresh cream. This is an area of strictly provincial jurisdiction. Industrial milk, which is used for dairy products such as yoghurt, ice cream, butter and cheese, is marketed jointly by federal and provincial governments under the National Milk Marketing Plan. This plan is based on supply management; that is, supply and demand — supply being domestic production and demand being domestic consumption. The balance is achieved through allocated Market Sharing Quota, or MSQ, to each province.

Producers receive a target price based on a cost of production formula for industrial milk produced under the MSQ and sold on the domestic market. However, they must cover the cost of exporting at world competitive prices dairy products not required for domestic consumption. At the present time, those export costs are shared by producers across Canada through levies deducted by the provincial boards from payments to producers and remitted to the Canadian Dairy Commission.

The levies are also used to provide rebates to further processors of products containing dairy ingredients. For example, companies such as Hershey or McCain use dairy ingredients in their chocolate and pizza products, and rely on obtaining them at world price levels in order to compete both on the export market and against imports on the domestic market.

These levies are now considered export subsidies under the WTO. This bill provides the necessary legislative authority for the Canadian Dairy Commission, in cooperation with the provinces, to replace the levy system with a new national pooling system of market returns.

We are pleased to support this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: When shall this bill be read a third time?

On motion of Senator Hays, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

CODE OF CONDUCT

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury, for Senator Joyce Fairbairn, moved:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to develop a Code of Conduct to guide Senators and Members of the House of Commons in reconciling their official responsibilities with their personal interests, including their dealings with lobbyists;

That seven Members of the Senate and fourteen Members of the House of Commons be Members of the Committee;

That the Committee be directed to consult broadly and review the approaches taken with respect to these issues in Canada and in other jurisdictions with comparable systems of government;

That the Committee have the power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have the power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have the power to retain the services of expert, professional, technical and clerical staff;

That the quorum of the Committee be eleven Members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented, and that the Joint Chairpersons be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, whenever six Members are present, so long as both Houses are represented;

That the Committee be empowered to appoint, from among its Members, such sub-committees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such sub-committees all or any of its power, except the power to report to the Senate and House of Commons;

That the Committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting of any or all of its proceedings;

That the Committee present its final report no later than October 31, 1995;

That, notwithstanding usual practices of this House, if the Senate is not sitting when the final report of the Committee is completed, the report may be deposited with the Clerk of the Senate and it shall thereupon be deemed to have been presented to the Senate; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

He said: Honourable senators, we have all been aware for some time of the need to restore public confidence in the institutions of government. One of the ways in which successive governments have tried to do so is through establishment of behavioral codes for public officials and parliamentarians. Each successive Prime Minister, including Prime Minister Chrétien, has refined the conflict of interest code for public office holders, but we have not yet been able to adopt a satisfactory code of conduct for parliamentarians, that is, senators and members of the House of Commons who are not public office holders.

The significant changes made already by Prime Minister Chrétien to the code for public office holders are the extension of the conflict rules to the families of the public office holders, the appointment of an ethics counsellor and the transferring of responsibility for the administration of the code and the new Lobbyist Registration Act to the ethics counsellor.

If we adopt this motion, the task of developing a code of conduct for senators and members of the House of Commons will fall to a special joint Senate and Commons committee made up of 14 members of the House of Commons and seven members of this honourable house. The members of this joint committee will be asked to develop a code, to suggest a mechanism and perhaps an officer responsible for its administration, to develop sanctions for breaches of rules of the code and to suggest how such sanctions should be enforced. The committee will have the benefit of the work of a joint committee set up by the previous government in 1992. That committee was instructed to draft legislation to deal with the whole area of conflict of interest among all parliamentarians and other public office holders.

I had the honour of being the Senate co-chairman of that committee. Donald Blenkarn, MP, was the Commons co-chairman. A number of other people here were on that committee. Some were amazed that we were able to report with all-party unanimity. Indeed we did so, and we presented the government with a bill as part of that unanimous report. However, the government of that day did not find the committee's bill entirely acceptable. It drafted another bill which the committee found unacceptable, and the whole legislative effort died on the Order Paper with the dissolution of Parliament.

This new effort should be more productive. Its mandate is more limited in scope because some steps have already been taken by the Prime Minister to strengthen the conflict code for public office holders, an ethics counsellor has been appointed and responsibilities under the Lobbyists Registration Act have been integrated into the system.

There are new political parties in the House of Commons, so it will be necessary to form a new consensus as to the behaviour concerning potential conflicts of interest to be expected of ourselves and our colleagues. I am personally delighted to see this initiative resumed so promptly in this Parliament. There should be no difficulty in reaching consensus in good time for passage of the resulting legislation during this 35th Parliament. The joint committee is to report to both Houses by October 31, 1995. Since this is a motion which affects us all equally, I urge you, honourable senators, to give this motion all-party support.

On motion of Senator Berntson, for Senator Oliver, debate adjourned.

ALTERNATIVE FUELS BILL

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN COMMONS AMENDMENTS—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kenny, seconded by the Honourable Senator Nolin:

That the Senate concur in the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill S-7, an Act to accelerate the use of alternative fuels for motor vehicles, without amendment; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.(Honourable Senator Carney, P.C.).

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this item was adjourned by Senator Carney. I understand that there is a desire to have the amendments sent to committee and returned expeditiously. I also understand that there has been discussion among senators opposite and Senator Carney.

Therefore, on her behalf, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Robertson, that the amendments be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources for consideration and report.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Sixth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs (budget—examination on the consequences of the economic integration of the European Union), presented in the Senate on 20th June, 1995.(Honourable Senator Stewart).

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. If I am not mistaken, which I may well be, we have skipped item No. 2 under Senate Public Bills. Did we not?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, this is a motion to defer the report to committee.

[English]

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, these items are similar motions which deal with budgets for various committees. With the permission of honourable senators, we are prepared to deal with them all at once.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is that agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Berntson: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of these reports.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and reports adopted.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2:00 p.m.

Thursday, June 22, 1995

The Senate met at 2:00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

CANADA COUNCIL

CLOSURE OF ART BANK

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, lend me your ears but for a brief moment on a subject which may be dear to your hearts or to which, to say the least, many of you are far from indifferent.

The topic I once again wish to draw to your attention is the March 1995 announcement that the Art Bank would be wound down and closed. Our colleague Senator Roux will address the larger context of the attack on culture and the arts later this day, hopefully before the proposed adjournment at six o'clock p.m.

Many senators support the Art Bank but may not be thoroughly familiar with its impact. I should like to quote briefly a few facts taken from the 1992 twentieth anniversary catalogue of the collection.

At that time, the collection was comprised of more than 12,000 works and is now comprised of 17,000. Approximately 75 per cent of the works in the collection at that time were rented or in circulation at any given time. More than 85 per cent of the collection had been rented at least once since being purchased.

Those who would want you to believe that the bank is a dud are wrong, wrong, wrong.

Besides its obligation to rent out to government departments and agencies, the Art Bank has always broadened its rental activities across Canada.

Did you know, honourable senators, again according to the 1992 commemorative catalogue, that more than two-thirds of the loan contracts and 40 per cent of the works rented are outside the national capital region? Rental clients have ranged from, for example, the Board of Education in Saskatoon to our Governor General's residence at the Citadel in Quebec City. Wouldn't it be nice to be there just now? I know for a fact, as do many of you, that Governor General Romeo LeBlanc was an ardent supporter of the Art Bank.

There have been rentals by institutions ranging from a secondary school in Chilliwack, B.C. to the Department of Supply and Services in Halifax, Nova Scotia. The list of locations is equally wide-ranging. Works of art have been rented from Whitehorse in the Yukon to St. John's in Newfoundland; from Victoria to Sudbury; from Paris to New York.

The Art Bank worked very well, honourable senators. Why are they trying to kill it when it was not broken?

The next episode will follow at the next sitting of the Senate.

In the meantime, perhaps honourable senators could join in vigorously opposing the decision to close this invaluable, made-in-Canada institution — the Art Bank of the Canada Council.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

THE SENATE

TIME LIMITS FOR INTERVENTIONS UNDER THE RULES

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I hope that the next few remarks will not be taken as a lecture, because they are not meant to be. However, as I will turn 70 this summer, perhaps I am entitled to give an occasional lecture.

I should like first to comment that this chamber has had a great tradition of civility and respect for one another for a long time. I see no reason why it should not continue along that path. However, something has developed in recent times that concerns me, and I should like to bring it to the attention of honourable senators.

We all remember the GST debate. Prior to that debate, in what I call "the old days", we sort of made our rules as we went along. We did not have time limits. It was really kind of nice. The GST, for better or worse, caused us to recognize that sometimes, possibly for the very best of reasons, the behaviour extended beyond the norm.

Happily, the feelings which existed at that time did not last long, but they did cause us to review our rules. The particular rule I wish to call to honourable senators' attention is 37(3) on page 39 of the Rules of the Senate which states that the sponsor of a bill and the first reply are each entitled to 45 minutes for debate. Next, rule 37(4) states that 15 minutes is the time allowed for other interventions.

Honourable senators, since that rule was agreed to and invoked, a pattern has developed in which senators who have not completed within the 15 minutes ask leave to continue his or her remarks. Initially those extensions were one to three minutes' duration.

Invariably, the Senate would grant leave. We are polite people. A senator cannot be asked to stop in mid-sentence, nor can leave be granted to finish a sentence. It does not make sense. Our habit will always be to grant leave. Now we are finding that these extensions are lasting as long as 30 to 40 minutes.

I would like to suggest three solutions to the problem: First, we harden our hearts and stick with the rules. I should hope we will not do that. Second, most senators' speeches come under the 15-minute rule and take about 15, 16 or 17 minutes. However, if the speech will take 40 to 45 minutes, generally one knows that in advance. Therefore, my suggestion is that a senator who has that problem would tell the Senate, in advance when one stands up, that the speech will take more than 15 minutes. That notice would give other senators the opportunity to state that possibly another day would be better to hear the intervention. Another option is to eliminate the rule. That is not a bad idea either. It is foolish to have a rule that we do not intend to follow exactly.

VICTORY IN EUROPE

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION CEREMONIES IN NETHERLANDS—ATTENDANCE BY VETERANS

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words to this chamber concerning my pilgrimage to the Netherlands with Canadian veterans in early May.

This is one of the greatest pilgrimages, and it made me proud to be a Canadian. There were a large number of organized activities in which our Canadian delegation took part. Everywhere our veterans were cheered and applauded. They were treated like the heroes they are.

A particular event I would like to bring to the attention of my honourable colleagues is the parade in Apeldoorn. I wish you could have all been there to see it; the longest parade of Canadian veterans in Europe since the end of the war. Just think, thousands of veterans, medals shining, walking through the cheering crowds, as if they were still young recruits. What a sight it was.

Canadians distinguished themselves during the war, and that was evident during that parade. The response of the crowd was overwhelming. Hundreds of thousands lined the streets to applaud our veterans and, in many cases, ran into the streets to hug them and present them with flowers. It was an event that will most likely never be seen again.

I also want to talk about the ceremony at Groesbeek Canadian War Cemetery, which contains the graves of 2,338 Canadians who died in the name of freedom. The veterans were honoured by the presence of Her Royal Highness Princess Margriet of the Netherlands. As you know, Princess Margriet's family came to Canada during the war and she was born here in Ottawa. For this and for the efforts of our troops in the liberating of the Netherlands, the royal family has always demonstrated their deep appreciation.

The Prime Minister of the Netherlands, Mr. Wim Kok, was also in attendance and thanked the Canadians profusely and eloquently.

Our Prime Minister was there, too. He spoke of this nation's appreciation of our veterans. He laid a wreath in commemoration of those who fought to liberate the Netherlands and did not return home.

Smokey Smith, a Victoria Cross recipient, participated as well in this ceremony, as did Messrs Wilford Kirk and Charly Forbes, recipients of the Willems Orde, the Netherlands' highest decoration for valour.

Honourable senators, the Dutch people truly appreciate what Canadians did for them during the war. They remember that when their country was oppressed by the Nazis and the people were starving, Canadians risked their lives to free them and to bring them hope — the hope of a better tomorrow.

During this pilgrimage and in particular during the Apeldoorn parade and Groesbeek ceremony, I witnessed and experienced some very emotional moments. Elderly women standing, cheering with tears rolling down their cheeks — reunions of long lost friends and the Dutch children greeting our veterans.

I was amazed to see how the Dutch children are so aware of the achievements of Canadians in their country. They offered them flowers, tulips among others, as a tribute to their courage. They thanked them for what they had done for their parents and grandparents. In the Netherlands, Canadians are heroes and their stories of great courage remain vivid from generation to generation.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senator Bonnell, I hesitate to interrupt you, but your three minutes has expired.

Senator Bonnell: Since Senator Kelly's new rule did not come in until today, perhaps I could read a few more pages for our veterans.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bonnell: These events, honourable senators, are more than I can capture with words.

Throughout this pilgrimage, the affection the Dutch people have for Canadians was very evident. Some of you may remember that after the war, the royal family and the Dutch people gave a very special gift to Canadians. They offered them the only thing they had left — a simple flower — the tulip. Since then, every year thousands of tulip bulbs are forwarded from the Netherlands to Canada and bloom each spring in a vibrant homage to the sacrifice of those who did not return.

This year, the tulip gained a very special significance. In Nijmegen, 25 years of devoted horticulture resulted in a new breed of tulip called the "Canadian veteran". No other country in the world has ever shown so much appreciation to its liberators.

It is with great pleasure that I have learned of the possibility of sending tulip bulbs of this unique breed to all our Canadian veterans who took part in the delegation. I am certain this would bring back sweet memories for those who, like me, were given the opportunity to be part of these memorial activities.

I had the privilege to meet most of the veterans selected to join the official Canadian delegation. However, I would also like to outline the wonderful participation of other Canadian veterans who travelled to the Netherlands on their own with tour groups. They came by the thousands and greatly contributed to the success of the commemorative ceremonies.

I would like to emphasize the extensive media coverage of the Apeldoorn parade and the Groesbeek ceremony, as well as other activities that took place during this pilgrimage. Among them, the CBC coverage provided an opportunity for those veterans who were unable to return to the Netherlands and, indeed, for all Canadians to see via satellite the ceremonies commemorating the end of the war in Europe. The CBC is offering a 90-minute tape of the V-E day events, including archival footage, which can be purchased directly from the CBC at a minimal cost.

This pilgrimage and the ones previously organized to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the liberation of Italy, D-day, the Battle of the Sheldt, to name a few, came under the auspices of the Canada Remembers program. Since its inception in 1993, the objectives of that program have been to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of major wartime events, as well as to ensure a greater awareness of the contribution of Canadians abroad and on the home front during the war.

I know that members of the Canada Remembers committee have worked hard to ensure proper commemoration. The results speak for themselves. Most important, however, is that the committee has succeeded in interesting Canadian children in their heritage. That, honourable senators, is priceless. A nation that cannot remember the actions of those who contributed to its growth is bound to repeat mistakes made in its past.

Through the activities of the Canada Remembers program, all Canadians, young and old, have had an opportunity to walk the path of history and to better understand and appreciate the contribution of previous generations to world peace.

All those who served overseas during the war deserve our praise and heartfelt thanks. Along with those who supported the war efforts at home, they contributed to a better world for you, for me, and for the generations to follow.

[ Senator Bonnell ]

I am thankful to those who did not hesitate to stand before the enemy to defend our way of life. Because of this pilgrimage, I have a deeper appreciation of our country and of our people.

THE HONOURABLE JACQUES HÉBERT

CONGRATULATIONS ON AWARD OF LEWIS PERINBAM PRIZE

The Hon. Jean-Louis Roux: Honourable senators, I would like to point out that one of the most distinguished members of this serene House, who unfortunately is not here at the moment, was given a prestigious award a few days ago.

In fact, Senator Jacques Hébert, the founder of an organization called Canada World Youth, received the Lewis Perinbam Award for international development.

After 25 years of extensive travel, Senator Hébert had the idea of founding Canada World Youth. He was convinced that, through an exchange program, young Canadians and young people from developing countries could learn to work together for development and peace and that the program would encourage them to do so.

Over the last 24 years, the lives of more than 20,000 young people, half of them from Canada and the other half from developing countries, have been transformed thanks to Canada World Youth.

The award came with $2,500, which Senator Hébert, in his characteristic generosity, decided to give to Canada World Youth. He admitted that if the cheque had been for one million dollars, he might have hesitated before giving it to Canada World Youth. Regardless, on behalf of each and every member of this House, including myself, and bending the customs of the Upper House a bit, I would like to ask you, Jacques, to accept our sincerest congratulations.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS COMMITTEE

CHANGE IN DATE OF FIRST PUBLIC HEARING

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, recently the Special Committee of the Senate on the Pearson Airport Agreements announced that its first public hearing would be on July 4. The committee has now decided that the first public hearing will be on July 11.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

PLIGHT OF LUBICON INDIANS—INTERVENTION OF WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, I wish to draw to your attention the fact that a group of eminent persons, under the rubric of the World Council of Churches, has made a visit to Canada to look into the plight of the Lubicon Indians. The members of that group have asked to meet with me as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples here in the Senate.

They are anxious not to intervene in the issue of the negotiations relating to the Lubicon Indian dispute. However, they are concerned that the negotiations are being delayed, and are not being dealt with expeditiously. Their concern is not so much for the leadership but rather for the plight of the individual Indians who are, in their opinion, resident in deplorable conditions at the Lubicon site.

Therefore, I would ask that the Canadian government move as quickly as possible and respect the opinions of the group of eminent persons of the World Council of Churches in order to expedite settlement of this very pressing issue.

SASKATCHEWAN

CONGRATULATIONS TO LIBERAL PARTY ON BECOMING OFFICIAL OPPOSITION

Hon. John G. Bryden: Honourable senators, I rise to extend congratulations to Lynda Haverstock and the Saskatchewan Liberal Party for — to quote from The Globe and Mail — having "vaulted past the Progressive Conservatives" to become the Official Opposition in Saskatchewan.

In the interests of fairness, I would also like to congratulate Conservative leader William Boyd for what the Saskatoon Phoenix refers to as the "Great Escape". The capture of five seats proves that the Conservative Party in Saskatchewan is not dead.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Like the Liberals in Ontario.

Senator Bryden: It has avoided the oblivion that the party has been consigned to in my province of New Brunswick, and indeed at the federal level. Perhaps they would be better off dead and then, Lazarus-like — as happened in Ontario — they could rise at some point in the future.

At any rate, congratulations to all.

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, we may also wish to congratulate the national leader of the Progressive Conservative Party for his guidance, the party having reached 20 per cent in the polls today.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED, PRINTED AS APPENDIX AND ADOPTED

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the sixteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources concerning Bill S-7, to accelerate the use of alternative fuels for motor vehicles.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Carney: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(g), I move that the report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. John Sylvain, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Thursday, June 22, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

NINETEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-70, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Income Tax Application Rules and related Acts, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, June 21, 1995, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN SYLVAIN
Deputy Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Céline Hervieux-Payette: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-82, to amend the Royal Canadian Mint Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 57(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT
CANADA PENSION PLAN
CHILDREN'S SPECIAL ALLOWANCES ACT
UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-54, to amend the Old Age Security Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Children's Special Allowances Act, and the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. B. Alasdair (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 57(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, leave has been given for second reading of Bill C-54 later this day. Have copies of that bill been distributed? I refer to amendments to the Old Age Security Act and various other acts which I think are rather important. Before we give the bill second reading later this day, we should at least have an opportunity to see the bill. I have not had an opportunity to search it out. This chamber should be a little bit more deliberate in its approach to matters such as this.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, I take the admonition from Senator Doody.

Senator Doody: It was a request.

Senator Graham: I understood there had been agreement on all sides that we could proceed, with leave, to the second reading of these two bills. We will endeavour to ensure that the bills are in the possession of all honourable senators. If they are not, we shall not proceed with them today.

Motion agreed to and bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO TABLE INTERIM REPORT ON STATE OF FINANCIAL SYSTEM IN CANADA

Hon. John Sylvain: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, June 27, 1995, I will move:

> That, notwithstanding usual practices, if during the summer adjournment the Senate is not sitting when the interim report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the state of the financial system in Canada and in particular its review of the 1992 reform legislation is completed, the report may be deposited with the Clerk of the Senate and it shall thereupon be deemed to have been presented to that Chamber.

CIVIL JUSTICE REVIEW

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, pursuant to rule 56(1), 56(2) and 57(2), I give notice that I will call the attention of the Senate to the first report entitled "Civil Justice Review" on the joint review of the civil justice system in Ontario by the Ontario Court of Justice and the Ministry of the Attorney General of Ontario, co-chaired by the Honourable Mr. Justice Robert Blair and the Assistant Deputy Attorney General, Ms Sandra Lamb, and, in particular, Chapter 16 of the report entitled, "Focus on Family Law"; and to some recent trends in the practice of civil litigation and family law, and some recent developments in matrimonial and custodial disputes; and to the use of malice, untruth, false statements under oath, and perjury, in judicial proceedings in the practice of family law.

ELECTIONS CANADA

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT PROCESS—TRANSMISSION OF MAPS BY CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, earlier today I gave notice to the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate of a question I intended to ask at this time. Since I sent the notice, I have received the information I was seeking. I hope my friend has the same information. Therefore, I would ask her to place it on the record in reply to the following question.

Because Bill C-69 was not passed yesterday, the suspension of the existing boundaries process ended at midnight last night. Under the law, the Chief Electoral Officer is obliged to transmit the revised maps which are in his possession to the Speaker of the House of Commons today, and the Speaker is obliged to table those maps forthwith.

Has the Chief Electoral Officer transmitted those maps to the Speaker, and has the Speaker tabled the maps in the House of Commons?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Murray did indeed send a note to my office this morning. I believe he has more information than I have with respect to this matter.

As honourable senators will know, the Chief Electoral Officer is an independent agent of Parliament. This matter falls very much within his jurisdiction and the jurisdiction of the Speaker of the House of Commons. At the moment, I have no knowledge of whether or not those maps have been transmitted. Indeed, we may have a further indication from the Speaker of the House of Commons this afternoon.

I do not have the knowledge that Senator Murray has indicated he possesses.

Hon. Lowell Murray: I cannot vouch for it, honourable senators, because I have not spoken directly to either the Chief Electoral Officer or to the Speaker of the House of Commons. However, the information I received coming in to this chamber is to the effect that the maps from Elections Canada would be delivered to the Speaker of the Commons by 4 o'clock today. It is the intention of the Speaker to table them, as he is obliged to do, forthwith upon receipt.

LITERACY

AUTHENTICITY OF KITS RELEASED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mabel M. DeWare: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. This morning, I attempted to understand a little better all the fuss and fuddle duddle that was generated yesterday by some members in the other place with respect to the recently released literacy booklet.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Watch your language!

Senator DeWare: After reading an article in The Globe and Mail and another in the Ottawa Sun, I called the Movement for Canadian Literacy. Unfortunately, they were unavailable, and unable to give me any indication of what all the fuss was about.

I then called the National Literacy Secretariat, and explained to the person who picked up the call that I wished to have some information on what the fuss was about. I was informed that the director general was in a meeting and would return my call later. When I asked to speak to other members of the National Literacy Secretariat, I was told they were all in a meeting. When I asked if there would be a call back, I was told that they would be in a meeting all day. Everyone at the National Literacy Secretariat will be in a meeting all day! I thought that was interesting.

With due respect, honourable senators, I must tell you that I did get a call back from the Movement for Canadian Literacy, from someone who tried to explain to me what the fuss was all about.

Literacy skills mean more than being able to read and write, or being able to cuss and curse. People with strong literacy skills are able to take full part in the economic, political and social life of this country. Literacy skills contribute to self-esteem. People who have good skills are more likely to have the confidence and the knowledge to function constructively in our increasingly complex society.

The children of people with weak literacy skills do not necessarily grow up without literacy skills, but studies suggest that if they grow up in an environment that is not conducive to learning, they are less likely to get the nurturing, support, and understanding they must have to acquire adequate literacy skills.

Perhaps the minister can assure us that the kit released on June 12 will go some way to assisting lifelong learning in people without strong literacy skills.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank Senator DeWare for her question, because it is a very important question. I welcome the opportunity to answer it.

I should like to tell members of the Senate that this important project is an effort to combine the expertise of people in the criminal justice field, the crime prevention field, and the literacy field to work together for the first time in Canada at the community level, and to try to work with adults at risk.

The project was approved and signed originally by a colleague and friend of Senator DeWare's, the former Minister of Human Resources, Bernard Valcourt. It has been developed over a period of almost three years, and is under a coalition of the National Associations Active in Criminal Justice. This is a group which spans all of the important groups in this country.

If I may, I should like to read out a list of the members of this association so that senators will know the thoughtfulness, care, and expertise that have gone into the production of the documents that were released by the association in a press conference on Parliament Hill a week or so ago.

That association includes L'Association des Services de Réhabilitation social du Québec, the Canadian Association of Elizabeth Fry Societies; the Canadian Association of Native Courtworkers; the Canadian Association for Community Living; the Canadian Bar Association; the Canadian Criminal Justice Association; the Canadian Psychiatric Association; the Canadian Psychological Association; the Canadian Training Institute; the Canadian Mental Health Association; the Church Council on Justice and Corrections; the National Association of Friendship Centres; the National Association of Women and the Law; the Prison Arts Foundation; the Saint Leonard's Society of Canada; the Seventh Step Society of Canada; the John Howard Society of Canada; the Network: Interaction for Conflict Resolution; the Salvation Army Correctional and Justice Services Department; and the YMCA of Montreal.

This core group put the project together. They were assisted by almost eighty other organizations from every province represented by senators in this house: outstanding literacy groups, criminal justice groups, church groups, and seniors groups. They have all come together to provide assistance in learning and training for people at risk in the communities of this country.

There was discussion yesterday in the other place about one of the pamphlets, which indeed was produced by young people — themselves at risk — in their language and through their experience, in order for adult Canadians to understand how to help them. It was suggested that one pamphlet was being sent across the country to schools and to students, to be used in some way in the curriculum for young people.

This morning I spoke with the President of the John Howard Society of Canada. He assures me that all of the material in this kit, which is an excellent project, is being directed to the network of groups that is dealing with Canadian associations, the experts who have put this program together. It has been made available to members of Parliament on both sides.

However, it is not being distributed to schools in this country. That is not the purpose of the material. The purpose is to direct a focus in our communities, not on crime but on crime prevention, and the important place that learning and literacy holds in the development of skills and self-esteem for Canadians at risk.

Honourable senators, I have given a long answer on this question because I feel strongly about this subject. The groups and the people who have taken great care in putting this kit together are the ones who have the skill and the expertise for this kind of training, and they should be congratulated rather than condemned.

CANADIAN HERITAGE GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS PUBLISHED UNILINGUALLY—INFRACTION OF POLICY ON OFFICIAL LANGUAGES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest: Honourable senators, I have a question relating to the implementation of the Official Languages Act, which is the responsibility of Minister Dupuy.

I imagine that the honourable minister is back from Budapest, and I hope he was informed that the International Olympic Committee had rendered its decision.

Yesterday, in answer to Senator Nolin, the Leader of the Government indicated that she would talk to Minister Dupuy about a guide published in English only by an organization which is subsidized by the Canadian government.

Today, we learned that there is a problem not only in the sports arena, but also in the field of science and technology. Indeed, the Museum of Science and Technology of Canada decided to publish in English only a magazine on astronomy, because of budget cuts.

I ask the question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate because, when the Minister of Canadian Heritage appeared before the official languages committee, he pledged that budget cuts would not affect in any way the implementation of the Official Languages Act, and that this was a government priority.

However, just this week, the Senate was informed of two very serious breaches of the principle of language equality in Canada. If the leader did indeed promise to talk to Minister Dupuy, I want to ask her if she told him about Senator Nolin's question and if she can approach him again — it is always a good thing to do in his case — and inform him of what is going on at the Museum of Science and Technology?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should say to my honourable friend that I did not have an opportunity today to discuss this personally with my colleague Mr. Dupuy. However, my comments of yesterday are very much the comments of Mr. Dupuy and the Government of Canada. The honourable senator is giving news to me today on yet a second indication of a clear infraction of the Government of Canada's policy on official languages. I will be happy to take this matter up with my colleague.

Honourable senators, I think I am on strong ground, however, in saying, as I did yesterday, that any materials emanating from an organization associated with the Government of Canada must be made available in both official languages — any documents that are being relayed to the general public relating to any aspect of projects or programs. If it was relevant with regard to the Canadian Sports Guide, it is equally relevant in the document to which my honourable friend has drawn my attention. I will certainly pass that on to Mr. Dupuy. I am sure that he shares, perhaps even more vociferously than I do, the comments that I have made.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I will state my question in English — not so that people will understand, but perhaps I will say less in English than I would in French.

I am getting tired of this situation. I have been sitting in Parliament for 30 years. I wanted to speak today because I thought that it was the last day before we adjourn until next week to celebrate not what I call la fête des Québécois but la fête des Canadiens français — and I do not need a translation there. Here, again, another such event has taken place, and it should not have happened. I am not blaming Mr. Dupuy, I am talking in general here. This type of action makes you feel like using the language used in the pamphlet "Making Scenes Between the Lines". Perhaps that should be the language we should use in Canada in order to be understood.

Each minister of the Crown of Canada is a guardian. Each minister of Canada should give directives to their subordinates to remind them what Canada is all about.

I will not campaign for the referendum if they do not understand that. All of them — that is, Crown corporations and others — should understand what this country is all about. If they do not, unfortunately, there will be very few of us to preach for them.

As the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the honourable senator sits in cabinet. Please remind these people of what I have said.

I attended a meeting just a couple of days ago. Everything was in English and another language that I like but it was not French. Someone said, as a joke, "Well, everything is all right today; everything is bilingual." I do not mind wisecracks, but they must not be the official stance of that person. The minister was present, so it was a good joke. I have been taken as a joker before.

Please, let there be people who are reasonable. We are getting fewer and fewer. It is not a question of speaking both languages. One senator told me the other day that he thought I was attacking them. I do not care if a minister or senator speaks only English, as long as he or she accepts the concept of what the country is all about. I have known ministers who were perfectly bilingual but they neither accepted in their heart nor understood what this country is all about.

I have said enough for today. That is why I prefer to say it in English. In French, I think I would have shocked a lot of my colleagues.

Sometimes enough is enough. We count on the leader to remind her colleagues that they do not need to go to Berlitz to learn their French, as long as they understand what this country is all about. The honourable senator has those responsibilities on our behalf here.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in response to the question posed by Senator Prud'homme, I accept that responsibility as a member of the cabinet.

I also know and understand the passion and anger behind my honourable friend's remarks. He has fought for this issue throughout his political career, as has Senator Jean-Robert Gauthier, Senator Pierre De Bané and other colleagues on both sides of this house.

I also remember that when I first came to Parliament Hill there was no simultaneous translation in these buildings. I understand that they are important from the other side as well.

Senator Prud'homme: We are not blaming you.

Senator Fairbairn: No, I am not taking it as blame. I am articulating the understanding of what is behind the honourable senator's obvious anger and passion, as I said earlier.

Senator Prud'homme: No, not anger.

Senator Fairbairn: I assure my honourable friend that this is an issue that I certainly will pass on to all of my colleagues. I take Senator Rivest's question as seriously because this is wrong. It should not be countenanced. It should not be repeated. This is a country in which that procedure is part of the law. In fact, it is more than the law. It is part of the soul of this country, and it should be respected.

LITERACY

MAKING SCENES BETWEEN THE LINES PAMPHLET— TARGETTED ADULT MARKET—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, I have a follow-up question to Senator DeWare's question regarding the kit that has been published called, "Making Scenes Between the Lines".

For those senators who are not totally aware of it, this is a kit, and within it is a collection of plays which are written by street kids of high school age.

I am very pleased to hear the minister say that this kit will not be distributed within our schools, because I certainly would not want our children to have access to the terminology that one finds in the lines of these plays.

Senator Fairbairn's press secretary, Barbara Nault, said that the kit, designed by 80 organizations which work with literacy problems and with people in trouble with the law, is intended only for adults.

Honourable senators, one particular play in this kit contains language that certainly would be considered unacceptable in this chamber.

I should like to know which adults the minister is talking about when she says that this information will be distributed to adults.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, all of the pamphlets within this kit are distributed throughout the network of the 80-plus organizations which have worked on this project and are working at the community level to try to help adults at risk, in terms of their association with the law and in terms of their literacy skills, which are very much a part of it.

The language in the document to which the honourable senator refers certainly would not rest easy on the ears of anyone in this chamber. There is no question about that. In fact, that is noted within the document itself.

The document was not changed. It was written by young people on experiences which they have had with the law, with the police, with parents, with principals and with teachers. Their experiences are the kind which promote the rage or the humility which causes them to do the things which put them into conflict with the law. The document says to adults what the whole package says; that is, "Understand us. Understand our problems and our language. Understand where we come from so that we, too, can be helped to learn."

This is not a training document to be be used for teaching in schools. This document is for community groups of adults who are interested in helping others in that community to better understand what makes people go off the rails. That is why it is there.

Sometimes, honourable senators, in order to understand the problems of other people, we need to listen to their experiences in their own words. This is one pamphlet of a wide variety of documentation which is representative of groups across this country who deal every day with this issue.

This is the first time in the history of our country that the streams of crime prevention, criminal justice and literacy have come together in a partnership to try to work for the betterment and safety of the communities of this country. That is what this document is all about.

Indeed, there is some tough medicine in one of them, but it is there for a purpose. The purpose is to sensitize adults to what is going on in the minds of some of the young people in this country so that parents, community groups, churches and seniors are better able to help them, and pull them away from what you have read in that pamphlet.

Senator Cochrane: Honourable senators, I know what the purpose is of these documents. I have dealt with literacy for years. In fact, I have been a teacher for 22 years. Still, I am afraid that this literature will get into the hands of school children, and I do not think they should be subjected to words of this nature. We have fantastic literature available. They can read better things than this. The minister is saying that these kits will be sent out to various groups, but I am afraid they will get into our schools, which I do not think is acceptable.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senator, the people who are responsible for developing this program are responsible for distributing it as well. They have told me categorically that this information is not for classrooms. This is not a curriculum for teaching young people in this country. This is, in fact, a cry for help from some young people who are not in the position of many whom we know, but who are living in risky situations with the possibility of offending the law. Parents who have problems reading and writing need assistance in how to deal with some of these problems. That is its purpose, honourable senators. It is not for circulation in schools.

I saw the television program last night. I do not know how the material got to the school, except that there was a story to be written and, all of a sudden, there was the material. I regret that, but that is not its purpose. There are very tough places in this country, and people need to understand them better in order to prevent situations which lead to crime.

REQUEST FOR KITS FOR SENATORS

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate send copies of this kit to every senator in order that they may know exactly what I am talking about?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the kits are not mine to distribute, but I can contact the National Associations Active in Criminal Justice that have made these kits available to any member of Parliament in the Senate or the House of Commons.

CANADA COUNCIL

ROYAL WINNIPEG BALLET—LOSS OF STUDENT GRANTS DUE TO BUDGET CUTS—POSSIBILITY OF ALTERNATE FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, the Canada Council has served notice on the Royal Winnipeg Ballet, the advisory council of which I am a member, that the money granted to its professional school — a sum which has never been large — will soon vanish. In cutting the budget of the Canada Council, the government is forcing the council to make choices between the country's major cultural institutions — in this case, between our second oldest company, the National Ballet of Canada, and the Royal Winnipeg Ballet.

Had that choice been made two decades ago, this country would likely never have known the artistry of Evelyn Hart who, when she found she could not develop her immense talent at the National Ballet school, developed her talent in Winnipeg at the Royal Winnipeg Ballet school.

Given that the Canada Council no longer has funds to make even the most minor contribution to costs, which can be more than $12,000 a year, will the Leader of the Government in the Senate enquire of the Minister of Human Resources Development and report back to this chamber on those programs in his ministry which might assist Canada's younger artists to get the practical training they need and deserve for dance as well as an academic education?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be pleased to do that. I will also make inquiries as to where else within government that kind of assistance might be found.

Senator Spivak will know, as does everyone in the country, that these are very tough economic times. Some very tough decisions have been made. At the same time, we value tremendously the cultural entities in this country which have been inspirational over the years. I will certainly look into the matter.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL

June 22 1995

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Charles Gonthier, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 22nd day of June 1995, at 6:00 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

Yours sincerely,

Anthony P. Smyth
Deputy Secretary, Policy, Program and Protocol

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate
Ottawa

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT BILL, 1995

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before proceeding to Orders of the Day, I wish to raise a point of order on an item which appears on the Orders of the Day. Honourable senators know that a deferred vote on Bill C-69 is to take place at 5:30 this afternoon.

My point of order is to request that the Speaker determine if there will be any purpose served by this vote, in light of the fact that Bill C-69 lapsed as of midnight last.

[Translation]

To sum it up, since Bill C-69 has lapsed, of what use will it be to hold a vote on an item which no longer has any reason to be on the order of business?

[English]

You will recall that Bill C-18, which was to suspend the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act reads in section 2 as follows:

> 2.(1) The operation of subsection 20(2) and sections 21 to 28 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act is suspended until such time as Parliament makes other provision in respect of those sections.
>
> 2.(2) If no other provision is made in respect of subsection 20(2) and sections 21 to 28 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act before June 22, 1995, that subsection and those sections cease to be suspended and are in force subject to this Act.

The summary, which is included in the act, on the inside front page, says in part, as an explanation for the purpose of the act:

> This enactment suspends the operation of certain provisions of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act until the earlier of the enactment of new electoral boundaries readjustment legislation and June 22, 1995.

In his remarks yesterday, on behalf of the government, Senator Stanbury stressed repeatedly the importance of moving quickly on Bill C-69, confirming that the deadline for passage for it to come into force was before June 22, 1995.

As a matter of fact, he could not have been clearer on this point when he said:

> If this bill is to become legislation before the end of the suspension to June 22 provided by Bill C-18, it must have Royal Assent tonight.

That is a quote from the government spokesman recorded yesterday, June 21. Today is June 22. The deadline for Bill C-69 to become legislation has passed, as confirmed by the statement of Senator Stanbury on behalf of the government yesterday.

It seems obvious, then, that Bill C-69 serves no purpose in remaining on the Order Paper. Any vote to adjourn the debate on it will be of no value, as the purpose of Bill C-69 can no longer be met since it did not receive Royal Assent yesterday.

In other words, Your Honour, in light of my interpretation of the legal status of Bill C-69, the same interpretation which was given to us yesterday by Senator Stanbury while speaking on behalf of the government, I ask that you rule redundant the vote scheduled for 5:30 and order it cancelled.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the legislation is still before us. Presumably, the opposition considered the legislation very much alive; otherwise, they would not have moved the adjournment.

Let me explain, honourable senators. Bill C-18, the predecessor legislation, states that if no new process is in place by June 21, the old process starts up again. It does not say that the old process cannot be stopped at any time if, indeed, it happened to resume.

Senator Gauthier: Repeat it slowly.

Senator Stewart: Go slowly. They are having difficulty.

Senator Fairbairn: Repeat it.

Senator Graham: It reminds me of a story.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You are on safer ground there.

Senator Graham: The story is about a gentleman who was trying to get through to a — I almost used the term "dense audience" but I refrained. You have to start out by telling them what you are going to tell them, and then you tell them, and then you tell them what you told them and hope they understand.

Bill C-69 has no date for implementation. When it is passed, and it is still before us, a new process would begin and the old process would die.

If the deadline of June 21 is missed, it does not mean that the Electoral Boundaries Act can never be amended or changed, because Parliament is supreme. I refer honourable senators to Bill C-69 at page 22, clauses 37 and 38. When this bill comes into effect:

> 37. The Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act is repealed.
> 38. The Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Suspension Act, 1994, chapter 19 of the Statutes of Canada, 1994, is repealed.

Honourable senators, this legislation is still before the Senate. It is still before Parliament. We intend to proceed with the vote at 5:30.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: It would appear, honourable senators, as if we have before us a problem of statutory interpretation. In my opinion, Bill C-69 has become, what we call in law, dead letter, because it has a deadline, that is, June 21, 1995, since the bill says before June 22. Therefore, at midnight on June 21, the legislation lapsed.

Senator Graham says it is still in effect. Bill C-69 repeals the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Suspension Act, 1994.

I would agree with him, if Bill C-69 had been approved by midnight last night and had received Royal Assent. As Bill C-69 was not adopted, clauses 38 and 39 are now meaningless.

[English]

The substantive law before us now is Bill C-18, the famous chapter 19 of the Statutes of Canada, 1994. Paragraph 2(2) of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Suspension Act states:

> If no other provision is made in respect of subsection 20(2) and sections 21 to 28 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, before June 22, 1995, that subsection and those sections cease to be suspended and are in force subject to this Act.

I wish to emphasize that the legal enactment is not on but before June 22. Legally speaking, we have been on June 22 for more than 15 hours. Obviously Parliament did not comply with paragraph 2(2) of the act quoted above.

• (1520)

Therefore, Bill C-69, has lapsed. As we say in French law, "l'article est caduc."

Section 6 of the Interpretation Act also applies to this case.

[Translation]

The now defunct Bill C-18, to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, lapsed as of the first second of June 22, 1995. Subsection 2(2) of this legislation is very clear, both in French and in English.

Bill C-69 was to receive Royal Assent before June 22 — in other words, yesterday before 23 hours 59 minutes and 59 seconds. Even if the bill was not defeated in Parliament as a result of a formal vote, it has now lapsed, since it did not receive Royal Assent before June 22, 1995.

[English]

In a way nothing is before us. The only objective of Bill C-18 was to suspend the process until June 21 at the very last moment; that is, before June 22. The act, in my opinion, no longer has any effect.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Your Honour is being asked to rule on a point of order raised by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate ,whether or not you should strike down a piece of legislation. I heard the honourable senator say that since this legislation no longer has any value, it should not be on the Order Paper. We should not take the vote. Is that not what he said?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Correct.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator admits that that is what he said. That is a request of Your Honour that I have never heard before.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We have never had this situation before.

Senator Olson: I have been around the Senate and the other place for approximately 38 years. I do not think that any Speaker has ever been asked to rule on whether or not a piece of legislation is useful. If that had been a possibility, there were 10 years when one could have risen almost every week and made the argument that the legislation was useless.

I am trying to be helpful to Your Honour in making a determination as to whether or not there is a valid point of order. I will not get into all the gobbledegook that has been handed to us, that this is on a certain date and that is on a certain date.

Your Honour is being asked to decide whether we should proceed to the vote. I do not know if we are voting on the bill or voting to adjourn at 5:30 p.m. The first vote that we should take, if we ever get that far, is whether or not we should adjourn. That is the vote that was deferred.

I do not think Your Honour will find anywhere in the precedents or in all the authorities written about parliamentary procedure that one can ask, under a point of order, whether or not legislation has any use or any value.

That is the very narrow point of order raised by the Leader of the Opposition. To me, it is simple. Bill C-69 is before this house and, therefore, it is up to this house to determine whether it should be disposed of and the manner in which it will be disposed of.

If it passes — and I do not know whether or not it will — there are law officers in the Department of Justice, and others, who will decide what to do with it and whether or not it is valid for the purposes it was introduced.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have wished to have an opportunity to use the word "specious", and I now have that opportunity. The argument put forward by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate is specious. I will give honourable senators an example of what that word means.

Clause 38 of the bill states:

> The Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Suspension Act, 1994, chapter 19 of the Statutes of Canada 1994, is repealed.

Senator Beaudoin's argument is that that particular clause is a nullity, by reason of the fact that the date specified in chapter 19 is now behind us.

That seems to be a reasonably good argument.

However, Clause 37 states:

> The Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act is repealed.

In other words, the electoral boundaries regime which prevailed before the enactment of what we have been calling Bill C-18 was reinstated, and the effect, which is now before this house, would be to replace that prior regime with the one set forth in the bill.

It seems to me that on the face of the proposed legislation Senator Beaudoin's argument will not stand.

However, there is another point. The honourable senator seems to imply that by the enactment of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Suspension Act, 1994, Parliament had bound its successors. That is an unusual line of constitutional interpretation. I should have thought that he would have argued that the subsequent statute, provided that it was not impaired by some constitutional consideration, would always overrule an earlier statute.

That, I would think, would be the principle of statutory interpretation that would apply here, if it were necessary to go that far.

The truth is that the matter can be settled simply by reading the words proposed to appear in clause 37, namely:

> The Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act is repealed.

The implication is that it is repealed and replaced by the regime set forth in this bill.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: I would like to ask Senator Stewart a question. If Bill C-69 is passed and becomes law after midnight yesterday, in other words today, or next week, that means that after June 22, Bill C-69, through the application of clauses 37 and 36 that the honourable senator has just read, cancel the application of the old process, but only as of the date of the coming into force of the new act.

My question is the following: Does the coming into force of the new act sometime next week, hypothetically, mean that by repealing the old process, we are also repealing what was done today under the old process — and quite obviously done legally? I submit that it does not and I would like to hear your answer.

• (1530)

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I thought I had covered that ground. Let me try again.

My understanding of the situation is that the operative clause is clause 37. That is, if Bill C-69 is enacted, clause 37 causes the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act — the old and basic statute — to be repealed, and, at the same time, because of the other clauses in Bill C-69, a new scheme for the establishment of electoral boundaries will come into force.

Bill C-18, we set aside. We go back to the original regime until such time as Bill C-69 is enacted. When Bill C-69 is enacted, the older regime is replaced by the new regime set forth in the bill now before this house.

Senator Nolin: If I may, everything done legally under the old regime is valid. We learned earlier that the Chief Electoral Officer will produce the maps today or tomorrow, and that action will be valid under the old process. It remains valid if we follow the Interpretation Act of Canada. It will remain valid even if we repeal the act under which action was taken.

Senator Stewart: I would argue, honourable senators, that anything done under the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act is valid. The point is that clause 37 will repeal that act. As of the moment this bill receives Royal Assent, if indeed it does, there will be a new regime. Those will be the rules of the game from that point on.

I am not saying that anything done today, producing the maps and so on, will have been illegal. In fact they are required, as I understand it, under the law which prevails as of this hour.

This bill proposes to supplant that law.

[Translation]

Senator Nolin: I have a supplementary question for Senator Stewart. Does he agree that Bill C-18, in chapter 19 of the statutes of 1994, only had a temporary life that it was an implementing law which lapsed at midnight last night?

[English]

Do you agree with that?

Senator Stewart: There is no problem in any case. This bill will repeal the act.

Senator Nolin: Why have they included that clause in Bill C-69? We think that Bill C-69 has to be operative before June 22, not starting today or at some later date. Clause 38 is there because the only valid period for Bill C-18 was from the date of its enactment until last night at midnight.

That is why Bill C-69 was properly written, including clause 38. If Bill C-69 can be enacted on June 22 or after, clause 38 is irrelevant.

We are faced with a clause that says nothing which is contrary to the Interpretation Act of Canada, so we have a problem.

Senator Stewart: I notice that this bill, honourable senators, was passed by the House of Commons on April 25. Obviously, clause 38 was included against the possibility that the bill would become an act of Parliament before the date mentioned in it. That date has passed. This clause will in effect be a nullity. That does not affect the validity of the other clauses of the bill.

Senator Nolin: Bill C-18 refers to the suspension of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act for a specific period of time. It was from the date of enactment of chapter 19 up until last night at midnight, so Bill C-18, chapter 19 has now lapsed. We do not need it. It is no longer a valid act.

If we follow the argument that Bill C-69 can become an act at any time, why include clause 38? We do not need that clause any longer, if we follow the reasoning of Senator Stewart. Our reasoning is that Bill C-69 can only be enacted before June 22 and not on June 22.

Senator Berntson: This bill is a dead letter.

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I have only one concern on the point of order. Senator Olson asked very definitively for a position. I know he would not want to compete with another Western Canadian. That is my only point. Senator Olson has ambitions about which I do not know but I am sure they are worthwhile.

Hon. Sharon Carstairs: It is clear that if we are to accept the logic as proposed by Senator Nolin, we could never adjust the boundaries in Canada. He seems to be implying that it has been suspended in perpetuity as a result of the fact that we did not pass it by June 22, 1995. That is clearly an illogical proposition.

Honourable senators, the summary on page 1a of Bill C-69 clearly states:

> This enactment repeals the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and sets out a new régime for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions and the readjustment of electoral boundaries....

That is the principal purpose of Bill C-69.

The second purpose, and it is only a secondary purpose, is to repeal the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Suspension Act, 1994, if that act is still in effect and in force. It is not still in effect. In fact, it died last night.

Therefore, Bill C-69 is amending the Electoral Boundaries Adjustment Act which is a perfectly logical, reasonable and democratic action.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I would like to suggest to the Senate that the Liberals are reviving the old trick of 1957 when they coerced Mr. Speaker René Beaudoin of the House of Commons on a Monday into declaring that he did not see the clock, and Monday is now Friday. That is what you are asking His Honour the Speaker to do in this case.

[Translation]

Senator Nolin: To answer a query from Senator Carstairs, I believe that, since she refers to the explanatory notes on Bill C-69, the purpose of Bill C-69 is to respond to subsection 2(1) of Bill C-18 passed in 1994, which says:

> The operation of subsection 20(2) and sections 21 to 28 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act is suspended —

This is the important part:

> — until Parliament legislates other provisions relating to these sections.

That is what Bill C-69 is supposed to do. In other words, during the time the legislation is suspended, as clearly specified in Bill C-18, Parliament legislates a replacement for the former process. However, this period came to an end last night, so Bill C-69 has now lapsed. The bill is no longer useful.

I realize there is some confusion about this and that we may find ourselves in a legal vacuum. The decision is yours. It is suggested that Bill C-69 no longer exists, but the decision is still yours.

[English]

Senator Beaudoin: This is not the first time in this Parliament that we have had a statute of a temporary nature. There is nothing mysterious about an act suspending the operation of another act, or sections of another act for a period of time. It is merely a temporary legislative measure. However, if Parliament does that, we must comply with a legislative measure of a temporary nature. That is what chapter 19 is all about. Chapter 19 states clearly that it ceases to be suspended if no other provision is made before June 22. Subsection 20(2) and sections 21 to 28 have ceased to be suspended and are in force. There is no legal vacuum at all.

I did not say that Parliament will never be able to legislate in the field of electoral boundaries. Of course, it may do that every day if it wishes. However, that is not what has taken place here. You cannot change the facts. The facts are that yesterday, before midnight, no Royal Assent was given to a bill of a temporary nature.

Honourable senators, it cannot be otherwise. I did not say that Parliament may not do anything else; it is up to Parliament to decide. However, in my opinion, the meaning of this statute is very clear. It is not a case of one Parliament binding another; it is a case of one statute suspending articles of another for a certain time. If Parliament, rightly or wrongly, does not act before the end of the statutory delay of June 22 — that is, midnight yesterday — we come back to the law. There is no legal vacuum. Of course, they may table the electoral maps this afternoon. There is no problem with doing that. If Parliament is unsatisfied, Parliament will change the law.

However, one thing is clear: that is that Bill C-18 was not complied with. You say that Bill C-69 abrogates two other statutes. A statute that has not been adopted by Parliament and a statute that has not received Royal Assent cannot abrogate any other statute of Parliament.

Some Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Beaudoin: This, in my opinion, is completely true. How can we say anything else on this matter?

Senator Carstairs: Honourable senators, it may be true that what the honourable senator says is true, that Bill C-18 no longer has force and effect. We have no argument with that. That having been said, we are now in a process wherein the original bill does have force and effect. It would be repealed and replaced with the passage of Bill C-69, but that is all that would happen.

Honourable senators, we will vote and we will make a determination. If Bill C-69 is passed, we will give it Royal Assent. It will then become the law of the land, and it will repeal anything presently on the legislative books.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, it would be good if we refreshed our memories about the purpose of Bill C-18 in the first place.

The Government of Canada introduced this bill last year, a bill to suspend the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act for two years; in other words, to ensure that the new electoral boundaries were not in place before the next election, and to ensure that the election to be held in late 1996, or sometime in 1997, would be based on the boundaries of the census of 1980. We on this side objected, saying that Parliament had a constitutional obligation to hasten the redistribution process as soon as the new census figures were known.

However reluctantly, the government accepted that argument and said it needed time to put a new system in place. We suggested a date in December or January. They said they needed until June 22, 1995.

I urge all honourable senators to read the debates of this place; read the debates of the other place; read the debates of their committee hearings; read the debates of our committee hearings. There you will get a consistent interpretation of the significance of the June 22 deadline. The modifications, if they were to be put into place, had to be passed by Parliament and given Royal Assent by the deadline of midnight before June 22, 1995. It is written here in the records of this house. It is testified to here. It is written over there in the records of the other place. It has been testified to over there. Until now, that argument has never been challenged. Not only has it not been challenged, it was reconfirmed only yesterday by the spokesman for the government, Senator Stanbury.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, this is criminal; this is slander. That is not what I said. I can quote you what I said.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I would like to read to you what you said, senator —

Senator Stanbury: You read it, but you completely misinterpreted what I said.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I did not misinterpret it. It speaks for itself.

Senator Stanbury: I made it very clear that unless the bill was passed in time for Royal Assent last night, the suspension, which had been created by the temporary bill, Bill C-18, would be surpassed.

I said:

> If this bill is to become legislation before the end of the suspension to June 22 provided by Bill C-18....

All I was saying was that if the bill was to become legislation before that suspension expired, then it had to receive Royal Assent by last night. That does not mean that the bill is no longer valid. Bill C-69 is still there. The temporary legislation, Bill C-18, is gone. However, Bill C-69 is there, and it becomes law as soon as you agree to pass it.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, Bill C-18 has not gone. Bill C-18 is still there. It is on our statute books. Nothing in it makes it expire at a certain date. It is there, and will always be there until it is repealed, or perhaps amended. The question is this: Where is Bill C-69?

Senator Oliver: It is functus!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Bill C-69 has lapsed. I quote, both from the blues and from Hansard itself:

> If this bill is to become legislation before the end of the suspension to June 22 provided by Bill C-18, it must have Royal Assent tonight.

Senator Stanbury: That does not affect Bill C-69. There is nothing wrong with that.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It confirms a deadline that had to be met.

Senator Stanbury: It simply confirms the suspension.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The honourable senator then goes on to say — perhaps we will have another interpretation of this one —

> All parties know the nature of the bill, the time constraints —

— at least there is an admissions that there are time constraints —

> — and the fact that the government is opposed to all but one of the amendments, which was accepted. All senators now have the opportunity to decide the fate of the bill...

• (1550)

Senator Stanbury: On the substance.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That was yesterday. The fate of the bill has been decided. Midnight has come and gone. There has been no Royal Assent. There is no debate to adjourn or engage in because Bill C-69, while it may be on the Order Paper, has no validity. It has lapsed.

Senator Stanbury: We vote on the substance of the bill, not on a procedural matter couched as a point of order. You do not destroy bills on a point of order.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It destroyed itself through your mismanagement.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: I should like to return to Senator Beaudoin's point of whether the Chair can act in a judicial capacity to deal with the issues raised by Senator Beaudoin. I do not believe you can.

[Translation]

Senator Prud'homme: Your Honour, first of all, I think it is very important that the Chair take the time to hear as many senators as possible, because this is a precedent-setting decision that we will have to live with. Therefore, I think that the approach taken by the Chair is a very wise one. I just wanted to say this at the outset.

Let us look back, for the benefit of those who have been following the issue from the beginning, at chapter 19 of the statutes and Bill C-18, which were assented to on June 15, 1994. There are two possible interpretations. The enactment reads "before June 22, 1995", while the summary and explanatory notes say —

[English]

— in English if you want:

> This enactment suspends the operation of certain provisions of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act until the earlier of the enactment of new electoral boundaries readjustment legislation and June 22, 1995.

We could debate the first issue, which is whether it is June 21, before June 22, or June 22. Honourable senators may choose one or the other. I think you could find legal minds who would say that it is no later than tonight, June 22. I am not talking about Bill C-69, but about Bill C-18.

What is the effect if it was yesterday? Regardless of what we may say on Bill C-69, the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada and his staff, either later today or tomorrow, and I would say today, must table these 11 reports. They are ready. The commissioners have done their duty. They are ready to be tabled.

Senator Thériault: They have been tabled.

Senator Prud'homme: Including one for New Brunswick.

For those who say it is June 22, there could be a vote later on today or there should be a vote later on today. That is another debate. Therefore, not having spoken yet on Bill C-69, the law takes its course.

The Chief Electoral Officer of Canada is an officer of Parliament. He is not under the direction of any political party, mine, yours or theirs. He could be in deep trouble if he does not follow the law. The law says that if, by June 22, he has not acted, and if there is no law telling him to scrap everything, he must proceed. I am not saying that that is what happened to Bill C-69 in the meantime. Therefore, his duty is to let the law take its course.

We will be faced with the extremely unbelievable and ridiculous situation of the law taking its course, as the law provides, starting this morning for some and for others tomorrow morning, depending on where you draw the line.

What does June 22 mean? The spending of money starts right away. The 11 commissions will not be created; the old one, reconstituted, is given new life to go on. They were suspended. They are all up in the air waiting to see what Parliament will do.

There is not much left to say on that point. We know that all the maps are there. I know some people do not like them. Let us talk to each other directly in that regard. Many of us went through the pain of seeing our ridings change.

The Speaker must take these 11 reports and table them with the appropriate committee for immediate consideration, and it is most likely that it is the Milliken committee that should be looking into them. They have 30 days to ask people to prepare and make presentations and 30 days to listen to presentations. I won in court, but I also won during these presentations.

If it was to be law, five members could get together and redesign five seats. It is provided for in the law. Ask the municipal councillor and bishops of all faiths to come and say, "This is the way we would like it." I do not need to tell them what they should do. I told them privately, every single one of them.

The committee then comes back to Mr. Speaker with their report, and Mr. Speaker, again being a mailman, returns all the final deliberations of the committee to the chief returning officer. The chief returning officer is almost a mailman himself. He gives the report to each commission, and these commissions have 30 days to say yes or no. That is the deadline, and that therefor immediately starts a new process of appointing returning officers by the President of the Privy Council on recommendation — we do not know what that means — and then they start drafting the maps and the polls.

If that process were followed, everything would be ready to proceed by no later than the end of December, 1996, to the best of my information and research. That is what should take place.

I should like to listen to further views as to the demise of Bill C-69. I share part of the opinion of my friend Senator Beaudoin. He was clear, and I think everybody will agree, Senator Carstairs included, that nothing precludes Parliament from coming tomorrow while the law is taking its course with a bill that says, "We do not like what is being done at the moment. Here is a new bill. Stop everything, scrap the old bill, and start all over again."

To be frank, I do not like some of the things in Bill C-69. It is bad business to have Their Honours producing not one map but three maps for each district. I can imagine Senator Carstairs and myself, if we were neighbours, saying, "We like option A," and Senator Gauthier saying, "Of the three maps, I like option B." We would then have to try to reconcile our differences.

In a nutshell, those who are unhappy today may be happy tomorrow. I predict that those who are happy today with the maps will be the first ones to yell when they see a new map. However, when will they see a new map?

In order to understand the debate, it is important to not only read what took place in the House of Commons and Senate, but also to read what took place in our own committee where Mr. Gray, the minister responsible for this bill, appeared as a witness. It started on February 10, and continued on April 26 and May 5 of 1994. That is a long time, and there have been all kinds of understandings. It will take time, but we think they may be ready for the next election. That was the motivation of all honourable senators.

• (1600)

Will there be a new map for 1997-98? I am more clear about what will happen tonight in the House of Commons. I think Elections Canada has no other option. I am only one person, but the House met last night. The matter could be dealt with tonight, but when you read the bill, the Chief Electoral Officer, regardless of our debate here, has no other option but to proceed. Otherwise, he could lose his job.

As for Bill C-69, I am not yet ready to listen to argument. Believe it or not, some in the Senate still like to debate issues and listen to argument. So far, I am not totally satisfied concerning what happened to Bill C-69. I still believe that the Government of Canada has the right at any time to produce a bill to cancel anything that is being taken, even though to do so could be royal folly, in my opinion.

The government may promise to have a new map for the next election, as it was well understood during the deliberations of the committee, when we were told that there was plenty of time in February of 1994, but time is running out.

Now, with the new bill, Bill C-69, if it was to be done right now, nothing could be done — and we must be aware of that — and it will be scrapped. New maps will be done. Instead of once, you will now go twice to public hearings. This will cost millions of dollars in additional money.

In closing, we must be aware that if we go through the new process, no election could be held under a new map before the end of June 1997, at the earliest. In other words, if an election were called earlier than December 1996, the old boundaries would apply — that is, the ones that exist at the moment. It will be the same for June of 1997.

I have been receiving calls from friends, Liberals and others. It is painful, but I know that those who are unhappy today will be terribly unhappy tomorrow when they see the new map that may be saving their so-called "seat". Those who are unhappy today will be happy to see new seats, but those who are happy today will be unhappy to see the new division of seats because they did not go through that process. They do know what it means. Some even think that the committee can redraw the boundaries.

Someone has to educate members. It is out of the hands of the members. It started with Mr. Pearson. I keep repeating that. It is a good process, but members should be educated on the other side, and told that you cannot manipulate the maps at your wish.

I will listen to more argument on the question of Bill C-69. As Bill C-18, the Chief Electoral Officer cannot wait for us, either to see what we will do with Bill C-69 or to await the Speaker's decision; in fact, it is an important discussion and a dangerous decision for the Speaker. The Chief Electoral Officer will have to proceed tomorrow.

The law must follow its course. They must proceed tomorrow until Parliament decides otherwise. Either you scrap Bill C-69 because you believe it does not exist — that is, you believe it is related to Bill C-18 — or the government will return with a tough new law that says, "We will make it clear. Everything is scrapped and that is the end of it. We will start drawing up new maps immediately after the bill is given Royal Assent."

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre-Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, I want to clarify a point regarding the problem of interpretation which Senator Prud'homme just raised. Senator Prud'homme seems to believe that there is a contradiction between the legislative enactment, in chapter 19 of the Statutes of Canada, 1994, and the summary of the act.

My dear friend, if there is a contradiction between the actual text of the act and its summary, the act prevails.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if there are no other senators who wish to participate in the debate on this point of order, I want to thank all of those who have participated. I know full well, in the words of Senator Olson, that the sole purpose is to help me in making my decision. I thank all of you profusely for that.

It is obvious, honourable senators, not only because of the degree of participation but also the importance of the project, that this is one that is of much importance to the Senate. I could rule on the point of order at once, but I believe that I should be absolutely certain of my ruling. Therefore, I will take it under advisement.

I would ask Senator Ottenheimer to take the Chair now. I expect that I will be reporting back to you before 5:30, which is the deadline, but I want to be absolutely certain of the ruling that I make.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

FIREARMS BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Carstairs, seconded by the Honourable Senator Honourable Senator Roux, for the second reading of Bill C-68, respecting firearms and other weapons.

Hon. Jean-Louis Roux: Honourable senators, I wish to speak about the gun control legislation. I will begin with a citation which will take a few minutes, but it is worth it. Do not worry; I will not go beyond my allotted time.

The citation states:

It was about 5:15 yesterday afternoon, the last class on the last day of school before exams.

Then the man walked in. He was wearing blue jeans, work boots, a hunting jacket and a cap of some kind.

He spoke French.

And he was carrying a semi-automatic rifle.

"He came in quietly", Chavarie, a witness, said. "And he told us to stop what we were doing. Everyone thought it was a joke. He was smiling at us. He was very calm."

The man told the students to separate into two groups. Women on one side, men on the other.

He was still smiling, and no one moved.

"Then he fired a shot, right by my ear," Chavarie said.

The students separated. Men in one corner, women in another.

They couldn't have known it, but they were being separated into victims and survivors by a man who came to kill.

The killer forced the men to leave the classroom. For a moment or two they waited outside, and then the shots began. Three, maybe four shots, as the terrified men sprinted down the hall, hoping to get away.

At the end of the corridor they stopped, until the killer came out and began firing at them from a distance of about 100 feet.

"He fired three or four shots in the hall, and I saw three or four men go down," Chavarie said. "I'm not sure if they were hit or if they were just trying to get away."

• (1610)

Chavarie ran down the stairs and waited at the entrance on the first floor. Other terrified students ran down after him as the killer moved on to the third floor.

According to one account, he was moving and firing systematically, hunting humans, firing and advancing and cocking his weapon and firing and advancing again, a calm and relentless killer.

Someone heard the gunman say, "I want the women."

And he got them. In the classroom, in the corridors, in the cafeteria, at a photo-copying machine.

An electrical-engineering student, Reda Boulos, heard the shots and saw the gunman in the hall.

"It must be a joke," Boulos said to the student standing next to him.

The gunman pulled the trigger, and the student fell. Boulos ran.

"I saw him bleeding," Boulos said. "Everyone was screaming and crying and trying to run away."

When we arrived at the massive six-storey École Polytechnique building at about 6:10 last night, police were still bringing the wounded out on stretchers. Someone said they had counted 11 stretchers, someone else insisted there had been only eight.

I watched a woman go by with a bandage over her eyes, followed by three more women who were all conscious and looking straight ahead as they were led through the gauntlet of flashbulbs and television lights to the waiting ambulances.

It didn't dawn on me until later that the victims I saw were all women and they were all young....

As the rain turned to sleet and then to snow, journalists stood and shivered and, with most of the witnesses departed, resorted to interviewing each other.

Someone said that one person had been killed and that the gunman had killed himself. Someone else said there were three gunmen and three dead.

At 7:10 p.m., two women, one of them the mother of one of the victims, rushed into the building. They came out 20 minutes later, weeping, and were surrounded by journalists. Students at the rear of the pack cursed the journalists. One of the women said that she had been told her daughter might have been taken hostage.

At 7:15 p.m., four SWAT team members in baseball caps and flak jackets ran into the building carrying automatic weapons.

At 7:30 p.m., three more uniformed policemen went in, armed with shotguns. It seemed that the killer was still alive and that he was holding hostages inside the building.

At 8:30 p.m., the school's director, Louis Courville, walked out of the building and stood with his arms folded in front of him, facing the driving snow.

First he asked whether there were any parents in the crowd.

There was a single woman among the waiting journalists, but she was waiting for news of her husband.

Courville began speaking.

"There are at least a dozen dead," he said. "All the dead are students, and the gunman has killed himself."

Christiane Chouteau, the woman who was waiting for news of her husband, gasped and turned her back to Courville. Her eyes were red from crying and she was biting her lip.

"My husband's name is Michel," she said. "He's a teacher. He said all the dead are students."

Courville walked back into the building. Journalists stood in small knots in the snow, for once not talking much.

What had been an incident, a story, had become an enormous, bitter tragedy. There were a dozen dead inside that building, and at least two more had died in the hospital. We weren't counting the gunman.

[Translation]

This article was taken from the Montreal Gazette, published on December 7,1989. It reported an incident that took the lives of 14 Canadian women and shook the collective conscience of Canadians across this country.

Consider the following: The gunman took his own life after the bloodbath he had just caused, and as a result it was impossible to identify his body. The Montreal Urban Community Police conducted a lengthy and costly investigation involving a number of gun stores, before they were able to trace the name of the owner of the weapon that was used to kill these 14 women.

The weapon could be equipped with a 50-round magazine, but the murderer used two 30-round magazines. He had obtained them legally.

Two conclusions: If the weapon had been registered, the Montreal Urban Community Police would immediately have been able to identify the disfigured corpse. Even more important, under Bill C-68, the murderer would never have been able to legally purchase a Ruger mini-14. This would have been a prohibited weapon. Furthermore, we can say, on the basis of the findings of a subsequent inquiry, that because of his family background and disturbed mental state, the murderer would never have been able to obtain any kind of weapon.

Honourable senators, you will probably think that so far, my speech has been very emotional, but it is hard not to be when we are talking about the lives of Canadian women that might have been saved if, nearly ten years ago, Bill C-68 had been given the force of law.

Following the Polytechnique massacre, students at this institution launched a petition and quickly collected the signatures of 560,000 Canadian citizens who demanded more stringent gun controls.

By the way, I recently received letters from about 100 students in Quebec with a similar request.

[English]

Furthermore, six days ago, an important group of physicians, including doctors practising from coast to coast, expressed their strong opposition to the Canadian Medical Association for its stand on gun control.

[Translation]

The shooting at the École polytechnique or similar events — because there are others — and the obvious conclusions to be drawn should never be far from our minds in the debate on the Senate's adoption of the new gun control legislation.

After Senator Carstairs' full and detailed speech yesterday, I listened carefully to the objections of my colleagues Senators Ghitter, Lucier, St. Germain and Watt, in particular. I listened especially to the remarks of the Honourable Senator Watt on the rights of native people enshrined in the Constitution and on respect for their ancestral traditions.

I am not dismissing the objections of the other speakers, but it seems to me that Justice Minister Rock responded very effectively during his visits to the various caucuses and in the documentation he sent us. I quote some of these responses.

> Let me say first that I do not understand, I really do not understand the revulsion of some of my hon. colleagues at the prospect of mandatory weapons registration. The legislation guarantees the rights and freedoms of collectors, target shooters and hunters.

[English]

The system will be computerized, simple and effective, saving firearms owners time and money. The firearms licence is renewable every five years. The registration certificate is good for the life of the firearm, unless it is sold or transferred. It is expected that in the first year there will be either no charge for registering, for example, a hunting rifle, or a nominal cost to obtain each a firearms licence, starting registration in 1996, or a registration certificate, starting in 1998. The cost for registering up to ten firearms will be the same as for registering one.

Registration applications for the firearms licence and registration certificate will be available at post offices and other public places conveniently located in the community. Those who own firearms now will be able to obtain their firearms licence and a registration certificate by mailing in the applications. The renewal licence and certificate will be sent directly to the applicant.

Some people say it will cost anywhere from $500 million to $1.5 billion dollars for the government to set up the registration system. It is not true. Setting up the system will cost approximately $85 million spread over five years, which will be recovered over time from the fees described above. The ongoing cost of issuing registration certificates will also be covered by fees. All fees will be reviewed by Parliament. None of those costs will be taken out of provincial, municipal or police budgets. I repeat: None of those costs will be taken out of provincial, municipal or police budgets.

How will registration provide any deterrent to criminal activity, since criminals will obviously not register their firearms? It is true that criminals will not register. However, by that very fact, criminals will identify themselves. Police will check out anyone who is found in possession of an unregistered firearm. The Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, the Canadian Police Association, the Canadian Association of Police Boards and groups representing victims of crime strongly support registration of all firearms for practical reasons. Dr. Stephen Corber, Medical Officer of Health for Ottawa-Carleton and Scientific Editor of the Canadian Journal of Public Health, declared:

> I have no doubt that firearm registration would result in reduced death and injury in Canada.

Registration will help police solve crimes where firearms are recovered; help identify the sources of firearms that are recovered; enable police to trace some of the 3,000 firearms lost or stolen every year back to their rightful owners — which should encourage all owners to store their firearms more securely — allow information on safe storage and handling regulations to be directed specifically to firearms' owners, and at less cost; help police to determine what types and numbers of firearms they might encounter when responding to an emergency call; and give the police information on the number of guns known to be in the home when they are trying to enforce a court order prohibiting someone from having firearms because of a history of violence.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I am sorry to interrupt. The honourable senator's time has expired. Is leave given for him to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Roux: I thank you for your patience.

The vast majority of firearm homicides occur at the hands of someone known to the victim. In Canada, one woman is shot to death every six days, in most cases in her home by someone she knows and with a legally-owned shotgun or rifle. Reducing access to firearms in cases of domestic violence is a key public safety measure.

Restricted weapons permits and registration of handguns has controlled their proliferation in Canada compared to the U.S. where controls are uneven or absent. In the U.S., the rate of murders without guns is slightly higher than Canada's, 1.7 times; but murder with guns is 10 times greater. That situation is probably due to our gun control measures. Consequently, one can foresee a larger gap between the two countries in that field, if tougher measures are applied.

Registration will help police to take appropriate preventive action in high-risk situations. Without information about who owns guns, it is difficult to enforce the 13,000 prohibition orders issued every year against at-risk individuals. The inquest into the suicide of Jonathan Yeo, the killer of Nina DeVilliers and Karen Marquis, recommended registration of all firearms.

[Translation]

Finally, there is the case of the aboriginals, Inuit or Indians, and other Canadian citizens who live in remote regions and for whom hunting is a means of livelihood.

[English]

For them, the firearms registration system will apply equally, as it should to all and every Canadian citizen. I am not in favour of a different law for the North and another one for the South, as suggested by Senator Watt. A special regulation should be put in place to meet with the legitimate claims of the subsistence hunters and particularly with the rights and the traditions of aboriginal peoples.

Honourable Senators, I will not take more of your time.

[Translation]

Having said all that, I urge you to not unduly postpone the passing of this bill, while still fulfilling the Senate's duty to make a comprehensive review of the legislation. This gun control legislation will be the envy of many countries. The Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs has already conducted an extensive consultation process. Sixty-four organizations expressed their views on the issue. Aboriginal peoples were represented by the Grand Council of the Crees, the Assembly of First Nations, the Council of Yukon Indians, the Inuit Tapirisat, the Metis National Council, as well as the Hunting, Fishing and Trapping Association.

The legislator took these views into consideration when it drafted its bill. It would be superfluous to start the process all over again. Let us follow up on legitimate requests. However, as I said, let us not unduly postpone the passing, by the Senate, of the new gun control legislation. Let us not forget the 14 unfortunate victims of the tragedy which occurred at the Polytechnique.

[English]

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to ask a question in order to better understand the arguments so well put by Senator Roux this afternoon.

The honourable senator speaks in terms of the terrible tragedy in Montreal and provides a linkage from the point of view of registration to that tragedy. I have difficulty in understanding the linkage. The weapon used in Montreal was a prohibited weapon and one which required registration, yet it was unregistered. How would registration under Bill C-68 have helped stop that tragedy from happening?

Senator Roux: First, as I said, the murderer would not have been able to buy such a piece of armament legally. Second, because of his antecedent, psychological disturbance, he would not have been able, under the provisions of Bill C-68, to buy any firearm at all.

As far as registration is concerned, it would have been easier for the Service de la Communauté urbaine de Montréal to identify the murderer if that arm had been registered. Since it was not, they had to conduct a very difficult investigation in order to identify the murderer.

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, Senator Roux made reference to Senator Watt's words. I listened carefully to what Senator Watt said about the impact this bill will have on the remote, northern communities and especially our aboriginal peoples.

I would ask Senator Roux if he has ever spent any time in these communities watching aboriginal people in their day-to-day lives as they hunt and trap to survive in this cold, barren wilderness.

[Translation]

Senator Roux: Honourable senators, the answer is "no". What I said, if you were listening, was that the regulation had to recognize the legitimate rights of all aboriginal people, including the Inuit. I understand perfectly that, for aboriginal people and for the Inuit in particular, a firearm can be a means of earning a living and a means of guaranteeing the security of the people who inhabit the far North.

I could not agree more that the act must respect the rights of aboriginal people. I could not agree more that the act does not entirely respect the rights of aboriginal people. I even think that I would not be overstepping my bounds by saying that, if the aboriginal community itself is unhappy with this legislation, we should amend the legislation or we should add a regulation to it to ensure that the rights of aboriginal people are fully respected.

• (1630)

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, perhaps I could ask Senator Roux a question.

Senator Roux: Certainly.

Senator Gigantès: Is the honouraable senator aware that in the other place Mr. Jack Anawak, who is himself an Inuit, declared that because of this law, not one less caribou would be shot. In other words, there would be no hindrance to the hunting that goes on in Inuit and Indian communities.

[Translation]

Senator Roux: I read that part of the proceedings in the House of Commons and I can only express respect for his opinion of course.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Senator Roux, the speech you just made was very touching and I thank you for it.

[English]

Honourable senators, a great deal of media attention surrounding Bill C-68 has now focused on the response of the Senate to this legislation. The media has left the impression that the Tory majority in the Senate is opposed to this legislation. I want to correct that impression, and that is one of the reasons I rise to speak at this point.

Given the debate here yesterday, it is apparent that some Liberal senators do not support this legislation. In our caucus, I do not think it is any secret that there are shades of opinion. There are those who are opposed, those who are for, and those with an open mind who would like to see the bill receive a rigorous examination in committee.

Honourable senators, I want to state my personal opinion, which is that I support this legislation and that I would like to see it sent to committee, reviewed and passed as expeditiously as possible.

I do not wish to speak at length at this juncture. Some of the arguments have been ably made by my colleagues on this side, as well as by Senator Roux and Senator Carstairs. I know there will be ample opportunity to speak at a later stage. However, I do want to address some of the myths and criticisms surrounding this legislation.

It is not true that the more people know about gun control, the less they support it. Minister Brian Evans' poll in Alberta was very explicit, giving people information about the rigors of the current process. Still, 65 per cent supported registration of firearms. If people knew that smuggled guns and random violence were not the principal problem, but that rifles and shotguns account for more of the guns seized in crime and that legal guns are most often used to kill, the support might be even stronger.

The case of the United Kingdom regarding gun registration is informative. Police are strongly in favour of the current legislation, and the vast majority of gun owners do register.

Honourable senators, the current process that we have in place was put in place by the Progressive Conservative government. Many people fought to have that legislation. They worked very hard, but there are gaps in the legislation. Canada does not have the strongest gun legislation in the world. Most European countries and most states in Australia have possession permits and registration requirements for all guns. The firearms acquisition certificate allows the holder to buy as many guns as he or she wants over a five-year period with the only record being in the store. Six million firearms are in circulation, and police do not know who owns them. The firearms acquisition certificate is needed only to purchase, not to own and use guns. The point of the new legislation is to require all gun owners in Canada to be screened in a consistent fashion.

There is a lot of talk about cost. Well, it is estimated that gunshots cost the Canadian health care system $70 million a year without assigning any value to human life. Dr. Stephen Corber, I believe, has estimated as much as $6 billion if you take in all the costs. We all know what the estimates are worth, on one side and the other, so I do not put too much stock in that.

My esteemed colleague Senator Ghitter said in his address to this chamber that some of his police friends feel that gun registration would have no impact on crime. I value his opinion, but I should like to read into the record some of the national and provincial police associations which support the Coalition on Gun Control and the legislation before us. The partial list includes: the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police; the Canadian Association of Police Boards; the Canadian Criminal Justice Association; the Manitoba Police Association; the Nova Scotia Association of Chiefs of Police; the Ontario Association of Chiefs of Police; the Ontario Senior Officer's Association; the Quebec Association of Police and Fire Chiefs; the Belleville Police Services Board; the Brandon Police Service; the Brantford Police Services Board; the Belleville Police Services Board; the Calgary Police Service; the Delta Police Services Board; District 54 du Service de la Communauté urbaine de Montréal; the Edmonton Police Service; the Gloucester Police Service; the Halton Police Services Board; the Hamilton-Wentworth Regional Police; the Hamilton-Wentworth Police Services Board; the Hawkesbury Police Services Board; the International Police Association Régime 7, Montréal; the Kanata Police Services Board; the London Police Services Board; the Metropolitan Toronto Police Services Board; the Montreal Urban Community Police Brotherhood; the Montreal Urban Community Police Service; the Moose Jaw Board of Police Commissioners; the Nepean Police Services; the New Westminster Police; the Niagara Police Services Board; the Ottawa Police Services Board; the Peel Regional Police Association; the Peel Regional Police Senior Officer's Association; the Peel Police Services Board; the Peterborough Community Police Service; the Port Moody Police Services Board, et cetera. I think the point has been made.

According to our "disarming" Minister of Justice, Alan Rock — that is the only word I can use for him — who spoke to us yesterday, police have been asking for registration for years. They have been passing annual resolutions to that effect. They have been asking for universal registration. The inquest on the suicide of killer Jonathon Yeo, as Senator Roux mentioned, recommended universal registration. The task force on smuggling of firearms recommended universal registration.

As has been pointed out here as well, the relationship between guns and violence is often denied by critics of the bill. However, as Senator Roux pointed out, you only have to look to the United States where gun controls are uneven or absent. There, as he suggested, the murder rate with guns is 10 times greater and they have 10 times as many guns. To underscore that point, recent annual statistics show 193 homicide deaths with firearms recorded in Canada, compared to 16,704 in the United States.

Senator Roux read into the record arguments for the fact that universal registration will provide a deterrent to criminal activity, icluding what Justice Minister Alan Rock had in his briefing book. The point is that those who say they are in favour of gun control, if only we could separate the crime controls from the registration, really have no argument as their concerns can be met, and they can be met adequately.

It is the case that the essence of this legislation is the universal registration provisions. My friends from the gun control coalition have done some hard work to get this legislation passed. Some have given up their careers to fight for this legislation. If it is passed, they will feel that their work has been rewarded.

Honourable senators, there are those who see this bill as imperfect. I am sure it is not perfect. There are different shades of opinion concerning it. I hope the Senate will review this legislation carefully. I hope, indeed, that it will approve this legislation which was begun under our government. Once passed, it will be a milestone in this country.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it a question which the honourable senator wishes to ask of Senator Spivak?

Senator Gigantès: I was offended that Senators St. Germain and Ghitter —

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I am sorry to interrupt, but is this a question to Senator Spivak?

Senator Gigantès: I will put it in the form of a question.

I ask Senators St. Germain and Ghitter if they feel ashamed at having sniggered in the Senate at the mention of the name of an elected representative of aboriginal people of Canada, namely, Mr. Anawak.

Hon. Ron Ghitter: I rise on a question of privilege, Your Honour. I do not know what the honourable senator is talking about. I take offence at his comment. I have no idea what he is talking about.

Senator Gigantès: I saw you. Both of you sniggered. It is disgraceful. You should both be ashamed of yourselves.

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I take issue with the statement of Senator Gigantès. This senator is totally irresponsible in his statements. If there is anyone who will stand up for the aboriginal people in this country, it will be me; it will not be a senator from an ivory tower in downtown Montreal.

I have worked with these people before, and I will work with them long after this senator even thought about their causes.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Does the Honourable Senator Watt have a question for the Honourable Senator Spivak?

Hon. Charlie Watt: Honourable senators, I have a question which I should like to address to the Honourable Senator Roux.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: A question should be asked immediately upon conclusion of a speech. Are honourable senators agreed that Senator Watt be allowed to ask his question of Senator Roux?

Senator Watt: I tried, but I did not have an opportunity, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed that Senator Watt ask his question of Senator Roux?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Watt: Honourable senators, I appreciate being given the opportunity to ask a question of Senator Roux. At the same time, I think I need to go a bit further in educating him. Hopefully, in return, he can educate me.

When I spoke the other day in regard to aboriginal people and how different they are from southerners in their traditional practices in their homeland, I meant it. I did not make a joke about it.

Honourable senators, we have a hard enough time in our remote communities today without more restrictive laws being applied to aboriginal people. Such laws will further depress them. They are depressed enough now.

Statistics show that some 16.2 people in the Northwest Territories committed suicide by using a firearm. Do honourable senators think those numbers will decrease? Do you think this bill will help? It will increase the numbers further. I know these people. I live with them. I see how they work.

I will not go so far as to give statistics with respect to the number of people who have a criminal record. Those who do will not be eligible to obtain a permit to purchase a rifle, not to mention register that rifle. What will they become in their communities when they are no longer allowed to go into the country to use those firearms to feed themselves and to clothe themselves in order to survive?

[Translation]

Senator Roux: Honourable senators, I would first like to say I have the highest regard for Canada's native peoples. They were here before us. Their ancestral rights are enshrined in the Constitution. We must respect these rights as we must respect their traditions.

I have never been in the far North. I have had no dealings with native populations who have to carry arms to live and protect themselves. I am simply pointing out that I said that, if the law did not guarantee the respect of native peoples' rights and traditions, the Senate would have to propose amendments to it or there would have to be appropriate regulations to ensure full respect of these peoples' rights and traditions.

[English]

Senator Watt: Honourable senators, I have a second question to ask of Senator Roux.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Watt be allowed to ask another question of Senator Roux?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Watt: Honourable senators, I appreciate the fact that Senator Roux is sensitive to our people in relation to Bill C-68. I, for one, am not against the bill, as long as it reflects where it belongs. While it is good for the South, it might not be good for the North.

I am not convinced, like some other senators, that we can reduce the impact of this bill by way of regulation. I recognize that certain parts of it can be dealt with through regulation, but not all of it.

I do not want law-abiding citizens among my people to be criminalized. For what reason will they be criminalized? Because they will have a hard time trying to understand what this bill is all about in order to comply with it.

Therefore, the senator is not correct in saying that it is better not to have a law at all if the law does not apply to everyone. If the law does not work, then we would be better off to design one for the North.

Does the honourable senator agree with that?

[Translation]

Senator Roux: Honourable senators, I come from a province which sometimes claims to have special status. I have always been against this special status. You can believe me when I tell you that I was poorly thought of by my colleagues for taking such a stand. I consider that the law should be the same for every citizen of this country. If and when legislation does not reflect the rights and traditions of a segment of the Canadian population, and only then, should we amend it and improve on it. I remain convinced however that there cannot be different legislation for different parts of our country.

[English]

Hon. Willie Adams: My perspective on this bill is different than that of some of my colleagues, because I see this issue from the point of view of people who live off the land; not criminals who use firearms to kill and wound people.

Senator Watt and I are concerned about Bill C-68 because we come from a different culture. We live in small communities. We have elders who have been hunting on the land and surviving off the land with their families for generations.

I am not against gun control and registration. Registration is a fact of life. If I buy a car or other motorized vehicle such as a Ski-Doo, I am required to register it. We now will be required to register guns. However, registering a gun is different from registering motor vehicles for us because it affects the way we live with our families.

If I registered my gun, my son could not use it. If he wanted to use my gun, he would be required to go to the RCMP, who would check my registration, and he would be asked to show identification to be able to borrow my gun to go out hunting on the land. That is a concern. If I register my gun and he goes out hunting on the land and shoots himself, I would be responsible. I would go to court. That is the way I understand Bill C-68. This bill does not deal with hunting, but criminalizing.

A typical aspect of life in our culture is that you live on the land and you own a gun. We will now be required to lock our guns up in a shed or in our houses. We will now have to register our guns. If we do not do so by the year 2001, we can be charged.

People in our community live differently from people in the South. I could go out on to the land tomorrow, carrying my gun. People living down south probably only carry a gun to go to target practice.

We do not have hunting seasons in the North, and we love to hunt 12 months a year. If we see an animal, we can shoot it. In the South, there is a hunting season for geese, and deer, and moose. We do not have caribou season.

Guns will need to be kept in safe places. In the wintertime, when you go out hunting, you do not put your gun in the house every day. You have to leave it out in the cold or in the unheated porch. Otherwise, if you go out the next morning and see a herd of caribou, when you cock your gun to shoot, nothing happens because your gun is frozen.

Also of concern is the fact that if I leave my gun out in the winter, not registered, and if the RCMP see my gun lying there, they can charge me under Bill C-68.

You now must have a safety lock on your gun whenever you are moving. We often go out seal hunting in a boat in the summertime. If we have a safety lock on the gun, by the time we get the gun unlocked, the seal could be gone. That is your food for the day. That is the type of situation I am referring to that we face in the Territories.

According to surveys, approximately 26 per cent of the people in Canada own a firearm. In the Northwest Territories, that figure goes up to 47 per cent. I would say that probably 100 per cent of native people own a gun.

I do not want to go against my own colleagues in the Senate, my own party. I believe Jack Anawak said in the House of Commons that we are protected by the Nunavut land claim. As you recall, we passed Bill C-132 and Bill C-133 about two and a half years ago. There is nothing in those bills about rights for native people.

Honourable senators, I am no different from you. You are white and I am Inuit, but we are all Canadians. Any bill that affects Canada affects me. Native people do not have special rights.

• (1700)

Alan Rock, the Minister of Justice, was saying "We will amend Bill C-68 after one week from today, or the bill will be passed in the fall." He would not amend it. Even if it were to be amended, it would not make any difference to us.

Inuit Canadians are no different from anyone else. If I shoot you, or you shoot me, it is no different. Do you think that I will get less time if I shoot somebody from here in the South because I live in the South? No. I will get life in prison, because I am no different.

We are concerned about Bill C-68. Some of the people in the North, even if the bill passes, will not understand it. They will not go to the RCMP to ask to register their guns. In the meantime, some people find out that the gun must be registered. If you own that weapon, you will not be able to lend it to someone. It belongs to you, but if you loan it to somebody else, for example, to your son or a member of your family, and if something goes wrong, you will be held responsible.

We are talking about certain ages, and so on, for those who can own a gun. When I was young, we used to buy guns. Sometimes even a child between the ages of six and seven years old used a gun. If someone in the family had to have a gun, the family bought one. In fact, we used to cut off the end of those guns because young children could not reach the trigger to cock the gun. A few years later, as your arm becomes stronger, you can begin to add on to it.

We never thought about the future. Even if we owned a gun for hunting, we never thought about using it to kill a friend, or an enemy, or something like that. To us, it was our right to own a gun.

I live in the South now. For example, when you own something or you buy something, you like to have it. No one can tell you how to use it or what to do with it, because it belongs to you. However, even though you lend your gun to someone, the minister who put forward this law says that it is still your gun. You are registered as the owner.

There is nothing wrong with registering. However, what if something goes wrong on your property with your gun? You are responsible for the communal rights to it. Even Jack Anawak and Ethel Blondin-Andrews voted for the gun bill in the House of Commons.

I was on the same flight last week with Jack and the Prime Minister. He had invited the German Chancellor, Helmut Kohl, to Iqaluit for a couple of days. He is not very welcome there — nor will he be, one week from tomorrow, because of what he did to the people. The people asked what Jack was doing. They told him, "We do not want that bill, but you went along with it. You know what will happen in the next election."

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable Senator Adams, I am sorry to interrupt you, but your 15 minutes are up.

Senator Adams: I only need one more minute and then I will sit down.

It would be nice to be able to amend Bill C-68. It will be difficult for me and for Senator Watt and other senators to deal with our communities in the North. I do not have special right, more than anyone else here in the Senate. Aboriginal people say that they can hunt all they want. People even suggest that they can hurt somebody without being charged. It will be difficult to decide upon an amendment for Bill C-68.

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Adams. He alluded to the possibility of one of his sons wanting to lend his registered gun to someone and that that would be impossible under this bill, did you not?

Senator Adams: Yes.

Senator Gauthier: I have three sons, and I interpret the bill in a different manner than Senator Adams does. I wanted to know what his interpretation was on this: If my son borrows my gun with my permission and I give him the registration of that gun, can he legally use my gun.

An Hon. Senator: No.

Senator Gauthier: I heard somebody say "no".

Under "Authorized Lending", clause 33 states:

> Subject to section 34, a person may lend a firearm only if
>
> (a) the person
>
> (i) has reasonable grounds to believe that the borrower holds the licence authorizing the borrower to possess that kind of firearm, and
>
> (ii) lends the borrower the registration certificate for the firearm, except in the case of a borrower who uses the firearm to hunt or trap in order to sustain himself or herself or his or her family;

There are exceptions for hunters and trappers.

It goes on further in clause 34 to state:

> A person may lend a firearm, prohibited weapon, restricted weapon, prohibited device, ammunition or prohibited ammunition to Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province or to a police force if
>
> (a) in the case of a firearm, the transferor lends the borrower the registration certificate for the firearm;

In other words, if you lend your certificate at the same time, you can do it.

Senator St. Germain: Yes, you can.

Senator Gauthier: But it is "with" my permission.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Gauthier, is this a question?

Senator Gauthier: Yes, it is a question.

Senator Adams: Honourable senators, you may have seen that in the bill, but to me it does not matter what you do with your family gun. However, under this bill, you cannot lend your gun.

In the meantime, even though my son has my authority to borrow my gun, he must register it with the RCMP so that he can use my gun. I think that is true. What about my uncle or brother-in-law, and so on?

Senator Gauthier: Yes, he can use it if he has your permission.

Senator Adams: But I will still be responsible if something goes wrong. What would happen if he gets killed with my gun?

Senator Watt: You are still responsible.

Senator Gauthier: No, it is not your responsibility.

Senator Carstairs: No, not according to the bill.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It was moved by the Honourable Senator Carstairs, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roux, that this bill be read a second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

• (1710)

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT RETIRING ALLOWANCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message has been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-85, to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act and to provide for the continuation of a certain provision.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT BILL, 1995

POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, earlier today Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton rose on a point of order and said:

> Honourable senators know a deferred vote on Bill C-69 is to take place at 5:30 this afternoon.
> My point of order is to request that the Speaker determine if there will be any purpose served by this vote in light of the fact that Bill C-69 lapsed as of midnight last.

Considerable discussion ensued. The point revolved largely on legal issues. Indeed, if you listened carefully to what Senator Lynch-Staunton said, I am being asked to rule on a legal matter and not a matter of the rules of the house.

Beauchesne is the only authority which speaks to this matter. I refer to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules & Forms, 6th edition, citation 324, which reads:

> The Speaker will not give a decision upon a constitutional question nor decide a question of law, though the same may be raised on a point of order or privilege.

Therefore, it is impossible for me to rule on whether any purpose will be served. That is not within my capacity.

Further, we have before us an order of the Senate to have a vote at 5:30 today. It is not possible for me, as Speaker, to rescind an order of the Senate. Only the Senate can do that. It is beyond my power. I cannot stop the process to which the Senate has agreed.

Honourable senators, under rule 66(3) of the Senate, on a deferred vote the bells must start ringing 15 minutes before the hour. It is now 16 minutes before the hour. I propose, therefore, that we ring the bells now for the vote at 5:30 p.m.

MOTION TO CONCUR WITH MESSAGE FROM COMMONS—SPEAKER'S STATEMENT—MOTION TO ADJOURN DEBATE NEGATIVED

On the Order:

> On the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Robertson, for the adjournment of the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Graham, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert:
>
> That the Senate do not insist on its amendments 1, 2, 3, 4(b), 4(c), 5, 6 and 7 to the Bill C-69, An Act to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions and the readjustment of electoral boundaries, to which the House of Commons has disagreed; and
>
> That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

SPEAKER'S STATEMENT

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before I call the vote, I should like to make a brief statement. Yesterday, when the standing vote was called, Honourable Senator Kinsella rose and asked that the vote be deferred under rule 67(1).

Rule 67(1) reads as follows:

> After a standing vote has been requested, pursuant to rule 65(3), on a motion which is debatable in accordance with rule 62(1), either Whip may request that the standing vote be deferred as provided below.

A motion to adjourn the debate is not debatable. Therefore, yesterday the deferred vote should not have occurred.

I am making this statement now because I do not believe that this incident should become a precedent in this house. An error was made, and I accept the responsibility.

Pursuant to rule 66(3), the Senate proceeded to the deferred division on the motion of Senator Murray to adjourn the debate on the motion to concur with the Message from the Commons on Bill C-69

Motion negatived on the following division:

CN COMMERCIALIZATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

> Second reading of Bill C-89, to provide for the continuance of the Canadian National Railway Company under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the issuance and sale of shares of the Company to the public.

Hon. Pierre De Bané: Honourable senators, I am pleased today to introduce Bill C-89, the CN Commercialization Act.

This bill is part of the government's overall plan to establish a viable and competitive transportation network in Canada. One only has to look at our country's geography to understand the importance of an efficient transportation network in allowing Canadian producers and manufacturers to remain competitive on world markets.

In fact, it would be impossible for Canadian exporters relying on rail transport to compete internationally if railway companies did not offer them efficient service at reasonable cost.

[English]

In this regard, the government introduced in the House of Commons on June 20, 1995, its proposal for a new transportation framework for Canada, the Canada Transportation Act. This will help set the groundwork for CN and all other Canadian transportation participants to improve their performance and serve Canadian shippers more effectively.

Commercializing CN is also consistent with the government's intention to have the private sector operate in areas where it can do the job better than the government. As the Minister of Finance said last February in his budget:

> Our view is straightforward, if government does not need to run something it should not. And in the future, it will not.

Under Bill C-89, all the government's current shares in CN will be sold on the public markets. All Canadians, including CN employees, will have an opportunity to buy shares in this railway. CN employees will continue in their current positions in the new CN and their pensions will be protected under the Pensions Benefits Standards Act. This means that CN employees and pensioners will not lose any entitlements or benefits to which they are currently entitled.

• (1740)

CN will remain a federally incorporated railway, and all current collective agreements will remain in place. This includes the June 14 decision by the arbitrator in the recent round of rail labour negotiations.

[Translation]

We hope that many Canadians will take an interest in CN shares. We would like them to be spread over the country.

On the other hand, the Canadian market is not large enough to absorb the initial public offering, which will probably be the largest in Canadian history. Since, to be successful, this offering requires foreign investment, we have decided not to limit the percentage of shares that can be held by foreign investors. Every effort must be made not to send the wrong signal to foreign investors and put them off to the point that they take little interest in this deal. That is precisely what happened with other privatization initiatives.

On the other hand, the government insists that CN should remain under Canadian control. Judging by previous international privatization initiatives, even if no restriction were put on ownership, it is unlikely that foreign investors would buy more shares than Canadian investors.

At any rate, to prevent control of CN by a single investor, the government will prohibit any Canadian or foreign investor from holding more than 15 per cent of the shares. This limit will apply to persons and corporations which are associates. For example, if an investor buys 10 per cent of CN's shares and one of his associates wants to buy some also, the latter will not be able to buy more than 5 per cent. This measure will prevent these investors from getting together to control CN. The bill also contains provisions preventing corporations which are not associates from joining forces and colluding to take over the company.

[English]

Honourable senators, this bill also strikes a balance between our objective of maximizing return for the taxpayer while ensuring CN is viable into the future and the operating obligations some may wish to impose on the railway. The headquarters of CN will remain in Montreal, and the Official Languages Act will continue to apply to CN employees. However, these are not changes from the way the railway currently operates. These will not affect the "saleability" or price which we will receive from CN shares because investors will expect CN to continue to operate in that manner.

We cannot, however, impose any service obligations on CN that do not apply to its competitors if we are to ensure that CN can compete on a level footing with the other transportation sector players into the future. It may be tempting to ask CN to maintain certain operations while it is still a Crown corporation, but CN can no longer be used as a tool of public policy if it is to serve Canadian shippers well. Government policy objectives must be met through more transparent and direct means, not through entities such as the railways.

In addition, honourable senators, CN will transfer its real estate assets to the government for fair consideration, which will also help pay down their debt. Any further debt reduction will be the minimum necessary, and will be undertaken with the goals of fairness and competitiveness in the rail industry and the transportation sector in mind.

The government has an agreement with three investment banks — Scotia McLeod, Goldman Sachs and Nesbitt Burns — to form a consortium for the purpose of leading this deal.

[Translation]

With this bill, the government is one step closer to achieving its major project of establishing an integrated, affordable, viable and competitive transport network in Canada.

Bill C-89 will allow the government to sell all of its interest in CN, while also getting the best possible value for taxpayers and ensuring that the corporation will continue to serve Canadians for a long time.

[English]

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, I laboured hard in the vineyard to bring forth these 10 or 15 pages of wisdom.

Let me say that on this side we certainly welcome the move to privatize CN. Going back to the government of Joe Clark, we as a party first proposed that this would be the proper way to go.

Honourable senators, we want this matter to go to committee where we would expect to call a number of witnesses. It will not be a repetition of the evidence given before the other place. We would certainly call thePpresident of CN. We would certainly want to talk to bankers and financial people in order to reassure ourselves about how this sale will affect the marketplace.

We all recall the difficulty we had with the privatization of Air Canada and the marketing of its shares. We do not want a repetition of that situation.

The committee will look at questions such as what happens to heritage railway stations. There are many issues to explore. We would welcome a fairly rapid referral to committee.

Honourable senators, the time has come for us to take this step. In doing so, we must look carefully at the existing debt and how the ministry and the government intend to cope with it. We do not want the taxpayers taking another bath to the tune of $800 million to $1 billion to cover the deficit.

The last time we converted debt to equity — some $800 million — Minister Mazankowski said "This is the last time". In making CN as attractive as possible to sell to buyers, I hope that the government does not extract from the hides of Canadian taxpayers another $700 million or $800 million. Mind you, given the amount of money the government has been able to save in recent months, one cannot help but wonder what they will spend it on a few years down the road.

With those few remarks, honourable senators, I look forward to the referral of Bill C-89 to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): I wish to thank honourable senators for their cooperation. Before I move the adjournment motion, I should point out that we have Royal Assent at 6 o'clock this evening. In the meantime, I should like it if we could proceed with Bill C-82.

Honourable senators, in line with the suggestion made by Senator Doody earlier, and in view of the fact that we do not have copies of Bill C-54 for every honourable senator, I suggest that we not deal with that piece of legislation until the next sitting of the Senate.

However, we would ask if we could deal with Bill C-82. If other honourable senators want to proceed further on the Order Paper after Royal Assent, we on this side are quite disposed to continuing.

• (1750)

Therefore, honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, June 27, 1995, at eight o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I thought we would be sitting tomorrow. Since we will be leaving tonight, I think it would be appropriate perhaps for at least two or three senators to say a few words on the Saint-Jean-Baptiste Day festivities, as has been the tradition. If you think it appropriate, I am prepared to say now, off the cuff, what I intended to say tomorrow. I have no objection.

Tomorrow I wanted to say the following, and I hope my colleagues will listen very carefully, because some of them will doubtless be startled. At one time...

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt you, but we were voting, and I would like to complete the vote.

[English]

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion of Senator Graham?

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to hear Senator Prud'homme now?

Senator Berntson: After Royal Assent.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, I, too, admire and understand the work of Senator Prud'homme over a long number of years — probably longer than anyone else in this chamber save Senator MacEachen. I know we are all anxious to hear his words. However, in view of the time, I suggest that we do not see the clock at six o'clock and after that we proceed with Bill C-82, have Royal Assent and reconvene to hear Senator Prud'homme.

Senator Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I do not want to impose on my colleagues. My intervention will be very short.

Senator Graham: In that case, honourable senators, I suggest that we hear from Senator Prud'homme now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

SAINT-JEAN-BAPTISTE DAY

GOOD WISHES TO FRENCH CANADIANS

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: I thank you, honourable senators. I would ask you to listen very carefully to what I am about to say because some may find it extremely controversial.

I want to start by saying: Vive Montréal! Vive le Québec! Vive le Québec libre! Vive le Canada français! Those are the very words General de Gaule used in 1967, as the records will attest.

Unfortunately, history has not retained his whole declaration, leaving out what came after "Vive le Québec libre".

This is what he said, the records are very clear, it is complete. He clearly said at the very end: "Vive le Canada français". And of course, since I pride myself on being French Canadian, I feel a certain affinity with these words.

Very recently, I did some research and discovered something even more astonishing: The good old general, who was in Berthierville, got carried away and started singing, asking people to join in and sing the national anthem. Some people started to sing La Marseillaise but did not know it well, so he started singing O Canada! just before entering Montreal. This proves that even he knew what we mean by the French Canadian people.

What I wanted to tell you, honourable senators, is that for me, June 24 was and always will be a holiday honouring French Canadians, no matter where they are in Canada or across the world. What I celebrate first and foremost is a people who contributed in many ways to the building of this country.

[English]

If we study further, we discover that the national anthem which most of you sing in English with great pride, and which I sing in French with as much pride, was composed in 1880.

We celebrated the one-hundredth anniversary of O Canada! on July 1, 1980. There was a man on the stage at the time who said, "That is wrong. It is 100 years and one week ago." I was bothered by that. I was invited by Francis Fox to attend because I had been a member of the committee that proclaimed O Canada! at the request of Mr. Pearson. Senator Forrestall and I were the only members left.

A very great senator friends of ours, Senator Tremblay, was there. He said, "That is wrong. My wife is the great-granddaughter of Sir Adolphe-Basile Routhier, who wrote the words of O Canada!. Do you know at whose request? At the request of the President of the Saint-Jean-Baptiste Society of the City of Quebec in order to celebrate with great joy June 24, 1880."

We all know that, I am sure. However, it is something that we should preach to Canadians about. The great Canadian flag is now the umbrella of all these great people of Canada.

[Translation]

Now, I must tell you in concluding and in thanking you for your kindness that, on the occasion of the French Canadians' Patron Saint's Day, la Saint-Jean-Baptiste, on June 24, the House of Commons and the Senate will not be sitting. I wish French Canadians, who are my people, the best of celebrations and, particularly, a return to their source, because when a people does not know its history, it is bound to perish. I hope that my people, which are well represented on both sides of this house, will refuse to die, because this country is ours and one of its most majestic celebrations is la Saint-Jean-Baptiste.

I wish my fellow citizens the best of days and I hope that together we relearn our real history.

The Hon. the Speaker: I might add that French Canadians in Manitoba also celebrate la Saint-Jean-Baptiste.

BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK OF CANADA BILL

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-91, to continue the Federal Business Development Bank under the name Business Development Bank of Canada.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Graham, and notwithstanding rule 57(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Colin Kenny moved the second reading of Bill C-82, to amend the Royal Canadian Mint Act.

He said: Honourable senators, respecting the new time rules, I will be brief. I am here to speak to Bill C-82, which my friend refers to as the "doubloon bill".

• (1800)

Bill C-82 is designed to save government expenditures and to modernize Canada's currency with the $2 coin. It will replace the $2 note and save Canadians approximately $254 million over 20 years in reduced production costs as compared to the notes. The average life span of the $2 note is one year, and the average life span of a coin is twenty years. The cost to produce a $2 coin is six cents per unit, compared to 16 cents for the bill.

There is a dual approach with this bill. It is the intention of the government to change the metal composition of other coins at the same time. The one cent, five cent, ten cent, twenty-five cent and fifty cent coins will all be readjusted at the same time. This will be done to save production costs. The government expects to save $12 million annually with this change.

The combined savings generated will be $500 million over 20 years. On top of that, the government is expected to accrue approximately $449 million in seigniorage to the Consolidated Revenue Fund within 18 months of issuing the $2 coin. Seigniorage, as we all know, is the difference between the face value of the coin and the cost of production.

Canadians depend on the $2 note for a variety of uses. A coin will be more durable and will save the government money. Two loonies cost 26 cents to manufacture, and the $2 bi-metal coin is estimated to cost 16 cents. The new coin will be just slightly heavier than the current loonies. Two loonies would weigh 14 grams, whereas the new coin weighs 7.3 grams.

The use of the new coin will be principally for vending machines. It is noted that Canadians are shopping more and more from vending machines. The proposed $2 coin is bi-metallic, and like many new coins around the world, it will represent a new technology for Canada and give the mint the opportunity to produce coins for other countries.

Thus far, there have been 17,000 submissions from school children, artists and other collectors to the mint suggesting new designs.

The government intends to provide a period of adjustment for the vending industry. The mint has had discussions with that sector of industry and has asked for their advice on how to make their adjustment. Their views are that it would be preferable to simply make one change with all of the denominations at once so that the vending machines need only be adjusted one time.

The proposed $2 coin will be composed of a nickel outer ring with an aluminum-bronze core. The mint believes that the proposed combination of alloys for the outer ring and core are best in terms of visual colour appearance, resistance to wear, and tarnishing, disposal and recycling. Canadians with vision impairment and the blind will find it easy to use the new coin.

I urge honourable members to support this legislation.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, although this legislation is only a few pages in length, it will have an impact on all Canadians. This legislation will allow the government to mint a $2 base metal coin of a size and weight that will be slightly larger than the $1 coin.

With the $1 coin and now the $2 coin, not to mention the other smaller coins which exist in this country, Canadians will now be able to potentially carry a purse or a wallet that can be used as a weapon. Mr. Rock will then be forced to amend the Criminal Code so that the police can charge you with possession of a dangerous purse. Can you imagine having to register your wallet?

The Royal Canadian Mint has been instructed by the government to prepare for the production and distribution of 300 million $2 coins. Distribution of these coins will commence early in 1996. The new coins have a life span of twenty years versus one year for the $2 note. Will they circulate, or will they end up in storage in bank vaults?

The government has stated that the new $2 coin will save taxpayers $254 million over 20 years and accrue an additional $449 million in seigniorage, whatever that is, to the Consolidated Revenue Fund within 18 months of the issue.

What will the cost of the $2 coin be for the private sector? As a result of the $2 coin, there will be an increase in expenses for businesses. Such expenses will probably be passed on to the consumer in the form of higher prices. This is not welcome news.

In an article in The Ottawa Citizen on June 13, it was stated that vending machine operators expect that it will cost them $80 million to convert some 200,000 pop and candy machines to accept the new coins. Cash registers will also need to be changed. Making such changes, of course, will cost businesses a tidy sum.

Has the government considered the alternatives, including doing away with the $2 piece altogether? During the debate on the $1 coin, known as the loonie, the then opposition said, and I quote from Mr. Don Boudria, June 17, 1986:

> The Canadian people will very rapidly get used to the $1 coin. I am, however, a little concerned about the $2 bill. I am not convinced that in the long term we will get maximum use of the dollar coin so long as we retain the $2 bill. In my opinion, we may want to withdraw that bill at some time in the future.

It was his opinion that getting rid of the $2 bill should, in fact, follow some examination. Has the government of the day done this? I do not know.

Finally, the new $2 coin will need a name. The media has referred to it as the doubloonie, but perhaps there is a more fitting name. The Martoonie? The Dingwalloonie? Who knows?

Bill C-82 raises some concerns in my mind and in the minds of others. What will be the actual cost of the $2 coin to the private sector, and is this the right time to introduce this new coin? Perhaps there are other concerns which can be considered when this legislation is examined in committee.

• (1810)

Senator Prud'homme: I do not know whether honourable senators would prefer to adjourn the debate or end the debate today. I am in your hands. I have followed this subject for 30 years.

It is difficult to follow the legislation that is coming at the moment. I do not have all my notes here, but I can make some of my views known; that is, unless someone else wants to adjourn the debate. I should like to ask for adjournment of the debate. However, if there is no seconder, I will participate right now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Bryden was rising as well.

Hon. John G. Bryden: Honourable senators, perhaps I might briefly ask a question of either of the previous speakers on this bill?

In the tradition that our coins have on one side of them wildlife, or a beaver, or whatever, some suggestion has been made to place the picture of an animal on the $2 coin as well. Someone has suggested the head of a championship buck deer from Alberta, but a great deal of concern has been expressed about placing the head of a dead deer on a coin.

Could we not perhaps commission Alex Colville, or someone else, to do a nice sketch of two of our white-tailed deer to place on this coin? In that way, we could also justify the coin's name: Two bucks!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is there a seconder for Senator Prud'homme's adjournment of the debate?

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, after second reading it was our intention to move the legislation to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Senator Prud'homme: I will make only a few brief comments now and then I can explain in further detail when we return. I would like to cooperate with Senator Graham and others on this issue.

Senator Graham: I just do not want to inconvenience the representative of His Excellency the Governor General any further.

On the one hand, Senator Prud'homme, we are quite prepared to have you adjourn the debate and resume the debate at the next sitting of the Senate. Otherwise, if you want to compress your remarks, with the understanding of the precedent and the practices around here, then we are quite prepared to allow you to proceed.

Senator Prud'homme: I appreciate the honourable senator's courtesy. If you want to second my motion to adjourn, I would be more than honoured to do so and I would be prepared to proceed at the next sitting of the Senate.

On motion of Senator Prud'homme, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators we have Royal Assent at six o'clock.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Your Honour, I had understood that you might have received a message from the other place.

The Hon. the Speaker: I have not received it yet.

Senator Graham: Then I move that all further reports of committees, inquiries and motions be allowed to stand so that we can accommodate His Honour the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is that agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I point out that if messages arrive during the course of Royal Assent, quite obviously we will return thereafter and I will read them at that time.

In that case, I will leave the Chair for the arrival of His Excellency the Governor General.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

UNITED NATIONS

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF FOUNDING

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yesterday was the fiftieth anniversary of the signing of the United Nations Charter. It would appear that very few observers are in the mood for a birthday party. In fact, the mood seems to be characterized by reproach, doubt, and, indeed, disillusionment.

There are valid reasons for pessimism. Many key agencies seem redundant and outdated. Member states are not paying their bills. The United Nations has accumulated $2.8 billion worth of unpaid debts. Countries like Rwanda, Somalia, and Bosnia seem to symbolize UN failure.

We all know the 185-member organization needs a massive overhaul. The latest report of the Ford Foundation proposes a new road map for the future. The product of the combined experience of some of the world's most eminent statesmen, the report entitled "The UN in its Second Half Century", is proof that ideas are not lacking at this most critical time in the history of the world organization.

There are many who say, "Why bother? The reforms required are too numerous, too costly, the challenges too great, the political and institutional obstacles to change too deeply embedded." Conventional wisdom seems to tell us that the UN should be like General Motors: Change must be instantaneous, results immediately visible.

So why bother? Perhaps it might do us all good to think back to the first principles upon which the UN was founded. Prime Minister Mackenzie King outlined them at the San Francisco conference from which the UN Charter was conceived on April 27, 1945. They have a remarkable applicability to our time, and I quote Mackenzie King:

> The present is one of those moments of transition when an old order is passing away. As representatives of the United Nations, we are all here to lay the foundations of a new world order. The ends that we seek to serve transcend the limits of race and the bounds of nationality. While the fires of war are still burning fiercely, the opportunity is given to this Conference to forge and fashion from those fires an instrument of world security...it is ours to give to grief stricken humanity a hope of which it is in greater need today than it has ever been before...it is ours to help bring into being a world community in which social security and human welfare will become part of the inheritance of mankind.

Honourable senators, we are, on the occasion of this fiftieth anniversary, at a moment of great historic transition, as were the great Canadians who participated in San Francisco in 1945. The United Nations remains a reflection of hopes and aspirations of a civilized world, as it did at the time when Lester Pearson, Norman Robertson and Escott Reid and so many other fine Canadian statesmen put their talent and commitment to work with diplomats across the globe in constructing a process of peace, and I emphasize the word "process".

The United Nations was to be imperfect, as are the member states which comprise it, and in constant need of reform and revitalization, as are the member states which comprise it.

Again, I come back to the question, "Why bother? The challenges are too great." The answer is simple: If we tolerate the failure of the United Nations, we tolerate the failure of all of humankind. I speak not just of grief-stricken humanity but, perhaps more important, of ourselves, the developed countries of the richer, more favoured part of the world.

If we fail to find better ways to improve the lot of the poorest of the poor, we fail only ourselves. If we fail to provide security on the other side of the world, we only endanger the limited security we have here. So why bother? Because if we tolerate the failure of the United Nations, we tolerate the end of hope, and hope, as Mackenzie King pointed out to the delegates assembled in San Francisco back in 1945, is the last thing that any of us in those times or in these times can afford to surrender.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, the fiftieth anniversary of the United Nations organization is an anniversary in which Canadians coast to coast to coast can celebrate. Indeed, many honourable members of this chamber have played a leadership role in the various organs of the United Nations since its founding 50 years ago.

Honourable senators, the travaux préparatoires of the United Nations organization and the Atlantic Charter served as a precursor to the objectives of peace and the promotion of harmony and human rights around the world, an objective of the grand alliance itself during the terrible period of the Second World War, it carried with it a vision of world solidarity and of the peoples of the world represented by every political ideology, every system of government, but with a common objective, an objective of world peace, an objective of common good on a global plane, a plane which, in the mid-1940s, might not have been conceptualized as it can be conceptualized as we approach the third millennium.

Indeed, as the honourable deputy leader has mentioned, many question the level of efficacy of the United Nations organization as it is presently structured, as it presently operates. On the other hand, many look to the grand achievements and the potential for even greater achievements in the years that lay ahead.

We would like to underscore the objective of human rights, as does the Charter of the United Nations, and it has been articulated many times as an objective of the organization itself. Human rights and respect for the worth and dignity of all men and women of the world community form the basis of the instrumentalization which the United Nations represents.

Honourable senators, it is important that the Government of Canada continue its leadership role, as shown by the various administrations since the founding of the United Nations. Canada has participated in every peacekeeping mission undertaken under the auspices of the blue flag.

Honourable senators, although the challenges are great in this world organization, Canada should rise to the occasion with a forward-looking, creative vision that the world community may continue in harmony, which is the objective and the desire of all men and women of goodwill.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, I too rise to speak about the anniversary of the United Nations. Perhaps we have focussed on the political failures, rather than the lack of political will by the countries of the United Nations.

The United Nations cannot succeed on its own. Those of us who are committed must face the challenges of the UN not with mere criticism but with constructive criticism. Therefore, I pay tribute to the United Nations Association of Canada and the fiftieth anniversary committee, which have put together constructive and timely proposals for the reform of the United Nations. I am pleased to see that the Government of Canada has embraced many of those reform recommendations.

The strength of the United Nations, which is often overlooked, is its role in the ECOSOC and in all of its cultural, social and health organizations. Anyone who has worked in those fields will know that we would not be where we are today but for the World Health Organization, UNICEF, and many of the other United Nations Development Projects, UNDP, which underpin child welfare and health issues. We can be proud of those contributions made by Canadians and others around the world.

From a personal point of view, I would underscore the effectiveness of human rights issues. This is a place where dialogue can supercede other, more violent efforts. If the United Nations did not exist, what would our world be like?

It is important that Canadians take note of the celebrations which are taking place across our country. I have been involved with many of the United Nations model assemblies. They involve university students, high school students and citizens at large. There is still optimism that the United Nations is a functioning organization and our best hope for a peaceful future.

There are critics who say, "Why bother?" Right-thinking Canadians know that we must bother. We must be worried about restructuring the United Nations. We must look at a global world which puts human rights, peace and development above all else.

I ask all senators, over the rest of this year, to reflect on how we as Canadians can contribute to this worthwhile cause.

Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, to me, since my days at university and as a member of the House of Commons and now in the Senate, the United Nations has always represented the hope of humanity. As institutions grow older, of course some reforms become necessary. However, when we criticize, we must be very careful to be constructive, not destructive. That is why I agree wholeheartedly with everything that was said this evening, and so I would rather not be repetitive.

We seem to have a very lot on our plate this evening, so I would not want to take up more of your time than necessary —

[English]

— except to say that, very often, when we talk about the United Nations, we have a tendency to dwell on the best record of the United Nations; that is, human rights.

I know I am repeating myself but I will go on until I die. My father always said, "When you talk about human rights, please do not insult me. Do not pick and choose. You either believe in the universality of human rights or you remain silent."

We see today again trouble starting all over the Middle East. It will grow, unfortunately, because in the past we have forgotten to go directly to the root of the problem over there — the question of human rights.

Senator Andreychuk has asked us to reflect for the rest of this year. I would say we should reflect for the rest of our lives on the question of human rights. Also, we should always be champions of the United Nations, especially with the new political agenda in the United States of America. They are attempting to find many faults with the United Nations so as to better destroy it. Canada should stand as a champion of the United Nations. Canadians would like that from us; they would expect that from us. I am certain that is what the Senate stands for.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I should like to refer particularly to comments made by Senators Graham and Andreychuk. Senator Graham pointed to the work of the group of eminent persons who was commissioned by the Ford Foundation to make recommendations about the future of the United Nations. That is commendable work and no doubt contains many valuable suggestions.

However, Senator Andreychuk did underline that, here in Canada, the United Nations Association has taken upon itself to focus on the reform of the United Nations as part of the fiftieth anniversary celebrations.

I would suggest to honourable senators that the work which has been done in Canada is as impressive and inspiring and probably has greater credibility, considering its source, than comments that could be drawn from other parts of the world.

Honourable senators will remember that The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy, which tabled its report last fall, did examine the United Nations and made some very concrete suggestions for its future. Those recommendations are as relevant today as they were when they were made.

The weakness of the United Nations is the weakness of the member states. The inability of the world community to grapple effectively and successfully with the situation in Bosnia does not primarily stem from the United Nations itself; rather, it stems from the indecision and the difference of opinion among the Europeans and the Americans as to what action ought to be taken in Europe.

We recently heard the President of the United States, in Halifax, confess his inability to commit any concrete action to the resolution of that problem because of the expected refusal of the Congress. How can the United Nations cover itself with glory in the present circumstances when the leading single superpower in the world is unable to show the leadership that it must if the United Nations is to make the impact on the world that it ought to make in the future?

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-104, to amend the Criminal Code and the Young Offenders Act (forensic DNA analysis).

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Graham, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 57(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT AND NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT— COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO TABLE FINAL REPORT

Hon. John B. Stewart, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 58(1)(f), moved:

That, notwithstanding usual practices, if the Senate is not sitting when the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs on Hemispheric Trade Relations is completed, the Committee, which was authorized by the Senate to monitor and report on the implementation and application in both countries of the Canada - United-States Free Trade Agreement, and on the implementation and application in Canada, the United-States and Mexico of the North American Free Trade Agreement, and was empowered to report no later than Thursday, December 14, 1995, shall deposit its Report with the Clerk of the Senate, and said Report shall thereupon be deemed to have been tabled in this Chamber.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. John B. Stewart, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 58(1)(f), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon, tomorrow, Wednesday, June 28, 1995, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: I think we should ask for an explanation, honourable senators.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, the Foreign Affairs Committee has been examining some of the proposals with regard to international financial institutions. As Senator MacDonald will know, those institutions were the subject of discussions at the Halifax G-7 conference. We are hoping that tomorrow we will have the Deputy Minister to the Minister of Foreign Affairs and International Trade available as a witness. We would like to hear that evidence before the Senate goes away for the summer. This will be our last opportunity.

Senator MacDonald: It would have been sufficient to say that that was the only time that the witnesses could appear.

Senator Stewart: It may well be that the witnesses could appear at another time, but we could not.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FINANCE

CONTROL OF DEBT AND DEFICIT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and is with regard to Canadian banks. The Minister of Finance is having a bit of a session with them. I can well understand why he is doing what he is doing.

Having said that, has there been any consideration given by the government to possibly allaying the fears of the banks by going further to reducing the deficit and the debt?

The Mulroney government controlled inflation, and it is still well under control. Has the government any plans in this regard? Having dealt with the banks for the number of years that I was in business, I believe that the uncertainty among the banks is as a result of fear that the deficit and debt control efforts will not be effective. An escalation in interest rates could put them in jeopardy with their loans.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Minister of Finance has been very clear in stating that the government is committed to reducing the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP in three years. That commitment is on track, and the minister is pursuing it with confidence and zeal. He has also indicated that that is a very important step on the way to his ultimate goal of the total elimination of the deficit.

That is Mr. Martin's ultimate goal, but the 3 per cent of GDP objectivve has been the prominent commitment of this government. We are on track to reach that commitment, and to surpass it.

JOB CREATION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, by way of a supplementary question, it is obvious that the uncertainty is there. It has been indicated that 3 per cent of GDP is not acceptable. I would like to know from the Leader of the Government whether the concern is really job creation. If the banks are not lending to small businesses, jobs will not be created. The greatest job creator this country has seen in recent years is the Mulroney trade agreement. Other people are taking credit for it, but it was the Mulroney trade agreement that we went to election on in 1988.

What programs does the government have in place, other than the infrastructure program that they came out with in the Red Book? How many long-term, long-lasting jobs will that program create, if any?

I would also like the honourable minister to elaborate concerning any future plans the government may have to create jobs, other than through beating on the banks, to which I do not take great offence because I have a certain bias toward the banks as well.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, naturally the total is not in on the infrastructure program. It is still very much in effect. Projects are being carried out across the country, and tens of thousands of jobs have been created.

I have said in this place on earlier occasions, however, that the goal of the infrastructure program was to kick-start job creation. That is what the three levels of government agreed to in setting up the program. It has turned out, not only in terms of job creation but also in terms of communities all across this country beginning projects, many of which are already completed. Without the program, many communities would have had to wait for years or possibly not have the infrastructure programs go ahead at all. They have been very successful and will continue to be so.

A number of other programs have been put forward by the Minister of Human Resources Development. I shall be pleased to get a list of those programs for my honourable friend.

The one main creator of jobs in this country is small business. This is the sector in which Mr. Martin is having a lot of difficulty with the chartered banks. There have been numerous pledges of easing access to small business over the years. These pledges have been hollow. Mr. Martin has been taking an extremely vigorous approach, not only in his budget but also in personal discussions with the chartered banks, for the good of the country, to convince them to ease their restrictions and offer greater access and support of small business. It is through that support that Canadians will be put back to work. That is the goal of everyone in this chamber.

EXPO 2005

SELECTION OF SITE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, my question is to the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I understand that a decision has now been made by the government with respect to the location of the Expo site. Could she tell us what the site is?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, no decision has been made by the government. This matter is still under discussion.

Senator Ghitter: I understand from reports in Calgary today that in fact the decision has been made. The people involved have advised me that the decision is a "no-decision" — that is, the government has decided that they will not select either site because neither will guarantee any losses that may accrue. Is that an erroneous report circulating in Calgary today?

Senator Fairbairn: That is an erroneous report. No decision has been taken and the discussions continue.

Senator Ghitter: Will a decision be made before the end of the year, or when may we anticipate a decision?

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Ghitter, your impatience is equalled only by my own. I hope the decision will be made very soon.

TRANSPORT

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—NOVA SCOTIA—RESTORATION OF FUNDING TO DESIGNATED PROJECT—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, earlier last week the Member of Parliament for Cumberland-Colchester indicated — at least to Nova Scotians — through the press and the various media that solutions have been found by Ottawa to the difficulties of funding that stretch of Highway 104 known as "Death Valley".

The provincial minister of highways has indicated that he has heard nothing and that he knows nothing more, nor has he had any advice with respect to the federal government either freezing the funding that was taken away or restoring fresh or new funding to that particular problem.

Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate know whether or not there is any substance to the suggestion that solutions have been found or are about to be brought forward?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, frankly, I do not know. I will pursue the matter to try to find out what is in the wind tomorrow.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Gérald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, my question involves the same subject and it concerns the diversion of $26 million in funds. Over the last number of weeks 11 questions have been asked on this subject, none of which have yet been answered. Could the Leader of the Government provide us with the time-frame within which we might expect answers to those questions?

After this past weekend's cabinet retreat, I had been hoping that we would have some solution to this problem that has been concerning Nova Scotians.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will try to hasten those responses. That is all I have to say.

HEALTH

BOVINE GROWTH HORMONE—LINK BETWEEN IGF-1 AND BREAST CANCER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I raised a question last week about the bovine growth hormone. The end of the one-year moratorium on rBST sales in Canada is just days away. The Canadian public is becoming aware that there are serious unresolved issues of potential harm to human health from milk produced by cows that receive this genetically engineered drug. Among them is a possible link between high levels of the insulin-like growth factor IGF-1 found in the milk and breast cancer. Last week The Ottawa Citizen published a letter, with scientific citations, again raising that possibility.

Medical scientists in the U.S., Canada and Britain have raised many concerns about IGF-1 in the last five years, and, yet, a House of Commons committee was told by a Monsanto official that Health Canada has given rBST a human health clearance and "there have been no comments or requests from Health Canada for further health studies since 1990."

In 1991, the Council on Scientific Affairs of the American Medical Association reported that,

> Further studies will be required to determine whether the ingestion of higher than normal concentrations of bovine insulin-like growth factors (IGF-1) is safe for children, adolescents and adults.

The U.S. National Institutes of Health made a similar call for further research.

My question for the government leader in the Senate is this: Will the government assure Canadians that Health Canada requires that critical research gaps — including the effect of the insulin-like growth factor and its possible link to breast cancer — be filled before issuing a notice of compliance to any manufacturer of rBST that would permit its sale in Canada?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take Senator Spivak's specific question to my colleague, the Minister of Health, but I assure her that Health Canada is continuing its evaluation of rBST for safety and effectiveness. Until this evaluation is completed and a decision has been made, rBST cannot and will not be sold for use in Canada.

GRANTING OF PUBLIC RELATIONS CONTRACT FOR G-7 SUMMIT—CONTRAVENTION OF TREASURY BOARD REGULATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday's Gazette revealed that once again, and this is the tenth time, her government has contradicted the principles of its own Red Book, the book brandished everywhere by Liberal candidates during the last federal election.

Once again, you have gone against the principles of your electoral Bible. This time, we have a contract that was given without tender to a company belonging to your friends, in connection with the organization of the G-7 summit in Halifax.

The Gazette reported that Groupe Columbia Inc., whose partners, owners or shareholders are eminent Liberals — always according to The Gazette — obtained a government contract worth more than $100,000, according to one of the shareholders or owners of the company. Can the leader confirm that this contract was indeed given to a Montreal firm known as Groupe Columbia Inc.?

• (2050)

Senator Berntson: Tell us a joke.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a contract was granted to that Montreal firm, which is well known for its skill and competence in the field of communications.

Senator Berntson: Along with a dozen others!

Senator Fairbairn: The firm was asked to perform a service for the Canadian government in a field in which it is highly specialized, and is able to perform with great speed and great skill.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: And at great cost, and no tender! An honest mistake.

Senator Fairbairn: That company did a fine job. The government was fortunate to have that kind of skill and competence to call on to undertake the task.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: An honest mistake, as Michel Dupuy would say.

Senator Nolin: Is the Leader of the Government aware that more than one company informed the government early this year that they would be pleased to serve the Government of Canada in that field? There is probably more than one company in Canada able to perform that type of service. Why did your government not ask for bids? The Treasury Board regulations require a bid for a contract of over $30,000. Why did you sole-source that contract, contrary to your Red Book promises?

Senator Fairbairn: I simply repeat that there was a job to be done, for which this particular firm was perfectly suited, since it is well known for its background and competence in that kind of communications advice. They were chosen by the government, and the company performed in a first-class manner for Canada in its work for the Halifax summit.

Senator Nolin: May I have the exact reasons why this company was chosen in this fashion? If the honourable senator does not have the reasons tonight, I can wait for an answer to my question until later this summer. There are some provisions in the Treasury Board regulations for going over the $30,000 limit. May I have the reasons that apply in this case? It is a serious matter.

For nine years, the Liberals argued in opposition that our government should not do such things, so we tried to comply with the rules laid down by Treasury Board. Now you are doing exactly the thing to which you previously objected. May we have those reasons?

Senator Fairbairn: I would be pleased to talk to the President of the Treasury Board and obtain an answer to my friend's question.

[Translation]

GRANTING OF PUBLIC RELATIONS CONTRACT FOR G-7 SUMMIT—REQUEST FOR ESTIMATED FINAL COST

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, on the same topic, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate give an estimate of the total cost of the contract that was awarded, which was well in excess of the $30,000 limit. In fact, according to The Gazette and other information we have received, the total cost was well in excess of $100,000 and was probably closer to $400,000 than to $100,000.

Could the Leader of the Government give her estimate by the time we finish our work this week? Most of the bills should be in by now. Someone did an evaluation of the work. According to the Leader of the Government, this company did a magnificent job. I imagine the cost/quality ratio could be determined. Could she perhaps give us her estimate of the bill for this contract by Thursday noon?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I will do my very best, as always, for Senator Simard.

GRANTING OF PUBLIC RELATIONS CONTRACT FOR G-7 SUMMIT—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS ON ADVICE GIVEN TO RCMP

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I just overheard many Liberals saying, "You did the same," and rightly so. I am ready to stand here and say that of course the Conservatives did the same, and they did so very happily. I was not with them then, and I am not with them today. If you have doubts, just watch me.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate ask the Solicitor General, Mr. Herb Gray, just what kind of advice a public relations firm can give to the RCMP, to explain to all Canadians why security would be so tight at the summit? I was not aware that the RCMP needed that type of advice. However, I am glad to hear that that is so, because now I will suggest many things to the RCMP as to how they should deal with security in Canada in the years to come. I am not being facetious when I say that.

Will the leader determine for us, through the Solicitor General, the type of advice that a public relations firm gives to the RCMP on how to control mobs and other groups?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will do my very best.

DELAYED ANSWER

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised in the Senate on June 7, 1995 by the Honourable Senator Robertson regarding the collapse of the Atlantic fishery — longer-term provision for laid-off workers under the Atlantic Groundfish Strategy.

FISHERIES

COLLAPSE OF ATLANTIC FISHERY—LONGER-TERM PROVISION FOR LAID-OFF WORKERS UNDER THE ATLANTIC GROUNDFISH STRATEGY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Brenda Robertson on June 7, 1995)

The government has committed to TAGS as a comprehensive, 5 year, $1.9 billion program to provide income support and adjustment measures to those fishery workers who were most seriously affected by the groundfish crisis.

To date, over 52,600 workers have applied to the program and, 13,500 fishers and 25,500 plant workers have been approved. Many of the 39,000 who have been approved for the program continue to work in the fishery and many continue to qualify for UI benefits. As a result, only about 25,000 are drawing TAGS income support benefits at any one time.

The first year of a five year program has just been completed, and therefore, it is much too early to draw any conclusions regarding the success of the program or requirements for post - TAGS. There have been, to date, some significant results, as more than 16,500 clients are currently involved in training and the other various TAGS adjustment measures.

Further adjustment and harvesting capacity reduction is expected in the near future, as the first round of the TAGS Groundfish Licence Retirement Program has just been completed and over 2,000 applications were received from fishers who wish to exit the fishery on a permanent basis.

In addition, negotiations with the provinces are being finalized to implement Early Retirement Programs, both for fishermen and plant workers which will provide further adjustment of another 1,600 workers.

Ministers Axworthy and Tobin are currently finalizing the TAGS First Year Review. They will be making a submission to Cabinet in the near future. It is expected that there will be a commitment for an annual review.

The government is very much aware that there is an ongoing requirement to monitor both the success of TAGS and, in addition, the recovery/status of the resource.

Two thirds of the TAGS caseload consists of plant workers from the processing sector, which falls under provincial jurisdiction. Therefore, it is important that provinces make some firm commitments regarding capacity reduction in the processing sector as part of a long term strategy.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

CN COMMERCIALIZATION BILL

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-89, to provide for the continuance of the Canadian National Railway Company under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the issuance and sale of shares of the company to the public.

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, the committee had a meeting at a peculiar hour this morning; an hour that I gather was designed to suit the Minister of Transport, the elusive Mr. Doug Young, who had vowed not to appear before the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications until the Pearson bill had been dealt with. However, Mr. Young attended and gave his usual good accounting of himself.

Perhaps because of the testimony of the six or seven other witnesses that we heard from this morning, rather than that of the Minister of Transport, I think we were generally satisfied that all due care and diligence will be taken with respect to the issuance of these shares. A particular watch will be kept to ensure that the difficulties faced by the investment community and by the transportation industry at the time of the sale of Air Canada's shares does not repeat itself. This, after all, is the largest undertaking of its kind in the history of this country. It is an enormous share offering, and it is underwritten, so we must be very careful.

Generally we on this side are satisfied that such care will be exercised and that the sale will go forward as portrayed by the bill.

Honourable senators, we did not view the bill itself for the protections which usually concern many of us in this chamber, particularly those who come from the extremities, the ports of Vancouver, Halifax, Saint John, et cetera. We did not look to this bill for any help there. However, when it comes before us, we will look closely for adequate protection measures in the new Transportation Act, for people such as captive shippers.

It was interesting to hear it admitted this morning, in response to questioning from a distinguished colleague on the other side, that this bill does nothing with respect to job creation. We spent much time today dealing with many issues but job creation was not among them. The only wealth creation that we could see will go to those underwriters and salesmen who peddle these shares. Who knows how many there will be when they are finished, but there will be quite a parcel of them.

Honourable senators, we are prepared to let the bill return to the other place without amendment. There is the matter, and I hope it is just an editorial problem, referred to by the distinguished chairman of our committee when he suggested that perhaps the clerks or the appropriate authorities could find some way to replace the word "Canada". It may have been inadvertently left out of the particular clause which suggested that the head office should remain in Montreal.

With those few words, honourable senators, I remind you that we are awaiting the presentation of the new Transport Act before taking our positions with respect to protecting the rights of Canadians in matters of transport, particularly with respect to Canadian National as it moves into the realm of Canadian heritage now. CN is part of our historical culture. When we return this fall, we will no longer be masters of that institution which has truly played a most significant part in the development of our nation. The railway has been the thread which has bound us together and allowed the varied regions of this country to develop.

In the hearts and minds of many Canadians, particularly older Canadians, Canadian National holds a very dear place. Indeed, CN is a bit of a mystique in our culture. In a sense, we are sorry to see it go, but the time has come for institutions such as Canadian National to be placed on the proper competitive level with other railway companies, notably, here in Canada, with Canadian Pacific.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, there is much in Bill C-89 which I can support. I would feel somewhat neglectful if I did not speak to this bill. I would feel that I would not be representing the constituents of my province in particular if I failed to address some fundamental questions that Atlantic Canada must ask when dealing with the federal government and change: How will this change affect the regional interests of Atlantic Canada in the future? Is this change being managed properly? Are the interests of the region, which is acutely vulnerable to change in national policy, sufficiently protected? These questions are always a test for change in Atlantic Canada, and they have to be a test for Bill C-89.

Honourable senators, the federal Minister of Transport is on record as saying that a private sector CN, which will be the region's only national rail service, is under no obligation to maintain services to Eastern Canada. Of course, if it is not viable, then that makes good sense. Such a condition would only discourage investors necessary to the very survival of the rail service. However, what about the critical interests of the region's manufacturers and exporters who depend on rail service to ship their products to Central Canada and to the United States markets?

It is perhaps a cruel irony that, as the region's exporters become more confident in their ability to compete in markets opened up by the North American Free Trade Agreement and by the international trade agreement, they are becoming more anxious about solutions to transportation problems in connecting with these export markets.

Honourable senators, the commercialization of CN, following on the heels of the termination of the Atlantic Freight Assistance Program on July 1, could have the effect of making things go from bad to worse. Regardless of the fact that the region's manufacturers are shipping a large portion of their product to Central and Western Canada — which, according to the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, impacts on 15,000 Atlantic Canada jobs — the federal government is terminating the program without properly assessing the consequences through an economic impact analysis.

Some time ago, I asked the minister about the possibility of having this economic impact analysis done to analyze our transportation problems. This really means that the region's exporters are in the situation of having very little time to adjust to this change. In fact, they have very little idea of the nature of the required adjustments. This is unacceptable. It could have been avoided had the federal government chosen to extend the termination of the Atlantic Freight Assistance Program to the end of the year, as was done with the termination of the freight assistance program, as those of you from Atlantic Canada will remember.

Honourable senators, it appears that CN commercialization has achieved widespread support in the region as the only hope for a viable rail service. The Atlantic Provinces Chamber of Commerce, for example, supports commercialization in principle, as I am sure we all do in this chamber. However, the chamber's concern, and my concern as well, is that the commercialization is proceeding in a transportation policy vacuum.

To put it another way, my concern is with the lack of details. In the absence of a rational, overall rail transportation policy, it is impossible to calculate the practical effects of this initiative on transportation services to the region's markets.

Notwithstanding the support for CN commercialization which has emerged in the region, the view presented by the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, that CN privatization must be carefully managed concurrent with the reforms, regulations and taxation structures under which the railway industry operates, is a sensible suggestion and, in my view, one worthy of serious consideration. The Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission has provided the federal Minister of Transport with a set of criteria to identify essential rail lines, which could be the basis for establishing a core network of rail lines. Adopting the essential network concept would enable the federal minister to manage change in a rational manner by setting a standard against which, to quote the Task Force on CN Commercialization, "an orderly shredding of uneconomic assets be done."

In view of the fact that rail abandonment in Atlantic Canada has left the region with a bare-bones type of infrastructure connecting us to the rest of Canada, the application of the essential network concept could prevent the loss of essential rail lines — lines which may not be viable in the short term, but may prove to be so in the longer term. The loss of those lines would simply be disastrous to our exporters and to Atlantic economic development generally.

It is for these reasons, honourable senators, that I support the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission's recommendation that the essential network concept be implemented by Transport Canada in connection with the passage of Bill C-89. I shall be watching carefully as we develop a transport policy for our country.

The Saint John Telegraph-Journal warns that the privatization of CN has great potential for bungling. This, my honourable colleagues, must not happen. Reducing the costs of Canada's transportation system is good public policy, but that reduction has a cost of its own. In the case of Atlantic Canada, that cost could be the weakening of an economy in transition from dependency to competitiveness.

I support this bill as a realistic approach to improved efficiencies. However, it is incumbent upon the Minister of Transport to proceed in a manner which ensures the development of a modern, efficient, national rail transportation system, and thus to foster national and regional economic development.

I trust that my comments today will serve to remind the minister that the commercialization of CN, as well as allowing the rail industry to compete fairly with other industries, presents special challenges to manufacturers and shippers and to their employees in Atlantic Canada. We have been advised through a press statement by the Premier of our province, and by the Prime Minister in the last few days, that the moneys set aside for compensation of manufacturers affected by the termination of the Atlantic Freight Rate Assistance Program in New Brunswick will be spent in the next three years on highway construction. We certainly need the highways.

I suppose that, for the premier, highway construction is certainly more appealing in an election year than subsidies, but what about the manufacturers and the exporters? Where are the answers? There are many people in the Atlantic provinces, and particularly in my province of New Brunswick, who are looking for answers. I hope the Minister of Transport will be providing us with them very soon.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THIRD READING

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-87, to implement the Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production, Stockpiling and Use of Chemical Weapons and on their Destruction.

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, I wish to lend my support to this convention, one of the most significant conventions in which Canada has been involved. Almost ten years have passed since this process began.

Some of us who have worked overseas have seen the death and destruction that chemical weapons can produce in many war-torn places, often upon innocent children and civilian victims. Chemical warfare has often been described as the warfare of the future. This convention is timely; in fact, in the eyes of many, it is long overdue.

Honourable senators, I wish to commend the administrations which have shown that they can rise above the political debate in Canada. One of the problems with conventions is that there is not a consistent pattern of pressure as far as they are concerned. In this case, I am pleased to see that the contrary is true.

The negotiations on this convention were started some 10 years ago. Because of the tireless efforts of the administrations in Canada, I believe that we now have a successful convention. My difficulty with conventions of this type is that often in international fora, once a convention is passed, the ability to ratify it loses impetus after the countries which have proposed it ratify and sign on. The hopeful sign in this case is that some 65 countries will sign on. However, that is still a dismal record. It is often the errant countries that do not ratify these conventions.

I hope the government will continue to press this convention as a priority issue in the international field. I trust that the surveillance mechanisms will be put in place and complied with. The United Nations and other international conventions lie dormant in many cases because of a lack of enforcement. We cannot afford to have this convention languish for lack of compliance.

As I have pointed out, once having witnessed the devastation of chemical warfare, one cannot tolerate one more day without this convention in place, together with adequate and proper surveillance and supervision. I urge that this matter continue to be a priority for Canada and for the international scene. In this way, we can be assured that civilians will not suffer the consequences of the actions of errant countries, and that we have a world in which chemicals are used properly as opposed to being used for warfare.

As senators may know, many chemicals have a dual use. This convention does not restrict the use of chemicals for proper medical and other purposes. What this convention does is stop the abhorrent use of chemical warfare against innocent civilians and for warfare.

Today is an historic day for Canada, as we adopt one of the most significant international instruments that we have at our disposal. It is also unique because it is intended to bind together all countries. Unlike other conventions, it goes immediately to destroying chemical weapons that are now in place. Not only does it talk about the future destruction of chemicals, but also the immediate and imminent destruction of existing chemicals that can only be construed to be for use in chemical warfare.

Those of us who have worked in the area know the countries to which we refer. We believe that there is an optimistic mood at the moment to deal with the excesses of chemical warfare. I trust this convention will go a long way toward eradicating a problem that can be devastating, to say the least. I trust that this convention will be adhered to, and that we will not neglect this area to the point where a disaster could arise again.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the order:

> Resuming debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kenny, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stewart, for the second reading of Bill C-82, to amend the Royal Canadian Mint Act.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I know this bill will not be read the third time this evening because I understand the bill will be referred to committee and read the third time later on.

That being said, I will make only a few comments.

• (2120)

This has been a subject of great interest to me for many years. It is a very trivial subject, except if you start to think about the meaning of dollars, bills and coins.

I had the honour to sit in the House of Commons for many years. I have always promoted Canadianism. What better way to promote Canada than to teach the millions of new Canadians the history of Canada? How do we teach the history of Canada to people who have no knowledge of it because they have just arrived here or because they were not taught much in school about our traditions, our political history or our country?

Honourable senators, I am also a member of the Queen's Privy Council. I swore allegiance to the Queen of Canada. An oath is for life. I always say that the difference between Canada and Australia, for instance, is that we believe in a slow evolution of the history of our country. That is why I have always said that for as long as Queen Elizabeth II lives or does not abdicate, she is the Queen of Canada. However, Canadians must start reflecting now upon what the future should be for the head of state of Canada after the Queen dies or abdicates.

In Australia, they say that in the year 2000, come what may, they want to have a republic. I am not of that school, and I am not ashamed to say that in either language.

For those of you who may not know — I will brag a little bit on the eve of Canada Day — I have spoken over 284 times in Western Canada since becoming a member of Parliament. I take no lessons from any journalist, or from colleagues, for that matter. One of my dear sisters keeps a record of the places I have spoken in Western Canada. I had the great honour of meeting Senator Carstairs in Alberta. You may not know that she was a teacher. She invited me to her school. Even then I was told not to speak about the monarchy. I did not know what to talk about so, as I am known to do, I started talking about everything I was told not to talk about. I survived that visit to her school.

The time has come for Canadians to reflect on the history of Canada. Is anyone ashamed to see William Lyon Mackenzie King on the $50 bill? When new Canadians look at a $50 bill, if they can find one, and ask who that man is, they are told that it is William Lyon Mackenzie King who was the Prime Minister of Canada for 21 years. He served as Prime Minister longer than anyone in the Commonwealth.

The man on the $10 bill is Sir John A. Macdonald, the first Prime Minister of Canada. On the $5 bill is a great hero of the Liberal party, a great hero in Canada and a great hero of mine, whose bust I have in my office: Sir Wilfrid Laurier, another past Prime Minister of Canada. On the $100 bill is Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister during the First World War from 1911 to 1917 and then in a coalition government from 1917 to 1920. Her Majesty the Queen is on the $1 bill, the $2 bill, the $20 bill and the $1,000 bill.

I have had the honour over the years of keeping the discussion going. In order not to insult people in Canada, one must be patient. That is the way this country functions best. You must go slowly in trying to convince one another. You move back and then you take a step forward. I am not new to this.

Jean Chrétien, my school friend, introduced a private members' bill in the old days. We always had the same feelings about Canadianizing our country. You may not know that it was Jean Chrétien's private members' bill which resulted in the change of Trans-Canada Airlines to Air Canada. Can you believe that there was a debate about that issue?

Remember the furious debate we had on the Canadian flag, which was supposed to terminate Canada forever. Recall also the debate on the metric system. We have seen nothing on the gun control debate that compares to the debate we had on the metric system which, it was said, would result in the taking over of Canada by the French.

The Honourable Mr. Dingwall sent over some information today. He offered us a briefing on this issue. I was amazed to see that he took this as a fait accompli, the proposed design and size, subject to Governor in Council approval on the recommendation of the Minister of Public Works and Government Service.

So far, so good. However, what will be on the face of the $2 coin? It says that on the obverse, "le motif de l'envers", in French, will be an effigy of Her Majesty the Queen. That is fine, but then it says that the reverse is to be determined by the government after public consultation.

It is very strange to go to the public to ask for a design for one side. There is no law which states what will be "à l'envers". Someone in the Department of Finance or the Bank of Canada decided that the Queen will be on every bill. I have proven them wrong in the past. I said, "What about the $5 bill, on which there is a great Canadian Prime Minister? What about the $10 bill?" They say it is against every rule in the world to have anyone other than the head of state on the coin.

All the American coins have different people on them. They are using their coins to teach. Either you build a country that way or you go "aux barricades", which I do not believe in. I believe that you gradually teach young Canadians, new Canadians, and even old Canadians whose minds are open enough to understand that that is one of the ways to build a country.

Since we are now to strike a new coin, my consultative friends, who knew of the love that I always had for Mr. Pearson, were all waiting for me to put forward a proposal. I also dealt with this bill in the House of Commons. It is not new for me today. In the seventies and in the eighties I proposed a similar bill. In my summation, I began to state "Therefore, I should propose that," and my honourable colleagues were waiting to jump on me. I went on to state "that the likeness of the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker be placed on the $1 coin." The Tories could not oppose that, but I did not get anywhere in any event, because it was already decided in the Finance Committee or by the Bank of Canada.

Canada is still in the process of building.

[Translation]

As I always said, Canada is a country which is in the making every day. It is not completed. It changes every day. It is not the country which our grandfathers knew, which my father knew, and which I knew when I first came to Parliament 30 years ago.

I understand that this bores you, but Canada is an extraordinary subject to discuss during the Canada Day week. Millions of dollars are spent on contracts with engineering and public relations firms to organize the festivities; yet, when we want to talk about Canada where it really counts, people seem indifferent.

When I see you smile, I know that you are thinking: here he goes again; he is so emotional. For heaven's sake, I am talking about my country.

[English]

I am fed up with how you people are able to make a passionate and emotional speech. How can you talk about matters in which you believe so much? You must have conviction, and show that you believe in what you say.

Have you ever heard Senator Robichaud speak? In 1960, I went as a student to make speeches for him in New Brunswick. If you talk about emotion tonight, you should have been there in 1960 when I was a student. He won the same year as Mr. Jean Lesage. What a great speaker he was. He was never accused of being too emotional. He was trying to talk about the rights of people living side by side in New Brunswick.

I will not depart from the subject-matter that will be put to the committee.

[Translation]

You know what a fait accompli is. Before we have a fait accompli, and are told that we could have spoken up sooner—

[English]

Since it is not being done yet, I encourage all honourable senators to accept Mr. Dingwall's offer to explain to us what this bill is all about and what they intend to do with it. His telephone number is 997-5421.

I hope that this bill will be sent to an appropriate committee by our distinguished Leader of the Government in the Senate. Perhaps we can call one witness only and ask, "Who has decided upon one side of the new coin?" It will then be a free-for-all with respect to the rest.

Motion agreed to and bill be read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, in view of the decision that the Senate has just taken to refer Bill C-82 to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, as chairman of that committee, I am convening a meeting for 3 o'clock tomorrow afternoon in room 356-S. I am counting on our friends in the leadership of the government to produce a minister of the Crown, or a Secretary of State, or a parliamentary secretary, or someone authorized to speak on behalf of the government on this matter.

On motion of Senator Graham, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

CHILDREN'S SPECIAL ALLOWANCES ACT
UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Hon. Lorne M. Bonnell moved the second reading of Bill C-54, to amend the Old Age Security Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Children's Special Allowances Act, and the Unemployment Insurance Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill will not take the old age pension from senior citizens, in case you thought that was what it was intended to do. This is an important piece of legislation, and I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this bill to amend the legislation governing the Income Security Programs provided to senior citizens in Canada today.

Over the years, governments have had the opportunity to update and streamline legislation, which is of paramount importance to every Canadian. Perhaps we are not always conscious of the fact that these acts affect the lives of not just those millions of our fellow citizens who are retired, but of every Canadian citizen concerned about the well–being and security of our parents and friends who rely on retirement income.

If you will permit me, I wish to point out some numbers that will help put things in perspective. In Atlantic Canada alone there are almost 300,000 people who benefit from Old Age Security pensions. A number of them — 167,000 in fact — also get the income tested Guaranteed Income Supplement or Spouse's Allowance. Canada Pension Plan benefits are also paid to over 382,000 residents of Atlantic Canada.

These changes are important, not only to those who are retired but also to virtually every Canadian who anticipates retirement. We in this chamber may not think of this every day, but to most Canadians retirement comes closer and closer with every passing day. This is a compelling reason for members of the Senate to consider carefully the provisions of the bill which will make it easier for those who have earned the right to a secure income to obtain their entitlement.

Honourable senators, I would be the first to admit that this bill does not try to make major changes to the programs. It tries to reduce the number of inconsistencies between programs, provide choices and accommodate some of the requests that Canadians have made.

Our current programs are rooted in a great tradition. For many hundreds of years, people on this continent have respected, honoured and cared for their elders. This great tradition, common to the many cultures which comprise our nation, is the basis for the caring society that Canada has become today.

• (2140)

One important concern characterizes these proposed amendments to the legislation governing Old Age Security and the Canada Pension Plan. That concern is improving client services. All MPs and senators receive letters and phone calls from Canadians asking for help in dealing with income security matters. With many millions of senior citizens living in every city, town, and village throughout our vast country, it is normal that some would consider that they are not receiving the service they expect. All of us in this chamber have responded to the requests of senior citizens for help.

The department strives to be as responsive as possible, and this bill is a major step in improving services. Here are some examples of how the department is seeking to enhance services and to provide more flexibility for clients. On the one hand, they are being responsible in administering public funds. On the other hand, they are responding to the needs of millions of clients.

Those who are receiving spouses' allowance will be converted automatically to old age security pensions and, if applicable, to the guaranteed income supplement when they turn 65. Information already on file with the department can provide correct data which qualifies people for automatic conversions to the appropriate payment. This will help streamline services for the 20,000 people who become eligible each year.

The program will be able to continue paying guaranteed income supplements and spouses' allowance benefits even for clients who have applied late. We can better serve those seniors who, through illness or other reasons, neglect to apply for their benefits. This can benefit 100,000 people each year.

Everyone needs flexibility in managing their financial affairs to accommodate changes in personal circumstances, and that includes pensioners. For example, to manage their retirement income, many people assign payments of a benefit to a spouse when the need arises. They will be able to cancel an assignment or reassign their benefits at any time.

Taxation of retirement income always requires some attention: When it is to their advantage, clients will be able to request cancellation of their monthly Old Age Security payment. This can eliminate concerns about the taxation of this benefit.

While awaiting approval of payments of Old Age Security or Canada Pension Plan, clients often can obtain temporary benefits from the provincial and municipal governments or other sources, which are to be paid back. They can now request the department to repay benefits directly to those governments or, for example, the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Inevitably, some people apply for their pensions some time after they become eligible. They pass their sixty-fifth birthday without seeking their Canada Pension Plan payments. This bill makes such persons eligible for up to one year of retroactive benefits. No one wants to deny benefits to a person who has been ill or unable to apply. This measure will harmonize those payments with those of other federal and provincial agencies and allow for fair treatment.

Honourable senators, the changes contained in Bill C-54, some of which I have highlighted today, are the type of provisions which, over the years, have earned Canada a reputation as a caring society, a society which recognizes the needs of people who want and deserve security of income.

The legislation governing our income security programs needs, from time to time, careful examination, review, and revision. This is an important reason for us being in this chamber. In the past, members of Parliament and senators have regularly examined our programs, reviewed them in the light of changes in our society, and revised them to respond to those changes. We must do what is required to maintain a sound system, based on the foundations of the past and responsiveness to the needs of the future.

The federal income support system for seniors has made a significant contribution to Canada's economic security. Although an increasing number of people are living well beyond the age of 65, fewer are living in poverty. There is every reason to expect this trend to continue. This is tangible evidence that, well-founded on good planning, good understanding and goodwill, our great traditions, our heritage, our commitment as a caring society, are to continue on into the 21st century.

I invite all members to join in supporting this bill which will help benefit many deserving people throughout our country.

[Translation]

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, the government was probably well intentioned when it drafted Bill C-54, the purpose of which is to improve services to senior citizens and allow for more efficient program administration; to increase consistency between programs in the case of the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan; to lower administration costs; to reduce overlap; to streamline procedures for clients of various departments; and finally, to make it possible for members of Parliament to be more helpful in dealing with their constituents. However, I have some concerns on which I will elaborate later on in the course of my speech.

The measures provided in this bill are essentially housekeeping measures and, as Senator Bonnell said, the bill certainly contains no major initiatives affecting senior citizens.

[English]

Bill C-54 proposes the following measures:

Authorize the Minister of Employment and Immigration to waive certain application and information requirements in certain Old Age Security cases.

Permit Old Age Security clients to cancel their benefits.

Streamline the appeal process for both the OAS and the Canada Pension Plan. Retired judges will voluntarily sit on pension appeal boards which will allow for appeals to be heard more quickly. This will give recipients an avenue of administrative recourse without them having to appeal to another court.

Allow clients to have their OAS debts forgiven if the debts are due to administrative error or erroneous advice by a departmental official. This is important to those seniors who would suffer undue hardship by being asked to pay back money they do not have.

Permit retroactive Canada Pension Plan retirement payments of up to one year. Back payments for Old Age Security benefits will be cut from five years to one year.

Allow information sharing with MPs who are representing a constituent.

Allow the government to waive the need to reapply for the spouses' allowance and the guaranteed income supplement each year. This measure is particularly important in that 1.4 million seniors, the majority of whom are women, must apply each year and wait until the application is received and approved before they get their payments. Eliminating this unnecessary process will allow the applicant to receive their benefits without delay and with a minimum of red tape. Many seniors whose incomes do not change significantly from year to year may never need to reapply.

Finally, allow the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General, and the RCMP access to client information under certain circumstances. This is intended to help bring to justice suspected war criminals and recover the costs of housing federal convicts.

There is also a paragraph which allows the Departments of National Revenue, Finance, Supply and Services, Canada Employment and Immigration Commission, and Canada Post access to information. Who in the country will not know about you? The element that concerns me is that of giving information to Canada Post. I have read through Hansard from the House of Commons, and I did not like the reasoning behind this decision. Canada Post was included on the grounds that it could help accelerate the processing of pension cheques. To me, this is not sufficient justification for what amounts to another unnecessary intrusion on seniors' lives. In the time of rapidly advancing computer technology, there is an increasing ability to access private information. Consequently, we must be extremely cautious about the disclosure of this information. In particular, we must protect seniors from the potential abuse they may face if this information were to fall into the wrong hands.

Another concern I have is that a large part of this legislation will be handled by phone through voice mail. I must say this is not new. This was started by the former government. I always opposed it, and I oppose it still today.

It is true that in a few years the new group of seniors may be used to these kinds of services, but the reality of some of the seniors today is that they do not understand or wish to deal with a computer. We are all young people in this place and do not know that kind of problem, but as you get older, you quite often develop a hearing impairment, and it gets to be extremely confusing for senior people. I do not think this is progress in this day and age.

[Translation]

While these measures ease some regulations which needlessly complicate seniors' lives, they do not bring any fundamental change to the social security system for these seniors.

After one and half years in office, the government is postponing to another six months the report on pension and other reforms affecting seniors. The promised consultation will not take place before the fall. The public is well aware that our social programs must be reviewed and restructured, and it generally recognizes that some cuts will inevitably follow.

However, seniors want their government to guarantee them some minimum security. They are concerned that the anticipated report will probably propose major cuts in the programs affecting them. In his last budget, the Minister of Finance pretty well left seniors' benefits untouched, but he made it clear that they would be his next target.

Here are the basic principles stated in the budget which will underlie that reform: integral maintenance of the protection afforded to all seniors who are poor (including those who receive the guaranteed income supplement); maintenance of full indexation of benefits to protect seniors against inflation; income security benefits based on family income instead of individual income, as is the case for the guaranteed income supplement; and reinforcement of the progressive nature of benefits, according to the level of income.

[English]

Seniors groups are very concerned about the proposal that the clawback on the Old Age Security, which presently applies to individual income, be applied on the basis of family income. This would mean that women who are 65 and over receiving Old Age Security would lose their Old Age Security based on their spouse's income. The main victim would generally be older married women, especially women who have stayed at home all their lives and whose husbands had an alternate source of income. These women, in general, would not have anywhere near the income of their husbands. Consequently, the government's aim to control program costs suggests that the government is looking to achieve savings at the expense of these already marginalized women.

Honourable senators, many women who are over 65, 70 or 75 today never earned a penny, though they worked very hard at home to raise families with many children. They depended on their husband's goodwill to get a penny to buy a pair of stockings or a pair of shoes. The men on all sides of this chamber have never known that, but this is the reality of most of the women who today are over 65. Now we think we can save money by calculating the Old Age Pension.

I have no problem with cutting Old Age Pensions for higher income seniors, but to save money by calculating the Old Age Security on a sole income or the common income of a husband and wife will make it hard for women of this generation who are 65 and over. It might be different later when many more women will have been on the — — labour market and have a pension, a salary like their spouses have now. Another point which is funny in a way, is that the government may be encouraging seniors to separate.

Senator Prud'homme: That is exactly what will happen.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: If they separate, their income will be calculated separately. However, if they stay together — I would like to use a more colourful expression but I will refrain —

Senator Prud'homme: Go ahead, it is a fact of life.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: I suppose that women who lasted 35, 40 or 45 years with their spouse might follow the example of the younger generation where separating is no big deal. I think that is a fact to be reckoned with.

The reason I mention this today is that apparently there was a cabinet meeting, at least according to the news on television and radio, where this matter was discussed. I hope they will really try to consider all the repercussions.

As some analysts pointed out, we have an aging population and OAS reform is one of the main fiscal imperatives. I accept the principle, but how are we going to do it?

During the 1994-95 fiscal year, old age security, guaranteed income supplement and spouse's allowance cost the federal treasury $20.6 billion. That is nearly twice as much as ten years ago, and it is expected this figure will increase by 60 per cent over the next few years.

In addition to old age security, it is also necessary to consider the Canada Pension Plan. People will object that it does not form part of the bill, and I agree. We cannot go on considering all aspects of old age security in such a fragmented manner.

Basically, OAS is a combination of the old age pension, in some cases the guaranteed income supplement is added, plus CPP and finally other kinds of pensions, if any. So the whole range of old age security should be considered, and everybody knows that the Canada Pension Plan is not ironclad. People who tell us that the plan is sound and that the answer is to raise premium rates may be in for quite a surprise. Apparently, that will not be enough, since premiums fall far short of the projected payments.

[English]

To conclude, honourable senators, this bill is strictly administrative in nature, but so much more needs to be put on the table in order that the elderly get more appropriate answers to the many questions they have in relation to their financial security, questions that have been left unanswered for too long. This bill, however, is a good effort to simplify administration and will allow seniors to avoid unnecessary red tape in the future.

As for the more fundamental questions relating to Old Age Security itself, the Canada Pension Plan, the Guaranteed Income Supplement, et cetera, we hope they will be addressed soon so that Canadians can plan their retirement with a certain peace of mind regarding the security of their pension, whether it is the Old Age Pension or the Canada Pension Plan.

Senator Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I do not apologize for speaking on this matter, but I will say that I am sorry to take up time because there are many bills to come. I wish to speak to most of them.

• (2200)

On this particular bill, the words of a populist member of the House of Commons come back to haunt me tonight. The member's name was Mr. Malépart, a great friend, a great protector, a great guardian. I assure you, more than anything else, I shall remember that I stood by Jean-Claude Malépart in all his fights. I see some senators not far from you who stood with Jean-Claude Malépart in his great fight.

I do not know what the government has in mind. The government has the right to propose and make public some new policies, but I will say clearly: Do not touch those who need it the most, our senior citizens. On this one, Marcel Prud'homme will make no concession. I am an older man but I can still organize rapidly and well.

I repeat, I do not know what the government has in mind. They have the right to propose new avenues to cut the deficit, but we certainly will not accept cutting the deficit on the backs of those who need it the most.

I know this proposal did not come from Jean Chrétien. I know that Jean Chrétien does not intend to go after those who need it most. Such a proposal is the total opposite of that for which Jean Chrétien has stood all of his life. He has said time and again, "Do not agitate."

For us here, it may be simple. We are talking about a few dollars. However, I am still almost a member of the House of Commons.

People get nervous so quickly. They see the way the issue is interpreted in the press, and they go to bed at night worrying that the government will take away their pensions. So much damage is done, not by us, but by the interpretation that is given by certain announcements. Surely, a government has the right to look into all the social programs without alerting people that those who need it most will pay for it at the end of the day.

Senator Graham and colleagues, you know that, in politics, perception is everything.

[Translation]

I just had a quick discussion, and I wish to be on the record as saying: "I know that is not what Jean Chrétien believes". If this were just before the referendum, I would go around saying: "That is not true, that is not what Jean Chrétien wants to do". I would go to the province of Quebec with Senator Bacon and Senator Lavoie-Roux to say it is not true. Jean Chrétien always says: "We must be careful".

[English]

It is better to be on the record early rather than later or not at all.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT RETIRING ALLOWANCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Pierre De Bané moved the second reading of Bill C-85, to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act and to provide for the continuation of a certain provision.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to introduce the second reading stage of Bill C-85, to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

Honourable senators are probably aware that a reform of the pension plan for members of Parliament has been the subject of spirited public debate and considerable controversy for quite a number of years. Although criticism is mainly directed at the allowances received by members of the House of Commons, former senators are sometimes the target of criticism when they accept an appointment within the federal administration and receive both a salary and a pension from the same government source.

The purpose of this bill is to amend those elements of the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act which, in the opinion of the government, have come in for the most criticism.

[English]

Bill C-85 represents a balancing of taxpayers' concerns and the need for a fair compensation package for those who serve in public office. The independent review cited in the Red Book is the "Study of Parliamentarians Compensation" carried out by the pension and compensation consulting firm of Sobeco, Ernst & Young. This report was delivered to the current government in March 1994 with specific recommendations on compensation issues for senators and MPs that went beyond just the pension plan.

Honourable senators, in addition to anticipating the report, the Red Book went further:

> Whatever the results of the independent review, a Liberal government will reform the pension plan of Members of Parliament to end "double dipping".

It was saying, in effect, that members of Parliament should not be able to leave office and receive a pension from the federal government if they accept a new full-time, paying job from the federal government.

The Red Book continues:

> In addition, we will review the question of the minimum age at which pensions will begin to be paid.

I should add that consultations included not only senators and government members but also members of the opposition parties.

The Sobeco, Ernst & Young study had concluded that the overall compensation level for members of Parliament was about right. In fact, the overall compensation level when compared to the private sector was not in the least excessive.

If we cannot increase salaries, and this is the situation now, how much can we do on the other side of the equation in terms of decreasing the pension plan? That has been one of the key considerations in the process of reform of pensions for parliamentarians.

A second study on parliamentarians' compensation was made by the Lapointe commission, a commission mandated by the Parliament of Canada to review the adequacy of allowances for senators and MPs.

The commission was chaired by the Honourable Charles Lapointe, a respected former federal cabinet minister, who sat with Jean Pigott, a former member of the House, and Professor C. E. S. Franks from Queen's University, a noted academic expert on parliamentary affairs.

The point of interest in the context of Bill C-85 is that the commission's recommendations, while not totally mirroring the Sobeco consultants report, nevertheless, were quite similar. The total compensation approach was again recommended with an increase in salary and a decrease in pension benefits while maintaining the same overall compensation level.

I move now to the question of minimum age. The current legislation provides for pension benefits for senators and MPs who serve six or more years in Parliament. A member can start drawing a pension immediately upon leaving Parliament, regardless of age. Bill C-85 would establish age 55 as the pensionable age, for a number of reasons, one of which is that this was recommended in the Lapointe commission report.

A stand-alone age and not an age and service combination was chosen primarily because parliamentarians do not, as a practice, serve for long periods of time in public office. Many people in the other House do not serve long enough to collect a pension at all.

[Translation]

According to Bill C-85, double dipping occurs when a former senator or member of the House of Commons is in receipt of a pension under this act and enters into employment, appointment or a personal service contract within the federal public sector earning remuneration from those activities in excess of $5,000 annually.

This amendment will put a stop to a practice that is unacceptable to many Canadians. In future, the pensions of former MPs and senators who have left public office and secured paid employment within the federal government's jurisdiction will be reduced dollar for dollar. A $5,000 threshold will be established to avoid penalizing part-time income earners.

As a result of the proposed legislation, the costs of the pension plan will be significantly reduced in 1995. The cost to the government will drop by about 33 per cent. That is a direct saving to the Canadian taxpayer of some $3.3 million from a $10 million pension contribution for that year.

As senators have probably understood, the protection they receive under the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act remains mandatory. The last provision of the bill which I intend to discuss is found in clause 4, which recognizes common law spouses for the purposes of survivor benefits, as is the case under several pension plans for public service employees, members of the Armed Forces and the RCMP.

In concluding, honourable senators, speaking on my own behalf, I would like to see a group examine a plan for a system proposed by a group of members in Quebec City and suggested here in Ottawa by the honourable member for Gatineau—La Lièvre, Mark Assad. In this system the member of Parliament and the government each contribute equal amounts of approximately $9,000 annually for a maximum of 8 years. According to the honourable member's calculations, after eight years during which both parties would have contributed the same amount of, for instance $9,000, this would add up to $72,000 contributed by the parliamentarian and $72,000 by the government, and if we add compound interest at an average rate of 8.5 per cent which works out to $67,000, this would give us a total of $211,000. That is the maximum amount which the parliamentarian will have contributed over eight years, the government will have matched that amount, and both amounts can then be invested in a so-called special RRSP.

If after eight years the parliamentarian leaves public life, he is given that amount, which he can then invest in an RRSP. There is no more paperwork, no more administration involved, and of course this kind of system has many advantages. The honourable member for Gatineau—La Lièvre calculated that after twelve years, under the present system the retired parliamentarian gets around $31,000, while under the system suggested by the honourable member for Gatineau—La Lièvre, it would be over $38,000.

Of course, upon the death of the beneficiary, the spouse and the children inherit the total amount in the RRSP.

That is a suggestion which I personally would like to discuss at some other time, but we must admit that the amendments proposed by the government and passed by the other place are a vast improvement, as they take into account the recommendations of two commissions which conducted studies on the subject, the Sobeco commission and the Lapointe commission, by putting a stop to what is usually referred to as double dipping, by letting the spouse be a beneficiary as well, and finally by ensuring that the pension cannot be paid to a beneficiary who has not reached the age of 55.

Honourable senators, for all of these reasons, I hope that this bill will be passed as soon as possible.

[English]

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak at length on Bill C-85. My colleague opposite has done a good job of providing a description of the general provisions and purposes of the legislation. I do not think it needs repeating.

This legislation, while important, probably does not have the same impact on our day-to-day activities as it has on that of our colleagues in the other place. Many of us here are still working hard well beyond the age of 55, some further beyond it than others.

With regard to the so-called double dipping prohibition, I think I can safely say that not many from our side were expecting an appointment to a government board or agency any time soon.

Amending the compensation paid through pensions, et cetera, to public officials, elected or otherwise, is never an easy exercise. It is a necessary exercise, nevertheless.

I was amused to read the press release issued the day this legislation was tabled in the house which, not surprisingly, mentions the "little Red Book" as being the precursor to this initiative.

If the truth be known, honourable senators, it was then Prime Minister Kim Campbell, in August of 1993, long before the little Red Book, who outlined some of the key provisions of the bill; specifically those pertaining to double dipping and the disallowance of pensions until age 55.

Honourable senators, while there may be some objection to the bill, I do not believe there is strong objection from our side to it going to committee, where concerns can be raised with the proper officials.

[Translation]

Senator Prud'homme: This is a very important bill. I look on both sides of this house and I can tell honourable senators that you are much more affected by this legislation than you think. I am not opposed to the bill. I simply want to draw your attention to some specific points.

[English]

I find it extremely shocking that the newspapers erroneously reported last week that Parliament had adjourned for the summer. I hope that the Leader of the Government in the Senate or the Speaker will write to the press and tell them that Parliament has not adjourned. We are part of Parliament.

The time has come for people to stand up and say that there is a difference between government and Parliament. The time has come for honourable senators to stop refusing to be referred to as MPs. A senator is a member of Parliament, as is a member of the House of Commons. I never attack the press, and I survive very well without them, but they should know what they are talking about on certain issues. Parliament has not adjourned for the summer. The Senate is sitting.

Members of the press said some senators have pensions because they were MPs. Try to understand the confusion. They were MPs; therefore, they have a pension. I am one of them.

I wish to put on the record that if I were to leave today after 31 years of service, I would receive a pension of close to $49,000 a year. I am 60 years old. I went on radio and explained my position. You can shout and yell, but at least listen to the explanation. At the end of the radio program, there were a lot fewer questions.

People are under the impression that some ex-members of the House are collecting a pension. I look around this place, and I will name some. Senators De Bané, MacEachen, Austin, Gauthier, Stewart, Murray, Kelleher, Balfour, Prud'homme, Comeau, Forrestall and Corbin. We are not double dippers. Yet, we fully contributed.

There is so much confusion about double dipping. People do not know exactly what it is. The country is living with double dippers, but we never explain what double dipping is. No one has studied what it really means.

I am not blaming anyone from the military and the tens of thousands who are double dippers; and I am not naming ex-members of provincial houses because they paid — they are entitled. If you start naming every single group, you end up having only senators who used to serve their country very well in the House of Commons. It is unfair that we do not stand up. We should be ready to go on radio and television. I was called, and I did not turn that opportunity down. I explained.

I met last week a high civil servant from an important department. He is 57 years old. He took his retirement. He now has a good contract as an advisor to National Defence with a full pension from another department. How many of them are there? Canadians do not know, but they always pin down the members of the House or senators. We are fair game, apparently.

No one stands up to defend us. Well, honourable senators, I do. I am proud to be a senator. I was equally proud to be a member of the House of Commons serving my country.

I am the one who instituted an end to double dipping when I was chairman of the Members' Services Committee of the House of Commons. My report still stands. The Hill Times could publish it. It was tabled many years ago, but no one implemented it. Now it looks as if it is new.

A friend of mine, a lawyer, Paul Sabourin, said this is —

[Translation]

— the elite corrupting the elite.

[English]

That is what he said. I thought it was strong language.

Honourable senators, perhaps we should not pass this bill so quickly on third reading. Perhaps we should send it to a proper committee. We should call someone to explain to us what double dipping means and how many people in Canada do it. We would educate ourselves and the country at the same time. We would do a lot for the sanity of public affairs in this country if we were to do that.

When I read what has been said about this matter, I believe Canadians have a desire, and rightly so, to know what is perceived to be double dipping. It is not correct to have judges of high courts serving in the House and receiving both a pension and a salary. I do not approve of retroactive laws, but I think for the future this is a good measure.

Honourable senators, something else in the bill should be looked into carefully. Many years ago, I remember that one night we amended a bill on veterans pensions. Within an hour, after all kinds of silly jokes, we allowed common-law wives or spouses to receive a pension after one year of cohabitation. No one stood up. I was laughed at. I asked if anyone would defend those who were married for 30 years, especially the women that Senator Lavoie-Roux talked about earlier tonight, the women who went through wars with their husbands, and who, at the end of their lives, saw their husbands divorce them. One year living common-law, and who gets the pension? You call that fair?

I will read the bill.

[Translation]

On page 4, in clause 4, subsection 20(1) of the Act is replaced by the following:

[English]

I may be wrong, but it would be nice to be told that by those who drafted the bill.

Proposed subsection 20(1) of the bill reads as follows:

> On the death of a member or a former member, there shall be paid
>
> (a) to
>
> (ii) any person of the opposite sex who establishes that the person was cohabiting in a conjugal relationship with the member or former member for at least one year immediately before the death...

It is the same thing coming back? I may be wrong.

Do you understand?

[Translation]

I am not opinionated.

[English]

That is why I would like this bill to go to a committee. Senator De Bané says I am wrong. That is why I raise this issue here. That is what the Senate is all about. People raise questions at the committee level.

Honourable senators, the question should be put to an appropriate committee so that senators will call witnesses to explain what double dipping means. We will have accomplished something if we did that. We could use that information for those of us who like to go on radio and television or to other public venues. It would give us something to talk about.

It is sad to see what is being said in the country about this bill. People are very upset. Everyone has a reason to be upset. Who do they go after? They go after their political institutions. That is dangerous in a democracy. Everyone goes after the political system.

I wait for Senator De Bané to give me an answer on my first intervention on this bill. I know I was right with respect to the question of veterans. Of that I am sure.

• (2230)

The Hon. the Speaker: If the Honourable Senator De Bané speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate at second reading.

Senator De Bané: My honourable friend has brought our attention to the instance where a parliamentarian would separate from his spouse and then have a de facto relationship with another person. He says, "My God, he could live with that person for one year, and she would get the whole pension." He quoted page 4 of the bill. I bring his attention to page 5, clause 1.1(b). Let us say a member with ten years in Parliament was married for nine years and then lived with someone for one year. His legal spouse would receive 90 per cent of his pension and the other person would receive 10 per cent. The problem brought to our attention by the honourable senator has been dealt with in the bill. It is absolutely clear.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK OF CANADA BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Peter Bosa moved second reading of Bill C-91, to continue the Federal Business Development Bank under the name Business Development Bank of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to begin debate on second reading of Bill C-91, the Business Development Bank of Canada Act.

This legislation moved quickly through the other place. Briefly, the members of the Commons Industry Committee focused their attention on the issue of complementarity: how to design the legislation so that the bank will complement and not compete with the private sector financial community. The government heeded the Reform Party's concerns in amending section 18(4) to reinforce the bank's role in financial transactions by specifying that the purpose be to reduce financial risk. A third amendment ensures that an initial parliamentary review of the bank's registration be conducted after five years and every ten years thereafter.

Proposed amendments were also incorporated at the report and third reading stages.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the government has made Bill C-91 one of its main priorities because the purpose of this legislation is to help small businesses. It changes the mission of a Crown corporation which, so far, has played an important role in helping Canadian small businesses obtain the financing they need to ensure their growth and prosperity. Small businesses employ more than half of the Canadians who work in the private sector. Since the early eighties, these businesses have created 87 per cent of all new jobs in Canada.

[English]

This legislation has moved quickly and efficiently to the point where we can now examine it in more detail today.

The government has placed high priority on this legislation because Bill C-91 helps small businesses. It changes the mandate of a Crown corporation that has proven itself invaluable in helping small- and medium-sized businesses in Canada obtain the financing they need to grow and prosper.

Small businesses employ more than half of Canadians working in the private sector. Since the early 1980s, small businesses have created 87 per cent of all new jobs in Canada. Small businesses face enormous challenges in responding to the demands of a fast-paced, knowledge-intensive, global economy. Among the most critical of these challenges is the need for access to both debt and equity financing.

For over 50 years, a vital link between the small- and medium-sized business community and the capital these enterprises require to grow has been the Federal Business Development Bank and its predecessor, the Industrial Bank of Canada. The bank has authorized some 175,000 loans totalling more than $14.6 billion dollars. Over the past six years, the bank has lent over $4 billion to Canadian entrepreneurs and at no cost to the government. This new lending is estimated to have created more than 30,000 permanent jobs.

About three-quarters of bank loans go to businesses with 10 employees or less, and 96 per cent go to businesses with 50 employees or less. Fully 55 per cent of the bank's loans go to non-urban areas, although these areas represent only 39 per cent of Canada's population.

Some 82 per cent of the bank loans are for amounts under $250,000, and 63 per cent are for amounts under $100,000. The bank thereby responds to one of the gaps that commercial lenders have left in serving their business clients: the size gap that makes smaller transactions less cost effective for private sector financial institutions to finance loans of less than $250,000.

Another gap is the reluctance of the private sector financial institutions to take a risk in lending to small businesses, even at interest rates which reflect the higher risks associated with those loans.

A third gap arises from the lack of knowledge that financial institutions have regarding the nature of a particular emerging industry in the new economy. They do not yet have a tried-and-true method to assess the risk in lending or investing in new industries. They look for bricks and mortar as collateral, but how do you assess the viability of small companies where the key assets may consist largely of software under development or the skills of an engineer?

Finally, commercial lenders are cautious about providing financing on flexible terms to promising businesses. Additional lenders typically require a stream of payments over the term of a loan. Small businesses in their early stages sometimes cannot service these debts, and they need more flexible terms.

These are the gaps that a renewed FDBD has been designed to fill. In addition, the bank provides management services for small- and medium-sized businesses. The CASE program, for example, provides over 1100 bank counsellors who help firms improve their methods of doing business. The bank's mentoring programs, such as the Community Business Initiatives, saw 43,000 business people participate last year. The bank also provides training through business management seminars and courses which drew 35,000 participants last year.

Many Canadian businesses have relied upon the FBDB either for capital or for business training. In fact, it is estimated that one out of every five small businesses in Canada today has at one point turned to the FBDB for assistance.

Under its existing legislation, the Federal Business Development Bank is approaching its statutory ceiling and financing ratios. Once it has access to new capital, it must begin rationing loans and investments.

Honourable senators will appreciate that now is not the time to slow down the bank's activities. Canadian businesses have emerged from the recession and are preparing to take advantage of new opportunities in a global economy. If ever there was a time when the bank needed strength and flexibility to help its clients, the time is now.

This legislation provides the bank with that strength and flexibility so that it can increase its financing and management products. The strength will come from a new capital structure that will increase the bank's capital base. The government's existing investments will be converted to common shares, of which the government will be the sole holder now and in the future.

In addition, the government will be able to issue hybrid capital instruments to be held by non-government investors. Such instruments will be issued subject to appropriate securities regulations and will not be subject to any government guarantee. These instruments will provide a vehicle for raising capital to meet future requirements. This approach will allow the bank to achieve its objectives without any impact on the deficit. The bank will continue to be fully cost recoverable in financial services. This will provide the bank with strength.

Honourable senators should be aware that no government funding is sought for the changes to be implemented in this bill. The bank's lending division is and will continue to be self-financing.

The flexibility will come from the new partnership that the bank will be able to strike with other government departments and agencies. For example, the bank will administer the Cultural Industries Development Fund on behalf of Heritage Canada and the Students Business Loans of Human Resources Development Canada.

The Federal Business Development Bank Act of 1974 limited the bank's ability to enter into agreements with non-business enterprises. On occasion, however, government organizations, including provincial agencies, approached the FBDB to collaborate in the delivery of management or financial services. The bank has been unable to participate because of the absence of legislative authority.

Other federal government credit granting agencies, such as the Farm Credit Corporation and the Export Development Corporation, have no similar restrictions. They are able to enter into partnerships with non-business clients so that other public sector departments and agencies can take advantage of their profession's expertise in designing programs to meet the needs of their clients.

The legislation before us removes the restriction that prevented the bank from entering into joint ventures and the delivery of financial assistance programs on behalf of other departments and agencies. The bank will continue to abide by its usual criteria in entering these partnerships but it will have more flexibility to work with other organizations.

Overall, Bill C-91 moves the bank towards increased activity in smaller loans and investments in its lending and venture capital programs. It leads us toward increased quasi-equity and working capital financing that will focus more on knowledge-based and exporting firms. The legislation also contains a number of housekeeping measures. It will help the bank improve customer service through an internal ombudsman, a client charter of rights, and increased responsiveness to customer needs.

Finally, the legislation gives the bank a new name: The Business Development Bank of Canada. The new name symbolizes the new mandate and the government's renewed emphasis on assisting small business in Canada.

I hope that honourable senators will join me in supporting this legislation.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, while the stated objectives of Bill C-91 find little opposition, there is less consensus as to whether or not the legislation itself will support or achieve the stated objectives.

Unfortunately, our spokesman on this bill is unavoidably away at this hour of the evening, but he has indicated to me that the concerns that he would raise could be adequately raised in committee or at third reading.

For our part, honourable senators, we are prepared to see this bill go to committee at this time.

Motion agreed to and bill read a second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Bosa, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès moved the second reading of Bill C-72, to amend the Criminal Code (self-induced intoxication).

He said: Honourable senators, mercifully, this is a very short bill. Honourable senators have the bill to which I am speaking. It is half of one page and half a column with a preamble.

Since the hour is late and everyone is tired, my speech will be as brief as the bill.

It is a bill that was prepared to deal with a shock the country felt after the Daviault case. Mr. Daviault attacked a woman who was partly paralyzed. He assaulted her sexually, and then claimed that he was so drunk as to be in a state of automatism.

On the basis not of legislation but of common law developments in the courts, such a defence had been accepted before for crimes of general intent, but not for crimes of specific intent. A crime of specific intent means that you have planned it and you wanted to commit a specific crime. The defence of drunkenness had never been admitted in such crimes.

This bill now makes the defence of drunkenness inadmissible in crimes of general intent. The way in which the bill does this is to say that there is a standard of behaviour which the whole country considers to be not only acceptable but also proper for everyone to follow. If you breach that by committing an act that affects the integrity of the person of another inhabitant of this country, then you have breached this code, and to claim you were too drunk is no defence.

There were two ways of handling this problem after the Daviault case in which the court decisions, both for the majority and the minority, invited the legislators to find a remedy. One was to define a new offence, which I attempted to do in Bill S-6 and call this defence, as I did, dangerous intoxication. There were three copycat bills in the House of Commons on the same subject.

However, what I was proposing had disadvantages. Women lawyers, among others, pointed out that one of the main disadvantages was that if there was this Catch-22 device that I had put in — in other words, you commit a crime under self-induced intoxication, which is important, and then you say "I did not know what I was doing. I do not remember. I was too drunk." — by the very fact that you plead this defence, you plead guilty to the offence of being in a state of self-induced intoxication while committing a prohibited act.

Women lawyers pointed out that there was a labelling problem; that people who had committed rape or aggravated sexual assault would now be put on the books as having been guilty of dangerous intoxication, rather than rape or aggravated sexual assault. It is necessary, they said, to call a spade, a spade. Somebody who is condemned for an illegal act, a reprehensible act, should be labelled properly.

There were also problems presented by other lawyers involving Charter difficulties which led the court to accept that the Daviault defence might be raised in a case in which this new offence of dangerous intoxication was used to catch someone who would claim "I did not know what I was doing."

For that reason, and after wide consultation with the public and lawyers, the Minister of Justice decided on this other avenue, which is to set out in a preamble, which appears in the bill, what is acceptable behaviour, and then to say that if you breach that behaviour, self-induced intoxication is no defence.

The Minister of Justice believes that this legislation will stand up in the courts. Of course, one never knows what the courts will say. However, it is quite clear that something had to be done because the Canadian public does not accept that somebody can be absolved of culpability simply because he was drunk.

I commend this bill to honourable senators. It will be a good amendment to the Criminal Code. It will protect women and children, especially against the violence that is associated with alcohol.

In committee, you will likely hear experts who will show that even excessive amounts of alcohol do not render a person unconscious of their actions.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words on Bill C-72, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (self-induced intoxication).

The recent Supreme Court decision in the Daviault case generated quite a bit of interest in Canada. The decision deals with a criminal law issue of particular importance. Our colleague Senator Gigantès already brought the issue before the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs through a bill.

That is to say that we have already looked at the criminal law issue or issues involved. If this bill is referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, our review will obviously be conducted much more quickly.

As chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, it would not, of course, be appropriate for me to deal with the substance of the bill today.

Since the sponsor of that bill expressed the wish that it be referred to the committee at the appropriate time, which is — unless I am mistaken — tomorrow afternoon, I will simply say that this referral to a committee seems to me to be perfectly logical. The committee will be able to look at the substance, the content and the wording of the bill, if this is the wish of the Senate.

I am pleased to inform you that the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Allan Rock, will appear before our committee tomorrow regarding three bills: C-72, C-104 and C-68.

Motion agreed to and bill read a second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

Hon. Dan Hays moved second reading of Bill C-92, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise to sponsor Bill C-92, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act. This bill has been the subject of much debate and discussion throughout Western Canada. This piece of legislation will address an issue of considerable urgency in Canada's grain industry: that is, changing the way in which freight costs are calculated and allocated on wheat and barley sold through the Canadian Wheat Board.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, for several months now, farm leaders, grain producers, the industry and the three provincial governments in the Prairies have been asking for this change. The outcome would be a better and fairer cost effectiveness ratio for the transport system, which would take into consideration the geographical realities of the movement of western grain towards the points of export.

[English]

The bill amends the Canadian Wheat Board Act to change the so-called pooling points. The eastern and western destinations would serve as the basis for setting the cost of shipping wheat and barley through the Canadian Wheat Board, or CWB.

As the current system stands, shipping charges for wheat and barley are determined by the distance to one of two pooling or collection points: either Thunder Bay or Vancouver. The cost of moving grain from Thunder Bay through the St. Lawrence Seaway is shared among all prairie producers.

Why does the pooling point need to be moved from Thunder Bay to other seaway ports? Over the past few decades, ocean shipping has changed dramatically from smaller carriers, which travel the length of the Great Lakes to Thunder Bay to pick up grain, to larger bulk carriers. The seaway cannot readily accommodate these large, ocean-going vessels and, as a result, less than 5 per cent of grain exports are shipped directly from Thunder Bay.

This means that western prairie producers are subsidizing the freight transportation charges of all grain producers who live in the eastern parts of the Prairies, and whose grain moves down the seaway. Changes contained in Bill C-92 will shift the eastern pooling point from Thunder Bay to the lower St. Lawrence, so that farmers whose grain is shipped through the seaway will pay the full cost associated with that movement, without being cross-subsidized through the various wheat pools.

For many years, grain farmers have complained about the inequity involved in maintaining Thunder Bay as the eastern pooling point. The situation is unrealistic, and it allocates costs unfairly within the prairies. Producers in the eastern prairies acknowledged that this was a problem but, at the same time, expressed serious concern about their ability to handle the higher freight costs that would be allocated to them with changes in pooling points.

The problem of how to fix this inequitable system has been the subject of debate throughout this country's grain sector for many years. After much discussion and consultation by Minister Goodale with grain producers, industry producer groups, co-ops and prairie governments, an important understanding has been reached. The elements of this agreement include changing the pooling system as of August 1, 1995, phasing in the changes over three years, and assisting the producers in the eastern prairies as they make the transition to the new regime.

In order to assist those producers who were concerned about the financial impact of the change, the federal government has announced a transitional assistance program to help these farmers adapt to new marketing realities. For the 1995-96 crop year, federal assistance will offset a significant portion of the increased domestic freight costs for farmers in the eastern prairies. In the following years, assistance will be more flexible, focusing on adaptation in the eastern parts of the Prairies and not just dealing with freight compensation.

The government is ready to allocate in the order of $100 million over three years to provide assistance to farmers who are most significantly affected by the pooling change. These funds will be available from the adjustment fund announced in the February budget as part of the transportation reform package. As everyone is aware, the February budget also announced an end to the Western Grain Transportation Act and the $560 million annual payout to the railways which that entailed.

While the elimination of the Crow Rate and the change in pooling points are not directly related, prairie farmers and industry leaders ask that the government also deal with the pooling issue now so that they can make the changes necessary to compete in the new market environment which will exist as of August 1.

The sector is making itself ready to accept the challenge. It is ready to explore the opportunities in greater diversification, value-added economic growth and new jobs. They are no longer content to ship bulk grain to other countries and then buy it back as value-added, finished goods. Producers know that the future lies with value-added and diversification, and that is the target upon which they have set their sights.

[Translation]

Therefore, what role must the government play in the next few months? It must continue, just like all the other stakeholders in the sector, to actively help producers and processors to adjust to this new reality and to take advantage of the new possibilities. Government assistance to this sector must promote investment in our growth and contribute to a decrease in short-term instability.

Honourable senators, most Western farm leaders have explicitly requested that the changes to the pooling system be implemented at the beginning of the next crop year, August 1, 1995. We cannot and must not disappoint them. We must provide our farmers with the tools and the programs they need to prosper and to create jobs.

[English]

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, while the hour is late, there are some very important points which must be made on this bill. This is a major bill, honourable senators. There is no doubt that it will change the entire direction of agriculture, grains and oilseeds in Western Canada.

The summary of the bill states:

> (a) to change the pooling points, on which initial payments are based, from Thunder Bay and Vancouver to points in Canada designated by regulation of the Governor in Council; and
>
> (b) to establish a deduction from the initial payment that reflects the relative transportation cost advantage for each producer.

In other words, the cost of the freight will be deducted from the payment for the grain delivered to the elevator.

The Wheat Board has announced that Estevan, which is 20 miles from where I live in the eastern part of Saskatchewan, will have the highest freight rates in Western Canada. Manitoba will also have higher freight rates. I believe that this will result in considerably less grain going through the St. Lawrence Seaway. More grain will go to Vancouver, but in time, much grain will go south through the Mississippi. There is no question about that.

These changes will mean that our governments will need to negotiate with the Americans on free trade and trade agreements. They will have to become better negotiators, because that grain will go south. Sixty per cent of all the grain grown in Canada is grown within 100 miles of the U.S. border. There are many unanswered questions: Are we tilting our hand to the Americans? Will they have more control over our destiny in terms of handling our grain? These are questions to which we do not know the answers.

Frankly, I am surprised that the prairie farmers are not more vocal on this subject. As Senator Hays said, this subject has been debated for 20 years. On Saturday, I spoke to someone who had been on the advisory board to the Wheat Board. He said that farmers have lost their punch on this issue.

I make these comments because I think senators should be aware that some major changes will result from this legislation. There may be more added value. No doubt more processing will take place at the local level I hope there will be much more diversification, and we are seeing some of that now. I am amazed at the positive attitude of farmers on this subject. We must move forward on it, but there will be some winners and there will be some losers. I just hope that there will be more winners than losers.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Hays, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL (FEDERAL AGENCIES)

SECOND READING

Hon. Dan Hays moved the second reading of Bill C-65, to reorganize and dissolve certain federal agencies.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-65 represents an important first step in the delivery of the Liberal government's commitment to provide good government to Canadians.

In the normal course, this bill would have been spoken to first by Senator Olson, and second by Senator Riel. I am pleased to stand in for both of them, knowing that they would both have been in a better position to deal with any questions on the subject than I am. However, I will do my best.

As you know, the purpose of Bill C-65 is to implement the results of the agency review. The objective of the review of federal agencies, boards and commissions was to simplify government by eliminating unnecessary or inactive organizations and streamlining others.

When all decisions resulting from the review are implemented, 30 per cent of the organizations reviewed will either be eliminated or significantly modified, saving taxpayers about $10 million in one time annual costs. As well, 21 per cent of the approximately 3000 Governor–in–Council appointments will be eliminated.

The savings and streamlining are substantial; however, there is much more to this exercise than simply saving taxpayers' money. More significantly, it is one important component of this government's activity to restore Canadians' trust and confidence in government.

[Translation]

In my opinion, Bill C-65 comes in response to the fact that Canadians want a government that intervenes less, a government that is smaller, less costly and more efficient. There will be fewer agencies, boards, commissions and advisory councils, which means less government intervention. Most organizations that will continue to exist will have fewer members, which will reduce the size of government.

As I said before, the savings will be substantial.

Finally, with fewer agencies, fewer appointments — and those based on merit — the government will be more efficient.

The public service and other public institutions are crucial to the way our society functions. However, you will agree that as in any human enterprise, the public service must adjust and evolve to meet new needs. We must ensure that public institutions continue to contribute to our individual and public well-being.

[English]

The changes proposed in Bill C-65 vary by agency. Some are being wound up, others made smaller, and others still are having their responsibilities merged with an existing organization.

It is logical and indeed necessary to ask periodically if programs that were put in place many years ago are still relevant today or whether they have outlived their usefulness. It is imperative to ask whether the needs that were once identified are still there or whether different and higher priority needs have emerged since then. The government has the political will and responsibility to ensure that federal institutions continue to be relevant.

[Translation]

We are taking concrete measures, such as Bill C-65 as well as the budget and the program review, in order to revamp and renew our public service by giving it an irreversible new orientation. Of course, such complex institutions and organizations as those that make up the government cannot be changed overnight. It will take several years. During the current parliamentary session, the government will introduce other bills to streamline, modernize and improve government operations.

I urge all senators to support this bill and all the other bills introduced in the future to control spending and to increase the efficiency of government programs and activities.

[English]

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, although I am known to use overstatement and hyperbole to make my point on occasion, Bill C-65 is a symbol of the Liberal government's actions over the last year and a half. It does not measure up to what they say, and it certainly does not measure up to what they should do.

When I was asked to speak on this bill, I thought I must have done something wrong because when I looked at it, it really did not have much to say. I think most of these agencies, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Canada Council and most of the rest of them should have been and should be repealed or eradicated or disembowelled, legislated out of existence, sold or privatized, or commercialized, as the Liberals would like to say. Instead, they are spending the taxpayers' money talking about something that was promised in the review of the budget of 1994.

They proceed in this bill to abolish the Procurement Review Board, which was announced by the previous Conservative government, and Emergency Preparedness Canada, also announced by the Conservatives. Almost all of the agencies they are getting rid of were already eliminated, so I am sure that the Department of Finance officials must have had a great time over the last year and a half debating whether they should have seven board members or eight board members or nine board members rather than fifteen. In reality, that is all this bill does.

I do not know what we will do with this bill in committee. We should be debating why all these organizations exist in the first place rather than debating whether they should have 15 board members or nine.

I notice that Minister Dingwall kept most of his appointments. I notice the Cape Breton Enterprise Corporation, that never-ending funding arm for Nova Scotia, did not get any of its board members reduced, so Liberals can continue to sit on that board.

It will also have the effect of removing any leftover Tories that are still hanging onto their board appointments. The effect of this bill will be that the Liberals will be appointing new Liberal members and citizens from all across Canada. I am sure that they will all be qualified, unlike the Tory ones.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I should like to see this bill referred to committee, although I am not sure what we will do with it there.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time, honourable senators?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

THE YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Rose-Marie Losier-Cool moved the second reading of Bill C-104, to amend the Criminal Code and the Young Offenders Act (forensic DNA analysis).

She said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to introduce, at second reading, Bill C-104, to amend the Criminal Code and the Young Offenders Act (forensic DNA analysis).

[English]

This bill was passed by the House of Commons on June 22 and is submitted to this chamber now for its consideration. It is an important piece of legislation. It permits judges to authorize Canadian peace officers to collect bodily substances from persons the police reasonably believe have committed serious crimes for the purpose of confirming whether the person was a party to the offence or should be excluded as a suspect.

• (2320)

The warrant would be available for the investigation of "designated offences". The offences are all serious and include sexual offences, crimes of violence, and offences where it is possible that a bodily substance from the body of the person who committed the offence could be left at the scene of the crime.

Since 1988, forensic DNA analysis has been successfully introduced in more than 100 court proceedings. In a significant number of other cases, it has been instrumental in obtaining guilty pleas resulting in reduced court costs. As well, in many cases, forensic DNA analysis has exonerated innocent people. In total, it has been used in more than 1,000 cases in this country alone.

[Translation]

The Criminal Code does not specifically authorize the collection of bodily substances for forensic DNA analysis. Several courts, including the Supreme Court of Canada in the recent Borden decision, pointed out the fact that there is currently no Canadian law expressly authorizing the taking of blood samples for forensic DNA analysis.

The use of gene prints could help better protect the public by helping the police to identify and arrest more quickly those who commit criminal acts, while also making it easier to sue these offenders. This technique can also be used to determine whether a series of criminal acts were committed by the same person or by several people. Forensic DNA analysis can be used to establish a connection between evidence in the possession of an accused and the commission of a crime, and also help identify the victims of violent crimes. It is important to note that it can also be used to exonerate innocent people.

[English]

The Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice have worked together to develop legislation to govern the collection and use of DNA evidence in Canada's criminal justice system. Bill C-104 represents the first of their legislation in this area — a DNA warrant scheme for use in criminal investigations. Work is continuing on the related issue of the DNA databank, which would complement the warrant scheme and the creation of a process for the approval of DNA laboratories.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the bill provides that three procedures are allowed to collect bodily substances: the plucking of hair, the taking of buccal swabs to collect cells inside the mouth, and the taking of a small amount of blood with a needle.

[English]

In all cases, the judge, in considering whether to issue a warrant, must be satisfied or convinced that a "scheduled offence" has been committed and that a bodily substance, reasonably believed to be from the body of the person who committed the offence, has been found; there are reasonable grounds to believe the person to be tested was a party to the designated offence; there are reasonable grounds to believe that analysis of bodily substances will provide probative evidence confirming or disproving the person's involvement in the commission of the offence; and, it is in the best interests of the administration of justice to issue the warrant.

On designated offences —

[Translation]

— the warrant issued can only apply to the investigation of offences defined as designated offences for the purpose of the act. These are all serious offences and include sexual offences and crimes of violence. Also, these offences have been chosen because bodily substances from the perpetrator can be left at the scene of the crime.

[English]

You will also have noted that young offenders are to be treated, for the most part, as adults. The police will have access to warrants with respect to the same types of offences. There would, nevertheless, be some special protection. For example, young persons would have the right to have the samples taken in the presence of counsel or other appropriate adults.

With respect to limitation on the use and destruction of bodily substances, great efforts were made to ensure that the provisions contained in this legislation accord with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and to ensure that peace officers executing the warrant respect the privacy interests of those persons who will be the subject of the warrant.

Honourable senators, the bill provides specifically that the warrant must be executed in a way that is reasonable in the circumstances to ensure that the privacy of the person is respected. Nevertheless, the person cannot be detained for a period longer than what is reasonable to obtain the bodily substance, and the bill says so.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, this bill contains provisions regulating the use that can be made of the bodily substances and the results of the DNA analysis. The DNA analysis can only be used in the investigation of designated offences.

The bill also provides for the disposal of both the bodily substances taken under warrant and of the genetic testing results in cases where, for example, the results show that the person in question did not leave any substances at the scene of the crime or in cases where the person is acquitted.

[English]

Honourable senators, this bill will bring Canada in line with many other nations. Forensic DNA typing is conducted in many countries throughout the world, including the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, Australia, New Zealand and Sweden.

This is a bill that will clearly outline how bodily substances can be obtained and used in criminal cases. As such, this bill strengthens the law without jeopardizing the Charter or other privacy interests. It is a finely tailored measure that I hope members of this house will endorse with enthusiasm.

Honourable senators, I have reviewed the bill, and I am satisfied that the rights of the individual privacy of the person and of security from unreasonable searches and seizures have been carefully balanced against the public interest in the resolution of serious crimes and the apprehension and punishment of these who commit them.

I urge all honourable senators to support the passage of Bill C-104.

[Translation]

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I fully agree with Senator Losier-Cool when she says that this bill deals with a very important issue. Indeed, it is a very important measure and, for that reason, we have a duty to take an in-depth look at it. You may ask why.

Senator Losier-Cool pointed out the fact that, last Thursday, the other place looked at this most important legislation, which introduces the use of new, modern technology. What did the members of the other place do? They went through first, second and third reading in the same afternoon.

Under the circumstances, what is our responsibility as senators? I believe it is very important that we review this bill and identify its principles. At this stage, we must look at the principles underlying this legislation.

[English]

When I received my copy of the bill this evening, honourable senators, I began to read it in order to ascertain the principles upon which I could agree, in this expedited process, to send the bill off to the appropriate committee this evening. Frankly, honourable senators, is this any way to run a business?

Senator Oliver: No!

Senator Kinsella: What kind of management process or management model is being used by the government whereby important pieces of legislation such as this — and I agree with my colleague Senator Losier-Cool that this is an important piece of legislation — are to be reviewed by us, when the other place has only looked at it for one day in all three stages? Surely the Senate of Canada would not be so remiss in its duty as to give an important piece of legislation such as this a scant review.

For example, honourable senators, notwithstanding this exercise in poor management of the legislative process, there are many inscriptions one can find in Rome. One of the inscriptions I would bring to the attention of our friends opposite is to be found at the bottom of the Via Venatil. It says tempore, temporae, tempora, which could be translated from the Latin into English as "Time must be tempered by time;" or "Time your time timely;" or "Manage your affairs of Parliament in a timely manner."

I invite all honourable senators to look at the bill and to ask themselves this question: Is the bill too intrusive, or is the intrusiveness underlying the powers that the peace officers will have, upon receiving the warrant to take bodily substances in order to do the DNA test, sufficient?

As was mentioned by Senator Losier-Cool, as provided in proposed section 487.06, there are three bodily substances that may be seized from a person, upon the issue of a warrant that a peace officer may seize the substances. One is the plucking of individual hairs from the person, including the root sheath; the second is the taking of buccal swabs; and the third is the taking of a blood sample.

Applying the principle of least intrusiveness, we might ask why would anyone need to take all three? Why not just take one? Why not just take the hair? Why be so intrusive as to take blood or other body fluids?

With the typical collaboration, as some would say, of the polarized opposition in the other place, the Minister of Justice has put before us rather quickly a bill that might not be terribly important in terms of clarifying the procedures which law enforcement officials can follow in obtaining a warrant to secure bodily samples from some criminal suspects.

One of the problems raised by a Globe and Mail editorial on June 22 was that the bill was adopted without hearings or any extended debate. In fact, the debate was limited. I looked at the debates from the other place this afternoon. I think only three or four members of that place spoke to this bill.

Without making a judgment as to the thoughtfulness of those interventions, the number of intervenors was limited. Because of that, all the more reason for the bill to be given particularly thorough and judicious analysis by this chamber. Indeed, yesterday's Toronto Star observed that it is now up to the Senate, as the chamber of sober second thought, to give the issue a thorough airing.

I invite all honourable senators to do simply that, namely, to give this bill expeditious but careful analysis. This is a new area of science that is being applied to law, and I think there are some serious questions that need to be canvassed with respect to it.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Your Honour, before we move away from government business, Bill C-69 has not been called. Did I miss something? There has been so much legislation going through that I apologize if I missed the government's intentions with respect to this bill. For my sake, and certainly for the sake of some of my colleagues, why is the government not calling that bill?

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is a fair question. By the honourable senator's very question, the Leader of the Opposition has indicated the main reason why Bill C-69 was not called tonight, namely the volume of legislation that we have before us.

Bill C-69 was debated last Wednesday and Thursday. It is rather a contentious bill. There is a difference of opinion on one side of the chamber as to whether or not the bill lives; there is an opinion on the other side of the chamber, as has been suggested by members opposite, that the bill is dead.

We have contended on this side that the bill is very much alive. Indeed, it is still on the Order Paper, but because of the volume of legislation that we had this evening as indicated by the clock — it is now 11:40 p.m — we thought it would be more appropriate to deal with bills that have not yet had an airing, or that have not yet been in committee. Bill C-69, and Bill C-18 before it, had much discussion both here and in the other place, and in committees in both places.

Rules were adopted, proposed and initiated by the members opposite when they were in government — and I will review for a moment to clarify the situation on that particular point. In reviewing order number one, which resumed the debate on my motion respecting the Senate amendments to Bill C-69, that order was debated last Wednesday by several honourable senators. Senator Murray adjourned the debate. A vote on his motion was then deferred to last Thursday, when a majority of senators voted in favour of the motion.

Rule 49(2) states that when debate on any item of government business is adjourned, "the item shall not stand on the Orders of the Day or the Order Paper in any Senator's name and may be called pursuant to rule 27(1), which states:

> Except as otherwise ordered by the Senate or as provided elsewhere in these rules, government business shall have priority over all other business before the Senate. Government business shall be called and considered in such sequence as the Leader of the Government in the Senate or the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate shall determine.

I am most grateful for the cooperation we have received on all sides of the house, from all honourable senators, in dealing expeditiously with the legislation before us. We dealt with eight bills this evening which are being referred to their respective and appropriate committees.

I think we have made excellent progress. There have been discussions between both sides of the house with respect to our deliberations tomorrow. It was suggested that, because of the amount of legislation before committees and the number of committees which must meet, perhaps we should make the whole of the day available for committees, save for the time that is normally allocated on a Wednesday morning for caucuses. In this particular case, it is for the Conservative caucus.

Accordingly, we made that decision. If that is the case, and if I move the adjournment, the motion would be for adjournment until Thursday at 2:00 p.m., with an undertaking that we will take into consideration Bill C-69 in the normal sequence of events on the Order Paper on that particular day.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I find this a rather extraordinary way of proceeding. The Deputy Leader of the Government has said that he wanted to dispose of the bills which were not too controversial. We have done so. Here we are. Why can we not attack Bill C-69 now? What is the reason for hesitating? We could take tomorrow off and come back on Thursday. What is the strategy here? What are we not being told?

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, these are rules which we are following which were initiated by members opposite.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I am glad that the rules that we initiated, which were condemned by the other side for so long, are proving useful and that their worth has been proven.

The point is that we have one item left, Bill C-69. Last week, the government was very annoyed at us for moving the adjournment of the debate. We had a vote on it and the adjournment was sustained.

Here we are, four or five days later, ready to debate, and the government, in effect, has adjourned the debate for two days.

Certainly, the government can explain its intentions on Bill C-69. Is it to keep us here next week, to wear us down? Why can we not get onto it now? We would be willing to move on it now. Senator Murray is not here, but I can pick up the debate in his name and we can carry on and keep it going.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, there is no intention on this side to delay debate on Bill C-69 unnecessarily. There was an understanding between both sides, as I took it, that tomorrow would be a committee day and that we would proceed on Thursday with a debate on Bill C-69. It is the government's prerogative to call the Orders of the Day as it sees fit.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Unless my associate says something to the contrary, I am not aware of any agreement that we would not sit tomorrow.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I agree with everybody. In fact, it was my suggestion that we pursue the possibility of dealing with legislation tonight and setting tomorrow aside as a committee day. I did suggest that. I do not think we went so far as to say that it was a commitment, but that it should be explored. The objective was always accommodation in order to complete all the work of the Senate by the weekend, if possible. It would be a reasonable goal to complete any necessary business so as not to require returning here after the long weekend. That is not to suggest that we would not be quite prepared to come back after the long weekend if there were work to be done.

I apologize to anyone who may have taken my suggestion as a commitment. I still think it is worthy of exploration.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, on a matter somewhat adjacent to this, I wonder if we could ask a question of the Deputy Leader of the Government, given the fact that we have the Canada Day weekend coming which is a very heavy time in terms of airplane reservations. Honourable senators who need to use the airlines to return to their provinces need to know if we are sitting Friday in order to make reservations.

This is important for all senators, particularly for the two whips. Those airline reservations will be hard to come by on Friday. Can we have an indication on whether we will sit on Friday morning?

Senator Graham: I dearly wish that I could look into a crystal ball and tell honourable senators with clarity what might happen on Thursday or, indeed, on Friday. I am just as anxious as any honourable senator to enjoy my family. Indeed, I did not intend to say this, but I have a very special day on the weekend because my youngest daughter is being married. There are the usual rehearsals and all the other things which surround such a wonderful event. I am as anxious as anyone to get home.

Having said that, our responsibility is here and we must deal carefully and thoroughly with all of the legislation before us.

Again, I am most grateful for the cooperation given by all honourable senators. If I move the adjournment, and if we agree, it would be until Thursday at 2:00 o'clock to enable the committees to deal with the legislation, but also with the undertaking that we would deal with Bill C-69 on Thursday.

At this particular hour, with such an important piece of legislation, it would be unfair to all honourable senators to begin that particular debate. We still have some ways to go on the Order Paper.

We should continue with the Order Paper and, if it is agreed, I would move the adjournment for Thursday at 2:00 p.m.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I have raised a question here and it is out of order to raise a motion when I have asked a question.

Senator Graham: I have not put the motion.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Can the deputy leader explain why we cannot debate Bill C-69 tomorrow? I have heard his answer. It is because there are committees that are set to sit.

What additional committees, which are not already scheduled to sit tomorrow, will sit knowing that the Senate is not sitting? All committees scheduled to sit tomorrow know their work. They know which bills are coming to them. There is not one more committee which will sit tomorrow as a result of the chamber not sitting. What purpose is being served?

Senator Graham: I would hope, honourable senators, that committee chairs, deputy chairs and all honourable senators who have to deal with the legislation which has been referred to those particular committees this evening, will undertake immediately to have those committees sit as early as possible, bearing in mind that the members opposite have their caucus in the morning.

I would hope that those committees could make arrangements as quickly as possible to begin sitting at 1:30 tomorrow afternoon, or even at one o'clock.

• (2350)

Senator Lynch-Staunton: This is becoming Kafkaesque: The honourable senator is expecting that at midnight clerks of committees should call in senators and witnesses. Let us be a little more serious than that.

Senator Graham: The clerks of committees and other staff are quite aware of what has been going on this evening. I am sure that, as conscientious members of our staff, they have been following the proceedings and taking whatever steps possible to arrange for committee meetings.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is interesting that they were alerted to the fact that we would not sit tomorrow before we were. That is another indication of how bizarre the management of government legislation is becoming.

It might be preferable that we do sit tomorrow and attack Bill C-69.

Senator Graham: That is not a fair comment from an honourable senator who, when he was in this position, treated this as a game of chess or checkers. Since you changed the Rules of the Senate, at least since the present government has been in office, we have been following a logical sequence in the Order Paper. When Senator Lynch-Staunton was in this position, we used to jump all over the Order Paper and there was not a single honourable senator in the chamber who knew which piece of legislation we would deal with next.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That was because we were the victims of deliberate obstruction on every bill brought before us. I was never able to thank the opposite side for the absolute cooperation for which Senator Graham has been able to thank us.

We on this side have been cooperating. We want to accelerate government legislation. We are coming to the end of the summer session. Friday is approaching. Senator Kinsella has pointed out logistical problems. We would like to know when we can commit ourselves to be elsewhere. That is why we would like to deal with the last piece of legislation before us as soon as possible. We could have spent the last 20 minutes dealing with government legislation rather than bickering as we have been.

You are telling both sides that we have no idea where we are going, how long we will be here or what we will attack when. We never did that when we were in government.

Senator Graham: There are still items on the Order Paper with which we have to deal.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I am talking about government business.

CODE OF CONDUCT

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rizzuto:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to develop a Code of Conduct to guide Senators and Members of the House of Commons in reconciling their official responsibilities with their personal interests, including their dealings with lobbyists;

That seven Members of the Senate and fourteen Members of the House of Commons be Members of the Committee;

That the Committee be directed to consult broadly and review the approaches taken with respect to these issues in Canada and in other jurisdictions with comparable systems of government;

That the Committee have the power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have the power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have the power to retain the services of expert, professional, technical and clerical staff;

That the quorum of the Committee be eleven Members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented, and that the Joint Chairpersons be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, whenever six Members are present, so long as both Houses are represented;

That the Committee be empowered to appoint, from among its Members, such sub committees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such sub committees all or any of its power, except the power to report to the Senate and House of Commons;

That the Committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting of any or all of its proceedings;

That the Committee present its final report no later than October 31, 1995;

That, notwithstanding usual practices of this House, if the Senate is not sitting when the final report of the Committee is completed, the report may be deposited with the Clerk of the Senate and it shall thereupon be deemed to have been presented to the Senate; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, it gives me great pleasure tonight to rise to support the motion introduced by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, a motion to establish a Special Joint Committee to develop a code of conduct to guide senators and Members of the House of Commons in reconciling their official responsibilities with their personal interests, including their dealings with lobbyists.

I want to begin by congratulating Senator Stanbury for his speech on this subject which he gave in this place on June 21. I wish to associate myself with his remarks. I would be remiss if I did not state that I had the honour of serving on the Special Joint Committee on Conflict of Interest in Parliament, a committee of which Senator Stanbury was the co-chair.

That committee, as Senator Stanbury rightly pointed out, presented the government with a unanimous report which contained a model bill on this subject of conflict of interest. Unfortunately, our efforts in this regard were to no avail as the legislative effort on conflict of interest died on the Order Paper with the dissolution of Parliament.

We are here now in Parliament with a House of Commons much differently constituted than the previous one. In fact, one of the parties, the Reform Party, claims to have developed its own code of conduct for members, enforced by members. We look forward to seeing and hope they will share with us, not only the content of their code but the experiences that they have had in attempts to enforce it.

As Senator Stanbury stated, the members of the joint committee will be asked to develop a code to suggest a mechanism and, perhaps, an office responsible for its administration to develop sanctions for breach of the rules of this code and to suggest how such sanctions should be enforced. These are the nuts and bolts of conflict of interest or code of conduct and, of course, they are vitally necessary.

I suggest, however, that to be successful this committee must deal with the topic on two levels. One is the level suggested by Senator Stanbury — what I term the mechanisms of conflict of interest. However, this committee must also take the time to reflect on this issue in a thoughtful and meaningful way. Members must ask themselves and attempt to answer some of the very difficult and troubling questions.

In the short time I wish to speak on this matter, I will only raise some of these more philosophical or fundamental issues. It will be up to the committee members to address them in their deliberations and to attempt to find solutions which can be set forth in the committee's report.

First and foremost, we, as public officeholders, both as elected and appointed representatives of the people, must ask ourselves why conflict of interest is such an important issue today. Indeed, it has been an important issue for at least the last 15 years. For it was in May of 1984 that the Starr-Sharp Task Force on Conflict of Interest appointed by then Prime Minister Trudeau reported its findings.

In having to address this subject we are not alone. The Clerk of the Senate has informed me that early in July, representatives of the newly established New South Wales Parliamentary Committee on "Ethical Standards for Members of Parliament" will be visiting Ottawa. They hope to meet with those of us who have an interest in these issues. Not only is this a crucial issue for Canada, but for other jurisdictions as well.

Again I ask: Why? Are today's representatives of the people so inherently corrupt that the only way to deal with the matter is to establish legally enforceable tenets by which all activity, personal and public, can be regulated and judged? I do not believe so. If anything, those in public office today, for the most part, serve at great personal and financial sacrifice. I believe, as was stated in the first paragraph of the Special Joint Committee on Conflict of Interest report, that service to the Canadian public has always been the highest calling of a Canadian citizen. Traditionally, Parliament has attracted dedicated men and women from diverse sectors of Canadian life to serve their country and fellow citizens with integrity and commitment.

In fact, the report goes on to state that in the experience of its members, most parliamentarians want only to do that which is right and proper and in the best interests of their constituents and the Canadian public as a whole.

For those of us in public life, the avoidance of conflict and acting in a reputable manner are daily watchwords, virtually taken for granted. For the public it seems it is an issue which demands immediate attention, attention to the extent that one would believe that all of us who serve the public do so with the sole goal of lining our own pockets. Large groups in the public are naive about public trust and conflict of interest.

One person suggested that a member of Parliament may be in conflict if his or her spouse works or earns an income from a corporation that involves some public policy. What major corporation in Canada does not? This is the type of ignorance that the committee must address.

The committee must come to grips with how these feelings of distrust, ignorance, bigotry and lack of confidence developed in the public and how they can be best addressed. I submit that it will take more than a nicely worded code of conduct enforced by an independent arbitrator to satisfy the public on this matter. What further must be done will be for members of the committee to determine.

A second fundamental issue which this committee must address is how, in this complicated and fast-moving world in which we find ourselves, where everything seems to be interrelated and there are few hard and fast rules, as society evolves at an ever-increasing rate, it is possible to separate or even to distinguish between official responsibilities and personal interests? How can one strictly define official responsibilities? How can one define personal interests, and where does one end and the other begin?

I do not believe that Canadians want people with no previous experience to represent them in public office — the professional politician who has no previous outside experience. Surely, the people want us to bring the sum total of our life experiences to the issues of the day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Oliver, I regret to interrupt you, but it is midnight. According to rule 6(1), I must interrupt the proceedings to state that a motion to adjourn the Senate has been deemed to have been moved and adopted, unless of course by agreement I do not see the clock.

Is it agreed, honourable senators, that I do not see the clock?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Therefore, according to rule 6(1), I must interrupt the proceedings and declare that a motion to adjourn the Senate has been deemed to have been moved and adopted and leave the Chair until the time provided for the next meeting of the Senate.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2:00 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, June 28, 1995

The Senate met at 2:00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

CONGRATULATIONS TO CONSERVATIVE GOVERNMENT ON TAKING OFFICE

Hon. Marjory LeBreton: Honourable senators, on Monday, June 26, the Progressive Conservative government of Mike Harris was sworn in. This date is significant for it was exactly 10 years ago to the day that the government of Ontario was turned over to a two-year Liberal/NDP coalition followed by a three-year Liberal government and then five years of the NDP — the lost decade, as Premier Harris has aptly described it. Perhaps we would be wise to listen to our colleague Senator Prud'homme, who predicted this way back on May 2.

Honourable senators, I have waited until the swearing in to mark the occasion publicly in the Senate. It is interesting to hear and read all the theories. As the late President Kennedy once said, "Victory has a thousand fathers — defeat is an orphan." No truer words were spoken. We have the Reform Party, the model of inconsistency, claiming ownership of a plan and policies developed over five years by Mike Harris and the PC Party of Ontario —several years before the Reform Party was even registering on the political scale.

Honourable senators, the media's interpretation of the Harris-PC victory is as expected and reflects their own biases — so much for objective journalism.

Everyone has a view as to who is responsible for this great win, but — the answer is clear — the credit for the victory belongs to Mike Harris, the Ontario PC Party, his campaign team and their clear, honest and consistent plan for Ontario.

What does this mean for the federal Progressive Conservative Party? First and foremost, it demonstrates the strength and roots of our party; but, more important, it is proof positive that the rebuilding plan we are embarked upon is the correct one. We have completed the first stage of our rebuilding by restructuring our party reorganization. We are now entering the second stage — policy development.

This was the step-by-step process followed by Mike Harris and our Ontario party, and at times the road was long and lonely. The message to my party is crystal clear — follow your plan, stick to your agenda and earn the support of the Canadian public, just as Mike Harris did in Ontario.

Congratulations to the new premier, the new cabinet, and from an Eastern Ontario perspective, to the three cabinet ministers from this region — the Honourable Norman Sterling, who represents the riding I live in, the Honourable Noble Villeneuve and the Honourable Bob Runciman. Eastern Ontario, indeed, has a strong voice in our provincial government. May they govern with the same common sense that was so ably demonstrated over the past five years leading up to their victory.

UNITED NATIONS

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF FOUNDING

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I rise today to join with those who spoke yesterday to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the United Nations. I waited until today because I wanted to confirm some aspects of my statement. I am particularly pleased to join with those senators to celebrate the United Nations on its fiftieth anniversary because I have had some personal involvement with the organization as a citizen of Canada and a resident of the province of Alberta. Alberta has sent thousands of peacekeepers to the former Yugoslavia and to other theatres. I have come to know some of them in various ways. I am enormously proud of them and the contribution that they make.

The National Film Board has produced two one-hour video productions. The first is a production called Caught in the Crossfire. It is a remarkable piece of work that illustrates how difficult it is for Canadians to be in a peacekeeping environment. I commend it to you.

• (1410)

The second film, The Price of Peace, is a tribute to Corporal Mark Isfeld, "Izzy," as he was known to his friends. An engineer in the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry, and involved in the clearing of mines, he was killed during the course of one of his tours of duty in the former Yugoslavia.

One does not give one's life but one risks one's life, and many Canadians are doing that on a daily basis. In this case, Izzy lost his life. That loss brought home to me the significance of our contribution and the significance of those who actually do the peacekeeping for all of us.

We have lost 10 peacekeepers in the former Yugoslavia and many others have received injuries, so why do Canadians answer the call to the United Nations time and again? Is the risk worth it?

We do it because we know that Canadians are making a difference. We know that the alternative to United Nations involvement is chaos and tragedy for many people. Because of the contribution of countries such as Canada, people around the world can at least hope for a better tomorrow.

To quote Warrant Officer Daniel Hartford five minutes after the burial of one of his men:

> By lifting these mines we leave the children of this unfortunate country with legs, arms and faces... And yes, it's worth it.

PRIVILEGES, STANDINGS RULES AND ORDERS

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

Wednesday, June 28, 1995

The Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

FOURTH REPORT

Your Committee notes that the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate also contain the Order Paper. The Order Paper is of little interest beyond the parliamentary precincts, as it is out of date before most subscribers receive it.

At the end of each session the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate are revised and reprinted as the Journals of the Senate. Some subscribers do not purchase the bound Journals: instead, they bind the daily copies of the Minutes. Consequently, it is suggested that the title of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate be changed to the Journals of the Senate. This would eliminate the necessity of changing the titles on each page of the Minutes at the end of a session.

Your Committee recommends that:

1. the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Order Paper be printed separately and distribution of the Order Paper be restricted to the parliamentary precincts;

2. the title of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate be changed to the Journals of the Senate; and

3. the Rules of the Senate be amended in Rules 29(2), (5), 86(4), 105(5) and 128 by substituting the word "Journals" for the words "Minutes of the Proceedings."

Your Committee also recommends that these changes take effect in the next session of Parliament.

Your Committee recommends that the Rules of the Senate be reprinted for the new session of Parliament. It is proposed that the new Rules adopted by the Senate during the present session be included as well as necessary editorial changes. It is also proposed that the Library of Parliament be requested to prepare a new index to the Rules and that this new index be also included.

Respectfully submitted,

BRENDA M. ROBERTSON,
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Robertson, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET
DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology have power to sit at 3:15 p.m. today, Wednesday, June 28, 1995, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

PEARSON AIRPORT AGREEMENTS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTINGS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Finlay MacDonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), moved:

That the Special Senate Committee on the Pearson Airport Agreements have power to sit from Tuesday, July 11 to Thursday, July 13, 1995 inclusive, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 58(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit at 3:30 p.m. today, June 28, 1995, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

PRACTICE OF FAMILY LAW IN ONTARIO

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, pursuant to rules 57(1) and (2), and 58(2), I give notice that I will call the attention of the Senate to the state of the practice of Family Law in Ontario and to a particular incident within a custodial dispute of enormous suffering and anguish to the children involved.

FIREARMS BILL

PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I have a petition relating to Bill C-68 signed by numerous residents of the Province of Ontario. This is an amendment to the Criminal Code concerning the possession and ownership of firearms and other weapons which has been sent to the Senate of Canada for consideration. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to amend this bill and delete those sections mandating universal registration of firearms and permitting more police search powers against gun owners.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND SENTENCING PROVISIONS— PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I also have a petition on Bill C-41, which was before the Senate for consideration and went through this house very quickly yesterday deals with a series of amendments concerning sentencing. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to amend this bill and delete section 718.2(a)(1).

I too should like to go on record and say that I would have voted against that bill. I will not go into the details as to why; however, Canadian society has suffered a major setback with that piece of legislation.

SOLICITOR GENERAL

RCMP MARKETING CONTRACT WITH DISNEY CORPORATION— REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. I understand that the RCMP has signed a contract with Disney Corporation, a little bit of Hollywood, to market their name and likeness to the world. We will have the proud traditions of the RCMP marketed along with Mickey Mouse and Goofy, which I think is hardly appropriate for a government institution and an historical institution so revered in our country.

• (1420)

I want to clarify some of the news reports that the RCMP entered into this contract because they could not find any business or person in Canada capable of doing this work. Is it not strange that a government institution should say that, in the whole country of Canada, they were not able to find any person to market the RCMP?

With respect to this contract, would the government inform Parliament as to the tendering process — for example, the public notice, specifications of the contract, the returns to the RCMP and the returns to the Government of Canada Consolidated Revenue Fund?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will certainly pursue the details relating to my honourable friend's question. I sought a preliminary answer myself this morning and was advised that the mounted police foundation did indeed encourage the submission of licensing proposals from both Canadian and U.S. companies.

Walt Disney Canada, which is a fully incorporated Canadian company, in existence since 1966 and staffed entirely by Canadians, produced a proposal which was selected as being the most comprehensive and the most likely to appropriately portray the RCMP image.

I was also told that Walt Disney Canada will give preference to Canadian manufacturers and suppliers, which may open up world-wide opportunities for Canadians through that network. That was a preliminary response to the question. I will do my best to get the rest of the details for you.

Senator Tkachuk: One interesting point that was missed was who are the shareholders of the Disney Corporation in Canada?

Further, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate also inform the Senate whether the management team issuing the contract on behalf of the RCMP — or the Solicitor General; I am not sure how this was done — travelled to Los Angeles or other places outside of Canada to meet with officials from the Disney Corporation? If so, I should like to know who paid for those trips, how many people went, and whether any senior RCMP personnel were promised any inducements for signing the contracts, such as trips to Fantasyland, Disney World, or any other such place.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I will not touch the last part of Senator Tkachuk's question. However, I will relay his other points to the Solicitor General's office and see what I can find out.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I am advised that Walt Disney Canada Inc. will do only a portion of the work. There are certain aspects of this contract which will be sole-sourced out of Los Angeles. I should like to know from the minister what portion of the work will be done in the United States, and then what portion will be done by the Canadian corporation.

Senator Fairbairn: I will add those questions to my request for further information.

[Translation]

GRANTING OF PUBLIC RELATIONS CONTRACT FOR G-7 SUMMIT— REQUEST FOR ESTIMATED FINAL COST—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether she has the answer to the question I put to her yesterday concerning the amount billed by a Montreal firm — following a patronage operation, which is what it was — when this public relations firm was hired to advise the government on the organization of the G-7 Summit.

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I understood Senator Simard's question, it was a request for particulars of the amount paid to the firm. I do not have that answer, but I am pursuing it.

BANK OF CANADA—SALARY INCREASES FOR OFFICIALS— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, a few days ago, Canadians were informed that four senior officials of the Bank of Canada had recently been given pay increases of 10 per cent which, in absolute dollars, works out to an increase of $13,000 each. When Minister Paul Martin was asked about this, after his initial amazement he promised Canadians he would talk to the Governor of the Bank of Canada about this. Does the Leader of the Government know whether Minister Martin did so?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not believe that Mr. Martin has had the opportunity since yesterday to have that conversation. He certainly intends to do so, and he made that very clear following the cabinet meeting yesterday.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Canadian taxpayers have been asked to make more and bigger sacrifices because the federal government is running a colossal deficit. We also know that tax revenues are no longer coming in at the same rate as in the past. Does Minister Paul Martin realize he will have to stand firm and tell the Governor of the Bank of Canada that this policy of giving 10 per cent pay increases is intolerable? Almost all public servants, senators, MPs and other Canadians have to do without new services and have seen existing services reduced. Does the minister realize that, to Canadians in general, this is a clear case of applying a double standard, one for governors and deputy governors of the Bank of Canada and one for other Canadians, who have to do more with less?

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators will know that through the last two budgets, the Minister of Finance has indicated his strong commitment to fiscal restraint. He is very aware of the effect that this restraint has had on the rest of the government departments and the people who work there.

He is also very aware that all Canadians have been asked to share in the burden of fiscal restraint. Those thoughts were very much in his mind yesterday when he became aware of the situation with respect to the Bank of Canada. As he said, he will definitely be raising that matter with the governor.

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the fact that in the near future the government will be compelled to make major adjustments to UI and to transfer payments for health and welfare right across the board, can the minister advise us at this time exactly what her government intends to do about the 10 per cent salary increase taken by the top officials at the Bank of Canada?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, as I indicated to Senator Simard, the Minister of Finance became aware of this yesterday. He indicated immediately that he would be raising the matter directly with the governor of the bank. The minister will do that. I will await further information from the minister, and then communicate it to my honourable colleague.

Senator St. Germain: Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate undertake to report back to this place at the next sitting as to what definitive action will be taken in this case?

When we were in government, we experienced similar incidents with respect to CN and the National Gallery in matters which seemed to be at arm's length. However, we are living in rapidly changing times. Drastic cuts are taking place, and I mention in particular those to Unemployment Insurance. Will any action be taken by the government to put some controls on these various agencies? In certain cases, it does not seem as though the government has the ability to restrict these people in their movements.

The Bank of Canada reduced its number of vice–presidents by one, which allowed them to take that 10 per cent increase. Perhaps there was no need for that vice–president in the first place. Perhaps, indeed, they could do with fewer still.

Perhaps I could have some indication from the minister on those points.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I will definitely send the comments and views of the honourable senator to the Minister of Finance.

With respect to the first part of the honourable senator's question, I will undertake to get the information to him as best I can, once I am in possession of it.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS TOWARDS INCLUSION OF CHILE IN NAFTA— REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Madam Minister, it has now been about two weeks since Canadian international trade representatives started talks on the inclusion of Chile as an economic partner in the North American Free Trade Agreement. Since these preliminary talks began more than two weeks ago, could the minister give us a progress report on these negotiations, especially since Canadians have major investments in Chile?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Nolin is quite right. We discussed this matter around the time that the meetings were taking place in Toronto. I cannot give him a progress report today. However, I will be glad to get one for him.

CANADA COUNCIL

CLOSURE OF ART BANK— PRIOR CONSULTATIONS WITH MINISTER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to convey my thanks and gratitude to the Minister of Canadian Heritage for answering my letter of April 4 on June 27 — which reply I just received today — regarding the closing of the Art Bank of the Canada Council.

Today, I should like to reiterate a question I put to the government leader a few weeks ago regarding the closing of the Art Bank. To date, I have not had an answer to my question which, simply put, is the following: Was the minister consulted, approached or informed before the Canada Council announced the winding up of the Art Bank?

The information that the minister has given in the House of Commons and in his response to my letter of April 4 seems to suggest that he does not have the legislative power to interfere with the "strategic decisions" of the Canada Council.

Yet we know, as does the government leader, that the Art Bank was instituted and funded initially by the government at the request of the Canada Council, and officially announced by the Secretary of State. Indeed, the former government reiterated a few years ago a policy to have all government departments borrow art for decorative purposes in government buildings from the Art Bank. I find it passing strange that if government approval was required for the establishment of the Art Bank, the Canada Council could decide on its own to abolish it. It was an unfortunate decision, one which is highly disapproved of by the cultural and arts community in Canada.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend has been patiently awaiting further information on his request. I myself am also in the process of doing the same, and I will share that information with him as soon as I receive it.

TRANSPORT

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—NOVA SCOTIA—RESTORATION OF FUNDING TO DESIGNATED PROJECT—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, was the Leader of the Government able to secure an answer to the question I raised yesterday regarding alternative methods of funding the construction of Highway 104 in Nova Scotia? More important, does she not agree with many of us that this matter has dragged on much too long?

Apart from the confusion that has arisen from the redirection of funding from the Highway 104 program to the Fleur-de-lis program, a further result may be that we might now have toll highways right across the country. Even more sinister has been the impact and effect that no construction has taken place this summer on that stretch of highway.

Does she not agree that given the very real danger that exists for motorists on that part of the Trans-Canada highway system, perhaps it might have been better if the government had moved to restore that funding and thereby encourage the province of Nova Scotia to proceed with the development of that highway, thus providing an adequate resolution to the very dangerous situation that now exists? I ask this question in light of the fact that tourism rates are now up and the traffic count is high.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate Senator Forrestall's concerns and the concerns of other senators on this issue.

I cannot throw any more light on the subject-matter of the question asked by the honourable senator yesterday. I am aware that similar questions were raised in the other place. In his responses, the Minister of Transport once again underlined the fact that decisions respecting highway construction, the allocation of funds and the routing of highways is a provincial matter and comes within the primary responsibility of the provinces in question.

Senator Forrestall: I do not need a lecture on the background politics relating to highways!

Senator Fairbairn: However, that does not go to the specifics of my friend's questions.

Senator Forrestall: I am worried about somebody being killed on that stretch of highway. If it happens, it will be our fault!

Senator Fairbairn: I understand my friend's concerns. I am continuing to try and obtain, for both you and Senator Comeau, greater detail on this matter in as collective and in-depth a way as is possible.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

AUTOMATED WEATHER OBSERVATION SYSTEMS

ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES—COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO TABLE INTERIM REPORT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move:

> That, notwithstanding usual practices, if the Senate is not sitting when the Interim Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources on the Safety Implications of Automated Weather Observation Systems (AWOS) is completed, the Committee, which was authorized by the Senate to examine the issue of jobs and the environment and, in so doing, provide a forum where issues, in which there seems to be a conflict between the creation of jobs and the preservation of the environment, could be discussed with a view to moving them closer to the point of mutually advantageous integration, shall deposit its Interim Report with the Clerk of the Senate, and said Report shall thereupon be deemed to have been tabled in this Chamber.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Government Notices of Motions:

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there have been discussions between the leadership on both sides. I believe that we have agreement on a plan for our work over the next couple of weeks. We are asking committees to meet in the coming days to deal with legislation which they now have before them. If the plan is acceptable, I will move for adoption of a house order pertaining to that legislation.

If it is the will of the Senate, I will call Bill C-69 for consideration immediately thereafter.

Therefore, with leave of the Senate and not withstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move:

> That all Standing Committees to which legislation has been referred, with the exception of Bills C-22 and C-68, be instructed to report such legislation back to the Senate no later than 8:00 p.m. on Tuesday, July 11, 1995.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to say just a word on this matter. Last night three bills were referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance: Bill C-82, the bill concerning the Royal Canadian Mint; Bill C-65 with regard to the reorganization and dissolution of various federal agencies; and Bill C-85, the members of Parliament retiring allowances bill.

I have cancelled a meeting which I had earlier called for three o'clock today because the Senate, contrary to my expectation, is sitting this afternoon. I have convened the committee for eleven o'clock tomorrow morning, at which time we will take whatever time is necessary to deal with the bills, it being understood that, if necessary, we could meet again in the morning or afternoon of July 11.

I know that my friends, the Leader and Deputy Leader of the Government, are making every effort to produce, in the case of each bill, a minister or a parliamentary secretary to testify before the committee. I wish to emphasize the importance of that. They have already produced a parliamentary secretary for tomorrow afternoon at one o'clock, on Bill C-82. I hope and expect that they will be able to do so in respect of the other bills.

There is a policy component to all of this legislation, and it would not be sufficient to have public servants, regardless of how senior they may be, arrive alone at the committee. I realize that if this motion passes we will be required to report the bills on Tuesday night, July 11, but there is nothing in the motion that says how we have to report them. In view of the fact that the Senate is going some distance to accommodate the government, I would hope that the government would give us the very basic minimum cooperation that is required by producing the necessary witnesses.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, that is a very valid question and a very legitimate concern expressed by Senator Murray. You will understand that the lateness of the hour last evening provided some difficulties in securing the appropriate witnesses as asked for by the Chairman of the Finance Committee. I shall give him and all honourable senators an undertaking that we are making every possible effort to get the officials who have been asked for by the chairs and indeed members of the various committees.

In that respect I wish to thank all honourable colleagues for their cooperation.

Hon. Marcel Prud'Homme: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Chairman of the Finance Committee. He said that he intends to proceed with Bills C-82, C-65 and C-85 tomorrow. As you know from my interventions last night, I am interested in Bills C-82 and C-85. Could the chairman indicate now in which order he intends to proceed with these bills, and when?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, much depends on the availability of the witnesses. I have scheduled Bill C-82 for approximately one o'clock tomorrow afternoon, that being the earliest time that the parliamentary secretary can be present.

I do not know yet whether we will have witnesses for the other two bills tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock, but I will advise my honourable friend and other interested honourable senators as to that.

Senator Prud'homme: I should like to join with the view expressed by the chairman. Last night, my friend Senator De Bané corrected me with regard to the bill on pensions. However, having read the bill this morning I still find some very disturbing items in it concerning, for instance, unmarried members, widows and divorce in favour of new common law relationships; things which should interest all members.

I cannot understand how the House of Commons could have passed such an important bill so rapidly. This is unbelievable. I am pleased and honoured to be in the Senate where we will not proceed as the House of Commons does on very important matters.

I hope there will be someone in authority at the committee to answer my very precise questions on Bill C-85. It is in the interest of every member of Parliament to pay attention to this bill. Members of the House of Commons should have paid more attention to the details of this legislation because if it proceeds as is, some people may discover some surprises too late.

• (1450)

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a small technical point for clarification. As I understand it, the House of Commons deals only with government legislation and, for example, the subject-matter of Bill S-10 would not be impacted by this house order.

Likewise, I think we have already dealt with Bill S-7, so it would not count. We are talking about government legislation.

Senator Graham: That is correct.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, to pursue the point made by Senator Prud'homme, I would like to be quite clear about the agreement that will be put to a vote in a few moments, and I am referring to the schedule of bills before this house. I think my opinion is shared by a number of Canadians and certainly by a number of senators in this house.

Thanks to poor management on the part of the Government House Leader in the other place, this year again we have to make decisions and rush through pieces of legislation of great importance to Canadians.

Before I approve this agreement, I want to make sure we all understand the situation. My understanding is that committees will present their reports to this house later than July 11 at 8:00 p.m., except in the case of two bills C-22 and C-68.

I want to make it clear to the Leader of the Government in the Senate or her deputy that just because the committees present their reports on July 11, she should not assume that we will rush these bills through in the following three hours. Quite the contrary. We may take a week or two or three weeks, if necessary, to consider the bill on pensions, Bill C-104 concerning forensic DNA analyses, and Bill C-91, which is now before us and concerns the future of the Federal Business Development Bank.

Senator Graham, perhaps you could tell us whether you have the same understanding as I do regarding this agreement.

[English]

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, I have never taken anything for granted. I presume the committee members will do their work very assiduously.

If the members take advantage of the time available, they will be able to complete their work by July 11. That is the understanding between both sides of the house. If there are serious concerns, I am sure that they will be brought to our attention on July 11.

I want to report a bit of progress with respect to witnesses because I understand that Mr. Massé is available for Bills C-65 and C-85. He will appear at eleven o'clock tomorrow morning before Senator Murray's committee. I also understand that Minister Eggleton or his parliamentary secretary, Mr. Duhamel, will possibly be able to appear before the committee at noon. That is the latest information, but stay tuned.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), it was moved by the Honourable Senator Graham, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert:

> That all Standing Committees to which legislation has been referred, with the exception of Bills C-22 and C-68, be instructed to report such legislation back to the Senate no later than 8:00 p.m. on Tuesday, July 11, 1995.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT BILL, 1995

MOTION TO CONCUR WITH MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Graham, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert:

That the Senate do not insist on its amendments 1, 2, 3, 4(b), 4(c), 5, 6 and 7 to the Bill C-69, An Act to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions and the readjustment of electoral boundaries, to which the House of Commons has disagreed; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before Senator Murray begins, I wish to inform you that the Honourable Senator Murray had been speaking on this motion. He now has seven minutes remaining to do so.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I had intended to point that out to His Honour, even if he had not done so. I think I can fairly summarize our position in the seven minutes that are remaining to me from the speech that I began one week ago.

Honourable senators, it was on June 14, 1994, that the Senate passed Bill C-18, as amended. Following Royal Assent, it went into the statute books as Chapter 19, the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Suspension Act, 1994. The purpose of that bill was to suspend the work of the boundaries commissions that had been appointed following the 1991 census until a new electoral boundaries law had been passed by Parliament, had overtaken the present process and had cancelled it, or until June 22, 1995, whichever was earlier.

This is not one of those situations where many years after the event we are asking ourselves and each other what was Parliament's intent. We know what Parliament's intent was in so doing. Most of us were here 12 months ago when Bill C-18, as amended, was passed.

Some honourable senators opposite are trying to argue that the June 22 deadline in Bill C-18 means nothing today and, in fact, that it never did mean anything, even when it was passed. However, honourable senators, the June 22 deadline was not just a major issue; it was the major issue on which a compromise had to be sought, and found, between the Senate on one hand and the government on the other.

Honourable senators will recall perhaps that we on this side had put forward an amendment providing that the deadline be February of 1995. The government argued for a June 1995 deadline. The government's view prevailed, and we adopted June 22 as the deadline.

The June 22 deadline was a key issue. You have only to read the comments made in the House of Commons by the sponsoring minister, Mr. Gray; or those of the Secretary of State, Mr. Fernand Robichaud; or, indeed, those of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Fairbairn.

The most recent testimony we have had from the other side concerning the fate of Bill C-69 came from Senator Stanbury when he spoke on Wednesday, June 21. Various statements by Senator Stanbury have been put on the record. I want to add to the record the very last words from the speech that he gave at 3:20 p.m. last Wednesday, June 21, 1995, as reported in the Debates of the Senate at page 1851. He said:

> All parties know the nature of the bill, the time constraints, and the fact that the government is opposed to all but one of the amendments, which was accepted.

He then said:

> All senators now have the opportunity to decide the fate of the bill on its substance or on the simple failure of the Senate to give consent to its disposition.

• (1500)

Honourable senators, that sums up the situation quite well. If no new law were passed before June 22, then the commissions appointed following the 1991 census would be revived. They would complete their work, and the next election would be fought on the present law and on the revised maps once proclaimed.

Those maps were sent by the Chief Electoral Officer last Thursday, as the law provides, and the Speaker of the House of Commons tabled them in that chamber last Thursday afternoon.

The Leader of the Opposition, Senator Beaudoin, Senator Nolin and others have pointed out that Bill C-69 is a dead letter. The Speaker has ruled that this is not a procedural question for him to decide, but rather a legal question. A legal cloud is over this bill.

I heard honourable senators opposite last week saying that Bill C-69 would repeal Bill C-18 with the June 22 deadline. Of course, honourable senators, if Bill C-69 had passed before June 22, Bill C-18 would be a dead letter and would be repealed. However, that is not what happened.

By June 22 at the latest, either Bill C-18 or Bill C-69 was destined to be a dead letter, and we are arguing that Bill C-69 is the dead letter.

I heard another honourable senator say last week that if Conservative senators' logic were followed, it would never be possible to amend the electoral boundaries legislation. Well, of course it will be possible, but you would have to do it right. I argue that you would have to amend Bill C-18 by pushing the June 22 deadline ahead to some future date, or repeal Bill C-18 and start over again with a new bill, if you want to amend the electoral boundaries law. To argue otherwise is to argue, as senators opposite have been doing, that Bill C-18 and, in particular, the June 22 deadline means nothing now and never did mean anything.

Surely honourable senators would not suggest that Parliament put that date in for no reason at all. Surely they would not suggest that it is possible now to ignore that statute and the deadline.

Honourable senators, we have a bill before us procedurally alive, perhaps legally dead, and certainly under a legal cloud. I do not believe that we can or should pass it while it is under that legal cloud.

MOTION TO REFER QUESTION AND MESSAGE FROM COMMONS TO COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Lowell Murray: Therefore, I would move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Robertson:

> That the question, together with the Message from the House of Commons on the same subject, dated June 20, 1995, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for consideration and report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in speaking in response to Senator Murray's motion, I do so in the context of the agreement worked out earlier today by the deputy leaders on each side of this house. We have agreed that the committees of this house will complete their work and report back to the Senate on July 11, with the exception of two particular pieces of legislation. Included in this agreement is Bill C-69, a piece of legislation of high priority to the government and, indeed, to the members of the House of Commons.

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will hear witnesses on this bill and the process which has brought it to this point in the Senate.

I do not intend to retravel at length the sometimes bumpy road which led to Bill C-69, other than to note that it had its genesis in Bill C-18, which was before this house more than a year ago.

As a result of amendments proposed in this house and agreed to by the other place, the current electoral boundaries commissions were suspended until June 22 of this year in anticipation of the enactment of a new piece of legislation.

In a very special parliamentary departure, the House of Commons Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs was given the mandate to draft new legislation on electoral boundaries readjustment and, with the consensus of two parties, produced Bill C-69.

Honourable senators opposite had envisaged a process that would have been completed by last February 6, but the government believed that that timetable was too tight and extended the date to June 22 in terms of maintaining the suspension of those commissions.

I suppose, honourable senators, it is always risky to make assumptions about the speed with which either house of Parliament might function. This bill is a case in point. The Commons process was a lengthy one, and, as it turned out, opposition senators did move amendments to the bill when it came here. By the time these were dealt with by the House of Commons and returned to this house last Wednesday in the form of a message, the bill was not passed according to the June 22 timetable in Bill C-18.

What this means, honourable senators, is that the current commissions have resumed their activities, but contrary to the strongly held views repeated today by Senator Murray and opposition colleagues, the government is of an even stronger conviction, based on assurances by our legal advisers, that Bill C-69 continues to be intact and remain properly before this chamber for urgent passage. We do not concede for a moment that this bill is, in the words, of Senator Murray, a "dead letter."

Honourable senators, we can all recall that at the core of the opposition's difficulty with Bill C-18 was the fear that it would not permit the next regular election to be held on the basis of the 1991 census. That concern was shared by a great many people in the country, in various provinces, within our own party and, indeed, within the government. Changes were made. Bill C-69 deals with that concern.

The other concern, as Senator Murray indicated, was the timetable. The amendments sent from the Senate, with the exception of a technical difficulty which the government was pleased to address, have pursued new disagreements on the content and the process which members of the other place had established to change the redistribution of the electoral districts where they are voted into Parliament by the people of Canada. Those concerns of the Senate were debated in the House of Commons, and all but one of the amendments suggested by the opposition senators was rejected. That message was sent back to this house, not as a peremptory rejection. It was seriously considered. It was fulsome, and it was respectful of this place.

Honourable senators, the Senate has done its job on this bill, as it has done a job on similar bills in recent years put forward by the previous governments concerning redistribution. As has been noted before, Bill C-69 does not simply tinker with the process — it sets up an entirely new system, which has been carefully explained by my colleague Senator Carstairs, who has carried this bill for the government with great care in this house and in the committee.

• (1510)

With the passage of Bill C-69, the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act is repealed, as well as the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Suspension Act, 1994, Chapter 19 of the Statutes of Canada, 1994. The current electoral boundaries commissions would be replaced by a whole new system.

Honourable senators, it would have been highly preferable to have had all of those matters completed in a neat and tidy way by June 22 last. As was anticipated, however, Parliament, in either house, is neither a neat nor tidy place, and that result, to the consternation of some, did not come about.

However, and I will repeat this to Senator Murray, the government strongly rejects any contention that Bill C-69 is improperly before this house. It rejects also any suggestion that either the government or Parliament is restricted or prevented in any way from proceeding with amendments to the electoral boundaries process as a result of events in recent days.

All senators in this house must have an opportunity to take a decision on this matter. The majority may wish ultimately to defeat this bill. That is their prerogative. However, we must have a chance, all of us in this house, to make a choice.

With all of the actions and the accommodations of the past year, the movement back and forth between the two houses and the response twice by the government on the other side, we believe that the new bill should be passed following the completion of the final committee hearings.

Honourable senators, I recall to you the words of a former Conservative Justice Minister, Leader of the Government in the Senate and Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, the Honourable Jacques Flynn, when he spoke for his party about the principles to be followed when this house was asked to deal with legislation on electoral boundaries. On December 18, 1985, at second reading of Bill C-74, on which many of us also spoke in this place, Senator Jacques Flynn pronounced as follows:

> ... I would say this is an area that almost exclusively concerns the House of Commons, and I think that we as a non-elected chamber and as appointed legislators are hardly in a position to tell the members of the House of Commons how they should proceed to draw the boundaries of their electoral districts.

Many of us in this chamber were here when Senator Flynn made those remarks. He was a parliamentarian of considerable experience and skill. I would tell my friends on both sides of this house that in effect, in the process of the past year, this Senate has taken a very active rather than a passive role on this issue. All of us in this house might reflect on some of the views that Senator Flynn expressed as we approach a final decision.

I am pleased that there will be a variety of opinions expressed on this issue as the committee does its work, and we on this side look forward to returning at a time when we will have an opportunity in this chamber to make a decision on this very important bill, not just for Parliament, but for the Canadian people who vote for the representatives who work and represent them in the House of Commons.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it was not my intention to speak on Senator Murray's motion because I thought that the debate on the side of the government would be limited to the validity of sending the bill to committee for legal assessment as to whether or not that bill is still valid. However, after hearing certain comments, I cannot help but react.

It is all very well for the Leader of the Government to quote Senator Flynn. In the circumstances under which he made that statement, it was extremely valid. However, that goes back some years. Today we are faced with a situation where a bill is before us which may be invalid. That was not the situation in which Senator Flynn found himself at the time.

In any event, if the leader wishes to quote other individuals in order to justify her position, perhaps she could quote Warren Allmand explaining to us how it is that the policy of the Liberal government today is contrary to the principles of the Liberal Party. However, I will let that one go by.

Let us not quote the words of others simply because we do not have arguments of our own. Let us look at Bill C-69, which the Leader of the Government in the Senate has identified as a high priority to the Government of Canada and to members of the House of Commons. There has been no reference to the high priority of this bill to the people of Canada. Nothing has been said about the fact that this bill is in the public interest.

Not only is this bill in the interests of the members of the House of Commons, particularly most of the leader's colleagues from Ontario, but it was even written by members of the House of Commons. Those who have the most vested interest in the electoral process were called on to be the authors of a new electoral boundaries readjustment act. That is gerrymandering. This is what the original act, passed into law 30 years ago, was designed to counteract. It was to stop the government and its supporters from determining electoral boundaries.

Not only is the new Bill C-69 authored by members of the majority in the house, it is with the conspiracy — or, if that is too strong a word, with the "cooperation" — of at least one opposition party, depending upon which feature of the bill we examine. The most heinous part of the bill is that it also compromises the Speaker of the House of Commons. It makes him part of the conspiracy.

Under the present act the Speaker, on his own, can name two of the three members of each of the provincial boundaries commission. The new bill, Bill C-69, says that, after consultation, the Speaker will name two of the three. After consultation with whom? Obviously with members of the government.

Under the present act, which has now gone back into effect since June 22, the political input of members of the house arises at the end of the process. Under Bill C-69, the political input starts at the beginning of the process because the Speaker of the house is instructed that, after consultation, he will then name two of the three members. The third member is named by the chief justice of the province, and that person becomes the chairman of the commission.

Under Bill C-69, if 20 members of the House of Commons disagree with the choice, they can rise within a certain period in the House of Commons and challenge the Speaker's decision. The ultimate authority of Parliament, the Speaker of the House of Commons, whose decisions on any procedural matter cannot be challenged, is being told that in the Electoral Boundaries Act, as suggested under Bill C-69, "Sir, you are part of cooperating with us to make sure that the majority members on each boundary commission sympathize with our objectives."

Can we envision 20 members in the House of Commons getting up and saying, "Sir, we disagree with those two members or that one member that you named in that province because their approach to electoral boundaries does not identify with ours"? The Speaker of the House of Commons could have a decision of importance overruled. What would be his choice? He would have to resign. He would have no other choice. Under Bill C-69, you are asking us to put the Speaker of the House of Commons in that dreadfully impossible position. We will not be party to that.

• (1520)

We will not get to Bill C-69 because the evidence is overwhelming that this bill has lapsed. The deadline has gone by. The whole debate since Bill C-18 was introduced has been on establishing a deadline. Minister Gray said, "I need two years, but maybe I can bring a new bill within two years," accepting that he had two years to do so.

We suggested the date of February 1995. The government, as Senator Murray pointed out, said, "That is a bit difficult. We will pledge ourselves to try to bring something in before June 22, 1995, otherwise we will be in the situation we are in today."

Bill C-18 is still alive. Bill C-69 has gone by the boards. In any event, I hope we will have expert, independent advice. That of the government, of course, has already been given to us by Senator Fairbairn. I am sure Senator Beaudoin will bring in expert advice that, I have no doubt, will save us the embarrassment of having to pass such a heinous bill as Bill C-69, which is self-serving and of no value to the Canadian public.

Hon. Sharon Carstairs: Honourable senators, is it not amazing that we can debate with such obvious passion a bill that the opposition argues is dead? The bill will go to committee. The committee will debate it. When the committee debates whether this bill is alive or dead, I would ask committee members to remember the following remarks made by Senator Murray on Tuesday, June 14, 1994, when he said:

> Finally, honourable senators, I just want to say this: I think that on a matter of this kind, the elections law and redistribution process, the government should seek the broadest possible consensus among the political parties in the House of Commons. I believe that, for our part, we senators should look favourably upon any bill that enjoys that kind of consensus.

Senator Ghitter, on April 21, 1994, stated:

> Personally, I would have no difficulty with amendments that would allow the bill to go forward, on the understanding that all the work that has been done already by the commissions will not be lost, and also on the understanding that by the time a new election comes about, there will be new boundaries.

Finally, on the same day, Senator Lynch-Staunton stated:

> We have absolutely no objection to a full parliamentary review of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, as long as the next federal election is based on electoral boundaries arising out of the 1991 census.

Honourable senators, Bill C-69 achieves each and every one of those objectives. I hope that we will come back to this house with an order for its speedy passage.

Senator Murray: Perhaps the honourable senator would permit one question. With regard to the consensus in the House of Commons, is Senator Carstairs aware that the message which we received at the eleventh hour on June 21 from the House of Commons had to be rammed through that chamber using closure? Some consensus!

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I would not want to repeat all the speeches I have made on this issue.

[English]

It is to Senator Fairbairn that I should like to make a concrete proposal. While we deliberate time is ticking away. Personally, I feel like Warren Allmand. He cannot come to terms with undoing what he thought we did well under the Pearson and Trudeau governments. I cannot come to terms with undoing what was done by Mr. Pearson. I was there when what was known as the gerrymandering was taking place. Some honourable senators shared that experience.

So be it. However, something is very disturbing. We know now that the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada tabled his eleventh report at 3:12 p.m. on the day on which he was supposed to table his report.

I do not know in what Bill C-69 will result. That is why I was careful last week not to say where I stood in regard to Bill C-69. Does it exist or not? If I had taken a position, the comments Senator Carstairs made a minute ago could well have been addressed to me. How can one speak to something that does not exist?

I wish to say to the government whip, his colleagues and all those who have friends in the government that since last week a deadline has been in place. If Bill C-69 is supposed to die here in the Senate, then members of the other place will have to prepare themselves for a big surprise. I worked on these committees for 30 years.

From the tabling of the report in the House, members have 30 days in which to give notice that they intend to make an ultimate representation. Among the regulations attached to this condition is the proviso that any member can make representation to the committee that will sit when the House sits. That takes into account another 30 days.

However, the first 30 days is now ticking. Any member who wants to make a representation must have the signature of 10 members of the House of Commons. For example, one might say, "I disagree with the electoral map of New Brunswick."

May I say to my esteemed colleague from New Brunswick that I was disturbed when I read the strong minority report made by one of the New Brunswick commissioners involving the loss of a seat to francophone New Brunswickers? This is dramatic.

Honourable senators, I should like to explain this issue once again clearly because I am sure I was not too clear the first time. The Speaker of the House of Commons has received the eleventh report. In the 30 days following the tabling of the report, any member can make an appeal to the committee that will sit when the House sits.

In the past I followed all the rules. I went to court. I went to the committee. I went to the committee on behalf of others. I won some and I lost some.

Let us say that I am a person from New Brunswick and I am unhappy with the map. As one member of the House I must obtain the signatures of any 10 members from any province and state, "I intend to appeal when that committee sits, but there are only 30 days as of last week."

I am afraid that if something bad happens to Bill C-69, members will take their chance. They have nothing to lose. If there is a new bill, if Bill C-69 is okay or if Bill C-69 passes, then they have lost but a few moments of their precious time having said that they intend to go to a committee to make an ultimate representation.

When the House reconvenes in September, they will have to listen to the views expressed by these people who gave notice within the 30 days starting last week.

• (1530)

They will have to give those to the Speaker, who will give them to the Chief Electoral Officer, who will give them to the respective commissions, which will have 30 days to act. That is the 90 days about which some members are talking. They forget that the 30-day time periods are split. Two are joined together, but this one is alone. If they do not move now, they will all be facing the reality that they were negligent or that someone did not keep them informed.

The House of Commons has adjourned for the summer. Senators cannot sign; the act specifically stipulates any 30 members of the House of Commons, not any 30 members of Parliament.

That is my positive approach. It is the duty of the whip to inform the national caucus and others who are interested. If anyone sees virtue in my proposal, they should find 10 members to sign, and give notice that they intend ultimately to appeal to the committee of members of the House of Commons who will study the matter and report back to the commissioner. Luckily, last time most of the representations made by members of the House of Commons were accepted. Some were rejected.

Mine is a humble proposal for the summer. I sat in the House of Commons for 30 years and I know what is going on there. I know that some members are unhappy. Those who are unhappy now may think they will be happy with a new map. Those who are totally happy with the present map — and there are many of those — may end up being totally unhappy with a new map. It is give and take for them.

I will attend the committee studying Bill C-69, albeit as a non-member. I have been involved in this sort of activity for 30 years, and I certainly do not wish to drop out at the end. Come what may, the universe will unfold as it should. In the meantime, someone must bring some sanity to members of the House of Commons and tell them the true realities.

I can tell you openly that they do not know about the ticking of the clock in the last 30 days. If I am proven wrong by esteemed colleagues in the Senate, I will stand corrected, but I do not think I am wrong. If I am wrong, I will not mind apologizing publicly. However, if I am right, something should be done. I have privately given my full agreement to Senator Graham to proceed as he intends today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before proceeding, I want to ensure that all honourable senators understand that Bill C-69 was included in the order of the house that we passed earlier.

CODE OF CONDUCT

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rizzuto:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to develop a Code of Conduct to guide Senators and Members of the House of Commons in reconciling their official responsibilities with their personal interests, including their dealings with lobbyists;

That seven Members of the Senate and fourteen Members of the House of Commons be Members of the Committee;

That the Committee be directed to consult broadly and review the approaches taken with respect to these issues in Canada and in other jurisdictions with comparable systems of government;

That the Committee have the power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have the power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have the power to retain the services of expert, professional, technical and clerical staff;

That the quorum of the Committee be eleven Members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented, and that the Joint Chairpersons be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, whenever six Members are present, so long as both Houses are represented;

That the Committee be empowered to appoint, from among its Members, such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of its power, except the power to report to the Senate and House of Commons;

That the Committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting of any or all of its proceedings;

That the Committee present its final report no later than October 31, 1995;

That, notwithstanding usual practices of this House, if the Senate is not sitting when the final report of the Committee is completed, the report may be deposited with the Clerk of the Senate and it shall thereupon be deemed to have been presented to the Senate; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Marcel Prud'Homme: I have a question on this matter, honourable senators. The motion says "That a Message be sent to the House of Commons." The House of Commons is not sitting. However, it does not stipulate that, even though the House is not sitting, the message will be received, et cetera. I am of the opinion that nothing can start before the House of Commons receives the message from the Senate. I have checked on this, and the majority of my advisers tell me that I am totally right.

Such a message from the Senate must be received by the House of Commons when it is in session. Therefore, we can reserve our judgment as to what we would like to say. I sat on that committee for a year and a half with many honourable senators here. Once again, I stand to be corrected, but I should like to know how we intend to dispose of this matter.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): This is an interesting point raised by Senator Prud'homme. I presume that the procedure would be to ask the Selection Committee of the Senate to meet and name the members of the committee, and to inform the other place. That opportunity will be available when we have Royal Assent for the legislation that we anticipate will require Royal Assent in the near future.

The Hon. the Speaker: I might point out that the message from the House of Commons did name their members; therefore, no further action is required by the House of Commons. Once the Senate names its members, the committee will be constituted.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Final Report of the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide, entitled: "Of Life and Death," tabled in the Senate on June 6, 1995.—(Honourable Senator Keon).

Hon. Wilbert J. Keon: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few remarks concerning the report of the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide which was tabled in the Senate on June 6.

First and foremost, I should like to express my gratitude to the hundreds of Canadian citizens — private individuals, health caregivers, legal, religious and other professional communities — who invested considerable time and effort either to appear before the committee or to prepare submissions to send to us. I believe that the quality of their contributions added a great deal to the deliberations of the committee. The diversity of their views are reflected in the committee's report.

I must congratulate our chairman, Senator Neiman, for the enormous effort she put forward to keep the deliberations focused and make this report possible. Our vice-chair, Senator Lavoie-Roux, also made enormous efforts to reflect the very strongly held convictions of those opposed to changes in the current laws on assisted suicide and euthanasia. This, coupled with the contributions of the committee members, resulted in a very balanced report containing a tremendous amount of information which will make a major contribution to Canadian society.

Indeed, I have had the opportunity of discussing this report at length with medical centres across Canada by teleconference. Health professionals across the country were deeply appreciative of its contents.

The subject-matters of the committee's mandate have become, in recent years, a very significant issue of public and political debate. They are very difficult issues to resolve, and that difficulty was evident both in the testimony and submissions our committee received and in the recommendations the committee members have reported.

The intellectual and emotional struggles involved in this debate surfaced not only among the competing points of view we heard from people across Canada but also, I believe, in the mind of each member of the committee.

• (1540)

Like the justices of the Supreme Court of Canada in their decision on the Sue Rodriguez case, our committee has delivered a split decision on the desirability of decriminalizing assisted suicide and euthanasia. I should like to emphasize that these were not partisan — they were honest and considered decisions arrived at after very careful and lengthy deliberations by each individual member of the committee. The differences of opinion that exist reflect the deep divisions of opinion in Canadian society on these issues. They also suggest that, as the Minister of Justice and other members of Parliament consider these issues in the months and years to come, they will not face an easy task of decision-making.

There is another point I should like to emphasize. Reports in the media have concentrated on the absence of a consensus in the committee on the critical issues of assisted suicide and euthanasia. Very little attention has been given to the unanimous consensus of the committee on a number of other issues which are very important to the public, to patients and to health care professionals. Those issues include withholding and withdrawal of treatment, the regulation of pain control, the practice of sedation, the provision and development of palliative care, and the legal and medical treatment of advance directives or "living wills."

In the case of some of these issues, the committee has simply clarified the legal status of these practices as it has evolved in recent years. That may seem to be a minor accomplishment, but I assure you that many medical practitioners will view that clarification as a welcome relief. In other instances, the committee has identified a need for policy and practice guidelines and has suggested that those guidelines or regulations should be standardized throughout Canada. Again, I can assure you that the health care community and patients would welcome clear policy directives from their ministries of health and clear practice guidelines from their governing bodies on these issues that surround the end of human life.

On the core issues of assisted suicide and euthanasia, the committee members have agreed to disagree with respect to each other's views and reasoning. We have disagreed also in recognition of — and reflecting — the serious divisions of opinion we heard from the public and within medical, legal, religious and other professional communities.

My own views, like those of my colleagues on the committee, are complex. In supporting assisted suicide under carefully regulated circumstances, I am contradicting my own moral and religious beliefs on this subject. My own beliefs would not allow me to commit suicide or to assist suicide, but as a member of the Senate committee, I feel obliged to reflect the views of what I judge to be the large majority of the Canadian public.

In the case of assisted suicide, I feel that several considerations should be taken into account. First, we heard repeatedly that approximately 5 per cent of dying patients experience physical pain that cannot be relieved by palliative care. Others experience pain of a different sort: emotional or psychological. We must ask whether or not we can legitimately deny the validity of their wishes or deny them their own autonomy. I have a concern also about the legal status or position of members of the health care community in the face of clearly stated and rationally defined wishes of a patient.

In light of those considerations and the apparent fact that assisted suicide does take place, I have concluded that assisted suicide should no longer be prohibited under the provisions of the Criminal Code. I do not take that decision lightly and I feel strongly that any future practice of assisted suicide should be carefully monitored and should be subject to strict guidelines, as the committee's minority has recommended in the report.

On the other hand, I cannot support the decriminalization of voluntary euthanasia. I believe that our society must move slowly and carefully in changing the law on these issues. We should proceed one step at a time with a careful assessment of the results of the first step and any subsequent steps we take. In the case of assisted suicide, the principal agent of death is the dying person — him or herself. The patient retains final control over the situation and has the opportunity at the last moment to change his or her mind. I believe that appropriate and effective controls can be put in place to ensure that. I am not convinced that the same controls would effectively prevent abuses if we were to relax the law on voluntary euthanasia.

I fully acknowledge the concerns of other members that if assisted suicide is decriminalized and not voluntary euthanasia, the result may be an infringement on section 15, the equality provision in the Charter, since it would discriminate against those who are physically incapable of committing assisted suicide and, thus, not afford them the option to choose the time and manner of their death.

There are those who feel strongly that assisted suicide could be proceeded with immediately, independent of euthanasia, in the interests of those who meet these guidelines — and since the guidelines would obviously be quite narrow in any event and exclude large numbers of people. I believe that assisted suicide should be legalized under controlled circumstances.

Honourable senators, these are very difficult issues which will continue to call for much searching of souls by Canadians not only privately and publicly but also individually and collectively. I should like to conclude my remarks by urging the decision makers who regulate medical practices, both in government and in professional associations, to act quickly on the many recommendations, apart from euthanasia and assisted suicide, on which our committee has reached consensus and has given direction.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, it seems that instead of thanking the Speaker, one is supposed to thank one's honourable colleagues. This habit of mine probably goes back to the time when I was in the House of Commons. In any case, I want to thank the Speaker for recognizing me.

I do not have a prepared text, but this was a deliberate decision. After spending 15 months or so on the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide, I saw no need to sit down and write a speech. I feel I have a good grasp of the subject–matter, and I should have no trouble speaking "off the cuff." I will not keep you any longer than necessary this afternoon.

However, I first want to join the other senators who spoke in thanking Senator Neiman for the way she led the committee in its work and also Senator Thérèse Lavoie-Roux who showed remarkable diligence in her efforts to clarify the issues.

Incidentally, when I was a member of the House of Commons, I did at some point consider presenting a private member's bill to give the House of Commons an opportunity to discuss this question. Over the years, other members did so, which is entirely to their credit. I think it is the first time in Canada's history that one of our two Houses of Parliament decided to proceed with a more or less exhaustive study of the issues of assisted suicide and euthanasia.

I approached both subjects with a relatively open mind. Like everybody else, I have my own opinions, my legacy of moral values, beliefs and experience, but I also have a great deal of respect for the opinions of others. This exercise was in many ways very satisfying from a personal point of view. I got to know my colleagues and other members of the committee in a way I would not have otherwise.

In the heat of the debate, we all at some point let our emotions come to the surface. There was a lot of intensity and conviction in the arguments we heard, both for and against the various issues that came up for discussion. I really appreciated this opportunity to meet well-known figures in the legal and medical professions and people from all walks of life. On the committee I was probably the member with the least experience in this area.

One thing struck me during the initial weeks when witnesses appeared before the committee. There seemed to be something missing from the debate. There was a kind of vacuum. Implicit in the motion referred to our committee was the assumption that one could be either for or against. What about the middle ground? Of course, we wanted to examine all the ethical, moral and political aspects of the question. Was there no middle ground that would satisfy the most ardent supporters of euthanasia as well as its opponents?

It is after hearing one witness after another tell us about the value and the potential of palliative care that I finally made up my mind as a member of the committee. Even though Senator Thérèse Lavoie-Roux, among others, was kind enough to give me credit for writing the chapter on palliative care, I cannot take that credit because, ultimately, it is René Leduc, a researcher whom I hired, who did all the work, who contacted all the provinces, who made numerous phone calls, who reviewed all kinds of documents, and who analyzed the witnesses' position on the issue of palliative care.

It soon became obvious that our country is far from providing the quality of palliative care its citizens could expect. I think that members of the committee pretty well agree on that: we can do better, given the resources already available in the institutional, medical and volunteer sectors.

Since I just alluded to volunteer work, I should add that, if it were not for volunteers, Canada would be lagging behind a whole lot more as regards palliative care. Canadians give from the heart. Hundreds and even thousands of people freely give their time, day and night, to help the sick. It is thanks to these people that our country can take pride in the fact that it has a palliative care network which, albeit limited, is still the envy of many other countries. There is a lot to do. I am personally convinced that through a better allocation of the available fiscal and financial resources, we could dramatically improve palliative care provided to the terminally ill.

Be that as it may, I must tell you something which I should have told you when the final version of the report was being drafted. I actually intended to do so, but I missed the last week of the work of the committee. I can only blame myself for this delay, but I still want to distance myself from the unanimous opinion or recommendation to the effect that the Minister of Justice should consider establishing a third degree of murder which, I want to make it clear, was one of our recommendations. That third degree includes murders committed for compassionate reasons, which would be subject to a reduced penalty.

I think that if there is "compassion" in the commission of a murder, the jury and the judge will take it into consideration. However, I believe that establishing a third category of murder would be inviting some individuals to use what is ultimately a subsequent defence as a motive to commit a murder, something which would result in reduced respect for life.

I apologize to my colleagues, as well as to the chair, vice-chair and members of the committee, for not stating that opinion during the review of the report. I was not there during the last week. I had intended to raise this issue. However, since I was absent, I missed the opportunity to do so. I want first and foremost to be able to live in peace with my conscience. This is why I make this statement today.

The recommendations made by the majority in the report are mine in every respect, except as regards the issue to which I just referred.

I have no intention of repeating everything that was said in the report. The report is very well written in both official languages. It was a hard task, since it was pioneer work. We had to agree on definitions. We had to focus on each term. That was not easy.

All in all, the majority's decision is also mine. It is my point of view. To reporters who ask me what I think of the report and what is my position, I could answer that they need only read the report, from the beginning to the end, including the appendices, and conclude that wherever there is some mention of the majority's point of view, it is also mine. I do not have anything to add.

I noted that the Prime Minister was quoted in La Presse, maybe through someone else, as saying that if the government were to decide to propose such a committee of the House of Commons, that committee should consider some areas our committee did not examine because it lacked the time or the resources.

There is one area, in particular, about which I am not satisfied. I do not believe that, at this point in time, serious and detailed studies have been done on the nature of physical and moral suffering. This is an issue that has bothered me throughout our work.

As I said to the committee, it seems that, at times, nature is generous enough not to make death such a painful experience for everyone. We were told that for 5 per cent of all dying patients, the pain cannot be controlled because there is no medication, no remedy and no solution available.

Sometimes, I think mental pain is worse than physical pain. Some people die as they lived and do not accept death. For them, death is the ultimate defeat. In a moment of despair, they suffer horribly, I am sure. No one here has gone through that. Very often, it is not the dying patient but the people who support him or her who suffer the most.

This is why I think we should undertake more comprehensive studies and research on the phenomena of physical and mental pain. Supportive care to dying patients, which is part, of course, of any good palliative care program, is also significant and must be taken into account. Evidence has shown that dying patients given support towards the end of their lives accept death more easily. This area deserves further examination.

We did not travel outside the country, and I think it would have been useful for the committee, if it had been authorized to do so, to go to the Netherlands. The committee should have met with the researchers who carried out the study on euthanasia in the State of New York. I think it would have been useful for the committee to meet with the British Lords who examined this issue. We should also have invited or met other foreign personalities and politicians not only to compare our studies but also to share our personal experiences. Finally, these are all matters a House of Commons committee could consider and examine thoroughly.

Having said that, I think the public debate Senator Neiman wished for has now been initiated, and very well indeed. The report has been very well received by most commentators, even if it has been sharply criticized by some. That comes as no surprise to me, because those people are really not open-minded. They have but one thing in mind, their own objectives. They refuse to try to understand other people's views. However, that is part of our political experience. We can never please everybody.

I take this opportunity to tell Senator Neiman and Senator Thérèse Lavoie-Roux once again that I greatly appreciated their leadership, even if they held opposite views. Out of the clash of ideas came, if not light, at least very useful information. I think that by undertaking this work we did a great service to this country. I wish the best of luck to those who, in the future, will have to deal with this fundamental issue.

On motion of Senator Neiman, debate adjourned.

STATE OF CANADIAN FINANCIAL SYSTEM

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the eighteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce with respect to its study of the state of the financial system in Canada, presented in the Senate on June 15, 1995.

Hon. John Sylvain: Honourable senators, I move that the report be adopted.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

CANADA COUNCIL

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Corbin, calling the attention of the Senate to the virtually unanimous opposition of artistic and cultural groups to the announced closing of the Canada Council's Art Bank. — (Honourable Senator Roux).

Hon. Pierre De Bané: Honourable senators, as our esteemed colleague Senator Roux is not with us this afternoon, I would like to say a few words on this matter. Here are a few comments that I respectfully submit to your attention following Senator Corbin's remarks on the Canada Council's decision to shut down its art bank.

I do not wish to comment on the validity of the Canada Council's decision, nor do I want to talk about the merits of the Art Bank, the benefits that Canadian visual artists can derive from it, or its role to make art lovers mainly, but also Canadians in general, more aware of Canadian art.

I would like to open up the debate a bit by talking briefly about two aspects of the issue. First, I would like to talk about the difficult situation now faced by the senior management of our great national cultural institutions because of the budget cuts made following the tabling of Minister Martin's Estimates for the 1995-96 fiscal year. Also I would like to say a few words about the role and responsibility of governments — especially the federal government — in arts and culture. I will be dealing mainly with the Canada Council, although all our great cultural institutions are currently in the same difficult situation. I might add that the Canada Council is probably better off than the others.

It must be pointed out that the current situation is not a recent phenomenon; it goes back a long way.

Since 1987-88, parliamentary appropriations for the Canada Council have gone down 22.8 per cent in real terms — what is commonly referred to as constant dollars — once inflation is factored in.

The latest cuts, of course, go back to the beginning of this year. This is a brutal fact cultural agency heads and boards of directors or governors must face. If I may, I would say that they have to face the music and make decisions that "hurt." At the Canada Council, these include closure of the Art Bank. At the CBC, they are leading to the laying off of thousands of employees and the closure of the library in Montreal, an essential resource for creative artists. At the National Arts Centre, they have resulted in the elimination of the positions of the directors of dance and of both English and French theatre, and hence the cancellation of three seasons of dance and theatre to make way for multidisciplinary festivals and commercial productions. At Telefilm Canada, these decisions include the end of assistance to regional film festivals, such as the Témiscamingue film festival, in favour of the major festivals, such as those in Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver. At the NFB, this means that regional film libraries will be closed and their collections turned over to public libraries. I have been told that so far it has been possible to protect production and creative artists, but this will probably not last in the years to come.

The nature of the decisions made is open to challenge, but not the need to make them. This is the result of the alarming financial situation Canada and the provinces are in. It is the unfortunate side effect of the reduction in parliamentary appropriations for these major cultural agencies. Such cuts can elicit two responses. The first is the following: Performers and creative artists in the cultural sector are just like everybody else and, like all Canadians, must also feel the effects of the crisis.

Social programs have been hit; hospitals are closing; tens of thousands of jobs are being cut in the public service and in the private sector. There can, however, be another response.

Last week, at the monthly dinner of the friends of Cité libre —which I attended with Senator Gigantès, who is here — I listened to the speech made by Judith Maxwell, who is the president of the Canadian research network on public policy, a renowned analyst of socio-economic issues, as well as the former chairperson of the Economic Council of Canada.

Her presentation was entitled "Fiscal Deficit — Social Deficit." This title reminds me of Senator Gigantès' report on the same issue. Mrs. Maxwell argued, among other things, that the fiscal deficit generates a social deficit and that it is dangerous to deal with the former while ignoring the latter since it could make things worse.

Mrs. Maxwell mentioned the following problems as symptoms of our social deficit: the school drop-out phenomenon, the unemployment rate — the issue reviewed by Senator Gigantès — growing economic uncertainty, personal distress and the collapse of the family unit. In my opinion, she forgot one of the most important symptoms, namely the deterioration of the quality and the status of arts and culture.

I have previously stressed the importance of artistic and cultural environment to our society. Senator Roux, who probably speaks with more authority than most of us on the subject, has said that culture and the arts are the oxygen, lungs, and heart, the vital organs of any society. Senator Roux made it clear that culture is what gives the country its soul.

When we travel abroad, we are interested in a country's cultural achievements. When we go to Italy, for instance, we remember its historic monuments, works of art, and so forth. That is what gives the country its soul.

Without the arts, without culture, society runs a deficit. Governments, and especially the federal government, should bear in mind this aspect of our social deficit when they set their priorities. Who knows, perhaps arts and culture will be spared the frenzy of government cost cutting across the board.

I believe, finally, that we need culture as much as the food we eat and the air we breathe. In the end, performers and creative artists are the ones who can best express a country's soul.

Honourable senators, I will stop here. However, having discussed this with my colleagues Senators Corbin and Grafstein, I believe that it would be in order to strike a special Senate committee with the mandate to study these essential issues. Next fall, it is quite possible that we will suggest such a committee by calling on a few of our colleagues across the way because, in these important matters, all partisanship must be avoided.

I regret that our esteemed colleague Senator Roux, who speaks with more authority than most us us on the subject, is not with us today. I hope that he will be able to speak as soon as possible on this inquiry by Senator Corbin.

On motion of Senator Hébert, debate adjourned.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE LATE DR. GEORGE JOHNSON

TRIBUTES

Hon. Sharon Carstairs: Honourable senators, it is with sadness that I rise tonight to pay tribute to George Johnson, who died on Saturday in Gimli, Manitoba, at the age of 74.

George Johnson was a former Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba. He was a provincial cabinet minister for many years, serving as Minister of Health and Welfare and Minister of Education in a Progressive Conservative government.

Dr. Johnson, who was a medical doctor, pioneered welfare reforms in the province of Manitoba. He helped to implement medicare. He was the Minister of Health, and he expanded the use of French in the public schools of that province.

Dr. Johnson's term of office as Lieutenant Governor coincided with the time that I sat in the Manitoba legislature, and I enjoyed the warmth of his hospitality and that of his wife on many occasions. He was essentially a shy man who was not comfortable speaking in public, despite his career in politics. He was always polite, and he conducted himself with great humanness, great spirit, and incredible dignity.

His illness began when he was in office, but despite his failing health, he never shirked his duties. Even at the end when the government delayed the appointment of a successor, he struggled on each and every day.

During his presentation of the Speech from the Throne, he always spoke some words in French. That was achieved with great difficulty, because this other language did not come naturally to him. He used to smile and say later that he always spoke much better when he was in the privacy of his office — or more particularly, in his bathroom. That is an experience with which many of us who learn a second language are familiar.

He was a wonderful representative of the Queen and a very good representative for my province. I extend my deepest sympathy to his wife Doris, with whom he would have celebrated his fiftieth wedding anniversary later this year, his five children — including, of course, our own Senator Janis Johnson — and their families. I share my sorrow with all Manitobans, who will miss this very fine man, and in particular the members of the Icelandic community, of which he was very proud to have been a part.

Hon. Terry Stratton: I, too, rise to speak about our beloved former Lieutenant Governor who has just passed away. Senator Carstairs has spoken eloquently of his background with respect to his professional life. Dr. George Johnson was also a great family man who had five children. The strength of a man, or the strength of his family, is usually measured by the success of the children of that family. All of their children have been highly successful; all of their children are very close, and I am sure they will miss their father terribly.

Over the years I have known him, he was always warm and friendly, but shy. He was a very humble man who did a lot for Manitoba over the years. He set a standard that we should all try to emulate of high principle, honour and integrity. That is the true measure of any man, or any woman, in the end. Tonight, I pay tribute to that integrity and to the integrity of his family.

CONVENTION OF WORLD PARLIAMENTARIANS ON TIBET

SECOND CONFERENCE HELD IN VILNIUS, LITHUANIA

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, the second Convention of World Parliamentarians on Tibet was held from May 25 to 27, 1995, in Vilnius, Lithuania, a country which only a few years ago became independent after 50 years of occupation. I was one of over 80 parliamentarians from 21 countries who participated.

The conference unanimously supported the efforts of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan government in exile to engage the Chinese government in a meaningful dialogue, without preconditions, to address the issue of Tibet.

The participants passed a number of resolutions, including one to mount a legal challenge through international bodies to China's claim to Tibet, and a resolution to request that China invite a delegation of international parliamentarians to travel to China and Tibet on a fact-finding mission. The delegation would also travel to Dharmsala, India, to meet with the Tibetan Government in exile, and then report its findings to the other nations.

The conference heard about the continuing human rights abuses in Tibet by the Chinese army and the denial of fundamental freedoms of Tibetan men, women and children.

Later this year, I will bring to the attention of the Senate details of the conference and the continued struggle of Tibetans to regain their freedom.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY

INTERIM REPORT ON FARM SAFETY AND FARM-RELATED HEALTH ISSUES TABLED

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I rise under this order of business to advise honourable senators that on June 30, 1995, the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry tabled with the Clerk of the Senate the ninth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry entitled "Farm Machinery: Lost Lives, Lost Limbs." As provided for in an order of the Senate, copies of the report have been distributed to all senators' offices as of June 30, 1995.

I ask that this matter be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Hays, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL (FEDERAL AGENCIES)

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Lowell Murray, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report:

Tuesday, July 11, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

SIXTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-65, An Act to reorganize and dissolve certain federal agencies, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, June 27, 1995, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

LOWELL MURRAY, P.C.
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): At the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, perhaps I might be allowed to ask a question of the chair of the committee.

The chairman will recall that I put a question to officials on Bill C-65 respecting a living allocation provided for the Director of the Canada Council as well as a living allocation for the Commissioner of Official Languages in lieu of moving expenses from their regular place of residence to Ottawa. We had a commitment from the official, if not the minister who was also present, that an answer would be forthcoming.

I would not be disposed to proceed with further consideration of this bill unless we have answers to those questions, which were promised to us. I wonder if the chairman has, in the interim, received information to that effect.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I recall the questions put by my honourable friend to Mr. Massé and his officials. I have not received any documentation from the government since the date of our meeting, but I will be in touch with government officials with a view to obtaining whatever information they committed to provide. I shall do so before the third reading debate takes place.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I do not wish to interfere in the proceedings, but I should like to point out that when bills are reported without amendment, they are not subject to debate or questions. Questions should be raised at third reading when the bill is before the Senate for consideration.

On motion of Senator Graham, bill placed on Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT RETIRING ALLOWANCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Lowell Murray, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report:

Tuesday, July 11, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

SEVENTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-85, An Act to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act and to provide for the continuation of a certain provision, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, June 27, 1995, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

LOWELL MURRAY, P.C.
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Lowell Murray, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report:

Tuesday, July 11, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

EIGHTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-82, An Act to amend the Royal Canadian Mint Act, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, June 27, 1995, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

LOWELL MURRAY, P.C.
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that we consider this bill later this day.

If I may, I wish to add one explanatory note on the volume of the legislation before us.

With respect to those bills on which honourable senators wish to participate in debate, we are prepared to move, with leave, that they be read later this evening save for one particular report. I discussed this with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, and there seems to be agreement.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Graham, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(b), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Dan Hays, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, presented the following report:

Tuesday, July 11, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee Agriculture and Forestry has the honour to present its

TENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-92, An Act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, June 27, 1995, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

DANIEL HAYS,
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Hays, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT BILL, 1995

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON MOTION AND MESSAGE FROM HOUSE OF COMMONS PRESENTED

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Tuesday, July 11, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

FOURTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the motion of the Honourable Senator Graham, dated June 28, 1995, relating to certain amendments to Bill C-69, An Act to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions and the readjustment of electoral boundaries, and the Message from the House of Commons on the same subject, dated June 20, 1995, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference dated June 28, 1995, examined the said motion and Message and now reports as follows:

The Committee heard testimony from the Honourable Herb Gray, Solicitor General and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, and from Mr. Jean-Pierre Kingsley, Canada's Chief Electoral Officer. The Honourable Herb Gray was accompanied by his Parliamentary Secretary, Peter Milliken, by Mary Dawson, Counsel, and by Professor Beverley Baines of Queen's University.

Mr. Gray said that the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Suspension Act (former Bill C-18) ceased to have effect on June 22, 1995, in accordance with its section 2(2). One purpose of Bill C-69 is to repeal that statute and the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (R.S.C. 1985, ch. E-3). Bill C-69 aims at establishing a new procedure for the readjustment of electoral boundaries. It contains no date for coming into force.

Professor Baines stated that the courts do not become involved in the passage of legislation, as confirmed by the decisions in Native Women's Association of Canada v. Canada [1994] 3 S.C.R. 627 and Reference re Canada Assistance Plan (B.C.) [1991] 2 S.C.R. 525. She corroborated the Minister's statements and expressed the view that Bill C-69 is still on the Order Paper. The courts interpret statutes on the basis of their wording.

Jean-Pierre Kingsley, Chief Electoral Officer, underlined potential difficulties should there be an overlap between the current readjustment regime, as set out in the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, and Bill C-69, if the bill were to be passed later, in the fall. Because of the wording of Clause 35 of Bill C-69, he did not rule out the possibility of legal proceedings against decisions he may have to make in this regard.

In light of this testimony, the Committee feels that some issues remain obscure, specifically: 1) the legislative process that led to the debate on Bill C-69; 2) the intention of the government expressed in the House of Commons and the Senate in May, June and July of this year; 3) the repeal of earlier statutes by Bill C-69; 4) the nature of the validity of action taken under the previous legislation and the scope of section 43 of the Interpretation Act;, and 5) the possible effect of Bill C-69 on Section 51 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

Consequently, the Committee recommends that these issues be examined in depth and that the Committee hold further hearings.

Respectfully submitted,

GÉRALD-A. BEAUDOIN,
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Graham, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

CRIMINAL CODE YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Tuesday, July 11, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

FIFTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-104, An Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Young Offenders Act (forensic DNA analysis), has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, June 27, 1995, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment, but with one observation.

The Committee is concerned with the question of the right of the person from whom the sample is to be taken to have counsel present when the warrant is executed. The Committee requests that the Government give consideration to this matter in the near future.

Respectfully submitted,

GÉRALD-A. BEAUDOIN,
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK OF CANADA BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. John Sylvain: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the twentieth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which deals with Bill C-91, to continue the Federal Business Development Bank under the name of the Business Development Bank of Canada.

I ask that this report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day, and that it from part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Sylvain: Honourable senators, I had some remarks to make on this matter, but I am a little confused about your directives, Your Honour, and what Senator Graham said. Should I make the remarks now or wait until later?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, according to our rules, remarks on a report should be made on third reading. However, if it is the wish of the Senate that you be heard now, that is up to the Senate to determine.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, Deputy Leader of the Government: Honourable senators, we are prepared, with agreement and with leave, to proceed later this day on this particular legislation.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, Senator Graham proposes that leave be granted for later this day. If it is convenient, then you could make your comments at that time, Senator Sylvain.

Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Graham, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT
CHILDREN'S SPECIAL ALLOWANCES ACT
UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, presented the following report:

Tuesday, July 11, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to present its

TENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-54, An Act to amend the Old Age Security Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Children's Special Allowances Act and the Unemployment Insurance Act, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of June 27, 1995, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment, but with the following recommendations:

The Committee is concerned that individuals, and especially elderly people, seeking information from the Department of Human Resources Development frequently find the process confusing and difficult. The introduction of new technologies such as automated telephone answering services tends to exacerbate the problem for some people. This new technology should be evaluated to determine how well it meets the needs of elderly people, particularly those who are disabled. The Committee believes that it is important to provide information to clients as effectively as possible.

Your Committee therefore recommends that measures be taken to ensure that the information provided to clients be readily available and easily accessible. It further recommends that periodic evaluations be conducted to assess the effectiveness of information provision services and that changes be made where necessary to rectify problems uncovered by such evaluations. A special effort should be made to ensure that technologies such as automated telephone answering services are as easy to use as possible and that clients who require personalized assistance have prompt access to such assistance.

Respectfully submitted,

M. LORNE BONNELL,
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Bonnell, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

AUTOMATED WEATHER OBSERVATION SYSTEMS

ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES—INTERIM REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources tabled its seventeenth report with the Clerk of the Senate on Wednesday, July 5, 1995, as authorized by the Senate on June 28, 1995.

The interim report, entitled "Pull Up! Pull Up!" deals with the safety implications of automated weather observation systems, otherwise known as AWOS.

A revised version of that interim report was also tabled with the Clerk of the Senate earlier today, July 11, 1995.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Kenny, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION

FIFTH REPORT PRESENTED

Hon. Jacques Hébert, Chairman of the Committee of Selection, presented the following report:

Tuesday, July 11, 1995

The Committee of Selection has the honour to present its

FIFTH REPORT

Pursuant to rule 85(1)(b) and the order adopted by the Senate on June 28, 1995, your Committee submits herewith the list of Senators nominated by it to serve on the Special Joint Committee on a Code of Conduct:

The Honourable Senators Angus, Bacon, Di Nino, Gauthier, Oliver, Spivak and Stollery.

Respectfully submitted,

JACQUES HÉBERT,
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(g), I move that this report be adopted later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I have no objection, but provided, if this is feasible, one or more senators are able to comment on this report before it is adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, there will certainly be an opportunity to comment later today, when the report is taken into consideration.

Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration later this day.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(h), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, July 12, 1995 at 1:30 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

LEASE OF PREMISES IN SYDNEY, NOVA SCOTIA— INTERVENTION OF MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. Some of us — even Nova Scotians, accustomed as we are to certain practices — are being left somewhat in awe at the speed with which Minister Dingwall seems to be getting around these days. Dealing with roads was obviously not enough for him, so now he has involved himself with the Canada Post Corporation.

Honourable senators, Minister Dingwall is, apparently, involved in a plan to scrap a lease which was signed with a Sydney business person last December for a new post office in Sydney, and to enter into a new lease with an individual who, to my knowledge, would be of somewhat better liking to Mr. Dingwall and Mr. Dingwall's party.

Given the continuing game of patronage pinball, can the leader give us some insight as to what justification her colleague may have given to cabinet colleagues for such a blatant political intervention and manipulation of otherwise arms-length contracts?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Forrestall may be aware that the chief executive officer of Canada Post Corporation has released a statement to the media on the situation in Sydney. He was asked by the minister to review the situation. He did so and came to the conclusion that proper consultation had not taken place in the initial contract to which my friend refers.

Canada Post Corporation is in the process of negotiating a different arrangement. Also, the minister himself has asked for a third-party review of this whole incident. A review will be carried out by Price Waterhouse of the circumstances surrounding the signing of the original lease. The results are expected by next week.

Senator Forrestall: I have no difficulty with Price Waterhouse being assigned to this task, but I do have difficulty understanding these practices.

How long must we wait for this report? Will it be presented during the next few weeks when the Senate and the House of Commons are not sitting?

We recognize the discrepancy in the amounts paid by Canada Post for space, the lease for which was cancelled. Can the leader supply to us similar quotations respecting the new space in the building?

Would she also determine whether the new price, which I hear is somewhat lower, includes the cost of certain work to turn what used to be an IGA grocery store into a functional post office? Who will pay those costs?

Senator Fairbairn: I would be pleased to seek that detailed information. I should also say to Senator Forrestall that, as far as I am aware, the Price Waterhouse review should be done by next Monday.

Senator Forrestall: This is rather short notice, but could the leader make available to us by tomorrow the terms of reference of that review?

Senator Fairbairn: I will make no promises, honourable senators. I will do my best.

HUMAN RIGHTS

ARREST OF ACTIVIST IN CHINA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, over the past few months we have been advised of the government's new approach to expressing our concerns for human rights in various countries through a process of quiet diplomacy.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: Does the Government of Canada, using this new system, have any concern over the arrest in China of Harry Wu, a well-known human rights activist? If so, has it expressed that concern?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will seek information on that matter.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

EXTENSION OF CONTRACT ON LEASES—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON MEMBERS OF CONSORTIUM

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, I have just learned that the Minister of Public Works has apparently intervened in another issue related to the Canada Post Corporation. Sources tell me that the minister has instructed the properties and leases division of Canada Post Corporation, to extend the contract of the consortium which handles the properties from three to seven years, and that this will increase the contract price from $150 million to $350 million.

Would the leader provide us with the identity of the newest member of the consortium and his ties to the Minister of Public Works?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I will take my friend's question as notice and try to obtain that information.

Senator Comeau: While she is attempting to find that information, would the leader also look into the allegation that the fourth member will receive 7 per cent of the contract which has now been increased to $350 million?

Senator Fairbairn: I will make enquiries in that regard.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR NEWLY APPOINTED AMBASSADOR TO ISRAEL AND CYPRUS TO APPEAR BEFORE COMMITTEE

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, my question is addressed to the very able Chairman of our Foreign Affairs Committee, Senator John B. Stewart.

I have reserved comment tonight on the appointment of an ex-colleague of ours from the House of Commons as ambassador to Israel. As the honourable senator knows, from time to time, the House of Commons can call before one of its committees any appointee. Would it not be advisable to call the new ambassador as a witness before the Foreign Affairs Committee in order to entertain an interesting exchange with him as to his views on the Middle East in general and, in particular, the very sensitive area to which he has been appointed? The ambassador to Israel is also ambassador to Cyprus, something which seems to have gone unnoticed by the press.

Would the Honourable Senator Stewart consider the possibility of calling him as a witness so that we can talk to him about his views and see if his views have changed over the years? In this way we can find out how he intends to fulfil his very difficult assignment for Canada.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, the Foreign Affairs Committee has two references from the Senate before it. One relates to trade, particularly in the Western Hemisphere. The other relates to Canada's relations with European countries. Without making a detailed analysis of the reference, at first glance it would appear that the committee is not under instruction from the Senate to take up the matter to which the honourable senator has referred.

Senator Prud'homme: Honourable senators, we know that Israel is not considered to be part of Europe, even though the world may develop that way some day. We now hear that they would like to be an associate member of NATO. However, Cyprus has made strong representations to be admitted to the concept of the European nations. Perhaps by using that request as an angle we could call the new ambassador to Israel before the committee.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I am really repeating my answer. Insofar as I can recall the words of the reference from the Senate that is now before the committee, it would require an extraordinarily wide interpretation to permit the committee to undertake the kind of work to which the honourable senator makes reference. However, I shall turn up the reference and pass it on to the Honourable Senator Prud'homme so that he can see if, by a most ingenious interpretation, he can justify the committee undertaking such a task.

Senator Prud'homme: I may have some consultations with a former Minister of Foreign Affairs who is a member of the Senate. He was a great master of finding solutions of that kind. He is very knowledgeable of the region and has been consulted in the past as to Canada's relationship with the Middle East. Perhaps if we put our brains together, we may find an angle.

We know that St. Paul was converted on the road to Damascus. I will not give up the possibility of learning from our new ambassador firsthand what is going on in the Middle East. Perhaps he will become an extraordinarily good ambassador to the two groups of people who share that land.

BANK OF CANADA—PAY INCREASES TO OFFICIALS

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, my question is addressed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Canadians discovered recently that at least four Deputy Governors of the Bank of Canada, and one who retired last year, had been granted substantial increases in salary. On average, those increases amounted to approximately $12,000 a year for each one.

At the time, the Minister of Finance declared himself very surprised that such increases had been granted. We heard on TV that night that he rushed to call the Governor of the Bank of Canada, insisting that the increases be rolled back. Obviously, that was done.

Being a cabinet minister, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us if the suspension of these pay increases was made retroactively?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot answer that question. I will endeavour to get an answer for my honourable friend. As he has noted, the increases were very quickly withdrawn by the governor of the bank and the board.

Senator Simard: Will the Leader of the Government also confirm that the Privy Council Office directed an increase for the governor himself in 1993 or 1994? Surely, that should not have surprised Mr. Martin. I am sure that Senator Fairbairn was there when cabinet approved the increase. Why are things so good for the governor, whose salary has tripled in the last decade? His salary range now goes up to $269,000. Why did the government not say no to this increase? Why did the government approve it?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I am sure my friend would not wish me to discuss anything that might go on in the confines of cabinet.

In the case of the Governor of the Bank of Canada, the process for his remuneration is different from the process utilized for the deputy governors to whom my friend referred earlier. Their situation was dealt with by the board of the bank. I will try to find out a bit more detail for my friend on the governor.

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, my point is this: When the public became aware of this situation, it was almost as if there was a crisis. The government found itself in an awful position, having asked Canadians to live with no increases for the last decade. Yet, it granted to the governor a 10 per cent increase in the previous year. Why did the government not ensure that all increases were rolled back?

We know that the Senior Deputy Minister of Finance was at that meeting when the board of governors decided to grant themselves these increases. Surely, Mr. Martin must be on speaking terms with his deputy minister. If not, he should be fired. If the deputy minister keeps such information from his minister, I suggest he should be fired. What does the leader think of my suggestion?

• (2050)

Why does Mr. Martin not level with people and tell the truth? If he is unable to tell the whole truth on this dossier, I am sure that the Leader of the Government in the Senate will do so once and for all.

Senator Fairbairn: I can assure my honourable friend that to the best of my ability I always try to tell the truth, especially in answering questions from him, and that I always find his observations extremely interesting, although I do not always agree with them.

Senator MacEachen: Speak for yourself.

Senator Fairbairn: In response to the question regarding Mr. Martin, he did make it clear at the time that he was not aware of the increases. I will, as always, ensure that my honourable friend's questions and observations are directed to the colleagues to whom he would like them to be directed.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a number of delayed answers. I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on March 21, 1994, by the Honourable Senator John Lynch-Staunton regarding the International Space Station Program: status of Canada's commitment. I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on March 2, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Pat Carney regarding the automation of weather stations. I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on March 22, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Duncan J. Jessiman regarding the disbandment of the Canadian Airborne Regiment. I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on March 22, 1995, by the Honourable Senator A. Raynell Andreychuk regarding an inquiry into the activities of the Canadian Airborne Regiment. I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on May 23, 1995, by the Honourable Gerald J. Comeau regarding the Federal-Provincial Strategic Highway Improvement Program. I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on May 24, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Jean-Claude Rivest regarding gun control. I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on May 24, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Lowell Murray regarding gun control legislation. I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on May 24, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Ron Ghitter regarding gun control. I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on May 24, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Gerry St. Germain regarding gun control. I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on May 25, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Lowell Murray regarding federal-provincial agreements currently in force. I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on May 25, 1995, by the Honourable Senator David Tkachuk regarding the Federal-Provincial Strategic Highway Improvement Program. I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on May 25, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Ethel Cochrane regarding the decline in university applications. I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on June 5, 1995, by the Honourable Senator John Buchanan regarding the Federal-Provincial Strategic Highway Improvement Program. I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on June 5, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Pierre Claude Nolin regarding NATO, respect of human rights as a condition of continuing membership. I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on June 6, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Richard J. Doyle regarding the refusal of airlines to negotiate discounts with the Government of Canada. I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on June 7, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Fernand Roberge regarding the effect of the enforcement provision of agreement on internal trade implementation bill on interprovincial trade. I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on June 21, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Gerald Comeau regarding proposed toll booths in Nova Scotia. I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on June 27, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Forrestall regarding the Federal-Provincial Strategic Highway Improvement Program.

THE BUDGET

INTERNATIONAL SPACE STATION PROGRAM— STATUS OF CANADA'S COMMITMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION— REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

(Response to question raised by Hon. John Lynch-Staunton on March 21, 1994)

The Government cannot shed any light on how President Clinton was personally informed of our intention to negotiate an orderly reduction in our involvement in the Space Station or when the President was made aware.

In the lead-up to the 1994 Budget there had been media speculation that Canada might withdraw from the Space Station project. The Minister of Finance made it clear that everything was on the table for consideration in the Government's endeavours to reduce the deficit. Following the United States redesign, which increased Canadian costs, there had been ongoing negotiations with the U.S. on Canada's role in the Space Station and an expectation that these discussions would continue after the Budget.

As acknowledged in the Government's answer to the Senate on March 17, 1994, discussions with the U.S. prior to the Budget addressed the issue of how to best achieve substantial savings in the Space Station Program while retaining a beneficial role for Canada.

U.S. officials met with Canadian officials in Washington on Monday, February 21, the day before the Budget. At this meeting, and in all earlier meetings, Canadian officials carefully observed the Department of Finance's advice on Budget-related negotiations. U.S. officials were not shown the Budget speech relating to the Space Station, dollar figures, or any other Budget-related material not in the public domain. Canadian officials did indicate the Government's intention to contain the costs related to Canada's participation in the Space Station. Those discussions were essential to ensure that Canada secured an appropriate role in the Space Station.

Press reports had raised U.S. concerns that the Budget might contain references to a Canadian withdrawal from the Space Station Program. Hence, the Government felt that the word "withdrawal" (which had already been included in the printed version of the Budget Speech) and even though qualified by the word "orderly," could be misinterpreted in the context of the international agreements relating to the Space Station. On this basis, it was decided to avoid any possible misunderstanding of Canada's position and to use the word "reduction" in the Minister of Finance's actual speech in the House.

The Government remains committed to the Space Station Program. The current Long Term Space Plan maps out the Government's strategy for the next 10 years, and will help ensure that this sector becomes an enabling instrument for Canada's transition to a knowledge-based economy.

Note: the expression "withdrawal from current commitments" was translated in the French version of the printed Budget Speech by the one word "désengagement."

THE ENVIRONMENT

AUTOMATION OF WEATHER STATIONS—
RELIABILITY OF TECHNOLOGY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Pat Carney on March 2, 1995)

Recent budget cuts at Environment Canada call for elimination of all human weather observations by April 1997. EC is proceeding with planned closures of local weather stations while continuing to respect the moratorium on commissioning of new aviation-related Automated Weather Observation Stations (AWOS) by installing new AWOS Systems only where they will have no impact on aviation requirements.

Transport Canada Aviation and Environment Canada have embarked on an action plan, in cooperation with the users, to correct AWOS deficiencies and to demonstrate its satisfactory performance such that it will meet aircraft operations/efficiency requirements and aviation user expectations at Canadian airports by July 1996. Notwithstanding the acknowledged deficiencies related to aviation purposes, the AWOS meets the requirements for public weather information and provides the essential elements to conduct an aircraft instrument approach (windspeed and altimeter setting). Similarly, the integrity of aerodrome forecasts is not affected by current AWOS observation deficiencies since a variety of data sources are used in the production of forecasts.

Transport Canada is committed to providing a safe operating environment for aviation users and is confident that current efforts will yield an AWOS that will satisfactorily meet all aviation needs.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADIAN AIRBORNE REGIMENT—
REASONS FOR DISBANDMENT

(Response to question raised by Hon. Duncan J. Jessiman on March 22, 1995)

Following the regrettable events which took place in Somalia in 1993 involving some members of the Canadian Airborne Regiment, the Chief of the Defence Staff and the Commander of Land Forces, in June 1994, made a recommendation to the Minister of National Defence with respect to the future of the Canadian Airborne Regiment. The Minister was reluctant to make a decision concerning the Regiment's future until a public inquiry, subsequently announced by the Minister in the fall of 1994, had reported on the events surrounding the Regiment's deployment in Somalia.

However, once the Minister learned of further disturbing incidents involving members of the Regiment — one in Rwanda in the fall of 1994 and two which were filmed on video, the first in Somalia during the Regiment's tour of duty in 1993 and the second in Petawawa in 1994 showing a hazing ritual in which members of the Regiment engaged in racist, violent, and degrading acts — he became concerned that the conduct of some members of the Regiment might have denigrated the reputation of all members, past and present, of the Canadian forces. While measures were taken to address individual issues, the Minister came to the conclusion that the problems of the Regiment were systemic. The cumulative effect on the public's confidence in the Regiment demanded that the Government act quickly to restore the reputation of the Forces.

Therefore, on January 23, 1995, the Minister of National Defence announced the disbandment of the Canadian Airborne Regiment and the reassignment of its members to their home units.

It must be added that many changes in personnel and procedures had been made during the period following the events in Somalia and that serving members of the Airborne Regiment were, by and large, dedicated professionals who had performed their duties with honour and distinction.

The disturbing incidents subsequent to the events in Somalia led the Minister to conclude that the problems of the Airborne Regiment were systemic and must not be permitted to denigrate the reputation of the Canadian Forces. The Minister of National Defence consulted with the Prime Minister and the Minister subsequently announced the Government's decision to disband the Regiment.

INQUIRY INTO THE ACTIVITIES OF CANADIAN AIRBORNE REGIMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk on March 22, 1995)

1. The Government must ensure that the Canadian Forces are not only operationally effective, but also that they are respected at home and abroad. The conduct of some members of the Airborne Regiment over the past few years brought that trust into question and might have denigrated the reputation of all members of the Canadian Forces. The Government could not allow the proud heritage of the Canadian Forces to be jeopardized.

An internal military board of inquiry heard many witnesses and gathered much evidence on the state of discipline and general readiness of the Airborne Regiment immediately prior to and during its deployment to Somalia. That evidence, some 12 volumes, has been made available to the Commission of Inquiry, as have the proceedings of all the courts martial which are in the public domain, and the results of military police investigations relating to the incidents which occurred in Somalia.

After the Chief of Defence Staff and the commander of the land forces made a recommendation on the future of the Canadian Airborne Regiment, the government made the judgement that the damage to the reputation of the Airborne Regiment was so great as to be irreparable. The Minister of National Defence, reluctantly, announced the decision to disband the regiment for the reasons stated above. The decision was not taken lightly or without due consideration. The problems were deemed to be systemic and the situation demanded action: the Regiment had to be disbanded.

2. The Canadian Forces have distinguished themselves both in war and in peace as well as in peacekeeping activities and continue to do so. Canadians are justifiably proud of our Armed Forces and they must continue to have confidence in our military so that it may represent us at home and abroad.

While the negative aspects of recent events cannot be minimized, it would be unfair to ignore the achievements of the Regiment. It is recognized that many changes in personnel and procedures in the Airborne had been made over the past year. The Minister recognized that the people serving in the Airborne regiment were by and large dedicated professionals. It is also recognized that the Airborne has, in the past, served Canada with distinction. However, the Minister is concerned that the conduct of some members of the Airborne Regiment over the past few years might have denigrated the reputation of all members of the Canadian Forces.

3. The 1994 Defence White Paper recognized the continuing need for an airborne capability within the Canadian Forces to support the United Nations and to respond to emerging situations anywhere in our territory. On 12 April 1995, the Chief of the Defence Staff and the Commander of Land Force Command announced that the army's parachute capability will, in the future, be provided by three separate infantry companies spread across the country that will consist of the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry company in Edmonton, a Royal Canadian Regiment company in Petawawa, and a Royal 22nd Regiment company in Valcartier. The troops for these units will come from the former Airborne and the 3000 additional combat troops provided by the White Paper.

The plans for expansion from company to battalion level will be finalized after the Defence Minister's Commission on the Reserve Force tables its report in December of this year. The new parachute companies will be formed in their new locations as soon as possible and no later than September of this year.

TRANSPORT

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—NOVA SCOTIA AGREEMENT—RETURN OF FUNDS TO DEATH VALLEY HIGHWAY PROJECT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gerald J. Comeau on May 23, 1995)

Highways are a provincial responsibility. The priorities are established by the province and almost every province has sought and obtained amendments to its highway agreements.

JUSTICE

GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION—AVOWAL BY THE PROVINCES NOT TO FINANCE REGISTRATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest on May 24, 1995)

The Minister of Justice tabled the "Financial Framework for Bill C-68" document with Parliamentary Committee on April 24, 1995 which details the cost and revenue estimates to support the development and the implementation of the firearms legislation.

In a recent letter to his provincial colleagues responsible for the administration of the Firearms Control Program, the Minister of Justice reaffirmed the federal government's commitment to the provinces to cover the cost of the design, development and implementation of the Canadian Firearms Registration System.

The federal government is also committed to the principle of cost recovery with respect to the Firearms Control Program. The continuing administrative costs of the registration system will be funded from the revenues of the fees for the firearms licences, registration certificates and authorization permits.

The fees will be modest but sufficient to defray the operating costs of the firearms legislation. The actual fee levels will be set by regulation and subject to Parliament's review.

The administrative costs actually incurred by provinces with respect to processing firearms licences, registration certificates and authorization permits, as well as the operation of the Canadian Firearms Registration System will be recovered through the Federal-Provincial/Territorial Firearms Financial Agreements. The authority is set in legislation (section 93 of the Firearms Act, Bill C-68).

Every effort is being made in designing the registration system to achieve easy accessibility to the public and cost efficiency. Federal officials will work with provincial counterparts in arriving at the final design, and with the provinces and territories full participation in this cooperative process following the legislation being enacted.

GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES PRIOR TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lowell Murray on May 24, 1995)

The consultation process was indeed widespread and significant. The Minister of Justice met with many firearms owners and users, and other interest groups, including health care and women groups, and police throughout Canada. These direct consultations by the Minister took place in every jurisdiction of the country. The government is currently engaged in formal consultations with aboriginal people on how to best implement the new law.

The Minister of Justice launched his proposals to develop firearms control legislation with his provincial and territorial colleagues at their annual meeting in Victoria, in January 1995.

Ongoing meetings between the Chief Provincial and Territorial Firearms Officers with the Firearms Control Task Group, Department of Justice, on the administration and general policy proposals of the Minister of Justice began in March 1994 and continued up to the Action Plan tabling in the House of Commons. The registration system was a focus of these meetings.

Gun control legislation issues were also agenda items of meetings of Assistant Deputy Ministers and, separately, of the Deputy Ministers. Further to these consultations, there have been exchanges of written communication on this subject between the Minister of Justice and the provincial and territorial Ministers.

Since 1978, federal-provincial agreements with the provinces compensate for actual administrative costs of the firearms control provisions. These agreements must be considered an important commitment to the consultative process.

The Minister of Justice conveyed to Parliament the federal commitment to cover the provinces' actual cost of administering the firearms control program and has conveyed those assurances to the provinces in writing.

GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION—FINANCIAL SELF-SUFFICIENCY OF REGISTRATION PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Ron Ghitter on May 24, 1995)

The Minister of Justice reaffirmed to his provincial colleagues that the federal government is committed to the principle of cost recovery with respect to Firearms Control Program.

The "Financial Framework for Bill C-68" document tabled with Parliamentary Committee on April 24, 1995 details the cost and revenue estimates to support the development and implementation of the firearms legislation.

The continuing administrative costs of the registration system will be funded by revenues paid from fees for firearms licences, registration certificates and authorization permits.

The fees will be modest but sufficient to defray continuing costs to the provinces and police service involved in the administration of the Firearms Control Program. The actual fee levels will be set by regulations that will be subject to Parliament's review.

The federal government will fund the costs for the design, development and implementation of the Canadian Firearms Registration System.

The administrative costs actually incurred by provinces with respect to firearms licences, registration certificates, authorization permits and the operation of the Canadian Firearms Registration System will be recovered through the Federal-Provincial/Territorial Firearms Financial Agreements.

GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION—COMMENTS OF PRIME MINISTER ON PROVINCIAL RESPONSIBILITY—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gerry St. Germain on May 24, 1995)

The initial media reports seemed to interpret the Prime Minister's comments in Québec City on May 21, 1995 about the constitutional division of responsibilities for the criminal justice system as an assertion that the provinces alone would pay to administer the firearms registration system. That interpretation is incorrect. The Prime Minister did not make any reference to the costs of administering the program as he pointed out in a subsequent press conference.

In a recent letter to his provincial colleagues responsible for the administration of the Firearms Control Program, the Minister of Justice reaffirmed the federal government's commitment to the provinces to cover the cost of the design, development, and implementation of the Canadian Firearms Registration System.

The federal government is also committed to the principle of cost recovery with respect to the Firearms Control Program. The continuing administrative costs of the registration system will be funded from the revenues of the fees for the firearms licences, registration certificates and authorization permits.

The fees will be modest but sufficient to defray the operating costs of the firearms legislation. The actual fee levels will be set by regulation and subject to Parliament's review.

The administrative costs actually incurred by provinces with respect to processing firearms licences, registration certificates and authorization permits, as well as the operation of the Canadian Firearms Registration System will be recovered through the Federal-Provincial/Territorial Firearms Financial Agreements. The authority is set in legislation (section 93 of the Firearms Act, Bill C-68).

Every effort is being made in designing the registration system to achieve easy accessibility to the public and cost efficiency. Following the enactment of the legislation, federal officials will work with provincial counterparts to arrive at the final design: the provinces and territories will participate fully in this cooperative process.

The Minister of Justice tabled the "Financial Framework for Bill C-68" document with the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of the House of Commons on April 24, 1995 which details the cost and revenue estimates to support the development and the implementation of the firearms legislation.

TRANSPORT

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—FEDERAL PROVINCIAL AGREEMENTS CURRENTLY IN FORCE—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lowell Murray on May 25, 1995)

There are no agreements extant concerning standards for conduct of provincial jurisdiction on provincial highways which include those portions of highways designated as the "Trans–Canada Highway." Each province has sole jurisdiction over highways within its boundaries with the exceptions of those highways or portions of highways through national parks which come under federal jurisdiction. There are no federal restrictions on provinces with respect to their jurisdiction over their highways, which includes charging of tolls on the highways under their jurisdiction, whether on the Trans–Canada Highway or not. The federal government has separate funding agreements with each province concerning highway funding: in some cases there are two or three separate agreements concerning funding, eg. Highway Improvement Program(s), Strategic Highway Improvements Program(s), Economic Regional Development Agreement(s), etc. While some highway agreements contain projects which concern portions of the Trans–Canada highway, others do not. The provincial governments are responsible for proposing the projects they wish funded. The size, scope, routing, tendering, timing, and all other details of each individual project is managed by the province. A project is generally a manageable chunk of highway. It does not necessarily address all or even the majority of the wishes for improvements, changes, enhancements, or other work for any given highway. Several projects within any given agreement may, and again may not, include work on portions, projects, or by-passes to the Trans–Canada Highway in a given section of a province.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—POLICY ON DIVERSION OF FUNDS TO UNDESIGNATED PROJECTS—REQUEST FOR PARTICULARS

(Response to question raised by Hon. David Tkachuk on May 25, 1995)

There is no new procedure here. Since the early Seventies at least, federal and provincial governments have reached agreements on funding for highways and have amended them. Provincial governments and, indeed, the former federal government are well aware that amendments can and are made. There have been amendments made to virtually every highway agreement made in the last twenty years. These include those agreements entered into and altered by the previous administration.

For instance, in February 1990, $5 million was reallocated from Highway 101 between St. Bernard and Meteghan River and from the Digby Interchange of Highway 101 to fund the New Glasgow by-pass on Highway 104 and Highway 101 between Bridgetown and Annapolis Royal. On October 12, 1993, the Truro and Kempton by-pass on Highway 104 was reduced by $3.6 million and the money went to the stretch of Highway 104 from the New Brunswick border to the Amherst Viaduct. In November 1994, 2 projects were cancelled in Manitoba, in the amount of $ 5.6 million, and reallocated to new projects like grading and constructing a 4–lane connection from Provincial Trunk Highway (PTH) 59 to PTH 15 as well as towards a CPR overpass and a new alignment of PTH 16 at Newdale.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

EFFECT OF CUTS TO SOCIAL TRANSFER PAYMENTS ON UNIVERSITY ENROLMENT

(Response to question raised by Hon. Ethel Cochrane on May 25, 1995)

Provincial jurisdiction, together with the fact that federal transfers to provinces for post–secondary education are unconditional, means there is no direct connection between federal transfers and provincially-set tuition. One consequence of this is that the federal government cannot accurately forecast future levels of tuition fees or make predictions about changes in post-secondary enrolment as a result of the new transfer arrangements.

While the federal government does not directly influence the level of tuition fees, it does, however, play a major role in helping students cope with costs and in facilitating access to post-secondary education. In 1994, Parliament approved the Canada Student Financial Assistance Act. This Act has already allowed significant reforms to the Canada Student Loans Program that include an increase in loan limits for full-time students from $105/week to $165/week, the introduction of a new approach to need assessment to target more aid to those who need it most, the introduction of a 60% aid-sharing approach with provincial and territorial governments, and pilot projects with four provinces to provide grants for students with permanent disabilities.

This year, approximately 130,000 students will benefit from some $200 million in additional aid.

The Minister of Human Resources Development will also be working with the provinces to develop appropriate principles and objectives to guide the Canada Health and Social Transfer and to continue federal-provincial cooperation in the areas it covers which include post-secondary education support. The department will also continue to work with provincial authorities as well as stakeholders to further improve the Canada Student Loans Program as circumstances evolve.

The federal government recognizes the importance of post-secondary education to our economic and social development and remains committed to supporting the national effort to help all Canadians acquire the knowledge and skills to compete in the world.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—NOVA SCOTIA—RESTORATION OF FUNDING TO DESIGNATED PROJECT—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

(Response to question raised by Hon. John Buchanan on June 5, 1995)

Nova Scotia, which has jurisdiction over highways, has pursued the objective of providing a four-lane divided standard on the Trans-Canada Highway in the province since the 1970s. The federal government, in striving to meet its objective of providing a safe and efficient national transportation system, has provided financial assistance over the years as funding has become available.

The original Canada-Nova Scotia Highway Improvement Agreement was signed on July 20,1987. The agreement was for a four-year, $100–million program, to be cost-shared on a 50-50 basis. Some $26 million of the program was allocated to two projects on Highway 104; $17 million to the New Glasgow By-Pass and the balance to improving the segment from the New Brunswick border to Oxford.

The original agreement was amended in August 1991 to extend the term of the agreement by two years and to add $3.0 million for the Millbrook Interchange on Highway 102. Included in the August 1991 amendment was a change to the allocation for the Highway 104 project to $19.4 million for New Glasgow and $10 million for the segment to Oxford. Spending on Highway 104 was extended to the end of the amended agreement, i.e., March 1993, and now totalled $29.4 million.

In February 1992, the agreement was amended a second time to add funding for additional projects on Highway 104. The term of the agreement was extended to March 1994 and $34 million was added to cover various work related to four-laning five separate segments of the highway from the New Brunswick border to the Kemptown by-Pass; at Amherst; between Nappa River and Thomson Road; at Mont William Road; Salt Springs to Kemptown; and between the Highway 102 junction at Kemptown. Under this amendment, planned spending on Highway 104 totalled $63.4 million. None of the new projects could have been completed solely with the funding provided under the agreements, i.e. without additional provincial funds above the cost-shared portion.

In June 1993, the agreement was amended for the third time; $60 million was added to the value of the agreement, bringing the total to $197 million and the term was extended to March 1997. The allocation for Highway 104 improvements went from $63.4 million to $123.4 million to complete the projects initiated in earlier amendments. Subsequent administrative changes have brought the total to $123.7 million.

On April 1, 1993, Nova Scotia and Canada entered into the Strategic Highway Improvement Program agreement. The agreement was for a $140 million, 50-50 cost-shared program covering the period to March 1997. Of this amount, $118.8 million was allocated to additional projects on Highway 104, including $55 million to start the construction of the Wentworth Valley by-pass between Thomson Road and Masstown. This was the first time that the Wentworth Valley segment was included in a federal-provincial agreement.

None of the highway funding agreements entered into since 1987 have made reference to the finalization of any specific project. Instead, the agreements have, in several cases, provided only enough funding to get a project underway and it has always been mutually understood that the province has the responsibility to determine when a project will be completed and how completion will be financed.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

RESPECT OF HUMAN RIGHTS AS CONDITION OF CONTINUING MEMBERSHIP—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin on June 5, 1995)

NATO is a community of common values and principles. Indeed, the Washington treaty describes its members as "determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage and civilization of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty and the rule of law."

Any country invited to join the Alliance should share these values. A democratic system based on the rule of law, the civilian control of the armed forces, and respect for human rights, including respect for minority rights, would constitute, in the eyes of NATO, members' pre-conditions to accession to the Alliance. Canada, like other members, recognizes the great importance of the respect of human rights.

Regarding the situation in Turkey, Canada undertook several steps concerning the situation of human rights in that country. The Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr. André Ouellet, raised this question during his meeting with his Turkish counterpart last May. Canadian representatives have raised this issue with Turkish authorities on every appropriate occasion. The Canadian Embassy in Ankara is in regular contact with Turkish organizations active in the promotion of human rights. On each occasion, Canada underlined its great concern regarding the human rights situation in Turkey. Canada believes that it is important to pursue a dialogue with Turkish authorities in order to set them on track towards reform in this area.

GOVERNMENT SERVICES

REFUSAL OF AIRLINES TO NEGOTIATE DISCOUNTS WITH GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

(Response to question raised by Hon. Senator Richard J. Doyle on June 6, 1995)

The Director of Investigation and Research is responsible for the administration and the enforcement of the Competition Act, and he examines all matters brought to his attention to determine if they Mise issues under the Act. According to available information, the Director is examining this matter.

If the facts reveal the existence of activities contrary to the provisions of the Act, the Director will take the appropriate action.

In October 1994, the House Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs formed the Subcommittee on Members Travel. Air Canada and Canadian Airlines appeared before the Subcommittee and the Subcommittee filed its report with the Standing Committee last March. The question is whether by refusing to offer discounts to Members of Parliament, the two Airlines may be contravening the Competition Act. The Director is aware of the situation and is reviewing it in relation to the provisions of the Act.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

EFFECT OF ENFORCEMENT PROVISIONS OF AGREEMENT ON INTERNAL TRADE IMPLEMENTATION BILL ON INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Senator Fernand Roberge on June 7, 1995)

Amendments to Bill C-88 to clarify the intent of the legislation will be introduced at the appropriate time.

Minister Manley consulted with the Honourable James Downey of Manitoba, the provincial Committee of Ministers on Internal Trade co-chairman, who suggested it might be helpful to review the wording of Section 9, to address the issue of possible ambiguity, so as to ensure that the legal language mirrors the provisions of the agreement.

Only Quebec has formally communicated to the government specific concerns about Bill C-88.

Alberta officials have expressed strong support for Bill C-88, while seeking some clarification.

British Columbia and Saskatchewan officials have voiced general concerns, but have not followed up with any specifics.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—PROPOSED TOLL BOOTHS IN NOVA SCOTIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gerald Comeau on June 21, 1995)

The agreement announced with the province of New Brunswick and the federal government is between the two parties and does impact on any past, present, or future agreement between the federal government and the province of Nova Scotia. The province of Nova Scotia is presently discussing with the federal government how it wishes to address the transition funds to be allocated to it under the cessation of the Atlantic Freight Rate and Maritime Freight Rate Assistance subsidies. Federal cost sharing agreements alone will not cover the cost of all highway improvements necessary in any province. Each province decides how it will fund its own highways and considers in those decisions the question of whether or not it will require tolls to fund any particular highway project. That is provincial jurisdiction.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL STRATEGIC HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM—NOVA SCOTIA—RESTORATION OF FUNDING TO DESIGNATED PROJECT—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

(Response to question raised by Hon. J. Michael Forrestall on June 27, 1995)

The Province of Nova Scotia has not approached the federal government for any further amendments to the Strategic Highway Improvement Program agreement.

Hon. Marcel Prud'Homme: Honourable senators, does the deputy leader have an idea of when my question posed on May 11 concerning the acquisition of class submarines may be answered? I asked a very precise question. The response is either "yes" or "no." Was a lobbyist involved in that transaction? I am patient, as everyone knows, but just because I am patient I do not forget. Would the deputy leader look into that matter?

Senator Graham: The answer is very definitely yes. I will urge expeditious action on this question.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-82, to amend the Royal Canadian Mint Act.

Hon. Marcel Prud'Homme: Honourable senators, for 32 years I have been repeating the same speech to students across Canada. This weekend I was in the Belleville-Perth-Tweed-Kingston area. I cannot understand why we are trying to pass this bill so quickly without at least asking ministers to reflect on proposals which were made on the slow and gradual Canadianization of our money.

I was greatly influenced by a man of courage in 1964. I was with him in Winnipeg in May of 1964, when, against all advice, he spoke to the annual national meeting of the Royal Canadian Legion. He said, "Ladies and gentlemen, the time has come for Canada to have an authentic Canadian flag." That was a man of courage. We know what happened across Canada after that.

On Friday, I was in the Fort–Coulonge area of what we call western Quebec. On every barn and on every street I saw the Canadian flag. Yet, I could not but remember that in 1964 we went through the most vicious debate on the flag. It was as vicious as the debate on the metric system. People seem to forget these debates. The metric system was heralded as the beginning of the French taking over the country.

I remember the flag debate. It was a turning point in my life, a time when I learned about courage. When you know you are on the right track, you go for it.

I was at the committee meetings on this bill last week, although I am not a member. Everyone knows I am not a member of any committee, so I go to all the meetings where they are debating interesting issues. Facing me was a senator — whom I will not name — who did not like what I stood for, although I was talking about Canada.

Some people who are trying to build a country get sick and tired of the nonsense they hear when talking about the great motivation for many of us, especially for new Canadians and young Canadians, of building a country. It is not enough to say that we have a great country. No one is more respectful of our gracious Queen Elizabeth II than I.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, Queen Elizabeth II, the Queen of Canada — I say it in French, I said it in Quebec and I will repeat it in both languages. I am not afraid of public opinion when I know we are right. And now they accuse us of being against the monarchy.

[English]

Canada is a country that we build every day, slowly, with respect for each other, but moving forward. Every generation must take a step toward Canadianization.

• (2100)

I do not believe changing the appearance of a coin will be opposed.

I had the experience of watching an official discussing this matter on television. He spoke absolute nonsense. I would enjoy entering into a debate with him.

Honourable senators, every gesture counts in building a Canadian identity. The note from the minister says, in English, "Oversee effigy of Her Majesty the Queen," and, "Reverse to be determined by government after public consultation on most appealling team." I am told there were 17,000 applicants.

I did not hear of anyone in Montreal or west Quebec being asked to apply. I used to think that an effigy of Mr. Pearson or Mr. Diefenbaker would be a good choice, but now I am of the opinion that one coin should honour a woman because four male prime ministers have already been honoured.

Honourable senators, I am talking about the Canadianization of our institutions. The country is burning, and people do not realize it. Those of us who passionately talk about our country are ridiculed by some, even by some senators. I have spoken in every province on this issue. Every time I discuss this topic, everyone demonstrates enthusiasm.

In 1964, I was invited as a new member to speak in British Columbia. A few days before I was to speak, I started receiving calls from people who told me that I should not discuss certain controversial issues. I touched on every subject I was advised not to discuss and I survived. In fact, I made many friends, some of whom became members of Parliament. Five are ministers of the Crown. My exchanges with them occurred when they were young Liberals.

We have established a committee which is asking Canadians, in the words of the representative of the minister: "Do you want to have a $2 coin?" The response was divided 50-50. However, as soon as it was pointed out that $223 million would be saved by the minting of such a coin, then, of course, 85 per cent voted in favour of the coin. No committee has been established to ask Canadians: "Would you like to continue the Canadianization of our institutions?" That question has already been decided.

People visiting Canada are curious about who is depicted on our different coins and bills, and I am sure that curiosity would continue if we were to depict a woman on one of our coins.

Honourable senators, I would support the clause that provides that the Queen shall be depicted on the coin because if it is proposed that that provision be rejected, then the bill will not be passed. Progress is important, but in progressing, we must respect the past.

Why should we not honour the first citizen of this country on a new coin? What would be wrong with having an Inuit or an Indian leader depicted on one of our coins? The millions of people who carry them will be reminded of what this country is all about.

I have made concession after concession since I arrived in Parliament where it seems that some are more at home than others. Shall I explain that comment?

Senator Gigantès: No.

Senator Prud'homme: Coming from anyone else, I would be upset, but I accept such a comment from Senator Gigantès.

When will we all come together — forget we are Liberals, Conservative, independents — on a matter which could mean so much for young, new Canadians?

Where are the people of courage who are not afraid to go against the public opinion? We have only people who are like weather vanes, and when you follow a weather vane, you never know where you are. By the time you catch the wind, the weather vane —

[Translation]

The weather vane has already turned.

[English]

I thank my colleagues for their patience. They said that I made a very emotional speech. When will we stop being afraid to discuss the real issue: our country? To express the sentiments in our beautiful country of Canada, we should Canadanize. The Liberals should be marching to continue the great tradition. Tonight we will not continue the tradition.

That is a very dangerous attitude to take because we should be trying to encourage, and not discourage, those in this country who are proud of having many types of symbols.

• (2110)

People ask me why we waste our time on these trivialities. Honourable senators, they are not trivialities; they are symbols, and symbols emulate people.

Honourable senators, it appears that I will not win this debate. Therefore, I will let the bill pass on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: It was moved by the Honourable Senator Graham, seconded by the Honourable Senator Neiman, that this bill be read the third time now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Prud'homme: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham moved the third reading of Bill C-104, to amend the Criminal Code and the Young Offenders Act (forensic DNA analysis).

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK OF CANADA BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Peter Bosa moved the third reading of Bill C-91, to continue the Federal Business Development Bank under the name Business Development Bank of Canada.

Hon. John Sylvain: Honourable senators, I rise this evening to make a few remarks in relation to Bill C-91 because I tabled the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on this bill.

I want to begin by saying that I fully endorse and associate myself with the report the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce presented to the Senate on Bill C-91.

The first paragraph of this report summarizes how we felt as a committee about the process followed in relation to Bill C-91. I quote:

> The committee wishes to put on the record, in the strongest terms, its frustration with the lack of legislative planning between the House of Commons and the Senate. This problem has existed for years, under both Progressive Conservative and Liberal governments. Both have exhibited a complete disregard for the legislative role of the Senate.

Both the content and the process used to put Bill C-91 before the Banking Committee demonstrates a real need to look carefully at our legislative system, and particularly the relationship between the House of Commons and the Senate.

Honourable senators, this bill raises the amount that can be lent to businesses by the FBDB — now the Business Development Bank of Canada — to the point where I, and some other senators, believe that this bank will become a rival to the existing chartered banks. This seems to fly in the face of the present government's move to privatize CN, our airports and Petro-Canada.

Honourable senators, this bill reached the Banking Committee as we were studying the federal government's involvement in the banking industry. We were told, "Pass this bill because the bank will run out of money if you do not!" We were also told, "You cannot amend this bill because the House is adjourned." That is what led the committee to write the report which accompanies the bill.

It was at the end of November 1993 when Senator Oliver called together the Progressive Conservative Senate caucus to talk about and make recommendations for Senate renewal. One of the main recommendations arising out of that meeting was the establishment of a Senate-House liaison committee charged with the responsibility for the orderly progress of legislation through the Senate. Why have we not established this committee?

In 1993, the House of Commons Standing Committee on House Management recommended that legislation be introduced in the house at least three months prior to the government's moving to have it passed by the house. In December 1985, the House Committee on Procedures and Organization produced a report entitled "The Canadian Budgetary Process: Proposals for Improvement." This report dealt with and recommended a financial timetable. It also recommended a timetable of five months in which to move legislation through the House and the Senate.

These studies and our efforts at Senate renewal all stress the need for cooperation between the House and the Senate regarding the legislative process. This issue crosses party lines, and its resolution will need the cooperation of us all.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce was denied the opportunity to do a thorough review of Bill C-91 because of an artificially imposed legislative timetable. This committee, through its report to the Senate, has served notice that we will not be denied this opportunity again. I hope other committees will join in this desire to have an orderly legislative calendar developed and put into use.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

[Translation]

FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fifth report of the Committee of Selection.

Hon. Jacques Hébert moved the adoption of the report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved that the report be adopted now. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I will be much more specific.

[English]

I know that Senator Robertson has looked into the possible contribution of independent senators. I assure you that I am not begging on my knees. I am not complaining. I am just saying that it is regrettable that the Senate cannot use all of its talent, if such talent exists. I have to conclude that talent may not exist.

I had the honour to serve in the House of Commons on this very committee. I regret that Senator Stanbury is not sitting again, because he was my chairman. He could always depend on me. I was very faithful. I never missed a meeting. I always had opinions, some of which were accepted and some were rejected.

It is regrettable, honourable senators, that we cannot find a way to involve the independent senators. We are three in number, although I am not speaking for the other two. They can speak for themselves. One of them used to sit on many committees. I could come back tonight with a file of independent senators, from Olson to Everett to Lang, who sat on committees.

I am a patient man. I will wait until June 21, 1998. Again, however, let me say that I think it is regrettable that people who have served their country in the other chamber are not called upon to serve on committees in the Senate because they happen to be independent.

Any senator can sit in on the meetings of any committee. In attending every committee, you end up knowing on which one you could be the most useful. I am not saying I would love to be on this committee, but I will attend its meetings.

Honourable senators, the leadership in the Senate should put their heads together and consider whether certain senators could not help deal with legislation referred to certain committees in light of their particular experience rather than the fact that they may or may not be a member of a particular party or a certain group. That has nothing to do with the efficiency of the Senate.

• (2120)

I want to go on record as saying that I find it appropriate that an old institution like this one should be composed of men and women of experience who can relax and give especially of their time. I repeat, some day, I will go further. I know that those senators who were appointed will be dutiful. I will pay close attention to the list which was submitted to us tonight.

Within a year I will return to see who was most active on that committee.

Honourable senators, I will certainly speak with Senator Robertson. I know there was deliberation as to the role of independent senators. Surely, there is a role for us to play. I try to play out that role and that is why I am on my feet too often. However, I do cooperate with Senator Graham who is a gentleman. I do not think I have turned down one of his requests. He consults, which is the way I think we should behave in this honourable chamber.

Hon. Brenda Robertson: Honourable senators, I should like to respond briefly to the remarks of the honourable senator. I do so because there has been a misinterpretation of the decision of the committee.

It was determined in committee that we would not change the existing rules. There is no rule excluding an independent senator from permanent membership on a committee. It is left to the Committee of Selection, chaired by Senator Hébert, to determine who shall be a member of each committee.

Thus, if the Committee of Selection chooses an independent, which they have done in the past, that is fine. That decision is not made by the Rules Committee.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, in the lifetime of many of us, it has happened that an independent senator, namely, Senator Molson, was chairman of a standing committee, the standing committee which is now chaired by Senator Robertson. Twelve years ago a special committee was headed by independent Senator Pitfield.

As Senator Robertson points out, these are matters that are the prerogative of the Committee of Selection.

I should add, however, that, normally, the government party takes responsibility for assigning one of its committee slots to an independent senator. I let my friends know that.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Final Report of the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide, entitled: "Of Life and Death," tabled in the Senate on 6th June, 1995.—(Honourable Joan Neiman).

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I know we are all looking forward to a pause in this parliamentary session. However, before I ask this chamber to adopt this report of the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide, I should like to leave with you a few of my personal thoughts on this complex subject.

There once was a woman dying from a particularly devastating disease. Her body was literally disintegrating, but her mind was clear. She knew beyond a doubt that her body would continue to deteriorate and her suffering increase before death finally released her. She wanted a means to die quickly and painlessly, when she herself decided she could stand no more, that it was time to go.

Sue Rodriguez knew that our courts had been increasingly supportive of the concept of personal choice, even though the choice made by a person might result in the death of that person. She also knew it was permissible to commit suicide but forbidden by section 241 of the Criminal Code to receive assistance in doing so.

Thus, she requested the courts — right through to the Supreme Court of Canada — to reconsider that prohibition in the light of the Bill of Rights and the more recent Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Each court declined, by the narrowest of margins, to make an exception in her case. However, the Chief Justices of the two superior courts both recommended that Parliament deal with the issues her request had raised.

Just days before our committee launched this study, Sue Rodriguez died. Although I had never communicated with her, I heard that she knew our committee had been constituted to study this issue and that she was happy that it was in the works.

Without determining who assisted in her death, British Columbia authorities have just closed her case. The overarching question to which the public still wants an answer, and to which the medical profession and Parliament must ultimately respond, remains: Under what circumstances should it be legally permissible to help shorten the dying process of a terminally ill person?

The committee study and its report marks just the first step in the examination of the issues surrounding assisted suicide and euthanasia. As honourable senators know, it contains many recommendations which, if acted upon, would do much to dispel the worries of many Canadians, particularly the chronically and terminally ill. It would certainly help put our health care house in order.

The committee's assessment of the state of palliative care in Canada, a type of practice which all members and most of our witnesses heartily endorse, was that it is today woefully inadequate, except in a few urban areas. Our recommendations suggest how those responsible can begin to fill the vacuum.

Our recommendations also address current practices with respect to the administration of analgesics, or painkillers, which may be, but need not be, part of palliative care. Committee members were disturbed to be told of patients who were left for hours, and even days, in unremitting pain because their doctors refused to prescribe additional medication for them. This continues to happen in spite of the fact that it is perfectly acceptable, legally and medically, to administer sufficient medication to relieve suffering, even though that may shorten life.

Can you believe that in Canada today there are still doctors who refuse to prescribe certain narcotics, or the amount needed to deaden pain, to a terminally ill patient out of fear that the patient might become addicted? Of what possible concern should that be to or about a dying person?

Although there may be ethical and other reasons why certain doctors make some of the decisions they do, I cannot fathom them.

Shortly after tabling our report, I listened to a woman in a public forum describe how her mother, who had died of cancer just a few days before in a palliative care unit, was scolded by her doctor for asking, and was then refused, additional pain medication. I find that outrageous. The medical profession has a heavy responsibility to educate its members on what they can and should do to relieve the suffering of patients whenever possible.

• (2130)

If it would provide the federal government with a copy of its protocols and guidelines, Parliament would be in a position to enact appropriate legislation to clarify the practice beyond a doubt. The public also needs to be fully educated in this area so people will know what they have the right to expect and demand by way of pain relief.

One of the areas in which I believe the committee could have been more forthright and helpful was in its definition of euthanasia. The committee decided it would describe it as "a deliberate act undertaken by one person with the intention of ending the life of another person to relieve that person's suffering where that act is the cause of death." Indeed, that is the definition used by many writers and witnesses.

However, to focus the debate on this issue more clearly and to distinguish the type of act which euthanasia is or should be recognized as encompassing, we have said that the definition should further qualify the act as "being motivated by compassion or mercy." Major dictionaries support my position in their definitions. Black's Law Dictionary states "an act of mercy," as does the Medical Dictionary for Lawyers. Webster's Ninth New Collegiate Dictionary states "for reasons of mercy." Roget's International Thesaurus describes it as "a mercy killing." In their papers on the subject, the Canadian Medical Association describes euthanasia as being "undertaken with empathy and compassion and without personal gain." The Law Reform Commission Report No. 20 of July 18, 1983, uses "from compassionate motives" in its definition. The Criminal Justice Branch of British Columbia, in its 1993 policy manual on the subject, uses "motivated by compassion."

Surely, feelings of compassion and mercy, which everyone must feel for a fellow human being in extreme distress, ought to inform every aspect of study and debate on this subject. Yes, it is killing — but it is killing of a very particular kind which may be undertaken only in very special circumstances.

If we keep that in mind, it would dispel the fear, which many people have expressed, of the possible abuse of the act of euthanasia.

The committee was reminded that the withholding and withdrawing of life-sustaining treatment at the request of competent patients, which are medically and legally acceptable practices today, were, 15 or 20 years ago, called "passive euthanasia," and were as vigorously debated then as other forms of euthanasia are today.

Senator Lavoie-Roux stated in her speech that all committee members agreed that there was a fundamental difference between deliberately causing death and not prolonging life. Literally, that is so. However, she went on to say that that difference was why we, the members, made a distinction between euthanasia and assisted suicide, which she described as deliberate on the one hand, and measures to alleviate suffering and the cessation or non-initiation of life-sustaining treatment on the other.

With great respect, I do not agree with that interpretation. In cases of both withholding and withdrawing, a deliberate decision is taken by a competent patient, knowing that death will in all probability occur much earlier than would otherwise be the case. The same is true for a physician who makes a careful, caring and deliberate decision to administer sufficient analgesia to relieve pain, even though it may shorten life. For example, several ethicists and doctors, among them Doctors Dion and Morrisette, who oppose any change to our laws, told the committee that totally sedating a patient, perhaps irreversibly, which is a technique practised today sometimes in palliative care, is very close to euthanasia.

All these decisions are taken by competent individuals. They all require the assistance of a physician. The foreseeable consequence in each case is hastening death.

If there is no moral distinction between any of these acts, why do we continue to make a legal distinction? In my view, it is beyond doubt that the vast majority of Canadians want the legal right to make the decision to terminate their life when necessary either by way of assisted suicide or voluntary euthanasia, in the same way that they now have the legal right to make a decision with respect to withholding or withdrawing life-sustaining treatment.

Since 1968, Gallup has conducted 10 national polls asking the following question, possibly with slight variations: "When a person has an incurable disease that causes great suffering, do you or do you not think that competent doctors should be allowed by law to end the patient's life through mercy killing, if the patient has made a formal request in writing?" The "Yes" vote has risen steadily each year since the question was first asked, from 45 per cent in 1986, to 76 per cent in December 1994. Surely, that is telling us legislators it is time to act.

Since the debate about euthanasia and assisted suicide will continue, probably far beyond the vote which will eventually take place in Parliament, I thought it important that the views of all members, whether they oppose or support legalization of these practices, be fully set out in the report. I can tell you what probably influenced my thinking the most, even more than my firm adherence to the principle of personal autonomy. It was the accounts of pain and suffering, both relievable and unrelievable, which we all listened to.

The committee learned that of all the people who experience pain and suffering, especially in the final phases of their lives, about 95 per cent can be relieved with good palliative care, of which proper pain control is an integral part.

• (2140)

That would be under ideal circumstances, which those witnesses admitted was far from the present situation in Canada. Even if we accept that figure as being possible today, there remains approximately 5 per cent whose pain and suffering — physical, emotional and psychological — are unrelievable. In Canada, where over 200,000 people now die each year, that means that there are approximately 10,000 individuals to whom we can offer no hope of relief if any of them were to say, "Please help me to go quickly. I cannot stand it any more."

Must the family, friends, and physician continue to stand by helplessly, offer sympathy, or sedate them into oblivion or a state of living death, as is apparently sometimes done in palliative care? Many physicians would help them to go peacefully, but they are afraid of being prosecuted under our law. Some help anyway, fearfully and surreptitiously. Others are opposed to changes in our law because of their personal concept of ethics, and I respect their point of view. Still another group would support legalizing assisted suicide and euthanasia but not personally practise it. That is how the situation stands today.

The committee heard many documented and personal examples of bungled suicides. The assistance was usually given to the dying person by friends or relatives using instructions from a book. It was often unnecessarily but unintentionally violent, and it had to be carried out secretly. Does not the lack of professional care and knowledge and the absence of public regulation put us on the most dangerous slippery slope of all? Is this the Hobson's choice those people must make — that is, a clandestine finale for them and a fearful and perhaps shameful experience for those who assist them; otherwise the endurance of increasing and unrelievable suffering until the end finally comes?

I was pleased when Senator Keon made the difficult decision to support the legalization of assisted suicide. He was unable to support legalization of voluntary euthanasia, but I understand that and respect his reasons. As he explained, one of the important considerations to him was that in suicide the act is committed by the person, while with voluntary euthanasia, the act is committed by another person.

Although I accept that distinction, it is the only one which differentiates these two practices. There are two other critical factors involved here. The first is that in both cases, the person making the decision to request an assisted death is fully competent and is making it freely and without coercion. The second is that by only legalizing assisted suicide, we automatically discriminate against those competent people who are physically incapable of performing the final act.

To illustrate the inequality which would result: If I am suffering unrelievably but have some use of my limbs and faculties, and assisted suicide is legal, I may receive the necessary means to die from an assisting physician; if voluntary euthanasia is not legalized at the same time and I can no longer move my arms, I would be able to obtain the means to commit suicide from a physician, but I would not be allowed assistance in bringing the glass of water to my mouth so I could swallow the pills. Surely, more severely physically disabled people should not be doubly condemned to go on living in agony while all others would be permitted to receive assistance to end their suffering.

I wonder how I shall comfort my friend Sharon Gate, who has had multiple sclerosis for over 20 years and, with the progression of the disease, is now paralyzed to her neck. She is a former nurse and has a wonderful spirit, even though she knows very well how the disease will continue to progress. She has told me that, if only it does not get any worse, she would be happy to live as she is for another 20 years. I can only tell her to hold on to the hope that the Parliament of Canada will have made the changes she and so many others want before her life becomes totally unbearable. Her doctor is hoping the same, because he has told her he will not let her suffer. That is just one more example of how many doctors are being torn between the law as it now is and what they perceive to be their duty to their patients.

The same safeguards which the minority members recommended be applicable to assisted suicide, or even more stringent ones, would be required for the legalization of voluntary euthanasia. The report stressed — and I believe this very strongly — that before any debate takes place in Parliament on either a resolution or a draft legislation, a set of proposed safeguards and guidelines be formulated with the advice of the medical and other health professions and organizations, as well as people having experience and expertise in the area. The parliamentarians would then have an opportunity to recommend changes they felt necessary. They and the public could be assured how the regulations would be monitored and enforced, either at the federal or provincial levels. This preliminary measure would not commit the federal government to changing the existing laws, nor the medical and other health professions to approving changes, but it would give everyone a chance to assess the strength and security of the regulations which would be in place in case of change.

The committee did not have the time, nor did it receive sufficient advice from its witnesses to draw useful conclusions with respect to certain types of non-voluntary euthanasia. The committee has defined "non-voluntary euthanasia" as euthanasia done without the knowledge of the wishes of a competent or incompetent person. That particular category includes severely disabled neo-natal infants and persons in persistent vegetative states.

In those cases, doctors must decide if further treatment is futile because it will have no real benefit to the patient, but they can and do run into difficulties if relatives think otherwise. The same type of situation can occur when they try to determine what is in the best interest of a patient and relatives dispute the decision. The decisions might involve the withholding and withdrawing of treatment, which we know is acceptable when a competent patient gives his or her consent, but these cases involve incompetent people and someone else has to take responsibility for the act.

I understand the Canadian Medical Association has been studying these situations for some time in order to formulate protocols for decision making acceptable to its membership and, hopefully, to the public at large. I realize it is an extraordinarily difficult problem, but it is one for which the CMA must find an answer — and the sooner the better for all concerned.

• (2150)

The committee recommended that, if either voluntary or non-voluntary euthanasia remains a criminal offence, the Criminal Code be amended to provide for a less severe penalty in cases where there is an essential element of compassion or mercy. That is a significant step forward.

Though I still cannot condone what Robert Latimer did, I think anyone who has read the full dispassionate account of the decisions which the Latimer parents had to make from the day Tracey was born, the almost interminable suffering which Tracey endured and they had to accept because there appeared to be no further medical miracles to alleviate their child's pain, will find the basis for the committee's decision to ask for lesser penalties in such cases. It must be a harrowing decision for any person to make, no matter how much compassion or mercy he or she feels, whether or not that other person requests it, because of that person's unrelievable suffering.

Finally, I leave you my personal message as one who believes in the right of a person to make choices concerning his or her own life, so long as they harm no one else. Other principles, such as respect for the sanctity of life or for our perceived societal values, surely do not include forcing any person to go on living beyond his or her human endurance. When you next debate assisted suicide and euthanasia, keep an open heart and mind. I wish you well.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report of the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

NINTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the ninth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications (budget—examination on Canada's international competitive position in telecommunications), presented in the Senate on June 21, 1995.—(Honourable Senator Oliver).

Hon. Donald H. Oliver moved the adoption of the report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION—PROPOSED ORDERS ON DIRECTIONS ON DIRECT-TO-HOME SATELLITE DISTRIBUTION AND ON PAY-PER-VIEW TELEVISION PROGRAMMING—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the tenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications (Direct-to-Home Satellite), tabled in the Senate on June 21, 1995.—(Honourable Senator Oliver).

Hon. Donald H. Oliver moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, this report was tabled some two weeks ago. Many items in the report have already been adopted by the government. However, it is the wish of the committee that a few words be put on the record concerning the process the committee went through.

I have the pleasure of reporting to you on behalf of your Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications regarding the proposed Governor in Council directives to the CRTC with respect to direct-to-home broadcast satellite services and pay-per-view television programming services. Your committee conducted an intensive one-month investigation into the events leading up to the proposed Governor in Council direction orders laid before the Senate on April 26 of this year and in accordance with the 40-day parliamentary review period. This inquiry also included the events surrounding the CRTC's decision to exempt from licensing Expressvu Inc. that precipitated the directives.

The conditions set out by the CRTC in its exemption order of direct-to-home distribution undertakings has enabled Expressvu to be the only entrant into the direct-to-home television programming services market in Canada. This is so even though there was at least one other direct-to-home satellite company willing to participate in the lucrative market and to compete with Expressvu, namely, Power DirecTV Inc. It, however, cannot meet one of the stringent conditions for exemption, namely, the requirement for the exclusive use of Canadian satellite facilities, and is unwilling to apply to the CRTC for a license which would put it on an unequal footing with Expressvu. The government's directives, therefore, would overturn the CRTC's exemption decision and would establish a competitive licensing system for the provision of direct-to-home and pay-per-view services in Canada. The directives would also have the CRTC repeal or revoke its exemption granted to Expressvu to enable Power DirecTV and others to enter the Canadian direct-to-home broadcasting satellite market on an equal basis with Expressvu. Both would like to begin service on September 1, 1995.

We heard from both relevant departments, Canadian Heritage and Industry Canada. We also heard from both relevant government agencies with specific mandates to address these concerns, the CRTC and the Bureau of Competition Policy. As well, we heard from the main direct-to-home combatants, Expressvu and Power DirecTV. We also heard from directly affected industry interests, such as Telesat Canada, Astral Communications Inc., Allarcom Pay Television Limited, and the Canadian Cable Television Association. We also heard from Television North Canada, the Federation of Francophone and Acadian Communities, the Television and Radio Artists, the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, Friends of Canadian Broadcasting, the Consumers Association of Canada, and many others.

In short, honourable senators, the committee obtained the widest perspective possible on the contentious issues entailed in assessing the impacts of this new radio and television programming distribution technology on the Canadian broadcasting sector and of the proposed Governor in Council directives to the CRTC. The committee has now completed its deliberations; has formed its opinions; and has filed its report with the government.

The committee has weighed the various actions of all the principals in this debate and found that no one was without fault. All share in the blame for what went wrong. For example, the CRTC in March of 1994, when it first proposed the exemption route for direct-to-home services, stated that a condition would be that "the undertaking makes use of Canadian satellite facilities to distribute programming services to viewers on a DTH basis." This condition is similar to that applied to cable television undertakings, so, naturally, no one gave it a second thought. However, in August 1994 when the order was finally issued, this condition had been altered somewhat to include "the exclusive use of Canadian satellite facilities." All of a sudden, the word "exclusive" made its way into the exemption order, which took many industry watchers by surprise.

Had it been the intention of the CRTC to deviate from regulatory convention established under cable television distribution by including this more constraining condition on direct-to-home satellite distributors, it should have indicated so in its March 1994 public notice. The CRTC's respondents to this call for public comment could have then focused their opinions and positions on this particular issue. Further, had the CRTC done so, senators would not, in all probability, be here today listening to these remarks.

The Government of Canada, on the other hand, responded by proposing direction orders to the CRTC under section 7 of the Broadcasting Act, but may have been too zealous in its drafting of these orders. The directives appear to be of "specific application" on "narrow policy matters," rather than of "general application" on "broad policy matters" as is required under that very section of the act. The proposed direction orders may also constitute retroactive regulation, which is clearly ultra vires. The preponderant weight of all the evidence laid before the committee suggested that these proposed direction orders are, in fact, ultra vires. In the most recent directions that the government has given to the CRTC, they have managed to avoid taking a step which would be ultra vires by ordering that a licensing regime take effect before November.

Clearly, if this were not the case — in other words, had the Department of Canadian Heritage waived its solicitor-client privilege to permit Department of Justice documents to be laid before the committee, or had the Minister of Canadian Heritage, the Honourable Michel Dupuy, appeared before the committee to explain this apparent new departure in statutory interpretation — the committee may have been able to come to a different conclusion.

One thing is for sure, however. If these matters are headed to the courts, as was threatened by the CRTC and Expressvu, Canadian consumers and Canadian culture will be the big losers. The committee was told that the so-called "grey" market, where Canadians are circumventing the law prohibiting the reception of unauthorized foreign programming, was estimated conservatively to be 30,000 households. This market is growing at about 1,000 per week. These Canadians, needless to say, are by-passing Canadian facilities and are not contributing even one cent to the production and promotion of Canadian cultural goods and services, as are all other Canadians. Canadian culture is under threat with each passing day that "grey" marketeers are allowed to roam the market and sign-up Canadian households to these American satellite services.

The committee sees no reason why this should happen. A court-determined solution need not be the outcome of this precarious state of affairs. In fact, Canadian cultural policy can, and still should, respond to this new technological threat. This is the time for cooler heads to prevail; and it is time for all those directly engaged in this dispute to realize that half a loaf of bread is better than allowing the entire loaf to go the American "grey" market way. Compromising among the four parties is not only required but imperative because time is of the essence.

The committee views its role in the policy making process as an advisor to government, which stems from its removed position from the principles or combatants and its expert status in dealing with matters arising under the Broadcasting Act. The committee advanced seven recommendations to the government that it believed would rectify the existing stalemate and avert a protracted court battle. I am pleased to say, honourable senators that given the action, that the government has taken, a great number of those recommendations were in fact adopted by the government.

I will read just one in conclusion.

> The Government of Canada and the CRTC immediately take the appropriate steps to institute a licensing process to begin upon the coming into force of the Direction Orders. That the CRTC wave the mandatory administrative time constraints and notice periods in order to complete the process before September 1, 1995, so that licences can be issued on or before that date.

The only change in the government directives is the date which was changed from September 1 to November 1, but Expressvu is allowed to commence under its exemption order on September 1.

That, honourable senators, without reading the other recommendations set forth in our report, is the essence of the report that has been tabled.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

ONTARIO COURT GENERAL DIVISION

MOTION TO STRIKE SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AND REPORT UPON THE CONDUCT AND BEHAVIOUR OF CERTAIN OFFICES AND JUSTICES—POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the motion of the Honourable Senator Cools, seconded by the Honourable Senator Carstairs:

> That a Special Committee of the Senate be constituted to examine and report upon the conduct and behaviour of certain justices and barristers of the Ontario Court of Justice (General Division), raised by the Honourable Senator Cools in her speeches on Parliamentary Privilege in the Senate in terms of:
>
> (i) failing to take judicial notice of the Law of Parliamentary Privilege, the Constitution of Canada, and the laws of Canada pertaining to the Senate;
>
> (ii) failing to uphold and enforce the said laws, and the immunities and privileges of the Senate;

(iii) interfering with and frustrating the enjoyment and exercise of the said laws, immunities, and privileges;

(iv) inducing failure to observe and comply with the said laws, immunities, and privileges;

(v) impeaching proceedings in Parliament;

(vi) threatening sanctions on the vindication of the said laws, immunities, and privileges;

(vii) their conduct and behaviour generally relating to the Law of Parliamentary Privilege, the Constitution of Canada, the independence of the judiciary, constitutional comity, the dignity of the Senate, and the due administration of justice;

That the committee be further empowered to consider and report upon related matters which may concern the privileges of the Senate;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee be composed of seven members, four of whom shall constitute a quorum; and

That the Committee of Selection be instructed to decide and report upon the membership of the Special Committee.—(Speaker's Ruling)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, Senator Robertson, who raised the point of order, and Senator Cools are both present in the chamber. I have taken considerable time in arriving at my ruling, as we are dealing with two very important matters. One is the privilege of the Senate and one is the independence of the judicial system.

My ruling is as follows: Honourable Senators, a point of order was raised on Wednesday, May 10, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Robertson with regard to the motion proposed by Honourable Senator Cools to establish a special committee to examine and report upon the conduct and behaviour of certain justices and barristers of the Ontario Court of Justice (General Division). The point of order questioned whether this motion is properly worded in that it seemed to include two distinct propositions and should therefore be divided. The point of order also questioned whether in the interests of parliamentary decorum it is appropriate for the Senate to debate the conduct and behaviour of certain judges and other officers of the court whom our parliamentary authorities refer to as "protected persons."

Upon completing her statement, Senator Robertson asked for a ruling from the Chair. Both Senator Cools and Senator Grimard then commented on the point of order. I wish to thank all three senators for their contributions.

What is before the Chair is strictly the point of order and not the question of whether the privileges of the Senate have been breached in any way. I remind honourable senators that last November 16, my predecessor, the Honourable Senator LeBlanc, ruled on a question of privilege raised by Senator Cools on October 5 which involved many of the points raised in the motion now before us. At that time, the Speaker ruled that because the question was not brought forward at the earliest opportunity, it could not be priority debate. The Chair has therefore already made a decision on the matter and should not intervene a second time to determine if there is a prima facie case of privilege.

[Translation]

In her point of order, Senator Robertson referred to rule 43(2) which states that:

> If the matter is not raised at the earliest opportunity, the Senator rasing the matter may put it on notice, but the matter cannot be proceeded with under the terms of this rule.

Senator Robertson noted that it would appear that Senator Cools is availing herself of this alternative procedure and I would agree. Barring other procedural irregularities, rule 43(2) allows Senator Cools to put that matter referred to in her October 5 statement on notice and to proceed by way of a substantive motion.

On the first part of the point of order, dealing with the wording of the motion, there is a problem according to Senator Robertson in that Senator Cools' motion implies two different propositions. These are:

i) that a bona fide question of privilege been established; and

ii) that a special committee should be established to examine the conduct and behaviour of the justices and barristers involved in this alleged breach of privilege.

In supporting her case, Senator Robertson referred to Beauchesne's Sixth Edition, citation 557(1) at page 172 which states that:

> A motion which contains two or more distinct propositions may be divided so that the sense of the House may be taken on each separately. The Speaker has a discretionary power to decide whether a motion should be divided.

I note, however, that Beauchesne goes on to say in citation 557(2) that:

> It is only in exceptional circumstances, and when there is little doubt, that the Speaker may intervene and, of his or her own initiative, amend the motion proposed by a member.

And according to Erskine May, Twenty-first Edition at page 336:

> A complicated question, however, can only be divided if each part is capable of standing on its won.

In Canadian parliamentary history, such dividable motions have been very rare.

[English]

In the Chair's opinion, while Senator Cools' motion does involve more than one idea, the propositions contained therein are all related. Given the way the motion is worded, I cannot see how it could be divided since the parts are not capable of standing on their own. Even if the motion were divisable, it would not render the motion out of order.

• (2210)

The second part of Senator Robertson's point of order, that the motion offends the established parliamentary practice that prohibits, or at least restricts, references to judges in the form of any personal attack or censure, is the more difficult for me to determine.

In order to be very clear on what might possibly be at issue in this aspect of point of order, I examined closely the arguments that were presented in May, and I have reviewed the authorities on the relationship between Parliament and the courts, particularly with respect to the censure of judges and their possible removal from the bench. Among the works that have been consulted are Alpheus Todd's On Parliamentary Government in England, Halsbury's Law of England and most important, perhaps, a treatise by Shimon Shetreet entitled Judges on Trial: A Study of the Appointment and Accountability of the English Judiciary published in 1976. I have also reviewed some of relevant Canadian and British precedents as well as a 1994 decision of the Federal Court, Trial Division, in the case of Gratton v. Canadian Judicial Council. I have felt it my obligation to undertake this review in order to provide some guidance to this house on a matter of importance and consequence.

In explaining her second objection, Senator Robertson quoted a passage from Erskine May, at page 380, which states, in part, that:

> ...reflections on a judge's character or motives cannot be made except on a motion, nor can any charge of a personal nature be made except on a motion. ... Any suggestion that a judge should be dismissed can only be made on a motion.

This practice has been sustained in recent years by various statements or comments by the Speaker of the British House of Commons. For example, on December 4, 1973, the British Speaker observed that:

> No charge of a personal nature can be raised except on a motion. Any suggestion that a judge should be dismissed can be made only on a motion.

Again, on July 2, 1987, the Speaker stated that:

> It is not in order to criticize a judge. That must be done by motion.

Although the Rules of the Senate are not explicit on this point, I do not believe that any senator would doubt the need to support such a practice either to maintain order and decorum in our debates or out of respect for the independence of the courts.

While recognizing the importance of maintaining the independence of the courts, it is still clear that Parliament does have the authority, and indeed the responsibility, to act when required. Senator Robertson referred to the Constitution Act, 1867, section 99(1), which states that:

> ...the Judges of the Superior Courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor General on Address of the Senate and the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Our parliamentary history presents only a few instances when Parliament even considered availing itself of this constitutional right.

The most recent case, and the only one in which the Senate participated in such action, was in 1966 when the Senate agreed to join with the House of Commons to enquire into and report on the expedience of presenting an address to His Excellency praying for the removal of Mr. Justice Léo Landreville from the Supreme Court of Ontario.

This action followed the presentation to Parliament of a report commissioned by the government to examine allegations of impropriety that predated Mr. Justice Landreville's appointment to the provincial Supreme Court. This document written by the Honourable Ivan C. Rand determined that there was sufficient cause to seek the removal of the judge.

The report also provided examples of British precedents where the conduct of judges had been reviewed by Parliament. There are, therefore, both constitutional provision and parliamentary precedent for such action by Parliament.

[English]

In order to further clarify the situation, I believe it would be useful to quote more extensively from the remarks made by the British Speaker referred to earlier. On December 4, 1973, when the House was about to begin debate on a supply motion, the Speaker made the following statement:

> Before I call the right honourable Member ... to move the motion, I want to say this to the House. Certain inquiries and representations have been made to me about the scope of this debate. I do not in general believe in ruling upon hypothetical situations, but on this occasion however it might be helpful if I try to give some guidance.
>
> Any Act of Parliament which the courts have to operate can be criticised as strongly as honourable or right honourable Members desire. It can be argued that a judge has made a mistake, that he was wrong, and the reasons for those contentions can be given, within certain limits.
>
> I wonder whether I might read to the House what Lord Atkin, one of the great judges of this century, said some years ago on this subject. He said:
>
> > But whether the authority and position of an individual judge, or the due administration of justice is concerned, no wrong is committed by any member of the public who exercises the ordinary right to criticising, in good faith, in private or public, the public act done in the seat of justice. The path of criticism is a public way, the wrong headed are permitted to err therein; provided that members of the public abstain from imputing improper motives to those taking part in the administration of justice, and are genuinely exercising a right of criticism, and not acting in malice or attempting to impair the administration of justice, they are immune. Justice is not a cloistered virtue; she must be allowed to suffer the scrutiny and respectful, even though outspoken comments, of ordinary men.

In assessing Lord Atkin's position, the British Speaker continued and said:

> That is very much the attitude of mind with which the Chair will approach this debate. Reflections on the judge's character or motives cannot be made except on a motion. No charge of a personal nature can be raised except on a motion.

For my part, it would seem that while reflections on a judge's character are not permitted as a general rule of debate since the people occupying these positions are described, according to Beauchesne in citation 493, as "protected persons" and to do so is unparliamentary, precedent shows that it is permissible to make such reflections if it is done by way of a substantive motion. Senator Cools has given appropriate notice and made such a motion. Although the motion does not specifically call for the removal of a judge of a superior court, the rules do not indicate this is necessary at this point. Parliament has the constitutional right to request the dismissal of a judge, and I would hesitate to interfere with this right in any way.

In adopting this position, I am guided by a precedent that happened in our own House of Commons in 1883. On that occasion, a member moved a motion to inquire into the actions of a county court judge who had refused to authorize a re-count of ballots in his electoral district. During the course of debate on the motion, one member went so far as to suggest that the motion was possibly out of order, but did not actually seek a ruling from the Speaker to confirm his suspicion. Instead, the House itself came to a decision on the motion after a fairly short and vigorous debate. I believe that the Senate would be better served if it were provided with a similar opportunity to decide the fate of this motion.

Let me make clear again that the Chair is not in any way acknowledging the merits of the substance of the motion or the allegations made therein but commenting strictly on its form. This is what Senator Robertson's point of order requested that I do. The role of the Chair is not to determine whether a motion is wise or not — that is for honourable senators to decide. The role of the Chair is to determine if a motion is in order according to rules and precedents. It will be up to the Senate to determine if it wishes this special committee to be established. My ruling is that I cannot accept the point of order. The debate on the motion may continue.

Order stands.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Motions:

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin, pursuant to notice of June 19, 1995, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have the power to sit from Monday, September 25 to Friday, September 29, 1995 inclusive, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and pursuant to rule 31, I propose to modify the motion to read:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have the power to sit from Tuesday, September 26 to Friday, September 29, 1995 inclusive, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted to amend the motion as proposed by Honourable Senator Beaudoin?

Hon. Sharon Carstairs: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of Senator Beaudoin?

Does this mean that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs could not sit between now and September 26, or could the committee also sit between now and September 26?

Senator Beaudoin: The purpose of this motion is to allow the committee to sit while the house is sitting because, obviously, in the second part of September, this Senate may be called back. We want to be quite sure that the committee can sit at that time in accordance with the rules.

As to the second part of your question, I do not consider that we are precluded from doing sitting between now and September 26. When the committee adjourns, it will adjourn to the call of the Chair.

I do not want to take a chance that the Senate may be sitting during the second part of September and the committee would have to cancel its meetings.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Beaudoin. He referred to dates in September. Until then, we still have the rest of July, the whole month of August and the first half of September.

There seems to be no reason why you could not sit during the next few weeks. If the Senate happens to be sitting at the time you want to schedule your meetings, you can go to the Senate and ask for permission to sit in committee while the Senate is sitting.

I do not see why you are anticipating a hypothetical situation this far ahead, that is to say, whether or not the Senate will be sitting at the time you want to sit in committee in September.

I do not see why you cannot sit right away. After all, you have plenty of time during the summer.

[English]

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I believe the committee simply wants to plan and organize its witnesses. The members need time to do that. If the Senate sits in that week, there may not be time to get permission then to sit while the Senate is sitting. That was part of the reason for this motion.

[Translation]

Senator Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I just do not want to waste two precious days. Yes, I could move a motion when we come back. It is very likely the Senate will be recalled at that time. However, if I wait until the Senate is recalled, it will take a day or two before we can sit.

As for why we could not sit on some other day, as I told Senator Carstairs, there is of course no objection to sitting earlier.

I wonder, however, why we are hearing these remonstrations against the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. For the past year and a half at least, the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee has been sitting more often than any other committee.

Of course we can sit in July, August and September and even on Christmas day. I have no objection. In any case, the committee needs a quorum to be able to sit. That is one point I am considering.

Senator Corbin: Senator Beaudoin obviously misinterpreted my comments when he referred to remonstrations.

That was not my intent. I was merely asking for information. I just want to know why you want to proceed the way you suggested. That is all.

I am certainly not criticizing your committee, but I may add that the Special Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide also sat for a long time, even late at night. In fact, you sat on both committees.

Senator Beaudoin: It was quite an experience.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion as amended?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, as amended.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, July 12, 1995, at 1:30 p.m.
