ment scheme when they might not take up an insurance scheme. Therefore, it was not intended to be a scheme to pay large annuities. My hon. friend is now going into competition with insurance companies. I do not know that any great harm can come from that, but it is quite evident that his viewpoint is not quite the same as that of the former minister who devised the scheme. No exception can be taken to the increase in interest in a given case. Money is worth more than in former times. Out of that, however, a suggestion arises, that I perhaps do not want to press too strongly. It seems to me that the argument that is used in favour of an increased rate of interest might also apply to an increased rate of interest on savings bank deposits. The rate of interest on savings bank deposits ought not, I grant, to be changed frequently. If you increase it, you cannot very easily take it down; and if there were a temporary hardness of the money market which would seem to make money dearer, I should not think that would be a reason why the interest on savings bank deposits should be increased. But where you have a continued condition running for years with a high interest value for money, I think the question of the rate of interest in the savings bank presents itself in a stronger light than in former times. I remember one occasion when a strong argument was put up to increase the rate of interest in the savings bank. I did not concur in the suggestion; but as a compromise I said this: We will create a Government stock of 3½ per cent, and if the people who have money in the savings bank attach sufficient importance to getting the higher rate, they can convert their savings bank deposits into 3½ per cent stock. I did not expect that very many would do that, and as a matter of fact very few did it. People who put money in the savings bank are of a class that does not understand finance; the question of rate of interest is not a very serious matter to them; what they want to know is that the money is there; that the Government is behind it, and they can get their money when they want it. I do not know, if my hon. friend were to increase the rate of interest on savings bank deposits, whether he would get much thanks for doing so. In the face of present conditions, however, where you have had a long period of years during which money has been getting dearer, and it is probably going to be dearer next year than this year, the minister might consider whether he would not be justified in increasing the savings bank rate.

There is another point. My hon. friend has intimated that the Government want to make this annuity system more popular. I do not know whether he has at hand any evidence to show to what extent people have taken advantage of this annuity scheme, but I think he is quite correct in implying that it is not very popular. I do not wish to introduce a note of complaint regarding his predecessor, but what happened was this. When this annuity scheme was devised, it was realized by its promoters that it was like insurance; that it was a good thing, but that people do not usually take out insurance until somebody goes to them and explains the matter—canvasses them. I suppose nearly three out of four members of this House will confess that their first insurance policies were taken out, not because they had the economic law in mind, but because some clever agent came and put the proposition before them. So we realized that if we expected to make this annuity scheme a success, we would have to do something to advertise it; that we would have to send men into the field to explain it, and we accordingly appointed a number of lecturers—I think they were called, agents,—canvassers to do that service. In the year 1911 a remarkable event happened——

Mr. McMASTER: A sad event.

Mr. FIELDING: —and a change of Government occurred. The Government that came into power decided that those lecturers were not necessary; that they were not any good, and the Government quietly dispensed with their services. Of course, it so happened that those lecturers had been appointed by a Liberal Government, and, perhaps, it would be wrong to suggest that that had anything to do with their services being dispensed with, but still the fact remains that the services of those lecturers, who were to be the canvassers to make this scheme successful, were dispensed with. We were told that the Government were going to substitute for that a better system; that they were going to make the postmasters of the country agents; that the postmasters were to give all the information. Soon after that information had been given out in the public press, I was in a large important town, a shire town down East—I shall not mention the name. I went to the postmaster, and I said: "I want information about the annuity scheme." He said: "What"? I said: "The annuity scheme." He said: "What annuity scheme"? Well, I gave him a little outline of what it was, and I said that it had been announced by the Government in the public press and otherwise that this scheme was to be carried out by the postmasters, and I said: "I suppose you have some instructions in regard to the matter." He said: "I suppose I have." He agreed to look for instructions, and a day or two afterwards when I asked him about them, he said that he supposed they had come, but he could not find them. It is not surprising under those conditions that the annuity scheme proved a failure. I do not know what method my hon. friend has in mind of putting the information before the public; but I would strongly advise him, even at the risk of not having Liberal appointees, to adopt the principle of the insurance companies and to send somebody amongst the people to explain the whole scheme to them, and then he will not have to come before the House and say that the scheme is a failure.

Mr. M. CLARK: The conversation to which we have just listened as well as we could at this end of the room is very interesting to me as illustrating how careful Governments should be in taking up business that on the whole would be just as well—or in nine cases out of ten better—done by private individuals. I notice the original Act dates back from the year 1908, and I am pretty sure that if I had been in the House then I would have protested against the original Act, although I would have been a very young member, on the ground that it is not desirable on general grounds that the Government of a great country like this should undertake business which is being done by private individuals. I think that general ground is a sound ground. This is just another example of that system of paternalism which is proving such an attraction to the comparatively limited population of a country like Canada. The worse fault that is taking hold of people to-day, so far as I can see, is that everybody wants to be governing his neighbour; people have a passion for looking after other people, and by means of the Government. I endorse what has been said by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) as to the original intention of this Act, and I must say that I listened almost aghast to the remarks of the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) in so far as those remarks showed that, with a lightness of heart, he was prepared to embark upon a scheme of money-making on behalf of this Government, in the conduct of a business which, I repeat, is properly the business of insurance societies.

Where are we going to end if these ideas of the functions of a Government are to prevail on both sides and in all corners of this House? We shall end in the buildnig up of a top-heavy bureaucracy, that is where we shall end. Men of all political persuasions are telling our people that what this country needs at the present time is production, and any one who knows Canada knows that there is an ample field for the activities of individuals in almost any line of human endeavour. There is an ample field for individualistic enterprise, and that is what the country wants—individual effort, for their own sakes in the first place, and to the certain advantage of the country in the second place. If you keep on extending the sphere of governmental action you inevitably keep on increasing the number of your civil servants. We are told we have far too many already, and that we ought to economize by carefully reducing their numbers, and certainly by being most careful in making new appointments. I think that is so, but if every second man you meet from the Atlantic to the Pacific is seeking for a Government job, without any regard to the preaching of annuities or anything else, how are you going to increase your production? I want just in a sentence or two to warn my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) against letting this idea of Government go too far with him. I am charmed with his first appearances in this House. His powers of exposition are great, but his political experience is brief, and I hope he will consult very frequently the Acting Prime Minister before he gives out such novel, radical, and I had almost said, Bolshevist doctrines. I suppose if we had a Soviet form of Government, everything would be in the hands of the Government, but I do think on the whole that annuities would be better handled by insurance companies than by any government that I can conceive of or have seen in Canada hitherto.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I can assure my hon. friend that I am very, very open to instruction in politics in every direction. I know I can get a lot of information from my hon. friend, and I hope he will be kind enough to give it to me from time to time. But with reference to this particular matter I really had the idea that Government annuities were supposed to be a good thing, and that they were not at all novel. My idea, I think, is not very far from the truth. Certainly I do not desire to have an army of men trying to sell Government annuities. My opinion is that the Government annuity business should be either stopped entirely or put upon such a basis as will recommend itself to the people whom we are asking to invest in them. Every one will agree that the original idea of Government annuities was to help the people who bought them. But they do not help if the terms are such that it does not pay any one to take them out. Annuities were surely never intended to be issued upon a basis that would give the Government an infinitely greater return that it had a right to get. They were established for the purpose of encouraging and helping people to save. Of course, we need production in this country, but we also need saving, and probably need it almost as much as production. Production and saving ought to go side by side, but you are not going to help saving by offering only 3 per cent. We may, and I hope we will, get people to save by making the changes I have suggested.

Resolution reported.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 16, to amend the Government Annuities Act, 1908.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. C. C. Ballantyne (Minister of Marine and Fisheries), for the House to go into Committee on the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal sections eighty-five to eighty-nine, both inclusive, and section ninety-one of the Canada Shipping Act, chapter one hundred and thirteen of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, and to re-enact in lieu thereof:—

1. That every British subject who,—

(a) served as a master or mate of a sea-going or coasting sailing vessel of over seventy-five tons, gross tonnage, before the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and twenty, for a full period of twelve months within ten years immediately next preceding the date of his application for certificate of service,

(b) produces satisfactory evidence of his sobriety, experience, ability and general good conduct on board ship, and

(c) passes the sight test and the prescribed examination in signalling, shall be entitled, on payment of the prescribed fee, to a certificate of service as a master or mate of a square rigged or fore-and-aft rigged sea-going or coasting sailing vessel not exceeding seven hundred and fifty tons, registered tonnage, according as his service has been (a) as master or as mate, (b) on a sea-going or on a coasting sailing vessel, (c) on a square rigged sailing ship or on a fore-and-aft rigged sailing vessel.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

2. That in every such certificate of service the name, place and date of birth of the person to whom the same is issued shall be stated, and each certificate shall specify whether the holder is entitled to act as master or mate, whether the certificate is for sea-going vessels or for vessels in the coasting trade, and whether for square rigged sailing vessels or for fore-and-aft sailing vessels, and that it is not for any vessel exceeding seven hundred and fifty tons, registered tonnage.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I presume that this is the proper time to discuss the principle of this resolution. Legislation very much akin to what is aimed at by this resolution was introduced in the latter part of one of the sessions last year by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), but it met with such vigorous opposition from hon. members, including myself, that the minister thought proper to withdraw the Bill. Now the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) comes forward with a resolution, not exactly word for word, but on almost precisely the same lines as the legislation introduced by the hon. member for Halifax last year. We all know that a certain standard of education, experience and ability is required of professional men in this country. In the case of lawyers, doctors, engineers, or any other professional men, certain educational requirements have to be met, and certain experience must have been had before they are permitted to practice. I venture to say that captaincy and charge of ships has been regarded not merely as a profession in this country, but as a very honourable and very onerous profession for the last hundred years and more. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries now brings before this Parliament legislation that would do away entirely with educational requirements in the case of a man whose duty it is to take charge of a ship.

According to this resolution, if a man obtained a certificate ten years ago stating that he had served on board ship for twelve months somewhere in Canada, now, after the lapse of that time during which he may have done anything else and may have forgotten all about seamanship, he can claim a license as a captain qualified to put to sea with a crew. The sections in Chapter 113 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, Sections 85 to 89 inclusive, are very simple in their requirements and are not, I think, too exacting. If this proposed legislation were restricted to coasting vessels there would not be so much danger. But it is also contemplated to license such men as I have mentioned to go across the ocean. What would happen to such a captain if he went to Liverpool? He might take his ship there but he would never be able to leave, because his certificate would be regarded as a mere "scrap of paper." He would have to show a certificate recognized on the other side by the Board of Trade. It is possible that the minister may have consulted the English Board of Trade and obtained their approval of this Bill. If he has not done so, I fear that the captains who may possess these unsatisfactory certificates will find themselves in difficulty in the Old Country. We know of instances in which engineers have gone from Canada to the Old Country with certificates that were good enough here but were rejected on the other side, and in this predicament competent engineers had to be secured to clear the ships from the ports in England. I earnestly submit that in order to take charge of an ocean vessel a man must have adequate knowledge of seafaring and be able to ascertain his position by the use of the proper instruments. So far as I am concerned, I desire it to be distinctly understood that I repudiate any responsibility that might accrue by the enacting of such legislation as this, for I think it is a most dangerous thing to put life and property in the hands of incompetent captains. The insurance companies of this country, I think, would refuse to insure ships or cargoes intended to be sent to sea under the control of men who were palpably incompetent in every sense, at least in the matter of training. The minister was not in the House when the Bill to which I have made reference was introduced. If he had been he would recall that both our own law and the English law on the subject were cited, and that after due consideration of the facts the hon. member who introduced the Bill deemed it wise to withdraw it. I am therefore surprised that within such a short time the minister should seek to establish such a low standard of seamanship in this country. In conclusion, I can only emphasize my protest and leave the responsibility entirely with the minister and those who may be disposed to implement this resolution by an Act of Parliament.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I was not present at the special session of the House when the then acting minister introduced the Bill in question, which was not similar to, but different from this. That Bill applied to sailing vessels propelled by auxiliary power, but this resolution does not apply to such vessels. It applies only to "sailing vessels," of a certain tonnage. Under the Shipping Act any master who served on a sailing vessel prior to 1870, if he were alive to-day, and were sober, experienced and of adequate ability and general good conduct, would be entitled to a certificate on the payment of the prescribed fee. The hon. member will at once realize that we could not expect men to be fit captains of sailing ships who had served prior to the year 1870, and this resolution seeks to repeal Section 85 of the Shipping Act, and to enact that any man who has served on a sailing vessel for twelve months within the past ten years and possesses the qualifications to which I have referred, in addition to a knowledge of signalling, shall be granted a service certificate. This is nothing new. We are merely bringing the Shipping Act up to date, and it is difficult for me to apprehend the reasoning of the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) in his argument that the legislation proposed is unusual and hazardous.

I wish to say to the hon. member that the service certificate that shall be granted to an officer who desires to become a master of a sailing ship, should this resolution and the Bill that is to be based upon it pass, is a service certificate that will be recognized just th same as a competency certificate. There is absolutely no difference so far as recognition by the English authorities is concerned between the service certificate and the competency certificate.

With regard to the other clause, I wish to have section 86 of the Act repealed also because a mate cannot obtain a service certificate without going back as far as 1883. Surely hon. members will not object to the changes that the resolution calls for in order that both a master and a mate, instead of having to go back to 1870 for the master and 1883 for the mate, may, upon a service of ten years be capable of obtaining a service certificate. During the last few years captains and mates of sailing vessels have become very scarce; in fact; they were so difficult to get that during the war I had to take the necessary authority under the War Measures Act to grant service certificates to masters and mates of sailing vessels. My object in bringing forward this resolution now is to meet the absolute necessity that exists for more masters and mates by enabling them to get service certificates for sailing ships. The Act introduced at the special session of the House was for sailing ships driven by auxiliary power. This resolution is confined to sailing craft only. There is another section of the Shipping Act—section 87—that I desire to have repealed. It provides that a vessel shall be only 100 registered tons and not over 150. The resolution stipulates that the tonnage may be increased to 750 tons. My hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) comes from a maritime province, and I am sure that he appreciates better than I do the fact that those experienced men who have been on sailing ships for a number of years, while they may not be able, owing to lack of education to pass the competency test and therefore obtain competency certificates, are just as good men and just as competent, providing that their eyesight is all right and that they understand signalling, as others who may be better equipped as far as education goes. But we cannot put men on sailing vessels who are seventy years of age. I therefore wish to repeal the clause so as to provide that masters and mates who have served, within the past ten years, for twelve months on board a sailing ship may be granted a certificate providing they have the qualifications that I have referred to.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If it is agreeable to the House I would move that we adjourn at six o'clock, but I would like, before we do that, to take Private Bills so as to get them one stage farther ahead.

On the motion of Mr. Duff the debate was adjourned.

SECOND READINGS—PRIVATE BILLS.

Bill No. 4, to incorporate Armor Life Assurance Company.—Mr. Griesbach.

Bill No. 5, respecting The Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company.—Mr. Crowe.

Bill No. 6, respecting the Canadian Mining Institute, and to change its name to The Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 7, to incorporate The T. Eaton General Insurance Company.—Mr. Mowat.

Bill No. 8, to incorporate The T. Eaton Life Assurance Company.—Mr. Mowat.

Bill No. 9, to incorporate Scottish Canadian Assurance Corporation.—Mr. Mowat.

Bill No. 10, respecting The Trust and Loan Company of Canada.—Mr. Cronyn.

On the motion of Sir George Foster, the House adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

Monday, March 15, 1920.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS TABLED.

Amendment to Radio-Telegraph Regulation No. 92.—Hon. Mr. Ballantyne.

Report of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment.—Mr. Hugh Clark.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

BOARD OF COMMERCE.

*Mr. PARENT:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to abolish the Board of Commerce?
2. If not, does the Government intend giving said Board, by means of legislation, more powers with regard to either textile, dairy or newsprint situation?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. The Government has not had under consideration any legislation with regard to abolishing the Board of Commerce.
2. Answered by No. 1.

ENLISTMENTS IN C.E.F.

Mr. GRIESBACH:

1. What were the enlistments in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, 1914 to 1919, by provinces?
2. What are the number of C.E.F. pensioners in each province, and the amount paid for C.E.F. pensions in each province, as of January 1, 1920?

Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. No definite information can be furnished until all documents have been returned from overseas and compilations made, but the following are the figures for enlistments, 1914 to 15th November, 1918, obtained from returns rendered by telegraph from the several Military Districts and allotted to the provinces from which such recruits were obtained:

Ontario, 245,677; Quebec, 82,793; New Brunswick, 25,864; Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, 33,342; Manitoba, 66,319; Saskatchewan, 37,666; Alberta, 45,146; British Columbia, 51,438; Yukon, 2,327; total, 590,572.

2. Number of C.E.F. pensioners in each province as at January 1, 1920:

Ontario, 25,660; Quebec, 6,111; Manitoba, 5,411; Alberta, 6,269; Saskatchewan, 4,585; British Columbia, 6,436; Prince Edward Island, 384; New Brunswick, 2,053; Nova Scotia, 3,315; total, 60,224.

Amount paid to C.E.F. pensioners in each province, as at January, 1920:

Ontario, $5,091,200.60; Quebec, $1,212,-483.51; Manitoba, $1,073,596.51; Alberta, $1,243,32.29; Saskatchewan, $909,709.85; British Columbia, $1,276,966.76; Prince Edward Island, $76,189.44; New Brunswick, $407,-335.73; Nova Scotia, $657,729.15; total, $11,-949,043.84.

VISIT OF CABINET MINISTERS TO CARLETON-VICTORIA COUNTY.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is the Government aware that three members of the Cabinet visited the Carleton-Victoria county, New Brunswick, in the latter part of the month of October, 1919?
2. If so, what was the object of their visit?
3. Was the visit undertaken in connection with official business of the Government?
4. Was the object of the visit of these gentlemen attained?
5. Was a government private car used in connection with the visit of the ministers to Carleton-Victoria county, as above?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. The Government is aware that three members of the Cabinet visited Carleton-Victoria county, New Brunswick, in the latter part of the month of October, 1919.

2. The object of their visit was to take part in an election for a member of the House of Commons which was being held at that time in that county.

3. I do not know that any official business was transacted by those gentlemen while they were there.

4. Whether the object of their visit was attained or not can be answered by each individual according to his wishes or his views. It was not entirely barren in respect to the efforts of some of these gentlemen.

5. A Government private car was not used for the expedition.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY—OFFICIAL CARS.

Mr. FOURNIER:

1. How many official and business cars are there in use at the present time in operation of the Canadian National Railway system?
2. Are the operating expenses of these cars charged to Pullman account?
3. If not, to what account?

Hon. J. D. REID:

1. Forty-one official cars used by the management and superintendents in connection with operation over entire system of 14,000 miles.

2. No.

3. The expenses of the above cars are charged to operating expenses under the headings of administration and superintendence.

EXPULSION OF THE TURK FROM EUROPE.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

1. What is the policy of the Government on the question of the expulsion of the Turk from Europe?
2. Has the Government been consulted on this question?
3. If so, will the correspondence be made public?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: The terms of the Treaty with Turkey have been under consideration by the Government and the Government has made representations in reference thereto. An announcement will be made in due course.

MILITARY EXPEDITION TO CHICOUTIMI.

Mr. SAVARD:

1. What were the costs incurred during the fall of 1918, in connection with the expedition of a regiment, in command of Lieut.-Colonel L. A. Beaubien, to Chicoutimi?
2. How long was the said regiment stationed at Chicoutimi?
3. How many officers and men comprised the regiment?
4. How many conscripted men were exempted from military service or obtained leave of absence?
5. How many defaulters were brought to Quebec by the police?
6. How many of such defaulters died in military hospitals?

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. Pay and allowances, 15 officers and 234 other ranks, 19-9-18 to 15-11-18, $18,568.70; travelling expenses, $3,153.37; total, $21,-722.07.

2. From 19th September, 1918, to 15th November, 1918.

3. 15 officers, 234 other ranks; total 249 all ranks.

4. The number of defaulters dealt with by this detachment was 601, of which number 316 were granted leave owing to low category, 173 were granted harvest leave, 9 leave of absence, 98 sent to Quebec.

5. 98 defaulters were brought to Quebec by military police.

6. 4 of such defaulters died in military hospital; two of pneumonia and two of influenza.

THE ONE BIG UNION.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. What attitude has the Government taken toward the One Big Union?
2. Is it considered to be a legal organization?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. The Government has not given any recognition to the " One Big Union."

2. The question of the legality or otherwise of this organization has not been determined as yet by any court decision in Canada.

ILLEGAL LOBSTER FISHING PROSECUTIONS.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish & Guysborough):

1. Have any prosecutions been brought during the calendar year 1919 for illegal lobster fishing?
2. If so, how many, and what is the gross amount of the fines collected?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1. Yes.

2. 83 prosecutions; $2,350—also collected, $45 outstanding as time was given by the Justices for making payment.

STEAMER "33."

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish & Guysborough):

1. How much was paid into the Consolidated Revenue as the proceeds of the fish caught by Government Steamer "33" under the direction of Mr. J. J. Cowie, referred to on pages 46, 47 and 48 of the Annual Fisheries Report, 1918?
2. What was the gross cost of the said fishing operations for the said season, including coal, fishing nets and gear, wages, salaries, repairs, supplies, and expenditures of every description connected therewith?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1. $1,780.57.
2. $10,384.94.

IMPERIAL PRESS CONFERENCE.

*Mr. TOBIN:

1. Has it been decided to hold an Imperial Press Conference in Canada?
2. If so, when and at what place?
3. Who are to be the officers responsible for calling the Conference and carrying it through?
4. How much is Canada contributing towards the expense of the Conference?
5. Is the Government aware that the Executive Council of the National Union of Journalists has declined the invitation to send a delegate to the next Imperial Press Conference?
6. Have the Provincial Governments been asked to help in financing the Conference, and if so, have all or any of them agreed to do so, and to what extent in each case?
7. Can Publishers be included in the Conference along with Journalists?
8. Has the Conference been changed from a Conference of Journalists as was intended to a Conference of Publishers?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Yes.
2. Ottawa, August 4 to 7, 1920.
3. Canadian Press Association.
4. Under consideration.
5. No.

[Sir George Foster.]

6. Yes. Ontario and Quebec each $10,000. New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, each $5,000.
7. The Government has no information.
8. No.

CANADIAN MISSION IN LONDON.

Mr. McMASTER:

1. What was the total expense of the Canadian Mission in London from its inception to its close?
2. What are the names of those to whom salaries equivalent to one thousand dollars per annum, and over, were paid, and the aggregate amount paid to each?
3. What was the number of those who were engaged with the Mission whose salaries were less than one thousand dollars per annum, and the aggregate amount paid to all?
4. What were the expenses of the Mission: (a) for office rent; (b) for house rent; (c) for food and household expenses; (d) railway transportation; (e) motor transportation.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. The total expense of the Canadian Mission in London from its inception to the 31st January is $123,410.36.

2. The following are the names and amounts paid to those to whom salaries equivalent to $1,000 per annum, and over, were paid:

Armstrong, C. H. A., $5,407.11; Baillargeon, J. A., $916.23; Blackwell, F. V., $2,337.52; Boyle, J. W., $9,733.33; Douglas, F. P., $584; Gibson, L. C., $880.93; Hearn, G. J., $4,236.86; Henry, J., $2,447.76; Hervey, Gen'l C. F., $1,071; Lloyd, W. E., $722.17; McColl, H., $3,650.99; Matthews, M., $718.49; Walton, S., $5,266.65; Williams, $662.70; Younge, R. J., $6,759.16.

3. The number of those employed whose salaries were less than $1,000 per annum was nineteen, and the total amount paid to all was $7,816.40.

4. The expenses of the Mission were:

(a) For office rent, $7,412.26.

(b) and (c) No house rent was paid, but the members of the Mission received living allowances which total $22,752.57.

(d) Railway transportation is included in the travelling expense, the total amount of which is $9,329.58.

(e) The cost of motor and upkeep thereof was $3,411.05.

CANADA AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. McMASTER:

1 Is Canada to be assessed as a first class power for the expenses of the League of Nations? If so, to what expenses shall we have to contribute?

2. The Allies, notably Great Britain and France, have large armies in Turkey, Galicia, and elsewhere. Are these armies agents of the League?

3. Is Canada to be assessed for a share of their expenses?

4. What estimate does the Government make of Canada's share of whatever expenses of the League we are to contribute to?

5. What special provision, if any, is being made to meet such expenses?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Canada is included in the first-class under the International Bureau of the Universal Postal Union and therefore contributes on this basis to the expenses of the Secretariat of the League of Nations as provided in Article 6 of the Covenant of the League.

2. No.

3. No.

4. The actual amount which Canada may be called upon to contribute will necessarily depend upon the number and classification of the States which ultimately become members of the League of Nations.

5. Expenses will be provided by means of an estimate submitted to the House.

GASCONS WHARF.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

1. Why was the contract not awarded and the work proceeded with on the wharf at Gascons, Quebec, after said work had been authized by Parliament, and after tenders had been called for by the Department of Public Works?

2. Does the Government intend proceeding with this work during the present season?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. and 2. Information will be given when Estimates are laid before Parliament.

BONAVENTURE PUBLIC WORKS ENGINEER.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

Who is the engineer at present in charge of public works in Bonaventure County?

Hon. Mr. REID: L. G. Trudeau is acting as District Engineer.

BONAVENTURE COUNTY WHARVES.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

Does the Government intend repairing the wharves at St. Omer, St. Bonaventure and St. Charles de Caplan, Bonaventure county, during the present season?

Hon. Mr. REID: Information will be given when the Estimates are laid before Parliament.

MATAPEDIA VALLEY HIGHWAY.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

1. Does the Government intend giving effect to the request made by a deputation of citizens of Matane, Bonaventure and Gaspé counties for further assistance towards improving the highway running parallel to the Intercolonial railway in the Matapedia Valley on the ground that most of said highway has been displaced to make way for the railway and is at present almost impassable for some twenty miles and more through territory unorganized municipally?

2. How much has been expended on this road by the Department of Public Works since 1911?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. No.

2. $10,497.12.

RESTIGOUCHE RIVER—INTERPROVINCIAL BRIDGE.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

1. Has the Government lately received a request for the erection of an interprovincial highway bridge over the Restigouche River at Campbellton, N.B., and Cross Point, Quebec? If so, from whom?

2. Has any action been taken or is any contemplated?

3. If contemplated, is it the intention of the Government to erect a highway bridge only or adhere to the original scheme of putting up a combined railway and highway bridge?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1, 2 and 3. No.

CAMPBELLTON—CROSS POINT FERRY.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

1. To whom has the contract for the interprovincial ferry between Campbellton, N.B., and Cross Point, Quebec, been let, at what price, and for what term?

2. Is the present rate an increase over the old one?

3. Are there new conditions in the contract as to the fares and hours of service?

4. If so, what are they?

5. Who were the tenderers and what were the respective tenders?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1 and 5. Contract not yet awarded.

2, 3 and 4. New regulations provide that for six hours during the day, at times of least traffic, one round trip only will be made every hour instead of every half hour. No change in fare except that tariff for one automobile with driver is fixed at thirty cents each way, this being the same rate as for a single team.

QUEBEC, ORIENTAL AND ATLANTIC, QUEBEC AND WESTERN RAILWAYS.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

1. Does the Government contemplate taking over the Quebec, Oriental and Atlantic, Quebec and Western Railways for the purpose of linking up these roads with the Canadian National Railway System?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure).

1. Have any complaints been received by the Board of Railway Commissioners in the last twelve months concerning the service given the public by the Quebec, Oriental and Atlantic and the Quebec and Western Railways?
2. If so, what action has been taken?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. Yes. Complaints have been received from Messrs. the Hon. Chas. Marcil, Mr. John Hall Kelly, and others.

2. The complaints have been investigated by the Board with the railway company and the financial conditions disclosed do not warrant any additional service during the winter months to that being given by the Company.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure).

1. Has the Board of Railway Commissioners satisfied itself that the Quebec, Oriental and Atlantic and the Quebec and Western railways are sufficiently equipped in steam power, passenger and freight cars required for the business on these roads?
2. If not, does it contemplate doing so in view of the complaints made in this regard?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. Yes. The Board has satisfied itself that the line is sufficiently equipped with steam power also sufficient passenger cars. The company depends upon other lines for freight cars the bulk of its traffic being through traffic with other roads.

2. See answer to No. 1.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure).

1. Was the suspension of the daily train and mail service on the Quebec, Oriental and Atlantic and the Quebec and Western railways, during the present winter, authorized by the Post Office Department or by the Board of Railway Commissioners?
2. Is a daily train and mail service at present given on these roads, Sundays excepted? If not, why?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. No. The time table was filed by the railway company in the usual manner and notice given to the public of the change of service.

2. No. The present service given by the company is a tri-weekly passenger train Matapedia to Gaspé, a mixed train service Matapedia to New Carlisle, and an accommodation tri-weekly New Carlisle to Gaspé Mail is carried daily between Matapedia and New Carlisle. The reason assigned by the company for restricted service is on account of its financial condition.

EDMONTON POST OFFICE—PARCEL LOST.

Mr. MACKIE (Edmonton).

1. Has the Postmaster General's Department succeeded in placing any responsibility for the disappearance of a parcel of money, fifty thousand dollars, from the Post Office in the City of Edmonton?
2. Has George Armstrong, Postmaster, been exonerated in connection with the theft of said parcel?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. The case is still under investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

2. No charge whatever has been made against the Postmaster in reference to this loss.

ST. HERMAS POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. ETHIER.

1. Were tenders called for the postal service between St. Hermas village and the C.P.R. station at St. Hermas, Quebec?
2. What mail carrier was in charge of this service before the calling of tenders for the new contract?
3. What was the amount of this contract?
4. Why were new tenders called?
5. How many tenderers were there, what are their names and the amount of their respective tenders?
6. To whom was the contract awarded?
7. At what price?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Yes.
2. M. Lafond.
3. $348.00.
4. Contractor Lafond refused to renew his expiring contract on existing terms from 1st April, 1920.
5. Three: Janvier Lacombe, $396, reduced to $374; Euclide Levert, $587.50, reduced to $348; Zenon Filion, $600, reduced to $490.
6. Euclide Levert.
7. $348.

SKEENA RIVER SALMON HATCHERY.

Mr. DUFF:

1. Is the Government erecting and equipping a salmon hatchery on the Skeena river, British Columbia?
2. Is so, at what particular part of the river is said hatchery being erected?
3. Is it being built and equipped by contract or otherwise?
4. Were tenders asked for?
5. If so, what are the names of the tenderers and the respective amount of each tender?
6. When will the hatchery be completed?
7. Is the Williamson and Parry system for the propagation of salmon being installed in said hatchery? If so, why?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1. Yes.
2. On Granite creek, Lakelse lake.
3. Built by day labour under the direction of the resident engineer.
4. No.
5. Answered by No. 4.
6. September 1, 1920.
7. No.

CITY POST OFFICES IN QUEBEC PROVINCE.

*Mr. SAVARD:

1. How many post offices are there in the following cities: Quebec, Three Rivers, Shawinigan, Grand Mère, Rivière du Loup?
2. What is the population of each of these cities?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Quebec—Head office, four postal stations and nine sub-offices; Three Rivers—head office and two sub-offices; Shawinigan Falls—head office and one sub-office; Grand Mère—two post offices; Rivière du Loup—four post offices.

2. Population—Quebec, 108,366; Three Rivers, 23,000; Shawinigan Falls, 12,000; Grand Mère, 8,000; Rivière du Loup, 8,715.

INSTITUTIONS PROVIDED WITH MILITARY UNIFORMS.

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. How many institutions, colleges or schools in Canada, were provided by the Department of Militia with military uniforms for their pupils?
2. How many in each province?
3. What is the total number of students and pupils who have been so furnished with military uniforms at the expense of the Government?
4. What is the total cost of these uniforms?

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. 230 (odd, partly worn and under-sized uniforms).

2. Nova Scotia, 9; New Brunswick, 20; Quebec, 21; Ontario, 106; Manitoba, 4; Saskatchewan, 34; Alberta, 21; British Columbia, 15.

3. Approximately 16,000, all of whom were only partially outfitted, not completely, as stock was available.

4. $63,841.90.

MILITARY INSTRUCTORS AT EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. What is the number of military instructors sent by the Government to give military instructions in the different educational institutions in the country?
2. What is the amount paid, by month, by the Government to these instructors?

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE:

1 and 2. No military instructors are sent to educational institutions, except at the request of the educational authorities concerned, and then only when instructors are available.

At the present time there are only six permanent force instructors detailed to the physical training cadre, permanent. The special duty of these non-commissioned officers is to teach physical training in the various normal schools, at the request of the educational authorities.

In addition to these, there are two non-commissioned officers in military district No. 4, Montreal, and three in military district No. 5, Quebec, and one in military district No. 7, St. John, who are assisting in the instruction of cadet corps.

At any place where permanent troops are stationed, the general officer commanding might utilize the services of a permanent force non-commissioned officer to help with the instruction of cadet corps, if required to do so, and his services could be spared.

These instructors receive the ordinary C.E.F. rates of pay of their rank. The number varies from time to time.

C.G.S. "SIMCOE."

Mr. LEGER:

1. Was the steamer C.G.S. "Simcoe" built in Canada?
2. If not, where and when?
3. What was her gross net and deadweight tonnage?
4. When did she last undergo overhauling and repairs?
5. Was she a fit vessel for ocean navigation?
6. Was she a seaworthy vessel for the purpose which she was put to?
7. When and where was she lost?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1. No.
2. Newcastle-on-Tyne, G.B., 1909.
3. Gross 913.38; net 437.63; deadweight, unknown.
4. October, 1917.
5. Yes.
6. Yes.
7. December 7, 1917, southwest of Magdalen islands, Quebec, in gulf of St. Lawrence.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. LEDUC:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to substitute electric locomotives on the Grand Trunk railway, to enter the city of Montreal from the western limits to Bonaventure station?
2. Is it the intention of the Government to reduce the speed of the trains to six miles an hour in entering the city of Montreal, west of Bonaventure station, so as to prevent accidents?
3. Is it the intention of the Government to put in execution the project of establishing an elevated railroad on the Grand Trunk line, for the protection of the public?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. When the Government get entire control of the Grand Trunk Railway system the whole question of Montreal terminals will be considered.

2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.

DIRECTOR OF CANADIAN NEWS SERVICE AT WASHINGTON.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

1. What number of employees are on the staff of the director of Canadian News Service at Washington?
2. What are their names and respective salaries?
3. To whom is the news supplied?
4. What has been the total cost of the administration of this office to date?
5. Out of what fund are the expenses of this office met?
6. Is it the intention of the Government to continue this service?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. There is no director of Canadian News Service at Washington, but there is a director of Canadian News Service at New York. The staff consists of five.

2. Their names and salaries are: Colonel J. A. Cooper, director, $5,000 per annum; F. Hudd, $300 per month; Mrs. E. B. Sprague, $25 per week; Miss D. M. Jones, $28 per week; Miss A. Roonan, $20 per week.

3. Supplied to the American Press.

4. (17th July, 1919-1st February, 1920)—$10,185.79.

5. The expenses of the office are met by equal contributions from the Departments of External Affairs, Trade and Commerce, and Immigration and Colonization.

6. An announcement will be made in due course.

EXPERIMENTAL FARMS IN BONAVENTURE.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

1. How many experimental or demonstration stations have been established in Bonaventure county?
2. Where are they situated, in whose hands are they placed, and under what conditions?
3. Have they been successful?
4. Is it the intention of the Government to establish any other stations? If so, where?

Hon. Mr. TOLMIE:

1. Two Illustration Stations are in operation in Bonaventure county.

2. One, of 10 acres, is carried on at New Carlisle by Mr. E. M. Legallais, of Paspebiac West P. O., and has been in operation since 1916. The other, consisting of 16 acres, is carried on at New Richmond, by Mr. J. B. Cyr, of Little Cascapedia. They are under agreement to follow certain crop rotations on this land, for which they receive $5 a year for each acre. (For precise terms of agreement, see Form of Contract attached).

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

3. The results at New Carlisle are considered as fairly satisfactory up to the present; and at New Richmond, quite promising to date.

4. The establishment of additional stations in Bonaventure county is not in contemplation at present. So far, it has been possible to carry on, in the whole Dominion, some 48 Illustration Stations in all, these being located in the provinces of Quebec, Saskatchewan, and Alberta. Naturally, in arranging for new stations in any province, an endeavour is made to give first consideration to large sections of territory without any stations at all in their midst.

REMUNERATION OF RURAL DELIVERY MAIL CARRIERS.

Mr. EULER:

1. Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the state of dissatisfaction existing among the rural delivery mail carriers because of the inadequate scale of remuneration consequent upon the increased cost of living?
2. If so, is it the intention of the Government to modify existing contracts and to increase the rate of pay to the rural carriers in future contracts so as to provide for relief as justified by said increased cost of living and the increased cost of rural delivery?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1 and 2. A number of appeals have been received from rural mail contractors for increased remuneration on account of the increased cost of living. Each appeal is considered on its own merits, due regard being paid to the present rate of remuneration and the date on which the contract was entered into.

The policy of the Government is to do everything possible to ameliorate the financial conditions of the rural mail couriers, but the Post Office Act makes it unlawful to increase the rate paid to a mail contractor without first inviting public tenders except when an addition is made to the regular service or when it can be shown that the quantity of mail matter which he is required to convey has increased to such an extent as to necessitate the employment of additional equipment and couriers.

If investigation shows that a contractor entered into his contract at a time so recent as to make it possible to foresee and consequently provide against the increase in operating expenses, there could be no good grounds for any drastic action by the Government to release him; but if on the other hand, the contractor entered into his obligations at a time when it was impossible to foresee the sudden rise in the cost of operation, and is consequently, through no fault of his own, carrying on his work at a loss, steps are taken to invite tenders with a view to making other satisfactory contract arrangements which when completed would lead to his release.

CHARLEVOIX-MONTMORENCY CUSTOM OFFICERS.

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. How many custom officers are there in the county of Charlevoix-Montmorency?
2. What are their names, where do they reside, and where did they reside before appointment?
3. When were they appointed and at what salary?
4. Have the said salaries been increased since appointment?
5. If so, when and to what extent?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. Two.

2. J. G. Martel, Point au Pic, transferred from port of Quebec, December 1, 1917. Edouard Leclerc, St. Paul's Bay, at time of employment a resident of St. Paul's Bay.

3. J. G. Martel first employed at Point au Pic December 1, 1917, with salary at $1,000 per annum. Edouard Leclerc first employed at St. Paul's Bay April 27, 1910, receives $5 for each vessel entered and cleared.

4. No increase in salary granted since appointment at present station.

5. Answered by 4.

CANADIAN WHEAT SHIPMENTS TO GREECE.

*Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

1. How many cars, if any, are now loaded with wheat destined for Greece, but which cannot be discharged and relieved because Greece refuses to accept such wheat at a higher price than contracted for?
2. How long have said cars been kept idle on that account?
3. When does the Government expect to relieve these cars?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1, 2 and 3: It is not possible to say how many cars, if any, are loaded with wheat destined for Greece, but which cannot be discharged and relieved because Greece refused to accept such wheat at a higher price than contracted for. No cars are being detained at the present time, nor have any been detained for the last ten days on account of delay in loading the vessels at ports ready to receive the grain. There is now no delay on that account.

DOMINION CANNERS.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Is the Government aware that the Dominion Canners form an important combine in this country?
2. If so, does the Government intend to suppress this combine by legal proceedings under legislation against combines which are contrary to the general interests of the consumers?
3. Is the Government aware that the Dominion Canners, last year, made profits whereby the directors were enabled to declare a 19 per cent dividend?
4. If so, why the Government does not confiscate a part of these profits extorted from the consumers of Canada?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. The Government is not aware that the Dominion Canners form an important combine in this country.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. The Government is not aware of what profits were made by the Dominion Canners last year.

4. Answered by No. 3.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

How many of the 22,954 temporary appointments made by the Board of Civil Service Commissioners since the Armistice are at present on the pay rolls of the various departments of the Government?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens):

For a copy of all papers, documents, telegrams, correspondence and reports made between the Department of Naval Service and the Inspector of Fisheries in Prince Edward Island or any other party or parties regarding the sale of the lobster hatchery at Charlottetown, P.E.I.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

For a copy of all letters, petitions, telegrams and other documents relating to the retention in office, as a Fishery Overseer, of John A. Dillon, of Guysborough, N.S.

DISMISSAL OF JAMES CONNER.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, in the interests of the public service of this country and in justice to a discharged official, the Public Utilities Commissioner of Manitoba be authorized to investigate the summary dismissal, in the autumn of 1917, of James Conner, who for many years served the country as a preventive officer, and that he report his findings to this House, coupled with a recommendation as to what action should be taken in order that justice shall be achieved.

He said: Before the motion is put, Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak briefly to it. This is the third occasion on which I have made an attempt to secure justice for a faithful official. I have already told the story to the House at two previous sessions and I purpose to tell it again. I want to ascertain for myself whether or not justice can be obtained for an official who served this country as faithfully as he knew how for twenty long years, and who was summarily dismissed, receiving notice, I think, on October 4 that his services were dispensed with as from the 30th of the previous month. I brought the matter to the attention of the House two sessions ago and was promised by the Minister of Immigration that it would be investigated and that justice would be done—I think he said that justice would be done. Nothing, however, was done in the case, and last session I again brought the matter to the attention of the House when the present Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) gave his pledge that there would be a thorough investigation to the end that justice might be meted out to this official. Up to the present time, so far as I know, absolutely nothing has been done. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to cross the floor of the House and take a place with the Opposition, nor do I wish to ally myself at present with the party led by my hon. friend the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), but I do want to ascertain whether or not justice can be done by this Union Government which I have stood by with more or less faithfulness since its constitution. Of course, if justice cannot be obtained from the Government it may be necessary for me to organize a party of my own, and I will see that the right thing is done.

Mr. BUREAU: A one-man party.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Well, never mind. Some great movements have been started by eminent men, though perhaps they were not so great as the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau).

Mr. PECK: May I ask my hon. friend if he expects participating in the salary of the leader of the Opposition in the event of his crossing the floor of the House?

Mr. RICHARDSON: No. I am quite free to say to my hon. friend from Skeena (Mr. Peck) that if ever I attained to the position of leader of the Opposition I should not ask for nor expect any salary. I should take the position free, gratis and for nothing, and discharge its duties to the very best of my ability. But, joking aside, Mr. Speaker, I desire to present, as briefly as I possibly can, the facts of this case.

Twenty years ago, when the boundary was largely unguarded, I succeeded in inducing the Government to appoint a Scotchman named James Conner, who lived along the boundary, to protect the wood that existed in such abundance to the north. I think he received a salary of $200 a year, but he guarded that boundary with exemplary faithfulness. Later on, when it was necessary to have a preventive officer in that locality, Mr. Conner was appointed to the position, and I think he was given a salary of $600 a year. It is a long time since I represented that constituency, but Mr. Conner continued in that position as preventive officer with the salary I have mentioned. At a later stage I shall state what his collections were in order that hon. members may form some idea of his efficiency. When the immigration from the United States began to pour into that part of the country, Mr. Conner was appointed Immigration Officer with an additional salary of $100, and in that connection for twelve years he guarded the boundary. He looked after all the immigrants for twelve years, during which time immigration poured into the country. Now, a little over two years ago when immigration ceased and coincident with the time the Union Government was organized, a petty conspiracy on the part of some understrappers was hatched against Mr. Conner, and he was notified that his services would be no longer required. As I have already said, he received notice on the 4th of October, his dismissal taking effect in September. I wish hon. members would listen carefully to this statement, because I am sure their hearts would burn with the same indignation that filled mine when the facts were presented to me. Mr. Conner knew me and wrote to me telling me of the facts, and I wrote to the late John MacDougald, Commissioner of Customs, who informed me that the man was dismissed on the ground of economy, and that a man named Nesbitt had been sent from Winnipeg to take his place. I instituted inquiries and ascertained that Nesbitt had been appointed Preventive Officer under the Customs Department at a salary, I think, of $1,050 for one office alone, whereas this man had rendered admirable service for twenty years, the last twelve years of which period he had done work for the Immigration Department for an additional $100. Yet he was dismissed on the ground of economy, forsooth! I naturally was indignant over the whole matter, and after being elected I made an investigation that convinced me that there had been great injustice to an official whose services had been absolutely beyond reproach. I therefore brought the matter to the attention of the House, for I know not of any other way to obtain justice for this man. I am not engaged in wire-pulling with any minister or the officers of any department. As a member of the House I like to present the facts of any case such as this right on the floor of Parliament, because I am satisfied that the sense of justice which must be alive in the mind of every hon. member must recognize that justice is imperative in this instance. The man has done faithful work for twenty years, and I am determined to urge his case, and to lay the circumstances before the House as forcefully as I possibly can, until justice is obtained.

When I found out what the facts were, as I have already said, I immediately brought the matter to the attention of the House and I received a pledge from the right hon. gentleman who is acting as Prime Minister. I may read from Hansard what took place in the House. In the course of my remarks I said:

> Mr. RICHARDSON: I felt I would keep at this thing to find out whether justice could be obtained in a case of this kind. If the position had been given to a returned soldier, probably Mr. Conner would have been perfectly satisfied and so would I.
> Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will try my very best to give a declaration after what the hon. gentleman has been good enough to say about me. I do not know the least thing about the case except that I have heard the story of my hon. friend. I am not impugning that at all; it is, I dare say, correct, but I think I will have to ask my hon. friend to await an answer from the responsible head of the department—it is very dangerous work mixing in with the business of colleagues. . . . .
> Mr. RICHARSON: If the right hon. leader of the House will say that when the papers come down, if he is leading the House at the end of the session, he will make a declaration, I will subside at once.
> Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I can do that right away. A declaration will be made either by the responsible minister or by myself.

The papers came down, and what did they show? Did they show that this man was inefficient? No; they showed that one of these men in the conspiracy that was formed to injure Conner wrote to Thomas Gelly, Immigration Agent in Winnipeg, to endeavour if possible to fish up some information that this man was not efficient. Finally Mr. Gelly was compelled to report that Mr. Conner was entirely efficient. I looked over the reports, and found that the immigration inspector had reported the man as being highly capable, and I may inform the House that it would be impossible, if you went over the province of Manitoba with a fine-toothed comb, to discover a more thoroughly reliable man, a man of more unquestionable integrity and sterling worth than Mr. Conner. For the last thirty or forty years he has lived on the plains in Manitoba, having raised a large family of some ten children. With that family he has farmed some eight or ten sections of land, and in the early days, I may say, he used to be an engineer, running a threshing machine at three or four o'clock in the morning with the thermometer down to twenty-five and thirty below zero, in an effort to earn sufficient money to keep the roof over his family. I think, therefore, in view of all the circumstances, it is a matter of grave injustice that a man of strict sobriety and integrity should be summarily dismissed for inefficiency, when his career distinctly shows absolutely the reverse. It was not a matter of inefficiency, by any means, Mr. Speaker, there was a conspiracy hatched by understrappers in the department, and as a result of their machinations this man was dismissed from a post he had filled so well for such a long time. As I say, my indignation naturally burned over the affair, and I was impelled to bring the matter to the attention of this House on two previous occasions, and am bringing it again. No action having been taken by the responsible department, I am now asking that the Public Utilities Commissioner of Manitoba, a man of great probity, Mr. P. A. McDonald, who enjoys the implicit confidence of the community, be asked to make an investigation. It is due this faithful public servant that he be vindicated. He lies under the stigma of having been dismissed for lack of efficiency, and he should be vindicated without undue delay. He drew only a small salary and was a comparatively obscure official, but that is no reason why justice should not be done him by Parliament. In our eyes he ought to have the same protection as if he occupied the highest position in the land. Let us do him justice, Mr. Speaker; let us ascertain whether he was really inefficient. I simply ask that the Utilities Commissioner of Manitoba make an investigation into the matter. I think it is due to Mr. Conner that this step should be taken and that this House should know whether or not he has been improperly treated. I further ask that a recommendation be made as to what should be done in the premises. Mr. Conner said to me: "I am not asking that you shall give me my job back if there is a returned soldier who desires it, but I do ask to be vindicated." And that is what I demand this afternoon, Mr. Speaker. I am satisfied that no hon. member who has listened to the facts as I have recounted them will decline to support this motion. All I ask is that justice—simple common justice—be done to as faithful a public servant as ever occupied a position in the public service of this country. I deeply regret that my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Bolton) is not here. He knows all about the facts. He promised me that he would second the motion, present the facts to the House and endorse what I have said.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry that the hon. member for Lisgar is not here because I understood the hon. member for Springfield to point in his direction and I named him as the seconder of the motion. Not being in the House, he, of course, cannot second the motion.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON: I am sure there is some man in the House who will second the motion.

Mr. DENIS: I will second the motion.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Certainly; I am sure the leader of the Opposition or any other member would second the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is purely a question of observing the rules of the House.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Customs): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I am not familiar with the matter that my hon. friend has taken up but as I have only recently taken charge of the Department of Customs—

Mr. DENIS: I beg your pardon but I would like to make a few remarks with reference to this matter before the Minister speaks. The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) opened his remarks by saying that this matter had been brought before the House for the third time. I am aware of it because this is the third time that I have heard him speak about this man Conner. I am not interested in the matter except for the sake of seeing that justice is done. Upon the declaration made by the hon. member for Springfield, it appears to me that he has established a prima facie case. I cannot understand a member of Parliament and a supporter of the Government standing up on the floor of this House and saying to the Government that he is here for the third time bringing up a matter, which at first sight, and on presentation of the case, shows a gross injustice done to this man James Conner. My hon. friend is now here for the third time asking his own party to do justice in a case where injustice is absolutely apparent. But the hon. member for Springfield goes further. He says that he is going to bring this matter up year after year until justice has been done to James Conner. I do not blame him for doing it, not because he is speaking against his own party but because I think that a member of Parliament who brings up a question like this owes it to himself, to his own responsibility and to his own dignity to see that justice is done. Consequently I would ask the Government to act in such a way that this question shall not again be brought before Parliament. This case with reference to James Conner is going to cost the country quite a lot of money if my hon. friend from Springfield who, I hope, may be a member of this House for many years, is going to bring it before Parliament year after year and we are going to sit here year after year listening to his appeals to his own party without his being able to receive any satisfactory answer from them. These are the only remarks I have to make and I hope the Government will see fit to give a satisfactory answer to my hon. friend and do justice to this man, James Conner, because if the facts as represented by the hon. member for Springfield are true—and no one has said so far that they are not true—there certainly has been gross injustice done to this man and it is up to us to know whether we are going to see that this injustice shall be remedied.

Mr. BURRELL: Mr. Speaker, I have very little to say on this matter. As I remarked just now to my hon. friend from Springfield, being somewhat new in the Department of Customs, I am not familiar with the subject except in so far as he has brought it before the House. I saw the return when it was brought down. My recollection of it is that it was a statement by the Deputy Minister of the Interior referring to the inefficiency of Mr. Conner. I think it is quite obvious that it would be rather unusual for this House to appoint the Public Utilities Commissioner of Manitoba to investigate this particular case but I see no reason, in view of the impression that this man has suffered an injustice, why there should not be some additional investigation to ascertain whether or not an injustice has been done. As far as I am personally concerned I am quite willing that that course should be taken. It is possible that the Civil Service Commission might look into it, or, if not it might be taken up by our own Department. I appreciate what the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis) has said that it is not desirable that the time of this House should be taken up with matters of this kind being brought up again and again and I appreciate the position of my hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) who believes that there has been a real injustice done and he would like to have it remedied. I shall be only too glad to expedite inquiry in any reasonable way.

Hon. J. A. CALDER (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): I would like to add just a word to what has been said by the Minister of Customs. It would appear that the Conner matter arose about the 5th October, 1917, and neither the present Minister of Customs nor I had anything to do with the incident.

Mr. RICHARDSON: That is right.

Mr. CALDER: Now as to the facts, because, after all, it is the facts that the House would like to have. I have discussed this matter on several occasions with the member for Springfield. It would appear that this man Conner had been in the public service for quite a while. He was in receipt of a salary of some five or six hundred dollars from the Customs Department, and in addition about $100 from the Immigration Department. The member for Springfield knows Mr. Conner, I understand, well—has known him for years, knows him as a very respectable, law-abiding, decent citizen of the very best type.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Hear, hear.

Mr. CALDER: Now on the other hand—whether it is true or not I do not know—the records of the department would indicate that in so far as Mr. Conner's services in the Immigration Department were concerned they were not looked on as satisfactory. I think the member for Springfield will bear me out when I say that the files of the department indicate that—not for a short period, but a period extending over a considerable number of years—

Mr. RICHARDSON: No, I entirely dissent from that statement.

Mr. CALDER: Well, that is a fact that will have to be ascertained.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The papers will show.

Mr. CALDER: I know that considerable stress is laid in the papers upon the file that Mr. Conner was responsible—and I think contrary to warning, if I remember rightly—for allowing in a band of gypsies, whose admission cost the country a very large sum of money. In addition to that, it was almost impossible for the department to get any return or statement from him at all, and this went on for a considerable length of time. I am not stating my view of the situation, I am merely trying to indicate what the departmental records show.

On the other hand, the member for Springfield has stated that there was a conspiracy on the part of certain understrappers in the department. Well, I do not know who were in the conspiracy, or why such a conspiracy should exist. I know that when I first took the matter up in the department, Mr. Cory, who was acting as deputy minister, and Mr. Scott, who has been Superintendent of Immigration for years, intimated that in their judgment Mr. Conner was not capable of carrying on the work that the Immigration Department expected would be carried on at that point. That is their view, whether right or wrong. However, it seems to me that in view of the position taken by the member for Springfield—and I do not blame him at all if he considers there has been a grave injustice done this man, and if he thinks that the facts and statements set forth in the departmental records are not correct—there is only one thing to do and that is to get the facts. It seems to me that those facts should be ascertained, not by the Public Utilities Commissioner of the province of Manitoba, but by some officer of the Federal Government who can be trusted to do that work. I do not wish to enter into any controversy at the present time over the facts—I am merely trying to intimate what the record is so far as the file itself shows it, and what the opinions of the officials of the department are, whether right or wrong, with reference to this man's work.

Although the member for Springfield has had the opportunity, as he had last year of looking over the whole departmental record, if he is not satisfied—if he considers that further investigation should be held, then I say we should grant that investigation in order to get at the facts.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Mr. Speaker, might I have the privilege, with the unanimous consent of the House, of saying a word or two further.

Mr. BUREAU: You have the right to do so, you are closing the Debate.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for Springfield is exercising his right to reply. If any other member wishes to speak on this matter he should speak now.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I merely wish to state in reply to what the minister has said that this incident occurred before the Union

Government came into office. I was not seeking to cast any blame—of course the ministers know I was not—upon the Union Government, although the Union Government might fall just as well as any other government. I wish to make this further statement. I looked over the papers when they were brought down, and I found this extract in a letter written by the Deputy Minister of the Interior. That is what convinced me that there was a conspiracy. I will read the extract:

> I believe that your officer at that point—

Referring to Mr. Conner—

> —is very old, and, from what I can gather very inefficient. The Commissioners, who have been investigating our Immigration Service recommend that the duties of the two departments be combined and that Mr. Nesbitt be placed in charge, the cost of the service to be apportioned between the two departments.
> This is the matter about which I spoke to you over the telephone. Will you please let me have confirmation of this arrangement.

Why should the Deputy Minister of the Interior confer with the late John McDougald, Commissioner of Customs, over the telephone about the dismissal, the side-tracking, of this very decent man? Then there is the attempt to discredit him, and even the minister has fallen into the snare. The Minister of Immigration says Mr. Conner was inefficient and that he let some gypsies into the country. Now let us see about that. For twelve long years of the period that immigration poured into the Northwest from the United States, this man Conner looked after the interests of the public in connection with that department, he did it for $100 a year, and not a single complaint that I could notice was ever made against him—I will refer to the matter of the gypsies later on. So far as regards the complaint of not reporting to the Department Conner reported every month. The minister has probably taken his cue from some member of the Civil Service who has told or tried to tell him, not the facts, but a garbled story about the situation.

Now with regard to the gypsies, and that is a matter in regard to which the officials ring the changes against this old official, Mr. Conner. There were a number of gypsies who came to the province of Manitoba some years ago bringing with them $35,000. They should have made entry at Emmerson but they came to Mr. Conner who was the officer there. They had all this money, they had their horses, and they had a lot of effects, and Mr. Conner naturally thought they were settlers and he allowed them to go through. But when it was found that they had practised some deception—I think I am correct in my facts—at Emmerson the matter was reported to Winnipeg and these men were coralled, brought back and tried at the town of Morden. The minister says it cost the country a large sum of money but I do not think he knew what he was talking about. Just look at the position the Government was in at that time. The gypsies were brought up for trial at Morden. Do you suppose the Dominion Government offered any evidence against them? They did not even appear against these men at all, and they were dismissed and sent out of the country, and the cost was practically nothing—probably only a few cents or a few dollars to anybody. Then the officials start in to make it appear that Conner is an inefficient man. I think I have demonstrated to the satisfaction of this House that so far from Conner being inefficient he was the most efficient officer the department had in that country. Let me cite a few further facts, because it is worth while under the circumstances; I do not want this matter coming up every session, I want it settled right here and now. It is true the present Minister of Customs knows nothing about the matter; he has not held his present office during the last two sessions. But the Minister of Immigration and Colonization does know something about it and he might, I think—because I have great regard for him—and a personal liking—have seen that justice was done. He did not do that. The leader of the House (Sir George Foster) who enjoys the respect, I am sure, of every member of the House, gave his promise that justice should be done and I accepted that promise. I did so in good faith and I said "Now, at last, Mr. Conner will have a square deal," but I suppose in the multitude of his duties the Acting Prime Minister has neglected to see that Mr. Conner did get a square deal.

Now to show you to what extent this man Conner is neither inefficient nor useless let me read a few facts. At Bannerman, which is a little bit farther west than where he guards the boundary, the revenue in 1918 was $2,481, and the cost of collection was $2,317, very nearly the amount of the entire revenue. I do not wish to tire the House, but I would like the facts to be known. At Boissevain the revenue was $3,117, the cost $1,000; at Cartwright $604 and $900, so that the country lost $300; at Deloraine $2,145 and $900; at Killarney $1,260 and $900; at Crystal city $1,777 and $1,000; at Morden $2,887 and $1,050; at Hasket $2,208 and the salaries $1,394. But at Snowflake, where this prime old servant James Conner looked after the revenue, the collections in 1918 were $4,622 or nearly double the amount collected by any other officer in that territory. At what cost to the country? He got only $650 as Customs Officer and $100 as Immigration Officer, so it cost only $650 to collect $4,622. Yet all the other men were let go scot free, while this faithful servant, who collected nearly double the amount of revenue collected by any of the others, was dismissed for inefficiency.

An hon. MEMBER: Have you got the figures for last year?

Mr. RICHARDSON: No. I do not know what the collections would be, but I suppose they would be about the same, although the salary has been doubled. On the grounds of inefficiency and economy this fine old public servant was dismissed and a man appointed in his place at double the salary. It is such an outrageous proceeding that I marvel that my motion is not accepted at once. I am tired of bringing this matter before the department officials. I want a recommendation that will do justice to this faithful servant. Let us vindicate him. Let us not turn him adrift on the ground that he was inefficient and too old to serve his country. How will you ever get faithful service unless you treat your most menial official justly? You must give him fair play or you cannot expect decent service.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have fully covered the ground. I do not at all like the suggestion that the matter should be left to the department, because it will simply be glossed over. Let us settle it now. Let us name some tribunal to investigate this case. I lay awake many hours thinking and I finally hit upon the Public Utilities Commissioner of Manitoba, a man of honour and probity, as the best gentleman to investigate and report on the matter. But if the Government knows "a better 'ole" let them go to it. I will accept any decent investigator, but I do not want to sit down without having a decision as to what shall be done. Let us have an investigation to ascertain whether this decent old man has been justly or unjustly treated, so that I may not be forced to bother the House with this case session after session. If the Government will put their heads together and name any other reasonable tribunal it will be acceptable to me, but I want the matter settled now.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Customs): I would suggest to the hon. member that the other ministers and myself see him and arrange for some official, satisfactory to him, to deal with this matter.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Somebody satisfactory to me?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I will be perfectly satisfied. That settles it then.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member be allowed to withdraw his motion?

Motion withdrawn.

QUEBEC'S ANCIENT FORTIFICATIONS.

Mr. CHARLES GAVAN POWER (Quebec South) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the ancient walls and fortifications of the city of Quebec, having for all military purposes become absolete, it is expedient in order to better preserve these valuable heirlooms as a historical monument for future generations, that their upkeep and control be now vested in the National Battlefields Commission.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the subject which I wish to bring up for discussion to-day has been on the Order Paper for quite a long time. It is a proposal that the walls and fortifications of the city of Quebec be now taken from the control of the Militia Department and placed in an independent commission. I am pleased indeed to see the Minister of Militia and Defence (Hon. Hugh Guthrie) in his seat, and before I go any further I wish to tell him that this scheme has had the approval of his predecessor and also of Sir Sam Hughes, former Minister of Militia.

The walls and fortifications have become absolutely obsolete and useless for warlike purposes. They could not withstand a five minute bombardment by modern artillery. They would be, I imagine, more a source of danger than defence to those who manned them.

Hitherto their control and upkeep has been vested in the Department of Militia and Defence. This department, very wisely I imagine, is not too wasteful of the public moneys, and does not wish to expend money for the defence of Canada where such expenditure would be useless. Therefore I propose to rid the department of what to-day must be very much of an incumbrance.

By 7-8 Edward VII, Chap. 57, there has been created a body called "The National Battlefields Commission." This commission was constituted because, according to the preamble of the Statute:

> It is desirable in the public interest of Canada to acquire and preserve the great historic battlefields at Quebec, restoring so far as possible their principal features.

To this Commission the Federal and Provincial Governments have at various times voted considerable sums, and societies and private individuals have generously contributed. I may say in passing that that Commission has performed splendid work in Quebec, as anybody who has been there recently may see. We have a splendid Battlefields Park on the Plains of Abraham, where formerly a wilderness existed.

Now, I propose, subject of course to any considerations of military necessity, that these fortifications be taken over by this Battlefields Commission. It is not my desire to hasten the Government into adopting any scheme that may be impossible or impracticable, and I quite understand that there may be reasons of State to prevent their taking the action I suggest; for instance, the Imperial authorities in handing over the citadel and fortifications to the Canadian Government may have placed some restrictions upon their use, but of that I have no knowledge. I simply wish to ask that serious consideration be given to this subject, feeling assured that the public service will be benefited and its efficiency increased without putting one cent more cost on the public funds.

I have already stated that the value of these fortifications for practical purposes is useless. We must not forget, however, that there attaches to them a very great sentimental value in the hearts of all Canadians.

It has been shown in the history of the past as well as in recent history that, while nations may be ruled by politicians and statesmen, they are never aroused to action; they are never impelled to the doing of good deeds, until their hearts are touched and their sentiment aroused. I imagine, therefore, that in forwarding such a movement as this we shall be helping our fellow citizens and the growing generation to appreciate the better their responsibilities as Canadians. A study of the deeds of our ancestors; a contemplation of the difficulties which they underwent; a perusal of our history, will bring to our people and to the growing generation a love of country which will better fit us to assume our national status.

The history of these walls is truly remarkable—remarkable from the standpoint of the antiquarian as well as from the standpoint of the historian; an object lesson to all of us; an object lesson to the growing generation—remarkable even from the standpoint of the soldier, because it shows that the art of defensive warfare has made wonderful strides within recent years.

In reviewing this history we may begin with the day when Champlain built at Quebec a rude stockade called "L'Habitation," fit only to repel the attacks of savages armed with bows and arrows, and go on to the time when they built on the crest of the cliff a castle surrounded by a moat and a wall, called "Chateau St. Louis." Many of you may not know where the Chateau St. Louis was; its site will be more familiar to you when I tell you that it is that of the present Chateau Frontenac.

In the time of the Governor from whom the Chateau Frontenac takes its name, it was decided to enlarge the walls and spread them over a much greater area. This was done partly by the inhabitants themselves, who feared the growing power of the English colonists and their savage allies, and partly under the direction of the French kings, who realized that in Quebec they had the strategic point from which their possessions in New France might be defended. The work, however—like most Government work, I am sorry to say—was placed largely in the hands of contractors, and the contractors of that day resembled very much the contractors of our day. We read that short quantities of earth were delivered; that stones were mixed with sand; that works had to be repaired before they were completed. We read also that a certain amount of ingenuity was exercised in the carrying out of some of the schemes well known to our own modern political camp followers, such as change of plan, extras, and so on. Evidently they knew all these things in the days of Montcalm and Frontenac. However, we read also that in spite of these things, the military governors and engineers such as Frontenac, Montcalm, Denère, Delary, Franquert, Ponteroy and others undoubtedly were honest and did their best under adverse circumstances to make these walls safe against the invader. One thing, though, is certain: Wolfe's artillery men, though not armed with pieces of the heaviest weight even for that day, had no difficulty in effecting large breaches wherever they chose.

During the English regime, Murray when he was besieged by De Levis and later Sir Guy Carleton when he was besieged by continental troops, found that their sole defence against the invaders was the stout heart of the defenders. We read also that in the letters of the governors of that time innumerable complaints were made to the home office of the insufficiency of the defences and that frequent requests were made for assistants, for men, for engineers, for materials, in order to strengthen the fortifications of that city which was the last bulwark of British dominion on the American continent. No comprehensive scheme, however, was entered into until 1823, when the walls were built which enclose approximately their present area. Later still, between 1860-1870 the experience of modern warfare having shown that the only means of defence for a city was to be found in separate and detached posts situated at some distance, forts were constructed at Levis in a position commanding the river St. Lawrence. These forts have, I understand, proved to be of some utility during the recent war, and it is not my intention to ask that they be included in the plan which I propose.

It is not, however, so much the history of these bare walls and these crumbling stones to which I wish to direct the attention of the House to-day. I wish to emphasize the associations connected with them; to deal with a subject which certainly does not enter into the realm of practical politics and in connection with which there can certainly be nothing in the way of vituperation or recrimination. I hope that the House will bear with me for a few moments while I recall some of the events connected with these walls, and refer briefly to some of the men whose names are associated with them.

From the day in 1535 when Jacques Cartier, with a few scurvy-inflicted followers, entered the St. Charles river and wintered beside the Indian village of Stadacona, down to the day when the mightiest Armada which had ever crossed the Atlantic, sailed up the St. Lawrence, bearing thirty-three thousand men who with their comrades were in four years to make known the word "Canada" in regions and to populations where hitherto it was considered almost as mythical as the fabled Atlantis; whose deeds stand out pre-eminent even in a war of giants; whose heroism has attracted the attention and praise of the nations of the earth through nearly four centuries—Quebec has been the spot on this hemisphere where history was made, where heroes lived and died, where a continent was lost and won. It was here that Champlain, a soldier, sailor and statesman, first established a home and planted the Cross which was to bring to a continent the blessings of Christianity and civilization. From Quebec he set forth on those perilous journeys into unknown regions amongst unfriendly barbarous tribes which led to the discovery of the Ottawa river and the Great Lakes. Later he was succeeded by others of the same daring breed. Talon, Laval, Frontenac, all made their headquarters within these walls. Statesman and colonist, priest and educator, soldier and governor—all left on the colony the glamour of their personality and enriched our history by the shining examples which they have left to posterity. Talon, with the clear vision of genius, saw that a country hitherto popularly supposed to be useful only as an abode for criminals, adventurers and younger sons, or to be given over to the avaricious rapacity of the fur traders, could be made the home of a peaceful, happy populace, devoted to industry and the cultivation of the soil.

Laval, priest, founder and colonist, by a system of education, rendered this country at least to a certain extent independent of old France in arts, science, culture. By his firm insistence on the rights and privileges of the clergy, by his struggle on behalf of morality and decency, he raised to a higher plane the standards of living which here as elsewhere had been lowered by the licentiousness and debaucheries of some of the wilder spirits. He instilled into the people of French Canada that love of authority, that God-fearing simplicity, and sense of moral responsibility which are the characteristics of the people of the province of Quebec to-day.

A little later Frontenac arrived, during the darkest hour of the colony. He subdued the Iroquois, terrorized the colonial settlements into an honourable truce and answered the imperious ultimatum of a British admiral anchored before the walls of Quebec by a haughty and successful reply from the mouth of his cannon. He put an end for a century to come to the menace of a British invasion of Quebec. Then later came priests and missionaries, the Recollects and Jesuits, trappers and explorers. They lived and struggled and died within the shadow of these mouldering walls. Time after time the Jesuits, unaccustomed to anything but the best living in Europe, went out into uncharted country, faced death in a thousand horrible forms, and suffered martyrdom in order to bring to a new country the blessings of civilization. We must all recognize the courage of the "coureur de bois," those hardy people who explored the Mississippi and were the first to discover our great West. Hon. members from the West should be glad to join with me in helping to reverence and perpetuate their memory by preventing the walls from which they started from falling into decay. Then came soldiers from Guinne and Picardy, descendants of whom are sitting around me in this Chamber today. These men must have viewed with gloomy foreboding the vast forests which lay before them. Little did they think that within a few centuries the trees whose shadows filled them with such a sombre feeling would be utilized to make fortunes for thousands of people.

Later on, from his lookout perched high above Cape Diamond, Montcalm must have looked very sorrowfully down the St. Lawrence at the mighty fleet containing the greatest force yet sent against the colony. He must have felt approaching the climax of the long struggle on the American continent between Briton and Gaul. Time does not permit me to dwell upon the trials and triumphs of the gallant Wolfe, nor upon the great battle of the Plains of Abraham, which so effectually decided the question of supremacy in Canada. Suffice it to say that the troops engaged were worthy foes, the reckless gallantry of France being matched by the calm courage and stubbornness of Britain. The prize, too, was worthy of the contest—the capture of the gateway to the northern portion of the American continent. The combat was so fierce, even compared with modern warfare, that four brigadiers on one side and three on the other were either killed in action or died of wounds, and both officers commanding were mortally wounded whilst gallantly leading their men to the attack. So closely are the names of these two heroes associated, one over-shadowed in his last moments by defeat, and the other dying at the moment of victory, that a single monument has been erected to commemorate their glorious struggle.

The city was to be besieged again. The following year De Levis, having avenged France in a battle fought on almost the same grounds as the struggle of the previous year, sat down to starve Governor Murray and a few troops into submission. The garrison suffered incredible hardships throughout the winter, but with the spring came the eagerly awaited British fleet, and the British flag was seen unfurled to the breeze. French colonial policy then collapsed and England became possessor of the vast territories which now constitute the brightest gem in the diadem of the Empire.

Quebec was besieged once more in 1775. Continental forces had overrun the whole of Canada, till only Quebec City still remained free from the heel of the invader. Sir Guy Carleton, by his energy and ability, so stirred the inhabitants, both English and French, that the city was put into such a state of defence that it withstood almost daily attacks from the forces of Arnold and Montgomery, till in the closing hours of 1775 the final assault was beaten off, and the bravest of the surviving Americans gave up his life attempting in vain to scale the cliffs.

Since that time, though the streets and squares have constantly echoed with the tramp of armed men, though the surrounding hills every day resound with the roar of artillery, no enemy has come within sufficient distance to give cause for alarm.

In another field, however, Quebec continued to be of the greatest importance to the Dominion. Here was staged the earliest debates on responsible government. Here was established for all time equal rights for the victor and vanquished in the matter of language and religion. Here sat the first Parliament of United Canada, and here, in 1864, were laid the foundation stones of our present Confederation.

In conclusion, let us remember that the facts which I have set forth are a large part of the history of all Canadians, no matter what their country of origin may be. The men whose deeds I have recalled are our common ancestors, and the newest Canadian as well as the descendant of fifty generations here, if he be proud of his country at all, should claim them and glory in their achievements and try to emulate them. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that no more befitting legislation could be adopted in the year of the opening of this magnificent new Parliament Building, which is a symbol of the growth into a mighty nation of the few provinces for whom these ancestors of ours laboured, fought and died, than to save from decay these crumbling walls in old Quebec, these mouldering stones, which witnessed their efforts on our common behalf.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Militia and Defence): Mr. Speaker, the motion which my hon. friend from South Quebec (Mr. Power) has just made brings to my attention for the first time this important question regarding the walls and fortifications of the ancient city of Quebec. When I first saw the notice on the Order Paper, I made inquiries in the department, but we could find no record of any application having been made in the direction set out in the motion now before the House.

However, I have heard incidentally that Sir George Garneau, the Chairman of the Battlefields Commission, has asked some members of the Government that these walls and fortifications should be handed over to the Commission, and I may inform the House that at the present time the matter is under consideration by the Government and by the officials of the Department of Militia.

I must commend my hon. friend for the excellent manner in which he has brought this matter to the attention of the House in the motion which he has just moved, and also for the graceful, eloquent and charming recital which he has given to us of the history of the early days of this great country. I think many of us are far too prone to consider that the history of our common country begins about the year 1759, and far too many of us are either not informed, or else we forget that Canada has in reality a great history, an honourable history; a history adorned with all the colours of romance. From the year 1535, for nearly four centuries, perhaps the principle historic point of the whole country has been in and about the city of Quebec; and certainly not the least point of historic interest in that city, perhaps one of the most interesting of all, consists in the walls and the fortifications which originally were looked upon as an unconquerable stronghold, but which to-day under the conditions of modern warfare, would not be considered the slightest military importance. These fortifications, as I understand, came into possession of the Government of Canada under some express arrangements with the Imperial Government; but so far as my information goes, I do not think that there were any limitations whatever in the deed of gift or grant which would place any impediment in the way of the proposal to hand over these memorials to the Battlefields Commission. From the knowledge I possess of the matter—and I frankly admit that I am not very conversant with its details—I believe that the walls and fortifications are not now used for any military purpose and are not likely to be restored for such purpose by this or succeeding generations. The citadel itself is used for military purposes and troops are quartered there. The parade grounds are of course used, but the walls themselves and the fortifications connected therewith will not, I think, ever again be of any practical use to the Government or the Department of Militia. During past years, I understand, some expenditure has been made in the work of restoration, both by the Department of Militia and Defence and by the Department of Public Works. Just what that expenditure amounts to I am not at the present moment able to state, but I know that within the last three months instructions have been issued to have a survey and report made of the whole situation in connection with these walls and fortifications; and I think that in the near future some scheme will be developed and a plan devised whereby conferences will be held between officials of the department and the Battlefields Memorial Commission in order that satisfactory arrangements may be made for the handing over of these walls and fortifications to that commission. Plans have not yet been fully developed in that respect; they are still under consideration by the department and the Government. Personally, I think there should be no hesitation in carrying out the plan suggested in this motion. I am very glad indeed that my hon. friend in moving the motion stated that he did not intend to press it at the present time but brought it forward to-day with the idea of presenting the matter directly to the attention of the Government and of this House. He has done more than that. He has put upon the pages of Hansard a charming address—

Mr. BUREAU: Hear, hear——

Mr. GUTHRIE: —which I have no doubt will be very widely read in the schools and colleges of this country. He has given us a resumé of Canadian history which will be of great value, and he has clothed it in most charming language, simple and easy to understand. I think, therefore, he is entitled to the thanks as well as the congratulations of the House for the manner in which he has submitted his motion to day; and in adopting his suggestion to let the motion drop, I may assure him that the matter will be given the best of consideration of the Government.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (Simcoe North): I have no desire to prolong the debate on this motion, but I wish to correct a wrong impression that seems to have possessed the House in regard to this matter. I have had some experience in going over fortifications, and I know how those of Quebec compare with other fortifications of similar character. The city of Ypres held out throughout the war. After the British took possession of its fortifications, it was never taken by the whole force of the German army united against it on several occasions, the British army having found refuge in the casemates and the old crumbling walls of the city of Ypres. Now, the walls of Ypres were just as decrepit, and were in the same condition when the war broke out between Belgium and Germany, as are the walls of the city of Quebec at the present time. The city of Ypres was taken possession of by the army and the casemates were utilized, and other works of a temporary character were built with the walls, with the result that Ypres became impregnable. And had it not been for the manner in which that city was held there is no doubt that the war would have ended in another way. The fortifications of Quebec as they stand to-day are far stronger and in a much better state of repair than were the fortifications of Ypres, and I have no hesitation in saying, as one who has seen the effect of war on the operation of fortifications of this kind, that any general who has had experience in defending fortresses in Europe would say that the form of the fortress of Quebec would lend itself to a defence that would be impregnable in any war that might occur in this country. Let us not make the mistake that these walls in Quebec are crumbled, ancient, and of no value. Behind them are rooms where men can go in casemates, which are far stronger and better than those in the city of Ypres. Th citadel of Quebec is impregnable under modern conditions. It is all very well to say that it could be blown up by artillery fire. Artillery might have some effect upon it—there is no doubt that it would have an effect upon it—but as to blowing it up or putting it out of business as a military stronghold, it cannot be done. For that reason the Government would be ill-advised to withdraw the garrison from the citadel and to remove the Quebec fortifications. The nature of the city, and of the fortifications of Quebec assure the protection of the St. Lawrence with the guns we have now. With some of those great howitzers which we have seen in Ottawa no enemy could come up the St. Lawrence beyond a point twenty miles from the city of Quebec. Before the war it was a common saying that the Canadian army was insignificant. People used to sneer at our soldiers and at the fortifications and armament of Quebec. In spite of all that, when the real, acid test of the war came the Canadian soldier was found to be just as good as any other soldier in the world and as far as the First Division was concerned its guns and its armament filled a gap in the life of the war but for which I doubt whether history would have been written in the way it is to-day.

Nobody knows what a day may bring forth. We even now have nations rattling the sword at Canada and trying to give us a little taste of their frightfulness. We may have trouble and we must be prepared for the next five or ten years to take our place in the ranks with our British brethren in case trouble comes to Canada or to the Empire. For that reason, instead of tearing down the fortifications of Quebec and withdrawing entirely the garrison from the city, we should maintain the fortifications in good order and keep the garrison there. The garrisoning of the city is so important to the protection of the St. Lawrence that I would strongly urge upon the Government to have a commission of Imperial engineers, men who have had experience of fortifications during the war, to go over the works and see what can be done with them. Walls of a poorer character in the city of Ypres withstood the full force of the greatest German guns and offered refuge for the British soldiers throughout the war. The riding school in Ypres, which was built with great underground places as refuges for soldiers, two hundred or three hundred years ago, served as a refuge for British soldiers during the war. The ancient engineers who built these walls and the men who built fortresses of the same character as that at Quebec understood their business very well and the modern engineer has not been able to improve very much upon their work. They knew how to build fortifications. There are old text books on fortifications which were used in the time of Marlborough and their teachings are still good to-day.

Amongst other nations the fortress at Quebec is looked upon as one of the great fortresses of the British Empire and it would be a mistake if the impression were to go forth that Canada was about to dismantle a fortress which is impregnable. At Halifax another great fortress stands overlooking the Atlantic ocean. For the purposes of war and defence the fortifications at Quebec are just as modern as any fortifications that could be designed to-day. All you would have to add would be outworks in the form of earthwork which could be done at any time in a day or two. I hope the impression will not go abroad, or that the Minister of Militia will not gain the impression, from the remarks which have fallen from the hon. member for Quebec city (Mr. Power), that the fortress at Quebec is useless, because there is no better design to-day in so far as the citadel is concerned than that to be found at Quebec. Passages and galleries might be added underground but otherwise the works are perfect. The great engineers who designed that fortress knew how to construct a work of that character and the fortress is just as modern to-day as the bayonet is still a useful weapon.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: Before the hon. member for Quebec South rises to speak I must remind hon. members that he is exercising his right to close the debate and if any other member desires to speak he should do so now.

Mr. POWER: A word only in answer to my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie.) I make no pretention of being a military authority as he is and therefore I do not intend to discuss with him the question as to whether or not these works are useless in time of war. All I can tell him is that that seems to have been the impression of the Militia Department.—

Mr. CURRIE: None of them have gone to war.

Mr. POWER: Nor is it the impression of one who is not a member of the Militia Department and who has gone to war. I wish to tell the hon. member that I put in a year at Ypres and I never saw a casemate or a wall there—I was in the trenches.

Mr. CURRIE: You could not have been in the hospital at the Menin Gate if you did not see one.

Mr. POWER: I shall close the debate and not enter into any recriminations. I shall withdraw the resolution on the assurance of the minister that this matter is receiving the attention of the Government and that an investigation of the whole question will be made. That will no doubt be satisfactory even to the hon. member for North Simcoe.

Motion withdrawn.

THE PENSION ACT—WIDOWED MOTHERS.

Mr. CHARLES GAVIN POWER (Quebec South) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to amend the Act to provide Pensions to or in respect of Members of the Canadian Naval and Military Air Forces, 1919, so as to provide that the pension of a widowed mother of a Member of the Forces who has died on active service shall not be reduced on account of her income; and further that Pension shall be granted her of right whether or not there are other living children.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a long way from the musty walls of the Quebec fortifications and the heroes of ancient Canadian history to the heroes of our own day and their dependents. I doubt whether I would have undertaken the task of discussing this matter had I not seen in his seat my hon. friend from London (Mr. Cronyn) who has always been very much interested in it from the same standpoint as I have been. Section 34, if I remember rightly, of the new Pensions Act allows a pension to the dependent widowed mother of a soldier killed in action. If she is not in receipt of any income the full amount of the pension is granted to her. Previously to last year should she have been in receipt of any earnings whatsoever the amount of these earnings were deducted from her total pension. To give you a concrete example: "Supposing a widowed mother is entitled to a pension of $600 a year, and that, as a washerwoman in one of the departments she earned $300 a year. Well, this was deducted from her pension; the Government paid her only $300. This obvious injustice was remedied last year in the Pension Act of 1919, but there still remains another injustice: We have deliberately excluded from the provisions of this amendment the widowed mother who is in receipt of an income of any kind—an income in stocks, bonds, pensions, insurance, et cetera—and we have left this matter entirely to the discretion of the Board of Pension Commissioners in cases of what they call extreme hardship. Now what I maintain is this: The widowed mother, whoever she may be, is as much entitled to the pension of right as the wife; that in many cases, in a large number of cases in fact, the mother is more entitled to a pension than the wife. The wife in a good number of cases may marry again, whereas the widowed mother is very often past that age—past the age where she may earn a living to augment her pension, and in such a position that she practically becomes an object of public charity. So that it is my contention that the widowed mother of a soldier should be allowed to obtain the same amount of pension whether she has or has not any income. We have heard in this House—I do not wish to revive old controversies because too much was heard of the matter last year—arguments with regard to the unmarried wife and respecting, as my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council would say "the wife by habit and repute." That I think was the last phrase we arrived at during the debate in question.

I do not wish to again revive the question of the wife "by habit and repute" but I imagine that the widowed mother of a soldier is more entitled to a pension than this wife by habit and repute. Let me cite a concrete case which I brought up in the House on a previous occasion, namely, the case of a young man, a barrister, who went away to the war as a private soldier, his people being well-to-do. During the war his father died leaving his mother not quite well off. Meanwhile the boy had attained the rank of Captain. He was killed and the widowed mother was granted a sum of $66 per month. About a year, or perhaps two years, after she had been in the enjoyment of this pension, what is termed "a visiting officer" called upon her and inquired whether she was being well treated. The lady was thankful for the $66 per month and told the visitor that everything was quite satisfactory, and that the Government had treated her very well. Then the lady visitor inquired "Have you any other resources?" "Oh, yes, I have a house in the country and I get $300 a year from that." "I see, $300." Deduct that from $800 and it leaves $500. "Have you got anything else?" "Yes, I draw $100 a year from insurance." Take that off also, making a total deduction of $400. This lady is left with $400 from the Government and her only son, that was her support and but for the war would now be earning a good income, has given up his life at the front. The age of this lady is such that she is utterly incapable of earning her living, and is practically left on the country. I maintain, sir, that in justice and fairness the widowed mother should be placed in the same position as the wife and no deduction of income should be made whatsoever. If the son has died at the front the widowed mother should get a pension just as when the husband dies at the front the wife gets a pension. We have debated this question before the Committee on Pensions and on two or three occasions we almost carried the point. We have not succeeded so far, and therefore I have deemed it my duty to bring the matter before the attention of the House.

Mr. HUME CRONYN (London): As the mover of the resolution has stated I have been much interested in this question, and he and I throughout the consideration of the Pension Bill fought strongly for more favourable treatment to widowed mothers. We were unfortunately in a minority in the Pension Committee, and when we renewed our struggle in the House an amendment was suggested to the Pension Act which I, at least, thought would have given relief. That amendment was dropped at the request of the minister in charge of the Bill. If my memory serves me right it was declared not to be in order for a private member to propose a resolution which involved the expenditure of public money; but there was another reason for delaying the amendment; it was hoped to get some information from the Pensions Board which would tell us just how much the proposed change would involve in the way of expenditure. From that time to this I have not heard whether that information was forthcoming, and as I did not know until this afternoon that the resolution was to be discussed I am not very well prepared to speak on the several points in issue. However, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Power) has explained, the widowed mother who is in receipt of an independent income from any source has deducted from her pension, which she would otherwise be entitled to, the amount of that income, and this, as he says, works very great hardship in certain cases.

On a former occasion I mentioned a concrete case of the sort where the widow of a clergyman, entitled to an annuity of $300, had for some time received a pension of $480 because of the death of her son at the front. Later on, under the regulations embodied in the Act, that $300 of annuity was deducted, and she received only $180 by way of pension. Other hon. members have similar cases arising in their own constituencies and these were also set out. Objection was raised that this was, in a manner, class legislation—that a widowed mother might be in receipt of so large an income that it would be absurd to further augment her living allowance. But that is easily guarded against if the amendment suggested were to be adopted. We could easily provide that if a widowed mother received a larger sum than her entire pension she would only be entitled to a certain amount. But even if it is class legislation I appeal to you, Sir, and to the House, that of all people in the world mothers should be entitled to a preference.

The mover of the resolution has made mention of the discussion with regard to unmarried wives. I know I was struck at that time by the objection made to the phraseology, which we of a somewhat cold-blooded race saw at first no reason against adopting. The objection was all the more curious too, because in the English language we have one word for wife and another for woman, whereas my friends from Quebec use but the one word femme to denominate either a woman or a wife.

Now, I venture to appeal to both sides of this House on behalf of an even more sacred person than the wife—I appeal on behalf of the mother. For that reason alone I would urge, without going further into the matter, favourable consideration of the resolution moved by the member for Quebec (Mr. Power).

Mr. DANIEL LEE REDMAN (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in accord with the resolution which has been moved by the member for Quebec (Mr. Power). As hon. members who have spoken on the resolution have said, this matter has been discussed by the Pensions Committee for the last two years. Last year we made a move along this line; that is, we said that when the mother earned any money by work it should not be deducted from her pension. This resolution goes one step further and asks us to state that if she has a private income it shall not be deducted from her pension. But all mothers are not included; the privilege is asked only for widowed mothers.

I am sure that nothing in connection with the Pension administration creates more difficulties, more misunderstandings and in many cases a feeling of greater injustice than the existing rule. As has been pointed out, it is necessary that in each case an investigator should make minute inquiries as to the properties or moneys which these ladies—usually aged—have, and often the investigators do not get the facts right, and in scarcely any case are they able to impress upon the people to whom they go the difference between them and some other widowed mother who perhaps lives in the same community. Consequently the impression is created that we are rather small, that the shades of difference we draw are perhaps what might be termed picayune. If it is a matter of money, one might point out that most of these widowed mothers are advanced in years, and the pensions will continue only during the remainder of their lives.

Last year the Great War Veterans and others came to us and asked for a gratuity for able-bodied soldiers. Our general answer was: "No, we do not believe in the principle of giving money to able-bodied men, because what money we intend to spend we wish to reserve for the dependents of soldiers." Now, I do not think there is any class more deserving than the widowed mother. We are only asking that she get the same consideration as the widow of the soldier, and we are limiting it to the widowed mother. Having regard to the attitude which we took last year, to the present rules which are not entirely satisfactory, and to the arguments which have been advanced by hon. members, and also to my study of the matter and my knowledge of it gained by contact with these people during the last few years, I have no hesitation in recommending this reform which in justice to the class concerned we cannot longer delay.

Mr. ARTHUR BLISS COPP (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I desire to associate myself with my hon. friend the mover of this resolution and with those hon. members who have supported it. I had not the privilege of being present at the meetings of the Committee that spent so much time in discussing and studying this question of pensions, but I have had some experience of it in connection with requests that have been made to me on behalf of widowed mothers, which requests I have taken up with the Pensions Department.

One of the strongest cases brought to my notice was that of a woman who had two sons overseas. Her husband was sick, and on one of her sons being killed in action a pension was given to the family. Finally the husband died, and after some investigation the pension was withdrawn from the widowed mother, on the ground that she had another son who was morally bound to support her—although he did not do so. If that is the proper ruling under the Pension Act, Mr. Speaker, I submit it ought to be changed so that the widowed mother may not have to depend upon charity, but may have that support by way of pension which her sacrifice richly entitles her to.

Mr. WILLIAM FOSTER COCKSHUTT (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, I have very strong opinions in regard to the subject matter of this resolution. I was not one of the committee that dealt with pensions, although I appeared before them on two or three occasions pressing for more liberality of treatment. Coming from a city that furnished between 5,000 and 6,000 men to the overseas forces, I feel that I have a good deal of experience in dealing with the classes that come within the scope of this resolution. I have had similar cases to the one just mentioned by the member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp) and some, I think, even stronger than that, and my heart has been pained and I have been actually almost forced to tears listening to the widows' tales of their struggles to keep their families going. I do not know whether my letters will ever see the light of day, but during the last two or three years I have written the very strongest letters I am capable of to the Pension Commissioners, pointing out the cases of gross injustice which have been brought to my attention. Whether the treatment of such cases is in accordance with the regulations or not, I do not think that we as a country can afford to allow it to exist as undoubtedly it does exist at the present time. It continues after this committee dealt with it so exhaustively last year. Within the last few weeks I have had one or two cases brought before me, and I am going to give one, Mr. Speaker, in order that you may see how the Act works.

I cite the case of a widow who at the beginning of the war had a husband and two sons. The eldest son enlisted first and served almost throughout the war: He was practically the mainstay of the family before he went away and would have been so on his return. He served for upwards of four years, but in the closing days of the war he was killed. The second son went over later, and was severely wounded, his leg being shattered from the knee down. After both sons had gone the husband came home from a recruiting meeting and said to his wife: "There is still an appeal for men; they are wanted at the front; I feel that it is my duty to go." Though upwards of fifty years of age he volunteered for service and was accepted. On account of some trouble with his feet he never got overseas but he did serve at the Niagara frontier for a year or two. During that service he became inflicted with a trouble which, though not originating during service, was aggravated to such an extent that he had to be discharged and shortly afterwards died. Up to the present time that man's widow has received no pension. She lost her husband in the service or as a result of the service; her eldest son was killed at the front after more than four years of the most strenuous fighting, and the third boy, who had his leg shattered, came home and was able to qualify as a telegraph operator at a very good remuneration, I admit,—$90 a month. Well, this is what the Pension Board gave him; in respect of that permanent injury to a limb he is getting $4 a month by way of pension, the limitation of amount being on the ground that he was able to earn $90 a month as telegraph operator. The Pension Board also told him to hand over to his widowed mother $10 a month to help her to live. Now, I have in black and white from the Pension Board what is virtually an admission of these facts; and I say that my blood boils to think that this country can do no better for a widow than that. I know the facts in this case; I have submitted them to the Pension Board just as strongly as I am submitting them now, but I have failed to get any redress for that widow. She told me with tears in her eyes that she could not support her remaining children and herself under these conditions. The young man whose limb has been shattered is engaged to be married, and the final intimation I got from the Pension Board was that if the young man would get married they would consider the widow's case on its merits and that probably she would get some pension. I know of other cases of the same kind; if one son is left at home, the widow cannot get a pension. This country owes a duty to that widow who gave her husband and her sons in the great conflict; she should not be treated on a charitable basis. I understand that the widow of whom I speak has two other children at home. One of them is a boy of fifteen—he is not strong and may be in poor health for at least a number of years—the other is a boy of seven. This is not an isolated case; cases of this kind, I believe, are fairly common throughout the country. I know of another case where four sons out of five sustained casualties out of the war, two being killed and two wounded and because the widow had one son left she was told that there was no pension coming to her. I know of another case, a widow who is able to work in a bank. She has moved from Brantford to New Brunswick and is now in the constituency of the member for York-Sunbury (Mr. H. F. McLeod). He and I have done all we could during a period of two or three years to get the case of this widow considered by the Pension Board, but because she is able to earn something by working in the bank she has not been given a pension. The Pension Board evidently arrived at this decision by deducting the amount she earns from the amount to which she would otherwise be entitled by way of pension. This business of reducing the pension by this amount and by that until it is whittled down to nothing is carried on to such an extent that I really wonder why, on that basis and according to their argument, the Pension Board did not actually find the widow to be in debt to the country. In my judgment the whole thing has been carried on from the wrong point of view. When a family have sacrificed husband, father or son, they have placed this country under an obligation, and that obligation is to see that want does not enter the house in which that family lives. It does not matter whether or not there is a prospect of help coming later. It is not fair to say that the members of a family must always stay in their old home until the parent is dead. I know three or four cases of young men who are engaged but who are obliged to stay at home practically as long as the mother lives. They dare not get married on the strength of the supposition that the Government will do the right thing, because they are afraid that the Government are not going to do the right thing in regard to pension. While we have treated our soldiers with the utmost liberality in connection with practically every service which they have rendered, when it comes to the matter of pension there is, for some reason, a kink in the system; they are not treated in a humane manner. I have had long experience in connection with pensions and have dealt with a very large variety of cases; and I can say that the Pension Board are either tied up by red tape or by regulations.

I have another grievance against the Pension Board in the way the pensions are administered. After a member has struggled hard—and it is a hard struggle to get anything like justice done by the Pension Board—I say, after a member has struggled hard, and has finally obtained a fairly satisfactory settlement for a widow, it may happen that the payments go on for three or six months and then you are suddenly wakened up with a jolt to find that the same thing has been undone. I have had that occur time and again. Now, in my judgment, after a thorough investigation has been made and a pension supposedly decided upon as final, it should not be open to the Pension Board to go back on the arrangement that has been made and to throw the whole thing into the air again as has been done time and again. I could mention names, but I do not think it is wise; I do not want to drag them into the publicity that the mention of them would give. But I know of cases where twice over a pension has been cut down, without any apparent reason, after having been, to all intents and purposes, finally settled and arranged between the Pension Board and the family on the basis of a thorough investigation. I say that this country is well enough off, badly as it has been hit by the war, to take care of all those who should receive pensions, The department, or whoever is responsible should limber up considerably, and not simply consider to what extent the Pension Bill for the year would be raised by appropriate action, but whether justice is being done to the individals and families they are dealing with. If it is found that justice is not being done and that the families have not enough to live on, I contend that it is the duty of this Government to set that matter right. The question my hon. friend from London (Mr. Cronyn) has raised is one that has often tripped me up when I have been trying to get pension cases settled. It will suddenly be discovered by the board or by some visitor who is mighty inquisitive, that the pensioner has a little income from somewhere, it does not matter where, and the pension is at once cut down by that amount.

I had one case recently where the board discovered that a widow, living in Brantford, who had been receiving a pension, I think, of $600 a year, owned two houses in Toronto. The rent of one house was $12 a month, and of the other approximately the same—about $25 a month from the two. When this fact was discovered by some inquisitive visitor, would you believe it, Mr. Speaker, the board deducted the whole amount of the rent from the $600 pension which the widow had been receiving for some little time, without making any allowance whatever for repairs, insurance, or even taxes. The whole rental from the two houses was deducted from the original pension, and I had to put up a considerable fight, which I did, before I got this injustice remedied. While the pension was not restored to its original amount, I did succeed in showing the board that it was not very business-like to assume, because a certain amount of rental is supposed to come in from a house, that it always does come in. Every hon. member knows that even if it does come in, there are a lot of other things to be considered, such as repairs, taxes and insurance, and the house may be empty for two or three or even six months. But simply because a widow has a house that is supposed to bring in a rental of $12 a month, the policy of the board is to deduct that amount as if she had the rental already in her pocket. The thing is absurd from a business standpoint, because rent for a house is not in your pocket until the cheque has been honoured by the bank, and then there are these deductions I have spoken of.

I hope this question will come up again. I do not think this will be the finish of it. I do not know whether the hon. member for South Quebec (Mr. Power) thinks it will be the finish of it if we pass this resolution. What we want is action. In spite of what was done by the committee last year I cannot take back anything I have said. I tried then to speak as strongly as words would permit in favour of proper treatment for the soldier and his dependents. Whether all the committee's recommendations are in full operation or not, I do not know, but I have certainly had some very severe cases since the regulations were put into effect last year. I have mentioned one case, and I could give others. In my judgment it is a shame that widows with dependent children who have lost a husband, or son, or brother in the war, who was their chief support, cannot have their cases treated in a reasonable way.

Furthermore, under the present regulations the woman who tries to help herself is penalized. The Government practically says that she should not have any income from any other source, and that if she has, they will deduct that amount from her pension. I say the country either owes these women a debt or it does not, and it is most unjust to make these deductions simply because a widow may have $200 or $300 or $500 coming in from a piece of property, to acquire which she has had to scrape for years. The pensions are much too small at the best, and are miserable at the worst. I am ashamed to mention the $3 or $4 pension. I have mentioned the case of a boy permanently disabled who receives a pension of only $4 a month. I say that if this Government cannot give a better pension than that to one who is permanently lame, it should not give anything. I would be ashamed to dole out such a small amount. I contend that this matter should be gone into thoroughly, and that every case of injustice should be considered on its merits by some competent authority. I know that there are some who will try to get out of the department more than they are entitled to receive, but don't let us think everybody is a robber; don't let us do an injustice to an innocent person because somebody else is trying to get a few dollars more than they should have. I am confident that the pensions that are being paid to the disabled soldier, to the widow and orphans, or whoever it may be that has suffered, will none of them be found to be over-generous, and a great many of them will be found to be entirely inadequate. At the risk of raising our pension bill five or ten millions per annum, I say this country owes it to itself and to its citizens to see that a grave injustice is not done to the widow and the orphan. I speak strongly because I feel strongly. I have been almost moved to tears in my office time and again by the relation of the facts alone, and I have felt that I ought to put my hand in my pocket and pay the pensions myself rather than let the poor widow go out of my office as she has had to go. I urge the House as strongly as I can to take active and adequate steps this session to see that the injustices I have spoken of do not continue any longeer.

Mr. ONESIPHORE TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with other hon. members in supporting the resolution moved by the hon. member for South Quebec (Mr. Power). I have had a number of cases in my county and town of the nature described by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) and the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp). The widowed mother of a soldier who has given his life for Canada and the Empire should be entitled to receive her full pension, no matter what her circumstances may be at any time. I have had a case where a pension was refused to a widow because she had a son who had reached the age of eighteen. He had never been able to earn a living for himself, because he was not physically strong enough to do hard work, and did not have the education to do other than manual work. In another case, a widowed mother was refused a pension because she had a son living in the United States or in some distant part of Canada who had been away from home for years and years and was unwilling to assist in supporting her. I also know of cases where a certain amount of the pension has been deducted because there have been other sources of income. One widowed mother had been receiving a pension of $60 a month for a year or two—her son had been a captain—and then it was discovered that she was the owner of two or three acres of land from which she got a certain revenue, and her pension was reduced to $30 a month. After consideration of the circumstances, and as a result of representations made by myself, the commissioners raised the pension to $45. I am convinced that the commissioners themselves are in sympathy with the mothers and dependents of the soldiers, but they are precluded from the exercise of any generosity by reason of the regulations. I therefore join with other

hon. members in urging Parliament at this session to take such action as will effectively remedy the present unsatisfactory condition of affairs and give to the widowed mothers of the soldiers adequate consideration. There are very few wealthy women among the Canadian widowed mothers of soldiers, and we could not, I should imagine, be much worse off if we spent a substantial sum of money in granting them proper relief than we should be if the war had been lost. Let Canada show her generosity to those who made the supreme sacrifice, not only for her own safety but for the freedom of men the world over and for the honour of the Empire.

Mr. EDWARD WALTER NESBITT (Oxford North): I desire to point out to my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) that under the regulations no deduction is made in the case of a woman who is earning money. A man's pension is based strictly on the degree of his incapacity through service to earn a living in the ordinary labour market; and his pension having been once fixed, no deduction is afterwards made by reason of anything which he may earn outside.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friend says that no deduction is made. Well, I can mention a case where nothing was ever granted and therefore nothing could be deducted. The case I mentioned from Fredericton is that of a widow who has now lost her only son, and because she is earning money in a bank her case has not been adjusted or even considered by the Pensions Board.

Mr. NESBITT: If she is earning money by her own effort it is not deducted from the pension she is entitled to.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: But she does not get any.

Mr. NESBITT: I cannot help that. So far as the Pensions Board is concerned, my hon. friend from Brantford and others must bear in mind that it is an administrative body. The board is appointed to administer the Act, and if there is anything wrong with the Act itself it is for this House to adjust the irregularity. It is the duty of my hon. friend from Brantford, if a committee is appointed this year, to bring before it the cases he speaks of.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I have already appeared twice before the committee.

Mr. NESBITT: If he does so, I do not think there is one member of the committee who will not assist him to have matters adjusted. Let me say, however, that I have never had to write a second letter to the board over any matter whatever after having once told them the exact facts, and having acted in accordance with the provisions of the Act. The Pensions Board cannot vary the Act any more than I, as a private member, can. They have to be bound by the regulations, and I think it is most unfortunate to blame them for doing properly what they consider to be their duty. My experience has been entirely satisfactory with the board, and any question on which I have written them they have endeavoured to attend to in accordance with the regulations laid down in the Act.

Mr. COPP: You had more influence.

Mr. NESBITT: I had no influence whatever.

Mr. GEORGE WILLIAM ANDREWS (Winnipeg Centre): The present discussion is one of very great importance to widowed mothers. Only last Saturday I received a telegram from an organization which is new to me, the Organized Mothers and Widows, in which they specifically called attention to the matter now under discussion. I do not think that this subject is at all new to any honourable member, for all of us, I have no doubt, have questions of one kind or another brought to our attention in relation to the position of widowed mothers who are in receipt of pensions, or should receive consideration. It was pointed out to me, on investigation, that the little change which I have suggested would cost the country $5,000,000. Hon. members will realize the necessity for the appointment of a committee of some kind to go into these matters. On the Order Paper there will be found a suggestion, which I trust will come before the House on Wednesday, that a committee should be appointed on the subject, which I think it is eminently desirable should be inquired into. I must agree with my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Nesbitt) that the Pension Board is purely administrative, and I have found its members always very fair. But the fact that the matter I have suggested would cost $5,000,000 is, I think, ample evidence of its importance to the hon. members of this House. The pension, as far as I understand the matter, is based on the principle that no widowed mother shall have less than a living if she has lost her support by the war. If there are two women living side by side receiving, say $48 a month, and one is allowed to receive an income of $500, or $600, or $700 a year, while the other has no opportunity to augment her pension, there might very well arise antagonism to what is commonly called "class legislation." To my mind, Mr. Speaker, the solution of the problem lies in raising the entire pension rate, which at the present time is too low.

Mr. C. W. PECK (Skeena): I rise to support the motion, as I have risen repeatedly in this House to express my sympathy with the mothers and widows of men who served their country in the late struggle. I shall not delay the House at this time with any lengthy discussion of the question, because I think that enough has been said. I am convinced that the Government have not closed the door upon any questions appertaining to the returned soldiers, and I think my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder) has expressed that determination. I have no doubt the time will come when the Government will appreciate the advisability of affording to this House an opportunity to discuss the subject from all possible standpoints. If, however, they do not grant that opportunity, then we shall bring the matter up in some other manner. I am sure they will give us a chance to go thoroughly into the question, for as I said before, and said advisedly, I rely on this Government to do everything humanly possible on behalf of the soldiers and the widowed mothers. I do not see within sight any other prospective Government that will be willing to do any more than this Government has done or can do. The very first question in regard to the soldiers should be that of pensions. I made this statement in my constituency; that the widows and orphans of the men, our comrades, who were left over on the battlefields of France and Flanders, should be given first consideration. I will not recite the case which I have in mind, but I may assure the House that there are many which should receive every consideration. I think the whole subject could be more advantageously discussed at a later date; and, as I have said before, I am convinced that the Government will grant an opportunity to discuss the question of pensions. We shall therefore await with anxiety their decision on the question, and if they can not grant ample opportunity to go into the matter then I shall take steps to bring it before the House.

Mr. THOMAS W. CALDWELL (Victoria and Carleton): Assuredly the question under discussion is one in which every man in this country is deeply interested; and while the motion has reference to pensions for widowed mothers, perhaps there are others who come within its scope with greater urgency and reason. I have in mind the case of a soldier in my constituency who at the age of 47 enlisted within a week of the outbreak of war. He was overseas two years and was severely gassed, returning home on the ship that took his three sons back to England to serve their country. That man was so anxious to return to civil life that he did not apply for a pension at that time, notwithstanding his severe suffering from the effects of gas. He was one of the old fellows who had considerable sand in him, and he would do a man's work, in spite of every obstacle or hardship which he could possibly surmount. In a very short time, however, his privations at the front told upon him and he had to go under medical treatment. He was sent to a medical hospital in St. John where he developed tuberculosis as the result of the weakening of his lungs from gassing. He was granted a pension of $5.50 a month at first, and after he had been in the hospital six months the doctors pronounced him 100 per cent disabled and he was granted a total disability pension. His case was reconsidered, however, and to-day he is receiving $5.50 a month. He has a family of three small children, one being an invalid, and the mother's time and care are taxed to their utmost. They have a home which they are in imminent danger of losing if they cannot meet the payments on it. This unfortunate man is at present in a military hospital, totally unable to do anything. The doctor has informed him that if he had come to the hospital when he was first discharged there would have been a fair chance of his recovery; but to-day, I regret to say, his condition is such that it is only a question of prolonging life. His pension was cut down on the ground that too long a time had elapsed from the date of his discharge to the time of his being pronounced totally disabled. I must say very emphatically, Mr. Speaker, that it would be an everlasting disgrace to this country if a man who had given such service, and whose family had given such service to their country were not granted an adequate pension to support his family, no matter what might be the cause of his disability. At the last special session of Parliament, I think, there was a sum of $40,000,000 voted for the patriotic purpose of supporting needy soldiers through the winter. In the early part of the winter this family applied for aid, and although the man's certificate was filled up by two physicians, one who originally attended him, and another, the military doctor appointed in the town in which he lived, both of whom pronounced him 100 per cent disabled, the chairman of the local board refused to sign the necessary papers authorizing the payment of aid to his family. This soldier applied to me and I went to the chairman of the Patriotic Fund Committee and told him that I wanted him to either sign that paper or give me a written statement of his reasons why he would not sign. He said the reason he would not sign was because there were three grown up sons. These sons had been overseas from 1916 until peace was declared when they came home and were demobilized. They are seeking to re-establish themselves and I think you will all agree with me that these men have a right to their own earnings to re-establish themselves after giving three years to the service of their country. The chairman of the Patriotic Fund Committee did sign this paper but he said "I will see that they do not get anything." I do not know what steps he took but I imagine he wrote to the authorities here not to pay the money. These boys are endeavouring to make the payments on their house. Here is this woman, worse than a widow, with three small children, one of them an invalid, getting $5.50 a month and nothing from the Patriotic Fund. I appeal to the members of this House if they think that is the way Canada should discharge her obligations to her soldiers. The man who is killed is out of his misery but this poor man is suffering untold agony and cannot at the best live very long.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL (President of the Council): Two questions have been brought up this afternoon entirely distinct—one of the law and the other of the administration of the law. The Board of Pension Commissioners are in no way responsible for the law. That was made by this House. It is their duty to administer the law as this Parliament made it. I was glad to hear the remarks of the hon. members for Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon,) the hon. member for Winnipeg Centre (Mr. Andrews) and the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) in appreciation of the work of the Board of Pension Commissioners. No doubt they are fallible as all other men are but they are all men who have served overseas. They are all men who, I am sure, have the deepest sympathy with the returned men and their dependents and I am sure I am but speaking the truth when I say that they are exceedingly anxious to administer the law as they understand it in the way which will do justice to those who are entitled to have the benefit of the pension regulations. The Pension Commissioners are a body entirely independent of the Government but I feel that it is due to them in their absence to say this much in reference to their work. As to the law, the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) is correct in his statement of the position. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) is possibly not aware that last year we changed the law on the point he mentioned. Prior to the amendment of the law last year the earnings of a widow were deducted when the question of her pension came to be decided but the law was changed last year so that the earnings of a widow are no longer taken into account.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I mentioned the specific case that I had taken up myself three or four times where a widow was earning $700 or $800 a year working in a bank. Her case would not be considered so long as she was working in the bank.

Mr. ROWELL: Either my hon. friend is misinformed as to the situation or the Board of Pension Commisioners are misinformed. Up to September 1 last year that was the law and the Board of Commissioners were bound to administer it but that has not been the law since the 1st of September and the Board of Pension Commissioners have been administering the law on the other basis since, because an actual case which they had before them came under my observation—

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The case to which I refer may have been righted within the last two or three months.

Mr. ROWELL: It has been righted since the 1st of September because it was on that date that the law passed last session came into force. Therefore the point that my hon. friend raises with reference to a widow's earnings is no longer a matter requiring our consideration. Take the other question, the one brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), supported by the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn) and other members of the House, and which, I am sure, is one that commands the sympathy of every one in the House. We are all deeply interested in the welfare of the widows who have lost their sons and we are all anxious that no injustice shall be done to them. I think however that I should state to the House the position in which this matter stood last session, particularly in view of the observations of my hon. friend from London. The members of the House will recall that for two sessions—that is in the session of 1918 and the spring session of 1919—we had a committee composed of members from both sides which went very fully into the question of our pension law. The committee reported its findings to the House and the Government in each case accepted its conclusions—as to what the pension regulations should be in the first case, and as to what the pension law should be in the second.

This particular matter was considered at length by the committee. The hon. member from Quebec (Mr. Power) and the hon. member from London (Mr. Cronyn) pressed their view upon the committee with great force. A substantial number of the members of the committee sympathized with the view presented, but when it came to a vote the majority was against that view for reasons which perhaps it is not at all necessary to enter into now. It is true that the hon. member for London raised the question on the floor of the House and submitted an amendment differing somewhat from the motion which my hon. friend (Mr. Power) had submitted. The latter, if accepted, would place a widow who might have a fortune of one, two or three hundred thousand dollars in the position to receive a pension just the same as the widow who is left with practically no means of support. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for London was not the same. It recognized a limited income, and in the case of a limited income provided that it should not be taken into account in fixing the pension. I did state to the House when the hon. member proposed his amendment that I would ascertain the facts from the Board of Pension Commissioners as to how much it would cost the country if the amendment were accepted, and if the Government could see its way clear to accept the amendment I might suggest that it be introduced into the Senate. I was under the impression that I had informed the member for London of the result of that investigation. The result was this: We found that accepting the hon. gentleman's amendment would involve an additional charge upon the revenues of the country of between two and three millions—I think about three millions a year. Possibly adopting the amendment proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. Power) now might involve the charge that the member for Winnipeg has mentioned—five millions. The view of the Government last session was that as the Pension Committee had considered the matter in all its bearings at great length, and had reached the conclusions which had been reported to the House, and as the House had accepted that report in Committee of the Whole, the wisest course for the Government was to act on the Pensions Committee's report, is it had always done, and leave this matter over for consideration when the Pension Committee was formed this year.

I want to say to the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Power) it is the intention of the Government that there should be a Committee on Pensions this year, just as there has been at prior sessions of the House, and already a Government notice of motion is on the Order Paper for the appointment of such a committee. That is necessary because my hon. friend will recall that under the law as passed last year the bonus only continues until the first of September next, and the committee must review the question as to whether that bonus is to be continued, or modified, or made permanent. A number of other important questions relating to the matter will also be required to be considered. Therefore I suggest to my hon. friend that this motion—on a matter of great importance and commanding the sympathy of members of the House—should be referred to the Committee on Pensions when appointed, for consideration and a report to the House by that committee in connection with other matters that will come up.

Mr. POWER: I will not occupy very long in replying to the minister—

Mr. SPEAKER: I should point out to the House that if the hon. gentleman exercises his right to reply, the debate on this resolution will be closed. Therefore if any other hon. member desires to speak on the question he now has an opportunity.

Mr. POWER: It was far from my intention, in presenting this resolution, to reflect in any manner whatsoever on the Board of Pension Commissioners. I know the three commissioners personally and I have always received the kindest treatment and courtesy at their hand. A reading of the resolution itself should make it clear that my object is to amend the law in order to place beyond dispute who is, and who is not entitled to have a pension under Article 34. I have in mind two cases recited to me by the former hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) last year. For example, supposing a boarding-house keeper were earning $40 a month from her boarding-house and suddenly wished to change that boarding-house into an apartment-house, her earnings would then become income and she would lose her pension. I want this kind of thing stopped once and for all so that the widowed mother of a soldier will get a pension even if she has $300,000 just as the wife of a soldier sometimes has $300,000. If she does not want to apply for the pension she need not do so; but I want every widowed mother to be entitled to the pension, and that is the object I had in proposing this resolution. However, I accept the suggestion of the minister and therefore wish to withdraw the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's resolution is to be withdrawn on the understanding, I assume, that it is to be referred to the Pension Committee. Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member have leave to withdraw his resolution?

The House gave permission.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. McMASTER (for Mr. Fielding):

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House:—

That a Special Committee composed of the Honourable Messieurs Boyer, Casgrain, Fowler, Thorne and White (Inkerman), has been appointed for the purpose of considering and reporting upon a scheme for the placing of the new Parliamentary Restaurant, when completed, both as to equipment and administration, on a parity with a first class club or hotel or dining room, and inviting this House to appoint a like Special Committee to act jointly with the Special Committee of the Senate.

NAVAL SERVICE BADGE.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg) moved:—

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and documents, which have passed between the Minister of Naval Affairs, or any of his officials, or any Department of Government, and the Committee on Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, the Officers of the Great War Veterans' Association either the Naval or Military branch, and any and all persons, regarding the service badge which has been distributed or is ready for distribution to any and all Canadians who served either in the Canadian or Imperial Naval services, either in Canadian or Overseas waters.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we listened to a very interesting discussion with regard to pensions for widowed mothers of returned soldiers; in fact, since I have had the honour of being a member of this House I have on several occasions had the pleasure of listening to a number of interesting discussions affecting our returned men. For a short time to-night I want to direct the attention of hon. members to our sailors who also fought for their King and country; and although what I am about to discuss will not involve any heavy expenditure, yet I feel, as do a number of our people, that the matter is a very important one.

May I be permitted to say, Sir, that the reason I am asking for these documents is that I received a letter from the Secretary of the Naval Branch of the Great War Veterans' Association of Canada requesting me to take this matter up and obtain the opinion of Parliament regarding the manner in which our sailors have been treated in reference to the service badge issued to those who served either in the Imperial Forces overseas or in the Home Forces in Canadian waters. These sailors are not satisfied with the badge issued to them by the Naval Department of Canada. They feel, Sir, that they should be treated exactly as our soldiers have been treated in this respect.

The letter to which I have just referred is dated March 2, and is as follows:

The members of this Branch feel very keenly the refusal of the Naval Department to carry out recommendation 14 of the Parliamentary Committee's report. On account of the interest you are taking in naval matters I am instructed to write to you . . . .

Would it not be possible to have this grievance discussed in the House, especially as a number of naval veterans are being antagonized by the action of the Naval Department.

Now, Mr. Speaker, they say that instead of issuing to the sailors the little bronze badge which we so much admire on the lapels of the coats of our soldiers who fought so gallantly overseas, the Naval Department issued a great big white disc resembling one of the old Mexican dollars, and my information is that these boys are ashamed to wear this badge on their coats.

I may be permitted, Sir, to quote another letter which I have received from a young naval rating who lives in Ashcroft, British Columbia. It is as follows:

I am very pleased indeed to see that you are taking up the matter of the service badge issued to those who served in the Navy during the war. As one of the Naval men who went overseas I wish to state that the badge we have been given is a shame and disgrace and I would not be seen wearing it to a dog fight. As you are probably aware it has much the appearance of some of the military cap badges and in fact is taken for one quite generally. No one ever would dream that it is the service badge issued to its sailors by a grateful country. I trust you will be able to see justice is done the Naval men in this matter.

You will remember, Sir, that last year a committee was appointed by this House to investigate certain soldier grievances. That committee met a number of times under the chairmanship of the Hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) and at one of those meetings the Great War Veterans' Association made a suggestion with regard to a badge for the naval ratings, which was adopted by the committee whose report was subsequently submitted to the House, and, if I understand correctly, adopted.

The recommendation to which I refer is contained in the fourteenth clause of the report, and it is in this form:

That members of the Naval Service who have served overseas in either Imperial or Canadian naval services or who have served in any seagoing ship in the Canadian naval service, outside of the three-mile territorial limit, shall be awarded the Class "A" badge with "naval" or suitable words in place of "C.E.F."

Now, Mr. Speaker, in case there is anybody here who does not understand what the Class A badge is, I may say that it is the little bronze badge we see our soldiers wearing on the lapels of their coats. The recommendation was that our naval ratings should be awarded a similar badge, but that instead of the letters "C.E.F." the word "naval" should be engraved thereon.

It is quite evident that this matter is engaging the attention of some of our important newspapers. Under date of March 1, the Toronto Star has an editorial which, with your permission, Sir, I will place on Hansard:

CANADA'S LITTLE BROWN WAR BADGE.

The desire of those Canadians who were in the naval service during the war to be awarded a badge which will be recognizable in this country as denoting that the wearer took part in the war is a perfectly natural one.

The little bronze button worn by the man who fought at the front is a badge of honour, and ever will be. Its significance is known to all who see it. Total strangers who wear it, meeting anywhere, establish a bond of understanding at a glance.

The badge which has been issued to the men who saw naval service in the war—and to some who didn't—is a decorative design in silver, too conspicuous for ordinary wear by a modest person. If a man did wear it probably not one person in a hundred in Toronto would know what it meant, and nine out of ten who tried to make a guess as to its meaning would probably regard it as a badge of some sort of non-combatant service. No doubt the tenth person would mistake it for a battalion badge of some sort. The fact is there are not enough naval war service men in the country to introduce this distinctive badge and give it vogue and acceptance.

In the fourth and final report of the Parliamentary Committee on the Re-establishment the 14th suggestion was as follows:

This suggestion I read a moment ago; I shall not repeat it.

It is the carrying out of this recommendation that the returned naval men ask for. In asking this they have the support of the G.W.V.A. organizations here and elsewhere and the editorial support of their organ, The Veteran.

The little bronze badge is the one that counts in Canada—it is the one that every one knows the meaning of and always will, and its meaning is that the wearer risked himself in the war and survived such dangers as confronted him in his duties. Already the use of this badge has been extended, and very properly so, to an overseas service not connected with the C.E.F.—those Canadians in the Royal Air Force who flew at the front receiving the badge whether they had formerly been in the military forces or not.

The ilttle bronze badge is the active service war badge of Canada—it is worn by those who saw active service on land and in the air, and should appropriately be extended to those who served on the sea.

I think you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that the Toronto Star sums the situation up much better than I could. I see no reason why the Naval Department should depart from the recommendation made by the Parliamentary Committee on Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and issue this distinctive badge to which the naval men object.

Of the Canadians who served in the Imperial navy during the war, there were about 300 officers and 2,700 men. While these men did not, perhaps, see active service which our soldiers saw in the trenches, they had to face the danger of the submarines, mines, storms, fogs and winds, during the course of their work in the North sea. Any one who knows anything about seafaring life know what conditions these men had to face as day after day and night after night they stood on the decks of small fifty or one-hundred ton boats, keeping watch over the sea and looking after the interests of British people everywhere. It seems to me that these men are deserving of the distinctive war badge as are the soldiers.

A number of our Canadian boys took part on the dash on Ostend and in the raid on Zeebrugge. We all remember reading with pride of the raid on Zeebrugge, when the English vessels entered the harbour and closed up the gap so that the German submarines could not get out of their bases. Surely any Canadians who took part in that raid are deserving of the very best that Canada can give them, and when they ask for a war badge similar to that which is given to our gallant soldiers, I see no reason why their request should not be granted.

The Naval Department give some reasons why they have not issued this distinctive metal badge. They say:

1. "A.A." badge—

That is, the white metal badge.

—fulfils its purpose.

2. Objections from the military authorities and the military individually.

3. Naval veterans are satisfied with the white metal badge.

4. That naval service should not be ranked on a par with military service in the trenches

I am quoting from a letter which was written to me by the Secretary of the Great War Veterans' Association. Perhaps the Minister of the Naval Service (Mr. Ballantyne) will tell us, after I have finished my remarks, whether or not these reasons have been correctly stated.

As to the first objection, I understand that the naval ratings are not satisfied with the white metal badge they would prefer these little bronze badges. The naval ratings say that the white metal badge is not recognized by the public; that it is not suitable to be worn and that "service rendered," the words which appear on the badge, are not adequate or fair.

As to the second objection, that the military authorities and individual soldiers object to the use by the naval ratings of the metal badge, that cannot be correct, because, as I pointed out a few moments ago, at a meeting of the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Committee, before which appeared Mr. McNeil, Secretary of the Great War Veterans' Association, and other members of that organization, it was suggested that the same badge be issued to sailors as was being issued to soldiers.

The third reason given is that the naval veterans are satisfied with the white metal badge. Now, Sir, I take exception to that statement; the naval veterans are not satisfied with the white metal badge. I have on my desk here a number of letters and telegrams which I have received from all over the country since I put this motion on the Order Paper, thanking me for bringing this matter before Parliament and expressing the dissatisfaction of the naval ratings with the white metal badge.

The fourth objection was that the naval service should not be ranked on a par with military service in the trenches. Well, even if that were correct, no naval official should have made the statement. I hope that the minister will be able to say that no such statement was made by the Naval Department, because it seems to me that if our Canadian sailors had been given the chance that they would have been given if we had had Canadian ships on the Canadian coasts, they would have shown their mettle and have done just as good service as was done by the boys in the trenches.

I noticed in the Ottawa Journal a few days ago an announcement which I assume was issued by the Naval Department. It is headed "1914-15 Bronze Star," and it says:

> The Department of the Naval Service announces that the issue of the 1914-15 Bronze Star for service in the Royal Canadian Navy has commenced. The conditions for the award of this decoration are service at sea between August 4, 1914, and December 31, 1915.

I assume from the fact that this badge or star is being issued for service betweeen August, 1914, and December, 1915, that the Naval Department intend to issue a number of badges of different kinds. It would be far better to issue only one badge. The men do not want these distinctive badges; no reason can be offered for issuing them. I trust that my remarks will be approved by the members of the House and that there will be a general protest to the minister in this matter and a request that only one badge be issued, the same as that which is worn by the soldiers. The cost will surely not be very great. We did not, I am sorry to say, have very many sailors, either in the Imperial or in the Canadian Naval Service; consequently the matter of cost cannot be urged as the reason for the non-issuance of these badges. Even at this late date the department can call in all the white metal badges that have been issued to sailors who served in the naval forces either in Canada or overseas and issue the little bronze badge which is so much admired by everybody. I trust that the minister will listen to the prayer not only of myself, but also of the boys who so gallantly served in our naval forces, and grant their request.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of the Naval Service): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) for putting this motion on the Order Paper and also for his warm words of commendation of those who served their country so ably and so gravely in the Royal Canadian Naval Service and in the Imperial Navy.

The House may be interested to know that the total number of Canadians who served overseas with the Imperial naval forces was 1,544, and that there were killed in action 26, lost at sea 3; that 11 died of disease and 5 were wounded. All hon. members will look with pride on this showing made by Canadians who served so well in the Imperial Navy during the war. In addition to that, 5,000 men served in the Royal Canadian Naval Service on the Atlantic and on the Pacific. The men who served in the senior branch of the service, either in the Imperial Navy or the Canadian Navy, are naturally proud that they have had an opportunity of serving in that branch.

Those who served Overseas shared, of course, in the glorious traditions of the British navy. Those who served in Canada in our own navy must in a lesser degree also have felt proud of being part of the great Imperial navy, which has not only preserved the British Empire to us but has done so much for the peace of the world. I am therefore glad to rise in my place in this House to-night and say on behalf of the 1,144 Canadians who served in the Imperial navy, and on behalf of the very large majority of the 5,000 men who served in our home naval forces, that while they look with pride on their brother Canadians in the Canadian Army corps who served so bravely on the fields of France and who deserve all the honour and recognition that has come to them, yet they have equal pride in their own force and want a medal that will distinguish the naval service from their brothers-in-arms of the Canadian Army corps. We have therefore issued three classes of badges to the Naval Service of Canada. I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) that a man would not be proud to wear one of these badges. I have a cut of the badges in my hand. They are of silver, and are very beautifully designed. In order to meet the views of the large number of sailors of all ratings who have served in the Imperial navy and in the Canadian navy for badges that would be distinct from the badges granted to the other branch of the service, after very careful consideration on the part of the Naval Service, by myself as responsible minister, and by the Government, the following three classes of badges have been approved by the Government and the Naval Service, and have been issued:

(1) Naval Class AA. This corresponds to the Militia Class A. This AA badge is issued to those who have served at sea or Overseas and who have been honourably discharged for reasons other than invalided.

(2) Naval Class A. This corresponds to Militia Class B. The badge is very beautifully designed, and bears the words "For King and Empire. Services rendered." This badge is similar to the one issued by the Imperial naval authorities.

(3) Naval Class B. This corresponds to Militia Class C. It is issued to those who have served on shore or in harbour in Canada and have been honourably discharged. It bears the words "For Honourable Services."

I am sure hon. members will agree that we did well to issue badges to honour these brave men who served Canada so well in guarding our own shores.

The hon. member for Lunenburg has suggested that the naval badge might not be known or recognized. I agree. But if my hon. friend had served in the front line trenches I am sure he would be proud to wear the Class A badge issued by the military authorities, and naturally the sailors are proud of the badges that are issued to them. If I had served in the navy, that fine branch of the service, I would not want to wear the badge of the gallant soldiers, much as we admire them; I would want an entirely distinct badge, and would be very proud indeed of the distinction of wearing the Naval Badge AA. If I had been invalided out of the service, nothing would make me feel more proud than to wear the badge of the invalided men, and if I had only been permitted to serve on shore I would with equal pride want to wear the Naval Badge B.

It is true that there are a few men in the Naval Service who are desirous of wearing the Military Badge A. They would be content to have the small letters C.E.F. eliminated from the military badge, and equally small letters inserted to make up the word "Naval;" but a naval man walking along the street or going into an office with that badge would at once be taken for an ex-soldier who had served in the front line trenches. Those Canadians who served at sea in the Imperial service and ran all the risks of mines and submarines and the other risks of naval warfare, can feel an equal pride in wearing Class AA badge. It was felt that the man who had served on shore should not receive a badge of the same class as the man who had served Overseas, and we have therefore followed the practice of the Department of Militia and Defence. That department issues three badges, A, B and C. Badge A is for soldiers who have served in the front line; Badge B for those who have been invalided out of the service; and Badge C for those who have served at home. Some did not have the privilege of fighting in the front line trenches, but nevertheless they offered their services and did the very best they could. That is true of our men on both the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts. I am sure my hon. friend appreciates that there were certain dangers even in the patrol service on the Atlantic coast. When the German U-boats came to that coast in the summer of 1918, they strewed the waters with mines, any one of which these patrol boats might have struck, and at any moment a U-boat might come to the surface; so the men who served in our home forces were exposed to certain risks, particularly on the Pacific coast at the outbreak of the war, and in the later stages of the war on the Atlantic coast.

The hon. member for Lunenburg has referred to a recommendation of the special committee which was appointed last spring to consider Bill No. 10, regarding soldiers' civil re-establishment.

Suggestion 14, to which the hon. member referred, was as follows:

> That the members of the Naval Service who have served overseas in either the Imperial or Canadian Naval Services, or who have served in any sea-going ship in the Canadian Naval Service, outside of the three-mile territorial limit, shall be awarded a Class "A" badge with "Naval" or suitable words in place of "C.E.F."

This was the suggestion that was made to the special parliamentary committee, and the following is their recommendation, which the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) omitted to give us, possibly not having it in his possession:

> It is recommended that the suggestion should receive the immediate attention of the Government with a view to removing a cause of complaint which, in the opinion of the committee, appears to be well-founded. The same may be also true of the R.A.F. If so, the matter should receive the attention of the Government.

There is nothing in this paragraph in the nature of any definite suggestion to the Government; it merely brings the matter to their attention. The Government gave due consideration to the recommendations of the parliamentary committee, and having done so decided to issue the badges which I have fully described to the House.

The hon. member for Lunenburg referred to the Royal Air Force badge being the same as the soldiers' badge, and I think it is but fit and proper that the two should be the same. The Royal Air Force is part of the army. It is not under the Admiralty, but under the control and direction of the Commander-in-Chief of the British Army, Sir Douglas Haig; and when the badges were being given to men of the Royal Air Force they would naturally be the same as those given to the soldiers in the army.

With regard to the medals that have been mentioned, I may say that the Admiralty will give medals, which I shall describe in a moment, to all ratings in the British Navy, and I think that our Canadian men have a right to be given the same medals. These medals are: 1914-15 Star: Service at sea between August 4, 1914, and December 31, 1915; British War Medal (General Service Medal), for those who have been 28 days mobilized in the service; Victory Medal, for those who have served at sea between August 4, 1914, and November 11, 1918. I shall make it my duty, and indeed it will be a pleasure to me, to see that these medals are given to all Canadian naval ratings, both those that were in the Imperial service and those that served at home.

Mr. DUFF: Are the badges mentioned by the hon. minister to be given to men in the British navy or to Canadians?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: To men in the British navy. I shall not take up any more time on the subject, but I desire to say that if we granted a badge similar in design to that issued to the Canadian soldiers it would not satisfy the majority of the thousands of our men who served either overseas or in our Canadian naval service. It would also antagonize the Great War Veterans, and I do not think the Militia Council would approve of it. On the whole, I think that any fair-minded man who has served in either the naval or the military forces will recognize the need of having distinctive badges for the two services; and I hope, in view of the brief explanation which I have given to the House this evening, that the hon. member may see his way clear to withdraw his motion.

Mr. H. M. MOWAT (Parkdale): I am interested in this matter because of representations made by large numbers of the naval veterans in Toronto—hundreds of them—that they feel keenly their treatment, which they regard as being unfair. The minister has said about everything that could be said in defence of his part in this matter, and has said it extremely well, as he always does. But at the same time he seems to me to fall short of explaining something that needs explanation, namely, that the report of the committee—the largest and most important that has sat in this House for years, a committee that sat day in and day out, week after week—came to a conclusion different from the opinions which have just been expressed. The point I wish to call to the attention of the House is that it is not the minister who took this position, but two of his officials. The report of the committee was adopted by this House on the 7th of November last year, but we find that on the 31st of October, a week before, one of the officials of the Naval Service Department took it on himself to say that we should not have that badge which was recommended by the parliamentary committee. of course, that was going pretty far.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If the hon. member will permit me, I should like to correct his statement that my officials decided the question. The whole matter was decided by myself as the head of the department, and if there is any blame to be attributed to any one I am the responsible person.

Mr. MOWAT: That is very generous of my hon. friend, but it is incumbent upon me to point to the date of the letter of Admiral Kingsmill regarding the matter, and I venture to say that the minister will admit the truth of my contention.

Mr. BURNHAM: Do I understand the hon. member to say that the report to which he has referred was adopted? If I remember rightly it was only received.

Mr. MOWAT: I understood that the report of the committee on the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment was adopted and passed on the 7th of November. Whether that is so or not, however, it was received and virtually adopted by a large majority of the House. The letter to which I refer is dated October 31st, and I may read from it:

> There appears to be no reason why the badges issued for naval service should not be recognized in the same way as those issued for military service except that, as there are comparatively few naval men in Canada, the public have not become familiar with the naval badges or the service which they denote, though a description of the badges and regulations governing their issue have been published in the press; and there is no doubt that in some cases discharged naval men have suffered injustice through the public not understanding the significance of the badges awarded to them.

The letter does not refer in any way to the fact, which was afterwards discovered, that there were some objections from the Department of Militia.

But that comes a couple of months later in a letter from the Deputy Minister of Naval Service. What happened was this: The admiral and the deputy minister came to the conclusion that they will make a badge, and they design a silver badge which the men do not like. But it would seem to be lese majeste to suggest that the badge designed by these two officials was not the thing for the soldiers and sailors, and the minister apparently thinks it would be a good thing to have some advice from the Department of Militia and Defence. He says:

> It was considered necessary that the opinion of the Militia Department be obtained before taking any action.

Although we had declared in this House that this particular badge with the word "Naval" should be issued to the sailors. He says further:

> There appears to be no reason why these badges should not receive due recognition.
> The Naval Department, therefore does not feel justified in issuing a badge similar to the Class "A" Militia Badge, when by so doing it is clear that great dissatisfaction would be caused.

There is no evidence of dissatisfaction. As a matter of fact, the secretary of the Great War Veterans' Association, Mr. MacNeil, was present at the committee; he is a soldier, he represents the soldiers; there were all sorts of officials present; and it was stated that the sailors asked for this particular badge. Any objection which came from the Deputy Minister of Naval Affairs or from the Militia Department afterwards must have come with very poor grace after the matter had been decided by the committee. How was this badge issued by the committee and how did they come to the conclusion that it would be better to make no distinction, or very little distinction, between the badges to be worn by the soldiers and the sailors? They are both fighting the battle of the country; they are both looking for jobs when they come back. When the men get back and line up before an employer in order to get a job, it is a great advantage to a returned man to have a service badge. But if he wears a silver badge which nobody knows anything about, and which, although it may be very dear to the heart of the officials of the Naval Service, is not relished at all by the sailors themselves, and which may look like a badge of the Ancient Order of Pelicans, or something of that kind, he is not likely to be selected by the employer. That was said by a gentleman who appeared before the committee, a gentleman who entered the service as a sailor and afterwards rose to the rank of a petty officer. Here is what he says:

Q. What is the point there?—A. Canadian sailors, I think, are the Canadians that have served overseas on active service that are not being granted the recognized active service button. This places all classes of sailors at a disadvantage.

Q. In the public estimation?—A. In the public estimation, a returned sailor going in to see an employer asking for a position, there is probably a line-up of men asking for employment and the employer does not stop to ask questions, his eye instinctively travels to the left lapel of the man's coat to see if the button is there and if the man is a strong, vigorous, active young man fit for service the employer simply asks no questions, but suggests that he go somewhere else to look for a position.

That is the evidence of the secretary of the Naval Branch, who was promoted during the war. I have also the evidence of an officer of the force and which shows that our sailors went all over the world. I refer to Captain A. C. Turner, whose evidence will be found at page 927: He says:

If I may take my own case as an example, I first of all went to England and was kept there a few months. Then I was sent to Gallipoli and the Dardanelles. From there I was sent back to the Channel and I had comand of my own ship in the attacks on Zeebrugge and Ostend. From there I went to the north of Scotland. For that service I have nothing to show. Until six months after the armistice there was no button that we could wear to show that we had been overseas. Lately the Naval Service Department issued a large white metal badge which however entirely failed in its purpose. First of all, it is not known to the public, and therefore is of no value. The only button of any value, so far as the public is concerned is that for service at the front. Secondly, that button in its wording is absolutely inadequate. It simply says, "For service rendered." It does not indicate the service. That is our request about the badge and our members feel very strongly about it. It puts them in an unfair position both in business and in private life. They fail to see why a line should be drawn between them and the men who went overseas as soldiers. Most of these three hundred Canadian Naval officers did exceptionally good work in various parts of the world. They went because they knew more about naval matters than about infantry or gunner work or military matters. They thought they could serve their country best in that way, and yet until about two months ago they had been given no badge of any description.

Q. Did you say you were at Zeebrugge?—A. Yes, I had the honour of being in command of a motor launch at Zeebrugge and I was later at the successful action against Ostend.

Q. You were under fire?—A. We were under fire for two hours and forty minutes at Zeebrugge and for two hours at Ostend. You have probably heard Captain Carpenter speak of that action. All who were in it were right in shore. Up to six or eight weeks ago there was not a button or a badge of any description that I could secure or that any Canadian Naval officers could secure to show that we had seen service. Now we have got a badge that is equal to the Class B badge. It is too large to be worn on the lapel of the coat, and it is absolutely unknown to the general public.

Q. Did you make application to the Admiralty or to the Canadian authorities for a badge?—A. We did, and that is the result.

Q. What sort of badge is it that you desire?—A. We desire one for service at the front; perhaps instead of the words "C.E.F." some suitable word such as "Naval" or "Naval Service."

That evidence so impressed the committee, sitting there deliberating and hearing the whole thing, that they came to the conclusion that is found in the report. I do not think that the report should be whittled down to the fine point to which it has been whittled by the minister because I am quite sure that it was meant by this House to give these sailors what they asked for. It is recommended that:

The suggestion should receive the immediate attention of the Government with a view to removing a cause of complaint which, in the opinion of the committee, appears to be well founded. The same may be also true of the R.A.F.

It appears that the R.A.F. had a Naval Service button known to all as the R.A.F. button. But when it comes down to interfering with this little silver badge that nobody wants but the officials of the Naval Service there is all the difference in the world. They make no difference between a man on the ground and a man in the air but they make a tremendous difference between a man on the ground and a man on the sea. There is nothing to warrant this. While I respectfully beg to commend the minister for the way in which he has defended the department I do not think they have done the just thing by these men. The minister says: I would not want to wear that little badge. The minister has not been overseas but those who have been overseas do want to wear this well known badge. They say it helps them in civil life, and I do not think that the minister or anybody else should now say: It is my duty to decide what they want, or what they think they want. It is rather the duty of the minister to give them what they do want. I think it would be a very small thing to scrap this silver badge, issue a war badge, and give that badge to all returned soldiers and sailors.

Mr. D. L. REDMAN (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker while there may be something to be said in support of the view advanced by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) the fact remains that we have two arms of the service; the senior arm—the navy, and the other arm—the army. The Naval Department have issued two badges for the navy. The army have also issued their badges. There seems to be nothing improper in that, no differentiation against the Naval Service. In fact, as I said before, they are the senior arm of the service, and should have the badge which belongs to that arm. Given that, everything is being done for them that could be done and possibly in that respect they have an advantage over the army. To any one who has thought enough of the navy to enter it, as compared with entering the army—surely the love of such men for that particular branch of our forces will still continue, and they ought to desire a distinctive badge for that service. It does not seem to me that any practical difficulty could be encountered in the wearing of that badge. Any man wearing it ought to be pleased to explain to any Canadian who had not sufficient knowledge of our affairs to recognize the badge, that it was a badge of the Canadian Navy. The members of that service are connected with the great British Navy which after all, in the British Empire, always has been, and possibly always will be, more important than our army. The traditions and associations of the British Navy are theirs, and they surely will be glad to have a badge which is peculiarly connected with those traditions and associations. Then we must look to the future in a country like Canada. With our vast coast line on three oceans Canada must have naval protection in some form or other. In the future we must have a navy along our coasts, and if that be the case there is no better way of educating our people to the fact that we have a navy, that we have men who fight for us in that navy, than that those men shall wear a distinctive naval badge.

Reference has been made to the report of the committee and it recommended that some button should be given. The committee did go so far as to say that the complaints in regard to the matter appeared to be well founded and that the question should be considered by the minister. That inquiry, however, was only a side line in the investigation, the main subject was that of the extent of the gratuity or direct help that should be given to our soldiers. The hon. member (Mr. Mowat) has mentioned the case of the Royal Air Force and the minister explained that that was a part of the army. We might also say that the Royal Naval Air Force is a part of the navy, and doubtless in the future will be classified under it.

I do not think any one in Canada will feel dissatisfied in that the men of the Naval Service hold a naval decoration rather than an army decoration. I would not go so far as to say that the men who have served in the army would have no objection to the naval men wearing this badge. I think that all these men have the highest regard for naval men, but the soldiers' idea of discipline and orderliness would tend to make them think that as a general principle it will be more in accord with army and navy practice that each branch of the service should have their own peculiar and distinct decoration.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): I would not enter into this debate had I not had the experience the other day of seeing one of these badges and therefore can well understand the disinclination of the naval men to wearing it. If you have ever, Mr. Speaker, seen the Highlander in full regalia you surely would have noticed the badge or broach on his left shoulder fastening his shawl. Now the badge in question is almost as large as the brooch you see on members of the Highland Brigade. It may be that the minister, who no doubt looks well in the regalia of a Scottish regiment, was duly impressed with the idea of the traditional Highland costume.

The trouble with the minister in this matter is that he does not understand the mentality of the sailor, although he is at the head of the navy, and for a long time was a harbour commissioner of the harbour of Montreal. The sailor, Mr. Speaker, is a brave and a modest man; his bravery is only equalled by his modesty. This medal or badge is one which on an ordinary lapel will extend over each side for at least one-eighth of an inch and is of bright, shiny metal. I do not think it is silver, because silver is so valuable these days, that the Minister of Finance would scarcely allow the Department of Naval Service to issue such a badge in real silver. It is more likely a mixture of tin and zinc, a—bright shiny, white metal. The fact of the matter is that we should give our sailors, who are just as much entitled to credit for their bravery as our soldiers, no more and no less than the latter. We should give them a badge that they would be pleased to wear and not a badge that is so conspicuous that it offends a man's sense of modesty to wear it. I speak with perfect seriousness in this matter. We should give our sailors a badge which is as attractive as that of the army but sufficiently different to be distinguishable from it. It should be of such a size and so inconspicuous that a modest man would be pleased to wear it. Hundreds of thousands of young men all over the country are wearing army service buttons, but I see very few men wearing the brooch—for it is a sort of a brooch—which the Department of Naval Service has issued. I believe the reason for that is that men do not like to make themselves unduly conspicuous.

I would urge upon the House the wisdom of the motion made by the hon. member (Mr. Duff). I do not often find myself in complete agreement with the words of the member for Parkdale, but the fact that I do find myself in complete agreement with what he said to-night will, I trust, add weight to his words.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): I would like to endorse what my hon. friend for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) has said. So far as the conclusions of the committee were concerned the whole of their report was a recommendation to the House, and that part of the report dealing with this particular matter was just as much a recommendation as the other matters treated in the report. The reason why the committee came to the conclusion it did was because it was waited on by various members of the Naval Brigade; and when the young fellow who commanded a motor boat at Zeebrugge —probably one of the most daring feats ever carried out by the British navy—when he applied personally to have the badge changed and to have a badge similar to the organizations that have been mentioned, I had no hesitation in supporting the suggestion to change the badge, and that these young men should be given the type they wanted. As the hon. member for Parkdale asked, what difference does it make to us? These young men only want what they certainly have earned, and as the cost will not be very great the committee could not see any reason why the request should not be granted.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Would the hon. member want the badge given to all those that served in the Canadian navy, at home as well as abroad—the identical soldiers' badge, with the exception of the small word "Naval" instead of the badge of the "C.E.F."?

Mr. NESBITT: I have no choice in the matter. It did not make any difference to me what the badge was, I simply concurred in the demand of these men.

Mr. FIELDING: The minister asked that the resolution be withdrawn. I would like to draw his attention to the fact that the motion does not express any opinion; it merely calls for papers to which I presume there can be no objection.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I quite agree with the hon. member (Mr. Fielding). I noticed what he refers to, but I thought it might be agreeable to the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff). If, however, it is not, I have no objection to conform to the motion as it reads on the Order Paper.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take any part in this discussion until I heard the speech of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). After listening to him I concluded that he was trying to camouflage himself to the world as a Highlander!

Mr. McMASTER: I come of decent Lowland folk and never did anything of the kind.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: The name "McMaster" has graced the personnel of many a Highland regiment. But, like Peter of old, his language has betrayed him to-night, and he shocked my modesty very much by asking: What sort of a shawl this is that a Highlander wears? Let me tell my hon. friend from Brome that that is the shawl which was worn by the 42nd Highlanders at the Battle of Waterloo; that the same shawl was worn by the Highlanders at the Relief of Lucknow; and that the same shawl was worn by Highlanders in the many battles all over the world where they have distinguished themselves and brought honour and glory to their King and country.

The pin or brooch which my hon. friend knows so little about is the clasp with which the Highlander fastens his plaid across his broad shoulders,—and if the badge which has been issued to these sailors bears any resemblance to the Highlander's brooch, I have no sympathy with any man refusing to wear it.

I did not hear the speech of my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) which I regret very much, and I heard only part of the speech of the Minister of Naval Service (Mr. Ballantyne), but I thought it was worth while, for the education and edification of my hon. friend from Brome, that I should give him some information about the shawl and the brooch and the reason for the pride with which Highlanders wear their plaid and every other part of their uniform from the bonnet to the buckle on their shoes.

I can quite understand, Mr. Speaker, that there should be some distinction between the badges awarded to the several classes of our Canadian forces. There is nothing too honourable to be worn by our soldiers who were at the front or who tried to get there; and there is equal distinction coming to any man who honourably served his country in the Naval Service where real service was performed. But I am not in sympathy with giving any decoration to men who during the war served in what was called the Canadian Navy, because I submit, Mr. Speaker, that so far as I know —and I know a good deal about them— they did not do very much that entitled them to any honour. I do not think they were serving with the idea of being awarded medals. At any rate, they had no opportunity of distinguishing themselves because they had not any fighting ships, and certainly it would not be fair to put a man who served in our Canadian Navy upon the same footing as the man who served in the British Navy during the war. If badges are to be issued for naval men I hope a distinction will be made and that it will be given to our men who served in the British Navy rather than to those who were engaged around our own coast in absolute security and who were able to return to harbour every night and sleep soundly in their beds. Possibly if I had heard the whole speech of the hon. minister I would have no doubt as to the different classes of badges that are to be issued. But I would join my voice with those who say that these naval men should be given the kind of badge they require so long as it does not interfere with the distinctive badge issued to the soldiers.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM: Mr. Speaker, on 7th of November, 1919, the report that I referred to was adopted by this House. On that date, I see, a division was taken and the main motion that the report of the committee be received was agreed to. So the member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) is wrong. Of course, as this is not a private fight anybody can get into it, but I have not taken sides in the matter because I do not understand the question. The point, however, is, that since this report was agreed to by the House it certainly shuts out all criticism of it; it would be an entirely different thing were it only received,—especially in view of the fact that the member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) has come down so heavily and almightily on the whole situation as to say that it was not adopted but only received.

Mr. NESBITT: That is a pure technicality. It does not matter.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Speaker, I—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Before the hon. member (Mr. Duff) exercises his right to reply it is my duty to inform the House that any hon. member who desires to take part in this debate must do so now.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Speaker, I will not take up much time replying to the arguments put forward by the hon. Minister of Naval Service (Mr. Ballantyne). It seems to me that after what has been said by hon. members who support me in this matter there is only one thing for the minister to do—to recall the badges already issued and to issue the badge which the sailors require.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you noticed that during the minister's remarks he did not tell us whether the sailors asked for those particular badges which he has been issuing. I would like to know who did ask for them. Was it the sailors, or, as the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) suggests, did the request come from the officials of the department?

We know that the minister is large-hearted. Last year, Sir, when I made a speech with reference to the Canadian navy, he was so big-hearted that he wanted to take on his shoulders not only the sins of the officials of his department while he was minister, but their sins while under his predecessor. To-night he is doing the very same thing, he is shouldering the sins of his officials who were responsible for these monstrosities.

The minister did me the honour of sending me a few minutes ago specimens of the three different badges which he has issued. The first one, as I have already said, is a monstrosity. It is certainly no honour to the scarf-pin which the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. D. D. McKenzie) and I wear when we don our kilts. Further, Sir, I say it is an insult on the part of the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) to refer to this monstrosity as something like the scarf-pin which Scotchmen wear.

This first badge, Sir, consists of two fouled anchors. That will enable the House to form an estimate of the artistic capabilities of the designer. You know, when a vessel gets her anchor fouled she goes adrift. Well, I suppose that is what is going to happen to these sailors. God knows that they had opportunity enough of going adrift while they were at sea; the minister evidently intends now to send them adrift with a heavy disc on their left lapels. Above these two fouled anchors there is a scroll; then a great, big crown. Sir, the thing is not fit to wear; I would not have my dog wear it, let alone give it to a man who has served in the naval forces.

Now, I was not a sailor during the war, nor was I a soldier, but the member for Calgary (Mr. Redman) said, as I understood him, that the army was the senior arm of the service.

An hon. MEMBER: He said, the navy.

Mr. DUFF: Then I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I thought he said that the army was the senior arm. I contend that the British navy is the senior arm of our forces. I say, then, that if the Great War Veterans' Association is satisfied that the same badge be issued to sailors as is issued to soldiers, all members of Parliament, the minister included, should agree that the one badge be issued.

Somebody has evidently told the minister that the Great War Veterans' Association objected to the use by sailors of this metal badge. The secretary of the Great War Veterans' Association, Mr. McNeil, assures me that the executive of the Dominion Command of that association is unanimously in favour of the recommendation to which I refer. Whether it was adopted, makes no difference; the fact is that the committee brought down this recommendation to the House; a recommendation which was endorsed by the military branch of the Great War Veterans' Association, as well as the Ontario Command. If the soldiers are willing that their comrades in the navy wear a badge the same as that worn by them, with the substitution of "Navy" for "C.E.F.," then the minister should scrap the different badges which he is issuing and issue a bronze badge similar to that which the soldiers are wearing.

The minister said that he was following the example of the British navy. Well, the British navy is a very old institution, and I can understand why they find it necessary to have distinctive badges or medals. But the Canadian navy comprises a very small part of the forces which we sent overseas; consequently it is not necessary for us to have three or four distinctive badges. As I have said, my only idea in bringing this matter up is to comply with the request of the Great War Veterans' Association and also of a number of sailors from whom I have received letters and telegrams. Under the circumstances the minister should, I think, reconsider this matter, and issue the same badge for sailors as is issued for soldiers.

Motion agreed to.

RESIGNATIONS FROM THE CABINET.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister): I should like to reply to a question that was put to me on Friday by the leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King) as to the resignation of the ministers who have resigned since the last session of Parliament. Up to that time I believe that explanations were made with regard to resignations which had taken place previously. I do not think I can make any better explanation than to lay on the Table the correspondence between the Prime Minister and the Acting Prime Minister and the two ministers who resigned. I may add, however, that in neither case was the resignation on account of any difference, either personal or with reference to policy.

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether this correspondence will be set out in detail in Hansard. If some other arrangement is not made he will have to read it in order that it may appear on Hansard.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If it is the desire that the correspondence should appear on Hansard, I have no objection.

Mr. BUREAU: We can consent to its being put on Hansard, and dispense with the reading of it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If there is no objection, then, Mr. Speaker, we will have it on Hansard.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: This can only be done of course, with the unanimous consent of the House. If no hon. member takes exception, the correspondence may be printed in Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The correspondence thus authorized to be published in Hansard is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE.
MINISTER'S OFFICE,

OTTAWA, September 22, 1919.

My dear Sir ROBERT BORDEN,—In the reorganization of the Cabinet, which you now have under consideration, I trust you will not overlook the request I made to you some little time ago, to permit me to retire from my present position in the Government.

As I stated to you then, I accepted the portfolio of Minister of Militia and Defence (Canada) with a keen desire to play my part in assisting you in every way possible to bring the war to a successful conclusion, and to support the Canadian Corps at the front with reinforcements. On the termination of the war, and before you left for the Peace Conference, at your request, I agreed to stay on for a time to carry out, so far as this department was concerned, the big problem of demobilization. As this task is just about completed, and as this department will now be reorganized on a peace basis, I feel that my contract has terminated and that the administration of the department should now be handed over to some one else.

While the war was on I did not hesitate to sacrifice everything I had to give my service to my country. I have been absent from my home and my business for nearly five years, and have been compelled to neglect my practice and my private affairs, but I feel repaid, inasmuch as I have had the privilege of doing something to support you, in a small way, in the enormous responsibilities that have been cast upon your shoulders since the 4th of August, 1914. During this long period, in the various offices I have been privileged to occupy in the public service, I have endeavoured to the best of my ability to conscientiously carry out my duties faithfully and to give you my very best support.

I feel that the time has come when I must, in fairness to my family, take a short rest and give personal attention to my private affairs that have been sadly neglected for so long. I would, therefore, ask you to accept my resignation as Minister of Militia and Defence at the earliest possible date.

I wish to express to you my very deep appreciation of the confidence you have reposed in me, and of the very loyal and whole-hearted support you have given to me while I have been a member of your Cabinet, and I trust that confidence will continue for all time.

I have the honour to be, my dear Sir Robert

Your obedient servant,

S. C. MEWBURN.

The Right Honourable
Sir ROBERT BORDEN, P.C., G.C.M.G.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ont.

OTTAWA, Ont., December 29, 1919.

My dear Sir ROBERT BORDEN,—With reference to my letter to you of the 22nd September, my subsequent interview with you, and having regard to the events which have developed during the past few days, owing to your very regrettable illness, I find from every standpoint I am compelled to ask you to accept my resignation as Minister of Militia and Defence, and I urgently request that same take effect not later than January 15 next.

I sincerely trust that you will ere long be restored to your old-time health and strength.

Believe me, my dear Sir Robert,

Yours faithfully,

S. C. MEWBURN.

The Right Honourable
Sir ROBERT L. BORDEN, P.C., G.C.M.G.,
Prime Minister, Ottawa, Ont.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

OTTAWA, Ont., December 29, 1919.

Dear General MEWBURN,—It is with the greatest regret that I have received your letter announcing the necessity of your retirement early in January. In September last you agreed, at my earnest request, to remain until the end of the year, in view of my unavoidable absence for some weeks from Ottawa; and I am grateful that you remained at your post during that period.

Throughout the war you have given splendid and conspicuous service to Canada and to the Empire in different capacities. Especially during the period in which you have presided over the Department of Militia and Defence your service has been notable. I am most grateful that in October, 1917, you accepted my invitation to become a member of the Union Government, upon which has been laid so heavy a burden of responsibility. During the period that has since elapsed you have given most valuable assistance in the discharge of that responsibility.

I trust that every blessing may attend you and your family in the New Year upon which we are soon to enter.

Faithfully yours,

R. L. BORDEN.

Major-General
The Hon. S. C. MEWBURN, M.P.,
Minister of Militia and Defence,
Ottawa.

OTTAWA, February 23, 1920.

My dear Sir GEORGE,—I beg herewith to tender my resignation as a member of the Government of Canada, and respectfully request an immediate acceptance of the same.

Yours faithfully,

A. K. MACLEAN.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER,
Acting Prime Minister,
Ottawa, Ont.

OTTAWA, Ont., February 24, 1920.

Dear Mr. MACLEAN,—I received your letter of resignation as a member of the Government of Canada and in accordance with your request give you an immediate notice of its acceptance.

I regret exceedingly that you have found it necessary to sever a connection which for the past two years and more has been so pleasant to all your colleagues and so fruitful of service by yourself.

Personally, I shall miss your counsel and your helpful co-operation.

Yours faithfully,

GEORGE E. FOSTER.

Honourable A. K. MACLEAN, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.

CANADA'S REPRESENTATIVE AT WASHINGTON.

On the Orders of the Day.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I am informed that there is an Associated Press cable from London to-day to the effect that the status of the proposed representative of Canada at Washington has been definitely fixed by the British and Canadian Governments. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if that report is correct and whether he has any information to give to the House with regard to it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: All that I can say is that the correspondence is still proceeding and that when it has ended an announcement will be made in the House.

A NATIONAL EIGHT-HOUR WORKING DAY.

Resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed resolution of Mr. Burnham:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that to the extent of the jurisdiction of this Parliament a national eight-hour working day should be established immediately, subject only to the right of express private contract.

Mr. I. E. ARGUE (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on this resolution from the point of view of the farmer. If this resolution carries and the eight-hour day becomes law in Canada, I do not see how we shall be able to carry it out on the farm. There is a great deal of lost time on the farm on account of inclement weather. To-day we are paying higher salaries than were ever paid in Canada for farm labour; in my own district we are paying from $75 to $100 a month. During the greater part of the summer, during seeding and the summer fallow, we must work our teams at least nine hours a day in order to get our work done. If we do that we are in the position of having to pay a man time and a half for overtime or of hiring a stableman to take care of the teams when they come from the farm and to get them ready to go out to work the next morning. Then, during harvest time when the grain is ripe and hundreds of acres are standing ready to cut, we must work ten or twelve hours a day to get the cutting done. I do not know how many hours they work in Ontario during threshing time, but I know that our machines start at daylight and work until dark, and sometimes after.

When our teams are hauling grain to the elevators it is often eight or nine o'clock before they get back to the farm. If the eight-hour day goes into effect in Canada it will simply mean that living, instead of becoming cheaper, will become dearer in this country. It will mean an increase of fifty per cent in the price of farm products. We have no objection to an eight-hour day in shops and factories. They can work eight or ten hours a day if they wish, but I do not see why we should pass legislation in this House to restrict the working hours of possibly the only people in Canada who seem to be willing to work—the farmers. I shall be compelled to vote against the motion.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council: Mr. Speaker, the question which is raised by this motion was one that engaged the attention of the Washington Conference, and as what was done at that conference may have some bearing upon this matter I think it is only right to put the House in possession of the facts. As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) is here, he can speak to the House on the constitutional aspect of the case.

Hon. members will recall that under the labour clauses of the Treaty of Peace, it is declared that among the conditions of labour which are producing "unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled" are the hours of labour, and among the measures which it is recommended should be adopted is one "regulating the hours of work, including the establishment of a maximum working day and week." Among the principles laid down in the treaty as of urgent importance is: "The adoption of an eight-hour day or a forty-eight-hour week as the standard to be aimed at where it has not been already attained." And in the agenda for the Washington Conference as set out in the Treaty the first article is "the application of the principle of the eight-hour day and the forty-eight-hour week."

I have referred to these matters in order to indicate to the House the exact nature of the question that came before the Washington Conference for consideration. The question before the Conference was not whether it was desirable or undesirable to pass legislation regulating the hours of labour. That principle was affirmed in the Treaty of Peace; and in all the provinces of the Dominion legislation has been passed regulating the hours of labour in certain classes of industry and among particular classes of workers, particularly women and children. So that principle is recognized in the legislation of Canada and, I think, of all civilized countries. Nor was it the question of whether, in regulating the hours of labour an eight-hour day or a forty-eight hour week would be wise or unwise. That general principle was also laid down in the Treaty. The question which the Washington Conference was called upon to consider was whether there should be an eight-hour day or a forty-eight-hour week or some modification or combination of the two, and whether the time had arrived to secure general application of that principle to all industrial nations. Hon. members of the House will recognize that one of the principles underlying the labour clauses of the Peace Treaty is that uniform action should be secured on these matters among the industrial nations, that the failure of one or more industrial nations to take action on any of these matters embarrassed, and, in a measure prevented other nations from taking advanced ground. Therefore the issue before the Conference was to ascertain if an agreement could be secured among the representatives of the nations members of the Conference whereby these nations would move forward together in a matter of this kind. What action did the Washington Conference take on this matter and how is such action to be made effective? I will tell the House briefly for the information of hon. gentlemen. Article 19 of the labour clauses provides:

When the Conference has decided on the adoption of proposals with regard to an item in the agenda, it will rest with the Conference to determine whether these proposals should take the form; (a) of a recommendation to be submitted to the members for consideration with a view to effect being given to it by national legislation or otherwise, or (b) of a draft international convention for ratification by the members.

Hon. members will see that it was open to the Conference to adopt either of these two courses, either to set forth its conclusions in the form recommended which would go forward to the different nations with the view to unite giving effect thereto by national, or the Conference might decide that its decision should take the form of an international treaty or convention to be signed and ratified by the nations parties to the Conference if they approved,

This same article also provides the vote necessary to make the decision effective:

A majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the delegates present shall be necessary on the final vote for the adoption of the recommendation or draft convention, as the case may be, by the Conference.

In the case of this particular convention the necessary two-third majority was secured. Now what follows when a convention is adopted? That is also provided in Article 19:

A copy of the recommendation or draft convention shall be authenticated by the signature of the president of the Conference and of the Director, and shall be deposited with the Secretary-General of the League of Nations. The Secretary-General will communicate a certified copy of the recommendation or draft convention to each of the members.

[Mr. Rowell.]

Now by reason of the fact that the Washington Conference was held prior to the League of Nations being constituted, because the ratification of the Treaty did not become effective till the 10th of January, the Conference was not formally closed, but was adjourned until after the Treaty of Peace had gone into effect by reason of its ratification, and the Conference was formally closed by declaration of the governing body at the meeting held in Paris after the Treaty had gone into effect. Before action is taken a certified copy of this convention must be sent to the secretary of the League of Nations, and a certified copy must be sent by him to each member. The Government has not yet received the certified copy of this or of any of the conventions adopted by the International Labour Conference at Washington.

Therefore the Government is not in receipt of any official communication up to the present time upon which it can take official action. This clause also sets out the obligation which shall rest upon each member.

Each of the members undertakes that it will, within the period of one year at most from the closing of the session of the Conference, or, if it is impossible owing to exceptional circumstances to do so within the period of one year, then at the earliest practicable moment, and in no case later than eighteen months from the closing of the session of the Conference, bring the recommendation or draft convention before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies for the enactment of legislation or other action.

The members of the House will see that that raises an important question, particularly in a country like Canada, with a federal constitution, as to whether the legislative authority before which this matter should be brought for appropriate action would be the legislatures of the provinces or the federal parliament. It goes on:

In the case of a draft convention, the member will, if it obtains the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, communicate the formal ratification of the convention to the Secretary-General and will take such action as may be necessary to make effective the provisions of such convention.

Then there is a further express provision dealing with a federal state:

In the case of a federal state, the power of which to enter into conventions on labour matters is subject to limitations, it shall be in the discretion of that government to treat a draft convention to which such limitations apply as a recommendation only, and the provisions of this article with respect to recommendations shall apply in such case.

As the Minister of Justice is here I shall not undertake to discuss the constitutional aspect of the question either in relation to the federal parliament, or the rights and powers of the provincial legislatures.

Mr. MORPHY: I cannot hear what the minister is saying, but I should like to know whether it is his opinion that this Parliament has no jurisdiction in the matter at all.

Mr. ROWELL: What I said was that, as the Minister of Justice was here, and as he has been giving the whole matter serious consideration, I would not undertake to pass upon that aspect of it. The Minister of Justice will be able to state the position as he sees it.

Mr. MORPHY: Will the Minister of Justice make a statement on that particular question before this debate is over?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I desire to ask a question of the minister (Mr. Rowell) in order that we may fully understand the procedure. In the event of this draft convention being submitted to a parliament that has jurisdiction and such parliament deciding not to take the action suggested in the convention, what would be the consequence of its position?

Mr. ROWELL: I cannot undertake at this moment to answer the question raised by my hon. friend. He will see that it involves a very important question, under our constitution, which would require very careful consideration. My hon. friend no doubt understands that the obligation of a government to submit a convention is exactly the same whether or not that government agrees with the principle of the convention. It may be open to very serious argument that a government, under our system, in submitting such a recommendation, should submit it so as to permit a free and open vote of the members of the House. That is one view of the matter. The other view would be that the government must take the responsibility of submitting the convention to the House as a government. But it would be a rather anomalous and embarrassing situation if the government were bound to submit to parliament a convention against which it had voted at the conference and with the principle of which it did not agree, and to put it forward as a government measure, virtually saying that parliament must adopt it. I mention this merely to indicate that here again is a very important question which will require the most careful consideration before a precedent is established which might to some extent bind subsequent governments. The matter is not free from very serious difficulty in the consideration of its constitutional aspect.

Mr. BURNHAM: May I ask when steps will be taken to settle the question of jurisdiction?

Mr. ROWELL: That whole question is now under the consideration of the Department of Justice. This afternoon I promised my hon. friend (Mr. Burnham) at his request that I would make a statement to the House in regard to the terms of the Washington Convention, so that hon. members might be informed on the subject; and in view of this, and the fact that the Minister of Justice will make a statement in reference to the question of jurisdiction, I would ask my hon. friend to withdraw the motion, because he has accomplished his purpose in bringing the subject to the attention of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In order that we may clearly understand the powers of governments in this matter, will my hon. friend explain to the House how any government will be made to carry out any convention that is agreed upon? As I understand the minister, there is an international convention drafted, and it is submitted to the governments of the different countries that are members of the League of Nations. Should any one of those nations decide not to carry out the convention, by what means will it be coerced, or is there any means of doing this?

Mr. ROWELL: As I explained the other afternoon in discussing the Bulgarian Treaty, there is no means of compelling a government to carry out any convention. The obligation of the Government is to present the matter to the competent legislative authority, for consideration and action. If that body determine that the convention shall not be accepted, or, in the case of a recommendation, that it shall not be acted upon, then the government has discharged its whole responsibility under the terms of the Treaty. But there is a provision requiring the government to submit the convention to the competent authority, and any government declining to do so might be subject to an economic boycott and the other penalties provided for to insure the enforcement of the provisions of the treaty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the point which I desired to bring out. I wanted to know the method by which obligations were to be enforced.

Mr. ROWELL: It depends, in the last analysis, upon the public opinion of any country, as voiced through its competent legislative assembly, whether any convention shall or shall not be accepted in that particular country.

Mr. MORPHY: Suppose this Parliament were found to have no jurisdiction, the jurisdiction being in the provincial legislatures, what would be the position of the Dominion then in relation to the League of Nations?

Mr. ROWELL: In that event, the whole responsibility of the Government of Canada would be to submit the matter to the respective provinces, and it would be for the provinces to decide what action they should take. The whole obligation of this Government would be discharged if it submitted the matter to the provinces.

Mr. MORPHY: Have the provinces any status in connection with the League of Nations and how do they come into juxtaposition?

Mr. ROWELL: The treaty expressly provides for, and contemplates, the case of states with a federal constitution. The matter came up in considering the position of the United States. Brazil also has a federal constitution and provision was made in the treaty for such cases. The reason the treaty says, "Competent legislative authority" is that it was considered that some of these matters might come within the competence of provincial parliaments and not within the competence of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand the President of the Privy Council to say that if the Department of Justice, or the highest judicial authority of the land, decides that this matter is within the purview of the provincial legislatures, and one of the provincial governments refuses to submit the agreement to the legislative body, or the legislature refuses to take it into consideration, a boycott will be resorted to? Are the other provinces of the Dominion to refuse to do business with this particular province —to boycott it?

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend has misunderstood what I said. I said nothing of that kind. What I said was that in cases where jurisdiction rests in the provinces and not in the Dominion, the whole obligation is discharged when the Federal Government passes on the recommendation to the province. There is no boycott, the provinces are not obligated to take action and the Federal Parliament has no authority to compel them to take action. The only case where the obligations of the treaty could be brought into play would be if the Federal Government declined to take any action or declined to submit the convention or recommendation to the competent legislative authority.

Mr. BUREAU: The way out is for the Federal Government to deny its jurisdiction?

Mr. ROWELL: It cannot deny it if it has it. But the Minister of Justice will discuss these matters of jurisdiction, and I think we will save time by leaving them to him to discuss.

Mr. FIELDING: Has my hon. friend in mind the date of the Washington conference?

Mr. ROWELL: November.

Mr. FIELDING: I understand that the official report has not yet been received by the Government of Canada?

Mr. ROWELL: The conference, as I explained, only adjourned; it did not conclude its session. The reason it did not conclude its session was because, owing to the delay in the ratification of the Treaty of Peace, the treaty had not been ratified when the conference concluded its regular business. Therefore the conference formally adjourned, instead of closing its session, and the conference was proclaimed closed some time in the month of January or February —I do not remember the date—by action in Paris, when the executive, or governing body, met. The chairman and secretary of the conference could not transmit any convention to the secretary of the League of Nations prior to the formal closing of the conference, and the secretary-general of the League of Nations could not transmit certified copies to the nations which are members of the League of Nations until he had received them from the chairman of the conference. Therefore, all have not received them. But there has been no great delay in dealing with the matter.

Mr. KING: I would like to ask the hon. minister whether, in his opinion, the circumstance of the United States not having become a member of the League of Nations would have any effect in delaying a conclusion upon the question as to whether the Federal Government ought to take action on this convention.

Mr. ROWELL: That would be an important factor to be taken into consideration. Now, just a word or two as to what the convention does provide. In the first place, it differs from the resolution before the House in that the resolution provides for a general eight-hour day irrespective of the classes of occupations. The convention recognizes that there are three or four groups of employees and it divides them into industry, agriculture, commerce, and those who go to sea. The convention only covers industry. It does not cover agriculture, commerce, or seamen. Thus it is narrowed down to employees engaged in industry.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: May I ask the hon. gentleman to explain the difference between industry and agriculture?

Mr. ROWELL: The distinction is drawn in the treaty in this way: The treaty sets out certain classes of employment which shall be called "industrial undertakings." It provides:

> For the purposes of this Convention the term "industrial undertaking" includes particularly:
> (a) Mines, quarries, and other works for the extraction of minerals from the earth.
> (b) Industries in which articles are manufactured, altered, cleaned, repaired, ornamented, finished, adapted for sale, broken up or demolished, or in which materials are transformed; including shipbuilding and the generation, transformation and transmission of electricity or motive power of any kind.

It goes on to define certain other specified undertakings which are classed as industry, including works of construction, building railways, transport of passengers or goods by sea or land. Then it adds—and this meets the point which my hon. friend has raised—

> The competent authority in each country shall define the line of division which separates industry and commerce from agriculture.

It is referred to the competent legislative authorities in each country to draw the line between industry, agriculture and commerce.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Does not the first clause include agriculture? It says: "other means of producing or extracting things from the earth."

Mr. ROWELL: No, agriculture is expressly excluded and is referred to the competent authority in each country to draw the line

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Agriculture is chiefly concerned with transforming materials into something a little different. It is not merely a matter of sowing the seed and reaping the harvest.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend evidently did not catch what I said. It is extracting minerals from the earth; not materials from the earth.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Materials transformed.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend can see the document and peruse it for himself. It makes it quite clear that it does not apply to agriculture. There is no mistake; it is made clear beyond peradventure. The Convention provides for an eight-hours day and a forty-eight hours week, subject to the exception set forth in the Convention. These exceptions are briefly as follows: (1) Persons holding positions of superintendence or management or employed in a confidential capacity; (2) where the hours of work on one or more days of the week are fewer than eight, the limit of eight hours may be exceeded by not more than one hour per day. Where there is a Saturday half holiday then the other days of the week may exceed eight hours so long as the total working hours in the week do not exceed forty-eight. (3) where persons are employed in shifts the eight-hours day and the forty-eight hours week may be exceeded provided they do not exceed the average of eight hours a day and forty-eight hours a week for a three weeks period.

Mr. BUREAU: In the other case the eight-hour day would be more properly defined as a forty-eight-hour week?

Mr. ROWELL: That is what the Conference decided. It is an eight-hour day and a forty-eight-hour week. In fact that was one of the points of difference in the Conference. The employers wanted the forty-eight-hour week without the eight-hour limitations.

Mr. BUREAU: That would be more sensible.

Mr. ROWELL: —and the employees wished the straight eight-hour day. If this had been granted in all employments where the Saturday half holiday prevails, it would mean a forty-four-hour week. This Convention was agreed upon as a result of a long conference between employers and employees and representatives of the Government as a fair solution of the differences.

Mr. MORPHY: What has the League of Nations to do with this resolution? It stands by itself as I understand it and this Parliament can adopt it or not irrespective of the League of Nations. Are we not discussing what is on the Order Paper, free from any interference, or control, or request by the League of Nations?

Mr. ROWELL: Entirely so. But as there will be before the Government of Canada a proposal dealing with this matter in the form of this Convention when it reaches the Government, I was simply explaining to the House the nature of the Convention so that the House will be seized of the matter and as a good and sufficient reason why this resolution should not be pressed at the present time. Some hon. members, including the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution, asked that the terms of this Convention might be stated for the information of members generally. I have now given the general terms of the Convention and I do not think there is anything to be gained by discussing the details of it at the present time. I will simply mention the further exceptions to the general limitation of hours of work contained in the Convention, because they are important.

Mr. BURNHAM: Are we going to receive an explanation from the Minister of Justice before this sitting closes?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes, the Minister of Justice will give an explanation.

There are exceptions in the case of accidents, actual or threatened also with respect to the processes required in an industry which by nature of the industry must be continuous. Provision is also made for seasonal occupations. So that great elasticity is possible to meet the varying conditions of industry.

Special provision is made for Japan and India and China. Japan makes the greatest advance of any country under the provisions of this Convention. The only law of Japan at the present time limiting hours of work is the one regulating the hours of work for women and I think that is twelve or thirteen hours a day. Japan has no rest day on Sunday but has two holidays in the year. Under this Convention Japan agrees to a limitation in general industries to nine and a half hours a day and in the silk industry to ten hours, and to one rest day a week. In this respect it marks the greatest advance in limiting the hours of labour in any country in the world. That means a great deal for Canada and the United States. In the days that lie before us the competition, the keenest competition, both as to employers and employees, will come from the great labouring classes in the Orient. It will be a great thing for the people of this continent if by means of a Convention like the present we get the hours of labour in Japan cut down from twelve or thirteen without any rest day each week to nine and a half or ten with a rest day each week, with the expectation that within a few years Japan will come into harmony with the general terms of this Conference. If nothing else were accomplished by the Conference at Washington than bringing Japan up to that point of co-operation with the other industrial nations in regulating the hours of labour, it would be well worth while and a great success.

Rt. Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I am very happy indeed to meet what seems to be the general desire for an expression of opinion on my part upon the question of the constitutional power of this Parliament to deal with the subject matter of this resolution, which, I think is the question that properly arises in connection with it. I quite understand that the natural desire of members for information with regard to the Labour Conference should have led to the very interesting discussion that we have heard on that subject; but I quite agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) that it is in reality—and I think in giving the explanation which he did give the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) recognizes the fact—beside this question.

The Motion that we have before us is a Motion to this effect:

> That it is desirable that to the extent of the jurisdiction of this Parliament a national eight-hour working day should be established immediately, subject only to the right of express private contract.

Now, as was pointed out, if my memory serves me correctly, by the leader of the Opposition, this motion or declaration that such an enactment should be adopted would not meet, and does not meet, the desire of those who want to have an eight-hour day made an obligatory day by law, because this resolution especially provides for an exemption from any rule that may be made wherever by private contract it is stipulated there shall be an exemption; and I understood the hon. member (Mr. Burnham) who moved the resolution to have declared that his resolution, if adopted and action taken upon it, would carry us no further than to establish a state of the law under which there would be a presumption that a day's work was eight hours.

Mr. BURNHAM: That is right.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is all. That presumption would be subject to become inapplicable or to be rebutted by any express stipulation in the contract. I think I am correct in that.

Mr. BURNHAM: Yes, that is right.

Mr. DOHERTY: Now, taking that position, I think there is room for little if any doubt—I think I may say for myself that I have no doubt, because one always looks upon a legal question recognizing the fact of the possibility of the existence of other people's opinions—that such a resolution, or an enactment based upon that resolution if adopted would be an enactment dealing with a subject matter entirely outside of the jurisdiction of this Parliament of Canada. Because, after all, what is it that that enactment would be? It would be a presumption applicable in every contract of lease or hire of work. Now the determination and the interpretation of contracts —the presumption that arises in connection with contracts generally; I will not make exception of any special conditions such as those that appear in Bills that come before Parliament—falls under the designation of "property and civil rights," and to me it seems quite clear that we have no jurisdiction to declare that it shall be a presumption in every contract of lease or hire, where a day is mentioned and no number of hours, that a day means eight hours. I think that is clearly legislation dealing with the interpretation of contracts having to do with property and civil rights within the different provinces, and—giving my opinion, of course, for what it is worth and for nothing more—I am of opinion that we would have no jurisdiction to enact legislation of that kind.

I would like to point out that of course the opinion of the Minister of Justice is of no binding effect upon this Parliament. It stands as worth what his opinion as a lawyer may be worth, and it has the weight of whatever may be his reputation as a competent lawyer. The Minister of Justice is not charged with advising the House of Commons, still less with imposing upon it his views of the law; he is the adviser of Government and of the departments of Government.

I think I might leave the matter there so far as the constitutional question is concerned as arising in connection with this resolution. However, I may point out what would be the powers of this Parliament to legislate with regard to the conditions of contracts of lease and hire if by some treaty validly entered into either Canada or any of its provinces became bound to enact some particular legislation upon the subject. If such a condition arose, then under Article 132 of the British North America Act this Parliament would have power to legislate for the purpose of giving effect to any obligation imposed either upon the Dominion or upon any of the provinces. It is only from the point of view of the application of that article that we may be led—in fact, I think we will be necessarily led—to a consideration of the question: Whether anything may arise out of any treaty or any convention that may be submitted to us by the Labour Conference which would confer jurisdiction upon this Parliament to enact such legislation as might be requisite to comply with or carry out the convention.

Mr. MORPHY: Might I ask the minister a question? Does he say that this Parliament, in view of section 93 of the British North America Act, giving the power to the province to legislate with regard to property and civil rights, would have any right to entertain jurisdiction until the provinces had or had not acted with regard to something which should be done in the treaty with foreign nations under section 132?

Mr. DOHERTY: I think that raises, not a question of the power of this Parliament, but the question of what would be proper in the action of this Government. If legislation were essential to the carrying out of an obligation imposed upon a province by a treaty made by the British Empire, there would be power in this Parliament to enact that legislation. If the legislation were of a kind which, under the rules of the constitution, irrespective of any treaty obligation, would fall within the legislative competence of the provincial legislatures, I myself would think it highly proper for the Dominion Government, before it proceeded to enact the legislation required, to ascertain whether the provinces in the exercise of their ordinary jurisdiction were prepared to act. But as an abstract question of law I do not think that the power of this Parliament to act under those circumstances would depend upon previous application to the provinces; the power seems to be given in express terms without any exception or limitation. In regard to that, as of course in regard to everything else, I am giving merely my own opinion, and upon this very question I shall guard myself by saying that it is really an offhand opinion, the question only having been brought to my attention this moment.

Mr. BUREAU: We would act through the provincial legislature.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not want to give any more off-hand opinions than are necessary, but the words go very far to confer a power to do that which is necessary so that the obligation is carried out, and I would be disposed to think we would be entitled to do something more than pass a law to carry out the obligation,—that being entitled to pass that law we would be entitled to enforce it. I have not the slightest doubt that if it were a matter about property and civil rights in the provinces, and Canada or the provinces became bound by a treaty to enact that kind of legislation, when we enacted it the courts would have to enforce that just the same as though it were a provincial law.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the minister take due notice of the fact that the resolution says, "It is desirable?" Would he mind discussing that word "desirable?"

Mr. DOHERTY: It is a pretty long cry from what is constitutional to what is desirable. I am not suggesting that this Parliament can pass this pious aspiration perhaps that such a law is desirable; but as I understand the resolution it would be in effect a declaration by us that it is desirable to the extent that it is within our constitutional power to enact the legislation; which in my opinion it is not.

Now, do not forget that the hon. gentleman pointed out the other evening that there are parts of this Dominion where we would have constitutional power. In fact, I think someone suggested that the only work done in those parts was by the wolves. However that may be, it does not seem to me that we could declare a national eight-hour day applicable in what remains of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. The purpose of the resolution, no doubt, is to declare a national eight-hour day, and I think we might leave out of consideration what possibility there might be of declaring such a day to be effective in those territories. Certainly it would not be a national eight-hour day if put into effect in that way. Opinions, of course, differ on the question whether it is desirable that there should be legislation creating this presumption. That, however, has been threshed out from different points of view, and I do not think that I could add anything of value.

Now, I do not purpose to go into the question of the interpretation of the provisions of the Peace Treaty with regard to the manner in which conventions are to be dealt with by the different powers. I may, however, point out that as I read the provisions of the Treaty—I say this subject, perhaps, to further consideration, though I have very little doubt about it—they do not impose upon the nations an obligation to enact into law the particular conventions adopted. The obligation as set forth is that the respective governments or the respective countries will bring before the competent authorities a convention for the enactment of legislation or other action. It goes no further than that. The convention goes on to point out that if that competent authority does not adopt legislation or does not act, there is no further obligation upon the country. If that competent authority does adopt legislation or take other action giving effect to the convention then it becomes the duty of the country concerned to report that ratification to the body in authority. When the conventions arrive at their official condition I do not think that we shall be in any very great difficulty in determining what action is incumbent upon us; certainly to the extent that action is incumbent upon us it will be our duty to take it. As I have pointed out, any action incumbent upon us deals in express terms with our bringing the matter before the competent authority.

Mr. BUREAU: That would be before the legislatures.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. I should say that unless there can be found in the terms of the Treaty as applied to the convention the creation of an obligation to enact some specific legislation, we shall not find what in my opinion are the essential conditions to giving jurisdiction to this Parliament to legislate upon the subject. Upon this question of legislative jurisdiction I understand that very strong opinions adverse to that which I have expressed are entertained by those who speak for some, at all events, of the provinces. In that condition of affairs it may become necessary to have this question authoritatively passed upon. It would be an undesirable situation, if it did arise, that we should fail entirely of action simply because all the different authorities considered that they were not competent to deal with the matter.

Mr. BURNHAM: Will this Government now try to find out about the jurisdiction?

Mr. DOHERTY: I might venture to say that we think we know about the jurisdiction. But if there should arise such a situation as I have been pointing out; if each authority should say: We have not the jurisdiction,—then it might become desirable that we should get an authoritative decision as to where the jurisdiction lies. It is not in the power of this Government to impose its view upon the provincial governments, and of course it is not in their power to impose their views upon us. While I am not saying that it will necessarily be done, the House will see that it is readily conceivable that that will become, if not a necessary, at all events a very desirable step to take.

Mr. MORPHY: Having regard to the phraseology of section 132 of the British North America Act, is the minister of the opinion that under this particular Convention there is any obligation resting upon a province as such, irrespective of its being a component part of the Dominion?

Mr. DOHERTY: Whether there is an obligation resting upon a province as such must depend upon what are the obligations in the Treaty. I have difficulty in conceiving that we would make a treaty imposing an obligation upon a province by name. But if by a treaty we undertook an obligation which in the ordinary operation of things could be carried out only by a province, then there would arise an obligation incumbent on that province as the result of the treaty. I do not conceive that the case that is contemplated is the making of a treaty whereby Canada would say: The province of Ontario will do such-and-such a thing. But if Canada undertook to do something which had to be done in the province of Ontario and which, leaving treaty obligations entirely aside, would be a matter to be dealt with by the province, then I think you would have the case that is contemplated in the statute of an obligation incumbent upon a province. I cannot at the moment quite conceive of a situation where you would have a treaty which would in terms undertake that a particular province would do a particular thing. It would be a treaty-making power that would undertake to do it; but in order to make that effective you must have something that is to be done by a province, or at all events through the exercise of powers which ordinarily belong to a province.

Mr. MORPHY: Even though this Parliament would over-rule the exclusive jurisdiction of the province?

Mr. DOHERTY: If the case came under Article 132, Parliament, as I understand it, certainly would be entitled to over-rule the exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. MORPHY: You would have to amend the British North America Act, would you not?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, because Article 132 says that.

Mr. McMASTER: In the terms of Article 132?

Mr. BUREAU: Is not the province supreme?

Mr. SPEAKER: We are not in committee. The Minister of Justice has the floor.

Mr. DOHERTY: Where there is concurrent power in the legislature of a province and in the Parliament of Canada to legislate upon the same subject, then the legislation by the Parliament of Canada supersedes the provincial legislation. Even if you treat Article 132 as leaving co-existent with Parliament's competency under Article 132 the competency of the provincial legislatures under section 91, then you have the case of concurrent jurisdiction, and I think that lawyers generally would agree that in such a case the legislation of Parliament would over-ride that of the provinces. But the only purpose of this express provision of Article 132 is to give to Parliament a power which it would have under the general provisions of section 91; by its express terms it confers a power with regard to matters constituting obligation on the part of the province. Therefore I do not think there is any difficulty in the way of its operating to confer upon Parliament the power to do things which, under other circumstances, would be within the exclusive power of a provincial legislature.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Am I right in gathering from the minister's remarks that as a matter of jurisdiction this Parliament has no power to enact what is called the eight-hour day?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not want to say that there is no possible combination of circumstances--

Mr. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: I mean, generally speaking.

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand the enactment of an eight-hour day to mean the enactment of a general law that in all contracts for the lease or hire of labour the day shall be eight hours and no more.

Eliminating all questions of carrying out Treaty obligations, my own opinion would be that Parliament has not the power to enact that legislation.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU: Unless Parliament made it a criminal offence to work longer.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. If Parliament felt justified, I suppose it is within its power to take matters which in their very nature one disassociates entirely from the idea of crime, and by declaring certain things with regard to them to be crimes, to put the matter into our jurisdiction in that way. But I myself would not be disposed to do that.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU: Very few would.

Mr. JOHN H. BURNHAM (West Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, some days ago it was pointed out in the newspapers that the Drury Government in Ontario did not intend to put the eight-hour day upon their legislative programme, but intended to hand the matter over to a commission to find out what it might find out. It naturally occurred to me that it would also be advisable for us in this House to find out, if we did not know, and at any rate to declare our position with regard to the eight-hour day in order that the province of Ontario and all the other provinces might know what the scope of their jurisdiction was with regard to it. We have tonight received from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) the explicit declaration that in his opinion—that is, such an opinion as he would give in advising the Government—this Parliament has no jurisdiction to consider a national eight-hour working day. That liberates, in my opinion, the province of Ontario and enables them to go on promptly with the work of enacting an eight-hour working day if they wish.

All this talk about whether or not the farmer would stand for it, has nothing whatever to do with the question. It was all very interesting, although I knew it all before personally. As to the point: Is the eight-hour day desirable?—strange to say, among all the mighty legal minds in this House not one of them has fastened upon the essential word in the introduction of the resolution. A resolution, as I understand it, is to enable the House to give an academic opinion after an academic discussion. But this House refused to consider the question whether an eight-hour day was desirable or not, and that is all I wanted them to consider. If they said it was desirable, then the next step was to be taken. If they said it was not desirable, that would have finished it. But they did not, and would not, consider whether or not it was desirable. They simply attacked, almost every one of them, the principle of the eight-hour day.

The object of the resolution has been fully attained, and as it serves no further purpose than that declared by the Minister of Justice I beg leave to withdraw the resolution, Mr. Speaker.

Motion withdrawn.

On motion of Sir George Foster, the House adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

Tuesday, March 16, 1920.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Evidence and Exhibits in the Race Track Inquiry.—Sir George Foster.

Volume 3, Auditor General's Report for the year ended March 31, 1919.—Sir Henry Drayton.

Annual Report of the Department of Indian Affairs for the year ended March 31, 1919.—Hon. Mr. Meighen.

Copies of Orders in Council passed from August 1, 1919, to February 5, 1920, in accordance with the provisions of the Forest Reserves and Parks Act, Railway Belt Act, Dominion Lands Survey Act, and the Dominion Lands Act—Hon. Mr. Meighen.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): The Minister of Finance has laid on the Table to-day the third volume of the Auditor General's Report. May I ask when we may expect the full report, particularly that part which has to do with the war expenditure?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): I understand from the Printing Bureau that Volumes 1, 2 and 4 will be finished about the end of this week. Volume 4 contains full particulars of the war expenditure.

KINGSTON HARBOUR IMPROVEMENTS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): I would draw the attention of the Government to a despatch from Kingston appearing in the Montreal Standard of March 13, which states that the Canadian Government has given the city of Kingston the assurance that the sum of $2,500,000 will be spent on harbour improvements there. I would ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, who is also the distinguished representative of Kingston in this House, if the report is true, and if so, whether these improvements are to be made in fulfilment of an election promise.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): The report is absolutely incorrect. That also answers my hon. friend's second question, but in order to make it a little more emphatic, I might say that there was no election promise.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOHN H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): May I be permitted to remind the leader of the Government of the well-known Parliamentary doctrine that the Government is required to obey the orders of the House of Commons. At the last session, and the last but one, a large number of orders were passed for the production of papers, which have not yet been complied with. I am drawing this to the attention of my right hon. friend in order that he may have the proper officers notified and have the papers brought down.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If my hon. friend will give me a list of the orders passed which have not yet been complied with, I will take the matter up personally.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I will do that.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE AMENDMENT ACT.

THIRD READING.

On motion of Hon. N. W. Rowell (President of the Privy Council) Bill No. 2, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act and to transfer to the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police the powers heretofore vested in the Commissioner of Dominion Police was read the third time and passed.

SUPERANNUATION AND RETIREMENT ACT AMENDMENT.—RATE OF INTEREST.

On the motion of Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance) the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That section twenty-seven of the Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act, Chapter seventeen of the Revised Statutes of 1906, be amended to provide that the rate of interest computed on all sums to the credit of the Retirement Fund, whether principal or interest, be increased from four to five per centum per annum, that the Governor in Council shall have power to reduce the said rate of interest, but not below four per cent per annum, and that the proposed amendments shall be deemed to have come into force and effect on and from the first day of January, 1920.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This resolution speaks pretty well for itself. I would point out that I am withdrawing resolution No. 5 on the Order Paper dealing with the same subject matter as this resolution. The object of the resolution before the Committee is to increase from four to five per cent the rate of interest on the percentage that is taken compulsorily from the salaries of civil servants, and the aggregate of which is paid over to them on their retirement. In view of the higher rate of interest now prevailing it has been thought but just to grant this increased rate.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): When this Act was passed, the rate of 4 per cent allowed on these savings was considered to be rather a generous one, because the Government were then borrowing at 3 per cent or less. I quite agree that in view of the changed conditions of the money market, 5 per cent is not too high to-day, and I quite approve the action of the minister. It suggests, however, the point to which I drew attention the other day, that we are increasing the rate of interest on nearly everything except savings bank deposits. I mention the matter merely for the reflection of my hon. friend Sir Henry Drayton.

Mr. DUFF: I see that provision is made to raise the rate of interest from four to five per cent, but the Governor General in Council is given power to reduce it, not below four per cent. It seems to me that some explanation is needed in regard to this provision. Why should that power rest in the Governor in Council? I think that if a year hence, or at any other time in the future, circumstances were found to justify the reduction of the rate the minister might come to Parliament and obtain its sanction for that reduction.

Mr. FIELDING: I think it is well, in increasing the rate of interest, to give notice that this is due to the general higher value of money, and that if a change takes place the rate may have to be reduced. But even if the 5 per cent rate were continued it would not be too generous.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: I am quite aware that in 1898 a change was made in the superannuation law giving an option to a great many civil servants to retain their status under the old Act or to come under the new Act. I should like to know from the minister how many civil servants are now entitled to the benefit of superannuation, and how many are entitled to that under the fund with which we are now dealing. Does it apply to the Civil Service generally? An explanation from the minister would be greatly appreciated by the country, as there is at present some confusion in the matter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I regret that I have not the definite statistics here, but, as I understand the matter, with the legislation of 1898 the former superannuation system ended. The result is that only those who were employed in the service prior to 1898 are still entitled to the old superannuation fund, which was not and is not a self-supporting fund, and towards which, I think, the country has contributed something like $11,000,000. That is altogether stopped now, except as regards those who had an interest in it at the time that legislation was passed. The present arrangement applies, I understand, to all civil servants who, apart from the change in the law stopping the superannuation, would have been entitled to that superannuation. The great difference between the two funds is that the present retiring allowance is supplied entirely by the employee himself, his salary being arbitrarily reduced by five per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: An option was given to the civil servants to determine whether they would remain under the old Act or take advantage of the benefit—if it was a benefit—of the new Act. I think a few old officials came to the conclusion that they would avail themselves of the option, and I know of one notable instance in which an old public official who had contributed a great deal of money, and to whom in the natural order of things nothing would be due at the time of death, took the option and agreed to come under the retirement fund. He died a few weeks afterwards and his heirs got many thousands from the public treasury.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time, and concurred in.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 17, founded on the resolution.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

]Mr. Fielding.[

CURRENCY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(GOLD AND SILVER COINAGE).

On the motion of Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance), Bill No. 15, to amend the Currency Act, 1910, was read the second time and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On Section 1—Standard for gold and silver coins—

Mr. BUREAU: Will the minister please inform the House what the old standard was?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The change made here is in connection with silver coinage. The old standard was 925 parts fine, and the reduction is to 800 parts.

Mr. McKENZIE: I take this opportunity of calling the attention of the minister to an article that appeared in the Boston Post a few days ago, regarding our exchange. In the debate on the Address I made some remarks that seem to have been regarded as being inconsistent with the general ideas concerning exchange, and I received a great deal of cheap advertisement throughout the country. The Boston Post published an editorial on my observations in which it said that Canadians could not expect anything else in regard to their money if they continued to grind it out simply in the press instead of digging it out of the ground in the form of gold. If it be the case that our exchange is what it is by reason of the fact that we have too much paper and not enough gold, when are we going to make an honest effort to get back to gold conditions and to a proper ratio between our paper money and our gold reserves so that our dollar will be worth one hundred cents as it was not so many years ago?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: And get the good opinion of the Boston paper.

Mr. McKENZIE: Get the good opinion of those who are selling goods and get a good opinion of our dollar. We know that our dollar is perfectly good and legal tender everywhere. I never heard of a paper dollar issued in Canada for which payment was refused in gold when it came back to the proper quarters. There is some prejudice against our money in the United States which is not justified. If it be true, as this paper says, that we have too much paper and not enough gold, whenever an opportunity presents itself to bring this matter to the notice of the Minister of Finance, I think we should do so. I do not profess to be an authority on these things but it does not require very much sense to know that when you present your dollar in any of the hotels in Boston it is only worth eighty-five cents. I want to bring back the old conditions when it was worth one hundred cents on the dollar. It is all very well to say that we do not scientifically understand these things. I think I am justified in bringing it to the notice of the Government and to those who are supposed to have scientific knowledge. I want to know whether there is anything in the argument of the Boston Post or not.

Mr. PEDLOW: Mr. Chairman, what is the business before the House? We have absolutely no knowledge of what is going on. We might as well be sitting looking at a moving picture show. I would like the members, when they are addressing the House, to turn in this direction so that we will have some slight knowledge of what is going on.

The CHAIRMAN: We are considering clause 1 of Bill No. 15.

Mr. PEDLOW: Thank you very much. I would like to have a copy of the Bill. We do not know what the Bill refers to.

The CHAIRMAN: The Bill has been distributed and ought to be on the hon. member's file.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid it would take some time to properly answer the question of the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie). Perhaps it will be enough to say that Canada's currency stands well and compares favourably, taking any standard of comparison, with any other currency in the world. It is absolutely an ill-founded statement to say that the declension in one particular matter, brought about by the exigencies of trade and the movements of money both as shown in trade balances which are apparent and those which are not so apparent is owing to the fact that the Canadian dollar is not sound. It is sound and not only compares well, but compares very favourable with any other currency.

On Section 2: Silver coins; schedule amended.

Mr. McMASTER: May I ask the minister to explain what "remedy allowance" and "millesimal fineness" mean?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They mean that you are getting the fineness down to a very small point. This "remedy" which is spoken of refers to the standard of fineness that every coin ought to have. For example, it is impossible to get every single coin absolutely perfect to the fraction of a grain and this is the standard of remedy which is fixed. The standard may be within that very small margin which is allowed. Our standard of remedy is exceedingly severe and more severe than the standard of remedy which is applied in the United States.

Mr. McMASTER: How is that remedy applied? Are deficient coins called in?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Deficient coinage is rejected. There is a machine which tests each accurately and any coin not coming up to the standard is at once rejected.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not think the minister understood my qusetion. When coins in circulation get below this standard, is there any machinery for calling them in?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This particular clause of the Bill does not refer to that; it refers to minting. Of course, coins which are below standard are called in.

On Section 3: Silver coins heretofore struck to continue current.

Mr. DAVIS: I would like to ask the minister how this will compare with American coin and whether the change will not make our coins pass for less than they do at the present day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In answer to the hon. member's question I would say that a silver coin, ordinarily and properly, is a token coin. So long as the country stands behind the silver token, and stands for the obligation, it does not make any difference whatever as to what the contents of the token are. We have been getting into an abnormal condition, in so far as silver is concerned, owing to the unprecedented rise in the price of silver, a matter that was discussed when the motion was introduced. The price has risen, during the last year, from 80 cents to $1.41 an ounce, so that at one time we were coining silver at a loss. Of course, just as soon as you have your token coin containing enough currency to be worth the increased amount—that is the amount a coin as a token coin is worth —then the coin is more than a token and there is actual value in it apart from the token. But the function of silver coinage is token coinage, and it could have no effect upon the value of our silver currency as a token.

Mr. DAVIS: At the present time I understand our coins are worth about one-twelfth less in actual value of silver than American coins. What I want to get at now is, what will be their relationship with this change?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The fineness of the American token is 900. Our old token was 25 points above the American token, but although it was 25 points better that did not help it in the American market. I might say, for the information of the hon. member, that the British Parliament, at the present time, is considering reducing the fineness of silver coinage to 500, and that the American authorities are now considering reducing the fineness of their coinage to 800.

Mr. DAVIS: The minister has not answered my question: What would be the proportion now between the actual value of the American silver and ours?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As eight to nine.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES ACT (1908) AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Sir Henry Drayton, Bill No. 16, to amend the Government Annuities Act, 1908, was read a second time and the House went into committee thereon —Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—sale of annuities to persons resident in Canada:

Mr. CAHILL: Will the minister explain the meaning of the change proposed here?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The purpose of the change is to remove from the officers looking after the sale of Government annuities the obligation of seeing that a man is domiciled in Canada. It renders it more easy for them to do business, more easy for Government annuities to be placed readily at the disposal of people living in Canada. No one entertains any idea looking towards leaving Canada for the purpose of pressing the sale of annuities; this provision simply enables the officials to deal with those Canadian residents who come to do business with the department without first finding out whether they are legally domiciled here.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—limit of amount increased from $1,000 to $5,000:

Mr. CAHILL: Will the minister kindly explain the purpose of this clause?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Under the old clause no annuity could be sold for a greater amount than $1,000. This provision allows annuities to be purchased from the Government for as large an amount as $5,000.

Mr. CAHILL: What was the reason for the Government's desire to increase the amount from $1,000 to $5,000?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Requests have been made from time to time, from residents of Canada, who were anxious to make provision either for themselves or for their children and who found an annuity of $1,000 was not sufficient for that purpose.

Mr. FIELDING: The reason is that he wants the money?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that is quite right; that is an additional reason.

Mr. McKENZIE: The House would like to know whether the Government sale of annuities has been a good paying business —what the record of the Annuities Branch has been since its inception, up to the present time. The Annuities Branch is not a very old institution in Canada. It commenced its operations, I think, in 1910, and some changes were brought about with respect to it in either 1912 or 1913. I can recall that when the former Postmaster-General, now Judge Pelletier, was in the House, we had lengthy explanations from him with respect to the annuities, and I think it is only fair to ask now if the business has been a paying one. We are paying out annuities from time to time and receiving certain contributions from the people, who are preparing themselves for the receipt of those annuities. Has the business been a paying one?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have not the exact figures showing how the operations of the department have worked out, but if the hon. gentleman desires I will be very pleased to obtain them for him. The real trouble in the past has been that we have not done very much business. Now, in so far as to whether the sale of annuities has been a paying business or not, the complaint has been made that in the past the Government has been making too much money out of them. A general complaint has been made that we have not been generous enough to the public, having regard to the table on which the annuities were based, rather than that the Government was losing money on them. The real trouble with the situation, I think, is that owing to the limitations that we are now trying to get rid of, there has not been as satisfactory a volume of business in the department as could have been desired. It is hoped that with the removal of these restrictions a far better volume of business will be transacted, and satisfactory profits made.

Mr. McKENZIE: Would the minister instruct his officials to give us a fair idea of how the business stands as to outgoings and incomings from its inception up to the present time?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: A report is laid on the table each year.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Age when annuity payable:

Mr. H. B. MORPHY: Mr. Chairman, there is very great difficulty in following the discussion from this end of the Chamber. I have only just learned that clause 3 relates to Bill No. 16 to amend the Government Annuities Act of 1908. I did not hear the reason given by the Finance Minister for the amendment; consequently I am not able to properly answer something that I could not possibly understand. Speaking in this direction (towards hon. members opposite) section 3 appears to be all right, but I have a great deal of objection to it for the reason that I do not know the number of the section to be repealed. It has not been produced before the House, that I am aware,, and—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. MORPHY: What I am saying, Mr. Chairman, is that section 3, repealing subsection 3 of section 8 is rather difficult to understand when the Act to be repealed is not before the House. I would like to have a full explanation of just what that section means by the Finance Minister addressing the Chairman first in this direction, so that hon. members at this end of the House may hear him, and then in the opposite direction so that other hon. members may hear as well.

It becomes a perfect absurdity and brings the House into disrepute when the public business is proceeding with only one half of the members able to hear what is being discussed. A conversational tone is accepted I believe, in some deliberative assemblies as being a highly ornamental method to disseminate knowledge, but it is not to be recommended for adoption in this Chamber. I notice the pressmen with their hands to their ears in an attempt to understand what is being said—and they are quite close to the ministers. Every member is entitled to the courtesy of those gentlemen who are a little further away using their best efforts to state plainly the matter that is before the House so that public business will be intelligible to every one; but we cannot hope for any improvement while the present conversational tone is maintained.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have much pleasure in answering the question of the hon. gentleman, and I hope he can hear me now. We are striking out, as the hon. gentleman observes, sub-section 3 of section 8 of the old Act, which reads as follows:

> Except upon the occurrence of invalidity or disablement of an annuitant, no annuity shall be payable or paid to any annuitant, unless he has reached the age of fifty-five years.

The amendment will enable annuities to be sold so that they become effective before the age of fifty-five years is reached.

Mr. CAHILL: Does any age limit apply now?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There will be no age limit at all. The rates of pay, however, provide a very effective age limit, because if a man wants to get an annuity at an unusually early age the charge becomes prohibitive.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—rate of interest increased:

Mr. COPP: What does that mean?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The change here is merely to provide that the rate of interest which is payable to the estate of a man who would have become an annuitant if he had lived long enough shall be at four per cent instead of three. There are really three classes of annuities: (1) Where a guaranteed number of payments is made either to the man if he lives long enough or to his estate if he dies; (2) where all premiums paid on account of the annuity shall fail unless the annuitant lives for the specified period; and (3) the intermediate class where if the annuitant dies his estate does not lose the benefit of the payments which he has made, but is entitled to a return of those payments plus interest, which used to be at three per cent but we now make it four percent .

Section 4 agreed to.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH BULGARIA.

STATUS OF CANADA AS A NATION.

Resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed resolution of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Hon. Mr. Rowell) respecting the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Bulgaria:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before speaking to the resolution I should like to ask my hon. friend the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Rowell) whether in the resolution itself the word "plenipotentiaries" is correct, or whether the word "plenipotentiary" should be used. I notice the resolution states that the Treaty has been signed "on behalf of His Majesty, acting for Canada, by the plenipotentiaries therein named." But on referring to the Treaty itself I find there is only one plenipotentiary mentioned for the Dominion of Canada, the Hon. Sir George Perley—unless it is to be understood that the other British representatives named are also signing on behalf of the Dominion.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL: It should be "plenipotentiary." In this case only one representative signed on behalf of Canada; in the other case there were two Canadian ministers.

Mr. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, while listening to my hon. friend, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in introducing this resolution I could not help feeling that he himself in asking Parliament for the approval of this Treaty was doing so simply as a matter of form. There was really nothing in his argument in the way of a substantial reason why this Parliament should approve of the Treaty so far as the relations between Canada and Bulgaria are concerned. This is a Treaty between the Allied and Associated Powers and Bulgaria, and we as a Canadian Parliament are being asked to give our approval to it. One would assume that, the Canadian Parliament being asked to approve the Treaty, we would find in it somewhere something relating to the Dominion of Canada. One would also have expected that there would be a possibility of an opinion of this Parliament influencing the judgment of those who have to do with the final ratification of the Treaty. But looking at the Treaty, one sees that it was signed by the different powers at Neuilly-sur-Seine on November 27, 1919, and I am very sure my hon. friend will agree that anything that this Parliament may do in the nature of approving or disapproving the Treaty will not affect the dotting of a single "i" or the crossing of a single "t" in a single clause of the Treaty from beginning to end. It is for that reason I say, it seems to me, that the approval of this Parliament is being asked for simply as a matter of form.

But while the hon. member has given us no substantial reasons why this Parliament should approve the Treaty, he has given reasons why it would be unwise for us not to approve the Treaty. In drawing attention to its different clauses, he pointed out that practically everything that we are asked to approve here was approved last year when we had before us the Treaty between the Allied and Associated Powers and Germany. Therefore, not to approve this Treaty at this time would be to have it appear that in the interval something had arisen which had caused this Parliament to take a different attitude towards the Treaties of Peace which are being signed in Europe from that which was taken at the last session. I am not aware that anything of the kind has arisen, and for that reason, I think it would be unwise for Parliament not to take, in the matter of approving the Treaty, the same action as it took in the matter of approving the Treaty between the Allied and Associated Powers and Germany.

But I want to point out just what are the grounds upon which my hon. friend has asked this Parliament to approve the Treaty. The grounds are broadly comprised under two headings. My hon. friend has mentioned one particular in which the Treaty has "special interest" to Canada, and it is the only particular in which he has specified any special interest to Canada as regards this Treaty. My hon. friend says that the provisions relating to debts and financial matters are of special interest to Canada in view of the fact that there are a number of Bulgarian Nationals living in Canada, and that there is a certain amount of enemy property in this country. It sounds very serious that there should be Bulgarian Nationals living in Canada, and that there should be a certain amount of enemy property in this country; but would any one consider for a moment that that was a reason serious enough to present to this Parliament for approving a particular Treaty? Yet, as I said, that was the only mention my hon. friend made in his speech of the particular interest this Treaty has with respect to Canadian affairs. In the same connection he pointed out that the provisions the Treaty contains respecting debts and financial matters are on all fours with similar provisions in the German Treaty which was approved last session.

My hon. friend went on to give another ground which he said made the matter of "most immediate concern" to Canada. It may be summed up in his own words as follows:

To go back to the two groups of clauses in the Treaty which are of most immediate concern to Canada, should like for a few minutes to speak in reference to the League of Nations and to the labour clauses of the Treaty.

In other words, we are being asked to approve this Treaty at the present time because of what it contains in reference to the League of Nations and the labour clauses of the Treaty. This Parliament has already approved the League of Nations' Covenant; it has already approved the labour clauses of the Treaty. Why should the time of Parliament be taken up in approving a second or a third time these particular matters? There has been no difference of view between us as to these clauses. I am not aware, when they were being debated in connection with the German Treaty, that a single exception was taken by any member of the House to the clauses relating to the League of Nations, and, in particular, to the labour clauses. Therefore, the reasons which my hon. friend has urged, are more in the nature of excuses for bringing this particular Treaty before the House, than they are good and substantial reasons for asking the approval of Parliament of this Treaty. I have said that they are excuses. I think, if my hon. friend would tell the House exactly what was in his thoughts, he would admit that his reason for asking the House to approve the Treaty was largely that he might repeat at this session what he said in Parliament at the last session and what he has since been saying on a good many platforms in regard to the League of Nations' Covenant and the labour clauses of the Treaty. I think that is the main reason for the introduction of this measure at this time.

My hon. friend, however, in addition to the two statements which I have quoted, has said that the adoption of the resolution involves the acceptance of certain principles which he has set forth. It is important that we should consider what my hon. friend has said in that connection. It affords the reason why, it seems to me, it would be inadvisable for this House not to approve the Treaty. These statements of principle might be made as separate substantial motions in this House; they might be made in reference to almost any other Treaty as well as this particular one. But should this House, in view of the statement which my hon. friend has made, refuse to approve the Treaty, then it would be immediately said, or the impression would be conveyed, that in some way or another this House was unwilling to accept the statements of principle which my hon. friend set forth.

Let me take up these statements of principle, one by one, and see whether there is any difference of opinion between members on both sides of the House in reference to them. They are all in the nature either of recognitions of something which is already conceded, or of reaffirmations of something which has already been affirmed. The first is the recognition of democratic control of foreign policy, and that Canada should not, without the consent of its Parliament, be finally committed to important international engagements such as are embodied in this Treaty. I venture to say there is not an hon. member who for one moment will take exception to the desirability of democratic control of foreign affairs. If we are to have an increased measure of foreign policy as a part of the business of this Parliament, it becomes increasingly important that we should have some effective democratic control of it; but the first example my hon. friend has given of democratic control by Parliament of foreign affairs is a somewhat unfortunate one inasmuch as he brings here for our approval a Treaty that was signed several months ago, the contents of which were not made known to a single member of this House until within the last two or three days, and a document which, I am sure my hon. friend himself will say, cannot be altered one way or another by anything which this House may do at the present time. But that is not the only example which my hon. friend has given to the House of his view of democratic control in regard to these matters of foreign policy.

On the first of March my hon. friend the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Rowell) laid upon the Table of the House copies of other treaties:

The Czecho-Slovak Minorities Treaty, a treaty between the Principal Allied and Associated Powers and Czecho-Slavia, signed at Saint Germain-en-Laye, September 10, 1919. Ratification on behalf of Canada authorized by Order in Council of December 1, 1919.

Note those words " ratification on behalf of Canada authorized by Order in Council of December 1, 1919." Mr. Chairman, is ratification of a treaty by Order in Council an evidence of democratic control on the part of the Parliament of Canada? That is exactly the line of action which hon. gentlemen opposite have been taking in so many matters of all-important concern during recent years—and that we have been protesting against. Instead of submitting these matters to Parliament for consideration, they have taken action upon them by Order in Council.

Copy of another treaty was also laid on the Table by my hon. friend on March 1:

The Serb-Croat-Slovent Minorities Treaty, a Treaty between the Principal Allied and Associated Powers and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, signed at Saint Germain-en-Laye, September 10, 1919. Ratification on behalf of Canada authorized by Order in Council of December 1, 1919.

Here again is more ratification by Order in Council instead of by Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, let me repeat, we on this side of the House are strongly in favour of democratic control of all these matters of foreign policy. I think we would be willing to go so far as to say that we would like to have an expression of opinion of this House to the effect that Canada should not be bound by any treaty or agreement in matters of external relations, of which Parliament has not been fully informed in a way of which all of us could take cognizance. That would be helping along the democratic control of foreign relations, and when we have that principle carried out we shall have a sense of security which at present we do not feel in the matter of our external and inter-imperial relations.

The next reason that my hon. friend has given is that the adoption of the resolution will involve:

A recognition that in any war in which the British Empire is engaged and in which Canada has taken part is a matter of concern to the people of Canada; that the terms of the Treaty of Peace bringing such a war to an end are also a matter of concern to the people of Canada, and that such a Treaty should not be ratified by His Majesty until it has been approved by Canada as of the five nations of the British Commonwealth.

There can be no difference of opinion on that matter. Every one in this country will admit that any war in which the British Empire is engaged and in which Canada has taken part is a matter of the greatest possible concern to Canada. Every one will be fully prepared to admit also that the terms of the treaty of peace bringing such a war to an end are also a matter of concern to the people of Canada, and that such a treaty should not be ratified—I think the word "not" has been left out of Hansard by mistake—until it has been approved by Canada as one of the five nations of the British Commonwealth. I am not sure that my hon. friend would not have been more consistent if he had inserted after the word "treaty" in the phrase "such a treaty" the words "in so far as Canada is concerned."

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

I just interject that point for his consideration.

Those are two recognitions or declarations of policy, or whatever one may choose to call them, upon which I think all hon. members of this House are thoroughly agreed. The remaining three are not recognitions of accepted policy, but are reaffirmations of positions this House has already accepted. First there is

A reaffirmation by Parliament of its approval of the creation and maintenance of a League of Nations for the promotion of international co-operation and the achievements of international peace and security by the methods set forth in the Covenant of the League.

As I mentioned a moment ago, this Parliament has approved of the creation and maintenance of a League of Nations for the promotion of international co-operation and the achievement of international peace and security by the methods set forth in the Covenant of the League. We have approved that over and over again, and why should our approval of it be asked for again in this connection? Is that a reason why this particular treaty with Bulgaria should be brought before the House for its approval at this time?

The fourth reason given by my hon. friend is that the approval of the treaty will mean:

A reaffirmation by Parliament of its approval of the Labour Clauses; and of the creation and maintenance of the International Labour Organization under its provisions.

How often have we to be asked, Mr. Speaker, to state what we have already stated time and time again in this House as to our views upon the Labour Clauses of the Covenant of the League of Nations? It may be that my hon. friend has some doubt as to the position some of his supporters may take towards those Labour Clauses, but let me tell him, speaking for those of us who are members of the Liberal party on this side of the House, that before the House took action one way or the other in regard to the Labour Clauses of the Covenant of the League of Nations, the National Liberal Convention, composed of representatives of the Liberal party from the Atlantic to the Pacific, made as one of the planks of its platform a full acceptance of the Labour Clauses in the spirit in which they were framed as part of the Covenant of the League of Nations. So that there may be no doubt as to the position which we on this side of the House have taken as to the Labour Clauses of the League of Nations, let me read the following from a resolution which was adopted in August last year by the National Liberal Convention:

> Resolved that the Committee recommends that the National Liberal Convention accept in their entirety as a part of the Liberal platform, in the spirit in which they have been framed and in so far as the special circumstances of the country will permit, the terms of the Labour Convention and general principles associated with the League of Nations and incorporated in the conditions of peace.

Unless hon. gentlemen opposite entertain a different view of the significance of these Labour Clauses, I cannot see why this Parliament should again be asked to approve them under the guise of expressing its approval of a treaty between Bulgaria and the Allied Powers. So far as the League of Nations is concerned, I believe there is only one opinion in this House and in this country. We all recognize that the League of Nations is in a formative stage, that its constitution is more or less nebulous at the present time, but that it has in it promise of great good for humanity and for mankind. We all desire to see the League of Nations made a success, and we cannot by approval after approval in this House make our position better known than it is.

Now I come to the last reason which my hon. friend gave as to why we should approve this Treaty. He says its adoption involves:

> A reaffirmation by Parliament of its approval of the position and status accorded to Canada in the League of Nations and in the International Labour Organization and of its determination to maintain that status.

Well, Mr. Speaker, who has questioned the status which Canada has attained in the League of Nations in any way that calls for a further approval by this Parliament of the status which we already have? Some question has been raised in the House and outside of the House as to whether the status is in any way the new thing which my hon. friend would lead us to believe it is; whether it is not a recognition of something that was achieved long before the Administration, of which he is a member, had anything to do with the matter one way or another. I think we are all agreed, Sir, that whatever status we have we desire to maintain. There is not a man in Canada who would cede one inch of ground on the question of the status which Canada has as a nation, and I do not think there is any difference of view between any of us on that point. Yet my hon. friend seizes this opportunity to bring up this question of Canada's status as a nation. As I have listened to his remarks in this Chamber and read his speeches delivered outside of the House, it has seemed to me that whether he intends to do so or not, he is seeking to convey the impression that we have a new status which we have never had before, and that it has in some mysterious way come about through some action of the Administration with which he is connected. I would be the last one to deny the Administration any credit to which I think it is entitled in regard to the service which it has rendered Canada in helping to maintain and clearly define a status which we have and which has long been admitted. But I think we are allowing full credit to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and those associated with him, my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Doherty) and my right hon. friend the Secretary of State (Hon. A. L. Sifton) for their service to this Dominion in standing firm on the question of its status, when we give them credit for having done their duty in a manner satisfactory to the people of the country.

Let me say at once that this whole question of Canada's position as a nation, when it comes to debating the matter, turns very largely on the meaning that we attach to the use of words. Hon. gentlemen opposite, on one or two occasions, have sought to make it appear that gentlemen on this side of the House, were, in some way or other, little Canadians who were endeavouring to minimize the status of their country, because they were unwilling to admit that, from certain points of view, strictly legal, or technical if you will, Canada was a nation with sovereign powers. Now, Mr. Speaker, no good purpose can be served by a contention of that kind. What is needed above everything else is clear and precise thinking on questions of this nature. Let me direct my hon. friend's attention to his own language in order to illustrate my meaning. My hon. friend says that in approving this resolution we are endorsing the following principle:

> The recognition that in any war in which the British Empire is engaged and in which Canada has taken part is a matter of concern to the people of Canada; that the terms of the Treaty of Peace bringing such a war to an end are also a matter of concern to the people of Canada and that such a treaty should not be ratified by His Majesty until it has been approved by Canada as of the five nations of the British Commonwealth.

My hon. friend will observe that in the first part of the paragraph he speaks of any war in which the British "Empire" is engaged and in which Canada takes part, while in the last part of the clause he speaks of the five nations of the British "Commonwealth." In other words, we go into war as part of the British Empire and emerge from it as part of the British Commonwealth. My hon. friend knows as well as any one here that, according to one meaning of the term, you cannot say that an empire is a commonwealth; although, according to another meaning, the two terms are more or less identical. It is exactly the same in regard to the use of the word, "nation." If you wish to emphasize and lay particular stress on a certain legal technical point, then it cannot be said that Canada has all the rights, the privileges, and the attributes of a sovereign nation. But if, instead of looking merely at the letter of the word you look at the spirit of it, I think that everyone will be prepared to concede that, with the self-governing status which we have, we are to all intents and purposes a nation. Now that is the point I would direct to the attention of my hon. friend. There is in Holy Writ a familiar passage which says: "The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life;" and that is as true in reference to the interpretation of constitutional documents as it is in reference to the Scriptures. If you rigidly follow the letter you kill what is real in the relationship between the different nations that comprise the Empire. If, on the other hand, you take the spirit of that relationship, then we distinctly have five nations forming a part of the British Empire or Commonwealth, by whichever name you choose to designate it. I should like to have that point made perfectly clear, and I trust I have done so in a way which will satisfy my hon. friend.

What, then, is the difference which exists between us and my hon. friend, or any of those associated with him, in regard to this question of the status of Canada? So far as I can see, we have no difference on what is fundamental as respects our status. Our difference is that hon. gentlemen opposite, and in particular my hon. friend, would have it appear, as I have already said, that our status is something newly acquired; that in some way or other which is inexplicable to us there has been a change within the last few years, and that we stand in a position now, from the legal and constitutional viewpoint, which we did not have before. We on this side of the House maintain that while there has been a clearer defining of the status of Canada, and while there has been unquestionably, and above all else, in the eyes of the world and from the international point of view, a recognition of the status of Canada through the splendid services of her armies overseas, and by reason of the valiant part they played in the great war, all these circumstances have served to emphasize and strengthen and make permanent a status which we already had and which we intend to maintain. If my hon. friend has any doubt at all on this point, I hope his mind will be disabused of any misgivings before I conclude.

By way of illustration of the point which I have been seeking to make clear, let me draw the attention of the House to the first Government notice of motion which appears on the Order Paper. In the name of my right hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, there appears the following proposed resolution:

> Resolved, that a humble address be presented to His Most Excellent Majesty, the King, in the following words:
> To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:
> Most Gracious Sovereign:
> We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that you may graciously be pleased to give your consent to submit a measure to the Parliament of the United Kingdom, to amend the British North America Act 1867, in the manner following, or to the following effect—etc., etc.,

Note the words in that resolution. The prayer from this Parliament is not to the King to assent to an amendment of the British North America Act. It is to His Majesty to submit a measure to the Parliament of the United Kingdom to amend the British North America Act. If you take the letter of the Constitution alone will any one for one moment contend that this country is a sovereign nation to the degree of having all the rights and privileges which the British Parliament has when we have to go to the British Parliament to ask for an amendment to our Constitution? If you construe the Constitution according to the letter, you kill the spirit immediately because we know, as my hon. friend pointed out the other day, that if we ask the British Parliament to amend the Constitution according to the constitutional practice, it is almost certain to do so and, since it is almost certain to do so, we have to all intents and purposes the full rights and privileges of a sovereign people in reference to our own Constitution. But I would like to submit to my hon. friends opposite that perhaps it would be more in accord with the status which Canada has as a self-governing dominion or nation within the British Empire if, instead of presenting an address to His Majesty to ask

His Majesty's consent to the Parliament of the United Kingdom amending the British North America Act in the two particulars mentioned, the Government should consider the advisability of an address being presented to His Majesty to have powers given to the Parliament of Canada, subject to the concurrence of the several provinces of the Dominion, to amend the Constitution of Canada in such particulars as may be agreed upon as a result of conference between the provincial and federal authorities and approved by this Parliament and the legislatures of the different provinces.

I have here a copy of the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia and of the Dominion of New Zealand. Both Australia and New Zealand have the right to amend their own constitutions in the particulars mentioned therein. Why should this Parliament not have the same powers to amend its own Constitution, subject to the safeguards that are necessary to comply with the spirit of the Act of Confederation, as have these other nations within the British Empire?

As I have said, our difference with hon. members opposite is not at all upon the question of Canada's being a nation but upon the inference which they would convey that national status, or to put it in the phraseology of the minister, equality of status with the other nations of the British Empire, is something newly acquired, something to be credited to the present Administration. What we say is that Canada's status as a nation from the constitutional point of view was established long before the present Administration was formed and in spite of the opposition of some of its own members and their associates in the past. If any one doubts this I will quote my hon. friend an authority which he will not question. Indeed, I am prepared to leave the question of Canada's status as between hon. gentlemen opposite and gentlemen on this side of the House to the testimony of my hon. friend himself.

I have in my hand a copy of a splendid address—one of the many splendid addresses which my hon. friend has delivered. It was not delivered since the war, or since the present Administration of which he is a member was formed, but it was delivered in Montreal on November 11, 1912—nearly eight years ago. The address is entitled:

> A Short History of the Beginning and Growth of Constitutional Government in Canada.

In it my hon. friend has set forth the constitutional development of this country and to whom the credit should be given in that connection. Let me, without quoting too many extracts, just read a few that are significant as showing the position which we on this side of the House are prepared not only to maintain but which we are glad to have the opportunity of advocating and of furthering to the extent of our ability. My hon. friend started in by saying:

> In all discussions of the relations of Canada to Great Britain and the other parts of the Empire, three questions appear to be uppermost in the public mind: Our political relations, our trade arrangements, and the defence of the Empire.
> I am glad we have with us this evening a descendant of Papineau, a man, who, in the early history of our country, struggled to secure for the people of this province what William Lyon Mackenzie was struggling to secure for the people of Upper Canada—the right to manage their own affairs; and while we may not agree with the methods either pursued, we must agree that they were fighting against grave abuses and were struggling to redress serious injustice to the mass of the people of the two provinces.
> The Rebellion of 1837, and the exceedingly able report of Lord Durham on the political conditions in Canada which followed the Rebellion constitute a convenient starting point for our discussion. Permit me to recall to your minds the records of the two political parties in this country from the Rebellion of 1837 down to the year 1911 on the three questions I have mentioned.

I am not going to quote at any great length, but just let me give one or two sentences.

Mr. McMASTER: Whose speech is that?

Mr. KING: It is the speech of my hon. friend the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Rowell): He says:

> The four main events in the development of our political relations during this period were: (1) the struggle for and securing of responsible government; (2) Canadian Confederation, including the purchase of the Northwest Territories; (3) the evolution of Canada from the position of a colony of Great Britain to that of one of the free self-governing nations of the Empire; (4) the creation of a truly Imperial organization under the name of "The Imperial Conference."

I wish to remind hon. members that this is an address which was delivered on the 11th of November, 1912. The Armistice was signed on November 11, 1918. It was in 1912 that my hon. friend was speaking. After mentioning the great fight for responsible government, he says:

> Around this issue the battle waged for years, Baldwin and Lafontaine leading the Liberal forces.

What further does my hon. friend say? He says:

The Conservative party in Great Britain clung just as tenaciously to government by Downing Street as did the Conservatives in this country.

Then he goes on:

The only party that believed in responsible government as being essential to the progress and prosperity of Canada, and that the granting of this right of self-government would not only not weaken but strengthen our loyalty to the Crown and the Mother Country, was the Liberal party in Canada.

My hon. friend makes the position clearer when he declares:

The result of the Conservative policy was the Family Compact, the Rebellion of 1837, and the long and bitter struggle which retarded the progress and development of Canada, and divided the people of Canada into two hostile camps. The result of the Liberal policy was the securing for Canada—

Listen to this:

—and ultimately not only for Canada but the other colonies of the Empire—of the right to manage their own affairs, and with that right the peace and progress of the country and a great increase in affection for and the desire to maintain British connections.

Then my hon. friend says:

This great discovery of colonial self-government, which, according to Sir Herbert Samuel, is one of the two great contributions in the sphere of Government which the British people have given to the world, was made, was wrought out and secured by the Liberal party in Canada.

My hon. friend goes on to say:

Their labour has made the Empire as it exists to-day possible.

I shall pass over what my hon. friend has had to say about the question of Confederation and the part played by the two parties in this country in that connection, and what he has said about the acquirement of the Northwest territory. He concluded, however, that part of his address by saying:

Here again it was the policy of the Liberal leader and the Liberal party which forced this great question to the front, and was so largely instrumental in securing these territories for Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, lest it might appear that we were getting away from this all important question of the status of Canada, and Canada's status as a nation within the British Empire, I am pleased to see that my hon. friend has devoted a considerable part of his address to that one particular subject. "The changed status of Canada," he calls it. Now let me read what he says in that connection:

When Sir Wilfrid Laurier went to England to attend the Diamond Jubilee of Queen Victoria—

That was in 1897, 23 years ago—

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

In one of his very first public utterances he took the position that Canada was no longer a colony but a nation. He said: "The authority of the Queen does not rest on military force, but from the Pacific to the Atlantic rests on the cheerful allegiance of five million people who feel themselves a nation. The feeling dominating Canada is one of pride in her local autonomy and legislative liberty connected with Imperial unity."

That is the end of the quotation from Sir Wilfrid Laurier's speech and my hon. friend goes on:

Throughout his stay in Great Britain Sir Wilfrid consistently maintained the position that Canada had reached the status of a nation. When he returned to the city of Montreal, and the citizens extended such a memorable welcome to him he again emphasized that position. He said: He had longed to live to see the day when Canada would no longer be a colony, but would be a free nation within the Empire, and he was glad to be able to say he had lived to see that day.

Mr. Speaker, whatever doubt there may be on the other side of the House, as to Canada's status, there can be no doubt as to the position which we of the Liberal party of Canada have had in regard thereto. My hon. friend has stated it accurately, he has stated it truly, and as he has stated it here every one of us is prepared to see that it is maintained along those lines. But what was the position—and here I should like to point out there are times and seasons for all things—of hon. gentlemen opposite? To-day they are saying a great deal about Canada being a nation. They are able to do so, why? Because the struggle which the Liberal party maintained for a quarter of a century in this country has at last, through the great service of our men overseas, come before the world in its true and bold form. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said: "Let us have the attributes of a nation and when the time of stress comes Canada will respond and do her duty by the Empire." Was not his prophesy fully fulfilled? Was it not because we had the status of a nation, because we believed we had the status of a nation, that Canada played the part which she played in this great war? I think one of the most significant things in the history not only of Canada but of the world is the fact that when this war came on, so far as I am aware, the British Government asked nothing of this Dominion; that everything that was done was done voluntarily and freely by the people of Canada through their Government. How did that come about? It came about as a consequence of Canada recognizing that she had the status of a nation, that she had said: "Recognize our status as a nation and we will do our part." Had she been held in a colonial position is it possible to believe that she would have responded as she did at that time?

But, as I have said, it is one thing to proclaim Canada a nation to-day; it was another thing to proclaim Canada a nation twenty-five years ago in the heart of the British Empire across the seas, and that is what Sir Wilfrid Laurier did. He did not wait, he spoke, he blazed the way. There at the Queen's Jubilee when all the nations were looking on he took that position and from that time he fought steadily to see that it was maintained in every particular. I might quote not only the address my hon. friend has referred to, but also a speech which Sir Wilfrid Laurier made at the constitutional club in London, England, on July 7, 1902. I have in my hand a report which appeared in the London Times on the day following and what is the expression used there? Every member of the House will recall the expression and the occasion of its use. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> You may search the annals of history so far as the human eye can pierce into them, and you shall not find a parallel to the spectacle of which you are to-day the witness. The Empire of Rome in the heyday of her splendid power never reached that level of moral attitude. And the reason is obvious. The Empire of Rome was composed of slave states; the British Empire is a galaxy of free nations.

That is where we get for the first time the expression of the British Empire as a group of free nations. Sir Wilfrid Laurier used the striking, the poetic phrase "a galaxy of free nations." Hon. gentlemen opposite to-day use the expression "A community of free nations," or "A cluster of free nations," or " A family of free nations." Call it by any name you like the essence of the whole relationship is in the phrase Sir Wilfrid Laurier used, " A galaxy of free nations," and from that moment up to the present time we have sought to maintain that position—that is, all of us who have fought for Liberal tradition and sought to maintain it.

Now, what was the attitude of the Conservative press towards Sir Wilfrid Laurier when he took that stand? What was the attitude of some of those who belong to the party opposite? My hon. friend the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Rowell) has told the country. He says in this address:

> What was the attitude of the Conservative press in regard to this? They charged Sir Wilfrid with being a separatist.

He goes on to quote from the Mail and Empire and he mentions that other Conservative journals and leaders of the Conservative party took the same position and indulged in the same criticism. He adds:

> They failed to perceive that which Sir Wilfrid Laurier and those who shared his views saw, that there can be no permanent basis of union and no permanent plan for co-operation between the peoples of the Empire with a dominant race living in one country to which those living in a self-governing Dominion would be more or less subject; that the future of the Empire as well as its strength, and stability depended upon a frank recognition of equality in the status of the people in the self-governing Dominions with those of the Mother Country.

Note those words. I imagine my hon. friend might be tempted to say that while we had sought to maintain a certain status, we had not equality of status as we have it to-day. But here are his own words: either he spoke what was true then, or he did not speak what was true then. I think my hon. friend will say that he believes he was speaking the truth then as he believes he is speaking the truth to-day and at that time (1912) he said: Sir Wilfrid Laurier took the position that the strength of the British Empire and its stability depended upon a frank recognition of equality in the status of the people in the self-governing Dominions with those of the Mother Country. My hon. friend says further:

> This assertion of our national status was necessary for the people of Canada to develop our own national self-consciousness and our own self-respect. It was necessary for the people of Great Britain in order that they might realize that they were dealing not with subjects but with fellow citizens. That this is our position, and that we are now a nation, is not only recognized by the statesmen of Canada but by the statesmen of the Mother Country.

The other day my hon. friend asked permission of the House to place on record certain excerpts from speeches delivered by the Right Hon. Arthur Balfour, the Right Hon. Lord Milner and by General Smuts. He told the House that the reason he wished to place these particular extracts on Hansard was to make it perfectly plain that not only was the status of Canada recognized here among Canadians, but that it was also recognized by the great leaders of thought and opinion overseas. Well, my hon. friend adopted exactly the same method in 1912, and he placed on record then in the course of his address before the Montreal Reform Club quotations from British statesmen to precisely the same effect. I shall not take the time of the House to read them, but instead of quoting General Smuts he quoted Sir Frederick Pollock. He also quoted Mr. Balfour and Mr. Asquith. He quoted all these gentlemen, for what purpose? To show that our position as a nation was not only recognized by the statesmen of Canada, but was equally recognized by the statesmen of the Mother Country. He said:

> Nowhere have I seen this changed relationship more clearly stated than in an article on the Imperial Conference written by the editor of the Round Table. Referring to the resolution passed by the Colonial Conference in 1907, establishing the Imperial Conference, this writer says:
> "This resolution"—

—that is, a resolution passed in 1907, when, I think, my hon. friend for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) was present—

> —"established the status of the Dominions as national entities, entirely distinct from that which inhabited the British Isles. It recognized that the basis of Imperial organization was the co-operation of five nations, not the centralization of power in the hands of the British Government as an Imperial Parliament. It finally destroyed the older conception of Imperial development, as a gradual re-union of the colonies with the Mother Country through representatives in either of the British Houses of Parliament."

But, Mr. Speaker, there are two or three more clauses that I wish to read. These are, I think, perhaps the most conclusive of any of the utterances of my hon. friend—and I again remind the House that these statements were made in the city of Montreal on November 11, 1912:

> Some of the most important changes in our British constitutional system were not brought about by any Act of Parliament or legislature, but by the demand on the one hand for new or enlarged rights and powers, and the recognition of these rights and powers on the other. This momentous change from a colony of Great Britain to that of one of the free nations of the Empire did not require any Act of Parliament—British or Canadian—for its consummation It simply required a demand on our part for a new status and the acceptance and recognition of that new status on the part of Great Britain
> I venture to suggest—

It gives me, Mr. Speaker, particular pleasure to read these words at this time and in this place—

> I venture to suggest that when the history of our constitutional development is written among the great things that Sir Wilfrid Laurier has done none will appear greater than his perception of the fact that the status of Canada must be changed and that this change must be brought about, not by legislative enactment, but by the demand on our part for a new status, persisted in until the people of Canada were convinced of its necessity; persisted in until the statesmen of Great Britain were convinced that it was right. By this great achievement Sir Wilfrid has enlarged the liberties and improved the status of every Canadian citizen, and what he has done for Canada he has done for all the self-governing Dominions.

My hon. friend uttered those words while Sir Wilfrid Laurier was alive. I ask him: Will he not be the first to say that they are equally true now that Sir Wilfrid Laurier is no longer here?

Mr. ROWELL: Does my hon. friend want an answer?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should be pleased to receive an answer.

Mr. ROWELL: I say undoubtedly they are true. And what is true of Sir Wilfrid Laurier is equally true of Sir Robert Borden in connection with the work of the Peace Conference and the League of Nations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend's statement just made in such a straightforward and honourable way is interesting not only in regard to the meed of praise which he is prepared to concede to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but also because of his reference to Sir Robert Borden.

Let me repeat here, Mr. Speaker, that my purpose in quoting my hon. friend is not in any way to belittle the work of Sir Robert Borden or of the hon. gentlemen who were associated with him. I would say frankly that Sir Robert Borden and his colleagues stood firm for the maintenance of Canada's status—they did their duty by Canada in that regard. If they had done less they would have been derelict in their duty and would have been liable to the censure of this Parliament. Having done their duty, and done it well, they are entitled to the thanks of this Parliament and of this country.

But, Sir, let me add this from the words of my hon. friend in regard to what Sir Robert Borden and his colleagues have been able to achieve. They are the very next words that appear in the speech from which I have been quoting:

> The welcome which Mr. Borden and his colleagues received last June was only made possible because of the work Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues had done for Canada.

I will ask my hon. friend if those words are not equally true?

Mr. ROWELL: If my hon. friend wishes an answer I am quite prepared to give it. I believe those words are equally true. I am prepared to give credit to whom it is due, and I think the other side should be just as ready to give credit to Sir Robert Borden and his colleagues too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope we are. I should like to make it perfectly clear that in this matter we are not seeking for honours; all we wish is to have the position made clear and plainly stated. As between us, if you will, honours may be evenly divided. What I wish to make perfectly plain is what my hon. friend himself has emphasized, namely that the welcome which Sir Robert Borden subsequently received was only made possible because of the work that Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues had done for Canada.

This is the next paragraph:

To-day—this was 1912—we stand in our relationships and in our negotiations, both in the mind of the people of the mother country and in the mind of the people of the other self-governing dominions, as one of the five free nations that go to make up the Empire. It is again the work of Liberal leaders and the triumph of the Liberal policy which has laid the broad foundation upon which alone the future strength and security of the Empire can rest.

Just one word in regard to the development of an Imperial organization. My hon. friend went on to say:

Some of our Conservative friends are very fond of talking about Imperial organization, they are fond of talking about representation in some Imperial body, they are talking about Canada having some voice in Imperial affairs.

I think this will interest particularly my hon. friend for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding):

While they have been talking and dreaming the Liberal leaders of Canada and the Liberal leaders of Great Britain and of the other Dominions, have been creating a truly Imperial organization for dealing with Imperial affairs.

We have in the Imperial Conference a truly representative body which, up to the present time, has proved itself capable of dealing with all important matters of Imperial concern . . . .

It is important for us to bear in mind some of the characteristics of this Conference. It recognizes the national status of the Dominions, as distinct from the mother country; it is truly representative in its character, being composed of the Prime Ministers of the mother country and self-governing Dominions; it is responsible in that each Prime Minister has back of him a parliamentary majority, and therefore has the power to implement the resolutions to which he gives assent; it recognizes the autonomy of all the governments and no resolution affecting any particular government can become effective unless assented to by it.

And this further word:

But Sir Wilfrid's contribution towards securing for us a safe and effective Imperial organization is not limited to a suggestion as to the form and work of the Imperial Conference. He has also done good work for Canada and the Empire in assisting to defeat proposals for Imperial organization which would have seriously impaired our rights of self-government. In so doing, he was not only fighting for Canada, but he was fighting for the whole British Empire.

That leads me to conclude by referring to the concluding remarks of my hon. friend the other day. After he had spoken at considerable length of the status of Canada, he said something to the effect that the choice to-day was between remaining part of the group of free nations comprising the British Empire and, on the one hand, either reverting to the old Colonial status, or, on the other, going in for complete independence. All of us will agree that it is unthinkable to speak about any return to the old colonial status; but my hon. friend did not put his hand on the real danger when he spoke about the alternative being complete independence. The thing about which we on this side of the House are alarmed is not independence or the maintenance of the status which we have as one of the nations comprising the British Empire. The thing we are concerned about and what we fear is the danger of swinging to the other extreme and developing a form of centralised Imperialism which we think would be thoroughly objectionable so far as the interests of this country are concerned. It is not to any status of Canada as one of the nations within the British Empire that we take exception. We wish to see that position maintained and strengthened; but we do not wish to see, through any insidious or other method, a condition of affairs brought about whereby the full autonomy of this country and of this Parliament will in any way be lessened or impaired by any scheme of Imperialism which will lead to a centralisation of the control of the British Empire, instead of the maintenance of the free self-governing position which we are privileged to enjoy at the present time.

We believe that position can be maintained by holding to the attitude of conference and consultation which was developed under the old Liberal administration; that it is possible for the British Empire to become, as regards the League of Nations, a league within a league, if you like, for the preservation of freedom amongst the different nations of the world. That position will be maintained by the attitude of conference and co-operation; it will not be maintained by a development which will lead to the loss of either of those features through any centralising tend-years, we would say that the change that has taken place in Canada's status as a result of the war—and there has been in the last few years an emphasis which there had not been for many years previously—has not been any change in the nature of our status, but has been, as regards the British Empire and relations within the British Empire, a clearer defining of a status already existing. As regards the world, there has been an international recognition of that status such as never existed hitherto in the history of the British Empire, and for that international recognition we are first and last, and shall always be most indebted to the services of Canada's armies across the seas. That is where the credit belongs for the international recognition which has come; and as I have already said, as regards the clearer definition of the status, we are prepared and are glad to concede to the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and his colleagues that they have done their duty well in maintaining that status firmly.

So long as, in the last analysis, all matters pertaining to Canada in her external or inter-Imperial relations are made subject to the approval of this Parliament, so long as no action can be taken of which the Parliament of Canada does not have ample opportunity to approve, we shall feel that to all intents and purposes, we are a nation in the true sense of the word. But let the sovereignty of this Parliament be impaired as respects anything that concerns Canada in either her inter-Imperial or international relations, and we shall feel that the position of Canada as a nation has been menaced to that extent.

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I shall have occasion to say, with regard to what the hon. gentleman (Mr. King) has said, some words that will, unfortunately, not be words of congratulation. I hasten, therefore, at the very outset, to offer him some words of congratulation for which I think his speech calls. I congratulate him for permitting us to listen to a different tale from what we listened to at the last session of this House when we spoke about Canada's status as a nation. I have not time to quarrel with the hon. gentleman about his reservations; I have not time to quarrel with him with regard to the question as to what particular Canadian or Canadians we owe the fact of Canada's status as a nation. I am content to congratulate him and to congratulate this country that he, as the leader of the great Liberal party—and at the last session we expected that the leaders of the great Liberal party would have taken the attitude that he took, but we were disappointed—with, as I say, certain reservations which he thought necessary to make for fear that somebody who never claimed any credit, might get it, has recognized, speaking for his party, that Canada has achieved the status of a nation within the great British Commonwealth—if he will permit me that word, as he does not seem to like it—and a nation standing on a footing of equality with the other nations of the Commonwealth. I congratulate him that he has agreed with us on that. We were amazed when people did not agree with us on that. We are gratified now to find that, on second thought and under a second leader, the Liberal party, as represented in this House, does agree with us.

I shall have occasion to refer to that portion of the hon. gentleman's address in which he belittled the importance of that by thinking it worth while to enter into a discussion as to who got it for us, as though it were not manifest to all of us, and as though any Canadian with heart and head large enough to be worthy to call himself a Canadian, were not prepared to recognize the obvious fact that that status was the result of a growth, a growth to which succeeding statesmen, one after another, contributed. Let me say at once, that I take off my hat without hesitation in respect to the memory of Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the great contribution that he made to that growth. All that surprises me is that the hon. gentleman (Mr. King) should have thought it necessary to quarrel with some imaginary person who had set up a claim that in the twinkling of an eye Canada had been made a nation, and made a nation by some one individual yesterday or the day before. If he would have taken the pains to read what was said in this House at the last session, he would have seen that no such contention was ever made. I ask him now, whether by or on behalf of anybody who had the honour to represent Canada at the Conference in Paris, any such claim was made as that we had made Canada a nation. Mr. Speaker, I shall have occasion to refer later to that very long and very laboured part of the hon. gentleman's address.

Let me go back to the beginning and take up some of the things that lamentably call for answer, if it be merely for the purpose of giving information to the hon. gentleman about some things that he does not know. The hon. gentleman said that this Treaty was brought before this House merely as an excuse for the making of a speech, and he asked why there was any need to bring the Treaty before the House, because in the first place, he said, there was nothing in it that related particularly to the Dominion of Canada, and in the second place, nothing that this Parliament might say about it could have the slightest effect upon the binding nature of that Treaty or alter its provisions by one iota,—by the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," I think he said. He said that this Parliament could do nothing in the matter because the Treaty was signed some months ago, and signed not only on behalf of the other nations of the British Empire, but on behalf of Canada, and he asked, "What are you going to do about it?"

The hon. gentleman does not know that treaties do not bind until they are ratified. The hon. gentleman who has talked so eloquently about our status as one of the nations of the British Empire apparently does not know that this Treaty was signed by the British Empire. He does not know that when you want the signature of the British Empire you get the signatures of all the nations that constitute the British Empire. The hon. gentleman does not know that, just as he does not know what a most elementary knowledge of international law would have taught him, that treaties do not bind until they are ratified. He does not know that when the British Empire proceeds to ratify a treaty it takes the whole British Empire to do it. Why, the hon. gentleman whom I have congratulated on sharing our views on Canada's national status, has not quite fully grasped what it means. He still imagines, as other hon. gentlemen opposite who spoke on this matter at the last session of the House evidently imagined, that there is a something somewhere which is the British Empire and which makes treaties, and that there is a Canada standing off on the side, and that the British Empire is making and ratifying treaties, or refusing to ratify treaties while Canada stands on the side not interested in the slightest degree.

Mr. FIELDING: Does my hon. friend mean to say that if this Treaty be not approved by the Parliament of Canada it will not be binding on the whole British Empire just the same, having been approved by His Majesty the King?

Mr. DOHERTY: This Treaty has not as yet been ratified by His Majesty the King. His Majesty the King, as the constitutional sovereign of Canada just as much as he is the constitutional sovereign of the United Kingdom, has adopted as his guide of action that he will not ratify a treaty binding upon the entire Empire until he has had the advice of the Governments of each and every one of the self-governing nations that make up the Empire. His Majesty the King does not sign on behalf of the Empire because the United Kingdom tells him to do so.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend has hardly met my question. Is the approval of this Treaty by this Dominion essential to the binding effect of the Treaty?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. In order that the Treaty shall bind the British Empire it is necessary that it shall be executed with the approval of all the self-governing nations of the British Empire, and Canada is one of them.

Mr. FIELDING: And if this Parliament should for any reason not approve, this Bulgarian Treaty would have no effect?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not saying it would have no effect, but it would have no effect so far as Canada is concerned. It would not bind the British Empire. It would bind, if you will, such parts of the British Empire as chose to ratify it, but it would not bind the whole British Empire. Have hon. gentlemen read the Treaty?

Mr. FIELDING: No.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not surprised then.

Mr. FIELDING: There is not an hon. member of this House who has read it.

Mr. DOHERTY: Much is now clear to me.—Hon. gentlemen have not read the Treaty.

Mr. FIELDING: Does my hon. friend say he has read it?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have read it and reread it, and I did not get very far into it until I found out that one of the parties to the Treaty is the British Empire.

Mr. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Did my hon. friend find any mention of Canada in the Treaty?

Mr. DOHERTY: Certainly I did. In the very opening paragraphs of the Treaty His Majesty the King of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions overseas and as Emperor of India,—acting in those capacities for the entire Empire—when he came to tell for whom and through whom he acted thought it worth while to mention Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend has not answered the question I asked. He says he read the Treaty through and I have asked him to be kind enough to inform the House whether on any page of that Treaty there is any mention whatever of Canada, not in the signatures but in the text of the Treaty.

Mr. DOHERTY: Does my hon. friend wish to know whether there was some special thing that was provided for Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; that is not the question.

Mr. DOHERTY: There was no mention of Canada because we were not looking for anything special. But, Mr. Speaker, it is significant that this question should be asked by the hon. gentleman who boasts of his pride in Canada's status as a nation standing on a footing of equality. What is the tacit suggestion of his question? It is virtually this: Unless we wanted some particular thing for Canada, this great nation, of which he is so proud, should not have had anything to do with the Treaty. My hon. friend said he did not read the Treaty. Let me point out to him—

Mr. FIELDING: Will the minister pardon me? It was I who said that I had not read the Treaty. I tried to do so, but I may confess that I did not read every line, for I found it too arduous a task.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not care to go further than to point out who are parties to the Treaty and how they are constituted. The party for whom His Majesty is acting is the British Empire, but His Majesty knows what it is that constitutes the Empire and he therefore informed those with whom he was contracting that when he contracted for the British Empire he did so on behalf of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, India, etc. He made it clear that he contracted for Canada, Australia and the other Dominions through their plenipotentiaries, and what constituted the signature of the British Empire was the combination of all those signatures. That is why I say that if you strike off one of those signatures, or if ratification fails on the part of one of those nations, you cannot have the signature nor the ratification of the entire British Empire. About that there seems to be no room for question. It is for them who made the contract to ratify it. If the contract could not be made without the participation of all the constituent nations of the Empire, how, I ask, is it to be ratified without similar participation on the part of those nations? This is one of those things which to me seem so obvious that I can only wonder that people do not perceive it.

Mr. McKENZIE: I dare say the minister remembers that Lord Milner, speaking for the Crown authorities of Great Britain, submitted an opinion to the Canadian Government in regard to the signing of the German Treaty in which he told us that our ratification of that Treaty was not necessary?

Mr. DOHERTY: Lord Milner expressed the opinion that because our ministers had signed the Treaty, ratification was not necessary. Let me point out, however, that Lord Milner does not decide questions of that kind for Canada. There are ministers in Canada who speak for Canada on such questions, and Lord Milner received his answer in which it was pointed out that, although ministers of the British Government had signed the Treaty and it was thought necessary that government should submit it to Parliament for ratification, so we, as a nation standing on a footing of equality, claimed that the same procedure was necessary here. On this representation Lord Milner very graciously admitted that our position was right.

Now, the Treaty is here because Canada was an essential party to the making of it and therefore is necessarily an essential party to its ratification; and if the Treaty has come before this Parliament it is not because I am prepared to say that it might not have been constitutionally possible for the advice to His Majesty the King to have gone from the Governor in Council without a special authorization from Parliament. But the hon. gentleman himself (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke eloquently of his devotion to the sound, democratic principle that treaties of this kind that were to bind Canada should not be ratified—if I mistake not, I think he said they should not be entered into—without the approval of the Parliament of Canada. And because we accepted that principle and brought the Treaty here the hon. gentleman rises in his place and says: "Why on earth did you bring it here?" Having condemned us for submitting the Treaty to Parliament, he then hunts up some Orders in Council under which we ratified the Czecho-Slovakian Treaty and another minority Treaty, and exclaims with indignation: "Here is another example of that awful procedure which we have been condemning for years past—doing these things by Order in Council." The hon. gentleman's arguments really place one in a quandary. If we bring the Treaty to Parliament he says "Why do you bring it? Why, the whole influence of the Canadian Parliament could not take a dot off an "i" or cross a "t" in the Treaty." On the other hand, if we do not bring it before Parliament but ratify it by Order in Council he assumes an equally strong position. "Why, gentlemen," he says;—well, Sir, words are positively inadequate to express his denunciation of the Government for passing the Order in Council. How will my hon. friend have the matter done? He agrees that Canada is a nation with its obligations and rights and duties, but there does not seem to be any way in which we can satisfy him as to the method of discharging those duties. We brought that Treaty before Parliament in order that hon. members might have an opportunity to express their views on it, and I may say that we did not do so in pursuance of any new idea. We took the position from the outset that any treaty of this kind ought to be submitted to Parliament before its ratification. We held that it should be submitted to the parliaments of all the constituent nations of the Empire, and this Treaty is here because we took that view and were prepared to maintain the democratic principle which the hon. gentleman has so eloquently defined in the course of his speech. It is true that we did advise the ratification of the Czecho-Slovakian and the other minority Treaty without bringing them to Parliament, and the hon. gentleman will remember that last session some objection was raised with regard to the Austrian Treaty. We were asked the same question, "Why was it brought here?" We had announced that if the Austrian Treaty had arrived after Parliament was adjourned we would have felt authorized to advise its adoption without submitting it to Parliament by reason of the fact that Parliament, by the adoption of the German Treaty, had in effect authorized the adoption of the Austrian Treaty, which was in all its essential lines, and in everything that could affect us, identical with the former. I think that we might have stretched a point in this case, and, proceeding upon the authorization that came in respect to the German Treaty, we might have taken upon ourselves to advise ratification without bringing the Treaty here. But if it were possible to bring it here, we thought it right to bring it here because we do attach importance to maintaining the principle that treaties of this nature should be ratified only after their submission to Parliament. In that way we meet the situation that the hon. gentleman contends for and that we have provided for, namely, that no treaty of this importance shall ever be binding upon Canada unless, before it becomes binding, it has obtained the approval of the Parliament of Canada.

This treaty with Bulgaria, signed as it was some months ago, is not binding on Canada yet. It is the action of the King, or the ultimate action of the King, taken on the advice of the Canadian Government, which advice will be given only when this Parliament acts, that will make that treaty binding upon Canada.

The hon. gentleman has pointed out, as I have said before, that there is nothing in this Treaty of special interest to Canada and therefore he adds: Why should Canada have anything to do with it? Canada has something to do with it because the Empire has something to do with it and because without Canada there is no Empire.

Mr. BELAND: Taking, for example the German Treaty, suppose that four or five nations of the British Empire had given their assent to the ratification and one had refused that assent, what, in the opinion of the minister, would have been the action of His Majesty?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is perhaps rash for me to answer a question based upon the hypothesis which the hon. gentleman puts. I cannot tell what His Majesty would have done. That is something that I would not like to take upon myself to say but I do venture this expression of opinion—I might say conviction—that whatever His Majesty did in the absence of the assent of one of the self-governing nations of the Empire, would not constitutionally be binding upon the entire Empire and more particularly would not be binding upon that nation of the Empire which had withheld its assent. What would be the effect upon the existence of the Empire of a divergence of that kind is another question. What would be the necessary consequence of such a situation arising is something the discussion of which I would not like to enter upon at the present moment. My impression is that the consequence might be very grave indeed. But this after all is only a consequence of the fact that the great thing that holds this Empire together is that we have so far found it possible to get together on the great, vital and important questions, and for my part I have abundant confidence that for years, and years, and years—I might venture to say centuries —we shall continue in that happy position. It is not necessary for me to undertake to prophesy what will happen after the nations of the British Empire disappear. All I am concerned with is to point out that in order to get the evidence of their agreement you must have the action of all of them.

The hon. gentleman, in dilating upon the entire absence of reason for bringing this Treaty here, intimated that at the last session of Parliament there had been no diffence of opinion about the League of Nations. He seemed to have entirely forgotten that the hon. gentleman who sits next to him (Mr. Fielding) had proposed to amend the League of Nations and to put in a reservation to one of its provisions.

Mr. McMASTER: Is it not true that the reservation proposed by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) last year was almost identical with the interpretation of clause 10 given by the Minister of Justice himself?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not criticising the amendment which was proposed. I am only pointing out that the hon. gentleman says that there was no difference of opinion upon it when as a matter of fact there was, in the opinion of the hon. gentleman, a sufficient substantial difference of opinion that he thought it necessary to divide the House upon it. Now they tell us that they took up the time of the House with a division about something that did not differ materially from what the Minister of Justice thought.

Mr. KING: Just for the sake of accuracy in the matter, as I recollect the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) it was to the effect that in so far as military service was concerned, nothing Parliament was doing in approving the Treaty would countenance Canada's taking part in future wars excepting with the approval of the Parliament of Canada. That was the substance of the amendment and that is practically what we are contending for to-day.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think the hon. gentleman has quite accurately analysed the effect of the amendment proposed but I do not believe we would gain anything by threshing out what the amendment was or whether it should have been adopted or not. I only mentioned it to show that there was something or other that arose in connection with the League of Nations which necessitated dividing this House and that did not seem to be quite consistent with the statement that there had been no difference of opinion in connection with the provisions of the League of Nations. The hon. gentleman also dealt with some observations of the President of the Privy Council in which he had reiterated our views in regard to the League of Nations, the Labour clauses, and other provisions. It may be that it was not absolutely necessary to do that but after all it was very eloquently and effectively done and I think this House will quite forgive the President of the Privy Council for having impressed these things not only upon the House and the public of Canada but upon a public that is wider than the public of Canada. The same thing might be said in this connection in reference to matters in regard to which the position of Canada was reaffirmed in the speech of the hon. gentleman.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. King) also dilated upon the possible distinction between what we meant when we said that Canada was a nation and something else that might be considered essential to Canada's being a nation. I do not grasp what the distinction is that the hon. gentleman is seeking to make. I do not realize that there may be respects in which Canada is not an absolutely sovereign state, but I confess I know of no national attribute of which Canada is not possessed. It does not prevent Canada's being a nation that she should be joined and associated with other nations, acting in co-operation with them in the partnership that we call either the British Empire or the British Commonwealth, as you will. As to the meaning to be attached to either of these words, I think if you applied the technical meaning to the word "Empire," the old-fashioned meaning which implied dominating over other powers, it would be incorrect to talk about the British Empire. The domination feature has long since disappeared, and certainly so far as the nations that compose that Empire are concerned, to state that we are all now on a footing of equality, would describe our relation to each other, and the term "Empire" is not perhaps the one to apply to a combination of nations so constituted. From my own part I think that "Commonwealth" is a most excellent word, but I would not quarrel with the words employed, anyway.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid that my right hon. friend has misunderstood what I said. I was not taking exception to the word "Commonwealth"—in fact, I prefer the use of the word "Commonwealth" to the use of the word "Empire." What I was endeavouring to point out was that the question of determining the status of Canada as a nation depends entirely upon the meaning to be attached to the term made use of. According to the way in which the word " Empire " is used, it may mean an excellent thing, or it may mean the very opposite. The same with regard to the word " Nation."

Mr. DOHERTY: I think there is a distinction to be made between a sovereign state and a nation. The latter may be a nation and not a full sovereign state. I do not propose to enter into the question of whether or not Canada is entitled to, or claims to be a full sovereign state. The hon. gentleman has discussed the question of Canada's status, and here I want to be careful; I am not claiming anything for anybody; I am only stating a fact. At the conference of 1917 we had the catagorical announcement by the United Kingdom, and assented to of course by all the Dominions, that the status of Canada, and of the Dominions within the Empire, was the status of nations standing on a footing of equality. We got this much further, and I should not say that, because the one thing I want to avoid is the evoking of discussion on the ground of what we are claiming for ourselves. We are happy to rejoice over what Canada has got, and let the glory go to anybody who thinks it is worth while to hunt out and claim that glory for himself. So long as Canada has the great substantial benefit accruing from that status our hearts are rejoiced and are proud for Canada's sake. What did happen that was made manifest to the world was this: We had been clearly and unmistakably acknowledged to be in the family circle in the resolution of 1917. There remained for us, if I may use the expression, to be taken out and introduced into the society of nations as a nation among the other nations. The old Mother Nation took us up and presented us to the other nations and said: These are the nations of my family; we will not stop to talk about definitions, I am bringing them into the society of nations; that is the society they are coming into. That is what happened. And that I contend is of very great value, not as making us a nation, but as giving evidence that the world recognizes.

The hon. gentleman referred to a couple of resolutions which were upon the Order Paper as indicating in some way a lack of completeness in respect of national status on our part. Now nobody has ever disputed that legally the legislative power is supreme in the Parliament of the United Kingdom and it follows that the British North America Act—though in reality and in substance a compact between the provinces is in form an act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom. Such being the case when that Act has to be modified we have to go through the form of addressing ourselves to that Parliament of the United Kingdom. But to suggest that that throws any doubt upon our constitutional status as a nation within this Empire I think only implies a confusion between what may be the requirements of law and what, side by side with those requirements of law, may be the constitutional rights of the nations or peoples within the Empire. We have the two things, we have the law and the constitution, and they do not always agree—sometimes they are in absolute contradiction.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was exactly my position.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman went on to say, apropos of this condition, that what we ought to have, instead of what we are asking in these resolutions, is a power in this Parliament, subject to the concurrence of the provinces, to amend our own constitution. In that I am most heartily at one with the hon. gentleman. I am not quite certain how the idea came to him but it does happen to be a fact that before the hon. gentleman made the suggestion, before this matter arose in the House at all, I had taken up that very question with the attorneys general of the several provinces and in discussing these resolutions on the Order Paper with some gentlemen upon the opposite side of the House, I so informed them. I do not know whether that was the way the idea came back to the hon. gentleman or not; but if it should not be so it only shows how great minds naturally converge upon the same idea.

Mr. BELAND: The leader of the Opposition spoke to me about it last year.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am glad that the hon. gentleman (Mr. King) has given due reflection to the subject but the fact is as I have stated. I rather inferred, therefore, that the way I have explained is the way it came about. At all events I am glad to be confirmed now in my own view. I am all the more glad to find that I was confirmed in advance by the leader of the Opposition. We will have the opportunity, I hope, to co-operate in bringing about the desired result and we will not stop to quarrel about who is entitled to the credit of having thought about it first.

I was going to say one or two words with regard to the question as to what party did most to make Canada a nation. It is discouraging, it makes one wonder whether we have reached a national size after all when we cannot venture to congratulate each other and advance in our national status without at once falling into a bickering dispute as to who did the most to bring it about. I might go back to the past and claim for the men of the Conservative party—for the men of the Liberal-Conservative party at all events—

An Hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. DOHERTY: —the party of Cartier and Macdonald, who did so much to build up this Confederation,—I might claim that they at the outset, accomplished perhaps as much as my friend's distinguished ancestor, (William Lyon Mackenzie) and Louis Joseph Papineau, by their readiness to stand up for the national status of Canada in those days.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: They did not take the same chances.

Mr. DOHERTY: Sir George Cartier took his share in the movement, and his name to-day stands high in the regard of all Canadians.

The hon. gentleman cited from the speech of the President of the Privy Council that one of the great steps in the building up of this nation was Confederation. I had an idea that John A. Macdonald had something to do with Confederation.

Mr. McMASTER: He opposed it to the very last; George Brown brought about Confederation

Mr. DOHERTY: I had the idea that Macdonald and Cartier and many of their followers were Conservatives. And yet the hon. gentleman cites from a speech that recognizes, and rightly recognizes, what an immense step in the building up of our national edifice was Confederation, and then he says, "The Liberal party did it all."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg my hon. friend's pardon—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member can only interrupt the Minister of Justice for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. DOHERTY: If I have fallen into an error I shall be glad to be set right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I merely rise to correct a mis-statement. My hon. friend asserted that I had said that the Liberal party did it all. If certain names were not mentioned in what I quoted, it is not my fault; I was simply quoting from the speech of the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. DOHERTY: At all events, my hon. friend impressed upon this House that the President of the Privy Council had at some time taken that attitude. Well, the President of the Privy Council is a very eloquent advocate of the causes in which he believes, and I do not want to criticize what he may have said in earlier days. We all can recognize in him, at all events, the capacity for appreciating the light as it becomes brighter and more widespread,—

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DOHERTY: —and I have not any doubt that to-day he will find a place for the men I have mentioned among those who contributed to the building up of this nation.

I might cite speeches of Sir Robert Borden and of certain of his colleagues in the course of the Naval Debate of 1910, and I might also cite his speeches made at the very centre of the Empire in 1912 in which he stated in no uncertain tones that Canada would not be the adjunct of any nation whatsoever, nay, not even an adjunct of the British Empire.

Gentlemen, let us be fair all round. Let us recognize that there is a Canada in which we all have a share; let us recognize that part of our great inheritance as Canadians is the distinguished men that Canada has given us in the past,—and some of whom remain with us to the present day; let us recognize that those men are the pride and the glory of the Canada that in its entirety is the country of each one of us, and let us try to recall what they have done rather than say, "It was I; it was not you." Let us say: "That is what Canadians in the past did, and it is by deeds of that kind that this Canadian nation has been built up." And allow me to add a word—in which I am only joining with the hon. gentleman, —let us never forget that in rendering comparatively easy the fruition of that work the coping stone that confirmed the status we all rejoice in was laid by the soldiers who proved, as by no other means it could be proved, that Canadians had in them the stuff that made them worthy to have their country recognized as a nation, so that Canada could take her place in bearing the burdens of the world, and that having so taken her place, without counting the cost or the sacrifice, she was entitled to the open, ample and ungrudging recognition of the world that she stood as a nation among nations, entitled to be heard not only concerning matters that interested her immediately, but to be heard in council when the Great Nations gathered together to devise what was best for the world and best for mankind. Let us see if from now on we cannot start out with one subject upon which we can be in agreement.

As I have said, I would willingly admit that all of the credit belongs to the predecessors in title of the Liberals who sit opposite to me. If it is necessary I will say that, happily, all the credit to-day belongs to the gentlemen who sit upon the other side of the House. But after I have said that I shall still rejoice for that fact which stands out beyond peradventure, that when the nations gathered together there was a place for the Canadian nation. And I am sure that on both sides of this House we can, after all, appreciate the fact of how little importance it is whether at one time men who called themselves Liberals and at another time men who called themselves Conservatives were doing the work.

In regard to the question of our national status, we might well take a leaf out of the book of the Mother Country, where they recognize that the relations of the country with the outside world, in other words, its foreign policy, is not a matter for party politics, but is carried on by government after government on well defined consistent lines, each successive administration profiting by the wisdom of its predecessor, and anxious to hand on in its turn some additional principle that may be availed of by its successor. Surely on this common ground of "Canada a Nation" we can stand together and rejoice together in the work of all those great Canadians who have helped to build up Canada, to all of whom without discrimination we are so grateful, and of all of whom without discrimination we are so proud.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. HENRI SEVERIN BELAND (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, the resolution submitted for our approval is in all respects identical with the one that was presented for our consideration at the last session of Parliament, which session was called especially that we might give our assent to the Treaty with Germany. In the course of his remarks the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) made to this side of the House what one might call a supplication that we should be unanimous with regard to this resolution. I do not rise for the purpose of offering factious opposition to the resolution; but it appears somewhat strange that Canada should be requested on this occasion to assent to a Treaty between the Allied and Associated Powers and Bulgaria, and that seemingly with the object of permitting His Majesty the King of England to ratify it. The man in the street, little conversant as he is with the affairs of the Balkan Peninsula, will undoubtedly be somewhat startled when he is made aware of the necessity for this Parliament to give its assent to such a Treaty, and the question will inevitably be asked whether it is true that such a radical and fundamental change in the political or international status of Canada has taken place. Last year the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell), and again this year the President of the Council, in periods pregnant with eloquence, repeatedly assured us of a powerful evolution, almost a revolution, in our political status which has brought Canada to the fore as a full-fledged nation in the councils of the world. No man in Canada is prouder than myself to see my country attain the status to which it is entitled by its economic development, by its almost inexhaustible natural resources in land, forest, fisheries, minerals and water-powers; by its ever-increasing manufacturing industries; by its geographical situation as between two great oceans; by its sturdy, thrifty, vigorous and labour-loving population, and last, but not least, by the heroic deeds of Canada's sons on the battlefields of Europe. These efforts of our soldiers were directed towards preventing the world from falling a victim to militaristic domination; but I fail to see in what extraordinary degree Canada is gaining nationally or internationally. The words "Canada's status," "Canada a nation," have been resounding in our ears from the treasury benches, during last session and also during this session; but since the days when Sir Wilfrid Laurier returned from the Imperial Conferences of 1897, 1902, 1907, 1909, with what I would call complete autonomy in matters commercial, in matters of immigration and in matters naval and military, a sentiment of national pride has pervaded the mind and soul of every man in Canada. That Canada is a nation is no new discovery. Canada was recognized as an autonomous nation many years before the war; but whilst up to the war Canada had international obligations commensurate with her national status, to-day the indications are that the equilibrium is destroyed by the predominance of international obligations over the political international advantages.

Let not my words, however, be construed as meaning that I offer any opposition to the creation or establishment of a League of Nations. There is, I think, a unanimous sentiment in this country in favour of the establishment of such a League which will doubtless prove to be an effective instrument for the maintenance of peace in the world. But Canada is not an independent nation; Canada is not a sovereign nation; and one has only to travel a few miles on the European continent or even in Great Britain to become fully aware of that fact. If I desired to prolong my remarks, I could quote many instances when, during my last trip to Europe, I was confronted with situations that made it perfectly plain and clear to me that Canada was not a sovereign nation and was not enjoying the same status as the United Kingdom, although the contrary has been affirmed and reaffirmed time and again in this House.

Moreover, a suggestion was made this afternoon by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) that we must be at one with the other nations of the Empire; to differ with the other four nations of the Empire would be fraught with the gravest consequences. Here is a Treaty to which we are asked to assent, though our plenipotentiaries were breathing the pure air of Canada when its provisions were discussed, and drafted, and signed. It is true our good friend the High Commissioner for Canada in London has affixed his signature to this Treaty; but who will doubt for one moment that Sir George Perley crossed the Channel only for a few hours; that on a cool, bracing, beautiful morning of last autumn he took an automobile ride to this delightful little town called Neuilly-sur-Seine, that he signed the Treaty, undoubtedly without reading it, and that a few hours afterwards he re-entered the capital of France only to rush across the Channel again to his absorbing duties in London, and the next morning or perhaps the same day the news was flashed across the ocean that Canada had signed the Treaty of Peace? And Canada has signed the Treaty. We may take it for granted that at the time this perfunctory act was discharged by Sir George Perley, not one of our ministers, surely not the members of this Parliament and the people of this country knew or had the remotest idea of some of the provisions of this Treaty. Would you think, Sir, for instance, that the President of the Council, or my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster), who leads the House, knew anything about a certain point 1295 situated about 18 kilometres west of Kuchuk-Derbend, as a part of the boundary between Greece and Serbia? Or anything about the apex of a salient formed by the frontier of the Treaty of Sofia, 1915, about 10 kilometres east south-east of Jisr Mustafa Pasha? It is a matter of history, however, that Sir George Perley has signed this Treaty without a smile.

The contention has been made in this House that Canada has attained a new status, a position that she did not enjoy and of which she could not boast before the war. We all recall the pathetic picture which was drawn of the struggle made by the representatives of Canada at the door of the Peace Conference. To use a phrase that was used in this House once by the late Mr. Israel Tarte, our representatives "fought like blazes" to gain admittance into the room. I do not want to minimize the honour or the advantage accruing to Canada by participation in the Peace Conference, but I say that no struggle should have been necessary on the part of our representatives to enter the Peace Conference. Canada had supplied 500,000 men, 60,000 of whom had fallen for the cause of the allied countries, and when the representatives of the allied countries got together in conference to settle the terms of peace I submit that no objection whatever should have been offered to the presence of the Canadian representatives.

Of the League of Nations, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to say anything because I do not want to prolong my remarks, except to attempt to correct what I consider is a wrong impression conveyed, not intentionally I am sure, by some hon. ministers regarding the voting power of Canada. In Article 4 of the Covenant it is provided that a nation that is interested in a dispute under consideration and which is not a member of the council may be invited to send a representative to sit in the council. It has been claimed by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and also by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) that sitting in the council in that way, as an invited guest, as it were, Canada would have the power to register a vote. But a perusal of subsequent clauses of the Covenant shows clearly that whenever Canada, or indeed any nation that is a member of the League, is interested in a dispute she is precluded from voting.

That the League of Nations will render immense services to mankind we cannot doubt. We need only recall the effects that the enactment of the Industrial Disputes Act has had in Canada, and if we may compare a big thing with a small thing we may expect that the League of Nations will at least render to the nations of the earth the service that has been rendered to this country by the Industrial Disputes Act.

Now, what is the new status of Canada within the Empire? No one so far has been able to draw from the Government the particulars of the new situation, if there is a new situation. It is true we have been told that Canada is one of five equal nations in the Empire, but when in the course of a debate last year my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council was invited by my hon. friend from Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Archambault) to name the nations that constitute the British Empire he replied that the British nation was composed of five nations equal in status, namely, the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. The claim has been made repeatedly that they are all on an absolutely equal footing in matters Imperial, and, I take it, also in matters international. Now let us see whether the claim is well founded. In order to ascertain whether the contention is just we must proceed by way of illustration. Surely the Parliament of Canada has no more extensive powers than the Parliament of the United Kingdom. That, I think, will be accepted as gospel by my friends on the other side. Last year we had some very interesting declarations from the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), whom I am sorry not to see in this House at the present moment. He made the declaration that if Canada refused to assent to the German Treaty, His Majesty the King would not ratify it. Have I represented faithfully the declaration of the Prime Minister? If my hon. friends do not object, then I shall go on;—this is becoming more and more interesting as we proceed. For, if the British Empire is composed of five equal nations all enjoying an equal share of autonomy and power and discretion, it is only natural to presume that in some instances one of those nations will differ from the others. We might have a case, for instance, where the United Kingdom differed from the four other nations. Now, in order to enable the House to reach a clear comprehension of what is described as "Canada's new political and international status," I would request the Government to inform the House what course would be adopted by the Sovereign in case the Parliament of the United Kingdom refused to approve this Treaty with Bulgaria after the four other nations of the Empire had given their assent to it. Would ratification take place? Would His Majesty the King yield to the wishes of the Parliament of the United Kingdom and refuse to ratify? Or would he yield to the will of the parliaments of these four other nations of the Empire and sign the Treaty? Whichever course he took, the consequences would be formidable for the United Kingdom. If the United Kingdom as one of five equal nations of the Empire refused to assent to a treaty accepted by the other four nations, there would be only one course open to the United Kingdom, and that would be to drop out of the British Empire. In other words, if one of the five nations refuses to assent to a treaty, then ipso facto a severance of that nation from the Empire takes place. I submit that this proposition, so preposterous, so impossible, so absurd and ridiculous as it appears, has its confirmation from no less an authority than the Prime Minister himself. During the consideration last year of the German Treaty, the right hon. gentleman, in presenting the resolution to the House, was subjected to a number of questions from hon. gentlemen on this side, and I shall read a passage from Hansard in which he makes a definite statement in reply to the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). At page 22 of Volume 1, 1919, (Special Session) this question is put to the Prime Minister:

> What difference does it make to us, the Empire, or the world, if we never ratify the Treaty at all?

In answer the Prime Minister said:

> It makes this difference. Canada would stand out of and apart from the rest of the Empire ratifying the Treaty. It would virtually, I think, commit Canada to such absolutely independent action that she could not be regarded in the future as acting in co-operation with the other nations of the Empire.

So that in the event of the United Kingdom refusing to give her assent to a treaty to which the four other nations had assented, the United Kingdom would have to drop out of the British Empire! This, surely, would be a very grave occurrence. Whatever, therefore, may be the Canadian national interest in regard to the provisions of any given treaty, if we dared to disagree we would ipso facto be wiped out of the Britannic Commonwealth—that is, if the explanation and interpretations given by the members of the Government are to be relied upon. The Minister of Justice, has sat, I am sure, on very many occasions on a court of revision in the province of Quebec, and I feel satisfied that in filling that office, in the able manner in which he has always performed his duties, some instances have arisen in which he differed from the two other judges. Yet he was not thrown out of the court; he remained in the court and the judgment was rendered.

Mr. DOHERTY: Does my hon. friend not realize the difference between the two things? In the court you have a provision of law which enables the majority to render judgment. In the present instance you have five nations constituting one Empire, and if the assent of that Empire is needed there is no provision by which the majority or any one of them can overrule any of the constituent nations. There is a manifest distinction between the two cases, I think.

Mr. BELAND: I see the distinction perfectly, but I should like to know how it comes that there is no such provision in this matter. There should be a provision by which, if one of the nations differed, it should not be read out of the British Empire because of that difference; and if this provision is lacking I say that the whole responsibility rests upon the shoulders of my hon. friend. Until the Constitutional Conference which is to be held in London has taken place, no man amongst ordinary mortals can definitely state whether Canada has advanced or receded in recent times. This state of the proceedings is very nebulous indeed. It has been affirmed that Canada has undergone an organic change of political status. We have been told that three courses were open to us: First, to fall back into the colonial state; second, to develop as a free nation within the Empire; and third, to declare our independence. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) makes the emphatic protestation that he refuses to recede to the colonial state. So do we. The hon. minister rejects with indignation any suggestion of the severance of British connection. So do we. The middle course, that is, the development of Canadian autonomy within the Empire, he embraces passionately. So do we. I will add, however, that this has been the policy of the Liberal party since the year 1896; but there may be a different appreciation of what constitutes progress in the direction of enlarging national status. And I say, with the leader of the Opposition, that if the development contemplated is to surrender to an Imperial Cabinet the autonomy we now enjoy in naval and military questions, and in questions concerning participation in wars and expenditures in connection therewith—and there are signs of this surrender on the horizon—then I say we are retrogressing and not advancing. I would warn the Government, if they will accept my warning, that in shaping the new political edifice which is in the vision of some imperialistic genius of England we should not start at the roof, the imperial cabinet. The edifice would undoubtedly be an imperial parliament, which would be founded on the desire of all parliaments within the Empire to be consulted. If those parliaments were consulted, judging by what I hear all over this country, you would not find any response to your call if you wanted to concentrate and centralize in London the administration of this Dominion. I can only repeat what was so ably said the other day, and at the conclusion of the last session, by my hon. friend, the member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). He adequately represented the opinion of the Canadian people when he requested that this Parliament and this country be consulted before any scheme of Imperial Federation be launched, or indeed before any step is taken to alter the present status of Canada.

As far as I am concerned, I wish Godspeed to the nations of the Balkan peninsula. As to Bulgaria, I hope she may be happy; the Peace Conference has paid a great deal of attention to the welfare of the different races that may inhabit that country. The Treaty which is submitted to us contains a whole section—section 4—in the political clauses, devoted to the protection of minorities. This is certainly the section of the Treaty that appeals to me the most. Reading this section, and the political clauses of the Treaty generally, we are apt to wonder how in the world it is possible that we Canadians should have entered a conflict raging some three thousand miles away from us for the vindication of certain principles, when the very principles for which we have struggled, fought and vanquished, for which we have lost 60,000 of the flower and youth of this country, may not be upheld in certain important sections of Canada itself. The reflection comes to the mind of the casual observer that the minorities of the vanquished nations have profited more than the minorities of the victorious nations. For, if we turn to the Treaty, and in particular to the clauses I have referred to, we find that it contains an enunciation of the principles which are deeply rooted in and inseparable from the heart and soul of every free man. I refer to the privileges guaranteed to linguistic and religious minorities. Nothing is more closely related to the love of God than religious creed, and nothing is more intimately associated with maternal love than the language learned at the knee of the dear parent. That these sacred and fundamental principles should have a place in the Treaty of Peace is an indication to me, Mr. Speaker, that they must have been ignored or disregarded and that the necessity of their public and solemn recognition is imperative.

In this respect the Treaty of Peace appeals to me more than in any other respect. It is a proclamation to the world at large that these principles should be upheld by all countries, and that this is undoubtedly the wish of the five Great Powers. Let me quote a few sentences by way of illustration. When you come to page 24 of the Treaty you are right in the heart of the clauses that deal with the protection of minorities. Here is article 53. I shall read a paragraph:

> All Bulgarian nationals shall be equal before the law and shall enjoy the same civil and political rights without distinction as to race, language or religion.

Let us go one step further—Article 54:

> Bulgarian nationals who belong to racial, religious or linguistic minorities shall enjoy the same treatment and security in law and in fact as the other Bulgarian nationals.

Article 55:

> Bulgaria will provide in the public educational system in towns and districts in which a considerable proportion of Bulgarian nationals of other than Bulgarian speech are resident, adequate facilities——

Adequate facilities.

> ——for ensuring that in the primary schools the instruction shall be given to the children of such Bulgarian nationals through the medium of their own language.

And the last paragraph:

> In towns and districts where there is a considerable proportion of Bulgarian nationals belonging to racial, religious or linguistic minorities, these minorities shall be assured an equitable share in the enjoyment and application of sums which may be provided out of public funds under the State, municipal or other budgets, for educational, religious or charitable purposes.

The nine articles of section 4 are in themselves a code of tolerance.

Resuming my seat, let me say that we concur in the resolution which is submitted to us. We have only to reaffirm the position taken last year as to the supremacy and sovereignty of the Canadian Parliament in the matter of participating in war as involved in Article 10. We are in accord with the Treaty because it embodies those principles of tolerance and justice which should be spread throughout the length and breadth of this country, for they constitute the foundation of a united Canada.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had no idea of speaking on this phase of the discussion which has been carried on in reference to the approval of the Bulgarian Treaty, and I disclaim any idea of making a speech at the present time. I would not have been on my feet had it not been for one remark made by the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), and reiterated by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Béland). I have been, if the House will allow me to say so, pleased with the spirit of the discussion which has taken place upon this Treaty.

In fact I might go a little further and say that I have been pleased with the tone of discussions in this House since the opening of the present session of Parliament; and I indulge the hope, as I most certainly cherish the desire, that we who begin our parliamentary work of this session in these new, artistic and ample surroundings, will express the spirit of this great edifice in its harmony of purpose, in its spiritualization of stone and wood into ideas and sentiments, and that it will have a restraining influence on all of us to be more kindly in our treatment of each other as partisans taking different angles of view, and will temper somewhat, and I hope greatly, what is apt in the best of us to degenerate sometimes into a mischievous, if not a malicious, baiting and hurting of one another.

For instance there is my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau). I meet him in the corridor, and I sit with him in the club once in a while. We converse together, and he thinks I am a very fair type of humanity. And, without any stretch of imagination or any great compulsion put upon me, I am making up my mind that, taken altogether, he is a pretty good sort of a fellow. We find that our ideas run pretty nearly parallel to each other, and as we sit and talk he would not try to make me feel that he thought I was a thief, a dishonest man, corrupt, over-extravagant, and everything of that kind. Now, when we leave our social converse, where we meet man to man, and separate ourselves on two sides of the House, the spirit of the aggregate gets into us, the spirit of the party, and when we get on our feet we look at each other through somewhat different glasses from those through which we see one another socially. But we are just as good men sitting opposite each other here as we were sitting side by side socially outside; and in the heart of each of us, no matter what he may be impelled to say in the heat and strife of party politics, we think the same of each other individually here as we did outside. Out of the Chamber we go back again to our social converse and we relapse into about the same relative attitude one to another.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Say that in French.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Well, what I hope is that as we grow older and more experienced we will try and keep that softened and human spirit even in our strongest and bitterest debates and so make them less strong in that sense and less bitter. How often I think of things that I have said a long time ago, when I was more vigorous than I am now, and wish maybe that I had not said quite all I did say; and sometimes I feel that the same thought has come to others who have said things about me. Well, we grow wiser as we grow older, but we cannot try any too much along the line of keeping with us that human kindliness even in our party debates and our partisan discussions.

Now that is not in the way of a lecture; it is just in the way of a word by a man who has been a long time in politics, party and otherwise and who, looking over the past and the present and a little towards the future, feels that we might have done more if we had been less partisan and had thrown all the best of us into the treasury of the common good for the benefit of the country.

A great deal is said about our national status. I am not sure but that we have talked nearly enough about it for a while. It seems to me as if now we had pretty well "sturdied" ourselves, if there is such a word. We know where we are and there is not any difference between us as it seems. Suppose we take it for granted that we have an improved status—and let it go at that for a little while.

Having come to a point of virtual agreement, that is a good point for us to start from. And, having a common opinion with reference to what we are and just how great and how strong we are, let us put that greatness and strength into the push forward for the development and betterment of our common country. We all know this is necessary. We have different points of view and these different points of view will grade our expressions, grade our feelings; but at heart we love our country equally, and we are equally anxious that our country shall get the best that is in us for its betterment and development.

I have found that some of the things that I have got most praise for—and I have never got a great deal of praise for anything I have done, from hon. gentlemen opposite anyway—were things that fell into my lap, things that I could not help but be for when they came to fruition. But the fruit was not my fruit; it was the development of years and years before, which, under proper cultivation long continued, proper sunlight, and proper atmosphere, just at that particular time came to the period of its fruition, and the man who happened to be at the head of affairs, who happened to have taken that line and who therefore foresaw that development—and which had come out as a sort of fulfilment of the prophesy of his own—got the credit of it when the most part of that credit did not belong to him at all. Happily for him fruition came in his time. So, when we talk about Laurier founding a nation, or if we talk of others having founded and made the status of a nation within a certain time, let us be modest about it; for this nationhood that is given to us is the growth of centuries and has had its gradual evolution. We never would have had the nation and the status we have to-day if we had not first had Confederation. That was the forming point, the foundation; our after-greatness aggregated and developed upon that foundation. We never would have had Confederation if we had not had the earnest, honest, straightforward laborious struggle and work of the explorers, the voyageurs, the colonizers and the developers of earlier days.

Confederation came as a fruit of the effort and development that preceded it, and in that work all had a share as in Confederation all had a share. And so what has developed since Confederation has been an evolution from within outward—and happy are we on each side of the House that we have been connected with that evolution and have worked in conformity with its spirit, and consequently, aided by it, have also aided in the result by our own efforts. I say this as, for myself, I have often found it a good thing to think that we all owe so much to the spirit that is about us, which develops without our efforts, with which we are consonant and with which we sympathize, and with which, to a certain extent, we work, but without which we ourselves would have been powerless to bring about the results.

Now, I had no thought of speaking in this line at all, but I want to say a word or two about a remark made by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat. He reiterated what we stood for on this side, and he reaffirmed his belief in those things. He agrees with us; we all agree with him with reference to that. But the leader of the Opposition made a remark which I would rather not have heard made, although he may think it proper to make it,—and maybe it is; I am not criticising it harshly. He said, "I fear,"—and when he said what he feared I wished in my heart that he had sat down before he voiced his fear, because he rather spoiled the effect of his speech. He said: I agree with what has been done in the matter of our status, its evolution, its strengthening, its gradual extension, its present position; but I fear Imperial centralization. If my hon. friends on the other side have—I will not call it a simulated fear—if they have an honest fear in that respect, it is their duty to voice it and to guard against that fear being realized. But what strikes me is that their fear is groundless in so far as Canada is concerned. Canada is the mistress of her own fortunes. It is not what an isolated man in England may have as a vision of some form of centralization that is going to affect Canada that ought to give us cause for alarm. We should have that sturdy reliance upon our own set purpose and our strength to carry it out, to treat such a thing as an idle fear, because it can have no place in Canada itself. As I said before, we are the masters of our own fortunes.

What are the grounds for that fear? I have been searching for them after having heard them reiterated now and again in the country and sometimes in this House. I have failed to see them. If I did see them anywhere, I was utterly unable to see them in Canada itself. Therefore I am unmoved by them. Again let me say, we are masters of our own fortunes, and I do not know any one in this country who is in for a game of Imperial centralization which will sap to the slightest degree the autonomy and the rights and privileges that Canada to-day exercises, and means to exercise.

If there are no well-founded grounds for that fear, are we doing much of a service to our country and to the Empire to raise it into prominence, to give it, as far as we can, a body, and a threatening body, and send it out to our people raising prejudices and suspicions with reference to our relations with the Mother Country and with the other parts of the Empire? I do not think that is the best service for us to perform. But every man must be guided by his own light, and if any one thinks that there is enough in it to justify him in arousing the country against that fear—which I think is imaginary—then his responsibility is with himself,——

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is no harm done.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: —and I would not be unduly harsh in criticising what he says along that line. But for myself, I do not think it is needed, and if it is not needed I do not think it wise to throw that in among the many contentious things that we already have to cope with. Surely we have enough of realities to fight without putting up these eventualities or figments of the imagination.

I think I have had pretty nearly as wide an acquaintance with the public men of Great Britain as most hon. members here. My hon. and valued friend (Mr. Fielding) who sits opposite to me may have had a more extensive acquaintance, but I have had a fairly large acquaintance with public men in Great Britain of all political shades of opinion, and for the last twenty to twenty-five years I have had the privilege of being side by side with them in a great many different capacities and of learning their hopes, their desires, their plans with reference to the development of the British Empire. I must say, as a result of my experience, that it is not possible for me to put my hand upon any organized effort amongst the public men of Great Britain looking in the least degree towards a centralization of empire which would harm to the slightest hair's weight the automony and freedom and privileges that the overseas dominions to-day enjoy,—and which they enjoy with the good-will and perfect unanimity of the people of Great Britain.

I am not going to say that there are not cranks and extremists and faddists in Great Britain, just the same as there are in Canada. But here is where we are apt to make a mistake, in that we take the voice of some one who gets the ear of the newspapers or of the public and makes his voice widely heard—we are apt to take that as being an indication of the sentiments of the nation to which he belongs. We must be discriminating in that respect. We can take that lesson to ourselves right here in Canada; my hon. friends can take it to themselves; my hon. friend who just sat down can take it to himself. You can take it on the language question, on the school question—you can take it on any question about which there are differences of opinion in this country. We do not get rid of the differences by saying nothing about them; at the same time, we do not get rid of them by saying too much about them, or if our statements are ill-advised and rash and reckless. But the trouble is that some extreme man in one section of the country makes a statement which is galling, rasping, unjust,—insulting if you like; and immediately, under present conditions, this is distributed to every part of the country, and it reaches that section where it hurts, where it arouses harsh feeling, and the tendency is to translate that statement as the voice of the province or of the section of the country from which its author hails. That is the chief trouble. If we could put all that class of utterance under our feet for a single decade, the unity and good feeling in this country of ours would be advanced one hundred per cent. But you cannot put it under foot. In a democratic country, how are you going to stop a man's mouth? How are you going to stop a newspaper's ink and printing press work? So long as you have those ideas and men who hold them, you will have those ideas floating about, and the injury, and the insult, and the slur will go from one and be returned by the other. If we cannot stop those individual utterances of extreme people, then, as sensible men, and not as children, we must ignore them, and not, like children, feel that we have been insulted by a whole people when one man says of us a thing that is unjust and harsh. We must be careful not to translate those sayings on the one side or the other into a general expression of the people to whom they are directed or from whom they are directed. That is the point which occurs to me. After all, I am of the opinion that there is a substantial, widespread, deep and profound unity in this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Except at election times.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: At election times —there is where we get foolish, very often get very foolish; and if we see on the outside edge of the crowd half a dozen people whom we think we can influence by a sling, or a jeer, or a slur, or a prejudice stirred up, it is human nature not to let the opportunity pass. The arrow goes; but that is an argument against the man who sends the arrow rather than otherwise. If we would just keep those poisoned-tipped arrows in our quiver—no, because we are human and might give way to temptation—

Mr. McMASTER: Destroy them.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: —if we would put them where they could not be used, we would have better politics, better social union and better sectional union in this country. I am digressing somewhat from my point as to this Imperial centralization, and I go back to it again, and I give it as my opinion, for what that may be worth, that neither in Canada, nor in the British Empire, nor in the outlying Dominions, is there anything to be feared from undue centralization, because that can never be made a fact in this British Empire. We have proceeded from the first on the line of conference, better knowledge of each other, co-operation; and the result has been splendid when you measure it up over a course of twenty-five years. I can go back thirty or thirty-five years, and I was, from my youth up, an Imperialist in that I wanted the British dominions and races and countries to work together, feel together, have the same heart, the same throbbing pulses, and the same hopes, ambitions and ideals, and to work out, on the plane of their love of justice and of freedom and their constitutional power of organization, one of the best machineries for the development and civilization of the world. Always I have had that in view. I have travelled in all those overseas dominions and I have met their men, and I have yet to find, in Australia, or South Africa, or New Zealand, or India, men who are working for an Imperial centralization. Everywhere they feel as we feel here; but there is one thing that I stand for—and I believe my hon. friends on the other side stand for it also—and that is this, that this British Empire has within its borders resources, mentality, morale, spirit of enterprise, power of organization, and ideals which, if they are combined in co-operative effort, will build up this great Empire as a unity and thereby make a force amongst the internationals of the world—a force for freedom, peace, justice, and true democracy. There is the line along which, I think, we ought to abate no effort, to leave nothing undone by conference, by co-operation. Go fifty years back and see how we have advanced by conference, by co-operation. Look forward fifty years, and if we proceed on the same lines wisely, our liberties will be broadened rather than curtailed, our politicians will have visions wider than our politicians have to-day. Our internal development, the spirit of our people, the cultivation of that which is honest and right and the putting up before us and the world of the ideals for which our Empire has stood from the first, will be a great guiding point, a star by which others will steer in their courses across the troubled seas of world development. Whilst we grow stronger ourselves, that strength will infuse itself into the world around us and be an uplifter and a developer for all other countries as well as our own. A strong nation is for the good of the world as a whole. A strong nation founded on the principles of this nation of ours is an untold good and blessing to the world. Do not let us be carried away by these imaginery ideas of somebody wanting to chuck us all into one Imperial group and take away all our liberties. That is absurd, nobody is thinking about it who has power to carry it into operation. Anyway, we are strong enough to let anybody who wants to think that way, think that way. As I said before, we have our fortunes in our own hands.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): Mr. Speaker, I must first congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) on the splendid utterances he has just made and his magnificent plea in favour of unity and harmony in Canada. Let us hope that his remarks will bear fruit and that they will be printed as a heading in all the literature that will be distributed by his party at the next general election.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Might I make a challenge, a defi, to my hon. friend? If we will print that at the head of our literature, will my hon. friend and his party print it at the head of all theirs?

Mr. BUREAU: Provided the body conforms with the heading.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Sure, it has always been there.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: It has always been the practice of the Liberal party to print such statements at the head of our literature. It would be very easy for me to bring before the House some pieces of literature that were distributed by hon. gentlemen opposite at the last election which had none of the earmarks of what my right hon. friend has spoken of to-night.

We are asked by this resolution to ratify the Treaty of Peace with Bulgaria, just as we have already ratified the Treaties of Peace with Germany, Austria-Hungary, Poland and other countries. Personally I do not believe it is necessary for us to ratify this Treaty at all. If England ratifies and the King signs this Treaty it makes no difference whether we ratify and sign it or not. The war with Bulgaria will not start over again. I feel, however, that it is not necessary for us to refuse to accede to the uncouth request of the Government, and I rose to-night not for the purpose of discussing the resolution at large, but to emphasize a point made by my hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Béland). I simply wish to draw the attention of the House to a few clauses which in my opinion are of unusual interest, and from which I think some hon. members can draw a very useful lesson. If I understand aright the meaning of this resolution, by approving this Treaty Canada approves of all the principles embodied in it, and I should like to read to the House Section IV of the Treaty. It is entitled Protection of Minorities, and reads as follows:

Article 49.—Bulgaria undertakes that the stipulations contained in this Section shall be recognized as fundamental laws, and that no law, regulation or official action shall conflict or interfere with these stipulations, nor shall any law, regulation or official action prevail over them.

Article 50.—Bulgaria undertakes to assure full and complete protection of life and liberty to all inhabitants of Bulgaria without distinction of birth, nationality, language, race or religion.

All inhabitants of Bulgaria shall be entitled to the free exercise, whether public or private of any creed, religion or belief, whose practices are not inconsistent with public order or public morals.

Article 53.—All Bulgarian nationals shall be equal before the law and shall enjoy the same civil and political rights without distinction as to race, language or religion.

Difference of religion, creed or confession shall not prejudice any Bulgarian national in matters relating to the enjoyment of civil or political rights, as for instance admission to public enjoyments, functions and honours, or the exercise of professions and industries.

Article 54.—Bulgarian nationals who belong to racial, religious or linguistic minorities shall enjoy the same treatment and security in law and in fact as the other Bulgarian nationals. In particular they shall have an equal right to establish, manage and control at their own expense charitable, religious and social institutions, schools and other educational establishments, with the right to use their own language and to exercise their religion freely therein.

Article 55.—Bulgaria will provide in the public educational system in towns and districts in which a considerable proportion of Bulgarian nationals of other than Bulgarian speech are resident adequate facilities for ensuring that in the primary schools the instruction shall be given to the children of such Bulgarian nationals through the medium of their own language. This provision shall not prevent the Bulgarian Government from making the teaching of the Bulgarian language obligatory in the said schools.

In towns and districts where there is a considerable proportion of Bulgarian nationals belonging to racial, religious or linguistic minorities, these minorities shall be assured an equitable share in the enjoyment and application of sums which may be provided out of public funds under the State, municipal or other budgets, for educational, religious or charitable purposes.

I have no comments to make on these clauses, Mr. Speaker, except to say that similar clauses were embodied in the other treaties which have already been ratified by this House; that they were approved by this House, and that they are highly commendable. I hope that hon. members will carefully preserve this Treaty and long remember the principles embodied in Section IV, because the remembrance of those principles, and their application in Canada in the future, might prove a permanent and paramount basis for unity, peace and harmony.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): I have taken a good deal of interest in the Treaty of Peace ever since it was promulgated, and I have been moved to make a few remarks this evening upon the question now before the House. The hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), it appears to me, made a rather unfortunate speech this evening in connection with this great question. If I understood the tenor of his remarks correctly his object was to glorify the position that the Liberals had taken in bringing Canada to the status of a nation rather than to find out our position as at present constituted, and the responsibilities that come to us by reason of being one of the forces in the League of Nations. The hon. gentleman made this remark, that there are times and seasons for all things. I would submit that it is not the time or the season when an international matter is under discussion to introduce local political affairs, and therefore I entirely dissent from the hon. gentleman's attitude this afternoon in debating this question. These international questions are too serious for hon. members to use the occasion to make political capital for one party or the other. The Treaty of Peace is surely a big enough subject to engage our best thought and attention, and I for one am not sure that we have yet done justice to it. Although this is the third or fourth time we have discussed the Treaty, a full exposition of the responsibilities we are undertaking has not been given. I agree with the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) that we have made altogether too much of the status of Canada in the Empire, and altogether too little of the responsibilities that are going to come upon us as the result of saying that we are a nation. Those responsibilities, as I understand it, are of a very serious nature, and if we do not realize that now we shall realize it in the very near future.

Those who have read the news to-day will have noticed that the American Senate has come to a decision with regard to Article 10 of the Treaty of Peace as contained in the Covenant of the League of Nations. The Senate has set out its objections to that article, which is the one providing for the carrying out of the undertakings of the League when moral suasion and economic pressure have failed. It calls for the contribution of men, ships, air forces, and all the munitions of war, to back up the opinions of the League as a finality. The author of the League of Nations, President Wilson, has said that Article 10 is the heart of the Treaty, and I think he is right in that respect. It is the heart of the Treaty inasmuch as it provides for the carrying out of its obligations when all forms of persuasion have failed. Economic pressure, diplomatic representation, moral suasion and every argument that can be urged are all exhausted before the final act of using the "big stick;" and when the big stick is to be used, as I understand the situation, every nation that has signed the Treaty has assumed the obligation to furnish men, money, ships, or air forces as its fair share towards the discharge of the obligation which the League as a whole has undertaken. The substitute has been found for Article 10, as I observe from the Evening Journal of to-day. I am somewhat surprised that neither of the leaders of the House has tackled what is really the pith of the whole Treaty, and that is the obligation which each party to it undertakes. We quarrel about the status of our country, and debate as to who is responsible for enhancing it, who deserves the glory and who does not. But we fail to realize that, having declared ourselves men, we must play the part of men, and that we shall be called upon to bear the white man's burden which, so far as Canada is concerned, consists in providing the sinews of war when all other peaceful means have failed to secure the carrying out of the will of the League of Nations. I am not one of those who believe that wars have ended. I believe that the machinery of the League of Nations will be in operation in a short time; in fact, it should be in operation now. And only yesterday the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) in reply to the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) said, I think, that although war was going on in Turkey and some troops were being landed there, Canada was not in this particular instance paying any part of the shot. Well, perhaps she is not; but she may have to do so later on if she lives up to her obligations which I understand she is assuming under the League of Nations, by which I believe she becomes responsible financially, or for the supply of men, money or ships, to hold up her end among the rest of the nations constituting the League. And no amount of explanation, or declamation that our status is being very much improved, making us now one among the big nations of the world, is going to relieve us of that obligation we have undertaken by entering the League of Nations. I desire to read to the House the decision of the United States Senate on Article 10. It is headed, "Substitute for Article 10 accepted." After giving an account of the discussion, and the majority by which the measure was passed—it was adopted by a vote of 56 to 26—the article proceeds:

> The reservation, adopted after many efforts to modify it had been rolled under by the solidly united Republican majority, follows in general form the one adopted last November. It is as follows:
> "The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country by the employment of its military or naval forces, its resources, or any form of economic discrimination, or to interfere in any way in controversies between nations, including all controversies relating to territorial integrity or political independence, whether members of the League or not, under the provisions of Article Ten, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States, under any Article of the Treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which under the constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall, in the exercise of full liberty of action, by act or joint resolution, so provide."

So that the United States, speaking through its Senate, which, according to the constitution, has the say in regard to questions of peace and war, has declared that so far as Article 10 is concerned it does not propose to observe the obligation except after the Senate has dealt with it and declared by voice and resolution that the United States is in the war. We have subscribed to this amendment on which our friends, after debating for ten months, have failed to come to a conclusion further than to declare themselves practically ruled out of the operation of clause 10, which President Wilson, the author, has described as the heart of the whole Treaty. That being the case, I do not think that this House can afford to shut its eyes to the obligations which we are undertaking with regard to these treaties that are being passed by us one by one. I contend that we are undertaking very serious obligations which we shall be called upon to fulfil when the time arrives to put them into operation. I am not sure that a great triumph has been secured in the stand that has been taken. I cannot see it that way; and as for the statement of my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Béland) that we are centralizing forces with a view to Imperialism, while I take no second place to any one in this House as an Imperialist, so far as I have been able to voice my sentiments in that respect, I do not regard the matter in that way either. I take an entirely opposite view of it. I may be wrong, but I think that our delegates who attended the councils of the League of Nations should not have gone as representatives of Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa or Canada, but as representatives of the British Empire. That is the position they should have taken, the position we have always held in the past—that we were a member of the British Empire and not a separate unit standing on our own footing. I have by me the prize essay of Heber L. Hart, K.C., LL.D., who won the Hundred Guinea prize in London on the subject of the League of Nations in its relation to the British Empire. His words are better than my own, and I shall therefore quote them:

> If it had not been intended that the integrity of the British Union should be impaired, the statesmen of the dominions would have been given a place in the councils of the League only in the capacity of representatives of the Empire as a whole.

That is exactly the idea I was trying to bring out a few moments ago.

> Disputes between different parts of the British Commonwealth should have been left for adjustment to its own representative conference and excluded from the jurisdiction of the League.

In other words, if we had any differences in the Empire, instead of airing them in public and before all the nations of the world, we would have a conference between Great Britain and her associated Dominions, debate the point there, settle the policy and go into the conference as a unit. In my judgment that is a stronger position, a better position than we are likely to attain, and I think it will lead to a great deal less trouble in the long run for the British Empire to be represented there as a unit than for us to be divided into five different countries speaking through five different classes of representatives from each of these divisions. If we are a nation, as has been boasted, and if we have "cut the painter" entirely—although I do not believe we have—we are just in the position of the young man who is starting out in life and who, when he gets to be twenty-one years of age walks up to his father and says: "Dad, I have been with you for twenty-one years, and now I propose to be a man on my own account; I propose to go out and see the world; I propose to row my own boat and to paddle my own canoe through the world; so, good-bye, Dad, old chap." Perhaps I give him my blessing and I start this young man out in this way. The young man goes out into the world and gets into trouble; he gets into debt; he gets into difficulty. This young man who is willing to be upon his own resources as long as the sun shines, but he expects good old Dad to pull him out when he gets into trouble and when he has contracted debts that he is unable to pay. That is practically the position we are ready to assume in Canada. We say that we are a nation, that we are a nation among the nations of the world, that of the forty-two nations that signed the Treaty, we are just as good as any. Are we prepared to pay the shot the same as they are? When we asked for seven thousand or eight thousand troops for all Canada, "Militarism" is shouted at us; when we ask for a few small boats to keep our coasts, it is said that we aspire to be a great naval power; when we ask for an air force it is said that we are going to squander money on war armaments. We will hear of that, and a great deal more than we have ever done before, if we are going to uphold our position that we assume in this League of Nations. It is going to be an immense responsibility, and I ask hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House to look it squarely in the face. I have appealed, on two different occasions and not merely to-day, in the discussion of this Treaty, and I again appeal to the leaders on this and the other side of the House to tell us what our responsibilities are, and what we are going to do when trouble comes. It is all very well to say that the sun is shining now and that it is always going to shine. I believe it is the part of good policy to look ahead. I do not expect that there will always be sunshine, that there will always be peace in the world or that we will have just the conditions that we would like to have. If that is the case, Mr. Speaker, we ought to look the whole situation over and we ought to have a statement from one of the leaders of the House as to what our position will be when the call comes. On what basis is it going to be settled? Is it on the basis of population, or is it on the basis of the area to be defended? On what basis is Canada, one of the five sister nations of the British Empire, to pay her share, or fight her share, with the rest of the world? That is what we will have to do. The United States Senate has balked for eighteen months over it, although we seem to be ready to take it down at one gulp and make no inquiry whatever as to what our responsibilities are in regard to it. I trust before the debate closes that we will have an authoritative statement from some quarter telling us how these troops are going to be raised, how the levy is to be made, how it is going to be paid for, and who settles the responsibility for it.

Heretofore when the British Empire has been at war we have been at liberty practically to do what we wished to help the Mother Country and in most of her wars we have wished to do nothing. In the last war, I am glad to say, Canada has taken her full share and perhaps more than her full share amongst the nations but is she prepared to take part in quarrels that she thinks do not concern her very much because some of these quarrels may be in the Balkan states, Arabia, Mesopotamia, Palestine and those countries and we may not feel like laying down the tools of peace and devoting ourselves again to armaments. If we are not prepared to do that, somebody has to do our share for us and if somebody does our share for us we have to pay for the share that is being done. That is the way I see it, that is the way it reads in Article 10, and the American people not only read it in the same way but they are not prepared to sacrifice the constitution of the United States in this regard to the extent of handing over to the League of Nations the right to say what they shall do, when they shall do it and how they shall do it. That is what we are doing. We are practically, when signing this Treaty, signing away our independence, not in relation to Britain but signing away our independence to the extent that we became subservient to the directions of the League of Nations. The League of Nations can say to Canada with a population of 8,000,000: You provide 100,000 men, ten ships and fifty or a hundred units of the air force. That may be the levy and it may not be a very large war at that. What provision is there for finding a force of that kind? That is a part of the Treaty, that is a responsibility that may come to us sooner or later, and if it comes how are we to meet it? I think that instead of glorifying ourselves as being a nation among the nations of the world and pointing to the fact that we have obtained a status that we had never thought of before, we should inquire, if we are going to be a man of the world, how much it will cost; are we able to carry the load; are we prepared to sustain the burden; are we prepared as citizens of Canada to provide the army, the navy and the air force to enable us to take our place amongst the nations of the world whenever they are called for? As I understand it that will be the final necessity of the case when we have entered into this League of Nations because it will apply with binding force to all those who sign the Covenant and in my judgment we will have to pay the piper later. If we do not recognize that now, when the assessment is made by the Council of the League of Nations, which is competent to do it, we will have to do what they ask us to do whether we like it or not, or else we will have to ignominiously drop out altogether. If I interpret the Treaty right, if any member fails to carry out the obligation placed upon it by the Council of the League of Nations, it automatically ceases to be a member of the League. If that is is so it will be up to Canada, when the call comes, to contribute in the way I have suggested and in a measure commensurate with her population, resources and the area that we have and which must be defended.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to make a few remarks on the important question which engages our attention, I cannot deny myself the privilege of offering to my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George E. Foster) my congratulations upon the address which he delivered and with which, with very little exception, we on this side of the House entirely agree. I am sure that the appeal he made to the members on both sides of the House as to the spirit in which we should discuss not only this but all questions will be responded to all round. I listened to his address with great pleasure and I am unwilling to let it pass without this remark from myself.

I am exceedingly glad to find my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) drawing attention to the responsibilities of Canada under these treaties and under the League of Nations. He is right when he says that too little attention has been paid to that important question. I think—in fact I know—that many hon. members on both sides have become enamoured of this notion of the higher status that Canada is said to have attained. They are fascinated with the idea of having a place in the League of Nations. We are getting to be a bigger boy than we formerly were and there is a disposition to see something to congratulate somebody upon. I think that when the sober-minded hard-headed people of Canada come to fully understand this question—when they understand the cost of this whole arrangement and the obligations that are being taken upon us—they will have a different impression, and I desire that the people shall understand what this thing is costing us at present. Some of these days we shall have the pleasure, I suppose, of getting at the inside history of this claim of Canada to a separate position. The thing seems to me to be so profoundly foolish that I am unwilling to place the responsibility entirely upon the Canadian Government. I have a notion that this thing originated in the mind of some fussy person from some other section of the Empire, and that the worst than can be said of the Canadian Government is that they were not strong-minded enough to resist the movement. I believe that some of the sober-minded Ministers of the Crown—clear-headed, hard-headed men; they are not all dreamers, they are not all faddists—I cannot help believing that their loyalty to colleagues and courtesy to their party surroundings obliged them to be silent on the question. I am satisfied, as I know these men, that they must entertain a mute protest against this foolish attempt for Canada to mix itself up in the foreign affairs of the world. I think that Canada's part in this matter has been largely a farce,—I hope it is not unkind to say that. A farce, of course, is an amusing thing. I think it was farcical last year when we undertook to represent to the people of Canada that it was necessary that Canada, through its Parliament, should approve of the German Treaty. No constitutional authority of repute would claim that it was necessary that Canada through its Parliament should approve of that Treaty. The Prime Minister himself did not say that. When the question was put squarely to him the most he could say was: Oh well, if you do not approve of it the Government will have to resign. But it is clear, I think, to the mind of any constitutional authority in Canada that if we had never passed any motion regarding the German Treaty that Treaty would have gone into operation just the same. And if it was a farce to deal with the German Treaty that way last year it is an even greater farce to deal in the same way with this Bulgarian Treaty. My hon. friend (Mr. Béland) gave us a picture of our respected friend, Sir George Perley, rushing down to the coast, crossing the channel, going down to the charming little French village, and hurrying in and affixing his signature to a document which he probably never read. I do not believe there are half a dozen members in this House who have read this Treaty. I do not believe the members of the Government have all read it. The Minister of Justice to-day said he had read it, and I am bound to believe him. He asked me if I had read the Treaty and I was frank enough to say no. I tried to read it, but it is a document of one hundred or more pages. I read the most of it, but I honestly confess I was unable to complete my reading. Still I am convinced that I read five times as much as most hon. gentlemen. Why, the thing is a joke. It is a joke as described by my hon. friend (Mr. Béland) if Sir George Perley went and signed the Treaty in the way described. It would be more of a joke if we could imagine Sir George Perley solemnly sitting down in Council, in judgment, on the condition of affairs to be arranged between Bulgaria and the Balkan States and the civilized world. We cannot imagine a more ludicrous thing than to suppose for a single moment, that Sir George Perley has the qualifications—and I say this without any disrespect for that gentleman; that he has the knowledge and qualifications—to sit down and consider the matter and deliver a judgment in the form of this Blue Book. The whole thing, Mr. Speaker, is ridiculous. And it is a costly bit of folly for the people of Canada. Just what it cost for our ministers to go to Paris I do not know, nor am I interested in inquiring. Whatever we may say regarding the status of Canada we will all agree that when our Ministers of the Crown go abroad they have a status to maintain and we would expect them to do it with dignity; and if the cost in that respect was a large and generous one I at least will find no fault with them. The country will not begrudge any expense of that kind when the money is expended for the purpose of the public business of Canada. Of course, the misfortune is in that case, whatever the expenditure was, it was to no purpose, because there was no public business of Canada before the Conference. Now information was laid before this House, official information I believe, to show that the Canadian ministers over there had exceedingly little to do and that, practically speaking, our participation in that Treaty was very largely a sham. That is perhaps too harsh a word, but at all events they did little or nothing, not because they were not able to do things, but because there was nothing for them to do. You can take the whole Treaty, and take this Treaty, and read them from cover to cover, and you will find nothing in them from beginning to end that has a direct bearing upon the affairs of the people of Canada. Therefore I say there was no need of their dealing with the matter in that way.

I again come to the question of the expense. It was stated the other day that we have paid $65,000 already for our share of the expenses of the League of Nations for the first year. I do not know by what authority or out of what appropriation that money was paid. That of course we will ascertain in due course. But there was another item that we paid in connection with this matter. Not only did the Government bring forward this pretence that it was necessary for Canada to approve of the Treaty through her Parliament, but they went further and said that it was so necessary and so urgent that they had to have a special session of Parliament in Canada for that purpose. Now, I have already declared, and I am not sure but that I am the only member who did so, that it was wanton waste of the public money to call that special session of Parliament, and I do not hesitate to repeat the statement to-night. If you would say "That is a partisan opinion," if you would say "that is a statement that only some partisan Grit would make," I am going to give you the opinion of a supporter of the Government which my Conservative friends will freely accept as having some weight. At the time that special session of Parliament was proposed the Montreal Gazette, a most influential journal of the Conservative party, had an article on the subject in which it said:

> An autumn session of Parliament would be nothing short of profligacy.

That is a very harsh term, but it is not my word, it is the word of the Conservative Montreal Gazette.

No one reason worthy a moment's consideration has been given why a session should be held, while there are a score of reasons on the other side. A million and a half dollars is a tidy sum of money even in these days when men talk familiarly of a hundred millions and do not pale when a billion is mentioned. A session of Parliament lasting only thirty days will cost the country a million and a half, and for this considerable price what can be gained? The ratification of the Peace Treaty three months earlier than in normal course! One might almost infer that an awe-struck world stands in fear and trembling lest the Canadian Parliament reject the Covenant, and so precipitate another war. It is nonsense to pretend that it makes a shadow of difference whether the Parliament of Canada, or the Parliament of any other country, for that matter, approves the Treaty in October or in January.

That is the opinion of the Montreal Gazette. I might put along side it the opinion of a journal that the Minister of Finance will have great confidence in, for I remember, though I have not the paper at hand, that it quoted the Gazette with approval, and that is the Conservative Kingston Standard. So that when I charge upon the Government this waste of the public money amounting to probably a million dollars at least—I asked a question about it the other day but we have not yet the official information, but I fear the cost will be a million dollars—when I charge upon the Government this wanton waste of a million dollars in order to carry out its claim about the necessity of Parliament having to approve of the Treaty, I am simply saying that which sober-minded Conservative people, as represented by the Montreal Gazette and the Kingston Standard, have said. So I think if the people of Canada come to understand the expense that this thing has cost them already—and Heaven knows how much it is going to cost them in the future—this glamour about Canada having a seat at the Peace Conference, will, in all probability, take on another colour.

Now, I must not be misunderstood. If any man says that I am willing to have the affairs of Canada disposed of by people who do not represent Canada he will state that for which there is no foundation. I insist that whenever Canada has a particular business requiring attention that business shall be attended to by the representatives of the Canadian people. That I would make quite clear. But if occasionally there are matters pending of only remote interest to Canada—the kind of interest that a man has out in the South sea islands if he is a Britisher; that a negro has in the West Indies; in fact, the interest which a Britisher has everywhere in the wide world—if there is only that kind of interest, then I say there is no particular reason why Canada should insist upon representation, because it ought to be sufficient for us that the interests of Canada will be safe in the hands of those who represent the British Empire.

So I do claim, Mr. Speaker, that this pretence that it is necessary that Canada, for the protection of her interests, should have representation at the Peace Conference is an entire delusion. There is no need of any hesitation on our part in claiming our right to deal with the affairs of Canada in the way I have described; there is no new status or power required for that purpose. There was a time many years ago when the affairs of the Dominions, or the colonies as they were then called, were disposed of by the British Government and the British Parliament without any reference to us. I suppose those would be what we call "the old colonial days." Unless it be between those times and the present, I do not know where you are going to draw the line as to what are referred to as "the old colonial days."

But those days are a thing of the remote past. For the last forty years at least there has been a recognition on the part of the British Government that wherever the interests of Canada were concerned, Canada must be either directly represented or she must be protected by a reservation in the Treaty that it is not to apply to her until it has received the approval of her Parliament. Our interests in that respect have been fully protected in the past, and it did not need any Conference at Paris or any League of Nations to give us that protection.

Although I may be peculiar in this respect—and I am careful to say that I speak for myself only—I regret to say that I regard the step taken by the Dominions generally in claiming seats at the Paris Conference as a grave mistake. I say it is a mistake to separate Canada from the rest of the Empire in international affairs, and it is a mistake which will work harm in the future. Within the British Empire we should stand for our rights, we should be willing, as my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) said to-day, at any conference with the Imperial authorities to see that wherever it is necessary the interests of Canada are protected. But when you come to deal with foreign affairs I claim that we should deal with them as a unit, as an Empire. And when you say,

"We will treat the United Kingdom as one part, Canada as another part, and Australia as another part," you are making the beginning of a policy of separation, the end of which may not be what you desire. I am firmly persuaded that this assertion of a separate interest on the part of Canada and the other Dominions is the beginning of the evolution of separation, and for that reason, amongst others, I regret we have to deal with it.

I want to say a word with regard to what my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) stated concerning the position of Canada in the League of Nations. The League is composed of a Council and an Assembly. As a matter of fact the Council is the really important body; the Assembly is a larger body which meets only occasionally, the real work being done by the Council. On the Council Canada has no representative, and I do not hesitate to say that she cannot have a representation. It is true there is nothing in the League constitution which says she will not have a representation, and the Prime Minister, for some strange reason, took the trouble to obtain from Mr. Clemenceau, from Mr. Lloyd George and from Mr. Wilson a declaration that the Dominions were not precluded from having a seat on the Council.

But that does not prove anything. The Council is composed of the representatives of five Great Powers: Great Britain, France, Italy, the United States, and Japan. Each of these Great Powers is a member of the Council by right, and then four others are to be chosen by the Assembly. Now, when you consider that there will be perhaps fifty or more nations having seats in the Assembly, many of them seeking to get to the Council, is there any reasonable probability that, Great Britain already having one member, these other nations will give the British Empire a second member in the shape of a seat for Canada.

Mr. BELAND: None whatever.

Mr. FIELDING: It is unreasonable, it is preposterous. We will have no seat on the Council, and it is the Council that is important.

That brings us to the question which has so much disturbed my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council, the Lenroot reservation. According to my hon. friend there is deep indignation throughout this country and a firm determination that we are not going to let Uncle Sam interfere with our rights and privileges in this matter. A great American—I would not say a very great one—gave to his countrymen what he told them was a good motto: Stand by your country, right or wrong. Well, the ethics of that motto I will not discuss, and yet it is practically what we all do. We all stand by our country. When my hon. friend makes a speech in which he tells us the American Senate is trying to interfere with something that belongs to us, we all stand up and say: They shall not do it. But we do not stop to consider what that something is. Now, as a matter of fact there is no such indignation and no such public opinion as my hon. friend says concerning the Lenroot reservation. If my hon. friend would go out into the public streets of any town and ask the first dozen men he met what they thought of the Lenroot reservation, five or six would tell him they never heard of it, one or two would inform him that they had seen it in the headlines of the newspapers, and he would be very lucky indeed if he found one man who knew what it meant; and it is pretty certain that he would not find one of them at all concerned about the reservation. My hon. friend is able to provoke a little public opinion by telling the world that the Americans are trying to do something to interfere with us. Well, we are all going to stand by our country against the United States. If we put forward a claim that is not very reasonable, nevertheless we are not going to let Uncle Sam say that we shall not do it. I suppose in that way my hon. friend can find some public opinion in support of his contention. But the truth is there is no such indignation. No one in Canada cares much for the Lenroot reservation; it is not a matter that disturbs anybody, whatever my hon. friend may think about it. However, he made a speech of the same kind in Montreal not many days ago, and immediately after it was reviewed in the Montreal Gazette of the 17th February. I am going to quote a passage of that review:

> The claim made upon the part of Canada is that the record of the Dominion as a belligerent raises this country to equal status with all those other nations. As a matter of constitutional fact, no such development occurred, and the wisdom of the attempt which has been made to first establish by assertion, and then defend, a position which in point of fact does not exist, is open to question. Canada is not now in any different position constitutionally than before the war. Canadian autonomy is neither more nor less complete than then.
> If the status which is being ascribed to the Dominion by some of its representatives had really been attained the Canadian Government would not now be protesting to the Government of Great Britain, as is the case, but would be acting independently. The fact that Canadian delegates were successful in becoming signatories to the Peace Treaty and obtaining for Canada the right, now disputed, of voting in the League Assembly does not alter the position of Canada as a Dominion under the British Sovereign. Canada cannot be dependent one day and independent another.

Then the article concludes—and this brings on the question of how much public opinion there is on this question:

Moreover, the Canadian people are not worrying one way or the other in regard to their right of representation in the League of Nations. They have shown a strictly detached and dispassionate interest in the matter and have shown no disposition to be what is called "het up"——

That is the Gazette's word, not mine.

Here is a bouquet for my hon. friends:

They know that those who mixed up the League Covenant with the Peace Treaty made a miserable mess of both, and they are by no means certain that the League will function with or without their vote. They are inclined to think that the success of the League will be more a question of commonsense than of voting rights and contracts.

Again I say, if there is to be a quarrel between the United States and ourselves, why, we have to stand for this Dominion in regard to the League of Nations, even if it seems an undesirable thing. It is a bad thing for neighbours and friends to quarrel, bad under any circumstances; but when the neighbours quarrel about some silly thing of no earthly importance, then the quarrel becomes very foolish. The President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) may not desire to be so; but whether he is conscious of this or not, his speeches lately have had a tendency to make trouble between the United States and Canada. If we are to have any row between the United States and Canada, I should like it to be about something important; I do not want to have a row with the United States over this petty question of whether or not we shall have a seat in the Assembly of the League of Nations. I do not think that is important enough to fight about; but if our American friends want to insist upon making it an issue between us, I suppose we have all to stand for Canada.

I contend that by the insistence upon these claims for Canada, harm has been done; no good has come to Canada; you give Canada no status in reality that she did not have before; you accomplish nothing for Canada; but you make trouble between Canada and the United States; you make trouble between Canada and Great Britain. I have at hand a quotation which shows that in this action there is, in all probability, a source of trouble for Great Britain. I hold in my hand a statement made by Mr. Henry White, one of the American members of the Peace Conference. Recently, he made at Washington to Senator Hitchcock, a statement which I read from the New York Times:

Henry White, a member of the American peace delegation, who recently returned to the United States, called to-day upon Senator Hitchcock and told him in detail of conditions in Europe. Mr. White emphasized the seriousness of the question raised by the Lenroot reservation on voting strength in the League of Nations Assembly. He told Mr. Hitchcock that in his opinion this reservation, which is number 14 in the Lodge group, is a very grave menace to the solidarity of the league. Mr. White explained how the British self-governing dominions, demanded of Great Britain her support of their claims to the right of independent representation, and how they would protest and oppose any effort by this country to disfranchise them. That is what the Lenroot reservation would do, in Mr. White's opinion.

He indicated that the British Government was not particularly concerned over this reservation on its own account,——

And remember that the writer of the article is reporting his conversation:

——but that the colonies raised such a clamour about it that Premier Lloyd George had been forced to take cognizance of their position, and to support it, as he did in his recent speech in the House of Commons.

Mr. White confirmed previous reports that there is little concern in Europe, particularly in France, concerning other American reservations, but the Lenroot provision is much more formidable as a bar to compromise than the Article X reservation, in his opinion.

So we have the claim of Canada a source of trouble between Canada and the United States, and this clearly shows that it is a source of trouble between Canada and the Mother Country. For these reasons, it is to be regretted that we ever made the claim for a seat in the Assembly which would be no good to us if we had it and which, I think, would not be in any way to the advantage of Canada.

It may be thought that it is only in Canada that dissent is expressed from this claim. I happen, however, to have found in my reading of the public press that the unwisdom—I do not think the word is too strong—of the Dominions making the claim has made an impression elsewhere. I hold in my hand a clipping from Wellington, New Zealand, which reads:

The Wellington Times urges that the Dominions should declare unequivocally against an apparently indefensible position which is not wanted and which those to whom it does injustice object. Such a declaration would splendidly disavow a policy of "grab all."

Another New Zealand paper, The Post, says:

Actually there is little cause of quarrel, since the real power of the League is vested in the Council where Great Britain and America have equal votes, without the Dominions' interference. The Dominions abandoned the substance for the shadow when they accepted votes in the Assembly instead of insisting upon an effective voice in the Council where the real work will be done. The Post urges that the Dominions should reconsider the matter, which is exceptionally delicate and difficult for the Imperial authorities, compelling them to defend a position which is not of their devising, which is formally indefensible and which gives the opponents of the Treaty a powerful handle while, as usual, not the Dominions, but Great Britain must bear the brunt.

Therefore, this claim of Canada has had the effect of creating trouble in many quarters, and trouble to no good end. I regret for those reasons that the minister has attached so much importance to it. I do not think there is anything in the situation which warrants us in getting up a row with the Americans on this question.

The President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) told us that we must do one of two things—shall I say? one of three things: We must recede to the old colonial condition, (although if he were asked to define the day on which that colonial condition ceased and some new condition came into existence, he would have difficulty in doing so); or we must go towards independence; or we must do something else which I have difficulty in defining. With regard to receding to the old colonial condition, nobody proposes anything of the kind. With regard to independence, my hon. friend says—and I am quite sure he is speaking sincerely—that he has no sympathy with the move for independence, and I am in hearty accord with him in that regard. I have said so before, and I hold that view now. But I must tell him that since Canada put forward a claim to a position in the Conference separate and apart from the British Empire, from that day there began to be a discussion in regard to independence in Canada. It is this assertion of a right, separate and apart from Great Britain, that has led men to-day to talk of separation and independence who did not talk about that subject before. I am afraid the matter goes further; I am afraid there is talk of treating Canada as a party separate from the British nation in her authority and power, and I am afraid it leads to wider talk of worse evils even than independence. With regard to the colonial condition of the past, we know that nobody wants it. With regard to independence, I have no sympathy with it; I am heartily against it; but I can at all events understand what it means, and I can go even so far as to admire the man who argues in favour of it as there is legitimate ground for his argument. But I do not know what my hon. friend means when he speaks about our going forward in a line of some constitutional development; I do not know what he wants, and we have the right to ask him what he means. I do not know of any grievances that Canada has. I do not know what we have to complain of. If my hon. friend knows of any grievance that Canada has which needs a remedy he ought to bring it forward in this House. Half a dozen hon. members in this debate have said to the Government that before they go to any Imperial Conference they should receive a mandate from this House. Well, we have had no motion made in that direction by the ministers, and I do not indulge the hope that they will give us the opportunity for giving any mandate in this matter. I do not think they will bring anything forward, for the good reason that they do not know themselves what they want. There is no grievance, nothing that we want to remedy. I do say that when hon. gentlemen talk about some great change which is to be brought about by the coming Imperial Conference I cannot understand what they mean, and I think that before we go any further in this matter we ought to have, perhaps not at this moment in the debate, some declaration from the ministers as to what change they want, and what they are prepared to recommend to the coming Imperial Conference.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council): May I first express my appreciation of the action of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in placing upon Hansard to-day so large a portion of an address which I delivered in the city of Montreal a few years ago? I desire to express not only my appreciation of the fact that he has placed that upon Hansard, but my still greater appreciation of his statement that not only he but all his followers heartily agree with the sentiments of that address. We have therefore, Mr. Speaker, the statement of the leader of the Opposition that he spoke not only for himself but for all the men on the other side of the House when he said that the statements I then made, and which I have repeated in the course of this debate, with reference to Canada's status had the unanimous support of the Liberals who are back of him. They certainly have the unanimous support of the Liberals on this side of the House as well as of the Conservatives. I am therefore in the happy position of being able to voice the unanimous sentiment of the whole House on this important question. My hon. friend in quoting from that address referred to it as an address upon our constitutional development. The address —my hon. friend has a copy in his hand—is an address on "Liberals and the Empire." It was a review of the part the Liberal party had taken in various important events in connection with the Empire. It is true that when it was issued by the Reform Association Publicity Branch, they put upon the face of it that it was a constitutional review, but the title of the address, which indicates its character, was "Liberals and the Empire," and it only professes to trace the share that Liberals had taken in our constitutional development. The address did not attempt to review the part taken by both parties in these great events, but in dealing with the history of Confederation I did refer to the great work of Sir John Macdonald. My hon. friend entirely omitted this reference in his quotations to-day.

It is not my intention to follow my hon. friend through the course of his address. I shall make only one or two further observations with regard to it, and shall then refer to the remarks of my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). With the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) I must confess that we on this side of the House could not but feel profoundly gratified at the stand taken by the leader of the Opposition to-day. It was a complete reversal of the stand taken by the leaders of the Opposition when the German Treaty came before the House. It is true that my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's in his speech to-night has harped back to the same old position that he took before, differing therein very markedly from the leader of the Opposition; but so far as the leader of the Opposition is concerned, he took entirely different ground from that taken by hon. gentlemen opposite when the German Treaty was debated last September, and if the address I delivered some seven years ago has contributed to the conversion of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and the members on the other side of the House to a recognition of the status of Canada within the Empire, it has proved one of the most effective addresses I have ever delivered. I am proud of the result. My hon. friend this afternoon instead of taking the position which was taken in the debate last September, that we were not a nation, said, "Oh, yes, we are a nation, but we became a nation many years ago. Sir Wilfrid Laurier made us a nation." Now if he will turn to the address I delivered in this House on the Treaty last September and to the one I delivered here last Thursday, he will see that I drew attention to the fact that Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1897 had claimed for Canada the status of a nation. I emphasized that in September as I emphasized it on Thursday last——

Mr. BELAND: Not very loudly.

Mr. ROWELL: —to show not only my appreciation of his great work but also how far my hon. friends on the other side had backslidden from the position which Sir Wilfrid Laurier took. I emphasized it in the hope that they might be brought up to date on this question, or at least as far as the position taken by Sir Wilfrid Laurier fifteen or twenty years ago. This is not a question of who is or who is not entitled to credit for our present position, and I shall not discuss it from that standpoint. We are considering a great fact in our country's history, and I think it is important enough to give all parties who have contributed to the result some share of the credit in connection with it. One cannot but contrast the position taken by the leader of the Opposition this afternoon with the position taken by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition paid a tribute this afternoon to the work of the Prime Minister and his colleagues at the Peace Conference. He said they had carried forword the work of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that they had maintained Canada's position, and maintained it magnificently, and he added that if they had not done so, they would have been derelict in their duty. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's rose in his place and said: The whole thing was a farce, the Prime Minister and his colleagues should not have gone over to Paris.

What is the position of my hon. friends opposite on this Treaty? Do they stand for Canada and her rights as a nation, not outside but within the British Empire, or do they take the position of my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's who, while he is opposed to centralization, proposes to leave the handling of our affairs in vital matters to the Government of Great Britain.

Mr. FIELDING: He never said so.

Mr. ROWELL: Then, what did he say? He said that being present at the Conference was a farce, that Canada had no special interest there, and that the Prime Minister and his colleagues had no right to be there. My hon. friend will not question that I am fairly stating his position.

Mr. FIELDING: I would not say they had no right to be there. I said it was no good to have them there, and was a disadvantage to Canada.

Mr. ROWELL: Then, it was a disadvantage to Canada to have them there, there was nothing of vital interest to Canada there? Well, Mr. Speaker, if the events in Europe were of such importance that Canada raised 600,000 men to help—

Mr. COPP: Oh, let up on that.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend says: "Let up on that." Perhaps he does not like to hear about it.

Mr. COPP: If my hon. friend is alluding to me, and will allow me—

Mr. ROWELL: No, my hon. friend may keep his seat and not interrupt. I was answering the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's who said it was not a matter of interest to Canada to have the Prime Minister and his colleagues at the Peace Conference. I say that if the issues in that war were of sufficient interest to Canada to call upon us to raise 600,000 men and to leave 60,000 lying buried in France and Flanders, they were important enough for Canada to be represented at the Conference in an effort to secure a just and satisfactory settlement.

It is my desire to take issue with the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's in the most clear and emphatic manner on his whole conception of Canada's position and status in the British Empire and in matters that are of vital concern to Canada. I agree with the leader of the Opposition that not only would the Prime Minister and his colleagues have been derelict in their duty if they had not maintained our position, but they would have been even more derelict if they had wholly failed to attend the Peace Conference when matters of such vast importance to Canada were under consideration. Did not my hon. friend from Queen's and Shelburne (Mr. Fielding) to-night speak of the obligations imposed on Canada under this Treaty? And my hon. friend the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) drew the attention of the House to the matter of our obligations under the Treaty. I shall not at present discuss these obligations, but if they are anything like as important as the hon. member for Queen's and Shelburne has suggested to-night, was it not the duty of the Prime Minister and his colleagues to be at the conference with a view to protecting the interests of Canada? Undoubtedly it was, and they were there in pursuance of that duty. My hon. friend says that this question of Canada's status in the League is of no importance to Canada. He says that it is of no importance to her to have a voice in the Assembly, and that she will never have any chance of being elected to the Council. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not to-night intend entering upon a discussion as to the chances of Canada's being elected to the Council of the League. My hon. friend has characterized as absurd the idea that she might be elected. I shall only say that our position in regard to the governing body of the International Labour Organizations is precisely the same as that in connection with the Council of the League. There were eight powers named who were entitled to nominate members of the governing body and only four other nations were to be chosen and elected from all the nations of the world to name the remaining four members; Canada, at the very first meeting of the conference was elected as one of the nations entitled to name a member to the governing body. Therefore, notwithstanding any suggestions which my hon. friend may make to the contrary, there is no absurdity whatever in the idea that Canada might some day be elected to the Council of the League, the election of Canada at the Washington Conference indicates the fine standing which this country enjoys among the nations of the world. My hon. friend has referred to the discussions that are going on in Washington, and has been good enough to suggest that the remarks which I have made have not contributed to a good understanding between Canada and the United States. I beg respectfully to differ from him, they were made to avoid misunderstandings and to maintain a good understanding. I doubt very much whether the remarks which that hon. gentleman made either in the discussion of the Treaty with Germany last September or in the present debate will contribute to a good understanding between the two nations, or will aid in securing just recognition of Canada's position in the United States. I hold in my hand the Congressional Record of the Senate debates of the present week, and I find quoted therein a statement made by my hon. friend when this question was under discussion in September last. I find it quoted by the opponents in the Senate of Canada's position and as a justification for their action. In the course of the discussion, as appears on page 4307, of the Congressional Record of Monday, March 8, the following statement appears, by Mr. McCormick:

> Mr. McCORMICK: Mr. President, let me ask the Senator one more question. Does he recall the speech in the Canadian House of Commons of Mr. Fielding, for 16 years a Minister of the Crown, in which he stated explicitly that logic was on the side of the contention of those in this country who insisted upon an equality of representation, in which he said that New York was more important to this Republic than the Dominion to the Empire? Surely the Senator will recall that speech.

If my hon. friend was right there would be no ground of criticism of his position. But I say he is not right, and it is just such speeches as that which he made in September and the speech he has made to-night that will be used against Canada in her effort to retain her position in the League. My hon. friend employed an illustration which is also quoted in the American senate; He compared Canada with the State of New York. It is very easy for our friends in the United States to fall into an error in connection with the situation, and I think their attitude in some respects is due to a misunderstanding—a misunderstanding materially contributed to by my hon. friend and others in reviewing the situation. Every one realizes that the British Empire bears no relation in its constitution to the United States of America. In the United States there is one government, the federal government, that conscripts men, levies taxation and carries on war. The edicts of that government run through every state in the American Union. It is the only government within the limits of the United States that has any authority to exercise these great powers. There is but one central government in the United States that wages war and makes peace. There can be only one member of the League and therefore only one vote. What is the situation in the British Empire? It is wholly different. No one government in the Empire wages war, conscripts men, levies taxation and negotiates peace. In the British Empire half a dozen governments exercise these functions. Canada did not act by reason of any law or edict of the Imperial Government, but on her own authority by the action of this Parliament, just as freely as the United States Congress and Senate acted when they undertook participation in the war. And I say it tends to mislead, not only the people of the United States but the people of Canada, to make any such comparison as my hon. friend made. As there are several self-governing nations in the British Empire each is a member of the League and each is entitled to a vote. I was also surprised at the remarks of my hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Béland) in his reference to the terms of the Treaty and certain matters in connection with the boundary, remarks which met with the approval of the hon. member for Queen's and Shelburne. I do not suppose that any statesman present at the conference other than the representatives of the Balkan States, would be able to form any definite opinion in regard to the exact boundary, but the representatives of Canada would know just as much about the subject as the representatives of the United States. It is not a question whether they knew the exact boundaries or not. It is a question of making peace with a country with which we were at war. My hon. friend has referred to the Balkans as if it were a place in which we were not interested. Well, the Balkans do appear to be remote from us, but it was trouble there in June and July of 1914 that set the world aflame and called forth the troops of Canada and other parts of the Empire to Europe to wage war. And unless the Balkan situation is cleared up on a basis of justice and equity, by the best solution that the nations can devise, who can tell how soon trouble in the Balkans may again produce the same results and call forth our troops once more? I desire to dissent absolutely from the position and attitude of my hon. friend that a controversy which called Canada's sons to war and may do so again, is not a matter in the wise and sane solution of which the people of Canada are interested. My hon. friend from Beauce—and this also touches the point raised by the hon. member for Brantford—spoke of the provisions of the Treaty and stated that it was quite clear that Canada would not be entitled to be present and have a vote in the Council of the League in the event of the question of military contribution being under consideration. My hon. friend from Brantford wanted to know how the question of a military contribution would be settled. I desire to direct his attention to two important provisions of the Treaty.

In Article 16 this clause appears:

> It shall be the duty of the Council in such case to recommend to the several governments concerned what effective military, naval or air force the members of the League shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the Covenants of the League.

It is the duty of the Council to recommend to the several governments. If my hon. friend will turn to Article 4 of the League, he will find this provision:

> Any member of the League not represented on the Council shall be invited to send a representative to sit as a member at any meeting of the Council during the consideration of matters specially affecting the interests of that member of the League.

It is set forth in language so plain that no one could mistake it that if the Council is called upon to consider a matter affecting the interest of any member of the League, that member must be present and is entitled to a seat. I should not have thought that the matter was open to argument at all. But in order to remove any doubt or apprehension from the mind of my hon. friend, I would like to draw his attention to a commentary on the Covenant of the League of Nations contained in an official document issued by the Government of Great Britain. This official commentary was prepared by the Rt. Hon. Lord Robert Cecil, K.C.M.G. and Lieut. General the Rt. Hon. Ian Christian Smuts, K.C., the two men, from the standpoint of the British Empire, who had more to do with framing this Covenant than any other two men and probably had considerably more to do with framing its general outlines than the President of the United States, although there were certain provisions which the President considered essential, and he was no doubt very largely responsible for their being included, particularly, Article 10. What do they say in their commentary on this article?

In the first instance, it is left to individual states to decide whether or not such a breach has occurred and an act of war against the League been thereby committed. . . . . It is the duty of the Council, with the help of its military, naval and air advisers to recommend what effective force each member of the League shall supply; for this purpose, each member from which a contribution is required has a right to attend the Council, with the power of veto during the consideration of its particular case.

I should have thought that that was quite clear without that commentary. I should have thought that that was the proper legal interpretation of the Covenant, but when you have that interpretation, which appears to be the fair, reasonable and proper interpretation in a commentary issued by the British Government, prepared by the two men who are responsible for the framing of the Covenant and which sets out in unmistakable terms the rights of any member who may be called upon to make a contribution to be present, to vote and to exercise the right of veto, I submit that the matter is not open to serious argument. It appears then that no nation can be called upon to make a military contribution without the consent of that nation given at the Council and with its representative present.

As far as Canada is concerned, she cannot be called upon to make any contribution unless her Parliament authorizes it and her representative at the Council approves of it.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: If that is the case why does the United States think it necessary to make the reservation I have just read as it has done with reference to Clause 10? The Senate of the United States evidently think that they will be called upon to make a contribution without being consulted under the terms of the Treaty.

Mr. ROWELL: I do not think it would be proper for me to express an opinion upon the reasons or motives which may have actuated the American Senate in adopting any particular resolution. The President of the United States did not think the reservation necessary, nor did his supporters in the House, when they considered it. The majority on the other side did, and now a sufficient number of votes in the Senate is apparently forthcoming to give the Republicans a majority in favour of the reservation that my hon. friend has referred to. I do not think it is desirable for us in this House to enter into a discussion of the reasons or motives which may have impelled them to take that action.

Mr. BELAND: Has the commentary from which my hon. friend quoted been distributed to the members of the House?

Mr. ROWELL: It was printed for distribution last session.

Mr. FIELDING: I presume it never in any way received the assent of the other nations?

Mr. ROWELL: I do not suppose it did.

Mr. FIELDING: Therefore, it might be debatable from their point of view.

Mr. ROWELL: It is only a commentary but I have never heard any serious question raised as to that being the proper interpretation. The President of the United States gave the same answer when he was asked by the Foreign Relations Committee as to the interpretation he would put upon the clause. As far as I am aware that is the interpretation put upon it by all the statesmen present at the Peace Conference.

It is not important and I should not take up the time of the House in discussing the matter, but my hon. friend referred to Sir George Perley suggesting that he had signed the Treaty without having read it. The answer is here on record already that the principal terms of the Treaty were settled while the Prime Minister and his colleagues were in England although the final form and execution were delayed pending the completion of negotiations for the German and Austrian treaties.

My hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Beland) put what he considered to be a poser when he asked what would happen in case one of the nations of the Empire did not desire to ratify the Treaty. It would depend entirely on the conditions under which such a question arose. My hon. friend, if he will recall the facts in connection with our history and our foreign relations, will realize that it is quite a common thing for Great Britain to sign a treaty on her own behalf and not on behalf of the self-governing Dominions. It is quite a common thing for her to ratify a treaty on her own behalf and not on behalf of her Dominions. I have in my desk one of those treaties, which will come before the House. That is the International Opium Convention. That was signed in 1912 but Canada did not have a plenipotentiary present to sign it. The Treaty is signed by the British representatives with the reservation of the following declaration:

> The article of the present Convention, if ratified by His Britannic Majesty's Government, shall apply to the Government of British India, Ceylon, the Straits Settlements, Hong Kong, and Wei-hai Wei in every respect in the same way as they shall apply to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; but His Britannic Majesty's Government reserve the right of signing or denouncing separately the said convention in the name of any dominion, colony, dependency, or protectorate of His Majesty other than those which have been specified.

The situation would not be a new or novel one if this House declined to approve of an international obligation entered into by the British Empire, even if His Majesty decided to ratify in respect of Great Britain, or in respect of Great Britain and the Dominions that approved it, but did not ratify it in respect of Canada because Canada did not approve. Surely the situation is not difficult to comprehend and I do not understand all this argument which has been addressed to us in reference to the difficulties of such a situation.

Mr. BELAND: That is not the point. The point is that the Prime Minister said that if we did not assent we would no longer be considered a part of the British Empire

Mr. ROWELL: I said in opening it would depend entirely on the conditions under which it arose. If my hon. friend will read the whole statement made by the Prime Minister I think it is reasonably clear from his statement that this was his view. It depends entirely upon the conditions. We might take action under such conditions that we would be virtually declaring ourselves a separate nation of the Empire, but that would not normally be the result as I have pointed out in the case of this particular contention. My recollection is that the Japanese Treaty was in this form, that it did not bind the Dominions until they had expressly assented to it; and that after it had been ratified by His Majesty in respect of Great Britain it was subsequently approved by this House and ratified with respect to Canada. It is not a new matter, it is not a difficult matter. All the troubles that my hon. friends are conjuring up are figments of a somewhat disturbed imagination. They are not serious when you look the situation squarely in the face and recognize our constitutional development and the position in which we stand to-day.

I must say that I could not quite reconcile the statement of the leader of the Opposition, supported by the hon. member for Beauce, that there was danger of some occult centralizing imperialistic influence at work to destroy our autonomy, and the statement of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) that this Government was proceeding along the lines which were disrupting the British Empire. The two statements cannot be correct.

Mr. BELAND: I do not know.

Mr. ROWELL: The truth is, neither is correct.

Mr. McMASTER: Might I ask a question? Is the President of the Privy Council unaware that for some years past an organization, with branches throughout the British Empire, has been busily engaged devising schemes for centralization; also that a very intelligent man has been spending years of his life going around propagating this idea and that a considerable amount of money has been expended in connection with it.

Mr. ROWELL: I am aware of it, but I might ask, has he converted my hon. friend to his views?

Mr. McMASTER: No, decidedly not, and I hope that he has not met any more success with other people. However, there has been the attempt. That is the point made by the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. BELAND: And some progress made.

Mr. ROWELL: If the gentleman in question has not met with any success in the case of my hon. friend he has not met with any greater success in my case.

Mr. McMASTER: I am a good Grit, it is hard in such a matter to make a success with me.

Mr. ROWELL: Perhaps it is not fair to allude to my hon. friend in that connection because he did, at the last session, offer the conspicuous example of a member of the Opposition who supported the views of the Government in reference to Canada's position. Therefore my remarks do not apply to the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). I am very glad to see that the rest of the hon. gentlemen opposite have got back to the good Liberal position on Canada's status stated in my address of seven years ago and re-stated in my address on this Treaty, and which I found when I entered the Government was the good Conservative position also. I found that the Prime Minister and his Conservative colleagues were just as strong in maintaining Canada's right to full autonomy and self-government and her status within the British Empire as any Liberals with whom I have been associated. I found we were all agreed on that issue, and that has made our association in this important work in connection with Treaties of Peace of the most harmonious kind.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWELL: And even my hon. friend (Mr. Lapointe) to-day comes in behind our position supporting it and standing for that idea. "While the lamp holds out to burn" —there is an opportunity for my hon. friend.

Mr. BUREAU: We will be standing with the leader of the Opposition long after you are gone.

Mr. ROWELL: Then my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) said that we were not only creating some trouble between the United States and ourselves but there was danger of our creating trouble between Great Britain and ourselves. I was interested in the authority my hon. friend was quoting for that statement. Where did he go to get authority for the statement that we were creating trouble between Canada and Great Britain? My hon. friend went to one of the plenipotentiaries of the United States. The hon. gentleman by his position not only gives comfort to those who are opposing Canada's status, but he draws his inspiration from a representative of the United States not from a representative of Canada or Great Britain to attack our position here. If my hon. friend wants to find out the position of the British Government, there is no difficulty in doing so from the members of the British Government themselves. No man could have made a clearer statement, of the necessity and determination of the British Government to stand behind Canada in maintaining her status than did Lord Grey in that famous letter of his, in which he said that there could be no departure from the principle of the representation of the Dominions.

My hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's said he could understand what was meant by independence—he did not agree with that view but he could understand what it meant. He also said that he could quite understand what the old colonial relation meant—he did not agree with that view either but he could understand it. He did not, however, understand what we meant by the present position, the wonderful things that were to be accomplished at this constitutional conference. Well, I did not say that any wonderful things were going to be accomplished at the Constitutional Conference, and I do not think it is difficult to understand the position which this Government takes, which the Government of Great Britain takes, and which the Government of each of the self-governing Dominions takes as the present constitutional relations of the different nations of the Empire. It is this: Although the self-governing Dominions have had the rights of self-government for a long period they have occupied a more or less dependent relation to the Mother Country. They have been steadily growing more independent of the Mother Country in the sense that they have been exercising a larger measure of sovereignty over their own affairs, and the time has come when the Mother says to these Daughter States: "Well, you have been in a measure dependent upon me in the past. I now recognize you as my equals. We stand on an equality as nations of the British family of nations" or "the galaxy of British nations," as Sir Wilfrid Laurier termed it. Is that difficult to understand? A father may have his boys with him in business. They may not be partners although they may be managing various branches of it. The time comes when the father says "I will take you into partnership. You shall be equal with me in your status in the business, although you may not have as much interest, you may not have as much power." The father may retain the majority interest in the business but the sons are partners, they have the status of partners, there is an equality of status. That illustrates the idea although of course it is not an analogy because you cannot apply the same rule to states. I only used the illustration as indicating what is meant by equality of status. What is the object of a Constitutional Conference? It is to provide improved machinery for consultation and co-operation in matters of common concern. Up to this present time Great Britain has been acting as trustee for all the other nations of the Empire in almost all matters of foreign policy. The time has come when actual participation in matters of foreign policy affecting the Dominions should be enjoyed by the Dominions, and some method of co-operation and consultation must be worked out to this end.

Mr. Speaker, the position of the Government is clear and unequivocal. I thought the position of the Opposition was also clear and unequivocal when my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, defined it this afternoon, but it has become somewhat clouded by the speeches delivered to-night. However, I would rather close the debate under the impression that the leader of the Opposition did speak for all his followers, and that the remarks made this evening which differed from his were but temporary lapses. I am glad to think that the House is unanimous in support of this resolution and of the principles embodied in it as set forth by me when I moved the resolution on Thursday last.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. ROWELL: Mr. Speaker, I beg to move:

That a message be sent to the Senate informing their Honours that this House has adopted a resoluion approving the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Bulgaria, signed at Neuilly-sur-Seine on the 27th day of November, 1919, and requesting that their Honours will unite with this House in approval of said Treaty by filling up the blank therein with the words "Senate and."

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Sir George Foster the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Wednesday, March 17, 1920.

The House met at Two o'clock.

PETITIONS FROM WAR VETERANS.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to present to the House petitions from the United Veterans' League, largely signed, praying for certain legislation to be enacted in reference to returned soldiers.

PATENTS OF INVENTION.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 19 to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to patents of invention.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CIVIL SERVICE RE-CLASSIFICATION.

Mr. ETHIER:

Is it the intention of the Government to authorize and apply the provisions of the re-classification of the Civil Service, on the 1st of April, 1920, which has been prepared by American efficiency experts appointed therefor and under the direction of the Civil Service Commission; or is it the intention of the Government to reconsider and revise the said re-classification?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: The re-classification is now in process of being applied and it is anticipated the work will be completed shortly.

BRITISH COLUMBIA FISH.

Mr. PECK:

What was the amount and value of fish caught in British Columbia during the year 1919 according to districts, in the following classifications: (a) salmon; (b) halibut; (c) other fish?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

Quantity of fish and value in British Columbia, 1919.

	Quantity cwts.	Value.
Southern district:
Salmon	227,206	$2,483,897
Halibut	32,051	420,832
Other fish	98,619	509,242
Northern district:
Salmon	759,036	4,744,939
Halibut	155,315	1,911,648
Other fish	56,023	126,847
Vancouver Island:
Salmon	538,783	3,691,123
Halibut	2,761	33,748
Other fish	628,105	991,688

The values are those to fishermen at the boat's side.

RURAL MAIL ROUTES.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. How many rural mail routes were established during the year 1919?
2. How many rural mail routes have been established up to the present in 1920?
3. What is the average per mile and per subscriber rate for the delivery of rural mail under new contracts?
4. What is the present policy in regard to the establishment of new rural mail routes?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. 34.
2. 3.
3. (a) $38.89 per mile per annum—calculated on the basis of service performed six times a week. (b) $14.09 per annum for each subscriber.
4. The Postmaster General has considered it advisable in view of the financial conditions existing at present and the increase in the prices asked for the performance of rural mail delivery service, to put aside for a time the applications for new routes. When circumstances will permit further extensions of the rural mail system the petitions for new services will receive consideration.

WHARF AT STE. ANNE DE BEAUPRE.

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is the Government aware that a certain contract was awarded to one Poliquin, to build a wharf at Ste. Anne de Beaupré, in the County of Montmorency?
2. Is the Government aware that the said work was to be fully and satisfactorily completed on or before the 6th instant?
3. Has the said work been finished accordingly?
4. If not, why?
5. When does the Government expect the work to be completed?

Hon. J. D. REID:

1. Yes.
2. No; date of completion is 31st July, 1920.
3. Answered by answer to No. 2.
4 and 5. When the contract was awarded the season was so far advanced that the contractor was unable to secure necessary timber. Work should be completed by August 1st next.

QUEBEC & SAGUENAY RAILWAY.

Mr CASGRAIN:

1. How many pasengers have been carried by the Quebec and Saguenay Railway since the 1st of October, 1919, to date?
2. What have been the net earnings of the Quebec and Saguenay since the 1st of October to date?

Hon. J. D. REID:

1. 14,273.
2. Deficit, $9,648.72.

[Mr. Ballantyne.]

ARMY BOOTS AND SHOES.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

1. How many pairs of army boots and shoes had the Government on hand at the date of the Armistice?
2. What was the initial cost of same?
3. How many pairs have since been sold or otherwise disposed of?
4. How much was realized from these sales?

Hon Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. Boots, 125,894 pairs; shoes, 188,355 pairs.
2. Boots, $674,358.65; shoes, $322,331.24.
3. Boots, 175,971; shoes, 161,906.
4. Boots, $879,840; shoes, $175,714.40. All these sales were made through the War Purchasing Commission.

NAVAL SERVICE AWARDS.

Mr. STEVENS:

Having regard to the following clause in the report of the Parliamentary Committee on Re-establishment:

"That members of the Naval Service who have served overseas in either Imperial or Canadian naval services or who have served in any seagoing ship in the Canadian Naval Service, outside of the three-mile territorial limit, shall be awarded the Class 'A' badge with 'Naval' or suitable words in place of 'C.E.F.'"

1. Have such badges been issued?
2. If not, by whose advice or instructions has the above recommendation been disregarded?
3. Will the Government take immediate steps to see that the Naval authorities comply with the report of the Parliamentary Committee which was approved by Parliament?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1, 2 and 3. The quotation mentioned in this inquiry is not the recommendation of the Committee. The recommendation was that "the suggestion should receive the immediate attention of the Government." The Naval Department, after consultation with the Militia Department, considered that the badge for naval service should be distinctive from the military badge.

C.E.F.—OFFICERS.

Mr. d'ANJOU:

What are the names of all the officers of the Canadian Overseas Forces who are at present employed at Militia Headquarters and who have been overseas but who have not seen active service at the front?

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE:

List of Officers employed at Militia Headquarters who were on the strength of the Overseas Military Forces of Canada, but did not see service in France: Major-General Ashton, E. C., C.M.G., Lieut. Bawden, F. H., Major Dickinson, F. R., Captain Dunne, H M., Captain Guest, F., Captain Holmes, A. W., Captain Kelly, P., Captain Melvin, J. P., Hon. Captain McKinley, J. F., Lt.-Colonel McCoy, S. H., Captain Nesbitt, C. H. F., Lieut. Shouldis, G.

MILITARY DEFAULTERS.—FINES.

Mr. MARCILE (Bagot):

1. Has the Government arrived at an understanding with the Quebec Government relative to fines paid by the defaulters of the Military Service Act?

2. If not, is it the intention of the Government to give instructions authorizing the Quebec Government to remit said fines to those who have paid them?

Rt. Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Yes. So far as these fines have been received by the Province, they are to be returned to the Dominion.

2. Answered by No. 1.

RE-CLEANED SCREENINGS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

1. Did the Department of Agriculture contract for the purchase of the whole or any portion of re-cleaned screenings from grain at the grain elevators during the years of 1918 and 1919?

2. If so, what was the price paid per ton for same and at what price was it resold by the department?

3. What was the profit or loss to the department on the transaction?

4. Was it ground or unground when disposed of?

5. What was the weed seed contents of these screenings as found by analysis or investigations made by the department from time to time?

6. Have any measures been adopted to safeguard the purchasers of such screenings from the poisonous effects resulting from the feeding of such screenings and the distribution of noxious weed seeds?

7. Did Mr. C. Rice Jones, general manager of the United Grain Growers' Company state, on June 27, 1919, in evidence given before the special committee of Parliament, known as the Cost of Living Committee, that the average price of screening for the three years before the war was $4.91 per ton, and that the average price per ton for the past six years, including 1918, was $8.84?

8. Is the practice of distributing unground grain screenings still in effect? If not, when did it cease?

Hon. Mr. TOLMIE:

1. In November, 1917, the department contracted with the terminal elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur for the purchase of all re-cleaned screenings (passing a set standard) for the crop year ending August, 1918. Later the contract was renewed to cover similar screenings from the crop year ending August, 1919.

2. Purchase price was thirty-five ($35) dollars per ton unground in elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur for the entire periods mentioned. Selling price to consumers was, from commencement until August 1, 1918, thirty-five dollars ($35) per ton f.o.b. Fort William, unground in bulk. August 1 to December 31, 1918, thirty-five dollars and fifty cents ($35.50) per ton f.o.b. Fort William, unground in bulk. January 1, 1919, to January 31, 1919, thirty-six dollars ($36) per ton f.o.b. Fort William, unground in bulk. February 1, 1919, to July 1, 1919, twenty-five dollars ($25) per ton f.o.b. Fort William, unground in bulk. July 1 to end of period, twenty-six ($26) per ton f.o.b. Fort William, unground in bulk.

3. Total loss to date, $96,446.29.

4. Material was disposed of both ground and unground at option of purchaser. When sold unground, purchaser invariably has made arrangements for grinding at local mill or elsewhere.

5. The botanical analysis of feed was as follows:

Broken and shrunken wheat ..	46.1	p.c.
Wild buckwheat	37.1	"
Wild oats..	8.6	"
Oats	1.0	"
Flax	0.1	"
Chaff..	5.65	"
Mustard	0.70	"
Other seeds	0.65	"

6. Apart from advocating to all purchasers of unground material the necessity of carefully grinding this feed and constant inspection by grain inspectors at Fort William and Port Arthur, no other measures have been adopted.

7. Have no knowledge.

8. No unground feed has been sold since August 15, 1919.

QUEBEC, ORIENTAL AND ATLANTIC RAILWAY.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

1. Has the management of the Canadian National Railways given any consideration to the acquisition of the Quebec, Oriental and Atlantic and the Quebec and Western Railways as part of the Canadian National Railway system, in view of the rapid development of business in the counties of Bonaventure and Gaspé?

2. If not, will they investigate the desirability of such acquisition?

Hon. J. D. REID:

1. No.

2. If matter is submitted to management it will be duly considered.

POSTMASTERS IN BONAVENTURE.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

1. How many postmasters have been appointed in Bonaventure county by the Civil Service Commission, and who are they?

2. How many of the said appointees are returned soldiers having served at the front and what are their names?

Rt. Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. (a) Thirteen postmasters have been appointed in Bonaventure county by the Civil Service Commission.

(b) Name and office: 1. Arsenault, Jos., Avignon; 2. Blois, B. W., New Carlisle; 3. Cyr, Ida K. (Miss), Maria; 4. Essiambre, Jean, Lagace; 5. Faure, Francisque, Milnikek; 6. Leblanc, Theophile, Black Cape; 7. Major, W. F., Hopetown; 8. Olscamp, Joseph, Restigouche; 9. Pike, Edith (Mrs.), Escuminac Flats; 10. Pitre, Wilfrid, Fauvel; 11. Poirier, Emilliene (Mrs.), St. Alphonse de Caplan; 12. Shaw, M. C. D. (Mrs.), Musselyville; 13. Theberge, J. A P., Milnikek, (abandoned the service August 27, 1919).

2. Three of these appointees are returned soldiers having served at the front, viz.: Faure, Francisque; Blois, Fletcher; Major, W. F. When the other ten civilians were appointed there were no qualified returned soldiers available.

ST. JOHN AND QUEBEC RAILROAD.

Mr. CALDWELL:

1. Has the Dominion Government made any agreement with the Government of New Brunswick whereby they will operate the St. John and Quebec Railroad between Centreville and Westfield Beach, in New Brunswick?

2. If so, what was the date of such agreement, and on what terms?

3. Did the Dominion Government make an agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to secure running rights for the said St. John and Quebec Railway trains over the said Canadian Pacific Railway between Westfield Beach and St. John?

4. If so, what was the date of such agreement and the terms?

5. And if the Dominion Government did not make such agreement, who did, and what are the terms?

6. Is the Dominion Government now operating the St. John and Quebec Railway as part of the Dominion Government Railway system?

Hon. J. D. REID:

1. An agreement was made between the Dominion Government and the province of New Brunswick and St. John and Quebec Railway.

2. Agreement dated November 9, 1916. The terms are as follows: The Government agreed to pay the St. John and Quebec Railway 40 per cent of the gross earnings.

3. No.

4. Answered by No. 4.

5. St. John and Quebec Railway Co. The terms are as follows: St. John and Quebec Railway Co., are to pay interest on a proportion of the value of the joint section plus a proportion of all working expenses calculated on a wheelage basis.

6. This line is being operated by the Canadian Government railways as part of the system.

CHAUDIERE STATION.

Mr. BOURASSA:

1. Is the Chaudière station, in the county of Lévis, under the control of the Government?

2. If so, is it aware that the station was burned over four years ago, and has been replaced by an unsanitary old freight car which is condemned by the Board of Health of the district of Quebec as being dangerous to the health of the employees and the public?

3. Does the Government propose to construct in the near future a station which will replace the one which has been destroyed?

Hon. J. D. REID:

1. Yes.

2. The railway is aware that the station was burned four years ago and that it has been replaced by a passenger car, but are not aware that it has been condemned by the Board of Health.

3. The railway does propose to construct a new station there but on account of the old building having been destroyed as a result of a collision, for which the Grand Trunk Railway was responsible, the question of the size and cost of the new station has been a matter of negotiation with the Grand Trunk and we expect to arrive at a definite understanding with them in the near future.

CANADIAN RAILWAY BOARD.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

1. Who compose the Canadian Railway War Board?

2. What are their respective salaries?

3. What was the total expense connected with this board during the calendar year 1919?

4. Is it the intention of the Government to dispense with the services of this board? If so, when?

Hon. J. D. REID:

The Canadian Railway War Board (known at its inception and for several months thereafter as the Canadian Railway Association for National Defence) was formed at a convention of executives of the Railways of Canada in the city of Montreal on October 23, 1917. The establishment of this organization was suggested by the Minister of Railways and Canals and had for its object the co-ordination of activities of the several railways to the end that the greatest degree of efficiency in the handling of troops, war supplies etc., would be accomplished. When peace was declared it was found that this organization was so beneficial that the railways decided to continue the organization under the name of the Railway Association of Canada. The expenses are borne by the different railways belonging to the organization, and the Government are under no expense in the matter.

INTERCOLONIAL PROVIDENT FUND.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

1. How much did the Department of Railways and Canals contribute during the last fiscal year to the Provident Fund of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways?
2. How many employees of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways were entitled, during the said fiscal year, to participate in this fund?
3. How much did the department contribute to each employee on an average?

Hon. J. D. REID:

1. During the fiscal year ended March 31, 1919, the Department of Railways and Canals contributed $100,000.
2. 12,223.
3. $8.18.

EIGHT-HOUR DAY—JURISDICTION.

Mr. EULER:

1. Is the Government still of the opinion that this Parliament has no power to enact legislation fixing the hours of labour?
2. If not, is it the intention of the Government to enact the eight-hour day during the present session?

Rt. Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Yes, unless such legislation should become necessary or proper for the purposes set forth in section 132 of the British North America Act.

2. The enactment of legislation is the function of Parliament. As to proposing legislation should such be called for under Article 132 above mentioned, the Government will announce its intention if and when that situation arises.

CIVIL SERVICE CLASSIFICATION.

Mr. FRIPP:

1. What are the names of the persons who prepared the classification of the Civil Service of Canada?
2. Where do they reside?
3. What has been their remuneration to date?
4. By whom were they engaged?
5. By whom recommended?
6. What is the period of their engagement?
7. When will their duties cease?

Rt. Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. The classification was prepared by the Civil Service Commission, assisted in a professional way by the firm of Arthur Young & Co., who assigned from time to time certain staff members to assist in the technical phases of the work.

2. Offices of the firm of Arthur Young & Co. are located in Chicago, New York, Ottawa, Milwaukee and Kansas City.

3. The firm of Arthur Young & Co. is compensated for its professional services through the payment of fees together with travelling and subsistence expenses for the staff members assigned. The total of these three items for technical assistance in the actual preparation of the classification amounts to $49,107.42.

4. The firm of Arthur Young & Co. was engaged by the Civil Service Commission in accordance with the Order in Council dated July 18, 1918 (P.C. 1778).

5. The firm was known by reputation to the Civil Service Commission as being the only one, not only in Canada but in the United States, which was equipped through experience and the necessary staff to undertake a commission of this sort.

6. No stated period.

7. As soon as the application of the classification is completed; this is estimated to be about May 1, 1920.

GREEK WHEAT CONTRACT.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the following article in "The Farmers' Sun" of February 14, 1920:

"GREEK WHEAT CONTRACT."

"The Greek wheat contract muddle in which Lloyd Harris, the Canadian Wheat Board and the Greek Government figure, may result in the Wheat Board being compelled to fulfil the contract entered into by Mr. Harris as Canadian Trade Commissioner, by which Greece received some 12,000,000 bushels of wheat at $2.47 per bushel.

"Prices are now at $3 and the Wheat Board claims that the contract was made for the amount of wheat at market prices.

"If the contract, which Mr. Harris upholds, is kept who will pay the fiddler? According to one prominent Toronto dealer, that is where the producers' participating certificates go up the chimney."

2. Is the contract mentioned to be fulfilled as to quantity and price in the terms stated in the above article?

3. If so, and a loss results, by whom is such loss to be borne?

Rt. Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

Mr. BUREAU: In connection with the series of questions which are now passed as orders for returns, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) if the returns, when they come down, will indicate how many of those in reference to whom information is sought are naturalized British subjects and how many are not.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am afraid it will be pretty difficult to get all the information that is asked for in the questions as they stand, and in asking them to stand as an order for a return, we only bind ourselves to bring down such information as we can get.

Mr. BUREAU: The status is an easy matter to get.

Mr. SPEAKER: There can be no supplementary question under the order of "Questions," and in any event the question must be answered as it is placed on the Order Paper. If the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) desires additional information he should put a specific question on the Order Paper.

Mr. BUREAU: It is just supplementary information.

Mr. SPEAKER: It must be a question of the hon. gentleman's own; he cannot alter the question put by another member.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY.

Mr. BUREAU asked:

1. Has any work been done on any of the lines enumerated in the Second Schedule of Chap. 13, 9 and 10 George V. being an Act to incorporate the Canadian National Railway Company and respecting Canadian National Railways?
2. If so, on what particular line has the work been done?
3. What kind of work has been done?
4. How much money has been expended for this work?

5. How much in construction? In surveys? In expropriations, and the purchase of the right of way?

6. How many station sites have been located on said lines, what is the name of each station and on what particular line?

7. What is the description of the land upon which it is located? How much was paid for said station site and who was representing the Government or the Canadian National Railways in negotiating the purchase?

8. If money were paid for any such sites, to what appropriation were they charged and on whose order were they paid?

9. Has any Order in Council been passed entrusting said Company with the management and operation of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Intercolonial Railways?

10. If so, what is the date of the Order in Council?

11. If not, why has not such an Order in Council been passed?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Stands as an order for a return.

Mr. BUREAU: May I be allowed to ask why?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is entirely at the option of the Government.

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask when I may expect the return to come down? That is one way of evading a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman should put that question on the Orders of the Day. Question stands as an order for a return.

RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF SOLDIERS.

MOTION BY MR. ANDREWS FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

Mr. G. W. ANDREWS (Centre Winnipeg) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the provision made for re-establishing in civil life the members of His Majesty's forces who served in the late war has in many cases proved inadequate, and that it is desirable that a special committee of this House be appointed to consider what provision can be made to meet such cases, the committee to have power to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath and to report from time to time.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it has been said that it is not so much what a man says as what he does that counts. Also, it has been said that by a man's service to his country his citizenship is proven. Also, "By their works ye shall know them." I do not claim that all the men who proceeded overseas were citizens of the highest possible type; they were not all plaster saints or high-born financiers, but I do claim that the great, overwhelming majority were amongst the best citizens of Canada prior to the war. Amongst them were the flower and youth of Canada. In spite of the fact that all were not possibly of the highest type, I claim that they were second to none in all those great qualities of self-sacrifice, discipline, courage, fortitude under punishment, and stability of character, which made victory possible. Perhaps I may be permitted as an Englishman to say that I believe there is something in the climate of this northern land of ours that produces men of great virility of character. Well do I remember as a new comer thirty years ago listening to the yarns of the old-timers about early days in Canada. Amongst the tales of endurance of the old settlers one story in particular occurs to my mind. It was told that a young man set out in the North country with a load of furs drawn by his dogs. He ran into heavy weather, lost all his food, his fish was all gone, but he made his way across the lake against heavy storms and at last, by the utmost perseverance and endurance succeeded in reaching the timber land. Here he built himself a fire, and being without food proceeded to cut off the tails of his poor dogs. He made soup from the tails, drank the soup, fed the bones to the dogs, and eventually arrived at the settlement. When he reached the trading post they said: "Hello boy, how did you get through?" And he replied: "A little short of tails but otherwise everything was jake." That, I think, illustrates the true spirit of our Canadians—absolutely unafraid in the face of danger, and full of initiative. The distinguishing characteristic of the Canadian forces overseas was the spirit of endurance and absolute determination to conquer or die.

The war has been an education. Men are thinking to-day as they never thought before, and as a result of their thinking these returned soldiers, who are amongst the very best citizens that we have, are organizing, falling into line, linking up for what is commonly known as "a square deal." My hon. friends may well ask: What do you mean by "a square deal?" It is pretty hard perhaps to describe it, because it means something different to almost every man. If hon gentlemen will accompany me for one day in the life of one of these men perhaps they will get a better realization of what a square deal means than in any other way I can suggest.

You will imagine, Mr. Speaker, that it is a June morning, after a more or less strenuous night of shell fire. The sun is just mounting above the horizon, and at this very moment—s-sh! a big shell is heard coming, and it lands about a hundred yards to your rear. There is a lull and then again is heard—s-sh !—and another big shell lands about one hundred yards short of where you are standing in a little bit of a ditch, really a captured German communication trench. Another delay, and once again—s-sh !—followed by an explosion. The German gunners have the range and the trouble commences in earnest. From that moment, Mr. Speaker, for eight mortal hours everything in the way of shell fire, big and little, comes roaring into that trench. Your comrades are blown up, the trenches are obliterated, and becomes a shambles of dead and wounded. A runner comes from behind and the orders are to hang on at all costs—a German counter attack is expected the moment the shell fire ceases. It does cease after eight mortal hours during which time men face death a thousand times. Then each man stands up not only with his own rifle but with all the rifles that he can grab from his dead friends to repel the counter attack. In this particular case it never comes. But the strain is there—the men are waiting, waiting, waiting. A little later comes an order that the battalion will be relieved to clean up. That means, bury the dead; and our boy amongst others is told off for this purpose. He helps to dig a trench, and collect the dead, and on this particular day they number twenty-one. While the men are stretched there waiting, the officer comes up to read the burial service. He says, "Attention, men. Greater love hath no man than this, that he give up his life for his friend." The officer salutes and carries on. The dead are buried, and the job is nicely finished, when there is another strafe from the Germans, and the graves of the dead are uncovered. The job of burial has to be done once more. It is finally completed, and our man gets back into his little front line and waits to be relieved. It is while he is waiting there that he looks up aloft and sees the stars shining calmly down as they have shone for a million years. The tension of this terrible day relaxes, and he says, " My God, what is it all about? Who is to blame for this Hell? He asks, was it the men that he helped to bury—were they the cause of war? Was it his company officer? Was it the men across in the German trench, or the German gunners, who were responsible? They had no more to do with the war than we had. He knows it. Was it the brigadier? No, he is under orders. Was it the corps commander who was responsible? No. Was it the Government? If so, our friend makes up his mind, that if he is spared by the grace of God to get back, from that day forward he will take a hand in the government of his country. If he is a thinking man, Mr. Speaker, as hundreds and thousands of the men were, and an educated man, he does not stop with the Government, because he knows that the possession of wealth and the control of government can never be separated. Who supplied the party funds? Who came down in delegations from boards of trade and interviewed the Government without ever consulting their local representatives? Were these men the cause of the war and are they to blame? For a while he thinks, yes. But his mind is open, his mind is free, and he sees clearly. He realizes that rich men's sons lie in the grave that he helped to dig that afternoon. He realizes that the Military Service Act played no favourites—it took the rich man's son as well as the poor man's son. Then who is to blame? If he is of a socialistic turn of mind, he might think that it is time the economic power which is now held by a few men in all the countries of the world, which stands behind all governments and must ever stand behind them, was taken out of the hands of these men and placed with the representatives of the people. But that will not satisfy his mind because he knows that individuals compose the nation. What causes war between individuals? Is it lust for power and selfishness, Mr. Speaker? Is that the cause of war, the cause of strife,—selfishness and lust for power? If so, what is the opposite of selfishness? It is love, doing unto other men as they would be done by—the words of the white Christ, the "square deal." The square deal means much or nothing to many minds, but it is a slogan, almost a crusade, to-day with the fifteen millions of men that fought in this war. Nothing less will do. And, Mr. Speaker, the behaviour of our officers, non-commissioned officers, and men in this great fight was so splendid that I have come out with an abiding faith in the decency of human nature. It has been said " as a man sows so shall he also reap." That is true of countries, likewise, I am perfectly satisfied that the great majority of our men who fought, and the great majority of our people who stayed at home, were filled with the spirit of self-sacrifice. Otherwise, we would never have won the war. As we sow, so shall we reap. If this is not true, Mr. Speaker, it means that there is no justice in this world; it means that our civilization is a lie; it means anarchy—red anarchy,—back to nature,—red in tooth and in claw;—that is what it means.

So far as I can learn, Mr. Speaker, it was never the desire of our people that the war should be made a political issue. There may have been differences of opinion as to how the men should be recruited and in respect to other details, but never, so far as I can learn, was it the desire of our people that the war should be made a political issue. And so far as I can learn it is not now their will that the re-establishment of the men and women who suffered through the war should become a political issue. Therefore I appeal to hon. members to tackle this problem in the same spirit which animated our men in France and at home and which helped them to win the war.

Mr. CYRUS W. PECK (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am seconding the motion of my hon. friend in order to get this question before the House. I am quite convinced that the Government is going to give us an opportunity for discussion. But I do not know that I agree with my hon. friend as to the method by which we can best attain the purpose he has in view. The only people I can see any chance of helping us are the Government, because none of the parties opposite have ever said what they are going to do for the returned soldiers.

If this question is brought up I think it should deal with all matters pertaining to the returned soldier in the following order: Pensions, re-establishment, gratuities. I am going to say right here that I do not for a moment pretend that I shall support the extreme demands for gratuities that have been made upon the Government. I have told my people that. At the same time, I think we should go into the whole question again, and have it properly ventilated, before, and fully investigated by, a committee sincere in trying to get to the bottom of it. I have every confidence that the Government is sympathetic, but if they are not I do not see any one else who will help us. Therefore I am going to depend upon the Government; I am sure they will not let us down.

Mr. RICHARD C. COOPER (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to discuss in any detail the motion brought forward by my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Andrews), but I do seriously ask the Government to appoint either a new committee similar to the Committee on Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment which we had last session, or give added powers to the Pensions Committee to deal with this question. There are still many questions of vital interest to the returned men that have not yet been satisfied. There is only one I intend to mention, it is one that was dealt with by the Committee on Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment last session. I refer to life insurance. A recommendation was made to the Government that action should be taken to see what could be done in the matter. So far as I know nothing further has been done. It has been discussed already this session, and in my opinion it is one of the most serious questions we have to consider in the future in connection with the man who served in the front line trenches. There are very few men, who, even if not actually wounded, have not received some physical or mental disability, and they will have to be considered and helped so far as life insurance is concerned.

I heartily support my hon. friend's motion, and I sincerely trust that the Government will not waste any further time in stating their intention of referring the subject matter to a committee to be thoroughly gone into.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE (East Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, if the resolution were pressed to a vote I would support it. At the same time I think it unfortunate that the mover has not given a larger number of cases which this committee is supposed to deal with. In any event, I wish to say, if we are obliged to-day to call upon a committee to further study matters relating to our returned soldiers, it is due largely to the administration of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. A number of the questions which were settled for them by the committee last year could have been settled by a deputy or a minister. The fact remains, Sir,—and my information is not only from friends in the House but from the soldiers themselves—that the deputy is a man whom they do not care to go to because he is not a soldier; he has nothing in common with them, although he may be sympathetic. The minister of the department is also, they say, hard to approach and does not give them the sympathy which they feel they ought to receive.

If it were not for the fact that I possess information that this department must necessarily cease its work very shortly, I would move an amendment to this resolution that, instead of having a committee of the House appointed to further inquire how matters may be dealt with, a minister should be appointed who is a soldier, and that his deputy should also be a soldier, so that the returned soldiers could tell their grievances frankly and fully to men of their own kind who would be able to understand exactly what was required.

If it is not too late I would suggest that a deputy minister be appointed who is a soldier, so that these men may get a lot of their grievances redressed without coming before this proposed committee. A committee of this House is not satisfactory; it was not satisfactory last year. The report was unsatisfactory, and it may be that the report of the proposed committee will be also unsatisfactory.

Mr. JOHN H. BURNHAM (West Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I sent a copy of this resolution to Peterborough, where the convention of the Great War Veterans of the province is now being held. I asked them to pronounce upon it, and they said they would do so. As the convention is still proceeding I should like to ask the member for Centre Winnipeg if it would be possible for him to adjourn the debate. As we are all aware, the committee appointed to look into this matter last session brought in a report, but as that report in several respects did not quite satisfy the soldiers, and the House, it was held open, and after a somewhat strenuous debate it was agreed that the Government would hear whatever further complaints the soldiers had to make. I understood the report would be brought back to the House and be adopted in the usual way, but I have heard nothing about it since, nor have I heard what additional complaints have been preferred or what has been done with regard to the matter.

It would appear to me that the proposition contained in this resolution conflicts directly with the work of the committee already in existence, because, so far as I know, that committee has not yet been released. Perhaps the Government will tell us what additional work has been done in this respect since that debate of last session. It might meet the purpose of this resolution if the assurance could be given that while the work of that committee has not been brought to a conclusion, it is on the way to it.

Mr. A. B. McCOIG (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my approval of the resolution proposed by the member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Andrews). It is proper and just that a committee of this House should be appointed with a view to bringing about a more speedy re-establishment of the returned soldier into civil life. I know a number of cases in my section of the country where returned men who have been desirous of locating on farms and of taking up farming work as a profession have been held back for months and do not know whether or not they can get land for the spring operations. In some cases the men have been assured that farms would be allotted to them, but in the meantime the prices of agricultural implements and equipment have increased to such an extent that those who want to equip their farms for the crop of 1920 will be under the painful necessity of paying from 20 to 25 per cent more for implements and equipment than they would have had to pay had they got the land earlier. It would have been better if a committee had been appointed at an earlier day, but certainly the Government should now appoint this committee and see that all possible assistance is rendered to those returned men who are desirous of locating on farms, as well as those who wish to re-establish themselves in other occupations.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): I desire to support this resolution and to join with the member for Skeena (Mr. Peck) in his intention not to support extreme demands made either in this House or out of it. I am not unmindful of the great service that has been done by this House to the returned soldier. The greatest service they did them or could have done them was the affording of sufficient support at the front. The gratuity which was given to the men on their return was a good one and one which they ought to be grateful for. I think that the great bulk of the men are grateful for it. But the first thing that this House and this country have to do is to look after the crippled, the widows, and the orphans. I cannot honestly say that that task has yet been fairly done. I hope that the Government will see its way clear to appoint a committee whose sole function will be to inquire into the matter of pensions. I do not say that the pensions have not been fairly well administered or that the scale of pensions is not reasonably high. Undoubtedly our pension scale is the highest in the world, and that is something for which our country ought to get credit. But in the actual administration of the pensions it happens that dependents, and the wounded and the crippled are in many cases not given enough money to live on. That, after all, is the main thing. The question is not whether our pension scale is the highest or the lowest; it is whether those to whom pensions are payable are receiving enough to enable them to live under present conditions. I think that a great deal of the difficulty in this regard could be overcome through administrative acts. But after two years' experience in dealing with many of these cases I am thoroughly convinced that the medical man is one of the greatest sources of trouble. I would like the House to grasp that point. The Pension Board has to work under a disability which they cannot override; in many cases they are subject to the decisions of medical men who are not in touch with the returned soldier and whose judgments and opinions vary considerably in different cases. I could cite cases of men who are disabled to the extent of being unable to do any work at all and who are drawing only $12 to $15 a month by way of pension. I am not blaming the Government or the Pension Board for that; I believe that the three members of the board are efficient men who take a sympathic attitude and who are anxious to do justice to the soldiers and to the widows and orphans who are pensioners of this country. But as I have said, the board are too much bound by regulations; they have not enough freedom, and the medical examiner is not in sufficiently close contact with the applicant for pensions.

Closely associated with this matter is the matter of life insurance. Many men who have been disabled during the war were unable to obtain the benefit of life insurance because of the fact that the companies levied a rate higher than they were able to pay, and to-day they are unable to get the insurance. The Government will not be doing justice to these men until it puts them in the position they would have been in had they incurred no war disability. The first thing we have to do is to look after the disabled and the war dependents; the next thing is to look after insurance; and the third—in connection with which, I realize, there are great difficulties—is to re-establish the men in civil life. I am not in sympathy, and never was, with the demand for a $2,000 gratuity. I do not believe that any man who gave his services voluntarily, as most of our men did, has a right to come back here and make a demand like that upon his country. I go further and say that ninety per cent of the men are not making such a demand; I have not had five men come to me and ask me to support it. But a large number of returned men are finding it difficult to get back into civil life, and many of those who are becoming re-established are doing so under great disabilities and with much hardship. I can cite cases of bank clerks, for instance, who upon their return from the front were offered their former positions at the same salary that they were receiving when they left them five years ago, while those who had remained at home had got increases of perhaps $100 a year, making a difference of $400 or $500. Then there is the great student body; I think that a greater claim could be made out for them than any other class. Students are drawn from all classes of society, from the poor as well as from the rich. I am not in favour of differentiating at all; I believe that one man's effort is as good as another's and should be dealt with accordingly. Many of these students have suffered great hardships and met with great difficulty in getting re-established in civil life. The problem is a difficult one, I know; it is one to which the best thought of men in this House and out of it has been given. But I do hope that the Government will appoint a committee to go into this question, and this question alone, because I think it is big enough to engage the attention of a committee. The Pension Committee will have plenty of work on their hands. Let us try to do what we can to be fair and just to everybody. I would be the last man, I think, to ask in this House for anything that is unreasonable or unfair; but I think that Canada cannot afford to have it said that we did not at least endeavour to do justice to the men who have served this country for the last four or five years.

Mr. THOMAS W. CALDWELL (Victoria and Carleton, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put myself on record as being in favour of the motion that a special committee be appointed to inquire into the re-establishment of returned men. One of the speakers on the other side has rather found fault that the mover of the resolution did not cite many branches of the service that should be investigated by this committee. I may be able to give some. I do not wish to cover the whole ground, but there are some cases that came under my immediate notice in our province and that I would like to bring to the attention of the House at this time. One is in regard to the matter of pensions which I think the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) mentioned a few moments ago. The hon. member spoke of the medical men being tied down by regulations; he said that they did not have free enough scope in deciding as to pensions. Another thing he said,—and I heartily agree with him—was that the medical examiner is not brought into close enough touch with the soldier who is applying for a pension. I have the papers here in regard to a man about whom

I spoke briefly, on Monday, who was granted a disability pension in July, having been in the military hospital for something like three months or more before this pension was granted to him. The physician who examined him for the pension was the physician who had attended him during those three months. I visited the man in the hospital during that period, and for a certain length of time he was allowed to walk out only fifteen minutes in the forenoon and fifteen minutes in the afternoon. Later on, he was allowed to walk out for thirty minutes in the forenoon and thirty minutes in the afternoon. So, it will be understood that this man was in rather a weak condition. At the end of about three months in the hospital he was granted a full disability pension, this being the finding of the doctors at that time:

BOARD OF PENSION COMMISSIONERS FOR CANADA.
43 Canada Life Bldg.,
St. John, N.B., July 18, 1919.

Sir:—I have the honour by direction to inform you that this office has given full and careful consideration to the proceedings of the Medical Board which examined you prior to your discharge from the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and to the other documents and information on your file. It has been decided to recommend that you be awarded a Class 1 pension at the rate of $600 per annum. If you are married, you will be entitled to a further $96 per annum. If you have children you will also be entitled to a further $144 per annum for the first child, $120 per annum for the second child and $96 per annum for each additional child. Your pension commences on July 5, 1919.

This man had three children, and he was paid this pension from the 7th day of July until the end of August. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that he was granted this full disability pension after careful consideration had been given to the proceedings of the Medical Board and on the examination of a physician who had been attending him for at least three months in the hospital. On November 3, this man received the following notice, and I understand this latter decision was made by a physician who never saw the soldier. This is from the Pension Commissioners at Ottawa:

BOARD OF PENSION COMMISSIONERS FOR CANADA.
Ottawa, November 3, 1919.

Sir:—I have the honour to inform you that very careful consideration has been given to the recommendation that you be awarded pension covering total disability as the result of tuberculosis.

It is noted that you were discharged in 1916 as the result of over age and debility. Several examinations in the course of the next two years showed that you had no disability other than a slight difficulty in walking as a result of gunshot wound of the leg.

Almost three years after discharge you were taken on the strength of the Department of Soldiers' Re-establishment for sanatorium treatment, and upon discharge it is shown that very sparse and scant signs of tuberculosis exist, and such as are at present would not appear to be in any way related to your military service, after careful perusal of the history of your case.

Future payments on your account will, therefore, be made at the rate in force prior to your commencing treatment with the D.S.C.R., covering the disability shown to exist to the extent of five per cent.

Your obedient servant,

STANLEY B. CORISTINE,

The Secretary, Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada.
Per. M.

This soldier is receiving for this five per cent disability $3 a month; for his wife, 75 cents a month; and $1.75 a month for his three children. Notwithstanding the fact that the doctor who had been attending him for three months pronounced him totally disabled, the doctor who, I understand, never saw the case, after giving careful consideration, not to the case but to the history of the case, decided that the man was only five per cent disabled. As I pointed out to the House on Monday, this family applied in January, 1920, for aid from the Patriotic Fund, and Dr. Rankine, the doctor whom the military authorities had appointed in Woodstock—and I may tell the House that this gentleman is one of the foremost doctors in our province, a man of the highest integrity, a man whose honour has never been questioned—signed this man's application for aid from the Patriotic Fund and declared him to be one hundred per cent disabled. This doctor had also been attending this man, as I think can be proved by looking up the records in the Pension Bureau at Ottawa where it will be found that the Pension Commis-

3 p.m. sion paid this man's doctor bill for treatment at the man's own residence. They also paid, or have agreed to pay, Dr. Grant for attending this man in his own home. Dr. Grant also signed this man's application for aid from the Patriotic Fund and declared him to be one hundred per cent disabled. There is something wrong with our pension law or with the putting of it into operation, and I should be inclined to think that there was something wrong with both phases.

There is one other matter in regard to soldier's re-establishment about which I wish to speak, and that is the settling of returned men on the land. I am perhaps in as good a position to speak of the facts as any other hon. member, having been in close touch with that work in our province since it was first organized. I was the Chairman of the Agricultural Qualification Committee from the time it was first organized until I had to resign to accept the nomination to run in the by-election last October. I was also a member of the Loan Committee, and in this way I was in very close touch with the work in our province. I do not wish to criticise the Soldiers' Settlement Act unnecessarily, because I believe it is a good Act and was designed for a good purpose, and is largely fulfilling that purpose. I do not, however, think that it is going to increase production in the eastern provinces, although it may do so in the western provinces where there is virgin prairie land on which they can settle these men. In New Brunswick and perhaps all the other eastern provinces there is very little such land. Nearly all the virgin lands in the East are wooded, and such lands can be worked best by men who have had experience in these conditions of cultivation. I do not think production will be increased by putting on such a farm a total stranger to conditions in the particular district. I have no fault to find with the purpose of the Act; I think it a very wise thing to establish these men in one of the noblest callings of the present day, that is, the production of the food necessary to feed the starving millions of the world. I think, however, that the terms of the Soldiers' Settlement Act require modifying in some respects. As hon. members are aware, these men have twenty-five years to pay for the farm on the amortization plan; they have six years to pay off the loan for stock and equipment, beginning with the third year, —they do not pay anything for the first two years on the stock and equipment loan, and that, I think, is a very good provision. I think the time for paying off the loan for stock and equipment should be extended for a longer period, and I will show the House a little later on how I arrive at this conclusion. Every man who was associated with me in that work in New Brunswick—and I do not think I am violating anyone's confidence in saying this—during the past summer and the previous winter, held the same view that I hold, namely, that it will be utterly impossible for these men to make their payments the third, fourth, fifth and sixth years. We had a detail d report made of what the cleared land was worth per acre, as well as the wooded land, together with a value of the buildings. We also secured a statement of the last two crops raised on the farm, and if it was impossible to get this we asked our inspector to make an estimate of the possible crop production of the farm. We took first the price asked for the farm and estimated what the man's yearly payments would be for the farm with stock and equipment necessary to operate it. From the total crop production of the farm we then had to deduct the actual cost of producing the crop, in which were included the man's living expenses for himself and his family for the year, and other indispensable expenditures. We were then in a position to know precisely what the man would have left at the end of the year to make his payments. Let us take the case of a soldier receiving the maximum loan—and in this connection I desire to express my conviction that there is another room for improvement in the Act. The maximum loan, in my opinion, is too small to be of any practical advantage to the borrower, for you cannot buy a very extensive farm with proper buildings for $5,000. Any hon. member in this House who has ever engaged in farming will realize that a farmer must work a certain portion of his land for the keep of himself and his family. If you double the acreage, the net profit from the added portion is far greater than from the first. It would nearly take a hundred acre farm to support an ordinary family. The man getting the maximum loan of $8,000 would pay $5,000 for the farm, $2,000 for stock and equipment and $1,000 for permanent improvements. His payments yearly for 25 years on the farm would be $390. On the third, fourth, fifth and sixth years his payments on stock and equipment would be $564 a year. And on a farm of this kind his tax would be in the neighborhood of $60 and his insurance $20. His total payments would therefore be $1,034 a year for these four years, which would take almost 13 per cent of a net profit on the whole investment of $8,000. In figuring up the purchases which we made during the summer—we had about one hundred applications per month in New Brunswick alone—we found that very few of the farms would return a net profit—after allowing for actual cost of production not including wages for the man and his family—apart from actual living expenses. We learned that very few of these farms would bring a net profit of more than ten per cent, and some less. I believe, however, that if the time were extended for payment of the loan for stock and equipment to twenty-five years beginning at the third year it would be possible for the borrower to meet his payments. If we allowed twenty-five years for the whole payment of the loan his payments would be $544 yearly and his taxes and insurance $80, making a yearly payment of $624 a year for twenty-five years, or nearly 8 per cent on the total investment. Of course, one objection that might be raised to the extension of time in regard to stock and equipment would be that the stock and equipment would not be good security after six years. But if I understand the Act correctly, and I think I do, everything that the man ever owns, farm, stock and equipment, including increase of his stock or any equipment he may acquire later, will still be held as security for the land; and as he cannot keep on farming without replacing his equipment when it wears out he will necessarily always have complete equipment of machinery on the farm, as well as stock. The man would be farming under Government supervision so that it would be impossible for him to allow his stock or equipment to deteriorate without the board being immediately aware of it. The field supervisors are supposed to pay these men monthly visits. Let us suppose that a man were given twenty-five years in which to make his payment; we shall see what the Government's security would be like at the end of six years. In the first place, he has to pay down 10 per cent of the purchase price—in the case assumed, this payment would be $500—before he gets possession of the farm. At the end of six years he would have paid $390 a year on his farm, or a payment of $2,340, and $154 a year, or within a fraction of that sum, for the third, fourth, fifth and sixth years on the stock and equipment loan. Thus at the end of six years he would have paid $3,456. This would make this property a better security to the Government than it was at the outset. For if the man has to pay out every last dollar that he can rake and scrape in order to meet his payments he will not be able to replace his stock and equipment; but if he is given a sufficiently long time in which to pay he will be able to make replacements when necessary. There is also a provision in the Act permitting soldiers to make payments more quickly if they see fit and are able to do so, and my belief is that these men would be only too anxious to make their payments as quickly as possible, because the more they pay yearly the less their interest charges. These men have no equity in the land and no credit with any one. They are not able to do business the same as other men until their loan is fully paid. During the present session I have received a number of letters from those who were settled last summer inquiring as to what method they should adopt to secure fertilizer for the coming spring's planting. The fertilizer dealers will not advance them any fertilizer because these farmers have no security to offer; you cannot collect a cent from them unless they are willing to pay, their property being held by the board until the loan is paid. This is right, because, I admit, the board must protect itself. I desire to read that section of the Act dealing with repayment to show why it is necessary to make it possible for the men to meet the payments when they fall due:

> All sales of property, real, personal or other, made pursuant to the provisions of this order and whereon any balance of the sale price shall remain payable by instalments, shall be evidenced by agreement of sale, which shall fully set forth the terms of sale. If any instalment mentioned in any such agreement of sale is not punctually made, or if default is made in respect to any other provision of such agreement of sale, the Board shall be at liberty, without any formal re-entry or re-taking, and without resort to proceedings in equity or at law, to rescind such agreement, to cancel such agreement of sale and to recall the property, real, personal or other, to another settler. The effect of such rescission and cancellation shall be to vest such property in the Board absolutely free and discharged of all rights and claims of the settler and of all persons claiming or entitled to claim through or under him for any estate in, or lien, charge or encumbrance upon or against such property. If and when such property is resold by the Board any surplus remains in its hands beyond the amount owing to it as balance of the sale price and interest at five per cent per annum and expenses of taking over and reselling the property, the Board may pay such surplus to the settler, but if, instead, a deficiency arises, that deficiency shall be paid by the settler to the Board, which shall have a right of action against him therefore. Before exercising the rights by this section given the Board shall give to the settler notice of its intention so to do, which notice shall be deemed duly given if mailed in any post office by registered letter addressed to the settler at his last address known to the Board thirty clear days before the Board acts thereunder.

There is another feature of the Act to which I think some attention should be given. The man's wife does not have any right of dower in the land until the loan is fully paid, and no judgment bill of sale or any other lien can be executed against the property pending that time. Even his crop cannot be seized for debt. I do not find fault with these provisions; they are absolutely necessary, I think, to protect the Soldiers' Settlement Board. On the other hand, I think it will be realized that it is imperative that the Government should not pass any regulation the terms and conditions of which it will be impossible for these soldier settlers to comply with and I think I have made it clear to the House that it is practically impossible for these men to meet their payments in the third, fourth, fifth and sixth years under the Act as it is at present.

There is one other feature of soldiers' re-establishment that I would like to speak of as briefly as I can—because I think there is a feeling in the country that the time of the House is wasted in long speeches and I do not want to be among those who transgress. What I desire to say has reference to university students who enlisted and went overseas. The pension law, I believe, makes provision for a man who comes back disabled and not able to take up his vocation where he left off. He is given training in some other department that he may wish to take up. While these students may come back absolutely fit physically, they are not in a position to take up anything and become earning entities in the country. They will have to spend two, three or four years before they are in a position to take their places in the world and even to earn their daily bread. I believe these men should be granted something by way of gift or loan. I am not very much in favour of a gift to anybody, and I do not believe that any money given in that way can be considered as a gift or charity at all. I do not want to be misunderstood in that respect. I believe they are asking for a gratuity in order to educate themselves. I think they should have some assistance along these lines in the way of a gratuity and that they should be granted the balance of the money they need by way of loan to enable them to finish their education.

Mr. R. J. MANION (Fort Willian and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take up very many minutes of the time of the House on this question, but I should like in a general way to support the resolution favouring the appointment of a special committee, or perhaps the continuation of the same committee as that which dealt with this question last year, to further consider the matter. Last year when the committee brought in their report, the House as a whole, including the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Andrews) adopted it. But at the same time there was an understanding that there would be further consideration given to some aspects of the report. One clause of the report said that the pensions in the case of the dependents of some of the soldiers who died at the front were inadequate. Having mentioned it before this session, I will not take time to discuss it further, but I believe they are inadequate and I think that is one of the questions which should come before that committee, or whatever committee deals with the question. The question of insurance was another matter which was discussed and favourably commented upon by the Committee. I believe that should be looked into also. Last year in my remarks, I took up the question of extending loans which the committee had recommended to disabled men. I suggested that these loans be extended to all needy cases. I have seen no reason to change that opinion since last year. I shall take a moment to read my remarks in the House last year upon that question:

> The committee have suggested loans only to the disabled. I personally cannot see why it should be absolutely impossible to work out a system of loans which would be extended to the needy as well as to the disabled. My hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Cooper) makes the statement that they would all be needy. I do not admit that. I think there would probably be 200,000, or half of he soldiers who came back from the front, who would be looked upon as not demanding a loan made to men who absolutely needed it. My hon. friend from Vancouver, my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Griesbach) and I are all returned soldiers, and we would be amongst those who would not under any circumstances touch a loan of that kind. . . . . I am merely offering this as a suggestion. I may be wrong but still it is something that I should like to have the Government consider. If 200,000 men asked for a loan of $500 each, these being needy cases, it would only amount to $100,000,000 and it is not impossible to raise that $100,000,000 in this country.

> The third proposition which I have to make is in regard to life insurance. The committee has gone into the question of life insurance and it has recommended that the matter should be further inquired into. I agree with that. I think the Government has a duty to perform and that is to work out some scheme to provide for men who have served and who cannot get insurance in the regular way from the legitimate insurance companies.

I also said:

> Finally, in many cases, the pensions have been inadequate. I believe that the rate of pensions should be increased in a large number of cases, as was suggested by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) this afternoon.

These are a few of the things I said last year and they dealt with a number of matters in the report which I do not think were completely worked out, not because the committee neglected to work them out, but because of lack of time. The committee admitted themselves that they should have had more time to discuss them. As these questions could not be settled in the time at their disposal, it is not unreasonable to ask the Government to either reappoint this committee or to appoint some special committee to take up these different phases of the question and any other matters that may be brought before them. I sincerely hope that the Government will favourably consider this resolution as moved by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg.

Rt. Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to take the place of any hon. gentleman who wishes to speak but up to the present it has all been from one side. The discussion begins to look as if it were a little lopsided and it is probably as well that I should make the few remarks I am going to make now. It might be in the beginning of the debate, or the middle of it or towards the end of it, depending on the members who are here assembled and who wish to take part.

I regret one thing and it is that to-day when this motion has come up my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) is not here. As all members on both sides of the House know, he had a very important and responsible position in connection with the committee which made the examination last year and in the consequent discussion that took place in the House. He has also had a great deal to do with, and has had a great deal of experience of, the administrative work and measures consequent upon the report of the committee and the action of the House. He is unfortunately prevented from being here on account of illness and I think it is to the disadvantage of the debate, because of information that might be given, that he is not here. That, of course, we have to put up with. For myself, in reference to these different measures, I have only been able to give a general sort of observation and attention to them. I have not been intimately connected with either the examinations of the committee or the administration of the different departments which have been carrying on the various parts of this work. But there are two or three things which occur to me, and I mention them because I think that as reasonable men on both sides of the House we are quite disposed to take them into consideration. In the first place, there is a very large number whose interests and whose conditions are to be taken into account.

The returned soldiers number hundreds of thousands.

There were direct disabilities and indirect disabilities ranging from ninety per cent disability to many and far removed lines of contingent and consequential hardship which appeal more or less to all of us as being the residue of a great and cruel war in the causation of which the victims had no part but from which they inevitably have to suffer. Then there are large lines of relief and of re-construction which are set out. Take for instance the pensions. That is one, and the main one we will say, along certain lines of aid. The pension law comes to be on the statute book by virtue of the deliberations of Parliament, and it sets out what at the time of the enactment of that law was the aggregate opinion of the Parlaiment of Canada. Thereupon, Pension Commissioners are appointed to carry out the law; and it is well for us all to remember first that Pension Commissioners are human and liable to mistakes; that they have to operate through a long line of subsidiary helps of whom the same must be said; and that they have to deal with thousands upon thousands of cases removed, most of them entirely removed, from their own personal observation or acquaintanceship. There, I think, comes in a plea for a good deal of moderation and a good deal of consideration in the criticisms which are made and which, viewed from the point of the individual case, are perfectly well founded criticisms. All that I am pleading for in this respect is, that taking into account the area and scope of the duties of the Commissioners and the human instrumentalities, widely distributed and impossible of direct supervision, through which they work out their duties of administration, it is absolutely impossible but that individual cases which, from one reason or another are not as speedily as possible or as adequately as possible dealt with, must necessarily occur —cannot be avoided. And therein a good deal of hardship, a considerable amount of grievance, and a good deal of well-founded criticism can come; but if we take into account what I have said, I think we would be disposed to be moderate and human in our criticism.

Then take the soldiers' re-construction under Sir James Lougheed, one of the members of the Cabinet. I do not suppose that any minister in any Cabinet is so endowed that it would be possible for him to be entirely to the satisfaction and entirely to the liking of everybody who has to do with his administration. That I think we may set down as being a fact. But I am bound here, as a member of the Cabinet and a colleague of the minister who is administering that work, to add my testimony not only to his diligence, his application and his interest—in the great work with which he is connected, but also to his sympathy with that work, and I think cooler moments with all of us, and a little examination into the real work being carried out and into the difficulties encountered in doing it, will help us in the end to appreciate according to its merits what is being done under the administration and leadership of Sir James Lougheed. I have looked into it somewhat, and I have also looked somewhat into similar operations and administrations carried on by other countries, and I have been myself—I say it honestly and I say it as I think it ought to be said—astonished at the amount of work, the quality of the work, and the saving nature of the work, which has been carried on under the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. I think we will all be agreed on that point. But some things have not been done and some things have been done wrongly; so it happens in all our business transactions; and the number of these will be greater or less according to the scope and the variety of the business which we are trying to administer. But I want to give my testimony, as one who knows something about it, to the work which has been carried on under that administration.

Then we have the Land Settlement scheme. There again if we look at it from one point of view, there is no country of all those which fought in the war which has a system so extensive and so broad-based, so generous in the point of the assistance given, and in the way of methods towards putting soldier farmers back upon the land or enabling them to go after training at first hand upon the land as this Dominion of Canada has. That we have done all we should do in that respect I am not claiming, but that we have done a great work and that the minister who has it in charge has given his whole soul and energy to the perfection of that system I think goes without a manner of doubt in the saying of it. But we have criticisms also upon that. My hon. friend from Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) went into a long criticism, and I am not going to say that he had not foundation for it; I did not quite take in all that he said, I did not hear him very well. But I think this is true: That if you put up a hundred or a thousand practical farmers to criticize that scheme you will have probably fifty, sixty or seventy per cent of different ideas upon it, and you cannot carry out any scheme in accordance with so many ideas. You have got to get some aggregate, some compass of the best, and carry on your system on that basis. And so, while individual criticisms may be well based, we yet have to settle down, in our judgment of that branch of the reconstruction that we are carrying on, as to whether we have got the best average foundation and whether that can be approved or not. But it is a great work that is being carried on and it shows well, there is not the least doubt about that.

Now we come to the other parts of the subject and hon. gentlemen have stated some things with reference to which they think this system of reconstruction, as we call it, may still be more extensive than it is. I think it may be. The Government itself is of the opinion that it may be, but the Government has to administer and to find the funds for that administration and has—apart from the nature of the trust reposed in it and the duties that are cast upon it— to give consideration to all sides of the question and to make that consideration as thorough and as well based as possible, not only as to what will be done as to individual lines of action but as to where they would lead on the successive lines which are advocated—and advocated in good faith and on good grounds—by gentlemen on both sides of the House. That is a duty which the Government has to take upon itself, though it is a duty the discharge of which will to a certain extent fail in meeting all points of view, and which necessarily will make for comparative slowness in carrying out what is actually determined upon in the end.

Now, the work of that committee has been reviewed this afternoon. It was a good committee. It put its back into the work. But it did more than that; it put its brain and its heart into the work as well. There was not a man on that committee whose heart was not in the work as well as his physical labour and his brain power. That committee had pretty abundant and extensive sources of information and a good deal of time in which to gather and digest it. But they did not cover the whole field, they did not get all the information which it is possible to get, nor did they explore thoroughly every branch that is possible of exploration. Therefore, it is the determination of the Government to appoint a committee this year. It will be either that committee with additions, or a new committee comprising some of the old, or maybe all of the old members—I do not know. But it will be a committee empowered to take up and carry on from the point that the old committee left off, examination into what further can be done for the benefit of our soldiers. The Government is not this afternoon in favour of coming to a decision off the bat to commit all this to a special committee. I think the Government has a right to ask the House to give it time to see what are the best means that can be taken to get the most thorough and complete exploration of the different fields which are yet to be explored.

It is a question that requires a little thought. Now, do not let any ungrateful personage on either side of the House at once say, "There you are; the Government is trying to shelve the thing." No, that is not the proposition at all. The Government does not propose to burk or smother the question or to defer it unduly. It proposes after a little consideration to take the best means in its power to see that these investigations are carried on.

My hon. friend (Mr. Manion) from the head of the inland waters of this country, has reiterated some of his suggestions of last year, and good suggestions they are. He takes up, for instance, the insurance question. I may say that there is to-day before the Government the scheme of a Bill, and if it can be worked out upon any kind of a reasonable basis, that Bill will be submitted to Parliament for consideration. So that the Government has not lost sight of that, but in conformity with the desire of the committee and with what is but reasonable and right, they have given it further examination and are now considering the concrete point. I hope the Bill will be submitted to the House before very long.

Then there is the question of the administration of relief. The relief itself, although it did not come just as every soldier thought it ought to come, was voted by this House and has been administered, and from what I know it has been administered in no mean or niggardly spirit; in fact, the administration has gone as far as it possibly could in the way of the actual relief of the distressed and the needy.

I confess to great sympathy, first, with the disabled soldier—the man who does not come back 100 per cent able, and in many cases but a fraction of 100 per cent. His case, by pensions and otherwise, demands the very first consideration of the country and of the Parliament which represents the country. My sympathies go out then to the widows and orphans, the dependents of those who fell. I do not think that this country can hold up its head whilst the widows and orphans of the men who fought for our ideals, representing the whole country, are left without fair and reasonable means of sustenance and support. For those classes that I have referred to, I have the very deepest sympathy and the liveliest interest, and the same may be said of all the members of the Government.

There are other classes that appeal to me—for instance, the men who have been mentioned here this afternoon. There is the student. I have been a student myself and know what it is to work one's own way through college and university—I have done it myself—and I have every sympathy with those young men who have to do it. It is hard enough for them if they are not crossed in their path by the sweep of a great war which takes them out of their orbit and delays their course for two, three or four years. There are objections to helping that class because it leads into other classes of help, the outcome of which we cannot very well see at the opening of the path, but I think the sympathies of the House are well based as they go out to that class.

Then you come into the broader and wider field of those who were put out of business, or wrenched away from their occupations, and after an absence of three or four years find it difficult, for various reasons, to get back again into the old business to which they were accustomed. If there is any way by which on a careful and reasonable basis help can be given to certain classes of those that have been hardly wrought with by the war, I should like to see that help granted.

Now, my sympathies do not cost anything to Parliament except the time I take in mentioning them. They do not go any further towards real relief than the expression of those sympathies goes. But I know, as most men in this House know, that sympathy is very often incalculable in dollars and cents, and it is not a worthless thing to throw into the currency of the world at such a time as this. How far those sympathies can be carried out in actual practice is something which calls for cool deliberation and a sense of justice and fair play, which I think we all wish to see exercised in our dealings with those who have come back over the sea and with their dependents.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not say anything more on this subject except to reiterate that I am not going to ask my hon. friend to withdraw his motion. I am just simply going to say that in the light of the considerations which I have put before the House, I intend to move that the debate be adjourned, and in the meantime members on both sides can go on discussing it for all the afternoon and give us their ideas, because we shall be very glad to have them. The Government will take the matter up and within a very few days—I do not think I need ask the House to wait very long—we shall be able to put before you what we propose as a committee and what powers that committee will have.

Mr. G. C. POWER (Quebec South): Will the hon. gentleman allow me—

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion for the adjournment of the debate is not debatable. Unless the minister withdraws it the member for Quebec South cannot proceed.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Then I will not put the motion just yet; some one else may do it. I do not wish to cut off discussion.

Mr. POWER: I thank the leader of the Government for his kindness. I would not be acting consistently with my own views or with those of the party which I have the honour to support if I did not approve most heartily of the resolution introduced by the member for Winnipeg Centre (Mr. Andrews). In the closing days of the last session a report of a Committee on Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment was brought in. It was moved by the leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King) that the report be not concurred in, but that it be referred back to the committee for further consideration. The reason for this concurrence was that the provisions for the re-establishment of the soldier was not adequate. Surely if those provisions are not adequate now, they were not adequate then, when we were on the threshold of a very hard winter. What astonishes me is to hear the leader of the Government—whose attitude I assume, is supported by members of the Government and also by hon. gentlemen on the other side who have spoken as well as some who have not spoken—say now: "It is quite true that the provisions for the re-establishment of the soldier are not adequate. Last year they were adequate: We had to vote $40,000,000 without delay; we had no time to study the matter further." But now, four months afterwards, when some of the men who needed the money then may have since starved,—I know some provision was made for necessitous cases, but a great many of the necessitous cases did not apply for pubic charity—now, I say, when a great many of these men may have starved, the provisions for the re-establishment of the returned soldier are no longer adequate.

Mr. Speaker, I support the motion of the member for Centre Winnipeg, but I hope that the adoption of the suggestion embodied in this resolution—and I say this without desiring to make any reflections upon my hon. friend (Mr. Andrews)—will not be used by the guilty parties—by the members of the Government and hon. gentlemen opposite who are guilty of having said to the soldier: "We will do this and we will do that for you," but have neglected to fulfil their promises;—I hope, I say, that this committee will not be used as a camouflage to be presented to the Great War Veterans' Convention which is to meet in Montreal next week. I sincerely hope that when the soldiers justly complain to their representatives and to the Government that such and such a promise was not kept, they will not be told once more: "We have appointed a committee to look into this." The soldiers are sick and tired of committees. We have been appointing committees on this and committees on that ever since the soldiers first put their claims before the public. I hope, therefore, that it is not with this object in view that a committee on re-establishment is being granted. Suppose we had a committee on re-establishment, may I ask the hon gentleman whether the Government—

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: When the hon. member supports this motion, is he not himself supporting another committee now?

Mr. POWER: I am supporting another committee now, as I supported a committee last November, on the ground that the provisions made for the re-establishment of the soldier were inadequate; and if they were inadequate then, they are inadequate now. I am quite consistent, therefore, in supporting such a committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But not in condemning committees and supporting them at the same time.

Mr. POWER: I am not condemning committees. I say that the soldier is fed up with hearing about committees and having his just claims shelved by reference to committees. I am quite willing to serve on any committee and to show once more that promises have not been kept and that the Government has not well administered matters in that respect. But in what respect, if the provisions made for last year were inadequate, should we have a new committee? Shall it be on pensions? We are to be granted a committee on pensions. The President of the Council (Hon. Mr. Rowell) told us the other day that a pensions committee was to be appointed this year to inquire once more into the whole question. There is, therefore, no need for a super-committee on pensions. Is it to be with regard to the question of a cash gratuity? The Government have already made up their mind that there is to be no gratuity of $2,000 or of any such extra amount. I suppose they have not changed their minds materially since last November, unless from some unknown source we have discovered another billion or so to augment our revenue. I hardly think we have. We may have spent that much, but we have hardly discovered another billion.

Mr. BUREAU: It is on the wrong side of the sheet.

Mr. POWER: I support this motion because I think that a thorough investigation should be made into the land settlement scheme, but not by such a committee as the Re-establishment Committee of last year, which was largely composed of city men. For instance, I was on the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Committee of last year, and when the question of land settlement came up I was in the position of not knowing a plough from a harrow. I did not know anything about land settlement, and I am sure that other members of the committee were similarly situated. The Government will be well advised—this is by way of advice, not of criticism—to pick out those particular phases of re-establishment which really need to be looked into and have them dealt with by separate committees, each made up of men competent to judge of what should be done. So far as land settlement is concerned, I would recommend that the Government address themselves to our worthy friends of the former cross benches who now sit on my left; I am quite sure that the Government could obtain considerable information from them.

The question of insurance was left in abeyance last year. That is a subject which really requires a special committee; an ordinary committee cannot possibly go into such a question as that of sub-standard insurance, the technical term, I understand, for the kind of insurance demanded by the member for Muskoka (Mr. Peter McGibbon). On such a committee there should be technical men, men trained in the profession of insurance, men who know something about the matter.

Vocational training is another sphere of activity in connection with soldiers' civil re-establishment. I understand that in February of this year vocational training ceased and that work is no longer being carried on. If the committee is to be a committee such as we had last year and is to bring in recommendations similar to those brought in last year, I cannot for the life of me see the utility of it. If we are going to take up separately new subjects, subjects that have not been so far treated, then the committee will be doing good work and I congratulate the Government on having on this late date granted this committee. If it is to repeat again recommendations which we gave last year and act on them as we acted on last year's recommendations, then we might as well not appoint a committee; we do not want it. The whole thing amounts to this; the first principal question which should be treated with regard to the re-establishment of the soldier is this, that the soldier be treated and looked after by soldiers. The first advice I shall give to the Government is: Dismiss your Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. The second word of advice is: Dismiss your Deputy Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and the third word of advice is: When you appoint another minister, let us have him in this House where we can see him and talk to him. I am willing to wager that 50 per cent of the members of this House or of the people throughout the country hardly know the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Who is he?

Mr. POWER: He is a member of the other Chamber.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Mr. Blondin?

Mr. POWER: The hon. gentleman mentions a member of the other chamber who is not the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. Had he been Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, there would, perhaps, have been a reason for his presence in the Cabinet as at any rate he was a soldier; he was at the front; but I maintain that such an important department as that of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment should certainly have a minister in this House.

In conclusion, in supporting the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg Centre (Mr. Andrews), and in supporting the suggestion of the leader of the Government (Sir George Foster) I hope this committee will have some definite results. Let us divide it the way we like, but let us have such results that we can say to the soldier: "At last, after all our promises, after telling you that we would do everything for you when you returned; that nothing was too good for the man who shed his blood for us on the plains of Flanders, this is the concrete thing we are going to do for you; we promise you no more; we are going to do this; we will not put you off with more promises; this is what you have; either be satisfied with it or not, we cannot do any more; we find that impossible, our funds will not permit us to do any more; our willingness will not permit us to do any more; something will not permit us to do any more." At any rate let us be frank with the soldier, and tell him: "We will give you this, and we will give you nothing else, or we will not give you this," so that the soldier may know exactly where he stands and every one of them will be thankful to this Government and his representative if the soldier is ever placed into that happy position.

Mr. MORPHY: I understand the hon. member's argument to be a condemnation of the work of the special committee of last year?

Mr. POWER: On the contrary, I must say that the work of the commitee of last year was very efficient, and that the work of the hon. gentleman himself was, perhaps, more efficient than that of some of the others.

Mr. DANIEL D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, this question is by no means a new one; we have been dealing with soldiers' re-establishment and soldiers' questions for some time. I am sure I need not tell the hon. member for Winnipeg Centre (Mr. Andrews) that I thoroughly agree with what he says about the deserving returned soldier; nor need I tell him that I agree with him as to the excellent work that was done and the bravery exhibited by our men overseas. We all concur in that. But I think the soldier, who patiently fought in the trenches and who was looking forward from day to day to the end of the war, had his patience pretty well exhausted in operations of that kind without being put to the extreme test of waiting until this Government would do something by way of relief. The war was tedious enough, but the tediousness of the war is not to be compared with the dilatoriness and the "tediosity," if there be such a word, of this Government. This institution, this very excellent Government, who in turn put up one after another of their best speakers—and they have some good speakers—to praise themselves and to tell of the excellent things they have done and the excellent things they intend to do—had decided this question almost a year ago without obtaining any evidence. We had the exhibition in this House of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) standing up in his place as the then leader of the Government and saying that the Government had reached the conclusion that they were not going to do anything along those lines; that the financial condition of the country was such that they could not spend another dollar, and the argument was that they had done as much or more than any other country and that they could not be expected to go any further along those lines. But if they had stood by that decision, we would have some respect and regard for them, and at all events, felt that they had reached a conclusion and they were prepared to stand by it and to let the people of this country pass judgment upon them as to whether or not they had done what was fair and reasonable in connection with the matter. But there was considerable agitation in the country amongst the returned soldiers, and reports were coming to the ears of the Government that their decision was not popular, and that the returned soldiers, when they had an opportunity, were likely to condemn by their votes and influence the action of the Government in regard to dealing with their respective cases. A decision was reached in the Government that they would have to do something. That something was the appointment of another committee to inquire into the judgment that they had already passed. I am an old practising barrister, and we have in some courts in this province, at all events in my province, a provision by which a judge may review his own decision. My experience of some twenty-five or thirty years is that I never came across any judge who would change a decision which he had already given; he always stood by it. That has been our experience with this Government. The evidence that was collected throughout the country was simply evidence to justify the decision that the Government had already reached. The chairman of that committee, a capable and astute politician, called to the witness stand such persons as would justify the attitude which the Government had taken in saying that the finances of this country were exhausted and that they would not stand any further strain. The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), who is always a ready relief for this Government, was called into the witness box to say that he knew the finances of this country, and that not another dollar could be expended along the line suggested by the soldiers. As might be expected, the chairman of the committee and other friends of the Government, and other men who were not friends of the Government, brought in a report confirming the decision that had already been reached that nothing could be done. When that report was brought down, my honoured leader (Mr. Mackenzie King), moved an amendment in this House, after having heard arguments pro and con in respect to the report, and that amendment, as it appears on page 1892 of Hansard for the special session of last year, reads:

> That the said motion or amendment be not concurred in, but that the said report now under consideration be sent back to the said committee for further consideration.

When the report of the committee was before the House a great many opinions were expressed by hon. members on both sides, but particularly on the Government side and it was suggested that certain means could be devised by which money could be raised for the purpose of relieving the soldiers. The hon. gentlemen who are to-day asking for further inquiry, by their votes on that occasion pronounced in a decided manner that no further investigation was necessary and that the report was good enough. We voted against the report on the ground that it was unsatisfactory and we said that one or two of the suggestions should be acted on and an effort made to find some means by which the soldiers' needs could be met in a way that would be at least fairly satisfactory to these worthy men. It is somewhat surprising, Sir, that hon. gentlemen supporting the Government who were perfectly satisfied with the report and voted for it should to-day come back and allege that it was unsatisfactory and inadequate and urge that something further should be done. It would be desirable to know when the end of this seemingly endless chain is going to be reached. One report after another is made. Hon. gentlemen opposite who are supporting the Government will vote for a committee and its report, which they will eulogize as being entirely satisfactory, and as soon as it is ascertained that it is really inadequate and does not meet the requirements of the soldiers, they immediately stand up and ask for another committee and a further investigation. This, Mr. Speaker, is merely temporizing and offers no relief to the unfortunate soldiers. My good friend, the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government (Sir George Foster) will no doubt appreciate the fact that committees' reports, however beautifully expressed they may be, will not put meal into the pot, or keep it boiling for the poor children of the returned soldiers, who need money in order to obtain the very necessaries of life to support them through the hard times now prevailing in this country. Something tangible should be done. If it is necessary to provide help for the soldiers—and I believe it is—time is of supreme importance, and we should take action at once. Surely if we have had, from the inception of the department down to the present time, a competent minister at the head of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, with facilities for obtaining ample information, he should know by this time what is necessary. The ministers are not overpaid, of course; but shall it be said that we are entrusting them with the control of departments of government, and furnishing them with every necessary staff and equipment, with every means of obtaining any information they may require, and, when anything is to be done, find that they know nothing about the subject with which they have to deal but must call for a committee of the House of Commons, who have never had anything particular to do with that subject, but whose duty it must be to inform the ministers upon matters peculiarly within the precincts of their departments? Yet, Sir, that is the condition of things, and I have no other conclusion to reach than that an effort is being made to postpone necessary action from time to time and give to the soldiers camouflaged unreality in place of real help, throwing dust in their eyes in the hope of appeasing them. I do not think that anything more will come of this committee. Indeed, I do not believe that a committee can be appointed which will be better than the last one, or whose report can be more exhaustive; and if the finances of the country could stand no strain last year, I venture to suggest to the present Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) that there is less likelihood now of their being able to do so. I observe that in the month of January, if I read the reports correctly, we plunged into an indebtedness of something like $64,000,000 over and above the income that ought to meet the demands upon the exchequer for that month; and I presume that other months since we parted last November were not very much better. Under these circumstances is it proposed that this new committee shall find money and devise means by which it is to be properly distributed for the re-establishment of soldiers? I submit that this motion is rather indefinite if we are to deal with any special subject. I do not want to find fault with the mover or seconder on that score, for I presume that if the motion is carried steps will be taken to specify more particularly what the subject matter of the inquiry will be. All that we are informed here is that the provisions so far made have proven inadequate.

We have no very great provisions except the Soldiers' Settlement Act, and when time will have developed what takes place under that Act and have fully shown the results, I fear it will be found that the provisions of that Act are unsatisfactory. I am told that the soldier who is put upon the land and to whom money is lent cannot call his soul his own, and in no respect can he exercise his own judgment. The plough, the horse, and the cow he gets is bought for him by emissaries of this Government who are capable of making any amount of graft as middlemen between the farmer and those from whom the articles are bought. They are charged to the farmer, who is supposed to pay for them, but evidently he has nothing to say about the price. The articles are not his; they are branded as Government property and the man has no credit or standing in the country. He has really nothing to say about the property, being as a matter of fact a ward of the Government, and in such a way that his own personality and initiative play no part in the start he has in life. I sincerely trust that these men who are re-established on the farms will make a success of their calling, but I think that provision should have been made for those who follow other occupations. When the Act was before the House I urged upon the minister in charge of it the desirability of having a general policy of settling the soldiers besides establishing them on land. I said that it would not do to frame a policy applicable only to men who desired to be farmers, but that consideration should be given to lumbermen, miners, fishermen, etc., who might be anxious to pursue these occupations. The soldiers were drawn from different classes, and there certainly should have been established a general policy embracing men of every calling in life so that the soldiers of every vocation might have an opportunity to resume his work. The Government, however, thought proper to single out agriculture as the industry in which to re-establish the men, spending enormous sums of money on the farms and paying no attention to the other classes I have mentioned. The results is that we have not only discontented farmers, but discontented lumbermen, fishermen and others, and are experiencing a general dissatisfaction because nothing has been done for those who did not and could not undertake farming. I do not wish to be regarded as unfair to the Government. I know that a great many things have been done, such, for instance, as educating young men in different walks of life, and it would be unjust of me to say that nothing has been undertaken. It is evident from the general discontent from Vancouver to Scutari among the returned soldiers that what should reasonably have been done has not been done.

I voted for a further inquiry last year. I thought the amendment of the leader of the Opposition should have been adopted by the Government and that further inquiry should have been made. For that reason, if there is a motion for the appointing of a committee, I am here to say that any further inquiry that may be necessary should be given. But I would suggest to the Government that a committee sitting in this House is not the best means of inquiring as to what is taking place in British Columbia, the Northwest, Winnipeg or the Maritime Provinces. Of course, we are sick and tired of roving commissions and we are sick and tired of ministers and departments who know nothing about their business. Nevertheless, if a thorough investigation is to be made—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: These general assertions are sometimes not very pleasant. Instead of including the whole Government among those who know nothing about their business the hon. gentleman should tell us who are the ones who do not know anything about their business. It would be interesting.

Mr. McKENZIE: We are dealing at present with one department—the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. One big committee undertook the task of gathering information for that department. We have a Government of twenty, or twenty-one, with mutual, governmental responsibility. Perhaps my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster), with his magnificent capacity for phrase making would say that he represents the soul responsibility of the ministers. If there is one man among them who does not seem to comprehend the responsibilities of his office, the duty devolves upon the other twenty, or twenty-one, as the case may be, of trying to penetrate the cranium and of imparting to him some of their surplus knowledge.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: You are going along well.

Mr. McKENZIE: Last year the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government was asked to tell us how many ministers there were. He said, "Let it stand as an order for a return." He could not tell how many there were. This will be one of the Orders that we will ask the minister to bring down at the earliest convenience. So many have left the Cabinet since that the list will not be such a long one. I am far from saying that every one, or that any one in particular, is dull, stupid or incompetent. I will leave that for the country to decide. But we are dealing with a department now in which it seems a hopeless job to get anything done in a proper or practical way. If the dullness is impenetrable and if it is not possible to get any action out of that department, not only is the department itself responsible but the rest of the Government are equally so because there is a mutual responsibility. That responsibility devolves particularly on the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government and who is responsible not only for the department over which he presides himself but for every other department over which he indirectly presides because he leads the Government. I charge them all with incapacity. They all know about it and their friends all over the country have reached the conclusion that the harvest is past, that the summer is ended and that this Government cannot be saved.

I wish to reiterate what I said before that there has been too much delay, too much putting off, too much dilly-dallying with this important question and if the soldiers, their wives, and dependents, are to get any relief from any action of this Government, it should be quick, as direct and as expeditious as possible. No hon. member of this House should be a party to any further delay in dealing as effectively as we can with the many questions connected with the soldier with which we have to deal. I understand that a motion is soon to be made that the debate be adjourned which, I presume, means that the further discussion of this matter is pitched over the fence and into the graveyard and that it will stay there perhaps till resurrection dawns. I hope however that such will not be the case and that some definite action will be taken by the Government.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I understood my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. McKenzie) to say that Mr. Calder who was the Chairman of the Committee that was appointed last year to look into Soldiers' Re-establishment ruled out any evidence that did not tend to bear out what he, Mr. Calder—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. NESBITT: What he, the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) did not want introduced. I understood my hon. friend to say that the Minister of Immigration and Colonization entirely ruled the actions of the committee and that he absolutely kept out any evidence—

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not say anything like that. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. NESBITT: Then my understanding must be getting bad.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. McKenzie) a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Cape Breton North (Mr. McKenzie) has not the floor; the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) has the floor.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) still has his voice.

Mr. NESBITT: I thoroughly understood my hon. frend (Mr. McKenzie) to say that. In any event he insinuated that and he insinuated that the Government had a plan that they would not go beyond a certain amount for the returned soldier and that the committee was selected for the purpose of working out that plan.

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes, I said that.

Mr. NESBITT: And that the Minister of Immigration and Colonization was put at the head of the committee so as to keep the committee in control and so that no evidence would be brought out that was not in accordance with the plan.

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not say that.

Mr. NESBITT: Well, my hon. friend insinuated that and sometimes insinuations are as dangerous as plain statements and even worse. I would like to ask my hon. friend if he attended any of the sittings of the committee.

Mr. McKENZIE: No.

Mr. NESBITT: Well then I think that for a man of his age it is very unfair to criticize the work of a committee whose sittings he did not attend. I think it is not only unfair but it is absolutely mean.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not think the hon. member intended to convey the impression that he did by using the word "mean" in respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Cape Breton North. I would ask him to withdraw that expression.

Mr. NESBITT: I do so with pleasure and I will leave it at "unfair."

Mr. McKENZIE: I must rise to a question of privilege. I said nothing whatever about it.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not proper for an hon. member to arise to a question of privilege while another member has the floor.

Mr. NESBITT: I am very pleased to hear that my hon. friend did not say anything against the committee, but for fear he should have any suspicion in the back of his head that the committee were not absolutely independent I will refer him to those members of the committee who sit on his own side. There are the member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee), the member for North Essex (Mr. Kennedy), the member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), I think—

Mr. DUFF: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. NESBITT: Pardon me, the member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp), the member for Beauce (Mr. Béland) and several other hon. gentlemen. I sat with those hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House for several years and I know them to be very competent and very upright. The Chairman of the committee never personally, to my knowledge, asked for any particular evidence to be submitted to the committee. Various organizations asked to be heard and the chairman put it to the committee whether their request should be granted or not. It was seldom that any evidence was objected to or ruled out excepting when it was proffered by organizations connected with the Great War Veterans, and then the committee asked that their evidence might be submitted through that body. I am sure that no committee composed of members of this House ever tried more strenuously to do their duty or attended more closely to that duty than did the committee on the Soldiers' Civil Re-esablishment. They sat three times a day for over a month, they listened to testimony from witnesses from districts ranging from Vancouver to Ha'ifax and they paid the closest possible attention to that evidence. But they had to take into consideration the interests and financial condition of the country as well as the interests of the returned soldier. No man, not excepting even my hon. friend from North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) could have listened with greater attention to the evidence that was submitted than did the Minister of Immigration and Colonization, and no human being could have given that evidence greater attention than he did, or could have allowed, no matter what exertion he put forth, more evidence to be brought forward unless the committee had sat all last fall in order to listen to it. I repeat that no one could have allowed more evidence or greater latitude or opportunity for evidence to be given, than did the minister in question. I rose for the purpose of resenting any insinuation that the committee were governed or ruled in any shape, manner or form by the Government or any member of it, or that the judgment of the committee was influenced in any manner whatsoever by the Government or any person representing the Government. Personally I resent any insinuation that I was influenced or dominated by anybody it does not matter by whom. The only authority that has any influence over me in my judgment of any case that comes before me to be judged—and that influence is directed so that I do not know it—is the Lord. So that I naturally resent any person insinuating that I was elected a member of the committee because it was desired that a certain verdict would be given. The same thing is true of every member of the committee in my humble opinion. Remember that the report of the committee was unanimous; I do not believe that any of the Opposition members on the committee who were my strong personal friends were influenced in any degree whatever by any human being; they were influenced solely by the desire to do justice to the returned soldiers as near as it was humanly possible to do so.

As to the Land Settlement Board we were not appointed to consider anything with respect to their operations. It did so happen that we had to secure some evidence with respect to the board in order to find out what was being done in the re-establishment of the soldier. Now if there is anything wrong in connection with the Land Settlement Board—judging from my experience prior to and since the sittings of the committee—the errors are all on the side of the soldier and not on the side of the country. The Land Settlement Board is managed with good judgment—the very best judgment I think that could be brought to bear in connection with it—but the proposition is a very difficult one. I listened with a great deal of interest this afternoon to the observations of an hon. gentleman opposite who had been working on the Land Settlement Board in New Brunswick for the reason that the hon. gentleman in question has had experience of, and is familiar with, the question. There is a good deal to be said from his standpoint, but there is also much to be said in opposition to it. It is one of those questions that a committee could sit down quietly and thresh out when the views of the majority of course would prevail.

Just a word about the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. I have had more or less experience in connection with that work, especially since the meetings of the Parliamentary Committee and it is because of that experience that I say that any errors arising in connection with that work have always been in favour of the soldier. And errors are almost impossible to avoid. Not even a man endowed with the wisdom of Solomon could entirely avoid imposition in connection with the work of the Soldier Settlement Board, and the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and especially the Vocational Training Branch. Even if everything was done that it was humanly possible to do I do not think we could escape from imposition, and as I say, any errors that have resulted, according to my experience, have always been in favour of the soldier. It is hardly possible for these departments to escape being imposed upon to a certain extent. I have tried to work out some scheme under which imposition would not occur but it seems to be hopelessly impossible to avoid it altogether.

As to the resolution under discussion it is possible that there are certain things in connection with the re-establishment of the soldier that have not yet been investigated. The same may be true with respect to the provision made for the soldiers' dependents. Still while a good many questions have been investigated, I see no reason why, as the leader of the Government pointed out a few minutes ago, a committee could not be appointed to investigate certain questions relating to the returned soldier that have not yet been inquired into and to suggest any remedies where remedies are found to be necessary. Personally I would think that as there is a motion on the Order Paper for the reappointment of a committee to inquire into the working of the Pensions Act, perhaps any other question relating to the returned soldier that has not already been investigated might be referred to that committee.

During the present session I have listened to several debates dealing more or less with this question, and several hon. members have stated circumstances that seemed very harsh, I did not hear all that was said about pensions this afternoon, but I do know that when the Pensions Committee sat for three years—and I happened to be a member of it from its organization—we inquired into a great many complaints, and I think I can say, without the slightest exaggeration, that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the committee found the Pensions Board were right. I remember only two instances in those three years where we found the Pensions Board were not correct in their findings in the judgment of the committee; and it must be borne in mind that that committee was composed of members of the House of Commons, whose inclination was, if anything, towards the complainants.

A great many of these cases appear very hard while you have heard only one side, but no one knows better than a lawyer that when you come to hear the other side they may assume a very different aspect. I do not think that complaints against either the S.C.R. or the Pensions Board should be aired here by individual members unless they have been inquired into by them personally. I said the other day that after I had inquired into any complaints brought to my notice, if they were within the regulations of the Pensions Act and were capable of adjustment by the Pensions Board, they were immediately adjusted. I can only repeat that statement. Hon. members must bear in mind that the committee of the S.C.R. and the Pensions Board are governed not by their own ideas but by the provisions of the Statutes controlling them. It would be a fatal thing for those two bodies to act according to their personal inclination, because then we would immediately have complaints of favoritism, and that would be the worst thing that could possibly happen.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would not have taken any part in this debate—in fact, I had no intention of doing so—had not my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) insinuated that the committee—and, by the way, I have seen this stated in the papers before today—that the committee had been hand-picked as to some of its members, who were appointed purposely to carry out the will of the Government. I rose to give that statement the most emphatic denial. I see on the other side of the House two or three of my brother committeemen and I leave it to them to say whether any influence was brought to bear to shut out any evidence that should have come before the Committee.

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish first to congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Andrews) on the eloquent manner in which he has placed his request before the House, and, secondly, I wish to state that I shall give my support to the resolution, hoping, as has already been stated by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), that a committee will be given an opportunity of further studying this question.

I do not rise for the purpose of criticising the report of the old committee. The amendment which my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition brought in at the end of last session was that with the further light and knowledge furnished to the House during the discussion the report should be referred to the same committee for further consideration. Therefore that amendment was not a condemnation of the report or of the personnel of the committee. In speaking briefly on the subject at the time I declared myself favourable to a gratuity—not to the extent which had been asked for before the committee, involving an expenditure of perhaps $800,000,000, but to an extent scarcely reaching twenty or twenty-five per cent of that amount. It is true that at that time the leader of the Government to-day as well as the hon. Minister of the Interior declared to the House and to the country that we were not in a position to grant any further money to the returned soldiers. However, the next day the Government came down with a proposition to acquire the Grand Trunk Railway system, and they did acquire it, and laid on the country an immense amount of further indebtedness. Now my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior having been able to gratify his ambition in that respect, I am sure that his ingenuity is not exhausted, and that he will be able to find the means necessary to give our returned soldiers what they really deserve and what to a great extent they have a right to expect, from the country.

At that time in seconding the resolution of my hon. friend from Winnipeg I had different considerations in view. I felt that the most needy soldier is generally the most humble, and will not go before a committee to receive charity. I know hundreds of cases in my constituency, Mr. Speaker,—and when I say hundreds of cases, do not think for a moment that I am exaggerating—I repeat, I know hundreds of cases of returned soldiers suffering in many ways. A returned soldier not able to suit himself according to his ambition will not apply for charity because perhaps he has a brother who will give him a home, or he may be able to go to his paternal home, although filled with other children. But that is the very soldier who requires the attention of the country. The only fair way is to give something to every soldier. I may be answered that to grant such a gratuity to a great many will be an invitation to waste. 400,000 soldiers are to-day still waiting for re-establishment of the 600,000 who went overseas. The soldier is human, just like any other man, and no doubt a few might waste the money that they got from the country. But the majority of them are sensible men and will re-establish themselves not only with a view to enjoying life, but also with a view to proving the value of their citizenship after the winning of the war.

I represent a lumbering, farming and fishing constituency. I know of a number of cases of returned men in my constituency who are without the means of following their occupation of fishing. It may be said that $400 or $500 would not be sufficient to enable a returned man who wanted to engage in the fishing business to buy a sailing vessel or motor boat. That is true, but if he is willing to invest the $400 or $500 in the construction or purchase of a sailing vessel or motor boat, some one may easily be found in the locality who will be willing to trust him with the balance. There might be a tendency not to advance the man the whole amount necessary to establish him in business, because of an apprehension that he might not, having put no money into it himself, be sufficiently industrious and energetic to carry it out successfully. But having invested $400 or $500, he gives a guarantee of his good faith and some person of means in the locality would surely be willing to help him out.

Then, there is the case of the students. Many young men who were on the point of leaving college and entering university went to the war and upon their return they have tried to get the means to attend university. We will say that it would take two or three thousand dollars to put a man through university. Well, if you gave him $400 or $500 he would be enabled to carry on his studies for a certain length of time, and a doctor or a lawyer or other good neighbour in his district would undoubtedly be willing to furnish the means necessary to enable the young man to finish his course, although he might not have been willing to run the risk of advancing the cost of the whole course. I hope, therefore, that the leader of the Government, whose generosity seems to increase year by year since he has acquired a good knowledge of the French language and an appreciation of the sentiment of those who speak it, will, in cooperation with the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Meighen) be able to arrange for a committee to look into this matter.

Canada is not bankrupt; Canada can assist her returned soldiers as generously as other countries assist theirs. In fact, Canada has done better for her soldiers than any other country has done. But the Canadian soldiers won a lasting name in the battlefields overseas; his name is of universal repute. When we boast of what the Government or the country has done in relation to the war we must remember that it is the Canadian soldier who did it. It was the Canadian soldiers who saved the Empire at the very beginning of the war; by their courage in maintaining the line until reinforcements came they kept the Germans from breaking through and reaching the sea through France and Belgium. So that I hope that a committee will be appointed which will consider the matter from every angle with a view to doing something to allay the disquiet which prevails throughout the country, particularly on the part of returned soldiers, and to provide generously for the re-establishment of these men into civil life so that they may be enabled to exercise their citizenship in accordance with the true British spirit.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I invite the attention of the House to the wording of the resolution proposed by the member for Winnipeg Centre (Mr. Andrews). It reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the provision made for re-establishing in civil life the members of His Majesty's forces who served in the late war has in many cases proved inadequate, and that it is desirable that a special committee of this House be appointed to consider what provision can be made to meet such cases.

And so on. It will be noted that the first statement in the resolution is that the provision hitherto made for re-establishment of our returned soldiers has proved inadequate. I think we ought to be careful not to allow the impression to go abroad that here is real ground for the contention made by some that the country has grossly neglected the returned soldier. Generally speaking, and holding in reserve for the moment special cases to which I shall refer later, I think that Canada has succeeded beyond the hopes of the most optimistic in solving the general problem of re-establishment. Or, to put it in another way, a very large proportion of the returned men are to-day happily reinstated in civil life. In saying that I do not for a moment wish to throw out the inference that the country has discharged its debt of gratitude and otherwise to the returned soldier. That is a debt which we shall never be able to repay, but it is a debt which comparatively few of the men themselves desire to have capitalized in the form of dollars and cents. But that does not alter the fact that I have already mentioned, namely, that in the main the great problem of re-establishment has been most intelligently and fairly successfully dealt with. I am conscious, however, that there are some cases—some classes, if you will—that have not, in my estimation, and I think in the estimation of a large number of the people, been properly dealt with. Indeed, Sir, the right hon. leader of the House (Sir George Foster) this afternoon expressed sentiments which lead me to believe that he himself concurs in that view. I suggest, therefore, that the member for Winnipeg Centre has, perhaps, made the wording of his resolution a little loose, because he generalizes in saying that the re-establishment scheme has proved inadequate and he makes no specific statement of the cases which he desires should go before the committee. Such a committee, appointed under this resolution, would have the whole field to travel over again. I submit that it is inadvisable for this Parliament to appoint another commitee which, by inviting from different parts of the country witnesses and others who desire to present schemes and cases, will traverse again the wide field which was gone over with such care and in such detail last autumn. I would, however, prefer that either the Government itself by a Cabinet committee, or the House by a special committee, deal in some effective manner with specific cases, some of which I shall present to the House this afternoon, which should be considered. It is a matter of gratitude to me to note that the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) assured the House that the Pension Committee would take up the matter of pensions. I desire, however, to take this opportunity—as it comes within the purview of this resolution—to refer very briefly to pensions. I am going to give the House two illustrations indicating a principle of administration of the Pension Board, which I desire to characterize here as, in my estimation, iniquitous, to put it mildly. It is a principle indicated by the two cases I shall submit to the House. Five boys of one family went overseas, and three of those boys were killed in France. The mother was an elderly woman who had married again, so that there was a step-father. Both of those people were too old to keep themselves, and they were dependent upon those boys for a living. When the three boys were killed, the Pension Board granted a pension of $48 a month to the step-father and the mother. This pension was gratefully received and no complaint was made, they being apparently satisfied with the amount. But this old couple, desirous of reducing the cost of their living, removed from the environs of the city to a place about ten miles outside, secured a small piece of land and built a cottage on it, thereby eliminating rent and raising in their garden some of the sustenance of life. As soon as the Pension Board learned that this couple had attempted to supplement their meagre pension in this way, they reduced the pension by ten dollars a month on the ground that the couple now had to pay no rent. Can you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members, imagine a more iniquitous practice than that? I give you one other case, and these two are indicative of many more. An elderly lady, a widow, lost her only boy overseas. She owned in Vancouver a house which was heavily mortgaged. She received a pension, I think, of $48 a month; it may have been a little more, but it was the ordinary regular pension, with which she was satisfied. In the rear of her lot she had a small building, and she spent $70 in fitting this building up, making it habitable, and she rented it for $15 a month, thus supplementing the meagre pension she was receiving and assisting her to carry on in this life. The Pension Board again seized upon that and reduced her pension by $15 a month, the amount of the pittance she received from this shack in the rear of her lot. Not only did they do that, but they totally ignored the fact that the woman had spent almost a hundred dollars in fitting up the building. These two cases are sufficient indication of a pernicious regulation being practiced constantly by the Pension Board, and it is such irritating and, I consider, utterly unneeded practices as this that cause a great deal of dissatisfaction. I give these illustrations to the House so that we may address ourselves to remedying regulations which are, on the face of them, wrong, unfair, unjust and, as I say, iniquitous, in this case.

I proceed to another phase of the question. I shall not discuss pensions further, because they will go before another committee. We have the claim of the student. I shall not traverse the ground gone over last year in this regard, but the student undoubtedly has a peculiar claim upon this country. This country above all others, and, indeed, in common with the leading countries of the world, realizes that a fair education is a great asset to the community. Indeed, in most of our provinces, we have a law of compulsory education, and why? Simply because we know that a man who has a fair education is a better asset to the country than a man without any education at all. The bulk of these students, particularly in the universities, stopped in the middle of their course and gave their services to the country. Having been for the time being dissociated from their studies, when they come back they find themselves somewhat handicapped, and they are asking that some consideration shall be given to them. The only objection to the proposal hitherto has been that it will interfere with other classes; or in other words, there will be other classes of returned soldiers which would claim the same privilege. I at once admit that there is an argument in this; that it is possible that it would cause the Government or the administration having charge of the matter some difficulties and confusion. But if we are going, as a Parliament, to refuse to do what is eminently just and in the interest of the country simply because it presents difficulties, then we are derelict in our duty to the country, and the sooner Parliament recognizes that it is by adjusting these individual cases that we shall make progress towards social and industrial peace, the better for the country at large. Therefore, I believe the case of the student whose studies were interrupted by the war, is a case worthy of special consideration, irrespective of its relation to other individual cases.

I pass on to another case to which I wish to refer with the utmost brevity, and that is the vocational training group, the men who are taking vocational training. This is not a criticism of the government; but as we progress in this hitherto untravelled field, we learn things that we ought, if we are wise, to take advantage of in order to effect remedies. In this particular realm, it has been discovered that a man will start a course as a bookkeeper, or as a mechanic, or in the motor transport, or as a carpenter, or in some other vocation. He may go on for two or three weeks or a couple of months, and it may be perfectly clear to those in charge that the individual is in the wrong vocation; that he is going to make an utter failure of it; that if we train him for three or six months as the case may be and turn him out, he will be useless and not, in any sense, a credit to the training he has received. It is the function of Parliament, the duty of the Government and of the department concerned to formulate such regulations that, when or if it is discovered that a man is pursuing a course which it is clear he will fail in, he may be changed over to some other course where he may have an opportunity of making a success. That is a real, tangible grievance that should have the consideration of Parliament and of the Government.

A good deal has been said regarding the Land Settlement Board, and I wish to take this opportunity of paying a tribute to that Board. I am not going to analyze its work in detail, because I have not had an opportunity of studying it very closely; but I have criticised it, as I think, in a constructive manner where I felt I was warranted in doing so. But I must confess to this, that as far and as impartially as I can judge, the Land Settlement Board is doing excellent work in Canada. It is administered by a man at the head, Mr. Black, I believe, who is not only doing his best but enthusiastically devoted to the work. I do not think a more capable man could be chosen. What I suggest to hon. members is that we should rather refrain from careless and general criticisms of the Land Settlement Board and seek to point out any specific weakness and take it up directly with that Board, or through the Government or, if a committee be appointed, through such a committee. But the point I wish to emphasize is this, that rather than make general and sweeping criticisms, we should particularize and seek to bring out some useful criticism which may offer an opportunity of a remedy being effected.

I wish to say to the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) that I take second place to no man in this House in respect for his experience in Parliament, but I was seriously disappointed at the attack which he made upon the Government. He, if I remember rightly—and I am subject to correction if I am in error—said that the people were sick and tired of Royal Commissions and that a committee of this House would be useless because it could not understand conditions in British Columbia or the Prairies or the Maritime Provinces. Well, Sir, what in the name of common sense do we want? What justification is there for these sweeping condemnations of the Government? This is an entirely new problem, a new field that has never been trodden before. We are the pioneers in this field, other countries having patterned their vocational training and re-establishment much after the original steps taken by this Government and this Parliament. I say, therefore, that rather than general criticisms, rather than sweeping condemnations of the Government, rather than feeding the fires of discontent in this country, the duty we owe to the people, to the returned soldier in particular, and to ourselves, is that, when we bring before Parliament a resolution of this kind, we should attempt to state as specifically as possible what grievance it is that we are desirous to remedy.

So far as I am concerned, I do not feel that I am at all in duty bound to support the resolution in its present general terms, but I do bring to Parliament, as I have already said, such specific instances as have been laid before me in order to invite attention and correction, although not subscribing in any sense to a general condemnation of the work that has been undertaken, without knowledge or experience, and carried forward, as I believe, with a larger measure of success than has attended any similar work of such gigantic proportions.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): I desire to say a word or two on the subject that has been introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Andrews). While I agree that it is desirable that Parliament should make further investigation of all the conditions surrounding the problem of re-establishing the returned soldiers in civil life, I do not by any means concur in the statements that have been made to the effect that the work done by the several departments of government which have been dealing with the re-establishment of our men has been inefficient or insincere, or that the men who have been charged with the responsibility of carrying out that work have been incapable of properly discharging that responsibility. I shall refer briefly to the statement of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), who I believe was a member of the committee that dealt with this subject at the last session of Parliament, that we should make an effort to reach a definite and final conclusion as to what should be done in the interests of the returned soldiers in order that they might know once for all what they might expect.

While I am on my feet I shall also make reference to what was said by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) in the same direction. In the course of his remarks that hon. gentleman, in referring to the possibility of a further investigation by a parliamentary committee said: "When will this endless chain end?" Well, Mr. Speaker, my own judgment is that for Parliament or the Government to undertake now, or a year from now, to lay down a concrete policy that shall not be digressed from in dealing with the problem of the returned soldiers, would be to undertake something that is humanly impossible, and something that would not be in the interests of the soldiers. There were about six hundred thousand men in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces. A very large number of these men reached France, and of them perhaps one hundred thousand have come back more or less depreciated in mental and physical strength; and fifty-eight or sixty thousand will never come back. In view of this fact, therefore, I would say, as a member of the House of Commons, that so long as a dependent of any one of these men is alive the problem of the returned soldier will rest with the Government and the people of Canada, and our responsibility to our gallant men will never be discharged so long as there is a single one of them in any state of mental or physical incapacity. So that in dealing with this vast problem that has been forced upon us, just as the war was forced upon us, while we are in a state of absolute unpreparedness to deal with it, to say that we should undertake to lay down a concrete and rigid rule that shall not be departed from, notwithstanding any new conditions and problems that may arise in the future, is, I reiterate, to undertake an utterly impossible and insensate task.

Something has been said concerning the object with which the committee of this House that heard the whole question of re-establishment at the last session of Parliament was appointed, and the methods which that committee followed; and it has been inferred that because members on this side of the House agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Andrews) that the subject should be re-opened, we are therefore inconsistent, having voted against the resolution, moved in the dying days of the last session, that the matter should be referred back to the committee. Let us analyze his question for a moment. Had the amendment of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) carried last session and the matter been referred back to the committee, what opportunity would the committee have had for giving anything like adequate consideration to the subject before the prorogation of Parliament? I think it is hardly necessary to say, because it is so obvious, that the committee could not sit during the recess. A committee of the House of Commons must sit while the House is in session, and had the matter been referred back to that committee there would have been an end to the proposals which the report contained for dealing with the immediate necessities of the soldiers, and the whole subject would simply have been left in abeyance. Having, however, adopted the report of the committeeè it was possible for the departments of Government to act on the recommendations made; and this House, as the free parliament of the people, was at liberty at this session to take up the question again and adequately deal with it. Like my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) I have one or two specific cases which I desire to bring particularly to the attention of this parliamentary committee or the Department of Government, either with the Pensions Board or the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, whose duty it may be to deal with them. These cases, which I shall cite in a moment, are, I think, an absolute evidence that there are regulations binding the Pensions Board which make it impossible for them to deal in an ample manner with problems that may call for consideration. There are two cases in particular in which I have been endeavouring to get the Pensions Board to revise their decision and in regard to which I have finally reached the conclusion that under the regulations the board can do nothing. The first is the case of a couple who lost their only two sons in France. The woman is seventy-one years of age and her husband seventy-five. They are both in a dependent condition, being ordinary working people without any income except such money as can be earned by a man of this ripe age. He is not in the most robust state of health, and although he and his wife live in their own home, they. are not in a position substantially to augment their pension of $48. Now, because this man of seventy-five was fortunate enough to secure some light employment during the months of August, September and October last in order that he might earn a meagre pittance, the Pensions Board, after sending an inspector to investigate his case, reduced his pension by half, so that he now receives only $24. One of the reasons adduced for this action is the fact that these people are living in their own home, and do not have to pay fifteen or twenty dollars a month rent. The other case is that of a widow who lost her only son in France, but who has at home three daughters who are domestics.

The Pension Board takes the ground that because these three girls, who are working out as domestics, are in receipt of an income, the mother should not get any pension at all. There is something wrong with regulations that will call upon a board representing the Government and Parliament of Canada to say that because a widowed mother who lost a boy in France has three daughters working out as domestics she is not entitled to some compensation on account of the loss of her son. I say, as I said to the Pension Board, surely these three girls are doing all they should be asked to do when they maintain themselves.

In regard to the Department of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment and the criticisms that have been levelled against it, I am not here to defend any department particularly but I must say in justice to that department that having had a number of cases of returned men to deal with in my own district and having been asked by these men to intercede for them, I have never received more sympathetic consideration from any department of Government, nor has any one ever gone further than the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment has gone in every case that has been brought before them. My judgment is that if there is anything wrong with what they are doing, or if their work is not adequate, it is because the machinery has not been made adequate and the responsibility rests upon the House of Commons to see that it is. Therefore, the suggestion made by the right hon. the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) that a committee is to be appointed meets with my absolute approval.

In so far as a cash gratuity to physically fit returned men is concerned I want to make myself absolutely clear to this House as I have to the branches of the Great War Veterans' Association in my own district. I have said to them, and I say to this House, that the responsibility of the country to the disabled men, those who are not fit to go back into civil life or to the same positions that they occupied before they went overseas, and our responsibility to the dependents of the men who fell, will never be properly discharged until we have gone to the limit of the country's resources. I submit that if we dissipate a large part of the country's resources in providing a further cash amount to physically fit men we will be thereby rendering ourselves less able to take care of the physically unfit and the dependents of those who fell. It is not because we would not like to do it. I do not believe there is a man on either side of the House but who would give his last nickel to a returned soldier who needed it. It is not because Canada does not want to do it but because there is a limit to the resources of the country, and it will tax these resources to the very limit if we take proper care of the widows and orphans of the men who fell and of the men who have come back physically unfit.

I agree heartily with the spirit of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Andrews) and with the spirit of the statement made by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster). I think there should be a committee. My wish would be that the same committee which did such splendid work last year might take hold of the subject again and give the House and the country the benefit of their judgment as to the best means of discharging our responsibility to the returned men.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, when the re-establishment question was before the House last year I did not enter into the discussion, but I favoured the appointment of a committee. When that Committee brought down a unanimous report I supported its recommendations. I think I can say that I have a mind of my own but at the same time when representative men from both sides sat in committee afternoon, night and sometimes into the morning, men who had served in the trenches, men who have given their sons in the war, men who were acknowledged to possess sound business capacity, and men coming from both political parties, I felt that I would require some very sound reason before I differed from their recommendations.

If this country could afford it I would like to see divided among the returned soldiers the $200,000,000 that was asked for. But it is impossible to do that. I accepted the report of the committee last year, and I went back home and defended my course. It was not a popular course to defend. I was often faced with criticism even by the reasonable men amongst the returned soldiers. When I told them that the committee said it was impossible for Canada to finance some of the schemes that were proposed and that we had to economize on account of the great obligations incurred through the war, they came back at me with statements to the effect that the Government was extravagant, that it was wasting money, that the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment was overmanned and that there was unnecessary expense in connection with it. They had me floored because I was not familiar with the facts in regard to the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. If, as the Government claims, the country cannot afford to expend this money, it should be the business of Parliament to see that this Government is not wasting any money. I am not saying that the charge against the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment is correct; all I am saying is that the charge was made. We should see that all these institutions controlling the affairs of the returned soldiers are manned sufficiently and economically so that we can convince the returned men that the attitude we are taking in this Parliament is backed up by actual facts.

There are cases, such as have been mentioned on the floor of the House to-day in which pensions should be provided for at this session of Parliament. I have one complaint to offer to the House and it comes from a great many of the returned men. It is in connection with housing. They have come back from overseas and they are unable to find homes to live in. They cannot avail themselves of any housing scheme in Alberta at any rate. If this Government in some way could help the returned men to acquire homes of their own, not by gift but by loan, they would remove a great deal of the criticism that exists.

Again, the suggestion was made last year —and I think it was left open for consideration—that loans should be extended beyond disabled men. I know it is impossible to grant a loan to every man who asks for it but it should be possible to consider the merits of a man just as a loan company or a bank considers them. We should assist such a man in that way provided we were satisfied that he was a gilt edged proposition and would use the money to the advantage of himself and the community in which he lived and, in due course, pay it back. If a loan scheme along this line were adopted I think it would meet the demands of the reasonable men amongst the returned soldiers. We cannot satisfy the extremists in any movement. Even if we can satisfy one reasonable man by a proposal of this kind we should try and do so in any further consideration of the case of the returned men.

I have no objection to the appointment of a Committee to consider further problems in connection with re-establishment provided it deals with the necessities of the moment and deals with questions that it is possible for the country to solve. I am convinced that it is impossible to satisfy the demands of those who are asking from this country more than it is possible for the country to raise. We should be frank and honest enough to say that. But we should attempt to deal with all the reasonable demands which are made and try and solve the question so that we can get rid, if it be possible, of the returned soldier problem, get rid of it for our own satisfaction and get rid of it so that the returned men, or the bulk of the reasonable men amongst the returned soldiers, may be satisfied.

Mr. WILLIAM GARLAND McQUARRIE (New Westminster): I also would like to say a few words on this resolution. Like the prevoius speaker I understood when I voted for the adoption of the report of the committee last session that the door would be left open for further discussion of the question of the re-establishment of the returned soldier. There are some matters which I think should be dealt with by any committee which is to be appointed and I hope the committee will be the same as the committee that acted last session. That committee, in my opinion, did excellent work, and there is no reason why they should not be asked to continue their labours and they will have the advantage of the opinions that have been expressed here to-day. I agree with the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) that some assistance should be given to university students. These are mostly youths who went overseas from the courses which they were taking. They are now unable, or perhaps some of them are unwilling, to continue their courses because of the years they have spent in service to their country. Now it seems to me that it is in the interest of Canada that these young men should be assisted to continue their courses in the university, and I hope that some means will be found to help them to do so. We must also consider the case of those just over the age of eighteen years who enlisted and served many years in the war and who now find that because they were over eighteen they are not entitled to the assistance which is being given to boys under that age. I think that age limit could very well be increased to twenty-one years, and I hope the committee will take this matter into consideration.

I was pleased to hear from the Acting Prime Minister that the Government was considering bringing in a Bill to cover the question of insurance and I support the stand which the Government is taking in that connection. I believe that a man who was physically fit when he went overseas but who finds himself unable to get insurance when he returns to Canada, should be looked after.

Then there is the question of better pensions. I believe that the pensions should be increased in amount in a great many cases, and also that the scope of the pensions granted should be enlarged. We have heard to-day of many cases of mothers and wives who should in all justice be entitled to pensions but cannot receive them because of the existing regulations, or because of the law as it stands at the present time.

I do not agree in any way with the criticisms that have been directed against the minister in charge of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. I have found that minister courteous at all times and invariably willing whenever I have had occasion to speak to him, to do what he could. But in a great many of these cases I have been met with the reply that although the minister thinks they are deserving of consideration, unfortunately owing to the regulations that are in force he can do nothing.

Another matter I would like to refer to is that of the Emergency Fund which was provided for last year. We all know that the returned men did not take advantage of that fund as we expected they would. The reason for that was that they considered it as a dole or a charity and they do not want charity—they want work. What I want to suggest is that the Government should consider opening up public works so as to give the men who are willing to work the opportunity of doing so. I do not believe in extravagant expenditures but I do believe that instead of handing out a charity dole this Government should provide work for men who are willing to do it, and in my opinion the great majority of the returned men are willing to work if that work is given to them. I know in my constituency there are a lot of men who are not saying anything, who are not making any complaints, but who are, and have been, unable to obtain employment. I hope the Government will give that matter serious consideration. I would like to go further than some hon. gentlemen have done. I would suggest to the committee that is about to be appointed the advisability of considering the granting of some assistance to those who need it if work cannot be given them, I am like all the hon. gentlemen who have spoken here to-day in that I believe first consideration should be given to the disabled men and to the dependents of those gallant fellows who gave up their lives overseas. At the same time I think there are those not classed as disabled men who are entitled to some consideration, and I would impress upon the committee that they should endeavour perhaps to go further in the direction of granting assistance to these men than has yet been attempted.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): I shall not detain the House at any length in speaking to the resolution under consideration. Let me begin by saying that I am a man of peace and not a man of war. I am not disposed to pay compliments to hon. gentlemen opposite because of the advice of a very old politician who once told me that it was a bad practice to compliment the other man for he would not believe you anyway. However, if such a thing were at all permissable to one who is so much younger I would like to say that in listening to the words of the leader of the Government—when he spoke with all the earnestness that he possesses upon this subject and said that he was doing his best—I did feel he meant every word he said. After a long life given by the right hon. gentleman to the public service of the country in all the departments he was called to administer I feel that his administration of those departments has been characterized by that thrift which, I am sure, every citizen in this country will recognize.

A complaint was made as to the work of the committees of the House. I was a member of the first committee formed to deal with the subject of pensions, and I want to say that hon. members on both sides gave to the work of that committee the best that was in them in their endeavour to do full justice by the men who had fought for a righteous cause, while not forgetting that the Administration was the custodian of the taxes of the people. That committee was presided over by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell), and occupied a great deal of the members' time, sitting morning, afternoon and evening for weeks, and they only knew what was happening in this Chamber through their perusal of Hansard or the public press. I must confess that last year when asked to again sit upon the committee I did not feel that I could give to the subject all the time that it deserved, and I sympathize with the men who did act, because I know they were intent on doing their duty between the soldier boys and the taxpayers.

I have heard complaints made about the pensions granted. Yes, those pensions might be higher. They were granted after careful study by that committee and were based upon the Workmen's Compensation Acts of various countries and upon the experience of those countries which had pension lists. It was a new incident in this country's history. We had been through a war more gigantic than has ever been seen before in the history of the world. That there should be things lacking I can conceive to be possible, and that those omissions should be remedied I conceive to be a proper stand for the soldiers to take.

I also feel, Sir, that the Soldiers' Committee, the Pensions Committee and the other committee formed to deal with the claims of soldiers have reported sufficiently to this House to have the Administration assume to-day the full responsibility of carrying out the recommendations of those committees—improving upon them where improvement is possible, and rectifying any faults that have become apparent—and I think hon. gentlemen to-day who spoke upon this subject from both sides of the House should direct all their energies towards making the Government feel their responsibility in the matter. It should not be shelved on to committees again; the Government is now fully seized of the matter and should be prepared to act.

There was a time, Sir, before the war was over and before demobilization began when we were told that the Government was well advanced in the development of a scheme by which the returned men would find all that was coming to them on their return home. That time has arrived, and our returned men who fought so bravely and were wounded deserve everything that is coming to them—not alone from the Government but from Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, I have heard it stated by some hon. members that the returned men have not been able to obtain employment—I have heard that complaint on the street, in my office, in my home, on trains, and I have read it in the press. I am not in favour of turning out all civilians in the Government service and putting returned soldiers in their places. I believe, Sir, in the Civil Service being the most efficient that we can have. I believe in the soldier having a fair share in the public service. But what I do believe in more, Sir, is that the widow, the dependent, the student and the other classes who require immediate aid should be granted that aid.

Now, as to such part of the resolution as bears upon what I have said, I am prepared to support it. But I am not prepared to go to the extent of saying that the provision made for re-establishment in civil life of the members of His Majesty's forces who served in the late war has in many cases proved inadequate. Perhaps it has. The hon. member who proposes the resolution is, however—or was until quite recently—more in the secrets of the Government than I am, and if he states there are cases wherein this resolution will help the soldiers—will help them in returning to civil life, will help them in becoming as they were before, good citizens of this Dominion, will help them for the sacrifices which they have made—then, Mr. Speaker, I will without qualification support the motion of the hon. gentleman.

On motion of Mr. H. B. Morphy (North Perth) the debate was adjourned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend who is leading the House what business we shall take up to-morrow?

Mr. ROWELL: I beg to move the adjournment of the House. Thursday is private members' day during the first four weeks of the session; therefore to-morrow is also private members' day, and any resolution which private members have on the Order Paper may be brought up for discussion. I may point out that if private members desire to have their resolutions disposed of it is desirable that they be prepared to go on at a time when there is opportunity to consider them; later in the session there may not be that opportunity.

If there is not sufficient business arising out of the resolution standing in the name of private members, Government business on the Order Paper will be taken up—resolutions standing in the name of Government members and any Bills that are ready. Some of the Bills are not yet printed in English and French; therefore we are not in a position to go on with them.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 5.50 p.m.

Thursday, March 18, 1920.

The House met at Three o'clock.

PETITIONS CALLING FOR MONEY EXPENDITURE.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to present to the House the report of the Clerk of Petitions dated the 18th of March. I would direct attention to the latter portion of this report which is as follows:

> He has also examined the following petitions and finds that as the granting of the prayer of the said petitions would involve the expenditure of public money, they should not be received.

Then he recites certain petitions which have been presented by hon. members of the House and the prayer of these petitions. It is in conformity with the invariable practice, as well as the rules of the House, that petitions of that character cannot be received.

REPORTS AND PAPERS TABLED.

Second Annual Report of the Historical Documents Publication Board, together with accompanying printed volumes, being the second edition revised and enlarged, of the first volume of the Constitutional Documents relating to Canada, 1759-1791, now issued in two parts.—Hon. Mr. Rowell.

Orders in Council together with a copy of a letter addressed to the Chairman of the Canadian Section of the International Joint Commission dated January 1, 1920, relating to the development and use of the waters of the St. Lawrence forming the boundaries between the United States and Canada.—Hon. Mr. Rowell.

Returns, Reports and Papers concerning the railway station at the Palis in the city of Quebec; appointment of harbour master in port of Canso; the dismissal of James Conner; bonds and secuurities registered; amount of Canadian securities previously held in Great Britain; refunds in tolls and duties; number of commissions appointed by the Government since 1914; number of commissions appointed since 1911; construction in the city of Quebec of a tunnel to facilitate the entrance of the Transcontinental railway; total number of persons of both sexes now employed by the Federal Government; contract between the Canadian Government, through the Canadian Wheat Growers, and Greece; construction of a dam over the St. Charles river; transfer of wharves on the St. John river.—Rt. Hon. Mr. Sifton.

RACING—DR. RUTHERFORD'S REPORT.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I beg leave to move, with the consent of the House, that seven hundred and fifty copies in English and two hundred and fifty copies in French of the report of Dr. Rutherford, commissioner appointed to inquire into racing, be printed forthwith, and that Rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE.

On the motion of Sir George Foster the name of Hon. Mr. Tolmie, Minister of Agriculture, was added to the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture.

QUESTIONS.

PUBLICATIONS IN FRENCH.

FARMERS' ACCOUNT BOOK.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Why has not the "Farmers' Account Book" been printed in French yet?
2. Why has not the publication known as the "Birds of Eastern Canada" been published in French yet?

Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. The "Farmers' Account Book" was published by the Commission of Conservation and has been printed in French. The French edition is exhausted and a new edition is now on order in the Printing Bureau.

2. "Birds of Eastern Canada" (Memoir 104, Geological Survey, Department of Mines) was published in October last, and work on a French translation was undertaken at once, and will be completed shortly. The usual practice of the department is to defer translations into French until the English editions are published. This is done in order that any additions or alterations made by the author prior to or during publication may be included in the translations.

HON. MR. BLONDIN'S TRIPS TO EUROPE.

*Mr. TOBIN:

1. How many trips has the Honourable P. E. Blondin made to England, France or any other European country since December, 1917?
2. For how long was he absent from Canada on each trip?
3. What were the total amounts of the bills submitted to the Government or any member of the Government, for expenses incurred by Mr. Blondin on these trips?
4. What was the total cost to the country of each trip to Europe made by Mr. Blondin?
5. Have all accounts incurred by Mr. Blondin when overseas been paid?
6. If not, what amounts remain unpaid?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. One.
2. From October 4, 1917, to July 5, 1918.
3. $2,433.33.
4. Answered by No. 3.
5. Yes.
6. Answered by No 5.

PRESS CENSORSHIP.

Mr. McMASTER:

1. Does the press censorship still exist?
2. If not, when did it terminate?
3. What has been the total cost of the press censorship since the 11th November, 1918?
4. How has said sum been expended?

Rt. Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. No.
2. December 31, 1919.
3. $24,693.29.
4. Salaries, $18,010.41; travelling expenses, $452.90; translations, $1,647.95; newspapers, books, etc., $118.25; printing and stationery, $804.37; rent, $2,600; lighting, $1.79; water, $76.69; sundries, including postage, telegrams, telephone conversations, freight, express, etc., $980.93.

BRIG.-GENERAL LANGTON.

*Mr. TOBIN:

1. Did Brig.-General Langton, Paymaster-General of the Militia Department, have any service overseas during the European war?
2. Was Brig.-General Langton a Lieut.-Colonel in the Canadian Army Service Corps when the war broke out in 1914?
3. What was his age at that time?
4. Did he volunteer for service overseas on mobilization in 1914 or at any other time?
5. Did he receive a communication from the officer administering the C.A.S.C. asking him whether he desired to have his name noted for service overseas?
6. What reply, if any, did he make to the communication?
7. What was the reason for Lieut.-Colonel Langton not proceeding overseas?
8. On what date was he appointed Acting Paymaster-General?
9. On what date was he appointed Finance member of Militia Council?
10. Prior to the appointment of Lieut.-Colonel J. G. Langton as Acting Paymaster-General—(a) what practical experience had he in the duties of an officer in charge of the Pay and Accounts of a Military Force, either in peace or on active service, and (b) in what capacity did he acquire this practical experience?
11. In regard to the statement by Major-General Mewburn, then Minister of Militia, in the House of Commons on the 29th April, 1919, that "as far as I am concerned every (permanent) appointment that is made will be given to a man who has seen overseas service," what is the reason for departing from this principle by the appointment of Brig.-General Langton to the Permanent Staff on the 8th of October, 1919, nearly six months after the above-quoted definite statement of the Minister of Militia?
12. What special qualifications justified the promotion of Colonel J. G. Langton to be a Brigadier-General and for his appointment as Finance Member of Militia Council?
13. Were there any officers in the Canadian Pay Corps who had the necessary qualifications and experience for appointment given to Colonel J. G. Langton? If so, why were they passed over when Colonel Langton was appointed?
14. Did Mr. J. W. Borden, the former Accountant and Paymaster-General, administer both the Accounts Branch and the Pay Branch of the Militia Department?
15. Does Brig.-General Langton only administer the Pay Branch?
16. What was the total salary paid to Mr. J. W. Borden immediately prior to his retirement?
17. What rate of pay and allowances per annum has Brig.-General Langton received since he was appointed Acting Paymaster-General?
18. What rate of pay and allowances does he receive now?

19. What is the total amount of money received by Brig.-General Langton for the twelve months ending 29th February, 1920?

20. Was Brig.-General Langton's permanent appointment made on the recommendation of the members of Militia Council?

21. Did any members of Militia Council oppose this appointment?

22. Upon what grounds was Brig.-General Langton's appointment opposed?

23. Did Colonel Edwards and Major Stiff, Chartered Accountants, investigate or inspect and report to the Minister of Militia on the condition in which they found Brig.-General Langton's branch?

24. What was the date of this report?

25. Was this report complimentary or adverse?

26. Will the report be tabled in the House in so far as it deals with the Paymaster General's Branch?

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. No.

2. Yes.

3. 46 years, 10 months.

4. Yes. He placed himself unreservedly at the disposal of Lieut.-General Sir Sam Hughes, then Minister of Militia, in August, 1914, and reported immediately for duty at Valcartier, and was detailed as Railway Transport Officer on mobilization, and Embarkation Officer of First Contingent.

5. No such communication appears on the official files of the Militia Department.

6. Answered by No. 5.

7. Lieut.-General Sir Sam Hughes, then Minister of Militia, reports as follows: "General Langton's services were placed at my entire disposal early in August, 1914. He made repeated requests to be allowed to go overseas, and I am responsible for the retention of his services in Canada, as, in view of his experience and organizing ability, I desired his services in ths country."

8. 8th February, 1918.

9. 8th October, 1919.

10. (a) and (b). After embarkation on First Contingent, General Langton was specially selected by the then Minister of Militia as Deputy Inspector General in charge of Regimental Audit and Accounts of Units of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, which work was performed by him in such an efficient manner that he was selected and appointed by the then Minister of Militia, Major-General Mewburn, as Acting Paymaster-General.

11. This partial quotation of General Mewburn's speech is further qualified in said speech, and never was intended to deprive the officers who had been compelled to remain in Canada of all future chances of either promotion or appointment, and the reason General Langton was selected was on account of his valuable services in the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

12. The financial responsibilities of General Langton as Acting Paymaster-General, owing to the fact that demobilization of the Canadian Expeditionary Force was well under way, became greater and greater, and it was considered that this officer, on account of his valuable services, deserved such promotion on appointment as Finance Member of Militia Council.

13. After due and careful consideration of the claim of Permanent Force Officers in the Pay Corps, the then Minister of Militia was of opinion that General Langton's appointment was in the best interests of the public, and, therefore, recommended to Privy Council that General Langton be appointed as Finance Member of Militia Council.

14. Yes, until such time as the burden of the administration became too heavy for one officer alone, causing his health to become impaired to such an extent that he had to retire to pension.

15. Yes.

16. As a civil servant—not an officer of the Permanent Force—he received the maximum salary of his class, i. e., $4,000 per annum.

17. 8th February, 1918, to 31st March, 1918, $6,000 per annum; 1st April, 1918, to 20th February, 1919, $7,000.

18. $7,000 per annum.

19. Pay, $7,000; travelling allowances at rates prescribed by regulation, total $172.

20, 21 and 22. Appointments to Militia Council are made on the recommendation of the Minister of Militia to Privy Council. and are not considered in Militia Council.

23, 24, 25 and 26. Colonel Edwards and Major Stiff did make an investigation of the three branches of the financial organization of the Militia Department, i. e., the Pay Branch, the General Auditor's Branch, and the Branch of the Chief Accountant. Verbal reports were made from time to time to the then Minister of Militia, and coordination between these branches proceeded at the same time as the inspection took place. At the conclusion of their work, these officers wrote a personal letter to the then minister, which was for his own information. There is no record in the department of this letter.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES IN PETERBOROUGH.

Mr. BURNHAM:

1. Are those employees of the Government in Peterborough who, by reason of age are entitled to superannuation, in receipt of the same?

2. Are they in any case retained after the age of superanuation set out in the Act?
3. If so, why?

Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

Customs and Inland Revenue—

1. One employee is entitled to superannuation. There are four employees each of whom is over 60 years of age but they do not contribute to the superannuation fund.

2. Yes.

3. The physical and mental capacity of the employee is still unimpaired and he is capable of efficiently performing his duties.

Railways and Canals—

1. The employees of the Department of Railways and Canals at Peterborough are not contributors to the superannuation fund.

2. and 3. Answered by No. 1.

Trade and Commerce—

1. The Department of Trade and Commerce has one officer who is over the age limit, but as he does not contribute to the superannuation fund, he is not entitled to superannuation.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Answered by No. 1.

4. What were the names of the employees in the Antigonish branch prior to the change and the amount of their yearly salaries?
5. What were the names of the employees in both offices on December 31, 1914, and their yearly salaries?
6. What are the names of the present employees in both branches and their respective yearly salaries?
7. How much was expended in public works in the area under the jurisdiction of the Antigonish branch for five years prior to December 31, 1911?

8. How much was expended in the public works in the area covered by both the Antigonish and North Sydney branches during the five years subsequent to January 1, 1912?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre):

For a copy of Order in Council No. 1589 for creation of a Wheat Board and for a copy of Order in Council stating salary of the Chairman and Assistant Chairman and for the providing of remuneration for travelling and living expenses, showing the amount of same and rate per day of expenses allowed, etc., etc. Also for a return showing departmental cost of the administration of the Canada Wheat Board to March, 1920, or latest date for which information is available.

Mr. ROBB (for Mr. Sinclair, Queen's):

For a copy of the report of the Committee or Commission appointed in 1919 by the Minister of Militia and Defence, of which General Morrison was Chairman, for the purpose of visiting the different Military Districts in Canada and ascertaining, among other things, the most suitable method of incorporating in the proposed reorganization of the Permanent Force the members of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces; and also the report of the said Committee on the Special Commission given them by the Minister of Militia to inquire into the return of the Military District to Prince Edward Island.

CIVIL SERVICE CLASSIFICATION.

Mr. A. E. FRIPP (Ottawa) moved:

For a copy of all representations, complaints and other correspondence filed with the Civil Service Commission regarding Classification of the Civil Service of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in asking the House for this return I desire to make one or two observations. The question of the classification of the Civil Service of Canada is a most important one, and it has proceeded now for some months, but from the information I have obtained I think it is time in the interests of the Service that a halt should be called.

Under the Act of 1918 respecting the Civil Service of Canada, the Civil Service Commission were empowered to classify the Civil Service. I submit the proper reading of the Act will be found to be that the classification was to be performed by the Civil Service Commission, or by such persons as they might engage and to be afterwards confirmed practically by the heads of the different departments.

It will be very interesting to the House I am sure to learn just how this classification has been carried out. In the first place, the Commission engaged an American firm, the Arthur Young Company of Chicago, to perform the work. I for one, Mr. Speaker, desire to register my protest against the employment of this firm.

[Mr. J. H. Sinclair.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FRIPP: If it was necessary to employ a firm of experts to classify the Civil Service—which I do not admit—surely there were persons and firms carrying on business in the Dominion quite competent to perform the work.

I asked for a return with regard to the cost up to date of the services of the Arthur Young Company, and I find that the answer given yesterday is not correct. I would like to draw the attention of the Secretary of State (Mr. Sifton) to the figures which he placed on Hansard in answer to my question. I ascertained at the Auditor General's office this morning that instead of the sum mentioned in answer to my inquiry as having been paid to these gentlemen for this work, viz., $49,-107.42, the correct figures are as follows: Up to the 31st March, 1919, $34,695.76, and for this fiscal year to the end of September last $56,536.17, or a total of $91,-231.93. The appropriation ran out in September last, so no payments have been made to the Arthur Young Company for the last five months. The Auditor General estimates that that further expenditure will be in the neighbourhood of $60,000 to the first of March.

Mr. PROULX: A great waste.

Mr. FRIPP: So the House will see that the total sum already paid and proposed to be paid to these Chicago gentlemen amounts to over $150,000.

Mr. BUREAU: Just for classification work?

Mr. FRIPP: That is for classification work only. Now, Mr. Speaker, had this work been carried out in any businesslike way, perhaps, apart from the objection I have already noted, one could not say very much against it. But I venture to submit that if a committee be named by this House to investigate the work done by these gentlemen it will be found to be most inefficient and in many respects absolutely absurd—in fact, they have attempted to classify the service without any proper idea of the work to be performed.

What do you suppose, Mr. Speaker, was the mode of procedure of these young men from Chicago, ranging from twenty-five to forty years of age, who have been performing their work in the city of Ottawa for several months past? In order to classify a department one would imagine that they would have at least gone first to the deputy minister and ascertained from him the status of the different persons under his control. No, Mr. Speaker, that was not their procedure, because that would have resulted in a very few weeks' work to complete their so-called classification. Instead of adopting that course they made out a simple card index, and every clerk in the service was handed a card with the request that he fill out his name, age, present occupation and duties. Having obtained that information the young gentlemen sat down in their office, without, I am informed, any consultation with the deputy heads of the departments, and made out a list of the civil servants with the salaries which in their opinion should attach to their positions.

In order that the House may have some idea of the manner in which this work was carried out, and the results obtained, let me give one or two illustrations. I find that dealing with the following secretarial positions the Arthur Young Company classify them in this way:

Secretary of the Civil Service Commission	$4,620
Secretary of the Pensions Board	4,200
Secretary of the Research Council	3,300
Secretary of the Post Office Department	4,200
Secretary of the Department of the Interior	2,400

Every hon. member knows that the Department of the Interior, being one of the largest and most important in the public service, requires a man as secretary with a knowledge of the department from A to Z, and to classify him as worth only $2,400 a year, while the secretary of the Civil Service Commission, who requires no knowledge at all except of clerical work, so far as I am aware, is classed as the highest of them all, is but one instance of the many absurdities contained in this so-called classification.

Then to give another example. In a certain department there are two young ladies, —I want to show to the House just how they were classified by these experts. One of them—we will call her Miss B—was appointed temporary clerk in September, 1916, was made permanent in 1918 and is now a 3-B clerk at $750 a year. She has been graded by these experts as a junior clerk at a salary of from $660 to $960 a year. Miss H, a temporary clerk in the same department, doing the same class of work, was appointed only in July, 1917, and had been classed as a 3-B clerk at $700 a year. Upon being asked for a report upon the work performed by these young ladies, the gentleman in charge of the branch replied in the case of Miss B, as follows:

> She came to us highly recommended and I have found the estimate of her ability well merited. She is a clerk of splendid qualifications and has already proved capable of taking charge of work of considerable responsibility. She holds a first-class professional certificate from the Department of Education of Ontario, also a Commercial Specialist's Certificate, and has had several years' experience as a high school teacher in Ontario. She has been rated altogether too low by the Civil Service organizers.

Of Miss H, he reports:

> This lady has been performing very good services, but as there are not enough vacancies available Miss H might well wait a year or two on account of her youth and her recent appointment.

How were these young ladies graded by this Civil Service expert? Miss H, of recent appointment, with only a year's experience in the department, is graded a class higher than Miss B, with a salary of $960 to $1,260 a year, while Miss B is rated, as I have said at $600 to $960, absolutely in defiance of the recommendation of the man who was in the best position to form an estimate of their ability.

Now, the difficulty with this classification —which, I think, ought to have been foreseen by those who brought in these experts, —is that, not having had any experience in the service, or any intimate knowledge of the manner in which the work of the different departments is carried on at Ottawa as well as in other portions of Canada,—because this classification affects all classes of the service, both inside and outside—they have classified the jobs; they have said: "This job is worth $800 a year," and they have totally disregarded the individual ability and aptitude for work of the different clerks in the several branches. The whole classification, therefore, is nothing but a stupendous farce. Any business man in this House knows that you may employ, for instance, three stenographers; one of them may be worth $900 a year to you; the other two may be worth $500 or $600 a year, but under this classification they are all put in at $900 a year without any distinction at all as to their respective merits and qualifications. These illustrations, Mr. Speaker, ought to show the House that the work of classification has been very badly done, and if I may offer any advice to the Government it is that they get rid of these gentlemen at the earliest possible moment, and call in the deputy ministers and the chief clerks of the different departments who, I venture to say, can classify the public service of Canada in a much more efficient way than has been done by these experts.

These gentlemen have also been asked to deal with the re-organization of the Printing Bureau. It is hard to know what department or what minister has control of the Printing Bureau, but one would have thought, having regard to the manner in which these American gentlemen have dealt with the other departments, that in the reorganization of the Printing Bureau the King's Printer or the Assistant King's Printer or both would be the men to say who should be laid off and who should be retained when the staff was being reduced. But you will be surprised when I tell you that, if my information is correct, this young gentleman, so-called expert, goes down to the Printing Bureau and, under the authority of the Government, selects two classes of men who are to be laid off: Men over 65 years of age and the men whom he thinks—whom he thinks, forsooth—are inefficient. Now, whether or not the gentleman who undertook this work in the Printing Bureau is an expert in the printing business I do not know, but I do know that upon his recommendation hundreds of men have been laid off or are to be laid off, many of whom are amongst the most efficient men in the Printing Bureau and are under the age of 65. I need mention only one name. A sub-foreman named Pritchard, under forty years of age, one of the best men we had in the Bureau, has been laid off by this so-called expert on the ground of inefficiency, although the King's Printer and the Assistant King's Printer tell me that he was one of the most efficient men in the branch of the department in which he was employed. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is patronage of the worst kind. To hand over to Americans the authority to go into the public service of Canada or any part thereof and to say to John Smith, "You shall stay," and to William Brown, "You shall go," is patronage of the worst kind and should not be tolerated by this Government who are responsible to the people. Personally I am opposed to going back to the patronage system; I had some experience in that regard as member for Ottawa during the past ten years. But in my judgment this classification by this American concern has done more to weaken the policy of this Government in connection with placing the control of appointment under the Civil Service Commission of Canada than any other thing could possibly have done. The Government have probably not been made aware as I have been made aware of the conditions that are existing in the Service to-day. Ninety-five per cent of the members of the Civil Service to-day are upset. They are discouraged; a feeling of unrest prevails among them. Why, Mr. Speaker, in the Department of Mines alone nine-tenths of the scientific men there employed have resigned during the last six months. Most of them, of course, have been offered and will receive a much higher remuneration than the Government has been giving them, but many of them have told me that having regard to the advantages of being in the service, having regard to the fact that they were doing work that they liked and with which they were thoroughly familiar, they had been willing to forego the increased emoluments offered to them from outside in the hope of expectation of their receiving a proper superannuation to provide for their older days. They were, however, compelled to leave the service on account of the classification. What has happened? I am informed, on very good authority, that this condition of affairs has reached such a pass, especially in the scientific branches of the service, that another commission, consisting of three very estimable gentlemen, has been called in to go over and pass upon the work that has been done by the firm of Arthur Young and Company.

I felt it my duty, as this matter affects not only the Civil Service in the city of Ottawa which I have the honour to represent, but the Civil Service of Canada as a whole, to bring it to the attention of the Government and to urge upon them to withdraw from the Civil Service Commission the power that they have given them to employ these American gentlemen, to dispense with the services of these gentlemen at once, and to have the service reorganized by the men most competent to do so, namely, the deputy ministers and their respective chief clerks.

Mr. JOHN H. BURNHAM (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that the fault which has now been exploded, if I may say so, by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp), was the work of the members of this House who put themselves on record as being unfit to recommend anybody for anything. The members having declared that they were unfit for that duty, it only remained for the Government to take up the job. Possibly these hon. gentlemen knew themselves best and whether they were fit or unfit, but for myself I took the opposite course. The only distinction between what was done in the old days and the course adopted at the present time as outlined by my hon. friend, (Mr. Bureau), is simply this: You have removed the responsibility one degree further from the electorate; you have centralized it instead of leaving it in the hands of those who were not only directly but immediately responsible to the people. If any hon. gentleman, we shall say, of the Opposition, made a false or bad recommendation or passed upon a recommendation in a wrong way, he would be immediately brought to time by the electorate. But the present system as to recommendations has been adopted instead of leaving the responsibility in the hands of the representatives of the people. I admit, of course, that if the people are no good and their representatives are no good, it is all up; but if the representatives are fit and proper men, as they ought to be, then notwithstanding what they have said about themselves, the stigma they have left upon themselves, the very low value they have set upon their own characters——

Mr. BUREAU: I rise to a point of order. My point of order is that I do not wish to accept the statement that I have stigmatized myself. I deny that.

Mr. BURNHAM: The hon. member has risen to a point of order. A stigma is a point, and a point is that which is without dimensions.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member (Mr. Bureau) has risen to a point of order. I must say, in all deference, that I do not see that the remarks of the hon. member for Peterborough West reflect in any way on the character of any hon. gentleman in this House. It is his opinion that by the House taking a certain course, it has stigmatized itself, but I do not understand his remarks as casting a reflection on any member.

Mr. BURNHAM: Quite so, Mr. Speaker. I had no intention of casting any reflection; they cast their own shadow. But the members having by their own indifference given out of their own hands the duty of looking after the Civil Service, inside and outside, and having handed over their responsibility to the Government, what could the Government do but centralize the authority and centralize patronage in itself? Since they had been told by the representatives not to look at them, not even to dare to speak to them with regard to anything concerning their constituencies and any recommendations in connection with their constituencies, what could the Government do but consult other people in the constituencies? The fact of the matter is simply this, that the members of the House, through laziness, indifference, or failure to see what was coming, handed over the authority and responsibility which belonged to them. In this, they were helped on by the newspapers who saw the ebb and flow of a sensation and who simply hurried them into this catastrophe, and here we are with $150,000 worse than wasted. I have no doubt that the press when they have discovered this error, will take up the matter again and blame the House of Commons for what they have done, and the press will be quite right. There is no getting away from the fundamental principle, that if you are not honest, no system will make you honest. It is not the system; it is the administration——

Mr. BUREAU: The legislation.

Mr. BURNHAM: Not the legislation; legislation is only the expression of the will of people who have no will.

Let me say, however, in closing, that if you are going to renounce the fundamental principle that an honest man will do honest work; that those who have brains enough and application should receive promotion and pay; and if the people and their representatives cannot be trusted to carry out a simple thing like that, then it is all up.

Mr. SPEAKER: I trust, if any other hon. members speak upon this motion, they will not broaden the question unduly. The question of patronage might be indirectly referred to in this matter, but it is my duty to point out that this is a specific motion calling for papers having to do with the classification of the Civil Service of Canada.

Mr. EDMOND PROULX (Prescott): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp) has mentioned several cases where the so-called experts have failed to appreciate the importance of the duties of certain civil servants. I want to mention another case, which is a glaring one. They classified the translators of the debates of this House and of the Senate, of legislation and of the different departments, and they put those translators into the class where the minimum is $1,260; contending that their qualifications would be those of high school graduates. Any one who has had experience with high schools in Ontario knows very well that the French language is not taught sufficiently in those schools —and I think the same may be said of high schools in other provinces—to qualify high school graduates to be translators of the debates of this House or of departments of the public service. The position of a translator to-day is, one might say, a profession, and it requires a university education in both languages; a man must follow a course of studies as long as if he were studying for a profession, and it is absurd to say that a man who has gone through a university and acquired a thorough knowledge of both languages should be put into a class where his salary would begin at $1,260. If that is going to be the case, we shall have very poor translators; many of those who are already in the service, if they are not too old to get out, will get out, and those who will replace them will certainly not be as well qualified as those who have left the service. There are many other cases; but I want to point out especially this case, and I am of the same opinion as the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Burnham) that the money spent in employing these so-called experts was worse than wasted.

The Civil Service of this country is composed of different branches, and we have two languages. How did the so-called experts know what qualifications were required of officers whose duties included work in both languages? We had Canadians much better qualified, and I do not see why it was necessary to go to the United States to get so-called experts to do this work. The Government must have gone back on their policy of past years. It was not so long ago when they would have no truck or trade with the Yankees, but now they cannot classify the Civil Service in this country without going to the United States for experts. I think there has been too great a tendency on the part of the Government for some years past to "pass the buck," to shelve their responsibilities to commissions and experts. Who could be better qualified to classify the Civil Service of this country than the deputy ministers and the chiefs of the different branches of the service? I do not think any better qualified men could have been chosen. They knew the personnel of the service, their qualifications, and the importance of the duties pertaining to the different offices. What could men from Chicago or New York know of the importance of the duties, for instance, of the secretary of the Interior Department? My hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Fripp) has pointed out the glaring inconsistencies in classifying secretaries of the different departments. I would also like to cite the classification of the Translation Branch. If we wish to have efficient service rendered by that branch it will be necessary to have it re-classified by genuine experts, such as university professors, who have been educated in both the French and English languages.

[Mr. Proulx.]

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there is no objection whatever to the motion made by my hon. friend (Mr. Fripp), but in view of some of his observations I think it is only right that a few words should be said lest a wrong impression might be created, and I am sure my hon. friend does not desire that.

I regret that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) who, while a member of the Government, looked after this branch of the work, and who is familiar with all its details, is not in the House. He has followed this reclassification from its inception and knows all about it. I am not in possession of all the information, and therefore am not able to inform the House as I should like to be able to do with reference to a number of matters mentioned by my hon. friend, but as a member of the Government I have a general knowledge of the situation, and am therefore able to correct some of the misunderstandings which I fear my hon. friend has fallen into.

As the members of the House will recall, the general Civil Service Act which was passed in the year 1918 made provision for the reclassification of the service. This Act was passed by this House and at that time the question raised by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) was a perfectly proper question to raise. The hon. member has been consistent throughout. He did not believe that the proposal to put all appointments in the public service under the Civil Service Commission was a wise one in the public interest, but at that time this House affirmed the principle of putting the Civil Service under the Civil Service Commission and it provided for a reclassification of the service. Members of the House who are familiar with the service know that prior to that time the inside service was classified, and I think some sections of the outside service had been brought under a measure of classification. So far as the inside service is concerned, it was divided into one, two, or three classes, with various grades in those classes, and men were placed in these different classes, not necessarily in accordance with the importance of the actual work they were doing, but in many cases because of the length of time they had been in the service. A man entering the public service might continue to perform exactly the same duties year after year over a long period of years and yet by means of being promoted from one class to another have his salary very greatly increased. The result is that there are men in the service who under the old classification are being paid twice the amount—I use that figure roughly, I am not familiar with the details—that others are receiving who are doing exactly the same class of work, simply because they had been longer in the service, or had been pushed forward when others had not been pushed forward. In different departments of the Government, under the old classification, men performing the same class of work were in different classes, and were paid different salaries. Every one recognized that it does not promote efficiency in the service to have men doing exactly the same class of work paid radically different salaries, nor does it promote efficiency to have one man paid a smaller salary than the man who is performing much less important work in the same branch. But that situation did exist under the old classification. Now the House in 1918 affirmed not only the principle of placing civil servants under the Civil Service Commission, but of providing for a reclassification of the service. Reclassification was entrusted by the Act to the Civil Service Commission. They were authorized and instructed to undertake the work, and in undertaking that work they called to their assistance Arthur Young & Company. Speaking for myself I had never heard of that firm until they were retained by the Civil Service Commission for this work. The Commission advised the Government, and I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of the advice they gave, that after canvassing the whole field the best experts who could be secured for the purpose of undertaking this most important and responsible work—the largest civil service classification ever undertaken up to that time on this Continent—was Arthur Young & Company. This firm had a large number of experts with a very high reputation in classification work, and so it was called in to assist the Civil Service Commission in classifying the service. Arthur Young & Company are not responsible for the classification: The Civil Service Commission is responsible for it.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU: Did Arthur Young & Company or the Civil Service Commission make the classification?

Mr. ROWELL: The Civil Service Commission.

Mr. BUREAU: Then what was the object in calling in Arthur Young & Company?

Mr. ROWELL: They were the experts who advised the Commission and did the detail work, just as my hon. friend when he was in charge of one of the departments of the Government was responsible for the work of that department, although the actual work was performed by the men under him in that department.

Mr. BUREAU: And I chose them myself.

Mr. ROWELL: The Civil Service Commission chose these men themselves.

Mr. BUREAU: Were Arthur Young & Company brought here to tell the Civil Service Commission what kind of work was being done by each branch of every department?

Mr. ROWELL: No, they were not.

Mr. BUREAU: Then what was the use of their services?

Mr. ROWELL: They were here to advise and assist the Civil Service Commission in working out the reclassification—

Mr. BUREAU: They knew nothing about it.

Mr. ROWELL: —and that is what they have done. They continued their work during the year 1918 and the greater part of the year 1919. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) laid on the table of the House last year the result of the reclassification up to date. He introduced a Bill approving of that reclassification. That Bill was referred to a committee of this House for consideration and report. That committee of this House had Arthur Young and Company before them, they had all the information before them and after the committee had considered the matter they reported the Bill and the reclassification back to this House. With that report before it, the House passed the Bill. Whether that action was wise or unwise, this House is responsible for the principles embodied in that classification. This House adopted it and it is that classification that is being worked out.

One or two words with reference to certain other points which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fripp) has raised because in respect to these he is under a misapprehension, as I know by reason of matters which have come under my observation in my own department. My hon. friend said that the method by which they collected information about the work of the public service was a card index, a card being sent out to each civil servant on which he should write out his present position and the character of the work that he was doing. That is perfectly correct but it was required that the deputy minister or head of his department or branch should approve that statement before it came back to the Civil Service Commission. Whatever the definition of the duties of any man in the Civil Service might be, it only came back to the commission with the approval of the deputy minister or the head of the branch concerned. All the information that the Civil Service Commission has received has gone to it with the approval of the deputies or the heads of the different departments.

What was the duty of the Civil Service Commission and their experts when they had received these cards defining the duties? It was to seek to classify them so as to secure a measure of uniformity in all branches of the public service. My hon. friend has referred to stenographers. Well, take stenographers; is it right that stenographers of the same skill and ability should be receiving $200 or $300 more in one branch of the public service than that same class of stenographer is receiving in another?

Mr. BUREAU: It depends on the work.

Mr. ROWELL: I refer to equal quality of work in all branches of the public service. My hon. friend has taken stenographers as an illustration of the classification. They create different classes of stenographers with a different scale of remuneration depending upon their skill in stenography. I have not the figures before me and I am not able to state the range of the salary among stenographers. I know there is a wide range. I think they start at $800 or $900 in one class and go up to $1,500, or something like that although I am not sure of the figures. There is a wide range between the lowest and the highest grade of stenographers. All stenographers in all branches of the service are classified on this basis. New stenographers coming in all come in at the same rate of pay in every branch of the public service. When stenographers in any branch of the service have attained a degree of efficiency which entitles them to promotion to a higher class, they are promoted to that higher class. That is the principle which applies to other classes and branches of the service. The basis of the classification is that all employed in the public service should be paid in accordance with the character and quality of the work they do, not in accordance with the personal will or likes of any minister or any deputy minister or any member of Parliament; not according to their political affiliations and not necessarily according to their length of service except there is some advantage in length of service because there is a provision for annual increases in these different classes. The basis of the classification is payment in accordance with the value of the work done.

Mr. BUREAU: What about the ability of the worker?

Mr. ROWELL: And the ability of the worker. Take the class that I have mentioned—stenographers. They cannot be appointed as stenographers until they have passed a qualifying examination which indicates that the person is qualified for the post. That is, when a stenographer first comes into the service all who enter are paid on that basis. After they have been admitted to the service and are doing more advanced work they are entitled to go into a higher class.

Mr. COPP: Who examines them in the case of the promotion examination?

Mr. ROWELL: The Civil Service Commission is responsible for the examinations for promotion as well as those for entrance into the public service. I am quite aware that there has been dissatisfaction in the Civil Service in connection with this matter. It would be impossible that the situation could be otherwise with the classification of a service of 50,000 employees. It is only right that the House should know that if the Civil Service Commission, and if the experts, had been willing to give a general advance in salaries beyond what would have been justified, much of the opposition would have been removed. They came to the Government, submitted the case and said: "The fact is that tremendous pressure is being brought to bear upon us to move up the classes beyond what we think is right and in the public interest, and to move up salaries beyond what people could earn in similar positions outside the public service; it means the expenditure of public money; what do you want us to do; the question of finance is peculiarly a matter for the Government, do you want us to yield to this pressure from the Civil Service and move salaries up beyond what we think is right and in the public interest or do you want us to do what we think is right?" The Government said: "Your duty is to do what you think is right in classifying the Civil Service of Canada and we will stand behind you in doing it."

Mr. BEST: Did the Government do their duty by increasing the salaries of a number of people from $100 to $1,000 when this report was expected down at any moment? Was the Government justified in putting into the Estimates increases in salaries ranging from $100 to $1,000 a year for certain members of the public service when this report was expected down at any moment?

Mr. ROWELL: There were in the Estimates, as my hon. friend (Mr. Best) has said, in 1918, or 1919—

Mr. BEST: 1919.

Mr. ROWELL: —in the spring of 1919 before the classification had gone into effect, the names of certain officials appeared in the Estimates for increased salaries. I do not question what my hon. friend has said. Personally, I have no hesitation in saying that I think the Government made a mistake in including any names in the Estimates brought down in the year 1919. I think all should have stood over until the Civil Service Commission report was brought before the House. These, however, were very few; there were very few cases of that but I think we made a mistake when we did it at all. We should have left all over until the classification was brought down—I have no hesitation in saying that. We are not infallible, we do make some mistakes and that is one that we made in connection with the Civil Service.

My hon. friend has referred to the question of the experts and the employment of experts is a difficult question. I know it because I have had difficulty myself in retaining chemical experts in the Food Adulteration Branch of the Department of Health. I was called upon to look into this matter by reason of the difficulties arising in this branch of the service owing to the retirement of a number of men from the service. It was stated to me that the reason for their retirement was because of the unsatisfactory result of the classification. I looked into the matter, and I found the fact to be that the re-classification provided a substantial advance for those men over the salary which obtained under the existing Civil Service regulation. But while the re-classification provided for an advance, the fact was that commercial institutions were in a position to pay them very much more than even the advanced figure, and as a result they left the Civil Service and accepted these commercial positions. Now it may be that the demand for expert service is so great at the present time, it may be that commercial institutions are in a position to pay so much for skilled and trained experts, that the Government of Canada must substantially increase its payment if it is to retain those experts in the public service. I want to point out, however that the responsibility for the existence of these conditions does not rest on the Civil Service Commission or the experts advising them. They did provide for a substantial increase over the salaries previously being paid. It may be, as I say, we will have to review the whole situation and provide for the payment of experts in the public service on a substantially higher scale than has been paid in the past, or the country may entirely lose the benefit of the service of such men.

Then my hon. friend has referred to the classification of the individual in the service. I may tell the House and my hon. friend, that the classification as framed and set out in the Act, or in the schedule to the Act, simply defines the different classes in the different branches of the service. To apply that classification to the existing service is a matter of great difficulty and in that application of the classification the deputies are all consulted and always consulted. The application of the classification is submitted to them and they are consulted with reference to it, but under the Act, final authority is in the Civil Service Commission. The Act of last session authorized the Civil Service Commission to review, or amend, or modify any of the classes provided for in the report laid before Parliament. Since that time the Commission has been busy reviewing the classification where complaint has been made, and I am glad to be able to inform my hon. friend that in the great majority of cases the result has been to give satisfaction to the parties concerned. A Board of Hearing has been formed consisting of two representatives of the Civil Service themselves, two deputy ministers and a member of the Civil Service Commission, which Board hears the complaints and appeals from the classification, and as a rule it is able to reach a reasonable degree of unanimity in its conclusions. The Civil Service Commission has always acted upon its findings and when the decisions arrived at come to the Governor in Council, I believe we have invariably approved them. In cases where particular individuals are dissatisfied with the application of the classification in a department they may appeal direct to the Civil Service Commission and the Commission hears that appeal and disposes of it. The members of the House will realize that in classifying such an enormous service mistakes are bound to occur. I have had matters brought to my attention where I think mistakes did occur and where a better result might have been secured, but those are all being rectified. The Civil Service Commission is dealing with the matter, and I believe is earnestly, faithfully, and effectively working out the application of the classification solely from the standpoint of the public interest and what is absolutely necessary for the Service. We should give the Commission a chance to do so, and give them a thorough opportunity, in the reclassification of a public service as extensive as ours is in Canada, to prove its worth and show what the results will be. While in my own department there have been some applications of the classification which I think could be improved it has not at all shaken my faith in the merits of the system, in the wisdom of Parliament in adopting it, nor in the beneficial results that will come to Canada when it is thoroughly worked out, and I believe it will mean a great deal to the efficienry of the whole service.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers): My hon. friend stated just now that he did not have full information about this matter. Could he give me any information with respect to the rule followed in classifying translators, for example, and state under what classification these gentlemen come?

Mr. ROWELL: I am sorry I cannot answer my hon. friend's question because I really have not the information except that I know there are different classes of translators. What the limits of the classification are I cannot say, but I shall be glad to get the desired information for my hon. friend.

Mr. BUREAU: My reason for asking the question is because of the difficulty, if not impossibility, of correctly classifying translators. They must be first class men possessing not only a thorough knowledge of both languages but considerable literary and scientific attainments.

Mr. ROWELL: I agree with my hon. friend that a translator must not only be well educated and thoroughly understand both languages but that he should have literary qualifications also.

[Mr. Rowell.]

Mr. BUREAU: Likewise technical.

Mr. ROWELL: These qualifications are necessary in order to enable them to translate from one language into another in a style that will be accurate and suitable in literary form. At the same time I think my hon. friend will not dispute the fact that there are degrees of efficiency and qualification even among translators. Nature and long experience will doubtless qualify one man much better than another.

Mr. BUREAU: Naturally.

Mr. ROWELL: Long experience will greatly help one man over another.

Mr. BUREAU: But nature must have done its part first.

Mr. ROWELL: A distinction might properly be drawn between translators that have just entered the service and are doing work not of great importance and translators of long experience engaged upon more important work.

I do not think it is necessary to add anything further. I only wished to make those general observations with reference to the work of re-classification lest there should be a misunderstanding owing to the remarks of my hon. friend.

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER (Laval-Two Mountains): Let me draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that there is a difference between the translators of debates and the translators in other departments. The debates translators are under the control of the House of Commons and are dealt with by the Debates Committee. When a vacancy occurs examinations are supposed to be held under the supervision of the Chief Translator. Some years ago when I was a member of the Debates Committee it used to meet regularly but of late I have not heard of the committee holding any sittings. It seems to have vanished.

Now, to come to my point. If the debates translators are under the control of the Speaker, how is it that the so-called experts in classification claimed the right of classifying those officials? Have they a right to usurp the authority of a committee of this House and to classify employees who are specifically under the control of Parliament? All the other members of the Civil Service in the various departments are under the authority of the Civil Service Commission, but the translators and the reporters of the debates, I repeat, are under the control of this House, and I think I am right in denying to the so-called experts any power to interfere with the Debates Committee. There is great confusion in regard to the classification of the translators and official reporters of the House of Commons and of the Senate, and it should be cleared up.

My hon. friend has just reminded us that when the Hon. Mr. Maclean presented the Classification Bill last year he stated that the civil servants would have an opportunity of stating their grievances to an Appeal Committee of the Civil Service Commission. Those men are very anxious to know what remedies they now possess in regard to this faulty classification, and before the first of April, when the classification is to take place, I think the Government should take the steps mentioned by my hon. friend for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp), with whose remarks I am perfectly in accord. I have myself on the Orders of the Day a motion for papers in regard to the same matter, but I did not expect this question would be brought up to-day. I have not one or two, but fifty, complaints from civil servants with respect to the reclassification.

In regard to the scientific men in the service, I wonder how many analysts are now employed in the Department of Inland Revenue? If I am well informed, twenty of the most efficient have resigned and only four now remain; those who have left the service having been offered better salaries outside. The classification of their positions was simply ridiculous, and I am confident that the classification of other branches is equally ridiculous.

I endorse the remarks made by my hon. friend for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp), and when the opportunity comes next week I shall be glad to furnish to this House complete information in regard to the way this classification has been worked out, and the injustice which is bound to follow by its application to the service.

Mr. FRIPP: Mr. Chairman, ——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must remind the House that the hon. member is about to exercise his right to close the debate, and if any hon. member desires to add anything to the debate he should speak now.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I have followed with a great deal of interest the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp) with reference to the Civil Service classification, I might remind him and other hon. members that we have been discussing this subject quite a number of times. I remember that about a year ago we appointed a committee to inquire into the Civil Service, and that committee subsequently made a report. I am sorry to say that I do not think the Civil Service were able to get any great results from that committee. I have no doubt they worked faithfully, but their investigation was conducted more or less concurrently with the classification efforts of the firm brought from the United States, and I imagine the two bodies were working at cross-purposes.

Let me say to the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp) that the first thing that struck me as serious was what he declares to be the system of dismissals. I watched with interest the answer of the President of the Privy Council to that point, and, if I followed him correctly, I do not think he touched on it at all. If a man has rendered faithful service he had a right to expect generous treatment at the hands of the Government in regard to promotion and otherwise. I think if what my hon friend for Ottawa stated is correct—and I have no reason to doubt it; it is not controverted by any member of the Government—that men of the highest standing of their grade in the service are dismissed without any investigation whatever, except some man stepping into an office, where perhaps there are thirty men working, and, with his eye on one of them, tossing a cent and saying, "Heads you stay, tails you go out," —that appears to me to be a very poor system of dealing with such an important service. I do hope that if there is to be a certain weeding out of the department the greatest possible care will be taken and that some more reasonable system will be established and followed by the Government than that described by the hon. member. I must accept his description as being correct, for I noticed that the hon. gentleman who spoke for the Government, and who is always ready to put forward everything that can be said in defence of the Government—

Mr. ROWELL: Will the hon. gentleman allow me? I do not think I should permit my hon. friend to make any such assumption. I did not speak on that point because I had not the details, but I am quite sure when the facts are investigated it will be found that every consideration has been given to retaining men in the service. In the public interest it is most desirable to release those whose services are not required. Where such men are released the Government has made provision for them and the House has voted money by way of recognition.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not think the hon. President of the Privy Council has any right to interrupt on that point and for that reason. My hon. friend knows the rules that would govern if during the course of an address to a jury I stated that there was no evidence on a certain point, and the learned counsel on the other side stood up and said: "If the judge will allow me I am going out into the highways and byways to get evidence on that point, which I will produce the week after next." My hon. friend knows that in a case of that kind the judge and jury would have to deal with the matter on the spot, taking the evidence as it stood. In view of the fact that no remarks have been offered by the President of the Council to justify the course that the Government are taking in regard to dismissals, I do not think he was up to his usual form in interrupting me and stating that some day in the dim future the Government are going to do better; are going to adopt some other system that will be more humane in dealing with their servants. For the present, Sir, we have to accept the statement of the member for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp) and believe that this is the unsystematic, unscientific and improper manner in which the Government are dealing with their servants, with men who may be called workmen, because they are workmen in the service of the Government and of the country generally.

No one in this House who has had any experience in public life has any doubt as to why it is so extremely difficult to grade and keep graded the civil servants. When this Government came into office they dismissed 11,000 civil servants—at least, that was the record up to last year—and in their places appointed 24,000. Now, these 24,000 were dumped upon the deputy ministers, and the deputy ministers could not leave them standing on the streets or in the halls of the public offices; they had to put them somewhere—twelve here, ten there, five somewhere else, and absolute confusion was the result. Moreover, when we start to grade them, the men who are in charge cannot do it because there was no system about it; many were dumped into positions that were not required to be filled, simply because places had to be found for men who were chosen by ministers for appointment, possibly in fulfilment of an ill-advised promise made before or during the election. That is why this classification has run beyond the power of the deputy ministers and why these outside men were called in to do the work.

Why, Sir, extraordinary positions have been given to men in the public service. I was told the other day of a young fellow who shortly after this Government took office came to one of the departments seeking a position and bearing a letter from one of the ministers to the deputy minister. Well, there was nothing for him to do; the department was already overcrowded. However, there could be no such thing as the deputy minister turning down the recommendation of the minister, so this fellow was given a position. "What shall I do?" he said. "Oh well, we have nothing for you to do, but you can carry some books from this room to that room and carry them back; keep moving around from day to day and possibly something will turn up." After a few days this young man, who, having come from the country, was more or less conscientious and unused to such trickery, said to the deputy minister: "There must be something wrong; I find a fellow following me around all the time; no matter where I go this fellow dogs me continually; when I go to one place, he is there; when I come back, he is after me. I am not going to stay here." "Oh," said the deputy, "don't be surprised at that; you are all right; that fellow is your helper." When things are carried on in that way is it any wonder that it is difficult to grade the civil servants and to determine what wages such a man as I have spoken about should get, and what his helper should get?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Would my hon. friend give names and dates?

Mr. McKENZIE: It is entirely unnecessary to give names and dates.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If you do not, you spoil the story.

Mr. McKENZIE: This has been going on every day for the last eleven years—at least since this Government came into power—and to give such a string of figures as this would involve would be confusing even to the astute and analytical mind of my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster). I mention only this instance; it will be sufficient to make my right hon. friend see that the difficulty has been that we have too many men and not enough places for all. When you have ten men whom you must dispose of in some way without dismissing them but have only one position to fill, the situation becomes a difficult one.

I can see no reason, unless it be timidity, why the Civil Service Commissioners should not have themselves determined the remuneration and avoided the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars involved in bringing people from a foreign country to tell them what they should do and what wages the men should get. I think that is a remarkable display of weakness on the part of the Commission. The President of the Privy Council told us—he will correct me if I am wrong—that the gentlemen who compose this Commission came to the Government, said that they were overwhelmed with demands for higher salaries, and asked: "What shall we do? Shall we meet these demands by giving higher salaries than we think is right, or shall we stand by our own judgment?" Surely a Commission whose duty it is to select men for the public service and to designate proper salaries for them should stand their ground, do their work, serve the country, or resign. But evidently the Government consented that the Commission should not discharge their duty and that they should, at the expense of the ratepayers of this country, send to the United States for a most expensive commission and have it sit here for months to tell them what they should do. That is, in effect, the declaration that was made by the President of the Council here to-day; there is no denying it. I cannot find any justification for the Government standing by an institution of that kind. Why, Sir, what can you expect from an institution of that kind? What decision, what judgment, what organization can be expected from this Civil Service Commission, when they had not the sagacity or the backbone to decide how much salary this man, that man, or the other man in the public service should get? It is an evidence of frightful weakness; it is an indication that there should be some improvement along that line or that some other course should be taken by which civil servants may be protected and the treasury of the country looked after better than it is. There should not be more civil servants than are necessary properly to carry on the business of the country. There is plenty of room for men and women in other walks of life throughout Canada; there is sufficient demand for employment outside to let the Civil Service be relieved of the overwhelming burden which it now seems to carry, with unsatisfactory results to the Government and to the country. I again remind the member for Ottawa and the Government that the difficulties which they meet to-day in connection with the Civil Service are due to the wonderful promises that were made before and during the election of 1917. Civil servants were told that wonderful things were to come to them by reason of this re-classification; and as a result, in the city of Ottawa itself there was an overwhelming majority for the Government, a much greater majority than had been the case in previous years. Civil servants were made to believe that the Government was to be returned to power, and that when it came back to power this re-classification measure was to be introduced and wonderful things would come to them. The Government was returned to power, the re-classification took place; but the wonderful things have not come to the civil servants. Consequently, the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp) and the Government find these chickens coming home to roost and these difficulties that now overwhelm them. But let me say that I hope a proper classification will be made and that the classification will be kept in order from year to year, from month to month and from day to day as men are coming into the service. If you go into any first class academy in any of the counties of Ontario or anywhere else, you will find that the principal of that academy has no difficulty in grading his pupils; he puts them into the proper places, because the grading is looked after systematically and properly from time to time, and the authorities have some conception of how that grading should be done. But if you take the whole ten or fifteen departments of any high school of this country and dump them together, the kindergarten with the high school pupil and ask a man to go in amongst them and grade them, you are asking him something that no human being can do. When, however, things are done properly, systematically and from day to day and as they ought to be done, there will be no trouble, and I would bring to the notice of my right hon. friend that if he will get out of this frightful muddle and get those departments into proper shape once for all, henceforth this Government or whatever Government may be in power in this country should see to it that no one is taken into the Civil Service who is not required; that if any one's services are required, he should be properly graded and put into the proper place, and that the country receives proper service for proper salaries paid.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I rise only for the purpose of asking a question. Is it the intention of the Government to see that a classification is made of the employees of the House of Commons? I understand that the Civil Service Commission takes the position that it has no jurisdiction over the employees of either the Senate or the House of Commons, and that the House of Commons should look after the classification of its own employees. If that be so, I would suggest the advisability of having a committee of this House appointed for the purpose of making that classification. It would not be fair to the members of this House and it would not be proper that such classification should be made by any officer or set of officers and then submitted to the House for approval at the end of the session. Such a course would not be treating this House fairly, and I would, therefore, suggest that a committee be appointed for the purpose.

Mr. ROWELL: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is only by the unanimous consent of the House that the hon. minister can answer the question as he has already exercised his right to speak on this motion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Perhaps the leader of the Government might answer.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I should much prefer that my colleague do so.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I take it for granted that the House gives its unanimous consent that the hon. minister may answer the question.

Mr. ROWELL: My information is not quite that of the hon. member. While I speak subject to correction, because I am not as familiar with this classification as I should like to be, my impression is that, under the Act of last session, the Civil Service Commission classifies the positions of the staffs of the Senate and the House of Commons. Then the classification is submitted to the Speaker for submission to and approval by the House. When that is approved, the classification will be applied to the Senate and House of Commons' staffs. But I shall be glad to look into the matter further and give my hon. friend fuller information, and it may be that it will be desirable, if not necessary, to have a committee appointed to deal with the matter.

Mr. ALFRED ERNEST FRIPP (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, I just wish to make one or two observations in reply to the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) who is not as well equipped with the facts pertaining to the matter as he usually is when he addresses the House. If I understood him correctly, he stated that the deputy ministers approved this classification. He must have forgotten that last session a deputation from the deputy ministers appeared before a committee of the Senate and protested vigorously against the classification as rendering the Civil Service inefficient. Amongst them was Mr. Boville, a most efficient servant in the Finance Department, who has since left the service, and one of his reasons for leaving the service—I do not think I am breaking any promise that I made to him when he told me—was that he found that under the classification of these so-called experts he had not the control over his department that he ought to have and, therefore, he could not remain in the public service. Another deputy minister is Mr. Newcombe, also a very efficient servant, and I think another is Dr. Coulter of the Post Office Department, and all these gentlemen protested vigorously against this classification as rendering the Civil Service absolutely inefficient instead of efficient as we all desire it to be.

Mr. ROWELL: The hon. member evidently did not hear me——

Mr. FRIPP: Very likely I did not.

Mr. ROWELL: What I said was that the deputy ministers were consulted with reference to the classification and so on. I did not say that they had approved it, because I do not know whether they did or not.

Mr. FRIPP: The deputy ministers were consulted as to the form of the index cards. They approved the information which each clerk gave; they simply gave their approval as to his correctly stating his name, age, work and salary; but they have never approved, and I do not think they approve the classification as prepared for their staffs. If I understood the President of the Privy Council correctly, he said there was promotion provided for. I should like to inform him that if this classification goes into effect, there will be practically no promotion for civil servants. You might as well write above the doors of our departmental buildings "Abandon hope all ye who enter here," because these classifications are absolutely fixed. A man is put into a certain grade and his duties are defined, and the deputy finds that when he says to a clerk: "I have work for you to do in another room," the clerk replies: "Oh, I do not work there; my duties are so and so and my salary is so and so." You have absolutely lost control of your staff.

Mr. STEELE: When a vacancy occurs, is there any opportunity for promotion?

Mr. FRIPP: I was going to give an example of what happens when a vacancy occurs. A deputy minister informed me that he had a messenger in his department and in another branch of the department, the Weights and Measures Branch, he desired a man to clean scales. He wrote to the Civil Service Commission recommending that the messenger be promoted to that position which meant a promotion of $50 a year in his salary. What do you suppose was the reply he got from the Civil Service Commission? They replied that there could be no promotion; that the job of cleaning scales was a new one, and that they would have to advertise for a new man. Thus under the system prepared by these experts, a new man has to be appointed whereas under the old system the services of a man already in the employ of the department could have been utilized.

With regard to the point mentioned by the hon. member for Cape Breton North (Mr. McKenzie) and the reference I made to the Printing Bureau, I have it from the head of the Bureau, and from the Assistant King's Printer that as to the men who were laid off by this so-called expert, their approval was not given, and that they did not give their opinion that the men who were dismissed from that service were efficient or inefficient. Surely that is a state of affairs that ought not to be allowed to prevail in the Civil Service of Canada. If there is to be a lay-off the deputy minister, or in the case of the Printing Bureau, the King's Printer, is surely the best man to decide who should go and who should remain. That is the point I endeavoured to make. Action was taken in this very high-handed way by this servant of Arthur Young and Company and approved of by the Civil Service Commission.

In conclusion, my desire in bringing this matter to the attention of the House was simply to promote efficiency in the Civil Service of Canada. I know, as I said at the outset of my remarks, that ninety per cent of the civil servants are dissatisfied, and there is unrest manifested in each department by reason of the re-classification. I therefore beg the Government to dispense with the services of these gentlemen from the United States, and ask the deputy ministers to make a report and clean up the re-classification in order that we may have an efficient Civil Service not only in Ottawa but throughout the whole Dominion.

Motion of Mr. Fripp agreed to.

WATER SUPPLY TO GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS IN OTTAWA.

AGREEMENT WITH OTTAWA CITY.

On the motion of Hon. N. W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council) for the Minister of Public Works, it was ordered that the House do to-morrow go into Committee of the Whole to consider a proposed resolution respecting an agreement between the Government and the city of Ottawa concerning the water supply to Government buildings in Ottawa.

Hon. MACKENZIE KING: Who is the Minister of Public Works?

Hon. N. W. ROWELL: Hon. J. D. Reid.

THE OPIUM AND DRUG ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. N. W. Rowell (Minister of Health), the House went into Committee on the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

1. That the Minister presiding over the Department of Health shall have power to issue licenses for the import, export, sale, manufacture and distribution of any drug; to name the ports or places in Canada where any drug may be exported or imported; to prescribe the manner in which any raw opium, prepared opium or any drug is packed and marked for export; to prescribe the record that shall be kept by any licensee in connection with the export, import, receipt, sale, disposal and distribution of the drug or drugs mentioned in such license, and to make all convenient and necessary regulations with respect to the issue, duration, terms and forms of the several licenses that may be issued and the payment of fees for such licenses, not exceeding the sum of twenty-five dollars for any license, and no such license shall continue in force for a longer period than one year.

2. That penalties may be imposed for the violation of the provisions of the proposed legislation.

3. That a duly authorized and practising physician, veterinary surgeon or dentist, or a druggist carrying on a bona fide business in a shop or store may be excepted from penalties imposed for manufacturing, selling or distributing drugs without license, but every druggist shall keep such records of the amount of any drug received or sold by him as the Minister may by regulation prescribe.

4. That the penalties imposed for manufacturing, selling or distributing drugs without license, and for not keeping records, shall not apply to any liniments, ointments or other preparations which are prepared for external skin use only, which do not contain cocaine, or any of its salts or preparations; provided, however, that the Governor in Council may by regulation apply the proposed provisions to any preparation named and prescribed in such regulation.

Mr. BELAND: Will the minister explain the resolution.

Mr. ROWELL: The object of the proposed resolution is to put into legislative form the conclusions embodied in the International Opium Convention signed at The Hague on the 23rd of January, 1912. The members of the House will recall that by Article 295 of the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Germany, provision was made that this International Opium Convention should be brought into force.

5 p.m.

A similar provision was inserted in the Treaty of Peace with Austria and in the Treaty of Peace with Bulgaria. In order that the Committee may have the matter before them I shall read the provision in the Treaty of Peace which relates to this matter. It is Article 295 in the Treaty of Peace with Germany, and Article 174 in the Treaty of Peace with Bulgaria, and reads as follows:

> Those of the High Contracting Parties who have not yet signed, or who have signed but not yet ratified, the Opium Convention signed at The Hague on January 23, 1912, agree to bring the said Convention into force, and for this purpose to enact the necessary legislation without delay and in any case within a period of twelve months from the coming into force of the present Treaty.
> Furthermore, they agree that ratification of the present Treaty should in the case of Powers which have not yet ratified the Opium Convention be deemed in all respects equivalent to the ratification of that convention and to the signature of the Special Protocol which was opened at The Hague in accordance with the resolutions adopted by the Third Opium Conference in 1914 for bringing the said Convention into force.
> For this purpose the Government of the French Republic will communicate to the Government of the Netherlands a certified copy of the protocol of the deposit of ratifications of the present Treaty, and will invite the Government of the Netherlands to accept and deposit the said certified copy as if it were a deposit of ratifications of the Opium Convention and a signature of the Additional Protocol of 1914.

The inclusion in the Treaties of Peace with enemy countries of this provision has made possible the bringing into operation of the International Opium Convention which was formulated and signed by some of the Powers at the Hague in December 1911 and January 1912.

While the Convention had been signed by a majority of the Powers who took part in the Conference at the Hague, there were still certain important Powers which, up to the meeting of the Peace Conference, had either declined to sign, failed to ratify, or been unwilling to agree that the Treaty should be brought into force. Therefore in view of the great international importance of this Convention which embodied the conclusions of the great Powers of the world as to the measures which were essential to not only restrict but to as far as practicable put an end to the trade in opium, morphia and cocaine, it was desirable that it should be brought into force. And the Peace Conference had made enforcement possible.

Perhaps it will be interesting to recall the fact that this Convention really had its inspiration at the International Conference held in Shanghai in the year 1908 and the early part of 1909. At this Conference some twelve nations were represented, and it is an interesting coincidence that my hon. friend the present leader of the Opposition (Mr. King) was the Canadian representative at that Conference which initiated the movement that culminated in the preparation of this Convention and in the agreement at Paris that it should be put into operation.

The Conference at Shanghai agreed to four resolutions; I do not wish to trouble the House with them but I shall give their effect as indicating the basis of this Convention. The first was a recognition of the sincerity of China in its desire to eradicate the production and consumption of opium. Members of the House will realize what the opium trade and traffic has meant to China. Information was given at this Conference at Shanghai that there were more than twenty million addicts to the opium habit in China, and every one knows how serious a menace to the moral, economic and physical welfare of the people of China the opium traffic has been. The second resolution was to the effect that each delegate would request his own Government to formulate laws for the gradual suppression of the opium traffic. By the third it was declared that the trade in opium, other than in legitimate ways, was held by nearly all the participants in the Conference to be a matter for prohibition or careful regulation. The fourth declares that as each country finds it feasible to restrict the importation of opium the Conference is of opinion that the export also should be prevented to any country which prohibits its entry. The fifth resolution declares that the manufacture, distribution and sale in each country, except for legitimate purposes, should be drastically dealt with.

As far as Canada is concerned, I think that within a year—or perhaps a little more than a year—after the Conference was held, the existence of the tariff was brought forcibly to the attention of the people by certain riots that occurred on the Pacific coast. In connection with these riots damage was done to the property of Chinese residents in coast cities and the claims they presented to the Government for compensation included claims for the destruction of important quantities of opium indicating the extent of the trade on the Pacific coast in that deleterious article. The result of the Conference at Shanghai plus the discovery of the conditions existing in Canada, led to the passing of the Act of 1911.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: For the sake of recording the order of events accurately, I might say that the situation on the Pacific coast had arisen before the Conference was held. The Canadian Government had the situation on the Pacific coast investigated, a report was made, and an Act was passed by this Parliament prior to the time at which the Shanghai Conference was held. In consequence of this country having taken action in the matter of the opium traffic, Canada was asked to be represented at the Shanghai Conference.

Mr. ROWELL: I thank my hon. friend for the correction as to the dates. My hon. friend recalls the facts to my mind. It was the Act of 1908 to which I referred.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is further interesting in this connection to state that the United States' government took cognizance of the Act which this Parliament passed, and at the Shanghai Conference admitted that Canada had really led the way in helping to control the opium traffic in so far as this continent was concerned.

Mr. ROWELL: I was in error. The riots preceded the Act of 1908 not the Act of 1911. The riots first, then the Act of 1908, the International Conference at Shanghai in 1909 and the legislation following that Conference by this House in 1911—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The further legislation.

Mr. ROWELL: The further legislation of 1911—that is the chronological order. The Conference at Shanghai recommended the calling of an international conference to consider the framing of an international convention which might result in the suppression, in very large measure, of improper use of opium, morphia and cocaine. That Conference met at The Hague in December, 1911 and January, 1912 and agreed upon the Convention which is now to be put into force. This legislation is to enable Canada to carry out fully the provisions of the Convention.. It is not as necessary for Canada to enact legislation as it is for some other countries because the Acts of 1908, of 1911 and of last session went a long way towards complying with the provisions of the Convention, but they did not fully carry out the Convention. As we are obligated to pass the necessary legislation within a year after the Convention goes into force, this resolution is introduced upon which will be founded a Bill to carry out the Convention.

So that the members of the House may appreciate just the reasons for the proposed legislation, may I draw attention to the terms of this Convention. By the way, it is of passing interest to note that the Convention to which we are now to give effect by legislation contains among the names of the parties to it those of several who have passed from the scene as rulers among the nations of the world. It indicates the remarkable changes politically which have taken place since this Convention was signed. Among the parties either to the Convention or who signed it are the Emperor of Germany, the Czar of all the Russias, and the Emperor of China, while one of the parties who proposed to adhere to it but did not sign it was the Emperor of Austria. All these four emperors have gone. The Hohenzollern, Romanoff, Hapsburg and Manchu dynasties have all passed away and republics have taken the places of their empires between the dates when this Convention was prepared and signed by some of the parties and the date when it actually comes into operation. The Treaty deals with raw opium, prepared opium, medicinal opium, morphine and cocaine, and special provisions are made with reference to each one. With reference to raw opium, the contracting parties agree to enact effective laws or regulations for the control of the production and distribution of raw opium unless laws or regulations on the subject are already in existance.

In article 2 they provide:

> Due regard being had to the differences in their commercial conditions, the contracting Powers shall limit the number of towns, ports or other localities through which the export or import of raw opium shall be permitted.

That is the reason of the provision in the resolution authorizing regulations to be made covering this point. Then by article 3 it is provided:

> The contracting Powers shall take measures— (a) To prevent the export of raw opium to countries which shall have prohibited its entry, and (b) To control the export of raw opium to countries which restrict its import.

Therefore the provision in the resolution, and in our Bill, controlling export. Article 4 declares:

> The contracting Powers shall make regulations requiring that every package containing raw opium intended for export shall be marked in such a way as to indicate its contents, provided that the consignment exceeds 5 kilo.

That explains the provision in the resolution and in the Bill to be founded upon it, which requires the marking of these packages.

Now, article 5:

The contracting Powers shall not allow the import and export of raw opium except by duly authorized persons.

That explains the reason for the provision that licenses shall be taken out by those who are to import or to export. Then we come to the prepared opium.

Mr. McKENZIE: Before the minister leaves that point, might I ask whether there is anything on our statute books to prevent the shipment into this country, or through this country, of raw or prepared opium?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes, there is at the present time. In addition to the legislation of 1911 we passed in the early part of 1919 two Orders in Council requiring that licenses should be taken out for the import or export of opium into or from Canada. We did that as a result of certain communications received from other countries which indicated that an illicit trade in these articles was developing and the available supplies were needed for medicinal and army purposes, and it was necessary to control the handling of it. Last session we put those Orders in Council into legislative form and under that statute we have been regulating the import and export of opium. Perhaps it will be of interest to the House to learn the result of that legislation. I am glad to say one result has been a very important diminution in the amount of opium imported into Canada. I cannot at the moment lay my hand upon the figures, but it indicates a great reduction in the amount. However, I will give the House the figures a little later.

Then, dealing with prepared opium, almost identical provisions are made for controlling its import, export or manufacture, as follows:

Article 6. The contracting Powers shall take measures for the gradual and effective suppression of the manufacture of, internal trade in, and use of prepared opium, with due regard to the varying circumstances of each country concerned, unless regulations on the subject are already in existence.

Article 7. The contracting Powers shall prohibit the import and export of prepared opium; those Powers, however, which are not yet ready to prohibit immediately the export of prepared opium shall prohibit it as soon as possible.

[Mr. Rowell.]

Article 8. The contracting Powers which are not yet ready to prohibit immediately the export of prepared opium—(a) shall restrict the number of towns, ports, or other localities through which prepared opium may be exported;

(b) Shall prohibit the export of prepared opium to countries which now forbid, or which may hereafter forbid the import thereof;

(c) Shall, in the meanwhile, prohibit the consignment of prepared opium to a country which desires to restrict its entry, unless the exporter complies with the regulations of the importing country.

The result will be that when concurrent legislation has been passed by the different countries which are parties to this Convention, no opium can be exported, say, from England or the United States to Canada, except in conformity with the regulations passed pursuant to our legislation which permits the importation into Canada by certain permitted persons for certain specific purposes.

Mr. BELAND: When was the first Opium and Drug Act passed by this Parliament?

Mr. ROWELL: The Act of 1908 was the first one we had; the next was the Act of 1911; and the third, the Act of 1919. (Reading):

(d) Shall take measures to ensure that every package exported, containing prepared opium, bears a special mark indicating the nature of its contents;

(e) Shall not permit the export of prepared opium except by specially authorized persons.

Chapter 3 of the Treaty deals with what is described as medicinal opium, morphine and cocaine. I shall not take up the time of the House by reading those provisions. I shall only point out that in principle they are similar to the provisions I have already read with reference to raw opium and manufactured opium. Then Article 15 provides:

The contracting Powers having treaties with China (Treaty Powers), shall, in conjunction with the Chinese Government, take the necessary measures to prevent the smuggling into Chinese territory, as well as into their Far-Eastern colonies and into the leased territories which they occupy in China, of raw and prepared opium, morphine, cocaine, and their respective salts, as also of the substances referred to in Article 14 of the present convention. The Chinese Government shall, on their part, take similar measures for the suppression of the smuggling of opium and of the other substances above referred to from China to the foreign colonies and leased territories.

In other words, as hon. members will see, the object of this article was on the one hand to protect China, if she honestly undertook to suppress the trade in opium, from having other countries profit by her suppression and smuggle opium into China.

On the other hand, the provisions inserted require China to act in a bona fide manner and suppress the opium traffic in her own country if the countries manufacturing or producing opium and exporting it to China curtailed it in their own country. The basis of it is a reciprocal arrangement governing China and the other countries as well. This is dealt with in three articles that follow:

Article 16: The Chinese Government shall promulgate pharmacy laws for their subjects, regulating the sale and distribution of morphine, cocaine, and their respective salts, and of the substances referred to in Article 14 of the present Convention, and shall communicate these laws to the Government having treaties with China, through their diplomatic representatives at Peking. The contracting Powers having treaties with China shall examine these laws and, if they find them acceptable, shall take the necessary measures to apply them to their nationals residing in China.

I do not think it necessary, Mr. Chairman, to go further into the terms of this Convention. I have given a general outline of these provisions so far as they have a bearing upon the resolution now before the House.

The Convention was agreed to by the twelve Powers represented at the Hague in January, 1912, and an effort was made to secure the adhesion of the other Powers who might be interested either in permitting or suppressing this traffic. There were thirty-six other Powers named in the schedule to the Convention who were to be asked to adhere to its terms, and the Government of the Netherlands was commissioned to communicate with those Powers with a view to securing their adhesion.

Let me say in passing that it was agreed that the Convention should come into force only in case all those Powers adhered to it. The object was absolutely to regulate, in so far as they did not completely suppress, the trade in these habit-forming drugs. Therefore the dissent of countries that either produced opium or might be responsible for dealing with it would interfere with the whole arrangement, and originally the operation of the Convention was predicated upon all the Powers named in the schedule adhering to it, it being provided that in case they did not adhere before a time specified, a new conference should be called at the Hague with a view to dealing further with the matter.

While a very large number of the Powers did adhere, the terms of the Convention were not complied with, and a new Conference was called at the Hague in July, 1913. At that Conference it was decided that the objects which the Convention sought to obtain were so important in the interests of humanity as a whole that the operation of the Convention should not be nullified by reason of some few Powers having failed to sign it, and that therefore the Conference should proceed and endeavour to secure the signature as well as the ratification of the other Powers; it being understood that the Treaty might go into effect even though it was not signed or ratified by all the Powers named in the schedule. An effort was made to carry out this resolution, and it was provided that in case of failure, a further conference might be held to decide whether the Powers that had ratified the Convention should be called upon to put it into legislative effect before all the Powers had signed it.

At the Conference of 1913 it was agreed that the Convention should be signed and ratified by the Powers who were willing to do so, but the action then taken at that Conference did not go to the extent of agreeing that it should be put into legislative operation, and another effort was made to get all the Powers in. That effort failed and a third conference was called in June, 1914.

Up to the time of this conference the consent of all the Powers had been secured in one form or another, except that of Turkey and Serbia, a qualified consent from Greece, a promise of consent from Austria-Hungary, and a qualified promise from Germany. With the information before the Conference, however, it was decided to proceed and a resolution was passed that the Convention should be put ito effect, and that the Powers prepared to sign and ratify should be asked to adopt the necessary legislation.

The war intervened and it was not posible to make further progress. The United States and Great Britain took the initiative at the Peace Conference and by inserting the provision I have mentioned in the Peace Treaties with Germany, with Austria and with Bulgaria,—and undoubtedly it will be inserted in the Treaty of Peace with Turkey, —they secured the assent of all the Powers which up to that time had refused and were thereby blicking the carrying out of this very important international undertaking. So that the combined action of the Shanghai Conference and the three conferences at The Hague, plus the Treaty of Peace, should be to bring into effect this international agreement for the suppression of the opium traffic in all the countries vitally concerned in it.

I am sure the House will agree that that consummation marks a most important advance in international co-operation for human welfare the world over. This resolution now submitted to the House is to put the Government in a position to carry out fully its obligations under the terms of the Convention. I do not know that there is anything more I can add by way of explanation, but if any further information is desired by hon. members I shall be glad to give it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might I ask my hon. friend if he has any information as to whether there has been any increase of the habit-forming drugs in consequence of the prohibitive enactments of recent years?

Mr. ROWELL: That question came up when we had the Bill before the House last session and I inquired of the officers of the department in reference to it. Their reply was that from the best information they could gather there was no evidence to justify the conclusion that prohibition had produced that result.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to say that I think the House is indebted to the Miniser of Health (Mr. Rowell) for having gone so exhaustively into the historical and international significance of this important legislation. He has given reasons which, I am sure, will appeal to all of us, and I think there is no good ground for delaying the passing of this resolution.

Resolution reported.

Mr. Rowell moved for leave to introduce a Bill founded on the resolution.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Ballantyne (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) that the House do go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to repeal sections eighty-five to eighty-nine, both inclusive, and section ninety-one of the Canada Shipping Act, chapter one hundred and thirteen of the Revised Statues of Canada, 1906, and to re-enact in lieu thereof:—

(1) That every British subject who,—

(a) served as a master or mate of a sea-going or coasting vessel of over seventy-five tons, gross tonnage, before the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and twenty, for a full period of twelve months within ten years immediately next preceding the date of his application for a certificate of service,

(b) produces satisfactory evidence of his sobriety, experience, ability and general good conduct on board ship, and

(c) passes the sight test and the prescribed examination in signalling, shall be entitled, on payment of the prescribed fee, to a certificate of service as a master or mate of a square rigged or fore-and-aft rigged sea-going or coasting sailing vessel not exceeding seven hundred and fifty tons, registered tonnage, according as his service has been (a) as master or as mate, (b) on a sea-going or on a coasting sailing vessel, (c) on a square rigged sailing ship or on a fore-and-aft rigged sailing vessel.

(2) That in every such certificate of service the name, place and date of birth of the person to whom the same is issued shall be stated, and each certificate shall specify whether the holder is entitled to act as master or mate, whether the certificate is for sea-going vessels or for vessels in the coasting trade, and whether for square-rigged sailing vessels or for fore-and-aft sailin vessels, and that it is not for any vessel exceeding seven hundred and fifty tons, registered tonnage.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): When this resolution was before the House last week I tried to get some information from the minister as to why we are departing from the old law pertaining to the handling and sending to sea of our ships. It is an offence against the Criminal Code to send an unseaworthy ship to sea; one who is convicted of that offence may be sent to penitentiary. What is the difference between sending an unseaworthy ship to sea and sending an unqualified master to sea in charge of a ship? The proposal now before us is to carry forward the old idea that prevailed at the time of the first introduction into this country of a Shipping Act. The doctrine that was held to on that occasion has been asserted also in connection with mining laws. There was a time when it was not necessary for a man to have a certificate to take charge of a coal mine; if he had had the experience and was capable of doing the work, no law required that he should have a certificate. All at once a law was enacted that a mining manager should have a certificate, and that was regarded as a very great hardship to a man who was competent to do the work and who had had the experience but who had not the technical education to enable him to write a proper examination or to answer satisfactorily the questions put as the basis for the granting of a certificate. It was provided in that Act, therefore—and there was a similar provision in the old Shipping Act—that a man who had had the experience and who was qualified to do the work should be permitted to carry on as he had done before and should be given a certificate of service. But everybody knows what the present provisions of our Shipping Act are, and a law should not now be enacted giving to any one who has not obtained a proper certificate the right to handle ships. Such legislation as is here proposed would have a tendency to put us away behind other countries in respect to ships, masters, and mates. We have been going into shipbuilding to the extent of millions of dollars; and so long as the minister keeps within proper bounds and gets full value for the money that he expends on this account, I fully approve of the action taken in that regard. But while we are going ahead in the matter of shipbuilding, we are going behind in proposing to give a license as master or mate to any person who may choose to serve a year on some schooner. If this proposal is adopted the tendency will be to discourage our young men from going into this profession, and the ships that we are building will have to be put in charge of men from other countries. The schools for the education of seamen and for the granting to certificates to captains should be encouraged; higher qualifications should be required of masters and mates. In practically every other profession the tendency is to go forward, to be more scientific, to be more progressive, to know more about the subject in hand than ever before, and to keep pace with the world. But the minister asks us to turn back the hands of the clock, to go back sixty years so far as the education of master mariners and mates is concerned. I live in a seaport at which thousands of vessels call every summer, and I have some conception of the importance of sending men out to sea in charge of crews of twenty or thirty and thousands of dollars' worth of property. Those men should be properly qualified. I would have as much right to pass a law permitting a man who is not a doctor, who is not a surgeon, to go into a hospital and operate on patients as I would to pass a law cutting down the safeguards and qualifications which have been found to be necessary in connection with the operation of ships. As I said the other day, I have not any personal interest in this matter, not even to the extent of one-half cent's worth. But I fought the legislation when it was proposed last fall; I regarded it as a danger to the community, and the then Acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. A. K. Maclean), who had the matter in charge, withdrew the proposals as a result of my protest. I suppose those who are behind this proposal think that where the then acting minister failed, a bigger and stronger man, and the head of the department, will succeed. If the minister wishes to display his prowess to those who are in favour of this retrograde movement, he is entitled to all the glory that attaches to it, but he shall not have that glory without my making the most vigorous protest against the proposed legislation.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): It is the hon. member himself (Mr. McKenzie), not the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who wishes to go back fifty years. As a rule, the hon. member is a very progressive gentleman; he is usually ready to be abreast of the times or even ahead of them. In this particular instance, however, he has an unusually strong desire to remain fifty years behind. I pointed out to the hon. member the other day that the Shipping Act now enables a man who wishes to qualify as master or as mate of a sailing vessel of one hundred or one hundred and fifty tons to get a service certificate. But that man's age would have to be 70 or 75, because no master or mate can obtain a service certificate under the present Shipping Act unless he served on a sailing vessel prior to the year 1870; nor can a mate get a service certificate unless he served on a sailing vessel prior to 1883.

I refer now to sea-going craft. This resolution also asks that section 86 be repealed in order that men, if they so desire, may obtain certificates of service as mates. But there again, they would have to have served on a sailing vessel prior to 1883 for inland waters, and that year applies to both masters and mates. The object of this resolution and the Bill that is to be based on it is merely to move the hands of time, as the hon. member has stated, from 1870 and 1883 up to ten years prior to 1920. Surely hon. members will have no objection to the Government bringing the Shipping Act up to date. We are not changing the statute so far as the law is concerned, as the hon. member has, I think, incorrectly stated; we are merely bringing the Shipping Act up to date.

We are also changing the tonnage of the vessel so that it shall not exceed 750 tons. I should like to point out to hon. members that our great neighbour to the south allows masters and mates to navigate sailing vessels up to 750 tons without any certificate at all. But before any one can get a service certificate as this resolution, and the Bill that will be based on it, set forth, he will have to have served on a sailing vessel twelve months any time within ten years prior to 1920; and in addition to that he must produce satisfactory evidence of his sobriety, experience, ability and general good conduct on board ship and must pass the sight test and the prescribed examination in signalling. I do not think that in the passing of this resolution and of the Bill later on we are jeopardizing the shipping industry. I pointed out the other day—there may be present some hon. members who were not in the House when this matter was under discussion before—that this country is so much in need of masters and mates for small sailing vessels that I had to take the necessary authority under the War Measures Act, and now that the War Measures Act no longer holds good, it is necessary for me to bring forward this resolution.

The hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) states again that a similar Bill was introduced by the acting minister at the last session of Parliament. May I be permitted to correct the hon. member and to say that if he will be good enough to compare the Bill that the acting minister introduced last session, with the resolution that is now before the House, he will find that they are entirely different. I will not take up the time of the committee by reading the Bill that the acting minister introduced last session.

Mr. McKENZIE: It was along the same pernicious lines.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The Bill that the acting minister desired to have passed at the last session of Parliament was for sailing vessels propelled by steam as an auxiliary power. The present resolution—

Mr. McKENZIE: That is a much safer method.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: There again I am sorry that I cannot agree with my hon. friend. But to sum up in a few words: The authority is in the Shipping Act today whereby any man can get a service certificate if he is seventy or seventy-five years of age and served on a sailing vessel prior to 1870. A man can also get a service certificate provided he is seventy or seventy-five years of age and has served on a sailing vessel prior to 1883. Surely, the hon. member is not going to find any fault with me or this Government for being progressive enough to bring the Shipping Act up to date in order that these men when they are in the full vigour of their youth may get the necessary service certificates as captains or mates.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister could not have followed me or he would not say that I am refusing to bring this Act up to date. When the English law was brought into force in this country, it was found that there were numbers of men who were navigating sailing vessels and doing it very well, who had no certificates, because the law did not demand them. It was found that to compel those men to get certificates would be a great hardship upon them and they were given service certificates because they could do the work at that time, a provision being put into the law that on account of their services they could get certificates. But that does not apply since the law came into force, because every man who puts his foot on board a ship with the hope of promotion knows that he must comply with the law, and he cannot come here and say: I have served so and so and because of my service I must get a certificate. Because when he started his seamanship and his services the law was on the statute book and he must be understood to know it and to expect to comply with it if he looks for any promotion. That is my position; that is the law; that is what the intention was; and there must be no misunderstanding as to my position.

Mr. DUFF: As my remarks will be rather lengthy, I should be glad, Mr. Chairman, if you would call it six o'clock.

Progress reported.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We have gone through the whole of the list of private member's resolutions and exhausted them. There is, therefore, no private members' business to come on if we return to-night. There is this resolution and that finishes the Government business which is ready, and under those circumstances, I think it is scarcely worth while for us to come back to-night. I, therefore, move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

Friday, March 19, 1920.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS TABLED.

Annual Report of the Board of Railway Commissioners.—Hon. J. D. Reid.

Auditor General's Report, Vol. 1.—Sir Henry Drayton.

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford) presented the first report of the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

OTTAWA BRANCH OF ROYAL MINT—INCREASE IN COST OF MAINTENANCE.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance) gave notice that on Monday next he would move the House into Committee of the Whole to consider a resolution standing on the Order Paper to amend the Ottawa Mint Act by providing that the yearly payment for defraying the salaries, contingencies, retiring and other allowances and expenses connected with the maintenance of the Ottawa Branch of the Royal Mint and the refinery forming part thereof, be increased from one hundred and ten thousand dollars to two hundred thousand dollars.

LOADINGS OUT OF ELEVATORS AT FORT WILLIAM.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): I desire to draw the attention of the Minister of Railways to a matter of urgent public importance. I hold in my hand a letter from a grain shipping firm in Winnipeg dated March 13, wherein there is a statement made to which I would like to know if it is a fact that there has been no coarse grain shipped out of Fort William for domestic purposes since January 5.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways): The hon. gentleman very kindly advised me that he intended to bring this matter before the House to-day and thus gave me the opportunity of getting information with respect to it. As I was coming into the House I received a letter addressed to Major Bell, deputy minister, and having instructed him to get information on this subject, I take it for granted that it contains that information. I shall be glad to read the letter in order that it may go on Hansard. It is from the Chief Commissioner of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and reads as follows:

OTTAWA March 19, 1920.

Dear Major BELL,—In reply to yours of yesterday re the shipment of oats from the head of the lakes, I beg to state that the whole story of what the board has done since the close of navigation would be a rather lengthy one.

Early in the season we attempted to regulate loadings out of elevators in an equitable manner to all parties concerned, and, on the 26th of December, we received a telegram from Mr. Stewart, Chairman of the Wheat Board, copy of which is as follows:—

"The Canadian Pacific Railway Company through Mr. Grant Hall have assured us an all rail movement of grain from Fort William east of a minimum of one hundred and twenty-five cars per day. We would like this apportioned as follows, twenty cars for coarse grains domestic and export, forty cars for domestic wheat, sixty-five cars for export wheat to Atlantic seaboard ports including Portland and St. John. Canadian National road through Mr. Hays have assured us of minimum movement of fifty cars per day which we would like apportioned as follows, fifteen cars for coarse grains domestic and export, ten cars for domestic wheat, twenty-five cars for export wheat to Atlantic seaboard ports including Portland and Halifax. Undoubtedly roads can improve this movement and haul more domestic wheat and export and domestic coarse grains than the total of eighty-five cars per day and until further advised we would like these interests benefit to the full extent of the increased movement but the sixty-five cars on Canadian Pacific and twenty-five cars on Canadian National for export wheat are irreducible daily average minimums and should take precedence over other grains. Will you be kind enough to confirm this to the railway companies accordingly."

Some discussion took place with the railways and with Mr. Stewart about issuing an order, but all parties agreed that, in so far as it was possible, 175 cars per day would be shipped out. The Wheat Board asked for a priority order for the 85 cars per day for export wheat. This we declined to grant until satisfactory evidence was furnished as to dates of sailings, tonnage, etc., and, as this data has never been furnished the board, we have, therefore, refused to give a priority order; but there was a general understanding, as we understood it, between the railways, the Wheat Board, the Lake Shippers' Association, and ourselves that the percentage of different grains, both export and domestic, as set forth in Mr. Stewart's telegram would be adhered to as closely as possible. Unfortunately, the weather conditions during January and February made it impossible for the railways to furnish 175 cars per day for this particular movement, and it very soon became apparent that some interests would not be able to receive the amount of grain required.

In the course of a few weeks, this board became convinced that course grains were not receiving their due percentage of shipments, and, therefore, in order to see that our intentions were carried into effect, on the 30th day of January last, this board issued an order the operating portion of which is as follows:—

"That on Monday, the 2nd day of February, 1920, and on each succeeding Monday until otherwise ordered by the board, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company provide at least one hundred and twenty-five (125) cars and the Canadian National railways at least fifty (50) cars at the elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur, in the Province of Ontario, for the receipt, handling, and carriage of grain, other than wheat, also flaxseed, for domestic use in Canada; the said cars to be allocated in proportion to the cars ordered for which the necessary documents have been surrendered."

During the next three Mondays, including February the 16th, 545 cars of domestic coarse grains, mostly oats, were shipped out, and, on account of severe weather conditions, we then concluded that coarse grains were receiving more than their fair percentage, the result being that, on the 19th of February, this order was suspended. Since that date up to the 13th instant, 211 cars of domestic coarse grains have been shipped, more than 90% of which would be oats. In addition to the above statement, according to information furnished us by the Lake Shippers' Association on the 16th instant, for the fortnight ending March 13, 420 cars of coarse grain have been shipped from western points direct to the east. During the same period, the Lake Shippers' Association inform us that a total of 153 cars of domestic grains of all kinds have been furnished the local mills, and 819 cars of export wheat.

This board receives daily from the Lake Shippers' Association, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and the Canadian National Railway Company statements of the number of cars loaded and handled, and at the present time we are subdividing the coarse grains under different headings, so that we are in a position to know exactly how much of each kind of grain is moving out daily, and, early in this present week, we came to the conclusion that coarse grains were not receiving their fair proportion. Telegraphic correspondence was entered into with the Lake Shippers' Association on Monday, and, after the exchange of a number of telegrams, yesterday morning the following order was issued by wire:—

"Your telegram yesterday received re coarse grain movement from head of lakes. This board requires that beginning to-morrow and until further orders twenty per cent of all cars loaded from all elevators at head of lakes be assigned to coarse grains for domestic consumption which is practically the percentage set forth in Mr. Stewart's telegram to me of December twenty-sixth last. Please confirm."

Yesterday afternoon confirmation was received as follows:—

"Your wire that twenty per cent on all cars from all elevators at head of lakes be assigned to coarse grains for domestic consumption until further orders is received and instructions have been given accordingly to our Fort William office."

If the daily returns require a change in these directions, the board will not hesitate to take whatever action may be necessary.

I think, however, I should point out to you the very serious conditions under which grain has been handled during the past two months, and I am satisfied that the railway companies have handled every car which it was humanly possible to get over their roads. Their first great difficulty has been weather conditions, not only around the head of the lakes but at the terminals, where hundreds of cars have been frozen in from Halifax to Portland, Me., and probably never in the history of railroading in this country have as many cars been held up at ocean terminals owing to weather conditions as have been in that condition since the first day of February. Added to this have been the most abnormal weather conditions from the operating standpoint, but probably even beyond both these difficulties has been the shortage of cars, due very largely to the fact that there are about 20,000 more Canadian cars on American lines than there are American cars on Canadian lines, and without cars it is impossible to handle freight.

I again wish to emphasize the splendid manner in which the railway companies have worked with this board in order to produce the maximum of result and have ever been ready to carry out any wish which we have expressed.

Sincerely yours,

F. B. CARVELL
Chief Commissioner.

Major G. A. BELL, C.M.G.,
Deputy Minister,
Dept. of Railways and Canals,
Ottawa.

I hope this answer covers what the hon. gentleman asked me.

SPIRIT RIVER WHEAT SHIPMENTS.

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. WILLIAM H. WHITE (Victoria, Alta.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) a somewhat similar matter to that brought up by the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb). I am sorry that I have not been able to give the Minister notice of this matter, but, as a matter of fact, I only got the information a few minutes ago. The subject is referred to in a local paper under the heading, "Wheat rotting at Spirit River for lack of transportation," and it is also dealt with in a letter addressed home by the Board of Trade at that point, stating that since the beginning of the year they had made appeals to the Department of Railways as well as to the Board of Railway Commissioners for assistance in getting out the grain—

Hon. Mr. REID: On what railway is Spirit River might I ask?

Mr. W. H. WHITE: It is on the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway. I might point out further that it is very necessary that this grain should be moved before the frost gets out of the ground in the spring, as there is only one line of railway running through the district and the settlers have to haul their grain in many cases fifty or sixty miles, and if they do not get it out this spring they will have to hold it over for another year. Many of the settlers have no storage facilities, and the chances are that they will lose their grain unless they get immediate help in the way of railway facilities. I might also point out that a great many soldiers have recently settled in the district, and, naturally they are depending on the returns from their first crop. Any assistance should be given at once or it will be of no avail.

Mr. J. D. REID: Mr. Speaker, I am thoroughly seized of the facts of the situation which the hon. member has mentioned. The member for Edmonton (Mr. Griesbach) has been bringing the matter to my attention every day—I had almost said he was worrying me—at any rate he has "put it up" to me to do something. In addition to the action taken by him, I have had telegrams from almost every settlement in that particular section. As the hon. member knows, we have a railway organization in the City of Montreal which formerly functioned as the Canadian Railway War Board, but is now known as the Railway Association of Canada. Whenever I receive notice of any transportation difficulties I immediately notify this organization, and it at once takes charge of the situation. In this particular case I took action some weeks ago, and the Railway Association in turn communicated with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and I am informed by Mr. Grant Hall, the General Manager of that company, that every effort is being put forward to remedy the trouble complained of, that duty having been assigned to his company,—although of course the Canadian National Railway would go to the assistance of the Canadian Pacific Railway if required. I might just read a telegram that I received this morning dealing with the subject. It is from Montreal, and states:—

Exchanged wired re situation on E.D. & B.C. Railway. General Manager that line states difficulty due to snow blockade which tied up portions of line for three to four weeks. With arrangements now made for additional power and cars from connecting lines and with improved weather conditions now being experienced situation rapidly returning to normal and line in better position to move traffic than any time in its history. Congestion of traffic will be relieved by extra power now available. Conditions improving daily.

(Signed) RAILWAY ASSOCIATION OF CANADA.

Had I known that the hon. member (Mr. White) was going to bring this matter up I could have read him a dozen telegrams to show the people of the Spirit River district that we have been giving their difficulties every attention, and that the railways outside of the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway have been doing their part to relieve the situation.

ESTIMATES FOR 1920-21.

On the Orders of the Day.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my right hon. friend, the Acting Prime Minister, when the House may expect the estimates to be brought down?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: On Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS OFFICIALS—ORGANIZATION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): I wish to direct attention to the fact that according to the minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of Canada, of March 11, 1920, His Honour the Speaker of the Senate has placed upon the Table of the Senate the organization of the staff of the Senate. I understand that the Civil Service Commission has held up the classification of the staff of the House of Commons awaiting the action of this House in passing upon that plan of organization. May I ask you, Mr. Speaker, when it is your intention to place before the members of this House the plan of organization of the staff of the House?

Mr. SPEAKER: I will give the hon. gentleman an answer on Monday.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS—CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Beauce): May I ask the Government whether the appointment has been made of a Canadian representative in the Assembly of the League of Nations? If not, when does the Government contemplate making it, and can the Government give the House any information as to the probable date of the first general meeting of the Assembly?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will have to ask my hon. friend to defer his question until Monday or Tuesday. I will inquire into the matter and give such information as is available.

CREDIT TO SERBIAN GOVERNMENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. S. BELAND (Beauce): It is reported in the press of this morning that the Serbian Government has asked the Government of Canada to grant to them a credit of $20,000,000, as in the case of Roumania and Greece. Has such a request been received by the Government?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No word of it is in the possession of the Government.

THE BODY OF FINLAY STONEHAM.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Has the attention of the Minister of Justice been directed to an article which appeared in the Daily British Whig on the 16th instant entitled, "Where is the Body of Finlay Stoneham?" An article——

Mr. SPEAKER: So far as the hon. member has proceeded I cannot conceive that this is a question of wide public import. If it is not, the hon. member should proceed by putting a question on the Order Paper in the usual way.

Mr. EDWARDS: Well, Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that it is of considerable importance whether a blunder has been committed and the body of a convict, supposed to be the body of Finlay Stoneham, sent to his parents which was not the body of Finlay Stoneham at all.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is hardly a question of sufficient public importance to engage the attention of the House upon the Orders of the Day. No question of public principle is involved, as I understand it, and if the hon. member will put his question on the Order Paper, he will be more within the Rules of the House.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does the Minister of Justice consider that the blunder that has been made is in any way due to the fact that the wardenship, deputy wardenship, surgeoncy and chief keepership of the penitentiary have been vacant for several months?

Rt. Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): Since the matter has gone so far as to include the statement of an alleged blunder, I prefer, if I may, to answer the question at once. No such blunder was made as is referred to in the correspondence in the Whig. The matter has been carefully enquired into. The body was examined in the presence of the father, who at one time said he could not identify it, and we are in possession of the reports of those who made the identification, showing on their statement not only that it was the body, but also that the father admitted that it was. Among the persons who made the identification of the body was the undertaker employed by the parents to attend to the burial, who was in a position to speak with personal knowledge as to indentification, inasmuch as he had been one of the jurors who sat at the trial of the prisoner whose body was in question. No blunder, therefore, was committed, and therefore no blunder could be attributed to the delay in the appointments referred to. With regard to that, the hon. gentleman will understand that these appointments have to go through the necessary process of submission to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must point out to the House that this does not come within the class of questions which ought properly to be put upon the Orders of the Day.

DISMISSAL OF ARTHUR S. PORTER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I wish to read a brief despatch which appeared in yesterday evening's issue of the Ottawa Journal, and to put a question with regard to it. The despatch is neaded: "Man who started Inquiry is Fired: Man responsible for Investigation into Combine loses Position," and reads:

> Hamilton, Ont., March 17—Arthur S. Porter, local manager of the Canadian General Electric Company, who was instrumental in starting the investigation by the Board of Commerce into the alleged Wholesale Grocers' Combine, has lost his position with the General Electric Company, according to a statement made today by Mr. Porter. Porter was called as a witness at the hearing in this city last week, though the Crown Counsel, A. W. Roebuck, told the board that he had not intended this.
> Attorney General W. E. Raney, in a letter to the board following the board's sitting at Hamilton, sharply criticized Chairman W. F. O'Connor for having brought the Crown's informant into light at the inquiry.

I wish to direct the attention of the leader of the Government to this embarrassing and unfortunate situation. If this witness was so dismissed, the Department of Labour or some other department of the Government should see to it that witnesses who are called by the Government are not subjected to treatment of that kind.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have no knowledge of the circumstances. I think that my hon. friend will, on reflection, come to the conclusion that it is very difficult for the Government to keep tab on all the transactions that take place between employers and employees in their several establishments.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT.

The House resumed consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Hon. C. C. Ballantyne, Minister of Marine and Fisheries—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

> Resolved, that it is expedient to repeal sections eighty-five to eighty-nine, both inclusive, and section ninety-one of the Canada Shipping Act, chapter one hundred and thirteen of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, and to re-enact in lieu thereof:—

(1) That every British subject who,—

(a) served as a master or mate of a sea-going or coasting sailing vessel of over seventy-five tons, gross tonnage, before the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and twenty, for a full period of twelve months within ten years immediately next preceding the date of his application for a certificate of service,

(b) produces satisfactory evidence of his sobriety, experience, ability and general good conduct on board ship, and

(c) passes the sight test and the prescribed examination in signalling, shall be entitled, on payment of the prescribed fee, to a certificate of service as a master or mate of a square rigged or fore-and-aft rigged sea-going or coasting sailing vessel not exceeding seven hundred and fifty tons, registered tonnage, according as his service has been, (a) as master or as mate, (b) on a sea-going or on a coasting sailing vessel, (c) on a square rigged sailing ship or on a fore-and-aft rigged sailing vessel.

(2) That in every such certificate of service the name, place and date of birth of the person to whom the same is issued shall be stated, and each certificate shall specify whether the holder is entitled to act as master or mate, whether the certificate is for sea-going vessels or for vessels in the coasting trade, and whether for square rigged sailing vessels or for fore-and-aft sailing vessels, and that it is not for any vessel exceeding seven hundred and fifty tons, registered tonnage.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose last night the resolution had been read and was under consideration. The member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) had the floor.

Mr. DUFF: I have two objections to this resolution: First, that the deparment has been so long in bringing it before the House; second, that it does not go quite far enough. Outside of that, however, I intend to support the resolution, and I will proceed to give my reasons for doing so.

Before the House adjourned yesterday afternoon, the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) took exception to this resolution, and he gave reasons why he felt that this House should not pass the resolution nor the Bill to be founded on it. I do not think it is necessary for me to say that I have the greatest respect for the hon. member and also for his ability, and I am sorry that I have to disagree with him. If this were a matter of jurisprudence or concerning some legal point, I would certainly not dare to controvert anything he might say. On this matter, however, I do not feel that I need apologise for taking a different point of view from that which he took yesterday afternoon. The hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria was afraid that if this resolution passed, the standard that had so far been maintained in the appointment of masters and mates for the Canadian mercantile marine would suffer, and that we would not have as good men manning our ships as we have at the present time. I should like to go into the history of Canadian shipping for a little while in order to prove to my hon. friend that his fears are groundless.

What is known as the Canada Shipping Act to-day is practically an Act which was copied from the old English Act, and from the time that Act was put into force by the English Government and the Board of Trade, there has been no question as to the merits of that Act. After Confederation, when Canada was formed into a nation, the then Canadian Government practically adopted the English Shipping Act. Since that time, it is quite true, a few unimportant changes in the shape of amendments have been made, but those amendments do not cover all the ground necessary to make the Canada Shipping Act a first-class piece of legislation for doing the work necessary in regard to Canadian shipping. It is also true that two or three years ago the then Minister of Marine or the Marine Department retained the services of a lawyer at Halifax to revise the Shipping Act, and I hold in my hand the revision which this gentleman made and which has not gone into force. I have looked over it very carefully, and I cannot find many changes in it; and before the proposed new Bill goes into effect, I would suggest to the Government and, in particular, to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), that a new revision be made, and that a practical ship-owner should be appointed along with a lawyer so that they could together make a proper revision. Under the old Shipping Act, sections 95, 96 and 97 set forth exactly the qualifications necessary and what it is necessary for a sailor to do before he can become either a mate or a captain of a Canadian ship. Under the old Act no captain could sail a ship over 100 tons unless he had a certificate, but that was amended, and the limit is now 150 tons. That was all very well a few years ago; but during the last few years the Government and, in particular, the Minister of Marine, realized that it was impossible to work under that Act, one reason being that the examinations which the sailors are subjected to would puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer. In order to be able to pass those examinations, a man would need to be a scholar and to have a university education, and there are in Canada to-day very few men who could pass the examinations necessary under the clauses which I have just quoted. Just for a few minutes, if the House will bear with me, I will give one or two instances of what sailors have to do in order to get one of those certificates. To take the examination for a first mate, a candidate must be not less than nineteen years of age and have served five years at sea. That is to say, he must go to sea when he is fourteen years of age and serve five years. Before I go any further, the committee will, I am sure, admit that a man who leaves his home at fourteen years of age and goes to sea for five years, cannot be very far advanced with his education. Of the five years which he must serve at sea,

(a) One year must have been in a capacity not lower than fourth mate of a sea-going vessel whilst holding a second mate's certificate for sea-going vessels;

(b) or one year and a half must have been in a capacity not lower than first mate in a coasting vessel whilst holding a second mate's certificate for sea-going vessels;

(c) or one year must have been as pilot with a first-class pilot's certificate.

In addition to that, he must answer certain questions, some of which are:

To answer questions on right angled spherical trigonometry.

To compute the time at which a given star will be on the observer's meridian.

To determine what bright stars will be within a certain hour-angle from the observer's meridian, above the pole and above the horizon, at any given time; also the hour-angle, east or west, of each of the stars, and whether they are to the north or south of the observer's zenith when passing the meridian.

And so on. What do we find that a candidate for a master's certificate has to do?

A candidate must be not less than twenty-one years of age, and—

(a) he must have served six years at sea, of which one year must have been in a capacity not lower than first mate of a sea-going vessel, whilst holding a certificate not lower than a first mate's certificate for sea-going vessels,

(b) or, he must have served six years at sea, of which one year and a half must have been in a capacity not lower than first mate of a coasting vessel whilst holding a certificate not lower than a first mate's certificate for sea-going vessels, ...

(c) or, he must have served six and a half years at sea, one year of which must have been in a capacity not lower than second mate of a sea-going vessel, whilst holding a first mate's certificate for sea-going vessels.

These are some of the things which the candidate has to do. He must have gone to sea when he was about fourteen years of age. He is required:

To write an essay on some technical subject.

[Mr. Duff.]

Just imagine a man who went to sea when he was fourteen years of age sitting down in a room and writing an essay on a technical subject. He is also required:

To find the latitude by the altitude of the Polar star at any time. To find the latitude by the meridian altitude of the moon.

The candidate will be required to give a figure and explanation for each problem worked, and give a written explanation of any of the terms used in navigation or nautical astronomy that may be asked.

It is almost impossible to get men who are able to pass such examinations, and I have proved from personal experience that the ordinary sailor or seaman cannot pass such examinations. The examination is a written one, and I have known a number of cases where the candidate, as soon as he came into the room and the questions on the paper were put before him, went all to pieces and had to leave the room. I have come across men who went up for an examination three times, men who had sailed vessels to practically all parts of the world and yet who could not pass that examination.

I cut from the Yarmouth Herald a few days ago a short article which is worth reading to the committee. It reads:

At the marine school last week two candidates were before examiner Capt. J. E. Murphy and passed successful examinations. The first was J. MacDonald Barkhouse, of Westport, who was granted a master's certificate for foreign going ships, steam or sail.

The following is the matter to which I wished particularly to refer:

Capt. Barkhouse was the first candidate to undertake in Yarmouth a master mariner's studies under the new and difficult system which has been recently established and he is to be congratulated on the excellence of his examination. The second was R. L. Lohnes, of Lunenburg, who was granted a mate's certificate for the coastwise trade.

It is almost impossible to get men who will go before the examiner and submit themselves to the examination which is put before them. If we are going to encourage the Canadian mercantile marine and shipbuilding, we must certainly put on the statute book something different from what the law is at the present time.

Let us see what our neighbour to the south is doing in regard to masters and mates. The United States, during the last few years, has been rather successful in building up a mercantile marine, and we could not do much better than follow the example of that country. I hold in my hands the navigation laws of the United States. With regard to the qualifications of masters, I might say that under the American navigation law there is no necessity whatever for a man to pass an examination to sail a ship under 700 tons. If the owners of the vessel and the underwriters are satisfied with his experience and ability, any man can sail a vessel up to 700 tons without license or certificate. The examination required above that limit of 700 tons is very simple, and is different altogether from the Canadian examination at the present time. Clause 69 of the American navigation laws reads as follows:

> The board of local inspectors shall license and classify the masters, chief mates, and second and third mates, if in charge of a watch, engineers, and pilots of all steam vessels, and the masters of sail vessels of over seven hundred gross tons, and all other vessels of over one hundred gross tons carrying passengers for hire. It shall be unlawful to employ any person, or for any person to serve, as a master, chief mate, engineer, or pilot of any steamer, or as master of any sail vessel of over seven hundred gross tons, or of any other vessel of over one hundred gross tons carrying passengers for hire, who is not licensed by the inspectors; and any one violating this section shall be liable to a penalty of one hundred dollars for each offence.
> Clause 70.—Whenever any person applies to be licensed as master of any steam vessel, or of a sail vessel of over seven hundred tons, the inspectors shall make diligent inquiry as to his character, and shall carefully examine the applicant as well as the proofs which he presents in support of his claim, and if they are satisfied that his capacity, experience, habits of life, and character are such as warrant the belief that he can safely be intrusted with the duties and responsibilities of the station for which he makes application, they shall grant him a license authorizing him to discharge such duties on any such vessel for the term of five years.

In view of these regulations I think it is certainly high time for some change to be made in our Canadian laws. Up to the outbreak of war in 1914, owners of vessels in Canada had a way of getting around the present Canada Shipping Act. I think the Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne) will agree with me when I say that perhaps 75 per cent of the Canadian tonnage on the Atlantic coast, instead of being registered in Canada, as it should have been, was registered at the town of Bridgeton, Barbadoes, in the West Indies, simply because under the Canada Shipping Act an uncertificated master could not sail a vessel over 150 tons. Vessels over that tonnage were registered at Bridgeton so that our men could sail them. After the war started, practically all the nations of the world, or at all events the Allied nations, passed a regulation or Order in Council prohibiting the transfer of registry of vessels from the country in which they were owned. After 1914 the Canadian Government refused to allow vessels built in Canada to be registered at Bridgeton. As a result, shipowners came to the Minister of Marine and to the Government and represented that it was impossible for them to get certificated masters to sail their vessels, and that something would have to be done to relieve the situation. The situation was relieved by the Government passing an Order in Council giving power to the Minister of Marine to grant, on application, permission for uncertificated masters to sail vessels over 150 tons. That, in my opinion, was the proper thing to do, and I certainly have no fault to find with it. So much tonnage of the Allies was being sunk every day in the week that we were told that if we could not fight we could help our country by building ships, and shipping men and monied men all over Canada decided to help in that way. The result was that in the Maritime Provinces and other parts of Canada new shipyards were opened and more ships were built during the war than had been built for many years past. Then we were faced with the condition that it was impossible to get masters to sail these vessels, so the Government passed this Order in Council. I think under the circumstances the Government should be congratulated on its action at that time, which allowed good men without certificates to sail our vessels.

The hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) in his speech yesterday afternoon said that insurance companies would object to these men sailing vessels. Well, Sir, I have had a little experience myself with insurance companies, and I have always been told by the underwriters that they look at the morals of a man far more than at anything else, and if they and the owners are satisfied that the man in charge of a vessel is a good, safe, reliable man in whom the owners have confidence, the underwriters never object. They say they are satisfied that these men are just as capable as certificated masters, and are quite satisfied to allow them to sail the ships, and are willing to insure vessel and cargo.

To show the ridiculousness of the law as it stands, let me cite one case only. Two vessels leave the port of Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, for North Sydney to load coal for St. Johns, Newfoundland. One is registered 149 tons, and the other 153 tons. These vessels go to North Sydney, load their cargo of coal, and when the captain of the 149-ton vessel goes to the custom officer for his clearance he is asked, "Where are you going?" The man replies "To St. Johns, Newfoundland, and then to Greece." The customs officer then writes out a clearance for that vessel and the captain goes out. He then turns to the captain of the 153-ton vessel and asks "Where are you going?" The answer is "To St. John, Newfoundland, and from there to Oporto, Portugal with a load of codfish for a merchant in St. Johns." "Where is your certificate?" he is at once asked. "I have none" is the reply. "I am sorry," says the customs officer, "but under the Canada Shipping Act I cannot clear you." There is a difference of only four tons between these two vessels, and why, if you can clear the 149-ton vessel cannot you clear the 153-ton vessel, if both captains have the same experience and ability? The thing is ridiculous on the face of it, and it is high time the minister remedied the situation by bringing down such a resolution as appears on the Order Paper to-day. I am quite sure that if this resolution does not pass this House, it will discourage shipbuilding in Nova Scotia and perhaps in other parts of Canada. I know that one or two yards have closed up already and that several contracts were cancelled last fall because there was an impression that after the Treaty of Peace was signed the Minister of Marine might not continue to grant the permission he had done in the past.

The hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria referred yesterday afternoon to the Bill introduced by the Acting Minister of Marine (Mr. A. K. Maclean) last year, and I understood him to say that that legislation was on practically the same lines as this resolution. I do not like to disagree with my hon. friend, but the legislation introduced by the hon. member (Mr. Maclean) last year was altogether different from this resolution. If I remember correctly, and I think I do, because before the legislation was introduced into the House I had spoken to the acting minister and the deputy minister with regard to the matter, the idea was to get Parliament to approve the action of the Minister of Marine in granting permission to uncertificated masters to sail vessels over 150 tons. I think that legislation should have been passed by this House, and I am rather surprised that the Bill was withdrawn after being introduced. No captain to-day who has a certificate has the slightest trouble in securing a ship, for there are more ships than there are masters available. So that this resolution will not, in my opinion, affect the standing of any captain who in the judgment of the shipowner is capable of taking charge of a vessel. If, therefore, there are any certificated masters who encounter any great difficulty in getting ships there must be some other reason than any alleged dearth of ships. Clause 1 (a) relates to every British subject who:

> Served as a master or mate of a sea-going or coasting vessel of over seventy-five tons, gross tonnage, before the 1st day of January, one thousand nine hundred and twenty, for a full period of twelve months within ten years immediately next preceding the date of his application for his certificate of service.

And sub-section (b) provides that he must produce

> Satisfactory evidence of his sobriety, experience, ability and general good conduct on board ship.

It seems to me that if any man complies with the provisions contained in sub-section (a) and sub-section (b), being able to give unquestionable evidence of his sobriety, good conduct and capability, and if the owners of the vessel and the underwriters, both of the hull and the cargo, are satisfied with his qualifications, the matter rests practically with these people, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would be doing nothing but right in granting him his certificate. I would direct the attention of the Minister to the last sub-section which I quoted requiring satisfactory evidence of sobriety, experience, ability, and general good conduct "on board ship". I think it would be better if these last three words were eliminated, for it is equally as necessary for a captain to be sober and well-behaved on shore as on board ship. I suggest to the Minister that this slight change would strengthen the resolution. Sub-section (c) requires that the applicant must pass the sight test and the prescribed examination in signalling. The Minister might add to this provision the words "and rules of the road." Possibly sub-section (b) embraces this qualification, but I can see no harm in the addition of the words I have suggested, which would certainly remove any possibility of doubt or equivocation. I am anxious to see every captain thoroughly qualified for his position, and if these words are deemed superfluous, still I should like to have an expression of assurance from the Minister that the "rules of the road" are beyond doubt included in the qualification of sobriety, experience, etc. There is a slight typographical error in sub-section (c) to which I might, in passing, call attention. The word "fore-in-aft" should be "fore-and-aft". In the same sub-section the following words appear:

According as his service has been (a) as master or as mate, etc.

As these words stand, I think they might be constructed to mean that a man who has served twelve months on a seventy-five ton ship can get a mate's certificate but before he can obtain a master's certificate he must go back again on the seventy-five ton vessel and serve as master for twelve months. These words may be explicit to a legal or technical mind, but it appears to me that the clause might be made somewhat clearer. Can the minister give us any assurance that there will be no necessity for a man who receives his mate's certificate to go back and sail as master on a seventy-five ton ship for another year? Under all the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I see no reason for objection to this resolution. In my own county there are about two hundred sailing vessels, ranging in tonnage from a hundred and twenty-five to six hundred tons, and if this resolution were not carried eighty per cent of the shipping in Nova Scotia will be hung up, which would be, I think every one will agree, nothing short of a calamity so far as that province is concerned. I trust that in view of the explanations that have been given in this discussion the resolution will pass unanimously.

Mr. FOURNIER: I have listened very attentively to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Duff), whose knowledge and experience of the subject under discussion have enabled him to cover the ground so thoroughly as to leave little for me to add. I would support his suggestion with regard to the inclusion of the "rules of the road" qualification, and would also suggest to the minister in regard to the tonnage of vessels, the desirability of adding to the resolution some such words as the following: "Vessels propelled by sail and partly by power, up to a tonnage of a hundred and seventy-five tons." Last year when this subject was introduced the hon. member for Matane, who unfortunately, has been called away, did not quite concur in the resolution. Since this resolution appeared on the Order Paper, however, we have discussed the matter and made diligent inquiry, and I believe that if the minister would accept the suggestions that have been offered, every interest would be served and the resolution would go far enough. I think that both sailing vessels and vessels propelled partly by power, up to a hundred and seventy-five tons, should certainly be included.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am very much gratified at the approval of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), as well as the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Fournier). With regard to the alterations suggested by my hon. friend from Lunenburg, I have no objection to adding to Clause (C) the words "rules of the road," but I submit that this is fully covered by Clause (B) which demands ability and experience. With regard to the other suggestions of the hon. member, I do not think it will be necessary for any man to serve a second year on a seventy-five ton ship in order to secure his master's certificate. The hon. member also suggested the elimination from Clause (B) of the words "on board ship," where the applicant's sobriety, experience, etc., shall have been evidenced. I think the hon. member will agree with me that the man's conduct while on board ship should be just such as is described in this sub-section, and the change is therefore not advisable. On the whole, with the approval both of the hon. member for Lunenburg and of the member for Bellechasse, I should like to have the resolution stand as it is. There is a great deal in what has been said by the hon. member for Bellechasse in regard to the inclusion in the regulation of vessels propelled by gasoline engines. But that is a matter that I would ask the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Fournier) to kindly not press for the moment. I will be very glad to give the matter my careful consideration and to learn what the hon. member's views are upon it.

Mr. McKENZIE: Nothwithstanding the very able address of my good friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) I still stand obdurate and unconvinced, and determined to see to it as far as I can, that every man in this country who professes to be a professional navigator shall have some technical qualifications, and that a man who may have served on a schooner ten years ago for the period of one year and has not seen salt water since until the present time shall not be qualified to receive the certificate of a first class seaman and the master of a ship. We might have very good knowledge ten years ago of some things and yet to-day have forgotten all about such matters. More than ten years ago I was a school teacher and regarded myself as a good one; but if I were sent back to-day to the same scholars and the same class, and had the same duties to do, I would find myself very much behind and unable to carry out the work I could do in those days. We have had the example of medical men who went overseas and remained there for three or four years. Upon coming back to this country they have had to take post graduate courses thus admitting that the time they spent away from their practice had altogether disqualified them from resuming the work they formally were accustomed to do. This is because in the intervening time they had forgotten the things that were absolutely essential for them to know, and therefore deemed it necessary for them to again go over the old ground, briefly, of course, in order to regain their old proficiency as practitioners. I submit to you, Sir, that one year of training as a sailor ten years ago is not going to give any one a knowledge of Marsden's rules of the road. I have read those rules as a lawyer perhaps one hundred times but I would not undertake to stand an examination to-day with respect to them. Still I profess to be as well up in these matters as an ordinary seaman who might, ten years ago, have put in twelve months on board a vessel. I think it requires special training, special care, and a special amount of education before a man should be admitted to be master of a ship and guardian of the lives of whatever crew there may be in the vessel. I do not think that the British Board of Trade is ignorant of the requirements of a seaman in this country. I do not think we are making any mistakes when we follow the rules that have been established in Great Britain for the last one hundred or two hundred years and that have been consistently maintained and adhered to up to the present day as sea-going requirements. Britannia rules the waves, and Britannia has followed the rules which are enforced to-day and which the Minister of Marine is prepared to lay unholy hands on under this resolution—break them up, and say that Great Britain, with all its knowledge of seamanship, and with its reputation for carrying trade and for leading the world as far as seamanship and shipping are concerned that has always been wrong, and that it is wrong now; that we in this country know more than do the British authorities about shipping and that we must depart from the practice which has been followed by them with such success for the last two hundred years.

As I have already pointed out to the minister, and I believe he knows it we have not in this Parliament absolute control of this question, and never had. The minister can pass his Bill, and he can give his man a certificate, but until it receives the approval of the Board of Trade and of the King in Council, and is gazetted in England, the certificated captain might as well be carrying a yellow covered almanac in his pocket as any certificate the minister may award. Section 95 of the Canada Shipping Act says:

> No ship registered in Canada, over one hundred tons registered tonnage, shall go to sea from any port or place in Canada on any voyage, not being a coasting voyage, unless the master and first mate, or only mate thereof have obtained and possess valid certificates either,— > (a) of competency or service for sea-going ships, appropriate to their several stations in such ship, or of a higher grade, from the minister; or, (b) of competency or service for sea-going ships, appropriate to their several stations in such ship, or of a higher grade, from the Board of Trade in the United Kingdom; or, (c) of competency appropriate to their several stations in such ship, or of a higher grade, granted in any British possession, and declared by order of His Majesty in Council, published in the London Gazette, under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, or of any Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom containing such provisions, to be of the same force as certificates of competency for foreign sea-going ships granted under the Acts of the Parliament of the United Kingdom relating to merchant shipping.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. gentleman is now referring to the competency certificate. This resolution, and the Bill that is based on it, very clearly sets forth that the certificate in question is not a competency certificate but a service certificate, and there is a vast difference between the two. The Shipping Act provides for a service certificate only in the case of a man who shall have served on a sailing vessel prior to 1870. What I am trying to do is simply to advance the legislation fifty years.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have heard of a certain boy who said to the school teacher "I am not as stupid as you thought I was." "No," said the teacher, "You are very much more stupid." I find that it is much more difficult to bring correction home to the minister than I thought it would be at first. I pointed out to him half a dozen times that this provision of service was adopted at the time the first Act came into force some sixty years ago so that no hardship would be suffered, but that any person who enters upon seamanship after the enactment of the Shipping Act must be understood to comply with the law. I point out to the minister also that any man who goes to sea now and is looking for a certificate or promotion is doing so and working with a full knowledge of what the law is. But to say that the old condition is to be brought up forever and that education, seamanship and knowledge, is to be cast to one side was never the intention. The minister says I am wrong about this but the first two or three lines in section 95 sets forth that no ship registered in Canada of over one hundred tons registered tons shall go to sea from any port or any place in the Dominion on any voyage not being a coasting voyage unless the master and first mate or only mate has obtained a certificate of the class that I mentioned. That is the law. My hon. friend (Mr. Ballantyne) may shake his head, but he cannot change the law and the practice of this country. The Act must receive the sanction of the King in Council and it must be published in the Royal Gazette to give our certificates the same force and effect as certificates obtained in Great Britain, and if my hon. friend is going to turn out masters and mates without any qualification, except that perhaps ten years ago they had been at school for twelve months, he will be disappointed if he expects their certificates to be recognized when they come before the British Board of Trade.

I have nothing further to say about the matter, Mr. Chairman. If the hon. minister is going to be absolutely blind to what has been the law and practice since the inception of our Parliamentary institutions, and as a result of that blindness stumbles, it is no fault of mine; I have warned him.

Mr. ROBERT H. BUTTS (Cape Breton South and Richmond): Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the remarks of the hon. members who have spoken on this question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. BUTTS: Do you want me to scream? There is some merit in those remarks, and I agree very largely with the position taken by my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff). There are also a few points in the remarks of my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. D. D. McKenzie) that I can still agree with. I may almost quote the words of my hon. friend from Lunenburg to the effect that the only difficulty he had with the resolution was that it did not go quite far enough. My hon. friend from North Cape Breton yesterday afternoon drew comparisons between the examinations set for master mariners and those set for miners. In those comparisons he was not quite correct, because in nine cases out of ten miner's examinations are oral, for the simple reason that miners get their education in the coal-mines and not in the schools or colleges, and it is therefore somewhat embarrassing for them to submit to a written examination. Exactly the same thing applies to the little boy who leaves school and ships in a fore-and-after at fourteen years of age. He cannot become a master mariner until he is nineteen, but having spent five years at sea he is not likely to have any opportunity of studying mathematics. Therefore I feel inclined to agree with my hon. friend from Lunenburg that the examination should be oral, particularly in connection with small vessels, because I think he will agree with me that out of his old port of Lunenburg, or out of Liverpool or St. John many a man has taken a sailing ship to Oporto or to the Mediterranean when, as they used to say in the olden days, "he had to smell his way." The science of navigation did not count for very much in those times.

I believe that the entire argument of my hon. friend from North Cape Breton must fall to the ground. We have the Canada Shipping Act, and surely if this Parliament had jurisdiction to pass that Act, they have from time to time jurisdiction to amend it as in their wisdom they may deem necessary. I think that follows as the night follows the day. Then if they have jurisdiction, why question it in such very pronounced terms as those used by my hon. friend? On the contrary, may we not even question his interpretation of the law?

I am of opinion, Mr. Chairman, that this resolution is perfectly within the jurisdiction of this House, and I am surprised that any hon. member should venture to question it. As I said before, we have the Canada Shipping Act, and if from time to time shipping conditions vary, should we not have the same power to amend that measure as we had to enact it some years ago? We have not been stripped of any of our jurisdiction. Indeed, if any attempt had been made to abridge that jurisdiction there would have been a storm of protest throughout the whole Dominion. The Canada Shipping Act is the law to-day; but it may not be the law to-morrow if this House says so.

But, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, the resolution in my opinion does not go far enough. I think there should be an entire reconstruction of the Canada Shipping Act. On different occasions yesterday afternoon and this afternoon the British Board of Trade has been referred to. They have R.N.'s,—those are the Royal Navy men, the highest order of shipping masters, then they have the R.N.R.'s. Now, if we inquire what those two classes of men are, we shall find that the R.N.R.'s are those who have failed to make a success of shipping. In other words, the title means. Go back and sit down, and when we cannot get any one else we may call on you. We have many ships sailing out of Canadian ports under the command of R.N.R.'s. Notwithstanding the decision of Lord Mersey, I assert that it was an R.N.R. who was responsible for the disaster in the St. Lawrence River when the "Empress of Ireland" was rammed by the "Storstad" and some eleven hundred or twelve hundred souls were lost. There are too many R.N.R.'s sailing ships out of our ports, and the Canada Shipping Act should be so amended as to make it compulsory for every man taking a ship out of a Canadian port to have a Canadian certificate.

I am inclined to qualify my agreement with my hon. friend from Lunenburg in this way: That the examinations for the masters of small sailing vessels should not be so strict as are the examinations for masters of ships of 11,000, 12,000 and 15,000 tons. The former examinations should not be so exacting as in the case of the examinations for the masters of ships who may have under them perhaps ninety or one hundred of a crew, and whose knowledge must cover marine and engineering subjects and in fact almost all the different trades that enter into the completed mechanism of the modern steamer. These men should be educated men. But as to these little 90, 100, and 150-ton schooners,—why, I have sailed one of them myself, and I would always manage to keep clear of the rocks. While I offer these few little suggestions, I believe that the resolution should be unanimously adopted, because it is a step in advance. Numerous disasters have occurred on our maritime coasts and on the Newfoundland coast; there was the case of the "Florizel," which was lost off cape Grace about a year ago. I agree, therefore, with my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) when he says that if these men are to carry on the duties of professional master mariners, then they should have the education of professional master mariners. But a line should be drawn between the big ship which carries hundreds of passengers and a large crew and the little ship that merely goes on lobster courses along our shores and is hardly ever out of sight of land. On one occasion I made the trip from Halifax to the strait of Canso on one of our government ships, and standing on the bridge with the captain throughout the whole of the night I was never for more than then consecutive minutes out of sight of three lights: That was the smallest number of lights that I saw at any one time. The coasts of the Maritime Provinces and Newfoundland and the shores of the St. Lawrence are well lighted. But here is another point in connection with which I made a suggestion to the minister a year ago. The pilotage system of this country is bad, as was proved by the Halifax disaster, and as is proved by the number of ships that are being run on the rocks. I know men who have gone from Sydney Harbour as far as St. John to bring over a ship and who had never in their lives been out of sight of land. It was brought out during the investigation into the Halifax explosion that men were piloting ships into Halifax harbour at that time who had never been out of sight of land. Some of the men who would be wiped out by the requirement of certificates are men who, if you sent them from here to China, would keep a vessel afloat so long as there was a cup of water under it. I suggest that the minister take counsel with some of the marine men in the different departments and that the Canada Shipping Act be amended, revised and improved. Even though my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) for whose legal acumen I have the very greatest respect, says that we have no jurisdiction, I suggest that the minister take a chance.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. BALLANTYNE thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 21, to amend the Canada Shipping Act,—(Certificate of Service).

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT AND THE CORPORATION OF OTTAWA.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Reid (Acting Minister of Public Works), the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to ratify and confirm the agreement made between His Majesty the King, as represented by the Minister of Public Works of Canada, hereinafter referred to as "the Government," and the Corporation of the City of Ottawa, hereinafter referred to as "the Corporation," whereby amongst other provisions, it is agreed,—

1. That the Government will pay to the Corporation the sum of $75,000 annually for a period of five years from the first day of July, 1919; the said payments to be in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims and demands on the Government by the Corporation except as otherwise provided in the said agreement.

2. That the Government will pay to the Corporation for water supply, for use in and on buildings, and parts of buildings, lands and premises in the City of Ottawa, now or hereafter owned or occupied by the Government at any time during the period of five years from the first day of July, 1919 (except buildings, lands and premises leased by the Government and subject to the general water rates established by by-law of the Corporation) and also for use in and on the Rideau Hall grounds and the Central Experimental Farm, and the buildings thereon, at the price or rate of thirteen cents per thousand gallons for such quantity of water as it may use in any year up to 200,000,000 gallons and for water used in excess of 200,000,000 gallons in any year at the price or rate of ten cents per thousand gallons; and that water rates for buildings and parts of buildings, and premises leased by the Government, as to which the Government is under obligation by the terms of their lease to make payment of water rates, shall be at the general rates established by the Water-works By-Law of the Corporation.

3. That the Corporation will install and maintain water meters at all convenient places where a supply of water is taken from its water-works for the use of the Government, and the Government will pay the Corporation annually a sum equal to ten per cent of the cost of such meters; the amount payable by the Government in each year to be determined by quarterly readings from said meters, and to be paid quarterly.

4. That in consideration of the said annual payments of $75,000 and of the grant to the Ottawa Improvement Commission of $150,000 a year for ten years, the Corporation agrees that said payment of $75,000 shall be in full discharge of all claims in respect of water supply for street sprinkling, for fire protection, and for use in Major's Hill Park, and in such other parks and driveways as may be owned or maintained by the Ottawa Improvement Commission.

5. That the Government shall maintain, repair and keep in repair the Connaught Place Bridge over the Rideau Canal, the Laurier Avenue Bridge, the bridges over the Chaudière Slides, and the sidewalks on the east side of Elgin street and on the south side of Laurier Avenue on front of and along the side of Cartier Square.

6. That the Government shall maintain and repair the sidewalks on the north side of Wellington street between Connaught Place and the western boundary of the Perley Home property, and on so much of the southern side of the said street as is in front of property owned by the Government, and the roadway, as it now exists, of Wellington street between Connaught Place and Bank street; and shall maintain and repair, and renew and replace, the existing asphalt pavement on that part of the said street which lies between Bank street and the westerly boundary of the Perley Home property; and if a new pavement be hereafter placed on that part of Wellington street which lies east of Bank street, such work shall be done by the Corporation, and property holders thereon shall not be released from any obligations imposed on them by law as regards payment of any taxes or local improvement rates in respect of their property on the said street, and the provisions of the contract between the same parties hereto, dated 7th August, 1916, with regard to Wellington street, are made a part of this agreement.

7. That the Government undertakes to indemnify and keep indemnified the Corporation from all manner of damage or injury, suits, claims, and demands on account of the said works or incurred by reason or in consequence of the execution thereof, or the supply of material therefor; and will pay to the Corporation on demand any expense sustained by it in consequence of such claims or any money reasonably and properly paid by the Corporation in settlement thereof, save and except suits, claims and demands arising by reason of anything done or omitted to be done by the Corporation, its agents, servants and workmen.

8. That all statutes of Canada, Orders in Council, by-laws and agreements, whereby the Corporation agreed to exempt from income taxes the incomes of officers and servants of the Government, resident in the City of Ottawa, derived from the Government, shall be abrogated and cancelled; and all former agreements between the Government and the Corporation with respect to these subject matters, inconsistent with the provisions of this agreement, shall be cancelled.

Hon. Mr. REID: Perhaps I had better give a few words of explanation in regard to the resolution, although, of course, when the Bill has been introduced and gets into committee, I can give further explanations as the various clauses are taken up. The situation is this: There has always been an agreement between the city of Ottawa and the Dominion for a certain annual payment for services given to the Government public buildings by the city. If my memory serves me aright, the amount paid annually for a certain number of years was $15,000. At the termination of the first agreement, the matter was taken up with the Government, and instead of increasing the amount, the Government made an annual grant of $100,000 to the Improvement Commission of the City of Ottawa. The city council have always claimed that the Dominion Government should pay taxes, and their requests, when made, were for an amount equal to the taxes they thought the Government should pay on property owned by the Government. This agreement expired some time during last year, and the city council again approached the Government for a new agreement requesting a very much larger amount than what had been paid during the term of the previous agreement, namely the last ten years. A sub-committee of Council was appointed, and a number of meetings were held with representatives of the city council. The demands made by the city council were very much larger than the terms covered by this resolution. After a number of meetings and negotiations, the suggestion which was made by the Government and which is contained in this resolution, was accepted by the city council, so that now, instead of paying $15,000 a year, the Government will, as will be seen by the resolution just read, pay for the term of this agreement an annual amount of $75,000 and increase the grant to the Improvement Commission from $100,000 to $150,000 per annum. This really means that from now on for the new term we shall pay $225,000 per annum to the city of Ottawa and to the Improvement Commission, instead of $15,000 and $100,000 as previously.

Mr. FIELDING: How much will you pay for water?

Mr. REID: I was just coming to that. In addition to the sums mentioned, we shall pay an extra amount for water. I have not the memorandum before me, but I shall have it when the Bill is brought before the House. In addition to what I have mentioned, there was in the previous agreement a clause whereby the salaries of the civil servants were exempted from any taxation. That clause will not appear in this Bill, and civil servants will be in the same position in that respect as any other citizen of the city of Ottawa. While the increase in the annual payment is very great, the sub-committee of Council who took the matter up with the city council realized that the Government are getting many more advantages than we did under the previous agreement. Our properties have increased and the city has had to make many improvements on account of Government properties. I did not intend to go fully into this matter today; I have not the papers with me; but I thought that by introducing the Bill, I would get the matter in such a position before the House that I could later give fuller details.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand that last year an agreement was reached between the then Minister of Public Works, Hon. Mr. Carvell, and the city. I should like to know from the Acting Minister of Public Works if the resolution which is now introduced is based upon the agreement that was negotiated then between the hon. Mr. Carvell and the city. I understood that the city officials were not altogether satisfied with the terms of that agreement, but the then minister stated in the House that he thought it was perfectly satisfactory. I should like to know whether that draft agreement is followed in this resolution, or whether this is a new agreement altogether, not following the opinion expressed by the then Minister of Public Works. The amount that we are to pay for water for the different public buildings appears to be very large. There are a great many ways of arriving at a proper estimate. Water can be purchased on the meter basis, just the same as electric light, and every gallon of water that goes into the Government buildings can be measured, and a reasonable rate arrived at. I do not know whether a proper investigation has been made along that line. Many corporations in this country are supplying water to different institutions. The cities of Toronto and Quebec no doubt supply water to the Provincial Government buildings in those cities, and the city of Montreal also furnishes water to different public buildings. I should like to know how our bargain compares with those that other cities have made with Provincial Governments, for instance. The town from which I come supplies water to a neighbouring town on a meter basis. The charge is 1/6 or 1/8 of a cent per gallon, I believe. At all events, it is a very small amount, and the town that is receiving the water is satisfied that it has made a fair bargain. I am sure the House would like to be advised that we are making a provident bargain with the city of Ottawa, and acting in a business-like manner.

As to the grant to the Ottawa Improvement Commission, I have no criticism to make, because I have no knowledge of the matter, but I do know something about the supply of water. I was mayor of our town at the time we made the arrangement with Sydney Mines and the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, and I should like to be assured that the country, which will have to pay this money, is getting a square deal.

Mr. REID: Answering my hon. friend's first question, whether this is the agreement that was discussed by the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell), I might say that it is. It was entered into on June 30, 1919. I was on the committee with Mr. Carvell when we made this agreement, and since he left the department it has not been taken up again with the city.

With reference to the supply of water, the city claimed that they were losing a very large amount of money on the large quantity of water consumed in the Government buildings, and the committee thought it was not fair that the people of the city of Ottawa should have to make good this amount. The committee agreed that the Government should pay what was fair and right. The arrangement we have made is, in part, as follows:

> The Government will pay to the corporation for water supply, for use in and on buildings, and parts of buildings, lands and premises in the city of Ottawa, now or hereafter owned or occupied by the Government at any time during the period of five years from the first day of July, 1919, except buildings, lands, and premises leased by the Government and subject to the general water rates established by by-law of the corparation, and also for use in and on the Rideau Hall grounds and the Central Experimental Farm, and the buildings thereon, at the price or rate of thirteen cents per thousand gallons for such quantity of water as it may use in any year up to 200,000,000 gallons, and for water used in excess of 200,000,000 gallons in any year, at the price or rate of ten cents per thousand gallons.
> That in consideration of the said annual payments of $75,000 and of the grant to the Ottawa Improvement Commission of $150,000 a year for ten years, the corporation agrees that said payment of $75,000 shall be in full discharge of all claims in respect of water supply for street sprinkling, for fire protection, and for use in Major's Hill park, and in such other parks and driveways as may be owned or maintained by the Ottawa Improvement Commission.

I think that answers my hon. friend's other question as to the supply of water.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has the minister any estimate of what the city of Ottawa lost through the exemption of civil servants from taxation by the city?

Mr. REID: I will give full details when the Bill is under discussion. I have not the information here, but I know it is quite a large amount.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In view of the fact that the amount is considerable, and that we are going to pay practically double what we have paid to the city in the past, would the minister be prepared when the Bill is under discussion to say what increase there has been in the service rendered by the city to the Government?

Mr. REID: I shall have all the details, and shall have the deputy minister here when the Bill is under discussion.

Mr. FRIPP: I have not been able to hear the explanation made by the minister (Mr. Reid), nor have I been able to hear the requests made by the leader of the Opposition. I rise simply to draw the Government's attention to the fact that clause 8 which proposes to abrogate the agreement which has existed between the civil servants and the Governments of Canada ever since we have had a Government here, so that the city may exact income tax from the servants of the Government, seems to me to be a great hardship upon the civil servants residing in the city of Ottawa. There can be no question but that the Government has made a very hard bargain with the city of Ottawa under the proposals now before the House. The material advantages that are given to the Government by the corporation of the city of Ottawa are worth far above and beyond the amount of $75,000 a year which is to be granted under this agreement. I think that the further charge now to be levied on the civil servants of Ottawa of paying an income tax into the coffers of the corporation is really enforcing too hard a bargain, and one that will result in the Government, who are the employers of the civil servants, being under the necessity of increasing their salaries. I trust the minister will reconsider Clause 8 with a view to retaining the present condition of things. I should like to know whether the mayor and corporation, who appeared for the city, were willing that this clause should form part of the agreement.

Mr. REID: A copy of the agreement is attached to the Bill and is supposed to be signed not only by the Minister of Public Works, but by the mayor and city clerk. Otherwise I would not be here moving this resolution, which is the result of the unanimous agreement of both sides. The agreement provides that all former agreements between the Government and the corporation with respect to these subject matters shall be cancelled; and this includes provisions of former order in council by which the salaries of civil servants were exempt from income taxation by the corporation.

I have had nothing to do with the negotiations further than attending meetings of the sub-committee of council and the corporation last year. Any negotiations from that time on have been carried on by Mr. Carvell, and I am informed that the corporation and Mr. Carvell decided on this agreement, as a result of which I am now submitting this legislation.

Hon. Mr. FIELDING: Whatever may be the merits of other features of the resolution, there ought to be no objection, I should think, to that clause which abolishes exemption from taxation. There never was any good reason why the civil servants of Ottawa should be exempt, while the civil servants of Hull were obliged to pay income taxes. I am aware that it was a privilege granted the civil servants of Ottawa many years ago, and sometimes these ancient rights and privileges continue in existence for a long time. My hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Fripp) may be right in saying that the abolition of this exemption should be a reason why the Government should consider the question of better salaries for the civil service. But I am one of those who never could see any reason in days gone by why we should give exemption to the civil servants of Ottawa in regard to income taxation while others were denied the privilege. The civil servants of Ottawa should be on the same footing as other civil servants in this respect and pay their taxes like any other citizens.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did I understand the hon. member for Ottawa to say that he regarded the withdrawal of this right of exemption from taxation as constituting the bargain between the Government and the city harder as respects the city?

Mr. FRIPP: I say that the city is evidently taking the position that they will exact their rights from the civil servants in the matter of income taxation because they are forced to do so. That, I assume, is the contention. But what I say is that if the Government of Canada, instead of paying the city $75,000 a year, paid them $100,000, probably the city would not be anxious to insist on exacting income taxes from the civil servants, and the matter would really be evened up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would point out that the Government, as a matter of fact, is increasing the annual payment to the city from $15,000 to $75,000, and is also increasing the annual payment to the Ottawa Improvement Commission from $100,000 to $150,000, besides permitting the city to exact income taxation from the civil servants. If there is any hard bargain anywhere, it would appear to be so far as the civil servants in Ottawa are concerned.

Mr. REID: I cannot agree with the hon. member that there is any hard bargain on the civil servants, who are being classified to-day so that they may receive salaries on a fair proportion to other workers throughout the city who are filling positions of a similar character. If other citizens who are doing similar work to that of the civil servants are made to pay income taxes, there can be no reason why the civil servants should not also pay taxes. I do not see why in the city of Ottawa the Government should virtually pay the income taxes of civil servants and not do the same in Toronto, Montreal, Halifax and every other city throughout the Dominion. To be logical we should bring in a Bill providing for the payment of the income taxes of all other civil servants in the country, if there is any reason in the civil servants of Ottawa being exempt from taxation. I agree with the hon. member (Mr. Fielding) that the civil servants should pay their taxes the same as any other class of citizens.

Mr. McKENZIE: Can the minister inform us as to what the law is in Ontario in regard to exemption from income taxation? I believe a man is entitled to vote on his salary, and when the assessor comes around he exempts eight hundred dollars, taxing the rest.

Mr. REID: I cannot give the information offhand. The municipalities are entitled to collect on income tax. In some provinces there are provincial but not municipal taxes on income, while in others there are provincial, municipal and Dominion taxes. When the Bill is introduced I will endeavour to have a statement submitted showing the law as it stands in each of the nine provinces.

Mr. FIELDING: There is a phase of this question which we shall soon have to face. I am not taking any exception to liberal treatment of the Ottawa Improvement Commission. I had the pleasure of introducing the first legislation under which it was created, and as it has done excellent work I should like to see it continued and liberally aided. After all, Ottawa is the capital of Canada, by reason of which position it has some claims which perhaps do not correspond with the claims of other cities. Unfortunately, however—I suppose this is inevitable—the very fact that we have been recently considering Ottawa's claim and proposing to give larger allowances to this city has attracted notice throughout the country, and many of our cities and towns are beginning to raise the question why they should not get something out of the Dominion Treasury. I think there was a deputation waited upon the minister a short time ago from an eastern city on the subject. The railway companies own property on which taxation is paid to the municipalities. When that property is acquired by the Government of Canada—we are dodging the issue just for the moment by keeping up the idea of a corporation—it ceases to be liable for taxation and out of that condition there has arisen a very considerable feeling amongst the cities and towns that the Government should do something for them, and the fact of this arrangement with Ottawa is used for an argument. I entirely concur in the desire of the Government to treat the city of Ottawa generously in the matter, but we need not ignore the fact that we have got to face this demand along with the other question.

Mr. McKENZIE: I notice that in the agreement we are charged for the sprinkling of the Government parks and part of Wellington street. We are furnishing a large amount of money wherewith to beautify the city and provide it with fine parks and I think it is a small thing to charge us for the water used in sprinkling those parks. It is a great advantage to the city of Ottawa to have the officials and members of Parliament come here from year to year. I think that any city in Canada would be glad to make concessions to the Government providing the capital were established within its precincts, but the city of Ottawa seems to consider we should pay a license for coming here at all. It charges us with the small things which it does and which it might very easily itself contribute towards the comfort of Members of Parliament. The city should be a little more generous and not charge the Government for sprinkling these parks.

Mr. REID: I would not like it to go uncorrected that the city of Ottawa is charging us for the sprinkling of the streets as the hon. member suggests. The municipal council claims that the sum of $75,000 is not sufficient to pay for the fire protection, and the other services outside of that which the city performs, but we took the precaution to include in the agreement the sprinkling of water and any other work that might be done by the city. When I get a detailed statement I will be very glad to give further information.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the fire protection which the city is prepared to give is as capable, as efficient and as effective as was rendered when the Parliament Buildings were destroyed by fire we certainly should not pay a high rate for it.

Resolution reported.

Mr. REID thereupon introduced Bill No. 22 to Confirm an Agreement between His Majesty the King and the City of Ottawa which was read a first time.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION AND RETIREMENT ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Sir Henry Drayton, Bill No. 17 to amend the Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act was read a second time, considered in committee, reported, read a third time, and passed.

On the motion of Sir George Foster the House proceeded to the consideration of the Order of Notices of Motion.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Hon. Mr. FIELDING:

For a copy of all correspondence between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Prime Minister of Great Britain under authority of a resolution of the Imperial War Cabinet of July 30, 1918.

PRIVATE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Bill No. 18 to incorporate the Canada Security Assurance Company.—Mr. Mowat.

On motion of Sir George Foster the House adjourned at 5.15 p.m.

Monday, March 22, 1920.

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READING.

Bill No. 23, to incorporate Canadian American Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Griesbach.

Bill No. 24, to incorporate The Pabos, Amqui and Edmundston Railway Company.—Mr. Pelletier.

Bill No. 25, respecting The Pacific Coast Fire Insurance Company. —Mr. Stevens.

Bill No. 26, respecting The Pacific Marine Insurance Company.—Mr. Stevens.

ESTIMATES FOR 1920-21.

A message from His Excellency the Administrator of the Government, transmitting estimates for the year ending March 31, 1921, was presented by Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the Committee of Supply.

REPORTS AND PAPERS TABLED.

Annual report of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police for the year ended September 30, 1919.—Hon. Mr. Rowell.

Copy of all correspondence and agreements between the Government and any banks touching any payments to officers and men of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.—Rt. Hon. Mr. Sifton.

Cancellations of Orders in Council authorizing the payment of Separation Allowances.—Hon. Mr. Ballantyne.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (Minister of Health) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 27, respecting Food and Drugs.

An hon. MEMBER: Explain.

Mr. ROWELL: This is a revision and consolidation of the present Act relating to the adulteration of food and of the various amending Acts of the past ten years. One of the principal differences between the present Bill and the Acts already on the statute book is the distinction now sought to be drawn between the adulteration of food and misbranding which is not very clear in the present Act, the new Bill excludes fertilizers and cattle feeds. At present we have an Act respecting commercial feedings stuffs which deals with cattle feeds, but we also have certain provisions in the Adulteration Act relating to the same matter. These are eliminated from the Food and Drugs Bill and will be included in the new Commercial Feeding Stuffs Bill. The present Act contains certain special provisions relating to honey and maple syrup which gives a monopoly in the use of these words; these are eliminated from the present Bill and will be dealt with separately. This Bill also includes quite a number of changes in detail, the result of the experience gained in the administration of the law during the last twenty years. These will be explained when the Bill is in committee.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

MAPLE PRODUCTS ADULTERATION.

Hon. Mr. ROWELL (Minister of Health) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 28, respecting Maple Products.

An hon. MEMBER: Explain.

Mr. ROWELL: It is simply the re-enactment in a separate Bill of the clauses relating to maple products which are eliminated from the present Adulteration Act not being properly germane to such an Act.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

[The Speaker.]

HONEY ADULTERATION.

Hon. Mr. ROWELL (Minister of Health) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 29, respecting honey.

He said: This is simply the re-enactment of clauses relating to this matter which have been eliminated from the present Adulteration Act.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

On the Orders of the Day.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Rt. Hon. the leader of the Government whether the Government contemplates bringing down any legislation respecting the franchise, other than that which is contained in the Bill before the House at the present time, and in particular whether the Government contemplates introducing either at this or at any subsequent session a Disfranchising Act.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not prepared to say at the moment what may be added to the Bill that has been brought down.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Do I understand my right hon. friend to say that the Government is not contemplating any disfranchising Act?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am saying that at the present time we are not contemplating any. But I have not any right to pledge the Government that they will not introduce any additions to the present Franchise Bill.

CREDIT TO THE BELGIAN GOVERNMENT—THE P. BURNS COMPANY.

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. WILLIAM D. EULER (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Government a question based on an article sent from Ottawa and published in the Toronto Globe on Saturday which states:

> Mr. P. Burns of Calgary is in Ottawa to see if a ten-million-dollar credit can be established for the Belgian Government, which desires to get that quantity of meat from him. On account of the situation in the West last year, as regards feed and grazing, many animals were sold by their owners, and the P. Burns Company has an exceptionally large stock of meat, the surplus of which Mr. Burns desires to export. As the Belgian Government is in a better position than most of the European countries, there is a possibility that an exception may be made in this case to the decision of the Government that it is better to withdraw from the credit business as soon as possible.

I should like to ask whether any such application has been received from the Burns Company and whether the Government is considering the granting of such application.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, proposals have been made—I do not know whether they are proposals of the P. Burns Company, as a company, or of the Belgian Government—but proposals have been made which look towards assistance from the Canadian Government in the marketing of cattle. The matter has not been advanced in any degree at all one way or the other; the proposal not having yet gone far enough to determine exactly what it is.

FISCAL POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): I should like to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) a question based on a report appearing in the morning papers. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne) is alleged to have stated that the fiscal policy of the Government will be brought down on the first of May—information which would usually be conveyed across the floor. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether my hon. friend the Minister of Marine gave the people of Montreal accurate information?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine): Probably it will be agreeable to the hon. member for Red Deer if I reply to his question. What appeared briefly in one of the Ottawa papers, and more fully in the Montreal Gazette, reports correctly a speech that I made, with this slight difference—not only slight, but it is also an important difference—I was speaking about the new general policy of the Government that the Prime Minister will bring down when he returns to his place in the House; but I did not refer to any new fiscal policy, although I had something to say on fiscal policy.

Mr. M. CLARK: Perhaps it is the old fiscal policy.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY—REPORTED DEMOBILIZATION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): The papers make mention of despatches from Esquimalt and Halifax indicating that the Minister of the Naval Service (Hon. Mr. Ballantyne) has issued orders having in view the demobilization of the Naval Forces of Canada. Has the minister any statement to make to the House on the subject? Have any orders been issued, and if so, what was the nature of them?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Naval Affairs): The article that appeared in the press this morning was wholly unauthorized. I will make a full statement to the House on Thursday next.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SCOTTISH CANADIAN ASSURANCE CORPORATION.

The House in Committee on Bill No. 9, to incorporate Scottish Canadian Assurance Corporation—Mr. Mowat—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 3—Capital stock:

Mr. McKENZIE: The business of insurance is a very important one and the rights of policyholders should be safeguarded in every possible way. Insurance companies operating in Canada have been known to fail and to be unable to meet the claims made under policies which they had issued. I hope the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) will see that any companies empowered to carry on the business of insurance in Canada are sufficiently strong, and that those who take out policies with them are sufficiently protected.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: All the provisions of the law relating to these companies will be strictly enforced. Under those provisions security has to be placed in the hands of the department before license to carry on business is issued, and after those securities are so deposited the companies are subjected to strict inspection.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—amount to be subscribed:

Mr. CAHILL: What proportion of the subscription must be paid in cash before the company may start business?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not in charge of the Bill, but if the hon. member will look at paragraph 7 he will see a provision that the company shall not commence the business of fire insurance until not less than $250,000 of the capital stock has been bona fide subscribed and not less than $100,000 paid thereon. There are other provisions setting forth the amount that has to be paid up before the business is undertaken.

Mr. CAHILL: That $250,000 is the amount which must be subscribed before the business of fire insurance may be undertaken. What is the proportion applicable to the carrying on of other kinds of insurance?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Section 7 goes on to provide the amounts for the other classes of business: accident insurance, $40,000; sickness insurance, $10,000; automobile insurance, $20,000; burglary insurance, $20,000; hail insurance, $50,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Then, what is the purpose of clause 4 providing that not less than $200,000 must be subscribed? What business can be undertaken by the company when that amount is subscribed, and what proportion of that amount must be paid in cash before any business can be undertaken?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Looking offhand at the section as drawn, I would say that apparently the fire insurance business is looked upon as the main business of the company, and that that business is not to be entered upon until $250,000 has been actually subscribed. Of course, it might be that the company would commence to carry on these other classes of insurance, and to provide for that the exact amounts of capital to be paid up in each case are specifically set out. The amount of $200,000 would be sufficient to cover any of these classes of insurance, excluding fire insurance.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Commencing business:

Mr. BUREAU: Read the section, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: This is a Private Bill which has already been considered by a Committee. Is it the desire of this Committee that the clause be read?

Mr. BUREAU: Is it not the privilege of a member to ask the Chairman to read a clause of a Bill?

[Mr. Cahill.]

The CHAIRMAN: It is not the privilege of an hon. member. This can only be demanded by the Committee. The Chairman calls the number of each clause and reads the marginal note. He should read the clause at length only when it is demanded by the Committee. Bourinot at page 522 is very clear upon this point, and many such rulings have been given. Having stated the rule, the Chairman has no objection to read the clause if the hon. member insists.

Mr. BUREAU: I do insist, and I say that the privileges of members ought to be extended if they have not the right to ask that a clause in a Bill under consideration in Committee of the Whole be read by the Chairman, simply because the Bill has already been considered by another committee. If that is the case, it is high time the rules of the House were amended.

The CHAIRMAN: The Chairman has no objection.

The Chairman thereupon read section 7 of the Bill.

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand that the basis of the business to be carried on under clause 6 is fire insurance? The company must raise so much money to be able to carry on fire insurance, and the fire insurance business must amount to so much before they can carry on sickness, burglary, automobile or other insurance; but the basic foundation is fire insurance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think so. When I was asked a question by the hon. gentleman who first drew my attention to it, I think, perhaps, he did not read section 4 aright and I had not read it. Section 4, the hon. gentleman will see, refers to the amount of capital stock to be subscribed before the general meeting for the election of the directors is called. That is the initial step in the formation of the company. That general meeting having been called and the stock having been subscribed, before the company commences to carry on the business of fire insurance, capital stock to the extent of $250,000 has to be subscribed and not less than $100,000 must be paid in cash thereon. That having been done, that being the first step, as the hon. member very properly points out, these other activities will be carried on provided that the financial status of the company is increased in the manner indicated in this clause.

Mr. BUREAU: The capital with the surplus?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The available assets of the company, its strength.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

THE TRUST AND LOAN COMPANY OF CANADA.

The House in committee on Bill No. 10, respecting the Trust and Loan Company of Canada.

On section 1—short title.

Mr. BUREAU: Has the Bill been before the Committee on Banking and Commerce?

Mr. SHEARD: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Then we might get a synopsis of it from the chairman of that committee, so that we may see what changes, if any, have been made.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. memmer for London is in charge of the Bill and is, I think, familiar with it.

Mr. CRONYN: This Bill stands in my name, although I have no personal interest in the company in question; in fact, it is a rival of the company of which I am manager. That, however, makes no difference to my attitude to the Bill, and as what the company is asking seems to be perfectly reasonable and within its proper competence, I am glad to support the Bill. The Trust and Loan Company of Canada, the oldest mortgage company in Canada, chartered originally in 1843, has three classes of stocks, one class on which £5 have been paid on a £20 share; that is the main body of the stock; a second class on which £3 have been paid on each £20 share, and a third class on which £1 has been paid. Hon. members will at once see that this makes three classes of stockholders because the liability of the unpaid stock varies in each of the three classes. That results in a difference in price and the various classes of stocks sell on the market at different prices. This also results in this anomaly, that the shareholder who has paid only £1 per share has the same voting right as the man who has paid £5 per share.

Mr. BUREAU: He has a larger liability.

Mr. CRONYN: He certainly has. The company makes these proposals. The directors are first calling up enough on the two lower classes of stocks to make all the stocks £5 paid. They have now £600,000 of paid up capital; they call up another £150,000 making their paid up capital £750,000. They have £600,000 of reserve, a reserve which equals their present paid up capital of £600,000. They purpose converting that reserve into paid up capital; giving each of their shareholders, who will then all stand on the same basis of their stock being £5 paid, for each £5 share, 12 shares with 15 shillings paid on each, or £9 in all. All shareholders will then be on an equality as to unpaid calls because the new shares will be £2 each and will have 15 shillings paid on each with an uncalled liability of 25 shillings. One curious feature of this company is that under its charter the directors are compelled to set aside out of the profits over 6 per cent, one-half of the surplus towards building up a reserve fund until that reserve fund reaches 100 per cent of the capital. As I pointed out, the present paid up capital is £600,000 and the reserve fund is also £600,000, so that the directors are free to-day to distribute all the profits among the shareholders. Once this Bill goes through, the reserve fund will be reduced to a very small fraction, and the company will thereafter be compelled to set aside out of the profits over 6 per cent, one-half of the surplus towards building up another reserve fund until it in turn equals the paid up capital. That is, I think, as far as I need go in explanation. If there are any questions which hon. members wish to ask and it is within my competence to answer them, I shall be only too glad to do so.

Mr. BUREAU: I never looked at the charter of the Trust and Loan Company. Did I understand my hon. friend to say that when the reserve fund is equal to or exceeds the amount of the paid up stock, this same reserve fund may be distributed amongst the stockholders?

Mr. CRONYN: No. Perhaps I expressed myself wrongly. Until the reserve fund reached 100 per cent of the paid up capital or, as the hon. member puts it, equals the paid up capital, the company must set aside one-half of its profits over 6 per cent, towards building up the reserve fund. Once the reserve fund is built up, the company can distribute its entire profits amongst the shareholders.

Mr. BUREAU: The reserve remains?

Mr. CRONYN: Yes in the form of paid up capital.

Mr. CAHILL: I understand that instead of distributing in dividends a portion of the surplus which may have been earned in the last two or three years, the Bill purposes distributing paid up stock. In what way does that affect the income tax of Canada?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid it does not affect the income tax much, one way or the other. In Canada we tax Canadian incomes; we tax the incomes of those people who are ordinarily resident in Canada or who carry on business in Canada. I think that practically all the shareholders in this company are people who reside in the Mother Country, and as such are not taxable.

Mr. CAHILL: That is, the business being carried on is taxable only so far as the people who own the funds are resident in Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Their personal taxes will not be changed at all one way or the other. As to whether this company is liable for any excess business profits' tax, I am not in a position to inform the hon. member, because that has not been looked into.

Mr. CAHILL: If the company were liable under the Excess Business Profits' Tax Act, would the fact of the company distributing paid-up stock instead of distributing the earnings in cash, affect the Government's power to collect the excess business profits' tax.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I don't think it would affect it at all. The transfer of reserve to capital stock would not affect the amount of capital upon which the business tax would be computed.

Mr. CAHILL: No matter how the profits were distributed?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No. Otherwise the hon. gentleman will see that the profits could easily be dissipated and the tax evaded?

Mr. MORPHY: Has this matter been before the shareholders, and if so, have they unanimously assented to the legislation? Secondly, if this becomes law, will any of the poorer classes of shareholders suffer by being what is commonly called "frozen out."

Mr. CRONYN: There were meetings called of the shareholders and debenture holders, which were very largely attended. There is an affidavit on file which was produced before the Banking and Commerce Committee proving that the necessary resolutions confirming what this Bill seeks to carry out, were unanimously agreed to without any objection, so I am informed.

Mr. GOULD: With respect to the Income tax, I understand that the Imperial Government requires all residents in this country who are in receipt of revenue from the Old Country, to make a return. Could not this legislation be made retroactive, empowering the Government to demand a return from residents of other countries who are recipients of funds from Canada?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That whole question is under consideration. We are not satisfied with the present position. Whether we shall be able to remedy it or not is another question.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—REPORTED.

Bill No. 7, to incorporate The T. Eaton General Insurance Company.—Mr. Mowat.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

MR. GEORGE CARVILL.

Mr. COPP:

1. Is Mr. George Carvill in the employ of the Canadian National Railways?
2. If not, was he dismissed from the service?
3. If dismissed, what was the cause and date of such dismissal and who ordered same?
4. Did said Mr. Carvill ask for an investigation into the cause of his dismissal?
5. If so, was such request granted? If not, why?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. No.
2. Yes.
3. Mr. Carvill was dismissed April 30, 1917, for general incompetency by the management.
4. Yes.
5. Request for investigation was received. The management investigated the case and from evidence submitted it was not considered necessary to re-open it.

TRENT CANAL WHARVES.

Mr. BURNHAM:

What will the Government do regarding the superintendence and upkeep of the Trent canal wharves between lock seven and Rice lake, in view of the statement by the then Minister of Railways and Canals recorded on page 759 of Hansard, Vol. 1, 1917?

Hon. Mr. REID: Wharves situated on road allowances where these intersect the navigable channel have, when considered of sufficient public importance, been repaired by the Department of Railways and Canals. No repairs have been made to those wharves which are situated on privately owned lands.

COST OF GENERAL ELECTIONS.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

What was the total cost of the general election of 1896, and of each general election subsequently held in the Dominion of Canada?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: 1896, $197,103.35; 1900, $232,911.20; 1904, $307,995.60; 1908, $391,960.32; 1911, $507,353.55; 1917, $1,678,-139.99. The latter amount includes expenses of taking the soldiers' vote and the cost of enumeration of voters' lists.

STEAMER A. J. McKEE.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

1. On what date was the steamer A. J. McKee purchased by the Government?
2. From whom was the steamer purchased, and at what price?
3. What is her net and D.W. tonnage?
4. How much has been expended on repairs and refitting of this vessel since the date of her purchase?
5. What trade is she engaged in at present?
6. What is her net earnings from the date of purchase up to the date of last voyage in which the accounts have been adjusted?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. April 18, 1917.
2. Purchased from Algoma Steel Corporation. Purchase price, $500,000.
3. Net, 1,373 tons; dead weight, 3,000 tons (approx.)
4. $342,660.
5. St. John-West Indies.
6. There has been a deficit of $269,354 to 31st December, 1919, on account of serious damage sustained through the Halifax explosion, and also on account of vessel running aground at New York. The vessel being uninsured at that time, repairs were largely charged to operating expenses.

GASPE STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

1. Has the Government given any thought to putting in some of its own steamers on the Montreal-Quebec-Gaspé route and on the Campbellton-Gaspé route in lieu of the steamers subsidized in the past?
2. Is the Government aware that the residents of Matane, Gaspé and Bonaventure counties have to rely on sailing craft to transact their business as in the old days?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. No.
2. The Government has no special information. There may be some cases of the kind.

MATAPEDIA FREIGHT TRAFFIC.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

What has been the amount of freight business done at the railway station of Matapedia, Quebec, in dollars and tons during the last five years as compared with the previous five year period?

Hon. Mr. REID:

For the five year period ending December 31, 1914, the freight business was as follows:

Outward freight	119,990 tons
Earnings	$274,294.04
Inward freight	119,319 tons
Earnings	$334,570.67

For the five year period ending December 31, 1919, the freight business was as follows:

Outward freight	392,939 tons
Earnings	$951,022.61
Inward freight	365,600 tons
Earnings	$1,030,916.36

BONAVENTURE AND GASPE COUNTIES DAIRY AND FISH SHIPMENTS.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

1. Are any arrangements contemplated for the coming season to assist in the shipping of fresh fish, butter and cheese in cold storage cars from the counties of Bonaventure and Gaspé?
2. If so, what are they?

Hon. Mr. TOLMIE:

1. and 2.—The Dairy and Cold Storage Branch of the Department of Agriculture has arranged for several years for a weekly iced butter car service to operate over the Qubec Oriental Railway from Bonaventure to Matapedia, where it is transferred to the Canadian National Railway. It is intended to continue this service during the season of 1920.

The Department of Agriculture has never arranged for iced cars for the shipping of fresh fish and does not know of any proposal that it should be done this year.

PUBLIC WORKS EMPLOYEES.

Mr. MACKIE (Edmonton):

1. Could any of the employees in the Architectural and Engineering Branches of the Public Works Department be dispensed with?
2. If so, how many?
3. Could the services of any of the said employees have been dispensed with some time ago without hampering the work of said branches?

4. If so, from what date?
5. What is the annual cost of keeping said employees in the service?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. Yes.
2. The number of employees who could be dispensed with depends entirely on the amount of work which the Department of Public Works is authorized to carry out during the year 1920, and this again is directly related to the extent of the appropriations granted to the department at this session of Parliament, as the volume of work varies from year to year.
3. Yes.
4. From the beginning of the year 1917.
5. Answered by No. 2.

MILITARY HOSPITAL, ST. ANNE, QUEBEC.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. Has the Government a large soldiers' hospital at St. Anne, Quebec?
2. If so, how much land in connection with said hospital cost and what has been the cost of erecting the buildings and equipment?
3. Does the Government own the land upon which the said hospital is erected?
4. If not, for how long has the land been leased and on what terms?
5. In what condition has the land to be returned to its owners?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. Yes.
2. Cost of buildings and equipment to 31st December, 1919, is $1,581,682.40.
3, 4 and 5. The hospital buildings are erected on land leased by the Royal Institution for the Advancement of Learning (Macdonald College), for a period of two years after the war, not to exceed seven years in all. At the expiration of that time, the owners have the right to acquire the buildings and equipment, or portions thereof, at a valuation to be agreed upon, otherwise the buildings are to be removed by the Government and the site restored to its original condition.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY.

*Mr. SEXSMITH:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to operate the Canadian National railways on standard time during the next summer?
2. If so, will they compel the private owned railways to use the same time?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. It has not yet been decided whether or not the Canadian National railways will operate under standard time this summer.
2. All railways will of necessity use the same time.

[Mr. H. A. Mackie.]

REDEMPTION OF DOMINION NOTES.

*Mr. TOBIN:

1. Are Dominion notes redeemable in gold?
2. If not, in virtue of what law can the Government refuse to carry out the obligation which it assumed when the notes were issued?
3. When will the Government be in a position to pay gold for the notes which are tendered for redemption?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1 and 2. Under the Finance Act the redemption of Dominion notes in gold has been suspended.
3. Dominion notes are issued under statutory authority which requires a certain percentage of gold to be held as security. The gold held has been at all times considerably in excess of the required amount. The redemption of Dominion notes in gold will be resumed at the first practical opportunity, due regard being had to the interests of the country.

CAMPBELLTON-GASPE STEAMER SERVICE.

Mr. Marcil (Bonaventure):

Owing to the refusal of the Government to grant a subsidy for a steamship service between Campbellton, N.B., and Gaspé, Quebec, is the Government prepared to offer a subsidy of $3,000 for a steamship service between Dalhousie, N.B., St. Omer and Carleton, Quebec?

Rt. Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The answer is in the negative.

CHARLEVOIX-MONTMORENCY CUSTOMS COLLECTIONS.

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. What amount has been collected each year by the Customs Department through its offices in the County of Charlevoix-Montmorency, within the last five years?
2. What was the amount collected through the same offices for the five years immediately preceding the war?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. 1914-15, $1,595.24; 1915-16, $2,392.44; 1916-17, $1,947.89; 1917-18, $4,956.24; 1918-19, $5,419.24.
2. 1909-10, $814.83; 1910-11, $1,001.72; 1911-12, $2,027.56; 1912-13, $1,876.24; 1913-14, $1,724.90.

NEWSPRINT CONTROL.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to introduce at this session an Act in regard to the control of papers and newsprint?
2. If so, has the Government engaged one Mr. Biggar, K.C., to prepare such legislation?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The question of newsprint control is now before the Supreme Court, and the Government cannot very well consider what action it should take until a decision has been rendered by that court.

RESIGNATION OF MR. R. A. PRINGLE, K.C.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Why has Mr. R. A. Pringle, K.C., resigned as Commissioner and Paper Controller?
2. Why has Mr. R. W. Breadner also resigned as Paper Controller?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. Mr. Pringle in his letter of resignation made the following statement:—

"I am afraid I will have to ask you to relieve me from the distribution of newsprint. I may say that for the last two or three months the matter has been most troublesome and has been taking my whole time. Some of the manufacturers, as you are aware, are refusing to comply with my orders, which will necessitate drastic action being taken. My staff is limited and the work is becoming very burdensome. You have other departments of the Government under which this distribution could probably be better carried on, and orders enforced."

2. Mr. Breadner was appointed controller only temporarily pending other arrangements and particularly to deal with the Fort Frances Pulp and Paper Company question.

CANADA'S CONTRIBUTION TO LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Hon. Mr. FIELDING:

Out of what appropriation was the sum of $64,043.15 paid on February 13 as Canada's contribution to the expense of the League of Nations?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: It was paid out of the Demobilization Vote.

RURAL CREDITS IN CANADA.

Mr. ROSS:

1. Has the Government considered, since the signing of the armistice, the introduction of legislation to permit of the organization of a system of rural credits in Canada?
2. If so, when does it intend to introduce such legislation?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: 1 and 2. The subject is under consideration; due notice will be given if any such legislation contemplated.

QUEBEC-SAGUENAY RAILWAY FREIGHT RATES.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is the Government aware that the freight rates prevailing on the Quebec and Saguenay railway by far exceed those in force upon other railways in Canada?
2. If so, what is the reason for this condition of affairs?
3. By whom were these rates made and authorized to be put in force?
4. Is it the intention of the Government to reduce said rates to conform with rates on other roads?
5. If so, when? If not, why?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. Local class rates on the Quebec and Saguenay railway are not higher than those on other roads. These rates were fixed by traffic officials of the Canadian National railways.

2, 3, 4 and 5. Answered by No. 1.

WHARF REPAIRS IN CHARLEVOIX-MONTMORENCY.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Are urgent repairs necessary to the following wharves in the county of Charlevoix-Montmorency, in the province of Quebec: Baie St. Paul, Ile au Coudres, Les Eboulements, St. Irenee, Murray Bay, Cap a l'Aigle, St. Fidele, St. Simeon and Ste. Anne de Beaupre?
2. If so, has the Government made any provision in the Estimates to be submitted this session to cover these repairs?
3. What are the amounts appropriated for each of these wharves?
4. When will the said repairs be commenced?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. Repairs are required at all wharfs mentioned except St. Fidele.

2, 3 and 4. Information will be given when the Estimates are laid before Parliament.

RAILWAY CHARTER FOR TEMISCOUATA.

Mr. FAFARD:

1. Has the Government, within the last few years, granted a charter for the construction of a railway between St. Camille, county of Bellechasse, and Cabano, county of Temiscouata? If so, on what date?
2. Has the Government granted any subsidies in this connection?
3. Have all the sudsidies been granted or part of them only?
4. If not, why?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. No.
2. Yes.
3. Part only.
4. Subsidies have lapsed.

SUPERANNUATED RAILWAY EMPLOYEES.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Is the Government aware that the old superannuated employees of the I.C.R. are receiving inadequate pension and not at all in relation with the cost of living?

2. If so, is the Department of Railways ready to grant them an annual bonus similar to the one granted to civil servants?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. The matter of increased pensions for employees of the Intercolonial Railway cannot be dealt with until a final scheme is decided upon, which will be uniform on the whole Canadian National Railway system.

2. No.

JOSEPH DUPONT.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Is Joseph Dumont (should read Dupont), of St. Roch des-Aulnaies, county of l'Islet, still employed by the Government as customs or excise officer or in any other capacity?

2. If so, why has he been appointed and what are the duties he performed at that place?

3. What is his salary?

4. What amount has he collected during the past five years?

5. What is the date of his appointment?

6. Does he make reports. If so, how many?

7. Does the Government consider that in the public interest it is necessary to maintain this employee?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. Not now employed.

2. As Preventive Officer, Excise Service.

3. Was $200 per annum.

4. Nil.

5. Was appointed on August 15, 1912, and services dispensed with on February 1, 1918.

6. Has made reports. Four.

7. Answered by No. 1.

IMPORTATION OF WHEAT IN 1919.

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. How many bushels of wheat were imported to Canada from the United States during the year 1919?

2. How much duty was collected on wheat imported from the United States during the year 1919?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. 69,714 bushels.

2. Nil.

NECESSARY PUBLIC WORKS IN QUEBEC.

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Has the Government received any communication regarding certain public works needed at the following places in the province of Quebec: Petite Rivière St. François, Murray Bay (St. Etiennne de la Malbaie), St. Fidele, St. Siméon, Ile-au-Coudres, Point-au-Pic, Port-au-Persil, Baie des Rochers, in the county of Charlevoix; and Ste. Anne de Beaupré, in the county of Montmorency?

2. If so, what is the decision of the Government regarding the advisability of proceeding with the said works?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. Yes, for Petite Rivière St. François, St. Etienne de la Malbaie, St. Fidèle, St. Siméon, Ile au Coudres, Pointe au Pic and Ste. Anne de Beaupré; no for port au Persil and Baie des Rochers.

2. Information will be given when Estimates are laid before Parliament.

HOUSE OF COMMONS STAFF: REORGANIZATION.

Mr. VERVILLE:

1. Has the re-classification or re-organization of the House of Commons staff been proceeded with since the last session?

2. If so, is it complete or at what stage is it now?

3. Is it the intention to submit said re-classification to the House for its approval during the present Session?

4. Is is the intention to provide at the same time for the placing on the retiring list of officials of the House who have passed a certain age and who, for that reason may not be able to fulfil their duties as effectively as required?

Mr. SPEAKER: The answer to the first question is "yes;" to the second, "nearing completion." To the third question, "yes;" to the fourth question, "under consideration."

GRAND TRUNK STOCK.

Mr. CALDWELL:

1. What were the different classes of the Grand Trunk Railway Company's stock quoted at in January, 1918, as regards, First Preference Stock five per cent; Second Preference Stock five per cent; Third Preference Stock four per cent; Ordinary or Common Stock; Five per cent Grand Trunk Debenture Stocks; Five per cent Great Western Debenture Stocks; Four per cent Grand Trunk Debenture Stocks; Four per cent Northern Debenture Stock?

2. What were the same stocks quoted at in January, 1919, and January, 1920?

3. Has any of the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company been sold or changed hands since January, 1918?

4. If so, who were the purchasers of it, what was the date of purchase or transfer, and what was the price paid?

5. Has any member of the present Government ever held any of the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, either personally or by proxy through any other person?

6. If so, what are the names of said members, what amount of stock was so acquired, on what date and on what terms?

Rt. Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In regard to numbers 5 and 6 of this question, Mr. Speaker, I may say promptly that no present member of the Government ever held any of the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company either personally or by proxy, or through any other medium.

LOTBINIERE AND MEGANTIC RAILWAY.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Has the Government any knowledge of a railway called the Lotbiniere and Megantic?

2. If so, where is the said railway located?

3. Who now owns and operates the said road?
4. Has the Government any interest therein?
5. If so, to what extent?
6. When was the said interest acquired?
7. By what legislation or Order in Council, if any?
8. What was the date of said legislation or Order in Council?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. Yes.
2. From Lyster to St. Jean des Chaillons, P.Q.
3. The company.
4, 5, 6, 7 and 8. An Order in Council dated December 1, 1919, gives authority for the purchase of this railway, but the transfer has not yet been made.

PURCHASE OF GOVERNMENT SUPPLIES.

Mr. STEVENS:

1. In what manner is the purchasing of supplies for the various Governmental departments now carried out?
2. Is the War Purchasing Commission still operating?
3. If so, who are the members of the said Commission?
4. Is it the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill this session to organize the Purchasing Commission on a permanent basis?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The purchasing of supplies for the various governmental departments has been carried out by the War Purchasing Commission which is still in operation. The members of the commission are Sir Hormisdas Laporte, Mr. Brown and Mr. Lecky. The Government will make known its intention when it has come to a conclusion on the matter.

RURAL MAIL CARRIERS.

Mr. DEMERS:

1. Has the Government received petitions, or have any representations been made to, concerning the rural mail carriers employed by contracts previous to 1918?
2. Has the Government realized that, owing to the abnormal increase of prices on all things since the awarding of these contracts, the services of these mail carriers are not sufficiently remunerated?
3. Does the Government intend to take into account these exceptional conditions created since the awarding of these contracts, and act accordingly?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Yes.
2. and 3. In dealing with applications from rural mail carriers for increased remuneration or for release from their contractual obligations full consideration is invariably given to the increase in operating expenses, and whenever it can be shown that a mail carrier entered into his contract at a time when it was impossible to foresee the abnormal rise in the cost of necessities and that he is consequently fulfilling the terms of his contract at a financial loss through no fault of his own, steps are taken to invite public tenders for a new contract which when completed leads to the release of the old contractor.

This is the full extent to which the Government can go as under the terms of the Post Office Act no additional remuneration may be given to a mail contractor in excess of his contract rate unless it can be shown that additional equipment and carriers are necessary to properly perform the work or unless there has been an increase in the frequency of the service, or distance travelled.

CITY MAIL DELIVERIES IN QUEBEC.

Mr. DEMERS:

What are the cities and towns of the Province of Quebec in which the city mail delivery has been established?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: Montreal, Quebec, Three Rivers, Sherbrooke, St. Hyacinthe, Shawenegan Falls, Hull.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. Fafard:

For a copy of all documents, letters, telegrams and other correspondence in the hands of the Government concerning the proposed railway between St. Camille, County of Bellechasse, and Cabano, County of Temiscouata.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. ROSS:

1. How many chartered banks were there in Canada in 1880?
2. How many chartered banks are there in Canada at the present time?
3. What profits, as shown by their annual statements, were made by each of the chartered banks in the years 1911, 1912, 1913, 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917, 1918 and 1919?
4. What taxes did each pay to the Federal Treasury in each of the above years?
5. What amount, not being interest on money borrowed, did the Federal Government pay to each chartered bank in each of the years 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917, 1918 and 1919, for service rendered?
6. What is the paid-up capital of each bank, and what is its reserve?

Mr. ROSS:

1. What number of automobiles valued under $1,000 were imported into Canada in each of the years 1918 and 1919?
2. What number valued at between $1,000 and $2,000?
3. What number at a greater valuation than $2,000?
4. What was the duty collected on these automobiles?

5. What was the duty collected on parts of automobiles imported during the years 1918 and 1919?

6. On what number of automobiles valued at less than $1,000 was excise duty paid in the years 1918 and 1919?

7. On what number of automobiles valued at between $1,000 and $2,000 was excise duty paid in the same years?

8. On what number of automobiles valued at over $2,000 was excise duty paid in the same years?

9. What was the amount of such excise duty?

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. How many investigations were held by the Board of Commerce since its formation?

2. Where were they held?

3. How many orders or decisions were given by the said board?

4. What affect did these decisions or orders have on the high cost of living?

5. How many sentences and fines were imposed and what are the names of the parties so sentenced or fined?

6. What has been the cost of the investigations and proceedings of the board to date?

7. Did the board retain the services of experts to help it in the discharge of its duties?

8. If so, what are the names of said experts and where do they reside?

9. How much has been paid to each of them?

10. Are they still in the employ of the board?

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. What are the names of the tenderers for the works to be done at the following places in the county of Montmorency, Quebec: Ste. Anne de Beaupre, Ste. Famille-Ile d'Orleans, St. Francois du Sud-Ile-d'Orleans, St. Jean-Isle d'Orleans, Ile de la Quarantine, Pointe aux Trembles?

2. Where do they reside?

3. What was the amount of each tender?

4. Who were the successful tenderers?

5. Have the said works been started?

6. When will they be completed?

Mr. KENNEDY:

What was the number of persons or corporations paying and the aggregate amount paid by each group by way of Dominion income tax in the city of Toronto during the fiscal years 1917 and 1918, whose assessed income was over $1,500, $6,000, $10,000, $20,000, $30,000, $50,000, $100.000?

*Mr. PARENT:

1. What was the total amount of the gross consolidated debt of Canada on the 28th of February, 1920?.

2. What was the total amount of the net consolidated debt of Canada on the same date?

3. What was the total amount of the assets of the consolidated debt of Canada on the said date?

4. What was the total amount of the yearly interest payable on the gross consolidated debt of Canada on the said date?

5. What was the total amount of yearly interest or revenue received or collected by Canada in respect to the property or securities constituting the assets of the public debt?

6. What was the total amount of the floating debt of Canada on the 28th of February, 1920?

7. What was the total amount of yearly interest payable on the floating debt of Canada on the said date?

[Mr. Ross.]

*Mr. TOBIN:

1. How many employees are there in the Inside Service of the Finance Department including the Insurance Branch?

2. How many are males?

3. How many are females?

4. How many males are French?

5. How many females are French?

6. How many males are Protestants?

7. How many females are Protestants?

CIVIL SERVICE RE-CLASSIFICATION.

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER (Laval-Two Mountains) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and reports relating to the re-classification of the Civil Service by American efficiency experts in the employ of the Arthur Young Company; also all documents relating thereto, which have been submitted to, and received by the Civil Service Commission and comprising: (a) a list of names who, in consequence of such re-classification and subsequently thereto, resigned from the service; (b) the reasons given in support of such resignations, and (c) the nature of the duties of each person who resigned.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There would be no objection to the passage of that with this observation, that the call made in the first part of the resolution would necessitate the employment of an army of clerks—I do not know how large. What the purpose of gathering that vast, desultory correspondence from all parts of the Dominion would be I cannot say. To the main parts of the motion (a), (b) and (c), the Government has no objection and with this observation I have no objection to the motion passing.

Mr. BUREAU: Are these the same people who made the classification for the state of New York?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think they are the same company.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motion stands.

EXPORT BUTTER AND CHEESE.

MOTION BY MR. EDWARDS FOR STANDARDIZATION AND GRADING.

Mr. JOHN W. EDWARDS (Frontenac) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the dairy farmers of Canada are annually suffering great loss through the lack of systematic grading of their products, and whereas it is desirable that a system of grading of butter and cheese should be established to the end that Canada may successfully compete in foreign markets, the Government of Canada, should, as soon as possible, take whatever steps are necessary to standardize and grade Canadian butter and cheese intended for export.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I might preface my remarks or argument in connection with this resolution by stating that from the standpoint of the value of dairy products the banner county of the Dominion of Canada is the county of Oxford. From the standpoint of the value of the cheese products of Canada, the county which I have the honour to represent stands fourth in the list, being beaten in the order named by Leeds, Hastings and Dundas. I want to place some figures before this House this afternoon with the view of trying to impress upon it, and especially upon those members who come from city constituencies, the importance of the dairy industry to the future well being of this Dominion. If any hon. member were presenting an argument in favour of some manufacturing establishment in one of our large centres of population, he would no doubt call attention to the amount of capital invested in Canada, the wages paid, the time spent in the production of the article, and so on.

May I invite the attention of hon. members—and again I say particularly members from city constituencies—to a few figures which I shall place on Hansard with a view to impressing on the members of this House the importance of the dairy industry. The number of milch cows in the Dominion of Canada in 1917, as estimated in a report which I have here, is 3,564,075. The value of these milch cows, at an average of $100 each, which I think is a very low estimate to place upon them, would be $356,407,500. I say I consider a value of $100 is low because I have noticed in any sales which have taken place in my county for the last two or three years that the average amount paid for cows is more nearly $125 or $150 than $100, but putting it at $100, we have for the value of the cows alone the figure which I have given. Mr. Speaker, I ask your consideration to these further facts. If we allow seven and a half minutes for the milking of a cow—and if I may be permitted the expression I think that is going some—there would be an average of fifteen minutes a day spent in the operation of milking each cow, which amounts to 891,018 hours employed eve.y day in Canada in that operation. If we place a value on the time of those engaged at only 20 cents an hour, or at a rate of $2 a day for a 10 hour day—and I am surely placing the rate very low—it would represent an outlay of $178,203 for each day for that operation alone. If we take 30 days to the month for 8 months only—the factory season—the cost of milking would amount to $42,768,720. If we assign to each milker the task of milking eight cows, it means that an army of 445,509 persons performed this work twice a day for at least 8 months of the year. I have given those figures—and I do not think they can be challenged—with the view of impressing upon hon. members the importance of this industry. I need not argue that if any gentleman could come before this House representing any industry with a capital of over $300,000,000 and an outlay of over $42,000,000 for only a part of the operation of producing that one article, and giving employment to over 400,000 people he would have a right to the attention and consideration of every hon. member.

But many other things besides those I have mentioned are fairly chargeable to the cost of producing butter and cheese. A portion of the value of the land and buildings should be charged to capital investment. Then there is the cutting and the storing of feed, the care of the animals, and the conveying of the milk to the factories and creameries—all of which represent an enormous investment and a very considerable expenditure of time, labour and skill.

We had in 1917—and I suppose the figures are about the same now—949 creameries patronized by 139,032 patrons; 1,900 cheese factories with 67,030 patrons; 549 combined butter and cheese factories with 38,344 patrons; or in all 3,398 of these establishments with 244,406 patrons. The capital invested amounted to $19,628,000; the number of persons employed 10,391; the amount paid in salaries and wages $5,447,346. The total amount paid to patrons in one year, 1917, was $73,863,845; the amount expended for fuel $834,036; for wages $5,447,346; for materials $3,844,699, and for miscellaneous expenditure $2,498,334, or a total expenditure of $86,488,260.

In 1917 these factories produced 87,526,939 pounds of butter, valued at $34,274,218; 194,904,336 pounds of cheese valued at $41,180,623; and other products worth $18,424,485, or a total value of $93,879,326.

The dairy industry has been developed in all parts of the country, especially the butter-making branch of it. In 1900 the amount of butter produced was 36,066,739 pounds, valued at $7,240,972; in 1917, it amounted to 87,526,939 pounds, valued at $34,274,218. The quantity of cheese made in 1900 amounted to 220,833,269 pounds, valued at $22,221,430; in 1917, 194,904,336 pounds was manufactured, valued at $41,180,623. So although the quantity of cheese in 1917 was less than in 1900, the value was practically double.

I wish now to draw the attention of the House to the graded cheese made in 1917, and I refer particularly to the cheese produced by the three principal provinces, Ontario, Quebec and Prince Edward Island. Ontario produced 1,087,000 boxes; Quebec 755,000 boxes; Prince Edward Island over 17,000 boxes. What I wish to particularly call attention to, Mr. Speaker, is that 93.38 per cent of the cheese made in Ontario graded No. 1, 6.42 per cent graded No. 2, and .20 per cent graded No. 3. In the province of Quebec, 70.88 per cent of the cheese graded No. 1, 27.13 per cent graded No. 2, and 1.99 per cent graded No. 3. In Prince Edward Island 90.85 per cent graded No. 1, 9 per cent graded No. 2, and .15 per cent graded No. 3. For the whole of Canada 84.22 per cent graded No. 1, 14.85 per cent graded No. 2, and .93 graded No. 3.

I might say in this connection that 98 per cent of the cheese from central Ontario—the district from Kingston westward—graded No. 1, which I venture to say is a record that cannot be beaten by any country.

But I would like to point out that producers of cheese suffered a very great loss on account of the low grading of a part of their product. There is no reason in the world why 6.62 per cent of the cheese from Ontario should grade below No. 1. The cut on No. 2 cheese as against No. 1 is one-half a cent a pound at Montreal. We will assume that all cheese below No. 1 is No. 2 and we will estimate the loss on the basis of one-half a cent a pound. On that basis the loss to Ontario in 1917 on account of this cheese not being graded No. 1 was $39,987. A larger percentage of Quebec cheese was graded under No. 1; their loss amounted to $98,360. Prince Edward Island lost $1,028, making a total loss due to low grade of the product amounting to $139,375 in one year.

Now, let me follow that up by a reference to butter. A classification was made of butter commandeered by the Canada Food Board covering the period from October 1 to November 9, 1918. This butter was taken from Ontario, Quebec, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and well qualified men expressed their opinion with regard to its quality. I shall not give you the number of boxes obtained from each province, but what I wish to impress upon hon. members is this: They graded that butter as No. 1, No. 2 and No. 3, and "No grade." Of the butter which was examined, the percentages graded No. 1 were as follows: Ontario, 70.73; Quebec, 94.48; Alberta, 90.26; Saskatchewan, 71.66; Manitoba, 81.10. In 1917—and I assume that the conditions are very much the same now—Quebec was far in advance of all the other provinces not only in the production and value of creamery butter, but in the quality as well. I regret to see the Ontario producers at the foot of the list in the matter of quality. That 94.48 per cent of Quebec butter should grade No. 1 is, I say, highly creditable to the producers of that province. That only 70.73 per cent of Ontario butter should grade No. 1 is not creditable to the producers of Ontario, nor is it, in my opinion, excusable.

I do not know what reduction is made for the grades of butter which are below No. 1, but suppose we allow a cut of 2 cents a pound. Possibly there would not be that much difference between No. 2 butter and No. 1; it is my personal opinion that the difference would be greater. However, if we allow only 2 cents a pound off all the grades below No. 1, let us see what it meant to Ontario and to the other provinces to have these inferior grades of butter. Ontario would lose in that year, on the basis of the butter produced in the creamery, of which we have a record, $167,979. Quebec would lose $37,831; Alberta, $17,440; Saskatchewan, $24,917; Manitoba, $20,870, a total of $269,037. On the total production of butter in the Canadian creameries in 1917, the loss due to poor quality would amount to $311,596. But this does not represent the total loss because I have referred only to the butter produced in the creameries. What of the enormous quantities of butter which are made by the people on the farms, and so on? In view of the fact that only 70 per cent of Ontario butter graded No. 1, I am safe in taking that as a criterion for all the butter produced in the province; consequently the loss on account of poor quality must have been very great indeed.

Mr. Speaker, the figures that I have given indicate very clearly the necessity of doing something to standardize or to bring up the quality of this article. But while my resolution does state as a fact that the producers are losing thousands of dollars yearly because of lack of systematic grading, it goes on to say that we should have a uniform standard of the butter for export. The various provinces may deal with the quality of the butter produced for consumption in those provinces, but it is the duty of this Government and of this Parliament to look after the butter which is exported. I want to deal particularly with the export of our surplus butter which goes overseas. Canada is the best market for Canadian butter, but in order to maintain the home market as our best market we must find buyers in other countries for our surplus production, and in order to be sure of obtaining buyers in other countries we must produce butter which is equal to the best offered by any other country.

Now, let me give you a few figures of our exports of butter and cheese from the port of Montreal for the years 1916, 1917, 1918, and 1919. First, butter:

Year	Quantity (Packages).	Value.
1916..	177,189	$3,426,741
1917..	48,356	1,188,251
1918..	143,573	3,778,841
1919..	79,155	2,612,115

Then, here are the figures with regard to cheese:

Year.	Quantity. (Boxes).	Value.
1916..	2,142,699	$33,822,503
1917..	1,660,675	29,618,134
1918..	1,619,321	31,078,892
1919..	1,172,460	26,718,896

This represents a total export of butter from Montreal in four years of 25,103,288 pounds, valued at $11,005,948, and of cheese of over 545,000,000 pounds, worth $121,238,425. An industry in which so much money is involved, and the export of the product of which runs into millions, is certainly deserving of the sympathetic consideration of every member of this House.

Conditions in regard to dairying, especially in regard to the marketing of our cheese, have, for many years, not been as good as they might have been. Resolutions have been passed in this House from time to time calling attention to injustices to and grievances of dairymen, and they have received, not from this Government, but from former governments, very little consideration. In 1908, 600 dairymen met in the city of Ottawa in convention and placed their grievances before the Government. In 1911, a delegation of over 800 waited on the Government and asked for redress of their grievances. Nothing, however, was done in a practical way to accede to their requests, although, I suppose, something was done when the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. W. G. Parmelee, was appointed as a Royal Commission to investigate the matter; but the investigation was held behind closed doors, and the then Minister of Agriculture, the Hon. Sydney Fisher, instructed him, to use his own words: "Don't go into too many details; I count on you to do everything you can to prevent any party capital being made from this." Mr. Parmelee occupied two years in this investigation, examining forty-eight witnesses in that time, or an average of two witnesses a month, so that he did not overwork himself. The matter hung on in that way, and nothing was done until 1912. I brought the matter up in this House in the session of 1912 asking for the appointment of a commission to investigate the whole subject of the weighing in Montreal. A commission was appointed, and following a report of that commission, a referee was appointed in the city of Montreal to whom the producer of cheese might apply in case he felt he was not getting a fair deal in the matter of weights. But for all that, I maintain that at the present time and under present conditions, producers of cheese—here I speak particularly for the people of Eastern Ontario and Western Quebec, because those are the two sections where cheese production is carried on to the greatest extent—are suffering very extensive losses in the way their cheese is being marketed. A man ships 500 cheese to Montreal, those cheese having been sold as No. 1 cheese. All cheese, of course, are sold as No. 1; the price paid on the cheese sold is for No. 1 cheese, and the cheese-maker is employed on the understanding that he is to make No. 1 cheese. 500 cheese are sold from a certain factory and they go to Montreal. The price to be paid for those cheese, was, let us say, 21 cents, that being the price that the buyer agreed to pay for No. 1 cheese. If there is a good stiff demand for cheese, I venture to say that that deal will go through without any trouble at all; but if the big exporters of Montreal get cables from overseas to the effect that the cheese market has fallen off about half a cent, then there is trouble; the wires get busy, and the man in Montreal wires back to his buyer in Kingston, for instance: "Those 500 cheese you bought for me is off flavour; something is wrong with them." The maker of the cheese is several hundred miles away from Montreal, and although he does not think that he is being used squarely, what is he to do? Will he get on the train, go down to Montreal in order to look the thing over, and put up a fight? If he does that, he must employ somebody to take his place in the factory, and may be while he is away there will be cheese produced that will be off flavour. He simply has to submit to his loss, and the result is that under those conditions we have in Ontario to-day some of the very best cheese-makers going out of business. The cheese-maker does not know from day to day where he stands; there may be such a cut made on his cheese that all his profits for the summer will be swept away, and he feels that he is in the hands of the men who are carrying on the export business; that they are going to protect themselves, if necessary, at his expense. I maintain that that could not happen if our cheese was graded at the port of Montreal. In that case, all that the big exporter could get out of the deal would be his commission, and he is entitled to that; but the cheese would be graded and sold as No. 1 or No. 2 as the case might be, and the same thing will apply, of course, to butter.

But there is another reason why our cheese and butter should be graded. I maintain that a proper systematic grading of butter and cheese is the only possible way by which Canada can hope successfully to compete in the markets of the world for our surplus production of those two articles. Let us for a moment take into consideration what has been done by certain other countries. Denmark aims to export only one grade of butter, and that the best. The grading in Denmark is under State control, three judges being appointed by the Government to judge and grade the butter. One of those judges is a State inspector; one is a butter dealer, and one is a butter maker, and they do the grading. In Holland, all export butter must bear the Government mark "Netherlands Butter Control". In New Zealand, all export butter must be inspected by a Government official and have the grade marked on the package; not only that, the Government of New Zealand also thinks it worth while to send an experienced man to London and to keep him there to examine each cargo of butter on arrival and to check the quality of each lot carrying a distinctive brand. The grading of Irish butter is in the hands of the Irish Butter Export Committee, and there is a special and four ordinary grades. In Canada there have been some slight attempts at grading in some of the provinces; but as regards grading for export, the only semblance of systematic grading we ever had was that carried on at Montreal by Mr. Burgess, of the Dairy and Cold Storage Branch during 1917, 1918 and part of 1919, when the cheese exported were graded as first, second and third. If Canada is to compete successfully in the markets of the world, we must adopt a uniform and systematic method of grading for both butter and cheese.

[Mr. Edwards.]

I should like to quote to this House a statement made in this House by Mr. Girard, formerly member for Chicoutimi-Saguenay in the province of Quebec, Mr. Girard was for many years very closely connected with the dairy interests of this province and took a deep interest in anything relating to the dairy interest. Speaking in this House on March 21, 1912, he said (Hansard p. 5733):

> The Cheese Exporters' Association of Montreal insists that, whenever one-third of a lot of cheese is found to be No. 2 or No. 3, the whole shipment, even should the remainder be of the very first quality, be rated as No. 2 or No. 3, according to the case . . . . . Of course, the buyer who has succeeded in putting through such a deal is very careful to classify in his store the products so bought and to sell in England No. 1 cheese as such, and No. 2 cheese as such also.

You can easily see where the producer gets off at in a deal like that. Further on he says:

> The Quebec Dairymen's Association . . . . . has suggested as the only remedy for such an evil, the grading of dairy products.

Still further on he says:

> I appeal to this House, I appeal more especially to my fellow members from the province of Quebec: Is it not urgent that a movement should be set on foot at once so that dairy products may be sold under their true designation on the British market, in the same way that in every country on all markets, products of various kinds, are sold under the designation of the maker and of the country of origin?

With these expressions of opinion I am heartily in accord. A meeting was held at the Chateau Laurier in Ottawa last week which was attended, I understand, by deputy ministers of Agriculture from all the provinces of the Dominion. At that meeting a resolution was proposed by the Deputy Minister of Agriculture for the province of Saskatchewan, and seconded, I believe, by the Deputy Minister of Agriculture for the province of Manitoba, asking this Government to do practically what I am asking it to do in this resolution. I have not their resolution before me, but I think I am right in my statement; if not, the minister will correct me.

The other day I received a circular from the Retail Merchants' Association, of Canada, and without going very extensively into its subject matter, I may say that it had to do with oleomargarine. I do not think very much of oleomargarine myself. I never eat it if I know beforehand what is put before me, but I want to say this: The dairying interests of this country should receive some protection from the Government in regard to that article. I do not think the makers of oleomargarine should be permitted to use the word "butter" in their newspaper advertisements and poster advertising. In order to help their sales, they use the word to give a certain air of respectability to the conglomeration which they ask the public to buy. I do not think they should be allowed to use the word "butter" at all in any of their advertisements.

In this circular the statement is made that unless the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine is permitted to continue, and made part of the policy of this country, a lot of people are going to starve because not enough butter is produced in Canada to supply the home demand. I think I can answer that statement conclusively by placing before this House figures of our imports and exports of butter for the last five or six years. In 1914 we imported 7,317,259 lbs. of butter, and we exported 1,228,753 lbs. These figures, I admit, show conclusively that we did not produce enough butter in 1914 to supply the needs of our people. In 1915 our imports fell to 6,822,540 lbs., and our exports rose to 2,724,913 lbs. Again, the figures show that we did not produce enough in 1915 to supply the home demands. In 1916 our imports dropped to 4,309,831 lbs. and our exports rose to 3,441,183 lbs. Again the same statements holds true. In 1917, our imports amounted to 997,335 lbs., while our exports amounted to 7,990,435. There is only one conclusion to draw from those figures, and that is that in the Dominion of Canada in the year 1917 we produced more than sufficient butter to supply the home market, and we had to look to other countries for a market for our surplus production. In 1918, our imports dropped to 434,049 lbs., while our exports amounted to 4,926,154 lbs. Again, the figures show conclusively that we produced more than enough butter in 1918 to supply the home demand. In 1919 our imports amounted to 1,939,062 lbs. and our exports to 13,659,157 lbs. It will be noticed that from 1914 down to the present time our imports grew less year by year, while our exports gradually increased until they reached the figure of 13,659,157 lbs. in the year 1919. Then for the ten months ending January 31, 1920, our exports amounted to 14,118,541 lbs. These figures can leave no doubt in any one's mind that we produced, and are producing in ever-increasing quantities, more than sufficient butter to meet the home demand, and therefore in years to come we must look more and more to other markets in which to dispose of our surplus production.

It is undoubtedly true that those countries which have undertaken a systematic grading of their butter and cheese have made a world-wide reputation for their dairy products. The mere mention of Danish or New Zealand butter carries with it the assurance that it is No. 1 quality. Butter from Denmark, from Holland, New Zealand and all other countries which have adopted a systematic grading has made a world-wide reputation for itself. If our production keeps on increasing, we must look to foreign countries for a market, and it is the countries I have mentioned that we will have to compete with. We should therefore build up such a reputation for our product that the whole world will know that Canadian butter is just as good as the best produced anywhere on earth.

Might I call attention to this further fact—and I do not think it is fair to the dairying industry in this country. In 1918, for instance, we permitted 2,262,514 pounds of oleomargarine to come into this country, and in 1919, 4,217,916 pounds. I have not the figures for the still later period, but I have no doubt they were greater, to say nothing of the amount that is manufactured in Canada. If we brought in, in the year 1919, 4,217,000 pounds of oleomargarine—we exported that year 13,600,000 pounds of butter—it is obvious that we were obliged to look in various countries all over the face of the globe to find a market for over 4,217,000 pounds of butter which was displaced by this questionable concoction. If I were to tell hon. gentlemen who represent city constituencies, and who perhaps have a personal interest in one manufacturing concern or another, that all protection should be moved from the particular article in which they were interested, and that that article should be made to compete with the same product from all parts of the world, those gentlemen, I fancy, would unhesitatingly denounce this proposal as being eminently unfair, and would straightway begin to tell me how much they had invested in the business, the number of people who were employed in it, and the amount of wages paid. Why, Sir, in regard to industries that are nurtured by a protective tariff, what argument could be advanced with greater force than on behalf of this particular industry? That is the contention that would be submitted. People who dwell in cities are unfortunately ignorant of many important things, notwithstanding the knowledge which their civic life gives them. They know a great many things, but they are entirely ignorant of conditions as they exist in the country. Indeed, their knowledge of those conditions is often woefully lamentable, and I say this with no offensive intent whatever, but merely as expressing a matter of fact. A very clever and astute hon. gentleman in this House, who has the misfortune to have lived in the city all his life, said to me: "I could not have the face to tell the people in my city, the labouring men with large families, that they could not have their oleomargarine, but must pay the present price of butter." In reply, I asked him this question: "How would it do to take all the duties off the particular article which your firm is making? Probably that might result in a saving in that direction to these labouring men, who would have all the more to spend on Canadian butter." He could not see the proposition just in that light. I want to impress on this House, Mr. Speaker, that we have, in dairying, an industry in which is invested an enormous amount of capital, and in which a great number of people are directly interested. It is an industry which, I venture to say, from the standpoint of capital invested, from the standpoint of wages paid, and from the standpoint of time and skill expended in its development, is the most important in the Dominion of Canada, and one which will have a greater effect upon the future prosperity and well-being of the country than any other industry that can be named. If this be true, then I say that the industry is one which we must foster and push forward in every possible way; and I cannot see how it is possible for our dairy industry to compete in the markets of the world, with countries which are great producers of dairy products and which have paid special attention to the standardizing of all their products, unless we take similar steps. Before resuming my seat, I desire to quote a statement made by J. S. Dunnet, in "Hoard's Dairyman." It is headed: "Striking Results from Uniform Grading in Australia," and is as follows:

> The war exerted one very important effect on the dairying industry in Australia. It developed the system of government control. Though this was in vogue in a limited way the anti-grading faction wielded enough influence to check the best results. But when the British Government bought the whole surplus, grading as it should be practised became one of the conditions. The results were magical. First grade and over rose from 43 per cent to 96.4 per cent. No comment is necessary.

I might call attention to the fact that we had on hand in Canada on F-bruary 1, of this year, over twelve and a half million pounds of butter and over nineteen million pounds of cheese. I believe that, under conditions which have obtained in this country, shrewd speculators bought butter in large quantities and kept it in cold storage until it deteriorated to a great extent, when it was made over and resold to the public or shipped overseas. Surely I am safe in saying that if there are on hand at present over twelve and a half million pounds of butter, and if we are producing enough fresh butter to satisfy the home demand, it is highly probable that those who hold these surplus stocks of butter will be looking to various countries throughout the world to get a sale for them. Quebec produces butter, ninety-four per cent of which grades number one, and if that province is looking to find a market overseas for its surplus high-grade butter, the reputation of its first-class butter which may go abroad will be utterly ruined by the poor article which is made over and held in stock by these interested companies.

Both Quebec and Ontario have a surplus of butter. Ninety-four per cent of Quebec's butter, as I have said, grades number one, and only seventy per cent of Ontario's surplus grades number one. This being the case, am I not right in saying that the surplus which Ontario tries to find a market for overseas, going alongside the butter from the province of Quebec, will damn the reputation of the first-class article which is produced there? Undoubtedly it will, and such a condition of things should not exist. It is not fair to those who produce a first-class article to have its reputation jeopardized in this manner, and the only way in which this unfairness can be prevented is to have what exists in the countries I have mentioned, namely, a system of grading—I am, of course, referring only to the quantity exported—under Government control, a system which will properly standardize the quality of butter and cheese and build up for Canada the reputation which it should enjoy in the markets of the world for these two products, of which we are likely to have an increasing surplus as the years go on. I therefore move the resolution which stands in my name.

Mr. SAMUEL FRANCIS GLASS (Middlesex, E): I have listened with considerable interest to the presentation of this subject by the hon. member for Frontenac, (Mr. Edwards), and having myself on several occasions in this House advocated a system of grading in regard to other commodities, it affords me much pleasure indeed to lend my support to the resolution which my hon.

friend has so ably moved. Surely it must be obvious to the Government, as well as the people of this country, that great benefits have accrued to the wool, wheat and flax industries as a result of the establishment of a system of grading. By establishing standards we have gained a reputation for these products, and in the markets of the world to-day the reputation of an article for which any great sale is sought is of supreme importance. It is an easy matter by carelessness or neglect of standardization to lose in a single shipment a reputation that has been acquired with years of care. I do not intend to elaborate this but in connection with the discussion one matter came to my mind which I would like to present to the House and to the minister for consideration. I shall not attempt to offer any solution for the difficulty which appears to me but no doubt some remedy may be applied. It is this: No doubt many hon. members have felt when they have gone into a store to make a purchase of butter, the product of some standard reputable dairy or creamery, that the name or label on the butter was a sufficient evidence of its quality. I thought that myself but my mind has been thoroughly disabused of the idea that any label or brand represents quality in butter. That, I opine, must happen in connection with shipments of dairy products overseas. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) has proposed standardization, under Government supervision and examination, of these products. That is perfectly right but that standardization, if I understand his presentation of the subject, requires that the examination shall be prior to shipment to cold storage in Montreal. Is it not evident every day of our lives, as we go into stores to purchase creamery butter, that the butter has so deteriorated in quality from being in cold storage that if you are depending on the brand you will find that the brand is no evidence of quality whatever. Supposing that this butter be shipped to Montreal and that with the guarantee of this Government it is branded or standardized as No. 1 butter. It is standardized at the time it goes into cold storage but later on in six, nine, twelve,—heaven only knows how many months—afterwards, because as long as it is in the interest of the cold storage man to hold it there for a higher profit it is held, it is finally shipped over to the markets of Europe. The product has so deteriorated in value that it must necessarily cause an injury to the dairy interests of this country. How are we going to get over that? That butter is sold in the market of old London with the label of the factory in which it is produced and the Government stamp of standardization and yet, that butter, by reason of its having been held in cold storage has so deteriorated that it is not even a third class butter. If such a thing as this is happening day by day in this country to our dairy products all the effort and trouble we may apply to standardization will not avail unless we are able to correct that evil. I present this view to the consideration of the House and the minister in the hope that there may be some solution for the difficulty.

Mr. A. M. DECHENE (Montmagny) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish, with the consent of the House, to add a few words regarding this subject which is of particular interest to the great majority of Canadian farmers. The proposer of this motion for once has spoken admirably of the producers of the province of Quebec. As a matter of fact, the production of butter and cheese has within recent years remarkably developed. Oftentimes, having ascertained certain results, we neglect tracing them back to their cause. It might be rash to conclude that because striking progress has been made along certain lines in some parts of the Dominion such progress is exclusively due to Dominion legislation. We should also take into account the legislation passed by each of the Provincial Legislatures, and especially the enforcement of the law as it stands.

We have incorporated in our Canadian statutes legislation having reference to the dairy industry, which imposes, for instance, restrictions as to the percentage of moisture that butter and cheese should contain; but do we realize that, very often, such provisions are not enforced with sufficient rigour? In the course of my law practice I have had the opportunity more than once of seeing Government inspectors of Quebec enter creameries in order to find out if the Dominion legislation was actually enforced as strictly as that of the province of Quebec, and in very few cases was there any occasion for interference on account of there being an excess of one or two per cent of moisture. If, in some provinces, the results have not been as good as might have been expected; if, as stated by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), only seventy per cent of Ontario's output grades number one, while ninety-four per cent of Quebec's butter is so graded, it might be interesting to inquire whether such result is not due to the fact that a sufficiently close inspection of the manufacturing processes of butter is not kept up in Ontario. The province of Quebec has enacted very strict laws and follows most closely its buttermakers. Twice, even three times, every month, the Government inspectors visit the creameries in order to find out whether the provisions of the Act are faithfully adhered to, and I do not think, Mr. Speaker, I am revealing a provincial secret nor any creamery's special secret, if I state that therein lies the success of that industry. Let us see to it, that the law as it stands is complied with, and the result will be a superior production throughout the country, without any need of resorting to checks more or less difficult of application, more or less cumbersome, and which always interfere with the manufacture, sale or exchange of our produce.

The manufacturing methods must be looked after. By looking after such methods and at the same time laying down rules as regards the building and management of factories, the handling of products at the factory, the milk and the cream delivered there, we shall surely succeed in obtaining a number one product that will attract world-wide attention.

The British market is already more difficult of access to our Denmark competitors who, according to some official publications, have even had to cross over to England in order that certain restrictions imposed upon their products should be removed.

It is better to try and produce butter which on its face is attractive to the market than to attempt to set instead some official standard which must necessarily result in destroying competition among the various provinces and between the different makers. A big exhibition was held two years ago in the province of Ontario in Toronto, I believe. A competition was opened to all the provinces for their cheese and butter. To the great astonishment of the whole country—the Government inspectors of the Quebec Department of Agriculture excepted—the province of Quebec carried off the first prizes. The fact attracted and aroused general attention. Last winter the Western people held in their turn one of these large conventions and the Western provinces came out first, while Quebec was awarded only the third and fourth prizes; unfortunately, as complained the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), for his province, it was still a little farther behind.

Instead of setting arbitrary standards for export, the question would be, Mr. Speaker, to go directly to the root of the evil and to promote in a practical way the manufacture of our own butter and cheese. While the practice is gradually disappearing as regards the butter manufactured in our province, the making of two kinds of butter is allowed: butter made from ordinary cream and butter made with so-called pasteurized cream. On our markets, in Montreal particularly and almost everywhere, the butter made from pasteurized cream has always fetched a higher price, often one cent or a cent and a half more per pound. That cent and that fraction generally go direct to the butter producer, because in this country, as in New Zealand and in Denmark, the farmers have striven towards joint action and co-operation in order to obtain a product that would be more uniform and more tempting to the consumer. Concerning the pasteurized butter kept in cold storage during winter, Dominion statistics give us striking results as to the possibility of developing it into a thriving business; this butter made from ordinary cream not submitted to a special treatment, after having remained some time in the large cold storage warehouses had lost, if I am well informed, from 4 to 5 per cent, and even much more in some cases, of its original value.

Our farmers look carefully after the manufacture of their butter; they congregate very often to discuss matters, and their tendency, at present, is apparently to have the private concern go out of business and co-operative associations of patrons take their place. This is perhaps a deficiency which might be easily remedied by a close inspection or by a change in the provincial laws, or by means of federal legislation.

In many cases, the individual manufacturer makes butter and cheese mainly with a view to increasing his profits; he buys from the producers their milk or their cream at a certain price, and then disposes of the product at his own sweet will. Things happen differently with respect to the products of a co-operative association. As a general rule, members of such associations bring their milk to their own factory, they make their butter and their cheese, and which is connected with what we call, in our province, "the co-operative association of the butter and cheese makers of the province of Quebec," which now has thousands of shareholders, all farmers and milk producers, belonging to some one or other of those local co-operative industries.

The main co-operative, which has its office at Montreal, receives the butter and the cheese from the local co-operative and sells on the foreign markets, in consideration of a mere commission, the product which is sent to it from every part of the province, with the result that the producer or the farmer himself gets nearly all the possible profit from his own product, whereas, if the private concerns were more and more encouraged, the milk and cream producer would not derive from his own goods all the profit which he might.

This idea is spreading enormously in our midst, as it did in Denmark, and recently in New Zealand, where it caused the farmer-producers who deal with this branch of their industry, to reap profits which were absolutely marvellous. Here is what I find, with respect to the dairy industry, in a concise report from the United States:

"Their is probably no country in the world where the manufacturing of dairy products has developed so quickly and to such an enormous extent as in New Zealand, or where the scientific and mechanical details have made such marvellous strides. New Zealand has perhaps, to-day, the largest and best equipped butter and cheese factories in the world, and her farmers make use of more cream separators and milking machines than those of any other country. But not only did the New Zealanders prove their energy and their ability by this mechanical or scientific development or by the total sum of their dairy production. And it was found, with surprise, that butter pasteurized with cream under special process, had lost a fraction of one per cent, or that this butter, so prepared, was of great value for immediate exportation.

Perhaps should we rather encourage the production of that kind of butter in our country, which would then, export it as a special brand, and to our credit on the different foreign markets. If in many cases, our butter and our cheese happen to lose a great part of their value when they get abroad, it is not due to the methods of manufacture or conservation, but to the manner in which they are received or dealt with, in England. Is it not a fact, and more particularly so during the war, that some four or five hundred thousand pounds of cheese have been at times left strewn at random on the wharves of Liverpool or of London, owing to the fact that we had not the necessary warehouses in which such goods might have been taken care of before they were delivered to the British dealers.

Instead of preaching, as it did last year, that the whole matter should be brought under one principle: "standardization," to use the English expression, our Department of Trade and Commerce should take action and find out how our products are dealt with in England, and whether all the Canadian products from any part of Canada do get all the attention which they are entitled to.

With respect to Canadian cheese and butter, it has often been noticed, for instance, that certain quantities of those products coming from a certain province were the object of close attention and were properly sheltered, so as to retain their quality and therefore, their value, whereas similar products, coming from the province of Quebec especially, were left on the highways or on the wharves, probably to show that they were of an inferior grade, and, of course, with the possible result that they might lose their good name on the market. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce would be acting the part of a good patriot if he would see that there were no discrimination on the foreign markets, as between the different products.

They have also achieved splendid results along the lines of co-operation and business and organization. Almost all the old butter and cheese factories belonging to private individuals became competitive establishments whose patrons are among the chief and very often the only shareholders. The result is that New Zealand has during these last four years taken a most prominent place in the American as well as the British markets.

It might be a fault to consider only the English market as an outlet for our butter and cheese while we have a large market almost at our own doors. For the United States are importing from New Zealand, Denmark and other countries large quantities of butter and cheese. By attending to the advertising of our products in those quarters we would undoubtedly have reasons for rejoicing and our producers, our farmers, would draw large benefits from their labours.

The Danish produce itself has largely depreciated on the American market. To quote the New York Produce Review of March 3, 1920: "Buyers are now convinced that the official Danish stamp is no more an indication of that high degree of perfection which was expected and they have resolved that every shipment must be carefully inspected upon its arrival. A lot of 500 casks from Denmark arrived here on Friday via Hamburg, and the quality is not among the best."

Seeing that periodicals in the United States are already complaining about the quality of the Danish product, why is it that our Department of Trade and Commerce, instead of attending solely to trifles, to the markets of South America, Africa, or India, does not attend to the direct advertising of our products in the United States, making it known that we in the province of Quebec have a produce we could ship abroad. Scarcely a month ago, there were in one warehouse over a million pounds of butter. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) himself was complaining a moment ago that Quebec had an enormous surplus on hand and Ontario as well. Why then does the Department of Trade and Commerce publish a weekly bulletin if the sole purpose of that bulletin be to acquaint us with the fact that in England, Denmark, France or Norway, as well as in Spain, such and such a product could be bought or sold, when it does not refer to the American market and especially to the large markets of New York, Boston and Chicago.

The quality of our produce could undoubtedly be improved on the whole, but I think, Mr. Speaker, what matters the most is to make it fully known abroad. By advertising it on a large scale in the United States we should reap an immediate benefit and our products would not be in danger of deterioration from the lack of accommodation or for the simple reason that on the docks in England the necessary warehouses to store them are wanting.

I do not see clearly what great use it would be to impose upon our producers a particular brand, a No. 1, requiring such and such a quality. Particularly, let us turn our attention to the processes of manufacture; let us make sure that provincial laws are well inforced everywhere and we shall thus reach our aims; the advantageous disposal of our products, the procuring to the producer of the full value and perhaps the lowering in a small measure of the cost to the consumer by doing away with the middleman, who often enhances prices by stowing large quantities of these products in the cities and compelling the unfortunate consumer to eat oleomargarine, when he could get butter if the large producer, who is to-day the same as he was during the war would not put it in the cold storage warehouses of the cities, because he prefers to let it spoil rather than allow the dropping of prices. I believe that we should thus obtain better results while the tendency, originating in the war, which prompts to legislate and assume general control of things in every particular will not be profitable because competition will largely be done away with, and it is competition which ensures the best results.

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the masterly way in which this resolution was introduced by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) and seconded by the hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Glass), and supported by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Dechene).

I feel that this is a most important matter, particularly when we consider that the value of our dairy products for 1919 is estimated at not less than $247,531,353. Surely under the financial conditions now prevailing in this country this is worthy of our consideration. And I want to say that the Government, as represented by the Department of Agriculture, is particularly anxious to support any movement for increased production of dairy products, and for the placing of those products on the market in such perfect condition that they will be able at least to compete on an even basis with similar products of other countries.

Under the present system most of the grading of dairy products is looked after by the Provincial Governments, that is, products that are for the most part disposed of for local consumption and for interprovincial trade, and this provincial grading is also accepted by United States buyers when purchasing for export to their country. A certain amount of grading was done at Montreal during 1917 and 1918, when large quantities of cheese and butter were being exported to the Old Country, but at the present time I understand there is practically no grading done at that port.

As pointed out by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), when the market is rising and cheese is in very great demand, there is very little trouble about grades; but when we have a falling market there is a considerable scramble to sell, and many producers are disappointed at the returns they receive. However, we cannot hope that grading alone will place our butter in the highest position. A campaign of education must be conducted to improve our dairy methods, so that when the cream or milk reaches the creamery or cheese factory it will be in first-class condition. It will be noted that in those provinces where close inspection is maintained the very best results are secured. We find that Quebec and Alberta occupy the highest positions for the quality of their butter, and I take this opportunity of complimenting the dairymen of those provinces on their excellent showing. The province of Quebec, I understand, was successful in winning the prizes for butter at the Toronto Exhibition of 1918, and in 1919 its dairymen also won prizes in Manitoba, for which they deserve all praise.

With regard to cheese, we find that Ontario stands very high, indeed,—ninety-three per cent No. 1, while Prince Edward Island is a close second with ninety per cent. The district that the hon. member for Frontenac represents has made almost a world's record in reaching a standard of ninety-eight per cent, and the dairymen there are certainly setting a very excellent example to their confreres in the Dominion.

If we can increase not only the quantity but the quality of our dairy products, I am sure we shall go a long way towards meeting the present financial demands of the Dominion. At the present time grading is conducted in practically the same way all over Canada. The Dominion Government about a year ago inaugurated a plan to instruct the graders of dairy products in the best methods of grading, with the result that in certain tests recently made, only a difference of a fraction of one per cent was found among them; showing the very great uniformity prevalent in the different provinces.

On the whole, I think that the figures furnished by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) make rather a good showing, and I do not know of any other country that to-day could better them, a circumstance that should be particularly gratifying to us when we consider that in many sections of the Dominion dairy farming has been only recently introduced.

In New Zealand there is no grading for home consumption. They grade for export, and when one remembers that they have to ship their butter through very warm areas and for great distances, it is apparent that with them it is simply a matter of self-defence to impose a very close grading system. Denmark, I understand, is not carrying on any grading system at the present time; neither is Holland, another country producing a great deal of butter for the English market.

I may say that the Department of Agriculture maintains four inspectors in Great Britain to inspect our butter on its arrival and to assist generally in seeing that it reaches the consumer in the best possible condition.

With regard to the meeting of Deputy Ministers of Agriculture from the different provinces that has been referred to, I may say that this department has considered the necessity of bringing together the representatives of the Provincial Departments of Agriculture with a view to assisting in the development of agriculture, to facilitate the work of the Federal and the provincial departments, to avoid duplication of work ,and to promote a better understanding all round. With that end in view we called a meeting of deputy ministers last week, and among the matters discussed was that of the grading of dairy products. The following resolution was passed:

> That the Federal Minister of Agriculture is hereby respectfully requested to inauguarate a compulsory system of inspection and grading of Canadian dairy products offered for export for overseas trade, whenever in the judgment of his department officials such action is desirable and necessary.

I heartily approve of the establishment of a system of grading for dairy products, but on account of the unsettled condition of the markets of the world and the fact that control will likely continue in Great Britain for some time to come, we do not consider the present time opportune for putting these graders at work. This course will be followed, however, just as soon as we think the time is ripe for adopting it. If, therefore, the member for Frontenac will be good enough to withdraw his resolution I shall be very glad to do my part in carrying out what I have outlined.

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in this debate, but representing as I do a district which is reputed for its development of the dairy industry, a few words on my part will not be out of place.

I was much interested in the presentation made to the House by the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). The subject is one of national importance, having regard to the large quantities of cheese and butter which are exported from our country. I was particularly interested in what the hon. member said as to the relative positions of the two banner provinces, Ontario and Quebec, in the production of cheese and butter. So far as butter is concerned the figures given by my hon. friend show that the province of Quebec holds the first position in Canada. That is most gratifying indeed. In the case of cheese, however, as the percentages stated by my hon. friend show, the position is completely reversed. I have long since realized that in the matter of cheese-making many centres in Quebec have not attained the perfection which the importance of the industry would seem to justify. When I was a much younger man than I am to-day I carried on in the province of Quebec a platform campaign for the betterment of conditions affecting the manufacture of cheese in that province.

The grading of these products is certainly a matter of great importance, but I am not far from sharing the opinion expressed by the member for L'Islet (Mr. Dechene) and by the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Tolmie) that though grading is important, it is perhaps not the most important step to take at this time. Suppose a certain quantity of butter has been graded, some of it No. 1 and some No. 2, and that no restriction has been imposed or regulation made governing the limit of time during which these products shall be held in warehouses before they are exported. If such a highly perishable product as butter, graded No. 1 and No. 2, is held in warehouse in Montreal for a number of months, it is likely that even the No. 1 grade will have deteriorated considerably by the time it reaches Liverpool, and the impression will prevail among retailers in England that our butter graded No. 1 is far from attaining the quality that one would expect of a product so graded. This is an objection which I think should be seriously considered by the Minister if he really desires to consider the question carefully.

Hon. Mr. TOLMIE: No grading system would be undertaken by the Government which did not provide for proper cold storage facilities at the point where the butter would be graded. Moreover, the butter would remain under the control of the Government until it was placed on the vessel; and I think it is generally conceded that butter which is in first class condition when taken into cold storage on board ship does not deteriorate during the voyage. Then, as to the handling at the other end, we would take further steps to make sure that the butter reached the consumer in proper condition.

Mr. BELAND: I thank the minister for this further explanation; it is indeed very reassuring. The loss of money sustained by the farmers through the sale of an inferior product is certainly substantial. I do not remember what the loss was in the case of Ontario for butter, or in the case of Quebec for cheese. But whatever that loss is, the loss of reputation is greater. It is with dairy produce as it is with the human being. A carefully built up reputation, characterized by good moral conduct, thrift and honesty, will, through some dishonourable act, disappear in a moment; and whatever may be the virtues and the attainments of the man who has so dishonoured himself, it takes him months and even years to regain his lost reputation. So it is in the case of cheese and butter; if Canada loses her reputation in the English market for the production of high-class dairy products, it will take years to regain it. So I say that loss of reputation is a more serious consideration than the loss of money that we are sustaining.

We have very keen competitors in the English market. My hon. friend has referred to the fact that Denmark is recognized on the English market as the best producer of butter. There are many reasons why that is so. One is that the Danish authorities keep in close touch with the producers of butter in that country. But another reason for the superiority of Danish butter is found in the particularly fine quality of the grass, and in the race to reach first place in the production of high class butter, that is a condition which we in this country cannot overcome. The important point is that our dairy products should be without fault, in colour, aroma, taste, consistence, and also packing. It is really a campaign of national importance that should impress itself upon the mind of every hon. gentleman who has a seat in this House, and all hon members who represent rural constituencies should, during the recess, impress upon the dairy farmers of Ontario and Quebec the imperative necessity of maintaining the reputation they enjoy in the English market. Hundreds of millions of dollars are at stake, and I hope the minister, who appears so well disposed in regard to this matter and who has to-day delivered his maiden speech as a minister, will give his most earnest attention to this great problem, these great staple, necessary articles of food, namely, cheese and butter.

The matter of proscribing from our market oleomargarine is a very delicate subject. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) is, I believe, of the opinion that we should prohibit the importation, manufacture, and sale of oleomargarine as was the case before 1917.

Mr. EDWARDS: Absolutely.

Mr. BELAND: Is it advisable that we should do that? Since 1917 the importation, manufacture, and sale of oleomargarine has been permitted, but as a result of that permission, do we find that the farmers have been receiving a lower price than before for their dairy products? I do not believe they have. Butter sells to-day higher than it did before 1917; cheese sells to-day higher than it did before 1917.

Mr. EDWARDS: So does oleomargarine.

Mr. BELAND: If the average farmer were consulted, if the question were presented to him in this light, namely: "poor families in this country cannot afford to pay 75 cents for a pound of fat under the name of butter, but they can afford to buy a pound of fat under the name of oleomargarine for 45 cents; by prohibiting the sale of oleomargarine, are we going to deprive poor families from enjoying some fat on their table"? What reply would he give? That is a very delicate question. I know that a large body of the farming community in this country is in favour of proscribing the use of oleomargarine in Canada; but taking into consideration the fact that the farmers are selling their dairy products at a higher price than when oleomargarine was prohibited, I think that for a time at least we should permit the use of oleomargarine in Canada.

I did not intend to detain the House so long. I thank the hon. gentleman who represents the riding of Frontenac for bringing this important subject before the House, and I am sure we are all thankful to him for the large quantity of valuable statistics he has given us upon this important subject.

Mr. JAMES ALEXANDER ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) closes the debate, I wish just briefly to call to the attention of the House and more particularly of the Government another feature of the dairy industry than that presented this afternoon by the hon. member who has given evidence of having studied the question of inspection, not only in Canada, but in other countries. I rise to speak more particularly on account of the statement just made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) who, speaking for the Government, said that the Government were desirous in every way of doing everything possible to encourage the dairy industry of this country. The minister admitted the figures presented this afternoon by the hon. member for Frontenac as showing that the dairy industry of Canada was one of the largest industries of this country, and that much of the future prosperity of Canada depended upon the dairy industry. When my hon. friend said that, it occurred to me that what was required in this country at the present time was not so much a provision for inspection of dairy products as methods of providing for the production of dairy products. For if conditions are going to be continued as they have been during the past two years, the dairy industry of this country will be ruined, and ruined by this Government. We have, sitting alongside of the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster), who has in his department two boards of control, each of which is doing all that it possibly can do to destroy the dairy industry of this country. On the one hand we have the Board of Commerce threatening to put farmers in jail if they increase the price of milk to the basis of what it is worth in export countries. That is on record; every hon. member acknowledges that the Board of Commerce, sitting at Hamilton, have, if they are correctly reported in the newspapers, threatened to put farmers in jail if they increase the price of milk. On the other hand we have the Wheat Control Board who not only take upon themselves to fix the price of wheat, but determine that if the millers of this country manufacture flour for export, they shall pay into the coffers of the Wheat Control Board a tax of $2 a barrel,—for export to some countries this has been reduced to $1.50 a barrel—and if the millers will not pay that $1.50 or $2 a barrel, the Wheat Control Board will not allow them to export flour. The consequence is that to-day the sheds in Montreal and St. John, N.B. are piled up with flour that cannot be exported because the markets will not stand the $1.50 or $2 per barrel tax that is demanded, and the large mills are shut down. It is not a question of setting a price for dairy feed for cattle to-day; it is a question of getting feed; there is no feed obtainable, because the mills are not running. If the Government are desirous of encouraging the dairy industry of this country, one thing they must do is to call off the man who threatens to put in jail the farmer who rises early to milk cows, and the other thing they must do is to take hold of this Wheat Control Board and say to them, that no matter how much they may preach protection or try to make the people of this country believe that they are in favour of taxes, they must take off the taxes if the milling industry of this country is not to be ruined, and along with it the dairying industry of this country, because primarily you must have cheap and good feed for your cattle if you are going to produce milk. You may pass legislation to fix the price of milk and of the feed that goes to the cattle, but you cannot pass legislation that will compel a farmer to milk cows unless he is going to make a profit. So I submit that if the Government are desirous of helping the dairying industry of this country they must do something to enable the farmers of Canada to get cheaper feed for their dairy cattle.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROBERT H. HALBERT (North Ontario): When I rose before recess I had no intention of making a lengthy address on this subject, and I see no reason why I should do so. I was greatly pleased at the able manner in which the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) discharged his duty this afternoon in moving the resolution, and the matter of his address was excedingly interesting. I am sure it must have proved instructive to all hon. members who heard it. In my opinion butter should be graded before going into cold storage as well as after coming out. It was this opinion which I desired pre-eminently to express when I rose this afternoon, and incidentally I intended to say that the farmers do not ask for protection. With regard to oleomargarine, the manufacturers tell us that it is something which is intended to benefit the poor. Well, anything that is intended to help the poor will help the farmers; they belong to that class. Let me say, however, that if oleomargarine were really a product for the poor man it could be put on the market in a much cheaper way than it is at present. It is put up in very expensive cases, two-coloured papers, and beautifully engrossed boxes, and is extensively advertised at great cost, all of which facts seem to indicate that the manufacturers are trying to make a profit out of this article which they would have us believe has been established as a sort of charitable institution. I think it should be made an offence to mention the word "butter," in any connection, in the advertising of oleomargarine, which should be so' entirely on its merits and with no allusion to butter either directly or indirectly.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. JAMES McISAAC (King's, P.E.I.): I did not intend to participate in the discussion of this important question, but the admirable manner in which the resolution has been presented by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) has aroused in me, as I am sure it must have aroused in others, a very great interest in the subject. The hon. member has given to the House an amount of statistical information so extensive and valuable that it seems to me it is of the greatest importance that it should be placed on the record of the proceedings. I was also impelled to rise to my feet in consideration of the statement which the hon. member made in the course of his remarks that the province from which I come—Prince Edward Island—was a close second to the great province of Ontario in the perfection of cheese manufacture. It was a matter of gratification and pride to me to hear the hon. member say that the cheese of Prince Edward Island graded ninety per cent, or a little over, and I take this opportunity of expressing my sincere thanks to that hon. gentleman and, at the same time, of putting on the record of this House an expression of real gratification at the fact that the smallest province of Confederation stands next to the greatest province, or at least one of the greatest provinces, in the matter of cheese-making. However, in regard to the hon. member's reference to oleomargarine, I do not think I can agree with him. I do not know that I have tasted oleomargarine, or at least, if I have, I must have done so unwittingly. It is said that this substance can be made to look so much like butter and, by means, of flavouring, to taste so much like it that it is sometimes difficult to discover the difference. I do not know much about its manufacture, but I would say that, under our prersent conditions, when the prices of all commodities are so exceedingly high, it would be hardly fair to prevent the poorer classes of people, who might not be able to supply themselves with butter, from obtaining a substitute which is reputed to be perfectly good. I am informed that, properly manufactured, there is nothing deleterious or injurious in the elements that enter into oleomargarine, and for that reason I think that, for the time being at least, those who cannot afford butter might be permitted to buy this substitute. As has been remarked, it would scarcely have any material effect upon the price of butter in the market, especially at the present time; and it has been shown that even formerly, when it was probably manufactured to a greater degree than it is now and prices were not so high, it was not known materially to affect the price of butter in the open market. I was very much pleased with the statement of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) that it was the intention of the Government to take proper steps in the matter of inspection, and in every other way to guard the purity and good condition of our butter and cheese intended for export, not only at the port of shipment but in transit, so that these products would be carefully looked after until by the officers and employees of the department they were absolutely on the market. That seems to me to give us a safe guarantee that this matter will be zealously looked after. As the minister remarked it will take some little time to bring this system to the greatest degree of perfection, but it is certain that everything that can possibly be done to safeguard the interests of our butter and cheese producers will be done. Before I take my seat I desire to say one word more. The debate was undoubtedly on a high level and was moderate in every way, and free from anything partisan, until the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) rose to speak. I regret to say, however, that he was unable to let the occasion pass without injecting a partisan spirit. He threw the virus of party bias into the debate in order, I presume, to have a crack at the Government. It seemed to me that his endeavour to connect the present subject with the Wheat Board and milling and other things was very far-fetched, and the hon. gentleman must have had considerable difficulty in bringing his remarks on those matters to bear upon the subject under discussion. I would not be so ungenerous as to suggest that there might be some thing other than the public good, perhaps a mere personal motive, that impelled the hon. member to wander so far afield, but I do think he could with great propriety have confined his remarks more strictly to the question before the House. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me once again express my gratification at the statement which fell from the lips of the hon. member for Frontenac that the province from which I have the honour to come has taken such a high place in the cheese manufacturing of Canada.

Mr. O. R. GOULD (Assiniboia): I am not sure that volume of words will add anything to the merit of the question or will enhance the able presentation of the subject made by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), and it is not my intention to discuss the question in all its details. Its subject matter is not of such great importance in the Western Provinces as it is in the Eastern and Maritime Provinces. Nevertheless, it is a fact that the people who live on the western plains are annually paying more attention to the dairying industry, and we believe that in the very near future this industry will assume such proportions as will justify its further expansion. However, the fact remains that the provincial governments of the Western Provinces, realizing that the industry is in its initial stage in that part of the country are adopting short courses with the direct object of improving the product of the factories and creameries along the lines suggested this afternoon by the hon. member for Frontenac. They felt that it was the duty of the Dominion Government to assist in this work, but short courses are being held and everything possible is being done in a provincial way to make the product of our creameries of a high standard. The large exports of the products of the creameries and factories from the West does not of necessity come East to find a market. It is a fact—which I know, because I have had first-hand knowledge of it—that the Saskatchewan creameries last year in a test case sent, early in the season, a carload of butter south of the international boundary line, and I may say that when the returns came my cream check showed two cents per pound of an increase in the price of butter fat. That may be due to a deeper appreciation of the merit of our product by the people south of the international boundary, or it may be the outcome of the educational campaign carried on by the provinces.

It seems to me that largely the question can be arranged or else a solution can be found by the competition which must, and does, of necessity, exist among the various provinces. I have with me a clipping that I took from a paper since hearing the address of the hon. gentleman this afternoon, and while he claims everything for the province of Quebec, while hon. members who represent the various districts of that province were very much gratified, while I was very much pleased also, and while I do not want to bring in the statement that I am now about to make to take any of the pleasure away from these hon. gentlemen, the clipping that I hold in my hand declares that the province of Alberta has already taken the lead in the meritorious product of its creameries. I am not going to treat that point in an argumentative way, but I refer to it as proof of the assertion that the provinces are on a competitive basis in this regard. I believe that hearty co-operation between the Dominion and provincial authorities will do much to overcome the difficulties as they have been presented to us this afternoon in the able address of the hon. member for Frontenac. I as an agriculturist wish to record my sympathy with the thoughts and ideas that were presented, and that is mainly the reason why I have risen to my feet to address a few words to the House. I want to suggest to these hon. gentlemen that it is because I am in sympathy with them that I am on my feet at this moment. Some day I will perhaps rise to my feet again and want some reciprocity from them in the form of sympathetic consideration for some suggestions of my own. We are extending our hands across the prairies to the Eastern Provinces. That is the position we are taking, and I hope these hon. gentlemen will be equally ready to extend a friendly hand to the West. The province of Alberta has already done a great deal to promote the dairying industry, and the ideas and suggestions that have proved so successful there are now being put in operation in the province of Saskatchewan. They are continuing their educational courses and trying to bring about a movement among the creamery operators which will result in uniformity of product. The same thing applies to the province of Manitoba. All the Western Provinces, I am sure, will be very willing to co-operate. You will find no antagonism from the Western Provinces, but on the contrary they will be willing to enter into hearty co-operation with all the provinces for a Dominion-wide campaign to make the products of our creameries and cheese factories better than they have been in the past, uniform and of such high quality that the label which they bear will be the symbol of merit.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (West Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, as there are a number of farmers in my riding, and as they have been more or less exercised over the question of oleomargarine, I wish to say that I thank the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) and the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Halbert), who is, or at any rate was until recently, the head of the United Farmers of Ontario, for substantially, or indirectly, agreeing with the statement that oleomargarine is a fit and proper product, and something that may be allowed to go upon the open market in Canada. The people cannot pay the price of butter as it is at the present time, but they can pay the price of oleomargarine, and, of course, hon. gentlemen are aware, the process of making oleomargarine is improving from day to day. It costs just now 45 cents a pound, but it is said that the price will be 30 cents in a short time; and whilst it is made of various animal and vegetable fats and vegetable oils, the people generally are fed on a reliable product in oleomargarine. The food constituents are such as to make it in every sense a most desirable product. Therefore, when we read, as we have been doing, that South Africa is giving up its dairy farming in favour of producing oleomargarine, and that more scientific machinery than has been used heretofore in the production of margarine is turning out a cheaper and a better article, we can very well understand that the remarks of the farmers' party to-night through two of their illustrious representatives, the member for Assiniboia and the member for North Ontario, indicate not only a broad and generous spirit, but that they are desirous that oleomargarine shall come in, no matter what any farmer may say. I think that is a sufficient reply to the objections raised by the farmers in Canada. Of course, in farming matters and matters of this kind, I will have to take my cue from those who know best, and I shall be in future an earnest champion of oleomargarine—the cheaper the better. It may be a serious detriment to butter, but of course these gentlemen do not care anything about that. They have been assuring us for some time that they want to see the price of foodstuffs come down, but they told us the other day that if the eight-hour day were adopted the prices of food would rise. Of course they want the price of food, and especially of butter, to come down, they have endorsed oleomargarine and they have made every legislator in this country feel that he had a right to vote for oleomargarine, as he will vote for it. We thank the farmers' party for having made oleomargarine a competitor on the Canadian market and recognizing it as a most desirable food for the Canadian people.

Mr. GEORGE BOYCE (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it gave me a very great deal of pleasure to hear the able address, of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), the hon. the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) and the other hon. gentlemen who spoke in regard to that very important industry of our Dominion, that is the production of butter and cheese. When we look at the returns we see that the Dominion produces in the neighbourhood of $250,000,000 worth of these commodities not taking into account the very large amount that is used by the producers. The industry must then be looked upon as taking a very high place in the productive activities of our Dominion. It has been said by some that the trade in oleomargarine is not antagonistic to the dairy industry. As far as I am concerned I spoke upon that question last year and I think that I will not repeat what I said then. What I did say was not very favourable, to oleomargarine but I have kept a very careful watch and I have not heard of anybody dying or being sick from use of it; therefore, I do not think that it should be condemned. I heard some hon. gentlemen saying that they could almost do away with butter. Well, supposing they did do away with butter, what about the cheese? Would not our agriculture be in a very serious condition then, because there is no question that the farmer who has a good herd of dairy cattle will produce from fifty to one hundred per cent more than the farmer who has no cattle or very few on his farm. I do not think that I would have spoken to-night but for the fact that I occupy the proud position of representing a county which stands second in the production of cheese in this Dominion of Canada. Therefore I could not let the occasion pass without expressing myself with regard to the benefit that is to be derived by agriculture from this industry. As we are well aware a farm conducted as a dairy farm, increases soil fertility and adds greatly to all kinds of agriculture production.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Speaker, the manner in which this resolution has been received generally by hon. members on this side of the House has given me no more gratification than the reception it met with from hon. gentlemen on the other side. It is a unique experience for me to have any of my suggestions received in such a friendly spirit by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. BUREAU: When you are friendly we are all friendly.

Mr. COPP: We are improving all the time.

Mr. EDWARDS: It is an experience which I shall not soon forget. I may say, Sir, that my gratification at the manner in which the resolution has been received by hon. members to your right and to your left was somewhat dampened just before the House rose at six o'clock by the attitude of those hon. members who occupy the "cross benches." Indeed, I was surprised and not a littled pained to notice that the God-chosened representatives of the agriculturists of the Dominion should be so conspicuous this afternoon by their absence when a matter of so much interest and importance to our farmers was under consideration. My sorrow in that respect, of course, was somewhat lessened by the late arrival on the scene of the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Halbert) who, Sir, you might have noticed, just previous to six o'clock was manifesting some physical uneasiness, which I did not know whether to attribute to a desire on his part to speak or to absent himself from the Chamber. However, before six o'clock the hon. gentleman set all our doubts at rest by taking the floor and giving us a very interesting, though exceedingly brief, address.

There are only one or two things for me to notice in the remarks made by the hon. member for North Ontario. He told us that the farmers did not want any protection. Then he proceeded to give his sanction to the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine, but he added that in his opinion those interested in the sale of oleomargarine should be rigorously prohibited from using the word "butter" in their advertisements. That, I might point out to the hon. gentleman is obviously asking for protection along a certain line. One might conclude that the hon. gentleman, even though declaring himself an out-and-out free trader and averse to having anything to do with protection, still, like many others on that side of the House, and especially those who occupy the cross benches and are known as the Agrarian group or the National Progressive party, still clings to the idea of some form of protection.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) was good enough to give his approval of the general terms of my resolution. But he thought that the very fact that he had been so kind was something which should call for a quid pro quo from me on some later occasion. In effect, the hon. gentleman said, "I am supporting your resolution, and I hope the time will come when you will not forget that and will support some of the things which I shall advocate in this House." I may say at once to the hon. gentleman that I very keenly appreciate his support, and I can assure him that if during the present or at any later session he brings down any matter which is as worthy of endorsation as that which I have brought to the attention of the House, I shall be very pleased to give it my support. The hon. gentleman and the party to which he belongs have made it somewhat difficult for me or any other member, except those who occupy seats alongside him, to follow him and his party in anything which they may introduce. He and his friends have organized what they claim to be a superior party with a superior platform.

Mr. BUREAU: A super-party.

Mr. EDWARDS: It does seem to me, Sir, that those hon. gentlemen have made this great mistake—and I believe they will become aware of it in the course of time—that they really have fashioned a god in their own image, and while they believe they are adoring that god they are in reality adoring themselves. I am glad to have the endorsation of these hon. gentlemen, and I hope that their participation in this debate—two of them have given my resolution their approval—is an indication that in time to come—for the rest of the session maybe—they will manifest that independence of everything savouring of party, which they have declared from the housetops to be the cardinal principle of their belief. If, for instance, we should have a debate on the eight-hour day, I would expect these chosen prophets from the agricultural districts not to absent themselves nor to keep absolutely silent as they did when the question was before this House the other day—and no question affects our farmers more—but to rise in their place, almost fighting for an opportunity to raise their voice against the introduction of any legislation to promote an eight-hour day. Because, whatever may be the opinions of farmers in regard to oleomargarine and many other things, there is not any doubt in my mind, Sir, that the vast majority of them would express themselves as against an eight-hour day.

I can understand, of course, the difficulty that these hon. gentlemen experience in taking a course like that, because it has been part of their platform, part of their policy, to link themselves up with labour in this country and they naturally feel diffident about saying anything which might turn aside from their party those of the labour group. In that respect these hon. gentlemen are showing some of the elements of political—would I be in order, Mr. Speaker, if I used the word "trickery?" It is the only word that occurs to my mind at the moment.

Mr. McMASTER: Sagacity.

[Mr. Edwards.]

Mr. EDWARDS: Sagacity—I thank my hon. friend. There is no limit to his vocabulary; that is a better word than the one which suggested itself to me. These hon. gentlemen have manifested some signs of possessing political sagacity, notwithstanding the fact that they tell us that they as a group will have nothing whatever to do with the old political parties; that party politics is something which is abhorent to them.

I wish to devote a little attention to the remarks of my genial friend from Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) who occupies the important post of Chief Whip of His Majesty's loyal Opposition. I suppose that he sometimes feels impelled to take upon himself the burdens of the whole party on that side of the House and exercise his privilege as Chief Opposition Whip by cracking the whip around the shoulders of the Government whenever he can get an opportunity of doing so. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman exercising himself along that line, but I wish to direct one or two things to his attention. The hon. gentleman made the statement—which I may be pardoned for thinking was a little extravagant—that the dairy industry of this country would be ruined by the course which the Government had been taking. The hon. gentleman wished to leave the impression that the farmers were being, and had been, neglected by this Government; that their interests were not being properly looked after. May I direct his attention to the fact that in 1912 an Agricultural Aid Bill was put through providing for the appropriation of half a million dollars to assist the provincial departments of Agriculture in extending and carrying on their work; that in the next year an appropriation of $10,000,000 was voted to be spread over a period of ten years under the Agricultural Instruction Act, and that in the first four years during which that Act was operative my hon. friend's province drew from the Dominion Treasury for agricultural purposes over $800,000 and Ontario over $900,000? That has been added to somewhat since. May I direct his attention also to the aid which was given by this Government to veterinary colleges by a grant of $20,000 a year? May I summarize by pointing out that from 1905 to 1911 the total aid granted to agriculture by the federal Parliament amounted to $6,930,000 or an average of $1,155,000 a year, while between 1911 and 1917 the total amount granted by this Government to aid agriculture throughout the Dominion amounted to over $19,000,000, an average of over $3,171,000? I merely direct attention to these figures in order to show the hon. member that if the grants to agriculture are to be taken as a criterion, then the hon. gentleman is not the person to complain of any lack of interest on the part of the Government which has been in power for the last six or seven years.

I wish to refer also to my hon. friend's statement in regard to milk and the alleged threat that the farmers would be put in jail if they raised the price of that commodity. I am not here to defend the Board of Commerce; in fact, Mr. Speaker, I may candidly tell you I do not feel any inclination to defend it. But in regard to fixing the price of milk, I may say that the price agreed upon was suggested by Mr. Stonehouse, President of the Milk Producers' Association, and that that price is very much higher than the price which the U.F.O.—Labour Government at present in power in Toronto are paying to the farmers down in my district for milk which they supply to the provincial institutions. Would my friends who comprise the group of prophets on the cross benches, the agrarian group, those who have laid upon their shoulders the burden of specially looking after the interests of farmers—would they address an appeal to Premier Drury, asserting that in their opinion as farmers and as the special representatives of that particular class of our population it is a crying shame that the farmer Government of Ontario is paying the farmers in my county less for the milk supplied to the provincial institutions than the price fixed by the Board of Commerce in Toronto and against which the U.F.O. members of this House and of the Toronto House directed a tirade of abuse? Now, here is an opportunity for them to show their particular interest in agriculture I trust that they will show it, and show it not as they did when the discussion came up on the eight-hour day—by keeping absolutely silent, but by communicating their views on the subject to the Government at Toronto which is abusing the farmer so shamefully in the matter of the price they are paying for the milk supplied to provincial institutions.

As to the further remarks made by the member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon, without taking the time to go into the details I would say that the lack of credit and the rate of exchange are a fair, full and sufficient answer to the criticism which he offers.

The member for Beauce (Mr. Beland) and the member for East Middlesex (Mr. Glass), very properly remarked that if butter was graded and then kept in storage for six or eight months it would be apt to be off colour or below grade, and that that was an argument against grading. I agree with the hon. gentlemen who have so expressed themselves. My idea is that the grading of butter which is destined for export should take place not six or eight or ten months before it is shipped, but only a few days before it is placed on the boat. That is what is done in New Zealand. I recognize that we are a different country from New Zealand or Denmark or Holland. These are small countries which we could tuck away in one corner of any of our provinces and never know they were there. We have a large country, a great extent of territory and I recognize the difficulties that will face us when we attempt to grade our export butter and cheese.

Most of that export will go through the port of Montreal, but I believe—and I am confirmed in my belief by what I heard at a meeting of the Deputy Ministers from the various provinces held at the Chateau Laurier last week—that the departments of Agriculture of the different provinces can work in harmony with the Department of Agriculture of the Dominion of Canada, and I believe there is a spirit that will enable them to work harmoniously together. I think the provinces should take up as their special work the grading of butter—I mention butter particularly—for home consumption, and that they should work in conjunction with the Federal Department which should assume the responsibility of grading anything that goes overseas. If the different provinces undertook to grade the butter produced in the creameries in those provinces, qualified men being appointed to do the grading, just as the man who would do the grading at Montreal would be a qualified man, I do not think there would be much difficulty about deterioration. In the first place, I am informed by the Chief Dairy Commissioner, who is a practical man and a man who has given a great deal of time and thought to this work, that butter which grades No. 1 is not very apt to deteriorate. He told me at six o'clock that some time ago he tested some butter in the city of Winnipeg which had been kept a year and a half and it was perfectly sound and sweet. I will grant you—and this is easily understandable—that butter grading No. 2, No. 3 and lower, will very easily deteriorate, but butter which grades No. 1 will not easily deteriorate. That is his statement to me, and I believe that is right, so that I think if we had co-operation between the provinces and the Dominion in the matter of grading, this scheme would be workable to have our butter before it is put on board properly graded by competent men, and in that way we could maintain our reputation for making a good article. Otherwise, if the butter were to be graded six, eight or ten months before it was shipped, that would be a very great mistake because then we might send across the seas butter which bore the stamp of approval of the Dominion Government, and which was found to be inferior. In that way, we would do more harm than if we had never taken up the matter of grading at all.

I do not know that there is anything else that was brought up to which I wished particularly to refer. I appreciate the position taken by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) and especially after he read the resolution which received the unanimous approval of the deputy ministers of the different provinces, that the time was not presently opportune to legislate on this matter. I believe it has his sympathy and will receive his support and that at the proper time legislation will be brought down which will standardize our butter and cheese for export.

I cannot, however, take my seat without making a brief reference to the question of oleomargarine. I do not agree with the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Burnham), but we are not going to quarrel over that; he holds his opinion and is perfectly sincere in holding it. I hold a different opinion in regard to oleomargarine. The argument is advanced to-day that oleomargarine should be permitted and should be continued in this country, because the poor man cannot afford to pay the price that is asked for butter at the present time. The very same argument exactly, word for word, was advanced by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and others when the Order in Council was put through on the 10th December, 1917, that the poor man could not afford to pay the price of butter at that time and that, therefore, he should have the privilege of getting oleomargarine. Butter at that time was selling at 40 cents a pound and oleomargarine was selling at 32 to 34 cents per pound. We were told then that the poor man could not possibly raise the other six or eight cents in order to buy butter; that he must have the fats that were essential to his health and that it would be a crime to keep him from having those fats in the form of oleomargarine. According to the statement made to-day by an hon. member opposite, the poor man is paying 45 cents a pound for oleomargarine, or more than he was said not to be able to pay for butter when the Order in Council was put through on the 10th December, 1917. What is the next step in connection with the matter? I presume the next step will be to sell him olive oil and cottonseed oil and let him drink that in order that he may get the necessary fats into his system, and get them at a lower cost than he is now obliged to pay for oleomargarine. No doubt we can feed him on neutral lard and we can give him a sucking bottle and let him take his fats in liquid form, because doubtless he would take the cottonseed oil and nut oil and those other things that form the conglomeration known as oleomargarine and get the necessary fats into his system in that shape, and he will have to get them in some shape like that, if he is going to get them at all, because if he could not afford to pay 40 cents a pound for butter in 1917, he cannot afford to pay 45 cents for oleomargarine in 1920. There is the situation. I maintain that having regard to the food value of butter, butter at 70 cents a pound is the cheapest article that the poor man puts on his table. I noticed the cut of an advertisement of one of those oleomargarine firms which was advertising what they call "King Nut." The advertisement read " King Nut is better than butter." There was a picture apparently of some place down in the South Sea Islands, because it showed a little expanse of water, some islands, some palm trees and some darkies running around with very little more clothing on them than you will see at some of the dress occasions which they have in high society. There was a fellow who, I guess, had got hold of some civilized clothes somewhere and he had put part of them on, but the rest of him was not covered. In that respect he was much like people we have to-day in some civilized communities, but he had on his head something that looked like a crown, and I presume he was the King Nut. The firm was advertising King Nut Oleomargarine made out of nuts and other things they get all over God's creation, gathered by people on whom the dirt does not show because of their natural colour, but no doubt some of it is mixed with the oil they produce. The stuff is gathered from all over creation and then these people who want to make money out of it and who are making thousands and tens of thousands of dollars a year out of selling it to the people, knowing that they could not sell it unless they gave it an air of respectability, say that it has the creamy butter taste. We shall have an opportunity at some other time of discussing this question of oleomargarine and I am ready to take a hand in the discussion whenever the time comes. I do not believe there is a ten per cent—well, in order to be perfectly safe and not to have to question my conscience in the matter later on, I will say I do not believe there is twenty-five per cent of the oleomargarine sold in this country to-day that is sold as oleomargarine. I believe that 75 per cent of the oleomargarine sold in Canada is sold as butter, and at the price of butter, just as is the case in the United States. Of course, if your retail grocers and others can get this stuff out and have it coloured up to look like pure butter, why, they are going to pass it off, and the very people on whom they will pass it off are the poor men with large families, who are causing so much concern to many men in this House who are backing up oleomargarine. It is significant that those who were responsible for the oleomargarine Order in Council took mighty good care that it was made a punishable offence to mix any oleomargarine with butter. Mix all the butter you like with oleomargarine, but do not mix any oleomargarine with butter. The rich man must have his butter without any chance of contamination, but when it comes to the poor man, you can stick just enough butter in to fool him, and sell the compound to him as butter, as is very often done, I believe. It is a great big fraud, conceived in sin and iniquity. The whole thing is a great big greasy fraud perpetrated on the people of Canada. If oleomargarine is just as good as butter, why in Heaven's name put any restrictions on its sale at all? Why say you cannot mix it with butter? If you can mix butter with oleomargarine, why not let them mix oleomargarine with butter fifty to fifty or two to one, and say this is a compound of two to one or half and half? Oh no, that would not do. The aristocratic palates of some of the millionaires of this country might be defiled by tasting some oleomargarine, and that would not do at all. Keep your butter clear of oleo, but you can mix butter with oleo and put it over the poor man with a large family. He is having it put over him to the queen's taste—perhaps that is hardly an appropriate expression in connection with oleomargarine—but certainly the poor man is having it put over him on this oleo question

But there is a bigger thing at stake. It affects a great big industry in this country, one of the biggest industries in the Dominion with hundreds of millions of dollars invested in it, employing hundreds of thousands of people, and spending millions upon millions of money in wages. Surely this is an industry which is entitled to protection.

Mr. BURNHAM: It does not want protection.

Mr. EDWARDS: It does want protection, so this Government says, and the former Government, and in fact every Government from Confederation down to the present time. We have had a duty of four cents a pound on butter. Can you imagine anything more illogical or absurd than to protect the makers of butter by a duty of four cents a pound and at the same time allow a substitute for butter to come in duty free? It is absolutely ridiculous. I do not care whether you are a free trader or protectionist, there is no logic or sense in it. It is ridiculous from the ground up, and it is made ridiculous because of those who are particularly interested in this conglomeration called oleomargarine, and who by reason of this fraud that is being perpetrated upon the public are putting thousands and tens of thousands of dollars into their pockets. I say there is a great big industry at stake in this country. If I have a right to ask this House to endorse this resolution to standarize our butter, in order that it may win for itself a reputation Overseas, I do not want at the same time to run the risk of Canadian butter losing its reputation through the actions of some persons whose only instinct is to get money, and who would send overseas a conglomeration part butter and part oleomargarine, and palm it off in the markets of the world as butter. That is what is happening here at home, and that is what will happen overseas if they get stocked up with a lot of this stuff. They will mix it with butter and fool the people with it, because it will be money in their pockets to do it. You have to watch that end of it every time. In legislating along these lines, look out for the fellow who is only out after the dollar and does not care about the principle at stake. He will need watching with both eyes.

Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my resolution because of what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) has said, believing that when the proper time comes the necessary steps will be taken to standardize our cheese and butter for export.

Mr. J. A. MAHARG (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, if I have the privilege I should like to put my hon. friend right on a statement he made with reference to the cross-benchers.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. gentleman would not be in order. He has not spoken himself. He could correct, by a personal explanation, any statement that had been made about him, but certainly cannot make an explanation as representing the party.

Resolution withdrawn.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. BELAND (for Mr. Bureau):

For a copy of the report made by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada on the application of the Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk Railway Companies on behalf of themselves and other railways carrying His Majesty's mail in Canada asking that fair and reasonble rates be fixed by the board for the carriage of mails pursuant to the reference of the matter to the board by Order in Council P.C. 617, dated March 7, 1917, for the determination as to the accuracy or inaccuracy of the claim made by the railway companies, that these rates are inadequate, and, if it is found that the present rates are inadequate to determine as the result of evidence to be submitted by the Post Office Department and the railway companies interested what would be a fair rate of payment for the service. Also a copy of all correspondence between members of the Government or any officials thereof and the Board of Railway Commissioners or any officials thereof in reference to the report mentioned above.

Mr. FIELDING:

For a return showing the cases in which, from October 1, 1896, to the present, in the computation of superannuation allowances to retiring officials, additional years were allowed under the provisions of Section 12 of Chapter 7, R.S., the dates of the granting of the allowances, the names of the officials and the number of years added to the actual service; along with a copy of all Treasury Board Reports and Orders in Council relating to such cases.

Mr. FIELDING:

For a copy of the Orders in Council of December 1, 1919, and December 9, 1919, respecting ratification of the treaties and conventions laid before the House of Commons on Monday, March 1, 1920.

RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF SOLDIERS.

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That a Special Committee be appointed to consider the question of continuing the War Bonus now being paid to pensioners under the existing pension law, and any amendments to the law which may be proposed or may be considered necessary by the Committee, and to report the result to the House; with power to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, and to report from time to time; and that Rule No. 11 be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: In moving this resolution, Mr. Speaker, I may say that it is not the view of the Government that the Pensions Committee this year should be called upon to review our whole pensions legislation as it has been called upon to review that legislation during the last two years. I believe that we now have a pension law which both in its scope and, in its general provisions, is an admirable one, and that therefore the work of the pension committee this year will be much less onerous than it has been in the past. While there is no restriction on the matters which the committee may properly consider in the motion I have submitted to the House, I think the important matters which the committee may be called upon to consider will be limited in number.

The first is the one suggested in the resolution, namely, the continuation of the war bonus which was granted by the legislation of last session. Hon. members will recall that a bonus of twenty per cent was added to the total disability and partial disability pensions and to the pensions to widows, should this be continued, extended or otherwise modified. This pensions committee will also be called upon to consider the matter brought to the attention of the House last week by the hon. member for South Quebec (Mr. Power), supported by the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn), as to whether, in computing pensions for widowed mothers, the amount of their income from other sources should be taken into account. That is a subject which the pensions committee will be asked to consider. Another matter of very considerable moment—and I mention it so that hon. members may give it some consideration—is the question whether the Board of Pensions Commissioners should be authorized to commute the pensions of those suffering from disability less than twenty per cent. When the disability is less than twenty per cent the pension is necessarily of a rather limited amount, payable monthly or quarterly as the case may be, and the payments are not large. It so happens, however, that more than fifty per cent of the total number of pensions is of this class, and it is estimated that the administrative staff might be very substantially reduced if the smaller pensions were commuted. In fact, the Board of Pension Commissioners estimate that a reduction in the expenses of administration to the amount of not less than $300,000 a year might be made if these pensions were commuted. It is a question that will go to the pensions committee for its consideration, but hon. members will see that it is an important one from the standpoint of administration.

Mr. BELAND: Most of the employees are returned soldiers, are they not?

Mr. ROWELL: The employees on the staff are returned soldiers, but hon. members will see from the estimates before the House that the cost of administering our pensions is a very substantial annual charge upon the revenues. I do not say that the committee should agree to this; I simply throw it out as an important matter which I think they should consider.

There is a fourth question which was brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Peck), and that is, whether or not the pensions to the widows at the present time are adequate. That is a proper matter for the consideration of the Pensions Committee.

I think that probably these matters I have enumerated will constitute the most important questions which will come before the Pensions Committee this year for consideration, but the resolution is broad enough to cover any question which any member of the Pensions Committee may think should be considered by way of an amendment to the existing law, and any matter that may be brought to the attention of the committee for their consideration by any hon. member of the House or any other parties interested in the subject.

Mr. BELAND: Has the minister any idea how many members will compose the committee?

Mr. ROWELL: The committee will comprise the following members: Messrs. Arthurs, Béland, Bolton, Brien, Caldwell, Clark (Bruce), Cronyn, Devlin, Fontaine, Green, Lang, MacNutt, McCurdy, McGibbon (Muskoka), Nesbitt, Peck, Pacaud, Pardee, Power, Redman, Ross, Rowell, Savard, and Sutherland.

Mr. BELAND: That is a somewhat smaller committee than the last.

Mr. ROWELL: I think it is the same size as the committee of last year.

Mr. MAHARG: Will the scope of the committee be broad enough to include members of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police who are now drawing pensions?

Mr. ROWELL: No. This committee relates to pensions for the Canadian Expeditionary Force only. That was the purpose for which the committee was appointed in the past. It will deal only with soldiers.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. ROWELL: Mr. Speaker, I beg to move:

That a Special Committee be appointed in conformity with the resolution agreed to by the House this day to consider the question of continuing the war bonus now being paid to pensioners under the existing pension law, and any amendments to the law which may be proposed or may be considered necessary by the committee, to consist of the following members: Messrs. Arthurs, Béland, Bolton, Brien, Caldwell, Clark (Bruce), Cronyn, Devlin, Fontaine, Green, Lang, MacNutt, McCurdy, McGibbon (Muskoka), Nesbitt, Peck, Pacaud, Pardee, Power, Redman, Ross, Rowell, Savard, and Sutherland.

Motion agreed to.

OTTAWA MINT ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir Henry Drayton, the House went into Committee on the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend section two of the Ottawa Mint Act, Chapter twenty-six of the Revised Statutes, 1906, as enacted by Chapter thirty-one of the Statutes of 1913, by providing that the yearly payment for defraying the salaries, contingencies, retiring and other allowances and expenses connected with the maintenance of the Ottawa Branch of the Royal Mint and of the refinery forming part thereof, be increased from one hundred and ten thousand dollars to two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. FIELDING: Will the minister kindly explain?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, our work in the Mint is somewhat different from ordinary governmental activities. The arrangements under which the Mint is operated in Ottawa were made by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) in 1906. The Canadian Mint is a branch of the Royal Mint. It is subject to the rules of the Royal Mint. The Royal Mint appoints the officers and does everything which is necessary to be done in order to keep up the high standard of its operations, and is responsible for these operations. We pay for the operations, but we get all the resulting profits from the Mint. There is a yearly payment by Canada to the royal commissioners of the Mint. In 1906 that annual payment was $75,000, and in 1913 it had risen to $110,000. The cost of the Mint has not been carried by the annual payment. The commissioners now desire that instead of supplementary votes being brought in from time to time, the spirit of the first arrangement should be carried out; that the annual grant made under the statute towards the Mint should be continued and that the amount should be increased to what would fairly represent the present activities of the Mint. The proposition is to raise it to the sum of $200,000. The business of the Mint has very greatly increased. When the annuity was raised in 1913 to $110,000 the coins produced by the Mint numbered 17,668,978, while the coins produced in 1919 numbered 35,986,003. The output has more than doubled and the expenses, of course, are creeping up. One further thing that I should call to the attention of the Committee is that unless the amount of the annuity is absolutely required by the royal commissioners of the Mint on Canada's account the expenditure is not made. In addition to the coins which were milled for Canada's purposes, the Committee may be interested in knowing in 1918 the Canadian Mint produced for the Royal Mint 4,435,000 shilling blanks, while in 1919 the Mint milled for the Royal Mint 1,566,340 blanks. The Mint is one of the few things which really pay. Of course it is not run directly for the purposes of gain, but as a matter of fact from the year 1908 to the end of last year the excess of receipts over expenditures amounted to $6,624,354.44.

Mr. FIELDING: It is a mere matter of accounting. We have to provide for the cost of the Mint and in view of its largely increased operations it is but reasonable to provide for an increased expenditure. At the time that the Mint was established there were some obvious advantages in having it as a branch of the Royal Mint so that the Canadian Mint might expect to be in a position to do minting work for other parts of the Empire. At that time it was thought that probably there would not be enough work to keep the Mint entirely employed on Canadian currency. I think the arrangements that were made for the Royal Mint have proven entirely satisfactory. One result of making this a branch of the Royal Mint was that we had the experience of the men who had been engaged in this work. I suppose we gave up a little bit of what is called patronage, although we are told that patronage has now been abolished. We have nothing to do, practically speaking, with the appointment of the officials; that is done under the direction of the authorities of the Royal Mint in England. Of course, as I said, this is a mere matter of accounting. If the operations of the Mint do not call for this larger sum, as the minister says, it will not be paid. The Mint, however, is a source of profit and whatever profit there is goes not to the Royal Mint but to the Government of Canada. I think the minister has given good reasons why this resolution should be adopted.

Mr. BELAND: Do I understand that the only privilege we have in connection with the Royal Mint is to pay the salaries? Do we appoint the employees?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Our privileges up to date might be covered by the result I have just mentioned—profits to the amount of $6,600,000.

Mr. BELAND: But this last year we have been operating the Mint at a loss?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. BELAND: I thought I heard the statement made the other day by the minister.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, but we stopped that. The country would have been operating the Mint at a loss having regard to the silver coinage. We had contracts for the supply of silver which ran us over a very considerable period of the high silver price so that we were able to mint it at a profit. When we had to buy dear silver we reduced the silver content.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Beland) will see that we not only have the privilege of paying but we also have the privilege of gathering in the profit.

Resolution reported.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 30 to amend the Ottawa Mint Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Burrell the House went into Committee to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient that section one hundred and twenty-seven of the The Customs Act, chapter forty-eight of the Revised Statutes, which provides that fire-arms and munitions of war shall not be imported except from the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland unless upon application to and permission given by the Minister, be amended by striking out the exception in favour of the United Kingdom; and, further, that a clerical error in section two hundred and sixty-four of the said Act be corrected by inserting the word "or" between the words "forfeiture" and "for" in the eighth line thereof.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Customs): The first amendment speaks for itself. We have always had control of the importation of fire-arms from other countries by requiring the owners of such fire-arms to have licenses or permits from the Minister of Customs, but an exception applied to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. With a view to securing better control it has been thought desirable to withdraw this exception. The second amendment is a purely clerical one. By some mistake the section was allowed to stand for some years as drawn, and we are now making the necessary correction.

Mr. CAHILL: Have the Government in mind the entire prohibition of the importation of small arms?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL: I would not like to speak positively as to that in the absence of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), because his department has been dealing with the question under the Criminal Code. Perhaps my hon. friend would repeat his question when the Bill is up for second reading.

Resolution reported.

Hon. Mr. BURRELL moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 31 to amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Rowell the House adjourned at 9.35 p.m.

Tuesday, March 23, 1920.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORT TABLED.

Annual Report of the Department of Labour.—Hon. Mr. Meighen (for the Minister of Labour).

SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH.

REAPPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE.

Rt. Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister): With the consent of the House I should like to propose a motion, which I shall explain in a few words. In the first session of 1919 a resolution proposed by the member for London (Mr. Cronyn) was adopted by the House approving the appointment of a committee on scientific research. On the motion of Hon. Dr. Reid, a committee was appointed. That committee made certain inquiries and on July 1, 1919, submitted a report which contained the following recommendation:

> Your committee would therefore recommend that the committee should be reappointed as early as possible next session to give further consideration to this matter, and to prepare to the House for consideration proposals dealing therewith.

The committee had been unable to complete its investigations; accordingly this recommendation was made. The report was adopted by the House and the recommendation for the reappointment of the committee, therefore approved. The session of last autumn was called for special legislation, and it was not considered best that the committee should be reappointed for that session. At the beginning of the present session I went into the matter, and with a view to carrying out the recommendation of the committee and the wish of the House as expressed by its approval of that report, I beg to move:

> That a special committee be appointed forthwith to consider the matter of the development in Canada of scientific research with power to call for persons, papers and records to examine witnesses under oath, and to report from time to time; that rule 11 be suspended in connection therewith, and that the following persons do constitute such committee: Messieurs Archambault, Béland, Cowan, Cronyn, Denis, Manion, Maclean (Halifax), McGibbon (Muskoka), Nicholson (Algoma), Pardee, Ross (Middlesex), Sheard, Sinclair (Antigonish and Guysboro), Steele, Thompson (Yukon), Tweedie, and Whidden.

That is practically the Committee of last year, with some additions.

Mr. SPEAKER: There having been no notice of this motion, it requires, of course, the unanimous consent of the House.

Motion agreed to.

COMMERCIAL FEEDING STUFFS.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL (Minister of Health) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 32, respecting Commercial Feeding Stuffs.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr. ROWELL: This is merely a revision of the existing law with the necessary amendments to bring it up to date. The provisions relating to commercial feeding stuffs which now appear in the Adulteration of Foods Act, have been taken out of that Act and are to be included in this, so that the one Act will cover the whole matter.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

CANADA'S CONTRIBUTION TO LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Hon. Mr. FIELDING:

Out of what appropriation was the sum of $64,043.15 paid on February 13 as Canada's contribution to the expense of the League of Nations?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: It was paid out of the Demobilization Vote.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): I should like to direct the attention of the Government to some orders for returns standing in my name which were adopted by the House last session. I refer to an order of September 18, 1919, regarding the Siberian Expeditionary Force; an order of September 29, regarding the Military Hospital at Ste. Anne de Bellevue, and an order of October 20, calling for a list of Grand Trunk shareholders. On the 10th of November, the last day of the session, I was assured by the Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Doherty) and the then Secretary of State (Hon. Mr. Burrell) that these returns would be forthcoming. I now ask that they be brought down as soon as possible.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will make inquiry and if they are get-atable I shall have them brought down almost immediately.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I was assured last year that they would be available.

SUPPLY.

GOVERNMENT SHIPBUILDING. VOTE OF $20,000,000.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Marine Department. Government shipbuilding programme—amount required for the construction of vessels in accordance with Government programme, $20,000,000.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine): Mr. Chairman, I think it is only fitting, before hon. members are asked to give their consideration to such a large appropriation as $20,000,000, that I should give some detailed information in regard to it. This amount of $20,000,000 is being asked for in order to complete the Government merchant marine shipbuilding programme, and part of the appropriation is a re-vote from last year. If Parliament gives its consent to this appropriation, then the Government have no further Estimates to bring down in connection with the building of steel freight ships.

It might be well for me to refer briefly to the condition of the shipbuilding industry from 1875 up to 1919. This is a comparative statement showing the number and tonnage of vessels on the registry books of Canada on the 31st December in the following years:

Year.	Number of Vessels.	Net Tonnage.
1875	6,952	1,205,565
1885	7,315	1,231,856
1895	7,262	825,776
1905	7,325	669,825
1915	8,757	929,312

Hon. members will note the great shrinkage in shipbuilding in Canada over the periods which I have just mentioned. During the last ten years, while the quantity is small, the vessels built were of both classes, wood and steel. In 1919, it will be seen that the business revived again on account of the war, and 8,573 vessels were built with a net tonnage of 1,091,780 tons.

Before the war the world's merchant shipping was roughly 43,000,000 tons, of which tonnage Great Britain owned approximately 23,250,000 tons. Owing to the great destruction by submarines during the war, the total world tonnage lost by enemy action was 15,000,000 tons gross, and of these losses British merchant tonnage comprised 2,479 vessels with a gross tonnage of 7,759,090 tons. I also regret to state that 14,287 lives were lost. 675 fishing vessels were lost, with a gross tonnage of 71,765 tons, and in addition 1,885 British vessels, with a total tonnage of 8,007,967 tons were damaged and temporarily put out of commission, involving the loss of 592 lives.

At this point may I be permitted to pay a tribute—which I am sure will be concurred in by all hon. members and in which I am sure I am expressing the opinion of the Parliament of Canada— to the heroic men who manned the merchant marine, and so many of whom gave up their lives during the recent war?

I wish to state very briefly the reason why the Government decided to enter upon a shipbuilding policy. I do not need to refer to the matter at length, because I have already referred in considerable detail to the reason why the Government decided to enter upon this large shipbuilding programme. In a word, the reason was simply this, that, owing to the great loss of world tonnage and the imperative need of Canada creating, owning and operating a merchant marine of her own, and also in view of the fact that the Government owned a very large system of railways which, when the Grand Trunk is formally taken over, will comprise some 22,000 miles, it was a matter of very urgent importance that Canada should own her own merchant marine to do work in conjunction with our large transcontinental railway system, and also for the purpose of expanding Canada's export business. Later on, I shall have something more to say in this regard, but I will now pass on to the contracts that have been let. The following table shows the several classes of vessels constructed and in course of construction, they being divided into six types, as follows:

Type.	Tonnage.	No. of vessels contracted for.
No. 1	10,800	2
No. 2	8,300	25
No. 3	5,100	8
No. 4	4,500	8
No. 5	3,400 to 3,900	17
No. 6	2,800	3
Total		63

This shows a total of 63 vessels contracted for and a total net tonnage of 380,435 tons.

Mr. DEVLIN: Could the minister give the dates of the different contracts?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am sorry I cannot, at the present moment, give the hon. member the information he desires, but I shall be very glad to get it for him if he so wishes. The contracts are spread over a period from, we shall say, March or April, 1918, up to within a few weeks ago. The average cost of these 63 vessels, including the contracts that were let during the war and since the armistice was signed, is $191-.92 per ton. During the war contracts were let at from $180 per ton for the larger vessels to $215 per ton for the lake size. Since the armistice has been signed, we have been able to contract for the large size at $167.50 per ton and for the lake size at $180.

The contracts have been placed with the following yards:

Then as to deliveries made: 7 ships have been completed of type No. 2, 8,300 tons; 4 ships have been completed of type No. 3, 5,100 tons; 4 ships have been completed of type No. 4, 4,500 tons; 8 ships have been completed of type No. 5, 3,400 to 3,900 tons, and 1 ship has been completed of type No. 6, 2,800 tons. Of the 8,300 ton type, 5 are being equipped with oil fuel apparatus and 13 of the same type are being fitted with refrigerating space.

The expenditure to date is as follows: Total payments up to April, 1919, $19,510,-322.35; total payments from April, 1919 to March 1, 1920, $24,194,639.78—grand total, $43,704,962.13. Balance available on March 1, 1920, from vote for current year, $15,505,-361.22.

There has been some criticism in the press, but very little I am happy to say, in regard to the cost of the Government ships, and I wish to take advantage of this occasion to make a comparison between our cost and the cost of ships contracted for in Canada by the Imperial Munitions Board for Great Britain, also the cost of ships built for Great Britain in foreign countries, and the cost of similar types of steel ships built in the United States.

Mr. DUFF: Would the minister be good enough to give us the date of the last contract he made?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It was about a month ago; I cannot give the exact date at the moment. From information available it is learned that the vessels constructed by the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation varied considerably in cost. Most, if not all, of the contracts placed by them during the war contained a provision that the price agreed upon in the contract was to increase or decrease according as wages and the cost of materials increased or decreased. Inasmuch as there was a steady increase in wages, there was a consequent increase in the cost of materials, with the result that it was not possible for them to determine the cost of their ships until after they were completed. It was then found that the price ranged very considerably over $200 per ton.

In connection with our system of placing contracts, we first of all had our own technical officers figure up the cost. Then we called for bids and made the very closest and best arrangement we could with the various yards with which we have placed contracts. We made our price and our contracts at so much per ton deadweight. It will be noted that the policy of our American friends differed entirely from the policy pursued by the Canadian Government. They took a base price and then had a clause in their contract to the effect that as wages and the cost of materials varied up or down—and it was always up—an increase in price would be allowed from the time the contract was let until the ship was completed. Consequently, until the ship was ready to be put into commission, they could not tell what the actual cost was. I believe I am making a very conservative statement when I say that the large amount of steel tonnage constructed in the United States for the Emergency Fleet Corporation cost $200 per ton or over. The firm of Skinner and Eddie of Seattle, are constructing a standard vessel of 8,800 tons capacity, and Mr. Skinner, giving testimony before the United States Senate last month, declared that these vessels were being constructed at the present time at a price of $188 per deadweight ton. Vessels somewhat similar in size but more exacting in the matter of equipment, etc., are being built in British Columbia at the present time under the Government programme for $167.50 per ton.

Now I wish to refer to the cost of ships built in this country by the Imperial Munitions Board, and I am offering no criticism whatever of the way in which the board let contracts: on the contrary, I think they deserve a great deal of credit for getting the steel shipbuilding industry in this country started in the manner they did. My figures are taken from the report of the National Committee on Expenditure appointed by the British Government, and are therefore official and authentic.

The Imperial Munitions Board ordered 44 steel ships in Canada at £39.10s per ton which would be equivalent to $190. I wish to point out that when they placed their contracts in 1916 the cost of labour, of shipplates, and of all other material entering into a ship was not nearly as high as when this Government entered on their shipbuilding programme about May of 1918. The Imperial Munitions Board also constructed in Canada 16 wooden ships at a cost of £42 per net ton deadweight, which in Canadian money would be equivalent to $204.

Some criticism has been levelled at the Government for intervening at the time we did instead of allowing the Imperial Munitions Board to proceed with their shipbuilding programme, but I am sure hon. members must see the wisdom of the Government entering upon our very large shipbuilding programme at that time, because the ships built by the Imperial Munitions Board were built for Great Britain. They were put under British registry, and could not be used in conjunction with our transcontinental railway system, or in opening up new trade routes and expanding our export business. I consider, therefore, that the Government acted wisely in informing the representative of the Imperial Munitions Board here that Canada would no longer advance loans to the British Government to have ships built for England, in Canadian yards and under British registry, but rather that it was the policy of the Canadian Government to build their own ships, pay for them with their own money, and afterwards operate them for the national benefit of Canada. I will mention the ships that were built for England in other countries during the war, because I conceive that this information may be of much interest to the House.

England ordered to be built in the United States thirteen steel ships at £41.7.10, equivalent to $200 per ton; in Japan, nineteen vessels at a cost of £44.17.8, or $214 Canadian money, per ton; to be built in China, or at least to be assembled there, three ships at £41, or $199, per ton.

Since the beginning of the present year, Norwegian interests placed orders for cargo vessels of 9,500 tons deadweight, with shipbuilding firms on the Clyde, at a price of $162 per ton, as compared with the price in this country, for the same size of vessel, of $167.50 per ton; and a cargo vessel of 7,750 tons deadweight, 11 knots, oil fuel, was contracted for recently by one of the companies engaged in transatlantic business, at a price of $220.35 per ton.

The routes on which the Canadian Government Merchant Marine have placed their vessels now in commission are : Canada to Liverpool; Canada to Glasgow; Canada to London; Canada to Brazil and Buenos Aires, calling at Pernambuco, Santos and Rio; Canada direct to Havana, three sailings through the present month; Canada to Barbadoes, Trinidad and Demerara; Canada to Havana; Cuba and Kingston; Vancouver to New Zealand and Australia. These are the routes on which our ships are already sailing, and the proposed additional routes on which the Canadian Government Merchant Marine will place our other vessels as they are ready to be put into commission are: Canada to other United Kingdom ports such as Manchester, and looking into the possibility of moving traffic to Ireland via Queenstown; extending the Jamaica service to Venezuela; weekly or fortnightly service from Montreal to St. John's, Newfoundland, calling at Charlottetown, when traffic offers during the season of open navigation, and the rest of the season from Halifax; considering a service to the Orient when vessels are available; looking into the possibilities of a service to India and, if conditions warrant, such a service will be established; considering a service from Vancouver to South Africa and return via Singapore and Hongkong; investigating conditions regarding a service from British Columbia ports to the west coast of South America.

At this point I should like to make a public appeal to the Canadian manufacturers to bestir themselves and to show more interest in the export trade of Canada than they have shown during the past years. If Canada is to throw off her great financial burden it is indispensable that this country should have a larger export trade than we enjoy at the present time. The Government have done their part by building up this large and efficient merchant marine. We have railway connection, and I have had placed on board these vessels, with accommodation for luggage and samples, additional staterooms in order that our manufacturers may be able to send their commercial travellers to these foreign countries on board Government ships. Our Government Merchant Marine is a great advertising medium for Canada and for our products generally. As hon. members are aware, the name of every one of our ships has the prefix "Canadian" before it; for example, Canadian Pioneer, Canadian Voyageur, Canadian Seigneur, etc. When our ships are in port they fly from the top mast the house flag, a white flag with a red cross and a beaver in the corner. Any one will at once recognize a Canadian ship, first by the name, and also by the house flag she flies while in port. I do not know of any better way in which Canada could advertise her own interests and develop the possibilities of the country than through the instrumentality of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, the ships of which will shortly be sailing the Seven Seas of the world. These vessels will prove of the greatest assistance to this country in the matter of imports. I may say that they were not constructed with a view to carrying manufactured products only. They are intended to carry the products of the mines, the fisheries, the forests and the field. These vessels will prove of the utmost importance and value to Western Canada, which has such vast quantities of grain to ship. These products will travel first of all over the Government railways, and our merchant marine will distribute them to various ports of the world to which they are destined. Continuity is maintained, the grain being handled by the Government system of railways until it reaches the seaboard, where it is transferred to the Canadian Government ships. And if the time should ever arrive when Canada will be discriminated against in any way, although I trust that such a possibility is very remote, then she has within her grasp the right to regulate the rates of freight on the products of the farm, the manufactures of the country, and all our natural products, from the point of shipment right through to the point of destination. Under all the circumstances, therefore, the Canadian Government Merchant Marine is fiilling a long-felt national want.

It may probably be of some interest to hon. members to know what kind of cargoes our vessels have so far been carrying. They are as follows:

CARGOES CARRIED FROM PACIFIC PORTS.

"Canadian Volunteer"—Genoa Bay to Garston, England, 2,085,569 feet of lumber.

"Canadian Trooper"—Vancouver to London, 1,956,216 feet of lumber.

"Canadian Aviator"—Vancouver to Garston, England, 1,934,938 feet of lumber.

"Canadian Raider"—Genoa Bay to Melbourne, 2,005,857 feet of lumber.

"Canadian Importer"—Vancouver to Melbourne, general cargo, consisting principally of the following:

Corsets from the Dominion Corset Company, Quebec.

Sewing machines from Cleveland.
Rubber tires from the Goodyear Rubber Company, Toronto.
Underwear from Hamilton.
Bicycles from Western Ontario.
Newsprint from the Canadian Export Paper Company.
Chocolates from Toronto.
Newsprint from Powell River Company, British Columbia.
Canned Herrings from the Canadian Fishing Company.
Mantles, lumber, laths, whitelead, etc., from various shippers.

This will give some idea of what a general cargo means.

Referring to our smaller vessels that are on the West Indian route, hon. members will be interested to know the vast quantities of raw sugar that were brought from the West Indies to Montreal, Halifax, and St. John, N.B. If it had not been for the Canadian Government ships I think I can say that there would have been a sugar shortage in this country. The sugar carried from the West Indies to St. John and Halifax was 47,266 tons. The total tonnage at present loaded and en route to St. John and Halifax is 14,155 tons. In addition to the above these vessels have undertaken to load before the end of April and deliver at Canadian ports 28,400 tons making a grand total of 89,821 gross tons valued at $13,164,160.40.

The number of voyages that our ships have made is as follows:

VOYAGES MADE TO FEBRUARY 6, 1920.

	Voyages.
To West Indies	27
To Buenos Ayres	4
To London	5
To Liverpool	9
To Glasgow	1
To United Kingdom from Vancouver, via Panama Canal	3
To Bordeaux	1
To Havre	1
To Australia and New Zealand	1
To St. John's, Newfoundland	4

I now come to what must be the most interesting part to hon. members and to the public generally. It is not often that ships, railways or other things are managed and operated by governments in such a way as to show a balance on the right side, but I am happy to say that from the figures I will give in the moment you will see that although 19 of these ships have only been in commission for a short time, not one of them having been in commission for a full year, the balance is on the right side. I wish to explain how the net earnings are arrived at. The Canadian Government Merchant Marine follow good business practice.

They had to put on a new organization and to open up new trade routes. After providing for organization, overhead expenses, operating expenses, depreciation, insurance and five and a half per cent on cost, the ships have made a remarkably good showing.

I think it is only fair that as Minister of Marine, and on behalf of the Government of Canada, I should pay a tribute to Mr. D. B. Hanna and his board of directors of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine for having accomplished such a fine result as I am going to refer to in a moment, not withstanding all the difficulties inseparable from new routes and a new organization. I am immensely pleased as the minister responsible, so is the Government, and I am sure that hon. members and the people of Canada will also be pleased. The profit statement is as follows:

Up to the end of December, 1919, there were delivered 19 steamers. Many of these were received during the late summer and fall, so that only 13 had completed voyages by the end of the year. As already mentioned, routes were opend to South America, West Indies and the United Kingdom. By December 31 28 voyages had been completed. The total gross earnings of all boats amounted to $3,448,030.25, and the net earnings to $1,406,000. This net will provide interest at 5½ per cent on the Government's investment, full reserve for depreciation and a handsome margin in addition. These earnings are held by the company in the shape of bank balances, Victory bonds and accounts receivable. In view of the fact that many of the boats were only in service for a portion of the year, and also as the initial expenses in placing boats in commission are extremely heavy, I think you will agree with me that the operations of the Government's Merchant Marine present an exceedingly satisfactory showing.

It will be of interest, I am sure, to the House to know that the Government boats enabled the exportation of Canadian products last year to the value of $21,362,000, much of which would not have been shipped if the shipping facilities had not been provided by the Government.

It will be also interesting to know that since the first of the year, the shipyards on the Pacific Coast have delivered three boats, the "Canadian Raider," the "Canadian Importer," and the "Canadian Exporter," all of which will be employed in the Canadian-Australian trade. The "Canadian Raider" and "Canadian Importer" have already sailed with a full cargo of lumber in the one case, and a full cargo of confectionery, newsprint, lumber, rubber tires, etc., in the other.

The " Canadian Exporter " is loading at the present time. It is expected that with the service which the Canadian Government Merchant Marine will be able to provide between Canada, Australia and New Zealand very important business will be established.

I wish also to explain how the Government transferred these ships, built and paid for by public money, to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. By Order in Council these ships were transferred to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine at the contract price. In lieu of that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine issued notes payable to the honourable the Minister of Finance bearing interest at the rate of 5½ per cent. It is incumbent upon the Canadian Government Merchant Marine not only to meet the interest on the cost of construction on these vessels at 5½ per cent but also to pay the principal from time to time out of earnings. I am very happy to announce that notwithstanding, as I have already explained, that only 19 vessels were for a portion of the year in commission, yet, out of earnings the Canadian Government Merchant Marine have issued a cheque to the consolidated revenue fund of Canada for $500,000 which meets the interest at the rate of 5½ per cent up to the end of December 31, 1919. Hon. members will see that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine are paying their way although they have hardly got started.

It may interest hon. members to know what our sister Dominion of Australia is doing. Australia has half our population but is still a nation of great vision, energy and capability. Here is what Australia has done with regard to shipbuilding:

Australian Shipbuilding Programme.

In the early days of the war, Australia acquired by purchase 15 second hand British vessels with a tonnage of approximately 100,000 tons. In addition the Commonwealth Government undertook a local building programme The original programme provided for the construction of 24 steel vessels of about 5,500 tons deadweight each and 24 wooden vessels of about 2,600 tons deadweight each. A second programme was subsequently undertaken which provided for the construction of 14 steel ships of about 6,000 tons deadweight each. In addition contracts were placed by the Australian Government for the construction of 6 vessels in United Kingdom yards of about 12,000 tons deadweight.

When Australia completes her programme she will possess a total tonnage of 348,400 tons net, a very good merchant marine for our overseas Dominions to have.

Mr. DUFF: Before the minister leaves the subject of net profits, will he be good enough to tell us how much of the profits has been set aside to rest account for depreciation.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I have not with me at the present time all the details of the organizations' bookkeeping.

Mr. DUFF: Could the minister give the gross amount?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That has been set aside to rest account?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, to rest account for depreciation.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am sorry I cannot give that information at the moment. I have given the gross earnings and the net earnings, and explained how these sums were arrived at, but just how much has been set aside to rest account I cannot say. I know that up to to-day the organization has in the bank, in the shape of cash and victory bonds, the large amount of one and one-half millions, but just what portion of that has been set aside for depreciation I cannot at present state. However, I shall endeavour to get the information for the hon. gentleman before the discussion on this item is finished.

Mr. DUFF: I would like to have the information if possible before the debate closes.

Mr. DEVLIN: Is that over and above the $500,000 cheque that was placed with the Department of Finance?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The cheque of $500,000 was paid out of the net earnings as I have stated.

Mr. DEVLIN: I might state that since asking for the dates of the contracts, I have received the desired information.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I now come to another important adjunct of shipping, and that is the establishment of a steel plate mill and the contract entered into by the Dominion Steel Corporation with the Government. The contract calls for 250,000 tons of ship plates, the Government obligating themselves on their part to take 50,000 tons per year for a period of five years with the option of increasing that quantity up to 75,000 tons if they should think fit to do so. The contract with the Dominion Steel Corporation was made at a time when the war was on. The Government had entered upon their shipbuilding programme and the only country that Canada could get ships plates from was the United States. We placed a large order in that country for 80,000 tons, but notwithstanding all our efforts to get delivery of steel we were only able, after waiting for twelve months, to get 6,000 tons. At that time no one knew how long the war was going to last and the necessities of shipping were very pressing upon the Government. Therefore they decided that Canada should be self-contained, as far as shipbuilding was concerned, and entered into the contract, to which I have already referred, with the Dominion Steel Corporation of Sydney.

The Government made this contract at a price of $4.15 per hundred pounds. That was during the war, but after the armistice had been signed I summoned the officials of the Steel Corporation to Ottawa and told them that while the contract was binding upon both parties I could not force them to reduce their price, but at the same time the Government would appreciate it if they could see their way clear to make a reduction. I am very pleased to say the officials received the proposal in a very broad and generous spirit, and after several weeks of negotiation, I was able on behalf of the Government to prevail upon them to reduce the price from $4.15 per hundred pounds to $3.65, equal to $11.20 per gross ton, a saving on the entire contract of $2,800,000. The mill commenced operations on the 17th February last, and from the first, ship plates measuring up to the high standard required by Lloyds were being successfully turned out. Within a month after the actual commencement of operations at the mill, the total commitments for the first year were practically disposed of. Thirty-four thousand tons will be required for shipbuilding purposes; nine thousand three hundred and fifty-nine tons have been sold to outside powers; while at the present moment an additional six thousand tons are under option. In addition the Government is in negotiation with the Government of New South Wales for the sale of some 15,000 tons, which it is hoped to conclude successfully within the next thirty days. Further inquiries are being received almost daily for steel, but until such time as the department ascertains the quantity of plates that the mill will be able to produce in the first year it will not be possible to take any further commitments.

I can say, Mr. Chairman, that there will be no difficulty on the part of the Government in fulfilling their part of the contract by taking 50,000 tons, and I am almost certain that we will have to ask the Steel Company, under the terms of our contract, for a maximum quantity of 75,000 tons. I do not want to make any statement that will not prove to be accurate later on, but as far as I can tell from the contracts that we have taken, the contracts that we expect to take, I think I am safe in saying that the Government will not make any loss after accepting the maximum quantity that they have to take under the terms of the contract, and there is a fair possibility that a year hence, if I am spared, I may be able to inform hon. members that there has been a profit in the matter of ships' plates as well as ships.

It might be of interest, particularly to my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) to state that our competitor in ships' plates in the world is not the United King-
4 p.m. dom, but in Australia and elsewhere our competitors are our neighbours to the south, the Americans. The price of ships' plates in England is, if my memory serves me right £27.10 per ton which is very much higher than is our price from the Steel Corporation of Sydney; so much so that we could ship Canadian plate, turned out at the Sydney mill, to any part of the United Kingdom and meet the competition there and still have a good margin of profit. In that connection it is not to be wondered at that the price of plates has advanced in the Old Country. There has been a rise in wages over there and the price of materials of all kinds that enter into shipbuilding, has gone up. No one expects that the United Kingdom will ever return to pre-war prices for steel freight ships or passenger ships either. I have already stated that the price of building steel ships in the United Kingdom, of similar size and design, is just as high as in this country. But there will come a time when the yards in the United Kingdom will not be as fully occupied as they are now. Every yard in England, Ireland and Scotland has more contracts than it is able to turn out for some time to come; but when the pressure on those yards eases off competition is bound to become keener; and if nothing is done for the shipbuilding industry in this country when that time arrives it is difficult for one to forecast what may happen to our magnificent shipbuilding industry, which as it is established at the present time has bright prospects of becoming very much bigger and greater.

That brings me to the question of subsidies. I am not going to say anything in that regard, further than that the Government have the matter under their careful consideration. The Minister of Finance, when he brings down his Budget will state, in the Government's behalf, whether or not they can see their way clear to do anything to aid the shipbuilding industry in Canada. However it will be gratifying to hon. gentlemen to know that notwithstanding the fact that Canadian shipbuilders have absolutely no protection of any kind they have been able under existing conditions to secure foreign orders in competition with shipbuilders in the Old Land.

The National Shipbuilding Company of Three Rivers—the constituency which is so worthily represented by my hon. friend (Mr. Bureau)—is at the present time engaged in the construction of six ships of 5,000 tons deadweight each, three of 3,200 tons each and two of 6,500 tons deadweight each for foreign registry. These orders were secured from France by the National Shipbuilding Company of Three Rivers in competition with the world. Canadian Vickers, Limited, of Montreal, also in competition with the world, secured a contract from Norway for the construction of two steel vessels of 8,000 tons deadweight each. The Collingwood Shipbuilding Company have secured the contract for the construction of a vessel of canal size for the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, to be employed in foreign waters. That may seem to indicate that our shipbuilders can now compete with the world, on account of the conditions that I have referred to. But I am not so optimistic as to say that one or two years from now they would be able to do so without any assistance whatever.

I desire to pay a tribute to those of our Canadians who have had to do with the building of these ships. They were not skilled in the building of ships when steel shipbuilding was commenced on a large scale some two or three years ago. But although the designs of the ships which are being turned out in the yards from Halifax to Prince Rupert are British, the materials and workmanship are Canadian, and Canadians have demonstrated their skill in shipbuilding as they have in other walks of life, just as when the call of their country came they displayed their adaptation to military life, and their bravery in the field of battle.

Our ships are equal in design, workmanship and efficiency to any ships of the same kind that are built in the old land. I have covered the programme as fully as I have been able to; if hon. members desire to ask any questions I shall be only too pleased to answer them.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I should not have intervened in this debate so suddenly had my hon. friend not seemed to be rather inclined, in respect of my humble efforts of a moment ago, to throw out to me a challenge across the floor. But there was not the slightest need of that, because as he proceeded with his statement I felt that it would be my duty, if I did say anything, to express my admiration of its remarkable lucidity and arrangement and of the evident effort which the minister made to make the whole Chamber hear him—an effort in which I am glad to say that so far as I was concerned he was perfectly successful.

There were one or two points in my hon. friend's statement which attracted my attention, upon which I made a note or two and upon which I think I am able to base a little advice to the minister, if I may be permitted to give it. I listened with interest to his statement as to the ten-year periods. I did not quite catch his figures, but I heard him say at the end that there had been a very great shrinkage in shipbuilding. I do not think that I misunderstood my hon. friend.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If my hon. friend will allow me, I pointed out the very reverse of that. I was endeavouring to convey an impression of the magnitude of the wooden shipbuilding business away back in 1875, and to show, by reference to ten-year periods, how the shipbuilding industry of Canada had declined from 1875 until recent years, when it had regained the big tonnage of that earlier period.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: That is exactly as I understood my hon. friend; that from 1875 until the most recent period there had been a shrinkage in the shipping of Canada. I understood him perfectly, and he will see why I was very glad so to understand him, as I am a strict follower of truth in these matters. May I point out to my hon. friend, who has always been a strong supporter of the National Policy, though he supported it under the name of Liberal, that from 1875 until the recent period of the war is the period covered by the National Policy?

An hon. MEMBER: 1878.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Hon gentlemen may console themselves all they can with those three years. So that my hon. friend (Mr. Ballantyne) of all men, comes before us to point out that under the National Policy the shipbuilding of Canada shrank.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If the hon. member will allow me a question——

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: My hon. friend talked for a long time; he will have to listen to me for a little while now. I am not surprised to have heard the minister make the statement that he did; indeed, I knew that it must be so. The United States, as I have often pointed out in the House, set out in the middle of the last century to be a great competitor of Great Britain in shipping, but in the middle of that century she went in for a national policy of her own and drove herself from the ocean. When Nova Scotia had the shipping, before the period of 1875, to which my hon. friend refers with pride, she had a nominal tariff. So it must always be; shrinkage is sure to take place under restriction. It is under freedom that expansion takes place. So far as the sea is concerned, the two little islands, specks in the German ocean, have given an example to the world of what freedom will do for shipbuilding which has never been equalled and cannot and never will be surpassed. They built and owned before the war more than half the entire shipping of the globe.

Now, it may be desirable that we should have a shipbuilding policy in Canada, and it may not; but the facts to which I have just drawn attention surely have a most important bearing upon what the policy of the Government is to be with regard to a continuance of Government shipbuilding.

I was touched by the pathos of the appeal which my hon. friend made to the manufacturers of Canada. He said: "For goodness sake, buck up and export some." My hon. friend is no better than Pharaoh; he wants the manufacturers of Canada to make bricks without straw. If you exclude imports to your shores you just as certainly prevent exports from your shores. As a general principle of trade that is as certain as any of the Ten Commandments, and as safe.

I observed as I listened to my hon. friend that lumber bulked very largely in his very interesting list of the goods that these Canadian ships have been carrying. What is the lesson of that? It is that if Canada is to meet her enormous liabilities in this reconstruction period, and her financial commitments abroad, Canada's exports must consist very largely of raw materials and food for years to come. The Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) and the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) know what I mean. I may expand this line of thought if I am permitted to make a few remarks upon the Budget; but men of the highest prominence in the financial world in this country, men at the heads of our banks, have been pointing out that, to meet our financial obligations abroad, this country must have a surplus export of somewhere in the neighbourhood of $200,000,000 for some years to come. I do not wonder that my hon. friend wants to see our export trade expand; but that export trade, I repeat, must expand, if we are to reach solvency and prosperity as a nation, in the shape of food and raw materials. My hon friend does not for a moment expect that there is going to be any shrinkage in our export of food and raw materials, does he? He does not expect our wheat fields to produce less; he does not expect our western farms to produce a smaller quantity of stock; he does not expect our huge forests to put out less lumber. Will my hon. friend answer me a question, and this all has a bearing upon the advice which I wish to tender very modestly to the Government? If we are to export manufactured goods and food and raw material, we cover the whole field of commerce; what is my hon. friend going to bring in? Ships to be profitably run must carry goods both ways. I am not referring to war time; I am referring to times of peace. Does my hon. friend want to build up a shipping industry composed entirely of an export traffic? In that case, I want to tell him that will not be a paying line of shipping; ships want cargoes both ways. I hope my hon. friend and the Government generally will pay very great attention to the question I have just put if they are going to embark upon any further business of shipping. If you export manufactured goods, food and raw materials, what are you going to bring in? The answer is—nothing, and you are going to commit yourselves to a shipping policy which is to be made a paying proposition by conveying goods only one way.

With regard to my hon. friend's statement, as I said before, I have not the least idea of attacking him or his policy in any way. In the period of the world through which we are passing, that man best serves his country who seeks for occasion to commend where possible rather than to criticize, who seeks for occasion to construct rather than to destroy.

I want to congratulate my hon. friend that he has come out of this business as well as he has, despite his figures which were somewhat homeopathic in dosage about the cost of plates. I am just going to permit myself to reiterate an opinion I expressed last year; that some of his bargains for steel plates were, to say the least, not very profitable. I hope that is not a very far departure from the desire to help which, I have just indicated, animates my bosom.

As I think I gathered from my hon. friend, he is not in favour of government ownership as applied to ships. I rather thought I gathered that that was his policy and the policy of the Government. In that case there would be no need of advice from me, because I should find myself absolutely at one with the Government. I think the sound principle in regard to government ownership is this:—Where public services are, in their real nature, a monopoly, then they might be profitably and wisely managed for the whole of the people; if they are a monopoly, then their profits ought to redound to the whole public. But if there is a possibility of competition, then the matter should be left to private enterprise.

An hon. MEMBER: Railroads.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Did I hear someone whisper "railroads?" The defense of the policy of nationalization of railroads was a two-fold one; that whether you believed in the principle or not, the things were in such a condition in Canada that you had to take them, willy-nilly. But I do not want to take refuge behind an answer of that kind. Railroads are in this country at the present time virtually a monopoly. Does any hon. gentleman in this House contend that there is real competition betwen our railroads as regards passenger and freight rates? Freight and passenger rates are both controlled in old England, controlled by Act of Parliament. I contend that railroads are in their nature a monopoly, and I anticipated the interruption and am grateful to my hon. friend for giving me an opportunity to vindicate my own consistency. In the case of ships, no one will urge the same contention. Wherever you have a seaboard and ports, you can have ships built by private enterprise, building them in one port here, in another there and in another further on and so on all round your coast. That is the principle I should apply; that is the way I should look at the principle of government ownership, and, therefore, I contend that this business is not one for the Government to extend.

Here, let me say—and this is by way of emphasizing and driving home things that I have already hinted at—whether success is attained in shipbuilding or not depends entirely upon fiscal policy. An admiral giving evidence before a United States Congress committee said not long ago: "We had better make up our minds whether we really want a merchant marine or not. If we do want a merchant marine, there is only one straight course to having it and that is by having free trade." Every one who has studied the subject knows that, and I enforce it by the simple argument I made in reply to the minister when I rose on this floor to-day. Shipbuilding will be successful or unsuccessful according to your fiscal policy. If you have a tariff barrier round your shores, you will never be a great shipping nation whatever else you may rise to. History proves that and will continue to demonstrate it unless the world gets more rapidly wise than it has done up to now, although I am extremely hopeful upon that subject because changes are happening very rapidly in the world at the present moment, in the field of politics, in the field of commerce, and in the field of enterprise of all kinds. My point is this: If you have the right fiscal policy, private enterprise will build your ships; if you have a wrong fiscal policy, then neither Government nor private enterprise can build ships for long successfully.

It is elementary and obvious that two things are required for running ships. One is a sea-going traffic and the other is seamen. I have dealt with the one; what about the other? Seamen are naturally also the result of policy.

Nova Scotians in the early and middle portions of the nineteenth century liked the smell of the briny as well as the old country people did, but they lost the smell. The National Policy extinguished it. What is the condition in regard to seamen in the world to-day? There may be hon. members of this House who do not know the fact—I am sure they will be pleased to hear it—that at the present moment in spite of all the drain of the war Great Britain has the finest and the most numerous set of marine officers and men that she has ever had in her history. The reason is very apparent. Liking the sea as they did, their was no compulsion in their choosing it in large numbers while the war was on. We know what Great Britain did on the sea while the war was on. Very large numbers of her sons, instead of fighting in the trenches, took themselves to the ocean. Fortunately, they are not needed any longer for fighting, but having got a taste of the briny, and the thing being in their blood anyhow, they are being drafted into the merchant marine. I just want to say this, and I am sure the House will not attribute any insular boastfulness to me on this point, that the Finance Minister, or any government of any country who think that it is going to be an easy thing two or three years hence to compete with Great Britain, either in building, manning, or sailing ships, will have to waken up and change their fiscal policy.

We have heard a great deal about what the United States has done in shipbuilding. I was in Orillia last Friday, and as I came down on the train I met a returned soldier with whom I had a very interesting conversation. I very soon found out that he came from Boston. He had been an officer, and understood business conditions in the United States. I said to him, "You are building a lot of ships down there, aren't you?" "Yes," he said, "but our people are not very keen on the project because they find, taking conditions all round, it is going to be difficult for them to compete with Great Britain." No humbug about the average Yankee. That is the latest news I have direct from Boston as to the hopefulness of the United States people in being able to compete with Great Britain. I trust the Government will inform themselves fully along these lines before they embark upon any further shipbuilding enterprise, after this vote has been passed and after present contracts have been finished.

Something was said about subsidies by my hon. friend (Mr. Ballantyne) before he sat down. I have had no reason up to now to have the least doubt as to the financial sanity of the present Minister of Finance, and therefore I scarcely need to offer him any advice. He does not find money any too plentiful at the present moment; he has lots of holes for all the money he has got. I observe that Mr. Austen Chamberlain, the Chancellor of the Exchequer of Great Britain, has lately laid down a policy under two or three heads. One is the cessation of borrowing; the other is the establishment of a sinking fund to obliterate gradually the national debt. If projects like that have any attraction for my hon. friend, he will turn a very deaf ear indeed to people who are coming to him for subsidies for any purpose under the sun. What the country wants at the present moment is a wise administration of the common law, a government that does not do so many things, but only does wise things when it does them, a government that will keep the tightest possible hold on the strings of the public purse. If the Government will govern along these lines, keeping out of all foolish projects and turning a deaf ear to people who come to them for Government doles, and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance will bring in an improvement in our system of taxation and an improvement in our fiscal policy, then I have sufficient faith in the people of this country, and in the country itself, to express my firm and sincere belief that in spite of all we have gone through as a young nation we shall before many years are over overtake some of the mistakes that have been made, and find ourselves in a splendid condition of national prosperity and financial stability.

Mr. EDMUND BRISTOL (Centre Toronto): Mr. Speaker, the matter before the House is of great national importance. I have listened to the breath of Cobdenism which has floated across the Chamber today from my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark), and I want to say to him and to other hon. gentlemen who entertain his views that a great many things have happened since Cobden was on this earth—things of very great importance to the British Empire, and of great importance to shipbuilding and other industries both in Great Britain and Canada.

I do not think that anybody in this House will for one moment combat the proposal of the Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne) to complete his shipbuilding programme. I think the country is to be congratulated that we have as Minister of Marine a man who in addition to doing his share in the war, raising a regiment and going to the Front, has had a business career of which any man in this country might well be proud. I think as Canadians we are very proud indeed of having him as a member of this House and a member of the Government. What he has done for shipbuilding and shipping in Canada is a very remarkable achievement. Early in the war he decided that if the shipbuilding business was good enough for Great Britain to carry on in Canada, it was good enough for Canada to invest her money in, and he decided to have Canadian ships built in Canada in the interests of Canada. He went into the project fearlessly, in spite of very severe criticism by many newspapers and by some hon. gentlemen opposite, and to-day he is in this remarkable position, that he could sell his ships for more money than they cost, and in addition, in operating them he has made a substantial business profit. That is certainly a unique achievement in the history of governments, and it is one upon which the Minister of Marine and the Government and Mr. Hanna and the gentlemen who are operating these ships are to be congratulated, and for which they will receive the thanks of the people of this country. Not only that, but with unexampled foresight the Minister of Marine made a contract for steel plates with the Dominion Steel Company. My hon. friend from Red Deer has sneered at the National Policy and given as an example the failure of Nova Scotia to produce ships, but he was about twenty-five or thirty years behind the time in that observation, because the ships he was talking of were wooden ships and they were disappearing as fast as they could after '74, '75 and '78, and steel ships were coming in.

The Government took measures to establish a steel plate industry in Canada in order to put Canada on her feet in the matter of shipbuilding. For shipbuilding you must have shipyards, steel plates, and skilled labour, and to-day through the efforts of the Minister of Marine and the Government we have these three requisites in Canada, and in splendid shape. Before this we were at the mercy of the United States for plates. Moreover, the Minister of Marine did not tell the whole story; he was too modest. If you try to order steel plate in the United States to-day you will find you cannot get them. The Minister of Marine made such a contract that to-day he is being offered higher prices than the Government is paying. He could sell his contract to-day for a million dollars without any effort. That is what he has done, and that is the kind of Government you are getting from business men associated with the business of the country.

Coming back to the shipbuilding industry, it is interesting to point out that when the war started we were building very few steel ships, and we should be grateful to Great Britain for what she has done through the Imperial Munitions Board towards establishing shipyards in this country, and developing the shipbuilding genius of Canadians who at that time were certainly not skilled in shipbuilding. These contracts were at comparatively high prices, which the minister informs us were higher than his prices, although wages and material were higher at the time he let his contracts. I agree with him, but I want to point out that the Canadian workmen from the moment they started shipbuilding began to improve and are still improving and becoming more efficient and I venture to say that if the industry were accorded the care and protection which should be given to any growing industry from its inception and until it gets firmly on its feet—and that is a policy which I believe is a sound one—in five years from the present time the Canadian shipbuilder will be just as good as any workman in the British shipyards who has been engaged in this occupation all his life. The Government took up the shipbuilding plan and the result of their operations, in conjunction with the efforts of the different shipbuilding yards, has been that these yards have been running to capacity, and the business, started with perhaps a few million dollars, has to-day practically fifty million dollars invested in it. This industry has a payroll of forty million dollars, and over fifty million dollars is invested in subsidiary industries which are maintained for the supply of such accessories as engines, boilers and all the appurtenances that go to make up the ship apart from the hull. There are twenty-three or twenty-four thousand people employed in the industry proper, and twenty-three or twenty-four thousand in the subsidiary industries; and, making the usual allowances in an estimate of the number of people dependent on any industry, there are over two hundred thousand people to-day who derive their subsistence from shipbuilding in this country. In addition to this, a sum of over one hundred million dollars is invested in this industry, and the dependent industries. These facts are of the greatest importance and call for the serious consideration of the people of Canada.

The interest in shipbuilding is very widespread in Canada, for there are two or three large yards in Nova Scotia, four or five in Quebec, five or six in Ontario, and three or four in British Columbia. Altogether, practically four-fifths of the people of the country are interested in the maintenance and upbuilding of our shipping industry.

Now, what is the position of our industry relatively to that of the United States? I say fearlessly, and confirming what the minister has said, that we can to-day beat the United States in prices in shipbuilding, and with the deepening of the Welland Canal, which I trust will soon be accomplished, when we commence to build six hundred foot boats on the lakes, four or five years hence, we shall be able to equal if not surpass the American shipbuilders. My hon. friend from Red Deer speaks of Great Britain as a free trade country, and I presume it is his opinion that the Liberal party in Canada was a free trade party from the year 1896 on. Well, I desire to pay this tribute to the Liberal party, that they may be free traders in theory, but practically, when they were in power, they were just as anxious to build up Canada, by the operation of a tariff to aid Canadian industry, as any party which ever held the reins of Government in this country. Further, my hon. friend talks about bonuses and bounties as if they were something unheard of, but it will be interesting to him to recall that it was a bounty given by the Liberal Government, in which my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) was Minister of Finance, that put the iron and steel indusrty of Nova Scotia on its feet, an industry that is destined to prove one of the most powerful factors in promoting our commercial and financial interests throughout the Empire. Right in Nova Scotia there are on tide-water the largest iron and coal deposits adjacent to each other that are to be found in the world. To-day in free trade England, with coal costing thirty shillings a ton, with their low grade iron, they must obtain their ore from some other source. I predict that in a few years England will come to Nova Scotia for five million tons of steel billets per annum. These billets will be manufactured in England, where there are the best steel finishing shops in the world, and where transportation is within easy reach. My hon. friend (Mr. Clark) says that if we export foodstuffs and raw materials and manufactured goods nothing will be left to be imported into this country. That is ridiculous. The United States has been longer under protection than Canada, and yet the imports into the United States run into billions of dollars. Unless we can grow things that we can not grow, and do things that no nation can do, there will always be imports and exports. But the point is this: We ought to believe in the National Policy; we ought to believe in turning our timber into the finished product and our iron and steel into manufactured articles so as to provide employment for our Canadian workmen and to supply our Canadian farmers with the implements they require, and give them the home market for their produce. Then let the finished product be sent to other countries, so that money may flow here.

The English shipyards have been in existence for hundreds of years—their modern yards have been operating for about twenty-five or thirty years—and there is no question that so far as the cost is concerned the English yards are cheaper to the British builder than any other in the world. If conditions were the same as they were before the war there is no doubt that the British shipbuilder could beat any competitor. I desire to tell my hon. friend something he does not know, and something that was news to me when I heard it, and that is that during the war Great Britain, a free trade country, gave a bounty of £4.10 to her shipbuilders on every ton of plates. I have a letter from Sir Auckland Geddes addressed to an English member of parliament, and I shall read a part of it which may be of interest. It is dated May 5, 1919, and reads:

> I have been in communication with the Ministry of Munitions, and am now in a position to reply to your letter to Sir Albert Stanley of the 14th April, on the subject of the subsidies on iron ore, pig iron and steel plates.

I observe that he calls it "subsidies."

> As regards steel ship plates no direct subsidy is being given, all direct subsidies to steel makers having been withdrawn on the 31st January, 1919. Up to that date a direct subsidy of 40 shillings per ton was payable on ship plates and in addition to this subsidy steel makers were receiving a refund of the extra cost of coal. This amount varied according to the consumption of coal at different works, but it was estimated to average about six shillings a ton.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Does my hon. friend know that Lord Robert Cecil, the eminent British statesman, who may be Prime Minister any of these fine mornings, recently advised England and the world that what we want to-day is to get rid of the war mind?

Mr. BRISTOL: I have not caught the hon. member's question. If the House will bear with me I should like to conclude this extract from this letter, because it is of interest as showing what Great Britain did during the war.

> It is practically impossible to give the equivalent of the direct subsidies on any particular class of steel. Subsidies have been paid on iron ore, coke and pig iron, and the effect on the finished steel varies according to the district and also according to the process employed at the steel works. The subsidies on coke for instance have varied from four shillings and six pence per ton to seven shillings and threepence per ton according to district.

In this connection I may direct the attention of the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) to the fact that coke comes into this country duty free and not one pound of domestic coks is made in Canada except by gas companies—

The pig iron subsidies have varied from 25s. per ton to over 40s. per ton in certain cases.

When export prices were fixed in December last an attempt was made to add to the home price of steel a figure which would cover all subsidies direct and indirect and in the case of ship plates this was assessed at £4-10-0 per ton. After allowing £2-10-0 per ton for the direct subsidies referred to above, 40s. per ton remains as the estimated equivalent of the indirect subsidies.

This letter is signed "A. C. Geddes," and it goes to show that Great Britain or any other country interested in maintaining a great industry must do what is necessary in the public interest to attain this end, whether by means of a subsidy, a bonus or a protective policy.

Let us consider the position of the Canadian ship owner. He embarked on this business in the middle of the war. His yard cost him at least one hundred per cent more than the British yards cost the British shipowners. That is a first charge. What the minister says in regard to ship plates is correct. Our prices for plates to-day, owing to the foresight of the Government, are practically the same as those in England, or possibly a little less. Another problem is the question of labour. Up to the present time the British workman on ships has been poorly paid. He is a man of long experience and he is a clever workman when he works but he is paid about half the wages that we have to pay Canadians. If you take this industry which has been fighting for its life in Canada, which started patriotically in the middle of the war, which was operated as a war industry, in which there is $100,000,000 invested, upon which 200,000 people are depending you will find that it has the support of every Board of Trade throughout Canada. These boards are urging the Government not to allow this industry to be put out of business. Any Government would be derelict in its duty which did allow an industry of this kind to go to pieces at the present time. I am sure this Government are not of such a character that they would not give the gravest consideration to the question how best to maintain this industry if they do not propose to go on building ships as they have done for some years past. The reason that the prices of ships built in British shipyards are maintained to-day is not because Great Britain cannot build cheaper but it is because the British ship owner is out to get his price from the rest of the world for building ships and even if Canada is his biggest competitor he can still get the business because of his greater facilities and experience. He must of necessity know more about building ships than we do in Canada. If you do not keep the shipbuilding yards in this country going to capacity during the next five or ten years, if you are going to allow the skilled workmen to become scattered, if you are going to disorganize this industry, you are going to cause very serious financial trouble and set back the progress of Canada as shipbuilding is a basic industry. I make the statement of my own knowledge, that over twenty-five per cent of the men employed in the shipyards of Canada are men who saw service in our own expeditionary force. The returned soldiers have petitioned the Government not to allow this industry to suffer, but that they should do what the British Government did in connection with steel plates—namely give some reasonable subsidy to enable the wages of our Canadian workingmen to be maintained and to enable these yards to be kept going for another five years until they are firmly on their feet, so that shipbuilding can be done here not only for Canada but for the different parts of the world. I am satisfied that the result of that policy would be that you would see ocean ships built in Canada at Halifax, Montreal, and Three Rivers, and lake ships built at Toronto, Collingwood and Port Arthur, as cheaply as they could be built anywhere. Colonel Carnegie who is well known to all of us and who was in this country as adviser of the British Government said to me, after spending a day at Toronto and going over the Dominion shipbuilding yard there, that he had not seen a more up to date plant anywhere adding: "After what I have seen of the intelligence and efficiency of Canadian workmen, in a few years you will be able to build ships as cheaply as we can in England." If the Government will give the shipbuilding industry a reasonable chance to bridge over the period necessary to establish it upon a firm footing, in a little while our Canadian shipyards will be turning out ships successfully in competition with the world.

Where you have practically every Board of Trade in every large city where you have the working people and the returned soldiers all supporting this policy, it indicates at all events that the business sense of the country wants to see a Canada for Canadians, wants to see Canada properly developed, wants to see Canada take its place as a manufacturing as well as an agricultural country. That business sense thus evidenced I am sure the Government will consult and consider in coming to any conclusion as to what is the best policy for the shipbuilding industry. I am glad that we have the distinguished gentleman who now occupies the position of Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne) in charge of the shipping interests of this country, and I believe that he has associated with him those who will give this matter their most careful consideration and that the shipbuilding industry will receive fair play.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg): Mr. Chairman, I am sure that we have all enjoyed greatly the excellent address which we have listened to from the hon. the Minister of Marine and Naval Affairs (Mr. Ballantyne) this afternoon. We also had much pleasure in hearing from that stalwart free trader the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) and that stalwart believer in high protection the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol). With regard to the remarks of the Minister of Marine, I think most of us were greatly surprised when we received our copy of the Estimates yesterday and noticed the modest amount he is asking for. One of the reasons why I was surprised was that a few days ago I saw in one of the newspapers, I think it was the Morning Chronicle of Halifax, the following desptach:

> Hon. C. C. Ballantyne, Minister of Marine, announced to-night at the annual dinner of the Dominion Marine Association, held at the Windsor Hotel, that the Government has under consideration the building of passenger steamships of 15,000 gross tons in connection with the Canadian National Railways. Mr. Ballantyne briefly reviewed the operations of the Canadian Government merchant marine and stated that the net profits on the steamship service had been a very handsome one.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Marine made that statement a few weeks ago, it certainly is a surprise to me, as it must have been to other hon. members of this House, to see that he has only asked for the small sum of $20,000,000. Twenty million dollars will not go very far in building passenger ships for ocean service. Perhaps the Government had a caucus and the hon. member could not get his way as happened in regard to the naval policy in connection with the report submitted by Lord Jellicoe. The minister told us during the course of his remarks that the Government started this policy of building cargo ships to be operated by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine in May, 1918. When the minister introduced this policy during the war, although we did not believe in government ownership of ships, we realized that as ships were being sunk in all parts of the world, there was nothing for us to do but to agree to that policy. But the war ended in November of that year and if the war was over and ships were no longer being sunk it was not necessary to go further in making future contracts. The minister told us that contracts were made in January of this year. It seems to me that it is bad policy for any Government to go into the shipbuilding and ship operating business. It is a matter which should be left entirely to private individuals; it is not a business for the Government to engage in. The Canadian people themselves can build and operate ships as well as the minister can. I am sure that he believed that he was giving a very glowing account of what his department had done during the past year. I say it was a very poor showing. The minister told us that with nineteen steamers—I presume of an average tonnage of about 4,000 tons deadweight which would make them cost anywhere from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000—there was a profit of $1,500,000 on their operation. Well, Sir, if the little boats that I am interested in only made that much profit comparatively in recent years I would sell them and sell them quickly. The only reason why that large profit was made—of course the minister did not say so but it is evident to everybody—was because the conditions that existed to-day, and which have prevailed for the last two or three years, were entirely unprecedented and it is only a matter of a few months, or a year at the outside when these ships, which have made a profit of a million and a half dollars under abnormal conditions, will go into debt—each one of them.

It must have been gratifying to hon. gentlemen on this side when the Minister spoke of the excellent work that was being done in the shipyards of this country. My mind went back about ten years when the Liberal Party were in power and wanted to build a navy. They told the people of this country that they could do so but hon. gentlemen opposite, who at that time were supporting the Conservative Party, said that we could not build ships, we could not find rivetters—in fact we could not do anything in that line. My hon. friends opposite at that time called to their aid the Rt. Hon. Winston Churchill who made the statement that there was not a spot on the North American continent, to say nothing of Canada, where we could lay down the keel of a ship. Despite that we have had the admission of to-day from the Minister of Marine. I am glad he acknowledged, —and the hon. member for Centre Toronto acknowledged the same thing,—that Canadian workmen can build as good ships as British workmen can build. I am proud of the fact, we are all proud of it; the only difference is that we on this side knew it years ago and hon. gentlemen opposite are only finding it out now.

I noticed that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bristol) in complimenting the Minister for his shipbuilding policy said he could sell those Government ships at a greater price than they cost. Well, Sir, my advice to the Minister is to sell those ships as quickly as he possibly can and the sooner the better. If he can sell those ships at a higher price than he paid for them, or at even as high a price, there is no reason why the Government of Canada should stay in the shipbuilding business. If those ships can be sold at a profit, private enterprise firms like The Canadian Shipyards, or Vickers Limited or any of the other shipbuilding firms can go out and get the business themselves. I notice that the Three Rivers Shipbuilding Company have had no contract from this Government and that nevertheless they have gone abroad and obtained outside contracts. If the business is good and the ships turned out can be sold at a profit every shipyard in this country can go out and get business for itself. Therefore there is no necessity for the Canadian Government to buy ships and interfere with the operations of private enterprise.

The Minister endeavoured to show that it was necessary to have those ships in order to build up our trade. It was quite true that while the war was on ships were scarce; but, Sir, with the shipbuilding programmes undertaken in Great Britain, the United States, and other countries that condition is not going to continue and I say that the Government has no more right to go into the shipbuilding business than it has to enter upon the manufacture of boots and shoes or candy. It should leave that business to those who are willing to invest their money in it. The Minister gave us a glowing account of the shipbuilding operations but I would like to draw his attention to facts set forth in the Toronto Globe of a recent issue. I have a copy of the paper in my hand and practically an entire page is taken up with an advertisement from the United States Shipbuilding Emergency Corporation in which they offer for sale 441 ships with a tonnage of 1,543,500 tons, and 31 barges with a total of 77,500 tons. In other words the United States Government are offering for sale at the present time 500 boats representing practically 2,000,000 tons of shipping. Now, Sir, if private individuals put up their money and buy these boats is it fair that they should be subject to competition from the Canadian Government?

The hon. member (Mr. Bristol) gave us a reason why we could not build ships in Canada as cheaply as they can in Great Britain that the workmen in the United Kingdom do not get as good wages as do our mechanics. In reply to that let me say that if there is one class of people in Great Britain to-day—and throughout the war and in pre-war times—who receive good wages it is the men in the Clyde Shipyards and other shipyards in the Old Country; and any person who says that the reason for their being able to build ships cheaper over there is on account of lower wages is certainly not acquainted with the facts. This statement is also true with respect to the hours of labour for the British machinists, engineers and shipbuilders do not work any longer hours than those in any other part of the world.

Now, Sir, what about the future of the shipbuilding industry in this country? Is the Government going to continue its policy of building ships just for the sake of having something to do, for I presume if it does that will be the sole reason? If private individuals are willing to build ships I cannot see any good reason why the Government should also enter into the business. As I said before, it is not a matter for the Dominion Government at all; it is purely a business for private enterprise which should be freed from Government competition, and if necessary, assisted. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bristol) told us about the amount of capital invested in the Canadian shipyards and the number of men therein employed. I agree with the hon. gentleman that we should protect that investment as well as the men who are working in the industry. Personally I would not like to see any policy adopted in Canada which would have the result of closing up those shipyards and putting those men out of work. But I say the right way to promote the industry is not for the Government to engage in the industry itself. The Government should go out of the shipbuilding business and frame another policy with respect to any help which it deems to be necessary for the shipyards which, are established at the present time. Of course we are only doing business in a small way in the Maritime Provinces. But during the war, notwithstanding the necessities of the case, we did not come to the Government and say "We cannot build our little ships down there unless you help us and unless you buy the vessels from us." It would have been just as proper and just as legitimate for the minister to buy our little boats as to buy vessels from Vickers Limited or any other firm. But we did not make such an appeal, we had a duty to do during the war, and we did it to the best of our ability. New shipyards were started, we invested what money we had and borrowed what further sums were necessary from the banks, and we did our little bit towards placing more tonnage on the ocean in order to help Great Britain and her Allies to win the war. If it is necessary to help in the building of ships and the securing of contracts for ships, let a suitable policy be devised; but the Government should not purchase ships and run them itself. If it is necessary, and if after careful investigation, it is found that the present Canadian shipbuilding firms cannot build ships in this country as cheaply as they can be turned out in Great Britain, France, United States, or elsewhere, the Government should in some way grant help. And my suggestion would be that it should be in the way of a bonus. If the Government thinks it is necessary to enter into that policy, I am willing to support it providing it is demonstrated beyond doubt that the Canadian shipbuilders need that bonus for the legitimate development of their business. There is no question but that during the war shipbuilding cost a great deal more money than it would under ordinary conditions, and for that reason, if it is necessary, the Canadian shipbuilding firms should be protected for a few years. But that policy should not be a permanent one, in fact I should not think it would be needed for more than one or two years; still if necessary our shipbuilders should have a certain amount of protection along that line.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: In view of the present financial condition of the country, where will the money come from?

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend is justified in asking that question, but I am not, under ordinary conditions, in favour of bonusing the building of ships or any other industry. An indispensable condition, however, is that it should be necessary. Perhaps the hon. gentleman did not catch my qualification, but I have always insisted upon that. I have always maintained that any aid given should only be forthcoming in the event of the shipbuilding industry needing it, and as far as I know it does not need it; I think the shipyards have made a lot of money. However, if it is necessary to keep our shipbuilding plants going, and keep the men employed for a year or two, the Government should come to their assistance.

If assistance is not necessary, do not give it to them; and in any case we should give it only after a proper investigation has been made. My hon. friend asked where the money would come from; I really do not know. The only thing I would suggest is that my hon. friend help us on this side of the House to defeat this Government as quickly as possible in order that a Government may be put in power which will properly administer the affairs of the country.

Mr. BURNHAM: I would like to make—

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Keefer has the floor.

Mr. FRANK KEEFER: I represent a shipbuilding city—

Mr. BUREAU: Hear, hear.

Mr. KEEFER: —and therefore, like my hon. friend (Mr. Bureau) I am interested in the shipbuilding problem. But I want to look at the matter from a somewhat wider standpoint than that. There is an aspect of this shipbuilding programme that has not been touched upon by the previous speakers. Longing eyes are being cast upon certain possessions of Great Britain down in the Carribbean Sea and in South America. I speak of the West Indies, British Honduras, British Guiana, Jamaica, etc. The sentiment of the people of these territories is intensively pro-British, notwithstanding the considerable propaganda that has been carred on against that sentiment. But there is a lack of transportation facilities to other British countries from those British possessions. At first blush, one would think that because we do not import so much from those countries, their trade is not important. But the people of the West Indies have never realized that while we have been taking only one-third of their total exports in a direct way, we have been importing indirectly but through a broker in the United States similar products valued at twice the value of their total exports. What is the reason? Lack of transportation, namely, ships—Canadian controlled ships. Heretofore these products have been going to the United States, have been carried by American railroads and been transported into Canada. I hope that that system will soon cease. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) wonders what will be the return cargoes. Trade does not move east and west nearly as much as it moves north and south; therefore we should provide for transportation facilities between Canada and the British West Indies and Central and South American countries in order that we may bring their products to our doors and ship our products to theirs. So far we have failed to do that.

The total exports from the West Indies in 1917—and they are relatively the same now, except that there is a slight increase in values—was $62,939,000, and their total imports were valued at $22,525,700. That was only one-third of all our trade with those countries. They did not realize that of these same articles, 32 in number, we were taking $117,000,000 worth. They were losing to a certain extent, and so were we, on account of brokerage, additional freight charges, and customs duties. Carload after carload of sugar has been transported from New York to the sugar refineries of lower Ontario. Why should that freight return not be going by our Canadian railways? Of every dollar that is being paid out in railway freight charges, about eighty cents represents wages, and our Canadian railway men have been losing all those wages paid in connection with the transport of these West Indian products. The people in the West Indies and British Central and British South America do not think we can produce any more goods than we have exported; they think that that is all we produce and they base their opinion simply upon the small quantity they receive from us. I join with the able Minister of Marine in saying that it is high time that our Canadian manufacturers and exporters should awake to the possibilities of trade with those countries, which are longing for British goods but have been unable to get them. Where we have one Canadian representative down there seeking business, there are twenty Americans. What are the trade returns of their imports from Canada? Of twenty-five articles, running from breadstuffs and cottons down to trunks, they imported in 1916 goods to the value of $35,883,800, and of that amount we sent them only $7,059,370 worth; and they thought that was all we could send them. And yet under this terrible National Policy, which has killed industrial trade export in Canada—so the member for Red Deer says—we were sending out $672,777,000 worth of the same goods, but not to those countries. That market is there if we will only provide the necessary transportation. We need their products, they need ours; one is the complement of the other.

The same argument applies in regard to the passenger traffic, that also should go through Canadian, not American ports. Heretofore Canada has been endeavouring to carry on that trade by paying a subsidy to the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company of about $1,000 a day, approximately $360,000 a year. That company have done excellent work so far. They carried on during the war, but to-day it may be said of them that they are unable to stem the volume of trade that has arisen. Passengers cannot get bookings; passengers who pay for first-class accommodation and for outside berths get second-class accommodation with the second-class passengers. The trade between the islands which these ships are carrying on is tremendously overcrowded; in many cases hundreds of people have to remain on deck without any sleeping accommodation whatever. There is one of the trade routes —namely, the route between the British West Indies and South America and Canada,—which the ships planned for in the programme of the minister can easily serve; and it is a trade which belongs to Canada. Why do I say that it belongs to Canada? A committee was appointed by the Imperial Government to look into the question of West Indian shipping. The object of the appointment of that committee is indicated in the following paragraph in the preamble of its report:

> To consider the probable effect of the shipping position after the war on British trade with the British West Indian colonies, and on intercolonial communications, and to report what, if any, measures should be taken to maintain adequate communication with and between those colonies, and to provide increased port or other facilities for shipping.

A perusal of the report of this committee, which is signed by the chairman, Lieut.-Colonel Amery, Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, reveals a most pathetic state of affairs. There are colonies with which trade communications cannot be established and maintained—I speak of communication with Great Britain—by a passenger and mail service without the payment of heavy subsidies. The report shows that the Royal Mail Steamship Company has lost money in endeavouring to maintain a service between England and the West Indies. The statement is made that a net loss of £1,037,853 has been incurred by the West Indian mail service in the period of twenty years between 1896 and 1915, even taking into account the subsidies paid. The reason is that they were trying to do what is called "bucking nature"; the West Indies are out of the line of the ordinary trade routes.

What does the report of this committee finally recommend? Practically what the Minister of Marine is now endeavouring to do. It says:

> We consider, therefore, that these colonies would do well in their own interests to co-operate heartily with any efforts made by the Canadian Government to open up direct steamship communication with them. In paragraph 31 we have referred to the experiment already made by the Canadian Government of running a cargo steamer between Canada and Jamaica, and we hope that this is only the beginning of a growing connection between the two countries.

Such is the considered opinion in 1918 of an able special committee appointed by the Secretary of State. We have, as regards that trade, powerful competitors. We all know that the United Fruit Company are well entrenched and established with their interests and their steamers. We have to compete with that company. No private concern can do so; but the Government of Canada can, and the Government of Canada can go in there and bring us the fruits, the raw materials that this country needs from that area, to the terminii of our railways so that they will be carried over our railways instead of being carried over American railways. Any person who does not to-day advocate Government control and operation of steamships so long as we have Government control and operation of railways is very short-sighted. What is the good of paying out of the treasury a loss by way of a deficit on railways when with a little foresight you can develop trade and bring it to those terminii and put it upon the railways and give employment to the men?

The freight business is there. The Minister of Marine has shown that some 23 or 24 voyages were made and those voyages have always been with full cargoes both ways. There is no reason why that trade should not increase as well as at least continue. We are only touching the fringe of the business to be done, and yet the business of the Royal Mail Line has not been interfered with. There is a class of business there that we ought also to have, namely, the business of the French islands, Martinique and Guadeloupe. None of the Canadian subsidized steamers are calling there, the reason probably being because of an arrangement between steamship lines so as not to compete at other points. That could not exist with a Government line of steamers; we should have the trade of those French islands coming to and from our ports of Halifax, St. John and Montreal. They want to deal with Canada in preference to dealing with the United States, but the ship transportation problem has so far been insuperable.

Those are some of the reasons why the policy the Minister of Marine has formulated is not only a wise one locally, but wise imperially and wise for the general benefit of the country at large and should be continued.

The following are the details of the exports and imports of West Indian products referred to in general figures above:

Mr. McMASTER: I do not purpose taking up a great deal of the time of the committee this afternoon, but there are a few things which I should like to say concerning this proposal of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to spend another $20,000,000 of the people's money upon building and, after building, operating a national system of steamships. There is an argument for nationalization of railways. It has been noted by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) that where anything is a monopoly, either natural or quasi-natural, it is proper and right that that should be controlled by the community. There is, in that sense, an argument which largely offsets, although perhaps it does not altogether offset, the loss of efficiency in management which nearly always goes with bureaucratic or Government control as opposed to individual or company control. But that argument which applies to the nationalization of railways has no application at all in connection with the operation of tramp steamers. That is what these steamers will be; they are not of the size to be used as large transatlantic or transpacific liners; they are the size of vessels which are engaged as tramp steamers, the sort of steamers which have built up in no small measure the wonderful mercantile supremacy of the Old Land. I cannot conceive of any business more inapt, if I may use that word, more improper for Government or bureaucratic control than the management of tramp steamers. You have to be able to watch the trade routes of the world, to bring your vessel home from Buenos Aires and on the next voyage send it off to the Black sea. I cannot understand how a Government can properly manage tramp steamers. The hon. member for Red Deer has very properly stressed the absurdity of a protectionist Government such as this Government is, endeavouring with a tariff to keep goods out of Canada and at the same time to build up international commerce by lines of steamers. But that is not the point I wish to make this afternoon, as it has been very well made by the hon. member for Red Deer. The point I want to make is the impropriety and unwisdom of the Government as opposed to individual or company endeavouring to operate ships. I remember during the war consulting a very well known steamship man of Montreal as to the efficiency which the British Government obtained from the British ships which, as a war measure, they had taken over. The British Government, in order to have the preference of the service of their mercantile marine, laid hands on the mercantile marine of Great Britain. I was told by this friend of mine that the ships were not operated above 60 per cent efficiency, because why? Not because the men who operated them were not patriotic, not because they were not trying to do their very best, but because they did not have the necessary information and freedom, the necessary initiative to carry on the operation of managing ships as private individuals or those in the employ of a company would have had. That is, to my mind, the great and fundamental objection to this scheme of the nationalization or the establishment of a national system of ocean-going vessels. We have had mixed up with the excellent and lucid exposition of the minister, paeans of praise of the protective system raised by hon. members on the other side. The hon. member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Bristol), who rarely visits this Chamber, has given us the benefit of an excellent speech in support of the principle of protection. May I remind him of a story told by some Portuguese legislator? There was a proposition made that the Tagus should be widened and deepened and made suitable for the conduct of commerce up and down that river in order to foster trade between Portugal and Spain; but Portugal had at that time a high tariff against Spain, and this Portuguese legislator said: "How ridiculous it is for us to endeavour to keep Spanish goods out of Portugal with a tariff and then to spend money on deepening the Tagus! Let the Tagus run to the sea as it did in the time of our forefathers." But it is the impropriety and unwisdom of placing the control of tramp steamers in the hands of a bureau, of a Government department, against which I wish to protest. The minister is in the happy position of being able to get out of this business with a profit. Let him embrace the opportunity at the earliest possible moment. Then he will have deserved well of his country; he will have entered into stupendous financial operations and closed those without a loss. How rarely in the history of this country have large operations of a quasi-commercial or industrial character been entered into by a Government and abandoned by the Government without loss!

I press this upon the minister. I am glad that he has made money with his ships and I shall be still more glad to see the exact figures when he lays them before the House, but now that he has made a profit let him remember the French proverb which says that "the better is the enemy of the good." Let him be satisfied to call a halt and bring these operations to a conclusion when he can do so without loss to the state.

Mr. JOHN H. BURNHAM: Mr. Speaker, I think a casual listener to this debate might get the impression that a large number of the members of this House had been sent here by private interests in order that they might thoroughly smash up everything they possibly can that is in the public interest. They do not seem to be pleading for the public interest. They try to show that it is utterly and absolutely impossible to conduct public business, and that it ought to be left to private individuals. If that is so, why do not these gentlemen leave this Chamber and go home, leaving the affairs of this country to private individuals? Simply because it is impossible to carry on the public business of this country in that way. The answer is before these gentlemen if they will only notice the things that are so plain. Will my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) for one moment contend that public efficiency is so inferior to private efficiency that the Government of Canada should have handed over to a private company the prosecution of the war? There seems to be no discrimination at all in these matters. Let us be patriotic; let us be sensible, and remember that we are here to transact the public business in a public way and by public means, and that it is not to be left to private individuals.

Do not let us forget that it is but a few years since we were at the mercy of the Atlantic shipping pool, and God forbid that we should ever be at the mercy of another shipping pool in our time. If the Minister does not go on with his public ownership programme in the matter of shipbuilding, and give the industrious farmers and labour generally throughout this country a fair show on the ocean, as it has agreed to give to them on land, the Government will certainly meet with the strong disapproval of the people of this country. We do not want the main lines of communication in the hands of private individuals.

Lest the observations of that scientific reasoner the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) go without challenge, I should like to devote just two minutes to his observations. First of all, he said British shipbuilders, because of free trade, had driven American shipbuilders off the sea. That I absolutely deny. If the hon. gentleman will read the latest work on the history and development of the American marine and American shipbuilding, he will find that from the time American shipbuilding began, British shipbuilders, Norwegian shipbuilders, French shipbuilders, and shipbuilders of every other nation were wiped off the sea by the Americans. It was the Americans with their old clippers who had the lines of shipping to Canton, South Africa, South America and Europe, and one very interesting thing in connection with those clippers is this: It was not the sharp bow that gave speed and efficiency but the blunt bow, which gave both capacity and speed. This history is one of the most interesting things in the world to review. You will find that the Americans simply captured the trade of the oceans. Then what happened? Under protection the American republic developed so rapidly that it looked about for other nations to do its bidding, to do its hewing of wood and carrying of water, its carrying on water, and when the Americans were asked why their shipbuilding had not been proceeded with and why Great Britain had been allowed to monopolize the shipping business they said: "It is because we have so much else to do. We prefer to let Britain do it, and to hire her ships." There are vast numbers of ships which the British shipyards are credited with building, and duly and properly credited with which, however, are under American registry. The Americans will build ships only as soon as they need to do so; it is not that they cannot build them, or because the system of protection forbids it. In the meantime they are drawing from the United Kingdom, Canada, and from all parts of the world, shipping and everything conceivable to enable them to expand as they are doing. Do not let anybody run away with the idea that our shipbuilding is not equal to that of Great Britain because we are said to have a false fiscal system in this country. That is not so at all. You cannot compare Canada with Great Britain, although the minister has announced to-day what has been achieved, and that we are able to take contracts on an even keel, as it were, even with the Old Country itself. That augurs well for the future, if we have a good governmental system. The trial spin has shown what we can do.

There is an extraordinary kink, as it were, in the free trader's mind. Having enunciated the general principle of absolute freedom of trade, he seems to be utterly unable to understand that other elements enter in. Let me illustrate. If between the hon. member for Brome and myself there should spring up a system of trade it follows, as the night the day, that if my labour cost is equal to his and his to mine, then absolute free trade must obtain between us. But if—and here is the point—I make a profit as against the hon. member for Brome I take just that much away from him and do not give him any return for it. If I make a 25 per cent profit, I do 75 per cent of the work and he does 100 per cent; he is 25 per cent behind. If I make 50 per cent profit, I only do half the work, and if I make 75 per cent profit, I do only one-quarter of the work and to that extent make no exchange of work. This element of profit, which is the basis on which all modern commerce is conducted is absolutely and entirely left out of consideration by these gentlemen. Profit is the basis on which all commerce is founded, and we surely have a clear example of that in the exchange situation to-day, when the United States is making us pay through the nose. It is absurd to say that Great Britain has been able to capture the commerce of the seas by reason of her free trade policy, and that because she exports she must import, because any one acquainted with the facts knows that half the time British shiping goes home absolutely empty. It is no good my hon. friend (Mr. McMaster) shaking his head, because that is a fact. Her profit and her subsidies enable her to do that.

Mr. McMASTER: Can the hon. member give us the figures?

Mr. BURNHAM: I can give the figures but I am laying down now simply a general principle. Let me tell the hon. gentleman, whether he likes it or not, that in order to prevent any loss whatever the British Government subsidizes these lines, and it is this policy that enables Britain to maintain the monopoly of the sea. If I had a telegraph line and discovered that I could lose on telegraphs and make a profit on something else I would be content to lose on telegraphs, and the hon. member for Brome would exclaim: "There, look at what free trade will do"; whereas, as a matter of fact, I am making on something else. It is the same way with the British Government. They know that, from their insular position, if they do not carry the trade of the nations they are undone. They therefore build ships and subsidize them, and in that way get the trade of the world.

Mr. DUFF: Does my hon. friend mean to say that the British Government subsidizes tramp or freight steamers?

[Mr. Burnham.]

Mr. BURNHAM: It subsidizes whole lines; not all, I admit, but it subsidizes lines, and especially missionary lines; and when these missionary lines have run the others out, then perhaps they withdraw the subsidies, as they have sometimes done. But read the history of the development of the American marine and you will find it all laid down there, and you will discover that your antiquated ideas are like cobwebs in your brain. Sweep them out; they are not true; they are not correct; they are not founded on common sense; and business is founded on common sense. Do not, when you are discussing general principles, omit some of the other principles that bear directly on them. You might just as well calculate the orbit of the moon without taking into consideration the influences of the planets and of the sun. Some of the earlier astronomers did that and could not understand why they were wrong. After Newton discovered the law of gravitation, when they made calculations without considering other heavenly bodies, they found that they did not work out. For example, when Herschell discovered Uranus a calculation being made of the orbit of that planet, it was found that it was more than 200 miles out. This appeared to be a negation of the Newtonian theory, but a young Frenchman, Leverier by name, made a calculation on the supposition that the Newtonian theory was correct, namely, that the influence of a planet still further out would account for the unusual motion of Uranus; and, proceeding on that assumption, he discovered Neptune.

Now let me commend this sublime illustration, this tremendous example, as something that may possibly attract the attention of the hon. member for Brome when he is discussing the law of free trade. Let him remember that there are countless other things that pull and haul it in other directions, and until he has taken those into consideration his calculations are absolutely wrong.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I rise to ask a question of the minister. Early in March I asked the following question, as appears in Hansard on page 327:

1. How many contracts for shipbuilding were given by the Government since the 1st of January, 1918?

2. To what firms were said contracts given and what were the respective amounts?

The answer was that there were fifty-six contracts given, and the minister this afternoon in his speech stated that they were given for the sum of $43,704,962.13. In answer to the following question:

Were all of said contracts given after tender?

The following information was given:

Contracts were placed after orders had been received from the several yards and prices and other details agreed upon.

My fourth question was: "If so, were they given by the lowest tenderer?" and the answer was, "Answered by number three." The answer to my fifth question, which was: "If not, why?" was "Answered by number three."

I have listened very carefully to the speech of the minister this afternoon and I am not very clear yet as to whether these contracts were given to the different shipbuilding companies after proper tenders had been made. Was an opportunity given to every shipbuilding company of Canada to tender?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The policy of the Government, when it was inaugurated in 1918, was to keep busy the existing yards then located and operated in Canada. In addition to these yards that were in existence at the time the policy was announced, two or three new yards have been established. We did not advertise for public tenders in the way suggested by my hon. friend, for the reason that if we did one or more yards might get too great a share of the business. The policy of the Government was to distribute the business evenly in order to keep all of the yards busy and give employment to the workmen in various parts of the country, and, after the Armistice was signed, to returned soldiers. Every yard in Canada was therefore asked to bid for the Government's business. As I stated this afternoon, our own experienced technical officers figured up the cost, so that we had a check on the prices that were submitted to us by the various yards. We also had the Old Country costs to go by. We carried on negotiations for certain types of ships with various yards, making as good a business deal as possible. As I say, we could not call for public tenders in the usual way, because some yards might not get any business while others might obtain too much. As I explained to the House this afternoon, the average cost of Canadian government ships is less than the American cost, and less than the cost of ships ordered by the Imperial Munitions Board.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: There was no competition?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If the Government desired to place a contract for two or four ships of, say, 8,400 tons, such ships could not be built on the Lakes, and we would ask shipbuilding concerns on the Pacific coast, and at Montreal, Three Rivers and Halifax to give prices for these ships, and we would make as close a bargain as possible, first of all having the cost of the ships ourselves, then having the bids from the yards capable of constructing ships of this size, and having other information to guide us. Altogether, I think we safeguarded the public interest as effectively as if we advertised for tenders in the usual way.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Does the minister not think that if tenders had been called for in the usual way the Government would have been able to secure lower prices?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No.

Mr. FIELDING: In regard to the manning and officering of these ships, has the minister been able to procure Canadian seamen and officers, or have we had to bring outsiders into the service?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: While the ships are owned by the Government, they are not directly operated by the Government. The Canadian Government Merchant Marine, the stock of which is owned by the Government, is entirely under the management of Mr. Hanna and his board of directors, and the organization which he has for the operation of ships. I have no direct knowledge of the personnel of the crews; the Canadian Government Merchant Marine look after that matter as well as the operating of the ships. Incidentally, I might say that I asked Mr. Hanna some time ago if they were many Canadians and he said "No." As a rule the majority of the crews for the time being are old countrymen, but Mr. Hanna gives the preference wherever Canadians are available. My department is doing everything it possibly can, with its schools of navigation throughout the country, to induce Canadians to take the necessary course to become officers or engineers, deckmen and so on. I hope that in the future the majority of the crews will be Canadians, but at the present time they are not.

Mr. FIELDING: We had a discussion a few days ago as to whether or not we had commanding officers available, and I had that in my mind when I asked the question.

Mr. DUFF: The minister spoke about the cost of Canadian ships in comparison with those built in other countries. This afternoon he gave us figures of contracts made in Great Britain in comparison with those made in Canada. Does he figure the cost in pounds or dollars, and does he take the English pound as having a value in Canadian currency of 4.86 2/3, or what rate of exchange does he take at getting at the figures?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I did not do the figuring myself, and I would not want to give an answer to the hon. member for Lunenburg unless I knew that the figures were absolutely authentic. I will ascertain and let the hon. gentleman know.

Mr. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the debate which took place this afternoon was a very interesting one, but apart from that, it appealed to us of the Liberal Party, inasmuch as it reminded us of another which took place some ten years ago, when the leader of the Liberal Party suggested that we should build in this country a Canadian navy which would promote a new industry, that of shipbuilding, and would certainly lead later on to the building and maintenance of a fleet of merchantmen.

At that time, the leader of the Liberal Party, represented in the House of Commons and throughout the country, the thoughts and ideals of all true Liberals of the day. If I remember well, the present Minister of Marine, who was then a member of the Montreal Board of Harbour Commissioners, was among the strongest and most enthusiastic supporters of such policy.

It is useless, Sir, to revert to the past; it is useless for us, on this side of the House, to recall the debates, the bitterness of which, however, is not quite forgotten. As I said before, if I remember well, the very man who led the forces opposed to that policy is to-day leading the Government in this House—I refer to the Right Hon. Acting Prime Minister. If you cared, Mr. Speaker, to read over again the discussions which took place at the time, you would be very much surprised to notice that the same man whose Government now propose an expenditure of $20,000,000 for the building of a Canadian merchantmen was the first one in the House of Commons and throughout the country, to raise his voice against such a policy and to oppose Laurier's "tin-pot navy." We read in the Gospel that there shall be joy in Heaven upon one sinner that doeth penance, more than upon ninety-nine just who need not penance.

To-day, Sir, as a member of the Liberal Opposition in this House, as a representative of the people who entered the field in 1911 as a supporter of the naval policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and was defeated, it is a matter of gratification to me to congratulate the Right Hon. Acting Prime Minister and to tell him that I hope that his change of heart, however late it may be, will prove genuine. And to quote again the Gospel, knowing as I do that the Acting Prime Minister is quite conversant with it, let me tell him that according to Holy Scriptures, the best rewarded labourers were those who came about the eleventh hour.

I do not wish, Sir, to discuss the question on its merits, whether Canada should have a Canadian merchant marine or whether we are entitled to have ships flying our national flag; for to such a question there can be but one answer. Yet, I think there arises an incidental question and I anticipate much trouble in the future, unless the Government tackle the problem and immediately solve it. The man who deals with the upbuilding of this new merchant marine with its operation and in a general way with its development, that gentleman, I say, is Mr. Hanna, of the C.N.R. Now, Sir, I say that if the Government of this country want to be fair and deal honestly with the Canadian ratepayers, and if the Minister of Marine wants to be consistent, and to live up to his Liberal principles—as I have no doubt he should—act—I say that the hon. minister has but one thing to do and it is this: Let him dismiss Mr. Hanna and all those who in any way are connected with the C. N. R. Here are gentlemen who have fleeced the country, here are men who have bled white nearly each province of Canada; here are men who after building throughout the country railway lines in an extravagant and irrational way, have extorted from a too liberal and obliging Government millions which are now filling the coffers of promoters such as Mackenzie and Mann. The thieves must be cast out of the temple, whether that temple be the Government of Canada or the House of Commons. The Hon. Minister of Marine has an imperative duty to discharge: Let him take up his whip, like an honest man, and expel all the knaves from his department.

Is the Government warranted in giving away another $20,000,000, and in handing that money over to that man Hanna who has brought ruin to the Northern Canadian and extorted from the public treasury hunreds and hundreds of millions, the wherewithal to pay the debts of unscrupulous financiers.

One more remark and I am through. Formerly the city of Quebec was the centre of the shipbuilding industry in Canada. The hon. member from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who always gives proof of erudition and is anxious to be looked upon as a scholar by his colleagues, has just referred to a new shipbuilding policy. Let me tell my hon. friend that he came over to Canada rather too late and that had he come to this continent a little earlier he would know that the shipbuilding business was thriving in Canada in the early sixties and seventies, down to 1875, and this because of an imperative necessity, as civil war was waging in the United States of America, and the Americans were having a very large number of ships built in this country. Whether success is attained in shipbuilding or not, it does not depend upon the fiscal policy, but upon favourable opportunities.

Sir, my opinion on the whole shipbuilding policy is very simple, and in fact so simple that it should also be shared in by the hon. Minister of Marine. I stood in 1911 on the same ground as Sir Wilfrid Laurier did, and the hon. Minister of Marine also took the same stand. Now, in 1920, I stand for the same policy and the members of the Government seem to hold the same views. In connection with this policy, let the hon. Minister of Marine recall that he was a follower of Sir Wilfrid Laurier; let him be mindful of the principles which he then advocated, and so doing he will ever protect Canadian autonomy. Let him not forget the dangers that threatened our trade during the war, because of the fact that England wanted to take over all our Canadian ships and let him in the future see to it that England be mistress in her own house, so far as marine is concerned, and Canada mistress in her own home.

The CHAIRMAN: It is now six o'clock and I leave the chair.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the House rose at six o'clock we were considering Item 219, providing for the Government shipbuilding programme, in the Main Estimates for the year ending March 31, 1921. The item had been under consideration since three o'clock and had been fully discussed. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the resolution?

Mr. COPP: We are asked to vote the large sum of $20,000,000 to carry out the Government's shipbuilding programme, but we are not given a very lucid explanation of the reasons for that expenditure. We are greatly indebted to the minister for presenting to us the information he had in regard to the item, but I was somewhat disappointed and rather surprised when he said in answer to an hon. gentleman that he did not know whether the information he was giving was correct or not because it had not been prepared by him.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I might say to the hon. gentleman that every figure I gave this afternoon I prepared personally with the exception of the sterling cost of the ships.

Mr. COPP: I was not referring to the statement of my hon. friend but to his reply in answer to a question. Doubtless the minister's statement was correct in so far as it went; but it seems to me that in asking for such a large amount of money at any time, and particularly under present conditions, he should be prepared to give further and detailed explanations in regard to this item. The minister somewhat hurriedly gave a list of ships that had been built, and other details the effect of which it was difficult to grasp without a little study. I would like to know whether the contracts for these ships were let by public tender, and if so whether the lowest tenders were accepted. Or are the ships being built under force contract, with provision for a certain percentage of profit? These are matters of detail which the minister should place before the committee before we are asked to vote this large amount of money.

I do not intend to discuss the question of what should be a proper policy in the matter of shipbuilding. I am free to say that I am not in a position to know whether a policy of shipbuilding by the Government is the best thing for the country. Of course, I have my own opinion about it, and I suppose all other hon. members have theirs; though their opinions may be based upon more knowledge of the matter than I possess. But the advisability of building merchant vessels at the present time is very questionable. It is questionable whether the minister did the right thing when he went into the building of a merchant marine a year or two ago—at a time when the cost of construction was very greatly enhanced. The minister said this afternoon that notwithstanding the huge expenditures that had been made in the building of these vessels, the return as a result of operation was on the right side. But have the expenditures connected with the operation of these vessels been charged up to the proper accounts, or have they been charged up to the operation of the Canadian National railways? Has a portion of the salaries of the directors of the Canadian National Railway system been charged up to the earnings of the vessels whose operations my hon. friend says have paid a dividend? We cannot know that there has been a proper return on the expenditure made or that there has been a net profit on operation unless we know that these things have been properly charged against the operations of the different vessels. Generally speaking, having regard to the experience of the past, we cannot, in the operation of steamships by a Board of Management appointed by the Government, expect to meet with the greatest financial success. When my hon. friend gives a glowing account of the results which have been achieved through the operation of the Government vessels, he must realize that in the years to come freight rates will not be as excessively high as they are now, and that he is building his vessels at a time when costs and charges are at almost the highest possible point. I think it was the member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Bristol) who said—the minister himself also said it —that we could sell these vessels to-day at a profit. If he can dispose of them at a profit, I would suggest that he do so, for two reasons: First, the responsibility of financing the undertaking would be removed from the shoulders of this country; and, second, the chance of loss in operation would be done away with so far as the country is concerned. Besides, if we handed these vessels over to private interests, we would not then be interfering with or competing with private individuals who were prepared to go into the shipping business. If, therefore, my hon. friend can transfer these ships and rid the country of further responsibility in regard to them without subjecting the country to any loss it is my opinion that he should do so.

Mr. POWER: Is the Board of Management which has charge of the operation of these vessels a member of the Shipping Federation of Montreal?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I cannot make a positive statement, but I should judge that they would be. That, however, in no way binds them as to freight rates.

Mr. POWER: What are the functions of the Shipping Federation of Montreal?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am not familiar with the functions of that body, but I should judge that they would deal with pilotage matters, aids to navigation, harbour dues, allocation of berths and so on. But they have nothing whatever to do with the fixing of rates.

Mr. POWER: Will the minister say that the government-owned ships are competing with other lines running into Canadian ports?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Certainly.

Mr. POWER: Are the government-owned ships charging lower rates?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am not familiar with the rates charged by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine but naturally they would meet competition where necessary. I cannot say whether or not their rates are lower.

Mr. POWER: As I understand it, one of the principal reasons for the building and operation of this Canadian Merchant Marine was that we might be able to ship our products overseas at a lower rate. Unless the Canadian Merchant Marine by competition decreases the cost of transporting freight I hardly see that there is much reason for its existence now that the war is over. It is essential that the minister assure the House that by means of the merchant marine built by the country we shall be able to ship our products overseas at a much better rate than heretofore. If the minister will not answer in regard to this matter, he may answer me in regard to something else. Were any arrangements made with the British Admiralty regarding the taking over of Canadian Government ships during the war?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The British Minister of Shipping had no authority to take over ships of Canadian registry during the war without the consent of the Canadian Government. As to ships under British registry, he had the right to commandeer without consulting the Canadian Government.

Mr. POWER: Is it not a fact that tons of freight were lying on the wharves at Montreal and that we were unable to send it overseas because the British Admiralty had taken all space for freight going from Canadian ports during the latter days of the war?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: On ships under British register the British Minister of Shipping commandeered 70 per cent of the available cargo space. As regards ships under Canadian register, such as the Canadian Mercantile Marine, he had no such authority, and did not exercise any.

Mr. POWER: Was the available space on the Canadian Government Merchant Marine given one hundred per cent to individual shippers?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

Mr. POWER: None given over to British Admiralty purposes?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Not an ounce.

Mr. CAHILL: Could the minister tell us where he expects to get this amount of $20,000,000 from that he purposes spending on shipping?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If the hon. member will ask that question of my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), when the Budget is brought down, I am sure he will tell my hon. friend. In a general way we shall get it from the revenue of the country, and if that is not sufficient, I suppose, maybe, it will be necessary for the Government to depend on the banks. But I think that question should more properly be put to my colleague the Minister of Finance.

Mr. CAHILL: But the question is before us now to deal with as to where this money is to come from.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I can assure my hon. friend that we shall get the money.

Mr. CAHILL: This is a matter in which the Canadian people are interested. The time has come when the people of Canada are about tired of spending borrowed money for the promotion of the industries of this country. At the last session of Parliament we had the Minister of Finance borrowing money from the Canadian people in order to lend it to countries so that they could buy goods from this country with that money. Much of that money—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I regret very much to be obliged to call the hon. member to order, but I must remind him that the House is now sitting as a Committee of Supply and not as a Committee of Ways and Means. The finding of moneys for all purposes mentioned in the Estimates comes properly before the committee when it is sitting as a Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CAHILL: I just wanted to point out by way of illustration that we had been spending a great deal of money on various things for the promotion of the rich men's interests in this country, and this apparently is one of them. This is not only a question of where the money is to come from; it is a question of the policy of the Government. The very item itself states that it is to complete or to promote the Government shipbuilding programme. If the Government have a programme, it must necessarily follow that they have a programme for providing the money for this shipbuilding, and I am simply asking the Government how they purpose going on, if they intend to go on.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must again point out to the hon. member that the question of where the money will come from or how the money will be provided is not in order at the present time.

Mr. CAHILL: I just want to bring to the attention of the Government the absurdity of their going on spending money by the millions when they do not have it. It is necessary to make some reference to expenditure in order to bring out the point that I wish to illustrate. The Government are spending money on every hand by the millions—

An hon. MEMBER: By the hundreds of millions.

Mr. CAHILL: —by the hundreds of millions, and they state that this vote is to carry out a policy. What I wish to know is where this policy is to lead the country, where the people of Canada are coming to with this policy. We were told this afternoon by one of the supporters of this Government that we must go into the shipbuilding business now in order to provide traffic for the railways. Where is the thing to end. The hon. member who made that reference also stated that we must expect deficits which will come out of the pockets of the people of Canada. I merely want to know from the minister if there is any end to the ambitions of the Government to spend the money of the Canadian people for the benefit of the friends of the Government.

Mr. DUFF: The minister has been asked with regard to the amount which appears in the Estimates in connection with the shipbuilding programme. It seems very strange to me that a business man should ask his shareholders to approve an expenditure of $20,000,000, or of any amount, without knowing where the money is to come from when he asks for it. It seems to me that the first thing that we should know, whether it is in order or not, is where the money is coming from. No Minister of the Crown should come before this committee without being able to give the information as to where the money is to come from before he asks for it.

I should like to know from the minister how these vessels are chartered. The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) asked whether the freight rates were higher or lower than the ordinary dealers' freight rates. Are these vessels chartered through brokers or directly through the agents of the Mercantile Marine Corporation?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The vessels are not chartered at all. There is more freight offering both for the outward voyages and the inward voyages than the vessels are able to carry. There is no necessity to charter them in view of the large quantity of freight constantly offering.

Mr. COPP: Does the minister refer to Canadian freight or foreign?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Mostly Canadian.

Mr. DUFF: That is not an answer to my question. I do not care whether there is ten times as much freight offering as can be carried. The fact that a vessel carries freight means that it is chartered; that is, a merchant in Quebec, Montreal or Toronto must charter space in a vessel to carry freight; and I would like a direct answer to my question.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I thought I had made the matter clear to the hon. member who is a shipping man. The Canadian Government Mercantile Marine do not charter their vessels; they see to it that there is an abundance of freight for them. Their vessels are handled the same as the Canadian Pacific or the White Star or the Cunard handle their vessels. Vessels are not chartered through brokers at all. The freight is sent to whatever port the ship is going to sail from, by the Government railways or by some other railway, and the Canadian Government Mercantile Marine sees to it that the freight is there when the ship is ready to sail; but they certainly do not charter any of their vessels.

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. DUFF: The last answer is what I wanted. The vessels are chartered. The trouble is that the minister does not know what the word "charter" means. A vessel is chartered by John Brown of Montreal or John Jones of Toronto to carry 100 casks of rum from Montreal—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DUFF:—or flour or anything else. I am pleased at the sentiment that emanates from the other side. Last year I noticed that when the vote was about to be taken many members absented themselves because they did not want to vote for prohibition. I am glad to know from the minister that these vessels are chartered without commissions being paid. Do these vessels pay a business profits tax to the Government? Every private ship owner in the country has to pay part of his profits to the Receiver General under what is known as a business profits tax or a tax on incomes received from vessels. Do these ships belonging to the Government pay this business profits tax?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am afraid the hon. member will have to ask my colleague the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid). The railways are under the Minister of Railways, and the ships are also managed by Mr. Hanna and his Board of Directors. Just what taxes they pay, I do not know.

Mr. DUFF: I move that the committee rise and report progress, so that we can get this information from the Minister of Railways.

Motion negatived.

Mr. BUTTS: The shipping question is one of very considerable importance to our part of the country. There is hardly a ton of soft coal that goes into the city of Montreal that does not come in one of our ships from Sydney. There is not a single ton of iron ore that goes into that city that does not come from Sydney or from our sister colony, Newfoundland, of which my hon. friend from Lunenburg is a native. I know my hon. friend is proud that from the ancient colony of Newfoundland and from the furnaces in my county comes the cheapest iron that is produced in the world. I will not say steel, but I repeat, we can produce pig iron more cheaply than any other part of the world.

Now I want to pay a little attention to my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark). We have heard his theories so often. They are the theories that directed my little infantile legs from the cradle, but I have always found that a man who preached free trade was a protectionist in practice. I wish I could pay my hon. friend the compliment of saying that he was sincere both in theory and practice on either free trade or protection; but I fear I cannot do it. He was a supporter for fifteen years of a Government that preached free trade but practised protection. Is not that true?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: The fifteen years began in 1896. I only came to Canada in 1902. My hon. friend surely won't hold me responsible for what happened in the six years before I came. I go one step further and point out to my hon. friend that he ought to hold it as an extenuating circumstance that the party got into thoroughly bad lines before I joined it, and I was misled by the name Liberal into thinking the party really was.

Mr. BUTTS: I am most pleased to receive my hon. friend's explanation. I invite him over. We will give him a seat here. Now for a moment we are going to lock horns seriously. My hon. friend would make it appear to this House that England became predominant in shipping during the days of free trade over there. Recalling the history I read when a boy, was it not in the war between England and France when England captured Louisburg and became master of all the inland waters of Canada that England acquired her supremacy at sea, and from that time France's erstwhile predominance began to wane? As my hon. friend from West Peterboro (Mr. Burnham) pointed out this afternoon, the Americans said: We can make more money out of other business, so we will hire our ships from England. Let me say this: It is within my own lifetime, and I am not the oldest man in this House, when the iron ore areas of Newfoundland were first discovered by Graham Fraser, the late president of the Nova Scotia Steel Company—a discovery which led to our beating the whole world, as we can to-day, at the smelting of ore from the coast of Newfoundland up there about Tilt Cove. We produce pig iron to-day more cheaply at Sydney harbour than in any part of this rotund globe. Coming now to free trade, it is a subject on which the people of Canada are fed up.

There are to-day in Canada over forty thousand miles of railroad and canals that have cost about $150,000,000; and we take pride in our court houses, custom houses, post offices, and other public buildings. Did any principle of free trade enter into their construction? Were they not rather built under the aegis of a protective tariff. When hon. gentlemen who talk so much about free trade rise to speak in this House, I sometimes—if the decorum of this Chamber will countenance the expression—I sometimes admire their gall. I will ask these free traders this question: Did they ever know a single man in this House of Commons of Canada who was sincere enough in his convictions to assume the Premiership of this Dominion and put into force a free trade policy? No; they do not. I am going to follow my hon. friend from Red Deer just a little further. Let me inform that hon. gentleman that I am not an Englishman; I am not an Irishman; I am not a Scotsman; I am a Canadian.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BUTTS: I repeat, I am a Canadian. And when I heard this afternoon the remarks of my hon. friend in regard to navigation and shipping I confess I was somewhat surprised at the meagre extent of his knowledge of the subject. The British Isles, that were almost lost in the German ocean, were, he said, the centre of control and the seat of knowledge in regard to the science of shipping. Well, now, Mr. Chairman, Balboa, who found the route of the Panama Canal, was not a native of the British Isles, nor did Columbus, the discoverer of America, have the honour to claim that spot as his home; and Cabot who explored the coast of North America was not, as far as I am aware, a native of the British Isles. I give Great Britain credit for being the greatest colonizer that the world has ever known, but she cannot be claimed to have been the greatest explorer. The man who wrecked the Empress of Ireland in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, I may say, hailed from those little islands in the German ocean. You never heard of a Nova Scotian ever having made such a mistake in navigation. Now I do not intend to pursue my hon. friend any further, for I see quite well that he works on dreams and theories and not on practical knowledge. Let us get away from bickering and get down to solid facts.

An hon. MEMBER: A good idea.

Mr. BUTTS: Yes, certainly, a good idea; and as a matter of fact, let me say right now that there is in the county I represent a steel works that is capable of producing pig iron cheaper than any other city in the world. This Government, and particularly the Minister of Marine, has entered into a contract with the company through which there has been established a very large steel plate mill, the only ship plate mill in any place from the Gulf of Mexico to the Arctic sea, with the exception of the "Smoky City" of the United States. We are able to produce there an ample supply of plates, as has been demonstrated within a very few weeks, and are likely to be able to supply the entire Dominion as well as a large portion of the United Kingdom, and may possibly be called upon even by Pittsburgh for the supply of plates. This is something that was not dreamed of ten years ago. Ten years ago in my county people were wondering how it was possible for them to send coal up the St. Lawrence to compete with the coal mines of the United States. Previous to the election of 1911 the city of Montreal entered into a contract with a United States company for bituminous coal. They were to be supplied with 50,000 tons of coal for all the public works of Montreal at a price thirty-one cents below the tender of the Dominion Coal Company, and that notwithstanding the fact that at that time the Dominion Coal Company and all Canadian coal companies had an advantage of fifty-four cents a ton. Under conditions of that kind it is rather difficult to understand why we people in the East of Canada are not a little bit prejudiced against the men in the West. We have very little in common with them. Do they buy our coal? When they bought our steel we gave it to them cheaper than they could buy it in England. We sent our steel rails around Cape Horn and sold them at a very cheap rate in Prince Rupert. These are facts. Now then, there is one other thing: I remember when I was a young fellow down in Nova Scotia the old men, and the old women too,—for I sometimes associated with the ladies—told me of the enormous cost of flour during the days of the Franco-Prussian war in 1870-1-2. They were paying $14 a barrel for flour. They thought it was something enormous. This brings me back to my farmer friends down there who talk to us so very, very much about profiteering. I am going to make this statement, that there is no class in this Dominion of Canada that are greater profiteers than the farmers.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would just like to call the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that we are still discussing the Government's shipbuilding programme.

Mr. BUTTS: Mr. Chairman, I was going to say that your remarks were so jocular—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BUTTS: If you allow me to proceed I will promise that my brevity will really amount to wit. I will let my friends the farmers down there go—I can have a slap at them some other time—and I will return to the subject of shipping which is under debate at present. Perhaps I will return to my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark). He talked this afternoon about shipping. My hon. friend from Red Deer does not know all about shipping. The biggest wooden ship that was ever floated on salt water was built right down in Nova Scotia in the county of Yarmouth.

Mr. M. CLARK: Under a low tariff.

Mr. BUTTS: Well now, let us see whether it was in the time of low tariff or not.

Mr. M. CLARK: When was it?

Mr. BUTTS: She was built somewhere about 1876 or 1877 in the county of Yarmouth.

Mr. M. CLARK: Before the National Policy, or you never could have built it.

Mr. BUTTS: There was never a very low tariff in Nova Scotia. It was always so high, so much above your English tariff, that they were able to build bigger wooden ships than you ever built in England. You talk about your free trade or protection, what has it to do with these lines of trade? What is the use of your having built in the county of Yarmouth the biggest wooden ship that was ever floated if she cannot connect with railway lines? Your railway and canal lines were built under protection. The policy of the Minister of Marine has my entire sympathy in every respect; only, as I told him the other evening, I would like him to call into consultation a few experts and drive his good policy just a little bit farther.

Mr. POWER: Will the minister give us some information with reference to the wreck of the "Canadian Spinner."

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The "Canadian Recruit."

Mr. POWER: It left Quebec late in the autumn of last year and was wrecked. I understand the wreck has been ascribed to the lack of proper ice breakers to escort this boat down the St. Lawrence. If we expend large sums of money on vessels of this kind we ought at least to take proper precautions to see that they manage to get to sea in safety.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: My hon. friend is aware that this occurrence took place very late in the season—in the month of December—when the most powerful icebreaker we had, the "Montcalm" was down around the Straits of Belle Isle trying to reach the lighthouse keepers. I have in my Estimates, when we come to it, an item of $2,000,000 for a very much larger and more powerful ice breaker than the "Montcalm." If we had had such an ice breaker as I propose—we had one but sold it during the war to Russia—there would have been no trouble experienced in relieving the "Canadian Recruit" and also the "Canadian Spinner." When we take up the ice breaker item I shall be very glad to say more in so far as the "Recruit" is concerned. I am happy to say that she is not badly damaged and I do not think there will be much difficulty in having her salvaged when the weather permits.

Mr. POWERS: Has she been abandoned to the underwriters?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: She has been abandoned to the underwriters.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What was the cost of that ship?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It was $817,000.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Was she fully insured?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Fully insured.

Mr. POWER: Is there any information to be given to the committee with reference to the rather unfortunate cruise of the "Canadian Pioneer" from Pictou?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The "Canadian Sealer."

Mr. POWER: —the cruise of the "Canadian Sealer" from Pictou to the Magdalen Islands? Is there any explanation why this vessel did not reach the Islands where, I understand, the inhabitants were in dire need of provisions and were almost on the verge of starvation?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The only explanation I can give is that owing to the very severe weather and the thickness of the ice it was quite impossible for the "Sealer" to reach the Magdalen Islands. Even the icebreaker "Montcalm" was stuck a month in the ice before she could reach the Magdalen Islands. We were using every endeavour within our power to get provisions to those islands. We also tried to reach the islands with the "Sealer" but the ice was too thick. Eventually the "Montcalm" got through.

Mr. POWER: It seems to me rather bad management on the part of the Canadian Mercantile Marine to have allowed a vessel —which I presume was not an icebreaker and therefore not fitted for a voyage in the depth of winter—to attempt such a trip. There is no doubt whatsoever that in so doing a great risk was being taken, and it seems to me that the Board of Management should have obtained expert advice on the subject before sending a ship which was liable to be damaged on such a dangerous expedition. I think the minister owes it to the people on the Magdalen Islands, who are the parties interested, to explain just on whose advice this ship was sent and why a boat better fitted for the journey was not selected.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I wish at once to relieve the Canadian Mercantile Marine of the onus of sending the "Sealer" to the Magdalen Islands. The "Sealer" had not been turned over to the Canadian Government and it was my own department that forced her to go there. The people of the Magdalen Islands were on the verge of starvation; our icebreaker "Montcalm" was not available at that time; and the situation was so serious that the Government were considering the advisability of sending provisions by airship if they could not be conveyed in any other way. Therefore I think hon. gentlemen will agree that the Government were justified in taking the risk they did. I am glad to say the ship was not damaged, but it was our responsibility and our duty to load the vessel with provisions and try to get her to the Magdalen Islands if it was at all possible.

Mr. PARENT: In view of the statement made by the minister to the effect that the Magdalen Islands were last season without shipping communication it is opportune for the members from the Quebec district to inquire why it is, in view of the Government having such a fleet at its disposal, the Magdalen Islands and Gaspé have been so sadly neglected in the past. Looking at the fleet of ships under Government control I find that their routes are all to places beyond Canada. I notice that those routes are from St. John to London, St. John to the West Indies, St. John to Liverpool, Halifax to the West Indies and so on; but I fail to see any route, for example, from Quebec to the Magdalen Islands or to Gaspé, where it would be clearly a case of serving the interests and meeting the necessities of our own people—and the minister himself said that the people of the Magdalen Islands were last season threatened with starvation. If the construction and maintenance of this fleet of steamships is, first, last and all the time, a Canadian enterprise, I would submit that the first thing to do would be to meet the necessities of our own people and not to allow them to starve, or to come within measurable distance of it. I understand that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has already granted subsidies to a certain company with a view to establishing a steamship service between the Magdalen Islands and to Gaspé, but no service is yet forthcoming. A reference to an answer given here by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) a few days ago will disclose the fact that the St. Lawrence Trading Company has received a large subsidy for such a service, but the service has never been installed. Many requests have been made to the Government for an improvement in the means of communication with that part of our coast but so far without success. If there is any excuse for this failure to provide much needed facilities it is that the Government is surrounded always by the same big interests which it desires to nourish and protect. The other day we had the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) coming to this House and giving advice to the Government. The only thing he told them was to carry on—that is carry on in the spending of money lavishly in the interest of the people whom the Government wants to protect. In the meantime Canadian ships are going all over the world while our own people are threatened with starvation. It seems to me, Sir, it is time we looked a little more closely after Canadian interests.

The other day I read in the Ottawa Citizen a speech by Mr. Hanna in which he said, referring to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, that we were adopting a shipping policy of our own, and were going to manage ships ourselves. "But," he said, "We want the politicians not to interfere with what we are doing." Well, Sir, that is very good, but no matter what Mr. Hanna may say, he will never prevent me from pointing out any wrong that I may see in the Government's administration. If there is one thing that a member from the city of Quebec cannot forget, when a programme of this sort is up for consideration it is the fact Quebec, although one of the best ports in Canada, has, during the term of the present Government, been deliberately and wilfully ignored.

Mr. Chairman, if this merchant marine of ours is going to be operated in connection with the Canadian Government Railways was it not the main idea of that railway system that the grain from the Canadian West should be shipped through Canadian ports, and especially through the port of Quebec. And yet I fail to see in the routes laid down provision made for a single vessel to load grain at Quebec, grain from the Canadian West intended for foreign markets.

The member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp) has asked some very pertinent questions. He has asked why these contracts for ships should have been granted to certain firms, whether tenders were called for, and whether in each case the contract was awarded to the lowest tenderer. I am informed that most of these contracts have been given to the same people. We should have information with regard to that, so that we may know whether there is competition in that line of construction. It would be interesting to know also what is the capital of each of these companies which are building Government steamers. We are told that most of them have hardly any capital subscribed, or, if any, that it is very small, and that practically speaking none of these people are taking any risks in connection with the building of the vessels. All this information we should have; it is only fair that questions of this kind which were put by my hon. friend (Mr. Copp) should be answered.

On the Order Paper appears a notice of motion in the name of the member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) asking for a copy of certain correspondence between the Prime Minister and J. T. Ross, president of the Quebec Board of Trade concerning the intention of the Government to build in Canada a number of 15,000-ton passenger steamships for the Canadian service; also a notice of motion asking for a copy of a letter said to have been signed by twenty-two senators and members of the House of Commons representing the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, addressed to the Prime Minister, recommending the shipment of grain by rail via Quebec; also a copy of the answer to such letter, as well as the letters sent by J. T. Ross to the Minister of Railways in January and February, 1920, concerning the export of wheat via Quebec. It may seem that there is no connection between these subjects and the item under consideration, but there is a connection. If the merchant marine is to be operated in connection with the Canadian National Railway system and the minister wants to obtain the support of the whole community he should not forget the best ports of this country, especially the port of Quebec.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: With regard to communication with the Magdalen Islands, I may say that the steamer "Lady Evelyn," owned by a private company and subsidized by the Government, was on that route, but, having become disabled about the month of November, was unable to continue her regular sailings. It would not be advisable for the Government to enter into competition with a private concern that was enjoying a subsidy from the Dominion Treasury, provided they were taking proper care of the passengers and freight, and I understand that they were. The "Lady Evelyn" will be repaired and again placed on that route, but if she is not able to carry on the service I shall be very glad to bring the matter to the attention of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. The hon. member is quite right when he says that these ships are built primarily for the use of Canada and Canadians and that we must serve our home interests before we serve our export interests abroad.

As to the other question raised by my hon. friend and also by the member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp), I have already given the information in answer to an inquiry made this afternoon by the member for Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Archambault), but I shall be only too happy to give it again. I stated this afternoon that when the Government inaugurated their shipbuilding programme, early in 1918, the policy was to keep the Canadian steel shipbuilding yards fully occupied and to provide the tonnage that the Government desired to have. We did not call for public tenders because the business could not be handled in that way. One firm, for instance, in order to be glutted with business, might quote a price a shade lower than that quoted by another firm, and we would not have been able evenly to distribute the business. The greatest care, however, was exercised in obtaining prices from the different yards. If we wanted a ship of 5,000 or 8,000 tons we asked the yards that were capable of turning out ships of that size what their prices were. We did not accept always the price that was quoted us; in many cases we carried on negotiations for weeks before the price was finally arranged that was satisfactory to the Government. We had a check on the price through the experts in the Marine Department who figured out what the cost of a ship should be; and we had also the competitive bids from the various yards. Moreover, we knew what it would cost to build similar ships in the United Kingdom. If hon. members will ask the shipyards they will be told that we did not let them off very easily. In fact, the shipbuilders in British Columbia felt that their prices were being so much beaten down that they appealed to the members and did everything they could to get us to deal more liberally with them. But I and the officers associated with me did the best we could to get the very best prices. In comparison with what other countries have done, I do not think that we need be ashamed of the contract prices that were arrived at.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Of the sixty-three contracts which have been or are to be awarded, the distribution is among some fourteen different firms and the contemplated total expenditure is something like $74,000,000, $50,000,000 has already been spent, and we are asking now for an additional $20,000,000. It is correct, is it not, that no tenders have been called for and that all these contracts have been awarded by Order in Council.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The contracts were awarded by Order in Council after I as responsible minister had seen that the prices were fair and right. The Government purchased just as a private corporation would purchase.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But so far as these fourteen companies were concerned, no tenders were called for?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No tenders. There were, I think, seventeen companies.

Mr. PARENT: Were any offers made for the construction of ships larger than those now being built by the Government,— for ships of 15,000 instead of 4,000 or 5,000 tons?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am not aware of any such proposal.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are further contracts to be awarded, or have all contracts been awarded?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No further contracts.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I endorse every word spoken by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Parent) a few moments ago. It is not fair that we should vote such a huge amount of money to be expended for the purpose of carrying the trade of Canada outside of Canada and expanding it abroad if we leave our provinces, and especially the part of our country which is most in need of the services of navigation, without any help at all. The hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Parent) has just referred to the Magdalen islands and the coast of Gaspé. I would call the attention of the minister to the north shore of the St. Lawrence below Quebec, the district which lies between Murray bay and Tadoussac, and as far as the Labrador coast. Last year I succeeded in obtaining from the minister the assurance that the steamer Champlain would be taken from her course and sent to ply between Murray bay and Tadoussac. This went on very well for a certain number of months until last January, when tenders were called for the sale of the boat. Recently, when I put a question in the House, the minister told me that there was no necessity for replacing the ship which was practically sold. I must protest against such an answer. There is a necessity for having a regular boat service from Murray bay down the river St. Lawrence all the time, and especially between the months of October and May. I am told that there is a little story told about this ship, the Champlain. Tenders were called, a certain number of tenders were received, and one was accepted. The reason why the sale was not proceeded with, I am informed, was that some friends of the Government submitted a tender which was to be accepted, but they could not finance the enterprise and pay for the ship. If we are going to vote such a huge amount as $20,000,000 for ships, we should see to it that $500,000 or $600,000, or whatever may be necessary, is applied for building a boat to carry on the service, which is very necessary, along the coast between Murray bay and Tadoussac, and as far as Labrador.

There is another point. I was surprised this afternoon to hear the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) defending the policy of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. This hon. gentleman, everybody knows, was connected for years past with a number of shipping companies, the Richelieu and Ontario, the Canada Steamship lines, and now he is one of the promoters of the Dominion Steamship Line, the Nova Scotia Steamship Line, and he is behind some of the big mergers that are going to be made of all the steel industries of this country, in which English capital is interested. He is still a director of the Dominion Steamships and the Canada Steamship Company, and a few weeks ago, just at the opening of this Parliament, I saw in the corridors no less a gentleman than Colonel Grant Morden who was at the back of the merger of the Canada Steamship Line, who, I am told, with Sir Newton Moore and other prominent men who came from Australia to this country especially for the purpose of organizing this huge steel merger, came here to get an assurance from the minister and the Government that this would go through in order that their interests would be safeguarded. This is the story, and I know it because some people have told me so, and they are just as reliable people as the minister.

I would ask the Minister of Marine for a few moments to get away from those big amounts of money and see that the little affairs of his department are better attended to. I am making no special charge, but I wish to draw to the attention of the minister that in the administration of his department there are many little details which were better looked after formerly, but which since this big policy of shipbuilding has been inaugurated, have been absolutely ignored. For instance,—while this may not be quite relevant to the question under discussion, I want to give an example,—the officers and employees of the steamer Champlain were to be given uniforms by the Minister of Marine, an amount was voted in the Estimates and the uniforms were to have been made. A few weeks ago I received some letters that the men have not yet got their uniforms. When we have the minister juggling with millions every day, the small details are not attended to, and the poor people, the officers and other employees of the departments and also the people who live along the north shore of the river St. Lawrence, suffer.

Mr. J. D. REID: I did not intend taking part in this debate, and would not have done so had it not been that I understood first that when I was in my room, having been called out of the house, a question was put that I should have been here to answer, and second in connection with this department—

Mr. DUFF: I should like to correct the minister, I did not say that the minister should have been here. The Minister of Marine said that the question was one which the Minister of Railways could answer.

Mr. J. D. REID: Perhaps I should have said that the minister having stated that I was not in the house, the hon. member moved that the committee rise until I should be present. The only objection I could raise to this could be this. If the hon. member had waited a few minutes and had sent to my room, I would have been here in a minute to give the answer to which he was entitled.

Mr. DUFF: It was not my place to send for the minister.

Mr. REID: I agree with the hon. member; perhaps it was not. But I might also add this, that if the hon. member had waited for a few minutes he would have had opportunity to receive an answer as I had intended to return shortly. Another reason is that the Canadian National railways have been brought into this discussion. I understand that the hon. member's question was: Do the Canadian steamships pay a business profits tax? I might answer the question in this way. These ships have not been in operation long enough for the question of the tax to come before the department. The business tax would be for the present year as the ships operated for only part of last year. The hon. member knows that the Canadian Northern railway is paying taxes. These ships are being built and put in the name of a private corporation; they will be operated in the same manner and will be in the same position as ships owned by an opposing company, for instance, the Canadian Pacific Company, and any taxes that a private company will be called upon to pay by the Finance Department, this steamship company will also be called upon to pay as if it were a private company. I think that answers the question of the hon. member. Another point that was raised was this. I understand that the leader of the Opposition and those who sit behind him take the position that these ships, instead of being operated, should be sold.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I expressed no opinion whatever on that point.

Mr. J. D. REID: I understand that some members of the Opposition—

Mr. DUFF: I did.

Mr. J. D. REID: It does not include all the Opposition. As I understand it, the leader of the Opposition takes one position and other hon. members opposite take another.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. REID: Well, the leader of the Opposition, if I am mis-stating his opinion, can state so now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I expressed no opinion one way or the other.

Mr. J. D. REID: This is a very important question, and I should like the leader of the Opposition to express his opinion upon it. At all events, it appears that some hon. gentlemen opposite are hostile to the Government owning and operating ships in connection with the Canadian National Railway system.

Mr. DUFF: Hear, hear.

Mr. J. D. REID: Why this hostility? Is it for the purpose of crippling the Canadian National Railway system, which will comprise some 22,000 miles of railway? Do I understand that the hon. gentleman expects the Dominion Government to operate that system without vessels on both oceans?

Mr. DUFF: Certainly.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member wants us to operate the system without any vessels?

Mr. DUFF: Absolutely.

Mr. J. D. REID: Well, my opinion is that if we do not have vessels to operate in connection with the system, which would carry the products of the West to European countries, so that we will have control over rates from the point of origin to destination, we cannot operate the Canadian National Railway system successfully. If I understand the policy which the hon. member is advocating, it is that we should send the products of the West to Montreal to be carried from there by Canadian Pacific steamships, or vessels of some other line, whose rates would be controlled by an opposition company, to the injury of the National system.

Mr. CANNON: What about Portland?

Mr. J. D. REID: If my hon. friend will have patience, I will deal with Portland and other ports in a moment. I say that we cannot operate the National system successfully in competition with the great Canadian Pacific railway unless we have vessels working in conjunction with the railway.

Mr. COPP: Does that 22,000 miles include the Grand Trunk?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Northern, and all Government lines. We have entered into an agreement with respect to the Grand Trunk which will be brought into force within a few days, so why should I not include the Grand Trunk in the mileage?

Mr. COPP: I am not objecting; I simply wanted the facts.

Mr. CANNON: Why not take over the Canadian Pacific road?

Mr. McMASTER: It is solvent.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member for Quebec West finds fault with this Government for having done nothing, as he says, for the city of Quebec. Let me say to him that since Sir Robert Borden formed his Government in 1911, we have spent from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000 on the city of Quebec, whereas in the fifteen years previous, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in power, less than $3,000,000 was spent on that city. So this Government has done pretty well, so far as the city of Quebec is concerned. My hon. friend who states that we have done nothing for the city of Quebec knows that we have built a 2,000,000-bushel elevator there; we have built the St. Malo shops, and have spent altogether some $25,000,000 on the city. We have made it at least equal to any other port so far as facilities are concerned. My hon. friend states that the city of Quebec is the terminal of the Transcontinental railway. I had always understood that Halifax and St. John were the terminals. I cannot for the life of me understand why some hon. gentlemen opposite are so hostile to anything the Government may undertake for the purpose of putting the Canadian National Railway system in a position where it can compete with the great Canadian Pacific railway.

My hon. friend said that he had a right to criticise the administration of Mr. Hanna. Of course he has that right. The only point I wish to make is that in justice to Mr. Hanna and the management of the system I hope the criticism will be fair and honest, and not made with the object of trying to injure the railway, or discouraging the management in such a way as to affect the operation of the system.

It seems to me that some hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to discourage the shipbuilding industry in this country. No one would regret it more than I, if by the criticism that is being offered in this House, and which will go forth to the country, the shipbuilding industry in this country should cease. It employs some 50,000 men, I believe.

Mr. DUFF: About 23,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: Well then, 23,000. The amount of money that is expended in wages in this industry is very large. Furthermore, every article that goes into the vessels that we are building is made in Canada from our natural resources. Even the ship plates are made in this country. It seems to me that under a policy of this kind which keeps the money spent on the industry in this country, the shipbuilding industry, should be supported, and I for one am willing to do my part in encouraging the industry. Like other industries, it is for the advantage of Canada. The ships that we have built have done more to advertise Canada in certain countries, and to bring us trade, than has been done for many years past. Most of our ships so far have been running to South America and the West Indies, with which formerly we had very little trade. They have brought us closer together and have brought us trade, and will do more in that direction in the future. The same results will follow in other parts of the world when we get our shipbuilding programme completed. I for one urge upon every hon. member the vital importance of the national control of these ships in order that we may be able to compete with the great Canadian Pacific railway in the matter of freight charges on Canadian products, and be in a position to carry produce from the point of shipment to destination at cheaper rates than can be quoted by our great competitor. If we have vessels that can be operated in connection with our railways, with the advent of the time—which I do not believe is far distant—when we can make both ends meet in the working of the railway system, we shall have solved the great problem of freight rates on the ocean, because we shall then be able to ship products from the place of production to its destination at probably a very much lower rate on the Atlantic than would be offered by our competitors if they had the practical control of the traffic from our Canadian ports.

Mr. CANNON: I asked the minister a question in regard to the port of Portland and he said he would reply in a minute. I should like his answer.

Mr. J. D. REID: What was the question?

Mr. CANNON: The minister told us that the merchant marine was designed to encourage the shipping of Canadian goods through Canadian ports, and my question is, how can the Government reconcile that policy with the policy advocated last year when the Grand Trunk Bill was under consideration, of keeping Portland and the improvements in Portland, and spending money there, as a terminal?

Mr. J. D. REID: Before we took over the Grand Trunk railway we had no control of the traffic over that road, but the position I take as Minister of Railways is that the products of this country should go by way of Montreal, Quebec, St. John and Halifax so long as we have our boats to take them. The hon. member simply wishes to give the public the impression that now that we have taken over the Grand Trunk we are going to send everything through Portland. That is not the policy of the Government, and I do not believe the people would tolerate any effort to ship traffic away from our own Canadian ports.

Mr. CANNON: If the policy of the Government is as the minister states, why should the Government expropriate the American section of the Grand Trunk leading to Portland?

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. gentleman knows a great deal more than I do. I did not understand that the Government had so far taken any proceedings under the agreement, because this road has not been handed over to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. How, therefore, can we take any action in the matter of expropriation?

Mr. CANNON: I should not like the minister to leave the House under an impression which I am loath to characterize as intentionally incorrect. Last year when the Grand Trunk debate was on the minister, as a railway expert, vouchsafed his help to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) who sometimes received that help with pleasure, and at other times, I venture to say, with mingled feelings. Last session the Minister of Railways often came into the House, as he has done tonight, with the avowed intention of throwing some light on the matter in order that we might understand it as perfectly as he thinks he understands it himself. He said repeatedly last year—and my memory is sound in this regard—that the section of the Grand Trunk on American soil was highly important because it led to the port of Portland. This year, however, when we have tabled in this House the agreement between the Government and the Grand Trunk, the minister tells us that he has no official knowledge of the proceedings taken by the Government in the matter of expropriation. I can only say that if the minister desires to retain his reputation as a railway expert and be taken seriously by the people of the country and the members of this House, it is eminently desirable that his speeches should be more studied. Proceedings are taken, the papers mention it, every member in the House is conversant with the subject, and people generally are aware of it; and the minister knows nothing about it he is the only person who is still in ignorance. This Government, which has diverted Canadian trade towards Portland, is composed of men who, when the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme was before the House, opposed it because they were not in favour of an altogether Canadian railway through Canada, but preferred at that time, as they prefer to-day, that only part of the railroad should be on Canadian soil; and they would rather give trade to the Yankees than to Quebec. The minister says that the Borden Government did more since the year 1911 for the province of Quebec than the Laurier Administration achieved during fifteen years. He mentioned the enormous sum of $25,000,000 spent in the city of Quebec. Now, how was that sum spent? Or, to be more precise, to be more in keeping with the methods generally adopted by this Government, I should ask, where was this money squandered? The Minister of Railways mentioned a grain elevator. I know that unfortunately, when he comes to our city, he remains only a few hours on his way to Saguenay, where he fishes trout or salmon; and the next time the hon. gentleman visits Quebec I invite him to call upon me and I shall be delighted to show him around the harbour. I will show him that famous grain elevator of which he has boasted so profusely. The shell of the elevator is there, but it is empty. There is no grain in it, and there never was; and, if this Government is retained in power, there never will be.

My hon. friend also mentioned another bit of construction work on which he said millions had been spent, the workshops in St. Malo. Has the minister developed of late a sense of humour? Is it his desire to laugh at the population of Quebec and their representatives in this House? We know what the St. Malo workshops are to-day. They were to be the greatest workshops in Canada, according to the plans laid down by the Laurier Government. But this Government, so far as those workshops are concerned, has pursued the same policy it has followed in connection with everything else, and that is to belittle the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thinking that it was given to small men to render as small as themselves a big statesman such as Sir Wilfrid Laurier was. The works are there, the minister can come on one of his trips to Quebec and we will then find if he has any excuses to make about the millions spent in Quebec for building shops. Where were the millions spent? The millions were spent in Levis where the money was given to the friends of the Government to buy fields, property and lots so that the friends of the Government would make some money.

The CHAIRMAN: I must also draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that we are discussing the amount required for the construction of vessels and the carrying out of the Government's shipbuilding programme. I did not interrupt the hon. member when he was answering the remarks made by the minister concerning money spent in the city of Quebec, but when he talks about there being scandals at Levis and elsewhere he is certainly far away from the question.

Mr. CANNON: I bow to your decision, Mr. Chairman. I think we have enough scandals in our own city without crossing the river and going over to Levis. I shall confine myself to Quebec. Millions, said the minister, have been spent in Quebec. A few months ago some western members came to our city, and in company with several of my colleagues I took 10 p.m. the western members around the city and showed them what I thought were the points of interest. We came, on a street called St. Paul street, to a barn, a shed, a shack, half falling into ruins. One of the hon. members from the west—if I am not mistaken it was the hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. MacNutt)—asked me what that was. I said: "That is the terminal station of the Canadian National railways in the city of Quebec." I will show where the minister has spent other millions in the city of Quebec. Right under the Dufferin Terrace, to which thousands of visitors come every summer to admire the magnificent scenery of the St. Lawrence and the Laurentian mountains, at their very feet this Government has erected a building which is a disgrace, an eyesore to every one accustomed to view things which are not ugly. It is a match box. That match box has been erected by this munificent Borden Government, which has spent millions of dollars according to the Minister of Railways. The city of Quebec gave them a magnificent property worth over $100,000 and in return this Government, to show their good faith, to show the interest they had in our city and district, erected a building worth about $25,000 which resembled more a match box than any railway station I ever looked at. The Minister of Railways will tell us that the city of Quebec is being treated better than she was ever treated under the Laurier Government. We had a line direct from Montreal to Quebec run by the Canadian Northern railway—a short line, beautifully located and running along the shore of the St. Lawrence. When the Minister of Railways took charge of the Canadian Northern this line, where there had been a slight landslide, was never repaired and although the line cost millions of dollars it is not even put into use. If a man wants to leave Quebec to go to Montreal, using what was formerly the Canadian Northern railway line, it is a trip that takes twelve hours. What about competing with the Canadian Pacific? The minister tells us that the only desire he has in his heart—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must call the attention of the hon. member again to the fact that we are discussing the Government shipbuilding programme and the item of $20,000,000 to be voted therefor. I am sure the hon. member himself will realize that the competition of the Canadian National railways with the Canadian Pacific between Montreal and Quebec is not included in that item.

Mr. CANNON: He mentioned it; that was part of his argument.

The CHAIRMAN: Even if the minister did mention it I rule that it is out of order.

Mr. CANNON: Why did you not so rule before?

The CHAIRMAN: Because I hoped the hon. gentleman would come back to the subject in the course of his lengthy remarks.

Mr. CANNON: When the Minister of Railways spoke a moment ago his main argument was that ships are necessary to run our Canadian railways and that he wishes to have shipping lines as well as railway lines to compete with the Canadian Pacific. The policy of the Government, and especially the policy of the Minister of Railways, is in flagrant contradiction to the argument brought forward by him to-night in the House of Commons at least as far as the city of Quebec is concerned. Establishing lines of railways to compete with the Canadian Pacific. As I said, from Montreal to Quebec, it takes twelve hours on the Canadian Northern while it takes five on the Canadian Pacific. Not only that but the Canadian Northern line in the city of Quebec does not even touch the waterfront. It may be that our railway expert, the minister, wishes to complete his magnificent scheme for the development of Canada by introducing a third branch into his department, that of aeroplanes, but unless aeroplanes were introduced in the city of Quebec my hon. friend, coming in his private car, would not be able to reach the waterfront on this line. Quebec has been badly treated by this Government. Has Quebec been badly treated on account of her attitude towards this Government? I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. My hon. friend must remember that we are not here to discuss the treatment given to the city of Quebec by the present Government. We are discussing the shipbuilding programme of the Government. He must, according to the rule, remain strictly within the item of discussion.

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to discuss how badly Quebec has been treated but I wish to underline the remarks made by the minister as to the magnificent treatment given to Quebec by the Government. Now a shipping policy is being considered. What will the Government do for the city of Quebec as regards shipping? Can we expect more in the future than we have had in the past? As I have said many times in this House we have lots of confidence in the management of shipping under the very able direction of the Minister of Marine. He does not claim that he is a marine expert as my hon. friend (Mr. J. D. Reid) claims to be a railway expert. The Minister of Marine is modest. He has not like the Minister of Railways been a minister for years. He has not yet forgotten his modesty. He has not, perhaps, ceased long enough to be a Liberal and has not become like the Minister of Railways a thorough Tory, and here let me say that I never met a thorough Tory who was modest, either in his person or in his demands.

I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to one last point, and I hope that in doing so I will be in order. I do not think that he is much better acquainted with the Canadian Northern railway crowd than the Minister of Marine. The latter is starting a new experiment. I would ask the Minister of Railways to be charitable enough to give pointers and information to our less informed Minister of Marine. The Minister of Railways has dealt with Mackenzie and Mann for over six years. He knows Mr. Hanna, he knows Sir Donald Mann, and he knows Sir William Mackenzie—in fact, I think he knows every prominent man in that crowd; the Minister of Marine does not. I will therefore ask the Minister of Railways to keep his own friends with him and not let that gang enter the office of the Minister of Marine. Unfortunately the Minister of Railways told us that the Government had decided that in Canada's new policy it was imperative for the same men to run the trains as to run the ships. I say that this should not be. It is bad enough to have the old men of the Canadian Northern whom the Minister of Railways knows so well, bad enough to have them again in harness running our Canadian railways to ruin, but this Government should see that the ships are protected from their clutches. Those ships were most unfortunate last fall. One was stranded at the very spot where the Minister of Railways, after strenuous days of work, goes to take his rest fishing salmon, at the opening of the Saguenay river. There she lies, one of the first ships built by Canada, affording a very sad spectacle. Another ship went further down the river and got caught in the ice, and she was experimenting to show the rest of the world that winter navigation was an easy task. A third ship disappeared on the coast of Nova Scotia, doubtless not having received instruction and advice from my hon. friend from Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Butts). This has been a poor start. The Minister of Marine ought now to change his policy and take control of matters into his own hands. For those hands are very competent, the reputation that the Minister of Marine has left in connection with the Harbour Commission of Montreal is one of the best. Therefore he should take over the control of matters himself instead of having Mackenzie and Mann strand our ships after having wrecked railroads.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I wish to say a word or two in reference to the port of Quebec. I concur almost altogether in what the hon. members from that famous city have said, with the exception of the statement of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, which was if I understood him correctly, that no grain had recently passed through the grain elevators at that port. Very large quantities of grain have passed through the elevators there. I am not a pessimist as far as the port of Quebec is concerned. It is one of the best equipped ports in the North American continent; and now that the National Transcontinental railway is in running order not only the preseent government-owned ships but the larger ships that I hope will shortly be on the St. Lawrence route will make Quebec their terminus. I look forward to the port of Quebec doing a very much larger business than it has ever done in its past history for it is one of Canada's national ports and will be treated as such. There is no warmer advocate of the further development of trade through the port of Quebec than I am; and I can assure hon. gentlemen personally, and also on behalf of the Government, that every thing will be done not only to make the port of Quebec what its parliamentary representatives quite properly desire it to be, but what the situation of Quebec and the facilities which it possesses should render it—a port doing fifty or one hundred times more business than it is doing at the present time. I for one am satisfied that more freight is going to pass through Quebec and more ships are going to stop there. Naturally, owing to the existing depth of water large ships stop there at present and the larger vessels that are to come will also do so. I hope that a year from now, if we are spared, I will be able to show hon. gentlemen that the business of the port of Quebec has grown and has exceeded in volume anything it has ever done in the past.

Mr. BUREAU: Where does Three Rivers come in?

Mr. DUFF: We are all pleased with the speech which the Minister of Railways gave us this evening, although I do not know whether I should apologize for bringing him in, or thank him for coming. The minister may know a great deal about railways but he has certainly shown by his speech tonight that he knows nothing about shipping; and when any member of the Government tells this committee that we cannot run railways without ships I think he had better go away back and sit down, and learn. If the operation of ships and railways is to form part of the Government's policy why should the Government not operate farms also? Why should it not go into the West, cultivate a couple of million acres, and produce stuff for this great railway that he talks about to carry to the seaboard to be there placed on steamships and transported across the ocean? The minister rather insinuated, if I might be allowed to use the expression, that if the Canadian Mercantile Marine was not built and operated so as to convey across the ocean the products to be carried by the Canadian National railways from the West the Canadian Pacific railway would gobble up the business. Of course, that is the old game,—trying to make out that we are in favour of the Canadian Pacific and against the nationalization or public ownership of railways. But that argument does not go very far, because it will be a long time before the tramp steamers that the Government are building will compete with the steamers of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It is useless for the minister to draw a comparison between the Canadian Pacific steamers which carry goods brought from the West to Montreal and St. John on the Canadian Pacific railway and the Canadian Government steamers which take goods from Montreal, Quebec, St. John, or Halifax, because the two classes of steamers are quite different. The buyer in Liverpool or in London knows exactly when the Canadian Pacific steamers will arrive, but the tramp steamers cannot operate on any specific schedule; consequently the shippers will not send on the tramp steamers the same class of goods that they will send on steamers that carry both passengers and freight.

The Minister of Railways knows so much about shipping that he has told us that through the construction and operation of these ships a great deal of business had been opened up between Canada and South America and the West Indies. But that is not the case, because this business was opened up long before the Canadian Government built and operated these ships, and although I am not a prophet or the son of a prophet, I venture the assertion that that trade will be there when within five years from now the Canadian Government ships are scrapped and sold as old junk.

But what aroused the anger of the Minister of Railways was my simple question whether the business profits' tax would be paid by the company operating these steamers. The minister rather sidestepped the question by saying, in the first place, that these steamers had not been operated for a year. Of course, I have to take the minister's word, but my memory is fairly good, and I think he will not deny that some of these vessels have been operating for nearly two years. Now is the time when every business man must file a statement with the Inspector of Taxation concerning his business profits. What I want to know is whether this marine company is filing a statement similar to that which every private shipbuilding company has to file. Just here I would like the Minister of Marine to answer two questions that I put to him this afternoon. First, how much of the $1,400,000 which he says was the profit in connection with the operation of nineteen ships, was placed to rest account for depreciation?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I explained this afternoon that the profit statement had been arrived at after providing for depreciation, interest on the cost of the ship, insurance, overhead charges and operating expenses. The amount allowed for depreciation is, I understand, five per cent. The hon. member will agree that that is a fair amount to allow for depreciation on a new ship. I repeat the statement I made this afternoon that none of these nineteen ships have been in commission a year. Some of them have made only one voyage; others have made only two.

Mr. DUFF: Then, there was the question of sterling exchange. With regard to the difference between the cost of vessels here and the cost in England, was sterling exchange figured on the basis of $4.86, or at the current rate?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: At $4.86.

Mr. DUFF: Then the minister did not give the House proper information this afternoon when he made a comparison between the cost of vessels in Canada and the cost of vessels in England, because everybody knows that six months ago English sterling was quoted at only $3.60.

Mr. CHAPLIN: He would have to make a new estimate every week.

Mr. DUFF: I thank my hon. friend for that suggestion. But the price per ton should be figured either at the average rate or at the highest rate, whichever the minister likes. It was not fair to make a comparison based on a rate of $4.86 for the pound sterling.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It really does not make very much difference, because during the past two years the cost of some types of ships has been about the same in the yards of the United Kingdom as in the Canadian yards. The point I tried to make was that during the past two years ships could be built as cheaply in the yards of Canada as in the yards of the United Kingdom.

Mr. DUFF: That does not alter the fact that if a man wanted to buy a ship in the British Isles he would pay for it at the prevailing rate of exchange; consequently, as I say, it was not fair for the minister to base his comparison upon a rate of $4.86 for the pound sterling.

The minister has kindly told me that the amount put to rest account for depreciation on these ships is five per cent. For the sake of argument we will say that that is a fair amount, but these ships are new, and during the first year new ships require hardly any repairs. The minister will find out before he is a manager of ships very long —I beg his pardon; he transfers them to his friend the Minister of Railways—the Minister of Railways will find out that five per cent will not go far for depreciation.

It has been stated that nineteen ships earned $1,400,000; that is about $73,000 per ship. Well, the Minister of Marine has no occasion to congratulate himself upon a vessel of 4,000 or 5,000 tons earning only $73,000. That is a mere bagatelle, and the only reason why they earned that is because of the present abnormal conditions—conditions which will not be prevailing in the years to come. If they could earn only $73,000 with freight rates as they are to-day, they will earn practically nothing when the freight rates are reduced. Then, from the $73,000 has not been deducted the business profits tax which the ordinary shipbuilding company has to pay. Next year the net profit will be reduced a good deal by the payment of this tax.

I am opposed to the Government operation of ships, because it is not fair to private companies or private interests. It will discourage the building of ships by private interests. There is no reason why the Government should enter upon a shipbuilding programme now that the war is over. The minister says that if they have not the ships he cannot carry his goods after they arrive at the seaboard. Well, how many railways in the United States have steamship lines? Perhaps one or two, but most of them have no steamships; they go out in the open market and make arrangements for the carrying of their freight, and that is what this Government could do. It is not necessary that the Minister of Railways should have ships to carry the freight which comes over his line from Winnipeg or other western points to ports on the Atlantic ocean. Moreover, in the next year or two when freight rates reach a normal figure, the Minister of Marine and the Minister of Railways and the Government will find that instead of making $73,000, they will lose that much and a lot more. In addition to that, the property is decreas-ing in value and it will cost a great deal more to keep it in repair. The Government, therefore, will find that instead of having a bonanza as they think they have, they will have a white elephant on their hands.

Mr. COPP: If the Minister of Marine sent a hurried message out to have his colleague the Minister of Railways come in and help him through with this item, I am afraid he made a mistake in doing so, because the Minister of Railways has put before the Committee arguments that must be answered. I suppose the Minister of Railways was hurriedly aroused from his after-dinner rest and came into the House somewhat excited, and he possibly went a little further than he would otherwise have gone. But he having gone so far, we must find out just what this means, and we are getting some information, even if we are getting it piecemeal and through somebody getting rather excited and saying things that possibly he would not otherwise have said. The Minister of Railways says to-night that we must continue in this shipbuilding programme because we cannot successfully operate 22,000 miles of railway unless we have nineteen ships to help us do so. When I asked him if the 22,000 miles of railway included the Grand Trunk Railway system that was to be taken over under the Act which was passed at the last session of Parliament and under an agreement that has already been entered into between the Government of Canada and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, he said it did. Then, this only loads up that system with $75,000,000 over and above the $700,000,000 or $800,000,000 of a burden which the people of Canada were obliged to shoulder under the legislation passed last session. My hon. friend says that he as Minister of Railways is going to see to it that not one pound of freight that is brought from the West down to the city of Montreal is going to find an outlet through any other ports than our own Canadian ports. How does he get past the statement which he has made many times in this House, namely, that he as Minister of Railways or the Government has nothing whatever to do now with the operation of the Canadian National railways; that that system is in the hands of a Board of Management, and the Government is absolutely cut clear and loose from any interference with the operation of that railway? That is what we were told last year. I want to ask the minister this question. When that load of wheat that he, with his fertile imagination, loaded up in the great West a few moments ago, is brought down over the Canadian National railways to the city of Montreal, if Mr. Hanna, or the Board of Management that has charge of the Canadian National railways, gives an order to take that load to Portland, will my hon. friend interfere and have it sent down to St. John or Halifax to be shipped from there? Can my hon. friend do that under the arrangement he has to-day with this Board of Management of the Canadian National railways?

So much for what the Minister of Railways has said. I want to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) a question. I believe he said that there were seventeen different shipbuilding plants in the Dominion of Canada with which he had entered into arrangements for the building of vessels. I want to ask him if the Government have in any way assisted in the construction of these plants for the different companies who are building these ships.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: In no way whatever.

Mr. COPP: I want to draw the attention of the Committee to the fact that we have from the Minister of Marine this afternoon and evening the information that he has given contracts for the building of 63 vessels of different tonnage and types to seventeen different companies. I want to protest in the strongest manner possible that it is not reasonable to expect that we shall get the best possible solution of the difficulties that arise in giving out contracts by one man being able to go to seventeen different contracting firms in the Dominion of Canada and say to them: I want you to build me so many vessels. I give my hon. friend all credit for doing the very best he can and getting the best prices he can from these firms. But it is not natural for water to run up hill; and it is not natural and not a proper business method for my hon. friend to go to the different shipbuilding firms in the Dominion and ask them what they will build a vessel for. The only safe and reasonable way to carry out the construction of these vessels for which we are to-night asking the people of Canada to shoulder a burden of $20,000,000, is for tenders to be called for, and then company "A" does not know what company "B" is going to tender, and company "B" does not know what company "C" is going to tender, and so on down all the line of the seventeen different companies. Instead of that, contracts are being entered into behind closed doors without the people of Canada having any opportunity of expressing an opinion, without any tenders having been asked, without any person but the seventeen different companies knowing that any such contracts were to be let. My hon. friend lets these contracts; he comes back to the Cabinet Council and he makes a recommendation that a certain contract be let to a certain individual company, and an Order in Council is passed. That is all the people of Canada have to say about this expenditure of $75,000,000 for the purpose of building ships without which the Minister of Railways says he cannot successfully operate 22,000 miles of railway, part of which is a bankrupt railway that he is taking out of the hands of individuals and companies in which some of our friends in different parts of the Dominion of Canada are deeply interested.

Mr. POWER: I was rather sorry to ascertain a few moments ago that the control of Canada's Merchant Marine is vested almost entirely in the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Railways, whom we now find out to be a naval expert, and Minister of Shipping. He reminds me of the old poem of, I think, Thomas Hood, who referred to a person as—

> A bo'sun tight, and a midshipmite,
> And the crew of the captain's gig.

It appears to me that the Minister of Railways will about fill that description. I said I was sorry that the Minister of Railways is in charge of the Canadian Merchant Marine, because the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has shown a certain amount of sympathy with the people of the constituency I represent and with the people of the province of Quebec. He has also shown a considerable knowledge of his subject. I am sorry I am not enough a seafaring man to say that the Minister of Railways and Canals has not shown a knowledge of the subject, but he has been far from convincing hon. members on this side of the House that he has shown such a knowledge. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has shown us that he takes a sympathetic interest in the district of Quebec. He has told us something that I am sure none of the members from the Quebec district knew; in fact, I am almost positive that nobody in the province of Quebec knew that the city of Quebec was to be the terminus for the ships of this fleet, and I shall take the first opportunity of informing my electors that this decision has been arrived at. A somewhat different point of view is taken by the Minister of Railways and Canals, who in spite of protests and requests and demands by various public bodies in the city of Quebec, has for the past few years invariably refused to assist the port of Quebec by giving us a reasonable rate on grain from the West. Some years ago he gave a through rate from Armstrong to Quebec which permitted the Transcontinental, now the Canadian National railway, to compete with the Canadian Pacific and other railways. This rate was put into effect for a certain season, and the result was that large quantities of grain were shipped from the port of Quebec. I have repeatedly asked the minister to endeavour to put this rate into effect once more, but on every occasion he has told me that it was no longer possible. I ask him again now. He knows as well as I and most hon. members of this House know, that fully 75 per cent of Canadian grain is now being shipped through American ports, and I think the largest percentage of it goes through New York. Now that he has this 22,000 miles of railway, now that he has, in spite of his assertion, a summer terminus in the city of Quebec and a winter terminus in Halifax, I would suggest to him that he use the national railway to ship Western grain through Canadian ports on these ships. We certainly do not want our mercantile marine to go to American ports. Let the minister use the national railway to carry the grain and, if necessary, make a slightly better rate in order to fill Canadian ships with Canadian cargo, and let the greater portion of the products of the West be shipped from Canadian ports in Canadian vessels. I think if my hon. friend (Mr. Reid), in his capacity of Minister of Marine would sit down with himself in his capacity of Minister of Railways and co-ordinate his efforts—that of his right hand as Minister of Marine with that of his left hand as Minister of Railways—he might be able to come to the conclusion that he could work both hands together, and if he did, I have no doubt it would be for the benefit of the country. I am merely suggesting this as a bit of advice, knowing that probably the minister will take it as a piece of impertinence for me to advise such a technical marine expert as himself; but at the same time I should like him to look into the matter very carefully, and if in following up his avowed policy of helping Canadian railroads by encouraging a Canadian Mercantile Marine he finds it at all possible to listen to my suggestion, let not his prejudice, legitimate prejudices perhaps, against the city and port of Quebec carry him away to such an extent that he will not put into practise his more practical views, let not his reason be overwhelmed by what might be termed his political emotions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before this item carries, I think we should have some declaration from the minister or the Government as to what their policy is going to be in awarding future contracts—whether public tenders will or will not be called for. I think if one wished to raise a point of order in regard to this particular expenditure, the point might be well taken. I have in my hand the Revised Statutes of Canada 1906, Vol. I, and I see that section 36, Part II, General of Chapter 39, an Act respecting the Public Works of Canada, provides:

> Whenever any works are to be executed under the direction of any department of the Government, the minister having charge of such department shall invite tenders by public advertisement for the execution of such works, except in cases—
> (a) of pressing emergency in which delay would be injurious to the public interest; or
>
> (b) in which from the nature of the work it can be more expeditiously and economically executed by the officers and servants of the department; or
> (c) where the estimated cost of the work is less than five thousand dollars and it appears to the minister, in view of the nature of the work, that it is not advisable to invite tenders.

These contracts are for the most part for amounts between half a million dollars and over two million dollars, and on a total expenditure running up to $72,000,000 the Government has not invited a single tender, according to the minister's own statement. There is no pressing emergency at the present time, and unless it were for the statement which the minister has made this evening, that all these contracts have been already awarded, I do not think that we would have any right to permit this item to pass without the announcement that tenders are to be called for. The accepted practice of all governments of this country for some years past has been, I think, to safeguard public expenditure in the awarding of contracts by inviting public tenders. I know that during the period of the war the Government for reasons of urgency and emergency departed widely from this practice, but that is only a reason why, now the war is over, we should return to it in the public interest. I should like the minister to make some statement to the House as to whether what he is asking us to do at the present time is to be taken as an indication of the line he intends to pursue in the future, or whether he regards the present action of the Government as something relating to the war period, which he would like to have excused on that ground. I think we ought to have a statement from the minister as to the policy of the Government in inviting tenders before awarding public contracts.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am sure my hon. friend is aware that public tenders are as a rule called for, and quite properly so, but we could not follow that policy in ordering ships. For argument's sake, suppose I had called for public tenders for six ships of 8,400 tons. Suppose that the Vickers Company, of Montreal, and five or six other shipbuilders had tendered, and that the Davie Shipbuilding Company, of Lauzon, which has not the facilities for turning out that number of ships except after a very long time, were the lowest tenderers. The Government would have no option but to award them the contract. We would not be able to distribute the orders. I quite understand the point of the leader of the Opposition, and that is, the desirability of safeguarding the public interest. The statute from which he has quoted makes it plain that the minister has power to use his best judgment, and the Government to purchase by the best means what it requires. I do not know of any method that would so well safeguard the public interest as the course we have followed. I believe we got lower prices than we should have obtained by public tender. When the Government asked for prices on ships, as I have already twice stated to-day, they did not necessarily take the prices that were quoted. If a price was considered satisfactory it was accepted and if it was too high it was of course refused. By the method we followed we were in a position to distribute the business evenly over seventeen yards at a cost probably lower than if we had called for public tenders in the way suggested by the leader of the Opposition. It must be borne in mind also that time is an important feature of the programme, and we could not allow one yard to take more business than it was capable of turning out. Some yards have two berths, some four and some six, and all these facts have to be taken into consideration in allotting the work. It was desirable to distribute the contracts in such a way that labour would not be concentrated in one particular place, but that workers would be evenly employed throughout the seventeen yards from Halifax to Prince Rupert. I have already said that the Government are at an end of their steel programme, and if I thought that the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition, whose opinion I regard very highly, was of any practical importance I would gladly recommend it to the Government. But from the business experience that I have gained during the last thirty or thirty-five years, I am bound to say that I think the Government have followed the best possible course.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With all deference to the minister, I would point out that what I quote from the statute is part of the law of the land.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It gives the minister an option.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There may be reasons of expediency of one kind or another why it should be advisable to allow the minister to distribute work from the Atlantic to the Pacific and allot it to different shipyards; but this Parliament has certainly laid it down in black and white that, in the matter of public contracts, where the amount exceeds $5,000 there shall be no option on the part of the minister. The minister says that the statute gives him the right to do as he thinks best. Let me once again quote the section:

> Whenever any works are to be executed under the direction of any department of the Government, the minister having charge of such department shall invite tenders by public advertisement for the execution of such works.

That is the law. There are certain exceptions. The minister referred to subsection three, which provides that where the estimated cost of the work is less than $5,000 and it appears to the minister, in view of the nature of the work, that it is not advisable to invite tenders—

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That is it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister says "That is it." He will note, however, that this sub-section applies only to works under $5,000. But the contracts under consideration vary in amounts from half a million to two million dollars apiece. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) is in his place and I am quite prepared to leave it to him to say as to whether or not my interpretation of the statute is not literally correct, namely, that the law provides that where a contract is of an amount over $5,000 there shall not be, except under certain specified circumstances, any option to the minister to distribute the work as he likes. He is obliged to call for tenders by public advertisement.

Mr. EDWARDS: Are there not two qualifying subsections?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; first, subsection "A" which provides against any pressing emergency in which delay would be injurious to the public interest. When speaking before, I pointed out that possibly these contracts were awarded in war-time, when there was a pressing emergency.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Most of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister, however, is inclined to base his right in the matter on a section which, I am afraid, gives him no ground whatever to stand on.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Most of these contracts were entered into under the War Measures Act, but even if they were not made under that Act, and putting aside altogether the legal aspect of the argument, I think that any business man in this House will agree with me that it would be unwise to attempt to order ships under public tender by reason of the wide distribution of the yards. Some of these yards are large and some small, and it was the desire of the Government not only to get the ships as quickly as possible but to have the labour distributed evenly throughout the country.

Mr. EDWARDS: Will the leader of the Opposition be good enough to read section "B."?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will read the entire clause:

> Whenever any works are to be executed under the direction of any department of the Government, the minister having charge of such department shall invite tenders by public advertisement for the execution of such works, except in cases
> (a) of pressing emergency in which delay would be injurious to the public interest; or
>
> (b) in which, from the nature of the work, it can be more expeditiously and economically executed by officers and servants of the department; or
> (c) where the estimated cost of the work is less than $5,000, and it appears to the minister, in view of the nature of the work, that it is not advisable to invite tenders.

I contend that a point of order could be raised in this connection, and would be sustained if it were raised. I do not raise it, however, because I have no wish in any way to delay the programme that the Government has under way. I believe it was started in a period of war. These contracts have already been awarded, and to raise a point at this stage would only be to delay the final execution of the work. But I do say that we should have from the Government, before allowing this item to pass, a declaration as to future contracts. The ground the minister has taken at present I do not think we can permit to stand for a moment, because it would mean that in the future he would feel at liberty to award contracts as he pleased regardless of the law of the land. There are two courses open to the minister. He can either get the law changed; or, if it is to remain as it is, obey it; it is part of the obligation of every hon. member of the House to uphold the law as it stands.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think it is quite clear that without getting outside of the terms of the law, what was done was perfectly justifiable. What was pressing to get done was precisely to get the whole shipbuilding capacity of this country at work, and this end could not be attained if you called for tenders and proceeded to allot the work to the lowest tenderer. It was probably as important to get the shipyards all to work, as it was to get the ships themselves.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is the minister speaking in reference to the war period?

Mr. DOHERTY: What is being done now is merely completing what was started during the war. As to a declaration of future action, there is no doubt that the Government intends that, when the exceptional circumstances that prevail in the present instance do not apply, they will be governed by the law as it stands, so long as that law remains on the statute book. But I think that a moment's reflection will show that the condition here comes very well within the first clause which gives the minister an option in cases of pressing necessity. It must be quite clear that if we gave all the work to the lowest tenderer we would experience considerable delay in getting the ships; and superadded to this fact, there was the desirability, apart altogether from the necessity for the ships, of providing work for the entire shipbuilding facilities of Canada. When you say that you should call for tenders from all the shipbuilding plants of Canada, in the nature of things you could not do this particular thing in that particular way. You could not get the result. You could not get the ships which we were pressing to get promptly and as early as possible. If you called for tenders, gave the contracts to the lowest tenderers and waited until the lowest tenderers could get the ships finished you would be waiting still.

Mr. W. C. KENNEDY: I listened with a great deal of interest to the explanation given by the hon. the Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne) as to why he did not ask for tenders, and I was not convinced by what he told us. From a purely business standpoint it was proper to advertise. We do not expect one shipyard is going to build all the ships required by the country, but surely the hon. gentleman could ask for tenders and limit the time that any one tenderer might have to build a ship. The practice of allowing a minister or a Government to spend $75,000,000 of the people's money by arrangement with shipbuilding companies and deciding how these contracts shall be distributed from Halifax to Vancouver is wrong. It is not in the interest of the people that this should be done and it is not the proper way to carry on public business. I listened very attentively to the minister this afternoon and I regret very much that we did not have the pleasure of hearing his answer to the question put by my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) this evening. My hon. friend asked: Where is the $20,000,000 to come from? He was ruled out of order by the Chairman on the ground that this is not a matter to be taken up at this time. It seems to me that it is good business to find out before you arrange to spend your money where it is coming from. I think that is what the people want to know. I believe the statement by the hon. gentleman showed that we were making money out of the steamship business but I think he will agree with me that conditions are abnormal. He cannot expect that freights will continue where they are to-day. He knows, and nobody knows better than he, that it is only a matter of a short time until freights will decrease in volume; there will not be so many cargoes to carry, some of the ships will probably have difficulty in securing business, and we will consequently operate at a loss.

I notice that there have been a great many recommendations in the press recently as to the desirability of establishing a shipbuilding business in Canada. When I read these articles in the newspapers I sometimes wonder where they emanate from, and I am not quite sure that this insistent demand that the Government shall keep on shipbuilding does not emanate from the gentlemen who are profiting out of it I am not quite sure that they are not behind the movement to create a public sentiment in support of shipbuilding. Might I suggest to my hon. friend that those people who have made so much money out of building ships when the war was on should continue the business without asking the Government to guarantee their profit now the war is over. What they are doing is what the railway builders did in the past. Contractors built railways, made their profit, but when the profits dwindled and deficits occurred they handed these railways over to the Government and put the burden on the shoulders of the people. These people who are in the shipbuilding business have been making their profits and they desire to continue making profits but they want to hand the business of operating over to the people so that the people will pay the deficit on operations.

The important question in connection with this matter is, I repeat, that which was asked by my hon. friend from Pontiac. It is true that the question should be discussed on the Budget but I believe that the Minister of Finance will have enough to do to handle the finances of this country without putting the people into a business that is going to lose them money. It is not good business and the people insist that this Government should carry on their affairs with reasonable business caution. It is not good business to ask the people to invest $20,000,000 when we are told that the shipbuilding business will have to be subsidized. The hon. the Minister of Marine would not put his own money into a prospect if he thought that it would be unsuccessful with a possible loss within a few years; and if that is the case why should he put the money of the people into this enterprise now? I listened to his remarks with reference to the cost and I was very much impressed with his statement that we were building ships at a reasonable price in Canada to-day. We were told that we were building ships at approximately $160 per deadweight ton. But the hon. gentleman knows full well that we will have to compete in a short time with ships that were built in pre-war days at from $60 to $70 a ton. There is only one way to meet that competition and that is to take the loss because lower freights will get the business. As against what we are doing here, the United States Government are selling their ships and I am told that they are so anxious to get out of the business that they are willing to sell them at $100 a ton. At the very time that they are willing to take a loss and go out of the business we are going into the business, putting $20,000,000 more of the people's money into it and, then we are told that we will have to subsidize it very shortly. On top of that we are told that $75,000,000 of the people's money is spent without a single tender being asked for. It is all right for hon. gentlemen to spend their own money if they want to, but they are the trustees of the public and they have no right to spend the people's money without giving the people the protection of public tenders and full knowledge as to whom these contracts have been awarded and why.

There is also the question of where these ships are going and what freights they are to carry. The hon. gentleman told us to-day that one of these steamers had left Vancouver for Australia. He did not tell us what she was bringing back from Australia. I think we know pretty well just what they export from Australia. They export wool, hides, wheat and tallow. They will not bring that kind of a cargo back to Canada. They will probably go to England and from England they will get a cargo to bring back here. There is no objection to that; if we are in the carrying trade that is good business. But why should we spend our money to establish and operate a line to build up business between Australia and England? It is not good business. We were also told that these ships would carry cargoes to South America. What do they carry from South America?—cattle, grain and hides. These they take to the English market. This is all right for Great Britain, a great food-consuming country. They send out their finished products, bring back raw materials and get cargoes both ways. We do not want any wheat in this country, we are not looking for cattle, we are not asking for mutton; and yet these are the things that are being carried from Australia and the Argentine to England. The conditions in Canada do not parallel those of Great Britain, consequently there is not the same possibility of a mercantile marine being a financial success. These, amongst others, are the reasons why I am opposed to this vote and I shall oppose it here and shall also oppose it when we come to its consideration in the Budget.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think we ought to clear up this point in regard to future contracts. I am sorry that the Prime Minister, or the Acting Prime Minister, is not here to speak but possibly the Minister of Justice could make a statement on behalf of the Government as to whether in regard to future contracts the Government will adopt the policy of calling for tenders as required by statute.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Government contemplates in future abiding by the provisions of the law as it understands it has abided by the provisions of the law in the past. If the circumstances which seem to have existed in this case, and which made it necessary and justifiable under the provisions of the statute to take the course we did, arise again, I am not in a position to say that the same thing would not be done. But the Government, as I understand, will apply and conform to the general rule of the law save where the circumstances set forth in the law as justifying an exception shall arise.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the minister say whether he thinks that this particular expenditure would be justified under the exception with reference to inviting tenders provided for by subsection (c) which says:

> Where the estimated cost of a work is less than $5,000 and it appears to the minister, in view of the nature of the work, that it is not advisable to invite tenders.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not prepared to say the cost of the work should be under $5,000. The first subsection, if I remember correctly, does amply cover the particular case here where there was the necessity of getting ships in the shortest possible time.

Mr. KING: The Minister of Justice takes a view quite different from the view of the Minister of Marine as to his rights under this particular section.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If the leader of the Opposition will allow me. My view is exactly the same as that of my colleague; you have got to take all the sections together.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not know whether as a layman I am not justified in putting forward my view here where so many lawyers are talking. It strikes me that the law as quoted by the leader of the Opposition covers this case exactly although not in section C nor perhaps in section A. If I understood the Minister of Marine correctly he gave us to understand that these vessels were more expeditiously and economically constructed under the plan adopted by the Government than they could have been under any other plan. If I am correctly repeating what I understand the minister to say then you have the reason given in section B.

Mr. KING: No.

Mr. EDWARDS: I think so.

Mr. KING: My hon. friend has not observed that section (B) states "more economically or expeditiously executed by officers of the department." This work has been done by shipbuilding companies. I will read my hon. friend the section so that he will see the point for himself:

> in which from the nature of the work it can be more expeditiously and economically executed by the officers and servants of the department.

I think that answers my hon. friend's point. This work has not been done by officers of the department, it has been done by contractors.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. McMASTER: This item should certainly not carry—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McMASTER: —and the more so in view of the refusal of the members of this Government to accede to the most reasonable suggestion of the leader of the Opposition that in future they would interpret the law as demanding that in connection with the proposed expenditure of $20,000,000 of the people's money the law should be applied as in ordinary cases. The war is over and it is of paramount necessity that the Government of Canada should realize it. They were given during the war very wide powers. Let me tell them, with all respect, that the people of Canada, and His Majesty's loyal Opposition as representing a large proportion of those people, do not propose that they should be allowed to carry on as they were allowed to do during the war. The law is absolutely plain. The Minister of Justice nods his head with confirmatory action. I am, Mr. Chairman, specially qualified to speak upon this question because when a law student I sat not at the feet of Gamaliel but at the feet of the Minister of Justice. Now let me read section 36:

> Whenever any works are to be executed under the direction of any department of the Government, the minister having charge of such department shall invite tenders by public advertisement for the execution of such works—

That is the general principle. Here are the three exceptions:

> Except in cases—
> (a) of pressing emergency in which delay would be injurious to the public interest.

Now the war being over how can any one pretend that there is a pressing emergency which would enable the Government of this country to over-ride the principle of the law. There is no such pressing emergency.

Mr. EDWARDS: How do you know? You have got to back that up with more than your statement. Your statement is not sufficient.

Mr. McMASTER: For this reason: We and the United States are the two great nations of this continent. Our economic life, our industrial development, and our trade relationships with the rest of the world are very much on a parity. The United States instead of going ahead with their shipbuilding programme are selling the ships which they built during the war. That is one good reason. Now a "pressing emergency" is one in which delay would be injurious to the public interest—not to private interest—not to the interest of one yard as opposed to another yard but to the interest of the whole public of Canada. I do not believe that any member who supports this Government, if he were talking to me quietly outside of the House, would contend that there was any such pressing emergency at this time requiring the immediate construction of ships in this country and that this protection of the public interest—this protection to safe and sound and honest business—should be disregarded. Now what is the next exception?

Mr. EDWARDS: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. McMASTER: I would be delighted.

Mr. EDWARDS: That may be. Is it not true that after an agreement was entered into by which wheat and flour passed freely between Canada and the United States, the latter country saw fit to place an embargo on Canadian wheat going into that country? That is true, I think I am stating the facts correctly. I think one reason why the United States did that was because they wanted to make sure that they could secure the necessary ships to get their own wheat out of the country, and so they prevented Canadian wheat entering the United States, and going to their own ports and probably taking up the shipping space that would be required to ship their own wheat. If that is true I do not think we should be placed in the position of depending upon the United States or any other country for ships; we ought to have ships to transport our own goods. There you see the public interest, and not a private interest. It is the interest of all those who have goods to ship.

Mr. McMASTER: In answer to what has been rather a "shorter catechism" than a question by the hon. gentleman, I would say that you cannot regard a condition as a pressing emergency when there is a very serious difference of opinion in the country as to whether the Government's programme is a wise or unwise one. The words "pressing emergency" must mean an emergency which is so pressing that there can be no practical difference of opinion among the people of the country as to the necessity. For instance, when war breaks out, if it is necesary to build a ship or construct a bridge—

Mr. PARENT: Or repair a wharf.

Mr. McMASTER—or repair a wharf, something of that kind, the minister in charge would be able to do it. There you would have a presing emergency; we can all imagine many instances of that kind. But here is the continuation of a shipbuilding programme which has been going on for several years and which I cannot regard as being a "pressing emergency" in any way, shape or manner. The second exception to the general rule to which I invite attention is:

> (b) in which from the nature of the work it can be more expeditiously and economically executed by the officers and servants of the department.

That exception does not apply. The third exception is:

> Where the estimated cost of the work is less than $5,000 and it appears to the minister in view of the nature of the work that it is not advisable to invite tenders.

In order to come within this third exception the estimated cost of the work must be less than $5,000 and it must be the opinion of the minister that it would not be wise to ask for tenders. Certainly these exceptions do not apply; therefore the only ground that the minister has to stand on is the view that a pressing emergency exists and that to fail to act as he proposes would be injurious to the public interest. Now, believing sincerely that this policy is a mistake and that the Government is not a proper agency for the operation of tramp steamers, I think that the public interest would be better served by the abandonment of the scheme. But certainly there is no such emergency as would take this matter out of the plain principle of the law, a principle which every man administering the money of others must desire to adhere to, namely, that he shall openly ask for tenders for anything that he has to buy or any work that he wishes to be performed in order that he may be able to say to those whose money he is administering: If it costs more than you thought it should cost, the fault is not mine: I gave full notice to every one and that is the lowest price at which after public tender and public advertisement I could get the work done. I ask the Government to fall in with my views in this matter, which I believe, are correct.

I should like to say a word concerning an argument advanced by the Minister of Railways. The minister was in the somewhat unfortunate position of one who comes into a debate after it has proceeded for some time and attempts to answer arguments which he has not heard. His view was that we needed Government-owned ships in order that we might round out and complete our national system of railways. Well, I do not think that is necessary. I believe that men controlling the vast amount of traffic which the Canadian National railways will control will be able to make proper traffic arrangements with steamship lines. But even a stronger argument in reply to that of the Minister of Railways is that the ships which the Minister of Marine proposes to build are not liners fit to co-operate with the great system of national railways and act as a link in a great transportation scheme which would take the products of Canada from British Columbia over to the Orient and from Nova Scotia, Quebec and New Brunswick across the Atlantic to Great Britain and Europe. What the minister proposes to build is a number of tramp steamers which cannot attain that success which the skill and initiative of private ownership and private control can alone assure.

Mr. PARENT: How much of the $40,000,000 voted last year has been spent in the construction of the twenty-five steamers now operated by the Canadian National Railway system?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The amount spent up to date is $24,000,000.

Mr. PARENT: On March 11, 1920, the following questions which I had previously put to the Minister of Railways were answered:

1. Has the Canadian National Railway at the present time twenty-four or any number of vessels plying in various routes?
2. If so, how and on what terms or conditions have said vessels been acquired by said Canadian National Railway, and what is the name of each steamer?
3. Who is the present owner of each of said steamers or vessels?
4. What is the tonnage of each?
5. What port or ports is each one of them plying between?

The answers given by the minister were as follows:

1. Yes.—25.
2. Vessels are being operated as provided for by Order in Council passed June 2, 1919.

[Mr. McMaster.]

In passing, I may remark that a reference to an Order in Council which had not been made public is hardly an answer to the question. However, that is not the point that I want to emphasize. On March 11 we are told that the Canadian National railways are operating twenty-five steamers, and the names are given; each name is preceded by the word "Canadian." But evidently some persons are better informed than the Government. I hold in my hand an article signed by John Kidman, in which he speaks of Canada's Merchant Marine—and highly praises it, too. But he gives the names of fifty-three steamers, while in the answer to my question of March 11 only twenty-five were mentioned. Whether or not that is right, I do not know, but this gentleman appears to be well informed.

An hon. MEMBER: Read the names.

Mr. PARENT: I will read first the names of the vessels mentioned in answer to my question of March 11. They are as follows, the word "Canadian" being prefixed in each case:

Voyageur, Pioneer, Warrior, Ranger, Recruit, Volunteer, Trader, Sailor, Trooper, Seigneur, Signaller, Miller, Adventurer, Gunner, Aviator, Sower, Navigator, Settler, Spinner, Raider, Importer, Exporter, Drummond, Sheba, Makee.

Then, here is the list given by Mr. Kidman, the name "Canadian" being prefixed in each case, as before:

Voyageur, Pioneer, Warrior, Volunteer, Trooper, Aviator, Raider, Recruit, Signaller, Gunner, Settler, Rancher, Fisher, Forester, Trapper, Hunter, Trader, Sailor, Adventurer, Sower, Mariner, Explorer, Navigator, Ranger, Seigneur, Miller, Spinner, Planter, Armourer, Composer, Beaver, Runner, Carrier, Importer, Exporter, Inventor, Prospector, Cruiser, Constructor, Sealer, Miner, Reaper, Thrasher, Otter, Squatter, Farmer, Observer, Artificer, Engineer, Victor, Conqueror, Commander, Leader. Total deadweight tonnage——

They even know that much.

——313,150. Total value,, 53 vessels,——

That is also known by them.

——$61,233,450. Average cost per ton deadweight, $195.54.

If, Sir, you are interested to know where this statement comes from, I can tell you that it is from the Montreal Gazette Commercial and Financial Review of the Year 1919, compiled by the staff of the Gazette and printed as a supplement with the issue of January 5, 1920. On the cover there is also this statement:

Canada does more business per capita than any other country in the world.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If the hon. member would allow me, perhaps we might save a little time. I am, of course, not responsible for what any publisher might print, but apparently he has given the list of ships that have been contracted for by the Government along with the ships that are in commission. That will explain the difference between the answer given to the hon. member and the reporter's statement that he has just read.

Mr. McMASTER: Does that mean, therefore, that some ships have been contracted for that are to be paid for out of this vote?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Not at all.

Mr. McMASTER: Then the amount of $63,000,000 is wrong.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am not accountable for a newspaper article.

Mr. McMASTER: I know that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This amount of $20,000,000, that we are being asked to vote is a very large sum; we have been discussing this item a long time, and I think there has been no effort on this side to obstruct, but only to elicit such information as is in the public interest. I should like to ask the minister to let the item stand for discussion at some subsequent sitting of the House. It is a large enough sum to warrant further discussion, and we ought perhaps to have a little more information as to just what the consequence would be of the item not carrying. I should like to hear from the minister just how far the programme he has in view is from completion and in what degree it would be affected if the item should not carry.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If the item did not carry, of course, that would be the end of it. While I would like very much to meet the views of the leader of the Opposition, because the Government has been met in a very fair spirit, not only by himself but by all the members opposite,—and I might say that this is not the first occasion on which they have treated this question as a national one, but they have done so at previous sessions—I gave to the best of my ability very detailed information this afternoon; we have been on this item now since half past three o'clock. Much as I should like to meet the views of the Opposition, I think we ought really to pass the item now. If there is any further information that the leader of the Opposition or any other hon. member desires, I should be glad to give it, but we are all anxious to get through with the business of the session.

Mr. BELAND: This is a very important item amounting to $20,000,000, one of the largest items that is submitted for our consideration. Undoubtedly, a number of hon. members who have not been present in the House this afternoon and evening may require some further information. I am sure that on this side of the House we do not want to obstruct this item in any way, but merely wish to elicit the information we require in order to justify this expenditure. The Government, therefore, should not refuse postponing until a further date the consideration of the item.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: In view of the request of the leader of the Opposition and also of the genial hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland), the Government will agree to postponing the discussion of this item.

Item stands.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill No. 9, to incorporate Scottish Canadian Assurance Corporation.—Mr. Mowat.

Bill No. 10, respecting The Trust and Loan Company of Canada.—Mr. Cronyn.

Bill No. 7, to incorporate The T. Eaton General Insurance Company.—Mr. Mowat.

THE T. EATON LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY.

The House went into Committee on Bill No. 8 to incorporate the T. Eaton Life Assurance Company.—Mr. Mowat; Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On the preamble.

Mr. McMASTER: I would like to know when the consent was obtained for the use of the name "T. Eaton." I do not find that name among the promoters of the Bill and it seems to me that the member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) should give the Committee some assurance that the use of the name is authorized. On the face of it there is nothing to connect T. Eaton with the formation of the company.

Mr. MOWAT: The incorporators, some of whom are the principal officers of the company, I am assured and am convinced, have been authorized by the T. Eaton Company to make this application. It is not likely that any general life insurance will be done by the company at all; otherwise they would choose some name of a more commercial character. I can assure the hon.

gentleman that the application is perfectly bona fide and that the incorporators have simply adopted the form of the model Bill which is in the Insurance Act. I hope the measure will be allowed to pass.

Motion agreed to.

Bill reported, read a third time and passed.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 24, to incorporate The Pabos, Amqui and Edmundston Railway Company.—Mr. Pelletier.

Bill No. 25, respecting The Pacific Coast Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Stevens.

Bill No. 26, respecting The Pacific Marine Insurance Company.—Mr. Stevens.

On motion of Right Hon. Mr. Doherty the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

Wednesday, March 24, 1920.

The House met at Two o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS TABLED.

Certain Orders in Council relating to the organization and work of the Department of Health:

1. Order in Council, P.C. 1627, dated August 2, 1919, naming the President of the Privy Council as the Minister of the Crown to preside over the Department of Health, and providing for the transfer to the Department of Health, from the Department of Immigration and Colonization of the staff of the Quarantine and Medical Service.

2. Order in Council, P.C. 1765, dated August 23, 1919, transferring to the Department of Health from the Department of Trade and Commerce the administration of the Adulteration Act, the Proprietary and Patent Medicine Act, the Commercial Feeding Stuffs Act, and the Fertilizers Act.

3. Order in Council, P.C. 2204, dated October 30, 1919, transferring to the Department of Health the work of the Housing Committee of the Cabinet.

4. Order in Council, P.C., 2321, dated November 21, 1919, transferring to the Department of Health from the Department of Marine and Fisheries the administration of marine hospitals.

5. Order in Council, P.C. 2612, dated December 31, 1919, transferring to the Department of Health the medical branch of the Commission of Conservation.—Hon. Mr. Rowell.

General orders and routine orders of the Canadian Militia, also appointments, promotions and retirements, Canadian Militia and Canadian Expeditionary Force, 1919.—Hon. Mr. Guthrie.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CIVIL SERVICE RE-CLASSIFICATION.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Are appeals taken before the Board of Hearing against certain items of the re-classification of the Civil Service dealt with finally by the said board?

2. If not, is the Governor General in Council or the Civil Service Commission, or both jointly, passing finally on the decisions of the board?

3. If the latter is the case, what is the use of the Board of Hearing?

4. Has the Governor General in Council or the Civil Service Commission, or both jointly, refused to confirm decisions of the Board of Hearing or ignored them altogether?

Rt. Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. No.

2. All decisions of the Board of Hearing are submitted to the Civil Service Commission, for final action. In cases where an increase of compensation is involved the recommendations of the commission are submitted for the approval of the Governor in Council.

3. The Board of Hearing was established to enable employees of the Public Service to make their representations regarding the compensation, duties and qualifications to a board, composed of representatives of the departments and the service itself and to give the Civil Service Commission the benefit of the views of men in the service who have made a study of the Civil Service Classification and to facilitate the hearing of complaints and adjusting the classification. The Civil Service Commission has expressed itself favourable to the establishment and continuance of the board.

4. The Civil Service Commission has confirmed all recommendations of the Board of Appeal. The Governor in Council has approved all but one, and in this case the department concerned reported that the office is to be abolished.

PRINTING BUREAU LINOTYPES.

Mr. FORTIER:

1. Are there any unused linotypes at the Printing Bureau, as a result of the dismissal of employees?

2. If so, how many?

3. Is it true that the Government, instead of selling these machines, tolerates their breaking up and deterioration?

Rt. Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. There are no unused linotypes at the Printing Bureau as a result of the dismissal of employees.

2. Ten linotypes are not now operated because they are not required to handle the output of the Bureau.

3. No.

ALFRED PEAT MANUFACTURING PLANT.

Mr. CAHILL:

1. Was the peat manufacturing plant at Alfred operated during the past year? If so, by whom?

2. If not by the Government, under what agreement or arrangement was it operated?

3. What was the cost per ton of production when operated by the Government?

4. At what price per ton was peat retailed to the consumer under governmental operation?

5. If the plant is now operated by private interests, what agreement, if any, is there restricting the price at which peat produced at the plant shall be sold to the consumer?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. Peat fuel manufacturing operations were conducted at Alfred last season by the Peat Committee which was appointed jointly in 1918 by the Dominion Government and the Government of the Province of Ontario.

2. The answer to this question is the same as to No. 1.

3. At the conclusion of the Government's manufacturing operations at Alfred in 1911 an estimate was made of the cost during 93 working days (not a full season) of manufacturing one ton of peat fuel. This cost, including overhead charges, was $3.05 per ton. This was the cost of the peat on the field ready for loading into cars or into shed. It was further estimated that this cost per ton of fuel would be reduced to $1.82 during another season's work, but at the end of this year (1911) governmental activities in this line were discontinued.

4. A limited quantity of peat was sold to consumers in Ottawa for $3.50 per ton. It was sold at this low figure, which was below the cost of manufacturing, plus shipping and delivery, for the purpose of introducing this fuel to the public and to get an expression of their views concerning its value as a fuel for domestic purposes.

5. The Peat Committee has not yet concluded their investigation and nothing at the present has been done concerning restrictions of the price at which peat produced at this plant or any other plant for the manufacture of peat fuel, shall be sold to the consumer.

MILITIA DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES IN LONDON.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. How many employees of the Department of Militia in London, England, were brought to Canada and placed under the jurisdiction of the Department of Militia and Defence since the signing of the armistice?

2. How many of these employees are still in the service of that department?

3. How many of those who are still employed were residents of Canada at the outbreak of the war?

4. How many Canadians have been dismissed from the Department of Militia and Defence since the date of the armistice?

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. 59.

2. 47.

3. 43.

4. 67.

CONNAUGHT RIFLE RANGES.

*Mr. TOBIN:

1. How many acres of land comprise the Connaught Rifle Ranges, situated in the County of Carleton, Ont.?

2. From whom was the land for said ranges purchased?

3. What was the total cost of the land?

4. What has been the total cost to date of equipping the Connaught Rifle Ranges?

5. What has it cost each year to maintain these ranges?

6. What has been the total cost of everything to date in connection with the purchase of land, equipment and maintenance of these ranges?

7. Has any revenue been derived from the land comprising said ranges?

8. If so, how much per year?

9. Have the ranges ever been used for competitions?

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. 2,717.70 acres, including roads.

2. G. A. Armstrong, J. Armstrong, N. Boucher, Catherine Burk, T. Burk, A. Davidson, I. B. Davis, Jennie V. Kennedy, J. Lavelle, R. Richardson, W. O. Riddell, J. Scissons, S. Scissons, G. Sparks, G. H. Sparks, W. Smith (Estate), G. I. Scott, G. Taylor, E. B. Whelan, Andrew Whelan, J. Whelan, Thos. Watt, Wilson Bros., E. Younghusband.

3. $206,700.

4. $770,490.45.

5. $1,684 per annum.

6. $986,160.45.

7. Yes.

8. Pasturage (tenders called for), 1915, $250, 1916, $250; 1917, $925; 1918, $925; 1919, $925. Total, $3,275.

1920—Pasturage rights transferred to Central Experimental Farm (Dominion Government).

9. No, the construction of the Ranges has not been entirely completed.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES EMPLOYEES.

Mr. DEMERS:

1. Have Messrs. John Blizzard, engineer, Wm. Campion and Henry Pereira, draughtsmen, Joseph Keele, expert in ceramic, and Robert Cantelo, chemist, of the Department of Mines, resigned?
2. If so, why?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. Messrs. John Blizzard, Technical Engineer, William Campion, Draughtsman, and Robert C. Cantelo, Assistant Engineering Chemist of the Mines Branch, Department of Mines, have resigned. Messrs. Henry Pereira, Draughtsman, and Joseph Keele, Expert in Ceramic, have not resigned.

2. The reason given in each case for resigning was that a more remunerative position had been offered, and accepted, outside of the Government service.

PRINTING BUREAU STAFF.

Mr. FONTAINE:

1. How many employees have been dismissed from the Government Printing Bureau since the 1st of November, 1919?
2. Why were these employees dismissed?
3. How many of the said dismissed employees are French Canadians?

Rt. Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. 233.

2. Two employees were dismissed upon recommendation of the King's Printer on the reports, verbal or written, of the officers directly in charge of these men.

Under Order in Council P.C. 22, approved January 10, 92 notices of retirement have been served, 90 of which took effect on February 1, and two of which were made to stand until further orders.

Under Order in Council P.C. 205, approved January 29, notices of retirement have been served upon 46 employees, and took effect on February 7.

Under Order in Council P.C. 417, approved February 21, notices of retirement were served upon 89 employees, and took effect February 29.

Under Order in Council P.C. above mentioned, the names of six employees were removed from the roll of the Department and their positions declared abandoned.

3. No record.

QUEBEC AND SAGUENAY RAILWAY.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is the Quebec and Saguenay railway now finally completed?
2. If not, why?
3. When is it to be finally completed?
4. Who is in charge of the road now and operating same?
5. To what funds are the earnings of the road paid or credited?
6. Has the Government officially taken possession of the road on its own account?
7. If so, when? If not, why?
8. When does the Government intend to take possession of the road on its own account?
9. By whom was the suspension of the daily trains between Quebec and Murray Bay ordered, last November?
10. By whom was it authorized?
11. Why was this train suspended?
12. Has the Government since then received complaints and petitions from public bodies and individuals of the county of Charlevoix, asking for a daily train service between Quebec and Murray Bay?
13. If so, why has the Government not complied with said requests?
14. Does the Government intend to give effect to said requests? If so, when?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. The work is still being carried on by the contractors to bring the Quebec and Saguenay railway up to the standard. Until contractors have finally ceased work it cannot be considered as completed. During the time the contractors are at work it is deemed advisable that operation of the railway be carried on under their supervision.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. During the current year.

4. Answered by No. 1.

5. The Department of Railways and Canals.

6. Answered by No. 1.

7. Answered by No. 1.

8. Answered by No. 1.

9. The suspension of the daily trains was agreed upon last fall after consultation with the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix Railway Company, who suspended their daily trains in November last.

10. By the Department of Railways and Canals on the recommendation of Mr. Gordon Grant, Chief Engineer, Quebec and Saguenay railway.

11. The business offering did not warrant a daily train service.

12. Yes.

13. Answered by No. 11.

14. As soon as business warrants the running of daily trains this service will be given.

C.G.S. "CHAMPLAIN."

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. How many tenders were received for the purchase of the C.G.S. "Champlain?"
2. What were the names of the respective tenderers and the amount offered by each?

3. Has a sale been finally made of the said steamer?

4. If so, to whom, for what amount and what were the conditions of payment?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1. Five.

2. Gulf of St. Lawrence Shipping and Trading Co., Ltd., Quebec, P.Q., $61,050; R. T. Sainthill & Company, North Sydney, N.S., $55,000 (subject to inspection and approval and received after other tenders opened); Thomas A. Duff, Toronto, $31,500; John C. Hearn, Quebec, $4,500; W. J. Thomson, Quebec, $4,250.

3. No.

4. Conditions of payment, cash.

QUEBEC-MONTMORENCY AND CHARLEVOIX RAILWAY.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Does the Government contemplate taking over the Quebec-Montmorency and Charlevoix Railway for the purpose of linking same with the Quebec and Saguenay Railway under the management of the Canadian Government Railway system?

2. Have there been any negotiations with that object in view?

3. If so, what were they and with whom?

4. If not, will the Government investigate the desirability of such acquisition?

Hon. Mr. REID:

I. The Government did contemplate taking over this line, as will be shown in Bill passed by Parliament on May 18, 1916. Owing to legislation being defective, proceedings were stayed from that time to the present.

2, 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

BANK INTEREST RATE TO GOVERNMENT.

*Mr. KENNEDY:

1. What was the rate of interest allowed by the Canadian banks to the Dominion Government on balances standing to its credit during the fiscal years, 1917, 1918 and 1919?

2. What did said interest amount to during each of the said years?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. Included in the balances due the Dominion Government as reported in the return by chartered banks published in the Canada Gazette are the advances of Dominion notes against securities made by the Department of Finance to the banks for war finance purposes. Upon these advances interest was paid during the years referred to by the banks to the Government at the rate of 3½ per cent and 5 per cent. The interest bearing portion of these balances as shown in the Gazette has varied according to the time of year from approximately 40 per cent to 75 per cent of the total.

During the flotation of the three Victory Loans in the years mentioned the remaining portion of the balances referred to was increased by payments on account of subscriptions. No interest was paid by the banks on this portion of these balances. Heavy payments were called for from time to time necessitating the holding of large balances until the proceeds of the loan were exhausted, and the banks were unable, because of the large and numerous drawings, in the interim, to place an appreciable part in time loans. There is practically no market in Canada for day to day money, and this portion of these balances could not, in consequence, be made remunerative.

2. For the year ending February 28, 1918, $616,743.07; for the year ending February 28, 1919, $2,381,347.08; for the year ending February 29, 1920, $3,202,069.05. Total, $6,200,159.20.

SIR WILLIAM DILLON OTTER.

Mr. ETHIER:

1. What pension is being paid to Sir William Dillon Otter as a retired Field Officer of the Department of Militia and Defence, what is his age and the date of superannuation?

2. What appointments has Sir William Otter held since 1914 and has any salary or allowances been paid him for same? If so, how much?

3. What is the total amount received by him since 1914 to date for any extra services rendered and all amounts paid for handling expenses and disbursements?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. An annual superannuation allowance of $4,100, dating from April 1, 1913. Age 77.

2. Director of Internment Operations at $5,000 per annum.

3. Nothing beyond salary mentioned in No. 2.

SAGUENAY RIVER DREDGING.

Mr. SAVARD:

1. What is the cost of the dredging of the Saguenay river?

2. What is the depth of the channel at low tide?

3. Is the Government aware that, at certain places, there are land slides which may block the said channel?

4. If so, does the Government intend to erect protective walls at these places?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. $522,867.41.

2. 16 feet.

3. No such information.

4. Answered by No. 3.

PORTAL IMMIGRATION HALL.

Mr. GOULD:

1. Are the shingles which are to be used on the Immigration Hall at Portal, Saskatchewan, being purchased in the United States?

2. If so, why are they not being purchased in Canada, thus saving difference in exchange?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1 and 2. Competitive tenders were received to make repairs, including the shingling of roof of building, and contract was awarded to Mr. D. Clarke at $407. No information as to where he purchased his shingles. No question of exchange involved so far as the Government is concerned.

THE TEMISCOUATA RAILWAY.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

Is it the intention of the Government to acquire the Temiscouata railway, which runs from Rivière-du-Loup to Edmundston, N.B., in order to make it a branch of the Canadian National Railway?

Hon. Mr. REID: No.

ST. JOHN RIVER WATER POWERS.

Mr. CALDWELL:

1. Has any person, firm or corporation got a Dominion Charter to develop the water power at Grand Falls, on the St. John river, N.B.?

2. If so, what is the date and what are the terms of such charter?

3. If such a charter exists, why has no development taken place?

Rt. Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. No information.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

RELIEF AND SEED GRAIN ADVANCES IN ALBERTA.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. What was the total amount advanced for relief and seed grain in the years 1914-15 in the Medicine Hat, Lethbridge and Calgary land districts respectively?

2. How much of these advances have been paid back in these land districts respectively?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1.

Land District.	Advances. Seed Grain 1915.	Relief 1914-15.	Total
Calgary	$ 686,583.50	$ 480,598.38	$1,167,181.88
Lethbridge	605,161.20	468,803.53	1,073,964.73
*Medicine Hat	529,179.81	580,750.63	1,109,930.44
	$1,820,924.51	$1,530,152.54	$3,351,077.05

2.

	Repayments. Seed grain principal.	Seed grain interest.	Relief principal.	Relief interest.	Total repayments.
Calgary	$ 538,943.43	$ 57,323.11	$ 280,883.90	$ 30,036.20	$ 907,186.64
Lethbridge	598,983.78	47,382.62	434,852.67	45,007.36	1,126,226.43
*Medicine Hat	400,769.24	25,328.58	334,093.44	26,299.58	786,490.84
	$1,538,696.45	$ 130,034.31	$1,049,830.01	$ 101,343.14	$2,819,903.91

*Note.—The Medicine Hat land office was closed March 13, 1918, and the land included in Lethbridge district. The repayments for Medicine Hat district given above are up to date office closed; subsequent repayments are included in the figures for Lethbridge district.

LA MALBAIE-TADOUSSAC STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Mr. SAVARD:

1. Does the Government intend to do something to replace the service done by the steamer Champlain between La Malbaie and Tadoussac?

2. If so, what?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1. As far as the Department of Marine is concerned, no.

2. Answered by No. 1.

CIVIL SERVICE RECLASSIFICATION TO BE RETROACTIVE.

Mr. STEVENS:

1. Having reference to reclassification of the Civil Service, did the Government pledge itself to the Railway Mail Clerks' Federation to make such reclassification, when finally passed, retroactive?

2. If so, to what date?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill confirming the reclassification this Session?

4. Will such reclassification be made retroactive until April 1, 1919?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1, 2, 3 and 4. It is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill making the reclassification retroactive as from April 1, 1919.

MONTREAL HARBOUR WHARVES.

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

Is it the intention of the Government to go on with the works already begun to the wharves of the Montreal harbour, in Hochelaga Bay?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE: These works are under the charge and direction of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.

The programme of the Harbour Commissioners, as approved by the Government, calls for the construction of a portion of these wharves in the near future.

RECLASSIFICATION OF CIVIL SERVICE.

On the motion of Mr. Ethier:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and reports relating to the reclassification of the Civil Service by American efficiency experts in the employ of the Arthur Young Company; also all documents relating thereto, which have been submitted to, and received by the Civil Service Commission and comprising (a) a list of names who, in consequence of such reclassification and subsequently thereto, resigned from the service; (b) the reasons given in support of such resignations, and (c) the nature of the duties of each person who resigned.

Rt. Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This motion will have to be amended before we can assent to it, for the reasons I gave the other day. The immense amount of correspondence that has taken place would make a very bulky return if brought down and it would require a small army to look after its preparation for a reasonably long campaign period. There is no objection at all to the passing of clauses (a), (b) and (c), and if the motion is amended accordingly, any correspondence with reference to those three clauses will be brought down.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN: I understand that Mr. Ethier has some special cases with which he wishes to deal, and if the minister is agreeable, I think it might be well to let the motion stand until he returns.

Motion stands.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

For a copy of all correspondence and telegrams between the Dominion Government and the Alberta Government relating to irrigation development in Alberta, and more particularly to Lethbridge Northern Irrigation District.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

For a copy of the correspondence between the Minister of Lands and Forests of the Province of Quebec and the Soldiers' Settlement Board.

FLAX PRODUCTION AND SPINNING INDUSTRY DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. S. F. GLASS (East Middlesex) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, National Economics demand that broadest consideration be given to such means as may be necessary to encourage the fullest development of the natural resources of the Dominion.

Propaganda waged during the trying years of war for increased production proved a stimulus that justifies a continuance of similar efforts, especially as regards products of the soil, as from this source, possibly more than from any other, must be created that new-found wealth, so necessary to the up-building of our national structure on broad and permanent foundations.

The exigencies of war have forced upon our country the development of hitherto latent resources, the success of which should impel us to even greater endeavour, so that the country may reap in the most ample measure the economic advantages of all its many and varied products.

To this end further substantial encouragement might be given to extending and developing production in flax, hemp, and other fibres, for which the soil and climatic conditions of different parts of the Dominion have proven their suitability:

First.—By establishing experimental and demonstration stations convenient to the area within which such fibres have been successfully grown, so that scientific instruction and direction may be given to growers in the most modern and approved methods of preparing their fibres for the world's markets.

Secondly.—By lending such encouragement as may be needful to the perfecting of mechanical appliances for harvesting the crop, so that growers may overcome the handicap of competition with cheap labour in foreign countries.

Thirdly.—By scientific standardization and grading of seed and fibres a permanent market may be obtained for our exportable surplus of these products, thus giving our growers an advantage in competing with foreign countries.

Fourthly.—By competent direction and encouragement (by propaganda) in order that production of these fibres may be extended to all of the provinces of the Dominion, wherein the climatic and soil conditions justify the expectation that they may be successfully grown.

Fifthly.—By continuing and further extending such encouragement as may be necessary to develop the spinning industry in Canada, so that in the fullest measure possible the products may be spun into yarns and woven into cloths within the Dominion, in order that the full economic value of our fibres in their many and varied uses may be conserved within the country.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution covers a very wide range of subjects, and I rather imagine that hon. members will surmise at the outset that its latter clauses are those to which I shall more particularly direct their attention this afternoon. I have in the past been very much impressed with the idea that the policy followed in 1916 and 1917 for increased production in this country bore sufficient fruit to justify the continuance of that effort in these times of peace. During these years, when it was necessary not only to produce but also to economize in the use of foodstuffs, it was shown that by scientific direction and encouragement of production and by concerted action we were able not only to increase to a very great extent food production in this country, but also by conservation and thrift to prevent the waste of food products. As a result of these two lines of effort we were able to send to the starving peoples of Europe largely increased supplies of food stuffs. Why should not this propaganda be carried on at the present time? I should like to direct the attention of the House to an item in the Toronto Star of last August giving the opinion of Doctor Hastings, the city medical health officer:

> Regret over the reduction in backyard gardening in Toronto during the past summer is expressed by Dr. Hastings in the current number of the Public Health Bulletin. The doctor points out that over 1,000 of the lots that were cultivated during the war are now bearing only weeds. In 1918, he states there were 5,285 back-yard gardens and vacant lots under cultivation, yielding 528,285,000 pounds of foodstuffs, or as much as was shipped to Europe during any year previous to the war.

The stimulus given to production was in evidence not only in the backyard gardens of the cities and towns, but throughout the whole country. It was shown that the well-directed efforts of the Government had achieved their object of very largely increasing the supply of food products. If it was necessary during the years of the war to increase production in order to accomplish a patriotic and benevolent purpose, because at that time millions of people were on the verge of starvation, why is it not advisable to pursue the same policy to-day, when conditions in Europe would justify us, not only from the standpoint of patriotism and generosity, but from the standpoint of our own material benefits, in using every means possible to increase the products of the soil? Let me direct the attention of the House to an extract which I clipped from the Dominion Agricultural Publication, the author of which, I believe, is one of the heads of the Department of Live Stock Industry of the Department of Agriculture. This extract reads:

> Farmers should not forget that Canada before the war annually produced one-sixteenth of the world's supply of wheat. That shows us the relative size of the market, and is a measure by which our live stock men can gauge their own opening. But in live stock the Dominion lags far behind. It has hitherto only produced enough to feed its own population. Mexico, with a population not quite twice that of the Dominion, annually exports four and-a-half times as many cattle. Argentina, farther away from European markets, and hampered by a 7,000-mile ocean route across the Equator, and with a smaller population than Canada, exports five times as much mutton, and four hundred times as much beef. Denmark, with a population of less than 3,000,000 people, with an area of only 15,300 square miles, i.e., about one-half the size of New Brunswick, and about one-eighteenth the size of Alberta, annually exports four times as much pork products as does the Dominion. But when we come to Australia shipping 3,000 times as much mutton, and little New Zealand shipping 4,000 times as much, our Dominion trade seems to fade out of sight.
> These considerations should be enough to show that our Canadian live stock development has only just begun.

The conditions prevailing in this country to-day are not peculiar to Canada. We find that Europe, like ourselves, is finding it necessary to use every means possible to stimulate the production of foodstuffs there. Lloyd George, as early as August last, called the attention of Great Britain to the conditions then existing, and I shall quote some pregnant remarks of his. Speaking about that time at a public gathering, the British Prime Minister made the following significant statement:

> The Prime Minister significantly remarked that greater production was necessary to enable Labour to maintain the substantial gains it had made during the war. The reduction in the hours of labour had resulted in a corresponding reduction of output in many lines. If the policy of limiting output is not corrected, Great Britain will not long be able to support her present population. . . . .
> Our excess of imports from the United States has cheapened our money across the line. Our export trade must be enlarged to pay for this excess and to meet our extensive war borrowings in the United States. Greater production is imperative to swell our export trade, and thrift is necessary to curtail the importation of luxuries. Canadian labour, like British labour, cannot maintain a standard of living above the value of its production. The world can be saved from economic collapse only by hard work.

I have been very much impressed with the fact, which seems quite evident in this country, and indeed throughout the continent of North America, that too many men are imbued with the falicious idea that they can find a substitute for work. It cannot be done, Sir, and I do not understand how the labour organizations of the country are going to reconcile their policy with the interests of the farmers in trying to reduce the hours of labour even below eight. How can they consistently appeal to the farmers to produce foodstuffs in order that the cost of living may be reduced, while they indolently lie by, reducing their hours of labour to a point where the cost of production must necessarily be enhanced? Labour and the farm must get together. Their interests are naturally allied; but apparently their efforts at the present time are being directed in channels diametrically opposed to each other. No doubt this is due to a lack of proper understanding between them of the respective conditions that prevail in the rural and urban centres. I find that in different parts of Western Ontario there is at present a tendency on the part of chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and business organizations generally, to seek co-operation with the farmers' interests. They ask the farmers to appoint committees and representatives to these organizations, and both sides are gradually getting together and arriving at a proper understanding of each other's position. Every means should be adopted to foster and encourage sympathy and co-operation between labour and the farmers, so that we may work, not for individual or sectional advantage, but for the greata national need and the national interests of the country.

Let me draw the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, to a clipping from the Globe, in regard to present conditions:

"The world to-day is in flux; the ferment of unrest is universal. I believe the course and origin of this unrest is in Europe, and being both political and social, is mainly found in the shortage of food existing through the latter years of the war, and even now existing amongst the European peoples.

There were approximately 300,000,000 people east of the western front concerned with this war, and all Europe, both east and west of the old fighting line, is bare. It is a fact that those European countries, including Asiatic Russia, who were actually engaged in the war, and over whose territories the war was actually fought, produced in 1913, the last complete statistical year, over sixty per cent of the entire bread grains of the world. Taking the four bread grains—wheat, oats, barley and rye—for the year mentioned, the figures strikingly reveal the situation which we of the western world are called upon to meet.

Austro-Hungary, Belgium, Bulgaria, Finland, France, Germany, Italy, Roumania, Russia, Serbia and Turkey produced in 1913—

	Bushels.
Wheat	2,059,733,000
Oats	2,642,079,000
Barley	1,002,345,000
Rye	1,748,448,000
Total	7,452,605,000

The entire world production for the same period was—

	Bushels.
Wheat	4,127,437,000
Oats	4,697,437,000
Barley	1,650,265,000
Rye	1,880,387,000
Total	12,355,526,000

These countries produced one-half of all the wheat produced in the world, a little over one-half of all the oats produced in the world, more than sixty per cent of all the barley produced in the world, and more than ninety-three per cent of all the rye produced in the world.

Mr. Hoover, of the allied food commission, has recently made the statement that not to exceed seventy-seven per cent of a normal crop may be expected in Europe in this present year. The twenty-three per cent shortage, based on 1913 production, would mean a shortage in bread grains in the war-torn countries of 1,714,000,000 bushels, a shortage so huge that even the unprecedented crops of North America in 1919 cannot begin to satisfy.—F. P. Mount of the Advance Rumley Co., at the Industrial Congress in Calgary.

There are two important objects which should engage our earnest consideration in the present unsettled condition of things, and the first is, the necessity for disabusing the mind of the farmer of the opinion that there is any possibility of overproduction in foodstuffs, at least for the time being. With that assurance, and with encouragement to produce to the limit of capacity under the present extraordinary conditions, by which the farmers are enabled to receive such plendid prices for the products of the farm, the problem of the hour would be largely solved. Does it not, therefore, seem a wise policy to encourage the farmers by every means possible, to a maximum of production, with the possible assurance that prices will be well maintained during the present year? Man cannot see far enough to say what is going to happen in this world in the next two, three or four years. It is all guess work, it is all more or less a gamble, but we do know that the supply of food in the whole world is far beneath the requirements to feed the population of the world. We know that millions of people are starving and that the production will only in a small degree alleviate the suffering and misery that exist by reason of this shortage which has accumulated for a period of years. I have very much sympathy with the idea that the farmer wants to be left alone and I do not mean that we should interfere or trespass in any way upon the prerogatives or rights of the farmer but I think the farmer himself will concede that with the facilities at the disposal of the Government and with an organization such as they have throughout all parts of the world, it is quite possible to gather information and present it to him in such a way that it will serve as a guide to him in determining for himself the policy that is best for him to pursue. I have not the slightest doubt as to the conclusion that the farmers, as sound business men, will come to when they have these facts properly presented to them.

I am interested in a small clipping containing a statement, the author of which is Dr. C. A. Zavitz of the Experimental Farm at Guelph, showing that not only by encouragement but by scientific aid and training through the agricultural representatives who are now scattered throughout the various counties and townships of Canada, the farmer is led to the adoption of more scientific methods and as a result greater production takes place. Dr. Zavitz says:

According to the Bureau of Industries for Ontario the increase in yield per acre for the last eighteen years in comparison with the eighteen years previous amounts to 20 per cent for barley, 14 per cent for winter wheat and 10 per cent for oats. These increases in yield per acre for the three crops in the past eighteen years would mean increases in the market values of these crops to the province as follows: Oats, $65,632,441; winter wheat, $35,239,437; barley, $33,795,525, or a total of $134,667,403.

That, Sir, I understand, is not a result attained by cultivating a larger area but it is a result that has been attained by better farming, by the use of better seed and by following scientific directions in the cultivation of the same quantity of land as was used previously. I am not unmindful of the great efforts the provincial departments of agriculture in co-operation with the federal Department of Agriculture are making along these lines and I have no word of criticism in so far as they are concerned, but I do point out that that feature has very materially assisted in increasing foodstuffs and other products of the farm. Having encouraged the maximum of agricultural production, having given all the reasonable assurance that it is possible to give with the information in the hands of the Government that prices are likely to be maintained may we not hope that the national economic value to this country will be so immense and so important that they will be fully justified in the eyes of the people.

The question of waste is also important. During the years of the war we were counteracting to some extent the deficiency in production by economy in the utilization of foodstuffs. We have apparently abandoned that policy at the present time. I realize that at times like this the people want to be pretty well left alone. Whilst these objects were attained by Orders in Council and directions of the Government, I do think that an educational policy that would point out the evil of unnecessary waste of foodstuffs would not be resented by the people and that it would result in a great saving of foodstuffs. After all the extent to which we can help the countries of Europe which need our food is the extent of our surplus for export and if by conserving what we have we increase that surplus we attain our object to the same extent as we would by greater production.

While we increase our production and economize and conserve our products, it is important that our people, in view of the condition of international exchange and of the world-wide conditions, should pay closer attention to the use of the products made in Canada. We have a Canadian Industrial Reconstruction Association which has published a little pamphlet or slip, giving as they are called, "Ten Commandments for Canadian Trade." I was attracted to a signboard in the city of Toronto while I was passing through last week. In large letters there appeared these lines:

Canadian Money,
Canadian Made,
Should stay in Canada
For Canadian Trade.

The ten commandments are as follows:

1. Buy Canadian products. In doing so you develop the home market, encourage factory expansion, provide employment for new populations, and create bigger and better markets for all kinds of farm produce. New factories, expansion of old factories, greater production, more workers and better agricultural markets mean national progress.

2. Import only necessities, and then only if similar Canadian articles or substitutes are not available. With Canadian money at a discount of from 10 to 15 per cent, exchange with the United States is costing Canadian consumers between $75,000,000 and $100,000,000 a year.

3. Produce to the limit in field and factory. Increased production means new wealth, and is essential to the success of any effort to reduce imports and promote export trade.

4. Co-operate, conserve, specialize, standardize. These are the means to maximum production of high quality goods at minimum cost.

(5) Develop export markets. Foreign business gives stability to trade. It reduces unit costs, benefits domestic consumers, affords employment to factory workers in times of depression, and corrects adverse exchange by improving trade balances.

(6) Utilize Canadian services. Ship by Canadian carriers through Canadian ports. Patronize Canadian railways, Canadian steamships, and Canadian banks. Place insurance in Canadian companies. Employ Canadian architects, engineers, scientists, and other experts. Spend vacations in Canada.

(7) Manufacture raw materials to final stages in Canada. Hundreds of million of dollars are lost annually to the Dominion, and especially to Canadian wage earners, by the exportation of raw materials and semi-manufactured products.

(8) Use science for the determination of the development of natural resources. Industrial research will reveal new wealth, improve industrial processes, and help to relieve our economic dependence upon outside sources for fuel, iron and other essentials.

(9) Make quality the hall-mark of Canadian products. In return for public support of the home market, Canadian manufacturers should provide products that compare favourably with imported goods, and Canadian workers should recognize good workmanship and maximum production as their standard.

(10) Be fair to capital. Canadian money should be encouraged to invest at home, and foreign capital attracted to promote Canadian industrial expansion.

To my mind there is nothing suggested in these commandments that should not commend itself to any citizen of Canada who has the interest of national upbuilding and national development at heart.

Now, Sir, I have said that I think we ought to get together. We want the labourer in the city and the labourer on the farm to get a closer understanding of each other and of each other's interests. Someone has said—I think it was in this House I heard the remark some time ago—that the pyramid of national prosperity rests squarely on the base of agricultural production; that there is no prosperity in a country such as ours that does not have its genesis in the soil. Therefore the responsibility resting on the farmers in Canada demands that they should have increased sympathy and support by every means possible, to the end that agriculture shall attain the maximum of efficiency in production.

The farmers occupy an outstanding position in our social system. They foot the bill for the nation. The farmer is the foundation stone which carries the whole deadweight of the natural structure. In effect he is the national paymaster general. He is the greatest consumer of manufactured goods and the greatest user of transportation. The total production of farms in the Dominion of Canada last year—I think, Sir, this is a significant thing and bears testimony to the splendid energy, the splendid courage and the splendid devotion with which the farmers of this country responded to the call for production—with a population presumed to be about nine millions was equal to the total production of the farms of the United States in the year 1880 when that country had fifty millions of people. That a people of nine millions should produce an amount of foodstuff equal to the production of a people of fifty millions certainly to my mind redounds to the credit of Canada. It will be seen, Sir, that the new found wealth created by the farms of this country in a single year equals the total net national debt of the country. Is that not significant? Does not that bear testimony to the splendid service that agriculture is rendering the country at the present time? Nevertheless it is only a tithe of what may be expected under well directed co-operation and organization through the several departments of agriculture, and the local branches which are being established throughout the different provinces of the Dominion. We are asked for increased production. This does not mean for the individual more work or harder work, but it does mean more efficient work and a new attitude towards work, a desire to make every stroke tell to the utmost. In a word it means willing, painstaking, and well directed effort, backed by capital and guided by science, to bring our acres to the fullest fertility, to build up and utilize adequately our forest resources, our fisheries and our mines, to develop and co-ordinate our transportation systems, to develop our water-powers advantageously and to distribute widely the resulting power—to check reckless waste and encourage the effective use of all our resources to the end that we may establish better and more satisfying types of rural life.

The waste of lumber is deplorable. As Mark Twain said about the weather we all talk about it but do nothing. Take pine; the value of resin, turpentine, ethol, alcohol, pine, tar, charcoal, lost in this waste represents three or four times the value of the lumber produced but great as is this loss it is modest compared with our colossal fire waste. We have been prodigal wasters, reckless destroyers, mere skimmers of cream. If we are to meet our national needs and build up sanely our superstructure on safe and sound foundations we must change the policy which has guided us in the past. Unrestricted individualism must now give way to controlled co-operation guided by a constructive economic policy which shall be nation wide in scope. We must bring to the solution of peace problems the unity and cohesive power developed throughout the war. Sir, let us be a nation of builders, creators, and distributors. Let us be proud of our country. It is time to build, time to unite, time for trade and for brotherhood. Let us be glad we are Canadians and let us stand for Canadian institutions. Let us have a little more patience, a little more charity for all, a little more devotion, less bowing down to the past and more looking forward to the future when Canada will be ripe for a great burst of light and life.

I now, Sir, leave the introductory part of my speech because, as hon. members may have surmised, I have more interest in presenting to them the unusual conditions surrounding that subject which I have directed to the attention of the House for some years back, viz, the flax industry of this country. I first drew the attention of the House to the very important subject of flax culture in 1916, and the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. J. E. Armstrong) preceded me in the good work in 1915. While we have very good reason to commend the federal Department of Agriculture—we have received very little support from the Departments of Agriculture of the provinces—I am still of opinion that that department has not put sufficient force into its work during the last four or five years to fully develop the possibilities of flax culture in this country.

Mr. BURNHAM: Might I ask my hon. friend if he is opposed to the theory enunciated yesterday by members of the Opposition, that all these matters should be left to private individuals?

Mr. GLASS: Perhaps my hon. friend will pardon me for not answering him now. In a few minutes I am going to direct his attention to a report concerning flax growing, published by authority of the British Parliament, in which a very full answer will be found to his question.

The flax industry is not new in this country; in fact, it dates back three hundred years ago when a Frenchman named Hebert grew flax on the banks of the St. Lawrence, and since that time the habitants have developed the culture of flax for their individual use, and they have become so expert with the hand loom that they are able to weave cloth of the finest texture. Indeed, I understand that robes for the clergy in the province of Quebec are made from these fine cloths.

Unfortunately flax culture has not advanced in this country in any degree corresponding with the importance which it bears to the great textile industry of the world, and naturally the question is asked, Why? I think the duty of finding an answer to that question devolves upon the Government. We have heard it said: Here is an opportunity to encourage flax growing in this country, for the stress of war has brought about conditions that never prevailed before and which should act as a strong stimulus to our farmers to produce flax. But the pessimists ask: How do we know that these conditions will continue for any length of time? How do we know that within two or three years Russia, which formerly produced eighty per cent of the world's flax crop, may not be again producing fibre at such a cost as would make it impossible for our growers to compete?

In answer to such questions, I want to tell the House that if Russia cannot produce a better quality of fibre than she produced before the war, our growers need have no fear whatever of being driven from the field. Under the direction of the Federal Department of Agriculture, backed by the persistent efforts of our growers, the cultivation of flax has reached such a high standard that Russia would have to very greatly improve her methods to be able to compete with the product of this country. We have achieved that progress, Sir, during the last few years, and at the present time Canadian fibre is finding a ready sale in the markets of Great Britain, Ireland, Belgium and France, the highest grades of linen being manufactured in Europe from fibre grown in this country.

3 p.m.

Now, Sir, I regret our paucity of production of fibre when I realize its enormous economic value to the country at the present time. If this country produced 100,000 tons of fibre at the world's current minimum market price—I say minimum because there are prices away beyond the price I have in mind—the economic value to this country would be $200,000,000. Is not such a valuable industry worth developing? Yet with all the effort directed during the past two or three years towards encouraging the production of flax our maximum production in any one year has not exceeded 3,300 tons.

Some of our farmers felt rather anxious lest with the re-action following peace the price of flax would drop so low that there would be no advantage to them in producing the fibre. Directly the opposite has been the result, Sir. To-day the minimum price in the markets of France, Belgium and Ireland is $600 a ton above the highest price current during the whole period of the war. The whole world is to-day starving for this material. We in Canada have demonstrated that we can grow a fibre of the highest quality, and yet our total production for last year was only a miserable 2,400 tons. It is true that is worth $5,000,000, and including the seed, $6,000,000; but to my mind there is no reason why with proper education and encouragement our farmers should not have produced $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 worth.

Throughout the centuries certain fundamental objections have existed to the growth of this product. Primarily the farmer is of the opinion that its culture is injurious to the land. I submit that if there be one thing a Government can do by proper propaganda work it is to once for all, by liberally advertising in the agricultural press, to dispel this objection. I may say that I do not care very much for the pamphlets which are issued from time to time, as I think they are a very poor medium of communicating with the farmer. My suggestion would be that the Agricultural Gazette might well be dispensed with. I am convinced that the same amount of money spent in an extensive advertising campaign through the agricultural press would bring far better results.

I find that notwithstanding the discussion that has taken place in this House year after year hon. members are still quite frequently impressed with the fact that the cultivation of this crop is very injurious to the soil, and I think steps should be taken to completely disabuse the minds of our people on this point. In the discussion in 1916 I quoted from Mr. Zavitz of the Experimental Farm, and his opinions will be found in the Hansard of that year. He said:

> The actual amount of fertilizing constituents taken from the soil by different crops is an important matter from the farmer's standpoint. To secure this information it is necessary to have a knowledge of both the yields and the chemical composition of the crops. Unfortunately, the statistics gleaned by both the Dominion and the Provincial Governments do not furnish sufficient data for these calculations.

For instance, the Ontario Bureau of Industries has not collected information in regard to yields of seed and straw of flax or of straw of cereals. At the Agricultural College, however, accurate determinations are made from year to year of the yields of both grain and straw per acre of the different farm crops.

Flax, winter wheat, oats and barley have been grown under similar conditions in the experimental grounds at Guelph in each of the past twelve years. The varieties used for these determinations of the comparative exhaustiveness of soil fertility were common flax, Dawson's Golden Chaff winter wheat, Banner oats and Mandscheuri barley. In each case the chaff was included with the straw. The flax was grown in duplicate plots each year with an average of seventy-seven pounds of seed per acre, and the average returns, therefore, represent twenty-four tests in the twelve-year period.

For the chemical composition the figures used were obtained from the 1915 edition of 'Feeds and Feeding' by Henry and Morrison, with the exception of those of flax straw, which are not given in that publication. For the chemical composition of the flax straw, use has been made of the figures determined by Kennedy in his thesis prepared at the Ontario Agricultural College. The flax was obtained from the Field Husbandry Department, and it was analysed in the chemical department of this institution. The following table gives the average annual yields for the twelve-year period and the amount of fertilizing constituents obtained through the sources previously indicated:

Variety.		Yield per acre.		Nitrogen N.		Phosphoric acid, P 205.		Potash, K 20.
		Bushels and tons.	Pounds.	Per Cent.	Total in crop (Lbs).	Per Cent.	Total in crop (Lbs).	Per Cent.	Total in crop (Lbs).
Common.	Seed	18.3	1024	3.62	37.1	1.50	15.4	.95	9.7
Flax.....	Straw...	2.45	4900	.72	35.3	.31	15.2	1.02	50.00

I do not know that it is necessary to read the figures; but as they are very important and are the result of scientific research spread over a period of years, I would suggest that it might not be amiss, if, with the consent of the House, the figures were repeated in Hansard. They are very important, as one of the greatest objections the farmers has to the growing of flax is the wrong impression he has that it is injurious to the soil.

I now give the answer, on the authority of Mr. R. J. Hutchinson, chief officer, Division of Economic Fibre Plants, in the year 1918, to the question "Is flax a specially exhausting crop?" Mr. Hutchinson says:

> This question is usually answered by our farmers in the affirmative, but this opinion does not appear to be warranted by the chemical analysis which have been made of this crop, showing the principal elements of fertility taken from the soil during the period of its growth. The results which have been obtained by chemical examination have furnished the following figures, which represent approximately the plant food removed from the soil by flax, wheat and oats.
> An acre of flax producing 15 bushels of seed and 2,000 pounds of straw takes from the soil 26 pounds nitrogen, 14.86 pounds phosphoric acid, and 9.28 pounds potash, for the 840 pounds of seed, and 20 pounds nitrogen, 9 pounds phosphoric acid, and 28 pounds potash for the straw, a total of 46 pounds nitrogen, 23.86 pounds phosphoric acid, and 37.28 pounds potash.
> A crop of wheat, yielding 25 bushels of grain and 2,200 pounds straw to the acre, would take from the soil 28.5 pounds nitrogen, 12.68 pounds phosphoric acid, and 8.54 pounds potash, for the 1,500 pounds grain, and 12.03 pounds nitrogen, 4.96 pounds phosphoric acid, and 20.57 pounds potash for the straw, a total of 40.53 pounds nitrogen, 17.64 pounds phosphoric acid, and 29.11 pounds potash.

Comparisons are also made with oats and other cereal crops, but I do not think it is necessary to delay the House in dealing with that matter.

I should like also to direct the attention of the House to a statement made by the Seed Commissioner. The opinion has existed amongst farmers that flax is a dirty crop, and you cannot disabuse the mind of the farmer of that false impression. There is, however, a plain reason which can be communicated to the farmer. In years gone by there was not proper machinery for cleaning the flax seed, and as a result of that the farmer got what he sowed. If weed seeds were in the seed that was sown, naturally he would get a crop of weeds. I wish to direct the attention of the House to a bulletin published by the Seed Commissioner in 1915 in which he was examining some flax seeds. He says:

> The noxious weed seeds in the sample containing 15,424 per pound were made up as follows: Wild mustard 11,936, false flax 1,792, wild oats 1,280, hare's-ear mustard 288, and stickseed 128. It also contained 11,616 other weed seeds per pound, mostly lamb's quarters. This sample was taken in central Saskatchewan and represented seed that had been in the stack over winter and threshed the following May. It was sown at the rate of one-half bushel per acre, which would put approximately 2,700 noxious and 2,000 other seeds on each square rod.

That would give approximately that quantity of weed seeds in each square rod. Surely there would be reason to expect that unfortunate results would follow the sowing of such seed.

We have during the last few years, by force of circumstances, given evidence to Great Britain and, indeed, to the world at large that Canada can produce flax and flax seed for quality and fibre equal to the best standards of the world. I directed the attention of the House last session, in 1916, and also in 1918, to the importance of standardizing and also of protecting the reputation that we were building around our flax seed products. I am glad to say that the then Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar), following the suggestions made in the debate of last year and further encouraged by the hon. member for Lambton East (Mr. J. E. Armstrong) at that time, has taken measures to protect the standards and the reputation attained for Canadian flax seed in Great Britain. What has the Department of Agriculture done? This order from the Seed Branch published in the early part of last autumn has had the unanimous support of the flax growers of Western Ontario and their unanimous co-operation in safeguarding the interests of shippers of seed from this country. This circular from the Department of Agriculture says:

> In order to safeguard your export trade in Ireland through the maintenance of a uniform standard of high quality seed, the Federal Department of Agriculture has made provision for an inspection and grading service for the flax seed crop of 1919. It may be expected that for years to come Ontario seeds will come into keen competition with Japanese, Dutch and Russian seeds, and unless Ontario can insure the Irish trade with a quality of seed that will compare at least favourably with that from the countries mentioned, you will be much handicapped in maintaining your market. You are offered the following service:—
> Any flax seed producer in the province of Ontario upon application to the office of the Seed Branch, 28 Front St., East, Toronto, may procure inspection for his seeds, subject to provisions, to wit:
>
> 1. Producer must have at least a carload of 400 bags ready cleaned for inspection (see standards herein described.)
> 2. The seed must be properly bagged in sacks of standard and uniform quality, net weight 189 lbs. and each sack must be securely sewed and sealed.
> 3. Each sack must be branded in red letters, (a) Ontario Fibre Flax Seed growth of 1919, Grade No..... Inspected by..... Department of Agriculture, Canada. (b) On the other side must be branded the shipper's name and address and the words "Certificate Number" followed by a space in which the number may be branded when known.

So that every bag of seed that is sent overseas bears a number which is recorded by the Department of Agriculture and the name of the man who inspected it. Thus, the man who is responsible for inspection and the man who produces the seed are both known to the department:

> 4. The grower must submit a representative sample of his seed for germination test to the Seed Branch, Ottawa, at least one week before the date of shipment to tide water.
>
> After compliance with the foregoing, the inspector shall be authorized to issue a certificate to accompany the bill of lading to Ireland. The number of the certificate shall correspond with the number on the sacks of the shipment and the Department of Agriculture in Ireland shall be so notified.
>
> For producers who have not appliances for cleaning the seed to standard, provision has been made whereby they may have their seed cleaned at any of the following points:
>
> Canada Flax Mills, Seaforth, Ont.
> H. Fraleigh, Forest, Ont.
> A. L. McCredie, St. Mary's, Ont.
> Canada Flax and Seed Co., Oshawa, Ont.
> whereat inspection services may be procured and the seed cleaned to standard at not more than 11c per bushel, including the following charges; unloading, elevating, cleaning, rebagging, sewing, sealing, reloading, five days storage and insurance. Those who ship to these points will be required to remove chaff, etc., with a fanning mill before shipping for cleaning. Owner of seed shall pay for his own bags. All screenings shall be returned to him unless other instructions are given.

The growers of Western Ontario submitted their flax seed to proper cleaning methods at the different points. Germination tests were held, and the seed was examined thoroughly and bagged, and the result has been that every bag of seed that has gone to Ireland this year, amounting in the aggregate to over 100,000 bushels, carried upon it the stamp of standardization by the Department of Agriculture in Canada. The standards fixed were fairly high, and if I had any criticism to make in that direction I would suggest that it might have been possible to establish a No. 1 Extra standard, in addition to the others. The grade standards that have been fixed for Ontario Fibre flaxseed for 1919 are as follows:

No. 1. Flax seed for seeding purposes shall be mature, sound, dry and sweet; shall be practically free from seeds of other cultivated plants; shall be free from noxious weed seeds within the meaning of the Seed Control Act (1 noxious weed seed per oz.) shall be well cleaned and graded to remove light and damaged kernels common weed seeds and other foreign matter and shall be capable of germinating at least 90 per cent. Certificates of this grade may be issued for Ontario Fibre Flax Seed providing that the seed is accompanied by an affidavit of pedigree or certificate of registration satisfactory to the Chief Seed Inspector.

No. 11. Flax Seed shall be the same as No. 1 in all respects except that it may contain 5 noxious weed seeds to the ounce.

Standard sacks may be procured, properly branded, upon application to the Department of Agriculture, Ottawa.

Producers shall seal sacks that have been inspected and have come up to the required standards with seals supplied by the Seed Branch (Toronto Office). Presses will be lent for this purpose.

What has been the result of the precautions taken by the department in this matter? I have before me a copy of the Irish Telegraph, published at Belfast, I believe, dated December 15, 1919, and in large type I find the following—and this is very important because our market for years to come for a very large amount of the seed we produce must necessarily be Ireland:

Canadian (Genuine Ontario) Fibre Flaxseed, Dutch Child, has for some years given yields and values of flax in Ireland superior to those obtained from Blue Blossom Dutch of the best brands.

The Irish Department of Agriculture has made careful and extended tests, comparing the various seed supplies on the basis of yields and values. For 1919 these tests resulted as follows:

	Stones per acre	Value per acre
Dutch Blue Blossom	24	£47
Canadian (Ontario) Fibre ..	26	52
Greater Return from Ontario	2	5

This would justify a farmer in paying as much as thirty shillings per bag more for Canadian (Ontario) Fibre Seed than for Dutch. These results are common in the experience of farmers throughout Ulster.

The Canadian Government this year considered it desirable to inspect and control the supplies of Genuine Ontario Fibre Flaxseed so as to enable Irish growers to be certain of getting their supplies of that seed without danger of substitution or adulteration. All such inspected and controlled seed is shipped in bags of 189 pounds each with the Canadian Government Brand printed on each bag in large red type and bearing Grade No. 1 and Shipper's Certificate No. All such branded seed germinated 90 per cent or better, with no more than 2 per cent of impurities. Dealers or the Department of Agriculture will advise farmers as to the Brand, the value thereof, etc.

The reason why we have this market is that conditions during the war forced the growers of Great Britain and Ireland to solve the problem of an insufficient seed supply. Ireland is in this peculiar position: While they can grow a fair quality of flax there, just as good perhaps as we grow in Ontario, and there is none better, they are unable to preserve any seed on account of climatic conditions. The flax is pulled by the roots when it is more or less immature, before it has reached what we call the ripe stage, and the peculiar weather conditions of Ireland prevent the maturing of the seed after the flax has been pulled, notwithstanding that the sap remains in the straw on account of the flax being pulled by the roots. Another reason is that the season for dew retting the flax is so short that after the flax is pulled the farmer cannot leave it in stook long enough to ripen, even if the sun would ripen it, and still have a sufficiently long season left to complete the retting of his crop. Therefore, Ireland, and Great Britain to a very large extent, have in years past depended upon a new supply of seed from year to year, and they have obtained their seed from Holland. This seed originated in Siberia—Riga seed it was called—and it was then grown one year, and sometimes two, in Holland. If it were grown one year in Holland, it was called Dutch Child. Year after year crops were grown with new seed purchased in Holland. If the seed had been developed for two years in Holland it came out as Dutch Grandchild. Up until that time we in Canada, for want of experiment and experience, had been under the impression that, like Great Britain and Ireland, we had to buy our seed from Holland from year to year. While some growers took the seed purchased in Holland and grew it on their farms for a year and possibly two or three years, nevertheless the impression prevailed generally that the seed must be renewed after a period of three or four years or its vitality would run out and as good a quality of fibre could not be produced. Therefore each year the grower in Ontario would grow some of this Dutch seed to produce seed for the next year's crop. Saving the seed for fibre purposes was not, of course, a matter of very great concern to Ontario growers at that time, but in the year 1916 Great Britain found that there was no seed available from Riga, and not sufficient available from Holland. They could not produce the seed from their own crops in Ireland, so they commenced to look to new fields for the seed necessary to crop the land for flax. Then for the first time the experiment was tried of using fibre seed produced in Canada for growing flax in Ireland, and from the very commencement the experiment met with success. Year after year it was shown that with the Ontario seed better results were attained, and I am at liberty to say that at seven different competitive shows held in Ireland last year fibre produced from seed grown in Ontario in 1918 won first prize over competitors from the rest of the world. We have therefore developed from the position of being a non-exporter of seed to the position where last year Canada was almost the sole source of supply for the Mother Country. We have attained an enviable reputation. I can understand that in the stress of circumstances Great Britain and Ireland might say at that time: " This is the best that is available and we shall try it out and see what the outcome will be." The fact, however, that as a result of that seeding we produced a fibre higher in quality than anything produced in Great Britain or Ireland last year is attributable to the merit and value of our seeds, and justifies the very great care that has been exercised by the Department of Agriculture in jealously guarding the reputation that we made during those years. An hon. member, as I came into the House this afternoon, said to me: " What do you want to have done in this matter? Do you want a bonus or a bounty?" I replied: " No, we want scientific direction and help in order to achieve a larger and better production." As I have said before, if Canada is to retain the position she so proudly holds to-day in the production of flax fibre we must not be satisfied with the standards we have at present; there must be constant direction and scientific aid on the part of the Department of Agriculture, and the object must be primarily not so much a larger tonnage but a better quality which is the factor that will count in the home markets and the markets of the world in the years to come. Canada's soldiers have won for her an indelible reputation in Europe and one that we have every reason to be deeply proud of, and it is but right that we should also jealously guard our reputation for honesty in the products of our industry by every zealous safeguard that can be devised, and by careful standardization, so that the people of England, who have evinced such confidence in our loyalty to the Empire during the war, will be equally confident, as the years go by, in the honest value of every product which leaves the shores of Canada.. We had before us for consideration the other evening the subject of the standardization of butter, cheese and dairy products. I am a thorough believer in standardization, and my firm conviction is that if we are to get the best results from flax we shall have to aim at higher standards in quality. If we do so we shall more quickly gain a permanent market than by any other method; and I submit to the minister, while I am on the subject the desirability of adding to the standard of seed that is already established, especially in regard to No. 1 extra which will germinate ninety-five per cent. It is quite possible that we have growers in this country who will produce seed of this standard, but while seed that will germinate ninety per cent is of good quality, the man who produces seed germinating ninety-five per cent is entitled to better and further consideration than the grower who produces at the lower standard. I do urge that the highest quality and reputaion that we can attain is a matter of the greatest importance and concern to us. In this resolution which is before the House, referring to what has been already done, I am not unmindful of the energy, the support and the boost which the Department of Agriculture has afforded; but I say—and I trust my remarks may not be misconstrued—that there has hardly been all the "pep" and all the boost which was justified under the very unusual conditions that have prevailed. In other words, I feel that after four years of propaganda and efforts in this matter, we are just about as far as we might reasonably have been expected to have been in one year. We are grateful for what has been accomplished, but we hope for greater accomplishment along the lines to which I have directed the attention of the House during the last few years. The standardization of seed is important, and one of the matters proposed in this resolution is the standardization of fibre. This is nothing new in this House, because it has been constantly urged upon the Government during the past four or five years.

We must have standardization of fibre if we are to build up a reputation in the markets of Europe. For the first time in the history of the industry we have had Belgian, French and Irish buyers right in our country going up amongst the mills and buying our product for the home market. With the reputation which these mills have attained in Belgium, France and Ireland, if we have been able to produce a raw material that meets the needs of these countries, can we not look forward with confidence to greater development and a larger increase in our production? The markets of these countries are literally starving to-day for flax which we should be able to supply. I desire to mention an incident which should be of great interest to farmers. I happened to have a conversation with Mr. Graham who lives in the township of Nepean in the county of Carleton, and who is a very successful farmer, farming two hundred acres of land. He informed me that the Department of Agriculture was anxious that someone in the locality should put in fifteen acres of flax last year, primarily to demonstrate that the peculiar climate, soil and conditions of this part of the country were adapted to the production of this crop. Before I proceed, I may say that there are two brothers Graham in partnership and the gentleman with whom I had the pleasure of conversing is Deputy Reeve of the township of Nepean, and a prominent man of enviable repute Yesterday he told me that he finally decided to put in fifteen acres of flax, the Department of Agriculture having proposed that if he would grow a crop, pull it and deliver it to the mill at the Experimental Farm, they would ret it—they do tank retting—scutch it, and prepare it for the market, charging him the cost of the operation and giving him the fibre. Now, after paying every cost to which he was liable, charging rent for the land used, paying for the seed, paying for all the labour of pulling and scutching and putting his fibre on the market, that fifteen acres produced a net profit of over $4,000. What was the result? Messrs. Graham Brothers made out of that fifteen acres more than they made out of the other hundred and sixty or hundred and seventy-five acres farmed altogether. They are now establishing a mill in the district of Bowmanville, renting an area of ground at some expense, and during the current year intend to develop about four hundred acres of flax for fibre. This suggestion, for purposes of demonstration, on the part of the Department of Agriculture has brought success to these men, shown them the possibilities of an industry, and stimulated them to get into a broader sphere of production, so that instead of fifteen acres they will this year have four hundred acres under flax. This is interesting. If such results can be attained in the way they have been attained in this district—and the same results are being repeated in western Ontario as well as around Oshawa, Bowmanville, Whitby, and all those districts—what would be the possibilities in economic wealth if under proper stimulus we grew an acreage of half a million acres instead of a paltry 13,000 or 15,000 acres?

Flax has many and varied uses. It must necessarily be used not only for textile purposes but for many other purposes. It will naturally become an important raw material in the industries of our country. Primarily, it is used for linen; that is the highest use to which it is put. Flax is used for spinning threads, for linen threads used for sewing shoes, sewing harness, and making fishing nets. The fishermen can use nothing else because no other fibre or twine of any description will stand the strain and the wear and tear. Flax is also used in upholstering in the form of the waste flax or the tow that comes from the fibre. There is a market for it in that way at a price that only the finest flax could bring a very few years ago. There is a large concern in Tonawanda, New York, which uses our Canadian-grown flax, to which nothing is done except breaking through a break and crushing the straw. They use it in manufacturing quilts, and the resiliency of these quilts is almost equal to that of the finest down. They also use it in making pillows and cushions. No amount of crushing can take away the resiliency that exists in this material. This shows that there are many and varied uses to which flax can be put. Mr. Archibald, the director of experimental farms, speaking in Toronto not long ago, discussed the question of flax. What did Mr. Archibald say? He is reported in the Globe to have said:

> "Undoubtedly. We can grow a quality of fibre equal to that produced in Ireland, and the pulling problem has been solved. The great difficulty in the past has been in getting labour for pulling. Hand labour is no longer necessary for that purpose. We have assisted an inventor in perfecting a mechanical flax-puller. That machine, capable of pulling four or five acres a day, is now being made in a commercial way, and it will simply revolutionize the whole flax-growing industry."

I am rather of the opinion that we have not given sufficiently forcible aid to the development of machinery for the pulling of flax. It is even a question yet as to whether this machine has been brought to a state of perfection, but I understand that certain improvements have been made to the machine that has been on the market for three or four years, and it is likely that a successful machine will be in operation this year.

My hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) asked me a question a short while ago. I desire at this stage to refer to the conditions of flax production in the Empire of Great Britain. I have before me the interim report to the board of trade of the Empire flax growing committee on the general situation and immediate prospects of a supply of flax fibre. It is dated April, 1918. This is the last report presented to the Imperial Parliament, and some very interesting data appears in it. On the general position of the flax raising industry it says:

The problem of flax supply involves the consideration of two questions. The first question, that of the supply of fibre, is closely dependent on the second, namely, the provision of seed, but the considerations affecting the two questions are so different that it has been thought desirable throughout this report to treat them separately.

1. Fibre Supply.

The following table, based on normal pre-war figures supplied by the Board of Trade, gives the world's commercial crops (i.e., excluding domestic consumption), and the mill consumption of the chief flax manufacturing countries:

	*Commercial crop.	*Mill consumption.
Russia	400	80
United Kingdom	12	100
Belgium	24	130
France	20	48
Germany and Austria	36	140
Other countries	14	8
Total	506	506

*In thousands of tons.

It would not be safe to take these figures as anything more than rough approximation to the actual position, but the only further information available is that Russia's total pre-war product was normally about 500,000 tons, and of this about 250,000 tons was usually exported. About 80,000 to 100,000 tons was consumed in the Russian factories, so that in the absence of direct statistics we must infer that about 200,000 tons of the Russian crop was used up by domestic consumption.

It is estimated that of the annual requirements of the United Kingdom before the war, which as indicated above were normally about 100,000 tons, Ireland contributed some 10,000 tons, Belgium, France and Holland together about 10,000, and Russia about 70,000 to 80,000 tons.

It will be seen that even under the conditions prior to the war a very small amount of the supply was in Great Britain and Ireland and that a very small proportion of the world's production of fibre came from France and Belgium. About 80,000 tons came from Russia for spinners in Great Britain. The future is encouraging in this respect that Russia is so demoralized at the present time that there would seem to be no possibility of any return to normal conditions. But even if Russia could return to normal conditions the product of her mills prior to the war was so inferior to that which is being supplied by Canada and these other countries to-day that she would not be a strong competitor against the high quality, standardized fibre produced in this country. The report continues:

The effect of the war upon all these external sources of supply was nothing short of disastrous. The flax growing districts in Belgium and parts of Northern France were the first to be overrun by the enemy, and the collapse of Russia in 1917 practically removed the principal remaining source of supply. The Dutch crop has also been very seriously reduced by war conditions, while the share of that crop obtainable by the United Kingdom was reduced to a minimum. The districts where Russian flax is produced are still not freely accessible to the British industry, while the free export of flax from Belgium, Holland, and Northern France is unlikely to be resumed for some time to come. The question of obtaining supplies from other sources, therefore, became during the war, and still is, of the first importance for the British linen industry.

The committee goes on to say:

In Ireland, however, flax growing persisted on a much larger scale, not only because the climate seems to be peculiarly suited for it, but also because the spinning and weaving of the resultant fibre had there been developed on a large scale in the North;

I submit that statement would seem to justify the argument that I have presented to the House that if we are going to develop this industry we must develop the manufacturing of the fibre into yarns and the manufacturing of the yarns into cloth. Therefore the devolopment and encouragement of the spinning industry must necessarily go hand in hand with the development and increase of fibre production.

The report goes on to say:

In Ireland, however, flax growing persisted on a much larger scale, not only because the climate seems to be peculiarly suited for it, but also because the spinning and weaving of the resultant fibre had there been developed on a large scale in the North; principally, however, because the crop suited the small farmer class who form the majority of the Irish rural population. The highest point in the acreage was during the cotton famine in the sixties, when the abnormal conditions of the cotton industry naturally gave a great impetus to the flax industry, but after that date the acreage declined considerably. This was mainly due to the low price at which common or medium flaxes were imported from Russia, and the superior quality of those imported from Belgium. Even before the war, therefore, the general situation of the trade with regard to the supply of its raw material was becoming unsatisfactory. Consumption had overtaken production, and manufacturers were faced with scarcity.

The committee soon realized that the problem of increasing the production of flax was not only an agricultural but an industrial one. Given a supply of seed, excellent flax can be grown in many parts of the Empire, and the United Kingdom itself is probably unsurpassed both in soil and climate for the growth of flax. The real difficulty arises from the fact that the harvesting of the crop and its preparation for the spinning mills involve a demand for labour which is difficult to meet under the present system of working in countries such as the United Kingdom, where labour is scarce and dear. No such difficulty arises in the production of seed, either for linseed or for sowing for fibre. Where no attempt is made to recover the fibre, as in Western Canada, the crop can be harvested and threshed by the ordinary machinery used for all cereal crops. It remains to be seen, however, whether it would be profitable to do so in the United Kingdom.

If there is to be any permanent increase of the acreage under flax in the United Kingdom, there will have to be an entire change in the system under which the crop has formerly been grown and handled. Under the system prevailing in Ireland, the farmer not only grows the flax but also puts it through the first manufacturing process, known as "retting." The next process, known as "scutching," is also done in small local scutching mills, generally on account of the farmer. Thus what the grower sells is not simply raw material, but a partly manufactured article, the trade being in this respect almost unique. The objection to this system is that in effect it limits the production and greatly restricts the possibility of improvement in the quality of the product. Where retting is done entirely under natural conditions, i.e., without artificial heating of the water, the process is necessarily limited to that portion of the year during which the natural temperature of the water is sufficiently high to allow of the retting being satisfactorily done. The desired temperature of between sixty and eighty degrees Fahrenheit can only be obtained naturally in Ireland during a very limited period in summer and autumn. This means that the amount of the crop that can be handled is restricted by the amount of labour available to rush the crop through the retting process in that limited period. This again reacts upon the quality of the crop. It is said that owing to the rush of the work, and also to the lack of scientific knowledge and expert skill which cannot be expected of small farmers, the quality of the product is seriously impaired. Again, the small scutching mills which have to be scattered all over the flax-growing districts, are probably far from perfect in their equipment and the skill of their labour, which results in a loss both of quantity and quality in the flax turned out, for bad handling means an undue proportion of tow, which, of course, means a corresponding loss of good flax.

It has now become generally accepted that to meet this difficulty it is necessary to introduce an entirely new method, which has already been instituted in various experimental areas, some of which date back considerably before the war. The new system is that the flax should be bought from the farmer "on foot," as it is called (i.e., as a standing crop in the field), or delivered pulled and dried, and that the whole process of retting and scutching should be undertaken by the purchaser, who, working on a large scale and at centralized points in well-equipped factories, would be able to have the best machinery and appliances of all kinds for the purpose. At the same time by introducing the process of controlled retting with artificial heating of the water, this system would get rid of the limitation of time imposed by the shortness of the season available for natural retting, so that a longer period would be available for the handling of the year's crop.

Probably the greatest permanent difficulty in securing an adequate production of flax in this country, either in Ireland or Great Britain, is the labour supply for the actual harvesting of the crop. Flax must, if possible, be pulled, not cut, and the difficulty of getting sufficient labour to handle the crop just at the time when other crops are ready for harvesting, has been so great as to require in England and Scotland special arrangements for imported temporary labour. The measures which have been adopted at considerable expense during war time would not be available, even if they were profitable in peace time; and it is greatly desired that some mechanical means of getting over this difficulty should be discovered. Several varieties of pulling machines have so far been produced, but all of them are apparently still more or less in the experimental stage. Complete success in this direction would, however, alter also the whole question with regard to flax growing, especially in Great Britain.

The point to which I wish to draw the attention of the House is that the conditions we find here are almost the same as they encounter in Great Britain and Ireland, and that the difficulties that present themselves over there to-day are the same difficulties that present themselves here. Old, as this industry is, dating back some two thousand years, it would seem as if man had not completely by his ingenuity developed a machine suitable for the pulling of this flax in the field. Now, as early as 1916 I saw a machine in operation; it was the one to which the minister referred last year towards the completion of which the Government were lending some assistance. I saw that machine working, and representatives were also present from the British, United States and other Governments, who were vitally interested in its development. At that time I wrote a letter to the Minister of Agriculture and urged that in my opinion it would be a good policy—seeing that the machine was so near a state of perfection and yet came short of it—that the best mechanical expert that could be secured in the Dominion should be sent to the locality to watch the machine at work in the field; to follow it round for a week or two if necessary, and lend his mechanical skill to assist the inventor in overcoming the difficulties which rendered the machine imperfect. However nothing was done and matters went on until the next year. While some improvements were made and people were waiting for the completion of the pulling machine, it was still in an unsatisfactory and unfinished condition. That was the condition last year. I then saw the machine pulling in the field and thought it did marvellous work. There were certain mechanical difficulties attaching to its operation which rendered it not in any sense a perfect machine; but I am told, Sir, that a large concern in the town of Goderich, Ontario, has purchased all the patent rights of this machine and has improved it by the use of ball bearings to reduce the amount of friction. I am also told that in operating it this year a gasoline engine that will work independently is attached to the binder. I have the intimation, Sir, that that machine is now practically in a perfected state, and I am sure it will result in very great benefit to the whole world if such turns out to be the case.

The subject is a pretty broad one to cover in an address of this kind and while it is technical in its nature it is by no means devoid of interest to members generally. Take the county of Chambly-Vercheres. I have the assertion of the fibre expert of the Experimental Farm that the soil and the climatic conditions in that county are peculiarly favourable for the development of flax culture. I am told further that J. G. Crawford, a director of the Belfast Spinning Mills, Ireland, visited that section of the country some time ago, in conjunction with Mr. Hutchinson, and was so attracted by the possibilities of flax culture in that district that he has taken steps to organize the cultivation of, I am told, two thousand acres—at any rate, a large area. Well if our friends in Quebec were able to cultivate two thousand acres at a profit in the ratio of $4,000 from 15 acres, which was obtained by Graham Bros. in Carleton county, last year, it indicate the possibilities that underlie the cultivation of flax. The names I have mentioned are those of reliable and responsible men; and if this big concern, the Belfast Spinning Mills, the largest concern in the world, is extending its operations to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario with a view to securing the raw material necessary for its mills in Ireland, surely it must follow, as surely as night follows day, that it will be to the advantage of these mill-owners to have their spinning and their weaving mills working side by side in Canada. Then we shall see the flax fibre manufactured into the finished article in Canada and a consequent great economic advantage to this country. To-day one-half of the whole export of linen from Irish mills goes to the United States. If Canada is the market for the raw material, would not this naturally be the place for them to establish their mills?

The desirability of encouraging the spinning of yarn took up the attention of this House two years ago, and I wish to refer to the subject of bounties. We recommended that in order to get the industry started some encouragement should be given for the establishment of spinning mills in Canada. No changes in the tariff were considered at that time, but the strong pressure brought to bear by the Imperial War Board for us to produce linen for airplane wings was so urgent that the War Board of Canada recommended to the Privy Council the desirability of lending some encouragement for the spinning of yarn to meet the requirements of the Imperial War Board. On the third of September, 1918, this Order in Council was passed, and in quoting it I wish to point out what I think is its inherent weakness, in that it did not cover the needs of the situation. The order is in the following form:

Whereas it appears that no linen thread or yarn has come forward from Great Britain since the first of January, 1918, for the manufacture of fishing nets, or shoe hemp for military and agricultural harness, or for the manufacture of aeroplane cloth, linen thread for miltiary boots, machine thread for the manufacture of agricultural and military harness, or yarns and threads for civilian use in Canada;

And whereas, owing to war conditions it is unlikely that Canada will be able to secure adequate supplies of linen and linen threads and yarns from Great Britain during the continuation of the war;

And whereas flax of suitable quality and adequate quantity is being grown in Canada, and it is desirable that the Canadian farmers should be provided with a favourable and satisfactory market for this flax in Canada;

And whereas certain manufacturers of linens in Canada are disposed to undertake the spinning of linen threads and yarns from Canadian flax;

Therefore His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, pursuant to the advice of the War Trade Board and under and by virtue of the powers vested in the Governor in Council by the War Measures Act, 1914, and otherwise, is pleased to order and it is hereby ordered as follows:—

That a bounty of three cents per pound be paid on linen yarns not coarser than twelve lea or finer than twenty lea, and six cents per pound on linen yarns twenty lea and finer, but coarser than forty lea, and nine cents per pound on linen yarns forty lea and finer, spun in Canada from Canadian flax in the three years beginning first day of April, 1919, and ending thirty-first of March, 1922. Such bounty, however, not to exceed $25,000 in any one year or a total of $75,000 in the three years;

No bounty will be payable under this order on yarns spun in Canada from Canadian flax until the day following the declaration of peace, and payment of the bounty hereunder in no event to extend and apply to yarns spun in Canada subsequent to thirty-first day of March, 1922;

In case the amount of $25,000 is not sufficient in any one year to pay the bounty on all linen yarns of twelve lea or finer spun in Canada under the terms hereof, the said $25,000 payable in any one year shall be distributed pro rata amongst all spinners of linen yarns from Canadian flax in Canada in proportion to the amount of yarn as defined herein spun by each during that year. Said bounty being adjustable and payable at the end of each quarter during the time such bounty shall be properly payable;

The prices to be charged for the yarns above mentioned, shall be such as from time to time appear reasonable to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Pursuant to that Order in Council a spinning mill was established in Guelph, Ontario, at an expenditure of $300,000, and before the war closed its pro-

4 p.m. moters were in a position to guarantee, if necessary, the production of suitable airplane cloth. We have heard, Sir, a great deal about this airplane cloth, and I have here a sample which was produced under the direction of the Imperial War Board. I understand that this cloth, which is as soft as silk and almost as tough as leather, is of a fineness of about sixty lea. This linen was produced in hundreds of millions of yards for aircraft wings, and almost the whole available flax supply of the Empire was commandeered for its manufacture. The reason for its use was two-fold. I am told that this is the only cloth that will take the cellulose for chemical varnish with which it is treated to render it rain and fireproof, and it has also this quality, that if punctured by a bullet or piece of shell it does not rip. Therefore it was a most important article, and every encouragement was given to its production.

As I have said, a mill was established at Guelph, but I understaand that any bounty that may have been earned under the conditions of the Order in Council which I have quoted has not yet been paid, owing to some technicality, such as the non-completion of the Peace Treaty, and that the men concerned in that mill have not been receiving the consideration which is due them.

I have referred to what we call lea yarns, and for the information of the House I would like to state what is meant by the term. I do not know the origin of the Irish word "lea" as applied to yarn, but in a little book published by a Mr. Moore, a member of the Textile Institute of Ireland, is contained an explanation, and I shall now quote it:

> The yarn is now, so far as processes of manufacture are concerned, practically a finished article of commerce. So without any further treatment, save being unwound in the "reeling room" and being measured on the reels—60,000 yards making a bundle, which is subdivided into "hanks"' and "cuts." Each hank contains 12 cuts, or "leas," and each cut 300 yards; consequently 16⅔ hanks are equal to a bundle. The bundles are then tied up in bunches of 3, 6, 9 or 12, according to quality—and so, after being carefully dried by steam in the lofts, the yarn is ready for sale. The finest spun for commercial purposes is about 340 leas of 300 yards each to one pound weight, though it has been worked up to 700 leas for special purposes. The coarsest spun out of pure flax is about 20 leas to the pound.

Thus the fineness of linen yarns is designated by the counts—a lea contains 300 yards —and the count, grist, or number of lea yarns is reckoned by the number of leas contained in a pound avoirdupois. Thus if 15 leas containing 4,500 yards weigh 1 pound the count is 15 leas or 15s. If 20 leas containing 6,000 yards yarn weigh 1 pound, the count is 20s., and 60 leas containing 18,000 yards weigh 1 pound, the count is 60s. In other words as the yarn gets thinner and finer, the count gets higher.

Mr. Moore gives figures of the export of yarn in 1912, which shows what an enormous industry has been developed in Ireland. The total export of yarn from Ireland in 1912 amounted to 17,671,100 pounds, which was exported to Belgium, Denmark, Egypt, France, Germany, Netherlands, Italy, Japan, Russia, Spain, the United States and some other countries. Canada at that time was also quite an importer of yarn, and, of course, Ireland in her own textile industries consumes a large quantity.

Before concluding, I want to refer to the possibility of the development and utilization of straw in Western Canada. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) last year when he was speaking on the subject of flax made a statement as to the possibility of utilizing Western straw which up to the present time has been largely a waste. The Textile Journal of March 2, 1920, which I think hon. members will find on file in the reading room, has an article which I am sure they would be very much interested in. This article, referring to the shortage of paper and the demand for pulp, draws attention to the possibility of utilizing and the economic value of the waste straw of Western Canada. The article continues:

Cotton rags are selling as high as 15 cents a pound, and high quality material from which paper can be made comparable with cotton rag content paper should readily command as much as $300 per ton. The United States daily consumes over 1,000 tons of high grade papers. Canada manufactures about 250,000 tons of high grade, bleached pulp, a large proportion of which is exported from the United States. It takes somewhat over one and a half cords of pulp wood to make one ton of pulp, and the demands on our forest consume over 20,000 acres of pulp wood limits per year, in which connection it is interesting to note that it takes from fifty to one hundred years to grow a spruce tree suitable for pulp production. Timber limits are rapidly increasing in value, and with the rapid depletion of the forests, lumbering operations must every year go further from transportation lines.

This situation is of direct interest to the Western farmer, because he is annually wasting about one million tons of raw material from which it has been proved that a paper pulp can be made convertible into a high grade paper comparing well with the linen rag product, for which price and demand are to-day higher than ever before. The material referred to is flax straw, at the present time burned and wasted wherever flax is grown for linseed, the straw crop therefore representing a dead loss to the farmer. In the 1919 issue of the Monthly Bulletin of Agricultural Statistics, published by the Dominion Government at Ottawa, we read; Another question of direct economic interest is the possibility of utilizing the linseed straw in Western Canada, which so far has been found useless, and is mostly burned. Any use that could be established for this by-product, which would increase even to a small extent the total money yield of the crop to the farmer would be a very important factor in extending the cultivation of flax throughout larger areas in Canada. It can now be definitely stated that such a use for flax straw has been demonstrated in the manufacture of pulp (bleached and unbleached half stuff) for conversion into high grade papers. All that is required is co-operation on the part of the farmers in the collection and delivery of straw, and interest of the necessary capital to organize a new industry which will revolutionize the flax-growing problem and at the same time stimulate the important paper industry of Canada with a supply of high quality pulp.

This is no question of experiment. That stage has been passed, and production on a semi-commercial scale has actually been accomplished. Over a ton of unbleached flax straw pulp has been manufactured, and then made into paper in two paper mills. This was submitted to various large paper manufacturers for their opinion, and from them it received the highest commendation. It is thought that the following points cannot fail to be of interest to the Western flax grower and also to the paper manufacturer.

The conditions essential to the successful manufacture of flax pulp are:—(1) Sufficient quantity of flax straw. (2) Suitable mill locations. (3) Suitable markets. Dealing with each of these headings, it is obvious that the first is of primary importance, the available supply of the basic raw material straw, the possibilities of collecting that supply, and the price at which it can be so collected, are factors on which depend the practical commercial possibilities of this development.

Taking first the available supply, we find that there has been in the past an enormous increase in flax acreage in the West. In 1870, the total Canadian crop was 118,044 bushels. In 1903, this had increased to 884,000 bushels, and this increase continued up to the enormous crop of 25,978,000 bushels in 1912. The fall in prices in the next few years was reflected in diminished production, but recovery has been rapid, and in 1918 a crop of 5,776,000 bushels was harvested in the Prairie Provinces, the estimated crop for 1919 was 7,117,000 bushels, of which Saskatchewan is credited with nearly 4,600,000 bushels. The following table gives acreage and yields for the Prairie Provinces during the past ten years, taken from volumes of Census and Statistics published by Department of Agriculture of the Dominion Government, Ottawa.

That shows the period from 1910 to 1919, but I shall not waste the time of the House in reading the table:

Crops such as those of 1918 and 1919, would each yield over 1,000,000 tons of straw, capable of producing over 100,000 tons of pulp. Canada to-day manufactures annually 250,000 tons of high grade pulp, practically all for export to the U.S.A.

Practically all of this flax is grown for linseed. It is well known that flax cultivation for this purpose is an entirely different farming proposition from growing flax for fibre. For fibre flax a special seed must be selected, and the crop is closely sown to encourage long slender growth of straw with small tops. Special cultivation harvesting methods and subsequent treatment of the straw must be resorted to.

The question of growing flax from fibre to replace the great shortage from which Europe is now suffering, though also a problem of first importance to the Canadian West, is an entirely different problem from that now under consideration, viz:—Utilization of the present supply of straw for paper pulp. With linseed flax, Canadian common seed is used sparsely sown to encourage plant to develop large tops; the flax is cut at a later stage of its growth, and threshed for its seed. The resulting straw is too short, broken and brittle for use in the textile trades and has hitherto been piled alongside the thresher and burnt.

The writer goes on to speak of the establishment of these mills. He says that it is necessary that these mills could be established at suitable districts convenient to the farmer, and in this article, which I will not waste the time of the House in reading, the writer shows that it is quite possible to have the "breakers," in which the straw is reduced to pulp and sent to the pulp mills, made movable so that they may be moved from place to place, and so that the farmer may have an opportunity of delivering the straw from convenient centres.

Arthur D. Little and Company, of Boston, who did a good deal of research work in connection with the utilization of western straw were, it is to be regretted, compelled to discontinue their investigations, owing, as they say, to the establishment of the Scientific Research Board by the Dominion Government, they thought they were trespassing on the ground of work undertaken by the Government. Dr. Howe, who was chief of that organization, the Arthur D. Little Company, Chemists, Engineers of Boston, Mass., who has a branch in Canada, writing me on March 24, last, said:

> I was pleased to receive your letter of the 13th and also the publication in which your continued efforts to obtain government support are recorded.
> We investigated very carefully all that has been done in an effort to use seed flax straw for cordage and textile purposes and so far have had no reasons to change our opinion that such utilization is not economical. We still believe in our paper process and one of these days hope to find a satisfactory way for commercializing that work.

These are the conclusions of Dr. Howe after very careful investigation. Dr. Howe, at that time, also gave a sample of linen paper produced from that pulp, which paper is in quality suitable for the finest bond or bank note paper. Unbleached and in its natural condition and colour, it is a paper of very great tensile strength. It seems to me that with the knowledge already at hand there are very great possibilities for the development of the industry in the utilization of western flax straw. The article that I have just referred to from the Canadian Textile Journal appears to have the authority of the Agricultural Statistical Bulletin of the Dominion Government and therefore I conclude that the statements made therein carry the stamp of official approval.

In conclusion, we are very anxious to develop the industry more extensively in Canada. We have been able to show that the area in which flax can be grown is not limited to Western Ontario, where it has reached its greatest development of recent years. Splendid fibre has been grown in the Annapolis Valley in the province of Nova Scotia. Different districts of the province of Quebec, as well as British Columbia, in the Fraser Valley and other districts, have demonstrated that they also can grow a very fine quality of fibre, and in view of the enormous value of production at the present time it seems to me that now is the psychological moment to bend every effort towards attaining the maximum of production. In the resolution I point out the desirability of establishing demonstration stations in the areas where flax for fibre is grown. Surely if new and modern machinery is essential in the scutching mills, if new processes of retting by water tanks and other means is necessary to the better development of the industry, is it not incongruous that a demonstration mill should be established at the Experimental Farm three or four hundred miles away from the people whom it is going to serve. I do not know, but I do not think I am very far astray when I say that this demonstration mill has never cost this Government one cent. The profits accruing from a mill doing this work, even as it is doing, would be sufficient, I think, to cover the entire overhead cost. If the Government would establish a mill in the district where fibre is grown for the benefit of farmers and millers alike and try and improve the present methods of production, it would be a very great aid to the people who are now engaged in a very worthy industry. I do not think it would cost the Government anything, because the building of a mill of this kind is not a very expensive matter, and the machinery itself is likewise inexpensive. We want to apply the newest and most up-to-date methods so that we can put our fibre on the market in the very best condition. Individuals are not so well able to investigate new processes of this kind as the Government. It is really a research problem, and the Government of this country has already adopted a policy of research on very broad lines, and is lending considerable assistance to research work generally. It seems to me that the only way in which the industry can reach its proper development is by the Government assisting and co-operating with the producers and helping them to solve what are really research problems. Howard Fraleigh, of Forest, up in the county of Lambton, has been carrying on research work more or less for the past five or six years, and he would take a greater pride in producing a hank of fibre that could beat fibre growing in any other part of the world than in making $100,000. He lives and sleeps and dreams of flax. He is an enthusiast on the subject, and is well posted, but even his experiments have not been carried to the point where he can say to the growers: We will abandon dew retting in favour of tank retting, even though tank retting increases the value of fibre from $400 to $600 per ton. Suppose as a result of an investigation which might cost even $8,000 or $10,000, we were able to add $600 per ton to the value of the fibre produced in this country. That would mean an enormous economic gain to the country, and would be a tremendous stimulus to increased production. The increased production we would get would justify very generous and sympathetic consideration of this question by the Government of this country. It is three years since I first brought this matter up. The Minister of Agriculture in his statement to the House last year said that he had listened with a very great deal of interest to my suggestion that demonstration mills should be placed in districts that were producing large quantities of fibre, but he was going to carry on experiments for another year at the mill at the Central Farm. I must say in all frankness and sincerity, so far as improved methods of retting are concerned we are not one whit further advanced to-day than we were a year ago. We knew just as much two years ago as we do at the present time, and no matter what information the mill may have gained, the people in the West have not got the benefit of it. It is unfortunate that at the present time there is not a proper appreciation of the value to the Civil Service and the country of technical men with scientific knowledge. I wanted a member of the Department of Agriculture the other day to attend a flax association meeting in London, and I called up Mr. Archibald at the Central Farm. I was told that Mr. Hutchinson, the Chief of the Fibre Department, had to be retained in Ottawa to attend a very important gathering last week of the deputy ministers of agriculture of the different provinces. I appreciated that it was more important that he should attend that meeting than the one at London, but nevertheless the London meeting was an important one too. Mr. Archibald told me that his assistant was leaving. I asked "What is the matter? Isn't he a good man?" "He is an A-1 man," he replied, "and has given good service." "Then why are you letting him go?" I asked. "We cannot hold him," he replied, "he has better inducements elsewhere." Here was an efficient man in this important department drawing a paltry salary of $1,500 or $1,600. He resigned his position to take employment in a little flax mill up in the town of Goderich, which mill had only 400 acres under cultivation, but was able to pay him a larger salary than his chief at the Farm was getting. How long shall we be able to hold our technical officers if this is to continue? These technical men are necessary to the development of the industries of this country, but the Civil Service Commission just fix what they think should be the maximum salary for the position, and I don't know but what the chances are that when they advertise for a chemist they get a blacksmith. There is not a proper appreciation of the importance of the technical chiefs of departments. I am not referring to the Department of Agriculture alone, but to the Mines and other departments. Day by day and week by week valuable men are being lost to the public service because private industry can afford to pay a better salary than the Government offers these technical men. This is a serious situation. Men with their knowledge and experience are not made in a day. It takes years of experience and training, and men with this knowledge and training are of incalculable value to the country at the present time. I direct the attention of the Government to the seriousness of the situation and urge upon them, before it is too late, to put a check upon this waste of important skilled and technical experts in the department. We should hold these men if we desire to make any progress.

I must apologize to the House for the length of time it has taken me to present this subject to hon. members. I am persistent in pressing this matter from year to year, and it seems that by degrees a few crumbs are being thrown out as a result of representations that were made by the flax growers some four years ago. There has not been a step taken by the Government in the development of this industry that was not recommended in 1915 by the flax growers of Ontario. Step by step the value of their recommendations is being realized, but in my opinion if the whole subject had been vigorously prosecuted in the year 1915 and adequate steps taken to develop this industry the economic value to this country in fibre produced would have represented hundreds of millions of dollars. Now, Sir, I do appeal to the Minister of Agriculture to discuss the matter seriously with those in his department in whom he reposes confidence and who advise him in these matters. The flax growers at a meeting last week in London pressed for the same thing for which I am here urging. Mr. Fraleigh, President of the Flax Growers' Association, in 1915 asked for precisely what I am now demanding. Although I do not say that we should do away with the existing mill, I submit that when ninety-five per cent of the fibre produced in Canada to-day is four hundred miles away from this mill, and some more than that distance, it is obvious that either the mill should be put to work where it can serve the interests of all, or another one should be established which would be an aid as well as a demonstration to the people elsewhere. If we desire this industry to be a success, and if we are anxious to have a large acreage under fibre cultivation, we must present the possibilities of development before the farmer in such a way as will secure his interest. The individual farmer cannot put up a mill of his own, and in no industry to-day is proper co-operation more essential than in the flax industry. Flax cannot be grown in successive years. In some countries it is grown in rotation of five years, and in others of seven years. But if a few farmers had each a small acreage under flax they could co-operatively put up a little mill costing fifteen hundred or two thousand dollars, and they would be in a position to grow flax and ret it, scutch it and put it on the market just as the farmer puts wool on the market. There should then be proper grading and standardization so that the grower would get the maximum profit from his crop. Under present conditions, however, the farmer does not get twenty per cent of the value of the crop, although there is no reason why he should not get a hundred per cent value; and there are ample possibilities in this industry to induce the farmers to develop the cultivation of flax very largely if the matter were only properly placed before them. The advantage of a demonstration station in the district to which I referred would be that farmers visiting it would get the technical and scientific information necessary in the cultivation of flax, and possibly in little groups in a community they could establish a flax mill. An important feature of the industry is the fact that it offers a solution of the year-the-round labour problem on the farm. The farmer who has fifteen or twenty acres of flax can profitably employ a hired man through the winter months, when otherwise he might not be able to find employment for him. I again appeal to the Government to give this subject their most serious consideration. The proposal I have made bears the stamp of approval of the Flax Growers' Association, which comprises men who have achieved success in the industry and who desire to see a portion of that success fall to the lot of others. I trust that at the earliest possible moment the minister, after consultation with those officials in his department who direct these particular branches of industry, will see his way to carry out the recommendations contained in my resolution.

Mr. PROULX: How many flax mills are there in Canada?

Mr. GLASS: There are sixty-four flax mills; in 1914 there were thirteen.

Mr. PROULX: Are most of them in Ontario?

Mr. GLASS: There are three mills in Quebec, and the rest are in Ontario.

Mr. J. F. FAFARD (L'Islet) (translation): Mr. Speaker, we have listened very attentively to the brief address made by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Glass). His statements were the more interesting to us that this is the fourth time we are privileged to hear them. The only thing tha remains for him, and that is no doubt what he proposes to do, though I refrain from giving him such advice, is to have 500 copies of his speech printed and distributed in his county. However, I have no doubt that the people of his constituency will be able to judge him on his merits. Had he been in earnest I think it would have been far easier for him to go and see the Minister of Agricultural and to put his question directly to him, and that would have taken but a few minutes. As a matter of feet, the hon. member has a motion before this House, asking the Government to deal with the development of our natural resources; but he seems to think that flax alone makes up all the natural resources of this country. As far as I am concerned, surely I agree that we must help all our industries and the flax industry is undoubtedly one which requires great attention, but I would have liked to hear the hon. member speak also of the other natural resources of this Dominion.

Now that the war is over, Mr. Speaker, the commercial fight is going to start, and there is no better means to fight this battle than to develop our natural resources. Anyone who has seen the country we live in and who has lived here for a certain number of years cannot but like it, willingly makes sacrifices in its behalf and contributes to its progress. The natural resources of Canada, if we give the words their full meaning, include all our industries.

Canada has not only a very large area of unlimited wealth, but it is also a country which can support itself if we know how to develop our natural resources effectively. Agriculture is most prosperous; it is not only sufficient to feed our people, but it leaves also a surplus of several millions for export. Our immense and almost untouched forests, besides providing us with all we need for building and other purposes, enable us to export every year several million dollars' worth.

Mr. Speaker, in 1918—I am speaking of the province of Quebec only—we had already eighty-one pulp factories, of which 31 were manufacturing pulp and paper, 26, paper only, and 24 paper and pulp combined. It is interesting for us to note that in this industry which is but a few years old, there is nearly $190,000,000 invested, and 23,000 workers are depending upon it.

These figures speak for themselves, and then we must consider that this industry which is but beginning has for its supply inexhaustible forests which are waiting for the woodcutter's axe to ring out the joyous jingle of silver. I spoke of our forests being inexhaustible. For instance if you take an average of five cords of wood per acre, and in view of the fact that two cords of wood yield a ton of pulp, the district of Lake St. John alone could supply one million tons of pulp every year during 50 years. Moreover, if you consider that it takes 25 to 30 years for spruce and balsam to develop, the conclusion is that, in spite of fires which might occur, the district of Lake St. John alone could supply our factories indefinitely with one million tons of pulp every year. The same may be stated and with greater emphasis, I think, of the country bordering on the river St. Maurice and the north shore of the St. Lawrence. Not only do these districts supply us with the raw material, that is wood, but they also afford us the requisite power for its development.

We have in this country the most wonderful water powers of the continent and these have contributed to a great extent to the progress of our industries. You don't need a very observing mind to notice that all our great industries are located in harbours where they can get cheaper power and greater shipping facilities. Three Rivers is a striking example of these industrial settlements.

The city of Three Rivers which was completely destroyed by fire some twenty years ago, is destined to become one of the chief industrial centres of our Province on account of its harbour and the power supplied by the Shawinigan Water and Power Company, and if I thought it would not displease the hon. member from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau), I might add: thanks also to the initiative of its representative in the House of Commons.

[Mr. Fafard.]

Our water powers are as inexhaustible as our forests.

Suffice it o say that the Provincial engineers estimate that the Lake St. John basin could supply 700,000 horse-power, and, without any thought of being offensive to the hon. member for Lake St. John, there are not a few points along the north shore of the St. Lawrence river, which can supply as much.

Inasmuch as I am speaking of the water-powers of the Province of Quebec I may be allowed to say a few words and to place on record a few data about the works carried out on the St. Maurice river, at the Loutre portage, with a view to modifying the conditions of this river's water-flow. The information I am now giving to the House has been taken from the report of the water courses commission, and the accuracy of the figure is unquestionable.

The St. Maurice is a tributary of the St. Lawrence river into which it empties itself from the North at Three Rivers; it is about 360 miles long and it has a drainage basin of 17,000 square miles.

The main water falls one meets going upstream are: les Forges, les Grès, Shawinigan, Grand'Mère, La-Tuque, The Rapide-Blanc, the Grand-Cœur and the Chaudières. Of these three are already in operation. They are: Shawinigan, Grand'Mère and La-Tuque.

It was in 1909 that the Quebec Government undertook to consider the scheme of regulating the water-flow of this river, and it was finally carried out in December 1917.

This dam is built at a distance of 220 miles from the hydro-electric plant of Shawinigan, forming a storage of 300 square miles in area with a capacity of 160 billion cubic feet of water. This extraordinary mass of water is restrained by a dam 1,626 feet long, having a minimum width of 20 feet and a maximum of 72 feet. The height of the top reaches 57 feet above the natural low water flow of the St. Maurice river, at that point, and 1,335 feet above the sea level.

The weir is 840 feet in length and it can allow a flow of 15,000 cubic feet of water per second for a three-foot wave.

Into the construction of that dam there entered: 71,751 cubic yards of concrete masonry and 720 tons of steel.

The water can flow from the reservoir through ten gates, known as bottom-sluices. Every opening is rectangular measuring 12 feet high by 7½ feet wide. The gates are built of steel and they are operated by a powerful piece of mechanism installed on the top of the masonry.

The total cost of these works, including the construction of the hydro-electric plant and of the dams built along the Manouan river, did not exceed the sum of $2,500,000, and to-day they are giving the Provincial government an annual revenue of $191,000; but it should also be noticed that this revenue must increase with the development of the other water powers which shall be extended in a near future.

We have to-day at La-Loutre the largest reservoir in the world. It is almost twice the size of the reservoir established in the valley of the Nile, in Egypt, by the Assouan dam, the capacity of which is 82 billion cubic feet. The Gatun dam, built in connection with the Panama canal, indeed gives a reservoir of a total capacity of 183 billion cubic feet, but of the whole amount of water held back in this dam, there is only the upper stream that can be penned up without making the Culebra cut unnavigable; the reservoir's capacity that can be turned to account does not exceed from 35 to 40 billion cubic feet of water. We can therefore say with a justifiable national pride that we have the largest reservoir in the world.

Many advantages accrue from this most important piece of work. Besides insuring the workmen against unemployment throughout the year and necessarily contributing to reduce the cost for producing motive power, it does especially attain its main object which was to control the river's water-flow. That you may realize, Mr. Speaker, the full importance of the control of that water-flow, I beg leave to submit that 12 tons of coal are required to produce one horse-power, and, as the additional power supplied by the storage of water on the St. Maurice river amounts to 48,000 horse-power which can be sold to the manufacturers, we may readily draw the conclusion that this construction is now saving 600,000 tons of coal per annum, and three times that amount when all the falls will have been likewise developed.

Under natural conditions, the St. Maurice river's water-flow, at Shawinigan, was of 170,000 cubic feet per second during the flood period in the Spring, but of only 6,000 cubic feet per second, during the Summer and Winter seasons.

To-day we can guarantee these companies 12,000 cubic feet per second the whole year round, which is the power required by their industry. The increase given the Shawinigan Water and Power Co., when the water is low, is equal to 82,000 h.p., which means an average of 32,250 h.p. a year. The surplus power obtained when all the available falls are harnessed will be about 140,000 h.p. per year and 400,000 h.p. when the water is at its low level.

I have given, Mr. Speaker, according to the statistics I referred to, the necessary information about the water power of the Loutre river which is to be called after the name of the Prime Minister of the Province. I gave them out, not only because it is interesting to hear about the matter, but also to have the figures placed on Hansard. Now that I have given that information, let us see what conclusion we may draw. I said a moment ago that agriculture was progressing in the province of Quebec, but it did not do so itself. It required a campaign of education and we had to send agriculturists throughout the province to teach the farmers what they learned at school. We had to get also a minister well acquainted with agricultural matters and we found a very good one in the person of the hon. Joseph Edouard Caron who is as well known in Ottawa as he is in Quebec.

I spoke of our forests and I pointed out their development in recent years; but to obtain that result the government of the province of Quebec had to adopt a policy such as would show foresters that they were ready to help them. It is with that object in view that the government of sir Lomer Gouin created a new Department which is called the Department of Forest Management, to oversee the cutting of the wood and ensure the protection of our forests. The government is working hand in hand with the lumberers toward safeguarding our forests in the interest of the country. The new department will see to it that no undersized tree is cut. And all this, Mr. Speaker, required a lot of work and the provincial Government had to place at the head of the Departments men who were able to follow a definite policy.

As to water powers, it is about the same thing. They did not evolve spontaneously. A policy had to be drawn up. I remember the time when much power was wasted in the province of Quebec; we were selling water powers without even knowing their possibilities. What occurred in the meantime? The Government appointed a commission of running waters and to-day water powers are leased only after their capacity and industrial usefulness have been ascertained. At the head of that commission, the Government put a most capable and highly appreciated business man and efficient administrator: the hon. S. N. Parent.

If this Government wish to obtain the results as pointed out in the motion introduced by the hon. member who has preceded me, they must do something more than talk about the development of our natural resources; they must act, devise and carry out a definite policy. In this like in any other policy, it is necessary that all the members of the Government be jointly liable and that they all agree to develop the resources of this country.

A conference was held recently in Buffalo by the International Commission and it is announced that on the 6th of April next another conference will be held in Washington to discuss the opportunity of building canals from Ottawa to the Great Lakes. I do not think that it is a purely federal matter. If other provinces want to establish water powers of 5,000 or 6,000 h.p., let them do what we have done in the province to which I belong, that is supply the companies with the necessary funds and bear the cost of the works.

I do not intend to dilate any further on the subject but let me say that I consider that it is the duty of this Government to adopt a clear cut policy. A single minister alone cannot be expected to deal with this matter; all the ministers, all the members of the Government should get together to promote the development of our natural resources.

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion of the flax industry by the hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Glass) and the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Fafard). I can assure them that the Government is keenly alive to the development of this valuable industry. At the present time, however, prices are extremely high—much higher than they were in 1914—and it is probable that there will be a certain amount of settling down when things begin to assume a normal condition. The Government, being seized with the importance of this industry, established at the Central Experimental Farm at Ottawa a mill for carrying on experiments in connection with the various processes connected with the preparation of flax for market. Ottawa was selected for the purpose because it was felt that the experiments could be kept more closely under the eye of the Department of Agriculture and of the director of the Experimental Farms. In connection with this work they are carrying on experiments in retting, breaking, scutching and also de-seeding. All this has resulted in securing a great deal of important and valuable information in connection with the industry. Samples are secured from all over the Dominion with the result that they are getting an excellent idea of the quality of the product from the various provinces. After looking at the industry from all angles, and after listening to the very excellent address of the hon. member for East Middlesex, we must all be convinced of the very great possibilities of the flax growing industry. The principal flax growing districts in Ontario are those around London, Chatham, taking in the counties of Kent, Middlesex, Huron, Perth and Waterloo. I have been informed by those in close touch with the work that Ottawa is not a first class district for this purpose. In some years it produces an excellent quality of flax, but it is found that if the summers are very dry the plant does not reach perfection. Quebec gives great promise as a flax-producing province. At Chambly-Vercheres flax grows very well indeed, although some of the very best quality is produced at Gaspé. The Maritime Provinces are also producing first class flax. In British Columbia in the delta land of the Fraser River valley first class flax can be produced.

Experiments are being carried on by the Government in connection with the various mechanical appliances for dealing with this crop. Pulling machines have been experimented with for several years, and I am assured now by one of the most prominent officials in the department that an improved type of this machine is expected to be ready by next year which will perform this operation. In all parts of the world pulling is performed by hand, and consequently in a country such as ours, where the cost of labour is very high, it is a serious handicap to the production of flax in competition with those countries where labour is very cheap. I sincerely hope, therefore, that his expectations will not be disappointed.

Experimental work has also been carried on in connection with de-seeding machines. The principal trouble with the ordinary de-seeder has been that it to a certain extent injured the seed, interfering very greatly with its germinating properties. This has now been overcome to a considerable extent, and we are producing seed that is received very favourably in the markets of Europe.

Scutchers are also being tested out, and after going over the plant and discussing the work with the men who are thoroughly familiar with it, I am certain that what has been accomplished at the Experimental Farm will be of great benefit to the producers of flax all over the Dominion.

As was pointed out by the hon. mover of the resolution, our seed has been able to compete successfully in the markets of the world with the very best seed produced. He has also pointed out the fact that before the war about eighty or ninety per cent of the flax used in Europe was produced by Russia. If you take into consideration the new system of government which is in control of Russia, I think you will agree with me that it will probably be some time before that country need be regarded as a dangerous competitor in the flax market.

5 p.m.

We have a good market in the United States, only small sections of that great country having proved suitable for flax production; we also have a good market at home; and, in addition, we are selling our product in Belgium, France and Ireland. It is particularly creditable that we are able to sell in the markets of Europe, where the highest class of flax is produced and where some of the very finest linens are manufactured.

A large proportion of the seed exported has been carefully inspected, graded and tested as to its germinating qualities, and it has been found that this procedure secures for the grower a very much higher price than we used to receive for seed which was not so treated. I understand that at the meeting held in London last week a resolution was passed asking the Government to adopt two grades, one ninety per cent and the other ninety-two and a half per cent. I can assure our flax growers that when this resolution is received it will be given the very closest attention by this department.

The fibre is rather more difficult to grade, but we are keenly alive to any possibilities tending towards improvement along this line.

In 1918 an Order in Council was passed authorizing the distribution of $25,000 per year to encourage the manufacture of thread from flax grown in this country, but I have not full information as to whether any of this money has been paid, it being a matter dealt with by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

My hon. friend from East Middlesex (Mr. Glass) must not be disappointed at the slow development of our flax industry, for the reason that our agriculturists are already educated in the production of other crops very much easier to produce, and which during the war yielded very satisfactory returns. Consequently a campaign of education will take a little time to bring to our farmers a realization of the fact that flax-growing, although giving a good deal of trouble and requiring considerable labour, is a very profitable crop to raise.

With regard to the exhaustion of land as a result of flax growing, this, I think, can be overcome by having a proper rotation of crops. My department fully realizes the importance of flax production and I will see that it keeps in very close touch with its developments and will be glad to render all the aid I possibly can which promises to be of value to the industry. In this regard I wish to say to the hon. member who proposed the resolution that while attending to this matter I will keep in mind his suggestion concerning the "putting of more pep into the business."

Motion agreed to.

TRANSLATION OF FRENCH SPEECHES.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres) moved:

That, in the opinion of the House, whereas the French language is one of the two official languages of the House of Commons of Canada and many of the members use the French language in addressing the said House of Commons and it is important that all members of the said House of Commons should have knowledge of the speeches so delivered; and whereas a very large majority of the English-speaking members do not understand the French language, and the speeches which are delivered in French do not appear in English in the Debates unless it be in the revised edition some six or seven months after they have been delivered, which is the opposite of what follows in connection with speeches which are delivered in English, the translation of same being published in French in the Debates of the following day; therefore the speeches delivered in French should be translated into English and so published in the Unrevised Debates and distributed the following day.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly-Verchères) (translation): Mr. Speaker, it is very seldom that I address this House in french. The reason is very simple: A majority of my colleagues do not understand french and, as I wish, whenever I, rise, to make myself understood by all, I generally use the English language. This is to be regretted, Mr. Speaker, but it's a fact. Therefore, in rising this afternoon, I trust that the hon. members who have so generously supported the resolution embodied in the various Peace Treaties, with a view to protect the Bulgarians and Czecho-Slovak minorities and all the Balkan minorities in respect to their language, should realize the importance of maintaining the two official languages in Canada and of making efforts to learn one of those two languages, that is to say French. It will be the surest means to promote unity and harmony between the two great races of Canada.

I do not propose to retain the House very long on the resolution which appears in my name on the orders of the day. The object of this resolution commends itself to the unanimous approbation of the members of the House and do not know any other proposal which could more efficiently promote the bonne entente.

Let me read the preamble. The first reason is as follows:

Whereas the French language is one of the two official languages of the House of Commons of Canada;

No one will venture to deny the truth of of that ground.

Section 133 of the British North America Act provides for the use of the French language in this House and foes even so far as to make such use imperative as regards the votes and proceedings, the journals and reports of the House. The second reason is the following:

Whereas a great many speeches are delivered in French.

I have notice with pleasure that many hon. members have availed themselves, this year, of the right which they had to speak French. I congratulate them and I believe that when the resolution now before the Chair has been adopted, they may use the French language much more freely, because the English-speaking members who do not understand our own language will be able to read the translation of their speeches the day after they have been delivered. The third consideration is the following:

Whereas it is important that all the hon. members should be made aware of everything said in Parliament.

It is obvious that, in order to properly follow the discussion of public matters within these precincts, all the hon. members must understand the suggestions made on both sides of this House. The forth reason is as follow:

Whereas a very large majority of the English-speaking members do not understand the French language.

Needless to dwell upon this. Many are the hon. members who not only do not understand French, but are unable to read it, and this leads occasionally to some very strange happenings. In the course of the session before last, for instance, the day after my hon. friend from Quebec East had spoken in French on the subject of the subsidy granted by the Government, to the Canadian agency in London, I met one of my colleagues, and here is what he told me in English. I shall repeat his very words, as they are so typical:

(Text.) It is too bad that Mr. Lapointe did not speak in English this afternoon, he is such an able speaker and it is always a pleasure for us to listen to him. He spoke in French and the only word I understand was an English word: "camouflage."

(Translation)—Well, Mr. Speaker, is it not obvious that the hon. member who not only did not understand Mr. Lapointe's speech but delivered himself of this ingenuous and candid statement that the word "camouflage" is English, is greatly in need that the French speeches be translated the day after they have been delivered, so that he may take cognizance of them?

May I be allowed, however, before I stop descanting as to whether the majority of the hon. members do understand French, to congratulate the acting Prime Minister (sir George Foster) on the magnificent speech which he delivered in French at the beginning of the session. I venture to hope that his colleagues will follow his example and that more speeches will be delivered in French on the other side of the House, as I realize that some of those hon. members are able to speak our beautiful language. We promise them, right now, to be considerate for the effort which they will make in delivering French speches. I now come to my conclusions which are the following:

In the opinion of this House, the speeches delivered in French should be immediately translated into English and so published in the Unrevised Edition of the Debates which immediately follows the sitting of the House.

There exists, as regards the issuing of Hansard, something anomalous which has probably escaped the notice of many hon. members. When speeches are delivered in English, the text appears on the day following in the report; and in the case of speeches delivered in French, we have the text also in that same report, the day following. Therefore, the first edition of the Debates gives the original wording of the speeches delivered. The speeches are printed in the language in which they were delivered. A day or two after, we have a second issue reproducing, in French, all the speeches which have been delivered. So then, the speeches delivered in English on the eve are translated and reproduced in the second edition, and the speeches delivered in French are so reproduced a second time, two days after; but English translation of the speeches delivered in French and which it is of interest of the members of this House not conversant with our language to know are, are published only seven or eight months later, in the Revised Edition. Consequently, in order to know what was said by members who spoke in French, the members who do not understand French are obliged to wait seven or eight months and read those speeches in the Revised Edition of the Debates, which volumes are kept rather as source of reference and for the purpose of consultation.

Such is the untoward state of things which my motion intends suppressing and I wish to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that even the public is aware of it. In an article which appeared in the issue of March 15 last under the heading: "French Speeches in Commons," the correspondent of "Le Devoir" advised the members to address the House in French; he granted that when debating important matters it might be better to speak English in order that every member might understand, but he went on:

> Excepting important occurrences when we must condescend to use the language of the Semi-Canadians, what harm could there be in not being understood or even listened to on the other side of the Table? On the day following those concerned would always be at liberty to refer to the French translation.

Well, such is not the case, Mr. Speaker. The official translation of French speeches is not to be found in Hansard of the day after or the following day; as I said a moment ago, it is only published in the revised edition of Hansard, that is, six or seven months after the speeches have been delivered.

I also contend that the immediate translation of French speeches would be useful to the people because you have no doubt been, like me, in a position to notice that the English papers very often impute to us statements altogether different from those we uttered in the House of Commons. I had myself occasion to notice in the English papers reports of speeches delivered in French in the House and very often those reports conveyed a different meaning.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move this resolution which will be primarily in the interests of the people and an incentive to those among us who wish to speak French; it will prompt us to use that language freely, knowing that our remarks will be correctly translated the day after and that we shall not be in danger of seeing the statements delivered upon the floor of this House distorted by journalists who are inimical to us and friendly to the Administration.

Mr. J. E. S. E. d'ANJOU (Rimouski) (translation): Mr. Speaker, I must first congratulate my excellent friend from Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Archambault) for having submitted his resolution which I am most pleased to second. I do not intend to speak at any great length, particularly after the spirited remarks my hon. friend has just uttered. Moreover, the resolution speaks for itself. No one can deny that French is one of the two official languages of this country. Consequently, we avail ourselves of a prerogative when we urge the Government to have French speeches translated together with English speeches.

For my part, without unduly boasting, I may sa that from the time I had the privilege of occupying a seat in this House, I have always been one of those who thought and still think that the French-speaking members should speak French in the House of Commons. Therefore this resolution is timely and the Government, I hope, will unhesitatingly pass it.

There is but one alternative. Both languages are official in this county; we are entitled to speak French and we avail ourselves of that privilege. But, unfortunately, as the hon. member from Chambly-Verchères said, the majority of the members on the right and some of our friends on the left do not understand French. Then, it is most important that speeches delivered in French shoud be translated into English the following day, so that our friends and the members on that side who do not understand that language may be acquainted with what we said the previous day.

Since we are upon that question, I intend seizing the opportunity to call the attention of the Government upon what goes on in the several branches of the administration. We notice every day in the newspapers that French has not the place it is entitled to. They refuse to deliver French forms; they even turn aside French correspondence. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is an abuse against which I feel bound to protest, and the opportunity appears to me a favourable one.

At all events, by agreeing to the resolution of the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères, the Parliament of Canada and the Government would acknowledge that French is one of the official languages in this country and is entitled to be spoken in this House. It will be the means of furthering good will between the various elements of the population of Canada, the best means of getting well acquainted with one another and opening unity and concord throughout the country.

The CHAIRMAN (translation): Is it the pleasure of the House that this motion should be adopted?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure but what I could make a better fist at speaking French than I can in understanding it when it is spoken across the floor of the House. Therefore, I have not been able to follow all that my hon. friend has said. The gist of his motion is quite apparent, and the only point that arises in my mind is this: I would rather that my h n. friend would not press his motion to a conclusion until some inquiry was made into the possibility of carrying out what he proposes in his motion in exactly the way that he wishes it carried out. I am entirely in sympathy with the idea that these speeches should be translated and at the disposal of the members in a reasonable time; and if it be true that it runs to five, or six, or seven months before these translations appear, that is not a condition of things that ought to be continued. My sympathy then is entirely with the purpose of the motion, but this is a matter which pertains to the management of the translators and the publishing of the debates, and is under the Debates Committee, composed of members of both sides of the House. I am informed that to carry out the exact wording of the motion of my hon. friend is physically impossible. So my suggestion to him is that, having brought the matter before the House, as he has done in a very temporate and full manner, he shall not press his motion to a conclusion; that it stand if he pleases, or that he withdraw it, as may seem best to him, and I will undertake that the matter shall be taken up at once and that we shall come to a conclusion which will be fair and also which will be possible of being carried out.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr. Speaker, this motion has been moved and seconded by two French-speaking members. As a matter of fact, it is the English-speaking members who should desire the improvement that my hon. friend is asking for. Of course, the better thing would be—and I wish it were so—that all members of this House could speak both French and English, and in that respect our French friends put most of us to shame. Every one of them can speak and understand both languages, whereas but a limited number of the English members of this House have that pleasure, although the number has been enlarged lately by the addition of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster.) The only good thing we have out of the Peace Conference is that my right hon. friend has learned to speak French. It is a rather expensive lesson, but it is a good thing that we have some favourable results. But if we cannot all understand the French language and have the pleasure of listening to and enjoying the addresses of our French friends, the next best thing is that we shall as early as possible afterwards have those addresses translated into English. I heartily sympathize with the motion which, as I have already said, should come from us who are English Canadian rather than from those who are French. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has suggested some difficulties in the matter; these are for the consideration of the hon. gentleman who has made the motion, but I desire to express my hearty sympathy with the object he has in view.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright) (translation): Mr. Speaker, before this resolution carries, I would like to add a few words to the remarks made by hon. members who have already spoken.

I must confess that unfortunately I do not frequently enough speak French in this House; to-day I make use of that language intentionally, because I absolutely recognize that both languages are official in the Canadian Parliament.

I am very glad that the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères has introduced the resolution now under discussion. It is most important that every member and every voter in this country should have in hand the speeches as delivered both in English and French. If more translators are required, it would be false economy not to appoint a greater number.

I do not want to make any lengthy remarks on this question, but I wish to tell my French colleagues, as has just been done by the hon. member for Queen's and Shelburne (Mr. Fielding) and the right hon. acting prime minister (Sir George Foster), that I am in sympathy with every thing contained in the resolution, and I trust the Government will see that there are no more complaints and that both language are recognised and put on an equal footing in this country.

Mr. O TURGEON (Gloucester) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I which to join my voice to that of the hon. members who have supported the resolution which has been so eloquently presented by my hon. friend from Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault).

It is seldom I speak French in this Parliament and until now I had a good reason for so doing; it was because, when I addressed my colleagues as well as the minister then representing New-Brunswick in the Government, I was always speaking to members who would not have otherwise understood my arguments and who might have been led to believe that I was taking advantage of their ignorance of my own language by not addressing them in a way to be understood; but now that the province of New Brunswick has had no minister for almost a year, now that the hon. the acting Prime Minister speaks French better than I do, I hesitate no longer to use the French language in this House. I am also anxious to criticize a statement made by my young friend while speaking of the province of Quebec. I would not like to have Parliament or the country led to believe that there are no French Canadians or French in this House but those who hail from the province of Quebec. I take pleasure in having this House and the country remember that there are also other French Canadians than those who have remained in the home of the French language, who closely observe whatever may be of help or otherwise toward the maintenance of our language. We are here three of us from the province of New Brunswick, representing three counties largely Acadian-French. We are just as much attached to that language as are our colleagues of the province of Quebec; we are therefore in favour of anything that may serve to enhance the French language in public opinion, not only in Canada, but throughout the whole world, and particularly of having the French portion of the Debates of this House translated as promptly as the English, in order that throughout this country, as well as outside of it, the arguments submitted by the members may be known without being distorted by some newspaper men. That is why I heartily agree with the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Archambault) and the seconder of the motion, the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. d'Anjou) and I hope my hon. friend, the acting Premier, may find a way—and that is always easy where there is a will—to remedy the state of affairs now existing and that should not exist.

Mr. J. E. FONTAINE (Hull) (translation): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to support the motion of the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Archambault). I think it is also the duty of all the French speaking members; the more so, as stated by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), because it is a good turn we wish to do to our English-speaking friends who have not the advantage of understanding and of speaking the French language.

Every member sitting in this House has the right, when rising to speak, to be understood, and if, unfortunately, some of his colleagues cannot understand what he says, it is surely the Government's duty to see that the words of such member, if he speaks French, be translated on the very next day, so that all may know what he did say. As states by one of the previous speakers, the French language is official and recognized in this Parliament, it must therefore enjoy the same privileges as the English. Although thankful to the hon. the Acting Prime Minister for his goodwill, I think he does not go far enough, and that he should immediately tell us that he will take the required means to do justice to every member of this House and especially to the English-speaking members, that they may be able to read on the very next day the French speeches translated into their own tongue. The Government now presided over by the hon. the Acting Prime Minister have, in my opinion, succeeded in overcoming difficulties far greater than that of finding a larger number of translators. I know, I am convinced, that much harder problems have had to be solved, and it would require ever so little good will on the part of the Government to settle this question. Circumstances are most favourable, every body is now talking of entente cordiale, every one wishes to have peace and union between the two races of this country; never was these a more propitious opportunity; let the Government set the good example and do an act, not of generosity, but of justice to an important portion of this country's population and find the way to fulfil the demand submitted by the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères.

Once more, it seems to me that the Government through the hon. the Acting Premier, have no excuse for asking any delay; we should immediately be promised that the matter will be adjusted and every body satisfied. I am fully confident we shall obtain justice.

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Montmorency) (translation): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the attention of the House very long, after the few speeches we have heard, and especially after the clear and precise remarks made by the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Archambault), supported by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. D'Anjou), there is nothing for me to do but to endorse and subscribe fully to every one of the statements contained in the motion before the House. If I do not often speak in French in the House, the reason is that, as my hon. friend the member for Chambly-Verchères stated, in many cases the members of the Government and those who support them cannot understand us when we speak in that language and that the speeches made in French are not translated immediately, with the result that our claims cannot have the same effect when only made known to the hon. members of the right four, five or six months later.

I believe that the Government should not rest content with only saying "we will remedy this state of things by making an investigation and finding out what can be done." That is a pretty vague and evasive answer; and it is the one which is very frequently given us in this House. I would prefer to hear the leader of the Government tell us now what he intends to do. With an investigation, with a commission, it will mean further delays, and we will reach the end of the session, and perhaps the end of this Parliament, before anything is done. I would therefore ask the Government to fully consider the question and tell us presently what we are to expect.

Mr. C. P. POWER (Quebec-South): Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to join the hon. members for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Archambault), and for Rimouski (Mr. d'Anjou) as well as the other French Canadian and Acadian hon. members, who have asked that in this Canadian House of Commons the beautiful French language be treated with equity. Their claims I consider to be just and reasonable.

[Mr. Fontaine.]

Mr. Speaker, as a citizen of the province of Quebec, as one of those who have always lived among the people of the same origin as these gentlemen, I desire to express my most thorough sympathy with resolution of the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères. As was stated a moment ago by the hon. member for Queens-Shelburne (Mr. Fielding), it should rather belong to us, the English speaking members of this House, to claim the right to read—since we cannot always understand—what is said so well and sometimes with so much eloquence by our French-speaking colleagues.

I understand that beside the reasons given by my hon. friend the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster), there may be legitimate excuses for the failure of the Government and the ministers to have the remarks made in the French language in this House printed on the following day.

I trust that the Acting Prime Minister and those having charge of the matter will attend to it as soon as possible, in order that in future the speeches delivered in French be immediately translated, and that the English-speaking members may as early as possible appreciate the intelligence, the eloquence and I would say the erudition of our French-speaking colleagues.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I very much regret that my command of the beautiful French language is not sufficient to enable me to reply to some of the very able deliverances that we have listened to this afternoon, but as chairman of the Debates Committee I shall be very glad to call a meeting to discuss the merits of the suggestion made by my hon. friend from Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Archambault) if the matter is referred to the committee as suggested by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster). It must be evident, however, to hon. members that if the resolution were adopted and put into force immediately, it would be impossible to publish the Unrevised edition of Hansard at the time it is now published. It now reaches hon. members about ten o'clock in the morning, but if all the speeches were to be translated, and especially if during a debate a number of hon. members spoke in the French language, it would be impossible to have the unrevised edition placed in the hands of hon. members at ten o'clock the following morning. However, the members of the Debates Committee—I am sure I can speak for them—will give the matter careful consideration when it comes before them.

I was struck the other day by the report made to the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons by Mr. Achille Frechette. I presume he was authorized to make that report by the Internal Economy Committee. I understand that he was connected with the Translation Branch of the House of Commons, and that he proceeded to Belgium and Switzerland to make some investigations, the results of which are embodied in his report. I shall read only one or two very brief extracts as I do not want to prolong this debate unduly. He said, referring to the Debates:

As is the case in Canada, the debates may be carried on in Belgium and in Switzerland in either or any of the official languages of the country.

In Belgium, where the House is composed of 152 Representatives, and sits from 2 to 5 o'clock p.m., a synoptic report of the debates is published on the same evening. On the third day thereafter, at 8 a.m., a stenographic report is published under the name of Annales Parlementaires. These Annales contain the speeches in extenso, but only in the language in which they were made. If a member has not furnished his corrections of the stenographic report of his speech within 48 hours, the latter, instead of being published verbatim in the Annales, is only inserted in the condensed form as found in the synoptic report, with mention of the fact.

Further on he says:

In Switzerland the stenographers take down only the debates on federal laws, and certain federal arrêtés (a term about corresponding to our Orders in Council). These speeches are published, in their own text only, in a Bulletin Stenographique, which hardly forms 600 pages at the end of the session. As to the rest, a translator sums up, verbally, in the House, in French if the speech was in German, and in German if it was in French, the conclusions of the different speeches.

It only remains, under this head, to state that the Belgium system, which is much more expeditious than ours, must also be, it seems to me, much less costly, inasmuch as the speeches are published in extenso in their original language only, and that only a resumé thereof is translated for the needs of the day.

When the matter comes before the committee it will be in a position to consider any suggestions made in this report, and I am sure if any hon. gentlemen who are not members of the committee have any representations to make we shall be delighted to have them attend the meetings of the committee, and I can promise, as chairman, that any such representations will be given the most careful consideration.

Mr. A. M. DECHENE (Montmagny): Mr. Speaker, the motion proposed by the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères deserves the attention of both sides of the House. Complaints and whispers very often come to our ears, but with no effective results. In spite of the acting Premier's good will, we are sorry to state that the French language, under any and every form, is being driven out of the Parliament of Canada and from the different Departments. Wherever we find a French civil servant, whether he speaks the language or he is called upon to either translate or transcribe it, he is left in the lurch or he is most unfairly treated.

This question, Mr Speaker, requires to be much enlarged upon and I would like to discuss it at a greater length; but, as it is now six o'clock, I would move the House do adjourn.

On the motion of Mr. Déchêne the debate was adjourned.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Before calling it six o'clock I desire to point out that resolution No. 12 standing in the name of the hon. member for St. Johns and Iberville (Mr. Demers) was not called owing to the fact that he wished to have it placed on the Order Paper for to-morrow, under the heading "Notices of Motions for Production of Papers." The hon. member is in the House and desires to make his motion now.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS.

Mr. DEMERS:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence, and other papers in the possession of the Government, in connection with the transfer of mail bags from the C.P.R. mail car to the mail car of the Quebec, Montreal and Southern Railway Company, and from the latter to the former, at Iberville Junction, during the period extending from the month of November, 1917, to the month of April, 1918.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, March 25, 1920.

The House met at Three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. 33, to incorporate International Loan Company.—Mr. Blake.

Bill No. 34, respecting The Montreal and Southern Counties Railway Company.—Mr. Archambault.

PAPERS PRESENTED.

Statement re the Naval Forces of Canada laid on the Table in accordance with the provisions of section 47, chapter 43, 9-10, Edward VII.—Hon. Mr. Ballantyne.

Copy of Order in Council P.C. 1961, dated September 29, 1919, covering the appointment of an Advisory Board as prescribed in the Act to amend the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act, chapter 66, 9-10, George V.—Hon. Mr. Rowell.

Copy of an Order in Council P.C. 2079, dated October 8, 1919, covering the appointment of the Dominion Council of Health.—Hon. Mr. Rowell.

Copy of Order in Council P.C. 328, dated February 11, 1920, accepting the resignation of the Hon. Walter R. Rollo as a member of the Dominion Council of Health and appointing in his place Mr. H. J. Halford, of Hamilton, Ont., Vice-President of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Rowell.

FRANCHISE ACT.

ADDITIONAL COPIES ORDERED PRINTED.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Acting Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker with the unanimous consent of the House I beg to move:

That 1,000 additional copies in English and 250 additional copies in French of Bill No. 12, an Act respecting the Election of Members of the House of Commons and the Electoral Franchise, be printed, and that Rule 74 be suspended in connection therewith.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 35 to amend the Dominion Lands Act.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Explain please.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This Bill is not of an important character. It provides for the acquirement of land earned under homestead by those who are refused naturalization only because they are unable to speak the English or the French language. There are one or two other minor provisions.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior) moved:

That Bill No. 14 to amend the Indian Act be referred to a special committee composed of Messrs. Boys, Charlton, Davidson, Ethier, Lapointe, Lanctôt, Reid (Mackenzie), Stacey and Wilson (Saskatoon), for consideration thereof and all matters pertaining thereto, with power to call for papers, persons and records, to examine witnesses under oath, and to report from time to time, and for that purpose that Rule No. 11 be suspended.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Ballantyne.]

COST OF STEFANSSON EXPEDITION.

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon):

What was the total cost to the Government of the exploration expedition sent to the Arctic Ocean with V. Stefansson and party, including the cost of ships, supplies and all amounts for any and all purposes?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE: $519,370.97.

GRASSHOPPER PLAGUE EXPECTED IN THE WEST.

Mr. GOULD:

1. Have any representations, petitions or other correspondence been received by the Government from representatives of various municipalities in South-eastern Saskatchewan, pointing out that from present indications there will in all probability be serious grasshopper plagues in districts overrun last year?

2. If so, what action has been taken to avoid a repetition of the destruction caused by the said plague?

3. Will the Department of Agriculture take immediate steps to investigate the advisability of sowing flax in the districts so infested, and if necessary supply flax seed in place of the wheat and oat seed now held?

Hon. Mr. TOLMIE:

1. We have had no petitions or other correspondence from representatives of any municipalities in South-eastern Saskatchewan regarding the expected outbreak of locusts in 1920. Our own officers, however, have personally investigated many districts in South-eastern Saskatchewan as well as portions of Manitoba and have found large numbers of eggs of destructive species, which certainly point to the probability of another outbreak occurring in 1920.

2. In order to meet any threatened outbreak of locusts in the Prairie Provinces in 1920 officers of the Entomological Branch, working in close co-operation with provincial officials, will conduct a vigorous educational campaign so that farmers in infested districts will know exactly what remedial measures to adopt. In this latter connection the importance of widespread community action will be specially emphasized. A special circular dealing with the locust pest is now in press and will soon be available.

3. The advisability of sowing flax in infested districts is of questionable value. The point has been previously raised that if flax is sown in soil infested areas, the land would be kept clear for a definite period in spring during which time the young hoppers would be starved owing to lack of food. The reply to this of course is that in addition to the fields which had been prepared for crop, all stubble fields, roadways and pastures as well as unoccupied areas would also have to be kept free of vegetation. This latter of course is impossible.

A valuable consideration in locust infested districts is to obtain a vigorous growth of the crop before it is attacked and to sow crops that are best able to withstand the attacks of these insects. In this connection rye being of quicker growth and more hardy, would doubtless be the best of all cereals to sow. Flax, on the other hand being sown late and having far less resisting power than cereals would suffer far more seriously were it to be attacked by locusts. Taking into consideration all these circumstances we could not consider the abandoning of cereals in favour of flax to be a wise policy.

MATERIAL IN NEW PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS.

Mr. COPP:

1. Was any of the material used in the construction of the new Parliament Buildings imported from the United States?

2. If so, what different kinds of material was so imported, what amount of each, and at what cost?

3. How much has been paid contractors for the construction of said buildings under their contract on the percentage basis?

4. Have said contractors been paid in full? If not, how much is still due them?

5. How much has been paid the architects on said buildings to date?

6. To what architects were amounts paid and how much to each?

7. Have they been paid in full? If not, how much is still due them?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. Yes.

2. 4,859 cu. ft. Indiana limestone, W. McMillan & Son, Chicago, $2,455.66; 84,229 cu. ft. Ohio sandstone, G. P. Sherwood & Co., Montreal, $103,649.63; 1,000 brls. All quarter cut oak for panelling and teakwood for floors was purchased in the United States by various sub-contractors, but do not know what was paid for such material. The majority of the large pipe and fixtures for the heating and plumbing installation and boiler plate for boilers, etc., was purchased in the United States, and there are several other materials which we know must have been purchased in the States as they could not be procured in Canada by the various sub-contractors, but no record of this material or the prices paid for it, as contracts were made with the various sub-contractors for the different parts of the work erected complete.

By resolution of the Joint Committee held May 12, 1916, it was decided that all materials entering into the construction of the building must be Canadian, wherever possible.

3. $314,805.26, but no payment made since 17th March, 1919.

4. Under the terms of the agreement $75,-194.74 is still due, as the contractors are to receive eight per cent on cost up to four millions and seven per cent on cost in excess of that amount up to five millions.

5. $255,354.24, but no payment made since 28th April, 1919.

6. Mr. J. A. Pearson, $214,729.72; Mr. J. O. Marchand, $40,624.52.

7. (a) No; (b) $19,645.76.

REPAIRS TO HICKEY'S WHARF, P.E.I.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens):

1. What was the nature of the repairs made to Hickey's Wharf, Prince Edward Island, during 1919?

2. Were the said repairs made by contract or by day work?

3. If by day work, who was the foreman, how much was he paid per day and how many days did he work?

4. What are names of all those who were employed at this work, the number of days worked by each man and the respective amounts paid?

5. What are the names of those who supplied the material, the amount supplied by each person, the price paid to them for plank per thousand and for stone per load or per yard?

6. What was the total amount received by each of said persons?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. Renewal of covering of floor stringers on the block situated between the outer two spans.

DUTY ON STEEL PLATES.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

What is the duty on steel plates for shipbuilding imported (a) from the United States, and (b) from England?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL: Iron and steel plates for wooden, iron, steel or composite ships and vessels are free of duty and exempt from war tax, under Tariff Item 470, irrespective of country from which imported.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer):

How many houses have been commenced, and how many fininshed, under the legislation of a year ago?

ELECTION IN ST. JAMES, MONTREAL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PIERRE FRANCOIS CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Montmorency): Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the Government if there is any truth in a statement published last night in La Patrie, to the effect that the election in St. James Division, Montreal, may be delayed owing to certain difficulties in getting the voters' list ready at the proper time?

Rt. Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I saw the article in La Patrie to which the hon. gentleman refers, and have caused inquiry to be made as to what foundation there is in fact for the statements it contains, and that is all I can say at the present moment. I am not aware whether the statements are accurate or not, and in the absence of definite information in the matter it is impossible for me to form an opinion as to what effect might be on the election if those statements were true.

NAVAL POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

STATEMENT BY HON. MR. BALLANTYNE, MINISTER OF NAVAL SERVICE.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Naval Service): Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to make a statement on the Government's policy in regard to naval affairs:

The Government has had under consideration for some time the question of the naval defence of Canada and the suggestion of Admiral Viscount Jellicoe in reference thereto.

In view of Canada's heavy financial commitments and of the fact that Great Britain has not as yet decided on her permanent naval policy, and of the approaching Imperial Conference at which the question of naval defence of the Empire will come up for discussion between the Home Government and the Overseas Dominions, it has been decided to defer in the meantime action in regard to the adoption of a permanent naval policy for Canada.

The Government has decided to carry on the Canadian Naval Service along pre-war lines and has accepted the offer of Great Britain of one light cruiser and two torpedo boat destroyers to take the place of the present obsolete and useless training ships, the Niobe and Rainbow.

The Minister of Naval Service, in order to be free to thoroughly reorganize and place the present service on an economical and efficient basis, has issued orders for the demobilization of all officers and naval ratings and for the discontinuance of civilian help at headquarters and at the Naval Dockyards in Esquimalt and Halifax. The Canadian officers who are in the Imperial fleet and who are now being paid by the Canadian Government will be recalled and placed on duty with the Canadian Naval Service. The Naval College will also be continued. After reorganization has been completed, only those officers and other ratings and civilians will be taken on who are absolutely necessary and possess the qualifications desired.

In addition to this announcement, Mr. Speaker, I beg to inform the House that the Director of Naval Service, Admiral Sir Charles Kingsmill, has retired. He has been Director of Naval Service since the inception of the Canadian Navy in 1910, and he has performed his duties in a most satisfactory manner. I therefore wish to tender him now, on the floor of this House, my thanks as Minister of Naval Service, as well as the thanks of the Canadian Government. An officer of a junior rank will shortly be appointed.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that all hon. gentlemen on this side of the House will join with the minister in expressing our thanks to Admiral Kingsmill for the manner in which he has discharged his duties as Director of the Canadian Naval Service. May I ask the minister whether I was right in understanding him to say at the beginning of his remarks that the Government at the present time has no naval policy? I took that interpretation from his utterance. Possibly he used the words "permanent naval policy." But does that give us to understand that the Government has no permanent naval policy?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Mr. Speaker, I stated the position of the Government in very clear and precise terms. I shall be glad indeed to send across the floor of the House to the leader of the Opposition a typewritten copy of precisely what I did say.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN: I should like to ask the minister whether, before a permanent naval policy is entered upon, the Government will consult the electors of Canada.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what I have already stated on behalf of the Government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is rather important that the position should be made perfectly clear. I read from the statement which the minister has been kind enough to submit to me the following words:

> In view of Canada's heavy financial commitments and of the fact that Britain has not as yet decided on her permanent naval policy, and of the approaching Imperial Conference at which the question of naval defence of the Empire will come up for discussion between the Home Government and the Overseas Dominions, it has been decided to defer in the meantime action in regard to the adoption of a permanent naval policy for Canada.

If these words mean anything they mean that at the present time the Government has no policy and proposes—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, let me repeat the words: "It has been decided to defer in the meantime"—that is, until this conference is held in the summer or whenever it is the intention to hold it. It has been decided, until that time, to defer action in regard to the adoption of a permanent naval policy for Canada. Surely this must mean that at the present time there is no permanent policy and that the Government intends to wait until after some Imperial conference has been held. In view of this fact, I think that the question asked by my hon. friend (Mr. Devlin) a moment ago is quite pertinent. I think that this House has a right to know whether the Government intends to consult Parliament on the policy which it purposes to adopt, also whether the Government intends to make any intimation to the House as to what policy it proposes to lay before the Imperial Conference for consideration.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): I may say that I endorse, so far as I can catch them, some of the remarks of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. I do not know how far I am in order in saying anything upon the statement which has been made to the House by the minister, but if I am out of order the minister was equally so. I think I am clear on that point.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is customary for ministerial announcements to be made upon the Orders of the Day. The hon. member himself will recall many instances in which such was done. That being so, it does not, however, open the subject for general discussion. But in view of the undoubted importance of the subject, it would be quite competent for the hon. member to put a question to the minister, although he may not enter into a discussion.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: The announcement we have heard is one of the most extraordinary statements that have ever been presented to Parliament. As the leader of the Opposition has said, it avows that the Government have no policy—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: —no permanent policy; and it goes on to say at the end of the statement, that nevertheless they have a policy which has been intimated to the British Admiralty. They have accepted the ships which have been offered by the British Admiralty in the place of others which are described as "useless and obsolete." As I may not discuss the subject, I shall put my views in the form of a question, and I would ask the Minister of Naval Service how long he thinks it will be before the ships he has now got will be useless and obsolete.

Mr. DEVLIN: In view of the importance of the subject and of the fact that it may not be debated, I should also like to ask a question or two of the minister. Have the Government been instructed in any way or informed by the Home authorities of the advisability of the action which the Government is now about to take?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The Government and the Parliament of Canada decide all issues of that character on their own responsibility.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: But they do not decide anything now.

Mr. DEVLIN: Why, then, is the minister waiting for the Imperial Conference?

Mr. SPEAKER: Orders of the Day.

Mr. DEVLIN: I have not finished, Mr. Speaker, I have another question.

Rt. Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The minister has made a statement which is before the House, and I think it would be advisable, seeing the different renderings which have been given it so far, that members should have the answer before them and see exactly what it is, so that they may not be led into making mistakes as to its interpretation. The Government has made its statement in reference to the policy; it is there and speaks for itself. At the opportune time the Government is quite ready to take up the question and debate it with hon. gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. DEVLIN: I want to bow right away to the suggestion of my right hon. friend, inasmuch as that suggestion helps out the Government; but we are representing the people here, and we intend to have the people's rights respected.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The rule is well established in this House: That there can be no debate on this subject at the present stage because there is nothing before the House. I am sure the House will agree with me that I have been quite lenient in not preventing the putting of questions. I hope there will be no further attempt at debate under the disguise of an interrogation.

Mr. DEVLIN: This is the question I would like to ask the minister: "Did the Prime Minister, upon a certain occasion in or near the city of Ottawa, make the statement that the Government would follow the advice of the Admiralty in forming a naval policy for Canada?" I speak of the occasion when Lord Jellicoe made a statement of the needs——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. DEVLIN: It is perfectly in order; I am giving the circumstances to remind the minister.

Mr. BUREAU: Just to refresh his memory.

Mr. DEVLIN: I am simply refreshing the memory of the Government.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I submit that that is a proper question for the hon. member to place upon the Order Paper.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The policy is to have no policy.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

MILITARY CANTEEN PROFITS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly-Verchères) (translation): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to see the hon. the Overseas Minister of Militia back in his seat, he having returned safe and sound from the exterior belt of the war, where he had remained for five years.

Last year, I put two questions, the one of which had reference to the profits of the military canteens of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, and the other dealt about the damages relating to the Kimmel Camp riots.

The hon. member for Hamilton, who was then Minister of Militia, told me that he would cable the Overseas Minister for an answer. I do not know whether the answer has arrived, but as I do not see the Overseas Minister in his seat, I would like the hon. member to answer those questions.

The Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (translation): I wish to say, in answer to my hon. friend the member for Chambly-Verchères, that I got some information with respect to the three questions which he put the other day: As for the Siberian Force, all the documents are ready to be brought down, and as far as the Sainte-Anne-de-Bellevue military hospital is concerned, the papers are under preparation and will be brought down within a few days. I may say, with reference to the Grand Trunk shareholders' list, that information must be obtained from London; it is being sought just at present, and is expected from day to day.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT (translation): Mr. Speaker, I have congratulated the acting prime minister yesterday on the progress he had made in the French language. May he allow me to say, however, that he has not quite understood the remarks which I have just submitted. His answer has reference to three questions which I have put yesterday or the day before. When I rose, this afternoon, I put questions quite different from those, and if my hon. friend will allow me, I shall now put them in English.

I stated in French that I was very glad to see the hon. the Overseas Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) back in his seat. Last year I put some questions to the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn), who was then Minister of Militia, with reference to the profits of the military canteens of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces and also in relation to the damages at Camp Kimmel. My hon. friend answered me that he was going to cable overseas and get the information. As the cable was probably sent, as I have no answer yet, and as the Overseas Minister of Militia is in his seat now, I would like him to answer this question.

Sir EDWARD KEMP (Overseas Minister of Militia): Replying to my hon. friend (Mr. Archambault), I may say that there is a question on the Order Paper which covers the information that he wants. The question was called to-day, but the answer is not ready. It will be ready at the next sitting of the House. The question is so wide that it covers not only the information that my hon. friend desires, but other information dealing with the same subject. I think he coupled with the statement he made the expression of a desire for certain information regarding some canteen fund that has reference to Canada. If so, that information would not be in the answer; it will have to be added by the Department of Militia and Defence.

RUMOURED CLOSING OF DISTRICT PENSION OFFICES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): I should like to direct the attention of the Government to a rumour which has been widely prevalent to the effect that certain district offices of the Board of Pension Commissioners have recently been closed and that others are about to be closed within the next few days, notably, Regina, Victoria, Charlottetown, Sydney, Quebec, North Bay, and seven or eight others. Is the Government aware that by closing these district offices they will seriously inconvenience—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should be content with putting his question.

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: I will make inquiries and ascertain whether there is any foundation for the rumour. Undoubtedly the Board of Pension Commissioners wish to keep the expenses of administration within as reasonable limits as possible consistent with giving due care to the pensioners.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT.

SECOND READING OF BILL NO. 12 MOVED BY HON. HUGH GUTHRIE.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Militia and Acting Solicitor General) moved the second reading of Bill No. 12, respecting the election of members of the House of Commons and the Electoral Franchise. He said: In moving the second reading of this Bill may I be permitted to say at the outset that it is somewhat doubtful at the present moment whether we have any valid and subsisting law of this Parliament under which the will of the electors of Canada might be recorded, or otherwise made known at the polls, through the medium of a general election, if at any time a dissolution of Parliament were to take place by law, or if perchance for any other reason it might be deemed appropriate and expedient to dissolve the House. As the House is aware there is a special Act in force at the present time which makes provision both for the franchise and for the conduct of an election, but that special Act is by its own terms expressly limited in its application to by-elections. It is known as the Dominion By-Elections Act, and under the terms of that special Act certain by-elections are now being held in Canada. That Act, however, has no application whatever to the case of a general election. Consequently if a dissolution of Parliament should take place—either by the expiration of the time limited under the British North America Act, or if for any other reason the Government should see fit at any time to tender advice to His Excellency to the end that Parliament should be earlier dissolved—we might find ourselves in rather an awkward predicament. We certainly should find ourselves in rather an uncertain situation as to whether we had at this time in Canada any adequate and subsisting law either to fix the franchise or to govern the conduct of a general election. To avoid that uncertainty and that unsatisfactory condition of the law in the future, and to render definite and certain what might otherwise be uncertain, this Bill is brought before the House at the present time.

When I mention the matter of doubt in regard to the present status of our election laws, may I be permitted to explain that any doubt which may exist upon the subject, exists by reason of certain contingencies and the happening of certain events upon which certain important portions of our legislation, which were passed under rather extraordinary conditions, were made dependent. The Dominion Elections Act of 1908, with amendments passed from time to time, continued in force down to the year 1917. During the year 1917 somewhat radical amendments were introduced into the law—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE:—under the provisions of a certain Act passed in that session and known as the War-time Elections Act, and further amendments were made to the Dominion Elections Act during that session under the provisions of another Act known as the Military Voters' Act. Both of these last mentioned enactments were undoubtedly in the nature of war measures. Each of them was duly approved by this Parliament with a full knowledge and realization of the extraordinary and somewhat critical war situation which then prevailed, not only throughout Canada but throughout the world. However, at this time no good end is to be achieved by a discussion of these Acts, I only mention them to show their bearing and application under the present situation.

It will be remembered that the War-time Elections Act in express terms suspended altogether the operation of Part 1 of the Dominion Elections Act, being that part of the Dominion Elections Act which provided for the franchise, for the voters' list and also for polling divisions. The War-time Elections Act also amended Part 2 of the Dominion Elections Act by providing, among other things, that the wives, mothers, sisters and daughters of persons serving in the military and naval forces of Canada overseas should be entitled to vote. These were rather radical changes in our law. In addition to these, however, the Military Voters' Act made other important changes in regard to the votes of soldiers, and the terms upon which the franchise should be granted to and exercised by them, and the Military Voters' Act itself was incorporated as Part 4 of the Dominion Elections Act. By section 1 of the War-time Elections Act it was provided:

> During the present war, and until demobilization after the conclusion of peace, the operation of Part 1 of the Dominion Elections Act shall be suspended.

Then in regard to Part 2 of the Dominion Elections Act the provision was as follows:

> That Part 2 of the Dominion Elections Act shall, during the present war and until demobilization after the conclusion of peace, "operate and apply as if amended," and shall be deemed to be amended, as follows.

Then follow the amendments, while the qualification in the Military Voters' Act which became Part 4 of the Dominion Elections Act was in the following language:

> This part of this Act shall apply only to a general election held during the present war or after the conclusion of peace but before demobilization.

From the summary of our election law as it stands, which I have just given, the House will see that there may be some substantial ground for uncertainty as to the correct and legal position to-day. In the first place the question will arise: Have we reached that particular period of time mentioned in the War-time Elections Act, and that particular period of time mentioned in the Military Voters' Act? Do the words "during the present war" apply at the present time? Have we reached that particular moment of time which could legally be described as "after the conclusion of peace"? It is true that peace has been proclaimed in so far as it concerns Germany and Austria, but is it not equally true—technically true at least—that we are still at war with Turkey and Bulgaria? That is the first question. The next question is: Has demobilization yet taken place? Demobilization has taken place for all practical purposes, yet technically demobilization has not fully taken place. There are still some members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force who are not yet demobilized—some men who are still employed, and men in hospitals and the like. However the question of demobilization, so far as it relates to the War-time Elections Act, has probably been settled by an Order in Council passed on the 16th day of July last, which provided that on the first day of August, 1919, demobilization shall be deemed to be completed in so far as the operation of the War-time Elections Act is concerned. It will be noted, however, that there is no mention whatever in the Order in Council of the Military Voters' Act.

Now, from the circumstances I have just related I think the House will readily understand that it is very essential for us to have some definite legislation upon the subject of general elections; to set at rest for all time to come whatever doubts and uncertainties might possibly arise by expressly repealing every Dominion Election Act heretofore passed as detailed in the schedule to the Bill, and by providing a simple and comprehensive system which, it is hoped, will afford both a just and satisfactory franchise and an expeditious and convenient means of conducting elections for this House of Commons.

The object of the present Bill is threefold: In the first place, to provide a uniform franchise; in the second place, to provide a uniform method for the preparation of voters' lists; and, in the third place, to provide uniform election machinery. The importance of all three objects, though combined in a single Bill, will, I think, be readily appreciated by the House.

In endeavouring to establish a basis of franchise of uniform application throughout the nine provinces, upon foundations of absolute equality and fairness to every section of the community, one is met at the outset with problems of great difficulty and diversity; in endeavouring to formulate and perfect a system for the preparation, revision and final completion of voters' lists in a territory so vast and scattered as that contained in this broad country, in order to ensure the legal right to vote with the least possible degree of inconvenience to the voter, one is met with a situation of great complexity and great magnitude; and, furthermore, in endeavouring to formulate from the broadest principle down to the minutest detail a set of rules and regulations for the safe, sure and just conduct of a general election under such diverse circumstances for a population unevenly distributed over such a vast territory, at some points dense and at other points scattered, one is brought to a full realization of the imperfection of all human productions, be the effort of the individual or of the Government to achieve perfection ever so great and ever so honest.

This Bill is naturally bulky. It is designed, as I have said, to have universal operation without, or almost without, any special limitations or exceptions. When one considers the vastness of the proposal, the conclusion is rather forced upon one that while standards may be established and principles adopted, to set forth within the four corners of a measure the general scope and application of the proposal as settled and intended as a pronouncement of Government policy, yet in a matter of such great national importance and complexity and of such vital consequence, directly or indirectly, to the rights, the interests, the welfare and the convenience of the whole community,—under such circumstances the Government has a right to expect that the industry, the intelligence, and the most mature judgment of every hon. member shall be placed at its disposal in the consideration of this measure, so that, when we have reached the end of our labours, we may be able to present to the electors an election law which is the product of the combined experience and intelligence of every section of the House, and which hereafter may prove to be a model of its kind in fairness and simplicity.

It is in this spirit, Mr. Speaker, that the Government brings this Bill forward on motion for the second reading. I realize that the Bill as drafted, while it has been considered and revised, and reconsidered and again revised, and while in its present form it expresses the policy of the Government in regard to the matters set forth therein, yet in one respect I can assure the House that it bears no resemblance to the law of the Medes and Persians. The Government will not hesitate to carefully consider and, if necessary, adopt any amendment that may be offered from any quarter of the House which in the opinion of the House will render the Bill more safe, more sure and more convenient in its operation than it may be in its present form.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after this general statement as to the present position of our election law and as to the policy and attitude of the Government in regard to this Bill, may I be permitted to touch very briefly upon what one might call the history of our franchise legislation?

I desire to mention this matter chiefly on account of a paragraph which I read the other day in a Liberal newspaper, to the effect that Parliament and the country would insist upon the principle of the adoption of provincial franchises and provincial lists; and because I noticed upon the opening day of this session that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) dropped rather a plain intimation in the course of his remarks to the effect that the Opposition would expect the Government "to adopt provincial voters' lists in accordance with the spirit of our constitution."

Well, Mr. Speaker, perhaps at this distance of time, after we have had over half a century of experience under the British North America Act,—which is the governing Act in regard both to Dominion and Provincial legislation,—it might be considered somewhat of a waste of time to attempt to justify the right of this Parliament to pass legislation for the creation of voters' lists and for the conduct of elections which pertain exclusively to the election of members to this Parliament. We all know that during the early years after Confederation a rather heated discussion was waged throughout Canada in regard to that very question.

It was very strongly and very ably urged in the early days that as Canada had been federated upon the theory and principle of a pure federation, as it was called, as opposed to a legislative union, the right was inherent in the provinces to fix the franchise and establish the voters' lists which should be used in the election of their representatives to the Federal Parliament. That question never really came before Parliament until that interesting period in our history about the year 1885, when the Conservative Administration, under the leadership of the late Sir John A. Macdonald, introduced into this House a Franchise Act based entirely upon the constitutional right of this Parliament to legislate in respect to the franchise, to voters' lists, and to rules of elections. A contest then took place on the floor of this House, one of the mightiest debates that ever took place in the political history of Canada. If one turns back the pages of Hansard, refers to the proceedings of Parliament thirty-five years ago, and reads the arguments that were used and the speeches that were delivered pro and con in regard to that question, one is bound to conclude, having regard to the men who took part in that great debate, that there must have been "giants in the world in those days." It was an able debate, sometimes bitter and acrimonious, sometimes even turbulent. But comparing that debate with our debates of the present day, one is bound to say that it was conducted upon a very high plane, and that that characteristic was very well sustained throughout.

Well, what was the argument? The argument of the Hon. Edward Blake, then leader of the Liberal Opposition, and undoubtedly one of the greatest lawyers that this country has ever produced, was briefly this: Among provinces joined together upon a federal principle, on a federal theory, it is absolutely necessary in order to carry out the true theory of federation, that each province should alone be asked in what manner it desired to send its own delegates or representatives to the Federal House. Mr. Blake argued that it was not for Ontario to say in what manner the representatives of the province of Quebec should be sent to this Parliament; that it was not the business of representatives from the province of Quebec to say by what method the representatives from Nova Scotia should be elected. Mr. Blake argued that the most outstanding example of the principle which he advocated was to be found in United States—I think he called it the most glorious and the most outstanding example of the federal principle. He demonstrated to this House that every State in the United States had the right to determine its own franchise and to make and revise its own voters' lists used in the election of members of Congress. That certainly was then and is now the right of every State in the United States. But I think there is an inclination on the part of many people who make a comparison between the constitution of this country and that of the United States to overlook this important fact: That while the United States was founded upon the federal principle, and the federation of the Canadian provinces was likewise founded on the federal principle, but upon principles in one material respect very different from the principles adopted in the United States. In 1776 the States which subsequently formed the United States sent their representatives to Philadelphia and there they laid down certain principles. One principle which they laid down was that each State should surrender a certain part of its sovereign power to the federal authority, that sovereign power to be exercised by the federal authority for the benefit of all the States which should form the Union. It was not so in the case of the formation of the Canadian federation. When the delegates of the various provinces assembled in the conference which led to Confederation, they worked out their agreement upon the principle that the federal or central government should have all legislative power which should thereafter pertain to the Dominion as a whole, and that only the residue (what was left), and only that which was of a local and private or provincial nature, should belong to the provinces. Now, the result of these two modes has been this: In the United States the national Government has jurisdiction only over those matters which were expressly handed over to it by the States themselves; all other legislative power and authority remains with the State Governments. But in Canada the provinces have jurisdiction only in respect of those particular matters which were expressly handed over to them by our Confederation Act, the Dominion having exclusive jurisdiction in regard to all other matters. That is a very opposite result as between the two countries, but it is arrived at by a logical process of reasoning, having regard to the principles which guided our respective forefathers when they came to their original agreement.

There is a very simple means of testing the question whether this Parliament or the provincial legislatures have jurisdiction in regard to the franchise so far as respects the election of members to this House. Under the scheme which was adopted when the British North America Act was passed there is one section which is well known to all lawyers, section 92. Under that section are gathered together all the subjects upon which the provinces have the exclusive right to legislate. There are only sixteen of them, sixteen subparagraphs, and with regard to those sixteen subjects the legislatures of our provinces have exclusive rights to legislate; apart from those sixteen there are only one or two other subjects in which there can be any possible conflict of jurisdiction—that is, in regard to education, dealt with by section 93, and the subjects of agriculture and immigration, dealt with by section 95,—I have said that there is a simple way of applying a test in these matters. If in section 92, among the sixteen subjects therein mentioned, you find a particular subject regarding which you are making inquiry, broadly speaking, you will know at once it is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. But if the subject concerning which you make inquiry is omitted from among the sixteen subjects enumerated in that section, you may take it as absolute that the provinces have no jurisdiction in regard to it. Now, I challenge any one to find in section 92 of the British North America Act, after going over it paragraph by paragraph, a hint, a suggestion, an insinuation in respect to a Dominion franchise, a Dominion election, Dominion voters' lists, or anything of that kind. So as a result of that simple test you are forced to the conclusion that this Parliament has complete and absolute jurisdiction on that subject.

But the matter does not rest there, by any means. When Parliament first met after Confederation, in July, 1867, some means had to be devised whereby elections could be held. The British North America Act did not provide the means, except for the first meeting of Parliament. The British North America Act was more a declaration of principle than anything else. It did not attempt to go into details. It left much of the detailed matter to be worked out by subsequent legislation, and it left a good deal of it likewise to be decided by the appellate courts of the British Empire. But section 41 did provide that until this Parliament should otherwise declare, the provincial franchises and the provincial lists should be used and the provincial election methods adopted. But the first words of section 41, I think, tell the whole story in regard to jurisdiction.

Section 41—I will not read the unnecessary portions—reads as follows:

> Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several provinces at the union relative to the following matters or any of them, namely: the qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly in the several provinces, the voters at elections of such members * * * * shall respectively apply to elections of members to serve in the House of Commons for the same several provinces.

That settled the question for the first election to this House, and that section commences with these words "Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides." That is almost an express enactment that this Parliament has the jurisdiction. Certainly the only implication from that language is that we have that jurisdiction, and that jurisdiction is the jurisdiction which was maintained in the Act which was presented to this House in 1885. I must say that the late Mr. Blake made a very forceful argument in support of his contention on that occasion; but Mr. Blake had in support of his argument the special conditions which actually existed in Canada at that time. He was able to point to the situation which had developed in the seven provinces which at that time made up Confederation in this country. He was able to tell Parliament that there was the greatest diversity in those provinces in regard to the franchise; that was true. Why, he said, in the most westerly province of Confederation, British Columbia, they have manhood franchise, while every other province has a property qualification, and in no two of those provinces is the qualification the same. Consequently, he said, there is the greatest diversity, and only confusion and trouble will ensue if you adopt a dual system. I am satisfied, however, that if Mr. Blake's life had been spared to this period of time, if he had been able to watch the development that has taken place in regard to this matter in the provinces of Canada, he would have been the first to admit that the foundation of his argument had been taken away.

What have we to-day? We have nine provinces in the Dominion, and in six of those provinces we have practically a single franchise—manhood and womanhood suffrage. In only three provinces is there any distinction made, and in those three, Quebec, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, I think there is still a slight property qualification, but with all due deference to those provinces I submit that the property qualification where it exists is so slight as to be absoltuely insignificant. There would be very little difference between a provincial list in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, based upon manhood franchise, and a list in the same provinces prepared having regard to the property qualifications which exist in those provinces to-day. So for practical purposes one may well say that throughout the length and breadth of Canada there is an established franchise, certainly an approximate franchise, which has uniform operation throughout the nine provinces. There is no diversity practically, and there would be no difficulty now in a uniform system. The danger of confusion has been removed, and that was the great danger that Mr. Blake foresaw. He did not on that occasion direct his argument very strongly towards voters' lists. He had very little to say about them. What he pointed out, and what the Liberal party pointed out in 1885, as any one can see by reading the debates, was that the Conservative Administration of that day was asking the House to adopt a measure which, in the opinion of the Liberal party, was nothing short of a political iniquity on account of the partisanship contained in its sections. The chief fight on behalf of the Liberal party was against the proposal to establish in this country a system of revising barristers, with power both to prepare and to revise the lists, and without any provision in the Bill for the right of appeal from the revising barrister. Every Liberal in the House pointed out the iniquity of such a proposal as that, and after a long and hard fight modifications were made, and the right of appeal was granted. That removed some of the difficulties, but as a matter of fact the question of provincial voters' lists per se hardly arose during the debate. The fight was on the method which the Bill proposed under which voters' lists should be prepared and revised by men who might be absolutely partisan, creatures of the Government of the day, with no right of appeal being given against them. Subsequently that proposal was very much modified, and the Bill passed the House. It was a most interesting debate, and I would commend it to the attention of every man in this House even at this late day. It was a fine argument and a rare fight. But I must confess that one cannot read these old pages of Hansard without some tinge of regret, some tinge even of sorrow. When you see in the list of those who participated in that debate the names of Macdonald, Laurier, Blake, Langevin, Mackenzie, Chapleau, Davies, Cartwright, Edgar, Weldon, White and Foster, one recalls with a feeling of sorrow that all the great parliamentarians of that day have passed to another sphere save two, one of whom now occupies the highest judicial position in this country, the other being my right hon. friend the Acting Prime Minister of this country (Sir George Foster). I am sure it is a matter of the greatest gratification and pride to us all to find him here at this distance of time, after a career of well nigh forty years in this Parliament, and over half that time, I believe, as a member of the Government. We have him with us to-day, rich in vigour of body and mind, his intellect, not dulled, but rather sharpened by the passage of years, his temper, I think, on the whole improved, his vision increased, and his parliamentary experience far above that of any other member of this House. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, I voice the unanimous wish of all the members of this House when I say that we hope he will be able for many, many years to say to himself,

> For men may come and men may go,
> But I go on forever.

The Act of 1885 went into operation despite the protests of the Liberal party, and it continued to be the law of this country for the next thirteen years. Speaking as one who had some actual experience under the operation of that Act, I did not like it. It was burdensome, troublesome, costly, and above all, dilatory. No one, I think, realized these features of that legislation more keenly than the Conservative party who passed it. The Act, before it was repealed, had not a friend in the country. Everybody wanted it changed. What I personally most complained of in regard to that law was that it was so dilatory that we never had an up-to-date voters' list during its whole operation. In the general election of 1891 we had to vote upon lists certified three years before election day.

In the election of 1896 the lists were over two years old. The thing was so expensive that you could not ask to have the list revised every year; the treasury would not stand it. I think the late Sir John Thompson realized the difficulty in 1894 when he was Prime Minister, for in that year he introduced a new Bill into the House. It only got to the second reading, having never passed the House. But in introducing the Bill Sir John Thompson was pretty guarded in his language. If I may be permitted to quote from his speech, he said:

> The number of differences which existed between the provincial franchises and the Dominion franchise as established by our own Act are so few as not to be worth the contest and expense which are involved in keeping them up, and the adoption of a general system which will apply to the local and Dominion legislatures has recommendations as regards simplicity and facilities for economy which cannot exist under a dual system which we have been keeping up for the past few years.

Later on in the same speech he said:

> The great principle which underlay the Franchise Act of 1885 was controlled by this Parliament over matters connected with the franchise.

And further on in the same speech:

We adhere to the principle that this House, and the electors who return members to this House, ought not to be under the control, as regards the exercise of their franchise, of the officers of any other Government or Legislature whatever in the country.

So that, from these statements taken from the speech of Sir John Thompson in this House when he introduced a new measure in 1894, we may conclude, I think, that he had seen and appreciated the development that had been going on in Canada and perceived that a uniform system was the correct system, and that there was not much use in holding out on the old principles. He was prepared to surrender one of them at least. However, the Act did not go through, and until 1898 we had no other franchise Act in this country, but the Act of 1885.

We all know that the Liberal party was in power in 1908, when they brought in a Franchise Bill and declared it to be founded on the principle they had so long advocated in this House and in the country, namely, the true federal theory or principle. They made many declarations to that effect, but I purpose to show that in the course of time they practically abandoned that theory. I happened to be a member of that party on one occasion during the session of 1908, when we absolutely negatived such a principle. When Alexander Mackenzie came into power he passed a Franchise Act in 1874, and it was the first Franchise Act passed after Confederation, he absolutely adopted the provincial franchise, without any qualifications or any conditions. He absolutely adopted the provincial voters' lists, and likewise without qualifications or exceptions. When the Laurier administration passed their first Franchise Act in 1898, if my memory serves me rightly in regard to its sections, it said by section 5: "We will adopt the provincial voters' lists"; and by sections 6, 7, and 8, "We will vary them and make certain voters' lists to suit ourselves." Then by subsequent sections it was decided to hand over these lists when made to the control of an officer of this Government. We said by that Act: "Here they will stay, and here they will be printed, and we will control them." That was not the Mackenzie Act of 1874 by any manner of means. Then by section 10 it was decided to adopt the provincial franchise, but by section 11 the Government said: "We will not adopt the provincial disqualifications." Practically they adopted it in so far as it suited them, and where it did not suit them they did not adopt it. However, I maintain that they had the absolute constitutional right to do so if they saw fit. This Parliament was not bound by any provincial Franchise Act and there was no custom in this country at that time that made it proper that we should accept or adopt provincial franchises. Certainly the Liberal Government did not adopt them. We passed amendment after amendment to the Act of 1898, but the decisive reasons for amendment arose in 1908. Mr. Speaker, I may be giving a little inside history, but I do not suppose it will hurt any one. I am not doing this by way of recrimination, nor yet by way of exultation, but solely for the purpose of justifying what the Liberal party did and what I supported them in doing in 1908. You remember, Sir, that there was a time when every provincial legislature in this country was controlled by a Liberal government; that was when the Act of 1898 was passed. From one end of the country to the other we had provincial Liberal governments. But there was a time when these administrations began to disappear one by one. Now, the election of 1900 was carried by the Liberal Government under the Election Act of 1898 practically unamended. Prior to 1904 we had only very slight amendments. But by 1904 one Richard McBride got into power in British Columbia, and a man named Roblin in Manitoba; and in January of 1905 one Sir James Whitney, obtained the reins of government in Ontario. That created rather an awkward situation at Ottawa. It made us look around to see what we could do. We had the constitutional right to legislate in regard to elections, and we were prepared to exercise it. We could survey the scene from the Atlantic to the Pacific to see where legislation or amendment was necessary. Looking out upon the province of Alberta, we did not foresee much difficulty. There lived in the land of Alberta a man named Sifton. I do not know whether the House has heard of this name, but I think the Liberal administration at Ottawa had every confidence that so long as a man by that name had control of the Government of Alberta no iniquity would be permitted in the voters' lists of that province.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: If the minister will pardon me I should like to correct him. No man named Sifton had charge of the Government of Alberta at the time of which he speaks.

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE: I should have said Rutherford, and Sifton subsequently. Well, the Administration had no fears so long as they knew that a man by the name of Rutherford controlled affairs there. Then, when we looked at the adjoining province of Saskatchewan, every one knew there was there a man named Jim Calder. I do not know whether the House knows the man or not, but the Liberal administration of that day in Ottawa had every confidence that so long as Jim Calder had anything to do with the Government of Saskatchewan the people of Saskatchewan would have a fair and square deal in election matters. As regards Quebec, you could go down there by day or night and find a perfectly satisfactory situation prevailing; all through the silent watches of the night the word would come back: "All's Well." We knew that the people of Quebec would be assured of a fair and honest voters' list. Little difficulty arose in New Brunswick, because, although there was in that province an administration known as the Hazen Government, that government wisely did not tamper with the old Liberal voters' list, and we were assured by men in the House—well-known men they were—that the situation was satisfactory in New Brunswick. In Nova Scotia we were doubly assured. The grand old Prime Minister there, the veteran who still occupies the distinguished position he has so long held—God bless him, and may he long be there—was in power in those days, and we knew that his name was a guarantee of fair dealing in regard to the voters' list in that part of the country. It did not matter so much in Prince Edward Island, because they had no provision for voters' lists in that province. The awkward places were British Columbia, Manitoba and Ontario, and the most awkward thing of the whole situation was what we considered to be an act of supreme impudence on the part of the Tory Prime Ministers of those three provinces, when they undertook to change the old standard voters' lists of the Liberal governments. That created a situation down here in Ottawa. It was bound to do so. We had to think the matter out and we began to think that the best way to meet it was by boldly declaring that we had the power to regulate the franchise in this country, that it was not a provincial matter at all, that it was a Dominion matter. I maintained that then and I maintain it now.

In June 1908 a Bill to amend the Election Act came before Parliament. I am not so familiar with what transpired in regard to British Columbia or Manitoba as I am in regard to Ontario. I know that it was suggested that these Acts of the McBride Administration and of the Roblin Administration were most iniquitous. I fancy they were as bad as they could be made. That was the excuse we offered for interference with their provincial voter's lists. I think we had found cases of overlapping, and that the Dominion constituencies and the provincial constituencies did not exactly conform and for that reason that there was necessity for our interference. In Ontario a very marked situation arose. The Government of Sir James Whitney came into power in Ontario in the spring of 1905. It will be remembered that for thirty-five years before that we had had in Ontario a Liberal Administration, Liberal voters' lists, and Liberal election laws had prevailed. For some reason best known to Sir James Whitney and his Government, they undertook to change that system and in 1908 they passed an Act which made provision for voters' lists in the unorganized districts of Ontario—that is where there were no municipal organizations, that northern tier in Ontario that used to send six members to this House constituting what we called New Ontario. I have no doubt that the proposal of Sir James Whitney was a very bad one. It did not suit the Government in power in Canada at that time. It was a very deliberate thing, I admit, but the Government of that day, with my support, passed an Act to say that for certain portions of these three provinces we would set aside the provincial lists and make lists for ourselves. There are men in this House like myself who supported the Government on that Bill and I am prepared to justify that vote, which I gave on principle, on the same principle that obtains now, and that is, that the Parliament of Canada has the full right to make its own franchise.

It is true that the hon. the leader of the Oposition (Mr. King) did not have a seat in this House in the spring of 1908. It may be that he was not then fighting in the front ranks but I will guarantee that by reason of his intimate knowledge of political matters at that time he had a position for himself on the headquarters staff. He knew what was going on, his party knew what was going on and it ill becomes a man who knows the situation which existed in 1908 and the law which we passed, and passed on principle I maintain, to say now, on the first day of the assembling of this session that the House will expect the Government to carry out the well known constitutional principle of provincial voters' lists.

The truth is that the Liberal Administration contained able men; it contained probably the ablest men that were ever gathered in a Canadian Government. They knew they had the right and they knew how to exercise that right which the law gave them. Sir Allen Aylesworth, the greatest lawyer, next to Edward Blake who has ever sat in this House, explained that law on the floor of Parliament. He said: "We have that right and we are going to exercise it." Why? He said that while on general grounds we might adopt the provincial franchise yet in this special case if Parliament thought it best not to adopt the provincial franchise it was perfectly within its right. Since that date I take it that the matter has been settled. I do not think the question can arise again. It would have remained settled as far as I am concerned but for the statement of my hon. friend (Mr. King) in regard to provincial lists and the statements I have seen in the Liberal press to the effect that the country would expect that we should follow the provincial lists and the provincial franchise in this new Bill.

I am free to say that the Liberal Government's Act of 1908 was a disappointment to many of us. I know it was a disappointment to myself in one respect. I believe that one of the first essentials of an election law is that it shall provide modern, up to date lists and that is what the Act of the Liberal Government did not at all do. I became a candidate for this House late in the fall of 1899 and I set to work on the lists in the rural municipalities and worked many weary weeks and many weary months in order that the names of all those who had a vote might be on the list. It was a different matter in the cities because you could register up to thirty days before the election. That is a principle that I, personally would like to apply to the whole country, to all municipalities, whether rural or urban. I knew there was a provision in the Act of 1898 which said that lists which were revised and in the hands of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery sixty days before nomination day should be the lists for election. These lists for my constituency were finally revised and in the hands of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery on the 15th August and the election was on the 3rd, or 6th November—I forget which. After all my work, after I had gone to the township courts of revision and to the judges courts of revision, what was my surprise when I received from the clerk of the Crown in Chancery, twenty, or it might have been forty copies of the lists of the year previous. I posted down to Ottawa and saw the Government about it. They said: "Why, your lists are all right, the lists for the counties of Waterloo and Halton are not finally revised for 1900, consequently you will have to take the old lists of 1899." the lists for the election of 1898 were probably eighteen or twenty months old. They were just about the same age in 1904 and were not quite so bad in 1908. The one fault I had to find with the Act of 1898 was that neither in its operation nor result did it give us an up to date list, a last moment list before the elections.

That is one aim that we have had before us in the preparation of this Bill. That is one of the most important things about a franchise Act. Every representative from the province of Ontario knows this fact in regard to our elections: that there are a large number of our people disqualified in respect of every election and they are among the very best people we have in the country. Take country schoolmasters; they change about every two or three years; we bring on an election in the Fall or at another time of the year, teachers' contracts have expired, they have gone to the next county and they have no vote in that county. That also applies to ministers and principally to those of the Methodist church in which the itinerant system prevails. A man becomes disqualified because while his name is on the old list he has moved away and he cannot get on the new list, there is no opportunity given to him to vote. These are things on account of which I always took exception to the old Act of 1898. The object of the present Bill is to give to the public an up to date, last minute Franchise Act, in so far as that is possible. Having regard to the conditions which exist in Canada, having regard to the practical unanimity which there is in the various provinces on the question of the franchise, realising that the whole trend of modern opinion, the whole trend of development in this country and in every other country during the past forty or fifty years has been toward a loosening and a lessening of all property conditions in regard to the franchise, to make the franchise something which pertains to the person and not something pertaining to property; that the whole tendency of modern thought is to make the right to the franchise a right in personam and not a right in rem, the tendency of modern ideas being to treat the franchise as a human thing and not a property right at all; and that theory having been adopted in six provinces and almost adopted in three other provinces, when we boldly make a Franchise Act based on manhood and womanhood suffrage I submit that we are reaching as nearly as can be, under our law and institutions, the proper ideal.

Now my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition may take this ground: He may say that he will contend for the federal principle and the right of the provinces to fix the law. I may contend on the other hand that it is the undoubted right of the Dominion Government to do so. I do not believe that in the final analysis or conclusion it is going to matter very much which ground we take; I believe the result is going to be practically the same whichever line of argument we take. My hon. friend may argue for the provincial principle and provincial control, and I think he will come back to manhood and womanhood franchise for Canada. I may argue it out on the principle of Dominion control, and the manhood and womanhood franchise laid down in this measure is the view of the Government and of myself as representing the Government.

So it is in regard to the voters' list; it does not matter very much what the argument may be. The Government say: "We realize that this Government has the undoubted right to pass laws for the preparation, revision and control of the lists. We can adopt, or not adopt, provincial lists as we see fit; for the sake of convenience, for the lessening of expense, we have decided to adopt provincial lists provided those lists are not more than a year old and provided an opportunity is given to make those lists conform to our franchise requirements." That is the proposal of the Bill. There is no other proposal in it, in regard to the voters' lists, that is the proposal and that is the result; and if the Bill in its present form is adopted it will have this effect in Canada; that in every province if there is in existence a provincial list, a regular provincial list, which is not more than one year old at the issue of a writ for an election, that prima facie will be the electoral list at the general election, and an opportunity is given to add to that list the names of all persons properly qualified to go upon it, and strike from it the names of persons that should be stricken from it. I do not know that I need elaborate that point any more.

In regard to the franchise I submit we are imposing no new, or impossible, or wrongful conditions upon any province. We are imposing the principle of manhood suffrage and womanhood suffrage on the provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island where they still maintain property qualifications, but as I pointed out a minute ago the property qualifications are so minor——

Mr. CANNON: There are no property qualifications in Quebec.

Mr. GUTHRIE: None in Quebec? Then the remark applies to the provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island; I thought property qualifications were required in Quebec too. But the property qualifications in those two provinces, excluding Quebec, are so minor and so insignificant as to amount to practically nothing. They have practically manhood franchise in Nova Scotia and in Prince Edward Island, and I think if we adopt it throughout the whole length and breadth of the country we will have both a uniform and a satisfactory franchise.

There is one other question which I should mention. It will be remembered that about a year ago this Parliament adopted the principle of woman suffrage. We did not adopt it in regard to this province, that province or the other province, but we made it as a law of this Parliament, apply to every province in Canada. I do not think objection was taken at the time to our constitutional right to do so. We did it and I think if objection was taken the House certainly never was divided on the principle. Within my recollection it was practically the unanimous wish of Parliament that that law should be passed though I remember some individuals in the House at the time did offer objections. Well, by the present Bill we will impose upon Quebec and Prince Edward Island womanhood suffrage. I have heard it said that that is very much against the will of the people in these two provinces. But after all isn't it merely an opportunity that we are giving them. There is no compulsion in the way of voting under this Bill. It has been suggested that there should be a compulsory voting clause incorporated, but by this Bill we are not imposing any duty upon the people of the province to do anything: We are not asking them to refrain from doing anything, we are not penalizing them if they do not do anything; all we say to the provinces of Quebec and Prince Edward Island, where womanhood suffrage has not been adopted in provincial matters, is "Here is the opportunity. If you see fit to avail yourselves of it well and good. Your women have a right to vote, but there is no compulsion in the matter, it is merely an invitation to take it or reject it as you see fit." The law was passed by Parliament to apply to every province. More than that we amended the law of this country to provide that women should sit in the Dominion Parliament. A woman from the province of Quebec can sit in the Parliament of Canada as a representative of a Quebec constituency even at the present moment—she has that right under our Dominion law. Surely it will be grossly anomalous and worse than that, to say that a woman may sit in this Parliament as a representative from Quebec and yet the women of that province shall not have the right to vote. That anomaly would be overcome by the proposition contained in this Bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to dwell at too great length upon the provisions of this Bill. I am afraid I have already occupied too much time of the House. There are, however, one or two points I would like to allude to before resuming my seat, and one of them is in regard to a criticism which I heard a few days ago by a member of the House, who said he had read the Bill from beginning to end and his first suggestion was that it was too fair to be honest—"that there must be something lurking within the provisions of the Bill, or something at present unseen; it is absolutely too fair." The next criticism he offered is the one I intend to deal with for a moment. He said: "The only tinge or taint of partisanship I find in the whole Bill is in regard to the appointment of returning officers." Well, in regard to the appointment of returning officers, we have adopted the course which has been in vogue here ever since Confederation, and is in vogue to-day in the majority of the provinces, though not in all of them. That is that in His Majesty's writ, in the writ of His Excellency the Governor General, the Governor in Council shall name the man who is to be returning officer. That system is still continued. There has been a great deal of discussion upon that point by the Government. I can assure the House that this Bill has received very serious consideration in respect to all of its clauses and all of its proposals. The clause dealing with returning officers was one of those most seriously considered, and we concluded there was no better system which we knew of or could devise, no safer system in the interest of the public, than that provided for here. The Government of the day must be responsible for the elections, and if an unfair election takes place the responsibility must be upon their shoulders. They must be answerable to the people, you cannot place the responsibility on His Excellency the Governor General; he only speaks through his Cabinet, or through the Prime Minister, the mouthpiece of his Cabinet. The Prime Minister must recommend to His Excellency the name to be put in the writ as returning officer. Now that returning officer is the appointee of the Government, and has the power, under this Bill, to appoint deputy returning officers and registrars, both rural and urban; and my friend in discussing that question said to me, "That leaves open the door to all kinds of partisanship and corruption." Now, I deny that suggestion, and I believe that anybody who examines the clauses of this Bill as they apply to deputy returning officers and to registrars will see that the measure has been drawn in such a way as absolutely to preclude dishonesty, no matter how evilly disposed the returning officer may be. He has the power to appoint deputy returning officers; he has the power to appoint the registrar in the city, town or village and also the registrar in the rural district. Yet no man can be deprived of his vote by the partisan act of the registrar—it is impossible. If the voter goes to the registrar and the registrar refuses him, he asks for a certificate of refusal. Suppose the registrar is really a corrupt and dishonest man and says: "No, I will not give you a certificate." In that event the applicant can appeal to the judge without certificate. Suppose the man does not go to register at all, and it is well known that where there is a limited time to do a certain thing there are a great many people inclined to leave it to the last minute of the last day. Suppose there are a good many there at the last moment of the last day, and some of them are left off the list through lack of time; that does not deprive them of their votes. They may still go to the judge without reference to the registrar at all, without taking a certificate of refusal, without giving notice of appeal, and obtain relief, for the judge has such absolutely unfettered discretion in the matter that no man can be deprived of his right to vote.

Mr. DEMERS: Is there in every case a right of appeal from the decision of the registrar?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. DEMERS: Even in the rural polling division?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, there is no appeal at all in the rural polling division; there the elector has the right to vote under section 63. I am referring now only to urban divisions. If under this Bill a man does not vote at an election, it is purely his own fault. I do not care how partisan or corrupt an officer may be, the man's right to vote is there, and he can vote.

In a rural division the registrar has to make up the list and sit for five days thereafter to hear complaints. Let us assume that he is a man of evil disposition, is thoroughly partisan, and intends, if possible, to be a wrong-doer. A man in the rural section comes to have his name put on the voters' list and is refused. That is the worst that can happen to him there. He may still on election day go to the poll, take the oath, mark the ballot, and vote just the same as an ordinary elector. If under the provisions of this Bill any man loses his vote he has no one to blame but himself, because no amount of partisanship or wrong-doing can deprive him of exercising his right to vote if he insists on doing so.

The Government has been criticised on the ground that this is rather an open door method. Prominent members of the Opposition have said to me, "I do not like that; it is too open." My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition was not in the House when the War-time Elections Act was under discussion. Had he been here he would have heard my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean), and the then member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Carvell) denouncing the Government of that day because it would not adopt this system, but preferred the system of the ""tied ballot." Under that Act a man could not get his vote in the ballot box; he could only tender his vote, but it would be kept in an envelope and not counted. But this is the open system, whereby every man and woman is absolutely assured of the right to vote; nothing can deprive them of that right but their own inactivity.

I have heard the suggestion made that it would enable a party of automobilists to go out of a city like Toronto into an adjoining rural constituency and plump in their votes by merely taking the oath under section 63. If that objection has any merit at all the Government does not insist upon this particular system. The Government is not adopting it for anything it can gain by it; it was inserted for the protection of hon. members opposite.

An hon. MEMBER: Thank you; that was very kind of the Government.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If the Government wanted to take an unfair advantage it could do so far more effectively, but the Government is trying to be absolutely fair, and if any hon. member by searching this Bill line by line, and clause by clause, can discover the so-called joker or Ethiopian in the wood-pile, I can assure him that if he points it out it will be removed. But I challenge any hon. member to point out any opportunity for wrong-doing under this measure.

I would further say that if my hon. friends ask to have deleted that clause which gives the elector in rural districts the right to cast his vote upon taking the oath under section 63, it will be stricken out. It is not put in for the protection of the Government, but for the protection of those who do not control elections.

In regard to the appointment of returning officers, it will be remembered that a committee of this House held an investigation some years ago to devise some better means of making such appointments. That committee could devise no better means. We had thought of having the House make the appointments of returning officers, but when that proposal comes down to the final analysis it again is appointment by the Government. It has been said that we should allow these appointments to be made by the judges.

Mr. ROSS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend from West Middlesex says, "Hear, hear." I take distinct issue with him. I agree that a judge is the proper man under an election Act to settle legal rights if disputes take place; but I would emphasize the desirability of keeping the judiciary of this country away from the ordinary machinery of elections. What would happen is this—and it will happen in Ontario if the present proposal of the Ontario Government is carried out, as I understand it from the newspaper reports of yesterday—if you give to a judge power to appoint returning officers, be he ever so fair and judicial in his appointments, a mistake will happen at some place, there will be wrong-doing some time or other, and the first man to be blamed will be the judge, with the result that you will have the judicial robes trailed through the political mire. So far as I view it—and it is no business of mine to criticise a measure introduced by the Ontario Government—the weakest point in their proposed system is that they make the county judge the president of the Election Board and that board appoints the returning officers. The experience in this House in regard to the conduct of returning officers at elections has not been bad; it has been good. Personally I have never heard of misconduct by a returning officer; I have heard of it in the Ontario elections where they have another system. I think in a number of the provinces they appoint sheriffs, registrars and other public officials. Now, there is something to be said in favour of that system.

Mr. POWER: Will the hon. gentleman permit me a question? Is it not a fact that under the proposed Act the judges appoint the revising officers?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The judges are the revising officers, and they may appoint such fit and suitable additional revising officers as may be necessary in any particular locality.

Mr. POWER: What is the difference between the appointment of a revising officer and the appointment of a returning officer?

Mr. GUTHRIE: A revising officer is in the nature of a judge. Let me point this out to my hon. friend. For the city of Quebec and the city of Montreal there is a registrar, and any one dissatisfied with his action may appeal to a judge, who is the Chief Justice of the Superior Court of that district. Now, it is not to be supposed that in a riding like West Quebec one Appellate judge can do all the work. He might be able to attend to it, but I doubt it very much, and in case he can not, he has the same power as a High Court judge of Ontario to call in a County Court judge.

Mr. POWER: Not necessarily a barrister or——

Mr. GUTHRIE: No. If my hon. friend considers that such a provision should be inserted in this Bill, personally I see no objection to it; if such a qualification is desired I think it might well go in. But if we recognize that the judges are the proper body to decide these matters, and we have more appeals than we have judges, who should appoint others to help them? Remember, they occupy judicial positions. I think the best provision is that made by the Bill which allows the judges to make additional appointments.

Now, in regard to the system of appointment of public officers, I am going to discuss it from the standpoint of Ontario, because for a long time there the law provided that sheriffs and registrars should be the returning officers. At this distance of time we might as well be candid and admit that that was a good, safe and satisfactory law for the old Liberal Governments of that province. Why, it was really committing the duties of returning officers to their best friends—they must have been good friends or they would never have got those positions. Not only that, but they were officials who could be removed by the Government at any time. There was therefore a double objection to that system. As far back as my memory goes the first sheriff I remember in the county of Wellington was the Hon. Peter Gow, at one time provincial secretary in the Government of Sir Oliver Mowat. He later became sheriff. Well, it was quite safe to trust the duties of returning officer to that man. When he died, he was followed by the late Robert McKim, who was the sitting member of the Legislature supporting the Government; the Government could quite safely trust the affairs of an election to Sheriff McKim. When Robert McKim died he was followed by the present incumbent, Sheriff Allan, also sitting member of the Legislature and supporter of the Liberal administration; it was quite safe to appoint him returning officer. Then, take the matter of registrar. The earliest date to which my memory takes me is the time when this appointment went to James Massie, sitting member for South Wellington, a supporter of the Government. When he died, Colonel Higginbotham was appointed, for many years a Liberal member of this House, supporting the Liberal Opposition. When he died, Henry Hortop was appointed; he was not a sitting member, but had been a candidate in the local election. All of these men were of the highest character and standing in the community, but they were all political partisans prior to their appointment. So that throughout the whole length and breadth of Ontario I do not know that there have been more than five or six sheriffs and registrars who were not appointees of the late Liberal Government; in 1905, when it went out of office, in fact, the majority of them had sat in the Legislature of Ontario as supporters of the Government. Now, do you think that is a good system? The only outstanding case of electoral irregularity that I know of was the case of West Elgin, where the sheriff had been appointed returning officer. There may have been others, but that is the only one I can recall at the moment. I have never in my experience heard of a single instance where electoral corruption has been charged against the returning officer in my district. For these reasons, and because it is right and proper that the responsibility should rest upon some shoulders for this appointment, the Government is determined to accept that responsibility. They have determined to accept it because no better system, no fairer system, has yet been devised, and until a better system is devised the Government will appoint returning officers under the provisions of this Bill.

There are a great many details in the Bill, Mr. Speaker, which I shall not now make an attempt to cover; indeed, I should not touch upon details on the motion for second reading. I have already spoken at far too great length, but possibly it will be found that the time I have taken up this afternoon will not have been wasted; that in the end it may prove to have effected a certain amount of economy in the further discussion of the Bill. I beg to move that the Bill be now read a second time.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I immediately congratulate my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Guthrie) upon the exceptionally clear, lucid and comprehensive statement which he has just given to the House? His concluding remarks to the effect that the length of time he had taken in delivering his address would in the end possibly prove of advantage to the House may, I think, be concurred in. His statement, with one exception, which I shall mention, has been from beginning to end helpful and most illuminating. Particularly do we thank my hon. friend for having at the commencement of this debate gone so fully in historical outline into past legislation pertaining to the franchise and also into the constitutional aspect and the question of the right of this Parliament and the right of the provinces respectively to legislate with regard to this matter.

I am sorry to have to say to my hon. friend that in that part of his argument which had to do with the constitutional aspect, and which constituted the major portion of his address, he was beside the mark in one respect: he led the House to believe that in some way or another I had questioned the right of this Parliament to legislate regarding the franchise. I challenge my hon. friend to point to any remark of mine, in Hansard or elsewhere, which has ever questioned the right of this Parliament to enact a federal franchise law. I am not fortunate in possessing the legal training that my hon. friend has had, but I have some little knowledge of constitutional law and of the constitution of this country, and I know as well as he does that as between the provinces and the Dominion, where no powers are specified other than those mentioned in Section 92 of the British North America Act as belonging to the provinces, the residue of power rests with the Federal Parliament and that this Parliament has full and complete jurisdiction in the matter of enacting a law pertaining to the federal franchise. As I proceed I shall take occasion to refer to the remarks which I made in the debate on the Address, to which my hon. friend alluded, and to show just what was the purport of the reference which I made to provincial lists on that occasion. Everything I said at that time I am prepared to repeat at this. I made the remark I did then in order that the Government, and my hon. friend in particular, might have it in mind when he should speak on this occasion. He has not, I think, met the point that I then raised, but, as he has said, there will be opportunity throughout the debate to do so, and doubtless he will give his reasons later if he takes exception to it.

But while I congratulate my hon. friend on the lucidity of his exposition, I congratulate him still more upon the spirit in which the Government, according to his statement, is prepared to meet Parliament with respect to the legislation which they are bringing down. He has made it clear that so far as the Bill before the House at the moment is concerned, the Government do not propose to view its provisions as being like the laws of the Medes and Persians; that, on the other hand, the Government will be ready to accept any suggestion that appeals to the wisdom of the House; ready to accept any amendment which may tend to make this Act in the nature of a model and a guide for all future laws dealing with the question of the franchise. Well, I am happy to assure my hon. friend and the Government that we are only too ready to meet them in that spirit. We have no desire to make of this measure a political football, a matter of party gain or loss one way or the other.

Mr. Speaker, the measure now before us is not only the most important measure which will come before Parliament this session; it is one of the most important measures that can come before Parliament at any time. The considerations which we have to take into account in discussing this measure are much larger than those of the fortunes of any member of the House, or of any party in the House, or of any Government. We have been passing through periods of great change in the world's history. Society, from many points of view, has been torn up by the roots. We have suffered through the war great loss not only in wealth and in human life, but, as I said once before in this House, also in the institutions of our country. Our political institutions have suffered along with everything else; public confidence, to a certain extent, has been shaken in the institution of Government itself. That has been inevitable through the effect war has upon Government and its actions, but there is, therefore, a double reason why at this time, having before us a measure which is fundamental and sacred as respects the rights of citizenship, and which lies at the very foundation of self government in all free communities, we should seek as far as we can to restore that confidence in political institutions which has been impaired, if not indeed largely shattered, as one of the consequences of the war. It is in that spirit that we on this side are prepared to meet the Government in considering this legislation, to see if we cannot, through joint action, take part in the work of reconstruction and restore, not faith in the Government, not faith in the Opposition nor in any party or section, but faith in our political institutions as the best thus far devised by man for the government of man.

It is important in regard to any measure of franchise that may be brought down that it should, above all, give to the people of the country a feeling of confidence that through that instrument their will in regard to matters pertaining to Government will find free and full expression and not be frustrated by any electoral or other device.

My hon. friend gave the best of reasons why some legislation should be introduced when he referred to the fact that even he himself, and the Government of which he is a member, are unable to say at this moment just what position the country would be in as respects the franchise should a dissolution of Parliament take place. That, from one point of view, is something of a reflection upon the Government itself. My hon. friend said that legislation now being repealed had to be introduced in consequence of conditions which arose during the war. Well, that may be an excuse for the obnoxious legislation that was introduced, but it is no excuse for the fact that there should ever come a time in this country when the Government would have to admit to the people that they were unable to say what law would govern in the event of an appeal being made to the people, and the people being given an opportunity to express their will. But what my hon. friend has said is altogether too true. The right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), who I am sorry is not here at the moment, was interviewed a short time ago on this very matter. I quote from the Montreal Star of January 13, 1920:

> "Suppose that before a new franchise is passed there should be a general election, what Act would apply?" was asked of the minister. "That," he said, "is somewhat of a conundrum, but I should say we might have to go back to the old Dominion Elections Act."

My hon. friend the Acting Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie) intimated this afternoon that instead of having to go back to the old Dominion Elections Act, we might have to have an election under the War-time Elections Act and the Military Voters' Act—that we had not yet reached a time of peace, and that therefore these Acts still govern. I am prepared to leave the grounds for the introduction of a new Act at this time just where the minister himself has placed them. I think they do constitute the strongest of reasons why at the earliest possible moment, as I suggested in the early days of this session, a Bill should be placed before this House which would remove all doubt and uncertainty in regard to the franchise of this country. My hon. friend's words, as I took them down, were "at the present time it is doubtful if there is any valid and subsisting franchise law governing the conduct of elections by which the will of electors could be expressed," also "if we had an election we would be in rather an awkward predicament"; further that the Bill had been introduced "for the purpose of rendering definite and certain what otherwise might be indefinite and uncertain." Well, Mr. Speaker, as I have just said, we welcome this opportunity of getting back to some basis of certainty and definiteness with regard to the all important question of the franchise.

Let me say that first and foremost we welcome the feature of this Act, that proposes to repeal at one stroke all the legislation which this Government has enacted respecting the franchise since the time it took office. In Schedule Four of the Act will be found a reference to the different measures which have been enacted by this Parliament in regard to the franchise and which it is proposed to repeal in their entirety: An Act to amend the Dominion Elections Act (Statutes 1915), the Military Voters' Act, 1917, the War-time Elections

Act (Statutes 1917), An Act to Confer the Electoral Franchise upon Women (Statutes 1918), An Act to amend Chapter Thirty-nine of the Statutes of 1917 (Statutes 1918), An Act respecting the Election held in the Electoral District of Yukon, 1918 (Statutes 1918), the Dominion By-Election Act, 1919, and An Act to amend the Dominion By-Election Act, 1919 (Statutes 1919, 2nd Session). The Government, by this legislation, proposes to clean the slate of all these measures. I congratulate the Government upon giving evidence of its desire to clean the slate entirely of legislation which, to use the expressive language of my hon. friend the member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), a former member of the Administration, constitutes a blot upon our national career. We cannot but be too glad that this stain is to be wiped off the records of this Parliament in so far as that can be done by legislative enactment.

So far as this Act is symbolical of the Government's intention to wipe out their own iniquities, to forget the past, and forgive, as well as to forget, we congratulate them upon the decision they are taking, and we heartily offer to unite with them in an endeavour to put upon the Statutes in the place of the legislation they are removing, an Act which, as my hon. friend has said, may be a model to the whole of Canada. I am prepared, Mr. Speaker, to believe that the purpose of the Government in effacing the legislation to which I have referred and bringing a fresh Bill before Parliament, is to do what they can in this post-war period, through the medium of this legislation, to unite the people of this country in good-will and good works as respect matters pertaining to the work of Parliament and the Government of the country. In that spirit we are only too happy to join in rendering whatever assistance we can from this side of the House to perfect the Act in every particular.

That leads me to speak of the attitude of the Opposition in regard to the second reading of this Bill. So far as any principle involved in this legislation is concerned, it can only be that of the desirability of having a Franchise Act which will be definite, known, just and fair. To that principle we can take no exception; it has our hearty endorsation, and we shall be only too glad to see the Government proceed with all the expedition possible, not only to get such legislation on the Statutes, but also to give the people of the country an opportunity to express their will under its provisions and have returned a Parliament which will be truly representative.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that while we acquiesce heartily in the principle of the Bill in so far as it means a new franchise, there are in the measure itself many provisions which we should like to see modified; and when it reaches the committee stage we on this side of the House will offer amendments or suggestions in regard to some of the sections, and we trust that when the Government hears what is to be said from the point of view we shall then put forward they will see the wisdom of amending the Bill accordingly.

My hon. friend in introducing this measure outlined its main provisions, and in his address to-day he repeated the outline in much the same form. I will take up what he said, just in a few words, and refer to the main features of the Bill.

Let me take the features of the Bill as my hon. friend has stated them. He points out, in the first place, that the purpose of the Bill is to fix a uniform franchise throughout the Dominion. With that purpose we are in entire accord. In the second place, it is proposed to provide a uniform method for the preparation of voters' lists. As to the provision of a uniform method, that depends in large measure upon just what the particular method is for which the Government desires uniformity. I think there is room for improvement in the Bill in that particular. In the third place, it aims to provide a simple and satisfactory method for the conduct of elections. We all wish to see a simple and satisfactory method provided as soon as possible, and there can be no question that any means that will achieve that end is eminently desirable.

The franchise, my hon. friend says, is to be established upon very broad principles. The only requirements in regard to qualifications will be, he informs us, those of British citizenship, residence in Canada for one year, and in the particular constituency for two months, and attainment of the age of twenty-one years; these requirements to apply in the cases of male and female voters alike. Now, Mr. Speaker, nothing could be fairer than that, and all that we ask, as respects the qualifications there set out, is that the Government shall not profess one thing and do another; that it shall not give with one hand and withhold with the other as respects the provisions of this enactment, or its relation to any other statutes which have been enacted in the past or which may be enacted in the future by this Parliament. It was for that reason that I asked my right hon. friend the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) the other day, whether the Government had any intention of introducing a disfranchising act at this session or any subsequent session of this Parliament. In the Bill before the House there is mention of a disfranchising act. That I understand has reference to an act so-named already on the statutes, and does not refer to some act that is contemplated and that does not as yet appear. I am glad to see my right hon. friend nods his concurrence, and is prepared to approve that statement.

In regard to one other matter, there is an exception to this requirement of British citizenship. It is an exception which was mentioned by my hon. friend, the Acting Solicitor General (Hon. Mr. Guthrie) at the time of introducing the Bill, in answer to a question I put to him on that occasion. He then drew my attention to a section in the Act with respect to provisions in provincial legislation regarding the rights of voters where considerations of race were concerned. Speaking generally, I imagine that every member of this House will feel that there should be no exceptions with reference to the rights which may accrue in virtue of British citizenship. On the other hand, as I read in the Act the exception I refer to, I am inclined to believe it is not so much an exception on any ground of race, as in the nature of a recognition of the problems of which a province may have to take account, and that in this respect it is only in accord with the federal spirit of our constitution which recognizes that while we may have one franchise for the Dominion of Canada as a whole we should at all times be prepared to consider, in matters which may involve international as well as national questions, the special concerns of particular provinces. While my hon. friend made a long speech to the House on ignoring provincial considerations, I should like to point out to him that in his own legislation in this particular he has recognized the very factor of provincial consideration, of which in any remarks I have made I have sought to have some account taken.

So much for the first main provision of the Bill. The second relates to the preparation of the voters' lists. And here, Mr. Speaker, I could not but be surprised at my hon. friend's taking exception to some statement which he said I had made in reference to provincial lists, inasmuch as, explaining this part of the Act, the very first sentence he uses is to the effect that one of the principles of the Act is the adoption o provincial lists in certain particulars. Let me read my hon. friend's words, which will be found in Hansard of March 11, at page 353:

> In regard to the preparation of voters' lists, the principle adopted is that the existing lists in any province—

Surely that is a recognition of provincial lists—

> —the existing lists in any province which are authorized by law for use in provincial elections shall be utilized in Dominion elections.

I have never intimated at any time that more than that should be done. Let me read from the speech which I made in this House, and to which my hon. friend has referred, exactly what I said in reference to provincial lists. I am sorry to take up the time of the House in quoting anything that has already been said; but I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friends will agree that it is necessary to do so at this moment. On March 1, 1920, at page 29 of Hansard, I spoke as follows:

> Speaking on the subject of the franchise, perhaps I might at this moment say a word in reference to the Government's promise in the speech from the Throne to bring in a new Franchise Bill. It is unfortunate for the country that the Bill referred to will owe its origin in part to some whose names have been associated with the kind of legislation I have just described.

I had been speaking then in reference to the War-time Elections Act and the Military Voters' Act.

> But let me assure the Government that if it will bring in a Bill which will help to restore public confidence in our political institutions; if it will bring in a Bill which will be honest and fair and true to the rights of the people, it will find the Opposition ready to assist and to expedite the passage of that measure. But, Sir, if a Franchise Bill is to be introduced in a form which will constitute another blot on our country's name and fame, whatever means the Government adopts to pass it, they must expect to find hon. gentlemen on this side prepared to resist to the utmost of their power legislation prejudicial to the fundamental rights of the people.
> The first question we would like to ask the Administration is why should there be a new Franchise Act at all? The old Dominion Elections Act has been on the Statutes for twenty-five years and in succession a majority of both political parties has been returned under its provisions. Why then do we need another Act? Why should anything more be necessary than to amend the provisions of the present statute and bring them into conformity with the needs of the country? The Government may have reasons for its proposals and we will await those reasons.

I direct my hon. friend's attention to the following words:

But I point out to the Government now so that they may take due notice of it, that if there is any endeavour to substitute a system of Dominion enumeration for the provincial lists which have been followed in accordance with the spirit of our constitution, the Government will have to give a pretty clear and satisfactory explanation before a measure of that kind will meet with the approval of the House and of the country. After the experience the country has had with Dominion enumerators, care will be taken before the freedom of our people is once again placed in the hands of the Administration for manipulation as it may see best by its own creatures. So much, Sir, in reference to the franchise and what it stands for.

I submit, Sir, that there is not a line in the foregoing statement which can be interpreted as meaning that in any way I have questioned the authority of this Parliament to pass a federal Act.

The only reference I made to provincial lists was to say that if the Government proposed to depart from the use of provincial lists and to extend the system of enumeration, the Government would have to give some very clear and satisfactory reason for so doing. I regret that my hon. friend, in his remarks, did not give us a satisfactory reason in that regard, but we shall doubtless have an opportunity as the debate goes on to have that particular point discussed.

What does the Bill propose?

According to the speech of the Acting Solicitor General when introducing the Bill:

In regard to the preparation of voters' lists, the principle adopted is that the existing lists in any province which are authorized by law for use in provincial elections shall be utilized in Dominion elections provided that they are not more than one year old or that not longer than twelve months has elapsed between the completion of such lists and the issue of a writ for the Dominion elections.

May I follow the example of my hon. friend and refer more particularly to Ontario. The voters' lists for Ontario were made up prior to the last provincial election in the month of November last year. The new Government that has come into power in Ontario has decided, to use the words of their own Attorney General, to scrap all the legislation that had to do with the system of enumeration. They have thought it well to do that because they believe that the system of enumeration does not give satisfaction, or lend confidence to any franchise law. But were we to have an election today on the last provincial list, what position would we be in? It has been disclosed since that list was prepared, to give only two examples, that in this very city—the city of Ottawa—some 8,000 names were left off, that the enumeration was so badly managed that 8,000 electors in this city did not have their names on the lists although they were entitled to have them there and in the city of Toronto something like 25,000 names were left off.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Does my hon. friend not know that these names can be added?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite aware that under this Bill these names can be added, but the point I wish to draw my hon. friend's attention to is that a system of enumeration which results in leaving off 8,000 names in one place and 25,000 in another at any particular election cannot be a satisfactory one. If such a thing happened on that occasion the same result is apt to happen at any other time, and in seeking to enact by Parliament a law that will be satisfactory and which will serve to give full expression to the people's will we should endeavour to avoid the possible dissatisfaction and limitations which have been so patent in the instances I have pointed out.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Such an error would not necessarily follow.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me draw my right hon. friend's attention to this. In the last provincial election, in addition to the election of members, there was a prohibition referendum. My right hon. friend, who is an old temperance advocate, knows very well that in that particular election there was an effort made on the part of those who were supporting temperance legislation to get names on the lists much greater than would have been the case had the referendum not been one of the features of that particular election. Instead of 8,000 names in one case and 25,000 in another having been left off the numbers would have been considerably greater. That they were not was due to the energy of the men and women who sought to have as many names as possible put upon the lists despite the system of enumeration that was followed. What we on this side advocate is that where you have organized districts in which lists are already prepared by the constituted authorities, these lists should be made the basis of the lists on which the election is to be held, and that if it is necessary to appoint enumerators to make up lists, the enumerators should begin with the lists that are already prepared and take these lists as a basis. If a man has been put on the municipal list by an assessor in a city or in a rural district, and his name is there, that should be sufficient to guarantee to him the right to a vote at an election. Why, after all this work has been once done, after the constituted authorities both of the cities and rural districts have prepared lists, not for any partisan purpose but for public use in connection with municipal matters, should all that work be duplicated at great cost to the State? It is a question whether the Government, in its desire for uniformity has not sacrificed considerations of even greater importance, namely, security, efficiency and economy.

My hon. friend said he was anxious to introduce a law which would be not only expeditious but also economical. At the last federal election this system of enumeration was adopted. Let me give to the House the figures on the cost of the last election compared with the cost of other general elections that have taken place in the Dominion. In this House on March 22, the hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) gave the following statement as to the cost of elections in the Dominion from 1896 to 1917. The figures were as follows:

1896	$ 197,103 35
1900	232,911 20
1904	307,995 60
1908	391,960 32
1911	507,353 55
1917	1,678,139 99

Look at the enormous increase from $507,353.55 in 1911 to $1,678,139.99 in 1917. When I saw those figures I thought that possibly the enormous cost had been due to the fact that they included the expenses of taking the soldiers' vote as well as the cost of enumeration of the voters' lists, and so I undertook to get the figures for those two groups separately—the cost of the election so far as the taking of the soldiers' vote was concerned, and the cost of the election in Canada apart from the soldiers' vote. Here are the figures, and I do not think they will be disputed. The cost of taking the soldiers' votes came to $251,613.09. The total expenditure was $1,678,139.99, making a cost, so far as Canada alone was concerned, of over $1,400,000. Now that increase of cost is to be ascribed almost wholly to the adoption of this system of employing enumerators by the thousands, and paying them for duplicating work that has already been performed in large part, in the preparation of municipal lists. If there is one thing above another which at this time we have reason to be careful of, it is the matter of large expenditures in the administration of public business; if we can save a million dollars and at the same time give to the electors a greater sense of security when they exercise the franchise than they otherwise would have, I think we are bound to do so. That is what I would urge upon my hon. friends opposite.

This legislation, as I read it, instead of seeking to confine the system of enumeration seeks to extend it. The Government in that particular is undoubtedly going in the wrong direction. The Government should seek to restrict the work of enumeration as much as possible, and so far as practicable take lists that are approved and accepted locally, or approved provincially. Those lists I contend should be used as largely as possible for the purposes of a general election.

Just one further word in reference to the two main provisions respecting voters' lists. In introducing the Bill my hon. friend said that where no provincial lists existed, the principle adopted by the Bill was, in urban municipalities, that of registration and, in rural municipalities, that of registration by way of enumeration. Urban municipalities are described in the Bill as cities, towns, and incorporated villages with populations of not less than 1,000. In such municipalities the principle of registration is very simple: All persons, male and female, will be required to register within the time prescribed by the Bill. When the registration period has expired appeals are permitted either by those whose names are not upon the lists, or against those whose names have been placed thereon. Those appeals, in all provinces where there are what we know as County Judges, are to such judges who are appointed revising officers. In provinces where there are District Judges, as opposed to County Judges, the appeals are to the District Judges.

Sir, there is one feature in this connection not mentioned by my hon. friend, to which I should like to draw the attention of the Government, and that is the time within which this work of preparing the lists is to be carried out. As I read the Bill, the preparation of the lists, either in the cities or in the rural districts, is not to be commenced until after the writ for the election has been issued. In other words, under this legislation as drafted, once the writ for an election is issued, at a time when candidates should be discussing the public questions on the different platforms, they will be beset from all sides by electors raising questions as to whether their names are or are not upon the lists, and as to how they can be put there. I think my hon. friends opposite need only to realize what the Bill as drafted means in that regard to see the wisdom of bringing about some change. Indeed, as one reads the Bill it would appear that in so far as the cities are concerned the revising officers are not obliged to furnish a candidate with the names of those who are entitled to vote until within four days of the voting itself. That gives no opportunity at all to a candidate to make sure that the lists are anything like as complete as they should be. It brings added confusion at a time when every effort should be made to avoid confusion. It leaves room for all kinds of irregularities and mistakes, and the time left to correct, or remedy, any of these errors is so short that there is absolutely no opportunity to have a satisfactory adjustment. When we come to consider the Bill in Committee that is one aspect which we would like the Government to reconsider.

But let me draw the attention of the House to yet other features. So far as the cities are concerned, the Bill recognizes the principle, in addition to registration, of having some court of appeal and some finality in the matter of the preparation of lists. There is a court of appeal, and the appeal is to constituted judicial authorities —authorities who are not appointed by the Government itself but who belong to the judiciary of the province. Those principles are good. But if they are good so far as cities are concerned, why should not similar principles be adopted in regard to the rural districts? That is the point above all others that we would like the Government to consider most carefully when we come to deal with the Bill in Committee.

What we feel is this: In regard to rural municipalities the Bill as now drafted opens the door to all kinds of possible irregularities. One has only to state the provisions of the law, for any person to see in a moment the possible evil consequences which may flow from their adoption. Here is the machinery: The Government appoints the returning officers; the returning officers appoint deputy returning officers and also appoint what are called "registrars." Now the registrars are simply enumerators. The Government has changed the name "enumerator" because it has an objectionable flavour in consequence of the abuses of that system as they were experienced under the War-time Elections Act; but despite their caution in place of the word "registrar" the word "enumerator" has slipped three different times into the Bill as it has been brought down. The system of enumerators is adopted. These enumerators, as mentioned, are appointed by the appointees of the Government, and what happens then? The enumerator is made all-powerful in the preparation and revision of the lists. There is no appeal whatever from his decision one way or the other. The Solicitor General spoke about what he termed "the iniquity" of the old system of revising barristers. He was very strong and emphatic in the protest he made against the system of leaving the preparation of lists to revising barristers. But, Mr. Speaker, this is exactly the same thing. The only difference is, that instead of having for the purpose of revising the lists, men of the intelligence that revising barristers might be expected to have, the Government is prepared to leave it to the type of men sometimes described as "ward heelers" to prepare the lists, and allows them the final say as to whether a name is to be added to a list or to be stricken from it.

Now, we think that feature of the Act is thoroughly objectionable; and, as I have said, one has only to consider what it may mean to realize how extremely objectionable it is. These enumerators, or registrars as the Act calls them, appointed by appointees of the Government, prepare whatever lists they like. They can omit whole streets of houses if they wish, no appeal can be made against their action; they can put on whoever they please and leave off whoever they please, and there is no remedy. Then on the day after nomination they furnish the candidate with the lists they have prepared, and the Bill requires that during the next five or six days they are to specify certain hours during which they may be waited upon by different persons who wish to have their names added to or other names stricken off the lists. But the Bill does not require that they must add the names, nor are they prevented from striking off any names they please. They have their place of residence for receiving whoever may turn up, and it may be any place that they themselves choose. In the last election I remember very well that some of the men who were selected as enumerators in the riding in which I was a candidate, had their offices in back kitchens, and half the time it was only with the greatest difficulty that electors could find them at all. The system under this Bill is exactly the same. It means haste in the preparation of lists by an army of enumerators, with arbitrary powers, no useful checks, and opportunity for all kinds of errors, confusion and frauds.

But that is not all, the lists having been prepared in the way I have described, the Bill requires that on the day of polling the enumerators shall hand their lists to whoever is in charge of the poll, but after the lists have been handed to the deputy returning officer, any man or woman, notwithstanding that his or her name is not on the list, can, if willing to take the prescribed oath, exercise the right to vote, and that ballot is put into the ballot box along with other ballots to be counted along with the rest, and there is no way of distinguishing it from any of the others. I am sure that my hon. friends, when they stop to think what that procedure means, will hesitate to give it permanent expression in any legislation. I confess that it made me feel sad at heart when I read that particular provision.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Buck up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "Buck up" my right hon. friend says. I shall "buck up," my hon. friend need have no fear. But I was sad at heart for the reason that if there is one purpose above another we should seek to accomplish in legislation of this kind it is to find a means above suspicion to give to the people the right to exercise the franchise fairly and honestly, and I despaired of that when I saw this provision.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: When we come to those details—and of course they are details—then we can thresh them out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad to hear my right hon. friend say that we can thresh out those details, because I am sure he is already feeling that it is a great mistake to have ever had the Bill drafted in that form—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not saying that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —for it certainly shakes confidence not only in the legislation as it will be when finally enacted, should these provisions stand, but to a certain extent in the Government's intentions, when it brings down a measure of that kind. I desire to be the last to entertain distrust of the Government's intention to do other than what it has professed to be its wish, namely, to put an Act on the statutes which will be above suspicion.

Before I leave this particular feature of the Bill I wish to point out that as the Bill now stands any group of men could go into any rural riding, demand at one poll the right to vote, be given that right by the returning officer, exercise that right, and then go on to the next poll, and the next, and so on, for as many polls as they are willing to attempt, and vote in every one. They might be men of no character, men brought from the country to the south out of quarters of cities where only men prepared to perjure themselves could be found. The Bill as it is drawn invites irregularities of that kind, because it makes possible through the act of perjury the winning of any riding in a rural district where the opposing parties are at all evenly matched. We should be the last to pass any measure which will tend not only to destroy the confidence of the electorate in the machinery of elections, but which will also tend to foster irregularities and crime. There should be finality in the matter of the preparation of the voters' lists and the possibility of revision before some regularly constituted authorities.

Now, Sir, apart from the features of the Bill which I have already dealt with, the only other general feature mentioned by my hon. friend is the machinery provided for the conduct of elections. I think in that respect the Bill follows pretty much along the lines of the legislation we are accustomed to, and in so far as that is the case, no exception can be taken to it.

There are a few innovations in the Bill, such as the provision for the appointment of a general electoral officer, the separation of nomination and polling days by an interval of fourteen days instead of the customary seven, and one or two other minor features. Doubtless the Government has reasons for introducing these innovations and will give them when the Bill is in Committee.

With the exceptions and possibilities I have pointed out, there are features of the Bill which all will be prepared to commend, and I have only to repeat what I said at the outset, that in discussing this measure at the present time we of the Opposition wish to approach the Government in the spirit in which the hon. Acting Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie) has said he is desirous of having the Bill considered. All we want is a fair Bill, a Bill that will be effective and make the machinery of elections economical, a Bill which when it is upon the statutes will help to restore on the part of the electorate confidence that their will is being expressed and not frustrated by any electoral device—a Bill that will be honest and just. If we can get that we will be not only doing a service to the people of our own country, but we will be helping the cause of good government everywhere.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (West Lambton): Mr. Speaker, after the very able presentation which the Minister of Militia (Hon. Mr. Guthrie) gave us this afternoon of the proposed Franchise Act one would imagine—and it may be so; further inquiry will, perhaps, clear up that point—that all that this House and the Canadian people had to do was to fall down and worship and thank Heaven that such a fair Franchise Act had been introduced. I say, Sir, that perhaps they will, but perhaps they will not. In the few remarks that I have to make I shall take up the suggestion made by the minister that both the Opposition and hon. gentlemen on the Government side should give their very best judgment and their very best thought to the consideration of this Bill, and that the Government would be content to accept any amendments which in their opinion might be deemed proper. The minister asked for suggestions and amendments in order that the whole matter might be made just as clear and just as fair as possible. In fact, he used the word "fairness"; he said that the Government desired only to submit to the country an Act that was absolutely fair; that, he said, was all they wanted to do. I shall confine myself to one phase of this proposed Act, Sir, reserving to myself, of course, the right to suggest in committee what in my opinion and in the opinion of this side of the House may be for the better working of the Act.

As long as I have been in public life, the one thing that has done more to divide the Canadian people and to make Canada more difficult to govern than any country that I know of has been the continual raising of racial and religious questions, day in and day out, month in and month out, year in and year out. There has never been a time during the course of my public life that I have not had to contend against this: There has never been a time, Sir, that I have not deprecated it with all the force that was in me. To my mind it is the greatest curse that has descended upon this fair country. It is the one thing that keeps Canada from being what it ought to be. In my opinion, members of this House ought to sink absolutely such considerations; ought to look upon themselves as Canadians and as Canadians only and come to the conclusion that no distinctions shall be made of class or creed. Could that be done, it would be for the benefit of Canada as a nation and would tend in the very greatest degree, more than anything else could tend, to the building up of our country to what it ought to be.

Sir, we had the war, and things were more or less abnormal. Ideas rather ran amuck; we were more or less carried away, and perhaps we did some things which in more sober moments we would not do. Section 30 of this Bill which has been brought down says:

> The respective persons hereunder mentioned shall for the time specified as to each such person be disqualified and incompetent to vote at an election.

And subsection (d) of this section says: "Persons disfranchised under the Disfranchising Act".

The Disfranchising Act is really the Naturalization Act of 1919. By Chapter 38, section 8, subsection 4, paragraph (b), the Naturalization Act of 1919 says:

> No certificate of naturalization shall, before the expiration of a period of ten years after the termination of the present war, be granted in Canada to any subject of a country who at the time of the passing of this Act was at war with His Majesty, but this provision shall not apply to a person who—

Then it goes to refer to those who served in His Majesty's forces, and so on. When you come to consider this section and read it in conjunction with section 30 of the proposed Bill, what does it mean? It means that any person who, by reason of being an alien enemy, is not now entitled to apply for naturalization, or who cannot be naturalized under the law as it stands at present, cannot vote for a period of ten years.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PARDEE: I hear some hon. gentlemen opposite say, "Hear, hear". I will put a question to them. Now that the war is over, should we continue to manifest the spirit that prevailed while the war was in progress? Should we not forget our differences and proceed to build ourselves up into a big, strong nation? Should we for ten long years keep open the old sores by putting a man in such a position that it may be said of him: That man, although he adds to the wealth of Canada; although he pays taxes; although he is a friend of this country, shall not have the right to vote; shall not have the slightest thing to do with the Government of this country? I ask any man in this House whether that tends to the upbuilding of Canada; whether it will make of this a united country? In my opinion it is the one thing Canada can do to perpetuate and keep open the old sore of race and religion which has cursed this country for years past, and I say to the members of this House and to every man, woman and child in Canada that if they wish to have immigration come to these shores and to see this country grow great and become what she ought to become, the sooner we get rid of that spirit the better.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: How does the hon. member come to associate religion with the disqualification of an alien enemy?

Mr. PARDEE: I was not associating religion with it. I said that was the cry in times past, and that this is nothing more or less than an attempt to perpetuate that cry. The Act, so far as this section is concerned, is bad, and against the best interests of the people of this country. It is not such an Act as will redound to the credit of Canada. Why, the War-times Election Act is not a patch on this Act for disqualifying citizens, when we read these two sections in conjunction. Even the mother of a son who went to the war and fought with the Allies and was killed may not be entitled to vote under this Act; the younger son in a family may vote, and the older son may not vote. Reading these two sections in conjunction, and taking into consideration all their ramifications, I say without fear of successful contradiction that there will be more people disfranchised under this Act as it stands to-day than were disfranchised under the War-times Election Act. Do we want that? Canada is a young country, with between 8,000,000 and 9,000,000 of people, and in what does Canada's hope lie? How can this country become prosperous? Only in one way, and that is by having people come to our shores and tilling our land and engaging in our industries. Only in that way will you get out of Canada the real stuff that is in it. It is the only way in which we can develop our potential resources. Will people come to our shores with that section of the Act barring them for ten long years from a voice in the government of this country, as to who shall or shall not rule? They will not. Where will Canada be then? Where will the great West be, with its millions of acres crying for people to come and till them? Will you get these people? Not at all. I say that no one considers himself a citizen who does not feel that he has a right to a voice in the government of his country. If the sections I have quoted are to be retained in the Act, disfranchising these people and keeping open the old sore, the Act will not redound to the credit of Canada, but will be absolutely to its detriment. If there is one thing we have preached, and we have preached it more of late since the League of Nations came into being, it is that Canada is a nation. Canada is a nation. Then let us be big enough to put on nationhood's clothes and stand as a nation. If we propose to do otherwise, the world, which now has its eyes upon us, will turn them in another direction. No man or woman of alien birth will come to Canada unless they know they will have a right to a voice in Canada's affairs.

Mr. EDWARDS: Do we want them?

Mr. PARDEE: We want them.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is your opinion; it is not mine.

Mr. PARDEE: My hon. friend may have his opinion, and I may have mine.

Mr. EDWARDS: Just so.

Mr. PARDEE: I say that no country can prosper or become great or develop its potential wealth without people. Where are the people to come from?

Mr. EDWARDS: No country ever became great by suckling traitors.

Mr. PARDEE: There is the old sore. That is what is keeping Canada where she is to-day. I say there are thousands of people in Canada to-day who will be disfranchised under this Act, who, though of alien birth, are just as loyal as any man that sits in this House to-day. If we are going to keep that old sore open, if a section of our population is going to continue preaching that doctrine, Canada's last state will be worse than her first.

Mr. CURRIE: We will get along all right.

Mr. PARDEE: Speaking for myself, I say that the shutting out of an alien population is not British. My hon. friend the Acting Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie) to-day referred to the United States. The United States took a long time to get into the war, but now the war is over; they went into it, and they have come out of it, and do you hear any rumblings in the United States about shutting out alien voters?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. PARDEE: No such thing. They are American citizens entitled to take the oath of allegiance, and as such are entitled to a voice in the government of the country, and such voice they have. But we here in Canada, in our splendid isolation, with our 8,000,000 of people on the biggest part of the North American continent, are so intensely ultra-loyal that we say that no matter how loyal these people may be, no matter how much regard they may have for the constitution of Canada, no matter whether they came here to the land of the free to escape the thraldom of the old land, they shall not be allowed to vote for a period of ten years, but shall be segregated and kept apart from the ordinary citizen, and shall have the finger of scorn pointed at them. For what? The only accusation you can bring against them, loyal and Canadian and all as they are, is that their mother was an alien. Why, Mr. Speaker, birth is simply a matter of accident. If we are born to a nation or to a religion, there it is. It is not my fault or your fault or the fault of any one; it is simply an accident, that is all. Are we, Sir, to damn the people that come to this country on that account?

Mr. BURNHAM: May I ask the hon. gentleman—

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: It was an accident for you too.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BURNHAM: I am inclined to think there will be a fatal accident up North to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Wait and see.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order

Mr. BURNHAM: I want to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pardee) if he would do away with the precautions taken for the acquirement of citizenship under the Naturalization Act, and under all naturalization acts.

Mr. PARDEE: I did not say so. It is all right to take the precautions, but why in the name of Heaven keep them open for ten years? I have naturalized many men, and women too, and I know that precautions are necessary; but why you should keep that sore open for ten long years, almost a generation, is beyond my humble capacity to understand. Sir, along these lines I have the greatest objection to this Act. I say that so far as we here in this House are concerned, there is only one thing for us to do, and that is to attempt in every way possible, with sane mind and level conception, to unite all the peoples in the Dominion of Canada into one great whole. We should bring them to the idea, and that idea only, that they are Canadians first and members of the British Empire, and that only as Canadians can we go on and make for the great destiny that is open to us. Along these lines legislation ought to go, and if it does not, then I say we are not true to ourselves as Canadian citizens. As I said before, there are other portions of the Act with which I have some fault to find. I shall not go into them now; I shall take the opportunity to do so in committee of the whole house. In the meantime, however, I say most earnestly,—whether this opinion be popular or unpopular I care not a button—that what I have stated is the only way to make Canada what she ought to be. To my mind it is the only way to make Canada a nation of which we can rightly boast. If we are derelict in our duty in doing this, then I say it will redound to the discredit of the country, and will point to the fact that the legislators of the great Dominion of Canada have not that broad vision of nationhood which they ought to have. It will so lower us in the eyes of the world that under those conditions emigration will go from our shores.

Mr. JOHN WESLEY EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to intervene in this debate on the second reading of the Bill; any comments I have to make I had intended to withhold until the Bill was in committee. However, while I shall not take up very much time, I desire to make a few observations on the remarks which have just fallen from the lips of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee). The hon. gentleman is very bold and very courageous in stating to this House and to the country that he does not care a button whether his course is popular or unpopular. Just a short time ago he was perfectly willing, when he was seeking election in 1917, to avail himself of the measure disfranchising some people whom to-day he says it would be a crying shame to disfranchise.

Mr. PARDEE: Mr. Speaker, may I say that although I supported the Union Government, at every stage of the War-time Elections Act I voted against it.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. gentleman, I repeat—

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Of course.

Mr. EDWARDS: Yes, of course. That remark came from the hon. member for Quebec, and I may say—

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: It did, and it does again; narrowness true to itself.

Mr. EDWARDS: I shall have something to say to the hon. gentleman before I sit down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Pardee) in the election of 1917 was not only perfectly willing, but anxious to avail himself of the Act which was passed enabling him to get his seat in the House.

Mr. PARDEE: He was not anxious.

Mr. EDWARDS: I repeat that the hon. gentleman was perfectly willing, nay eager, to avail himself of the Act which gave the vote to the soldiers overseas, a share of which vote he got.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PARDEE: Not at all.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does the hon. gentleman say "no" to that statement?

Mr. PARDEE: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. gentleman informs us, then, that he did not want the soldiers' vote. Well, I do not think that on cool reflection he will again deny that the statement I made is correct.

Mr. PARDEE: Yes, I will.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. gentleman tells us he did not want the soldiers' vote. Well—

Mr. PARDEE: I did not say so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BUREAU: Let him proceed; he must get rid of his bile.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: He has a good deal of it.

Mr. EDWARDS: I did not catch the remarks of the hon. member for Three Rivers.

Mr. BUREAU: I said you had to spill your bile. Go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS: There is a possibility, Mr. Speaker, of my getting rid of all the bile I may have; but—

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Oh, no.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

Mr. EDWARDS: But there is no possibility of the hon. member for Three Rivers getting rid of his.

Mr. BUREAU: He has not got any bile; that is the difference between us.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must appeal to hon. members, if they desire to address the House, to do the House the courtesy of rising in their seats, and I must also point out that the hon. member who has the floor may not be interrupted except on a point of order or to be asked a question.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Some men rise and do not know what courtesy is.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not expect court esy from certain hon. members on the other side of the House, especially I may say, the hon. member for Quebec.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: That is something the hon. gentleman knows nothing about.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I trust the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) will bear in mind that we are debating the principles involved in the second reading of the Franchise Bill.

Mr. EDWARDS: That fact, Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavour to keep in mind, but I presume I shall have your sympathy when I say that it is somewhat difficult to keep the subject matter of the debate rigidly in mind in the face of the interruptions which have been levelled at me from the other side of the House and which, I venture to say, have neither been warranted nor courteous. The hon. gentleman who has taken his seat (Mr. Pardee) waxed very eloquent and somewhat violent in his statement that he wanted to see done away with entirely this curse of race and religion, which had divided every country in times past. He hoped to see no more of it. I can cordially join with the hon. gentleman in that wish, but I can hardly understand the gentleman who occupies the seat immediately to his right (Mr. E. Lapointe) saying "hear, hear" to that expression of opinion, for I have a distinct recollection, as I am sure many hon. members have, of that hon. gentleman, who then represented Kamouraska, moving a resolution in this House, when this country was at war, that could have no other effect than to divide the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. EDWARDS: That, I presume, is a pertinent remark.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member who has the floor is quite in order in rebutting any argument of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee). He is not in order, however, in referring to the attitude of the hon. member for Quebec, who has not spoken and in discussing a matter which is not germane to the subject before the House.

Mr. EDWARDS: Perhaps I was in error, Mr. Speaker, in supposing that the remarks made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee) were added to in strength by the endorsing "hear, hear" of the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Lapointe). It was on the supposition that the hon. member's expression endorsing the remark of the hon. member for Lambton justified me in directing some remarks to my hon. friend from Quebec that I adverted to that gentleman. Undoubtedly your ruling is correct, Sir, and it was unnecessary for me to refer to the hon. gentleman's "hear, hear" which I am sure added absolutely nothing to the arguments of his colleagues on his left.

The hon. member for Lambton asks us to return to the pre-war spirit, to forget the differences that divided us, to build ourselves into a strong nation, and so on. It is all very well to forget our differences, but in forgetting our differences we should not forget those people who forgot their country when it needed their support. It is all very well for my hon. friend to say: Let us forget our differences and bury the past; let us forget all those people whose sympathies, actively and otherwise, were turned against the men who went overseas prepared to give their lives for their country; it is all very well for him to say forget these things but we cannot remember the sacrifices that were made by our boys overseas and not remember the attitude of these people.

My hon. friend (Mr. Pardee) thinks that an alien enemy population of this kind will be the greatest asset of this country. He asks us whether we wish to stop immigration and he answers this question with an emphatic "no." I just as emphatically tell him that I do wish to stop that kind of immigration into this country. If you could get the opinion of the people of Canada generally I am convinced that ninety per cent would say that the country can get along and build itself up for the next ten years at least without the assistance of any Austrian or German immigrants. We want immigrants in Canada, but, as it has been intimated to us on more than one occasion in this House since the session started, we should in the future have regard to the quality rather than the quantity of the immigrants we get. Will the hon. member for Lambton tell me if his view is that we should throw the doors of this country wide open to the people of Germany, Austria and Turkey and let them come in and take part in making our laws? That apparently is what he wants.

We would be untrue to the men who sacrificed their lives, we would be forgetting those who had been fighting for four or five years and pouring out their blood on the battlefields of Europe if we opened our doors and allowed that class of immigrants to come into this country and have the privileges of other men who fought our battles or whose sons gave up their lives in the war. In that respect I am perfectly prepared to differ from the hon. member from Lambton just as widely as one pole is separated from the other. I believe the people of Canada will endorse my attitude rather than the attitude of the hon. gentleman.

I want to repeat with the utmost emphasis that in my judgment in framing this Franchise Act we must have regard to the quality of our citizens. If we are to be fair to those who have the privileges of citizenship and who bore unflinchingly the duties of citizenship we cannot regard in the same light those who had the privileges of citizenship but who refused disloyally to bear their share of the responsibilities of citizenship. The hon. member for Lambton and those who sit about him would amend this Franchise Act so that when polling day came in Canada we would have this spectacle: Here is a man back from the front who served several years overseas, he is minus a leg or an arm and otherwise shattered by the war, and here is an Austrian or a German who fought against him, whose sympathies were against him, who was doing everything he could to make it hard for him over there and to prevent his coming back, elbowing him to one side in order that he might put his ballot in the box. I will not endorse such an attitude as that on the part of this or any other government. To place these people on an equality with the men who have made sacrifices in the late war is to cast a slur on every man who made a sacrifice in that war. The attitude of the hon. member for Lambton and its endorsation by hon. members on that side of the House weakens his argument rather than strengthens it in my opinion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EDWARDS: In my opinion the endorsation of what was stated by my hon. friend from Lambton by hon. gentlemen on that side of the House sitting about him weakens his argument rather than strengthens it.

Mr. CANNON: Will the hon. gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. EDWARDS: Not from you.

Mr. CANNON: Is the hon. gentleman expressing simply his personal opinion? If it is only the hon. gentleman's personal opinion it does not count for much.

Mr. EDWARDS: In regard to my personal opinion whether it counts much or little, at all events I believe it will count for just as much in the estimation of the country as any opinion offered by the hon. gentleman who just got up (Mr. Cannon). In the course of his remarks the hon. gentleman for Lambton asked: "Would Britain shut out any alien; would that be the policy of Britain; would Britain do anything of that kind?" He characterized this particular portion of the Act as being un-British and I heard "hear, hear" from the hon. gentleman who sits immediately at his right and another "hear, hear" from the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) and another from that volatile young gentleman who rose just a few moments ago. When I heard the hon. member for Dorchester say, "hear, hear," I thought that it suited his purpose to say that this Act was un-British—that hon. gentleman who, in the course of an election campaign asked: "What do we owe to England,"? who replied: "We owe nothing to England," and whose whole stand when he was appealing for votes for himself was most shamelessly anti-British.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Sevigny said that.

Mr. EDWARDS: It is extremely pleasant to me to get beneath the hides of these hon. gentlemen. In no way could they give greater satisfaction to me than by showing their dissent. If, Mr. Speaker, I received the endorsation of these hon. gentlemen I would be sure that I was wrong. It is because they endorsed the hon. member for Lambton that I said that his argument and the conclusion from his argument must be wrong. These gentlemen talked about British institutions and British fair play. What was their attitude when British institutions, the British constitution and the British Empire were at stake?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EDWARDS: All through the war what was their attitude?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EDWARDS: Hon. gentlemen opposite may answer by saying "Oh, oh." In that respect they represent by the aritmetical character of "O" which is naught, what they have done to maintain British institutions. They are using the proper term because it accurately represents their attitude during the war. According to the principles they enunciated during the war, their attitude would be represented by a cypher and therefore they ought to say "O" and say it with very good grace and very properly when referring to their attitude at that particular time. If it means that their consciences are beginning to work, well even I shall be very pleased indeed.

Mr. GAUVREAU: How does the Franchise Bill come into all this?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Censored by the lodge.

Mr. EDWARDS: As I said upon rising I do not intend to discuss this Bill very fully.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. EDWARDS: I was going to follow the example set by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pardee) and confine myself to one particular phase of it. I want to assure hon. gentlemen opposite, several of whom have asked me questions on different points that in the limited time at my disposal I am not going to undertake to fill the void in their craniums which needs filling in order to afford them the information which they desire. But if these hon. gentlemen some time during the recess will come to me for information, I will endeavour to the best of my ability to fill the vacuum which I know is there.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EDWARDS: I will do what I can to help them out and give them the information which they so much desire.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the expression of the hon. member is hardly in keeping with the dignity or decorum of the House.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is all right from him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS: To what particular expression, Mr. Speaker, do you refer?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member used an expression with reference to members of this House which is not in keeping with the dignity or decorum of the House, and I think the hon. member would be well advised if he would withdraw it. The expression in question was the reference to certain hon. gentlemen as "having a void in their craniums."

An hon. MEMBER: It is all right.

Mr. EDWARDS: I did not notice at the time that I was saying anything that might be regarded as contrary to the rules. If I did so, I will withdraw the remark.

An hon. MEMBER: The hon. member does not know any better.

Mr. EDWARDS: I am very glad, indeed, to know and to have it demonstrated to me beyond any doubt that the statement I made in regard to the unfurnished condition of their mental attics was incorrect.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Don't be too witty now.

Mr. EDWARDS: There are gentlemen on the other side of the House——

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Do not try to be human.

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend——

An hon. MEMBER: Say it in French.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must put it to hon. members, whether a debate can be rightly and properly conducted under such conditions as have prevailed for the last three or four minutes.

Mr. EDWARDS: Do I understand, Mr. Speaker, that your remarks in that particular instance are directed to this side of the House?

Mr. SPEAKER: To the whole House.

Mr. EDWARDS: With all due deference, I see no particular reason for the application of your warning to hon. gentlemen on this side. My hon. friend from Chambly and Vercheres asked me not to be humourous——

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I said "human."

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS: I would not presume to undertake to play the part of a humourist or clown so long as my hon. friend is in the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EDWARDS: I know that I should only run a poor second to my hon. friend in that regard, and therefore I will leave him a clear field.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: An also-ran.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Speaker, we will have a further opportunity of discussing this particular clause in committee. Once more, allow me to say that I disassociate myself entirely from the remarks made by the hon. member (Mr. Pardee) that we should lay aside all of those things which had their influence when the War-time Elections Act and the Military Voters' Act were passed. In considering the future of Canada may I be permitted to say that in my judgment we should be more particular in handing out the franchise than we have ever been in the past? May I say that in my judgment one of the great weaknesses in our Franchise Acts in this country is that we have opened the door too wide. We have cared nothing whether a man understood a word of the English language or not, or whether he understood anything of British principles or of our constitution. So long as he was twenty-one years of age he was allowed to vote and so enjoyed as free an exercise of the franchise as a man who thoroughly understood the principles of Government under which we live.

In my judgment that is wrong and I think it has been a weakness in our legislation in this country. If those people come to Canada from other countries they do so because they believe the conditions here are better than the conditions in the country of their birth. That being the case I say that they should in some way show that they possess some knowledge of our country and of our principles of government before they are put on an equal footing with people who were born and raised in Canada and upon whom in a time of crisis the responsibility of "carrying on" devolves. I say, Sir, with respect to any person or to any class of people in Canada who during the last four or five years proved by their attitude that they were not prepared to assume all the responsibilities of citizenship, that I am not ready for one, simply because the war is over, to tell them that they can come in and have as much voice in the administration of the affairs of this country for the next five or ten years as those persons who assumed and worthily bore their full share of responsibility. That is my attitude and I believe it will appeal with greater force to the people of Canada than the attitude which has been stated by my hon. friend (Mr. Pardee) and so vigorously endorsed by those who sit around him.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): I will not attempt, Mr. Speaker, to answer bitter words with bitter words. The occasion which calls us together this evening is of far too great importance for us to take up the country's time in bandying doubtful compliments across the floor of the Chamber. I rise for the purpose of supporting the spirit of the remarks offered by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) and I would like to draw the attention of hon. members to the manner in which other countries that have suffered just as much as we have—aye, and far more—in the conflict which has closed are treating this subject of after the war reconstruction. This Bill is a part of after the war reconstruction, for what we are discussing to-night is the charter under which Canadian society shall operate in the future.

Let us turn for a moment to Italy. I suppose there are few nations in the world that have suffered as Italy has suffered under the awful tyranny imposed upon her for generations by Austria. During the war Italy suffered frightfully; her northern provinces, some of the fairest she possesses, were overwhelmed by Austrian and German troops. A poor country with a tremendous debt before the war, her debt is now of crushing magnitude. Life will be harder and more bitter on account of the war for the population of Italy for years to come. But what is Italy doing to-day, Mr. Speaker? Italy in her poverty is taking tens of thousands of starving Austrian children and entertaining them in her own homes. That is the spirit in which the world can be reconstructed for a better future; but the spirit shown by some hon. members is just the opposite.

What is Great Britain doing? I would suppose all will admit that the part played in the war by Great Britain, by those little islands in the North sea, has been just as fine as the part played by Canada. I would imagine that all hon. members will agree with me when I state that the losses of young British manhood have been as heavy, aye, heavier than our own. Why, Scotland, the place from which my forbears came, has lost such a proportion of her young manhood as would make the angels weep. What is Great Britain doing? To-day perhaps the one solvent country in Europe, through the Economic Council of the Allies at Paris she is proposing to make advances to Germany in order to allow that country to get on its feet.

Mr. CURRIE: That is not votes.

Mr. McMASTER: No, but that is the spirit which should animate us to-day. Now, in that spirit I shall ask all hon. members to approach this matter—not animated by hate, for, as the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Andrews) said the other day, we cannot build up a new world on hate; we must build it up on love. Is it a strange doctrine to say that one must love his enemies? It is a doctrine that has been preached for two hundred years—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh. Two thousand years.

Mr. McMASTER: We may well laugh, because although it has been preached for two thousand years it has never been followed in international politics. The great fundamental reason for the Gethsemane through which humanity has passed during the last five years was that those principles were not adopted. And I ask this House and this country to approach this subject in the proper spirit—and we all know what that proper spirit is.

Let me ask this question also. Did those in our community from whom the right to vote is taken by this Bill—our people of Austrian origin—behave themselves badly during that period? I cannot speak from personal experience. I know there are very few German or Austrian people in Montreal, and there are none in my constituency; but as far as I know they gave no succour to the enemy, but behaved themselves in seemly and proper fashion; and from the information I have received I understand that in other parts of the country those belonging especially to the Austrian nation, Hungarians and Bohemians, were not only not anti-British or anti-Ally, they were pro-Ally, and volunteered in large numbers to fight for the Allies. Have there been plots in Canada by our German population? I do not think so. I believe I should have heard of them had there been any.

But, after all, I ask: How are we going to build up a Canadian people? It seems to me that there are only two courses to pursue: If a man is not a desirable citizen, he should be asked on fair terms to leave the country; and if he is a desirable citizen, then he should be given all the privileges and responsibilities of citizenship. I know no other way by which you can build up a great nation.

Before I sit down I wish to deal further with the principle of the Bill. By section 30, subsection one (g) it is provided that:

> Persons who, by the laws of any province in Canada, are disqualified from voting for a member of the Legislative Assembly of such province in respect of race, shall not be qualified to vote in such province under the provisions of this Act.

To this provision I take strong exception. I do not think it is wise, nor do I think it is honourable. This is our Act—the Act of the Dominion of Canada. Naturalization papers are given by this Government—the federal Government. Once we give naturalization to people, no matter whence they come, they must be given full rights, and those rights include the right inherent in Canadian citizenship—the right to vote. We cannot have different grades of citizenship. What is this provision aimed at? It is because certain provinces, for reason which perhaps appears just to themselves, have withheld the provincial franchise from men and women of Oriental origin. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to discuss the wisdom or unwisdom of having orientals settle in this country, for it is not a question on which I would feel qualified to speak without giving it profound study. But that is not the question affected by the Bill. What the Bill affects is Canadian citizens, and the proposal is to take from Canadian naturalized citizens the right to vote,—the most precious right of citizenship. And when you consider, Sir, who are being disfranchised under this clause, its ignobleness, if I may use the expression, is startling. Who protected our Pacific coast when the war was on? The cruisers of Great Britain's ally, Japan. Who are being disfranchised by this Bill? The former subjects of the Mikado. Is that gratitude? A certain political and moral philosopher has said: What is not good morals cannot be good politics. This is not good morals for it is base ingratitude; and it cannot be regarded as good politics.

I am no Imperialist, Mr. Speaker, but I have a very warm regard for the Mother Country, and a strong desire to help her in every way I can, and I say that an Act such as this passed by the Parliament of the second, if not the first, of the members of the Britannic Commonwealth, the Dominion of Canada, cannot but tend to hurt the relationship which should exist between Great Britain and her great Eastern ally, Japan.

And who also is attacked by this Bill? Our fellow-British subjects from India. What did they do in the war? They, of another race, of another colour, sent—from a population of teeming millions, it is true—into what was essentially a white man's war, 1,500,000 men. They fought on the Western front; they fought in Egypt; they fought in Mesopotamia,—but they are not to vote in British Columbia. Is that right? Oh, you may say, you must not offend the feelings of British Columbia. I do not want to offend the feelings of British Columbia.

Mr. HOCKEN: You are doing it.

Mr. McMASTER: The member for West Toronto says that I am doing it. When the war broke out a Home Rule Bill had been passed in the Imperial Parliament, but in order not to offend Ulster that Home Rule Bill was postponed; it was put into the cupboard and allowed to get stale. What was the result of that desire not to offend Ulster? It was the rebellion of Easter, 1916, and it is the existence of the Irish question, the greatest and the most serious question that faces the British Empire today. You have to offend sometimes in order to do what is right. Surely the member for West Toronto has never hesitated to offend when he thought that to do so was necessary to the accomplishing of something that he thought good.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to conclude my remarks in a tone of bitterness or on the plane of conflict. I ask that the members of this House consider this Bill seriously, carefully and well, remembering that when you have your enemy in the dust, to rub his face in the dirt, or, as this Bill proposes, to rub his thirty-second cousin's face in the dirt, is poor business, poor politics, poor statesmanship.

Mr. WILLIAM D. EULER (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker it had been my intention to discuss certain phases of this Bill in Committee of the Whole, but the debate has taken a certain turn which impels to discuss the matter just a little more broadly than I could discuss it within the rules under any clause in committee and it is for that reason that I am going to make my observations now.

It is not my intention, although the provocation is great, to answer insult with insult. It is my intention to debate a certain principle, or the violation of a certain principle, in this Bill from the point of view entirely of logic and justice and fair play. If I cannot convince the Government and members on the other side of the justice of my argument in a reasonable and logical way, I am assuredly not going to make an appeal to sentiment, because I think the time for that has pretty well passed.

Before I proceed further, may I say that I hope the Government will use the machinery which it is about to provide, and in connection with which certain amendments will, I trust, be made, to give the people of this country an opportunity of using it in the election of a Parliament that properly represents them.

I shall confine myself entirely to those clauses of the Bill which most closely touch the people in the riding which I have the honour to represent. I may say frankly that I am going to discuss to-night the attempt to disfranchise British subjects of late enemy origin,—or, if you like, of British subjects in Canada who are of German or Austrian birth. And I want to say that I am not on my feet to make a plea for the alien. I am not going to make a plea for any one; I am merely going to demand a square deal for men who are British subjects and good citizens of Canada.

I think, Sir, it is also in order for me to point out that in its application, the word "alien" has been abused in this House ever since I entered it. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House—perhaps hon. gentlemen on this side have occasionally done so—have frequently spoken in debate of "aliens," when they meant men of alien origin. I contend that when a man has become a naturalized British subject he is no longer an alien; he is in very truth a British subject, and entitled to the privileges of a British subject.

I realize, Sir, that in discussing these particular clauses in the Bill I am in a somewhat peculiar position. I appreciate that perhaps I am the only member of this House whose ancestors sprang from the race with which we have been at war. As is probably well known——

Mr. CANNON: The member for Edmonton.

Mr. EULER: I have no knowledge of any other member of the House who is of the same descent as I am. But whether there is another or not, I want to say that on that score I have no apology whatever to make, because before I am through I think I shall be able to show that, after all, I am in very good company. I should like to say also that I was born in this country, and that I am a Canadian. I would like hon. members as they listen to me to-night to remember, if possible, for the purposes of this debate that I am a Canadian as they are, and to give me credit, as I give credit to them, for a desire to serve my country, Canada. If they are able to do that I shall appreciate it.

Sir, I had hoped that the Franchise Bill when it was introduced into this House would be free from the objectionable clauses which obtained in the War-time Elections Act. It is not my purpose to indulge in any lengthy recriminations with regard to that Act. It has been described as a blot on the statute book of Canada. For my part I should be glad to see it relegated to the limbo of forgotten things, together with other scraps of paper, and other broken agreements. But I did hope after the minister spoke the other day that the Bill would be almost entirely free from the disfranchising clauses of the War-time Elections Act.

I know that the impression prevails throughout the country, fostered by the press, and justifiably so, I believe from the information that we had, that the Franchise Bill, which is now before the House, is a very fair measure, and that perhaps very little fault can be found with it. But a careful study of the Bill, together with a study of some of the provisions of the Naturalization Act passed last year, discloses the fact that this Bill will disfranchise many more British subjects than were disfranchised under the War-time Elections Act. Indeed, I think it is almost true to say that while the War-time Elections Act disfranchised its thousands, this Act as it stands will disfranchise its tens of thousands.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Under what provision of this Act does my hon. friend justify the statement he has just made?

Mr. EULER: I am coming to that, and if I am wrong I shall be very glad to be corrected, and my remarks will come to a conclusion very quickly. I am going on with this more particularly now because the charges made by my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) were much the same as I am about to make, though perhaps my remarks may be made from another viewpoint. No exception was taken to the statements of the hon. member for West Lambton. In fact, hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to believe that what he charged was the intent and meaning of the Act.

To make my point clear I want to state certain definite facts. The first is expressed in the Naturalization Act of 1919, section 11:

> The wife of a British subject shall be deemed to be a British subject.

That is all that is necessary for me to quote for the purpose of my argument. Secondly, the children of a naturalized alien, being minors, both male and female, become naturalized quite legally with the naturalization of the father. The result therefore is that the naturalization of a father of alien origin naturalizes his wife and his children of both sexes. I think that is the case. At least, that was the law up until the Act of 1914, and even since that Act was passed the children are still naturalized under the law, provided they are mentioned in the naturalization certificate. That I understand is the purport of the law.

The next fact I would mention is this: The Bill gives the franchise to women; that is well known. Secondly—and this is one of the most important facts of all—before these wives and children of naturalized aliens can be permitted to vote, although they are in very truth British subjects—and I want to emphasize that—the Bill before the House states very definitely that they must obtain personal naturalization. I will read the section for the purposes of record. Subsection2 of section 29 says:

> For the purposes of this Act, the allegiance or nationality of a person, as it was at the birth of such person shall be deemed incapable of being changed, or of having been changed, merely by reason or in consequence of marriage or change of allegiance or naturalization of any other person,—

Such other person being the father, I presume.

> —or otherwise than by personal naturalization of such first mentioned person.

I think that makes it perfectly clear that all these British subjects, being the wives or grown-up children of duly naturalized men of alien origin, cannot vote under this Bill unless they become personally naturalized through the Secretary of State. Finally, and this is just as important as what I have already mentioned, the Naturalization Act of 1919 provides (Part II, section 8, subsection 4, (b):

> No certificate of naturalization shall, before the expiration of a period of ten years after the termination of the present war, be granted in Canada, to any subject of a country which at the time of the passing of this Act was at war with His Majesty.

Then follow certain exceptions. Thus the joint effect of these clauses is to disfranchise thousands of women and men of German or Austrian birth. Now if there is any escape from what I have said, it must be through an interpretation of this clause. The clause is not absolutely clear to me, but it is certainly capable of being interpreted in the way I have indicated. If I have interpreted it incorrectly I should be very glad if the Solicitor General would set me right.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Solicitor General): The last part of my hon. friend's interpretation I think is absolutely correct. The Naturalization Act of 1919 provides that no subject of any enemy state shall be permitted to be naturalized in this country for a period of ten years after the close of the war. That would include Austrians, Germans, Bulgars, and Turks. They will not under the present Bill be entitled to vote, nor will they under the Naturalization Act be entitled to become British subjects for a period of ten years from the end of the war. That is correct.

Mr. EULER: I think the minister has missed my point. The point I am trying to make is this: British subjects, naturalized in Canada by virtue of the naturalization of some one else, either husband or father, must under the Bill before the House obtain personal naturalization in order to vote, and my interpretation is that they cannot obtain naturalization because of the clause I have just read. Is that correct?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They cannot if they are Austrians, Germans, Bulgars or Turks. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. EULER: Exactly. I am referring to naturalized British subjects of Austrian or German birth who have become naturalized by virtue of their fathers' or husbands' naturalization. I am correct then in stating that people originally of these races, though now British subjects—and I want again to emphasize that point—cannot obtain personal naturalization under the Act of 1919.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, they cannot for ten years.

Mr. EULER: I am quite sure they cannot, because I took occasion to investigate and made inquiry of the Under-Secretary of State. I put this question to him: "What would you do if a British subject, of German or Austrian birth, who had become naturalized by reason of the naturalization of father or husband, applied for personal naturalization?" He replied "Naturalization would be refused." So that point seems perfectly clear.

Let me review these points. We have, I think, in the Dominion of Canada, about 115,000 of male naturalized citizens of former enemy alien origin. My figures may not be exactly correct, but they are nearly so. These people are British subjects, although of German or Austrian birth. Secondly, this Bill says they cannot vote unless they become personally naturalized. Thirdly, the Naturalization Act forbids such naturalization. Therefore it is a fact that if the Bill passes as drafted, probably something like 100,000 British subjects in Canada will be deprived of the right to vote at the next election, and perhaps for a period of ten years altogether.

When the Naturalization Act was piloted through the House last session by the Solicitor General (Hon. Mr. Guthrie), it will be recalled that I objected very strongly to the ten-year clause, and made the argument then that credit should be given at least to those people who had already lived in Canada for ten, fifteen, thirty, forty or even fifty years. I was unable to carry my point, although as a matter of fact the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) said he was in sympathy with the stand I had taken in view of the fact that both he and the President of the Privy Council (Hon. Mr. Rowell), had so expressed themselves at the Peace conference in Paris. However, for various reasons, the suggestion was not adopted and I was unsuccessful in securing the result I desired. At that time it did seem to me that the reasons given for failure to adopt my suggestion were trivial and insufficient; and if I were of a suspicious nature, which I am not, I would be apt to surmise that the action of the Government last session in placing that ten-year clause in the Naturalization Act was committed with a pre-vision of what was to follow in the Franchise Bill which we have now before us. I do not say that I believe this to have been the case, but I say that if I were suspicious I would be apt to think that it was then the intention to disfranchise these people.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend must remember the discussion of last year, and he no doubt knows that the Bill which this House passed then is the accepted model in all British colonies, being the Act in force in the Motherland, and applies to British citizenship, not only in Canada but through the British Empire. The ten-year clause in the Imperial Act, which we followed.

Mr. EULER: In reply to that statement of the hon. gentleman, let me say that the Prime Minister on the floor of the House, after I had drawn his attention to his own speech at the Peace conference, which he admitted embodied his sentiments in this regard, said:

> I assure my hon. friend that I will make representations to the British Government with respect to the matter with a view to having such modifications made in the Imperial Act as will permit of reasonable modifications in our own.

I communicated with the Prime Minister, not long ago, inquiring of him whether he had done as he had promised, and he replied that he was taking the matter up with the Solicitor General. I am informed, however, that nothing whatever has been done in that direction, and I am forced to the conclusion that there never was any intention that anything should be done.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if it were worth while, we might compare the present Franchise Bill with the War-time Elections Act. In the War-time Elections Act there was not the degree of disfranchising that will occur under this Act, by which every woman of German or Austrian birth will be deprived of a vote in the coming elections. And if I may be allowed a personal remark, I may say that this Act, if it passes, will disfranchise my mother, although she has lived in Canada as a good Canadian citizen, having reared good Canadians, for sixty years. It will deprive of the franchise all women who have lived in this country for many years, but who were born in Germany and were naturalized as a result of the naturalization of their fathers. But observe the injustice of this, Mr. Speaker. Many of those whom this Act will disfranchise have actually voted in past years, having been duly naturalized British subjects. Under this Act, if it is read with the Naturalization Act, they are deprived of the right to vote by reason of the ten-year clause. I know that there are in the riding I represent men who have lived in that locality during the past few years perfectly secure and serene in the belief that their franchise would not be imperilled, because they had complied with the requirements of the law in that they had become naturalized with the naturalization of their fathers. They have no remedy now. There can be no doubt in the mind of any hon. gentleman that if these men had for one moment suspected that a law would be passed depriving them of the franchise, unless they obtained personal naturalization, they would long ago have taken steps to obtain such naturalization. Now, under the law, it is utterly impossible for them to do so. The Acting Solicitor General this afternoon spoke of anomalies which might arise if certain suggestions were adopted. I think one of them was that if the women of Quebec had not been given the franchise we should have the peculiar position of a woman of the province of Quebec being able to stand as a candidate for Parliament and yet not have the vote. I wonder if we are not in exactly that position to-day. These women and men who are disfranchised are still British subjects although they have not got the vote. Now Sir, the requirement of a candidate for the Canadian House of Commons is that he or she shall be a British subject of the age of twenty-one years. It may be that my constituency in its wisdom will select some good honest Canadian woman of German birth, a British subject, and will send that woman to the Canadian Parliament although she herself will have no vote. There are other anomalies in the Act as it stands, and as I believe that the minister was sincere this afternoon when he said that if necessary corrections were pointed out to him he would adopt them, I think after I have indicated some of these anomalies he will feel inclined to effect some changes.

This clause will enfranchise men who could not vote in the war-time election; it will enfranchise those men who were disfranchised in the last election if they had been naturalized within the last fifteen years and were of enemy origin. It will disfranchise men who had votes in the war-time elections. Now, you have this peculiar situation: Men of alien origin who could not vote under war conditions will be allowed to vote now that we have peace, and men who were allowed to vote in war time will not be permitted this privilege in the future. That, surely, is an anomaly of the first order. I desire to refer to another important point. I have not read the Act as closely as I should like to have done, but so far as I can see there is absolutely no provision giving the franchise to women of German or Austrian birth, British subjects, who gave their sons to the war, even if those sons were killed. I find no provision enabling such women to vote; and in reply to some statements made by another hon. member, I beg to give to the House just a little bit of proof that the German Canadians, British subjects in Canada, were not quite so remiss in their duty in this war as some people would have us suppose.

I have in my hand a list of men who were killed in the war, all of whom came from the city of Kitchener, or the town of Waterloo, and possibly a few from other parts of the riding. I shall not read all the names but I am going to read some of them, and I think that when you hear me pronounce them you will have no doubt whatever as to their racial origin. The first is Lieutenant Harry Snyder, a young man whom I had the honour to instruct when I was a public school teacher in the schools of what was then Berlin, now the city of Kitchener. That young man enlisted, entered the air force, was some time later reported as missing and has never been heard of since. I spoke to a brother of his last Sunday just before leaving for Ottawa. I mentioned the Franchise Act and this disfranchising provision. He said to me: "It will disfranchise my mother who gave her son." That is one case. Then there are Private Zapfe, and Private Schreiter, Private J. Gehl, Private Knechtel, Private G. Stuffer, who is a descendant of the Mennonites of whom we have heard so much; Private A. Schierholtz, Private George Strub, Private J. Gerbig, Private V. Hummel, Private J. Diefenbecker, Private H. Rosenberger, Private H. Treusch, Private S. Uffelman, Private Herman Gross, Private Clayton Fenner, Private Steckenraider, and Lieutenant W. Bauer. These men gave up their lives fighting in the armies of Canada. I do not know to what extent that clause will affect their mothers. I do know it will affect the mothers in some cases at least and I believe it will affect the sisters of some of these men. I referred a moment ago to the fact that some twenty years ago I had the privilege of teaching in the public schools in the city of Kitchener. Besides teaching the ordinary subjects of the public school course, I did what I could to inculcate in those boys and girls a measure of patriotism and of faith in British institutions. I taught those boys and girls that British law and institutions stood for justice and fair play. I believed then what I taught. After the record of the last four or five years and sometimes as I have listened to speeches and statements made in this House, that faith of mine has occasionally wavered and as a result of certain incidents has continued to do so. It that clause is retained in the Bill, certainly my confidence in the justice of the British people in this House will not be strengthened.

The boys and girls of the city of Kitchener—and I speak particularly of that city because I live there and because there is in that city a large admixture of people of German origin,—are still being taught to be good citizens. They are told that Canada is a progressive country. They are told that the women of Canada have been given the franchise. I have no doubt that those boys and girls come from homes in which there are fathers and mothers who, perhaps, forty, fifty or sixty years ago, were born in Germany or Austria. They will tell the mothers that they also have received the franchise. When election day comes the mother will have to learn that under this law she has no vote. The father goes to vote because he is enfranchised again; he has his personal naturalization papers. I can fancy that the girls and boys will urge the mother also to go and vote because, I believe, our public schools are teaching the children that one of the greatest privileges and duties they may have is the right to exercise the franchise. The mother must say to them that she cannot vote. The inevitable question comes: "Why not"? The answer is that because thirty, forty or fifty years ago she was born in Germany or Austria. "But," says the boy, "father was born in Germany and he can vote; why not mother"? Do you think that any reply the father or mother can make will satisfy the sense of justice of those Canadian boys and girls? What will be the effect upon those boys? Will they despise the mother who is insulted, or will they look with contempt upon the law and the Government which did the wrong?

Let me take another concrete case. A father and a mother came from Germany, for example, thirty years ago, both of them being, we will say, thirty years of age. They brought with them a boy of five and a girl of three. In four or five years the father obtains Canadian naturalization in the regular way. In the course of two or three years another boy and another daughter are born to this couple. We have now the passing of this Act with an election following. The young people who were born in Canada are British subjects; the older ones are also British subjects. The younger ones do not require to be naturalized personally because they were born on Canadian soil. They have now reached voting age. The older son has been voting for twelve or fourteen years. An election comes on and under this Act you have this condition; that the father, the younger son and the younger daughter go to the polls and vote while the mother and the older son, who in the past has been voting, and the older sister, are compelled to remain at home. In addition to that, it is not at all a far-fetched suggestion that the younger son, whose mother, older sister and older brother are disfranchised, may have fought in the war as a volunteer recruit in the Canadian army.

I think it would be impossible to conceive of anything more illogical, more unfair, and, if I may use a word that is unparliamentary—that is more tricky or more calculated to destroy faith in the national decency and honour than this proposal. The War-time Elections Act was bad. But in the War-time Elections Act of 1917 the entry was made by the front door and the right of British subjects was taken away openly. By the Bill we have now before us, entrance is made by the back door of the Naturalization Act with the apparent idea that the plunder may be abstracted before those who are robbed know what has happened to them.

Mr. Speaker, there must be reasons for this legislation and I can conceive of only three, one of which perhaps I must already discard. The first one is that possibly the Government did not quite appreciate what the joint effect of these two clauses would be. I can hardly believe that to be the case because apparently the effect is quite intentional, being so admitted by the Acting Solicitor General. The second possible reason is that the Government felt that these people should be disfranchised in the interests of Canada itself. And the third reason that occurs to me is that these people are disfranchised in order to gain a political advantage.

Now let us examine the second. What can be said or has been said, to show that the granting of the franchise to these British subjects could prejudice the interests of Canada? The war is over, and I do not think it is the intention of the Canadian Government to prepare for another war with Germany or Austria or any other country; at all events I devoutly hope not. I do not see, under those conditions, how the vote of these women, cast in a Canadian election for members of the House of Commons, could possibly be injurious to Canada.

Let us examine the conduct of the people who are affected by this law. The question has been asked by hon. gentlemen on this side, how have these people behaved? I can speak only for those of North Waterloo, and while I am very well aware that a great many comments have been made about that blessed portion of this Dominion, a great deal of what has been said has not been true. If I might again be permitted a personal remark I would say that in the first year of the war I happened to have the honour of being mayor of the city of Kitchener. That city was one of the very first to organize a branch of the Canadian Patriotic Fund, and its people, who are largely of German origin, voluntarily contributed individually and through the municipality, at that time a larger sum per capita than did any other centre in Canada. They gave liberally also to the Red Cross, the British Red Cross Society, and they subscribed most generously to the Victory Loan, as the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) will know. Again, in 1918 I think, the riding of North Waterloo subscribed a larger per capita percentage of the loan than did any other riding in the province of Ontario with the exception of those situated in the larger centres of population. Further, the number of voluntary enlistments compares favourably with those of many other parts of Canada.

If these people were disloyal, if they were acting as traitors—as one hon. gentleman opposite suggested—how is it that we have had no prosecutions? I may be wrong but I am pretty well acquainted with the facts in the county of Waterloo, and especially in the riding of North Waterloo, and I cannot recall that there was even one successful prosecution of a British subject of the kind I am discussing for treasonable utterances or anything that could be construed as disloyal. I want to say also that there are a great many people in that county who, if anything of the kind had been practised, would very soon have taken action, and punishment would have followed. Speaking of internments, British subjects, of course, could not be interned without a trial. There were about eight thousand internments in the whole Dominion, but with the exception of one, so far as I know, the persons interned were all alien enemies who are not the subject of this debate at all. In this connection I want it to be clearly understood that the people of whom I am speaking to-night are not alien enemies; they are people of alien birth but they are British subjects. Of these there was not one convicted, not one man was interned. I should perhaps make an exception. There were seven internments from the city of Kitchener out of about 8,000 for the whole of Canada, a fairly creditable record I think. Among those seven there were of course, no women, but one man was wrongfully interned, he being a British subject naturalized in New Zealand. Although this man was a British subject, with ample proof of naturalization from the Secretary of State of New Zealand, he was sent to the internment camp and kept there for three or four years. He was never accorded a trial, and finally, in spite of his protests, was deported to Germany but was later brought back by the Canadian Government who recognized and realized their error. I know that in the county of Waterloo, in the county of Perth, in Oxford possibly, in Bruce and Huron and Renfrew and in many sections of the Canadian West, there are thousands, almost hundreds of thousands, of the people of whom I speak now. To-day under this legislation they have no country. Surely the first privilege of a British subject is the franchise itself; and yet under this Bill the Government to-day makes outcasts of men who are innocent. They punish men who have committed no offence, because, although offences have been charged no definite statements have been given by hon. gentleman opposite who spoke before me. No proofs have been given of the broad statements which they have made with regard to the acts of treason committed by these people. If the Bill passes in its present form, this Government points the finger of scorn at a hundred thousand good Canadians and cries "Unclean." Why? Because these men and women by an accident of birth came from Germany or Austria and because they were trustful enough to accept the invitation and the promise of agents of the Government of Canada that if they came to this country and discharged their duty as citizens should, they would be granted all the rights and privileges of British citizenship.

Mr. Speaker, I intended to read some extracts from some of the papers in connection with this phase of the question but I will dispense with that. But, I do want to say that the whole spirit of the clause which I condemn is wrong. We have heard a good deal of the spirit of the bon entente that should exist between the people of Quebec and the people of Ontario I think it is right that such a spirit should prevail, but why cannot the same spirit be extended to the small minority that lives in other provinces of Canada? And, Sir, I want to place on record my conviction that in the treatment of most of these people of former alien enemy birth, Germans and Austrians, a sad mistake was made by many Canadians and by the Dominion Government. I was going to say that some of it might be excused—no not excused, but explained by reason of the prejudice and the sufferings arising out of the war. But, Sir, if there had been something more of trust and a little less of suspicion it would have been very, very much better for this country. I want to say—and I know whereof I speak—that among the people of North Waterloo of German or Austrian origin—although we have not many Austrians there—there is no love of militarism and that most of them came from Europe to escape from that very thing. I want to say further that I do not believe that the common people in any part of the world desire war, because war means the slaughter of their sons. I do not believe that is true of any people, and it is certainly not true of the people of North Waterloo. They hate war. They want to be good Canadians,—if you will only allow them to be so.

Mr. Speaker, the Government of this country brought these people here, and they came in good faith, believing what was told them, that Canada was a democracy that welcomed all who would share her responsibilities. They toiled and helped to build up this country, including the county of Waterloo from which I come, as did also the Mennonites of whom we have heard so much. They identified themselves with us, their children attended our schools, and they absorbed our national ideals. In very truth they became of us, and we recognized the fact by entering into the sacred compact of citizenship with them. They have carried out their part of the bargain. Can an honourable nation do any less than that? If these people disobey the law they are as liable to punishment as the native born, their responsibilities are in no way lightened, and their property and industry must contribute to the national treasury.

Some eight or ten days ago I enjoyed a speech delivered in this House by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster), when he made a plea for greater tolerance as between hon. members on the two sides of the House. I appreciated very much what he said. Before I resume my seat I would like to say to him, if I may, Mr. Speaker, and if a younger man may with propriety say this to an older man: That kindness and trust and charity are infinitely more powerful than the degrading influences of suspicion—influences, which are exemplified in the Bill before us to-day. And I would say to him that the harvest which he can expect from the sowing anew of the seed of racial hatred will not redound to the advantage of Canada if carried out in this Bill. Canada is populated by people of diverse races. It will always be so, and you can only weld them into one great Canadian nationality by the process of education and by inculcating and applying the principles of justice and equality, and the square deal.

I do not dare to hope, Sir, that anything I may have said will induce the Government to strike out this clause, but if they do so it would be, not an act of generosity but an act of justice, for which I think they would receive full credit. But whether or not they take that course, when this Bill reaches the committee stage, if no one else moves in that direction, I certainly will move for the striking out of this disfranchising clause.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We will be with you.

Mr. EULER: In conclusion, Sir, I would like to say that in the ranks of the Allied nations, notably in those of the United States, there were thousands upon thousands of men of German or Austrian ancestry, and many of them held positions of high authority in that country. Yet I do not believe that the trust reposed in them was ever betrayed. But, Sir, I would like to come nearer home. From Waterloo, and from Perth, from Oxford and from Renfrew, from Bruce and Huron, and from the Great West there came hundreds of men to fight in the Canadian army, many of whom died on the battlefields of France. To-day I submit the honour of Canada is in the hands of this Parliament. I ask you not to insult the memory of these men through an affront to their sisters and brothers and to the mothers that bore them.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, one clause of this Bill has been very freely discussed. I have very little to say with regard to it, but I wish to join with the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Euler) in stating that I think it is very illogical—indeed, it is still more illogical than he has shown it to be in that particular. We usually speak of what we ourselves know especially. Although there are not many people in my constituency of alien enemy birth, a number of such men homesteaded there years ago and became naturalized, they brought their children with them, many of them very young, and

I think I am correct in saying that probably more would be disfranchised among those families than those who are now entitled to vote, and yet those so disfranchised are the very people who should be entitled to vote. Those who are now entitled to vote are the people who, if any, should be disfranchised. If among those people there are any with German or Austrian sympathies they are those who had reached manhood before they settled in this country. Their children who have been educated in our Canadian schools, have acquired Canadian habits and imbibed Canadian ideals, and surely there is no disloyalty among them. If there is any disloyalty in that district it is among those who under this Act are entitled to vote. I do not know what will be said with regard to the rights of those people, but it seems to me that if a man who came from Germany or Austria is entitled to exercise the franchise, there is no good reason why his wife should not be also entitled. She is as much a British subject as he is; and his children, who were minors at the time he was naturalized, are British subjects just as much as he is. It seems to me very illogical if we disfranchise one part of the family without disfranchising the other, especially when we disfranchise those members of the family who are certainly much better Canadians than their parents who are enfranchised.

I would like to draw the attention of the Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie) to some other features of the Bill. By subsection (E) of section 79 the agent of a candidate must publish the list of all those who contribute anything towards the election expenses. That, I think, is a move in the right direction, and I would like to congratulate the Solicitor General on it. I am sorry, however, that he did not go a little further. It seems to me that while he was making that provision he should at the same time have provided that a list should also be published of those who contributed to the party funds at any stage of the game.

The leader of the Opposition made a remark which was apparently very well received on both sides of the House with regard to the necessity of so legislating that the people would have faith in this Parliament and in its doings. Faith is the most necessary thing in this life. You cannot succeed in any line of business without faith; you cannot carry on any commercial undertakings without faith. Indeed, without faith we can do nothing; without faith in each other we live but a life of misery. Accordingly, we must so act that the people shall have faith in us; otherwise we cannot make the progress that we should. We must not only be entitled to the confidence of the people; we must also have that confidence. Any one who has been around the country a little knows that campaign funds are regarded with a great deal of suspicion; in fact, there is nothing of which the people are so suspicious. I do not mean the funds that go to the agent of the candidate or to the candidate himself in order to bring about his election; I mean the campaign funds that are contributed to the party. The Solicitor General has asked for suggestions. I suggest that he go a little farther than he has gone in section 79 and compel the publication of campaign funds of every description, including funds paid to the party or contributed to any association or group of candidates. If he does that he will accomplish more in the way of inspiring public confidence in Parliament than he would be doing in carrying out the step proposed; though I do commend him for the step that he has taken; it is a step in the right direction.

I am sorry that the Solicitor General is not in his seat; I wanted to direct his attention to another point. In schedule A to section 32, rule (14) provides:

> The onus of substantiating sufficient prima facie ground to strike off any name shall be upon the applicant.

The word "applicant" in that schedule is used about a dozen times, but outside of that particular section, "applicant" refers always to the man who is applying to be put on the list. The reference here would certainly seem to be to the appellant rather than to the applicant. The appellant is nowhere referred to as an applicant. The appeal is never referred to as an application; it is referred to as an appeal. If this section is allowed to stand as it is, there will be some confusion; but it would be quite a simple manner to change the word "applicant" to "appellant".

I again emphasize the point which I have made in regard to the necessity for extending the provision set forth in section 79 for the submission of a statement respecting election expenses, so that it will require every party, every group of politicians, every one in connection with such party or group of politicians, to make public the sources of funds contributed for all purposes in connection with party work.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should be very glad that I caught your eye at this moment, if for no other reason that that it gives me an opportunity to pay on the floor of this House my tribute of admiration to my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), who made a speech which, by its moderation of tone, its dispassionateness of thinking, its accuracy of knowledge of the subject with which he was dealing, and its general spirit, was, if I say say so, the very essence of what should animate the minds of all Canadian citizens in this period of reconstruction.

Sir, I should be guilty of a grave dereliction of duty if I intervened at all in this debate and did not offer my very hearty congratulations to my old friend and political comrade in arms, the Solicitor General (Hon. Mr. Guthrie), for the splendid specimen of parliamentary exposition which he gave us to-day. I have long taken interest in his career, and it was really a pleasure to me as an old personal and political friend to listen to his magnificent speech this afternoon. My regret is all the greater that that speech introduced a Bill which on the whole is a good Bill, and which, I have no doubt, the authors had their own difficulties in making even as good as it is, but which nevertheless did not rise to the height of a great opportunity and did not manage to miss the pitfall which has given rise to this debate.

Mr. Speaker, when one section of the miners of Britain met the other day and, under the leadership of Mr. Robert Smillie, a working man, a miner, who has risen to the ranks of statemanship, or near-statesmanship, voted £10,000 for the relief of the suffering women and children of our recent enemies in Europe, everybody felt: That is magnanimous; that is big conduct; and the people who are capable of such conduct are the people to run this world, if that were possible. When Lord Robert Cecil wrote a letter the other day in the midst of the Paisley election recognizing the bigness of the occasion and wishing success to his life-long political opponent because of his eminence of intellect—a letter which had much to do with Mr. Asquith's success—all over the world big-minded men felt themselves compelled to say: That is great; that is magnanimous; that is the way to solve knotty and difficult questions. It is the only way to bind up the wounds of war; it is the only spirit in which to enter on this period of reconstruction. If that be true of the nations of Europe, it is ten times as true of Canada, where we have such a mixture of races and peoples and creeds, and where it is of vital importance that all our people should live together as far as possible in peace and friendship and mutual sympathy and good understanding. The Government had a splendid opportunity. If they had brought in a Bill framed on these lines, caring not whether it was admired by civilians or veterans or aliens, they would have themselves led the Parliament of Canada along large lines, along a broad way, and they would have given an example, the effect of which upon the whole nation it would have been hard to over-estimate.

I am hopeful that even yet they will reconsider the disfranchising portions of the Bill and cut them out altogether. The same Lord Cecil who wrote that letter in regard to Mr. Asquith's election gave a splendid piece of advice to the British people, which went all over the world, when he said the other day, "What we want to do in the period of reconstruction is to get rid of the war mind." Well, I am afraid, if I may say so in all charity, that that piece of advice has not penetrated very deeply into the mind of my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). I refrain from saying many things at this moment that one might very easily say if one were not trying to get rid of the war mind oneself. What was the use of my hon. friend, who I am sorry has left the Chamber, taunting my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) with having received certain votes in the last election? That does not get us any further forward, and more than that, such an attitude of mind could only come from having failed to appreciate the all-important fact that we are in peace times now, while we were in war two years ago. The duties of war are altogether different from the duties of peace. I myself, I think, would do things—certainly things would be justifiable in being done to keep the Germans out of Paris that would be wholly unjustifiable if done by any chance to keep one's political opponents out of this Chamber. The two objects are so very different. I deprecate on the part of any hon. member of this House any attempt to continue the spirit of war into the times of peace. That is my answer to my hon. friend on this particular head.

I deprecate equally any attempt to create strife between those who are called alien enemies and our soldiers in the recent war. Such an act is criminal to the best interests of this nation. Any man who has the real interest of Canada at heart must take the very opposite road, and try to get all the citizens of this country in the peroid of reconstruction to understand one another and to appreciate the good that is in one another. I know there are different classes of soldiers. There are some who are differently constituted from others; we all have varying temperaments. But I do know this, that very large sections of the returned men when they were in the trenches did not hesitate, when the Christmas bells were ringing and when hostilities had been suspended, to fraternize with the very men they were fighting against, because they knew they were fighting against institutions, against autocracies, and not against individuals. Well, if that was the attitude of our soldiers in war and on the battlefield, I am pretty sure I am on solid ground when I say that these men in many cases would be very leaders in magnanimous thought and action in regard o a subject such as we are debating to-night.

There is not much more that one can say upon this question. Let me put my position in a few words: We have as a nation the right of every other nation to keep out of our country any people who we do not think would make good citizens; it is within the right of any nation to regulate its own immigration. But when it comes to people already in the country and recognized as citizens to the extent of promoting the wealth and prosperity and development of the country, then it is a grave responsibility for a government to go the length of depriving them of their votes. As some one has said in the debate to-night, if a man is a traitor, he ought to be either in gaol, or deported, or hung; but if he is not a traitor, if he is a citizen working for the promotion of the general material prosperity of the country, he ought to be a citizen of the country. That is the only logical conclusion to which I can come.

I return to the point of reconstruction. Here is a group of men working in a mining camp or in a factory. They are taking a chew or a smoke off the same plug. If by any chance in these days a bottle of something stronger than water is hovering around they are taking a dram out of the same bottle. But an election comes along, and the Government goes into the midst of those men and picks out one or two of them, by the miserable provisions of this Franchise Act, and says, "You are all right to work with these men, you are all right to read with them, you are all right to chew with them, you are all right to drink with them, but you cannot vote with them." There is no logic in it. And what will be the effect upon the group wherever they are? Put a badge of inferiority upon certain members of a group of workmen in various portions of the country, and the inevitable result of that is not to reconstruct; it is to continue strife, dissension, and suspicion, which may very easily lead to blows and continue within our own borders on a smaller scale that war which we are all thanking God has now ceased outside our borders. At a difficult period of the war the Government in pursuance of what they believed to be their duty, held an emergency Cabinet council on a Sunday, and they took certain steps. That was to keep the Germans out of Paris. I supported the Government then. I wish it had been my good fortune to be able to support every line of their enfranchising Bill, but I cannot do it with the marks of smallness that I find in those portions of this Bill which have been criticised so logically and effectively in the speech of my hon. friend from Waterloo (Mr. Euler). It is a small role for a big nation. Let us be a magnanimous Canada. Let our Government rise to the occasion and hold an emergency Cabinet council now, and afterwards come down to this House and say that the larger logic and the better spirit has prevailed with them. We shall gladly follow them, and they will gain, and not lose, in the country. But what is far better than that, because after all gaining and losing in an election is a trifle compared to the larger issues at stake, they will help to heal the wounds of war; they will be pouring oil into the sore places of mankind. They will be setting a splendid example to the world in a big way of dealing with the problems of reconstruction.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE (East Edmonton): As I listened this afternoon to the speech delivered by the Acting Solicitor General I was expecting to hear a statement in regard to the motive and reason underlying Clause 29, and I had hoped that by this time some one would have risen on the Government side to give some information that would justify that clause as it stands. That the speech of the Acting Solicitor General was magnificent in its ensemble no one can deny, but that the whole Act was built on the principle of fairness and simplicity is a statement that I challenge both on the ground of the facts contained in the Act and the other documents to which the Act refers. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, no one in this House will attack my conduct as being inconsistent, because when I was a candidate for the Conservative party and was consulted as to whether disfranchisement should take place under the War-time Elections Act I protested. I believe, however, that in the result the then Government was justified in taking rigorous measures to prevent disastrous consequences; but that a condition of that sort should be perpetuated when we in Parliament are bragging about the virtues of the League of Nations and are singing of "Peace on earth," and being made to swallow holus-bolus treaties of peace without a quorum in the House, I say that we ought to be exceedingly careful what we do if we wish to make the people of Canada believe that we are sincere and honest in our speech and in our actions. I believe that there is a good deal of misapprehension in regard to the Bill which is before us. As regards the Naturalization Act and the clause calling for ten years' residence after the termination of the war I had occasion to protest against that measure at the last session of Parliament when I said that it was shameful that we should have to enact such legislation, and the reply was that it was a universal act not applicable to Canada alone. I therefore accepted this explanation without further remarks. Now, however, I trust the Government will deem it its duty to have this measure changed to such an extent that men shall not be obliged to remain in Canada fourteen, thirteen, twelve and eleven years before they can be naturalized.

The statement has been made that in the past naturalization has been given too freely to some citizens of Canada through the mistakes of previous governments. This statement I do not challenge, but because mistakes have been made in the past by previous governments is no reason why this Government should go to the opposite extreme. I am going to endeavour to seek a motive in Clause 29, and I shall ascribe to that clause the best possible motive that can be conceived. If there is a reason at all in Clause 29 for disfranchising a British subject that reason lies in a naturalization act itself which requires, among other things, that the applicant for naturalization shall be of good character and shall possess an adequate knowledge of either English or French. Now, Sir, I can understand that it may be the desire of the Government to raise the standard of citizenship, and, owing to the operation of the law which made it possible for a woman to become a British subject by marriage or a son to become a British subject without naturalization, to see that such persons should possess the necessary qualifications, namely, good character and ability in English or French. That can be the only motive behind this clause, unless there be the unworthy motive that we are seeking to elect ourselves once more by disfranchising as many people as possible. If that is the case, I would go a step further and say that we should disfranchise every one who voted against the Union Government and so make a sure thing of it. I believe, however, Mr. Speaker, that the real motive underlying Clause 29 is in fact to ascertain whether the man or woman affected has all the qualifications required under the Naturalization Act. But if this interpretation be correct, then it will be necessary to amend Clause 29 so as to make this motive apparent at least. Now, let us see what this clause says.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. member will not go too far in discussing the details of the measure which, of course, can be discussed only in committee.

Mr. MACKIE: I have not yet entered into any details, Mr. Speaker, and I trust I may be permitted at least to broach the general principle of the Bill, which is the question of enfranchising or disfranchising. Clause 29 does disfranchise, and I wish to call attention to this particular portion of the Act which reads, inter alia as follows:

—provided, however, that this subsection shall not apply to any person born on the continent of North America nor to any person who in person applies to and obtains from any judge having jurisdiction in naturalization proceedings a certificate under the hand of such judge and the seal, if any, of his court, to the effect following:

The certificate is as follows:

This is to certify that from evidence submitted before me, I am satisfied that A.B. of.. .. .. in the province of .. .. (occupation) .. ..is a person naturalized as a British subject by operation of law, who, but for such naturalization is qualified and would be entitled at the date of the issue of this certificate to be personally naturalized in Canada.

Now it says that if you have disfranchised a man or woman there must be a personal application for naturalization. Is Clause 29 the only procedure enacted? Can a person simply step into a court and say: I wish to be naturalized, having been disfranchised as the wife of so-and-so or the son of so-and-so? Is there any particular procedure provided as to how a person may place his or her claim before the court?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is certainly discussing the details of the Bill which can only properly be discussed in committee. He is not discussing the principle of the Bill, to which I shall have to ask him to confine his remarks.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I hope that I am not singled out in any way because the debate has been carried on on clause 29.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order; if the hon. gentleman feels aggrieved at the decision of the Chair he has his remedy. The last remark which he has made is entirely uncalled for.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling and I will endeavour to generalize more than I have, but I desire to call to your attention once more the fact that clause 29 has been discussed on the other side and on this side as well as the clause of the Naturalization Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no objection to making reference to a clause but there is an objection to discussing in detail the clauses of the Bill.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I will simply discuss the effects of the Bill and the effects are just as they have been enumerated by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) and other members of the House. As it is drafted now, a man must take his application before the court and refer it under the Naturalization Act before he can get his naturalization, and it will be a long time before he can get his naturalization papers. It is unfair, therefore, I say, that you should disfranchise a whole population in Western Canada because it is the desire of this House to see that they have the necessary qualification under the Naturalization Act. If there be machinery in the court, whereby these men and women, being disfranchised, could immediately apply to the court and receive redress without going back to the Secretary of State, who is master in this matter, it might be all right to see that these men and women possessed all the qualifications required under the Naturalization Act, but as the Act is drafted it is impossible for them to do so. They are completely disfranchised and will have to abide by the consequences of the law as it is drafted.

What about, for instance in my own district, the thousand or more Galicians who went into the 218th battalion and fought overseas? What about those men who have come back? Some of them may have voted in the past and they will not be able to vote now. What about the mothers of those sons who went overseas and performed their duty voluntarily because the Conscription Act made it impossible for any of these people to go overseas afterwards. They volunteered like other people in Canada to go and they were placed in the 218th battalion. Is it just that the man who fought overseas, and naturalized by the father, should be prevented from voting and should be forced to adopt the method of being naturalized as of the first instance? Is it right that this man's mother shall be compelled to go before a judge and prove that she has a sufficient knowledge of the English or French language? The War-time Elections Act disfranchised a number of people for a certain period of years but there is no restriction in this Act; it covers any period and may extend back for forty or fifty years.

We must not forget that at the beginning of this war those Ukrainians who lived in Little Russia sacrificed a million or more men on the battlefield in the cause of the Allies. The Ukrainians in Western Canada are brothers and cousins. Shall they be treated as enemies? We must not forget that in the province of Alberta those men whom we call aliens contributed to war funds and bought Victory bonds to a degree that was satisfactory to people in charge. We must not forget that when the Winnipeg strike and other disturbances all over Canada took place, not one of these people was singled out as being amongst the men and women who took part in those disturbances. These are facts, but in spite of these facts we find here a law that will put a stain upon the Dominion of Canada if it goes through in the way in which it is constructed. I hope this Government will see the wisdom of amending the Bill in such a way that they can boast that it is fair and just to all who are entitled to take part in Dominion elections.

On motion of Mr. Fielding the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Sir GEORGE FOSTER, the House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Friday, March 26, 1920.

The House met at Three o'clock.

ACT RESPECTING COPYRIGHT.

Rt. Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 37 respecting copyright.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This Bill is intended to bring the Copyright Law of Canada into conformity with the Berne Convention. It establishes a uniform period of copyright protection, and also extends copyright protection to records, perforated rolls, cinematograph films, and so forth, and is intended to secure Canadian authors full copyright protection from all parts of His Majesty's Dominions as well as in Canada.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE CLASSIFICATION.

On motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Minister of the Interior) the House returned to the order of motions.

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Honourable the Secretary of State (Hon. Mr. Sifton) I desire to lay on the Table a return to an order of the House dated March 18, 1920, calling for copy of representations, complaints, and correspondence, with reference to the classification of the Civil Service.

SOLDIERS' CIVIL RE-ESTABLISHMENT —PENSIONS COMMITTEE.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council): With the consent of the House I move that the following members be added to the Committee on Pensions: Messrs. Calder, Chisholm, Cooper, Copp, Edwards, McGregor, McLean (Royal), Morphy, Ross, Tweedie, White; and that the committee be authorized to continue the inquiries instituted by the committee on civil re-establishment last session into such matters as may call for further investigation, and to report its recommendations to the House.

The work of the Pensions Committee this year, as I pointed out in moving for the committee, will not be nearly so onerous as that of last year, nor would a committee on re-establishment have the onerous work that the committee had last year, in view of the extent and character of the investigation carried on by that committee. Furthermore, a number of the members of the House were on both committees, and it is thought that it would not meet with the convenience of the members to have two committees at work which might well be centred in one committee. I am therefore moving to add to the Pensions Committee the names of all the members of the Re-establishment Committee who are not already on the Pensions Committee, and to give the Pensions Committee the power to continue any investigations that may be found necessary.

Motion agreed to.

[Sir George Foster.]

EASTER ADJOURNMENT.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister) moved:

That this House adjourn on Thursday, the first April next, at 6 p.m., and that when the House so adjourns it stand adjourned until Tuesday, the sixth April next.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, may I request the right hon. the leader of the House to amend his motion so that the adjournment may commence on Wednesday evening. Thursday is a holiday of great importance to us who belong to the religious minority in this House, and I really think that it would be only proper, in view of that fact, that the adjournment should start from Wednesday night.

Mr. BUREAU: There is no sitting on Wednesday night either.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not desire to encroach on the sacred holiday privileges of my hon. friends. At the same time, however, the object was to devote as much time as we possibly could to the business of the House. It is not at all difficult for those hon. members who reside in proximity to the seat of Government to take holidays, because they can go home or go to their friends and enjoy themselves. But those who come from a distance and have to remain here have that much longer time on their hands, and unless my hon. friend strongly presses his suggestion I think it would be the opinion of the House that we should pursue our business, as moderately as possible, of course, and with as good demeanour as should befit the day. Thereby we should save that much time.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I may say that I have been a member of this House for over sixteen years, and it has always been the custom to have the Easter adjournment from Wednesday night. I really do not see why there should be a change this year.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I had not paid any particular attention to the matter, but as my hon. friend assures me that the custom is as he states, perhaps it would be rather out of place to break it on this occasion. Under the circumstances I have no objection to amending the motion in accordance with the suggestion of the hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion as amended now reads:

That this House adjourn on Wednesday, the thirty-first day of March, at 6 p.m., and that when the House so adjourns it stands adjourned until Tuesday. the sixth day of April next.

Motion as amended agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS OFFICIALS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): Before the Orders of the Day are called, may I say that some days ago I asked for the plan of organization respecting the staff of this House, and your honour, in answer, very kindly consented to lay it upon the Table to-day. May I ask you, instead of laying it on the Table to-day, to defer it until Monday or Tuesday in order that I may have an opportunity of further consideration with the hon. members of the House as to the real needs and necessities of the occasion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The suggestion of the hon. member is entirely agreeable.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS—INCOMPLETE ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GEORGE PARENT (Quebec West): I would like to draw the attention of the right hon. the acting leader of the Government (Sir George Foster) to a question I asked a week ago and which was asked to stand as a return. I understand it is the privilege of the Government to deal with such questions as they like, especially when the answers call for a large amount of work. It is quite obvious that the particular question I refer to does not involve any great amount of work in the preparation of the information, and I would like to know when I may expect an answer to the question.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: What was the subject matter?

Mr. PARENT: The question was as follows:

1. What was the total amount of the gross consolidated debt of Canada on the 28th of February, 1920?
2. What was the total amount of the net consolidated debt of Canada on the same date?
3. What was the total amount of the assets of the consolidated debt of Canada on the said date?
4. What was the total amount of the yearly interest payable on the gross consolidated debt of Canada on the said date?
5. What was the total amount of yearly interest or revenue received or collected by Canada in respect to the property or securities constituting the assets of the public debt?
6. What was the total amount of the floating debt of Canada on the 28th of February, 1920?
7. What was the total amount of yearly interest payable on the floating debt of Canada on the said date?

And so on. The Department of Finance is surely in a position to answer every one of these questions right off.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know that the delay will be very long before the return is made. There are a great many questions being put and a great many returns have to be made. I do not know whether this is out of its turn, but it will not be very long delayed.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. W. CALDWELL (Carleton, N.B.): I would call to the attention of the Government the answer given to a question on the Order Paper in regard to the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. There were six questions—1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6. Questions 5 and 6 have been answered, but the answers to questions from 1 to 4 were omitted. I would also desire to point out that the answers to numbers 5 and 6 are not in accordance with the questions. I asked in question 5:

Has any member of the present Government ever held any of the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, either personally or by proxy through any other person?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member should put that question either on a motion for the House to go into Committee of Supply or when the House is in Committee of Supply. When, on the Orders of the Day, questions are answered, a member must accept without discussion the answer of the Government as it stands.

Mr. CALDWELL: There are four questions not answered.

Mr. SPEAKER: They may have stood as an order for a return. Does the hon. member mean that they do not appear in the list of questions as having been answered?

Mr. CALDWELL: The questions appear but the answers do not. The answers to questions 5 and 6 are in Hansard, and I want to call your attention to the fact that the answers given are not in accordance with the questions.

Mr. SPEAKER: That point is one which the hon. member would have to take up with the Government on a motion to go into Supply, or when the House is in Supply, or at some other stage. On the Orders of the Day he must accept such answers as the Government give, but he has his remedy on the two occasions to which I have particularly referred.

Mr. CALDWELL: I would like an explanation as to why there is no answer to the first four questions.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If Mr. Speaker will allow me I will tell my hon. friend why. The first four question were allowed to stand as an order for a return and the return is to be brought down for my hon. friend. The other two questions were answered offhand and therefore it was not necessary to reserve them for any further examination. The answers will come all right.

Mr. CALDWELL: Thank you.

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): I desire to draw the attention of the Government to a despatch in the Montreal Daily Star of Thursday, March 25, entitled "Big Changes at Quebec Harbour." It is as follows:

> The amalgamation of both the local agency of the Marine and Fisheries of Canada and the Quebec Harbour Commission is reported today in semi-official circles.

I do not wish to read the whole article.

> The head of the two combined bodies would be Sir David Watson, it is rumoured. The ultimate end to be attained by this reorganization would be a curtailment of expenses in the administration of these two branches of the public service.

I wish to be informed by the Government whether or not there is any truth in this rumour.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will ask my hon. friend to repeat the question when the Minister of Marine is in the House.

SUPPLY—INTERIM VOTE.

On motion of Sir Henry Drayton the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON moved:

> Resolved, That a sum not exceeding $62,900,986.09, being one-sixth of the amount of each item set forth in the Main Estimates for the year ending March 31, 1921, laid on the table of the House on the 22nd instant, be granted to His Majesty for the year ending March 31, 1921.

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask if it is one-sixth of the whole Estimates?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is understood that we are consenting to one-sixth of the total appropriation but we reserve our right to criticise every individual item.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Absolutely so.

Mr. BUREAU: But we cannot move to throw out any item if we vote one-sixth of it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: We have already voted one-sixth of it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am told that this is the ordinary way of arriving at it.

Mr. BUREAU: During the war.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The whole object is to get something with which to carry on the public service. The hon. member is not committing himself upon any item that he may wish to discuss.

Mr. FIELDING: While the practice is to take one-sixth of the whole I would suggest that the power should only be used in urgent cases, such as to pay the Civil Service and such like matters. Of course, in regard to debatable items, we cannot withdraw the vote for the one sixth, but I do not anticipate any trouble. The power is generally used to pay for urgent matters such as the Civil Service and I take it that the Government will apply it in that spirit and not apply it to other items which can just as well wait.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Does this include one-sixth of the $20,000,000 that we were asked to vote for government ships two or three days ago?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It includes one-sixth of everything but the effect is that the hon. member or any other hon. member will not be bound in any way with regard to any particular vote.

Mr. BUREAU: We are bound by the fact that we have voted one-sixth.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, but the vote is not a vote of endorsation in so far as any particular item is concerned. As I understand it it is the ordinary vote which enables public business to be carried on.

Mr. CANNON: I have great confidence in the minister's explanation but on the other hand I very often clash with the chairman of the committee and I would like to have his interpretation of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN: The resolution which is now before the House provides for a vote of one-sixth of the entire Estimates which were laid on the Table on the 22nd of March. There is absolutely no doubt that this vote gives the Government the power to expend one-sixth of every item in the Estimates if it desires to exercise that right. This is the customary blanket vote, but every item in the Estimates must once more come before this Committee in order that the other five-sixths be approved. Rule 17c remains in force the same as though this resolution were not adopted, and hon. members will have the absolute right to fully discuss any item when it comes before this Committee as a separate resolution.

Mr. CANNON: Suppose an hon. member, when the House is in Committee later on in the session, should move that an item be struck out altogether?

The CHAIRMAN: Any hon. member could move, during the balance of the session, that an item be reduced, or the Committee can vote for the rejection of any item. If the item is rejected, the Government would be precluded from expending the other five-sixths of that item. If the one-sixth which is voted to-day has not been expended, there are very few cases where the Government would find it advantageous to do so without being authorized to use the balance of the amount. Technically, it would have that power.

Mr. BUREAU: Heretofore it has always been customary to grant one-sixth of the amount required for the salaries of the civil servants and other public employees who are dependent upon those salaries for the maintenance of themselves and families, but how can we vote one-sixth of the sums necessary for the payment of contracts that we know nothing about? If we make the vote we are committed to the principle and we cannot escape from it. If we admit the principle that the Government has the right to spend one-sixth of the sum of $1,000,000 involved in the contract, it would be ridiculous for us to intervene later and say that the remaining five-sixths should not be spent. I cannot then move to strike the item out because I have already acquiesced in the principle of the vote.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend is, I think, unduly exercised over this matter.

Mr. BUREAU: I am not exercised at all.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It has been the practice ever since I have been in Parliament that when the end of the fiscal year draws near the Government shall secure the sums of money necessary in order to carry on the business of the country. The votes for this purpose have always been granted, and cheerfully granted. I am not sure that my hon. friend himself has not passed through two or three crises like the present in past years.

Mr. BUREAU: Yes, fortunately I did pass through them.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It has always been considered proper to grant the votes and no opposition has been made to that course.

Mr. BUREAU: It is a wrong principle to ask us to vote fifty or one hundred million dollars out of perhaps a total of $300,000,000, when there is absolutely no explanation of the proposed expenditure. That is what I object to. A vote for the salaries of civil servants is something we are familiar with, something that we know is necessary. But when you ask us to vote en bloc large amounts for other things that we know absolutely nothing about, and have had no opportunity to look into, that is an entirely different matter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to assure the hon. gentleman that the motion which has been moved is the customary motion, and it was furnished to me by officers of the House. So far as I have been able to learn, the course which is now proposed, is the one which has always been followed. We must remember that salaries and other commitments have to be provided for, business must be carried on, obligations must be fulfilled, and interest must be met. However, I would meet the views of my hon. friend absolutely to the fullest extent that we can. For example, I do not think that the present vote of one-sixth would be any authority to the Government to undertake new obligations in the meantime. That, I think, is the only point about which my hon. friend is very much concerned.

Mr. BUREAU: I am not so much concerned except that I think that the principle which is proposed here is wrong, and I desire to protest against it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have looked up Hansard to ascertain the form in which previous requests have been made and the nature of the replies by the Opposition to those requests. I observe that in each case the Opposition has taken care to state that while granting one-sixth of the total appropriation it was to be distinctly understood they were not thereby sanctioning any individual item, but reserved the right to pass upon every item appearing in the Estimates. It is in that spirit that we are prepared to meet the Government at the present time. That is, the understanding shall be that while voting one-sixth of the total appropriation necessary to enable the business of the country to be carried on until such time as the Estimates may be passed, we are in no wise prejudicing the right of any hon. member to discuss any individual item on its merits.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My understanding agrees absolutely with that of my hon. friend.

Mr. FIELDING: If it is desired to get at the root of the trouble the Government must be reminded that they should not have allowed so much time to elapse before seeking Supply. This House should have been called at a much earlier period. In the olden times when the fiscal year terminated on the 30th of June Parliament met in January or February. However it was thought that that time was too late and for business convenience it was deemed desirable that the session should begin earlier and end earlier. Accordingly the fiscal year was changed so as to terminate on March 31. Parliament was then summoned to meet in November or December and in the intervening time from the 31st of March, it was considered that ample opportunity was afforded to prepare the necessary public documents for the proper despatch of business. The present Government, however, for reasons of their own, have allowed months to pass without taking action. Now they find themselves at the end of the fiscal year with no money voted. The explanation of this trouble is that they should have called Parliament several months ago.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That should have been done on numerous other occasions by my hon. friends on the other side.

Mr. FIELDING: Quite possibly, but let us take each case in its turn. I would like to know what reason the Government can give, in view of the fact that we changed the fiscal year in order to have an early meeting of Parliament, why Parliament was not summoned before the 26th of February.

Mr. McKENZIE: I invite the attention of the Government to the point as to how an item that has once been dealt with should be considered when it comes up a second time. Are we not debarred from taking action in the future with respect to an item which has been already considered? It should be distinctly understood that although we are passing one-sixth of every item in the Estimates on the present occasion we shall not be precluded from discussing such items when they again come before the House for consideration.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I entirely agree with my hon. friend.

Resolution reported, read a first and second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE INTERIM SUPPLY BILL.

On motion of Sir Henry Drayton the House went into Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON moved:

Resolved, That towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the Public Service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1921, the sum of $62,900,986.09 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 36 for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1921.

Motion agreed to, Bill read a first and second time considered in committee and reported without amendment.

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Speaker, I wish to remark that this Bill is not yet distributed. I do not desire to raise objection now, but if such proceedings are repeated I would ask the Government to see in future that the Bill is distributed beforehand.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Bill read the third time and passed.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT.

DEBATE RESUMED ON SECOND READING OF BILL NO. 12.

Resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Acting Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie) for the second reading of Bill No. 12, respecting the election of members of the House of Commons and the Electoral Franchise.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, the only purpose I have in intervening in the debate is to refer to a phase of it that developed yesterday afternoon and evening with regard to a certain section of the Bill. It is a phase that ordinarily might well be left to discussion in committee, as it really concerns a particular item of the measure. The only reason that I desire to speak upon it now is that the Acting Solicitor General, who has charge of the measure in the House, has already spoken and, consequently, cannot address the House a second time.

Certain hon. members on both sides of the House called attention yesterday to what appears to be the effect of a reading together of the Naturalization Act as passed a year ago and section 29 of this Bill. The Naturalization Act passed in the first session of 1919 was an Act to determine Canadian naturalization in such a manner that a person naturalized in Canada would thereby become naturalized for all purposes of the British Empire, that wherever he might be he would be deemed a British subject. The Act as then passed was drawn and enacted in conformity with British legislation, part 2 of which was submitted to and adopted, I believe, by all of the Dominions of the Empire, thereby having the effect of establishing what might be termed Empire Naturalization.

By the terms of section 8 of that Act it was provided that no subject of a then enemy state could obtain naturalization in Canada until a period of ten years had elapsed after the expiration of the war. There were three exceptions to that general provision. The disabling clause contained in sub-subsection (b) of subsection 4 of that section was made not to apply to: First, those who though born in an enemy country were of a race or community known to be opposed to the enemy governments; secondly, those who had taken part in the war on behalf of the Allies; and, thirdly, those who, though enemy subjects, were British born, having thereafter become naturalized in enemy states. Those were the three exceptions to the general rule as embodied in the British legislation and as virtually transcribed into our legislation.

It will become manifest at once that the purpose of the legislation of 1919 was to impede, for a period of ten years, the admission into citizenship in the British Empire of those who were enemy subjects. Consequently nothing can be more apparent than that there was no thought that those who were British subjects at that time should be affected in any way whatsoever by section 8 of the Naturalization Act. Its purpose was only to delay, to impede for a fixed period, the admission to the privileges of British citizenship of those who theretofore had been subjects of enemy states.

Section 29 of our own Act provides that those who have become British subjects not by birth but by naturalization,—naturalization not based on the personal merit or qualification of the subject, but resulting from the operation of law alone—those subjects, though naturalized by the operation of law, must show the same qualification that British subjects should have before being admitted to the franchise. The intent of the section was that such examination, such investigation into the qualifications of those who would seek to vote by reason of naturalization by construction of law, should take place as would determine that they were qualified just in the same way as those who secured naturalization by personal application for same. The form of the certificate appended to section 29 is such that no one would be entitled to that certificate who, though not a British subject, could nevertheless become a British subject at that time. Well, it requires only a little reflection to see that the result is this: That the subject of an enemy state who became a British subject by construction or by operation of law would, if he or she had not so become a British subject, still be a subject of an enemy state. In this case the provisions of the Naturalization Act would at once take effect, and a judge hearing the application of such person for naturalization would be compelled to say: Yes, you are a British subject, but if you never had become such by construction of law I could not now make you such because you would be a subject of an enemy state and consequently disabled under the provisions of the 1919 Naturalization Act. This is the way section 29 comes to read the way it does. It is, I believe, word for word the same section as appears in the Act of 1918 which first of all gave the franchise to women and then determine what should be the extent of woman's voting privilege as a result of that franchise. The 1918 Act effected the purpose that it was intended to effect, because there was at that time no Naturalization Act to read with it. Subsequently the 1919 Naturalization Act was passed, and in the By-election Act of last year, just as in the Act of 1918, a similar clause to clause 29 of this Bill appeared. That was carried forward into the legislation that is now presented to the House, and from the discussion of yesterday it appeared that reading the Naturalization Act with this section, a consequence not intended by the Government resulted. That that consequence does result there can be, in my judgment, no doubt; indeed, the Acting Solicitor General (Hon. Mr. Guthrie) in answer to an inquiry last night, clearly indicated that it did result. Now, I firmly adhere to the principle that no one in this country naturalized merely by operation of law should acquire rights to the franchise until he or she shows that in point of actual qualification he or she lives up to the general provisions of the legislation applicable to all naturalized subjects; lives up to all the qualifications that others applying for naturalization must have. No reason in the world could be advanced why, for example, a married woman who becomes a British subject, perhaps two or three days or weeks after she comes to Canada from an enemy country, by the mere act of marriage with a former alien enemy who had previously been naturalized, should be entitled to the franchise, whereas a man coming from an enemy country must, before he may be naturalized, show that he has an adequate knowledge of French and of English; that he possesses a character such as we desire in citizens of this country and the other qualifications called for in general by the provisions of the Naturalization Act. Those requirements that are demanded from all who come from all countries and ask for citizenship here should be found to exist in all persons who desire the franchise in Canada before that franchise should be granted. But I do not think, and I am sure that on reflection hon. gentlemen will see that it could not be logically argued, that any special disability should be put upon a person which was intended to apply to non-British subjects but which, taking into account the Naturalization Act and reading in connection with it the Act of this year, has the effect of applying to British subjects to whom it was never intended to apply at all. If that were to result, an alien enemy or one who formerly had been an alien enemy, who came to Canada in 1910 or 1911, took a homestead, and, to fulfil the requirements of the homestead law, took out naturalization in 1913 and became a British subject,—that alien enemy, according to the Act now presented, is entitled to the right to vote. Such a man under the provisions of the previous law which operated only for the duration of the war would not have had the right to vote, whereas a person who came to this country say forty years ago, and shortly after coming, say at the age of eighteen, became a naturalized British subject by reason of the naturalization of his father and had remained a British subject and had voted as such throughout all the elections since and even in the election of 1918—that person would find himself disentitled to the franchise. Well, there could be no justification, it clearly appears to me, for disfranchising that person and enfranchising the other. A much stronger argument could have been made for the retention of the disability on the recent arrival than could possibly be applied to a person who had been a British subject and a resident of Canada for perhaps forty years. That was not the intention of section 29, and the Government will propose in committee an amendment to the effect that no disability read out of paragraph (B) of subclause 4 of section 8 of the Naturalization Act should disentitle a person on that ground alone to the certificate required under section 29 of the present legislation. I feel that I have made clear our position as it is assumed by the Government. Of course, hon. members understand, without any explanation from me, that this Bill, in all its provisions and with all its principles, because as regards principles there are a dozen or twenty-four principles in legislation of this kind, is merely a declaration first of all that provision should be made for a general manhood suffrage and then that provision should be made for machinery for taking the vote in Canada for purposes of the election of members to this House. Hon. gentlemen will agree, without any explanation from me, that this Bill, presented in this way to the House of Commons, comes before the House open to amendment, discussion and suggestion. In respect of section 29 as I now explain it to the House, and in respect of every other section, as regards every feature whether embodied in the Bill or believed ought to embodied in the Bill, the Bill comes before the House, for suggestions as to amendment and for improvement if, in the wisdom of the House, improvement can be made. I simply present this feature of the legislation as it was intended to be constructed, with the effect it was intended to have, and in that way the Bill will be laid before the House in committee for full discussion and debate.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Has the amendment been prepared?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. McKENZIE: Before the minister sits down, I should be obliged if he would give some explanation of what is meant in the certificate attached to section 29. I have not been able to satisfy myself as to really what it means.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not in charge of the legislation and I have already spoken. I do not know that I can add anything to the very clear words of the certificate. The certificate says, in effect, that no one, as I express it, constructively naturalized, shall vote unless he or she gets a certificate from a judge to the effect that, on his or her own merits as a citizen, he or she would be entitled to naturalization aside from the fact that he or she had become naturalized by operation of law.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Of course, the certificate will have to be changed in order to make it agree with the amendment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Either that, or something would be required to be added to the effect that the certificate could not be denied, only because of the provision of sub-clause (b) to which I referred.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the hon member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) speaks, I must mention that he would be precluded from speaking inasmuch as he moved the adjournment of the debate and did not proceed with his speech, but he did not proceed out of courtesy to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen). I merely mention this so that the occurrence may not be taken as a precedent.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to pursue the discussion along the lines of the debate of last evening, nor to make any review whatever of the remarks made by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) to-day. The discussion of last evening dealt with very interesting aspects of the question. The discussion respecting a clause disfranchising certain persons, not aliens, but British subjects, and the kindred legislation concerning the naturalization law, was certainly deeply interesting, much more interesting, I am sure, than anything I can hope to present to-day. In several of the speeches, and notably in the most impressive and very calm and effective speech of the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Euler), we had presented what I may call the anomalies, injustices, and even absurdities which would arise under the operation of this franchise measure if it were to remain in the condition in which it now stands. I hope that the suggestion made to-day by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) will remove some of those difficulties, and that when we have the Bill in its final shape, there will not be so much room for the criticism which was so effectively offered by the hon. member for Waterloo North. It is, however, not with these subjects, but rather with the more prosaic and matter of fact features of the Bill in one or two particulars that I desire to deal. There are many aspects of this measure which can most conveniently be discussed in committee, but there are some leading features which we may well discuss, as we have been discussing them, at this stage, the second reading of the Bill.

I accept, in unreserved manner, the assurance of the Acting Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie) that the desire of the Government is to make this a fair and sound Bill which can be accepted by all parties. Believing that he has that object in view, and having in mind his invitation that suggestions are desired from all classes, I want to call the attention of the minister and the Government to one or two features of the Bill which I think are capable of amendment in order that the purposes which the Government say they have in view may be carried out.

In the operation of our electoral machinery, there are two stages at which there arise very strong temptations for the Government of the day to exercise an undue influence. The first of these is with regard to the preparation of the electoral lists. The second of the occasions when they have a strong temptation to act otherwise than fairly is with regard to the appointment of returning officers. If the Government may obtain, wholly or partly, control over the prepartion of the electoral lists, and if after that preliminary step in connection with the electoral machinery has been taken, they can proceed to go out into the highways and byways and select any partisans they please to fill the places of returning officers, then we shall not have a fair Franchise Act; we shall have a measure designed to bring about the purposes of the Government and not to guard, as they should do, the franchise as a sacred trust. In both these respects, the Government are taking to themselves unnecessary, dangerous power, power that they should not seek, power which the House ought not to grant. I shall not occupy the attention of the House more than a few minutes; but first, let us give a thought to the question of the returning officers. After the Acting Solicitor General had discussed the question for some time, some hon. member, it appears, had suggested that the judges might appoint returning officers. The Acting Solicitor General at once took exception to that, and I heartily agree with him on that point. I do not think judges should be called upon to appoint returning officers. We are all interested in keeping our judges out of politics, and I agree with the Acting Solicitor General that if we were to give judges power to appoint returning officers, that would be getting them dangerously near the political field. But it does not follow that because it is not wise to have judges make the appointments, we should give an unreserved hand to the Government to make the appointments themselves. It is true they have that power now; and that it has been exercised improperly is easily capable of proof. Every hon. member probably has within his own experience some knowledge of appointments made of returning officers which were not made for the highest purposes of a Franchise Act. But should the Government have an unlimited power? In my province of Nova Scotia, the Government exercises the power to appoint returning officers. The Acting Solicitor General says that this is a power which the Government should not abdicate, and I agree with him on that; the Government should take the power. But in Nova Scotia, when the Government appoint returning officers, they are not free to appoint whom they please; they must appoint the sheriffs of the province, who are judicial officers, so that there the Government, while they exercise the power of appointing returning officers, are not free to go out and appoint partisans for that important function, but they must take important public judicial officers for that duty.

4 p.m.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Who appoints the officers?

Mr. FIELDING: The Government of Nova Scotia.

Mr. BEST: How much better would that be?

Mr. FIELDING: I expected that my hon. friend or somebody else would raise that question. But if the appointment of a sheriff by a Government makes him the partisan of that Government, does the appointment of a judge by the Dominion Government make him a partisan of that Government? What is the difference between an officer appointed by the Dominion Government to perform a judicial duty and an officer appointed by a provincial government to perform what is also a judicial duty? If we regard it as a crime for the Government of a province to appoint a sheriff to perform such a duty, what shall we say of the Dominion Government which calls upon the judges of the country whom they appoint to discharge judicial functions in connection with the administration of this law? Partisans they are and naturally always will be. I am not finding fault with the appointment of judges; I am not making complaint. But when exception is taken to a sheriff because he is an appointee of a provincial government, I say that with equal force one could take exception to deputing to one of the judges the duties in connection with this Bill, because the judge is appointed by the Dominion Government.

Let us consider the province of Quebec, from which there are some things that we can very well learn. The Government of the province of Quebec undertake the function of appointing returning officers, but they do not claim for themselves an unlimited right to choose. They cannot go out on the highways and byways and pick up the first man who will serve their purpose. They have the right to appoint the returning officer, but they must appoint him from the prescribed list of permanent public officials. If I am correct in the opinion, I think these officers are the sheriff, the prothonotary, and the registrar. At all events, there are three permanent stated officers and the Government must appoint one or other of them. Why cannot we have a similar provision in this Bill? If objection be taken that these three officers are provincial officers, then, as I have already said, the fact that they are provincial officers is no more a disqualification than the appointment by the Dominion Government is a disqualification in respect of a judge. In both cases you have men discharging, with a sense of responsibility, a judicial function, or what is to some extent a judicial function. But if there is anything in the point that because officers are appointed by the provincial government they are disqualified, then let us enlarge the list and say that the Dominion Government shall select as returning officer a person from a class on a prescribed list; and if the three officials named in the province of Quebec, or the sheriff named in Nova Scotia, are not enough, then put on the list, if you like, one or two responsible officers appointed by the Dominion. My point is this: I do not think that the Government should have the power, as they now have, to go out on the street and select any partisan and appoint him as a returning officer. I want them to exercise their power, but I desire to see them exercise it with the limitation that they shall appoint to this high and important office some man who has already a fixed status in the country, a man who holds a responsible office, either local or Dominion, and who can therefore be held accountable for his acts. I submit in all sincerity to the Government of the day that in seeking the continuation of the present system, whereby they can take any partisan they choose and appoint him to the position of returning officer, they are exercising a dangerous power; and if the Government desire to make this Bill as fair and equitable as it is their avowed intention to make it—I am accepting their assurance in that regard—I ask them very earnestly to give careful consideration to what I have said touching the selection of returning officers.

Let us turn to the question of provincial lists. My hon. friend the Acting Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie) argued at considerable length to prove that this Parliament has the power to enact a Dominion Franchise law. Well, Mr. Speaker, I really do not know why the hon. gentleman devoted so much time to that point. I do not think that any one ever disputed the power of Parliament to pass a Dominion Franchise Law. I am quite sure that Edward Blake and the other great men to whom reference was made never for one moment set up the contention that the passing of a Dominion Franchise Act was beyond the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. It was not a question of constitutional power or of constitutional jurisdiction; it was a question of public convenience and public advantage; it was a question of public economy. I think it is a great pity we could not have in every province provincial lists adopted for Dominion purposes. I can see great advantages in that if it were possible. The preparation of these lists is a matter of great trouble and expense, sometimes of worry and annoyance, to men interested in politics. It is a pity we have to have trouble of that kind in the preparation of one list, and it is doubly a pity that we should have to go to the same trouble and expense a second time for a Dominion list. I repeat that the question is one of public convenience and not of constitutional power. I have had such strong views on that question that a great many years ago, in the early days of my political experience in Nova Scotia—more years ago than I care to confess—I remember sending a telegram to Sir John Macdonald offering the suggestion—for the franchise question was then up at Ottawa—that instead of quarreling about lists a conference should be called of the Dominion and provincial governments with a view to agreeing upon some basis of lists that both could accept. Unfortunately that view was not taken. My hon. friend, the Acting Solicitor General yesterday read an extract from a speech delivered by Sir John Thompson who said that there was so little difference between the Dominion and provincial franchise that there was no reason for maintaining the separation. I quite agree. But if the difference was so slight that there was no need for two laws, what need should there be for two lists? For obvious reasons, we should favour the adoption of provincial lists generally, if it were possible, but we know that it is not possible because the lists of the several provinces differ so widely. In Quebec the women are not on the list, and clearly, if we are to carry out the purpose of this House, so far as that province is concerned, there must be some machinery for enrolling the women of Quebec. In that case you cannot adopt the provincial list as it stands. In the case of Prince Edward Island, there are no lists at all. A man comes to the poll and swears that he has the right to vote, and he votes. Speaking generally, I think that is a dangerous practice. Prince Edward Island is a happy, prosperous community where everyone knows everyone else, and there is no room for dispute regarding any one's qualifications down there. That province is the most prosperous part of the Dominion of Canada. There are none who are very rich and none very poor; everyone knows his neighbour, and there are no possibilities of dispute. But when you adopt generally the principle in vogue in that province you will have men coming up to the poll at the last moment and getting on the list by simply swearing that they have the right to be placed on it. As I say, that is a dangerous principle. I am afraid that you cannot adopt the provincial lists generally. Let me say, however, that the provincial lists ought to be encouraged wherever they exist and are fair and reasonable. What I am about to say by way of illustration concerns Nova Scotia, but it may, I think, be said as well concerning New Brunswick. I think that conditions are much the same in these two provinces, but my hon. friends from New Brunswick will speak for themselves. There is no reason why the lists of the province of Nova Scotia made up under the existing law should not be accepted as a finality, and when the Government proposes to appoint A, B, and C, possibly their own partisans, to get out and add to that list or take from it, I think they are making a grave mistake. Whatever may be said about the other provinces, the lists are made up in Nova Scotia in a way which

I believe leaves no room for dispute. What is the method? The foundation of the electoral list in Nova Scotia is the assessment roll. The property qualification in Nova Scotia is so small that I agree with the statement that it is virtually manhood suffrage. The revisors are not appointed by the Government of Nova Scotia but by the municipal councils. They take the first assessment roll as a basis. That assessment roll indicates the names of all persons who are assessed as owners of property, to a very modest extent, as tenants of property, also to a moderate degree, as sons of tenants, sons of owners, sons of farmers. Practically speaking, it gets down almost to a basis of manhood suffrage. A public notice is given of a day when the revisers will meet for the purpose of making further inquiry. The lists as prepared by the officers are posted up, the officers hold a meeting, and those concerned add to the list or take from it as the case may be. The lists are then made up. Is there no appeal? Yes, there is an appeal to the sheriff. I suppose my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) from his interruption a moment ago, considers that that is no appeal at all. The sheriffs of Nova Scotia are as much a judicial body, lacking only in volume of dignity, as the judges of our country. They hold their offices by a tenure almost as secure as that of the judges. There was a time many years ago when the sheriffs held their offices from year to year. That has passed away and the sheriff is now appointed not for life, but during good behaviour, and he can only be removed for cause. Let me illustrate the character of these men from my own experience. There are two counties —Queen's and Shelburne—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The hon. gentleman says they can be removed. What is the removing power?

Mr. FIELDING: The Government of the province which appoints them and nobody else. I do not know whether my hon. friend can suggest anybody else.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No; I just wanted the information.

Mr. FIELDING: I want to illustrate the character of these sheriffs to show that they are a body deserving of respect. It is a fact that they are appointed during good behaviour. I want to give an illustration from my own constituency. I happen to represent two counties. In these counties there are two sheriffs and the junior of these two sheriffs is the senior in the matter of the years of his official life of all the judges in the province of Nova Scotia. He is a man of longer experience in official life than any member of the bench of Nova Scotia. The junior of these two men has been in office for thirty-six years. He is the sheriff of the county of Queens. The sheriff of the county of Shelburne has been in office for forty-three years. The sheriff of the county of Shelburne, Mr. George Maclean, a most respected Conservative, was appointed many, many years ago by a Conservative Government. He was in office when I and my friends came into power in 1882. He was continued as a capable and respected official and he has been there for forty-three years, a man who has performed the duties of his office, as sheriff and returning officer, in a manner that has won the respect and confidence of the people at large. These happen to be the older sheriffs in the province. Other hon. gentlemen who are familiar with the sheriffs in other counties will be able to testify that the sheriffs of Nova Scotia are a body well qualified to act as a court of appeal in the revising of the lists and although there may be some party strife I think we all agree that the manner in which the sheriffs of Nova Scotia discharge their duties is satisfactory to all political parties. Therefore I want to suggest now in regard to the provincial lists, whatever may happen with other provinces, because in Canada conditions vary, that the Government consider the manner in which the lists in each province are made up and that, unless they have some reason to believe that the lists are made up in a partisan and unfair manner, they accept the lists as a finality and do not appoint any parties of their own to go out and put names on, or take them off and make up whole new lists for themselves. In the interest of fair play I ask it; in the interest of economy I ask it. It means a waste of time and money to get out a second list under conditions of that character. I think the situation is much the same in New Brunswick but again I say I must not speak too positively as to that.

My only purpose at present is to offer the Government in all good faith two suggestions. The first is that you amend your present system of appointing returning officers. If it is necessary to show how that system has been abused I shall be prepared to do so but I do not want to raise that question now. As I am not dealing with individual cases; I am only dealing with principles. I would suggest that the Government adopt a prescribed list of officials from whom they shall select their returning officers and if there is any fear that the provincial officers are prejudiced then put on your prescribed list some Dominion official who can be called upon to act as a returning officer and who would be a responsible citizen known to everybody. Let that be done instead of appointing a man particularly for the occasion.

The second point is that inasmuch as I believe the lists of Nova Scotia are fairly made and there is no reason why they should not be accepted, I want to suggest to the Government that as respects that province unless somebody can show that the lists are not fairly made, these lists be accepted as a finality and that this Government shall not send out men to disturb lists of that kind.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER (East York): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Guthrie) should be congratulated upon the very able address with which he favoured this House in introducing the Franchise Bill. Although we have had in this Parliament such great men as Macdonald, Blake, Mackenzie, Aylesworth and others and although a review of the history of Parliament presents many notable figures, I think we will come to the conclusion that we have a degree of talent in the House to-day equal to that at any period in its history. It seems to me that while honouring the memory of the able men of those early days we should not be unmindful of the quality of the men that we have in this House to-day. If I chose, I think I could name many members who are sitting in the House to-day who could be truly compared with the great men of former years.

The hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), in replying to the speech of the hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence laboured very strenuously in his criticism of the Franchise Bill. His attempt was a complete failure. His particular effort seemed to be to inform the House that while he was offering a criticism of the Bill, at a later period, when it came before the committee, he would reserve the right to further criticize it and possibly suggest many amendments. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that he has need to make a greater effort if he wishes to be more successful than he did yesterday.

The Minister of Militia and other members of the Government, with the ability which they possess, have prepared what may be a fair Bill but there possibly will be some amendments to be made to it. In fact there are some amendments that they have consented to make. But I think there should be other amendments. I think the Government should consider the disfranchising of slackers, deserters, evaders and alien enemies. When I speak of this class of citizens I might remind the House that we have had some experience. We need only go back a few months and recall what took place in the great city of Winnipeg. There we found a class of people who were creating a great deal of trouble and who undertook to cause a rebellion that might have spread throughout the Dominion and become a very serious matter for the country at large. However, it was checked. These people were principally foreigners but amongst them were a few Canadians who had held prominent positions including some clergymen who had associated themselves with these foreigners and aliens in the effort to create a rebellion in this country. That being so there is still danger to be feared from the actions of the "Reds" or Bolshevists of whom we have many thousands in Canada. There should be some check on this class of people and they should not be permitted to dictate, or to voice their views, as to how the country should be governed, or offer themselves for public positions, neither should they be permitted to participate in the enactment of legislation. In my opinion this class should be disfranchised and the present Bill should be amended so as to bring about that result. In order to retain control over these people either the War-time Elections Act should be continued or the present Bill should be amended in the desired direction.

We must consider the sentiments of the people of Ontario and of Manitoba and the other Western Provinces with respect to slackers, deserters and evaders. We should heed the desire expressed in regard to these persons not only by returned soldiers, but by the mothers, wives and sisters of men who fought at the front, and who say that these undesirable individuals should not enjoy the rights of free citizenship. I think I am safe in saying that hundreds of thousands of worthy citizens throughout the Dominion have given utterance to that sentiment. In my travels throughout the Dominion, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, I have found that a general feeling exists in favour of the disfranchisement of these undesirable characters, and that the aliens especially should be deprived of the franchise for some years to come. During the war we had to intern many thousands of these aliens in order to prevent them from destroying the property and probably even going further and destroying life, and the adoption of the necessary safeguards involved the Dominion in millions of dollars of expense. I do not think that these people have changed materially in their sentiments since the war was brought to a close, and therefore the Government would be well advised to enact such amendments to the present Bill as will disfranchise them until they have demonstrated themselves to be suitable citizens. They should not be allowed to be candidates for office or register a vote at any election in this country. It is not asking too much to insist upon that course. All slackers, deserters and evaders should be disfranchised for at least ten years. I have heard it even suggested that the period of disfranchisement be extended to twenty or twenty-five years, but the shorter time proposed will give us a chance to judge as to their qualifications for citizenship. It is not fair to those gallant men who freely volunteered their services to defend this country and the rest of the British Empire that slackers and men of a similar type should have as free a voice in the making of the country's laws as should be enjoyed by those who underwent such great sacrifices. To any such proposition as that I say No.

When it became necessary to reinforce the ranks of our gallant men who were fighting overseas and the Military Service Act was called into operation, many young men who should have been in the ranks of the defenders of this country fled to the backwoods and even crossed to the United States to avoid military service. Perhaps if these young men had been left alone they would have accepted conscription and would not have been characterized so unworthily as evaders. Unfortunately they were badly advised by certain of the Liberal press. Doubtless if good counsel had been extended to them many of these men would have gone overseas without any compulsion. But the advice given to them was bad, perhaps even pressure was brought to bear upon them. They acted upon that advice and failed to rally to the defence of this country. Why then should the same treatment be extended to these young men as is enjoyed by those who fought and bled for their country and the Empire?

It would almost appear as though the underlying motive with some persons in their antagonism to our war efforts was to sacrifice the English and preserve the young Frenchmen of Quebec. Doubtless many hon. gentlemen opposite will dispute the existence of any such motive; but I have heard it stated by many citizens throughout Canada that there appeared to be in the province of Quebec a desire to conserve the lives of the young French-Canadians and to sacrifice men of British birth so that those who had thus been preserved to the detriment of the British-born might be free to engage in a policy of expansion having for its object the securing of control in the other provinces of the Dominion.

We have been told by the hon. member for Red Deer that we should get rid of "the war mind." How is it possible to get rid of the war mind when we recall the numerous slackers, deserters and evaders who have shirked their duty in Canada? It is all very well to talk of getting rid of the war feeling, but that feeling has been so strongly impressed upon the minds of people in the majority of homes in this country by the actions of those individuals to whom I have referred that it is very hard to eradicate.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) asks us to help heal the wounds of war. Who created the wounds of war? The slackers, the deserters, the draft evaders—men who refused to do their duty in their country's hour of need. How can we heal the wounds of war, Mr. Speaker, when those wounds are so impressed on the minds of our people? It is all very well for the hon. member for Red Deer, who, as well as his brave sons, did their duty nobly and well, to preach reconciliation, but he must remember that all minds do not think alike, and he must permit those who lost their loved ones at the front to express their opinions as to how soon they will be prepared to forget and forgive. I venture to say that it will take a lifetime to erase from their minds the impressions created by the war.

In some parts of the Dominion we had the experience of practically no response from young men to do their duty, notwithstanding the efforts of the Government by voluntary enlistment and, that having failed, by conscription, to bring those young men to a sense of their obligations to fight for their country. Indeed, the attempt to enforce the Military Service Act led to riots in some parts of the Dominion, and we heard the threat made that rather than obey the law those men would create a revolution. I submit, Sir, that it was not creditable to encourage that condition of affairs, and it seems to me that a great deal of the responsibility for this revolutionary sentiment is upon the shoulders of many of the priests and bishops and public men of this Dominion. It has been said by hon. members that there should be no ill-feeling amongst the people of the various provinces, but when we remember such instances of disloyalty it forces us to the conclusion that it will take many years to restore the old-time harmony that existed in this country. Had those who were so anxious to give advice attended to their own business I believe conditions would have been entirely different. I do not blame those young men, but I do blame their advisers. I firmly believe that we shall not be able to overcome the lack of harmony created by such improper advice for perhaps another forty years.

Mr. W. H. WHITE (Victoria, Alta.): Mr. Speaker, as one who comes from a constituency which this Bill is bound to affect very seriously, I would like to say a few words. The matter has been pretty well discussed, particularly by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), who has pointed out the great injustice that is about to be done to a large proportion of our population. I may say that it is not in any spirit of self-interest that I am taking part in the debate, because, owing to the Military Service Act, those who were inclined to support me did not get an opportunity to do so.

I may also say that I was not, as was charged by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) against another hon. member (Mr. Pardee) elected by reason of the Military Service Act. I submit, Mr. Speaker, there must have been a tremendous difficulty in the Unionist party when of two members elected on the same ticket one cannot withdraw from that party without the other taunting him that he could never have been elected had it not been for that Act.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Speaker, permit me to say that the hon. gentleman is misquoting me. I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: Would the hon. member allow me to quote his exact words to that effect?

Mr. EDWARDS: I will be very glad for my hon. friend to do so,—if he can.

Mr. WHITE: I find the following passage in the unrevised Hansard report of the hon. gentleman's speech:

> The hon. gentleman is very bold and very courageous in stating to this House and to the country that he does not care a button whether his course is popular or unpopular. Just a short time ago he was perfectly willing, when he was seeking election in 1917, to avail himself of the measure disfranchising some people whom to-day he says it would be a crying shame to disfranchise.

A little later in the course of his speech the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards) said:

> The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Pardee) in the election of 1917 was not only perfectly willing, but anxious to avail himself of the Act which was passed enabling him to get his seat in the House.

Is that clear? Will the hon. gentleman accept Hansard?

Mr. EDWARDS: I said that he was willing to take advantage of the Act which gave him the soldier votes.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: "To get his seat in the House."

Mr. EDWARDS: That does not say that the soldier vote elected him. That is what my hon. friend said; I did not say that.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: "Enabling him to get his seat in the House" and "being elected"—there may be some distinction between those two statements, but there is very little difference. With regard to the Bill itself and the promise that has been made by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) that some changes will be made in the most contentious clause—clause 29—I may say that certain hon. members from the eastern part of Canada, judging from their remarks regarding the people affected by this Bill, would lead one to believe that there is something wrong with those people,—that they are so wild and unprogressive that we would be better rid of them. I think the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) said: We do not want them; let us get rid of them, or words to that effect. But let us go outside of this Parliament and take the statement of a man to whom frequent reference is made in this House, the man who is able to handle the largest spending department of the Government. I refer to Mr. D. B. Hanna. I remember his appearing before a committee of some members of this House and pointing out that some of the most productive districts in the North-west Territories were settled by Austrians. He pointed to a certain line along which these people had located and said that more was being produced along that line than in any other part of Canada. These people, he said, are our hope for the West; some day they will be our best citizens.

I ask hon. gentlemen what is the matter with these people? What is the charge against them? What have they ever done that they should be discriminated against or singled out for special treatment? Let us take the history of these people. They came to this country at the invitation of the Government of the day; they settled on land that was not cleared; in many cases they took sections en bloc in order that they might be together, and often they got the very worst kind of land. But they were encouraged to settle on it, and to-day wherever they are, they are producing more per acre than any other class in the whole of the Western territory. What have they done? Have they not been as progressive as others? Do they not produce as much? What was their attitude when the war broke out? An hon. gentleman on the other side of the House has said that thousands of them left his district and enlisted in our Forces. In some cases they changed their nationality in order to be able to enlist. They wanted to become Canadians; they wanted to serve Canada. I may say in passing that they are a people who bring no national pride with them; you never hear them boast of their country, as the Americans and the Old Country people do. The Austrian never says anything about the country that he came from, though after he learns English he may tell you what part of Ontario he had been in. He wants to be a Canadian citizen. He does not want to be an Austrian all his life; he never intended such a thing. But apparently we do not want to let him become a Canadian. If the member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) were here he would bear me out when I say that the provincial constituency of Whitford in Alberta, largely peopled by Ukrainians, was the first constituency in that province, or perhaps, in any province, to make a voluntary assessment upon themselves of $5 each per month for the Patriotic Fund. Afterwards they went further and subscribed another $5, making the contribution $10 per month from every homesteader in that district. So that from that point of view they appear to be good citizens. The very fact that the 218th Regiment was made up of ninety per cent of that class of the people shows that they were willing to serve their country.

Mr. GRIESBACH: What was the other name of the 218th Regiment?

Mr. W. H. WHITE: I believe it was called the "Cornwall Cossacks."

Mr. GRIESBACH: It was the "Irish Guards," was it not?

[Mr. White.]

Mr. W. H. WHITE: They were called the Irish Guards first and afterwards the Cornwall Cossacks. But that only goes to support my statement that the majority of them were of that class. That nickname was applied to them because most of the men were of Austrian birth, but they did good service.

Now, it appears that these people have been willing both to assist patriotic movements and to serve their country in the military forces. Moreover, hundreds of them got past the recruiting officers and went to the war; yet under the provisions of an Act similar to this the wives, mothers, sisters and brothers of these people were cheated out of their vote in the election of 1917—that is, if you like to call it an election. I never considered it an election; in my opinion it was a revolution. A revolution is usually organized and carried out for the purpose of removing from office a Government that cannot be dislodged by constitutional means, but this revolution was organized and carried out for the purpose of continuing in office a Government which could not remain in office by constitutional means. This revolution has had no parallel on this continent, unless it be in Mexico and some of the other Latin republics.

While on this subject I wish to read from a local paper to show what is the spirit of the Ukrainians in the Western country. A body of Ukrainian farmers, about the time the Soldiers' Land Settlement scheme was inaugurated, held a meeting and adopted the following resolution:

> We, the Ukrainian farmers assembled at this meeting, hereby volunteer and promise to gratuitously help any returned soldiers settling in my district on the land by offering to do all the required improvements on their farms, such as hauling lumber, erecting buildings and fences, clearing, breaking and discing the land, and will also arrange to do all necessary work with our teams and machinery during the seeding and harvesting operations, free of charge.

Yet some people say they are against the soldier. The resolution continues:

> We also wish to solemnly assure such newcomers that friendly help will be at their disposition, and they will not suffer any want or hardships of a beginner. And we will greatly appreciate the presence of the returned man in our communities who would be able, willing and anxious to teach us the great British ideals, to promote our loyalty and to help us to attain the standard of British citizenship.

Knowing that the soldiers who would take up land would have difficulties to meet, these people determined to make it as easy for the soldiers as possible and solemnly pledged themselves to give them assistance.

Governments, like people, sometimes have suspicions that are not well founded. Shortly after the war broke out the Government called from their duties certain members of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. I was for many years a member of that body. It is an organization that has a splendid record for efficiency; no organization of its kind has had so few failures recorded against it. Well, these men moved about among the Austrians and people of that class in the West, not in uniform but in civilian clothes, putting forward one pretext or another—the pretext of buying cattle or of looking for land; and during four years of this ferret work they never found one man in Victoria district guilty of uttering a word of sedition. Why be suspicious about a class of people like this? If you go into some other sections among the Scotch, you will find somebody who is dissatisfied and making criticisms in connection with the conduct of the war. I do not know whether or not you can find any such people amongst the Irish. There is, however, no reason at all for these suspicions, because those people have never done anything to warrant them.

Let me take another class of people with whom this measure is going to deal harshly. I know of a man of the nationality to which I refer who comes under this Act, who sent his boy to the war, and his boy is still over there and will remain there. Under this measure, if it passes, that man, now that his son does not give him a vote, is disfranchised and he cannot vote in the next election. Another case which I know is that of an Englishman, British-born, married to a German girl, and there is a good deal of intermarriage of that kind in this country. They had three children, one boy being nine years old, and although that man made the supreme sacrifice, his wife is not entitled to vote under this legislation. That may be justice; it may be freedom; it may be the way to build up national unity, but it does not look like that to me. I am sorry the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) is not in the House, for two reasons, one being that I wished to compliment him on the splendid speech he made the other day when he said that we should have more tolerance; that we should get closer together; that while it was very easy, sitting in private, side by side, to agree, when we got into the House, differences arose. I should like to submit to him the case of two neighbours of mine who came to this country possibly thirty years ago, farmed side by side; who paid the same taxes, who went through this period of development, suffering hardships side by side, each man doing his part to develop and make a great country of Canada. Then, when an election comes along, although they pay the same share in taxes and every thing else, one man is disfranchised while the other is permitted to exercise his franchise. Such a condition of things is unfair whatever way you view it.

Another case which I should like to mention is that of a man, honest and good enough to pay an income tax on $11,000 of his profits, paying it cheerfully. This man sent his eldest son to France and he is still overseas and will remain there, but his father is disfranchised under this measure. We know that this present Government and the Conservative Government before it have at least the reputation of dividing the Canadian people into two classes. It is charged to them, and I think everybody who knows anything about the matter will say, that they are to blame for whatever disunion there exists at the present day. If the Acting Prime Minister were in his seat, I should like to appeal to him, because judging by the speech he made the other day I do not believe that this Bill suits him very well. Although he is only Acting Prime Minister for a short period of time, let it not be said that under his regime he is creating another unnecessary division. These people of whom I speak and who are disfranchised will, as long as they live, be called alien Canadians; they cannot get away from that. We have the French Canadian and the English Canadian, but these people will be distinguished by being called alien Canadians, and there is not much chance of building up, and it is a waste of time and energy for any one to speak of unity in Canada when every session, one after another, the Government brings down legislation that divides people further and further apart. I do not expect that there will be any fairness in this Bill. I feel somewhat as the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. H. A. Mackie) does about the Bill. He said: We shall have another Act that will win our elections by disfranchising. He suggested to the Government that they should go further and do the thing right and disfranchise all but those who voted for Union Government last time. I will go one better than my hon. friend; I will raise the "ante" and say that there is no need at this time to go to the expense of a general election. Money is very hard to get, and this measure is framed in such a way that you can have out of it pretty nearly any result you wish. My suggestion is that there should be one man appointed by the Government to decide the political complexion of each district and that the Government should be allowed to appoint that man.

5 p.m.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: My hon. friend agrees with me that we ought to disfranchise every one who voted against the Government?

Mr. W. H. WHITE: No, I was supporting the suggestion of my hon. friend by going him one better. The suggestion was yours and I made it better. My hon. friend thought that would be a good idea.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Even at that the Government would not be safe.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: I do not think I have anything to add, but I am sorry I cannot hope for any success, because the policy of the Government seems to be "safety first." That is the game they are playing. This Bill is, for this side of the House, a little worse than the other election law, and for hon. members opposite, a little better. They are exercising their privilege of making laws with majorities, and I suppose they will continue to do so as long as the people permit them. I wanted to do my duty, in fairness to many citizens although they will never have an opportunity to support me or, for that matter, to vote against me, in bringing this matter to the attention of the House and in endeavouring to find out what reasons the Government have for so unfairly discriminating against these people.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Georges Etienne Cartier): Mr. Speaker, representing one of the most cosmopolitan constituencies in the Dominion of Canada, I feel that I cannot allow this debate to conclude without offering a few observations, reserving any extended remarks which I may have to make when the Bill reaches the committee stage. I have not had the time to peruse with care the Bill as it is before the House; but I have read several sections of it, and in my remarks I wish particularly to deal with those. Perhaps, inasmuch as I have not read this measure, I may be considered to be in the same position as the famous Sydney Smith who said that he never read a book before he reviewed it, because it prejudiced him so. The origin of some of the principles embodied in this Bill will be found in the Act which was passed in the session of 1919; that is, in the By-elections Act, and the part of it to which I wish to refer particularly is that which deals with the naturalization of married women. The House will remember that when that Bill came before the House in July, 1919, I made a somewhat vigorous attack on the principle enunciated and in the clause of that Bill to which I am about to refer. Notwithstanding anything that we on this side of the House had to say, the Bill went through, and probably the Government find that it has worked so well that they want to perpetuate it in the Bill now before us.

I should like to know from the Acting Solicitor General or from the Government, why a distinction is made in the matter of naturalization and in the matter of voting, between women born on the North American continent and women born on the continent of Europe. Is it because women on this continent are more intelligent? Is it because they are more refined? Or is it because they understand the advantages of voting for Union Government? What is the reason that women born on the continent of North America are placed in a category by themselves and in a higher class than are women born in Europe? Under this law, if it passes, you will find a full-blooded negress of San Domingo; a daughter of a Mexican greaser; a Mulatto from the State of Georgia, having greater rights in this country as voters, than the most refined and cultured womanhood of France, Belguim or any other continental European country. This is not a matter which affects enemy alien countries at all; it is not a matter that appertains only to Germany and Austria. It declares in so many words that any woman who comes from the continent of Europe is obliged to obtain personal naturalization from a judge of the district in which she lives before she can exercise the right to vote, while this negress from San Domingo will have the right to vote simply upon going to the poll and declaring that she is the wife of so-and-so, who happens to be a British subject. Is not that grotesque; is it not ridiculous; is it not something that brings the laws of this country into disrepute? Why, under this law the late respected Duchess of Connaught, if she were alive, and living in this country, would have no vote whatever; but her cook or housemaid, or some person who happened to be imported from Alabama, would have the right to vote. I leave that thought with our super-patriots on the other side of the House.

I should like to say a word or two with regard to the naturalization of alien enemies and the postponing of their naturalization and concomitant right to vote until the expiry of ten years after the close of the war. There seems to be an idea among the members of this House, and even outside of this House, that we are excluding from naturalization the whole of Austria and Germany; that is to say, that every one who comes to this country from what were Austria and Germany will not be able to secure naturalization until the expiry of the ten-year period. That is not the fact. We are excluding from naturalization only those people from the portions of these countries that are still named, Austria, Germany, Bulgaria and Turkey. Austria to-day is dismembered. There is in that country a population of something like five or six milloins, in Vienna and the surrounding neighbourhood. Practically the whole of Austria, or fifty-five millions of people, now comprises Jugo-Slavia, Czecho-Slovakia, Roumania and other countries surrounding Austria. The man in Canada from Vienna will not be allowed to exercise the franchise, but the man from Prague will have that right because he comes from Bohemia. The citizen from Cracow will be given the right to vote because he comes from what is now Poland, while citizens from any of the other places I have mentioned will also be accorded the privilege by reason of the fact that they hail from countries that no longer form a part of the new Austria. I ask hon. members, is that a protection to this country? Are we protected when we give the right to vote to fifty-five millions of former alien enemies, and deprive of this right a paltry five or six millions living in what is now Austria? Take Alsace, which to-day is as much German as is Saxony. If Alsace had the right to declare by plebiscite whether it would elect to remain a part of Germany or be a part of France, it would no doubt choose to remain with Germany. But citizens of Alsace to-day will have the right to come here and in the ordinary course be naturalized after five years. Any man living in Danzig to-day—and no one can conceive of any place more German than that—has the right to come and be naturalized in the same way, as if he did not come from an enemy country. But the man from Berlin will have no right to vote. These are some of the anomalies in the Act which naturally attract the attention of even the most superficial observer, and it seems to me that the Government must give some good and valid reason why it should declare in the Act that some people of enemy alien origin have not the right to vote while others have. Let us be logical first.

I desire to say a few words regarding the Naturalization Act which was passed last year, and which is intimately associated with this Act. We have boasted in this House for the last year or two, at least since the Peace Treaty was signed,—and no one was louder in his pæans of praise of our nationhood than the President of the Privy Council (Hon. Mr. Rowell)—that Canada has achieved a national status and is now in a position which it has never occupied before. Mr. Speaker, we have not re-written one line nor changed one tittle of the British North America Act, but it seems that by some unseen force the whole position of Canada has changed, and we have now an entirely new status. That being so, do you not think that it would be only right and just that we should have our own Naturalization Act?. Why was it that, simultaneously with our achievement of this national status, we tore our Naturalization Act into a thousand pieces and threw it into the waste paper basket, and accepted the British Naturalization Law? Surely we should be able to declare who is a British subject in Canada and who is not. Yet, when I ask the Acting Solicitor General why he did not allow these two Acts, the Imperial Naturalization Act and the Dominion Act, to function side by side, so that we could take our choice either of the Act conferring the right of British citizenship in Canada after three years, or the other extending the period to five years, the hon. member informed me: "We have only the Imperial Naturalization Act; we have not the right to draw up a different Naturalization Act and place it on the statute book, we must take the Naturalization Act dictated and written by Downing street and sent to us, and if we do not take it we shall get nothing." And we took it; we swallowed the dose, nauseous though it may have been.

I do not wish at this stage of the debate to go into the question of the advisability or justice of having in this country three different classes of citizens, first, the British citizen who has the right to vote; secondly the potential British citizen who will have the right to vote ten years after the expiration of the war; and, thirdly, the citizen who does not intend to become naturalized at all. Under the ancient system in England—and in Russia it continued, I think, down to 1862,—there were three classes of citizens, first the free man; second, the serf; and third, the slave. We are making serfs, Mr. Speaker, of these people to whom we deny the vote in the regular way. Here are people who come to Canada, having selected this country from among all the countries in the world as that in which they should like to live and bring up their families, and where they expect to die. They have left their native country because they are dissatisfied with conditions at home; they are dissatisfied with the life lived there and with the class distinctions that prevail in their society. We admit them to this country, and mark you, Mr. Speaker, before they are admitted they are examined through a microscope by the Immigration Department. The Department of Immigration have page after page of rules in regard to the admission of foreigners into this country. One who reads that list of rules would imagine that people thus selected are too good for this world, that they are as white as the driven snow and that they have to be 100 per cent perfect before they come into this country and are received by the immigration officers. They must be mentally perfect, they must be perfect physically, and they must never have declared any views in regard to constituted government—they must never have said that they wished to forcibly remove the autocrat of Russia or the Kaiser at Berlin. When it is found that they have complied with all these requirements we permit them in the goodness of our hearts, to come into Canada. They are perfect, in so far as respectability is concerned when they enter. But they do not know about our naturalization law and they find that they have to wait ten years before they can be permitted to make the declaration: Civis Britannicus sum.

Why should they want to come to this country? They can go to the United States, reside there for five years and have conferred upon them the rights of American citizenship, and those rights they hold against the world. If a man is a respectable citizen and if he is qualified in regard to the immigration rules, he is permitted to enter the United States and the test is one of character and not geography. But for some reason known only to the Government, hon. gentlemen fear that people who come from these countries may vote against the Unionist Government. Judging from the lurid picture painted last night by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) who said that they are the worst people in the world and that the door should be closed to them for all time, that they are traitors, and so on, one would imagine that these were a very bad lot, but all I have to say is that if they are only half as Prussian as the member for Frontenac they would qualify as voters on the Unionist side.

When these people can go to the United States and be received as citizens after five years' residence, why should they want to come to Canada; why should a German want to come to Canada? We are not offering any advantages to him; we are declaring in our laws that he is to be put in a class by himself, that he is to be a pariah among our people, that he must breathe the free atmosphere of Canada for ten years before he is entitled to the rights of citizenship and that at the expiration of that time we, in the goodness of our hearts, may take him in. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) yesterday said something that I consider a truism. He said that people may chew together, or they may smoke together or perchance they may drink together, but when they go to the polls they cannot vote together. Do you think that makes for harmony in this country;—does it not rather make for intolerance? The rank and file of our own people are the proper judges of these things, and it is the rank and file of our own people that the alien comes in contact with. What will be the impression of the Canadian citizen born in humble circumstances who happens to fraternize with an alien in the village or on the farm, whom he finds to be quite a respectable person and fit to associate with his wife and family when he discovers that that alien is denied the privileges which he himself possesses and for a reason which he cannot understand? The fact is that when this Bill becomes law it is going to prove a boomerang to those who are its authors. The Government will find that every man who is now denied the right to vote, when he does get that right after a period of ten years, will have his reckoning with the party and the Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is discussing the Naturalization Act. His remarks have no connection with the Bill which is before the House. There is nobody denied the right under this Act. Does he suggest that persons not naturalized should vote?

Mr. JACOBS: No, I do not suggest that persons not naturalized should vote but I do suggest that it was an outrage on the part of the Government to permit to pass into legislation the Naturalization Act of 1917, which declares that these people shall not have a right to naturalization until they have been in the country for ten years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend himself had a part in that; he did not even challenge a division of the House upon the Act.

Mr. JACOBS: Did he not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, and the Act passed without division. What is the use of discussing the Naturalization Act on the second reading of this Bill? The Naturalization Act is passed. The hon. member had better bring in a Bill to amend it.

Mr. JACOBS: That is in keeping with the peculiar mentality of my hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is true.

Mr. JACOBS: Because I did not call for a division of the House on that Act I am deemed to have acquiesced in everything the Government did in that respect. The hon. gentleman must remember that on two or three occasions when the Bill was in committee we did everything we could to point out what would result from the policy of allowing the British Government to come into our country and dictate to us what we should do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why does not the hon. gentleman bring in an amendment?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Because the Prime Minister promised that he would see to it that it should be amended after a conference with the Imperial authorities.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We can only amend it in this House. Bring in a Bill.

Mr. JACOBS: It will be remembered that Lincoln said before the Civil War that no nation could exist half slave and half free. That is the condition that exists in this country. We have half our people free and the other half are deprived of the rights of citizens. That is what this Act proposes to do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not this Act.

Mr. JACOBS: I am referring to the Naturalization Act, this Act and the Women Voters Act of 1918 all in conjunction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This Act does not disfranchise anybody.

Mr. JACOBS: Will the hon. gentleman tell me in what respect it affects the Naturalization Act which we passed last year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does not affect it at all. I am saying to the hon gentleman that if he complains of the Naturalization Act he should bring in an amendment embodying his views, and submit that to the sense of Parliament instead of criticising the Naturalization Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order; we had better proceed according to the rules of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The resaon I say "hear, hear" is that the hon. gentleman should be held to the discussion of this Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: With reference to the point of order I may say that it is somewhat difficult to disassociate the Naturalization Act from the consideration of this Bill. It is no doubt true that the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) has gone very far afield but there is a remote connection between the two measures. I hope that the hon. member will not proceed too far along this line.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is what the minister himself did this afternoon.

Mr. JACOBS: I would like to say a word or two in regard to the manner in which passports are affected by this Naturalization Act and by this Bill when it refuses to give aliens the right to British citizenship. No person but a British subject has the right to take out a passport in Canada to travel abroad. For example, a German who has been in this country for ten years and has not been naturalized has no rights whatever as a citizen of Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. JACOBS: If he requires a passport in order to travel, and if he is not naturalized, where is he going to get that passport? Mr. Speaker, a man in that position who has lived in Canada for nine and a half years can only get a passport to travel by applying to Berlin. Actually a man who has been a citizen of Canada for that period of time can only obtain the right to travel abroad when the Berlin Government wishes to give it to him; the Canadian Government has no right whatever to do anything for him.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member how he applies this argument to the Bill under discussion?

Mr. JACOBS: Mr. Speaker, I want to point out the anomalies, the absurdities, the grotesqueness of this Bill. It is practically impossible to discuss this Bill, in its references to naturalization, without referring to the Naturalization Act. I am attacking the Government not only because of the terms of the Bill now before the House, but the provisions in that measure with respect to naturalization. They deprive us of the Naturalization Act under which we worked successfully for so many years. I charge that upon the Government and I say it is because of the fact that these people who are affected not only suffer the loss of their vote, but will be unable to obtain the most elementary rights of citizenship.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have concluded what I desired to say on that phase of the subject but I shall have something further to say when the Bill goes into committee. I was not in the House yesterday when the Acting Solicitor General stated that he understood some one had made the remark that there was a joker in the Bill but that for himself he wished to say that he knew of no such joker. There may be no joker in the Bill but there are in it a few jokes which I have endeavoured to point out to the House. I trust that before the Bill emerges from committee we will have full opportunity of dealing further with it, and that after the anvil pounding which we may have to bring to bear upon the measure it will be something less objectionable than it is in its present shape.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): I do not intend to occupy the time of the House at any length upon the present occasion. I purpose making such remarks as I deem to be necessary, when the House is in committee and we can review the respective clauses. However the Acting Solicitor General was kind enough when he presented the Bill to say that if anybody could discover grave difficulties in its application he would be prepared to accept amendments and remedy the defects so discovered. Well, Sir, taking that statement in conjunction with the one just made by the hon. gentleman who preceded me as to there being a joker in the Bill, I would like to call the minister's attention to what might possibly be the joker in question. To-day we have heard a number of hon. gentlemen speak about the rights of different nationalities in connection with this Bill and the Naturalization Act. I had hoped that I would see some hon. gentleman opposite rise and speak in the name of the Democracy of England, and show how the poor Englishman is being treated under this Bill. So far, however, no one has taken that point, and therefore it falls to my lot to draw the minister's attention to the fact that under this Bill harsh treatment is meted out to residents in Englond. If the minister will kindly read section 38 of the Bill he will find the following clause:

> Except as in this Act otherwise provided any British subject, male or female, who is of the full age of twenty-one years, may be a candidate at a Dominion election.

That means that any gentleman living, say, in England, may be a candidate in our Federal elections—there is absolutely nothing to prevent him. But if that gentleman living in England should take it into his head to come over to this country and offer himself for election and ask the electors to refrain from voting for him or to vote for him, or should he have the hardihood to advance reasons why the electors should vote for him, then he falls immediately under the provisions of section 11 which the Government apparently overlooked when they drafted the Bill and commits an indictable offence, which seems hardly fair. Let us read section 11:

> Any person, not being an elector, who resides without Canada and who, to secure the election of any candidate, canvasses for votes or in any way endeavours to induce voters to vote for any candidate at an election, or to refrain from voting, is guilty of an indictable offence against this Act punishable as in this Act provided.

The Minister of the Interior being a shrewd and very capable lawyer, will see right away, or I am a very dull lawyer, that any gentleman residing, say in the city of London or in any part of England, may under section 38 become a candidate for this House, but if he attempts to say a word as to why he should be elected, then anybody in the country who wishes to bring a charge against him for so doing, can land him in jail. Now, hon. gentlemen have spoken about the Austrians, about the Germans, and about men of different nationalities. I do not claim any great intimacy with the Germans or with the Austrians, which may be my great misfortune, but I do know something about England and about Englishmen, and I am a great admirer of the democracy of England. I am a greater admirer of the democracy of England than I am of the laws of England, and I believe this to be a case in which the Englishman should get fair play. I bring this point to the attention of the Government and I say further that whereas I have found in the perusal of this Bill innumerable clauses that are jokes, and mean when the House resolves itself into Committee to move to amend some of them; in the meantime the Acting Solicitor General should see to it that the Englishman is properly treated by this Bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And that he gets justice.

Mr. DEVLIN: And that he gets justice.

Mr. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester): When the Acting Solicitor General introduced this Bill yesterday afternoon I followed his speech with great attention and drew certain conclusions that I wish to communicate to the House before the motion for second reading passes. The first conclusion that I drew was that the electoral law of Canada would certainly be improved by the fact that the Franchise Bill of 1920 was fathered by the Acting Solicitor General and not by the Minister of the Interior. I did not have the honour of a seat in this House when the famous debate over the War-time Elections Act took place, but I was a very inquisitive reader of newspaper reports and also a very anxious student of the Hansard reports, and I might say that if I had admired the astuteness of the Minister of the Interior I could not give as great a measure of admiration to his sense of fairness in the debate of 1918 as far as the breadth of the electoral franchise in a free country like Canada was concerned.

Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon up to five o'clock Canada apparently was to be given a fair, a liberal and a broad franchise. In the evening as the shadow of night fell I saw the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) enter the House, sit next to his colleague, the Acting Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie) and have a few words of private conversation. As to the outcome of this private conversation we have had this afternoon an explanation by the hon. Minister of the Interior himself—an explanation which may be very clever, but I must say that it has not removed from my mind all the doubts and suspicions that I entertain with regard to clause 29.

Coming back to the Acting Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker, he has been given highly flattering eulogies by the speakers on our side. I know that he is quite satisfied with them and anything in the way of compliment that I might give him would not add in any way to the very high appreciation we entertain of his speech of yesterday. But I notice, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Acting Solicitor General made two omissions. They may have been voluntary; I hope they were not.

The first omission was in connection with the very learned debate which took place in the House of Commons during the session of 1885 when the giants of Canadian politics of those days—Edward Blake, John A. Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and others, were fighting over the Franchise Bill and were debating whether provincial rights should prevail over federal privileges. It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to go into that discussion. I do not wish this afternoon to argue with the learned Acting Solicitor General whether the provincial franchise should be maintained as regards federal elections, but I simply wish to say to him that we on this side of the House—we who belong to the Liberal party, who have belonged to that Liberal party for many years—would have been more pleased when he mentioned the debate of 1885 if he had not omitted the name of the greatest statesman that Canada has produced—our late lamented leader, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. More so, Mr. Speaker, because in that memorable debate—

Mr. GUTHRIE: If my hon. friend will permit me, Mr. Speaker? I had a list of those names before me as I spoke yesterday and the name of Sir Wilfrid Laurier was certainly on my list after that of Sir John Macdonald. I thought I mentioned it, and I note it in Hansard to-day.

Mr. CANNON: I accept with great pleasure the explanation given by the Acting Solicitor General. I knew that it would be sufficient for me to draw his attention to that omission for him to repair it.

The second omission, Mr. Speaker, which I noticed in the remarks of the hon. Acting Solicitor General was that of a spirit of high statesmanship when he came to discuss the amendments to the electoral law of Canada introduced by the Laurier Government in 1908. The hon. gentleman told us that in 1908 he had supported amendments to the then Franchise Bill, and he gave us the reason why those amendments had been brought in. The way I wish to answer that part of my hon. friend's remarks is as follows: Either the vote given by the Acting Solicitor General in 1908 was a thoroughly honest vote—and I have no doubt that it was—and if such was the case I do not think that the Acting Solicitor General of Canada, speaking as such in the House of Commons, when introducing a Bill of such great moment as the Bill he introduced yesterday, should try to ridicule the Government of 1908 and their motives for having afforded him the opportunity of giving a good vote. Or, Mr. Speaker, the case may be the opposite, and the vote given by the hon. Acting Solicitor General in 1908 might not have been as good as I think it was. In such a case I think my hon. friend should not boast about it, because if he does we might have our doubts as to whether he is sincere—he must be—but we might have our doubts as to his sincerity on the present occasion.

The hon. Acting Solicitor General told us yesterday: "If there are any vices that can be remedied, if there is any flaw that can be removed, just point them out and I will be pleased to consider your suggestions." It is my intention to study most carefully and seriously the Bill when it comes in Committee of this House. And why so? Because the idea that the Acting Solicitor General may have of a vice or of a flaw may not be exactly the idea that I myself hold. When I consider the Votes and Proceedings of the Seventh Session of the Twelfth Parliament, that is, the session of 1917, I notice to my great surprise, although the hon. Acting Solicitor General yesterday afternoon told us that he had always fought in the fore ranks of the Liberal party, that during that session he left his party and voted in favour of the War-times Election Act. Therefore I conclude that although the Acting Solicitor General yesterday was very generous in his remarks, words in his mouth might not have the same meaning that they would have in the mouth of a leader of the Liberal party who always had remained faithful to the principles of the Liberal party.

Mr. Speaker, a gentleman made a speech yesterday—he represents the county of Frontenac. I do not wish to take the time of the House in commenting on the speech made by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), but I may tell him once and for all that whenever he attacks the province of Quebec, whenever he attacks our traditions, our aspirations and our ideals, whenever also he attacks our intellectual standing in the House of Commons or in the country, he reminds me very strongly, Mr. Speaker, of those niggers in Africa who complain that the sun shines too brightly in their eyes.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will recall that on the occasion in question the member for Frontenac was asked to withdraw that remark, and he did so. I do not know that any useful purpose can be served by reviving the incident.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. CANNON: Your remark, Mr. Speaker, is perfectly just. As I have said, I do not wish to take up the time of the House in this connection. I simply want to quote in reply to the member for Frontenac the words of a French poet. The hon. gentleman, will, I am sure, appreciate this reference. The poet, referring to those natives of Africa who complain that the sun shines too brightly in their eyes, goes on to say:

> Et le dieu poursuivant sa carrière.
> Versait des torrents de lumière
> Sur ses obscurs blasphémateurs.

No matter what the hon. member may say, the province of Quebec will continue to be, as she has been in the past and will be in the future, a model to the other provinces of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the Franchise Bill is introduced during the reconstruction period. The Government should be guided, so far as this legislation is concerned, by what happened in the country to the south of us during the reconstruction period which followed the Civil War. In those days there was a class of politicians in the United States who did not desire to forget what had happened during the Civil War and who, after General Lee had surrendered, peace had been signed and the southern armies had been demobilized, wanted to continue some of the conditions of war. These people, Mr. Speaker, were called "carpet baggers." I hope that we shall have none of that kind of politicians in Canada. I hope that on both sides of the House this question will be considered as it should be considered—as one of national importance, not one of political expediency.

The Acting Solicitor General talked of the Liberal party in a very light mood. But we on this side are not ashamed of the past record of our party—the party which framed the first franchise law in 1874; which gave the secret ballot; which in the different provinces has given a fair franchise; which in the province of Quebec has introduced the one man one vote system. Our party stands on this question with a record which should call forth the praise of every honest-minded citizen of Canada.

We wish to have a fair franchise. The question of disfranchisement has been discussed at length and been discussed by people who have more experience and knowledge than I have. I heard with great pleasure the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) say at the opening of the House that, the period of war being over, we wanted peace, and express the hope that his last days in politics would see a closer union of the different races of this country. If we wish to have harmony in Canada; if we wish to have union; if we wish to have good understanding, the sooner we remove from our statute books any law which is in the nature of class legislation; any law which discriminates against a certain section of our population, the sooner shall we attain the object hoped for by the Acting Prime Minister.

The time for a narrow franchise has gone. There may be some old-time Tories in this House, but they must know the history of England; they must know the history of politics in Canada. The Tory theory of granting the franchise to a class as opposed to the masses is dead and will never revive. In 1829 creed exclusions were done away with in England; in 1832 property exclusions were to a certain extent done away with. Since then other reform bills have been introduced and adopted in England, until to-day England has a franchise under which nearly every British citizen has the right to vote. In Canada we have had the same path to follow. We had a very narrow franchise act in Upper Canada; the same was true of Lower Canada. But since Confederation the basis of the franchise has been broadened every year, and now, when the Government introduces new legislation in this regard, the franchise ought to be given to every honest, law-abiding citizen of Canada, no matter what his origin may have been.

When the Franchise Act, having been amended to meet the desires of the Opposition and of the liberal-minded members on the Government side, has become law, let the Government show their good faith by immediately appealing to the country in order that the electors may choose a Government that will be representative of the wishes of the Canadian people, a Government that will have a programme and a policy designed to meet the needs of the moment. This Parliament is not representative of the people. Members sitting on the other side, members sitting on this side, do not represent the majority of the people in their respective constituencies, and the time has come for the election of a new Parliament. When this Franchise Bill becomes law and when an election is decided upon, I hope that the election will be conducted in such a way as to cause the Canadian people to forget all the horrors, all the irregularities and all the illegalities of the last election.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

The House went into Committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—short title.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is it the intention to take up any of the contentious clauses of the Bill this evening?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, we can run over a few of the purely formal and non-contentious clauses. If there is any objection to a clause, it can stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suggest that this first clause pass now, but in view of the fact that many members will not be present this evening I believe it will be more satisfactory to the House generally if we proceed in committee at a subsequent meeting. This evening we could take up some of the other Government measures, as suggested by my hon. friend (Sir George Foster) last evening.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We shall pass this one section. We shall come back after six o'clock in committee, but we shall not continue very long in committee on this Bill, and then we shall take up some other Government Bills.

Section agreed to.

At six o'clock the House resumed, and then took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 23, to incorporate Canadian American Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Griesbach.

Bill No. 33, to incorporate International Loan Company.—Mr. Blake.

Bill No. 34, respecting the Montreal and Southern Counties Railway Company.—Mr. Archambault.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT.

House again in committee on Bill No. 12, respecting the election of members of the House of Commons and the electoral franchise, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock, section one had been adopted.

On section two—Definitions.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The majority of the definitions that are to be found in section

2 are the same definitions, practically though not identically, as are to be found in our former election law. Some new phrases are introduced in this section. I think perhaps it might be well for us to consider the section subsection by subsection. In subsection (a) there is a mistake. The clause "advance poll" as meaning a poll held "as by section ninety-nine of this Act provided." I move that subsection (a) be amended by striking out the word ninety-nine" and inserting the words "one hundred" in lieu thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. TRAHAN: I think it was understood this afternoon that consideration of contentious clauses would be deferred for the time being, and any definitions that have a bearing on such clauses should, I think, be also postponed. I have read section 100, to which I take exception on many grounds, and inasmuch as subsection (a) of section 2 has reference to that section I would suggest that we let it stand for the moment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is merely a change from the word "ninety-nine" to the words "one hundred." This is only a matter of referring to the clause by its proper number.

Mr. TRAHAN: If later on section 100 were not adopted, then subclause (a) of section 2 would serve no purpose. It would be useless. I suggest therefore that as it has a bearing on section 100 we suspend its consideration.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If there is any objection to the adoption of this subsection I have no desire to press it.

Mr. GAUVREAU: There is a confusion between the French and the English versions of the Bill. Subsection (a) in the French version speaks of "agent officiel," and in the English version we are discussing "advance poll."

Mr. GUTHRIE: Under the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I move that the whole of section 2 stand.

Motion agreed to. Section stands.

On section 3—repeal:

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is a pretty general clause and on referring to schedule 4 on the last page of the printed Bill I think it will be seen that we have included there every Act of this Parliament which affects Dominion elections or anything in relation to them. The intention is to repeal everything.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. TRAHAN: In section 3 reference is made to a certain number of Orders in Council; they are all repealed. But the schedule refers only to the statutes. I would suggest that a list of the Orders in Council repealed should be put in the schedule.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That would be at variance with the practice of this or any other House. The statute does not recognize the repeal of the Orders in Council because they in general terms are referred to in section 3. The repeal of all statutes would necessarily include all Orders in Council whether that section so stated it or not. It is under the authority of a statute that the Orders in Council are passed. When we put a schedule of the statutes in the Bill I think that includes everything else.

Mr. BURNHAM: I would like to ask the minister if there is anything in the Act which does away with the provision which we had incorporated in the law after considerable trouble by which offences set out in this Act, instead of being the subject of indictment only, can be proceeded with by information before an ordinary magistrate and tried in the ordinary way. This is simply designed to have the law in general vindicated without any special or direct reference to the election, but it will be plain to anybody that it has a distinct bearing on an election case. If I lay an information against some person for the infraction of the Election Act, and have that dealt with by a magistrate and have the man fined, it is quite plain that there is something that has transpired under oath which would enable anybody to upset the election.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think we will have to wait till we come to these clauses. We are now dealing with the general repeal clause. I may say, however, for the information of the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) that this Bill does recognize both kinds of prosecutions. The more serious offences are dealt with by way of indictment and the less serious by summary conviction. I thas been suggested that perhaps it would be better to deal with all prosecutions under this Act by summary conviction. That is a matter that can be determined when we get to those clauses, which are about the middle of the Bill.

Mr. McKENZIE: I was not here when the explanation was given by the minister, but I understand that his position is that repealing the statutes repeals all Orders in Council. I do not go that far. I think rather the idea is that the Order in Council is made under the statute, that certain rights are extended under that Order in Council, and that although the statute itself may be repealed the Orders in Council stand. I do not think it falls to the ground merely because the statute does.

Mr. GUTHRIE: For anything heretofore done under the Order in Council, it stands just as the statute stands for any Act heretofore done under the authority of the statute, but for all future purposes both statute and Order in Council go.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister says so.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the best I can do.

Mr. McKENZIE: If he will take the general interpretation Act in the revised statutes he will find that the force of Orders in Council is more extended.

Mr. GUTHRIE: As I understand, without referring to the Interpretation Act, the effect of an Order in Council is precisely the same as the effect of a statute. It has the same force and effect as a statute—no more and no less. It has to be passed under the authority of some statute. Until the repeal of the Act anything done under the provisions of the Order in Council is perfectly valid, and continue to be valid, but on the repeal of the statute everything goes and no further Order in Council could be passed.

Mr. McKENZIE: I quite understand that no further order could be passed by virtue of the statute, but there is vitality, effect and force in the order already carried out under the statute.

Mr. GUTHRIE: To make the matter clear we have included in section 3 an express repeal of all Orders in Council. It cannot be doubtful under section 3.

On section 4—notices, how given:

Mr. BUREAU: It is rather a wide discretion to give an election officer when you say that he may advertise or give a notice in such a manner as he may see fit? All notices ought to be given for a purpose but this might mean giving no notice at all. In every other case where a notice is required. the mode by which the notice shall be given is provided for, whether it be by a poster in a public place or otherwise.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend should read line 3 of the section.

Mr. BUREAU: (reading):

When any election officer is by this Act authorized or required to give a public notice and no special mode of notification is indicated——

Mr. GUTHRIE: In every case the Act says what the notice shall be.

Mr. TRAHAN: The clause is useless, then.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is the clause from the old Act to cover any unforeseen case. It has been in the old law for many years although we have changed the language to a very slight extent. The old Act had the words "as he thinks best calculated"—not very elegant language in the first place. We have made an improvement in the language as it appears in section 4. It may be that some case requiring notice has not been provided for. I think, speaking from memory, every case is substantially provided for.

Mr. BUREAU: Strike out the section, then.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, because there may be cases unprovided for.

Mr. BUREAU: There ought not to be.

Mr. GUTHRIE: As we go on with the Bill I think we will make every point clear. In the meantime, I do not think the clause should be struck out.

Mr. POWER: In the course of the last election a case occurred where this clause might have been enforced. The returning officer in my riding refused to give me a list of the enumerators. I telegraphed to Mr. O'Connor at the time, and he stated that although there was no law on the subject I should be given the list. In spite of that, the returning officer refused to give me the list. I had to employ people to find out who the enumerators were. I imagine that would be a case where this section would apply.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, this has reference to public notice. However, if there is any contention I will let it stand.

Mr. BUREAU: We will go through the Bill and when we come to another clause where notice is to be given, we can provide the mode by which notice shall be given.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In all involved acts there is usually inserted a general clause to cover anything that might be unforeseen.

Mr. TRAHAN: These general clauses are always dangerous.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is more dangerous to have no general clause.

Mr. BURNHAM: I would like to impress upon the minister the fact that for any public notice, especially if it is a general one, a handbill is a very dangerous proceeding. The whole principle of giving notice in important affairs of a public character unquestionably is to post something in the public office of the municipality wherever that may be. Every city, every township, has a place where certain notices for the public benefit must be posted, and really I think the least the returning officer, or any other election officer, can do, is to post up there within a certain specified time the notice which he desires the public to take cognizance of. Because, to leave it to a handbill simply means that the handbill may be thrown away, and that be the end of it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If my hon. friend (Mr. Burnham) would examine the Act he would not make suggestions of that kind. As I say, so far as I know, and I think I know the Bill pretty well, every case where notice is necessary is specially provided for. With respect to anything the returning officer, the deputy returning officer, the registrar, or the judge has to do there is an express way of giving notice by posting, by registration, by publication in the newspapers. For every single case there is a specific provision. But it may be that same notice will be required that has not been provided for, and if so, rather than have no provision, we have a general clause. Take any important Act in the country, take the Municipal Act, and it is declared that in all other cases not otherwise provided for the advertisement shall be so-and-so. Under any general legislation occasion may arise when notice has to be given and there is nothing in the law which provides for it. This is intended only for cases not otherwise provided for.

Mr. BURNHAM: With all due deference to the minister and his reasoning I do not see why the analogy in the Bill itself should not be followed in a case not provided for. It is quite possible that something or other of an important nature may arise, not provided for by Parliament, which the election officer would treat as if it were of no importance whatever. He could give notice where it suited him, by handbill or otherwise. It might be extremely bad whether and nobody would know where to go to find out about these things. Above everything else in the world in the matter of an election it is most important that a candidate or his agent should know what is going on by simply visiting a certain office—going to a certain place and looking at the notice board to see if any new notice has been posted up. That is a precaution it is very easy to take. I am not at all convinced by the minister that because there may be some things unprovided, therefore the analogy in the very Bill itself should not be followed.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I agree with the clause and will give the committee an example of where it will be useful. Supposing you wanted to get a notice from Edmonton to Fort McMurray. There is no way in which notice can be given to a place three hundred miles away except by wire. Now supposing you wanted to give a notice to say to Fort Vermilion. There is no way in which you can cover the distance of three hundred miles except by sending a telegram to Peace River, and from there you will have to go in three hundred miles on horseback. If there is not a general clause by which you may use some discretion to get over those distances in our country publication will be of no use. This clause provides for a method and gives the returning officer discretion to do what he thinks best under all these circumstances. The clause is quite an important one and should stand as it is because of the great distances we have to contend with in the western country.

Mr. BURNHAM: I would say in reply to that, it is very easy for the man who has authority to send the telegram to say "Please post this telegram in the usual place for the municipality."

Mr. MACKIE: There is no such place.

Mr. BURNHAM: If there is no such place then all I have to say is that whilst the principle would be violated there is no question it is not of much importance. I can assure the hon. gentleman however that in more thickly settled places, in cases that are not so extreme as the hon. member has just spoken of, it would be an exceedingly dangerous thing, if a candidate had a hostile returning officer or election agents who were unfavourably disposed to him or were themselves unscrupulous.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: In the case of Fort McMurray the only places we have for posting of notices are the Hudson Bay Company's store and the office of the North Bay Transportation Company. The same at Fort Vermilion and also at Wabasca. The only places there are the Hudson Bay Agency and the Roman Catholic church. There is no use in talking about sending out notices in the western country, we have not got the facilities for it.

Mr. BURNHAM: I am talking about municipalities.

Section stands.

On section 5—printed documents to bear name, etc., of printer:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This clause is the same as the one in the old Act, is it not?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Under the old Act the penalty for non-compliance with the provision was $200 and costs or six months.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the penalty for violation of the provision in this case?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is much more serious.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Would printing cover typewriting?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know. It has been held in the province of Ontario that typewriting is printing. The clauses in regard to penalty will be found on page 67 commencing at section 84:

> Any person who is guilty of any indictable offence against this Act is liable on indictment or on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars and costs of prosecution or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, or to both such fine and costs and such imprisonment, and if the fine and costs imposed are not paid forthwith (in case only a fine and costs are imposed) or are not paid before the expiration of the term of imprisonment imposed (in case imprisonment as well as fine and costs is imposed) to imprisonment with or without hard labour for such term (or such further term) as such fine and costs or either of them remain unpaid, not exceeding three months.

With respect to non-indictable offences the fines are less. They are dealt with by section 85.

On section 6—Removing notices forbidden.—Copy of subsection 1 to be printed on documents posted up.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If memory serves me right that is the old clause unchanged.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is there any reason for repeating the penalty of this section? It is all set out in section 84.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would think that the provisions of section 84 applied to any offence under section 6. The latter section was taken bodily from the former election law, section 250A.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It seems to be needlessly encumbering the Statute.

Mr. TRAHAN: But this section must be published.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, there is some necessity for it. It has to be printed as a notice, and the notice would have to include the penalty. That is the object in view, I suppose.

Mr. BUREAU: Otherwise there would be no offence.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Oaths, how administered.—Gratuitous Administration.

Mr. DAVIS: I suggest that "police magistrate" be added there. I have an unpleasant recollection of an election that I lost in Manitoba because those words were not in the Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The section now includes "a judge of any court, a notary public, a justice of the peace or a commissioner for taking affidavits having authority or jurisdiction within the place where the oath or affirmation is administered." Personally, I see no objection to including "police magistrate." If the words are to be included I would insert them after "justice of the peace" in line 33.

Mr. MICHAUD: While we are adding a few words to this section I would suggest that we also add "stipendiary magistrate." He is not a justice of the peace.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think a stipendiary magistrate is a judge, but I see no objection to adding the words, "stipendiary magistrate, police magistrate," after the word "peace" in the thirty-third line.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I think it is worth while to have the French version before us while we are reading that section. The English version reads, "having authority or jurisdiction." Why is it that in the French version it is, "ayant autorité et jurisdiction." That is not a correct translation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I can hardly be held responsible for the translation into French —I wish I could be. I am glad my hon. friend has mentioned that point. I think both versions should be the same.

Mr. BUREAU: In the interpretation clause, Mr. Chairman, the word "judge" is defined. The definition is, "'judge' includes chief justice." I would have less doubt about a chief justice being a judge than I would about a stipendiary magistrate being one. If a chief justice is a judge, the puisne judges have not got much judgeship about them.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: It is sometimes difficult to get a justice of the peace in a polling booth when a deputy returning officer requires to be sworn in. Can the oath be administered by the poll clerk?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not sure on that point, Mr. Chairman. I will look it up.

Mr. J. H SINCLAIR: I see no reason why it should not be done It would be a great convenience if the statute provided for it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is only for the swearing in of officers that you want power given to the poll clerk to administer oaths?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The deputy returning officer is sworn in by the returning officer.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The returning officer, we will say, is the sheriff of the county and resides in the county town. The county may be a hundred miles long. My hon. friend surely does not mean that all the deputy returning officers must come before the returning officer to be sworn in? At any rate, it has not been the practice in the past.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think that the Act as drawn states before whom the deputy shall be sworn. Section 25 provides:

> Every deputy returning officer shall before acting as such take the oath in form H.

I assume that would be an oath taken before any person authorized by this Act to administer oath.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Suppose a returning officer residing in Edmonton appoints deputies at Peace River, Colling River, McMurray, Mackay, Fort Chipewyan and Fort Smith. These points cover a distance of several hundred miles, and at none of these places is there a notary public or justice of the peace. If you happen to find a member of the Mounted Police at his post you may get him to swear somebody as commissioner. But at the last election I endeavoured to get the Provincial Government to appoint a man a commissioner and send him along with the ballot boxes to swear the deputies as he went along the route. The Provincial Government was not favourable or kind to me and at first I was not able to succeed. However I took the matter up with Mr. O'Connor by wire and he got in touch with the provincial authorities and they finally yielded and had a man appointed who could go about and do this. It would be impossible for the returning officer to do the work himself. I would like to see some provision in the Act under which it would be possible for the authorities at Ottawa to appoint someone a commissioner to swear in deputies or other officers in these far away places.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Section 25 does not provide that the deputy returning officer shall be sworn in before any particular person; consequently he can be sworn in under the provisions of section 7. The returning officer can swear in the poll clerk, and the poll clerk, when sworn in, can swear in the deputy returning officer. Would that remove the difficulty?

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: No. In this stretch of country five hundred miles long there is no person to administer an oath, although there are six or eight ballot boxes and, consequently, six polls. The returning officer cannot accompany the men with the boxes and swear the deputies, so we have to get a commissioner, and that commissioner must be appointed by the local authorities. If the local authorities are not well disposed toward you, you may not get one at all, and the returning officer will be forced to take a trip of perhaps three hundred miles in order to administer this oath.

Mr. GUTHRIE: As the Bill is drawn, every deputy returning officer before acting as such must take the oath. The question raised by my hon. friend is: How is the deputy returning officer himself to be sworn? He cannot act until he is sworn; I see the difficulty where very great distances have to be covered and there are very few commissioners. When we come to section 25 I shall be glad if my hon. friend will remind me of that point.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What does the Acting Solicitor General say to my suggestion that the poll clerk be authorized to administer the oath to the deputy returning officer?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The poll clerk is appointed under section 26, but before he can act he must be sworn. We all assume that the first man sworn is the deputy returning officer; the deputy himself cannot appoint a poll clerk until he is sworn.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Then the deputy must go before a justice of the peace to be sworn.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He must go before someone authorized by this Act to administer an oath; then he can swear his poll clerk.

Mr. BUTTS: Is there any provision in the Act imposing a penalty upon any person with jurisdiction who refuses to administer an oath? We have had numerous cases in Nova Scotia where magistrates have refused to swear in a man, even for the voters' list.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, there is a provision in that regard somewhere between sections 80 and 90.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

On section 8—penalty for inducing persons to make false oath:

Mr. GUTHRIE: The former sections covering this subject were 273 and 274; they have been combined in one. The former section read, "Every candidate who," and so on; this section says, "Every person who" does so-and-so.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—executory contracts void:

Mr. POWER: Would this clause cover, for instance, a contract made by a candidate with a newspaper or an advertising concern for advertising?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think it would. An executory contract is a future contract uncompleted by payment, delivery or execution. The purpose of the section is to void promises made before an election to be implemented after. It has been the law of the land for many years.

Mr. POWER: There have been things in the law of the land for many years that I think are wrong. We have laid down as crimes things which are not crimes. Why force a man to commit a crime? I suppose every member of the House has at one time or another made a contract with a newspaper or an advertising agency for advertising—

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is not an executory contract. An executory contract is for something to be performed and paid for in the future.

Mr. POWER: What about the terms of the undertaking?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If it be an executory contract, the amount cannot be recovered. There are in this law provisions for the recovery of debts incurred during an election; there is a time within which an account must be rendered, and the like Those provisions will be found towards the end of the Bill. There is a general provision to make void every promise of an executory nature which is not to be performed before the election, promises which used to be made for the purpose of securing political influence here, there and the other place. I think there is a strong moral ground for retaining this section.

Mr. POWER: It is a promise or undertaking to pay, after the election, if one be elected. I maintain that we should not void it; there is nothing wrong in promising that you will pay a newspaper only if you be elected.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The case of a newspaper is an executory contract, so that it is a contract completed by execution. It may be postponed.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—contributions for political purposes:

Mr. PROULX: Is not subsection 2 going too far? It reads:

> Any company or association violating the provisions of this section.

Some shareholders might not know that the directors were making contributions. The word "wilfully" or the word "knowingly" should be inserted.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is a good old section passed after careful consideration. I think, in the year 1908, and possibly it was in the old Act of 1898. It is considered a very salutary proviso in our law. I would not open the door in this respect if I could avoid doing so.

Mr. DEVLIN: But do companies contribute towards election expenses?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They cannot under this clause.

Mr. CANNON: Why limit the clause to companies? Why not extend it to persons? It might be easy for a man connected with a big company to make a large contribution, and that would be just as wrong as if the contribution were made by the company.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No.

Mr. CANNON: Why not?

Mr. GUTHRIE: An individual has a heart and soul and mind of his own, and he has a right to vote and can lawfully exercise political influence. The case is different with a company. An incorporated company is not a person within the meaning of this legislation. The purpose of the section, as my hon. friend probably knows, was to get rid of a system that was growing up in the United States and in Canada, which was very objectionable in its results. The great corporations were exercising a large amount of influence on the political situation in this country and in the United States, heavy contributions being given by the corporations as such. Individuals might think twice before they would spend their own money; but when it was looked on as a matter of corporate funds and the result of the election might possibly help the general financial standing of the company; and ultimately favourable legislation might be passed by the successful party, huge contributions began to flow, not so much in this country as in the United States. But the time came in Canada when, in the wisdom of this Parliament, it became necessary to check that evil, and I think it has been fairly well checked in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Oh, oh. I do not think so.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) seems to smile at that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He is doubtful about it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know the system that prevails in the province of Quebec, but in Ontario and elsewhere the evil has been pretty well checked; and if it has not been checked in Quebec, let us devise legislation that will check it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Was that what my hon. friend told us after the election of 1911 when he came back to the House?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not remember ever discussing the question of contributions by corporations in this House, and I did not tell any one anything about it. I think this is the first time in twenty years that I have ever opened my mouth on the subject. But if there be any doubt as to what is going on in this respect, let us have a law broad enough to stop it, and if the present enactment be not broad enough, let us improve it. I would not suggest weakening it in any way, I would suggest strengthening it.

Mr. CANNON: I was suggesting to my hon. friend that the law should be broadened by adding the word "person." He mentioned Quebec. Naturally I am more familiar with conditions existing in Quebec than with conditions existing in the other provinces, but in Quebec, and probably in all the other provinces, individuals doing very large business now do not do their business under their individual names any more, but under corporate names. Most people do that. Therefore, individuals who have in reality the greatest interest and sometimes all the interest in the companies are doing business under corporate names in our province—and I think the same is true of most of the provinces. These gentlemen naturally will not, according to this clause, contribute as a corporation, but they may well do so individually under their personal names, and that is not supposed to be an indictable offence, although the result is exactly the same in the end.

9 p.m.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They cannot use corporate money for the purpose.

Mr. CANNON: But the corporate money is their own money.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I never before heard that it was considered as wrong in this or in any other country for a man, out of his private means, to contribute to a cause which is desired to succeed in an election. I never heard it suggested before that such a thing was an offence or wrong in principle or morals or in any other respect. But it has always been considered, to say the least, as a matter of doubtful propriety, to use corporate funds in an election. Under this clause an individual cannot, as a shareholder, or officer, or attorney, or agent of a company, contribute any corporate money. The company itself cannot contribute. But I have never yet heard it suggested that an individual should not be permitted, out of his private money, to contribute some of his money for the success of the cause which he happens to have at heart.

Mr. MAHARG: Is this clause exactly the same as the clause in the old Act?

Mr. GUTHRIE: With the exception of two or three words, it is.

Mr. MAHARG: Would the minister mind giving us those exceptions?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The clause in the old Act read as follows:

Mr. DEVLIN: Is the minister referring to the Act of 1911?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I am referring to the Act of 1908. If I recollect the matter properly, the only change in the clause is in the first words. The first words of the old section read:

Any company or association.

And the first words in the present clause read:

No unincorporated company or association and no incorporated company or association.

Mr. MAHARG: Does this mean that no group of individuals, whether large or small, can contribute to or secure funds in any way for the purpose of the election campaign of a candidate?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think that is practically the effect of the section. No business men can group themselves together as a company or association, whether incorporated or not, to contribute funds towards an election campaign.

Mr. MAHARG: According to the section no group of labour men, returned soldiers or others—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Farmers.

Mr. MAHARG: —can group themselves together, unless they get incorporated, to assist financially in the election of a candidate. Could this be done under the old Act?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The object aimed at is to prevent men from grouping together and using their joint contribution for the purpose of assisting in an election campaign.

Mr. MAHARG: What about their individual contributions?

Mr. GUTHRIE: An individual contribution would not be viewed as unlawful, but if a number of men joined together in the form of an association for the purpose of using their joint contributions towards a campaign it would be unlawful under this Act.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I think the same purpose was accomplished with the section as it stood in the old Act. Why make people suspicious that this section has been drafted in a different way with the object of reaching them? What is the object of changing the words of the two first lines?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The only reason I know for the change was that it would prevent men from grouping themselves together for the purpose of influencing an election by financial contributions.

It seems that this is one of the clauses that may be regarded as contentious, and in view of my statement this afternoon perhaps it might be as well for us to postpone its further consideration for the time being. I would therefore move to let the section stand.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Does the minister think that individuals could group together under the old Act?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think they could. The only groups prohibited under the former Act were those who incorporated.

Mr. DEVLIN: They could not group together under the old Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has been pointed out to me that my interpretation of the former law was incorrect. The former Act provided that "no company or association other than one incorporated for political purposes alone shall" etc. That would cover a group or association just as under the present Act. The draughsman of the present Bill, Mr. W. F. O'Connor is, I may say, an experienced man, and he changed the language into "no unincorporated company or association" etc.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I desire to put myself on record in favour of this law, which I think is a good one, although possibly it might be improved. I think that the cure for the evil we are trying to overcome is publicity, and if the minister can devise some method by which funds will be made public the difficulty will be met in every respect. I think this clause is to some extent insufficient. The real cure is publicity of campaign funds, and I should like to know if there is anything in the Act in this regard?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a provision. I have not the exact section, but it is the same provision as in the former law, which requires that a detailed statement of all contributions, payments, loans, advances, deposits or promises of money made on behalf of the candidate, shall be given to the agent or returning officer for publication.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think this section might very well stand. But before leaving it I would say that, it being mainly intended, as I interpret it, to prevent business corporations from contributing to campaign funds, it has my hearty approval. I feel that it cannot be made too exacting. In order to make perfectly clear the purpose of the section, I think it would be an improvement if one or two words were added to subsection 2. This subsection reads:

Every director, shareholder, officer, attorney or agent of any company or association violating the provisions of this section * * * * is guilty of an indictable offence, etc.

I should like to see inserted, after the word "agent," the words "or any person on behalf of any company or association."

Mr. GUTHRIE: In law the term "agent" includes any person acting on behalf of another. However, I note the suggestion of the hon. member.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My desire is to have it made perfectly clear that the law prohibits business corporations from contributing to political funds, and I should like to see the section amended to that extent.

Section stands.

On section 11—Persons not electors and not residents of Canada forbidden to canvas:

Mr. GUTHRIE: The change here is in reference to the penalty. Under the former Act the penalty was from $100 to $200, or six months' imprisonment. Now it will be an indictable offence punishable by fine up to $2,000.

Mr. CANNON: What is the reason for this clause?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is fairly explicit; it is a clause adopted by Parliament in 1908. I do not know that I can give any better reason than the language in the section. I do not think I could give the reason for it better than it is given in the language of the section:

Any person, not being an elector, who resides without Canada and who, to secure the election of any candidate, canvasses for votes or in any way endeavours to induce voters to vote for any candidate at an election, or to refrain from voting, is guilty of an indictable offence against this Act punishable as in this Act provided.

The object was to prevent convassing by the foreigner who has no right or business in this country, who is not a native of Canada, and who only takes part in an election as a paid agent. A man who has no stake in the country will take a desperate chance that a citizen of the country would not take, and then skips over the border when the election is over so that he cannot be reached by our criminal law.

Mr. CANNON: Take an election in which we would have imperial preference discussed in Canada, would a person from Great Britain be debarred?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is not a foreign country.

Mr. FIELDING: It says anybody who resides outside of Canada.

Mr. CANNON: People of that class will be debarred from taking part in an election. Suppose we should discuss at a future election the question of reciprocity and a prominent man from the United States would like to address a meeting in Montreal and tell the people there what his views were upon that question; this section would bar him out of our country.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, it is to be "at an election," and "at an election" is defined in section 2 as including:

The period after the issue of the writ for an election, or after the dissolution of Parliament or the occurrence of a vacancy in consequence of which a writ for an election is eventually issued, until the elected candidate is returned as elected.

People who came out from Great Britain or other parts of the world to discuss public questions could not be very well be said to be coming here for the purpose of securing the election of any candidate. They would not be canvassing for votes at an election.

Mr. CANNON: Certainly they would.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I can only say to my hon. friend that I do not know the exact origin of this section but my hon. friends across the way who then sat in the Government when this Act was put upon the statute book can probably give the reason for it better than I can. I admit the propriety of it. I see good reason for it and I do not think it is open to the narrow interpretation that the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) seeks to put upon it.

Mr. CANNON: I am perfectly willing to accept any interpretation that the minister can give, but that is how I interpret the clause, and I think my interpretation is right.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think my hon. friend's interpretation is absolutely wrong. The Act says that the person must be here canvassing and that he must be here at an election.

Mr. CANNON: "endeavours to induce"—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, I grant that. The object was to keep out a person who had not a vote in this country and who had no interest in the election. The real object that the section was intended to achieve was to keep out stragglers from the other side who came in here, hired by some political party or other and who, after having done their nefarious work, quit the country, went to the other side and we were not able to catch them.

Mr. MOWAT: If the section were wider than the Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie) says it would not do any harm, because the words are "in any way endeavour to induce voters to vote for any candidate at an election." That means during the period intervening between the issue of the writ and the polling day. I do not see why persons from outside should come into Canada anyway.

Mr. DEVLIN: I called the attention of the House to this section this afternoon. The hon. Minister of Militia not having been here at the time, the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) took note of the objection, but apparently the Minister of Militia has not received any intimation of it. I will repeat in substance, very shortly, the objection I have to this clause. By section 11 it is provided that:

> Any person, not being an elector, who resides without Canada and who, to secure the election of any candidate, canvasses for votes or in any way endeavours to induce voters to vote for any candidate at an election, or to refrain from voting, is guilty of an indictable offence against this Act punishable as in this Act provided.

That means that any citizen of England —I used the words "citizen of England" this afternoon to call attention to the absurdity of the matter; I might have included any citizen of Ireland, or any citizen of Scotland, or anybody residing in the Isle of Man, or any other place that I might mention—would not have the right to come over here and try to influence—I want the minister's attention because this is a serious point—or induce any voter to vote for any candidate. By section 38 of the act any one of these gentlemen may be a candidate himself. The result is that of any man in England, or Ireland, or Scotland, or the Isle of Man, or Newfoundland, wants to be a candidate for this House, he may be one.

Mr. POWER: He would go to jail.

Mr. DEVLIN: No, he could be a candidate. But if he undertook to come over and hold meetings and say to the electors: "You should vote for me" for the reasons I have given, he would find himself landed in jail. Now that is very absurd and I would like to ask the minister if he can offer any other interpretation of the clause to the House.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It would be a very easy matter to change section 38 by saying that all candidates for seats in this House shall be residents of Canada. I think they should be. I quite approve of the section as it is drawn, but it is not of very great consequence. I would not like to see it changed unless there is some good reason for it. My hon. friend and myself were in the House when the section was put in and we supported the Government that had put it there. I thought it was a good section.

Mr. DEVLIN: That was section 69.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, both sections,—certainly section 11.

Mr. DEVLIN: I do not wish to interrupt the minister but if he will allow me, I have under my hand section 69 of the Act which my hon. friend refers to and which corresponds to section 38. Section 38 of this Bill reads:

> Except as in this Act otherwise provided any British subject, male or female, who is of the full age of twenty-one years, may be a candidate at a Dominion election.

The clause to which the minister refers in section 69 of the Dominion Elections Act which reads:

> Except as in this Act otherwise provided any British subject may be a candidate in an election for a seat in the House of Commons. No qualification in real estate shall be required of any candidate.

That is really more favourable to the British subject.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not see how. I may be obtuse but I cannot see the difference.

Mr. DEVLIN: Well, I did make the remark to the Minister of the Interior that I might be dull but I could not help seeing it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I see the anomaly that might arise if we permit section 38 to remain as it is in the Bill. What I suggested was that we could very easily cure the difficulty by inserting a few words in section 38 to provide that a person who offers himself as a candidate for election to this Parliament should be a resident of Canada.

Mr. DEVLIN: If the minister is going to undertake to debar any British subject from being a candidate for this House then I cannot offer any further objection.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Unless he is a resident of Canada.

Mr. DEVLIN: I cannot offer any further objection.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I personally would be prepared to go that far.

Mr. DAVIS: If the clause were amended so as to read that any person who canvasses for votes or who, by personal solicitation, endeavours to induce voters to vote for any candidate other than himself at an election, that will fix the whole matter.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has been suggested to me that we could meet the point raised by my hon. friends opposite very simply by amending the first line of section 11 to make it read thus:

Any person, not being an elector or a candidate—

And so on. Then my hon. friend would be able to carry out his wish that at some time or other in the future, residents of the British Isles might sit in this House. I do not agree with the proposal, but if the Committee is willing I am perfectly content that after the words "not being an elector" we shall add "or a candidate."

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. DEVLIN: I do not take the responsibility for it; it is the Act of the Government.

Mr. POWER: Notwithstanding the very lucid explanation of the Acting Solicitor General I am still opposed to this clause. I expect we will very shortly have in this country a strong Labour party. The Labour party are about to organize and will perhaps need in their organization the help and assistance of some members of their body in the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POWER: I see no reason why they should not be allowed to come in—

An hon. MEMBER: Keep them out.

Mr. POWER: —to help in an election by speeches. More than that we shall also have, I think—

An hon. MEMBER: We have got enough Socialists here now.

Mr. POWER: —a strong Prohibition party. I see no reason, for instance, why "Pussyfoot" Johnson, who is now in England, should not come here, and yet if "Pussyfoot" Johnson were to come here he might be put in jail, and then the President of the Privy Council would be in trouble.

An hon. MEMBER: Even Billy Sunday might come here.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. POWER: In any of these cases it might be pleaded that intervention on the part of strangers would be perfectly legitimate. Lord Jellicoe could even come here and explain his naval proposals. I would not like to see Lord Jellicoe put in jail.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would not like to see him here engaged in an election either.

Mr. POWER: It would not be a good thing for the Tory party. However, if the clause must remain let the hon. gentleman make it a proper one. The clause provides:

Any person, not being an elector, who resides—

And so on. Well, residence is a very difficult term to define. A man who remains here over night might be deemed to "reside" in Canada. If the Acting Solicitor General adopted the phrase "who is domiciled in the country," then I think perhaps the clause might suit his purpose. In the province of Quebec we have discussed the question of "residence" and "domicile" in making up electoral lists time and again, and I would ask the minister to substitute "domicile" for "residence."

Mr. MANION: As a representative of another province than that of my hon. friend opposite, I should like to say that personally I am convinced that the Canadian people can very well run their own elections without assistance from either English or Americans.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 12—conveyance of electors to polls, etc., for hire, forbidden.

Mr. GUTHRIE: These are the time-honoured clauses 270 and 271 which have been for a long time in our law.

Mr. FIELDING: Honoured more in the breach than in the observance.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They have been combined in these proposals and the language has been changed to some extent but the change does not affect the meaning. There are the same old sections, and as my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) said a moment ago perhaps more honoured in the breach than in the observance. It has not been my experience, but I have heard of it in other cases.

Mr. P. McGIBBON: I think we ought to be candid and fair and strike this out.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Let us be honest.

Mr. McGIBBON: No man can run an election nowadays under this provision and get the vote out. People will not walk five, ten, or fifteen miles to vote. The candidate has got to get the vote out, no matter what party he belongs to or what Government he supports. This piece of hypocrisy that as my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) has said is observed more in the breach than in any other respect. I think we ought to be honest and strike it out.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I endorse that view, only I support it more strongly than the hon. gentleman has done. In the last election when I heard my opponent was hiring everything in the city I engaged more men to go and hire the remaining conveyances. I make this statement without any reservation. If any gentleman wants to prosecute me under the Act for what I have done he can do so, but I will institute prosecution against every other member of the House if anything is started on me. As a matter of fact, however, that is the practice that is followed. I will give you a good reason for it. In the city of Edmonton there is a pretty large territory, as much as would accommodate the cities of Chicago and New York. They have two or three mills there and the men cannot go to the polls in the morning; the operator will not allow them out at noon except for an hour. If you are to get these men to the polls between five and seven o'clock you must do something else than merely send invitations to them. It is well known that we have been hiring conveyances for election purposes, and I endorse the statement of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) that it is time for us to stop being hypocrites.

Mr. BUTTS: Just before the motion for the adoption of this clause is put let me say that I agree entirely with the Bill as it stands only it does not go quite far enough. I think it would be well if the Acting Solicitor General would add to the prohibited conveyances:

Dirigibles, hydroplanes, submarines, submarine chasers, and all other chasers.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, all that my hon. friend has suggested is covered by the clause as it now stands in these words "or other means of conveyance." I think, though, this clause might stand. As we have made fair progress on the Bill I now move that the Committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Before you leave the Chair—

The CHAIRMAN: The motion is not debatable.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not want to debate the motion, but—

The CHAIRMAN: If the minister wishes to withdraw his motion it will be in order for the hon. member to continue the debate.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I withdraw my motion.

ELECTION IN ST. JAMES, MONTREAL.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I wish to ask if the Government has any information to give the House in regard to the election in St. James, Montreal? Is it to be postponed on account of the notices being sent out too late?

Rt. Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I have no knowledge of any postponement of the election. I have seen it stated that there has been some irregularity in connection with the lists, but I have not definite information as to what the particular irregularity is. If I may be permitted to give an impression that I do not want to be bound by, I would say that it does not seem clear to me that there is any authority in any one to decide that there is any irregularity and to postpone the election. If there be any gross irregularity, I can see that it would be for the courts to deal with it when properly seized of the particulars. However, I am speaking without accurate knowledge of what is the difficulty that is said to exist.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I move that the Committee rise, report progress and beg leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

BRITISH COLUMBIA INDIANS.

SETTLEMENT OF DIFFERENCES CONCERNING INDIAN LANDS.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior and Superintendent General of Indian Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 13 to provide for the settlement of differences between the Governments of the Dominion of Canada and the Province of British Columbia respecting Indian lands and certain other Indian affairs in the said province.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and the House went into Committee thereon—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 2—Power given to Governor in Council to settle differences between Canada and British Columbia respecting Indian matters.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Mr. Chairman, is this Act based on the report of the commission with reference to lands in British Columbia which was tabled a few days ago?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the Act has anything to do at all with the Commission "that reported a few days ago." I do not know what commission the hon. member refers to.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: With reference to Indian lands in British Columbia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That commission reported in the early months of 1916.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR. That is the commission I referred to. I think the report was tabled by the leader of the Government a few days ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That may be, but I presume the report was put on the Table four years ago as well. It would be tabled a few days ago for the assistance of the House in the debate. That is the report referred to in the preamble to the Bill, and it was made in the early part of 1916.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What was the total cost of that commission?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The information has been given before, of course, but I can give it again. The total cost, inclusive of salaries and living allowances, clerical services, travel of clerical staff, transportation, surveys—a great many surveys had to be made in connection with the work—office expenses, including rent, printing, binding and lithographing—$317,797.68.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: That is a very large amount. Could the minister tell us why the money was spent by that commission?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The principal reason is that the commission lasted so long. I would not like to state whether it took longer than was necessary to do its work, but there are some who think it did.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Would the minister state how much was paid to the commissioners?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The amount paid in salaries was $159,255.76, extending over four years, and the amount paid in living expenses was $62,490.92.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The minister has not specified the commissioners who received this money.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The commissioners were as follows: Hon. E. L. Wetmore, chairman, from April 12 to November 30, 1913; N. W. White, commissioner; G. H. Bergeron as secretary; J. A. J. McKenna as commissioner; S. Carmichael as commissioner; D. H. Macdowall as commissioner; J. P. Shaw as commissioner; C. H. Gibbons as assistant secretary and secretary; A. H. Green, D.L.S., as technical officer; and McGregor Young as counsel.

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand that the Bill is made to empower the Governor in Council to carry out agreements which may be the result of the report of the commission to settle Indian affairs in British Columbia?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not quite. The commission was appointed in pursuance of an agreement between the representatives of the Government of British Columbia and the representatives of the Government of Canada. The differences between the two Governments had lasted for a number of years; indeed, I think ever since British Columbia was a province. The two Governments by agreement undertook to appoint a commission composed of two representatives for British Columbia and two for the Dominion, the four so appointed to appoint a fifth, and the cost to be shared equally. The expense figures I have given are shared equally by the two Governments. Perhaps I should very briefly state what the points of difference were. The British Columbia Government had contended that it, as distinct from the Governments of the other provinces, was entitled to a reversionary interest in all the Indian reserves in British Columbia; that is to say, if for any reason, whether by extinction of the tribe or by a decision to sell the reserves, or for any other cause, the land or any part thereof ceased to be used by the Indians, the Government of Canada was not entitled to sell that land on any portion of it being surrendered and place the money in a trust fund for the benefit of the Indians, as is done in the case of every other province, but that that land upon so ceasing to be used by the Indians reverted to the province of British Columbia. The administration of Indian affairs, if such a claim were to be conceded, would become not only very difficult but a tremendous burden upon the Dominion. That claim has not been conceded by the Government of Canada. The Government of British Columbia, by the terms of the Act of Union of 1874, bound itself to provide lands or reserves in that province adequate to the needs of the Indians, and the Government of Canada, on the other hand, bound itself to maintain a standard of Indian administration, equal in generosity, equal in liberality towards the Indians, to that maintained by British Columbia prior to Confederation. Clause 19 of the agreement, if I remember correctly—I do not know that I can express it fully; I have not the clause before me now—used words upon which British Columbia based its claim to this reversionary interest.

As time proceeded it became evident that certain reserves were larger than was necessary for the purposes of the Indians. That is true in every province. Scarcely a week passes without a surrender being made in some province of a portion of a reserve, the lands so surrendered being sold by the department and the proceeds going, according to the terms of surrender, to the trust fund,—some of them usually going to the Indians themselves direct. So this occurred in British Columbia. Reserves were found to be larger than necessary, and in some cases they were found to be too small. This, then, immediately brought to an acute point the question what was to be done with the reserves so in excess. We could not sell them, because if we did the money would not be ours, and we had no money with which to get new reserves.

I think I have indicated to the committee some of the difficulties that arose. It was determined by the two Governments that there should be a final end to this controversy. It was made more acute by the developments in relation to the Kitsilano reserve, which had become a very valuable property, to the business centre of the city of Vancouver; indeed, it was required by the Vancouver Harbour Commission in connection with harbour developments. That, then, became a fitting cause for the sale of that reserve and for the acquirement of some other land less valuable but more adapted to Indian habitation and to Indian pursuits. The property was valued at anything from half a million to a million and three-quarters. The Harbour Board had to have the property, but both Governments were claiming the proceeds, we, of course, claiming them only as trustees. There was not time,—and furthermore there were other objections to doing so,—to have this question of reversionary title decided by the courts. Consequently, an agreement was entered into and provision made therein whereby interim reports should be made, interim recommendations by the commission looking to the disposal of reserves or parts of reserves that might be immediately required for other purposes. Now, it was a term of that agreement, and embodied in the Orders in Council passed by the respective Governments subsequently adopting the agreement, that the agreement should be sympathetically received and acted upon by the two governments subject to such conditions or modifications as would be deemed reasonable. The effect was that virtually there was no agreement at all further than an agreement to have the matter investigated, and while that in itself might be worth while, it did not lead to any finality. The Commission set to work and performed—on the whole, I think, very well—undoubtedly a very laborious task. Interim reports were made. One report was made with respect to this Kitsilano reserve, and that report was acted upon. As a result the Harbour Commissioners took possession of the Kitsilano reserve, and have possession of it to-day, but we are still in controversy as to what is to be done with the money. Accordingly, the Harbour Board has not paid any money and there is no decision as to what they are going to pay or what is going to be done with the money when it is paid. A report was received in the early months of 1916 recommending certain cut-offs and certain new reserves, and the Government of Canada not long afterwards intimated its readiness to accept the report and to abide and be bound thereby. The report provided on the general and main issue that where land was found to be in excess of requirements, that excess might be sold and the proceeds equally divided between the two Governments, the Government of Canada to utilize the portion so received by it on behalf of the Indians for whom, of course, it was trustee. Now, the Government of British Columbia did not deal with the report at all. They indulged in certain communications from time to time, it is true, but they have not yet intimated their willingness to accept. Indeed, we have at the present time no official communication—one was made and withdrawn—as to what the Government of British Columbia is prepared to do with regard to that report. But at the last session of the legislature of that province the Government took power to negotiate with the Dominion Government looking to the adoption of the report embodying modifications which were to result from the negotiations. There is no question in my mind that legislation is necessary to enable that to be done. That being the attitude and the action taken by the Government of British Columbia it seems desirable that we should be in the same position, because there will be no object in our negotiating with them without authority. They stand there with the authority given them by their legislature; it seems to me right and necessary that we have similar authority from ours. We have a list of the cut-offs recommended and also of the additions recommended; and the report is on the Table. This legislation is authority to negotiate and to make binding any agreement arrived at covering various details of these cut-offs and the disposition of the proceeds.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Can the dispute not be settled by the courts?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is possible that the question of reversionary interest might be settled on a stated case. My information is that an attempt was made some time ago by the legal departments of the two governments to come to terms on a stated case, but they could not agree on a stated case. A suggestion has been made again by the Attorney General of British Columbia looking to a stated case on two or three phases. They claim absolute ownership of the Kitsilano reserve. They claim reversionary interest and interest at law in all the other reserves. But in his communiction the Attorney General stated that the British Columbia Government were anxious to settle the matter amicably if they could. I have replied to that communication with a proposal which I hope will result in an amicable settlement of this question.

But even if such a settlement should be arrived at, that would not take care of the subjects sought to be taken care of by this Bill.

The question is, what shall be cut off from the reserves. There are one thousand reserves in British Columbia alone, and they are all dealt with in the report. Even though the question of the reversionary interest were settled, we would still have to negotiate with the province as to just what cut-offs should be made from various reserves, what additions should be made to others and what reserves should be added in the province. Consequently the legislation is necessary in any event even though we may have come to a stated case on the question of reversionary interest.

Mr. BUREAU: The clause itself seems to presume that, because power is asked for the Governor in Council to fulfil every act, deed, matter or thing necessary for the carrying out of the said agreement between the Governments of the Dominion of Canada and the province of British Columbia according to its true intent. There is something that seems to be rather of a judicial character, namely as to the intent of the agreement. If you cannot agree together and get a stated case, how are you going to come out of the matter? If you give power to the Governor in Council, and the Government of British Columbia does not agree, what is the effect?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If we do not agree, we do not get anywhere; but if we do agree as to the intent, then doubtless this clause makes the agreement binding.

Mr. BUREAU: It gives the Government power to make it binding?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. DEVLIN: I do not wish to interfere in the affairs of British Columbia, but it seems to me—and I have had some experience in connection with the Indian Act—that this legislation in clause 3 of the present Bill is asked for independently of what may appear in the Indian Act. We are the custodians of the rights of the Indian, and the Government cannot take away from the Indians any of their reserves without first obtaining a surrender from the Indians concerned. The Government having obtained that surrender—I speak now from memory—the money goes to the credit of the Indians. If this Bill is passed, then it varies altogether the provisions of the Indian Act. I have in memory now a case in the constituency which I represent. There are two settlements, one of which is a very important settlement, at the other end of the county, called the village of Maniwaki. The land connecting the adjoining settlement, the River Desert, with the village of Maniwaki belongs to the Indian Reserve, and the river Desert runs right through that, and alongside of that is the main road which is practically the only communication between the two places. For years I applied to the Minister of Public Works of the former Government, not the present Government, and later to the Minister of Indian Affairs, to have that roadway protected by some kind of construction. The Public Works Department could not act because this land was Indian land. This Government, I feel sure, would not be prepared to act possibly for the same reason, although I want to call the attention of the Minister of Indian Affairs to the fact that it is work that is absolutely necessary for the preservation of the Indian Reserve. It is also work that is absolutely necessary to preserve a means of communication between the one place and the other. Upon this land that I speak of now in the immediate vicinity of the water, very few Indians reside; I think that right around there might be one family of Indians. And yet that land cannot be taken away from the Tribe. The Tribe still exists and the Tribe will not surrender. If this legislation is passed, of course, similar legislation could be applied as to Indian reserves in the province from which I come and with which I am more familiar. I fail to see in what way, whilst the Indian Act remains, even in spite of clause 3 or any clause of the Bill, you are going to take away from the Indians vested rights. You may alter the sections of the Indian Act, but these are vested rights

10 p.m.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know the reserve to which the hon. member refers in the province of Quebec at Maniwaki, having been there, and I know the position of the road and river. It is quite true that the Indian Department would be powerless to take from that reserve any portion of it without the formality of a previous surrender, and it is quite true that in this case also of the British Columbia reserves, affected by the report of the commissioners, though we might agree on a settlement of this whole trouble, dating back almost to Confederation, we would be absolutely powerless to carry it out if even one band, for any reason, however capricious, were to say: We will not surrender these two acres —or whatever the area may be. It is only in most exceptional cases and for most extraordinary reasons that the Government, as the guardian of the Indians, should assert the right to take any land without the consent of the band. But for the life of me I do not know how we are ever going to settle this matter unless we do assert that right. We have no reason to apprehend especially that there will be the exercise of caprice or obstinacy on the part of these bands. It will be our endeavour in any event to secure surrenders, even though this clause passes. But surely it is only right that we should have the power to carry out this settlement, because the legislation is asked for only for the purpose of carrying it out, and otherwise we cannot administer Indian affairs in British Columbia. It is for the purpose of settlement that this commission was appointed, and in order to make the settlement effective we must have the power in this clause. The reasons are extraordinary; the circumstances are most unusual and compelling, and on that account I decided to ask Parliament for this power in this special case.

Mr. DEVLIN: I said at the opening of my remarks that I did not wish to enter into the details of British Columbia affairs. Does the minister think that if this legislation passes, he will be able to give a good and valid title?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. This legislation, being subsequent to the Indian Act, is valid legislation. I do not think there is any doubt of that. This legislation has been submitted to the Justice Department and they understand the purport of this clause.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are the Indians themselves satisfied with the settlement that is proposed here?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is a pretty large order. I do not know that they are. I believe the Indians of British Columbia, at least some people who represent them, claim that they want to go to the foot of the Throne on the whole question of Indian title in British Columbia, but that is another question. They claim that the old Indian title has never been extinguished in British Columbia, but I do not think there will be any object served in getting into a discussion of that subject; it has to do with the state of mind of the Indians, and I do not think I would be justified in saying that all the Indians of British Columbia are satisfied, because I do not think they are and I do not think they ever will be.

Mr. BUREAU: I have here something new that has just been brought to my notice. It is a letter from the special agent of the Allied Tribes of Indians of British Columbia. From this letter they appear to be dissatisfied and they would like to have a hearing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does that not refer to a hearing with respect to Bill No. 14 rather than this Bill?

Mr. BUREAU: To this Bill. They say that they had a promise in 1910 that their case would be submitted to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and that the matter would be adjudicated. I do not think that the minister should entertain any objection to going into this question. Whatever there is in these people's contention, we might just as well know it and see where we stand. As the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) has said, we are brushing aside the Indian Act in this case, and giving the Governor in Council the right to take any part in an Indian reservation without surrender. If we brush aside the Indian Act, the money which is derived from the sale of the reservations will be disposed of without reference to the provisions of the Indian Act, and it follows that the whole procedure after taking over the land will not be under the operation of that Act. If this matter could be postponed I could look into it further and be able to submit information to the minister that might possibly throw light on the subject.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There will be no need of that, for the reason that if the Indian contention is right, or if they should be encouraged to go to the Privy Council or anywhere else on the question of the extinction of the original Indian title, they will be in just as good a position after this measure goes through as they are now. Their claim, if it is good, challenges the whole foundation of the original Indian Act, but their request to be heard should have no bearing on this Bill. This Bill would be invalid in relation to British Columbia lands in the same way that the whole Indian Act would be invalid, if their claim were good. That is to say, they might just as well be heard against the Indian Act as against this. I do not think their request has anything to do with the question of the wisdom of passing this legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the minister would get on as quickly with the Act by postponing further discussion for the time being as if he proceeded and we had to delay the third reading for a time. There are some representatives of the Indians in the city at the present time who wish to be heard in reference to the matter, and who are anxious to present their case to some members of the House, and I think it is due to them that we should give them a chance of being heard through their representatives.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If there are any Indians who want to be heard in relation to this Bill I have not heard of it. There are Indians who have come down and have seen myself and other ministers, and no doubt hon. members also. They want to be heard in relation to an amendment to the Indian Act and it is mainly for that reason that that Act is being referred to a committee. But I cannot see why they should want to be heard in relation to this Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have a petition from Indians, asking to be heard in reference to this very Act.

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a wonder they did not petition me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know why they did not, unless it was, as the minister has intimated to-night, that he was not inclined to listen to the Indian point of view.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never heard of the matter before.

Mr. PECK: While I have no desire to see this Bill hurried through, I desire to say a word or two in regard to the advisability of proceeding. There are more Indians in the constituency of Skeena than perhaps in any other riding in Canada, and I am the very last man who would wish to do an injustice to them. I have the very greatest respect for the Indian tribes in my riding, especially the more advanced tribe of Tsimpshian; but I have known of this controversy for a long time, and I do not see that we shall get anywhere unless we empower the minister to deal with the Government of British Columbia. There are in British Columbia a lot of reserves that have been held up for years, such for instance as the Giltsalt Reserve. I may say that there is a good deal of mining up in the mountains and in the valley, and the whole development of the district is held up because the reserve cannot be dealt with. If this Bill passes it will be possible, I understand, for that reserve to revert immediately to the province of British Columbia, and development of the country will be proceeded with. I should like to know who are the Indian agitators that come from British Columbia. Some representatives of the Indians may be all right, but I may mention a man named O'Meara—

Mr. FIELDING: An Italian, apparently.

Mr. PECK: He is an agitator, wherever he comes from. He annually makes a business of going to the Indians and collecting a few hundred dollars to keep him going. He is a sea lawyer and keeps up an agitation from year to year, and these people come down and try to confuse—I was going to say confound—the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not the gentleman I refer to.

Mr. PECK: This man is typical of them.

Mr. BUREAU: I have the names of the men here. They are Peter Calder, of Nishga Tribe; George Matheson, of Tsimpshian Tribe; Peter R. Kelley, of Haida Tribe; Basil David, of Shuswap Tribe; all representing the Allied Indian Tribes of British Columbia.

Mr. PECK: I know them; they are all O'Meara's children.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister wondered a moment ago why the representatives of the Indians did not petition him. If the minister is agreeable to postponing this matter I shall be glad to ask them to see him to-morrow if possible, or at any other time he may suggest.

Mr. MEIGHEN: For the sake of getting the Bill through I would deny myself the extreme pleasure of seeing Mr. O'Meara.

Mr. MACKENZIE King: I am not speaking of Mr. O'Meara.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid there is too much truth in the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Peck). Mr. O'Meara has undoubtedly made himself the parent of considerable trouble among the Indians of British Columbia, and I do not feel very sympathetic at all towards his whole mission and his conduct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not referring at all to Mr. O'Meara, but to a man named J. A. Teit.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. O'Meara is not an Indian, but one of a number of people who make themselves leaders of Indian trouble. He is not alone in that regard. The Indian is just as much the victim of the agitator as many other people in this country, and when Mr. O'Meara is presenting Indian affairs and obtaining signatures to petitions he does not pretend to do so on his own behalf. He always puts forward the Indians. I do not think there is any reason for delaying this Bill at all. So far as I am concerned it would only mean coming back again. These men have been heard times without number, back over the years, by the last Government and the Government before the last. I would not wonder but that the leader of the Opposition himself has received delegations on this very point. It has been in controversy—if you call this a controversy—for years and years; I cannot say how long, but I know the dispute dates back into a good part of the period of the Laurier Administration, if indeed it does not antedate that. I do not think that any good purpose would be served by crowning the matter with another delegation and sitting and listening to the story over again.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think it is only fair to the gentlemen who are represented as being agitators, to put on Hansard some of the arguments they present against the present Bill. They say:

1. The Indian tribes of British Columbia have always claimed tribal ownership of their respective territories under aboriginal title and the Proclamation issued by King George Third in the year 1763.

2. In the year 1875 by report of the then Minister of Justice of Canada adopted by the then Governor General of Canada in Council it was declared that the land claims of the Indian tribes of British Columbia are well founded and that those tribes are entitled to an interest in all the lands of that province.

3. The then Government of the province of British Columbia and succeeding governments of that province refused to recognize the land rights so declared, and proceeded to deal with the lands of British Columbia as the absolute property of the province notwithstanding the fact that in the year 1875 the then Land Act of the province had been disallowed upon the ground that its provisions ignored the land rights of the Indian tribes.

4. The present position of the Indian land controversy which thus arose and has ever since continued is shown by the following extract from the statement of the Allied Tribes prepared at the request of the present Premier of British Columbia and presented to him on 13th December last:—

"By means of the direct and independent petition of the Nishga tribes we now have our case before His Majesty's Privy Council. We claim that we have a right to a hearing, a right which has now been made clear beyond any possibility of doubt. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, when Prime Minister, on behalf of Canada, met the Indian tribes of northern British Columbia, and promised without any condition whatever that the land controversy would be brought before the Judicial Committee. Moreover, the Duke of Connaught, acting as His Majesty's representative in Canada, gave positive written assurances that if the Nishga tribe should not be willing to agree to the findings of the Royal Commission, His Majesty's Privy Council will consider the Nishga petition. In view of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's promise and the Duke of Connaught's assurances, both of which confirm what we regard as our clear constitutional right, we confidently expect an early hearing of our case."

5. By communication which on 27th May, 1918, the London agents of the Nishga tribe addressed to the then Lord President of His Majesty's Privy Council, it was submitted on behalf of all tribes allied in support of the Nishga petition, among other things as follows:—

"They are unwilling to be bound by the agreement regarding reserves mentioned in the petition which was made in the year 1912 between the Government of Canada and the Government of British Columbia, as therein stated, 'as a final adjustment of all matters relating to Indian affairs in the province of British Columbia,' and under which the findings of the Royal Commission have been made. On the contrary, the allied tribes contend that both that agreement and the Order in Council adopting it which was passed on 27th November, 1912, are beyond the power of the Government of Canada."

3. Your petitioners therefore humbly pray that your honourable body do not read a second time said Bill No. 13, until all matters above set out and related matters shall have been fully considered by your honourable body.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

Peter Calder, of Nishga tribe.
George Matheson, of Tsimpshian tribe.
Peter R. Kelley, of Haida tribe.
Basil David, of Shuswap tribe.

All representing the Allied Indian Tribes of British Columbia.

Dated at Ottawa, the 23rd day of March in the year 1920.

I have nothing to add.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It will be very clear to the hon. member now that what I said was correct. What these people claim—or rather what this man claims and what he got others to help him to claim—is that in 1874 the original Indian title was not extinguished, and he wants others to assist him to the foot of the Throne to argue out that question. Do hon. gentlemen really want to bring that question into the discussion of this Bill? Why? If that were the case we ought to cease the Indian administration altogether because we will have no Indian reserves at all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does my hon. friend deny that these men are true representatives of the Indian tribes?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. O'Meara?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, these four gentlemen.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, of course they are not. I understand there is no Indian agent or missionary or any one who has anything to do with it who does not denounce the whole movement and denounce the men, or the man, at the head of it. I do not think the committee will be well advised to make the representations they have presented a cause for interference with the regular course of parliamentary procedure. It seems to me that it would be giving it an importance away beyond what it deserves. If there is anything in it it is just in the same position after the Bill passes as before. There is nothing disturbed by this Bill.

Mr. BUREAU: These Indians, I understand, are only, a minority, a lot of troublemakers according to the statement I hear from hon. gentlemen on the other side who seem to know about this matter. It is said that they only represent a small portion of the whole and that the majority of the Indians are willing to submit to the report of the royal commission. Is my comprehension of the facts right? Is it true that these men are a minority, that they are just a few troublemakers who come before this House to oppose this legislation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That part, I am satisfied, is right. I cannot make any statement as to the opinion of the majority of the Indians of British Columbia on the report of the commission. I cannot say that it can be said that the majority of them have any definite opinion on the matter. I do not know. If I had the deputy minister in front of me I might speak perhaps with more authority on a question of that sort, but I do stand by what I have said as to the authoritative or lack of authoritative character of the representations made through the instrumentality of Mr. O'Meara.

Mr. BUREAU: I would point out to the minister that the Indian Act provides all the machinery required for the surrender of this land and if these men are only a few troublemakers there should not be any difficulty because unanimity is not required. A tribe may reach a decision upon it and the majority decides whether the surrender shall take place or not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, yes.

Mr. BUREAU: The fact that you want to discard the Indian Act so as to reduce the area of these reservations is an indication to me that certain Indians are not getting a fair deal. They may be getting a fair deal but they are not getting the deal that they desire to have. If the Government were certain from the reports of their agents, or the investigations that have been made, that these men did not represent the feelings of the Indians, then, under the Indian Act, you have the power, where necessary, to get these tribes together and get them to surrender those parts of the reservations that you desire to acquire. The Government of British Columbia want a part of them and the Dominion Government are willing to make an agreement with the interested parties. Are we going to discard the contracts which we have made with these wards and under which we are bound to take care of their property and to look after them? I think that some consideration should be given to this matter before we proceed further. I see that one of the gentlemen who has signed this petition is the Rev. Mr. Kelley. Does the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Peck) know him? He is the Rev. P. R. Kelley, of Nanaimo.

Mr. PECK: I know most of the reverend gentlemen in my riding but I cannot say that I know Mr. Kelley. I never heard of him.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have the pleasure of knowing Mr. Kelley very well; I have heard from him in connection with another Bill which is before the House, Bill No. 14. I am sure he is a gentleman well qualified to speak on these questions. He seems to know all that concerns the Indians of British Columbia.

Mr. BUREAU: What I was saying when I was interrupted was this: No harm will be done by delay and we will have the opportunity of reading the papers and memoranda which have been prepared and thus of knowing exactly what we are doing when we vote upon this Bill, which brushes aside the Indian Act for the purpose of carrying out certain agreements. No time will be lost and we shall have the satisfaction on this side of knowing what the claims of these people are. We do not want to stop the passage of this legislation if it is necessary, and if the claims made are unfounded surely no exhaustive discussion will take place.

Mr. PECK: I do not want it to be thought for a moment that I wish to impose any hardship on the Indians of British Columbia; in fact, no member of the House will go as far as I am prepared to go in order to help them out. As far as the franchise is concerned, I wish to see the more advanced tribes get it, but I do not see that we are going to get anywhere unless you empower the Minister of the Interior to deal with this question. Unless you do that it will be possible for any tribe or any crest to hold up the Bill. Take the Eagle Crest consisting of only half a dozen. They can hold the settlement up unless the minister is empowered to deal with the matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We are not trying to kill this Bill. We merely want—on behalf of these people, who are in the minority, who are feeble and who ask for protection—a little time to study their grievances and to consider the question. I do not think this request should be refused.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If hon. gentlemen opposite press for time to study the Bill further I am not going to ask the committee to report the Bill. I want, however, to bring this fact to their attention, especially to that of the hon. member for Three Rivers. Ninety-nine per cent of the Indians of British Columbia might look with favour upon the settlement and be satisfied with it, but unless this Bill goes through it might well be that the other one per cent could defeat its whole purpose. There might be some little tribe, in which there might not be twenty men who have a vote, but if those twenty men refused to surrender an acre and a half of their reserve——

Mr. BUREAU: I do not object to the Bill, I only want time to consider it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am answering the hon. gentleman's point. If those twenty men, with respect to an acre and a half of their reserves, say it shall not be surrendered no matter what happens, then the agreement we may come to goes by the board. It is not very hard for any one—at all events with some tribes—to get his way, if he goes about it in a skilful manner, with at least twenty persons. Consequently it seems to me necessary that if it is decided by us as trustees for the Indians, and we are acting for the Indians, that this is a proper settlement of a long-standing controversy, surely it is right that we should put it out of the power of any one who tries to influence the Indians, as well as of a very small minority of Indians themselves, to totally defeat the whole settlement. I only want to point out that if there was a petition presented to myself asking to be heard against this Bill on any ground that affected the legislation that would be one matter. But when people come and say "You have no title to Indian lands in British Columbia, they are still owned by the Indians and the descendants of the Indians of 1870," it does not seem to me that it is to be taken seriously as in any way affecting this legislation. That is the point I desire to make. On the ground that my hon. friends opposite wish to study the legislation in all its bearings I certainly will not press this measure now. I therefore move the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. Mr. Meighen moved that Bill No. 14 to amend the Indian Act be read a second time and referred to the special committee, appointed on March 25th inst. for the consideration thereof.

Mr. BUREAU: Who form the committee?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The committee was appointed yesterday.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know whether this is the most appropriate moment but if it is I would like to move that we return to the Order of Motions in order that a change may be made in the personnel of the committee just referred to.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The motion can only pass with the unanimous consent of the House.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The committee named to consider this Bill consisted of Messrs. Boys, Charlton, Davidson, Ethier, Lapointe, Lanctot, Reid, Mackenzie, Stacey and Wilson (Saskatoon). I desire to move that the name of Mr. Charlton be omitted from the committee and that there be substituted therefor the name of Mr. Harold (Brant). I do this at the suggestion of Mr. Charlton.

Mr. HAY: Will the Bill come before the House again after it has been considered by the special committee?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: All Bills referred to the committees are submitted to Committee of the Whole House before they are read a third time.

Motion agreed to.

MAPLE PRODUCTS ADULTERATION.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Rowell (Minister of Health) Bill No. 28 respecting Maple Products was read a second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 2—Manufacture and sale of adulterated maple sugar or syrup—Adulterated maple sugar or syrup defined—Use of word "maple" restricted to pure maple sugar or syrup.

Mr. ROWELL: I should like to make an amendment to subsection 3. As hon. members will see, the language of this subsection—which is the language of the law as it now stands in the Adulteration Act—is so broad that it covers the use of the word "maple" in any connection practically, and some difficulties have arisen in the administration of the Act where the claim has been made that the word should not be used in relation to products having no relation to maple syrup whatever, such as the Maple Leaf Milling Company's brand of flour. It is difficult, however, to frame a definition that will just meet the case, and the Department of Justice has suggested that the clause should be amended in this form:

by inserting at the beginning of the said subsection the following words: "Except with the consent of the Minister of Health."

I would therefore move that the clause be so amended.

Mr. FIELDING: In the case of the Maple Leaf Milling Company they would simply have to get consent?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes; and in any similar case. One came to my attention during the past two or three months, where a firm had been selling a maple brand of biscuits, and had been doing so before this Act was passed. Their right to do it was challenged. Their product had no relation to maple syrup or maple sugar, but it was said they were violating the law.

Mr. BUREAU: Is it the Maple Biscuit Company?

Mr. ROWELL: I think the Maple brand of biscuits manufactured by the McCormick Company of London.

Mr. BUREAU: Don't they claim that they sweeten their biscuits with maple sugar?

Mr. ROWELL. Then they should not have permission under that clause, because unless it were pure maple sugar they should not use the term "maple."

Mr. DEVLIN: The minister instanced flour; that is not a product of maple sugar.

Mr. ROWELL: No; but my hon. friend will see that this subsection does not require that it shall be a product of maple sugar or syrup. The subsection really creates a monopoly in the use of the word "maple," and it may be a serious question whether such was contemplated by the Act.

Mr. CAHILL: Will the minister explain subsection 2 of section 2? What is meant by being "up to standard" within the meaning of the Food and Drugs Act of 1920?

Mr. ROWELL: That Act prescribes a certain standard of purity, and the product must comply with that standard to be entitled to be considered pure maple sugar within the terms of this clause. That standard is fixed in order to protect those who are making maple syrup and maple sugar. A certain amount of maple syrup or maple sugar was being adulterated with other sweetening mixtures. The syrup or sugar must comply with a certain standard, or it cannot be sold as maple syrup or maple sugar.

Mr. CAHILL: That is provided for in subsection 3 of that clause. But what is the standard of maple syrup? May it be thinner or thicker, or is there any standard required under the Act?

Mr. ROWELL: The definition will come up when the other Act is before the House.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: Is not subsection 1 of section 2, which says that "any article of food resembling maple syrup shall not be sold," rather a sweeping clause? If any food product resembles maple syrup, it seems to me it should be sold under its proper name.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend will see that the latter part of that clause qualifies the language of the first two lines:

> or being an imitation of maple sugar or maple syrup, or which is composed partly of maple sugar or maple syrup, and which is not pure maple sugar or pure maple syrup.

That is the present law.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As that section now reads what my hon. friend has just said would apply. If the word "or" after "resembling" were changed to "and" it would meet the objection raised.

Mr. BUREAU: Insert after "syrup which is composed partly." That would be more grammatical.

Mr. ROWELL: I see no objection to the change being made, but this is the form in which the section was originally enacted and it has been in force for six years.

Mr. FIELDING: If we may return to subsection 3, I do not know that I could suggest any better words than those proposed by the minister, and yet I think they are inadequate, as, if added, they will convey the impression that it is the purpose of the clause to allow the minister to consent to some of these adulterations. I know that that is not what is in his mind at all, but it leaves that impression, and he may find himself open to annoying applications of that nature. I am sorry that the Department of Justice has not been able to put some limitation on the consent to be given. I cannot, offhand, suggest the proper form which the amendment should take, but before the matter is finally disposed of I would like the minister to find some happier expression to make it clear that consent shall not be given in the case of any foodstuffs, but is to be given only in connection with the naming of an article which has no relation to the maple trade.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suggest that the minister make a change in the language of the first section which will remove any doubt as to the legality of selling an article of food that may resemble maple syrup. If he will change the word "or" at the beginning of line 3 to "and," the point will be met.

Mr. ROWELL: I have no objection to making such an amendment. But the word "or" occurs twice in that line, and the meaning is quite different if you change the first and do not change the second.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: Change the second and leave the first.

Mr. ROWELL: If you do that, the clause may be open to different construction.

Mr. DOHERTY: Change the second "or"; then you provide that a man may sell a thing which is not maple sugar, though it resembles or imitates it, but he may not sell it if it is partly composed of maple sugar.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: Why should a dealer not be permitted to sell an imitation which is sold under its proper name, even if it contains no maple syrup? I do not see why he should be prevented from selling it simply because it resembles maple syrup. It may be syrup of some other kind, and a pure article of food.

Mr. DOHERTY: Then some provision should be made that the article should be described by its proper name.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: I agree.

Mr. FIELDING: That clause has been in the law for some time. I think it would be wise for the minister to consult his officials before making the change suggested. A slight change in the wording of an Act after it has been in operation for some years may materially affect it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I know an article of food similar to maple sugar which is customarily on sale in confectionery stores. As this section now reads, it would be an offence to sell that article. I do not think that is the intention of the Act. The intention is to protect dealers against imitations of maple sugar. Under the Bill as it now stands it would be an offence to sell maple cream, for example, an article which is like maple sugar.

Mr. ROWELL: It is an offence to sell maple cream if it is not pure maple sugar.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Under this Act it would be an offence to sell any candy that is at all like maple sugar.

Section stands.

HONEY ADULTERATION.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Rowell (Minister of Health), Bill No. 29, respecting honey, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the chair.

On section 2—feeding bees with sugar:

Mr. ROWELL: This is simply the re-enactment of clauses relating to this matter which have been eliminated from the present Adulteration Act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is there any change?

Mr. ROWELL: No change. The clauses are taken out of the Adulteration Act because in re-drafting and consolidating the law we think it desirable that where a monopoly is created it should be dealt with under a separate Act and not in the general Act respecting adulteration of foods.

Mr. DEVLIN: Section 2 provides as follows:

> Feeding bees with sugar, except for the purpose of being consumed by them as food, or with glucose or any sweet substance—

And so on. But who is to go after the bees and see if they are fed with these different articles? Has the minister any official in his department who will follow the bees? I can assure him I had only one experience in going into an apiary; I found that there were more bees than I had reckoned upon, and I should not like to be an officer charged with the duty of going amongst them several times. The minister is putting on the statute book words, but he is not inserting any provision by which this law is to be carried out. Who is going to look after the bees?

Mr. ROWELL: If the Civil Service Commission advertise for some one to carry out this law, I shall not expect my hon. friend to be an applicant for the position.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Clause 2 reads:

> Feeding bees with sugar, except for the purpose of being consumed by them as food.

Can the minister suggest any other purpose that the bees would use the sugar for except for food?

Mr. ROWELL: I do not profess to be well versed in the art of caring for bees, but the point is this. A certain amount of sugar is all right as food for the bees, and there is no objection to that; but if they are fed sugar for the purpose of making honey, a lower grade of honey is produced, not at all equal to the honey produced by the bees under normal conditions getting the honey from natural sources. That is the object of the provision.

[Mr. Rowell.]

Mr. CAHILL: I take it that the Minister of Health is interested, not so much in the health of the bee, as in the product of the bee.

Mr. ROWELL: I should think the question of the health of the bee would come under the Department of Agriculture.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

OTTAWA MINT ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance), Bill No. 30, to amend the Ottawa Mint Act, was read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty, the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Monday, March 29, 1920.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council): I beg to lay on the Table the following draft conventions and recommendations adopted by the International Labour Congress at Washington and communicated to the Government by the Secretary General of the League of Nations, pursuant to Article 405, Treaty of Versailles:

(1) Draft convention limiting the hours of work in industrial undertakings to eight in the day and forty-eight in the week.

(2) Draft convention concerning unemployment.

(3) Recommendation concerning unemployment.

(4) Recommendation concerning reciprocity of treatment of foreign workers.

(5) Draft convention concerning the employment of women before and after childbirth.

(6) Draft convention concerning the employment of women during the night.

(7) Recommendation concerning the prevention of anthrax.

(8) Recommendation concerning the protection of women and children against lead poisoning.

(9) Recommendation concerning the establishment of Government Health Services.

(10) Draft convention fixing the minimum age for admission of children to industrial employment.

(11) Draft convention concerning the night work of young persons employed in industry.

(12) Recommendation concerning the application of the Berne Convention of 1906, on the prohibition of the use of white phosphorus in the manufacture of matches.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is that in printed form?

Mr. ROWELL: It is in printed form as it has been received from the secretary of the League of Nations. I think that a certain number of copies of the convention were printed after the Conference, but we have not copies available for distribution among the members of the House. I shall be glad to move that these recommendations be printed for distribution among members.

RETURN TABLED.

Copy of the Order in Council dated December 1, 1919, respecting the ratification of the treaties and conventions laid before the House of Commons on Monday, March 1, 1920.

COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Rowell, the name of Mr. Turgeon was substituted for that of Mr. Ross on the Committee on Pensions.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks).

ST. REGIS INDIAN RESERVE—SHEEP ISLAND.

Mr. DECHENE:

1. Has the Government purchased, within the last three years, one or several islands in the River St. Lawrence?

2. If so, what is the name of the island or islands so purchased, where situated and what is the purchase price of each?

3. From whom was the island or islands purchased?

Rt. Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. In November, 1919, the Department of the Interior expropriated under the authority of the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act for Dominion Parks purposes an island in the St. Lawrence river.

2. This island was a portion of the St. Regis Indian Reserve and was known as Sheep or Doran's Island. It is situated opposite the town of Morrisburg, Ontario. The price paid for same was $3,300.

3. The island was expropriated from the Indians of the St. Regis Indian Reserve.

THE CANADA WHEAT BOARD.

Mr. McCOIG:

1. How many members are there on the Wheat Board?

2. How many employees are there connected with the said Board?

3. What is the monthly expenditure of the said Board, including salaries of the Members, employees and operating expenses?

4. Are said expenses paid by the Government out of the general revenues or are they deducted from the price obtained by the Board for the wheat before it is divided among the farmers?

5. Is it the intention of the Government to continue the services of this Board to handle the crop of next season?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. Twelve.

2. I have not the exact record but probably 70 to 75.

3. Of the monthly expenditure of the board, including salaries of the members, employees and operating expenses, I have no record.

4. None of the expenses are paid by the Government out of the general revenue. The Wheat Board is appointed a board to purchase and sell wheat. It performs the operation, makes the advance cash payments, pays all expense out of gross receipts, and at the end of the transaction, distributes to the original producers whatever sums may be coming to them pro rata.

5. It is not the present intention of the Government to continue the services of this Board.

SMALL FLOUR MILLS.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. Is the report correct that most of the small flour mills in the country are closed down on account of the market being limited to the local market?

2. Are the small mills suffering from the set price of flour, not being able to compete against the large mills?

3. Is there a tax imposed upon flour shipped to the Orient? If so, why?

4. Is there any intention of removing this tax?

5. Is the Government aware that the Oriental market is about the only export market for flour available at the present?

6. If so, why is that market not encouraged?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. It is not correct to say that a greater number of small flour mills in the country are closed down than in normal times on account of the market being limited. Whether it is due to that or not it is difficult to say.

2. The Government has no information on which to base an answer generally applicable.

3. No.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. The Government is not aware that the Oriental market is about the only export market for flour available at present. Its information would lead to a contrary opinion.

6. Practically answered by 5, but in no way is the market in the East discouraged.

CANTEEN PROFITS—CANADA'S SHARE.

Mr. ANDREWS:

1. Is it now possible for the Government to estimate what share, if any, of the profits of the Expeditionary Forces Canteens and the Navy and Army Canteens, which operated in areas occupied by the Canadian Military and Naval Forces, will be apportioned to the Canadian Government? If so, what is such estimate?

2. Has an Overseas Board of Trustees been appointed to receive payments on this account? If so, who constitutes such board?

3. What sums, if any, have already been transferred to such Board of Trustees?

4. What is the total amount of Regimental Funds transferred by the Overseas Paymaster General to the trustees of the various units interested?

5. Has any deduction been made from the Regimental or Canteen Funds because of charges for barrack damages?

6. Is it the intention of the Government to deduct from Regimental or Canteen Funds any amount in payment of claims for damages to canteen equipment and stores during riots in Canadian Military Camps? If so, what will be the amount of such deduction?

7. Is the Government prepared to announce any policy in respect to the disbursement of any sum that may be apportioned to Canadian Forces, as accruing from Overseas Canteen profits or Regimental Funds?

8. Is it the intention of the Government to expend such sums for the exclusive benefit of former members of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces and their dependents?

9. Will the Government consult with representatives of returned soldier organizations in respect to the disbursement of such sums?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL, for Sir Edward Kemp:

1. It is not now possible for the Government to estimate what amount of the profits of the Expeditionary Force Canteens (France) and the Navy and Army Canteen Board will be apportioned to the Canadian Government as these institutions have not yet been able to complete their balance sheets to the termination of their period of trading.

2. (a) Yes.

(b) Minister of Overseas Military Forces of Canada, High Commissioner for Canada, in London, Chief of the General Staff, Overseas Military Forces of Canada. This board appointed the Accountant-General, Overseas Military Forces of Canada, Secretary-Treasurer.

[Sir George Foster.]

3. £193,434.13.4.

4. Units of the Overseas Military Forces of Canada have transferred £118,612. 7. 4. to their respective trustees in Canada. The Paymaster General, Overseas Military Forces of Canada, transferred £45,997. 0. 4. of this amount for the units concerned, the balance having been transferred by such units themselves.

5. Units of the Overseas Military Forces of Canada in England maintained a Barrack Damage Fund from which they made payments for barrack damages. Where a unit was disbanded its surplus funds were paid over to the Paymaster General, Overseas Military Forces of Canada, in trust. Any payments for barrack damages or otherwise made thereafter from these funds were made in accordance with the conditions of trust.

6. The amount of damage done by members of the Canadian Forces to canteen equipment and stores the property of the Navy and Army Canteen Board will be deducted by that board from the profits payable by it. The amount has not yet been definitely ascertained.

7. This matter is under consideration.

8. Answered by No. 7.

9. Yes.

FARM LABOUR FOR SPRING WORK.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. Is any effort being made to obtain farm labour to meet the needs for spring work?

2. Is there a scarcity of such labour at the present time?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. The Dominion Provincial Employment Service is endeavouring to secure the necessary farm labour to meet the needs for spring work, and already more than 500 placements are being made on farms weekly. The Employment Service reports 504 unplaced applicants in the agricultural group on Mrch 6, 1920, and 951 unfilled vacancies; 614 applicants for farm labour were referred to vacancies during the week ending March 6, and 530 placements were made, of which 405 were made in the three Praire Provinces.

A conference of representatives of the Dominion and Provincial Employment Services was held at Calgary, March 8, 9 and 10, and the question of securing an adequate supply of farm labour was discussed. There was general agreement that it would be impossible to indicate the farm labour requirements with any degree of accuracy for some weeks' time, as the farmers are waiting until the spring is more advanced before registering their orders. In as far as possible, however, the situation is being anticipated. Numbers of men are now being released by the lumbering companies in Northern Manitoba and Saskatchewan and by the mining companies in the Crows Nest Pass, and it was thought an effort should be made to divert them directly to employment on farms. Temporary employment offices have been accordingly opened in Manitoba and Saskatchewan for that purpose, and the opening of one or two temporary offices in the Crows Nest Pass is under consideration. As soon as the workers are released from the mines and camps, efforts will be made to register them at the temporary offices and to send each man on reduced transportation to a farm job.

2. There is every possibility that the demand for farm labour will be satisfied.

CANADA WHEAT BOARD.

Mr CHISHOLM:

1. Who are the members of the Canadian Wheat Board?
2. What salary is paid each member of said board?
3. What other allowance is paid to each of them?
4. Is there a tax of $2 or any amount upon a barrel of flour exported from Canada?
5. If so, by whom is this tax imposed and what is its object?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. Jas. Stewart, chairman; H. W. Wood, F. W. Riddell, W. A. Black, Norman McL. Patterson, Wm. L. Best, C. B. Watts, Frank O. Fowler, William H. McWilliams, Jos. Quintal, Lieut.-Col. J. Z. Fraser, Wm. A. Matheson.

2. Only the chairman and assistant chairman of the board are paid salaries. No salary has yet been recommended to or approved by the Government in regard to these officials.

3. The members of the board outside of those I have mentioned are paid no salary. They get travelling and living expenses and they get a per diem allowance when they are absent from their homes on the business of the board, at Winnipeg.

4. There is no export tax on flour, nor has there been any.

5. Answered by No. 4.

PEACE WITH ENEMY COUNTRIES.

Mr. PARENT:

1. When will the Proclamation declaring under the War Measures Act, 1914, that the war between Great Britain and her Allies and the German and Austrian Empires and their Allies, is at an end, be published?
2. Has the Government of Canada, or any member thereof given any consideration to the question as to whether it is advisable to publish said Proclamation?
3. If so, why has the said Proclamation not been published?
4. Until the publication of this Proclamation are goods coming from or going to Germany, Austria or any other country which was their Ally, allowed to be received by or exported from Canada?
5. Has the Government any information as to whether trade is being carried on between the inhabitants of Great Britain, France and the United States, or any of them, and the inhabitants of Germany, Austria and their Allies, or any of them?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. When peace shall have been legally restored with the last of the enemy powers.

2. Yes.

3. Because the time for it has not yet arrived.

4. With Germany and Austria, yes.

5. The Government is informed that trade is being carried on between the inhabitants of Great Britain, France and United States and the countries with which peace has been concluded.

RIVIERE-DU-LOUP SHOPS.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Of the ninety employees transferred from Rivière-du-Loup shops to St. Malo shops, how many were single and how many were married?
2. How many women and children are dependent on said married men?
3. What is the total population thus taken from Rivière-du-Loup?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. There have been 93 employees transferred, of which 33 are single and 60 married.

2. 227 women and children and 29 other dependents, total 256.

3. 349.

NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND EXPRESS COMPANIES.

Mr. DECHENE:

1. What are the conditions imposed on the Dominion Express Company for the service of National Railways agents and the use of offices in the stations of said railways?
2. Is it the intention to give the same privileges to the Canadian Express Company?
3. The Canadian National Railways taking control of the Canadian Express Company, is it the intention to give to the latter the exclusive privilege of the service of agents and stations on said railways?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. The Dominion Express Company pay the Canadian Government Railways 50 per cent of its gross earnings for the service of that railways' agents and the use of offices and stations of said railways. Also the privilege of operating on their lines.

2. The Canadian Express Company operates on the Canadian Government Railways on the same basis as the Dominion Express Company.

3. This being a question of policy, it will be considered by the Board of Management.

CANADA HIGHWAYS ACT.

Mr. FRIPP:

1. Upon what date were the regulations called for by the Canada Highways Act (Chapter 54, 10 Geo. V) promulgated in the Canada Gazette?

2. Were these regulations communicated directly to the Governments of the several provinces, or only through the medium of the official publication?

3. Have all the provincial governments accepted the conditions of the Canada Highways Act and the regulations founded upon it?

4. If not, which provincial governments so far have refrained from accepting the provisions of the Act?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. December 13, 1919.

2. The regulations called for the Canada Highways Act (Chapter 54, 10 Geo. V.) were communicated directly to the governments of the several provinces.

3. Five of the different Provincial Governments have filed with the department, their general programme map of a system of selected highways to be constructed or improved conforming to the terms of the Canada Highways Act and the regulations thereunder, and the remaining Provincial Governments are, they advise, working on their general plans in this connection. The department has not been advised that the conditions of the Act and the regulations thereunder are not satisfactory to any province.

4. Answered by No. 3.

NAVY LEAGUE OF CANADA.

*Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

1. What is the Navy League of Canada?

2. Is it a Government enterprise?

3. What is the object of the League?

4. For what purpose are funds collected in the name of the League?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The answer to the second question is No. The first, third and fourth questions are not answerable by the Government. If the hon. member wishes that information he should apply to the officers of the League. The Government has no information with reference to their aims, objects or operations.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

WHEAT SHIPMENTS BY FARMERS INTO UNITED STATES.

*Mr. MACNUTT:

1. Is the Government aware that it is reported that some farmers who live too far from the United States boundary to haul wheat from their farms by waggon, shipped same by the carload to some point near the boundary, loaded it into waggons and crossed the line, thus getting the benefit of the United States market?

2. If this report is correct, will such farmers be compelled to pay the Wheat Board the amount received for such wheat, less the initial price fixed by the Board, and receive participation certificates therefor?

3. Will holders of participation certificates receive a proportionate share of any extra price obtained by such farmers?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Government is aware that it has been reported that some farmers who live too far away from the United States' boundary haul wheat from their barns by waggon, ship the same by carload to some point near the boundary, load it into waggons and cross the line, thus getting the benefit of the United States market, but neither the Government nor the Wheat Board has any definite information other than rumour. Question No. 2 is practically answered by reply to No. 1 and the same with regard to question No. 3.

PARTICIPATION CERTIFICATES.

*Mr. MACNUTT:

Will the holders of participation certificates receive any allowance to compensate them for the reduction in value of such certificates by reason of reduced prices for seed wheat, allowed on compassionate grounds to farmers in dried out areas?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

*Mr. MACNUTT::

1. Will Canadian farmers near the International boundary who have marketed grain by waggon loads into the United States be compelled to account to the Wheat Board for the amount received by them over and above the initial price fixed by the Board?

2. Will holders of participation certificates receive a proportionate share of any extra price received by Canadian farmers marketing by waggon loads into the United States?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The answer to each question is in the negative.

INDIAN RESERVES IN CANADA.

Mr. CANNON:

1. How many Indian reserves are there in Canada?

2. Where are they situated?

3. How many lots are there in said reserves, and how many buildings thereon?
4. How many Indians are there in Canada?
5. How many in each province?

CANADIAN VICTORY BONDS.

*Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

1. Is the Government aware that many Victory Bonds of 1919 have not been delivered yet?
2. Is the Government aware that the bonds subscribed through English-Canadian banks have been delivered for over six months, and those subscribed through French-Canadian banks are not yet delivered?
3. If so, what is the reason of the delay?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1, 2 and 3. As far as the Government is aware, all Victory Loan Bonds of 1919, upon which payments in full have been made, have been delivered to subscribers, both in French and English text.

Deliveries are made through the medium of the chartered banks. The various banks requisition the nearest Assistant Receiver General's office to cover the requirements of subscribers through their office. In the case of subscribers desiring fully registered bonds the banks requisition the Department of Finance; all such requisitions have been filled to date. The above applies to the English-Canadian banks as well as the French-Canadian banks.

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION.

*M. DESLAURIERS:

Has the Government taken into consideration the system of election by Proportional Representation, or is it the intention of the Government to take it into consideration during the present session?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This matter is at present under the consideration of the Government.

11. No.
12. Answered by No. 11.
13. Those men transferred to Special Guard were already in possession of clothing and equipment, and those men specially enlisted were issued with clothing and equipment on joining the unit.
14. One pair of handcuffs per man is issued to each Military Policeman.
15. In all cases where a man was deficient a pair of handcuffs, the stoppage was $8.09. No fine imposed, as a soldier can only be fined for drunkenness.
16. Answered by No. 15.
17. All men serving in Canada only, issued with uniforms and greatcoats since July 1, 1918, are required to turn in the following articles of uniform: Greatcoat (or cloak), trousers (or breeches), jacket, cap, forage. Men issued with clothing prior to July 1, 1918, are permitted to retain uniform.
18. No.
19. Yes.
20. $35.

* Mr. TOBIN:

1. Is there stationed at Halifax a special guard of Canadian Military Police Corps?
2. If so, how many men compose this corps?
3. What are their duties?
4. Is one Capt. Legg attached to this corps?
5. If so, is he a pensioned officer?
6. What pension is he receiving?
7. Did Capt. Legg see service in France?
8. If so, for how long?

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. Yes, at the request of the Imperial Government, and all expenses connected with this force are paid by the Imperial Government,
2. Return of strength dated 23rd March, 1920, shows 255 all ranks.
3. Guarding coolies of the Chinese Labour Corps being returned to China via Canada, while they are in this country.
4. Yes.
5. Yes.
6. At present receiving $1,243.45 per annum, long service pension, based on 26 years' service, in accordance with the Militia Pension Act.

His present salary, though advanced by the Canadian Government, is recoverable from Imperial Government, and, therefore, is not paid out of Canadian funds.

3. 4,883.
4. 25.

GERMAN AND AUSTRIAN BOOKS.

Mr. CROWE:

1. Is it a fact that certain books printed in the German or Austrian languages are admitted free of duty into Canada while those printed in English or French are subject to duty?
2. If so, why?
3. Is it the intention of the Government to cancel this preference? If so, when?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. Tariff Item 172 provides for the free admission of "books printed in any lan- "guage other than the English and French "languages or in any two languages not "being English or French or in any three "or more languages."
2. By authority of Parliament, Customs Tariff Act, April 12th, 1907.
3. The matter is under consideration.

HIGHWAY GRANTS.

Mr. GERVAIS:

What sums of money were paid up to date to each of the provinces by virtue of the law, 9-10 George V, Chapter 54, entitled: An Act to encourage the Construction and Improvement of Highways?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. No payments have been made to date under the Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Prince Edward Island—Charlottetown, one. Nova Scotia —Halifax, Sydney, two. New Brunswick— St. John, one. Quebec—Montreal, Quebec, two. Ontario—Ottawa, Kingston, Brockville, Belleville, Toronto, Hamilton, Brantford, St. Catharines, Cayuga, London, Walkerville, Fort William, Stratford, thirteen. Manitoba—Winnipeg, Brandon, two. Saskatchewan—Regina, Weyburn, Prince Albert, Saskatoon, Moose Jaw, Yorkton, six. Alberta—Calgary, Edmonton, two. British Columbia—Vancouver, Nelson, Victoria, three. Yukon Territory—Dawson, one. Steps are being taken to open further offices at Dauphin, Man., Lethbridge, Alta., and Prince Rupert, B.C.

SMUGGLED AUTOMOBILES.

Mr. PREVOST:

In what way does the Minister of Customs dispose of the smuggled automobiles seized by his department?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

The Minister of Customs gives his decision in the matter respecting the seizure, as provided by section 177 of the Customs Act.

If the automobile be forfeited by the terms of such decision, it is disposed of in the manner provided by section 143 of the Customs Act, that is, either by public auction, or as the minister sees fit instead of being sold by public auction.

Section 143 of the Customs Act is as follows: "Sales of goods forfeited or otherwise liable to be sold under this Act shall be by public auction, and after a reasonable public notice, and subject to such further regulations as are made by the Governor in Council; but, in any case, the minister may order vessels, goods, vehicles or things forfeited to be disposed of as he sees fit, instead of being sold by public auction."

INDIAN TRIBES—EMANCIPATION.

Mr. CANNON:

1. Are there any Indian Tribes who, by petitions or otherwise have asked the Government to amend certain clauses of the Indian Act as regards their emancipation? If so, what tribes?

2. Has the Government received any demands by petition or otherwise to amend the Indian Act, in order to emancipate them, from certain municipalities adjoining their reserves, or from certain individuals or corporations located in those municipalities?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. Yes. Moravians of the Thames, Ontario.

2. No.

WAR TAX STAMPS.

Mr. LESAGE:

1. Does the Government intend to amend the law which compels the retailer to affix a war tax stamp upon patent medicines and certain toilet preparations at the time they are sold to the consumer?

2. Is the Government aware that in many cases the said stamps are not affixed as required by law?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. Any announcement as to amendments to the Special War Revenue Act, 1915, will, as is customary in regard to taxation changes, be made in the Budget Speech of the Minister of Finance.

2. In all cases brought to the attention of the Government prosecutions have followed in accordance with the Act.

HOARDING OF FOODSTUFFS.

Mr. LEDUC:

Does the Government intend to bring radical remedies to the high cost of living by investigating as to where food stuff is hoarded or stored?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Government is not in a position to answer this question as put, unless it affirms a certain thing, namely, that the mere investigation of how much butter or other commodities are stored at a warehouse will have a radical effect on the high cost of living.

BUTTER PRICES.

Mr. LEDUC:

1. Is the Honourable the Minister of Agriculture aware that butter in cold storage has made a jump from 57 to 65 cents in one week?

2. If so, is it the intention of the Government to take steps to prevent such increases in the future?

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE:

1. No. I am informed that the wholesale price of butter on the Montreal market varied between 60 and 66c from March 1st to March 25th. During that period butter was sold as low as 57 to 59c and as high as 68c. The high price was paid for butter of the finest quality and the lower prices for inferior quality, which accounts in part for the range in price.

2. It does not appear to be practicable to prevent these increases or decreases in the price of dairy products.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT.

Mr. WHIDDEN:

1. Has the Government or any member thereof received any communication, written or verbal, from the Ontario Branch of the Dominion Alliance, or any officer thereof, in reference to the applicability to the province of Ontario of the legislation of last session known as An Act to amend the Canada Temperance Act?

2. If so, what was the nature of such communication?

3. What answer, if any, has the Government made thereto?

4. Has the Government received any resolution in reference to such legislation from the Dominion Committee on Liquor Legislation?

5. If so, what is the nature of such resolution?

6. Has the Government any information as to what organizations are included in the Federation known as the Dominion Committee on Liquor Legislation?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. Yes.

2 and 3. On March 5 the President of the Privy Council received the following letter from Mr. C. E. Steele, President of the Ontario Branch of the Dominion Alliance:

Dear Mr. Rowell,—There are one or two points which we would greatly like to have cleared up with regard to Bill 26.

As you know there seems to be conflicting legal opinion as to whether or not it applies to this province. Enclosed are copies of opinions from two eminent counsel.

You will readily recognize the desirability, indeed, imperative need that all such doubts should be removed.

Two things we would like to know:

(1) Was it the intention of the Government that the Act should apply to Ontario?

(2) Would the Government be prepared to bring in legislation removing all doubt?

To which the President of the Privy Council replied on March 8, as follows:

I have your letter of March 5 in reference to Bill No. 26, "An Act to Amend the Canada Temperance Act." You ask two questions, namely:

(1) Was it the intention of the Government that the Act should apply to Ontario?

(2) Would the Government be prepared to bring in legislation removing all doubt?

In answer to question No. 1, would say that it certainly was the intention of the Government that the Act should apply to the province of Ontario, and in the opinion of the Department of Justice the Act does so apply.

In answer to question 2, would say that as the Department of Justice advises that the Act in its present form does apply to the province of Ontario, no amendment would appear to be necessary. In this connection I would draw your attention to the last paragraph of section 154 of the amended Act, which is as follows:

"Provided, however that the provisions of this section shall not apply or extend to the importation, manufacture, sending, taking, delivery, carriage or transportation into or within, or the sale or agreeing to sell for delivery in, any province in which the prohibition is in force, of any intoxicating liquor for sacramental or medicinal purposes, or for manufacturing or commercial purposes, other than for the manufacture or use thereof as a beverage, or to any intoxicating liquor which under the laws of the province or territory in which the prohibition is in force, may be lawfully sold therein."

You will note particularly the concluding clause of this paragraph, viz., "or to any intoxicating liquor which under the laws of the province or territory in which the prohibition is in force, may be lawfully sold therein." The use of this language shows that it was the intention of the Government and of Parliament that the Act should apply to a province in which the general rule was prohibition, but in which some particular class of liquor might lawfully be sold, such as native wine in the province of Ontario.

I might add, however, that in view of the opinion Mr. Ewart has given to you on the matter, the Department of Justice is taking the opinion of eminent counsel upon the question, and my own expectation is that the opinion of such counsel will confirm that of the Department of Justice. Should such not be the case, the question would then undoubtedly receive further consideration at the hands of the Government."

A supplementary telegram was sent to Mr. Steele on March 10 as follows:

"Referring my letter March eighth, opinion received by Government from eminent counsel confirms opinion of Department of Justice that Act of last session clearly applies to Ontario."

The counsel referred to was Mr. Eugene Lafleur, K.C., of Montreal and the following is his opinion:

"This Act provides for the taking of a vote in any province of Canada in which there is at the time in force a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes, such vote being taken for or against the following prohibition:

"That the importation and the bringing of intoxicating liquors into such province may be forbidden."

"The question submitted for opinion is whether the provisions of this statute apply to Ontario inasmuch as in that province the Ontario Temperance Act, while generally prohibiting the liquor traffic, nevertheless allows manufacturers of native wine to sell their product in wholesale quantities only. The opinion has been expressed that in view of the existence of this permission to sell native wine the province of Ontario cannot come within the language of the above statute because the law of Ontario prohibits only the partial sale of intoxicating liquor and it is argued that between a very limited prohibition such as a statute prohibiting the sale of brandy only, and one which extended to all intoxicating liquor with a slight exception there is no point at which a halt can be made.

"I am unable to adopt this view inasmuch as it appears to me that the context makes it clear that Parliament intended the statute to apply not merely to provinces in which total and unrestricted prohibition exists, but also to provinces in which what is generally understood as prohibitory legislation is in force, even though that legislation may make certain exceptions to the otherwise general rule.

"Section 154 of the statute enacts that if prohibition is, in consequence of a favourable vote, declared to be in force, no exportation shall be allowed, no sale or contract to sell liquor to be delivered in the province shall be allowed and the transportation of liquor through the province is to take place only by common carrier and no package is to be opened in transit.

"The same section then contains the proviso that its provisions shall not apply or extend to any intoxicating liquor which under the laws of the province or territory in which the prohibition is in force may be lawfully sold therein.

"From this language it seems perfectly clear that "prohibition" may be in force in a province whose law permits the sale of some intoxicating liquor, and that Parliament intended the Act to apply to provinces like Ontario, whose laws contain some exception allowing the sale of intoxicating liquors in derogation of the general principle of the prohibitory legislation.

"In other words, the amendment to the Canada Temperance Act applies not only to provinces which have absolute and unrestricted prohibition, but also to those which have a prohibitory law with qualification and exceptions and in the latter case effect is given to such qualifications and exceptions by the Dominion legislation."

Subsequently, on Tuesday, March 23rd, a deputation from the Ontario Branch of the Dominion Alliance consisting of Mr. Steele, President, Mr. Spence, Secretary, and Mr. D. V. Sinclair, waited upon the Government and requested that in view of the alleged doubt as to the applicability of the Act of last session to the province of Ontario, the Government should remove the doubt by amending legislation, or, in the alternative, should refer the matter to the Supreme Court for decision as to whether the Act applies to Ontario or not. To which the Government replied that as it appeared perfectly clear to the Department of Justice that the Act of last session does apply to the province of Ontario, no amendment to the law is necessary and that therefore the Government could not undertake to introduce an amending Act, nor could the Government see its way clear to grant a reference to the Supreme Court to interpret the Act as the Government has no doubt as to its correct interpretation or its applicability to the Province of Ontario.

4. Yes.

5. The Government has received from Dr. Andrew S. Grant, Chief Executive Officer of the Dominion Committee on Liquor Legislation, the following resolutions:

(1) Resolution passed at the Annual Meeting of the Dominion Committee on Liquor Legislation on January 13, 1920, held in Montreal:—

"That this Committee express its appreciation of the Liquor Legislation passed by the Dominion Parliament providing for a vote in each province on the importation of liquor for beverage purposes.

That this Committee recommends that each province be encouraged to secure a vote on the question of prohibiting importation of liquor for beverage uses.

That the idea of having the vote taken, in so far as this may be found feasible, on the same date in all the provinces be approved.

That the taking of the vote should be upon lists which include women citizens on the same terms as men."

2. Resolution passed at a Conference of Representative Methodists held in the City of Toronto on March 17, 1920 and a further resolution passed by the Executive of the General Board of Evangelism and Social Service of the Methodist Church:

"Rev. A. S. Grant, D.D.,
Excelsior Life Bldg.,
Toronto, Ont.

Dear Dr. Grant,

A conference of representative Methodists was held in Wesley Buildings on Wednesday, March 17th, 1920, to consider the present temperance situation in Ontario. Very careful consideration was given every phase of the subject, including expert legal opinion, and the following resolution was adopted;

"Resolved, that this meeting, after giving consideration to the legal opinions submitted, and having before it the statement of the Provincial Premier, as published this morning.

Recommends the Executive of the General Board of Evangelism and Social Service to render every assistance towards the immediate submission of the referendum as provided in amendment to Canada Temperance Act enacted at the 1919 session by the Parliament of Canada.

The same afternoon the Executive of the General Board of Evangelism and Social Service of the Methodist Church again considered the question, and adopted the following resolution:—

That having considered the recommendation of the morning's meeting, this Executive hereby records its approval of the recommendation, and directs our General Secretary to notify the Referendum Committee.

the Government of Ontario and the Dominion Alliance.

We further appoint the following persons to represent this Board upon the Referendum Committee; The General Secretary, The Treasurer, Dr. Creighton, Dr. J. A. Long, and Mr. J. O. McCarthy, with Mr. Thomas and Mr. Coburn as alternates.

The Methodist Church, through its official representatives, will be ready to act with the Referendum Committee. We shall be glad to be informed as to any way in which we can advance the prohibition movement in this province.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) T. Albert Moore,
General Secretary."

(3) Resolution passed by the Board of Home Missions and Social Service of the Presbyterian Church at its meeting in Toronto on March 17th;

" This Board of Home Missions and Social Service of the Presbyterian Church record their apprceiation of Prohibition legislation of the various provinces and of the Federal Parliament, express their conviction that it is most desirable that the legislatures of all the provinces should request the Federal Government to take a plebiscite on the question of the importaion of liquor into dry provinces for beverage purposes at as early a date as possible, and, if possible, on a uniform date; and appoint delegates to be named by the Convener to represent the Church and to co-operate with the Ontario Referendum Committee and the Dominion Prohibition Committee in pressing for complete prohibition throughout Canada of intoxicating liquor for beverage use."

6. The following organizations are included in the Dominion Committee on Liquor Legislation:—People's Prohibition Association of B.C.; Social Service Council of Alberta; Social Service Council of Saskatchewan; Social Service Council of Manitoba; Ontario Branch of Dominion Alliance; Citizens' Committee of 100 of Ontario; Anti-Alcoholic Leagues of Quebec; Quebec Branch of Dominion Alliance; New Brunswick Temperance Alliance; Social Service Council of Nova Scotia; P. E. I. Temperance Alliance; People's Prohibition Movement of Yukon.

THE LAST NATIONAL LOAN.

Mr. DECHENE:

1. What was the total amount subscribed in the last National Loan?

2. What amount has the Government accepted?

3. What amount has been paid in full by subscribers, and what are their names?

4. What amount has been partially paid and what percentage?

5. What amount is actually advanced by the banks to subscribers who have not paid in full their subscriptions?

6. What amount has the Government advanced to the banks in order to help them to carry the subscriptions not entirely paid?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. $673,000,000 (estimated).

2. $643,800,000.

3. March returns not yet received by department. Estimated about 90 per cent has been paid up in full. There were some 830,000 subscribers through the various banks; the names of the subscribers are not furnished to the department by the banks except those requiring fully registered bonds.

4. Estimated about 10 per cent.

5. Department has no information.

6. No amount has been advanced.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

What was the value of goods, entitled to the British Preference, brought into Canada during the last fiscal year via American seaports, what American ports were thus utilized, and to what extent?

Mr. TOBIN:

1. Which military districts have been visited by Brig.-Gen. Langton between 1st October, 1918, and the 1st October, 1919?

2. In connection with the work of the Paymaster-General's branch of the Militia Department, were inspectors employed?

3. If so, which military districts were officially inspected by these inspectors, between the 1st October, 1918, and 1st October, 1919, and upon what dates were the inspections made?

4. Did Brig.-Gen. Langton, Acting Paymaster-General make any official inspection duties to the various military districts in Canada, between 1st October, 1918, and 1st October, 1919?

5. If so, how many journeys did he make to Toronto for this inspection work, and on what dates?

6. How many journeys to other military districts did Brig.-Gen. Langton make, between 1st October, 1918, and 1st October, 1919, and on what dates?

7. How many journeys, official or otherwise, to Toronto did Brig.-Gen. Langton make, between 1st October, 1918, and 1st October, 1919?

8. On whose authority did Brig.-Gen. Langton make these journeys?

9. Did Brig.-Gen. Langton obtain leave of absence for any of the journeys he made that were unofficial?

10. What number of these journeys were made on Government warrants or at Government expense?

11. What number of Government transport warrants were used by Brig.-Gen. Langton between the 1st October, 1918, and 1st October, 1919, for the following journeys: (a) from Ottawa to Toronto; (b) from Toronto to Ottawa; (c) for sleeping car accommodation from Ottawa to Toronto and from Toronto to Ottawa?

12. Did Brig.-Gen. Langton submit travelling claims for his expenses for journeys between Ottawa and Toronto and return?

13. If so, for what number of journeys and what was the total amount of his claims for travelling expenses, and what is the total amount which has been paid to Brig.-Gen. Langton on this account?

14. For how many days was travelling allowance of $8 a day paid for these journeys, and did the $8 in such cases cover a full period of 24 hours' absence?

15. Did Brig.-Gen. Langton's family reside in Toronto during the period from 1st October, 1918, to 1st October, 1919?

16. Did Brig.-Gen. Langton stay at his own residence in Toronto for any days on which he claimed the $8 a day travelling allowance?

17. If not, did he incur any expenditure for sleeping accommodation at any hotel in Toronto, or other place outside his own residence?

18. How often, and on what dates, did Brig.-Gen. Langton use Government motor cars in Toronto during this period?

19. Did Brig.-Gen. Langton charge on his travelling claims for cabs, street car fares or taxis during this period?

20. If so, upon what dates were such charges made?

21. Did Brig.-Gen. Langton, when Deputy Inspector-General, carry a name on the Deputy Inspector-General's pay lists and draw pay for a person after that person had returned to his civil occupation?

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS

Mr. ETHIER:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and reports relating to the re-classification of the Civil Service by American efficiency experts in the employ of the Arthur Young Company; also all documents relating thereto, which have been submitted to, and received by the Civil Service Commission and comprising: (a) a list of names who, in consequence of such re-classification and subsequently thereto, resigned from the service; (b) the reasons given in support of such resignations, and (c) the nature of the duties of each person who resigned.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have already asked that this order be remodelled. Any one can see that the question involves an immense amount of unnecessary work.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT AMENDMENTS.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCIAL ATTORNEYS-GENERAL.

Mr. CASGRAIN:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Minister of Justice and the Attorneys-General of the different provinces of Canada, regarding the power of the Dominion of Canada to amend the British North America Act by its own Parliament.

Rt. Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: With reference to this motion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that the correspondence so far exchanged is in the nature of a purely informal, unofficial interchange of views upon the question and of a confidential nature, and therefore at present there is no correspondence which it would be proper to bring down.

Mr. MORPHY: Mr. Speaker, as this is rather an important question, I would like the minister to repeat this answer, which was quite inaudible in this part of the Chamber.

Mr. DOHERTY: I said that the correspondence so far is in the nature of an unofficial, informal interchange of views upon the question and is of a confidential nature. There is, therefore, at present no correspondence which it would be proper to bring down.

Motion dropped.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. ROBB (for Mr. Archambault):

For a return showing (a) the total production of coal in Canada during the past ten years; (b) how much of said coal was anthracite; (c) the total importation of coal into Canada during the same period; (d) how much of same was anthracite; (e) the total exportation of coal from Canada during the past ten years, and (f) how much of this total was anthracite.

Mr. ROBB (for Mr. Archambault):

For a copy of the specifications and plans for the drydock at Vancouver, British Columbia, for which a subsidy is being granted to J. Coughlan & Sons, Limited, along with a copy of the contract between the Government and J. Coughlan & Sons, Limited, for the construction of the said drydock.

Mr. ROBB (for Mr. Archambault):

For a return giving a list of the names of all the officers employed at the Headquarters of the Militia Department, at Ottawa; their respective salaries; the date of their appointment, and the length of their services in the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

ALIEN IMMIGRANTS AND CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP.

Mr. MICHAEL STEELE (South Perth) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is essentian for the future national welfare of Canada that appropriate measures be taken by the Government to fit and prepare all immigrants of alien origin for assuming the duties and responsibilities of Canadian citizenship.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my belief that this is the first occasion in our history that the subject matter of this resolution has been formally discussed by this House—an evidence, perhaps, of the extreme disregard which we have had in the past of the important subject of the Canadianization of our alien population.

For many years we have been receiving large numbers of newcomers, representing practically every nationality and every known tongue, every variety of dress and embracing both sexes of all ages, from the babe in arms to the grandfather and the grandmother—this motley crowd speaking eighty-five languages and dialects and representing fifty-three nationalities. I need scarcely point out that such a condition has created a problem which, at the present day at least, cannot be ignored by this country.

Let us look for a moment at the number of people who have come to our shores to make Canada their home. In the ten years from 1906 to 1915 inclusive there arrived more than 2,500,000 who came ostensibly to make this land their home, some temporarily, many of them permanently. They came, I believe, nearly all actuated by one idea—to live under better conditions than those which they had experienced in their home lands. But they knew nothing of Canadian life, of Canadian laws, of Canadian customs; many of them knew nothing of Canadian civilization. About one-third of the two and one-half million were from the continent of Europe, and this element especially would be described by the words which I have just used. They, too, came to this country with no knowledge of our language or our history. Many of them had lived under conditions which would be absolutely repugnant to Canadian people, and many of them brought to this country and adopted here the very same conditions under which they had been living in the lands which they had left. So far as citizenship is concerned we have treated these people with utter neglect. We have been too busy building railways, canals, factories and other important public works. We have been thinking of the opening up of our country and the settlement of its vast areas. We have been interested in policies, many of them of national importance, having in view the material welfare of Canada, but we have given very little thought indeed to the citizenship of our country; to the necessity, the importance and the methods of receiving these newcomers into Canadian citizenship. Perhaps the war did something to wake us up from the lethargy into which we had fallen in this regard. It assisted us at least in seeing that the condition that had been produced in this country by the receiving of this vast army of foreign people might give rise to a menace; indeed evidences were forthcoming that in some sections of our land there was such a feeling as would constitute a menace to the welfare of this country. Canada is a young nation, and if her future is to be what we all hope it will be and what we all believe it can be, it is absolutely necessary that this question of citizenship receive greater attention than it has in the past. After all, the people of Canada are Canada's greatest asset. But I must say that we have among our people a large element which are an undeveloped resource, a resource which should be the subject of great care and thought. The future citizen of Canada must not be the result of chance; he must be created by influences set in motion by the present Canadian people. Professor Fairchild, of Yale University, in his book on immigration, says:

> The recent rapid development of communication has made the ease of immigration so great that we have been overwhelmed by the resulting problems. The movement of millions of people from one region to another is a phenomenon of prodigious sociological import.

In that phenomenal movement Canada has been sharing, the magnitude of Canada's problem is in proportion to the number of people she has been receiving from that movement as compared with her resident population. Professor Fairchild was directing the attention of the American people to the problem which immigration had produced for that nation. Our problem may be better appreciated if we illustrate it by comparing it with that of the United States. The largest number of immigrants which arrived in the United States in any one year was 1,285,349 in 1907. That meant an addition of about 150 immigrants to each 10,000 of the resident population of the United States. Canada's largest immigration was in the year 1913, when 402,432 people came to this country, representing an addition of 500 immigrants to each 10,000 of our population. So that the number of immigrants which Canada was asked to absorb in that year was about three and a half times as great as that which the United States was called upon to absorb in the year of its greatest immigration. Both countries have come to realize the necessity of a more careful selection of immigrants. But the United States has gone further than that; within the last five or six years they have organized a vast effort for the purpose of Americanizing their people—not only the foreigners who come to their shores now, but even native-born Americans of foreign parentage, and perhaps some also of American parentage.

Last year Canada made certain amendments to its Immigration Act, the chief purpose of which amendments was to exclude from Canada undesirable citizens. I shall not take time to enumerate those amendments, but if it is important that this Parliament should by legislation in the form of an Immigration Act take all necessary precautions to exclude undesirable immigrants from our country, surely it is of even greater importance that we should endeavour to reduce to as small a number as possible the undesirables who are now in our midst.

I think that a man would not be unreasonably optimistic who would believe that in the very near future we shall have a large immigration to Canada. If I were to give my own opinion—which, of course, would not be of much value—I would venture to predict that by the year 1940 we shall have 20,000,000 people in Canada, the greater portion of which will be newcomers to our shores.

Let me direct the attention of the House to another phase of this question. During the twenty-year period from 1900 to 1919 there were received into Canada 3,311,498 immigrants, of whom 1,188,946 were British. 1,268,793 American born, and 853,039 from other countries, but all of non-English parentage. Let me put this in another way: 1,188,946 were British-born and 2,121,832 were non-British. This means that in the past twenty years we have had to absorb a number equal to twenty-five per cent of our total population. Not only is the problem one of number, but we can well understand that while a country of limited population such as Canada is may successfully absorb a certain number, when the number exceeds that to a very large degree, it may become quite impossible for us to absorb and assimilate the new comers to our country.

Another phase of the situation which exists in Canada is brought out by the figures of the Canada Registration Board. Their report shows that on June 22, 1918, there were in Canada of males sixteen years of age and over, 2,656,548, of whom 561,650 were alien born, and of those so born only 200,580 had become naturalized, so that we had in this class of males 361,070 who still acknowledged allegiance to a foreign country. I think every one will admit that this is not a desirable condition to exist in our country; that people who come to our land, especially those who come intending to make Canada their home, should become part of our life, should become naturalized citizens and should put themselves in a position to take upon themselves all the responsibilities of citizenship in our country.

Another phase of the situation is shown by these figures. According to the census of 1916 taken in the three Western Provinces, we find that out of a total population of 1,240,374 there of those of ten years of age and upwards, 102,425, or 8.3 per cent were unable to speak English. This included, of course, native-born as well as foreign-born, and they were distributed fairly equally throughout the three provinces, with 37,504 in Manitoba, 40,126 in Saskatchewan, and 24,795 in Alberta. Of the different nationalities there represented, the Ukrainians show the largest percentage who do not speak English, with a percentage of 39.8 of those ten years of age and over. Of the Austro-Hungarians 35 per cent did not speak English, of the Poles 27.2 per cent, and of the Russians 27.1 per cent. These are the figures as regards inability to speak English; but there is a still further phase of the question which I wish to bring to the attention of the House, and that is the number of illiterates in our country. In the three Western Provinces, out of a population of 1,240,374 of ten years of age and over, 92,732 or 7½ per cent were reported as illiterates, the foreign-born furnishing 62,559 or 67½ per cent of these. Each province seems to have its share of this class. Manitoba with 32,978, or 8.1 per cent of its population of ten years of age and over; Saskatchewan with 36,021, or 7.7 per cent, while Alberta had 23,733, or 6.4 per cent, and Winnipeg alone had 4,642 unable to read or write. I do not refer to the Western Provinces with the intention of showing that they are any worse than other parts of Canada. I use these figures merely because I have them and they are more up to date than any other figures I have for the country. But if we look at the condition of Ontario as reported in the census of 1911, we shall find, when we consider the age of the province and the comparatively small number of its population that are foreign-born, that the condition there is even more deplorable than that of the Western Provinces. According to the census of 1911 there were in Ontario 147,225 who could neither read nor write.

Mr. BURNHAM: How old were they?

Mr. STEELE: I cannot give the ages.

Mr. BURNHAM: We must have the ages, because some of them might be so young that they could not be expected to read or write.

Mr. STEELE: Yes, that would be expected. But 6.5 per cent of the total population was in that class. There are in Ontario to-day large numbers of foreign-born residents, and it is estimated that one-fifth of the present population of Toronto is foreign-born. Even old conservative Quebec is not free from this same condition, because figures of at least two or three years ago showed that about 105,000 of the population of Montreal were foreign-born.

In all this I am not casting one word of reproach on the foreign-born. I am using these figures simply to show the situation which exists in Canada to-day, and this situation, as I said, creates a problem which we cannot ignore. This condition of illiteracy, this condition of non-English speaking—and when I use the term "non-English," I include with that the other official language "French;" but I may be pardoned if throughout my remarks to-day I use the term "non-English" as illustrating the condition which exists in the greater portion of Canada at least. The fact that we have so many illiterates so many who do not speak and are not learning to speak the English language, so many who apparently do not desire to become naturalized citizens, creates a problem which we must face, and so long as this condition exists in Canada we cannot have a unified country. But to remedy the situation we cannot trust to the happy-go-lucky methods of the past.

The solution of this problem involves not only the commercial prosperity of Canada, but even the safeguarding of our national life. Whatever policy is adopted in Canada should have for its sole object the making of Canadians who will be absolutely one hundred per cent Canadian in spirit. We should endeavour so to assimilate this population that we shall have one common standard of nationhood. To all the foreign-born who come up to the standard of admission Canada extends a hand of welcome, but every immigrant should be made to understand that this is a British country, that while he may continue to love his homeland, which in many cases has had a glorious history and demands the admiration of its people, while he must not necessarily give up the use of his own language, in this country Canada's methods of life must be maintained. The inferior civilization of the native lands of these people cannot be transplanted to this country, and they should be made to understand that our laws and institutions must be respected, that in future Canada will be their home, and that their duty and allegiance and responsibility is no longer to the land of their birth but to the land of their adoption.

Canada as a nation has a duty to the foreigner. While she has a duty to the foreigner she has perhaps an even more important duty to herself and her future. In my opinion there are three prime requisites in our methods of dealing with the foreigners who come to our shores. First, we must fit them for industrial life. A very large proportion of the immigrants from southeastern Europe come here as unskilled labourers. They come largely for the purpose of making a little money, and when that is made they purpose returning to their own land where they have left their families to reside during their absence. They serve a good purpose in this country, without a doubt, but even these temporary residents should be compelled to contribute their utmost while in Canada to the country's needs, not only by their labour, but by their mode of life and their influence as citizens. All our immigrants who are engaged in industrial life in this country, especially Europeans, should be compelled to observe our laws of health and of society, for otherwise our social organism will suffer. The illiterate, non-English foreigner provides a fertile field for anarchy, Bolshevism, and the many other "isms" and manias that are cursing the world to-day, and from which no one suffers more than the same common labourer of foreign birth. Just in proportion as we remove his illiteracy and teach him to read and speak the English language, and teach him proper methods of living, do we increase his value as a national asset, and increase his value to himself and his family. Men who cannot speak our language are generally condemned to the hardest kind of labour and the lowest wages, and they will generally be found in the lowest ranks of our industrial life. It is manifestly unfair that the labour of the low-living illiterate foreigner should enter into competition with that of the Canadian; but it is much worse when conditions are such that Canadian labour is driven to compete with that of the Asiatic or European foreigner. In the first case, the condition of the foreign labourer may be raised to some extent towards that of the Canadian, but in the second case the condition of the Canadian labourer is sure to be brought down lower, towards that of the foreigner.

I said that by compelling the foreign labourer to live under Canadian conditions we will be doing him a service. Employers of labour testify that as soon as the labourer can speak and understand English, that moment his earning power and usefulness is increased. Testimony is given by American employers of labour that a man who knows, speaks, and reads the language by which he is surrounded is worth on an average five dollars per week more than before he acquired that knowledge.

The second requisite, to my mind, is to fit these people for naturalization. We define the terms upon which a foreigner can secure naturalization in this country. We say to these people: We desire you to become naturalized subjects of His Majesty, and when you are able to comply with certain conditions you will be received into the Canadian family. We say further, by our actions, at least, that we disapprove of a refusal or neglect on the part of any newcomer to become a full Canadian citizen, and yet we put forward no effort to fit them for taking upon themselves the duties and responsibilities of citizenship. We make no effort in fact to acquaint them even with the requirements of the naturalization law, not to make them familiar with what we expect them to do. If we say, as we do, that a person seeking naturalization in this country must have a knowledge of English or French, it seems to me it is our bounden duty to give them an opportunity to learn either English or French. In the United States a few years ago a concerted effort was made by Congress to remove some of these disabilities in respect of the foreigner, and to provide means whereby they could become familiar with the need and the methods of securing naturalization. The results were amazing. Let me give a few figures taken from United States records. In 1910, there were 222,264 applicants for naturalization, and in 1915, 354,132

4 p.m. —an increase of over fifty per cent.

In 1919 there were about 650,000 applicants for naturalization. There is no doubt that much of this increase was due to the efforts put forward to give the foreigner such conveniences and opportunities as would enable him to comply with the requirements of the naturalization law.

The third requirement, I think, is to fit these men for the franchise. One of the chief responsibilities laid upon the newly naturalized citizen is the exercise of the franchise. Canada, we delight to say, is a democratic country; we are a democratic people, but if we as a democratic people are going to govern ourselves in a democratic way, we must do so wisely.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. gentleman mean that if we are to govern ourselves wisely, the better we govern ourselves the better example we will furnish to the foreigner because the foreigner is already able to judge of our standard?

Mr. STEELE: No, I had not that in mind. I will allow the hon. gentleman to expand that idea which, I am sure, is a very interesting one. But what I had in mind was that if we claim to be a democratic country and are ruling in a democratic way, we must see that we do not reflect upon democracy by giving Canada a rule which is not truly democratic in all respects and which does not represent a wise democracy. If we are going to keep up the standard which we have set we must as one of the methods try to keep up the standard of the individual voter. If upon the present electorate we are going, within the next few years, to unload as it were a large volume of unprepared voters, who have had no preparation for exercising the franchise wisely, then I think we must admit that probably to the degree that the standard of the electorate will be reduced the problem which we have to meet will be made more difficult of solution because of the lowering of that standard. The lower we make the standard of intelligence of our voters the less capable they become to solve the problems that are facing us.

I have thus far been speaking of our duty to the foreigner in the interest of the State. We also have a duty to the foreigner in his own interest. It seems to me that we have resting upon us the duty of protecting the foreigner and the new immigrant from the agitator and the exploiter. For example, in our industrial life, I believe that no employer should be allowed to herd his employees in shacks. The law should insist that they should have comfortable homes with sanitary surroundings and that their persons and homes should be reasonably sanitary. There should be no herding together in foreign quarters. The modern slum is one of the most convincing evidences that even yet democracy woefully fails at times to govern itself. There is no more reason for slum conditions existing in our Canadian cities than there is for a cesspool to be established in the centre of this beautiful Chamber. Intelligence and authority will prevent both. Where slums persist there is a lack of intelligent government on the part of someone. These conditions which I have described do exist and perhaps the chief offenders is the foreign-born employer. I do not say that he is the only one by any means.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Does the hon. gentleman recall any city where there are no slums?

Mr. STEELE: The conditions which have existed in the past should not be allowed to exist in the Canada of the future and because slums existed in ancient cities and have existed in nearly all cities up to the present, is no reason at all why they should be allowed to exist in the cities of Canada. The homes of the foreigners, their surroundings and the field of their labour, should be according to Canadian standards. They should not be permitted to bring into this country the standards of life in the lands which they have left or to adopt these standards here and live according to them. They should be compelled to approach the Canadian standard. Not long ago, it is reported, a strike occurred among the foreign workmen in an American plant. They sought a conference with their employer and their demands were under three heads, as follows: They said they wanted a place to hang their hats and coats; they wanted a place to wash and they wanted an arrangement by which the foreman should stop kicking them. Whether that really occurred or not I cannot say but at all events it illustrates reasonably well, the conditions that exist in many of our labour fields in our country. The foreign labourer is not always properly treated and especially is he not properly treated by his own foreign employer.

But not only should the labourer of foreign birth be looked after; the foreign-born woman needs attention and all the more so now that in a few years at most she will probably be adding her voice to the solution of Canada's problems. She has been entirely ignored in the past and little or no provision has been made for her instruction—little or no thought given to her citizenship. These women will be the mothers of hundreds of thousands of boys and girls who will be brought up to be future Canadians. Statistics show that the foreign-born woman rears just about twice as many children as the native-born woman rears and if the old saying is true that the hand that rocks the cradle is the hand that rocks the world, we say that the hand that rocks the Canadian cradle should be the hand of a woman possessed of the Canadian spirit.

The foreigner should also be protected as far as possible from the exploiter and the imposter. His ignorance of our language, laws, customs, institutions and business methods should not be taken advantage of by any person. Many of these people come from countries where the system of government is unlike that which exists here. In the homeland of many of these people government means tyranny, taxation and terror and it is easy for them to believe that all governments are the same and to become imbued with a feeling of opposition to all government. It is then that the agitator gets in his work and sows the seed which too often leads him to lose confidence not only in the Government but also in society, in the church and in his fellow men. Bolshevism and revolution are held up by the agitator as the only remedy. The man who comes under that influence cannot be expected to be a true Canadian; he is apt to lose the spirit.

Then there is the man who exploits the foreigner commercially, and robs his pocket, and the foreigner thus exploited in apt to lose the Canadian spirit and to believe that all Canadians are equally dishonest. There was drawn to my attention a few months ago a case which illustrates this point effectively. In a certain part of the province of Ontario a middle aged man, who came from Germany a few years ago and has during his residence in this country proven himself an industrious well-behaved fellow, desired to become naturalized. He knew that lawyers are the men who are supposed to be able to advise on legal matters and he consulted a lawyer.

Mr. GAUVREAU: That is the man.

Mr. STEELE: The lawyer advised the man and incidentally, before he left his office, asked him for $6 in payment of his fees. The application for naturalization was filed in the proper way and although the Naturalization Act of 1919 says distinctly that no person of German birth can secure naturalization in this country for a period of ten years after the passing of that Act, the man in question was not so told. His application for naturalization was filed and about the time report was passed upon it he received an additional bill from his legal adviser for $14. It just cost this man $20 to consult a lawyer who did not tell him the truth.

Mr. PROULX: Who was the lawyer.

Mr. STEELE: Can we expect that man to feel kindly towards Canadian institution? Now offenses of this kind are not confined to lawyers. That profession is responsible for quite sufficient we know; but even some of our judges in Canada to-day are receiving the applications of German and Austrian citizens, are passing upon them, and are recommending the applicants for naturalization, well knowing, or at least they should know, that no naturalization certificates can be granted that class of people. What is the result? The applications are sent on to Ottawa, but naturalization certificates are not forthcoming, and the man who has made application naturally desires to know why he is not receiving a certificate. Then the political exploiter comes in. "Oh," he says, "you cannot expect to get anything from that Government at Ottawa." I am not making these remarks with any political significance at all because perhaps if any other government were in power the same story would be told. The result is that that man becomes an enemy not simply of the present Administration but of any Canadian Government. There is no doubt such a man has been badly used and I would call upon the Government to see that this practice among the lawyers and the judges of our country in deceiving German residents who are applying for naturalization, is stopped.

But perhaps the most dangerous exploiter is the political type, whether it be a person, or a newspaper or, as sometimes happens, the two combined. They plead the cause of the foreign born, appeal to their prejudices, stir up whatever racial feeling there may be, and in this way antagonize these people against prevailing Canadian conditions. They are constantly endeavouring to persuade foreign born that they are unjustly treated, that those in authority are their enemies, that their liberties are being interfered with—that, in fact, Canada is more Prussian than Germany. I venture the opinion that a very large measure of the antagonism of the foreign-born to things that are Canadian is due to these two classes of people—the social agitator and the political exploiter. They are both imposters and future events will prove that they are, and have been, the worst enemies of the communities they are to-day professing to guide. Both these classes make their appeals in the name of British fair play knowing well that they are only doing so in order that they may, so far as they are able, destroy that same spirit of British fair play. The man or newspaper which seeks to excite the prejudice of the foreign-born at this time of our history against Canadian law in order that for selfish purposes he or it may claim to be the friend and protector of the alien, or the alien born, acts unworthily and is one of the chief instruments in destroying Canadian unity.

The Government to my mind should at this time set on foot a great movement for the Canadianization of the foreigner in our land. We owe this to the people who come among us, and we owe it to the nation itself. The future welfare of our nation is largely dependent on the ideals of its citizens. Canadianization is not only an intellectual process but it is closely associated with our economic, industrial, social and political progress and prosperity, and it makes for the very life of Canada. The foreigner should be made to feel that he will get a square deal in Canada, but he should also be made to see that Canada must also get a square deal from him. He should be taught that his children have greater opportunities in Canada than anywhere else in the world, and that is so because of our resources, our laws, and our free institutions. I would go further and say that the foreigner as he lands in this country should be made to feel that he is here on probation, and that if he does not make good, back he will go in the course of time to the land he has left.

There have been rather extensive efforts made in this country along these lines by certain bodies who, however, are unable to co-operate and unite their efforts. Perhaps no organization in the country has made a greater and a more genuine effort to do something for the Canadian foreign born than the Daughters of the Empire. I am glad on this occasion to be able to say a word on behalf of that society, and to commend the splendid efforts that it has been making during recent years to bring under the influence of our Canadian life and spirit the young people of our country.

The Toronto Board of Trade have for several years been studying this matter and are bringing it to the attention of the authorities wherever it can be done. Our churches and our settlement workers have also taken the matter up, and our Western provinces are giving it very great consideration. I think that every person who looks into it feels that these agencies are unable to adequately handle the situation as it exists. Some paramount unifying body is needed which can induce all the existing agencies to work in co-operation, and even then the task will be one that will be almost impossible to overtake. I would therefore urge the need and the wisdom of the Federal Government undertaking a thorough and extensive Canadianization programme which, with the aid of the provinces and the municipalities, will produce results which will materially promote the future unity and prosperity of our people. The task of preparing this army of foreign born people for a full and intelligent appreciation of the higher social, industrial and political life of Canada, and to produce within them a right point of view with respect to their relationship to the State, is difficult at the best. But if this mass of raw material now in our land is to be remodelled into good Canadian citizens, Canada must pay the price. This is a service we owe not only to the foreign-born and would-be Canadian citizens, but owe also as a matter of self-protection to the state.

And I bring this subject forward not with the thought of restricting the opportunities of the foreign-born nor of restraining them from making the best of their life in Canada, but rather for the purpose of enlarging their opportunities and of assisting them in securing their full part in the blessings and privileges and opportuities which Canada so lavishly possesses and which she offers so generously to her people.

Mr. SAMUEL CHARTERS (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word or two in support of the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Steel) . I think the House will agree with me that he is to be commended for placing so much valuable information before us. The Canadianization of the foreign element is a question of interest to the people of the whole Dominion, and it will not be settled until it is properly settled. Doctor like, my hon. friend very carefully and, I think, very accurately diagnosed the disease and then proceeded to suggest many remedies that might be employed in order to ameliorate, if not cure, the disease. There are very many conditions, he said, which called for immediate action, if such action is at all possible.

Reference was also made to the question of the naturalization of our foreign element. Let me suggest one or two instances in addition to those which have been already given. In 1918 the registration made of all males over sixteen years of age showed that there were 110,000 Austrians, of whom 70,000 still retained their nationality; 32,616 Italians, 27,000 of whom had not been naturalized; and 47,777 Chinese, of whom only 625 were naturalized. This is evidence that the foreign population is not here for the purpose of becoming Canadianized, but rather for the purpose of making what money it can and, in the great majority of cases, returning to its native land to live in happiness and contentment. When that is so we have a right to consider what is the duty of Canada in connection with a solution of the problem.

The foreign element is responsible for very many of the unatisfactory conditions in the slum districts to which reference has been made. For instance, in 1907 in the Province of Ontario there were no fewer that 6,120 undesirable immigrants dealt with by the authorities, with this result: 1,51[illegible] patients were sent to hospitals for the insane, at a cost to the province of $227,550; there were 4,314 prisoners in jail, which cost the province $61,329.23; and there were 289 prisoners in the central prison at a cost to the province of $25,425.80, making a total cost for those 6,120 persons—every one of whom had been brought into the province under the laws of the Dominion—$314,315.03 for that one year. Since that time many deportations have been made, and the Immigration laws have of course been improved, but notwithstanding that the undesirable element continues to flow into the larger cities, and it is a very conservative estimate to say that upwards of $3,500,000 has been expended upon this class of people during the past twelve years. They are responsible for a very large proportion of the crime that exists in the country, and they are also responsible for a great deal of the agitation that is disturbing the Dominion at the present time.

Following the conditions in Ontario, I might give you, Mr. Speaker, an example of what is happening in one of the western provinces. A press despatch dated from Yorkton, Sask., April 8, 1919, is as follows:

> Thirty criminal cases, including murder, incest, illegal shooting, assault, perjury, comprise the criminal docket of the Court of King's Bench which opened its sittings here this afternoon. Foreigners are involved in every one of the thirty cases.

The same conditions are brought out in the report of Mr. Perry, Commissioner of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, which was tabled a few days ago. Speaking of the action of the foreign element in the West he says:

> They have shown little appreciation of the just and fair treatment meted out to them by the people of this country. They have shown themselves to follow and support the extremists who play upon their ignorance and appeal to their national prejudices and sympathy for the Central Powers. Bolshevism finds a fertile field among them and is assiduously cultivated by the ardent agitator.
> The assimilation of our large alien population is of the greatest importance and it demands wise and sympathetic action and constant attention.

Speaking of the literature that is being circulated, he says:

> A number of convictions have been secured but there is a flood of pernicious and mischievous literature not on the prohibited list. Under the cloak of freedom of thought and speech, this literature is being spread for the avowed purpose of overturning democratic government and destroying the foundation of civilization. Appeal is made to British fair play to protect them in their efforts to destroy British fair play.

In spite of these conditions a considerable number of our people are anxious to bring into Canada very large numbers of foreigners in order chiefly that our farms and factories may be supplied with very much needed help. Important as it is that such help should be provided, I think it would be a very great mistake indeed if conditions were permitted to be created under which twenty or thirty millions of foreigners should be brought into Canada in the next twenty years. We must have Canadians. We cannot Canadianize these people sufficiently fast to enable them to be assimilated as Canadians. So the greatest mistake we could make would be to bring in such a very large number of people. What we must do is to bring in picked people—men who are in sympathy with Canadian aims, and with its British institutions. If we do that we will succeed. If we proceed along the other line, I am convinced that we will have merely a population instead of a nation—we will be a house divided against itself; and we have the strongest authority for the statement that such a house cannot stand.

That thinking people all over Canada are taking steps as I suggested a moment ago to meet and deal with this question is evidenced in many quarters. For instance, the president of the Board of Trade of Toronto, Mr. Kenneth J. Dunstan, at their annual meeting last January, made this statement:

> Canada may expect large foreign immigration within the next few years and it is imperative that adequate steps be taken to teach not only the English language, but also the fundamental principles of our Government and our ideals of citizenship. It is intended to actively aid in the organization of a national movement in favour of a Canadianization policy, which will help the foreign-born and their children to appreciate our form of Government, our laws and their administration, and also to appreciate the responsibilities and duties which go with the privileges of such citizenship.

I think his statement will meet with a very ready response. Every campaign that has been carried on unitedly by our people has succeeded. That campaign, if inaugurated, will succeed in doing a very great service not only to the foreign element but in arousing the interests of our people to the necessities of the situation. To make such an effort successful there must be some backing from the Administration. Therefore I would suggest that the Government deport all foreigners found engaged in unlawful agitation and enforce the law to the letter against all citizens who are convicted of similar conduct.

The Government should assist by substantial federal grants the provincial authortise in the education of the children of foreigners. Such grants should be conditional upon the flag flying over every school, and every day there should be some exercises to emphasize the meaning and value of Canadian citizenship. Every newspaper printed in a foreign language should be required to print in English translations of all articles dealing with national Canadian questions. The Immigration Department should give special encouragement to immigrants from the old lands and from those countries whose people have shown a disposition to become Canadians. These suggestions are worthy of consideration by the Government and by the members of the House. The Government of the day and all those who have to do with the enactment of laws should have before them as far as possible the old Gladstonian declaration to the effect that all Governments must pass legislation to make it easy to do right and difficult to do wrong. To the extent that we follow that course we shall speedily succeed in creating a sound, united Canadian nationality.
