George Rex.

Rt. Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, moved, seconded by Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (leader of the Opposition):

That Mr. Speaker do make grateful acknowledgement of the gracious message of His Majesty the King on behalf of the House of Commons.

He said, Mr. Speaker, it is fitting that I should say a few words on this occasion in reference to the message of His Majesty the King and the subject matter thereof.

We have been favoured at various times by having associated with the home of the Parliament of Canada different members of the Royal Family. This site of our Parliament buildings was chosen by our late beloved Queen Victoria. The corner stone of the old building was laid by her son, then the Prince of Wales, afterwards King Edward VII of England. The corner stone of this present building was laid by His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, and that of the memorial tower by His Royal Highness, Edward, Prince of Wales. So that from the first days of Confederation down to the present time, the foundation and construction of our Parliament buildings have been connected with the Royal Family. Their interest in Canada has been exemplified by their active association with the home of the Canadian Parliament.

This occasion invites us to review some of the events of our history connected with our past Parliamentary homes and to indulge in some reminiscences. I may be pardoned, therefore, for saying a few words as to the past, as well as with regard to the present and to the future.

Our Parliamentary homes have been somewhat nomadic; and in that respect they have partaken of the character of our earlier period of exploration and development. To the British colonies in North America Parliamentary institutions came in due time. The old Parliaments of the Maritime Provinces early found their homes in the cities of Halifax, Charlottetown and Fredericton; and these homes have been maintained to the present time. The Parliaments of Upper and Lower Canada, when united, found their homes in various cities. The first meeting of the Parliament of United Canada was held at Kingston in the year 1841. Thence it was moved to Montreal in 1844. Fire drove the representatives of the people from their legislative home at Montreal and they betook themselves to Toronto. After Toronto had sheltered the members of the Parliament of United Canada for about ten years, they found a home in the city of Quebec. After Queen Victoria's choice of Ottawa as the seat of the Federal Government and the building of the old edifice which was destroyed by fire in 1916, the Parliament of the United Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada met in Ottawa in 1867, and on November 6 of that year the first meeting of the Parliament of Canada was held in Ottawa. This brief sketch gives us an idea of the wanderings from place to place of our representatives, until at last they settled down in the Parliament Buildings at Ottawa in 1867. With the exception of a short interregnum after the fire of 1916, during which we found shelter in the Victoria Museum Building, we have since made our home here. And now, a few years after the fire of 1916, we occupy this noble and splendid edifice, which we hope will long continue to be the home of the Parliament of Canada.

May the record of Canada's legislators in their new home be as worthy of being embalmed in the history of our country as has been the record of those who have been connected with the Parliaments of the past.

We cannot help looking back to that day, the 6th of November, 1867, when the members and senators of the first Parliament of Canada crossed the threshold of their new home in Ottawa. I have often tried to sympathize with their state of mind, their hopes, their fears; none of us lived the lives that they lived; passed through the struggles which they passed through; earned the experience that they earned. It is impossible, therefore, for us fully to appreciate their feelings. At that time 181 members of Parliament and 72 members of the Senate crossed the threshold of their first national Parliamentary home. With what hopes; with what fears; with what pride in the record already made; with what uncertainty of feeling, yet with what strong hope in the future did these men—young, middle-aged, and old—commence their deliberations. Behind them were the struggles of long years of development, of organization, of the formation of municipal institutions, of bringing the country out of the rough and into a condition under which it could make greater and fuller progress, with all the struggle and contest and difficulty incidental thereto. In their hearts there was a new fire; on their faces a new light. They looked to a future vague and uncertain, yet full of strange and hidden potencies, flooded with the rising sun of possible great and glorious days.

These men had courage; they needed to have courage. As they looked upon the past and tried to look into the days to come, they needed the full consciousness of their high emprise, all the courage of their resolution, all their optimism and hope, to face the dim and uncertain future and go on to the work left for them to do. We who stand here after a lapse of more than fifty years can plainly read the record. We find it in the harvest which has been gathered from the seed they scattered on uncertain grounds; in the advance which has been made in territory; in the increase of internal strength. It is a record which ministers to our pride, though it is no occasion for boasting. It tells of a past which is a source of gratification to people who have carved out a road for themselves from the rough and the wild—people who belong to a country whose proportions are noble; whose foundations are securely laid, whose superstructure remains for the generations of the future to complete in manner worthy of its firm foundation.

Mr. Speaker, as we cross the threshold of this the noble home of Canada's Parliament of to-day, it behooves us to contrast ourselves with the men of the past. We must look to the proud record which has been made and which has been handed down in trust to us. We must question ourselves as to what manner of workmen we shall prove ourselves to be as we bring forth the tools of our art and apply them to the work that yet remains to be done. Are we fitted to carry on the work so well begun? When fifty years have passed and others stand where we stand to-day, will our work bear the scrutiny of those who succeed us? Will it stand contrast with the work of the Fathers of Confederation?

Looking back over the years which have passed since Confederation, and observing where we stand now as compared with where we stood fifty years ago—not only as regards our own internal affairs, but as regards also our status as a country among the nations of the world—we cannot help realizing that in all respects Canada's position is immeasurably greater now than it was then.

But every advance that we make in knowledge of the world outside of Canada, every advance that we make in world life and world struggle, put upon us the added responsibility of higher conceptions, of stronger principles, of a finer finish of culture and of superstructure to the great national edifice, now being raised, and in the completion and finishing of which it is our duty and privilege as well to take some part.

(Continuing in French). (Translation): Mr. Speaker, before resuming my seat, I wish to say a few words to my colleagues—my friends, as well, I trust,—who, within these precincts, speak French as their mother-tongue. It goes without saying that in undertaking such a task, I shall make many mistakes. I am yet a pupil, a very young pupil in the colloquial knowledge of French, but it is with the greatest confidence that I appeal to the indulgence, goodwill and proverbial courtesy of my colleagues.

Let me first congratulate you on the inauguration of these Halls of Parliament and on our crossing the threshold of this national edifice, built upon its old foundations, and designed according to the old style of architecture, and surrounded as it is with the memory, traditions and the very presence of those noble men, who, half a century ago, framed our constitution, the Fathers of Confederation. We have in Canada the descendants of two great historic nations, of two virile and powerful races which, in past centuries, have strongly determined the destinies and inspired the ideals of a large portion of the territories and peoples of Europe. Our ancestors, throughout the world, on land and on sea, have struggled against each other on many a battlefield; but our ancestors, more particularly within the later years, have fought, on various battlefields, side by side against a common foe, for the same cause, prompted by the same ideas of justice, liberty and for the rights of humanity. The feuds, misunderstandings, ill-feeling and prejudices of the days of yore are almost a memory of the past, and what remains now enshrined in our hearts is the memory of a noble courage, of a perfect camaraderie, of an entente cordiale as permanent, I hope, as it is deep-seated.

In North America, our two races have played a glorious part and on this continent unexplored, uninhabited, and almost a virgin wilderness, they have developed a civilization, the richest and the most powerful in the world, over this vast expanse of territory which is now known as Canada. Our two races, for over two centuries, have battled and contended with each other for mastery, and afterwards they have remained together in this territory as good friends, as fellow-citizens of a common and well-beloved country.

There are differences between the two ethnical groups; differences of genius, of origin, of character, of language. Those differences have existed from the very outset and will perpetuate themselves in the future; but the causes of those divergences should not be lost sight of and now, after the stress and storm of the awful and tragical war that we had just brought to a triumphant conclusion, if we wish to grapple with the problems of the future, we must set to the task of welding all the elements of our population into a united nation, as fellow-citizens and inhabitants of a country which needs all our efforts towards its upbuilding and its fashioning into a noble and great commonwealth. On this historic occasion, when we cross the threshold of our new home of the Parliament of Canada, let us make it our duty to dedicate ourselves anew to the service and welfare of our country; let us pledge ourselves ever to keep burning, on the altars of this national temple, the sacred fires, lit over half a century ago by those noble and distinguished men, who even in death are never silent and still speak to us and whose example of service and sacrifice are still our inspiration.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I have the privilege, on behalf of His Majesty's loyal Opposition, of seconding the motion which has just been moved by the right hon. the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster).

The cable of greeting which has been read by you, Mr. Speaker, from His Majesty reminds us not only of the sovereignty which we share in common with all parts of the British Empire, but of the constant concern of members of the Royal Family for the well-being and prosperity of this Dominion, and of the many intimate associations of its Royal members with these halls of Parliament.

My Rt. hon. friend has spoken so feelingly and effectively of the attachment between His Majesty the King and the people of this Dominion that I shall refrain from attempting to add to what he has so eloquently said in this connection, beyond mentioning that hon. members on this side of the House share in equal measure the sentiments of loyalty and devotion to the person and office of His Majesty.

If more were needed to reveal the heart of the Canadian people, and, for that matter, the heart of the Royal Family, it would be found in the expressions of mutual affection everywhere evoked during the recent visit of His Royal Highness, the Prince of Wales, and the memory of that visit at this time.

May I join my right hon. friend in giving expression to other sentiments which we experience in common on this historic occasion?

It is not more a source of regret to supporters of the Government than it is to hon. members of the Opposition that the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) is prevented, because of the impaired condition of his health, from being present at and participating in these opening ceremonies, certain as they are to live in the memories of all who are privileged to witness them. It is gratifying to us, as it will be to the people of Canada, to know that the change of scene and thought, and most of all, the freedom for a time from vast responsibilities, which the Prime Minister is at present enjoying, have not been without their beneficent effects; and that restoration of health, which we all hope may be speedy and complete, appears now to await him. Still, we regret his absence, and we miss his presence.

There is another presence which will also be missed by this House and by the country on this memorable occasion. I am sure every hon. member will deeply regret that the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who for fifteen years preceded the Prime Minister in that high and important office, and who for forty-four years was an honoured and greatly beloved member of this House, was not spared to witness the restoration of these Halls of Parliament in which his long life was given with such fidelity to his country's service. Especially on occasions of ceremony, such as this, do we miss his distinguished appearance, his chivalrous and courteous manner, and, most of all, his charm of utterance and ability to portray the significance of transpiring events toward which many of us stand as mute spectators.

But, Sir, whilst we miss these leaders of our political parties through the recent past—the one taken from us and the other spared to us—we are all glad, I am sure that, circumstances being what they are, the honour of being the first to welcome the Commons to their new home, and to speak the word which gives its appropriate setting to this occasion, should have fallen to one who is not only so eminently gifted in the art of expression, but who is also the oldest member of the King's Privy Council for Canada. May I extend to my right hon. friend the congratulations of hon. members of this side of the House, in which I know hon. members on his own side will very cordially join, that, despite the many vicissitudes of a long and strenuous public career, he has been spared to attain this distinction, and to enjoy it in the capacity in which he meets Parliament to-day.

With all that my right hon. friend has so eloquently and appropriately said, we of His Majesty's loyal opposition are in full accord. Did time permit, and were it fitting so to do, one might dwell at great length upon the thoughts which this occasion inspires, and which the dignified and noble proportions of this imposing edifice cause to be uppermost in one's mind. Great as the temptation is to speak of much that is suggested here, with the permission of the House I shall content myself with but an added reflection or two upon the notes that are sounded as one contemplates the impressive loveliness and vast architectural beauty of these Halls of Parliament in their finished state.

It is not always easy to interpret the mind of genius; but genius lies in the ability to interpret to others the mystery of the greatness that lies everywhere about them. This, in a word, through the medium of these buildings, is what the chief architect, Mr. John Pearson, and Mr. J. O. Marchand, his associate, and others with them have succeeded in doing, with such admirable skill and such perfect taste, as respects our vast Dominion. The committee of both Houses in charge of the work of reconstruction, the departmental officers and officials of Parliament, and all who have assisted in thought or execution of design, are to be congratulated upon what we behold to-day. They are not less to be commended for permitting the architects great freedom in the working out of their ideas. If it is appropriate, as I believe it is, to single out the chief architect for special mention on this occasion, I would remind the House of the tablet which appears in St. Paul's in honour of Sir Christopher Wren, the architect of that great cathedral: "Lector, si monumentum requiris, circumspice"—"Reader, if it is a monument you seek, look around." If it be praise of Mr. Pearson and his associate that is demanded, let it be uttered by the visible embodiment of their conceptions.

The first note sounded through a contemplation of these buildings, even in their unfinished state is that or our Canadian nationality. First and foremost, comes the thought that this is a national edifice, that it symbolizes Canada. More and more, as the years go by, we shall come to feel towards these buildings as the Englishman feels towards the Houses of Parliament at Westminster. How strange that they too should have been destroyed by fire some eighty years ago! These Halls of Parliament, like those yonder, represent our nation's story; they are the centre of our nation's story; they are the centre of our national life. With consummate skill, exception.

The stone of which the walls of the interior are constructed bears upon its surface the marks of the sea, though it comes all the way from the Middle West. It is Canadian stone. Like the Laurentians which we see as we look towards the setting sun, it reminds us that, recent as our country's written history may be, its material foundations belong to the oldest known geological formations to be found anywhere on the surface of the globe.

Francis Parkman has told, in one of his great works descriptive of Canada's past, of how, while New England was still a wilderness, and the settlers of Virginia scarcely dared venture inland beyond the sound of a cannon shot, Champlain, in the near vicinity of the Rideau and the Chaudiere, where these very buildings stand, was planting on shores and islands the emblems of his faith. The daring exploits of those early intrepid explorers and Christian missionaries, that form the romantic and heroic background of our early history, are depicted here and there in sculpture and painting throughout these halls, reminding us of the great race that first brought the arts of civilization to this part of the North American continent.

In the main entrance, the central column, commemorative of Confederation, washed at its base by a mythical sea, stands symbolical of the British Isles, whence sprang our political institutions. It serves to remind us, as well, of what a noted historian has referred to as "the expansion of England," and the other races that have combined to make our Canadian nationality what it is. When completed, the fan-shaped projections of this central column will unite with like expansions from the columns that take their rise from the outer edges of this central court, thereby forming a series of arches symbolical of the several provinces of the Dominion. In this splendid way will be commemorated our Confederation, the unity of the British peoples, and what the Parliament of Canada and the Legislatures of the several provinces owe to the mother of Parliaments in the old land.

The tower which is to be the crowning feature of this structure will be a national memorial to Canada's sons who gave their lives for the world's freedom in the recent war. All Canada will rejoice at this recognition of our heroic dead, the chivalry of our young land. Beneath the stone at its base, laid by His Royal Highness, the Prince of Wales, in September last, will be found the names of the workmen who have carved the stone, and wrought the iron finishings which are a part of this structure. In the tower itself, I believe it is contemplated to record the name of every man and woman who served with the military and naval forces of Canada during the war. What finer symbolism could there be of the forces that combined to win the War—the armies in the field, the navy and the merchant marine upon the sea, and the workmen in essential industry wherever found?

In this Chamber and in the Senate, as also in the reading room and the Railway Committee Room, the design and artistic detail will be such that, not only will great dignity and impressiveness be lent to the surroundings, but each room will speak its own purpose.

The Hall of Fame which connects the central court with the Library will be our Canadian pantheon, the prophecy of a Canadian Westminster or St. Paul's of the Canada that is yet to be.

In this unique and inspiring manner, those of us who are privileged to assemble here, will be reminded daily of our country's vastness in extent and resources, its variety and picturesqueness in natural scenery, and ever-changing customs, its strength and virility in all that relates to the development of its industries, its progress in art and letters, as well as in material wealth, and of the true greatness of the Canadian people in character and heroic achievement.

A second note sounded in this wonderful environment is that of harmony—harmony of colour and design, harmony of aim and purpose, harmony of the several parts that unite to comprise the whole. Here surely is something that will not be without its influence upon the amenities of our parliamentary life, and its bearing upon the great problems that confront our nation. We have too often mistaken the significance of our differences of origin, of temperament, of interest, forgetting that variety may lend a richness to life which uniformity tends wholly to destroy. What is needed in the upbuilding of our nation is not the obliterating of differences, but the reconciling of them. We should seek to make this noble structure a temple of reconciliation in all that pertains to our national life. To what loftier purpose could we dedicate the new privilege that is ours to-day?

There is another note that is sounded, and which at the moment seems to ring out beyond all the rest. It is the spirit of our people. To some it has seemed a misfortune that we should have entered these buildings before they had reached completion. They, surely, have never heard of "the glory of the imperfect." What we witnessed in the destruction of these buildings was a symbol of the desecration and the desolation of recent years. What we are witnessing to-day is the spirit of the people rising out of the ashes and ruins of the world, and building anew a civilization of a higher and saner order than any the world has hitherto known. Who would separate himself from this work of reconstruction, standing aside lest his garments may be stained? Why, Sir, we have here a foretaste of the industrial commonwealth that is to be, where, in the affairs of State, the workers in industry are the builders in common with the framers of a nation's laws.

And this note brings out another; it is the greatness that is yet to be. It was on the 56th anniversary of the laying of the corner-stone of the old Parliament Buildings by King Edward VII, at that time the young Prince of Wales, that his brother, His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, officiated at the relaying of the same stone as the new foundation of these buildings as restored. Speaking of that earlier occasion, His Royal Highness remarked that, looking at that stone, and all that it represented of the changes that had taken place when it was first laid, we recognized how little those who had assisted at the ceremony of those days could foresee the great progress and advancement that has been made by this Dominion. If that remark was true when we were still in the midst of war, how much more true it is to-day when Victory has been won and Peace restored. When Edward VII, as Prince of Wales, visited the capital of Canada that was to be, he and his party made their journey from Montreal to Ottawa in canoes, they were escorted by Indians and couriers des bois, they landed at a wharf on the banks of the Ottawa, and climbed its slopes. To-day, our transportation terminals rival our legislative halls. What will Canada be in another fifty-six years? What in another five hundred and sixty? Who will dare to say?

Great as was the faith of the Fathers of Confederation in the future they foresaw their anticipations have been eclipsed even within the lives of some who were spared until our day.

Sir, this nation's greatness can be limited only by its aspirations. We have been given by Providence a firm and enduring foundation. All that we wish for in material environment is symbolized in what we see to-day. The form, the semblance of loveliness, the outer strength and beauty, are all here. It remains only to cherish and ennoble the nation's ideals and to seek their realization in the justice of our laws.

Words of my own fail to express what I wish for my country in this connection. But the words of another come to me as I speak, and I apply them to the soul of our nation in the spirit of the resurrected form and beauty we behold to-day. It is a note clearer, purer, more ethereal, than all the rest.

Through the deep caves of thought I hear the voice that sings:
"Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll!
Leave thy low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea!"

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Beauce) (Translation): Mr Speaker, you will realize that it was not my intention to address the House this afternoon. However, I feel it to be my duty—an agreable duty indeed—to notice in the presence of my colleagues, the remarkable effort just made, in the French language, by the right honourable minister of Commerce (Sir George Foster), who is now filling the important functions of leader of the Government.

He has set an example to his English-speaking colleagues, and we, whose maternal tongue is that of Racine and Corneille, hope that this example may be often followed.

In a language as distinguished in substance as it is in form, the honourable minister displayed before our eyes the panorama of the history of Canada. It was truly interesting. He made us live over again the hours of anguish which preceded the cession of Canada to England and the trying period which followed it.

We remember indeed reading in our history that the beginnings of the English regime in Canada were not always what they should have been.

There lacked lubricant between the administrative machinery of the time and the French Canadian people—then, supplying with the native races, the only population of the country. But in 1775, there took place in America an historical event which was a source of inspiration for Great Britain.

Two years ago, Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to be present, in Westminster, upon an occasion the remembrance of which will ever live in my memory. It was the celebration in London, in the heart of the British Empire, of the anniversary of American Independence. It was on the 4th of July, 1918, and upon that memorable day Mr. Churchill, in his speech, uttered the following words:

"When England lost the empire which was called the United States of America, England thereby won an empire."

How, Mr. Speaker, did England win an empire by losing the United States? Because this event determined with so clear-sighted political men as the English are, a new course in the management of their dependencies. It was a lesson by which it profited. And it profited by it to such an extent that to-day is seen around it this empire an integral part of which we are proud to be.

We are to-day meeting for the first time in this legislative temple. The speakers who preceded me have praised in inimitable language its artistic and harmonious proportions. I have but to join my voice to theirs, and to add that we of the French tongue are ready as we always have been to unite our efforts to those of our English-speaking friends and colleagues who share with us the soil of Canada on a footing of absolute equality.

We are here the descendants of two ancient and chivalrous races who have just demonstrated — if ever proof were needed —that they had not degenerated, when for five years on the battlefields they covered themselves with an immortal glory.

Yes, we desire to take our share, not only of the benefits which naturally accrue to a Canadian citizen, but also our share of responsibility and duty.

We were bidden to do so by the honourable minister; we shall willingly do it.

Mr. Speaker, I have but one word to add: let all devotion join together, let all energy in the country unite. The work to be done is immense and for the carrying out of the task before us, it is not too much of all the experience of men older than myself, and of all the ardour and spirit of those who are younger. Let all old and young join hands in what is truly a sacred union.

Then it comes to my mind at this moment that the Greek history tells us that in the great celebrations, in Athens, was to be seen a procession of a truly imposing nature. It was the filing past of the old men ahead of those of the younger generation, the old men, bending towards the grave, chanting words like these: "We are the fathers of the nation, the hour of our departure is near, we disappear and you will follow us." And after the old men had marched past the forum, the younger one appeared and these were singing: "We come after you and our supreme duty shall be to march in your footsteps."

A moment ago, the honourable minister was recalling to us the immense task accomplished by the Fathers of the Confederation, at a time when the future was not very bright before them. Well, we can repeat after him as after the Fathers of the Confederation: "We are your descendants and we will follow in your footsteps, in order that Canada towards which are turned the eyes of the world, be a happy country, united in harmony and prosperity."

Motion (Sir George Foster) agreed to.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both Houses of Parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I congratulate you that after an enforced absence of four years, it is possible for you to assemble in your new legislative home, resting in trustful security upon the old foundations and surrounded by the picturesque and historic setting of Parliament Hill. Though not entirely completed, its noble proportions, its wide and convenient spaces, its beauty of design and chasteness of finish and its unique local situation mark it as a most striking and dignified structure, worthy of the people whose national life it will henceforth serve.

Since the last Session of Parliament events of importance have taken place which have brought appreciably nearer the much desired settlements of peace. Following the exchange of the final ratifications, the Treaty of Peace between the Allied Powers and Germany has been brought into full force and effect and has rendered possible the constitution of the League of Nations and the establishment by it of the various Commissions and mandatories authorized by the Treaty to be carried out under its direction. It is satisfactory to note that the status of Canada as a member of the League has thus been definitely fixed.

The Treaty of Peace with Bulgaria has been concluded and will be submitted for your approval. Negotiations for the conclusion of Treaties of Peace with Hungary and Turkey are now well advanced and, if concluded in time, will be laid before you during the present Session of Parliament.

The first meeting of the International Labour Conference, in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty of Peace, was held in Washington in October and November of last year and was attended by representatives of my Government and of the Canadian employers' and employees' organizations. It will be gratifying to learn that Canada was selected as one of the twelve Governments whose countries are entitled to representation on the governing body of the International Labour Office.

When the remaining Treaties shall have been concluded and the functions of the League of Nations and the various tribunals authorized thereby become fully operative, it is confidently hoped that the end will have been reached of the confusion and uncertainty consequent upon the long and regrettable delay in bringing into operation the provisions of the Treaty and an effective beginning made in the improvement of national conditions and the adjustment of international relations which will ensure the continued blessings of peace.

The forces which Canada contributed to the war have now nearly all been returned and mostly demobilized and the great majority have resumed their avocations and again become active and important factors in civil life.

The Department of Soldiers' Civil Reestablishment and the Soldiers' Land Settlement Board continue to provide vocational training and opportunities for permanent occupation which greatly aid in the solution of the problem of readjustment, whilst the work of the Labour Employment Bureaus and the helpful service of the Canadian Patriotic Association in administering the emergency fund provided by Parliament, have materially assisted in solving the problem of temporary non-employment.

In the European economic field clear vision is still impossible and the unsettled state of Exchange, the lack of International Credits, and the inflation of paper currency, combined with the scarcity of raw materials and the demoralization of labour and transport conditions, combine to retard production and to restrict the exchange of products necessary for the proper sustenance of life and the rebuilding of the waste and destruction caused by the great war. From every quarter of the world is being impressed, often by severe privation and suffering, the one great lesson that increased production through increased work, combined with thrift and economy in individual and state, is the only sure hope of business improvement and future prosperity.

After four years of war and a year and three months of confusion and dislocation which has succeeded thereto, it is satisfactory to know that business in Canada has been well maintained, that production has been large and that general conditions are on the whole satisfactory. It is cause for thankfulness that of all countries affected by the war, Canada has maintained a record of social order and industrial and commercial prosperity second to none.

The ratification of The International Opium Convention renders it necessary to obtain legislation to carry into effect its provisions relating to the sale of opium, cocaine and other deleterious drugs. A Bill will be laid before you for that purpose.

A Bill to provide for a Dominion Franchise will be introduced, dealing with the qualifications of voters and the procedure necessary to enable all persons legally qualified to register their votes.

Other Bills will be presented for your consideration including a Bill respecting Copyrights and Bills providing for the amendment of the Patent Act, of the Loan and Trust Companies Acts, the Indian Act, and the Exchequer Courts Act.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts for the last fiscal year will be laid before you. Estimates for the next fiscal year will be submitted at an early date, making provisions for the various services of the Government of Canada. These have been formed with a view to strict economy, having due regard to the requirements of the public service and the obligations of the Country.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:
Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In inviting your careful attention to the important subjects which will engage your attention I pray that the blessings of Divine Providence may attend your deliberations.

On the motion of Sir George Foster it was ordered that the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both Houses of Parliament be taken into consideration on Monday next and that this order have precedence over all other business, except the introduction of Bills, until disposed of.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed lists of members to compose the select standing committees of this House under Rule 10; said committee to be composed of Messrs. Reid (Grenville), King, Calder, Meighen, McCoig, Middlebro, and Robb, and that that portion of Rule No. 10 limiting the number of members of the said committee be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Joint report of the Librarians of Parliament.—Mr. Speaker.

APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY SERJEANT AT ARMS.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Serjeant at Arms, with my approval, has appointed Louis Charles Panet, Esquire, to be his deputy during the present session of Parliament.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH BULGARIA.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL laid on the table of the House a copy of the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Bulgaria, signed on the 29th November.

ADJOURNMENT—ABSENCE OF THE PRIME MINISTER.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER moved that the House do now adjourn until Monday next at 3 o'clock.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: May I ask the right hon. gentleman who is leading the House (Sir George Foster) if he can give the House any information as to the probable date of the return to his parliamentary duties of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden).

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not prepared to give my hon. friend (Mr. Murphy) that information.

Motion agreed to and House adjourned at 4.40 p m.

Monday, March 1, 1920.

The House met at Three o'clock.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION.

Mr. SPEAKER: I beg to present a communication from His Excellency the Governor General approving of a Minute of the Privy Council appointing Hon. Sifton, Secretary of State, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purpose, and under the provisions, of the Eleventh Chapter, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, entitled "An Act Respecting the House of Commons."

REPORTS AND PAPERS TABLED.

Annual Report of Steamboat Inspection; Annual Report of Department of Marine and Fisheries; Annual Report of the Department of Naval Service; Annual Report of the Fisheries Branch; Order in Council authorizing the payment of Command money to the officials of the dockyard service; Amendments to Radial Telegraph Regulations—Hon. TREATY BETWEEN ALLIED POWERS AND BULGARIA.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council) moved that 350 copies in English and 150 copies in French of the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Bulgaria signed on 27th November, 1919, and laid on the table of the House on 26th February, 1920, be printed forthwith and that the provisions of rule 74 in relation thereto be waived.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion, of course, can only be entertained by unanimous consent of the House.

The House gave unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

On the motion of Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster the name of Mr. L. J. Papineau was placed on the Committee to nominate the Select Standing Committees of the House in substitution for that of Mr. King.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE AMENDMENT ACT.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to Amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act and to transfer to the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police the powers heretofore vested in the Commissioner of Dominion Police.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Explain, please.

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that last year a Bill was passed making provision for the amalgamation of the Dominion Police with the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, which amalgamation has now been carried into effect. Under the Ticket of Leave Act, however, certain special duties and powers are assigned to the Dominion Police, and the first section of this Bill is to transfer to the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police those duties and powers, the office of Commissioner of Dominion Police being no longer in existence. The object of the other portion of the Bill is to make a slight change in the pension provisions contained in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act of last year.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

[Mr. Speaker.]

TRIBUTE TO DECEASED MEMBERS.

THE LATE DAVID MARSHALL; THE LATE LOUIS AUDET LAPOINTE.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed with the Orders of the Day, I have a sad duty to discharge, that is, to refer to the vacancies caused by the death since last session of two of our members. Mr. Marshall, who was elected for the East Elgin division in 1906 at a bye-election, and re-elected at the general elections thereafter, has been suddenly called away, and we have on this side of the House a vacant place formerly occupied by a very much beloved friend and loyal supporter, not only of the old Liberal-Conservative Government in its time but also of the Union Government since its formation. Mr. Marshall never took a very prominent part in the discussions of the House. He was a man of stirling character and of excellent business ability, and he made his way with his fellow members by the possession and exercise of those qualities. I am sure that my fellow members on both sides of the House will join with me in deploring his decease and in sending to his family our sincere regrets and condolences.

Another member has also been taken by death since the last session of Parliament, the representative of the St. James division of Montreal (Mr. L. A. Lapointe), a man with whom I had a less intimate acquaintance, but who in his day and generation—he was not an old man when called away—served well his native city in many positions of responsibility and trust.

These two gentlemen have both gone from us. Yesterday they were here; to-day they are not. These occurrences may well make us think of the valuations that we put upon life and its purposes. Realities and vanities make up most of this life of ours, and as we grow older I think we come to the conclusion, especially when face to face with these occurrences, that the vanities are far more regarded than the realities, and that we pursue many of the former when we should be devoting our lives to the pursuit of the latter.

May these occurrences be to all of us a warning and a lesson that life is short, that its duties are great and that its responsibilities are heavy, and that it becomes us, more especially as representatives of the people, to play well our part as we pass across this short stage on our march through the eternities.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I add my tribute to what the Acting Prime Minister has said respecting the memory of our two deceased colleagues. They belonged to different provinces and they represented different parties in this House, but both were alike in this regard, that much of their life was given to public service. It is gratifying to recall that in the case of these late members we had an example of appreciation of public duty such as is given only by those who are willing to incur the responsibilities and obligations of public life.

Mr. Lapointe, who was on this side of the House for a period of something like ten years, gave a great deal of his time not only to the service of his country in Parliament, but also to the service of the municipal affairs of his city. For sixteen years he was a dominating personality in the Council of Montreal. He was chairman for ten years of the Finance Committee. At one time he was a candidate for the mayoralty. During the whole period of his municipal career the financial affairs of the city were conducted with a degree of efficiency and regard for public integrity such as satisfied the most exacting citizens.

Mr. Marshall, who sat on the other side of the House, was known to us, as my right hon. friend has said, not merely as a faithful, efficient and industrious public servant, but also as one of those who have done much to build up the most important of our industries. I am sure that we all join together in conveying to the relatives and friends of our late colleagues the deep sympathy which this House feels at their sudden and unexpected demise.

BOARD OF COMMERCE—RESIGNATION OF JUDGE ROBSON.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. leader of the Government if it is the intention to give to the House a statement as to resignation of Judge Robson from the Board of Commerce, and if so, when?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The papers will be brought down in due time.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY ACQUISITION —THE AGREEMENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I observe from the press that the Grand Trunk Railway shareholders have approved the agreement entered into between the Government and that company. I would like to ask my hon. friend, the leader of the Government, if it is his intention to bring down immediately a copy of the agreement?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, it is the intention.

LORD JELLICOE'S VISIT TO OTTAWA.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) if he has any statement to give to the House or if there is any official statement forthcoming with reference to the recent visit to Ottawa of Lord Jellicoe and his staff. By whose invitation was it that Lord Jellicoe came here? Has he made a report to the Government, and if so, will the House be put into possession of that report at an early date?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think I may answer my hon. friend's questions in the affirmative.

VACANCY IN EAST ELGIN.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Writs have been issued for the holding of bye-elections in three constituencies. There is also a vacancy in the electoral district of East Elgin. Is it the intention of the Government to issue immediately a writ of election for the filling of that vacancy?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Government will issue a writ in due conformity with the requirements of the statute. As to obtaining any further information, I am afraid that my hon. friend will have to adjourn his curiosity.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY MOVED BY MR. HUME CRONYN AND SECONDED BY MR. ALEXANDER McGREGOR.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the speech of His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. HUME CRONYN (London) moved:

That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, offering the humble thanks of this House to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament.

He said: The announcement in the public press that the duty and honour of moving the reply to the speech from the Throne had been conferred upon me was my first intimation on the subject, and came as a complete surprise. When, a few days later, the news was confirmed by a kindly letter from the Acting Prime Minister, there seemed no choice save to discharge the obligation with such modicum of ability as in me lay.

Lest, Sir, that expression should be criticised as an ungracious or, at least, lukewarm acknowledgement of the honour thus conferred upon me, let me hasten to add that the predominating feeling in my mind is one of utter unworthiness adequately to carry out the task which devolves upon me on this occasion; to do honour to our new parliamentary home; to depict in mere words what the artist has so well fashioned in stone; to be the first, in a sense to address my fellow members in this impressive Chamber, and in that address I humbly hope to counsel, to encourage, to inspire my fellow countrymen. Indeed, the task seemed to be so far beyond my powers that I was flung into a veritable slough of despond. You will appreciate my relief, Sir, when on Thursday last I was elevated out of that mire by the eloquence of the right hon. Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster), the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), and the member for Beauce (Mr. Béland); because after their tribute to the new parliament building I felt that part of the burden was lifted from any shoulders. My I add a further explanatory note. My ignorance of the usual technique employed was abyssmal, nor did consultation with those of experience and wisdom bring much assistance. A recent political biography described the speakers in the English House of Commons on a similar occasion as "purring ceremonious optimism." This phrase of itself was enough to confirm the repugnance, innate perhaps in one whose forebears hailed from Kilkenny, against adopting that particular feline mode of expression. "Purring optimism," forsooth, may I ask you, Sir, whether you ever heard an Irishman purr, where a government was concerned?

It would not have been a difficult, though perhaps a lengthy performance, to pass in review what Union Government, with or without the help of this Parliament, has accomplished. Such a subject might well arouse the enthusiasm of the speaker, if not of his immediate audience, who must, unless their understanding be wholly warped, be equally aware with him of its extent and importance.

But, in the first place, this task has already been undertaken by members of the Government, perhaps not so frequently or widely as might be desired, but with an ability and eloquence which easily surpass any effort of which I am capable.

Then too, and more important still, the speech from the Throne contains the Government's programme for the present session, and it is but reasonable to suppose that this House and the country at large will be more interested in a discussion of what lies before us than in even a memorable and fecund past.

Having arrived at this view, my first endeavour was to secure an outline of those measures which it was contemplated should be submitted for your consideration, but in this I was unsuccessful and it was intimated there might be some delay before any information would be forthcoming. In the interim, which was a considerable one, my mind naturally ranged over the possible field to be covered. Recalling the comedy produced some years ago under the title "If I were King," I set myself to draft what, as a representative of His Majesty, I should desire brought to the attention of the Canadian Parliament. In this I was in imagination not so much usurping the prerogative of royalty as combining in my unworthy person, like the survivor of the ill fated Nancy Bell, the "Cook and the Captain bold, and the crew of the Captain's gig." In so far, therefore, as my remarks —the product of a single and irresponsible individual—fail to concur in the actual pronouncement, they are made without the sanction of authority, and will doubtless be treated accordingly.

Canada, as has oft been proclaimed, enters this year into a new era. Formal peace—a peace, as the unreconciled irreverent have it, which passeth understanding —has been declared with our arch-enemy and the League of Nations duly incorporated. True it is, one of the chief belligerents—or if you quarrel with my phraseology, one of the largest nations—still remains outside, repeating the famous soliloquy "To be or not to be;" while her leading man has altered his lines to read:

"My League is out of joint: Oh, curses long That Lodge was ever born to set it wrong."

But we live in hope that this is but a temporary check and that before the year is out a fair and united start will have been made in that noblest of efforts—to banish war from a weary world.

But this new era brings to Canada, in common with other nations, problems and difficulties more pressing and more acute than those which confronted her in prewar days. Material problems connected with her financial status, her future population, the development of her natural resources, and those immaterial and elusive problems, still more difficult of solution, which have to do with her mental, moral and spiritual welfare. These varied questions are so interlocked and merge into each other at so many angles, it is well-nigh impossible to treat them apart, but from a legislative standpoint the attention of Parliament must of necessity be directed chiefly to measures dealing with the material aspects of the situation.

Permit me, then, to outline a few of the outstanding problems which to my mind demand our careful consideration. There are doubtless others which to some will appear of more vital import than those I propose to discuss. It would be impossible, Sir, even were I qualified, to cover the whole field, nor have I any desire to pose as a rival to the late all-wise, unlamented and much "wanted" William Hohenzollern.

To meet the heavy obligations incurred by the war (and I decline to delay the House by further definition of these—they are as familiar to us all as is the aspect of the most prominent landmark in our own constituencies) we must adopt such steps as will ensure prompt and full payment. It is significant that in an international memorial submitted last month to the Governments of the Allied and Associated powers, a memorial bearing the signatures of the most prominent financiers of the world, the following statement was emphasized: "No country is deserving of credit nor can it be considered a solvent debtor that cannot or will not bring its current expenditure within the compass of its receipts from taxation and other regular income."

The steps to be adopted have already been set out in the speech from the Throne; they are, in one aspect, precisely those so often commended to the public at large; so often, indeed, one hesitates to again mention them before this assembly. They are like the cardinal virtues, so facile of utterance, so difficult of attainment! Because it is easy enough to tell an audience or a nation that every one must produce and save, that "work" and "thrift" must be emblazoned on the national shield: whereas most of us find it hard to increase our normal output, and still more trying to change the habits of a lifetime and, for the sake of an altruistic benefit, to deny ourselves the luxurious necessities of modern existence. Many of us, too, appear to have forgotten the first lesson in political economy which teaches so clearly that dollars expended on luxuries not only cease to fulfil their proper function but enter into direct competition with those employed in productive trade.

A special committee on currency and foreign exchange, appointed by the British Treasury under the distinguished chairmanship of the late Baron Cunliffe, did not hesitate in its final report to the British House in December to repeat these maxims in the following language: ".Increased production, cessation of Government borrowings, and decreased expenditure both by the Government and by each individual member of the nation are the first essentials to recovery."

It will not, therefore, be less than our duty to consider in what manner the Parliament of Canada may best practice the doctrines which it is universally conceded lead to financial salvation.

Let us first examine the negative branch of the above commands, because economy or thrift is in a literal sense the inhibition of extravagance. On this side the Government can do much. In the first place, its borrowings should either cease altogether or be brought down to the irreducible minimum, and in the second place, every unnecessary expenditure should be ruthlessly vetoed.

Our uncontrollable expenses are enormous; interest and sinking fund alone exceed the total charges on the Consolidated Fund in the year prior to the outbreak of the war,—we cannot possibly lessen these: then there are the sums due for Soldiers' Pensions, Land Settlement, and Civil Re-establishment: even were these controllable the desire of our people is that there shall be generosity rather than niggardliness. They acknowledge that the debt we owe to the dependents of those who have fallen, and to the maimed and disabled, is a more sacred obligation than that engraved upon any bond.

Again, there are the absolutely necessary charges for the defence of this country, whether by sea, in the air, or on the land. There is no need at this moment to enter into a discussion of our national status, because, quite apart from any change in that respect brought about in the main by the wonderful achievements of our soldiers, it is unthinkable that we should longer remain content to sponge upon the over-burdened taxpayer of Great Britain.

Where then can we economize? It is difficult on an occasion such as this to particularize, but in general terms one can assert that no expenditure should be authorized unless it be absolutely necessary and that it also will tend to increased production. A halt must be called in the prosecution of public works which do not come within the above category, and we must for some years to come make shift to use such fixed plant as we now possess.

Members of Parliament and their constituents should alike refrain from pressing upon the Government their claims,—long delayed though these may be, necessary as they may appear to local interests—until this country is in a sounder financial condition. Deflation of our swollen credits is a more vital matter than magnificent public edifices or memorials, nor can there be any speedier means found whereby the mounting cost of the necessities of life may be reduced.

Outside of these larger enterprises which for the most part would be charged to our capital account, every effort should be made to lessen the drain upon the ordinary revenue. Let us agree that our public service is not overpaid. I imagine the public service will take that as a very conservative statement. It has of late become obvious that our experts can obtain higher salaries than the Dominion awards—there remains, however, more than a suspicion that certain departments are overmanned and that in many directions there is a duplication of effort which costs the country dearly.

So much for the unpleasant subject of economy, what of the positive side—that of Production. The first function of Government under the direction of Parliament is to see that a sufficient amount is raised by taxation to meet the country's annual expenditure. From the comments of the platform and press it is apparent the methods whereby this end can be accomplished will be the subject of much debate and profound difference. Daring as I may be, I do not propose to anticipate that event; suffice it to say that on those who propose radical changes in our customary methods of taxation the burden falls of proving there are other more equitable and equally efficient modes of raising the amount required. So far as my observation has gone, I have failed to discover in any or all of the alternative plans proposed sources of revenue which would suffice to produce anything like the total needed.

In a question like this, as in all matters of business, what is required for clear judgment is above all an accurate knowledge of the facts. While doubtless other hon. members, more able and experienced than I, have at their disposal this essential—yet such is my misfortune or density, I have never been able to find it clearly set forth. It would be to me a profound satisfaction if the Bill (introduced into this House some nine years ago and dropped because of disagreement between the Commons and Senate) providing for the appointment of a permanent tariff commission—were this Session revived and eventually put into force.

It is not often I venture to advance my opinion against that of the former Minister of Finance, but his suggestion made two sessions ago, that certain members of the Government should make personal inquiry on this matter throughout the country, struck me as an inadequate substitute for a body of experts who would study the question year in and year out, collate the facts, and thus permit Parliament to frame a system of taxation on something like a scientific basis.

But, after all, Mr. Speaker, it is but a play on words to denominate taxation as production. There are other measures more truly within that category, whereby the Federal Government can actively aid this essential factor in Canada's welfare. May I be permitted to mention but two of these? The first is the encouragement of suitable immigration to these shores. Nothing within the power of the Government to do can contribute more largely to our progress than an energetic campaign to this end. I would restrict the newcomers to that class who prefer to settle on and cultivate the soil—who are apt to be assimilated, who desire to become permanent citizens, and who will adopt for their own guidance the ideals of justice and freedom which have created for the British Empire its outstanding position in the world. The reputation of Canada and the widespread knowledge of her resources are such that even within the limited class above mentioned, I am confident that tens of thousands of the well-disposed citizens of other countries will be glad to join their fortunes to ours.

The second measure which appeals to me as of paramount value is a generous meed of assistance towards scientific research. Nearly a year ago I endeavoured to impress on the House the importance and urgency of this question. It would be unfair to repeat what was said on that occasion. I was disappointed when through the last session the Government made no move in advance. Each month's delay handicaps us in the race with rival nations, and under the seal of ignorance keeps hidden stores of treasure which might otherwise be at our disposal. How much would not Canada have lost if the scientific knowledge and patience of Dr. Saunders, the discoverer of Marquis wheat, had not been utilized by the Department of Agriculture?

On this one item alone our Western farmers are in pocket many millions; and throughout the length and breadth of this scientifically unexplored land there are many equally golden opportunities awaiting discovery! I venture, therefore, to appeal once more for immediate consideration and broad-minded action on what will be a positive aid to greater production.

Mr. Speaker, my two-word text has been, perhaps, unduly expanded, but the subject can be compressed into the following guiding principles, which will not tax the memory unduly:—

(1) Rigid economy;

(2) Cessation or minimization of Government borrowing;

(3) Adequate taxation on a scientific and equitable basis;

(4) An energetic and discriminating immigration campaign, and

(5) National scientific research.

In addition to these primary subjects which, by reason of our present position, insistently demand our best thought, there are other substantial legislative problems to be brought to our attention. A new Franchise Bill will be submitted and dealt with. This opens up the general question of representation and representative government, and I trust may lead to the serious consideration by a select committee of what is commonly termed Proportional Representation. The philosopher of the House has declared that humanity is on trial to-day, but humanity in this condition, having condemned representative government for all the ills of the hour, is more than ready to heave half a brick through its polished and highly respectable plate glass. Were it not well, then, to ascertain and remedy the obvious defects of a system which leaves large and important sections of opinion unrepresented by permitting local and artificial boundaries rather than the people themselves to determine an election? The threat or boast of a Provincial Premier that the next Federal Parliament shall contain not a single old member holds no terrors for me, knowing (and perchance happy in that knowledge), that "the Clerk of our delight shall hereafter rising look through this same bear garden after me in vain." But, Sir, whatever the Fates may have in store for us—and I use the plural advisedly because as the ancients pictured the Parcae as feminine in gender, so must we in modern political life recognize the metamorphosis wrought by the enfranchisement of women. A change perhaps not as striking as may prevail in Great Britain, but yet great enough to permit the ladies to wield the abhorent shears on the tenuous thread by which we are suspended —whatever, I repeat, these dear Fates have in store, we should, if not as members, at least in our capacity of citizens and voters, believers in the spirit of pure democracy, insist that an equal share of representation be given to each separate elector, instead of its exclusive possession being entrusted to any one class.

As a corollary to fair representation, we should be concerned with the machinery of Government. We should insist that the antiquated and obsolete plant which when in charge of either party creaked and groaned under a pre-war burden, and which, in times of war stress, frequently went out of gear, be relegated to the scrap heap in favour of a more efficient motor. The recent report of a committee of the Senate revives the significant statement of Sir George Murray that our "Ministers of the Crown"—those servants of the people who, in proportion to their responsibility, labour and necessary expenditure, are so fantastically underpaid—"have both too much to do and do too much." That Canada is not alone in this predicament can be gathered from the synopses of various like reports made to the British House of Commons. After reading these one is not surprised at the suggestion made a year or two ago that the greatest need of the English Government was a department of thinking. Shall I be deemed impertinent if I hint that an echo of this suggestion has been heard on our side of the Atlantic? If a reform of our system were to include an improved method for the submission and consideration of Government Estimates we would take a great step forward toward the intelligent control of the country's finances.

The Select Committee on Re-establishment, which did such strenuous and conscientious work at the last session, should resume its inquiries into the position of the returned soldier. There should be added to its duties an investigation into the working of the Pension Act. Let us not delude ourselves with the idea that the problem of the soldier can at any period be deemed static: in its very nature, which is human to the core, new phases, fresh consideration, further demands, reasonable and unreasonable, will arise. It is the part of wisdom that members of this House and the public should be kept in close touch with the entire situation, rather than it should be left in the hands of a department, no matter how fair minded or anti-bureaucratic its officers may be.

For much the same reason just mentioned a second Industrial Conference should be convened. Time and effort are never ill spent in an honest endeavour to readjust the industrial situation for the permanent benefit of all parties. The example set by the enlarged Whitley program in England and by the American plan as detailed in Leitch's most interesting book "Man to Man" show what may be accomplished by the democratization of industry. It is freely prophecied that before long Labour will be hiring Capital rather than Capital hiring Labour. Would it not be well for both of these interests to realize what this reversal of existing practices may entail?

The prominent part assumed by Canada in the settlement of the labour clauses of the Peace Treaty, and the fact that she is now a member of the governing body of the International Labour Organization, make it incumbent that we should keep abreast of this great movement. It is of interest to note that of the twelve members forming that body eight are the appointees of the Council of the League and but four were chosen by the votes of the remaining nations. Once again the renown won by our men in the field secured to us the distinction of selection from amongst a score or more of rival candidates.

Here endeth, Mr. Speaker, my review of those material questions which I should like this Parliament to consider, and on that side of the shield, while the situation is not free from peril, there is no need for pessimism. We are incomparably better off than our European Allies; we have at our disposal the resources of a vast and richly endowed land, and we are wont to believe ourselves a virile, sane and industrious nation. Granted that these adjectives can be truthfully applied, there is nought before us to cause undue anxiety. As the Scot has it: let us "Set a stoot hairt to a stey brae." Shall we be the less happy if, for a few years, "We scorn delights and live laborious days?" I trow not, provided our hearts are stout and our minds retain their sanity. But therein lies the trouble: we are all more or less abnormal; just as the war has affected our financial status, so has it upset our nervous system and modes of thought.

During the war Canadians were united by a common danger and a firm purpose: these artificial stimulants, with other intoxicants of more noxious but not less exciting nature, have been withdrawn. There appears to be some danger of disintegration. Not only has the old-time class warfare revived, but new classes and groups have arisen and are vociferously demanding the overturn of established order.

Canada, too, has unfortunately become the refuge for many from the old lands who bring with them as their household gods the inherited grievances of European autocracy. They "still nourish in their bewildered brain that wild, unquenched, deep-sunken, old world pain." But, that they should be permitted to become leaders of any considerable body of citizens, to so poison the minds of their followers as to kill healthy or kindly thought, is a matter for deepest anxiety. Unless we regain our mental poise, there can be little hope of recovery in the body politic and much reason to fear disruption.

The history of the early days of peace following every bitter war shows the existence of similar conditions; and as this war was the greatest and most terrible ever waged, so are the reaction and disturbance more pronounced. The dogs of war, it is true, are in leash, but "those lesser breeds without the law" are still in full cry, and "havoc" is their note. No nation, race or belief is secure from their attack. The more prominent the individual, the more untiring his effort, the more unselfish his aims, the greater his sacrifices, the keener are the progeny of Cerberus to pull him down, to worry him into retirement or death. The man hunt is on! Denunciation and Defamation, Slander and Scandal are the leading couples in the hellish pack!

But, Sir, you may object these are not matters to be cured by legislative enactment. I quite agree. The doctrine that man's moral nature can be moulded by statute is as musty as are the blue laws of Connecticut. What can this House do to remedy so grave an evil, an evil which legislation is admittedly helpless to cure? I believe much can be done by the mere force of example.

We meet to-day in a new building, erected by modern methods, yet imbued with the beauty and stateliness of the past —a gathering place typical at every turn of Canadian life, yet one in which any Parliament of the world might be glad to convene. May we not be persuaded to believe that those fierce flames, which found so much suitable material to feed their frenzy, destroyed not merely an antiquated and hazardous structure, but as well utterly consumed the equally inflammable and more dangerous vestments—veritable fabrics of Nessus—woven of ancient party strife.

I pray you, Sir, to believe I do not arrogate to myself the unenviable post of judge or mentor, nor is this a curate's plea for "sweetness and light." We have had, and must in the future retain, honest differences of opinion; our judgment on questions of the weightiest import will be widely divergent, and forceful words will be used by forceful men. But let us not fall into the mortal error of mistaking feeling for thought, or of substituting mere passion for argument.

I am confident I speak for many, perhaps for a majority of members on both sides, when I say we have in the past been forced to listen with grave repugnance to attacks made both within and without this House; attempts to stir up racial and religious feeling, to divide or segregate one section of the community or country from the remainder, to malign or belittle those high in the service of the nation; attacks which utterly failed to accomplish the nominal object of the aggressor; nay, rather served to undermine the very cause he purported to uphold. Do not let us forget, however far apart we may stand on questions of policy, we have at least one common cause for unity in that we are all Canadians.

For the Parliament of Canada can never represent the East as distinguished from the West, the English speaking peoples apart from those who love the French tongue, Capital rather than Labour, the city in preference to the country, or the civilian before the soldier. This Parliament should, and I believe does, represent the whole of Canada; a country of which we have every reason to be proud, but one in which, because of its physiographical position, its diversities of language, religion and interests, there is a greater need for the strongest unifying influence.

In searching for an apt statement on this head I applied to my broad-minded and good natured friend, who formerly represented Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe), but who is now to be congratulated on his election to the seat so long held by his distinguished leader. He drew my attention to the sentiment of the talented author of "L'Esprit des lois" or, as some Englishmen prefer to call it, "The Spirit of Nations," when he uttered this phrase: —"La société est l'union des hommes, et non pas les hommes." So in very truth this country of ours is and will only remain a Dominion by virtue of the unity of its citizens and not through the mere existence of the citizens themselves.

Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to travel over the greater portion of this broad land, and thus to learn, from such personal observation as my faculties permit, something of its attractions and resources. It does not, therefore, astonish me when conversing with my fellow members, whether they hail from Prince Edward Island on the east, British Columbia on the west, or from one of the seven sister provinces lying between, that each and every one is ready, in describing his home territory, to employ the sentiment—if not the graceful words of the classical poet—"Ille terrarum mihi praeter omnes angulus ridet."

An hon. MEMBER: Translate.

Mr. CRONYN: An hon. member demands a translation. There are many happy ones, but I prefer to adopt that of the westerner who, when speaking of his own smiling corner of the Dominion, says in words more blunt—but none the less convincing, "It sure is a bit of God's own country."

It has also formed a part of my life to pay many visits to Great Britain, and while on business bent my mind was ever open to the beauties—I need scarcely say, Sir, I refer solely to inanimate nature—the beauties of the Old Land, whether these were to be found in the mystic atmosphere of the "distresshful" island, in the wealth of colouring of peace-time England, or in the more rugged outlines north of the Tweed. I snatched at each rare opportunity to enjoy the pleasures offered by art, or that more elusive charm of a civilization mellowed by age; not too happily defined by the word "culture."

But on each and every occasion when the home-bound liner neared these shores, I found myself offering a fervent welcome to my native land. Nor was this worship evoked by the sight of the shining flood of the mighty St. Lawrence, or of those Northern hills upon whose purple peaks the deeper shades descended; it was not the memory of the thunders of Niagara transmuted and transmitted for the service and light of ten thousand happy homes, of our vast Mediterraneans bearing the argosies of a continent's commerce, of the unchecked horizon of our fertile prairies here showing the velvety blackness of their fallow soil, there miles of waving grain, richer than the tracery of any goldsmith's cunning; nor yet the intimate friendliness of those fruitful valleys bathed by the soft airs of the Pacific. It arose from a cause deeper even than these eternal glories, from a profound belief that in this country we draw more freely and fully the breath of life, that we have escaped (and thanks to the effort of the former member from Kingston, seem destined yet to escape) that taint of caste which to the outsider seems to permeate and render unhealthy so much of the old world; that in Canada we recognize as the truest aristocracy that of character—I would one could declare it to be the sole aristocracy to which we bow, but the gross bulk of the plutocrat obtrudes—that here there is given to every man an opportunity to develope those powers with which the Creator may have endowed him, and that as we gaze into the sky of our future we find it glowing with the promise of a glorious day.

That belief of mine, is my excuse, if excuse be needed, for making an appeal to my fellow countrymen to unitedly stand guard over this splendid heritage. Let us prove ourselves worthy, not merely of these stately buildings and all they symbolize, not only of our sires the benefit of whose arduous labours we now enjoy but worthy even, if that be possible, of those brave souls

> "Who ventured life and love and youth
> For the great prize of death in battle."

Too long have I, Mr. Speaker, presumed upon the patience of this House where words are our only currency and where, following universal law, an unlimited issue causes a corresponding decline in value. I would—however soon these worthless tokens of mine may disappear from the market of its memory—leave with it one message as a guide in the days to come; a message given literally from the deathbed of an outstanding Englishman, for he died a few days after its utterance, one who was a former Governor-General of this Dominion, and for whom might fittingly have been selected that joyous epitaph—"Glad did I live and gladly die and I lay me down with a will."

I am (perhaps too acutely) conscious that the simple and artless words used by the late Earl Grey will cause the cynic and worldly-wise—"those least erected spirits" —to scoff at them as better fitted for the pulpit or nursery, but I am among those who believe that the same ideals which govern our private lives should as well be the fixed stars to guide us in the rougher seas of politics, or, as Lowell has it "the real will never find an irremovable basis till it rests on the ideal." Here is the message; may it be graven on the hearts of all true citizens:—

> "We've got to give up quarrelling. We've got to come together.
> We've got to realize that we are all members of the same family.
> There's nothing that can help humanity, I'm perfectly sure there isn't, perfectly sure, except love! Love is the way out and the way up. That's my farewell to the world."

Mr. ALEXANDER McGREGOR (Pictou): Mr. Speaker I have the unexpected honour of seconding the motion so eloquently spoken to by the honourable member for London (Mr. Cronyn). As honourable members of this House know, I am not ambitious to be classed among the speech makers, and having but a short experience in parliamentary life, I feel that I should crave the indulgence of my brother members while I endeavour to discharge the duty that is laid upon me.

I wish to say that I regard the honour as being intended more for the important constituency which I represent than for myself, in that sense I accept it, and on behalf of my constituents express sincere appreciation. It is a high compliment to them that I should be privileged at this the first session in our reconstructed, commodious, and beautiful chamber, to second the Address.

I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that every honourable member of this House sincerely deplores the absence of the Prime Minister, and also sincerely hopes that ere long he will be restored to his accustomed vigour. Men come, and men go in Parliament, as they do in other walks of life. Some leave light, some indelible impress of individuality and power. Sir Robert Borden is recognized as one of the really great men of Canada. He has been an outstanding figure in our wide flung Empire, a statesman of the highest rank in the world's estimation.

Naturally, some have differed with him on political questions, but no one ever challenged his honour, his profound sagacity, his political devotion, or his powerful influence. The enormous responsibilities of the past five years have evidently shaken his vigorous constitution, and to-day, he may well be regarded as a casualty of the great war.

The honourable member for London has so completely dealt with the legislation proposed in the speech from the Throne that little remains to which I might refer. He has gone very fully into the financial situation, and the successful financing of our war loans, which during the war, has meant so much to our agricultural, and industrial prosperity.

Our success in financing the war within ourselves, was, I believe, a revelation to the people of this country. It demonstrated the fact that Canada was in the fight to the finish, and not only so, but one year after the signing of the armistice, the men and women of Canada again came forward with their money largely in excess of the amount requested by the Minister of Finance.

I think one would be justified in coming to the conclusion that the people of Canada have faith in the men who are guiding the destinies of the country in the most critical period of our history.

When Union Government was formed one of the promises made, was that returned soldiers would be given the preference of Government positions. In looking over the official records, I find that 338,137 officers and men have been demobilized. Of this number 23,532 men have been placed in positions in the different departments of the Government services, as follows:

Agricultural Department	269
Air Board	8
Auditor General's Department	9
Food Board	18
Civil Service Commission	13
Commission of Conservation	20
Customs and Inland Revenue	959
External Affairs	30
Finance	37
Governor General's Secretaries	2
House of Commons	10
Health	5
Indian Affairs	136
Immigration and Colonization	112
Interior	1,544
Insurance	1
Justice	637
Labour	76
Marine	158
Militia and Defence	2,408
Mines	90
Naval Service	757
Post Office	5,691
Printing and Stationery	158
Privy Council	16
Public Works	1,122
Railways and Canals	588
Secretary of State	22
Senate	12
Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and Pensions	7,364
Soldiers' Settlement Board	1,107
Trade and Commerce	144
War Purchasing Commission	10

Since these figures were compiled 2,000 additional appointments of returned soldiers have been made or a grand total of 25,532.

In addition to this the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment have placed over 129,000 men in various positions outside of the Government services.

At the end of the year 12,327 men were receiving training in schools operated by the Department of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment, and at the same time 11,223 men were receiving training in industries throughout the country.

In the Land Settlement Department 44,278 men have made applications for farms, of which 33,496 have qualified.

$55,000,000 has been advanced by the Government for the purchase of farms and equipment, for those who have settled on the land.

$125,000,000 has been paid out in gratuities to the returned man, and, $40,000,000 has been appropriated to assist the unemployed soldiers during the winter months of the present year.

Up to December 31 pensions paid to returned soldiers and dependents total over $41,000,000.

So I think it can well be claimed that the Government are carrying out their pre-election promises to the returned men.

Mr. Speaker, I believe there is no member in this House, who is not disposed to grant all reasonable assistance to the returned soldiers; the extent of our desire to assist is limited only by the ability of the country to pay. I do not hesitate to say that in my humble opinion, in view of our enormous financial obligations. Canada has been generous toward the returned men, and I believe a large majority of the returned men realize the situation and appreciate the fact that a grateful country has done what it could do to assist them. Personally, I do not take second place to any in my appreciation of our gallant forces and a desire to assist those who require assistance, but I have little regard for those who at the present time are endeavouring to exploit the problems of the returned men.

As the world is groping its way out of the horrors that engulfed it during the eventful years of the great war, many are depressed because the thing we call re-construction does not spring up in a night. There are some who appear to entertain the vain expectation that the countries which were scourged by the scorpions of war, and are heavily burdened with its indescribable consequences, ought to quickly emerge, and, as it were by magic, re-establish themselves in normal conditions. There are others, and these are not few in numbers who imagine themselves to be heaven born reformers, reconstructionists and prophets endowed with unfailing knowledge, of sure cure, and cure-all panaceas, that are warranted to immediately restore the world's social, industrial, commercial, and financial equilibrium, and make every man, woman, and child contented and happy.

I venture to think, Sir, that what we need to-day in this country, in common with other parts of the world, is a substantial reduction in the crop of political and social agitators, who are keeping the pools of discontent stirred up; and a common sense recognition of the fact that normal conditions cannot be restored by feeding fire with gasolene.

In my judgment there is no short cut, or primrose path to re-establishment, nor is there any quack political nostrum on the market which can be relied upon to give this country, or any country, immediate relief. The only remedy is work and more work, production and more production.

It is gratifying to note, in regard to the world's condition that some progress has been made in the stupendous work of clearing up international problems. The treaties with Germany, Austria, and Bulgaria, have been ratified, and we can hope that ere long these settlements will produce results that will be beneficially felt in all countries that were engaged in the war.

Referring to our own country, I have no hesitation in believing that it came through the war, and so far, through after the war conditions, with a record of achievements, that should be an inspiration to all the people of Canada. Mr. Speaker, our history is the history of the war. We were in it from first to last. We did not wait to be driven into it. We heard the call to duty, even before it was sounded, and responded in men, women, and treasure until the last gun was fired. We have the glorious record of work well performed.

We came out of the war with our unlimited natural resources unimpaired, we have immense potential wealth in our agricultural, mineral, fishery, and commercial enterprises, we have a virile and progressive people, and we should have unbounded faith in our country. We have, it is true, increased financial liabilities, but a very large part of these are in the control of our own people. Our fathers were never dismayed by the mountains of undertakings which confronted them, and as I see it, there is no reason why we should falter in the great work of nation building so well begun by them, and now resting upon our shoulders.

Looking the situation over, I do not see any country whose stability is more certain, and whose future is better assured than our own. We have come through the maelstrom as well as any of them, and better than many, and in this regard we do not accept second place even with the great republic to the south of us.

There was some fear that during the winter months, conditions might be trying. Our valiant soldiers and their dependents were returning and it was said that business depression might set in, and unemployment be unprecedented, but happily the evil days did not come. The Government organizations for taking care of returned men and providing employment, worked smoothly and successfully. Business men generally and employers of labour everywhere throughout the country were diligent in organizing to provide work for returned men and others. There has been expansion instead of depression, and on the whole it is a safe statement to make that we have had more satisfactory conditions than any other country that was involved in the war.

Our trade returns for the twelve months ending with December last show that the total imports of merchandise for consumption and the total exports of merchandise, amounted to the grand total of $2,235,928,072, which is $82,049,160 greater than in the year 1918.

Of the figures for 1919 the imports were $941,007,700; our exports were $1,294,920,372.

Of the imports $607,482,288 were dutiable and $333,555,412 were free. The duties collected amounted to $168,920,659.

The imports of 1919 exceeded those of 1918 by $30,858,560, and the exports of 1919 exceeded those of 1918 by $51,190,600.

In view of the recent depreciation of the Canadian dollar in the United States, we are much interested in the trade with that country. The returns show that in 1919 we bought from the United States goods to the value of $740,580,225. Whereas we only sold them goods to the value of $454,686,294. Needless to say we should endeavour to reduce the adverse balance, by buying Canadian goods instead of American productions.

On the other hand, it is interesting to note our trade with the Mother Country. In 1919 we sold the United Kingdom goods to the value of $528,035,514, whereas we only bought the relatively small value of $87,516,819.

Turning to another subject, may I remark on the fact that we appear to be drifting politically into class divisions. I have no quarrel with the movement; it may be well for those ambitious classes to experience what the responsibility of national government means. They will discover that it is an entirely different thing from government of a class. The truth is simple enough; no class can as a class govern this country, the class will have to cease to be a class, or the country will end the authority of the class.

Mr. Speaker, there is one class of people in Canada, and in other countries as well, known as the manufacturers, who appear to have a good many hands lifted against them. We find them attacked front and rear, on the right, and on the left; they are attacked coming and going. The principal reason back of these assaults appears to be that the agitators think it will be popular to attack them. Mr. Speaker, I am not here to defend the capitalist or any other class, but I think it is only fair that the man who puts his money into Canadian industry, who seeks to give employment, who does give employment, who creates markets and helps to develop the country, is no more deserving of attack because he makes a success of his business than is the farmer, the merchant, or the mechanic, who makes a success of his business. Why should one class be singled out as profiteers and the other commended as patriots?

During the war the industrial leaders of this country were as patriotic as any other Canadians. They contributed substantially in the production of munitions towards the winning of the war. A few of them probably made large profits, but it is also true that thousands of the workmen in the plants made unprecedented wages, and they are not the only ones who substantially increased their earnings. A large majority of plants, however, I am convinced, did not make exorbitant profits out of munitions, but they certainly did eminently patriotic service for the country.

I think it is sometimes forgotten that as a result of the great war many of our citizens do not realize the extent to which our industrial life was disorganized. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer, briefly, to what happened almost immediately after war was declared, in the county that I have the honour to represent.

In Pictou county we were the pioneers in the iron and steel industry in Canada. We were also the pioneers in shell forging and shell finishing. During the period of the war the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company forged upwards of 15,000,000 shells, ranging in size from the smaller shrapnel, to the 12-inch high explosives, equal to 200,000 tons of steel. Their value would be in the vicinity of $25,000,000. In addition to this they supplied large quantities of steel for other purposes.

The fact that we were able to undertake the forging and finishing of shells and thus keep our forces at the front supplied with munitions was not only a great factor in the winning of the war, but it was also a great factor in our industrial prosperity. Hundreds of carloads of shell forgings were shipped from the plant of the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company to the many shell finishing plants throughout Canada. Enormous quantities of steel and steel products were shipped directly to the Mother Country and to France by the Dominion Steel Corporation of Sydney. All the other steel companies in Canada, I believe, did what they could to assist in the time of need.

It may be interesting to note the total amount of federal assistance given those engaged in the development of the iron and steel industry. Extending over a period of twenty-five years, about $17,000,000 was paid by the country in order to encourage the development of this great industry. The amount collected by way of Business Profits Tax up to March 31, 1919, was $66,747,660. I venture to say that at least fifty per cent of this amount was paid by those engaged in the various iron and steel industries throughout the country. The Government has evidently received in direct cash payments at least two dollars for each dollar they paid out. Indirectly Canada was, many years ago, reimbursed fourfold for all the Federal assistance given towards the development of this industry.

As a result of our being able to undertake this important business, Canada was not only able to supply shells for our own forces, but in addition, we were able to furnish large quantities of munitions for the Mother Country and the Allied armies.

At the outbreak of war the plant of the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, employing between four and five thousand men, was almost entirely turned into a munition plant. When the war terminated, their business was naturally disorganized, and what is true with regard to the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company is equally true, I believe, of nearly every other manufacturing concern throughout the country. It should be understood that the manufacturers had no option in the matter; their plants were largely under the control of the War Department. Mr. Speaker, I think we should congratulate the manufacturers of Canada in the way they met the situation after the termination of hostilities, or during the reconstruction period. It was evident that while the manufacturers were readjusting their plants there was bound to be a period of unemployment, resulting for a time in hardship to the employees in the larger manufacturing centres. This situation was inevitable. It must be admitted, however, that in most cases the employers did their best to meet the situation, with the result that Canada has less unemployed in proportion to her population than any of the allied countries.

In looking over the trade returns I find that during the past year we imported steel and iron to the value of $154,021,858. This one item accounts for over fifty per cent of the adverse balance of trade between Canada and the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I have often thought what might have happened if our neighbours to the south were unfriendly neutrals during the years they remained out of the war. What if they had refused to sell us steel? What if they had refused to sell steel and steel products to the Mother Country? Serious as the situation was, it might have been more serious.

In view of the many lessons which we have learned as a result of the war, I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Government of this country will do well to further encourage the development of the iron and steel industry, which has meant so much to the industrial prosperity of Canada in the past, but more especially during the period of the great war.

Perhaps some of us forget the great financial obligations which have been thrust upon us as a result of the war. When we entered the war our national debt was $335,000,000; to-day it is nearly $2,000,000,000. The interest on our national debt at the outbreak of the war was about $15,000,000; to-day it is over $115,000,000. In addition to this we have a yearly Pension Bill of $25,000,000, or possibly $30,000,000.

As our financial obligations have increased, in like proportion our industry and efforts must increase, if we are to meet our obligations and overtake the world-wide shortage of all the necessaries of life. For five years 50,000,000 men have been fighting, and 100,000,000 men turned their attention from their ordinary pursuits in life to the furnishing of munitions and the necessary supplies that enabled our forces to carry on at the front.

In the years that lie before us, capital must be content with fair profits; labour must be paid a fair living wage. If our industrial life is interrupted by strikes the situation will become more difficult. To accomplish the task, labour and capital must co-operate.

During the last session of Parliament an industrial conference was held at Ottawa, representatives of labour gathering together in conference with representatives of capital from, I think, nearly every province of Canada. Mr. Speaker, I believe this was a move in the right direction; it will, no doubt, result in the bringing about of better conditions and a better understanding of the difficulties of both labour and capital. Not only should labour and capital work in harmony, but every province of this great Dominion should carefully consider the problems of the other provinces. The interests of the East should not be overlooked by the West, and in like manner the interests of the West should, and I believe will be considered by the people of the East.

In the past all classes in this great country worked side by side in harmony. There was little, if any, friction. I think it was well understood that when the farmer was prosperous the manufacturer was prosperous, and when the manufacturer was prosperous, labour was content. We can only prosper as a well balanced organization, for we are each dependent on the success of the other.

Our policy must be national, not selfish or sectional. I think it will be admitted by all fair-minded men that those who have legislated for us in the past, regardless of party, were not class legislators.
I believe the men who were entrusted with our political destinies in the past were honest men who did their best having regard to the interests of every portion of this great Dominion.

As a result of the war we have a share of the world-wide unrest which in other countries threatens to destroy the very foundations of civilization, but in that respect we have little to complain of in Canada. It is true we have those who advocate class legislation, and those who would set up one class against another. Such can end only in disaster, and those who advocate such a course are not the true friends of the soldier, of the farmer, of labour, or of the manufacturer. The platform or the policy of any class that is not national and equitable to all, regardless of class, race or religion, should not be considered, and, I believe, will not be considered by the intelligent men and women of this country.

While much has been said of our great natural resources, which I do not wish to minimize, at the same time, I believe the greatest endowment of any country is that of a united, happy, and contented people. The bulwark of a nation is not its army or its navy, but the character of its citizens. We are now clothed with the authority and obligations of a nation; let us as true Canadians demonstrate to the world that we are worthy of that great responsibility. We must not forget that the name of Canada is written large on the map of the world by the supreme sacrifice made by nearly 60,000 of our brave sons. The responsibility is with us to maintain it.

Mr. Speaker, I have much pleasure in seconding the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is appropriate that the opening paragraph of the speech from the Throne, as well as the burden of the remarks of the hon. members who have just spoken, should have reference in large part to the assembling of this Parliament in its new home. It would be strange, indeed, if, under the spell of the noble and dignified proportions of this chamber, we were not all impressed with the spirit of the Canadian people in rising out of the difficulties of the past and impressed with the future greatness of our country, if we are but willing to put our hands to the task and make the future all that it lies within the possibilities of our people to make it.

It is no mere formality, Sir, to have the privilege at this time of congratulating the mover and the seconder of the Address on the excellence of their speeches. I am sure that all of us who have heard them believe they have made the most of the occasion and of the opportunity afforded to them. If there has been any limitation in the nature of their remarks, that has been due, one must say, to the meagreness of the legislative programme which the Government has presented in the words which it has put into the lips of His Excellency in the Speech from the Throne. Listening to the hon. gentlemen, I could not help remarking how each of them seemed to regard himself as a prop beneath a crumbling edifice. They made a reference or two to some features of the Speech from the Throne, but for the most part they took care to "get out from under" it altogether. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. McGregor) went entirely into the past; he confined his remarks to giving the House very interesting and valuable statistics on matters of trade, on matters of manufacture, on assistance to the returned soldiers, on munition output, on trade with the United States and trade with the Mother country. He took care, as I have said, to confine his remarks almost exclusively to the past and to give the House a mass of statistics for which I am sure we shall all be very grateful.

On the other hand, the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn), who moved the Address in such eloquent, witty and poetic language, went to the other extreme, confining his remarks for the most part to the future, in a constructive and helpful way telling the Government wherein he thought they had been remiss in excluding from the Address practically everything in the nature of constructive legislation. I am sure we on this side of the House will all congratulate my hon. friend that he has been the first to draw the attention of the Government to this omission which will be noticed throughout the country, and, though doubtless not so intended, the remarks of both hon. gentlemen on the Address are a reflection upon the Government in what they have put into the speech of His Excellency to present to this Parliament at this time.

If one examines the speech from the Throne, one cannot help being struck at the outset with the fact that His Excellency's advisers appear to be infinitely more concerned with external affairs than with the business of this country. Omitting the opening section to which I have just referred, let us take the other paragraphs in the speech from the Throne and see what they include. First, there is a reference to the League of Nations, to commissions and mandatories. Then there are references to the Treaty with Bulgaria and to other possible treaties with Hungary and Turkey. The next is a reference to a conference in Washington, and next a reference to the confusion and uncertainty arising out of conditions affecting the League of Nations. There is a passing reference to Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and then comes another reference to the European economic field. The next section deals with confusion and dislocation again, and then we come to the International Opium Convention, and finally we are reduced to two tiny concluding paragraphs which contain all in the way of constructive legislation which the Government has to offer to the country at this time.

I could not but be struck the other day, with the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell), being the first to present a document to this Parliament, and at his laying upon the table of the House a copy of the Treaty between the Allied and Associated Governments and Bulgaria. We are all interested in Bulgaria, but I could not help thinking that it would have been more in accord with the wishes of the Canadian people if the first document to be presented to this Parliament had been for the purpose of ratifying and approving the agreement between the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Government of this country, instead of one of ratification and approval of this particular treaty.

The Government thought well to give to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company in England the right to approve an agreement of the terms of which the members of this House, with the exception of the ministry, have no knowledge even at this time. Sir, I submit that the people of Canada are concerned primarily with their own affairs and are entitled to have placed before their representatives in Parliament at the earliest possible moment documents of so vast importance as the one to which I have just referred.

But, Sir, there is a further limitation in the speech from the Throne which serves to reflect the mind of the Government in another particular. The speech discloses an entire absence of any policy on the part of the Administration in regard to the economic, social and political questions which are uppermost in this country at the present time. The hon. gentlemen who have just spoken on the Address drew the attention of the Government to the unrest in Canada, and spoke of "agitators" and so on. By so doing they helped to bring to the attention of the Government that it is high time we had in office in this country an Administration capable of propounding some policy which would help to bring that unrest to a speedy end.

Having referred to the first part of the speech from the Throne, I now come to the legislative programme which it outlines. What does it amount to? It says:

> The ratification of The International Opium Convention renders it necessary to obtain legislation to carry into effect its provisions relating to the sale of opium, cocaine and other deleterious drugs.

No doubt that is important, perhaps important enough to be included in a speech from the Throne, but I submit that the people of this country are much more concerned at this time with the question of food than with the question of drugs, and that it would have been much better if the ministry, in advising His Excellency what should be brought before this Parliament for discussion, had propounded some policy which would help to relieve the high cost of living, instead of skirting about that great issue and dragging in small affairs such as legislation for regulating the sale of drugs.

The reference to the Dominion franchise is the most important in the speech. As my hon. friend from London (Mr. Cronyn) has said, it will raise in this House the whole question of representative and responsible government. My hon. friend in that remark touched upon what I conceive to be the most important of all matters which we have to consider in Canada at this time. During the war we got far away, in procedure and parliamentary methods, from the ideas of representative and responsible government as they have been held in the past, and we shall not find a solution for the unrest of our time until we have in some very considerable degree restored those safeguards of liberty, freedom and popular rights which have been so much neglected by the present Administration.

Take the only other reference in the speech from the Throne to anything in the nature of constructive legislation:

> Other Bills will be presented for your consideration, including a Bill respecting Copyrights and Bills providing for the amendment of the Patent Act, of the Loan and Trust Companies Acts, the Indian Act, and the Exchequer Court Act.

That is the whole programme. While these Bills may be important enough, I submit that what is needed in the interests of this Dominion at the present time, more needed than any amendment to the Patent Act, is such an amendment of the tariff as will bring relief to producers and consumers. But the Government has not thought well to mention these questions which bear upon the needs of the country and are of vital importance. They have simply skirted around the vital questions and have dealt only with external matters or matters of petty concern, with which the attention of this House should not be taken up to any extent at this time.

The two refer nces to "confusion" and "dislocation" which the speech from the Throne contains suggest that what we must consider above everything else is how we can make our way out of this confusion and dislocation into something that will better represent the ordered system of affairs which we ought to have. In this Chamber to-day we have before us a visible embodiment of what can be done, when the minds of men are put to it, in the way of reconstruction. We have here something which symbolizes the resurrection to a finer life, out of the ruins and ashes of the past, which is possible in connection with our material environments. There is nothing in the way of material environment which we dare not hope to improve in this country.

Sir, unfortunately it is not only our material environments which have suffered during the war. There has been another loss, the greatest of all—the loss of human life, and the impairment of mind and body to many thousands of men who have suffered during this war. That is a loss which can never be made up. It is part of the infinite mystery. It belongs to the sacrifice which has been the price of freedom through all the ages. But the loss that we have suffered in material things and the losses we have suffered in human life do not make up the sum of destruction in this war. The war has also destroyed, as my hon. friend from London has said, much that is sacred and venerable in all our institutions, religious, political, and of every other nature. That indeed has been one of the most serious of all the effects of the war and to a very large extent accounts for the great unrest that exists in the world to-day. In faith, men "have faltered where they firmly stood." This is true alike in State and Church. Men's faith in government is shaken, and in religion, and even in themselves. What we speak of to-day as Bolshevism had its origin in a country where they have had least in the way of free religious and governmental institutions to cling to. Wherever such has been the case, there the world has suffered most. What is needed to-day to bring about a change in conditions is a restoration of the faith that has been weakened, faith in an over-ruling Providence, faith in our political institutions, faith on the part of men and women in themselves.

That brings me to the point which I should like to make in answer to the hon. gentlemen who have spoken so eloquently of the restoration of these halls of Parliament. It is not the restoration of the Parliament buildings that is needed so much as the restoration of our parliamentary system of government. Mr. Speaker, of all that we have inherited through our British connection there is no possession so highly to be prized as the British system of government. The British constitution has been the model for our own. All members of Parliament from the day of Confederation down to the present have spoken of the greatness of that constitution. Its ancient origins is something that we reverence. We reverence even more the spirit of freedom which is conserved through that constitution. To the Fathers of Confederation and to this Parliament, it has been, as Sir Wilfrid Laurier once said on a memorable occasion, as a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night to lead this nation towards greater unity and nationhood.

But, Sir, the greatness of an institution, as of an individual, lies in its spirit; and an institution, no matter whether it be a material structure such as this or whether it be a constitution, which has lost the vital spirit that has lent it greatness, may become the very opposite of what it was intended to be. Instead of being a citadel of freedom it may become the home of autocracy or, what is perhaps worse, the abode of indecision and inaction in all things. We have suffered in this country, it is true, as a result of the war, but I regret to say, in part also, as a result of the inadequacy of the Administration to meet the needs of the country. That our political institutions, in common with all the other phases of our national life, should suffer through the action of war was inevitable. What is most unfortunate is that the loss is greater than it should have been, and this by reason of the failure of the administration to deal with the affairs of the country as they should have been dealt with.

I should like to point out wherein it seems to me this Parliament and the Government have ceased in large measure to be representative of the will of the people. That, after all, is the supreme, the fundamental fact which confronts us. If I do not deal with other matters that have been touched upon by the mover and seconder of the Address, it is because I feel that the restoration of our political life, and also in large measure of our social and economic life, is dependent on Parliament and the Government being in the truest sense representative of the will of the people. And it is because, throughout this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, people believe that the Government does not represent their will, that we hear the demand which we on this side of the House desire to voice for a new Parliament and a new Administration.

Mr. Speaker, let me draw the attention of the House to some of the essential conditions of parliamentary government, and show wherein during recent years we have wandered far from a compliance with these conditions. First of all, under any system of parliamentary government, the House of Commons, the elective chamber, should be a representative assembly. To say that an assembly is representative implies that its members have been returned under a fair franchise and on a policy which is known and defined and which has been placed before the people.

Now, Sir, will any one pretend that this Parliament to-day is representative in that sense? Let us go back to the franchise under which hon. members seated in this House to-day secured their return to Parliament. Let us examine the methods by which the representation of the people has been effected and ask ourselves the question whether that franchise was in accordance with the spirit of the constitution or was not in fact in direct violation of it. Take the War-time Elections Act—for it was under that Act that Parliament was elected. Consider the circumstances under which that measure was passed in this House.

Hon. gentlemen who were in the last Parliament will remember that Parliament had exhausted the period allotted to it by the constitution. The constitution of Canada lays it down that five years shall be the period of time for which a parliament shall sit, and the time of Parliament could not have been extended for a single day or a single hour beyond that period except by the consent of hon. members on this side of the House. Except by the unanimous resolution of both Houses of Parliament there would have been no amendment of the British North America Act extending the period of parliament for another year. If any hon. gentleman doubts that statement let him read the language of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) himself, at the time the matter was under discussion. The Prime Minister took care to point out that it would be impossible—and that he would not suggest it—to have an extension of the period of parliament except by the unanimous agreement of both Houses. What were the conditions under which unanimous agreement was arrived at? What was the condition on which the Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who was leading the Liberal party in this House, consented to an extension? It was that Parliament in meeting another year would avoid controversial issues during the progress of the war. That consent was given on the highest grounds of patriotism and on the unequivocal understanding that in no way was Parliament parting with the right of the people to control, but rather that Parliament might take a position which throughout the country it was felt at the time was obviously desirable, namely that there should be as little in the way of party strife as was possible during the period of the war. Let me read to the House the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in giving consent to the extension and ask hon. members whether, hearing his words, they believe that the spirit of the Constitution was violated in the action that was subsequently taken by the administration. The words to which I refer may be found in Hansard in 1916, February 8, page 634. The matter had been fully discussed between the Rt. Hon. the leader of the Opposition and the Rt. Hon. the Prime Minister, and the Prime Minister had given repeated assurances that the Government had no intention to do anything but simply "carry on" for the next year, as was necessary in the circumstances. Sir Wilfrid, having in mind the interests of the people, whose servant he was, and whose servant every hon. member of this House at that time was, said:

> I would observe, first of all, that it is not proposed here to alter the principle of the constitution. It is not proposed to override the control which the people have over parliament. It is simply proposed to suspend for the time being the operation of the constitution. If it were proposed to make away altogether with that principle which is embodied in the constitution, certainly I would oppose such an attempt with all my might. But no such thing is proposed. This measure simply proposes that the constitution shall be suspended for twelve months, at the expiration of which time it will resume its full force.

Mr. Speaker, mark these words and ask yourself the question: Was the spirit of the constitution lived up to or not?

> It is not proposed to override the control which the people have over parliament.

Sir, do you wonder that the leader of the Opposition of those days felt that he had been grossly deceived; felt that the House had been grossly deceived; felt that the people of the country had been grossly deceived, when, after an understanding of this nature, hon. gentlemen who occupied the treasury benches of that day undertook to change the whole franchise which was the means of entry of the people's representatives, at the people's will, into this House of Commons, and to place upon the statute books one of the most infernal pieces of legislation that have been enacted in this country? I have used a strong term but I do not think it a bit too strong. But I will not trust to my own language to express my conception of that legislation. Let me quote the language of one who until almost yesterday was a member of the present administration. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) spoke during the debate upon that measure, and several other gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches to-day also recorded their views upon that occasion. I might quote the language of one and all to show what their impression of that legislation was, but I think the words of my hon. friend (Mr. A. K. Maclean) meet the case so completely that further quotations are unnecessary. What were the hon. gentleman's words? They will be found on page 5596 of Hansard of 10th September, 1917:

> The Bill before the House proposes to disfranchise arbitrarily a portion of the people of the country. . . . This legislation is objectionable in principle, and I deny that there is anything in the world to justify its introduction or its enactment. . . . A proper regard for the future of this country and for our good name among the nations and peoples of the world compel one to oppose the measure. It is not founded upon any principle of a substantial character. . . . I maintain that history will adjudge the act contemplated by this Bill as a blot upon our National career. And, unfortunately, it comes at a time when we are writing glorious and imperishable pages of our history which will be the future epics of this young nation.

Mark these words, Mr. Speaker.

> A proper regard for the future of this country and for our good name among the nations and peoples of the world compel one to oppose the measure. History will adjudge the act contemplated by this Bill as a blot upon our National career.

And yet, Sir, it is to this "blot upon our National career" that the Administration owes its return to power, and it is as beneficiaries of this "blot upon our National career" that hon. gentlemen opposite continue to occupy the Treasury benches and to draw the emoluments and enjoy the dignities, privileges and power attaching thereto. Is it any wonder, Sir, that the people of Canada have lost confidence in this Administration? They never had any confidence. How could they, when the Administration was returned to power through a violation of the most sacred right which belongs to a free people—the right to a just and honest franchise?

But, Sir, if that legislation is to be spoken of as a blot upon our country, what is to be said of that other piece of legislation, the Military Voters' Act, whereby the ballots of soldiers across the seas were so manipulated as to aid in the return of hon. gentlemen opposite? What is to be said of a piece of legislation which, if not so designed—though it would even appear that such was the intention—was at least used as a means not of furthering the will of the people of Canada but of preventing their will being accorded expression. It has been openly stated in this House, and it will not be denied by hon. gentlemen opposite, that as a consequence of that legislation whole bundles of votes of soldiers overseas—votes by bundles—were taken and put into this riding, and into that riding, and into another riding, at the instance of some committee that was in the confidence of the Administration. That was not done at the will of the brave men who were fighting overseas; they did not know, many of them, where their votes were to be recorded.

Mr. ROBERT H. BUTTS (Cape Breton South and Richmond): Oh you!

Hon. Mr. KING: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, I did not gather the purport of his observation. If the hon. gentleman desires to ask a question I shall be very glad to answer it.

Mr. BUTTS: Y-o-u.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Prohibition would be a good thing here.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: His case is a bad one. Perhaps the hon. gentleman is a little dry.

Hon. Mr. KING: The hon. member evidently feels that he is not in a position to make a statement that he would care to have the House listen to. If he wishes to resort to other methods of showing his disapproval of my statements I will not have the slightest objection. I would ask him, however, to show due regard for the dignity and decorum of Parliament.

An hon. MEMBER: Take your medicine.

Hon. Mr. KING: I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that both the principle and the practice under the Act in question to which I have just referred have been defended by one of the members of the Administration openly in this House, and, by their silence, other members have acquiesced in both the principle and practice of taking votes from men overseas and assigning them to different constituencies without the knowledge or consent of voters abroad or electors at home. And what has been the effect of these Acts and these methods of dealing with the people's franchise? The effect is that Parliament has lost altogether its representative character, and in the country the people have ceased to have the faith they should have in our whole system of parliamentary government. Instead of regarding Parliament as the forum in which a nation's rights are to be maintained and its freedom preserved, forums have sprung up all over the country which the people themselves are using as pulpits from which to pour their contempt upon Parliament, when in times such as these every arm in the land should be sympathetically outstretched towards Parliament in an effort to promote the great work of reconstruction which is so much needed.

Speaking on the subject of the franchise perhaps I might at this moment say a word in reference to the Government's promise in the speech from the Throne to bring in a new Franchise Bill. It is unfortunate for the country that the Bill referred to will owe its origin in part to some whose names have been associated with the kind of legislation I have just described. But let me assure the Government that if it will bring in a Bill which will help to restore public confidence in our political institutions; if it will bring in a Bill which will be honest and fair and true to the rights of the people, it will find the Opposition ready to assist and to expedite the passage of that measure. But, Sir, if a Franchise Bill is to be introduced in a form which will constitute another blot on our country's name and fame, whatever means the Government adopts to pass it, they must expect to find hon. gentlemen on this side prepared to resist to the utmost of their power legislation prejudicial to the fundamental rights of the people.

The first question we would like to ask the Administration is why should there be a new Franchise Act at all? The old Dominion Elections Act has been on the Statutes for twenty-five years. Administrations representing both political parties have been returned under its provisions. Why then do we need another Act? Why should anything more be necessary than to amend the provisions of the present statute and bring them into conformity with the needs of the country? The Government may have reasons for its proposal and we will await those reasons. But I point out to the Government now so that they may take due notice of it, that if there is any endeavour to substitute a system of Dominion enumeration for the provincial lists which have been followed in accordance with the spirit of our constitution, the Government will have to give a pretty clear and satisfactory explanation before a measure of that kind will meet with the approval of the House and of the country After the experience the country has had with Dominion enumerators, care will be taken before the franchise of our people is again placed in the hands of the Administration for manipulation as it may see best by its own creatures. So much, Sir, in reference to the franchise and what it stands for.

Let me now say just a word in regard to the application of the franchise in making good representation in Parliament, for which purpose it is intended. How, under the franchise in relation to the different vacancies that have occurred, has the Government "carried on," so far as representation in this Parliament is concerned? Since the present Administration was returned to power in December, 1917, thirteen vacancies have occurred, but hardly any were filled until the advent of this session. First, the war was made a pretext for not allowing the people representation in constituencies that had been vacated, and to a certain extent the country acquiesced in this. One would have thought that the moment the war was over the Government would immediately have sought to make good the lack of representation by bringing on by-elections in the several constituencies. Did the Government do that? No. One pretext gave way to another. When the war was out of the way the next excuse offered was the necessity of passing a new by-elections Act. When the by-elections Act was passed did the Government attempt to put it into force so as to secure representation in this House for the people of those various constituencies? No. They waited almost until the very day before the opening of the last session before they issued writs, and the Act was so drafted that the vacant constituencies were without representation for almost the period of that entire session.

I think my hon. friend from Kingston (Sir Henry Drayton) and myself were in this Parliament last session for about two weeks. Why did our constituencies not have the privilege of being represented through the whole of last session? Had the Government's plans not miscarried there would have been no representation of those two constiutencies. At the very last moment the Government brought in a measure that was not referred to in the speech from the Throne, the Grand Trunk Railway Bill, consideration of which prolonged the sitting to such an extent that these two constituencies were represented for that short period of time.

But how about the constituencies of Assiniboia, North Ontario, Glengarry and Quebec East? They were all without representation in the last session. Not only that, Sir, but the constituencies of Glengarry and Stormont, North Ontario and Assiniboia were without representation for three entire sessions. I have here the dates at which several vacancies occurred and the by-elections took place. Glengarry and Stormont was vacated on April 13, 1918, and the by-election announced on October 27, 1919. In other words, five hundred and sixty-two days elapsed before the writ was issued, and then a further period elapsed before the return of the member. I think my hon. friend who is in the House to-day (Mr. John W. Kennedy) had the privilege of sitting for two or three days—that was the whole length of time that the people of his constituency were represented in this Parliament from the time the Government assumed office.

Then take the constituency of North Ontario, which became vacant on May 25, 1918. It was December 9, 1919, before the by-election was held, making a period of five hundred and sixty-three days during which the people of that constituency had no representation in this Parliament. In other words, they were without any representation during the last three sessions.

Similarly Assiniboia, one of the largest of the western constituencies, was vacant almost from the moment at which the Government took office, and yet until the day of the opening of this session, three days ago, not a soul was here to speak on behalf of the people of Assiniboia. Three hundred and ninety-nine days elapsed before any writ was issued for that particular vacancy.

Then take the constituency of Quebec East, which was vacated through the death of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Through that entire session and the next until my hon. friend, formerly the member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) was elected to represent the constituency held by his leader for the previous period of forty-three years, it was without representation.

Similarly the constituency of Victoria-Carleton was represented in this House for only one or two days last session, when it should have been represented for the entire session.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, Glengarry and Stormont, North Ontario and Assiniboia were not represented at all for three sessions; Quebec East was not represented for two sessions; Prince County, Prince Edward Island, Kingston, Victoria City and Victoria-Carleton were not represented for the greater part of one session.

Then coming down to the present time, since our last meeting of Parliament four vacancies have occurred, those in Timiskaming, Kamouraska, St. James (Montreal) and East Elgin. The constituencies of Timiskaming and Kamouraska were vacated respectively on September 22, 1919, and October 14, 1919. Why are not these constituencies represented in this Parliament at this time? There is only one reason—that the Government by deliberate intent put off the possibility of representation of these ridings as long as it possibly could. It waited until almost the very day before this Parliament was called for the present session to issue writs for the filling of those vacancies. In the case of Timiskaming the electors were a long time without representation through the protracted illness of the former Minister of Railways and Canals, the late Hon. Mr. Cochrane. One would have thought that had the Government cared at all for the representation of the electors they would have been eager and anxious to give them their right to be represented here at the earliest possible date.

During the last two weeks we have had the two vacancies that were referred to this afternoon by the right hon. the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster)—St. James and East Elgin. Why is it that a writ has been issued in the case of one and not in the case of the other vacancy? I asked my right hon. friend at the opening of the session to-day if he would tell this House and, through this House, the people of the latter constituency, when they would have the right to be represented, and he gave me a reply as evasive as it could possibly be, saying nothing and making no promises one way or the other. I would ask my right hon. friend when he does reply to my speech, as no doubt he will, to tell the people of East Elgin when they may expect to have the right of representation in this Parliament which it is their privilege to demand.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, that having regard for Parliamentary Government in the matter of representation, if you look at the laws under which this Parliament has been returned, or if you look at the way in which those laws have been administered, you will find that there has been a complete demoralization of the whole business of parliamentary representation as contrasted with what it should have been were we anxious to preserve intact our political institutions.

There is this to be remembered at all times, Sir, in regard to by-elections: They are a means of keeping the Administration in touch with the country and of giving it the views of the people on great public issues. Have we not all observed how jealously England guards the rights pertaining to the representation of her people in Parliament? We watch our newspapers to see the results of by-elections in the old land as they occur from week to week or from month to month; and in the meantime no attention whatever is paid to the necessity for holding by-elections in our own country. If we are to preserve the spirit of the constitution, which stands for the right of representation of the people in Parliament, we must seek to give to the people the right of representation as soon as possible after a vacancy in an electoral district occurs.

There is one other point that is of importance in considering the essential conditions of parliamentary Government. Parliament should be not only a representative assembly, but also a deliberative assembly. It should be a means of keeping the people informed of the public business and of having all matters of concern to them freely and openly discussed. I shall not attempt to present in detail a statement of the extent to which there has been demoralization in this connection during and since the period of the war. I shall point out, however, three very obvious particulars which are of importance if we are to have a restoration of our political institutions.

Take first the Speech from the Throne, to which we have just listened. If that time-honoured custom has any purpose whatever, it is that of acquainting Parliament, and, through Parliament, the people, with the questions that are to come up for discussion and consideration here. Well, Sir, I have only to mention the last session of Parliament and what took place then to direct the attention of the House and the country to how far we have departed from that important safeguard of a people's rights and liberties. The most important measure that was put through this Parliament last session—the most important financially in the history of Canada—was the Bill for the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway system; yet in the speech from the Throne of last session no mention whatever was made of the Government's intention to bring down legislation of that kind. How were the people of the country to be expected to anticipate the bringing down of such an important measure? Had reference been made to it in the speech from the Throne, we should have had an opportunity to hear from different parts of Canada an expression of opinion in regard to its merits and the legislation itself might have been vastly improved as a consequence. I say at once to the Acting Prime Minister that if the Government has other legislation in contemplation at this session of which no mention has been made in the speech from the Throne, we hope that the Government will announce to the House at the earliest possible moment what that legislation is to be. That is owing to the House; it is owing to the country.

Why, Sir, what an occasion of surprise it is to us when almost the day after His Excellency delivers the Speech from the Throne an announcement—it appears on the Order Paper—is made that the Government intends to introduce two amendments to the British North America Act. I shall not now discuss the proposed amendments; I shall not question what they are or what is the necessity for them. But I should like to point out that on only six occasions since the days of Confederation has the British North America Act been amended. If when the Speech from the Throne was delivered it was the intention of hon. gentlemen opposite to bring down an amendment to the British North America Act, they might at least have had the courtesy to tell His Excellency of it and to have had His Excellency so inform this House and the people. The amending of the Constitution is no small matter; it is a much more important matter than the amending of any drug Act, any copyright or patent law, or any of the things that are spoken of in the speech from the Throne. It is in one sense the most important matter which this Parliament can be called upon to consider. So I say, Mr. Speaker, that in these matters we have been departing altogether from the principles of parliamentary government. If you seek the cause of the unrest which prevails throughout the country, you will find it in these departures from a system of representative and responsible Government.

In this connection I may, perhaps, appropriately say a word in regard to Supply. The voting of Supply is the only way in which the people can exercise their control over Parliament and Parliament its control over the Government. We have all observed that in previous sessions, while items of supply might be brought down early or late, at the very end of the session just when members were leaving, further large appropriations were asked for. Well, Sir, under such conditions it is impossible for the people to exercise the control which they should have over public expenditure; and we on this side of the House hope that the Government will this session, so far as they can possibly do so, bring down their Estimates on the earliest possible day; that they will not in the dying days of the session, when the House will have practically no opportunity of considering them, bring down appropriations of further millions of the people's money.

Final decisions upon matters of national import should not be made by ministers in their private rooms; should not be made without opportunity being afforded to the House of Commons to consider them in the first instance. After all, it is the public business that we are discussing here, and the country has the right to have submitted to it all that is essential in regard to large transactions, before those transactions are finally put beyond the power of this Parliament. I refer again to the Grand Trunk railway agreement. That is one of the largest transactions that this country has ever undertaken. What position are we in to-day? We who sit here in the House of Commons as the representatives of the people have been put in the humiliating position during the last fortnight of reading from cable despatches of approval being given by English shareholders to an agreement with the Government of Canada —an agreement concerning the terms of which we as members of Parliament have not the slightest knowledge. I ask if that is what is owing to the House of Commons; if that is what is owing to the people of Canada? I hope that it is not too late for the ministry to consider the advisability— notwithstanding the fact that at the last session of Parliament they said that they would not accord that right to the Canadian people—of laying on the table of the House that agreement and of asking for its approval, just as they are asking the House to approve of the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Bulgaria.

Mr. Speaker, there should be an end to Government by Order in Council. Because of the extent to which the Administration carried on Government by Order in Council during the period of the war, it may be difficult for them to realize that this method of Government—the method followed in the old days, 80 years ago—is not the method of Government which we have come to regard as free and representative Government. During the war, Government by Order in Council may have been necessary and may have been tolerated to a large extent by the people; but the time has now come when, if we are to have Government in the true sense of the word, that Government must be by Parliament and through Parliament; it must not be by the substitution of the diplomacy of Cabinet councils, carried on by Cabinet ministers in their secret chambers, for the free discussions and questionings of the ministry in this House in regard to public affairs.

If we are to restore the deliberative aspect of this assembly, ministers should be in their seats in the House where they can answer the questions put to them in regard to public business. The Prime Minister should be in his seat to answer questions with regard to matters of policy. I hasten to express the sympathy which all of us have with the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) in that, through the impairment of his health, he is prevented from being here at this time. I hope that no hon. member will endeavour to misconstrue my reference at this moment as being in any way inconsiderate. Indeed, I think a lack of consideration was shown by his colleagues in virtually compelling the Prime Minister to remain at the head of the Government, in spite of his protests over and over again that he was not in a position to attend to public affairs and that he wished to be relieved from that duty altogether. It was a mistaken kindness to him and to the country to ask him to assume a nominal leadership when it was impossible for him to assume any leadership at all. I might remind the House that during the period of the war and since the war the Prime Minister as well as two or three of his colleagues have been not merely out of this House but in large part out of the country. That is the system which has grown up, and it shows the indifference of the Government to the method of carrying on Parliamentary representation here. What is happening at this very moment? If what we read in the newspapers to-day is correct, two of my right hon. friend's colleagues are down in New York discussing the business of this country with the Prime Minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No truck or trade with the Yankee.

Hon. Mr. KING: Why should we have to go to New York to deal with questions that affect this country? The ministers should be here so that they can answer questions. It is astounding, when we see on the other side an endeavour to revive the old cry "No further truck or trade with the Yankees," that our ministers rush off to New York to discuss what is to be the policy, if there is to be any policy of the Government for the next few months to come.

What are the consequences of the frequent absences of the Prime Minister? One is the rumor that the Prime Minister has either conditionally or absolutely tendered his resignation; that he has no intention whatever of returning to Parliament or of occupying a seat in this House. That rumour may be wholly false, and I hope my right hon. friend will give the House some definite statement on this all important matter. But the circumstance that it is so persistently stated that the Prime Minister has no intention of coming back; that he is merely holding the bridge, so to speak, until his colleagues can find someone to take his place, is having an unsettling effect throughout the whole of this country. What is another effect arising out of the same cause? We are told that not only are we to have the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster), who is present in the House to-day, as the leader, but during the evenings or during other periods we are to have an acting leader of the House in addition.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Is that a rumour or a fact?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That we hope to find out during the course of the next few days, but the fact is that we do not know whether we are facing a Government without a head or facing a Government with three heads.

Unfortunate as we are with regard to the Prime Minister, we are almost equally unfortunate with respect to the personnel of the Cabinet. Conditions at the present time remind one of the conditions as they were prior to 1896 when the Government of that day went to pieces. The only difference is that at that time there were seven bolters who went all at once, and to-day there are seven of them who have disappeared, one by one. At that time the political edifice was dynamited from within; to-day it is crumbling to pieces. That is the only difference. Let me read the names of the resignations there have been of ministers: first, Hon. T. W. Crothers, on November 7, 1918; then, Hon. T. A. Crerar, June 16, 1919; Sir Thomas White, July 9, 1919; Hon. F. B. Carvell, August 1, 1919; Hon. S. C. Mewburn, January 15, 1920, and Hon. A. K. Maclean, February 23, 1920. Now it is rumoured that the Prime Minister himself is to go. Why, Sir, that is a small ministry all in itself, a ministry of very considerable proportions, and with the Government beginning to split up as it is in that way, the public mind is kept in a restless condition to see who is to be the next one to come out. In that way, we are never sure exactly where we are.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Providence may choose.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: While the Government has been indifferent in the regard mentioned, it has been equally indifferent so far as the deliberative nature of this assembly is concerned, in withdrawing ministers to the other Chamber where they are beyond questioning altogether. We have at the present time in the Senate no less than three ministers holding portfolios, the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and the Postmaster General. In times like this, of all times, the minister who holds the portfolio of Soldiers' Civil Re-establisment should be in this House where he can be questioned, and so should the Minister of Labour; but these gentlemen, along with the Postmaster General, are taken over to the other Chamber, so that the people's representatives here are put in the position, when they ask questions on many matters, of being unable to obtain authoritative replies at the time information is so necessary in connection with public discussion.

Then there has been the further tendency of the gradual shifting over to irresponsible commissions, boards and delegates of one kind or another, of a great deal of the business that should be carried on by the Government itself. I heard a gentleman say the other day that he thought the time had come when we should have government by the Government, instead of government by commissions, delegates and boards of different kinds. The effect of all this is that, in one way or another, instead of the business of Parliament being discussed here in a deliberative fashion, the country is being committed directly and indirectly to policies of which it has no knowledge, by persons who in no way owe responsibility to the people through their representatives in this House.

There are just two further matters to which I will refer, and I think I can promise the House that I shall be through by six o'clock. I have spoken of the representative nature of this deliberative assembly. Let me say a word in regard to what I think the spirit of the Constitution demands with respect to the representative character of the Cabinet. Canada is a country of wide geographical areas. Up to the time of Confederation it was a country of scattered provinces and territories. The work of nation-building ever since has consisted in welding into one Dominion the various provinces and territories, and cementing between the parts, bonds of friendship, mutual understanding, and common interest. The representative character of the Cabinet has been one of the most effective means to this highly important end, so that it is essential we should have a Cabinet that will represent in a general way the various important considerations of race, religion, economic interest and provincial right and concern. I shall not speak of more than one of these, but every Cabinet that there has been from the time of Confederation up to the present has had regard for the different elements that go to make up the nation in a way that will tend to unite and cement together the different portions of the Dominion.

We have representing the province of Quebec in this House two hon. gentlemen whom I see opposite to me at the moment, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne). Both these hon. gentlemen are English-speaking. There is not in the Cabinet a single representative of the French-Canadians in this country.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the Postmaster General?

Hon. M. KING: I hear someone say "What about the Postmaster General? Well, Sir, we cannot say that the Postmaster General represents the French-Canadians.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He could not get ten votes in any riding in Quebec.

Hon. M. KING: The Postmaster General has removed his r sidence from the province of Quebec altogether, and has come to reside permanently in the province of Ontario; but more than that, the Postmaster General ran in two constituencies in the last election when the voice of the people was heard in the matter of representation. He ran in the constituency of Laurier-Outremont and was defeated there by a majority of 1,247. He ran in the constituency of Champlain and was defeated there by a majority of 6,623. In the face of that, can it be said that the Postmaster General represents the French-speaking element of the province of Quebec?

But that is not the most serious feature. From the confines of the city of Montreal right through to the Atlantic ocean there is not a single Cabinet minister, with or without a portfolio, in the Government. The province of Nova Scotia has no representative in the Cabinet; the province of New Brunswick has no representative in the Cabinet; the province of Prince Edward Island has no representative in the Cabinet. That is to say, something like 3,000,000 of the people of this country are without any representation in the Government, so far as their province is concerned. How in the face of a situation like that, can we longer talk about representative government in this country? Why is there no representation? The answer is plain. The people have lost faith in the Government, and the Government has lost faith in the people; neither has any longer any faith in the other, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite would have us believe they are carrying on representative government in this country. No, Sir, if we wish to remedy the unrest in this country let us have a government that is representative of all classes and of all provinces in Canada.

Just this word in conclusion, for it helps to explain all the rest. What is the most fundamental of all principles underlying responsible Government? It is that of collective cabinet responsibility—that there should be a cabinet with a known policy; that its policy should be known and defined as well as its members. Will any one pretend that hon. gentlemen opposite have a defined policy? Why, there are as many policies as there are members in the Cabinet. There are as many opinions as there are members in the Cabinet. When the Prime Minister talks of resigning, one aspirant for the leadership will make a speech in which he will announce a policy regarding trade or some other question, but the other members of the Cabinet do not necessarily follow him. Other aspirants announce other policies. We have no voice of the ministry as a whole, on any great question of national policy. Not only that, but among the Government's own followers in the Senate and in this House, there are those who are framing up new policies for the Administration, showing that they have no faith in the Government any longer. The Government press, which has been behind the Government all along, comes forward with suggestions for a new alignment of parties, so that somehow, in some fashion, we can get back to some system of Government where we will have a Cabinet with a known policy able to carry on the business of the country in accordance with the country's wishes.

What lies at the back of everything else is the absence of any collective cabinet responsibility. How is that to be remedied? Why is there no Government policy to-day? Hon. gentlemen know the reason very well. The Government is composed of two factions, two groups of men of different attitudes of mind, and their job for the last year or two has been, not to find a policy, but to see how they can get along without a policy so they can hold together. If there is any doubt on that question let the ministry answer.

When the war was over one would have supposed that the Prime Minister would have made some statement to the House as to what his post-war policy was to be. The ministry was elected as a war ministry, and when the war was over its purpose was gone. It had no policy at any time other than to carry on the war. If it had I should like any member of the ministry to state what it was. I say it had no policy except to "win the war," and when the war was won it had nothing further to say as to what it represented in the country. One would have supposed that under these conditions the Prime Minister would have stated to the people of this country that the Government would carry on a little longer until demobilization had been completed and that he would then issue a statement of the Government's policies for post-war conditions and would appeal to the people and give them an opportunity of approving those policies. That would have been the proper constitutional method, but was that done? No, that chance was lost, and from the moment that chance went by, the Government began to lose the confidence of the people; it began to lose its ministers one by one, it began to lose by-elections one by one. It became a crumbling edifice until to-day there is only left a remnant of what one could call a united cabinet.

What is the position as stated by the Government itself? The people of this country were prepared to allow the ministry to carry on for a session or two for the purpose of demobilization. That would have brought the situation up to the beginning of last session. Then the job for the Government would have been limited to getting through that session.

My hon. friend the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) will recall that he and some of those who came into the Government as Unionist Liberals held a meeting and discussed how they could stay longer in touch with those who represented the other element of which the Cabinet was composed. When that meeting was over, my hon. friend gave out a statement as to its result, which appeared in the press throughout the country on October 1. I shall read only one paragraph of that statement:

> The meeting expressed unqualified approval of the war policy of the Union Government, and the Government is congratulated on its success.

That was self-congratulation.

> The concensus of opinion was, as the members were elected to support Union Government, it is their intention to continue to do so, and the hope was strongly expressed that the Government would be able at an early date to evolve a progressive policy satisfactory to the country to meet the after the war conditions.

Note that. Here is one section of the ministry saying to the other section of the ministry and to the country that they strongly hope that in some way or another the ministry will be able to frame a policy to deal with post-war conditions. Was there ever such an exhibition of cabinet incompetency as is expressed in those words? Well, that was sufficient to keep the Government together through last session. Then we came to the Christmas recess, when the job was to hang on until another session came. That became pretty difficult. Matters grew more and more tense in the Cabinet, as my hon. friends know, and finally there was pretty nearly an explosion. The papers came out on December 15 with headlines such as these: "Sir R. L. Borden to retire from public life—Will make announcement to gathering of supporters—Heeds Medical advice—Parliament will meet in February with new Premier and leader of Unionists." We all remember what consternation there was when it was said that the Prime Minister was to resign. Why did he not resign? The answer is to be found in the newspaper headlines of the following day "Couldn't find successor, so Premier sticks." They have been looking for a successor ever since, but have not found one. Then came the statement which the Prime Minister issued himself before he went away on leave. It appeared in all the papers and is well known to every hon. member of this House. I shall read only one paragraph. It is a sort of political last will and testament by the Prime Minister. To quote:

> Sir Robert Borden desires that the situation as here outlined—

He had been outlining what took place in the Cabinet.

> —shall be placed before his supporters in Parliament, and he considers it essential that they should approve of the arrangement which his colleagues have urged and which he has accepted.

It was the purpose of the Prime Minister to have set forth to the country during the recent session the policies for which the Government would stand during the life of the present parliament. During his illness, and just before his departure, he embodied his proposals in written form, and, on the second of October, the day before he left Ottawa, he submitted them to a gathering of Government supporters. It was his desire that these proposals should be taken into consideration by those present and that at a further gathering, the suggestions of senators and members should be placed before him, after which he intended to formulate these policies from his place in parliament as controlling the action of the Government during the period mentioned.

Some of the proposals thus presented have since been carried out by action taken during the recent session. Sir Robert Borden desires that after due consideration of the advice and suggestions of the supporters of the Government in parliament the policies as finally accepted shall be presented to Parliament and to the people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is the present situation. The Prime Minister has gone away. He has left some document which is to be discussed by his followers in Parliament. He has set out what he thinks should be the policy of the party, and if all cannot agree on that policy as outlined by him, then he and they must part company. That, Mr. Speaker, is what it amounts to. In other words, instead of the policy being decided by the party's followers, or by a convention representative of the people belonging to the party, the Prime Minister, as an individual, lays down what is to be adopted, and if it is possible to secure agreement on his policy they will carry on. But what does this document say? "During the life of the present Parliament,"—another couple of years. That is the proposal that is put before the country at this time. This Government and this House, as unrepresentative as it is, is to be continued for another couple of years through some policy that is yet to be framed and that is still unknown. Why, Sir, a position of that kind is impossible, and, in the opinion of the people, will prove intolerable.

There is no remedy for such a situation except the remedy which the constitution provides; that is to say, at the earliest possible moment there should be an appeal to the people of the country so that the will of the people shall be known and voiced by a parliament and government that is truly representative. Sir, we have passed the time when people exist for the sake of governments. People do not exist to-day for the sake of governments. On the contrary, governments exist to give expression to the will of the people. Having this fundamental principle in mind, therefore, I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria, (Mr. D. D. McKenzie), that the following be added to the Address to His Excellency:

We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that the conditions under which the Government was formed and the present House of Commons was elected have now passed away, and that new conditions have arisen which are not being adequately met. The regrettable protracted absence of the Prime Minister, the widely accepted belief that it is not his intention to return to the duties of his office, the makeshift arrangements for the direction of important departments to which no minister has been regularly appointed, the attempt to carry on the public business when the three eastern Maritime P.ovinces are entirely unrepresented in the Cabinet—these and other things operate to produce a condition of uncertainty and instability from which a vigourous and efficient administration of the Dominion's affairs cannot be expected.

We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that in the interest of the peace, order, and good government of this Dominion such a condition of our public affairs should be brought to a speedy termination, and that the only effective remedy is to be found in an appeal to the electors at a general election.

We, therefore, respectfully represent that Your Excellency's advisers should forthwith bring forward the promised Franchise Bill for the enrollment of the electors and give it precedence over all other business, and that upon the enactment of such a measure as may be necessary, and the making of temporary provisions for the urgent public service, they should take the proper constitutional steps to obtain Your Excellency's approval of an appeal to the people at the polls.

I submit this resolution, Sir, as being fundamental in the way of what is necessary in the reconstruction of our political institutions.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, observing the time honoured custom which it is a delight for me to follow this evening I beg to tender my congratulations to the mover and to the seconder of the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne and to add my words of felicitation to those that have been uttered by the Leader of the Opposition. These two gentlemen have acquitted themselves in a thoroughly workmanlike manner. They have shown themselves proficient in parliamentary oratory and they have produced a structure which in beauty of language, in finish, in diction, and in practical sound suggestions and common sense will stand well on the records of Parliament with similar efforts from Confederation to the present day.

Now I must make some comment in a discursive way on the different points that have been raised by the leader of the Opposition, but I do not wish to spend the entire evening in replying to the hon. gentleman, and he will excuse me if, after some more or less extended comments upon what he has said, I take up certain subjects somewhat beyond the line of his criticism. It is said that the wish is father to the thought and I imagine that as my hon. friend expressed the view that the edifice occupied heretofore by the present Government was a crumbling edifice, his observation was prompted by the desire that it should crumble and that he might speedily see it crumble. Well, an edifice may or may not crumble, but there is one structure which will not crumble or decay, and that is the good, efficient, courageous work which this Government has performed since it came into existence. That monument is indestructible.

My hon. friend was not satisfied with the speech from the Throne. In all my political experience I have not known a leader of the Opposition to be other than dissatisfied; it is the business of the leader of the Opposition not to be satisfied with the speech. Nor was my hon. friend satisfied with the gentlemen who moved and seconded the Address; his congratulations to those gentlemen were followed by criticisms of them. My hon. friend declared that one of the gentlemen dealt with matters away in the past and that did not please him, the other gentleman projected himself into the future, and that pleased my hon. friend still less. Evidently the only thing that is secure to my hon. friend is the little bit of the present upon which he stands. Neither his past nor his future has very many charms for him in either retrospect or outlook.

The leader of the Opposition objected to so much of the speech being taken up with allusions to external affairs. My hon. friend is behind the times. Where has he been living this last five years?

An hon. MEMBER: In the States.

Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Where has my hon. friend been living during the time in which Canada has been so very much taken up with external affairs. I observe sitting opposite me one hon. gentleman who passed several years, and under trying circumstances showed his devotion to the cause of Canada and the Empire, in foreign fields. Let me tell my hon. friend that Canada has been largely living abroad during these last five years. It has been living in the hearts of its soldiers, living in its prayers for their success and their welfare, echoing their desire for victory for the cause which they championed and glorying in the reputation and the honour which those brave men conferred upon their country and ultimately brought back unsullied when the cruel war in which they fought was at an end. Why should we disjoin this Canada of ours from the part we have taken in external affairs in the last few years which, may I not hope, is but the beginning of that common world-wide interest which helps to make a people less provincial and directs them into the life movements and currents of the great body of humanity of which they form a part?

My hon. friend found one reference in the speech from the Throne which was sweet to his taste and that was the allusion to the Franchise Bill. The allusion was sweet to his taste because it gave him an opportunity to go back to the warmed-over porridge in the kettle which has already been dealt with, a matter which has been fought out and fought out, with the result that the various theories and imaginative processes of my hon. friend have been exploded over and over again. However, the subject served for a foundation for some criticisms by my hon. friend and seemed to please him. He was very much concerned as to this Government's constitutional way of conducting the affairs of the country, and he based a complaint against the speech from the Throne in that he did not set forth the various changes in the tariff which were to be made during this session of Parliament. Now my hon. friend might very well have known, had he thought for a moment, that it is dangerous work to put a tariff schedule in the King's speech. It has never been done, I believe, in this or any other country. Consequently I think that part of his criticism fell rather short.

He deplored the waste of material, the waste of human life and the waste of moral and religious fibre. No one can deplore that more than myself and gentlemen on this side of the House in common with all other hon. members. War is cruel, and wasteful. Its effects are not confined to the year in which it rages, they remain and burrow deep into human nature, and on the average they do not elevate, but they depress and degrade our humanity. There are great bursts of heroism, splendid feats of gallantry, great occasions when the soldier loses all thought of self in the mighty cause for which he is waging war and venturing his life,—those are high and brilliant gleams in the general gloom, but war in the end and on the average depresses and degrades humanity.

But what are we in this Parliament to do to restore the religious faith and moral fibre of the nation? In ourselves we may seek to restore it; in others it must be a process between themselves and their God—between themselves and their own conscience, which in each is the voice of God. We must all pray and hope that this great cruel war will not have so far wasted the faith, the religious fervour and the moral strength of our people that we may not quickly restore ourselves, our country and the world to the basis upon which we stood when this war commenced.

My hon. friend quarrels with the autocratic methods, the indecision and the inadequacy of the administration. I shall deal with that a little later in a general way, and yet with special reference to his criticism. He calls for a new Parliament and a new Government, and bases his demand, amongst other things, upon this foundation: that as the result of an agreement between both sides of the House a year's extension of the Parliamentary term was allowed; and then he declares that the most infernal piece of legislation that stands to the record of any Government was in that year of extension perpetrated by the Parliament of Canada.

Now, I want to ask my hon. friend if when the Parliamentary term was extended a year, it was extended with the condition that Parliament should be shorn of any one of its rights? One of the rights of Parliament is legislation upon the franchise, and that extension of life was a year's extension with full powers, and without restriction. In the full possession of those powers Parliament enacted a piece of franchise legislation which, whatever my hon. friend may think, was well received by the vast proportion of the loyal people of this country as a necessary piece of war legislation.

In referring to the proposed Franchise Bill my hon. friend gave us a promise that if we brought in a proper Bill—that is, one which pleased him—he would support it; but if we brought in an improper Bill—one which did not please my hon. friend—then there would be war to the knife; or if we did not adopt certain provisions we must give very good reasons why. We shall bring in a Bill which ought to satisfy my hon. friend, and which ought to satisfy his friends on his side of the House if they are reasonable, as I believe they will be, and we will welcome his and their aid towards its perfection. My hon. friend spoke of the provincial franchises and of their adoption, but I think we are face to face with somewhat of a new condition in that respect; however when our Bill is brought down the House will judge as to its foundations and what is built upon these foundations.

My hon. friend declared that Parliament has not only ceased to be representative but that it has ceased to be deliberative. Well, that is news to me. Deliberation consists in two things: Thought over the measures which shall be adopted, and free expression of views with reference to such measures. We are not responsible for gentlemen on the other side of the House if they do not apply their thoughts to our measures, and we have not controlled any fair expression of their views upon these measures. In what respect, then, has this ceased to be a deliberative assembly? I think my hon. friend's criticism is not quite just in that respect. He instances as a reason why that the Grand Trunk agreement, while it has lately been submitted to the shareholders of the company in Great Britain, was not submitted to this deliberative assembly, and he finds fault with us in two directions: First, that the agreement was not mentioned in the speech from the Throne last session; and second, that it was not submitted for the approval of the House. Had my hon. friend exercised his memory a little he would have recollected that a certain distinguished leader of the Liberal Government and party in this country at a certain time introduced into Parliament a most important Bill, and one which has had most important consequences, to wit, the Grand Trunk Pacific measure, and that although that measure was formed in the minds of the Government and many of their supporters at the time when the speech from the Throne was written no mention of that legislation was made therein. So there are lapses on his own side.

But there was a reason for the omission of any mention of the Grand Trunk agreement in the speech from the Throne last session. That agreement and the legislation upon which to found it depended upon an agreement being reached with the Grand Trunk authorities, and although nearly two years had passed while the question was being discussed more or less, no arrangement had been come to when the speech from the Throne was read, and consequently no legislation could be promised with reference thereto. After the session had proceeded for some time an agreement was arrived at. It was only then that it was in a condition to be brought down to Parliament, and it was then brought down. As to his quarrel with the Government because they have not yet submitted the Grand Trunk agreement to the deliberation of the House of Commons, well, what was submitted to the House of Commons, debated in the House of Commons and passed by the House of Commons, was the legislation which authorized an agreement to be made, and laid down the conditions of that agreement. So that every bit of pertinent information with reference to it was deliberated upon and passed by this House and is known to hon. members if they studied the legislation which was passed. But the agreement itself will now be laid on the table.

The hon. gentleman also found fault with the Government in that while they had made mention of an opium convention in the Speech from the Throne, they had made no mention of proposed amendments to the British North America Act. Well, before the very first working day of the session announcement is made under the Notices of Motion upon the Order Paper that amendments will be asked to the British North America Act therefore my hon. friend and his friends have all the information at exactly the same time as they would have had it if the proposed legislation had been mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. It is a question of choice whether the information should be given in the Speech from the Throne or otherwise; but there is no grievance on the part of the House of Commons because of prompt and early notice not having been given by mention of the proposed legislation in the Speech from the Throne. Neither in the Speech nor in the mere announcement of the title of the Bill are the provisions of the Bill made known; consequently my hon. friend and his friends are just as far ahead as they possibly could have been had notice been given in any other form than that which was actually adopted.

Mr. hon. friend gives us that old, well-worn bit of advice and caution: Bring down your Supply early. Well, we have heard that for thirty years from both sides and under all Governments. It is always a pious resolution, that the Supply should be brought down early. Generally it is brought down early—not all of it, but the most of it. But the House of Commons is a pernickety association of individuals in some respects. If we were to bring down the whole of the Supply and put it on the Table to-morrow it would be the last days of the session before a militant Opposition would do more than discuss all manners of issues except the real nature of the Supply itself. That is a phenomenon that we may all think over and account for as best we can. But I agree that Supply should be early put before the House. I agree also with the suggestion made by my hon. friend who moved the Address this afternoon (Mr. Cronyn): That some method might be devised to provide that after the Estimates have been presented to the House they shall be examined by a committee or some body of that kind and put in proper shape so that we may understand them better and be enabled to come to better conclusions upon them. If we are allowed to remain a little while longer in this crumbling edifice that my hon. friend so pathetically described this afternoon, we may find some method by which improvement can be made in that respect.

My hon. friend contends that it is time that Government by Order in Council should cease. I will take that up a little later and deal with it somewhat more exhaustively than I can at this moment.

The hon. gentleman went on to declare that ministers should be in their seats. So they should. But the difficulty is for us all to do just what we should do. If ministers were always in their seats, atrophy, dislocation and delay might result in other important respects which bear a close relation to the promptness with which the business can be put through Parliament. The members of the House have a perfect right to demand that a fair proportion of ministers should be in their seats; that ministers, certainly when their own departments are under consideration, should be here. But it is practically impossible, having regard to the duties which are laid upon ministers to-day with their large departments and the multiplied demands which are made upon their attention, absolutely to tie themselves to their seats in Parliament during all the hours that Parliament is in session. There must be some reasonable give and take in respect to that matter.

But my hon. friend goes on to develop his thesis by saying that the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) should be in his place, and his argument, if it meant anything, was: No matter what are the conditions;

no matter what the state of his health, you are not doing your duty to Parliament unless you have your Prime Minister in his seat now and constantly during the session. I do not think that the good sense of the House or of the country will march easily with my hon. friend's opinion in that respect. I have alluded once before somewhere to the pathetic side of the life and work of a Prime Minister of this Dominion; for it has its pathetic side. My hon. friend is young and strong and the future is before him. If he ever gets out from the light and free atmosphere of criticism and assumes the burdens of the office of Prime Minister of this country, he will find that they are nerve-racking and body-racking; that they involve body toil and body pain; that morally, mentally and physically there is a strain upon the man who holds that office, all of which call for sympathy rather than criticism when the strain proves to be too great to bear. And if that is true in normal times, when we have storms and ebullitions only under shelter of the wings of peace, what must be involved in these duties in times such as we have lately gone through, when the war winds blow, when currents and counter-currents come alternately; when immense responsibilities must be assumed and quick decisions made?—What the duties of the Prime Minister must be under these conditions I know, because I have sat by and have seen. I tell you that in my heart of hearts, as in the heart of hearts of all of us, there will be a spot free from censure, free from criticism, free from stern rebuke—a spot in which is generated human nature's just recognition of merit and of toil. This I say of what must fairly be our attitude with regard to the Prime Minister. We have not failed to recognize the responsibilities devolving upon the Leader of the Opposition in time of peace or in time of war. His also is a brain-racking and a body-racking office, and my sympathies went out to the old chief who lead the battalions of hon. gentlemen opposite for so many years, when in his advancing years I noted how the sense of the responsibilities and of the burdens which he had to bear grew upon him. I knew that in his mind and in his heart there were struggles of statesmanship but little known to those who could see only what was apparent from the outside.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition says that certain Ministers should have been here last year and the session before that. He asserts that the Prime Minister and several of his Ministers were not only out of this House but out of Canada: That they were in Europe, and that they should have been here. I challenge that position and I ask the judgment of the people of Canada upon it.

I ask the judgment of the people of Canada on that statement with a full impression and conviction that the people do not agree with my hon. friend in that respect. If 500,000 of the bone and sinew, the flower of this country, left home and business, went across the seas, spent their years, their blood, many of them their lives, for the cause for which we were all fighting, and gained the cause, who shall rise and say that the responsible ministers shall not, after the victories of the war, strive to make certain the victories of the peace? If the dictum of my hon. friend holds good, Lloyd George would have tied himself down in Downing street. Did he? The Italian ministers would have tied themselves down in Rome. Did they? The United States President would have confined himself to Washington. Did he? Not simply a responsible minister, but the head of that country, thought—and his country agreed with him—that when the lines were to be gathered up after war's ravages and peace was to be framed and tempered to the conditions of the time, it was no less a person than himself, with his authority and his representative position, who should be on the spot to lay the lines of peace. Surely my hon. friend cannot hold to the dictum he has laid down. If he does, he puts himself in the minority in this country and in the world.

My hon. friend first mentions some things as rumours. Then in that geometric or arithmetic progression upon which we go from less to greater, his next sentence makes of those rumours facts, and on those facts, whose mothers were rumours, he founds an argument for an indictment of the Government. Imagination is a fine servant, but a bad master; and imagination is the mother of rumours, and rumours are mischievous and generally as far off from facts as it is possible to get them. There would in fact be no spice in a rumour if it were a fact. Rumour is not a fact, and thereby it allures, and it catches, and it does not tie you down to argument. It is so easy to say: So-and-so told me such-and-such. Off it goes; nobody is responsible; but it is on its trot; it is started in the race, and it goes to the uttermost parts of the world. And so on all the rumours which he then makes into facts, he founds the pleasing proposition that there was a Government seated opposite him that had one head, two heads, three heads—the first, very respectable, having one head; in the second place a monstrosity, having two; in the third place, a very hideous monster with three heads. The Government has one head and one only; it has not two and it has not three. But while one head is away, another, very humbly and in a very poor way, undertakes to do, as far as he can, what the real head would do if he were present. And under the circumstances of the present, when the sick man is absent searching for a return of the health which has been shattered by his devotion to the duties and responsibilities of office, the onerous responsibilities of the war, one of the members of his Cabinet undertakes to fill his place, however unworthily, by the good grace of his fellow-members and his supporters and of the House as well. My hon. friend would surely not object to that.

As to the proposition which he adds to that—and that rumour developed into a fact with which he clenched his argument that there was a one-man proposition somewhere and that in this whole business there was a concealed design, and not a healthful one—let me set my hon. friend's mind at rest. The right hon. leader of the Government is away, unfortunately, and with regret we say it, in search of a very much shattered health. On the conditions of two or three or four months free from the cares of office, as far as he can be free, depends entirely whether he shall ever lead this Government again or not. But there is nothing up the sleeve; the fact is absolutely that and nothing more. If a kind Providence permits and health is restored in reasonable time, we shall have the leader of the Government back again.

My hon. friend objects to having members of the Government in the Senate. Since when? Is his party behind him in that respect? Have a Senate and have no member of the Government in it? It has not been so in the past; it will not be so in the future. The more the Senate is useful, the more it will demand that responsible members of the Government shall be in the Senate to state their policy, and their policy will be carried out in that way. Since when did my hon. friend develop this strange theory that because a man was not successful in a constituency for the Commons he could not represent his province in the Senate? Such a theory does not stand on good ground. The Senate is not a body elected by the electors. A senator is a man appointed under the constitution from a certain province, who represents his province, and Mr. Blondin, a member of our Government, as surely represents his province as a senator as the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland) represents his province on the electoral basis in the House of Commons.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is too much.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: But the last argument that my hon. friend adduced to show that our hon. colleague did no longer represent Quebec, was that he had moved his family and was living in Ottawa. My hon. friend suffers from a lapse of memory. How long did my right hon. friend, now deceased, who led the party that my hon. friend now leads, have his family and his abode in Ottawa? Did he cease to represent his province because he lived in Ottawa? For a man who conducts a large department and who is not very close to his home, it is absolutely impossible to get along without having his family here if he intends to enjoy the amenities of family life and to have the help and aid that family life gives him when he is carrying on those responsible duties which devolve upon him. So it is no argument at all to say that because a man lives in Ottawa and not in his native province he therefore as a member of the Government does not represent his province.

My hon. friend finds fault with commissions. He says that there have been too many of them, that they are autocratic, irresponsible, and lead to situations which are not founded on legal and responsible grounds. Now, commissions have been plentifully appointed during the war in all countries that were engaged in the war. My hon. friend will not dispute that for a single moment. How many commissions were established and carried on in the United States, for instance, during the war? —most important commissions dealings with some of the greatest interests of peace or war in that country. The same holds true of Great Britain, of France, and all the other great warring countries. Our commissions are of two kinds. A commission is either administrative or advisory. If it is advisory, it is appointed by the Government and reports to it, and what is done is done on the responsibility of the Government. If it is administrative, it is established by Order in Council, which lays down the powers and duties placed in its hands by the Government, which duties it carries out, and beyond which powers it cannot go. So he must revise somewhat our opinions about commissions on these grounds. The Government is always responsible. In the case of an advisory commission, the Government either accepts or rejects its recommendations. In the case of an administrative commission, the Government lays down the scope and lines of the powers the commission is to exercise.

Geographical representation is outraged, my hon. friend says. I am not going to contest that, except that perhaps the word is rather an extreme one to use. There are many things done in time of war which project themselves into peace times. It is not always possible to bring them at once strictly into conformity with the lines followed in peace times. My hon. friend then goes on to say that there is no collective Cabinet responsibility. My hon. friend does not sit in our Cabinet. Absolutely he does not. I have never seen his face there, neither does he walk along the corridor or have a seat by the outside door. The Cabinet itself is sworn to secrecy. So how does my hon. friend know that there is not collective Cabinet responsibility? If he will take my word for it—and I am sure he thinks I am fairly honest, and that what I say would, according to my lights, be a true saying—never since Union Government has been formed has there been any line of policy adopted on which the Cabinet has not stood as a unit. What does my hon. friend mean by collective responsibility? Evidently, the responsibility of the whole Cabinet for every policy of the Cabinet. Take our policies as they have been developed in the last two years and a half, policies of magnitude and of far-reaching importance. Behind all of these there has been solidarity on the part of the Government. What about the Opposition? I know what was in my hon. friend's mind; at least, I think I do. I think he had some reference to those troublesome things called tariff policies, and that when he was speaking of possible differences he was thinking of differences with reference to bases of a tariff. How does my hon. friend stand in that regard? Is he all-collective with his party on possible tariff conditions? Was it ever so with the party now led by my hon. friend? I remember the long years before 1896 and the well developed and arduous struggle, and a fine struggle it was, of the Liberal party from opposition into power which they attained in 1896. During all those years of struggle, in the nest where little birds are supposed to agree two birds nestled side by side. One was always squawking "Eliminate Protection. Free trade as they have it in Great Britain." The other was more prudent but chirped once in a while " Keep your feathers from being ruffled, it will all come out right; there will be a little bit of protection in the end." In 1896 the bird that had done all the squawking before was bundled out of the nest, and the other took possession of it and kept it until 1911. No one knows that better than my hon. friend, or my hon. friend who sits behind him (Mr. Fielding). My hon. friend says that we were elected in 1917 on the sole platform of prosecution of the war. He is not absolutely correct in that. He goes a certain distance, but he does not go far enough. We were elected, indubitably, pledged to carry the war to a victorious conclusion, but we were elected for other purposes besides that. We had a platform, which was put out in 1917. My hon. friend has read it, and I make the assertion here to-day without fear of contradiction that the platform was far broader than simply the prosecution of the war, and that it has been lived up to by the Government and the party supporting it.

Then my hon. friend comes to his later proposition. He echoes what I have seen in the newspapers, what I have heard from the platform, a sort of impression which some people try to persuade themselves into accepting as truth, that the Cabinet during the last year or more has been in a tense state, ever on the point of explosion, and that its troubles have been vivid, continued and irreconcilable. Where does my hon. friend get his information? He was good enough to tell us. He gets it from the headlines of the newspapers. Now, God bless the newspapers in so far as they go right and do not waste too much paper, in these days when paper is very scarce, in big forty or forty-six page issues. But the last place to which I would go to get the solid basis for a political or any other platform would be the headlines of the newspapers. The headlines, however, are sweet to the taste of my hon. friend. One headline flares out: "Tense condition in the Cabinet;" another follows it with this: "Explosion almost took place yesterday in the Cabinet;" and a third conveys the statement that "Borden would be out but he could not find a successor." All this is contained in the headlines. Now, my hon. friend is younger than I, and I am sure he will take it in good part if I advise him to avoid the headlines of the newspapers as a basis for his political information and policies.

My hon. friend concludes with a resolution wherein he states a present policy of himself and of his party, and the gist of that resolution is that with all possible speed we should immediately put through a Franchise Bill and then appeal to the country in order to get the opinion of the people afresh and obtain a new Parliament and a new Government. Does my hon. friend see no lurking shadows of future disaster to himself and his party if the suggestion should be acted upon and within a fortnight or three weeks we were put to the test of a general election? Was the success of his party at the last general election so great, so striking, that it makes him all of a hunger for another contest? Or is this a bit of fine strategical camouflage under a pretty well-founded assumption, as he reads things, that the vote will not carry in this House and that he will have all the honour of declaring for a bold and vigorous strategy without exposing himself to any of the disaster which might follow from a realization of what he pleads for? However, I am not going to discuss that point further to-night. Having wearied the House to this length, I shall make a few remarks on what is, after all, the gist of this whole campaign with reference to the present Government. The gist of the whole campaign is to get in full swing rumours, headlines, statements, whether true or false, assertions of every kind, allegations, and, in short, anything at all that is calculated to create the impression that this Government has had no strength, has done nothing in the two years of its existence, has been an uncourageous, an indecisive and an inadequate Administration. Is not that the sum and substance of it? Is not that what is sought to be impressed on the people largely in order that, under such an impression, the downfall of a really good and honest and efficient Government may be brought about? I propose, with the indulgence of the House, to devote a few moments to a very brief statement of some things that have been done since the election of 1917, and I think I shall be borne out in the assertion that a campaign of thoughtless and baseless, and in some respects, mischievous, if not malevolent, criticism has been and is being levelled against the Government.

The Government has suffered, and why? Because its members have been too busy to travel over the country to refute these false statements and misrepresentations on platforms. For instance, put a man in the War Department at Ottawa during these last four years of war, with all its responsibilities and trying circumstances, with its nights and days of unremitting toil, and then ask him to leave his desk, his bureau, his directing seat, and go through this country on weary weeks of combatting these criticisms and misrepresentations. He would be recreant to his duty, recreant to the trust the country had reposed in him if he attempted this. It is to his disadvantage, it is to the disadvantage of the Government that this cannot be done. But it is a case in which the Government must do its duty in regard to the work which is immediately before it, no matter what the people may be saying outside. We have taken that resposibility. We have been up against that disadvantage, and we are up against it to-day. But truth is still truth, and the people of this country are, I think, on the whole, sensible, fair-minded and truth-loving. Now that the war is over and some of the hardest problems of peace have been met and put in the way of solution, the Government will find its methods and means to place the whole truth before the country. And when the whole truth is heard and the whole matter is made plain, misrepresentation will not score a victory, but rather an honest and efficient devotion to duty will carry the approval of the great fair-play-loving body of the Canadian electorate. I stand here to-night, with the experience I have had in public life, and make this assertion, which I believe to be absolutely true: That no Government since Confederation has faced greater responsibilities and met them more efficiently, or has so fair a record in performances, as this Government which has carried through the work of the war. No Government that I have known has more fully carried out the pledges that it made upon the platform upon which it was elected than has this present Government; and I propose to prove both these assertions if the House will give me its attention.

We may divide the work of the Government into three branches: The home work and policy, the war work and policy, and that other body of administration and policy which has to do with both home and war work in the way of support, amalgamation, and co-operation; and I want to briefly draw attention to what has been done under these three headings. The first article of the platform upon which the Government went to the people in 1917 was: A vigorous prosecution of the war. What fault has my hon. friend to find with the Government in that respect? Did it lack courage, or initiative, or efficiency, or loyalty, deep and abiding, to the men whom it sent overseas? Did it suffer those men to go into the war unequipped? Did it give them insufficient food, or equipment, or clothing, or medical care? Were those men nursed when they were sick, were their wounds cared for when they were struck down? Is the Government at fault in any of these respects? When there were influences abroad in various parts of this country to endeavour to cause the Government to ease up with respect to its war measures, to go no further and to refrain from the last irrevokable step which was necessary if the ranks of our men were to be kept up, the Government displayed the courage of its convictions. Its members took their political lives in their hands. They went to the country. They pledged themselves to that policy which the situation called for and they have carried it out ever since. You ask for proof. Talk with our generals that have lived and fought upon the battlefield. If you ask for further proof talk with the generals of the Allied Army who have seen our men fighting and toiling on the battle grounds. Talk with those who have had charge of the great helping institutions of the war—the nurses, the Red Cross Society, the Ambulance and First Aid organizations, all those activities which go to solace and comfort and healing of soldiers. Ask these authorities whether Canada was to the front or to the rear in all of these respects? I say that no further words are required to prove that the Government has fulfilled its pledge in regard to the war and fulfilled it most efficiently.

The second article in our platform was Civil Service reform; the extension of the Civil Service Act to the Outside Service, with the abolition of patronage, and a preference for returned men in making appointments. That pledge has also been fulfilled to the letter. A National Government has existed in this country since 1867 and the Civil Service has been a subject of debate and examination during all the intervening years. No Government up to the time of the present one has been either willing or strong enough to take hold of the Civil Service and to establish it on the basis of merit rather than on the basis of party patronage. This Government did that. It has passed legislation classifying the Civil Service and has entirely eliminated the power of patronage—has made merit the foundation for appointment, has made efficient work the foundation for promotion. Is the Government to be found fault with in respect to that far-reaching measure of reform?

In respect to a preference in the matter of appointment of returned soldiers, up to the present date 24,000 returned soldiers have been appointed to the Civil Service, of whom 7,500 have been made permanent. In that respect the Government has shown itself strong, and persistent, and faithful to the promise it made.

For many years in this country there has been a growing feeling that the Dominion should have a Health Department. We started out with an Immigration Department to bring immigrants to this country, while all the time death was taking its toll of the young from month to month and from year to year. The finest way to build up the population of any country is to care for the births that take place in it, and to preserve and cause the young life to grow up in a native constitutional atmosphere into good citizenship. What waste there has been in this respect in the past medical men and publicists can very well tell. Well, Sir, this Government has established a Health Department, and has added to it a Child Welfare Bureau, and has followed that up with a Housing Scheme under which $25,000,000 is advanced by the Government, in co-operation with the provincial authorities, for better housing in this Dominion. Better housing means better homes and better health conditions—longer life, and more life in the homes of the country.

Technical education has been alluded to by my hon. friend (Mr. Cronyn) who moved the Address. In organization measures with respect to technical education this Government has taken the first step. A sum of $10,000,000 has been appropriated to the purpose. Contracts have already been entered into and are being made with the provincial authorities to put into operation the work of technical education. That is a great step forward. Who denies that in this country there are great hidden forces lying right by our hands of which we are oblivious, but which gentlemen of keen research will spy out and bring to the light, and which the skilled hand of the technically trained man will set into the work of development and progress? These hidden powers are tremendous in a country like Canada, and with resources such as we have these are vitally necessary to the full prosperity and development of the country.

So along with technical education we have the Industrial and Scientific Research Council, a body of honorary members comprising amongst them the best of our scientific men in ability, in training and in experience, giving their work for nought, yet not stinting their labour. This Scientific Research Council, side by side with technical training, marks in its establishment an era in the progress of this country, and if we are wise we will utilize it in practical application of brains to business. I am not insinuating at all that business men have not brains, what I mean is that the brain power which animates and impels the chemist and the delver into nature's secrets to discover these hidden forces and to invent methods for their utilization must be applied to the business and productive development of our country. Is the Government to be blamed, to be called indecisive, inadequate and without policy because it has laid the foundation for progress in this most important and vital matter?

It was a plank in the platform of 1917 that women should be enfranchised. The first pledge of this nature ever given by a Government on its appeal to the people was endorsed by the people and has been redeemed by the Government, and to-day women are enfranchised in this Dominion. Large are the spaces to be travelled and long the time required before a great reform like that comes to its fruition. The bud which is just ready to blossom requires the warmth of the sun's rays to bring it to full efflorescence. So in this long march towards women's enfranchisement this war—where women stood side by side with man, ministered to his wants, shared his dangers, mothered his sick and his wounded and sacrificed their heart's blood for the sake of victory—acted as the sun's ray, and gave that added heat which was necessary to bring this bud into perfect efflorescence, and we now find that almost without exception women's enfranchisement is an accomplished fact in Canada as throughout most forward nations of the civilized world.

This Government has had the courage of its convictions in relation to prohibition. The importation of liquor was forbidden in 1917, for two reasons: To ensure the saving of our money, and to secure not lessened but improved efficiency; manufacture was prohibited in 1918; transportation to forbidden areas was prohibited and Canada was protected from an influx of whiskey from the United States by a thirty day embargo—all this being done under the powers of Orders in Council founded on the War Measures Act plus statutory enactment. Now that those orders have been dispensed with the Government again comes to the rescue.

While the provinces must be their own judges, yet if they want the importation of liquor into their territory stopped we have passed legislation which will implement and carry out that desire. There is the Government's record with reference to prohibition.

In shipbuilding my hon. friend who sits to my right (Hon. Mr. Ballantyne) inaugurated a bold and vigourous policy, and about $70,000,000 is being expended in the production of a fleet of fifty or fifty-one freighters, part of which fleet is now ploughing the seas carrying the produce of Canada to foreign countries. No Government would have adopted such a policy if it were inefficient, indecisive and spineless. Does my hon. friend chide us for that addition to the transportation facilities of this country? No; neither will he nor the country at large object to such a policy.

Now I come to that vexed question—the high cost of living. I notice my hon. friend not long since in speaking on the subject dealt pretty strongly with it. He is a student, he has had a wide range of reading and a wide range of observation as well, and he understands, I believe, the foundations of this subject better than do a great many of us. So I was struck as well as a little amused when I noticed how carefully he skirted on the outer edge of that question in some speeches he has been making recently. I think he did allow to shine through some light of his conviction that there were greater causes than are generally thought of for the high cost of living, and that it is a problem of such magnitude that solutions favourable and practicable have not yet been found in any country. Every country that has tried to crack this nut of the high cost of living has failed in the attempt. First Germany, with an organization unequalled and an obedience to law unequalled as well, tried it, and the grossest failure was the ultimate result. Amongst other countries that have tried to keep down the high cost of living is the republic to the south of us. But that high cost has not yet gone down; it has on the contrary gone up. It is somewhat comforting to know from the statistical statements covering all the great countries that the elevation in the cost of living from 1914 to this present time is less in Canada in some cases by one hundred per cent, and in other cases by higher percentages, than in most of the other great countries. Undoubtedly they have skilled experience, scientific and practical men in all those countries, but although they have given of their best in their attempts to solve this problem they have not yet solved it. The reason is that the underlying causes are so world-wide and so varied that this sick world must become convalescent before prices can come back to normal.

Among all the causes of the high cost of living, the least canvassed and probably most potent are the inflated credits and currencies of the world. Where there is an overplus of money and a shortage of commodities, the prices of commodities will go up, and vice versa. Russia is the most striking example; Germany is following fast in her footsteps; all the countries of the world are in somewhat the same position. Only the healing of time, the getting back to better conditions of credit and of currencies, greater production and greater thrift will gradually bring the sick man from the bed on which he lies prone to-day and give him successive impacts of health and strength until he becomes his normal self again.

As to production, what has this country done? What has this Government done? I want to say just here that when I talk about governments doing this or that I have not in mind the exclusive and autocratic point of view that the people have nothing to do with these things. It is the accordant action of the Government and of the people that makes these problems soluble; in proportion as the Government and the people work in harmony, these problems become more easily anl more perfectly solved.

In its efforts toward increasing production the Government has been untiring; it has been generous, wise and successful. Various tariff changes have been made, all in the line of trying to reduce the cost of production. The Government, through the Department of Agriculture, has generously provided an advance of $3,000,000 to give assistance to the people in those districts who through seasonal difficulties have been deprived of their seed. The Board of Grain Supervisors in 1917 and 1918, under the able leadership of their chairman, Dr. Magill, bought, sold and managed the wheat crop of Canada, and not a word of criticism has been uttered against their integrity, the success of their work, or the manner in which it was carried out. If you scan the history of other countries you will find that enormous troubles have taken place in these respects. Courts of law, courts-martial, and commissions are investigating in other countries enormous frauds which have taken place with reference to the people's food supply. Last year the Canadian Wheat Board was formed. It does practically the same work as the Board of Grain Supervisors did during the two preceding years. This year as well there is no intimation that matters have not been efficiently and squarely carried out—so much so that the Council of Agriculture for Canada and various large agricultural associations and organizations have not only approved the policy which was so efficiently carried out in time of war, but have asked that it be continued in the time of peace.

We have had a Food Board which did good service. The Department of Agriculture has made strong, uniformly consistent efforts in these lines. The sum of $10,000,000 advanced towards agricultural education is being expended in co-operation with the provinces. Twenty million dollars has been allocated to good roads—and good roads aid production; they are of the greatest service and aid to the farmer.

My hon. friend has criticised control. What is the ground of his criticism? Does he mean to say that during wartime no measures except those which are found in the regular statutes of a country should be invoked by a Government; that a Government must depend upon those laws, or others to be from time to time enacted by Parliament to carry out its emergency war measures? He cannot mean that, because no country carries on war under such conditions. In Great Britain, in the United States, in France, Italy, Japan—everywhere—extraordinary measures and extraordinary powers which would have been frowned upon or not permitted in times of peace are carried out and exercised when the war emergency comes and where changes are almost instantaneous. And so food control, control of the packing industries, fuel control, control of imports and exports, have been exercised in all warring countries as they have been in Canada, under war measures and legislation for the defence of the realm.

With reference to the purchase of war supplies and equipment, this Government established a War Purchasing Commission, through whose hands hundreds of millions of dollars have passed for the purchase of food and equipment for war purposes and supplies for the Departments in time of peace. These purchases have been successfully carried out to the satisfaction of the great body of the people. The names Sir Edward Kemp, Sir Hormisdas Laporte, Mr. Galt, and Mr. Gundy, whom unfortunately we lost about a year ago, will always stand in that Commission as guarantees of efficiency, of economy, and of honest and honourable service.

Now, coming to the after phases of the war, has my hon. friend anything to find fault with in the matter of the demobilization of the forces of this country? When the armistice was signed, some 340,000 Canadians were on the other side of the Atlantic. During part of the time of their demobilization I happened to be in Europe and I saw what went on with reference to our soldiers as well as with reference to the soldiers of other countries. I am entirely of the opinion that no country in the world more expeditiously, more efficiently and more smoothly demobilized its soldiers than did Canada. More than 20,000 soldiers' dependents have been repatriated at the country's expense.

We have financed our part in the war, paying out $1,600,000,000 in that account. Two billions of dollars were raised through loans subscribed by the Canadian people themselves, or about $270 per capita.

My hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) was denouncing the Government, saying that it did not have the sympathy and confidence of the people. I wonder how it was that the people of Canada, the hard-headed business men of Canada, raised two billions of dollars for this Government and entrusted it with its expenditure if they had as bad an opinion of it as my hon. friend says they have. Not only have we done that, but we have enlarged the area of taxation as no other government has done before, on the basis of business profits, of income and of other war taxation. We have extended credits, and these credits have enabled the selling of our own produce. A courageous, some say a foolhardy adventure, but to my mind, under the circumstances, absolutely necessary, and I believe it has had and will have the very best of results.

I might speak now and lastly of what has been done for the soldiers after demobilization, in the way of vocational and other training, in the way of medical and hospital care, in the way of appliances, orthopedic and otherwise, for soldiers that have been maimed, in the land settlement arrangement under which hundreds and thousands of returned soldiers are making their application, undergoing their training and being settled down into the production on the soil, one of the finest of productions that we have in this country. I might speak to you—and it would be a revelation to any one who had not read it—of the re-establishment work in this country, of its far-reaching effects, of the numbers that come under its tutelage, its training and its care. Suffice it to say that already the Land Settlement Board which selects men returned and trains with pay and allowances, advises in choice of lands, stock and implements, and loans the necessary funds, has already qualified 34,000 for settlement and advanced $55,000,000 in loans.

As regards Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, let the following facts sink into our minds and make their proper impression: 104 hospitals and sanitoria are being directly and indirectly operated. 6,520 In and 1,634 Out patients are therein on strength of department. 8,993 average outside clinics have been operated per week in December, 1919. 27,602 were on strength of department for vocational training December 31, 1919, and of these 20,107 were disabled and 7,495 under 18 years. 3,988 are training in curative workshops. 12,327 were training in Schools Department and outside during the last week of December. 11,223 training in industries. 114,728 net applications have been received by Information and Service Boards to December 27, 1919. 106,061 have been placed in employment—92% of total. 3,496 applications and 2,717 placements in professional and business sections have been made. 762,322 inquiries have been dealt with in Information and Service Branch. 7,000 tuberculosis cases have been treated and 75% enabled to resume useful occupations. 42,679 re-training courses have been granted, of whom 23,966 are in training, 9,455 courses have been completed and 3,096 discontinued.

Canada's record in this great work stands away over and above that of any country that participated in the war and in it. She has spent so far about an even $40,000,000.

I rest my case. I have thought it wise to put some of these general observations before the House and the country, not because I feel that this Government has not made errors and mistakes. It has made many of them; what Government has not? But I do think that it is in the interest of fair, honest playing of the game that what has been done should not be hidden under misrepresentation or clouds of false criticism, but should go to the people for their calm examination. And if that is done, I for one feel that I can entrust my stewardship that of the Government to the judgment of my fellow citizens in this Dominion of Canada.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, possibly at this hour and after having heard a number of excellent speeches this afternoon and to-night, the Government would not consider it amiss to adjourn and take up this debate to-morrow afternoon. It is now almost ten o'clock, and we have heard a very elaborate speech from the leader of the Government, and I think it would be hardly fair to ask an amateur like myself to reply to it at this late hour. I would, therefore, be obliged if the leader of the Government would agree to an adjournment and let us take up this debate to-morrow afternoon.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Taking into consideration the extreme youth and inexperience of my hon. friend, I am touched by his appeal, and I shall be pleased to agree to his moving the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. McKENZIE moved the adjournment of the debate.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Hume Cronyn for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King thereto, resumed from Monday, March 1.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, although somewhat familiar with the House of Commons for the last almost twenty years, still, coming to this new Chamber, I must confess to you, Sir, that I do not feel just quite as much at home as I used to feel, and I must crave the indulgence of hon. members on both sides of the House and yourself, Mr. Speaker, while attempting to discharge the duty which now devolves upon me to continue the debate upon the motion before the Chair.

Let me at once, Sir, revert to the time honoured custom of congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address, and to assure you in doing so I am not indulging perfunctorily in any old-fashioned custom that one regards merely as a matter of duty. We are proud, Mr. Speaker, of our Parliamentary institutions, traditions, and customs, and we are always zealous that the duty of moving and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the Throne shall be discharged in a manner becoming the House of Commons of Canada. It is therefore a great pleasure to be able to congratulate the leader of the Government upon the manner in which the hon. gentlemen selected by him have discharged their duty.

From the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn) we expected the kind of address that he has given us, for we have heard him before, and know him to be of a literary turn of mind, and it is sufficient for me to say that he has done justice to his former reputation in this House.

My good friend who represents the grand old county of Pictou (Mr. McGregor) has not in the past troubled us very much with speeches, and being a very patriotic and zealous Nova Scotian, although differing from him in politics, I was very anxious indeed that he should do justice not only to the good old province of Nova Scotia but to the grand old county of Pictou. I am glad to be able to say to my friends in Nova Scotia that the traditions of our province have been well lived up to in the speech of my hon. friend.

My good friend from London (Mr. Cronyn) was during the study of his speech and in the delivery of it reminded of that good old phrase of Scotch thought, that it required "A stoot heart to stay brae." No doubt he realized that it required a particularly "stoot hairt" to face the "stey brae" of saying anything laudatory about the present Administration. But I must do him the justice of saying that he faced the brae very well;—whether or not he made the grade is another matter.

I shall not, Mr. Speaker, confine my congratulations entirely to these hon. gentlemen. I must congratulate the House, and particularly the Opposition, upon the very able and comprehensive speech of the leader of the Opposition (Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King). Under our institutions the Opposition is recognized as a part of the machinery of Government, to the extent of its leader being paid, and properly so, out of the funds of the country. The whole House, therefore, must be pleased to know that we have in the person of the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition one who is well qualified to discharge the duties pertaining to that office and in the doing of it to follow along proper constitutional lines. I congratulate the hon. Leader of the Opposition, therefore, upon his very excellent speech of yesterday. It opens up a new vista for the Liberal party; it gives them confidence in their leader, in his capacity and in his ability to blaze the way to greater things for Canada than Canada has ever known.

It would be carrying coals to Newcastle if I were to congratulate the old veteran—old, I mean, in parliamentary practice—who so ably and so well leads the remnant of the Government in this House (Sir George Foster). I wish, Sir, that the reply to the able speech of that hon. gentleman had fallen into abler hands than mine.

I listened to the right hon. gentleman's speech with a great deal of interest. I have tried to analyze it and to pick out of it whatever meat might be found in it. After sleeping over it last night and thinking over it a little this morning I find that if you strip the speech of its clever "Fosterisms" there is not enough left for a decent burial. I shall refer later to the observations of my right hon. friend. It would be folly for a youngster in politics like myself to say that the way in which the leader of the Government delivers his addresses in this House is not able, is not masterful. I shall not attempt to do so; I shall simply make this passing observation: The leader of the Government began wrong some eighteen years ago; he has kept wrong, and I fear that he will end wrong.

We cannot forget our surroundings, Mr. Speaker, on this occasion. We cannot forget the grandeur of the magnificent building in which we find ourselves. The builders of this splendid temple have provided not only for the present, but also for the future greatness of this country. No matter how great Canada may become; no matter how splendid its proportions or its material development or how large its population, for all time to come we and our children after us will have in this building, if God spares it to us, a temple worthy of the great country of which we are so proud.

This is a fair and proper time for some stock-taking so far as our country is concerned. Let us observe, Sir, what has been done; let us observe what it is possible for us to do in the future. Let us hope that this country will live up to the great expectations which the fathers of Confederation had in their minds when they started out to lay broad and deep the foundations of this country. We have in Canada magnificent lands, great areas of country extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We have mineral wealth, forest wealth, agricultural wealth, and we have a great people. Let us hope that we shall continue to utilize and husband our lands and resources, our facilities for transportation, and all that goes to make for the building of a great nation. Let us hope that our statesmen and our people will set themselves to the task of building up a great country, of building up a citizenship worthy of the Mother Country and its institutions—institutions which have made for this country a home of safety, happiness, and prosperity for its citizens. The fathers of Confederation laid the foundations of our transportation system, of the settlement of our vast stretches of country and of the building up of a nation within the bounds of Canada. Let us hope that no divisions of any kind will tend in the slightest way to mar the growth of our country, it unity, its prosperity, its greatness, or to make them less than what the fathers of Confederation had in mind in the days when there was consummated that union of which we are so proud and which we hope will ever be kept intact. Some differences of opinion may prevail among the different parts of Canada; some policies may be regarded as not of application to the whole country. But if we hope to be a nation, Sir; if we hope to grow up as a country; if we hope to be united from the Atlantic to the Pacific, we should so devise our plans and policies of Government as to bring about a reasonable degree of success and prosperity throughout the whole of our Dominion.

I should like now to devote some time to the speech that was made by the leader of the Government yesterday and to the remarks of the member for London (Mr. Cronyn). I have no criticism to make of the speech of my hon. friend from London. He said that the old methods of Government were breaking down; that those old methods had fallen short of meeting the necessities of the country and that something new had to be brought in.

My hon. friend has not told us what that new thing is going to be, and if he finds the machinery of Government and of the party to which he belongs breaking down, I would invite him to pay attention to the manner in which his Government and party are breaking down and to give up talking about principles in the operations of the old parties.

I am not admitting for one moment that the principles of Liberalism have fallen down or that anything in connection with the Liberal party in this country has fallen down. On the contrary, it is strong and vigorous and willing to carry forward the responsibilities of party in connection with the affairs of this country as it has done of yore. If my hon. friend finds that that party to which he belongs is falling down upon the job; that it is not equal to carrying on the government of this country; that there is not that cohesion or unity amongst the members of that party that is necessary in order to enable it to carry on a common policy and purpose, let him admit the corn and say that they must look around for something new in order to carry on the affairs of government along the lines of party. But I will not admit that there is any occasion to say that, so far as we on this side of the House are concerned, there are any signs of decay, of falling short, or of inability to carry on the business of the country in a party way and along party lines.

There was a time in this country—and I suppose the time is not yet gone—when the Tory party stood for something in Canada. Such men as Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Charles Tupper, and Sir John Thompson, stood for something in this country. They were great men in their day and generation, and there are in Canada to-day men who are proud of their history and of their doings. Is the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn), with one stroke of the pen, going to wipe off the map the existence and history of such men as leaders of a party and to build up something of some fanciful character, the character of which nobody knows, which has no beginnings of days or end of time so far as we can tell what he has in his mind? That is about all I have to say as regards the speech of my hon. friend, so well delivered, so worthy of him, so worthy of the institutions of this country, and so worthy of the excellent manner in which he discharged his duty.

Let me say a few words about the speech which was delivered in this House so ably and well by the acting leader of the Government yesterday evening. It has been said by the leader of the Opposition that we have not in this country to-day that strength of government that we should have in order to deal with the various important questions that loom up in Canada and with which we have to deal. My right hon. friend answered in his usual easy fashion, pointing out that the Government were all right; that they were perfectly sound, and that no man should pay any attention to rumours in his country; that he and the chosen few who are treading the narrow way with him alone knew what was going on in this country, and the the people of Canada would have to wait until the good time came when he thought proper to tell them something about the Government. He tells the leader of the Opposition that the door of the sick chamber (because I would call it the sick chamber) is well barred; that nobody can get in; and he told us that the bulletins that the newspapers were putting out were unreliable and not the truth, and that we knew nothing about the real condition of the sick person in the sick chamber. Doctors are very zealous about the atmosphere in a sick chamber, and very often they turn people out of a sick chamber. Apparently, whoever is in sick chamber now must be showing some of the symptoms which a person shows when the doctor turns the visitors out, because one after another of those who occupied that chamber are being turned out and we see them wandering at large, and we must come to the conclusion that they are turned out because the nervous condition of the patient will not tolerate any longer their presence in the sick room.

It is well known to doctors and to us all that when a person is sick he becomes nervous, and some things that used to be quite tolerable to him would not be permitted at all within reach of his touch or vision. When conditions grew unhealthy in the sick chamber, there were some people sitting around whom the patient did not like, and when you see such men as Mr. Calder, Mr. Sifton—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McKENZIE: —Mr. Crerar and other men sitting around, the sick man would say: "What do these Hebrews here anyhow; what brings them into this place?" And the situation is that they are turned out. You will pardon me, Mr. Speaker, mentioning these hon. gentlemen by name, because I have no reference to them as members; I was referring to them in an imaginative way as men being turned out of a sick room, and I ask your pardon if I have transgressed the rules of the House. That is the condition in which we find the Government; but the leader of the Government is becoming so easily satisfied now that he says: They are perfectly all right, and they could always get along in that way; it was only following an old custom that there should be a full Cabinet and that every department should be manned. The right hon. gentleman has discovered that they can get along without them and that it is a saving of money and time and many other things that we should get along in this country without the whole Government. He pointed out yesterday that it does not matter so much about the body if we have plenty of heads. Would it not be well to ask some of the friends of the Government what they think of the present Administration? It would not do for myself to give any opinion of my own, because I am honest enough to say to you, Sir, that my opinion might be, to some extent, prejudiced. But the Administration has a few friends in the country; they have people who always thought well of them and we want to know what they say about the present Government of Canada. The leader of the Government would be quite willing to put the editor of the Montreal Gazette on the stand and ask him questions about the administration of affairs and the kind Government that we have in this country. He would say that it is quite fair to call as a witness the editor of that paper, because it is an old responsible newspaper in Canada; it is a paper that is familiar with the affairs of this country, and that has always been more than fair to the Tory party. He would admit that it is quite proper to call that editor and ask him a few questions in respect of this Government.

Let us put the Gazette on the witness stand, but before doing so, I want to read to this witness something that appeared in the editorial columns of his paper not long ago. The Gazette said that the Union Party was not united, that it had outlived its usefulness, and that having accomplished its purpose it was reverting electorally into its original elements. Here are the exact words:

> The art of government is most difficult under the best auspices, but a leaderless ministry, destitute of policy, must be the despair of its friends. The public memory is short and public gratitude an unknown quantity. The electorate requires a guide, a policy, an association with those who invite its confidence; and the Government offers neither guidance, nor principles, nor familiarity with the people. The situation is not suddenly precipitated. It began with the conclusion of the war, since when futile efforts at permanent coalition have more than once been made, and minister after minister has dropped out until the situation has become difficult for the Government and despondent for its supporters.

That is the statement made by that tried and true friend of the Government. Now let me ask the witness some questions.

What about the leader of the Tory party in the House of Commons? The reply is "It has no leader; it is leaderless."

What about the policy of the Tory Party? "It has no policy."

What about the opinion in which it is held by its friends? "It is the despair of its friends."

How is it as a guide for public business and public policy in this country? "It offers no guidance."

What about the principles of the Government? "It has no principles."

How does it stand with the people? "It has no familiarity with the people at all; the people never knew it."

What about the present general standing of the Government? "The Government is in a difficult position and its supporters are despondent."

That concludes the direct examination of this witness, and I would invite my right hon. friend at some future time to put this witness, his friend, under cross-examination and see if he has anything to take back of what he said in such plain words.

I am going to call one more witness, and it is no less a personage than the Hon. Robert Rogers, who at one time adorned the benches of this House and stood high in the counsels of the Tory Party, and stands high to-day, I have no doubt, in the counsels of that party under certain of its colours and flags and phases. Before calling this witness let me read what he said the other day when he was talking about this Government openly and plainly in the great city of Winnipeg, before a gathering of his Tory friends, no doubt. He is reported as follows:

> The Hon. Robert Rogers, a former colleague of Sir Robert Borden, who claims that he was the first to propose Union Government, says that the Union Government is "a Government of tinkers and jobbers, a Government of second-hand dealers, their energies almost entirely devoted to second-hand theories that are the product of the diseased brain of some poor unfortunate uplifter."

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: Who is the uplifter?

Mr. McKENZIE: There are so few uplifters in the Government that it is not hard to place him. I will leave it to the jury to put their finger on the uplifter. I do not agree, however, with Mr. Rogers that the uplifter has any diseased brain. I think his brain is very active. It is not so much the brain that is at fault, as the channels in which that brain is directed. We might ask Mr. Rogers a few questions: What position, for instance, he held in the Tory Party. He would answer that he was Minister of the Interior, and later, Minister of Public Works, and that he stood high in the counsels of that party.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: Also minister of elections.

Mr. McKENZIE: If we ask him why he left the party he would refer us to his letter of resignation which we all remember very well, and which appears on Hansard, in which he said that he was leaving because he wanted to get from under the crash that was coming in this country, due to the inaction and lack of ability in the Government of which he was a member. That was the reason he gave for leaving. In the face of that evidence I would ask my right hon. friend who leads the Government if it is not time he took serious thought as to whether this Government is such a substantial structure as he would seem to think it. If it is my privilege and my duty to address this House, it is also my duty and my privilege to warn my right hon. friend that this structure with which he is so satisfied is but a house built upon the sand which, when the storm comes and the rains descend and strike upon it will fall, and great will be the fall thereof. If he chooses to stay in that house after I have warned him, and prefers not to dig around a little and put stones under the corner to prop it up a little, when the crash comes and he loses his political life he will not be able to blame me.

Referring a little further to the speech of my right hon. friend, he was very sore, very sorrowful, and in great pain apparently, about the lack of sympathy in this country with public men, and particularly with prime ministers. As he was speaking I could not help asking myself, Is this a real Damascene conversion or is it a mere moment of weakness? I remembered, as we all remember, that there were times when he was not so sympathetic with prime ministers as he is now. Be that as it may, it was somewhat peculiar that from speaking of the lack of sympathy with prime ministers he immediately turned to birds and eggs in a nest. I presume, however, he will sometime explain how these thoughts were conceived. Now, there were some remarks in the Rt. hon. gentleman's speech with reference to ministers, and it is only well that his observations should be fairly and properly answered. He brought the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) severely to task for suggesting that ministers of the Crown should be in their seats. There may be, and I am sure there are, occasions when the business of the country demands that ministers shall not be in their seats but shall be attending to matters of importance elsewhere. I cannot conceive, however, of any circumstances that can render it impossible for a minister of the crown at some part of the day during the session of parliament to give some time, half an hour or an hour, to the proceedings of the House, particularly in the early stages of the sittings, so that any hon. member who was desirous to ask questions of the minister might have an opportunity to do so, in order that all necessary information might be vouchsafed the public. That is all that the leader of the Opposition meant, and I think it is only fair, if we are to have responsible government at all and if the operations of government departments are to be known to the public through the proper channel, that at some time during the day—not every day perhaps, although that would be highly desirable if it were possible—ministers of the crown should be in their places to answer such questions as might be properly put to them in regard to the administration of the affairs of their departments. Now, in regard to the position of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) possibly my right honourable friend (Sir George Foster) did not quite clearly apprehend the observations of the leader of the Opposition, and I feel that some explanation is necessary concerning his remarks anent the absence of the Prime Minister. I am sure that I myself, as a Nova Scotian, have always had the greatest possible admiration for the Prime Minister and I sincerely regret his enforced absence from the House. The same regard, I have not the slightest doubt, is held for him by every hon. member on this side of the House; and I think that nothing could be more unjust to the leader of the Opposition than to imply for a moment that he was finding fault with the Prime Minister because of his absence in the exigencies of the occasion. What the leader of the opposition suggested was that the leader of the Government should, if possible, be in the House, he being the man who is responsible to the people and on whose shoulders the people have placed the burden of conducting the Government. Under the present circumstances it seems that this is not possible. But there are various rumours in regard to the Prime Minister's desire to be relieved of his office. We have no other means of obtaining information in this country—on our side, at all events—than through the medium of the newspapers and reports which go abroad in the press of the party to which the right honourable gentleman belongs; and when those reports, purporting to come with authority from headquarters, stand uncontradicted, we have the right to believe the statements they contain. From these reports we learn that the Prime Minister was willing and, indeed, anxious to throw off the responsibility of leading the government, by reason of the state of his health, and that pressure was brought to bear upon him to renounce this privilege. He was cruelly prevailed upon by his friends to remain in his position regardless of the effect his enforced stay in office might have upon his health, and this, in order to prolong for a few years the life of a decayed, a decrepit, and a marked-for-death administration. These are the observations which the leader of the Opposition expressed, and I cannot entertain the idea that the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government would purposely put a false construction upon this his words. He may possibly have misunderstood what was said, but I want to make it perfectly clear to him and to the country at large that the Prime Minister has the deepest possible sympathy of his friends on this side, and that whatever time may be necessary for him to spend away from the House in the interests of his health, no matter what inconvenience it may involve, we shall concede him ungrudgingly; for it is our common desire on this side to see the Prime Minister restored to his former vigour. I hope that this will satisfy every one within the sound of my voice that the leader of the Opposition had nothing in mind but the opinion to which I have just given expression.

We trust that we shall hear from the hon. gentlemen who have gone as plenipotentiaries from the Government to meet the Prime Minister in that most holy city of New York, where, it seems, every great thing appertaining to this country of ours must now transpire. Halifax is the capital of Nova Scotia and has for a long time been regarded as a highly loyal city. The Prime Minister was there. Why did not the representatives of the Government choose that city as the place in which to interview the Prime Minister? No. They had to ignore Halifax and bestow on the city of New York the honour which belonged to the capital of Nova Scotia. However, we hope that they have good news to bring us, and that the Prime Minister will come back and some day before long resume his position at the head of the Government.

Now, there are several points in the speech of the leader of the Government to which I might refer, but I do not think that it is necessary that I should deal with them at all. There is one point, however, upon which I must touch. The leader of the Opposition charged the Government and its supporters with not having been elected to the House on a proper franchise, on the ground that the War-time Election Act was not the proper, democratic and free kind of franchise that we should have in this country, it having deprived a great many citizens of the right of passing judgment upon the Government. We are told that if Parliament being allowed to exist for another year through extending its constitutional limit it could do just as it pleased. I join issue sharply with the leader of the Government on that point, and say that when the end of the five years came for which we were elected, those who were in a position to elect members to this House should not, by reason of an extension of the life of Parliament for another year, have been deprived of that right. If one year was added to the life of Parliament for war purposes that did not authorize the Government to change the jury that would pass upon it and impanel a new one. It is as if, during a criminal trial, the jury should be changed when things began to look bad for the accused. On the charge and on the evidence, the jury in the box would have to find him guilty but they turn him out, let him loose in the town and give him the privilege of finding a jury that will bring in a verdict in his favour. That is what was done in this case. The Government took to themselves the right of cutting off the vote of every man that they thought would be opposed to them, finding a panel that they were perfectly sure would vote for them and bringing in a verdict in their favour. After having found that panel they wrote out a verdict in their own favour and got the foreman of the jury to sign it while, in regard to the distribution of the votes, as was told yesterday, bundles were put here and batches there, designed, placed and arranged all in accordance with the wish of the Government and where it was thought they would do the most good. That was not democratic or fair, nor did it secure a proper expression of the will of the people of this country. That is the position we take and that is a position which has not been answered by the right hon. the leader of the Government who says that although there was a year added, that year was to be made use of in the same way as the rest of the parliamentary term for which members were elected.

The leader of the Government claims great credit for what has been done in regard to technical education. The right hon. gentleman knows very well that the technical education policy of this country did not have its origin in anything that was done by this Government or by the old Tory Government. He knows that it is the product of the policy of the Liberal party, that we pressed this policy upon them day in and day out and that they made no move until at last they had to do something to meet the demands that were continually being pressed upon them. I must submit that so far they have not done much to carry out the ideas which were formulated by the Liberal party in connection with this matter.

The same thing is true of shipbuilding. Every member of this House knows that during the Liberal administration, under the premiership of the late right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, we had a shipping and naval policy in this country. It is well known that during the first four or five years of this present Administration, and up to the time they started shipbuilding, we were pressing upon them, day in and day out, the necessity of carrying out such a policy. They left it until the very last days of the war and until the cost of shipbuilding had gone up to a point four times what it was when they came into power. Ships are costing this country at the present time four times what they would have cost if the policy of the Liberal party had been carried out and if this shipbuilding programme had been carried forward at the time when it would have done the most good and entailed the least possible cost to the country. These are things for which the hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to get glory to-day.

The Union Government is trying to get glory for having encouraged agricultural production. If there is any credit due to anybody for the policy of the present Administration in connection with agriculture, that credit is due to the present Minister of Customs because in 1912 he brought in a vote of $10,000,000 which passed this House and received the support of Liberals and Conservatives. The right hon. gentleman has such hard scratching to find some reason for his existence to-day that he has to go back to 1912 and patch up a claim that this Government has had something to do with an agricultural policy with which the present Administration has had nothing whatever to do.

He says that they have done great things for the returned soldier and that the returned soldier is satisfied. I want to join issue with my right hon. friend there and to put in the witness box the returned soldier himself. If my right hon. friend reads the literature that is published in this country from day to day and month to month of the leaders of the great body of returned soldiers, he will see what they think of the Administration. The leader of the Government has been deluged with requisitions, petitions and demands asking him to dismiss the minister who had charge of this work. That is the way in which the returned soldiers are satisfied with the conduct of the Government. The Government, if they are doing good things, are most unfortunate in the way in which their acts and favours are received by those upon whom they are professing to bestow them. They have not one friend among the returned soldiers and if to-morrow they sought their opinion by means of a plebiscite, they would be wiped out of existence, horse, foot and artillery. That is where they stand with the returned soldier.

Then, they claim that they are entitled to credit for the great things that they have done for the Civil Service. There has never been such a muddle in this country, or in the whole world, as there is in connection with the Civil Service to-day. Let my right hon. friend ask those who sit around him from Ontario and from Nova Scotia, but particularly from the great province of Ontario. We have heard members from Ontario expressing themselves here as to what they thought of the Civil Service and its administration. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken), the editor of the newspaper called the Sentinel, has expressed himself in this House time and again and he has said that the legislation in regard to the Civil Service is the most stupid that was ever put upon the statute books of this country. That is the opinion which prevailed to a very material extent among hon. gentlemen supporting this Government in so far as they have support from anybody except by force of circumstances. These are matters, Mr. Speaker, for which this Government claim great praise and credit and I think I have stated clearly that they are not such as to satisfy the requirements of any well balanced or sound thinking administration or that there is anything in the reasons put forward by the right hon. the leader of the Government which would justify him in thinking that all is well with the Administration that he for the present leads.

I wish to say a few words about the general policy of the Government as well as the general policy, on trade and other matters, of the Liberal party. We are questioned as to what our policy is. We are told that we disagree amongst ourselves. All we have to do is to recall the history of that great party from 1896 down to 1911 when it had charge of the affairs of this country in every phase, every line, of Government and to ask the people of Canada to put the confidence in the Liberal party that they reposed in it in those days. As we made a success of the Government during those days and built up the country in a way in which it had not been built up before, we ask the people to place the same confidence in the same men, with the same policy, the same principles and the same desire to honestly and well serve their country.

That is what we say about our policies to the people of this country. When we met in convention in this city last August we confirmed those policies, and they are to-day the policies of the Liberal Party from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We have not one policy for the Maritime provinces, another policy for Quebec and Ontario, and still another policy for the West. Our policies are intended for one united people, and we refer to our past record as an earnest of how we propose to carry out those policies in the future.

The right hon. gentleman who leads the Government tells us that what we read in the newspapers is idle gossip which we cannot believe. I do not go that far with him, because the newspapers containing those reports stand very faithfully behind him and his Government and give the very best possible account of whatever redounds to his credit, and therefore he has no reason to give a black eye to the press by calling their reports idle twaddle or gossip which nobody can believe.

The newspapers tell us that the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Meighen), recently made a speech in Quebec in which he said the country would have to be protected to the hilt; then he moved towards the West, and at Winnipeg found he had to change his tune, as we in coming from the Maritime provinces to Montreal have to change our watches to have the correct time. When the hon. gentleman reached Winnipeg he found he had to put a new record in his gramophone, and the burden of his address was no longer protection to the hilt, but only moderate protection. I suppose had he continued further West by the time he got to Saskatchewan and Alberta there would have been no trace of protection at all in his speeches. I would warn my hon. friend to be careful lest some day he puts on a Quebec record at Calgary or Edmonton and finds himself in a bad mess indeed, because the Quebec record which he played to the shoe manufacturers will not do for the Free Traders of the West. So far as the Liberal party is concerned, we have no occasion to change our tune, for the simple reason that from the West to the East we have only one sound policy to commend to the attention of the people, and we believe that when they see fit to restore us to power that policy will bring back to this country the same prosperity that it enjoyed during the fifteen years the Liberal party was in control, and will revive in the people that faith in the Government which was once so strongly entertained by them.

It is true, Sir, that we have not the great leader of the past years. Men die, but principles never, and we hope on this side of the House that, as we have been faithful in the past to the leadership of the great man who has left us and to the principles which he espoused, there is enough Liberalism in the country to give effective support to those same principles and to compel the same success which we had while proudly marching forward under the leadership of the great man who has left us. We have to-day as our leader a man chosen in a democratic way by the whole country, a man who is in touch with the people, and who is willing and capable to carry forward those policies that will meet with the approval of our great democracy.

Before closing, Sir, there is one matter I wish to point out to the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government. He found great amusement yesterday that any one could suggest for a moment that anything about tariffs should be mentioned in a speech from the Throne. A great many of our people, much to their sorrow, will remember that in the years gone by the right hon. gentleman himself had something to do with the finances of this country, he having been Minister of Finance in the year 1894. In the speech from the Throne at the opening of Parliament in that year, prepared under the eye of the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Government and who at that time was an important member of the Government, we find the following passage:

> At an early date a measure will be laid before you having for its object the revision of the duties of customs,—

It is a most extraordinary thing that the leader of the Government found such a fund of merriment yesterday in the suggestion that anything about customs should be mentioned in the speech from the Throne.

> —with a view to meet the changes which time has effected in the business operations throughout the Dominion. While my ministers do not propose to change the principles on which the enactments on this subject are based, the amendments which will be offered for your consideration are designed to simplify the operation of the Tariff and to lessen as far as can be done, consistently with those principles and with the requirements of the Treasury, the imposts which are now in force.

That, Sir, was prepared and put in the speech from the Throne in that year by the right hon. gentleman who made such fun yesterday of the suggestion that the people who are groaning under the present heavy taxation and the high cost of living, and who are looking earnestly and anxiously for some relief from the Government and Parliament, could expect any expression of opinion of that kind in the speech from the Throne. We had a right to expect it, we had a right to believe that an effort would be made to better the condition of the people and to make Canada a country easy to live in and attractive to the proper kind of immigration from all parts of the world. Do not let us forget, Mr. Speaker, that while we have a population of only some 8,500,000, we have a country extensive enough to support over 100,000,000 or the same population as that of the United States. Therefore it is the duty of whatever Government is in power to make conditions such as to invite the right class of people to come here.

Talking about trade questions, I am willing, Sir, that we should have the freest possible intercourse with every country in the world.

Let me say this to the Government and to the country—and I am not particular in what way it will be understood; in fact, it can only be understood in one way—that while I am anxious for the widest possible trade with foreign countries, I would not trade to the extent of one five-cent piece with any country which will not recognize my Canadian dollar to the full face value of that dollar. If this country is loyal to itself, loyal to its principles, loyal to its institutions, it will stand by Canadianism in the matter of having any trade with any country that will not recognize the Canadian dollar at its full face value as international currency. I am not in favour of any restriction of trade, but I am in favour of Canada's trading where there is fair trade where she is properly treated. If there is any reason why any country is willing to sell goods to us and yet will not recognize the face value of the dollars with which we pay for them, that reason should be clearly stated. Although this condition of things has existed for some time and has caused the loss of millions to the people of Canada, not a word has come from the Government with regard to the making of any effort to bring about better conditions or to relieve the people of Canada of this great drain upon their resources. I am not saying whether or not the Government could do anything, but surely they could make an effort; surely they could satisfy the people, if it is possible to satisfy them in that regard, of what should or could be done concerning the adverse exchange conditions which have prevailed during the last few months.

I again thank you, Sir, and the members of the House for the patient attention with which my remarks have been received. I hope I have made it clear to everybody in Canada that the Liberal party has only one standard, only one principle as applied to all of Canada. That principle, which admits of no place for sectionalism or anything of that kind, is Canada first, Canada last and Canada always.

Mr. HERBERT M. MOWAT (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, in interjecting a few remarks at this stage into an interesting and vivacious debate. I take the place of other hon. gentlemen who were to have spoken at this time, and my remarks will have the virtue of brevity.

As the extending of congratulation to the mover (Mr. Cronyn) and the seconder (Mr. McGregor) of the Address has not become trite at this early stage in the debate, it is not out of the way for me to say that we have in the mover of the Address (Mr. Hume Cronyn) an example to most of us in this House. The hon. member for London is a reader of books and a thinker along the lines of that which he reads, and although he has not troubled the House—or, rather favoured the House—with many remarks during past years, he is able, when called upon, to bring the mind of a cultured student to bear upon the subjects dealt with, and to deliver a speech which is an occasion of pleasure to all who hear it and which will go down in the records of the House as one of the best that at all events the younger members have heard.

In the member for Pictou (Mr. McGregor) we have another kind of speaker, namely, the business man who deals in a concise way with the questions that he is so well capable of dealing with and with which he is perfectly familiar. The hon. member for Pictou, when he tackles a business question, is like the description of his celebrated forbear spoken of by Sir Walter Scott, Rob Roy, when he said: "My foot is on my native heath; my name, McGregor."

It gave pleasure on this side of the House to see the unmistakable warmth of the reception accorded to the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King) by his own friends. He contributed a speech which was able from a debating standpoint; perhaps in only one respect did he transgress the amenities of debate. The fact that he was warmly applauded by his supporters is readily accounted for, because this is the first time that he has taken his position in the House as Leader of the Opposition. It is natural that when he took his first flight his supporters should be there heartily to applaud him.

But I must say that in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition there are some things to which I cannot give support. During the last few years we have learned a great deal in this country about the principles of "safety first." These words have been placed before the people on bill boards and in any place where there is a possibility of danger, with the result that the people have become more cautious and accidents have become less frequent. If ever a safe motion was introduced to this House, a motion which was absolutely innocuous to my hon. friend and his supporters, it is the amendment which he has offered to the motion for an Address in reply to the speech from the Throne. Of course, every one who is beaten wants to have a new election. That is a well recognized principle of human nature; the man who loses the race always wants to have it run over again. In a certain game on which I am not at all an authority I have been told that the man who has been losing all the evening is the man who wants still another round of jackpots when everybody else wants to go home. My hon. friend and his supporters know very well that there is no possible chance of such an amendment carrying.

But I want to go further with my hon. friend. I want to point out to him that he is not prepared for an election. If he will go to the province from which he comes and will consult the party leaders there, he will be told straight that he is not prepared for an election. When my hon. friend says that he wants an election, does he mean that he is prepared for an election in the constituency of North York, where he has been invited to become a candidate instead of in his temporary sanctuary in Prince Edward Island? If that is what he means, then I tell him that if he expects to be elected there he never was more mistaken in his life.

My hon. friend has not been here regularly. Where has he been during the war? For he seems not to have learned the great lesson of the war that no campaign, no sortie, can be successfully carried out unless ample preparation is made. The most successful leaders in the war were those who knew their details; those who had for weeks and months made their preparations so thorough that nothing was left undone to ensure success. That is the great lesson of the war. That being so, I ask my hon. friend to inquire into what took place not very long before he came into this House. Has he heard at all of an election in a celebrated constituency in Saskatchewan, known as Assiniboia? If he has, he will know the danger of being unprepared. His friends sent to that constituency two of his present supporters who have attained a respectable position in their party.

But of these two one was the father, if I may so state the position of a motion in regard to absolute free trade, a motion which, from what I can hear, from his previous remarks and from his proclivities in his province, I imagine, was not concurred in by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McKenzie) who has preceded me in this debate, not concurred in by the hon. member from Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea), and not concurred in by some others whom I see sitting opposite to me and who are smiling as I now speak. But he was the person sent to Assiniboia to support the Liberal candidate there against the farmers' candidate. He was so unprepared and these gentlemen who went out as his emissaries were also so unprepared that they were like the "Babes in the Wood;" they were apparently absolutely without any protection and comfort, and the result was the election of a man against the candidate of my hon. friends opposite to the tune of a majority of about four thousand.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Great victory for the Government.

Mr. MOWAT: If that is the sort of an election which my hon. friend is in such a hurry to bring on, the sooner he brings it on the better. I shall not support the amendment because, much as I regret to say it, I do not believe in its sincerity. But I should like to support any motion which would bring on an election now, because at the present time my fortunes are linked up on this side of the House, and if there were an election now I have not the slightest doubt that there would be a repetition of the result of the election of 1917. I see humour and risibility depicted in the faces of my hon. friends from Quebec. I am not at all sure that the result in Quebec would be the same as before.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will the Government have candidates in the three bye-elections which are about to take place?

Mr. MOWAT: The hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) deems it proper at times to throw the charge, if it be a charge, or sneer, if it be a sneer, across the floor of this House at members on this side as being the Tory party. It may please him to do so, but I can assure the House and the country that such is at present not the case. So when my hon. friend (Mr. Lapointe) from Quebec East, who seems to have arisen to a high place, although I do not know what it is, in the councils of his party, asks me questions about what the Government are going to do, I may say that I am not in the confidence of the Government, but no doubt they will answer for themselves.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You will see what will happen.

Mr. MOWAT: My point is that the position of my hon. friend who moved this amendment is such that we on this side cannot believe that he really wants that we should support it and bring on an election two years after the last one.

My hon. friend made some remarks which were not at all generous toward the member of the Government (Mr. Blondin) who comes from the province of Quebec. I am surprised at that, because if there is one thing more than another to which we should now direct our attention, our hearts and our heads, it is to bring about a better understanding and rapprochement between the English and the French-speaking peoples. I have no hesitation in saying that because I have always believed it. But I was amazed, and I think we on this side were all very much surprised, to find the ungenerous allusions to the defeat of the Postmaster General in the last election treated with more applause than any other remarks made by the leader of my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. GAUVREAU: We know him all right.

Mr. MOWAT: I ask what my hon. friends mean by that. Do they mean that because they know that Mr. Blondin was defeated by those majorities, the allusion to which defeat caused so much cheering, of 6,000 in Chambly and Verchères and 1,200 in Laurier Outremont——

An hon. MEMBER: You have the wrong county.

Mr. MOWAT: Did they mean that, knowing that the reason that Mr. Blondin was defeated was because he held the very opinions as to the prosecution of the war that the majority of the people of this country support? That was the reason he was defeated. In holding that view, do they mean, because elections on those opinions are profitable in their province, forever to continue this dissension between the peoples of this country? I can attribute no other reason for their action. They must know and I assure them sincerely that we on this side think it is a great calamity that we have not French-Canadian members in the Government of Canada to-day. The reason is that there are no French-Canadian supporters of the Government elected to the House of Commons, from Quebec, so how can there be French-Canadian members of the Government? But it is not too late and I have no doubt that there are members of this Government who would freely and willingly retire to-day if they could rest assured that members of the French-Canadian race would be elected and would so act in harmony with the present Government that they would take their accustomed places in the Cabinet Council. So I am surprised that applause should be given to such a statement. It is true that political feeling runs high, but my hon. friends opposite must remember that while majorities were large in the province of Quebec in favour of a man holding certain principles, there were large majorities in the other provinces just because other men held different principles. There were Unionist majorities of 20,000, 16,000, 14,000, I think more than that in the city of Winnipeg, overwhelming majorities. General public sentiment demands that racial dissensions between the two peoples shall stop and that large majorities because of the holding of these strong opinions shall cease, and that all the people in this country will get together to do what we know is our duty, which is the dearest hope of most of us, namely, to first uphold the honour of all Canada.

I did not notice in the speeches made by the Leader of the Opposition and his follower who so chivalrously made way for him, an invitation which was given out last year or perhaps the year before, and which had for its figurative expression " a light in the window." That was a genial invitation to return. to Liberals who had formerly been with the party which now calls itself Liberal. He said that there was a light in the window and that the latch string was on the outside of the door. It is perfectly obvious that that invitation has not had any great effect. It has brought only two of that class of members from this side of the House and they had made up their minds fairly definitely before the invitation was given. The trouble with the Liberals who were thus invited was that they were not sure of the treatment they would receive after they went back in response to the light in the window. The house was all right. We helped to build the house, but the point is that you cannot live in a house unless the coal bin is pretty full and there is enough in the larder, and we did not see any particular reasons for having a good social time in the house in which the light was put in the window. The consequence was that there were not many defections from this side, and perhaps it is because the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) has seen the futility of repeating the invitation, or because my hon. friend who is now his leader is not of the same hospitable character as his predecessor that that invitation has not been mentioned again. It is important to refer to some extent to that, because I think that it is a proper time now after two years, that I should make some observations regarding the first of the cleavages which we saw two years ago.

Political cleavages in parties are not unknown in Canada. They have generally occurred owing to a large mass of the people of one party hoping for commercial advantages, or on the other hand, because of some religious question which has stirred the hearts of the people. The Liberal Party and the Liberal Government of 1878 lost thousands and thousands of supporters who thought that their commercial welfare would be better served by more Protection, and the great majority of those supporters never came back to the party. The Conservative party in 1896 lost a very considerable number of its supporters, who objected that the Dominion Government was interfering with the rights of a province in the matter of separate school education. There we have an example, in the first place, of commercial advantage, and in the second place, of religious fervour, which are the two chief causes of cleavages in parties. Then we come to 1917, when for the first time we had a great world war, which was more potent than any other factor in creating cleavages in parties. It is true that some of us had to separate from our old friends, and we have been referred to as " The prodigal son," as the boy who has strayed away, or, setting the theme to music, " Oh, Where is My Wandering Boy To-night?" But it must be remembered that it was not only one boy who left the old home, but most of the boys. Anyway, "the" boys, the best boys, left the party because of its policy in connection with the carrying on of the war. If you will look at the election results you will see that the vast majority of the Liberals who could not follow their old party on this issue were elected without the help of the military vote. If you look at the other side of the House you will find that only two Liberals were elected in Ontario, the greatest and most populous province in Canada, on what might be called old party lines, and the others come from constituencies in which, for racial reasons, feeling was aroused to a very great extent against Great Britain. I am not competent to speak of other provinces, but as a general result the vast majority of the Liberal-Unionists candidates were elected. We on this side of the House cannot object to those who are left calling themselves the Liberal Party if they like, because everybody has the right to call himself whatever he chooses, but it does seem absurd that those who are in the minority should attempt to make out that we have not been treated properly on this side of the House, and that we have been absorbed into a party by another name. As a matter of fact, while we have been over here we have been well received. We have found no attempt at proselytizing. Our opinions have been received with civility, and furthermore, we have found something that has amazed us, and which would have amazed some of my hon. friends opposite had they come over here, and that is that there are more real Liberals on this side of the House than there are on the other. I will go further. I have found men on this side of the House who call themselves Conservative for party reasons, who are more radical than any I have ever found among my old friends the Liberals. I have been astounded to learn of the uprooting that some alleged Tories on this side of the House were willing to do in one way or another, so one is naturally bound to come to the conclusion that these old party names stand for nothing when a great cataclysm comes and a man takes the course he thinks is right. I am quite aware that the so-called Liberals, if they will not mind my using that term,—anyway, the Liberals,—have been saying disagreeable things, as they have a right to do, about defections and turn-overs, but I can assure them that there is nothing on this side of the House that has given offence to those Liberals who went out for the principles of which I have spoken. Not only have we been well received, but we have heard nothing of the extreme views which my hon. friend from Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) attributes to our colleagues on this side of the House. They have not tried to rub in, so to speak, their own particular opinions. I have heard that there are some strong party men on this side, just as there are strong party men on the other side of the House, who would prefer to be alone, but, of course, they have been civil enough not to let us find that out, except that we have heard some reference here to-day to certain efforts of a former Cabinet minister hailing from Winnipeg. So far as our colleagues on this side of the House are concerned, we have had very pleasant relations with those with whom we formerly disagreed.

The war changed things in many ways, and with the exception of those who had the most tense political feelings and political inclinations, the war made men think as they wanted to think without regard to political party trammels.

It is proper for me now, I think, after two years, and as the subject has never been discussed in Parliament before, to give a short history of the rise of the cleavage in the Liberal party, and I can do it best, and it seems to me it would be the most convincing to those who are listening to me, by giving my own personal experience. In September, 1917, returning from my usual summer vacation, when one does not read many newspapers, I was surprised to find that there were some people in the country who were opposed to Canada taking further part in the great war. I discussed this matter with three men of political prominence, candidates under the leadership of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and I expressed my views, because I held them definitely and strongly. I said "We cannot let Canada down now that we have sent her in; we cannot let our boys at the Front get discouraged and weaken; we have to send more men." The first man replied, "Of course we should, but what has that to do with politics?" Then he told me he had been going around among the people and had found that conscription was unpopular, and that Conservatives who did not want their sons to go to the Front were going to vote for the Liberal party if the Conservative party stood for conscription. The next man, who was also a candidate, agreed that many Conservatives who did not want their sons to go to the Front would vote for the Liberal party to avoid conscription, and he gave instances to show that conscription was not going to win. These men were of that type. I shall not mention their names, but I am not abusing any confidence because anything which they said to me they will say at any time. They thought that while it was proper for Canada to continue her effort in the war, as was done afterwards by the Union Government, the more important thing was that the Liberals should get into power. That disposes of two from whom I got opinions. The third to whom I spoke—a candidate afterwards—rather shocked me when he said: "Well, I think we have done enough; let Uncle Sam do the rest." Well, I do not care to express contempt for any man, but if ever I felt like doing so in my life it was on the occasion of this assertion. If these be candidates of the Liberal party, I felt, how is it possible for us, who think differently from them, to march in double harness with them again unless they change their minds? We could not endorse any policy of non-support of our men who were in the war and so there was an election. Now, mark this: The Liberals who left their party were as convinced as those who remained in it that conscription was an unpopular issue. They thought that they would be defeated, but apprehension of defeat did not alter their intention and determination that the war should be fought to a successful issue. So it came about, in an imposing outburst of public enthusiasm, that the Union Government, which was pledged to continue the war, was sustained except in one province. None were more surprised than the Liberals who had run as candidates in support of the Union Government, and I must say that the result was gratifying to them. When a prominent member on the other side made a remark in Ottawa last winter that the Liberals who left their party had done so for their personal aggrandisement I assured him he was wrong. We were elected through the patriotism of the people, in Ontario at any rate; but at the time we ran there was no idea of personal gain at all. We had played the political game before, but on that occasion we claim that we played the game of what was right for Canada without regard to the political party to which we belonged. I therefore give no credit to men like the three of whom I have spoken; they were wrong in their heads as well as in their hearts. They made a bad guess politically. They thought they were going to win and they lost, and I give them no credit for possessing any right principle or anything else to boast of. It was a pure political game with them. As I say, they were of opinion that they would win, but they lost; and it now ill becomes them to throw slurs at those who thought or acted differently from them.

I shall now conclude by saying that while this is not a political party on this side of the House—most of us have voted against the Government repeatedly, although the Government has not been sensitive on that point, knowing that our hearts and our allegiance were generally in the right place—while we are not a party, I do not see why we should not become one. Men of like opinions, men with the same ideals in regard to the future of Canada, men who do not wish to see racial dissension or cleavage in the country, if they can meet on this side for two years and have no serious disagreement as to what is needed for good government, regardless of former party shibboleths, may very well compose a party. While therefore we are not yet a party, if there is any proposal that we should become a party and the leaders can devise a policy consistent with the ideals I have seen on this side, I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberal-Unionists are going to join that party. We are assured there will be nothing new which will be inconsistent with anything we were ever told in political meetings on the Liberal side. I ask my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) now seriously—nay, humourously—did he ever hear political principles of a liberal kind discussed in a Liberal political meeting? No, he did not. Well, neither did I. We always played the party game. We were party men; and what a lot of rot it is to talk about Liberal principles or Conservative principles all the time! We were party men. But sometimes in a crisis we cannot be party men, and if we can find something better to substitute for what exists there is no reason why we should not take it. And we will take it. I, in common with the Liberals on this side, have had pleasure in supporting this Government, and supporting it enthusiastically, even though it be unpopular. During war I do not want to support a Government merely because it is popular. I want to support a Government that does the right thing even if it is going to be unpopular. And what a number of unpopular things this Government has had to do! One thing after another, which would almost strain to breaking point the ordinary man, these men in the Government benches, heedless of party politics, caring not whether their actions might incur the disapproval of their supporters or constituencies, or what effect those actions might have in the event of an election, have day in and day out framed policies and passed measures—Orders in Council, if you will—that were bound to be unpopular, but which were in their belief for the ultimate good of the country. The only thing that saved Canada during the war was the fact that there was a Government that was not afraid to do things that would be unpopular. And I mistake very much the temper and the generous spirit of my fellow-countrymen if they will not ultimately support a body of men such as compose the present Government. It is true that at the present juncture criticism is freely indulged in. Attacks are made in every quarter; everyone is abusing everyone else—the Bolshevists condemn the Government. The returned soldiers abuse the pacifists. But when this state of feeling subsides, I have enough faith in my fellow-countrymen and enough confidence in their gratitude to know that they will support the party that did the right thing whether it was popular or not. I admit there is some talk of the unpopularity of the Government at the present moment, but that does not bother me a bit, because we know that it is merely a passing cloud. While it is fostered by my friends on the other side—sometimes, I regret to say, not altogether fairly—I know it is but transient. And when the next election comes, whether at the time demanded in my friend's motion, or a little later—probably a little later—the present Government, comprising men who formerly held different political views, is going to be swept ultimately into power again. The history of Canada shows that the people have favoured keeping governments a long time in power during the last forty years, and history will repeat itself at the next election. Then, my hon. friends, I think, will be somewhat ashamed of themselves when they go down to defeat—except in one province—because they did not try to unite with us to put an end to dissension, to throttle the racial feeling the moment it appeared, and to lend their support to a government working for the advantage of the whole country and of the whole Empire, and for the well-being of mankind at large.

Mr. LOUIS JOSEPH GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to speak in my own language on this occasion but before entering upon any remarks I wish to answer very briefly the speaker who has just preceded me (Mr. Mowat). The hon. gentleman says that we are not ready for an election and he concluded his remarks by stating that whenever there should be an appeal to the people the Government he is supporting would come back triumphantly to power. If it is true that we are not ready for an election, and if the Government is sure to come back triumphantly to power, why do they refuse the amendment of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition
5 p.m. (Mr. King)? We do not ask a dissolution because we hope to come back to power; we ask a dissolution in order that the people shall have an opportunity to say whether or not they have any confidence in this Government. We do not care to come back to power but we want to fulfil our duty. That is the difference between us and the hon. gentleman. He says also that now is the time to try and get nearer to the province of Quebec. Speaking in my own name, and for my province, I will quote the words of one of our public men who says that the province of Quebec is not in a state of mind to enter into any conference; it has been misjudged; it has been badly treated; it has been slandered; it is waiting for its hour and after that it will confer but not before.

The hon. gentleman says that whenever the Government shall be ready to propound a policy, that policy will appeal to the people of Canada. Yesterday the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government (Sir George Foster) told us that they had a policy but the hon. member for Parkdale who supports this Government is not aware that there is a policy. He tells us that there is going to be a policy propounded and in advance he tells the country that he is going to support it. I believe he is a bad supporter of the present Administration as he was a bad supporter of the Liberal party. If he desires to come back to the Liberal fold we will receive him because the door is open, but if he should be only as good a supporter of the Liberal party as he is of this Government we will not rely very much upon him. I will now proceed with my remarks in my own language.

Mr. L. J. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville) (translation): Mr. Speaker, the mover of the address in answer to the speech from the Throne told us that the war had destroyed the old order of things political in this country and that Canada was entering into a new era. That is exactly what we believe, that is precisely what we maintain and that is also what the leader of the Liberal party, the leader of the Opposition, has submitted to this House and to the country in moving for the dissolution of Parliament.

He laid emphasis on the fact that the hybrid alliance which gave birth to the government we have been enjoying since 1917 had brought about the overturn of the old political order of things.

What is the present situation and how did it originate? For the winning of the war, the constitution of the country had to be battered in; to win the war, individual rights had to be done away with; to win the war, the constitution had to be suspended; individual sacrifices had to be appealed to, in order to achieve victory and bring to a triumphant conclusion the cause supported by the Allies. These hon. gentlemen that sit on the Treasury benches maintained that, in order to have a free hand and plenty elbow room, all the existing laws had of necessity to be suspended and the Parliament of this country had to give up its prerogatives, so as to hand over to ministers sitting in the Unionist cabinet the full control of public affairs.

Aware as we are that, in order to build up that Unionist party and that Union government, all men of good will had to be appealed to; when we call to mind that sincere Liberals, for the time being, severed connection with and cut loose from their party to join hand in hand with men they had hitherto opposed, it is most regrettable to find that the acting Prime Minister of this country has deemed it fit to slap them in the face, as he did yesterday. How so, Sir? The Acting Prime Minister told us that in 1917, not only was the Unionist party elected on the platform of prosecution of the war, but that the new allies had agreed on a political programme, and that the election of 1917 was won not only to carry the war to a victorious conclusion, but on a well-defined political programme. Is there a single individual, out of this House, who is going to believe—for in this House under our rules, one is bound to accept the statements made by an hon. member from his seat, and so far as I am concerned, I am bound, so long as I sit here, to believe that the Acting Prime Minister did really make a statement borne out by the facts—but let me ask the hon. members who sit within these precincts whether there is a single individual, outside this House, when not bound by the rules of the House, who would believe that my hon. friend, the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. W. S. Fielding), a former Prime Minister of his province, one of the outstanding figures of the Liberal party, a minister of Finance for fifteen years, who has waged war on the protection tariff so dear to the hearts of these gentlemen, who is the man, I say, who is going to believe that the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's did really come to an understanding with the Acting Prime Minister on a well defined political programme previous to the election? Had such an understanding been reached, how happens it that my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's severed his connection with and cut loose from the Unionist party, and returned to the party fold, sitting now in the ranks of the Liberal Opposition?

In the reference to the words fallen from the lips of the Acting Prime Minister, and directed to those colleagues of his who supported him in times of stress, it strikes me that it was paying them a very poor compliment to say that they proved false to and have gone back on the pledges given prior to the election of 1917. By no means, Sir. Who is going to believe that the hon. member from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) did really forswear his allegiance to free trade, in order to adhere and subscribe to a pre-arranged political platform of the hon. gentlemen? Who is going to be fooled into believing that the former Minister of Agriculture who is now sitting alongside the representatives of the United Farmers, and old Liberals, old oppositionists to the present Government, had joined the Union government with a well defined political programme?

Oh no! these gentlemen may well try to throw dust in the eyes of the people, they may well try to belittle the grandeur of those who, in a moment of distress, believed in the sincerity of the scattered remnants of the Tory party, believed at a time that really their help was necessary to enroll the live forces of the nation, to enlist our youth and send 500,000 of our sons to the battlefields of Europe, while draining the wealth of the country; of such men as the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, as the hon. member for Red Deer, as my hon. friend the member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) who, in a manner to which I will later call attention, has just left the government which he had joined. These men had believed that their help was necessary, and because they believed that their help was necessary I bow to them for the course they took; I recognize that they obeyed the dictates of their conscience. But, after having accomplished the work for which they had abandoned their party, when they think proper to come back to that party, it seems to me that they deserve other treatment at the hands of those whom they have helped to retain power, that they deserve other treatment than to be told that when they entered the Government there was a perfectly definite political programme which they deserted before its realization.

I am bound to believe that there was a programme, but I doubt very much whether the public will give much credence to this statement of the Acting Prime Minister.

It is said that there exists a general uneasiness in the country. To this the Acting Prime Minister answers, well, the cost of living has risen in all countries, we suffer as they suffer elsewhere. This is no answer. Mr. Speaker, allow me to point out a clear proof of the uneasiness which obtains in the country. You see at the end of the benches, on your left, men who sit in this House aloof from the parties. Why have they been elected to this House? What is the reason of their aloofness? The reason is that there exists at this moment in the country an intense uneasiness caused by the faulty legislation, by the scandalous administration, of the present Government. The people are looking about in search of a remedy. These United Farmers of Ontario, who have awakened the political hopes of the farmers of Canada, on what have they built their hopes? These political hopes are born of contempt for broken promises; they are born of the fact that a Minister of Militia, in the first days of December 1917, with a view to capturing the votes of the farmers' sons and of the farmers of Ontario, went over that province exhibiting an Order in Council, and declaring that he, the Minister of Militia, had obtained it so that the sons of farmers would never go to the war. The election took place. The Unionist party was returned. And the result was that immediately after the proclamation of the vote, the farmers' sons were called to arms notwithstanding the Order in Council, which had been repealed in spite of the promise of this Minister.

And you wonder now that among the people, when men holding public offices are capable, in order to gain a momentary success, of making game of the public confidence, of treading under foot their promises and their oaths, you are astonished that there is uneasiness?

Well, the uneasiness is taking shape. To-day it is to be seen in the claims of the farmers grouping themselves into a unit, and deciding that henceforth neither the party in power nor the party in opposition are capable of satisfying their hopes and their ambitions. And as is the case for all class movements, the responsibility for this movement rests upon the Government, by reason of their policy, their legislation and their administration.

The greatest crime with which I reproach those who sit on the ministerial benches, is of having started in this country this movement, which is setting classes against each other and stirring up throughout the country a turmoil of which no one may foretell the consequences.

The uneasiness is wide spread, you say; yes, it is, and it is becoming more and more so. And, Sir, what comforts me now is to see that in the maelstrom which draws in province after province, in this orgy of folly, of destruction which rouses province against province, which rouses race against race, regions, classes, against each other, alone the province of which I am one of the representatives, remains at its work, continues to love the soil, continues to cherish its institutions and, notwithstanding the abuse which has been heaped upon it, gives its calumniators, its persecutors the example of true patriotism, by remaining attached to the soil, intent upon work, and developing energy, in order to bring about the production which is so much needed. That is the answer to the slanders and insults cast upon the province of Quebec.

The right hon. Acting Prime Minister used an unfortunate expression, when, speaking of the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition, he called it "'camouflage". If the action of the leader of the Liberal party may be termed camouflage, there is a stand of the Government which I look upon as deserving much more to be so characterized.

I know that within these precincts it is rather difficult to speak openly, but I shall not disguise my thoughts, whatever the outcome. If there be any camouflaging, it is in representing the Prime Minister of this country as being so broken in health as to prevent his taking his seat in this House for the last three sessions, and in saying that he requires two different kinds of attendants, for the Prime Minister, since his stay in Europe, has developed an immoderate liking for international and foreign affairs. Therefore he has an attendant for external affairs and until recently had two more for the home policies.

As regards external affairs, I am bound, as I said a moment ago, to take the hon. Acting Prime Minister's word and to acknowledge that the Prime Minister is sick, and that is the sole reason for his not being present. But can you possibly imagine that the people will believe that the Prime Minister is so ill that he cannot attend to the business of Parliament when they hear that he has gone away on an imperial mission with Lord Jellicoe to establish naval forces in all the colonies of the Empire? If he is too ill to come to this Parliament how is it that they throw upon him the burden of discussing the naval policy.

We cannot believe that Lord Jellicoe took Sir Robert Borden away with him simply on account of his own personality. Nobody would believe that, because Lord Jellicoe has other business to do than that of looking after a sick man. He simply took Sir Robert Borden with him because he is Prime Minister of Canada. Here is a man who, according to the description given by the Acting Prime Minister, is unable to follow the sittings of this House and who, however, is being overburdened with the consideration of the whole naval policy. But that is not all. Our Prime Minister comes back to the American continent, he calls at Halifax and immediately upon his arrival at New York, he is met by his two attendants for home affairs who discuss with him during two days the policy which is to be adopted by the Government of this Dominion.

I always thought that public life involved for those who entered it, the sacrifice of every hope of home life, of their profession or business in favour of the common weal. But I never fancied that when a public man became ill, everybody should strive to hasten his death. Such a thought never occurred to me. However it seems to be the case; if we are to believe the statements made by the right hon. gentleman from the opposite side of the House. Here is a sick and feeble man who, according to press reports and conversations among his friends, is gone to South Africa when he has not actually reached New York, who has arrived in Florida when he is still aboard Lord Jellicoe's ship, who is supposed to be in New York and is found the next day in London, who when reported to be still in London is in Halifax and in New York when they look for him in Halifax. Nobody can see him. It is jugglery, witchcraft, camouflage.

I was never a supporter of the Prime Minister, but had I been one of his friends, I think I should have treated him better than his so-called friends do to-day. I should have shown some compassion, even for the sake of decency if he were not sick. But personally I believe he is ill, because the hon. Acting Prime Minister gave us his word and we have to take it.

Now there is one observation the people will not fail to make. The leader of the Opposition, as in duty bound, moved an amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the Throne, asking for the immediate dissolution of this Parliament, on the ground that it does not, and neither does the present Government, represent the people.

The right honourable Acting Prime Minister calls that strategy, though suspecting it is rather camouflage. Then the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) is sure that the Liberal Opposition is not ready for the fray and that if we had an election in the near future the present Government would be returned by an immense majority. I take for granted the statement made by the acting Prime minister that the Government cannot agree with the strategic move of the Opposition. The Government and their supporters will go to the people with the same platform upon which they were elected in 1917 and the member for Parkdale says that if we had an election to-morrow the Opposition would be crushed.

Well we fully realize the bearing of hon. gentleman's argument. We are perfectly well aware that the Liberal party, in order to live up to its war time obligations, suffered the Government to encroach upon the prerogative of Parliament, upon the rights of the representatives of the people, upon the franchises of the people; and we realize that public opinion instead of giving us credit for such sacrifices and generosity, and because it has been poisoned by a salaried press, is under the impression that the Opposition is not any better than the Government. In spite of this and of the agitation of the united farmers and of the efforts of the Government to hold on to power, notwithstanding what may happen, we are ready to take a risk. And why? Because above the Unionist, Farmers' or Liberal parties there lies the public interest. We much prefer that a new parliament should be the outcome of the election, a house truly representative of the people and conducting the affairs of the country according to the wishes of the people and in the interest of the people, rather than our being returned to power and taking Sir Robert Borden's heritage, which is far from being enviable.

The Opposition may well take a pride in their action. Still that which denotes broadness of mind and magnanimity is greeted by our opponents with unkindness and contempt. Whatever the Union party may say or do, we shall have to go back to the form of responsible government, to the government by the people. Personally I think there is nothing more pitiful in what is going on under our eyes in Canada at the present time than the fact of the acting Prime Minister being forced to defend an indefensible case and being absolutely unable to make his views prevail. It is not customary with me to praise my opponents, but as far as the right hon. Acting Prime Minister is concerned, I think he fully understands the bearing of our leader's declarations. He realized his position was a difficult one and accordingly marshalled all the resources of his imagination, all his expertness in dialectics and parliamentary training. May I be allowed to state that he sorely disappointed us? It is not surprising. Such an accomplishment exceeded even his means and resourcefulness. The stand taken by the Opposition is unassailable, but that which the Government forces the Acting Prime Minister to defend is anti-constitutional and inimical to the principles of responsible government. No one in this House knows it better than the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government in the absence of one who ought to be here to-day.

May we not entertain the hope that in the councils of a party which boasts of having attracted the best brains in the country, there will be among its leaders some one who, in order to preserve our system of responsible government, will impress upon the minds of those who do not understand, the danger of so jeopardizing the existence of our representative institutions.

At first the people may take no particular interest in the matter, but to-morrow they will grumble; then unrest sets in and in the course of events which are shaping themselves you will reap what you are sowing to-day.

Whatever the Government may say or do, nobody believes that they represent the people or that they were elected through a franchise which represented public opinion. Nobody believes it. They may say: We have a sound and well balanced Government. But they are alone to say so and I think they do not even believe what they say. How could the taxpayers and those who have made sacrifices, who have contributed money and the blood of their children towards ensuring victory to the Allies, how could these people, I ask, believe it?

But the people of this country are going to call these men to a strict account for their administration of public affairs.

Besides, Sir, one need not be a great scholar to know that no administration that has come into office in war time succeeds in remaining in power after peace has come in. Why, Sir? A state of war means the destroying of all that has been painfully built up in the piping times of peace; a state of war spells the suspension of fundamental laws; a state of war involves for the citizens of a country the obligation of giving up their interests, of renouncing their egotism, of sacrificing everything to the public weal. Do you believe that such sacrifices may be imposed on a whole people without a reaction being bound to arise at a given moment? Moreover, every body knows than when war is let loose, public expenditure cannot be controlled as it should be. There are uncontrollable expenditures, which go on increasing by leaps and bounds; appetites get sharpened, passions spring into flame, love of money increases and to satisfy the rank and file of the party, to gratify friends, inroads are made deeper and deeper into the public treasury, and meanwhile, public anger keeps roaring and gathering. And prior to its being let loose, torrent-like, over the country, jeopardizing those institutions for which our ancestors so long struggled, for which, I say, men of the generation of the acting Prime Minister have so often done battle and for which institutions those who will come after us are willing to live, struggle and contend, so as to improve and enlarge them, were it not high time we told the Government: In the public interest, gentlemen, do not hesitate to sink your personal ambitions, to make up your mind to renounce the sweets of office, go to the country, appeal to the people, and should the people, through means I do not wish to qualify here, wish to give you another lease of power, you shall at least have public confidence behind you, you shall at least have the support of public opinion. Beware you do not tarry and wait till class feeling has reached such a pitch that you can no longer stem the tide. The farming community, in this country, should it syndicate, would prove to be the power par excellence, and you should have class legislation, an administration prejudicial to public development. And this, because of your refusing, at a given moment, to take up a position which your duty to the public demanded, and because of your lack of confidence in the people, who put their trust in those who have served them well.

And that is why I cannot understand the position taken by the Government in refusing to accept the amendment moved by my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition.

The hon. member for London (Mr. H. Cronyn)—and this will be my concluding remark—said in his speech in moving the Address in answer to the speech from the Throne that the state of war had brought about the overturn of the old order of things political. I am going to lay down here a principle, at the risk of shocking those who hear me. I make no bones about saying that I am a party man; I am not ashamed of stating that I am a believer in political parties and I shall tell you why I believe in political parties. Without any political parties in which men of all classes and conditions may meet and give personal bickerings their quietus, so as to work harmoniously and hand in hand in the common interest, you shall have a Government made up of factions, you shall have an administration carried out by coteries or groups. Of the two governments, that which has been most subservient to the interests of humanity, is party government. Because the government of countries carried out by political parties has proved the greatest agency for good in the world, I am still in favour of that government. I am still a party politician and I believe—any contrary opinion notwithstanding—that there is magnanimity in the fact of a man who, holding strong views, tries to have them prevail, but yielding to his colleagues whose opinion runs counter to his own, is broad-minded enough to pocket his personal grievances, so that the opinions of the majority of his party friends may prevail. It strikes me that there is magnanimity in such an attitude. Do not call it servilism, do not call it slavery. Every one is entitled to hold his own opinion, until the majority has spoken, and in such a case it is the opinion of a whole party which is voiced by the majority, and everybody must subscribe to it.

I wish to make an appeal to my right hon. friend, the acting Prime Minister, because, I believe, he is a party man, and because I invoke the statements of the supporters of this Government, that for the winning of the war, all political parties had to sink their differences, in order to form a coalition government, and now that the war is over, I appeal to him,—not as a political opponent,—but I am entitled to make that appeal because he is the oldest representative of the people in this House, the most experienced man, and he is considered as the strongest man in his party: let him do his best so that we may go back to the administration of public affairs in this country on the lines of well defined political parties, leaving to each group the care of urging its claims, but without giving rise to the creation of clans or classes which would bring about class and faction legislation, which would result in the overthrow of every thing we hold dear, for which we have fought so long, and which we have inherited from our ancestors.

Before taking my seat, let me thank this House for having so long listened to my remarks, which may have proved devoid of interest to the majority of my colleagues; but I thought that under the circumstances, I was entitled to the use of my mother tongue, as the assertion of a right, and in speaking in my own name as well as on behalf of those I represent here, I wanted the claims, demands and grievances of my constituents to be heard on the floor of this House in their own mother tongue.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (West Peterborough): I should like to join Mr. Speaker, in the praise extended to the mover and seconder of the Address, for I am sure their speeches are worthy of every enconium that has been bestowed on them.

This noble building one might expect to inspire noble thoughts, but I have been somewhat disturbed by the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Gauthier). He began by repudiating the conciliatory remarks of the member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat), and ended, as I understood him, by saying—and he asserted that he spoke for himself and his Province—that Quebec would not confer until her hour had come, and then she would be prepared to confer. If that is what the hon. gentleman said and if that is what he meant, I would ask him if he intended that as a threat.

Mr. GAUTHIER: It is not a threat; it is a declaration.

Mr. BURNHAM: The difference between a threat and a declaration, especially a declaration of that kind, is that the man who makes the declaration is afraid to back it up.

Mr. GAUTHIER: The hon. gentleman has no right to insinuate that I am a coward.

Mr. SPEAKER: It would not be in order for any hon. member to impute cowardice to another. It is a question of construction as to whether that is what the hon. member (Mr. Burnham) meant in the present instance, and I can hardly go so far as to place that interpretation upon his words.

Mr. BURNHAM: Mr. Speaker, I of course bow to your ruling instantly. I might explain that I was not attributing physical cowardice to the hon. gentleman; I was attributing to him moral cowardice, something that he himself—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has now clearly brought himself within the rule of the order, and his latter remark ought to be withdrawn.

Mr. BURNHAM: I certainly withdraw the remark, Mr. Speaker. Proceeding then upon a declaration which is not a threat, but which is a full, plain and explicit declaration by a man who is speaking for himself and his Province, as he said, I must say that I am unable to distinguish between his remarks and something of a very warlike and threatening character. I do not understand such talk as that. I am an admirer of the French. I like the French—the French of Canada as well as the French of old France. But in these days when we in Ontario have had to stand the Nationalists, when we have had to endure from Quebec every insult under Heaven, why should we be subjected to a statement of the most mysterious character, a statement that they would only confer when their hour had come. That means when their hour has struck. Well, if it means that, I can only say, with most infinite regret, that I do not care a brass farthing whether they threaten or whether they do not, for I am confident that we will be able to hold our own with equanimity.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I may say that we will never confer with the hon. gentleman, for if we did he would not understand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BURNHAM: However, this sort of feeling that has been aroused, to my infinite astonishment and very great regret indeed, seems to be in the air. The passion displayed by the gentleman of that portion of the Opposition is no doubt largely aroused through the feeling that they have lost the major portion of themselves. The farmers of this country beyond all doubt, according to my way of thinking, owe to the Liberal party, who held the fort for many a long day, at least a tribute of respect, if not of consideration. But now the farmers have repudiated the Liberal party, and surely if the farmers repudiate their associates, the least we on this side can do is to agree with them. They know the Liberals better than we do, and they have cast them aside like a brand into the burning. I regret this parting from old associates, from those who remain of a great historic party, now about to disappear because it is to be swallowed up in that far greater movement known as the Agrarian or Farmers' Movement.

This is one of those incidents arising from furious feeling which has been developed by the war. We have other exemplifications of force; we have the women of this country (whose forte is practical but not philosophical idealism), advocating force. Strange to say in this general convulsion after the war, when peace should have supervened, we have the doctrine of force being preached from one end of the country to the other, by ministers in the pulpit and by women out of it. The religion and the morals of the people, as well as their peace and content, depend upon individual liberty, and if we are to understand, as the Rev. Doctor Bland said recently in his pulpit—a prominent pulpit in Toronto—that individual liberty has disappeared, and that we must henceforth have only community liberty, then we must bow to force. Well, we will bow to force only when we have to. And we will not submit to the force of the majority, because I have known a minority that, when it came to force, could overcome a majority; and if our women and the pulpiteers have so far forgotten their respect to God, and preserve their desire to spread infidelity throughout this country, as they are most certainly doing, let them remember that the remnant who hold dear all the old basic elements of the moral law, the basis of religion, will adhere to these elements when these people proclaim, as they are proclaiming, that the death of Christ himself was unnecessary if the Almighty had had brains enought to prohibit the source of evil. It is one of the most extraordinary and deplorable conditions imaginable. I am well aware that those who say that do not mean it, but they do not know. Those people who pooh-pooh philosophy; who sneer at the fundamental reasons of things and set up something that they adore and that they are determined to back up by force, have intensified the spleen and excitement which we now see throughout the country and which will result in the country's downfall if something is not done to prevent it. I am not now referring to any particular brand of prohibition. It is not necessary to stop at alcohol; that form of prohibition is a very minor affair. We need only follow that idea up to rveive at once the conditions of the inquisition. It it is wrong to misuse alcohol, it is wrong to misuse religion—and we have all the horror of the days when women were executed as witches and when people were burned at the stake the persecutors maintaining the while a remarkable self complacency. The descendants of these very people are to-day delighted to see a repetition of what has happened before. One cannot look back on those days without wondering how these things could have been done; but when people are wedded to force they can do anything. I can only say that I do not come of a race that submits to force. If force has to be exercised, then let us "cry havoc and let loose the dogs of war." We can all join in that, and possibly out of this extraordinary condition of things there may come that spirit of re-union which the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) a few moments ago seemed to repudiate. We cannot and we will not put up with this dogmatism which has been engendered by a false system of ethics, this force which has been substituted for the old religion and which sooner or later will destroy the very foundations of society.

One of the disturbing elements of the present day is, beyond all doubt, the condition of the mind of the soldier. He is not satisfied. Why? Because broadly before him is placed this simple fact: That the people who stayed at home have profited and that the people who went to war have lost. They simply say to themselves: Upon us has fallen not only the burden of the war at the front, but the burden of the war at home; we are ignored; we must struggle. The consequence is that there has been engendered and aroused a feeling which is regrettable in the extreme because it is caused by ingratitude—above all things the basest and the meanest flaw in the human character.

I confess that the people who have been engaged in looking after the returned soldier have thought that they were doing well. To some extent they have been doing well. But he gives twice who gives quickly, and they did not give quickly, nor did they follow up what they intended to do with that instantaneous and practical carrying out of the intention which would have taken away so much from the sting of the loss which these men had suffered. Delay followed delay. Impracticable things were suggested. It was suggested that returned soldiers should go upon the farm who did not know a farm when they saw it. Men were offered inducements to go upon the farm but no inducements to go into business. Afterwards the loan principle was extended in some degree to business but there has been throughout a lack of promptitude on the part of our people—on the part of all of us—with regard to the soldier. And the soldier feels it. He does not want to be paid for what he did. He cannot be paid; no country could pay him. But after four or five years of war he finds that he is in an extremely bad condition in many cases—a poor, unfortunate condition— and he thinks that if he had some decent help in time of need; if the people of this country had been a "very present help in time of trouble," this post-war period would have been tided over, with possibly few exceptions. But the condition has been so widespread and so general that it has occasioned at last a suspicion in the minds of the people themselves that all is not right. In England they have said that war fortunes must not only be regretted; they must be given up. How frequently do we say that people in this country made a good thing out of the war; but we let them keep it. Let them in all honesty and ourselves in all honour remember that while they are entitled to a fair reward and fair remuneration, they are most decidedly not entitled to keep the fortunes they made during the absence in the field of strife of our glorious soldiers. There can be and will be no satisfaction so long as these evidences of luxury are paraded before the men who made the sacrifice which made possible the enjoyment of these luxuries. Therefore when we analyze the various causes of discontent we must remember that we have not by any means done all that we could do to allay it.

The high cost of living is founded upon the most awful inflation that ever took place in the history of the world. It is true that the nations' holdings of gold have been enormously increased, but the paper currency in circulation, based upon that gold, has been still more enormously and disproportionately increased. The increase has extended from three times what it was before the war in some cases to ten times what it was before the war in others. There is an immensity of paper money. In some quarters it is worth nothing; in other quarters it is worth little, and we have high prices, based, of course, upon this inflated currency—the Governments of the world, not excluding our own Government, meanwhile standing by and taking no steps or adopting no measures to shrink that inflation and enable prices to get back to where they were. The most extraordinary feature of it all is that we have in exchange a loss to this country which is almost beyond belief and is almost more than we can bear. There are people, the farmers included, who view this condition with equanimity. They may be a little disturbed, but they say: We will not buy in Canada if we can buy more cheaply out of it. Well, if they are determined to follow that system and they are bled year by year many millions of dollars in discount or by way of foreign premium, then, just as a case of Bright's disease will sooner or later destroy and exhaust a human being, so will the payment of that money surely destroy Canada. The nations of this world are not one. We have all our households, national and domestic to look after. Our farmers are the most cultured and, generally speaking, the happiest and most prosperous class in the whole community. For them to consider that they have a right to envy the rest of us because of our superior luxuries or attainments is a serious and sad mistake. I know of nowhere that the farming community enjoys such a high, broad and luxurious life as in Canada. Therefore, it is with the utmost regret that I see that they have formed themselves on a basis of force into a class or group, and to prove that they have formed themselves into an exclusive group, they say that nobody but a farmer can join them. You have nothing left; you cannot follow in behind them because you approve or disapprove their principles, because they repudiate you. And why do they repudiate you? Because their whole new policy is founded on selfishness or self interest. How can they say that they intend to do what is best for Canada when they refuse to let good Canadians join them unless they are actual farmers? They hope, by the power of their number to come to Ottawa to rule the country, and I am stirred to make these remarks by hearing the Premier of Ontario say that he did not care so much for his job as Premier of Ontario, only for one thing, namely, that he regarded it as an outpost in his keeping, and he bade the farmers of Ontario keep their eyes and their minds upon Ottawa. There, he pointed, was the field of their operations, and the province of Ontario will be kept as an outpost while a class or group, defying all the traditions of good Canadianism and all the desire that we have that we should blend our interests, will reject all these and say: We will keep the province as an outpost and make our assault upon our fellow citizens at Ottawa. As for the others—their day will come; labour, the professions, their day will come; the manufacturer, their day will come, their hour will come, in the language of my French friend. But now, just like a great storm blowing across the country, the farmers have announced that they are determined to sweep all before them. Well, that is a magnificent way to proclaim the unity and solidarity of Canadianism. I sympathise with the Liberals that I see before me who are going down in this great storm. I do not suppose that two years hence Liberalism will be more than a name; and if the Conservative party, or that which shall succeed the Conservative party, does not defend the true national policy, which means Canada for the Canadians, a well developed and well balanced country, the Conservative party, or the party which succeeds it, will go down too.

Like the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat), I am wedded to no party, but I am wedded to a Canadian policy. I am wedded to the national policy, not to every feature of it, because there have been mistakes; there have been injustices; but to the principle. Work at home, work together; buy at home; let your country be well balanced; then when time of trouble comes, you will be developed and able to take your part as in the late war, and when difficulties of a financial character arise, they will all be at home and you will not be paying out your gold to redeem yourselves and paying a huge discount to other nations. These things are too serious to trifle with, and I hope, in these crucial days, nobody is approaching these subjects except with the most acute concern.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (resuming): When the House rose for dinner I was calling attention to the question of exchange and inflation, and I shall not detain the House further than to make a general summing up. I will begin by congratulating the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria, the former leader of the Opposition, (Mr. McKenzie) on the courage and fortitude which he displayed in pronouncing unequivocally for Protection, in favour of Canada for the Canadians. It required some courage to do that in view of his surroundings, but I am pleased to see that he thinks more of Canada than of any party; the same spirit should inspire us all.

I just wish to say further with regard to the farmer that if any body asks why it is the farmer has become so aroused he will find the answer in the fact that the farmer dreads high wages, daylight saving, and things of that kind. Especially does he dread shorter hours, and he cannot be blamed for that in view of his industrious life and its requirements. The question of shorter hours is no reproach to labour, because when we consider how it arose the answer at once presents itself. In the United States, for example, the operators of the coal mines, in order to have as little coal on hand as possible when the demand came for it, shortened the hours of production, so that if the worker in the coal mine was to have any pay at all he must necessarily shorten the hours of his working day so that he could get in more working days, because it frequently happened day after day and week after week that he would have not only many hours but whole days idle. Now when he sees that the operators have made tremendous profits, running all the way from 400 to 2,000 per cent, what can he do but strike? for neither this Government nor any other that I know of has provided him with any means of expressing his feelings in the matter except by striking? People when they read the newspapers hold up their hands in horror at the usurious perc ntage exacted by such operators as I have referred to, but they make no effort to stop it. The reason I refer to the United States is that the Americans have at last taken up this question in their usual strong and vigorous way. We in Canada, although I have nothing but the greatest respect for our Minister of Labour (Hon. Mr. Robertson) who is I think a man of great energy and great ability and certainly of great sincerity, seem to be utterly confounded by these things. We have no solution; we offer no suggestions, and the cruel work goes on. Labour has therefore taken the matter into its own hands, and if we do not get an eight-hour day it will be because we will get a six-hour day, and the farmer will then be worse off than ever. If the manufacturers, for instance, decided to run the country, decided to form a powerful financial group and to concentrate their energies and their wealth, with all the ability that their leading men have, upon their own interests in this House, and with the farmers doing the same, where pray would the rest of Canada be? I would be just as strongly against the manufacturers in any such event as I would be against the farmers. We must be a united and a sane people, or we will cease to exist as a nation. I am confident that one of the difficulties this country labours under is that the people are largely uninformed except as to their own business, and here is a reproach that lies at the door of our leading men. Our ministers of government and the leading men of the Opposition might well go through the country, not at election times when nobody believes anybody else, but at other times, and explain the broad principles of government and of statesmanship. A statesman, Gladstone said, is a man who ascertains the facts and acts accordingly. In this way our leading men would learn in their peregrinations what the true conditions of the country were; they would know what the country thought and needed, and the country would know also what they thought; but at the present time, until the war drum of elections is sounded, nobody pricks up his ears about the country at all, and it is left to Canadian clubs and similar institutions to educate the country. This is a very serious drawback, and I am quite convinced that the good feeling as well as the intelligence of the country would be very much developed if our leading men were to visit different sections of the country at different times.

I want to touch for a moment upon a source of energy that has come like a flash into view and will afford us more comfort than anything else that I know of. The day of coal has gone by. Even if it could be mined, it is of poor quality or it is not there—I am referring to hard coal particularly, and the highest quality of soft coal. Gasolene has become so tremendously expensive that it is fast disappearing in public estimation and is creating a need which is about to be supplied, industrial chemists tell us, by industrial alcohol. The Americans a few years ago manufactured 6,000,000 gallons of alcohol per annum. Now they manufacture over 100,000,000 per annum. Our industrial alcohol, owing to the nervousness of the temperance people, has to be shipped from the distillers to Ottawa, there be denatured, and sent out to the users throughout the country. The consequence is that the freight alone is so expensive that Canada is put out of business as a consumer of industrial alcohol. That has to be stopped. The National Council of Industrial Research begs the Government to tell the people to grow more corn, and potatoes and everything of that sort from which alcohol can be easily made, and then to take off all sorts of embargoes such as I have referred to, so that this source of energy may be made available to the people.

which means, of course, not only motive power but heat. We are short of electricity, and even if we had all the electricity we wanted, alcohol has become so cheap as a manufacturing product that one might almost describe it as the product of the wizard's wand. The hope of the world lies in industrial alcohol. Let us be alive to that fact and see to it that the Government duly recognizes it. A few years ago it was discovered that peat could be made into a fertilizer. I wrote to the department then, some five years ago, and begged them not to let some people get hold of all the peat bogs in the country and, after they had been tied up in this manner, find that they were all owned privately. I believe that some steps were taken in the matter. There is a fertilizer which, as the chemist might say, by a single twist of the wrist could be made available to the whole country, and surely it is necessary and desirable that this should be done.

I desire to say in closing—because it is a matter that is very near to my heart—that the basis of religion and morals is individual liberty; and when individual liberty is gone then no religion or morals can exist. The Creator recognized this truth, and He could not establish the moral law or be the fountain of that law and compel one single human being by means of prohibition or any such device. We are to have no freedom, no free will in anything, except by the behest of the prohibitionists. If you want Bolshevism, if you want that frightful explosion of energy which we saw in Russia, which overthrew like a volcanic eruption the tyrannical and autocratic system that was in vogue there, then that is the way to get it. There was no sense in the cruelty practised there by the ruling classes. The country did not belong to the people but to the few. How can we expect a great multitude, disturbed like an immense animal from its long sleep of oppression, to do otherwise than rise up and smash everything to pieces? Believe me, there is far more of that very spirit in this country than many people imagine, and it may show itself in many peculiar ways and not be recognized as the spirit of Bolshevism until it is too late. Why pray when the policeman is at the door? That is the motto of the prohibitionists and the user of force, the man who is substituting force for faith. Hail the policeman! Crush them! Do what no divine plan ever did or could do, and you will show your human presumption, your ignorance and your incapacity. Let me say that no moral system can substitute the "must" for the "ought." In conclusion, let me extend in all sincerity the hand of fellowship from one province to another, if I may be bold enough to do so. Surely the Protestant and the English speaking people have played some part in Quebec. Surely they have shown their faith in Quebec, as well as their high regard for the French people. We are the same as they; our interests are linked up with theirs; our prosperity and our whole future, in Ontario at least is linked up with that of Quebec. If Quebec and Ontario cannot pull together they will both be ruined, and Ontario knows this whether Quebec does or not. Now, we are all men and women, whether we are French or English, Liberals or Conservatives, farmers, manufacturers or mechanics. Let us drop the race cry; drop the party cry. Let us of course be loyal to whatever school of thought we belong to; let us be loyal to our friends within reason. But let us remember that above all things we are human beings and must be loyal to human liberty and human rights.

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, like many others who have preceded me in this debate, I am glad to have the privilege of participating in the deliberations of this Parliament in these new buildings. Throughout the ages among all peoples a custom has prevailed of erecting monuments to commemorate the lives of great men and the occurrence of great and noteworthy events,—monuments designed to give to future generations a proper conception of the glory of their people. These new buildings which we have just entered, when they will have been finally completed, will stand forever as the best monument to the grandeur and magnificence of the Canadian people. Now, Mr. Speaker, although I join with others in pleasure at this fact, I must confess some disappointment with the speech from the Throne. We expected to hear much more from the Government in the way of new legislation intended to solve the problems of the day. In these new buildings to-day we are face to face with many questions of a very grave nature that demand immediate attention from the Government. Yet in the speech from the Throne there is nothing to indicate that the Government proposes very much in the way of progressive legislation. Mention is made of different events that have occurred since the last session, events concerning for the greater part the affairs of the people of Europe. We also have a reference to the International Labour Convention which was held in Washington last fall, but although there were delegates from our Government at that convention, we do not hear in the speech from the Throne that our Government intends to introduce any new legislation in order to ameliorate the conditions of the labouring classes of this country. It is amusing to read such sentences as this, which appears in the speech from the Throne:

> From every quarter of the world is being impressed, often by severe privation and suffering, the one great lesson that increased production through increased work, combined with thrift and economy in individual and State, is the only sure hope of business improvement and future prosperity.

Now, this is very nice indeed, if only the Government would make some attempt to put this theory into practice. This is a time when there is greater need than ever existed before for Parliament and people to co-operate in the task of working out a solution of the many problems which confront us. It is also pre-eminently a time for the exercise of proper caution when we embark upon untried policies. It is no time for pursuing false doctrines in grappling with political, social or economic problems. It is interesting to read in the speech from the Throne that the affairs of our country are in a very good state, that Canada has maintained a record of social order and industrial and commercial prosperity second to none. If, however, we go to the bottom of the question, as the member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. L. J. Gauthier) stated this afternoon, we shall find that, on the contrary, the affairs of Canada are in an absolutely unsatisfactory condition, due undoubtedly to the imprudence and improvidence of the present Government.

If business was so good in Canada why was the Government obliged, a few days ago, to put an embargo on the selling of foreign securities on the markets of Canada, and to fix the prices of Victory Loan bonds, decreasing the price of those gilt-edged securities for which the Government said we would get par? Many financiers upon being apprised of this action, have expressed the opinion that this is one of the weakest steps that the Government could have taken in order to restore the financial condition of the country. It is bound to be misunderstood by people abroad and to prevent new business from coming to this country. It will also make it much more difficult for the Government to float further loans such as they have been launching in years past. When we contrast the way in which the affairs of the country were run a few years ago with the way in which they are run today, we find that the people of Canada are just as much burdened and taxed as any people ever were. I believe, as a matter of fact, that we are more heavily taxed than the people in any other country. We pay municipal, provincial and federal taxes. The people are absolutely burdened with taxation and yet the Government, notwithstanding the increase in the cost of living, which is being further added to by this taxation, has not seen fit to place in the speech from the Throne any intimation that legislation is contemplated to alleviate the troubles of a suffering people. Either the Government is absolutely deaf to the voice of the people or the people are crying out in vain and their voice cannot reach the Government. When one looks at the treasury benches and contrasts the appearance that it presents to-day, with the appearance that it presented a few years ago, and when we remember the doings of the Government within the last few months, we may be inclined to believe that the spirit of the devil is not dead. We see the Government to-day trying to do things that have never been done before by any Government in any democratic country. Devilish deeds are being done by the Government to keep in power as long as they can and to prevent the people from passing judgment upon them. I say the spirit of the devil is not dead and I believe that the devil himself is not dead.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CASGRAIN: You are laughing, gentlemen, but we saw not long ago in Montreal the respectable, honourable, venerable Minister of Trade and Commerce, the present leader of the Government, addressing the Canadian Club, and we heard him telling the people of Montreal that the affairs of this country are not so bad after all, and that they should not listen to those people who tell them that we should have a change of government; that it would not do any good and that the only thing to do is to hold on and stick to the Government of the day. The leader of the Government said to the members of the Canadian Club, the leading people in the financial world in Montreal: "The only thing you have to do is to economise, work and produce more." We had heard that slogan before—economise and produce. But has the Government given any fair chance to the people to put this doctrine into practice? How can they economise when, since the beginning of the war and after the war, the Government has done everything it could to help the trusts and the big interests? Last year when there was apprehension throughout the country as to the high cost of living and the abnormal conditions that had been created in Canada, a measure was introduced into this House and a Board of Commerce was created and given wide and broad powers. Its duty was to inquire into the different conditions of life, to try and set fair prices and to see that the big interests and the people controlling capital should not exact too much from the people. What have we seen and what has been the result of that board? After about five or six months trial I fail to see that any result has been brought about. Has it decreased or helped in any way to decrease, the prices of the commodities most necessary to life? Not at all. I believe that the prices are the same this year as they were last ——

An hon. MEMBER: They are higher.

Mr. CASGRAIN: And in some cases they are higher. We heard a few days ago that three of the big sugar refineries in Montreal had met together and that they had increased the price of sugar from one to three cents per pound. That is a fact that cannot be controverted. I have been told that this has been done under the supervision, and with the quasi consent, of the Board of Commerce that was created last year.

Mr. Speaker, this Board of Commerce has also conducted other inquiries in different parts of the country. We do not know the results of all those inquiries, but as regards the province of Quebec we may say that the inquiries were conducted—I would not say in an indifferent way, but in a manner that was not quite satisfactory. We have seen some companies ignore certain orders of the Board, and yet the Board seemed to be absolutely handicapped in the matter of bringing the recalcitrants to reason and compelling their submission to the orders.

And what do we see to-day, Mr. Speaker? Just before the opening of this session the press announced the resignation of the President of the Board—one of the most capable men that the Government saw fit to appoint to that position. Many rumours have been current regarding his resignation. Some are to the effect that it is on account of a misunderstanding with the Civil Service Commission, which did not want to see the Board working satisfactorily. That may be so; we do not know. Other rumours are to the effect that certain circumstances that the President of the Board did not want to disclose were responsible for the course he took. We are assembled to-day, Mr. Speaker, to discuss national affairs and to try to adjust them in the best interests of all concerned. I put a question on the Order Paper, and so has the member for Quebec West (Mr. Parent), asking that all the correspondence leading up to the resignation be submitted to this House as soon as possible, and that an investigation be undertaken to ascertain the real reasons that brought about Mr. Justice Robson's retirement. I might add that we have also heard that his action might have been influenced by supposed friends of the Government who have differences to adjust with the Board. The people have a right to know every circumstance in connection with the resignation of the President to see whether such resignation was, if I may use the word, forced.

The acting leader of the Government (Sir George Foster) when he visited Montreal and paraded as one of the devils of the Administration told us to produce more. If we are to credit the reports of the different industries and Boards of Agriculture in the several provinces, we must come to the conclusion that we have gone a long way towards increasing production in every line of agriculture and of commerce, and that at the present time our people cannot do very much more unless the Government comes to their rescue and gives them a fighting chance and fair play.

I said, Sir, that our people cannot do very much more to-day unless the Government tells us fairly what it intends to do regarding the fiscal policy of the country. We hear on every side that people are afraid to put capital in any new enterprise because they are not sure what the Government is going to do next. In Montreal people have come to me and asked what was the intention of the Government regarding the Excess Profits War Tax; was it the intention to keep it in force for another year? We have not any explanation from the Government as to their intentions. Last year we were told that a commission for the revision of the Tariff was to be appointed to inquire into conditions prevailing in this country, but up to now, so far as I know, we have not been advised that any such commission has been appointed. We hear that the Government is in possession of certain information, but that information is very vague and incomplete, and is not what was promised by the Prime Minister last year on the floor of this House.

I said at the opening of my remarks that the devil was not dead. One day we see another devil of the Government represented by the unquestioning faith and optimistic personality of the President of the Privy Council, we see him telling the people of his constituency that everything is all right, and praising the Government for what it has been doing since the war and what it intends to do later. Mr. Speaker, it may be true that the President of the Privy Council is of the opinion that everything is all right with the business of this country, but if he really entertains that opinion it must be based on very imperfect information of the affairs of this country. If that is the information given to him in his constituency, I would advise him to go into some of our big centres, where I am confident he would be informed that conditions are not so satisfactory as he has been led to believe. He hears only one bell—the bell of the Union Government, and it is not the best bell to listen to in my opinion.

Mr. Speaker, it is no use to talk about the affairs of this country being thoroughly satisfactory and the people quite prosperous, and by way of confirmation to quote figures and statements as did the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. McGregor) who seconded the Address yesterday. There is a better way than that, and if I may use the words of a great statesman who is no longer with us, the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, when he was leader of His Majesty's loyal Opposition I would say:

> It is no use quoting figures and statements to convince the people that they are happy and prosperous. When I shall have the direction of the affairs of Canada it will be my policy to enact such legislation as will bring happiness and success to everybody; it will not be necessary to quote figures and statements to realize you are happy and prosperous; you will feel it in your pocket.

The only way the people can be satisfied to-day and the trade and commerce of the country placed on a proper basis and so bring back that national prosperity which we enjoyed from the year 1896 down to 1911 is by an immediate readjustment of our fiscal policy.

We have, Mr. Speaker, on the other hand, as I said, another good devil of the Government—this is a real one, and I bow to him—the hon. member, the young and promising Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen). A few months ago he came down as far as our old province of Quebec and addressed a meeting in the city of Quebec itself.

Then he told a big gathering of shoe manufacturers that they would have to be subjected to further taxation; that if they made big profits the Government would try to get some of them. Two or three weeks later the same minister addressed a gathering of farmers in Winnipeg, and on that occasion he said: "Trust us; we will adjust matters so that you will have a moderate tariff, moderate protection; you will get what you want and be happy." That, Mr. Speaker, is not all. In an effort to appease the people, to keep them quiet, as an old schoolmaster would do with his class, the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) announced that an investigation would be made with a view to seeing what could be done with regard to the tariff. That investigation has been promised session after session, but it never seems to materialize. Now that the minister has officially assumed the duties of his office and is in his seat in the House, we hope that the inquiry with regard to the tariff will be instituted, so that we may know what the situation is and advise our constituents accordingly.

Mr. Speaker, among bad angels there sometimes happen to be a few good ones. Among the members of the Cabinet we find that there were three or four good ones. The former Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White); the former Minister of Agriculture (Hon. T. A. Crerar), and the former Minister of all Departments—I mean the member for Halifax (Hon. A. K. Maclean)—as good angels among the devils, separated from their colleagues, saying: "This is no place for us." Some people say that they are defaulters for leaving the Government, but as the member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) said this afternoon, these men entered the Government with a sincere desire to render service in a good cause, and when they considered that they had finished their work and done their duty, they withdrew. Possibly they were dissatisfied, too, with the manner in which public affairs were being administered. These gentlemen, who are public men of the highest character, having seen fit to resign on the ground that their work was finished, the Government of which they formed a part should immediately do the same—they should resign and appeal to the people. It is recognized in our constitution that a dissolution of Parliament is called for when public interest demands that the country should be consulted upon a question of great importance or when the ministers fail to obtain the support of the majority in the House. Never, I believe, in the history of Canada did public interest so strongly demand the resignation of the Government and an appeal to the people. I need not go into the details of the formation of Union Government; they are known to every one. The Government was formed to win the war. No other policy was laid down at that time. I do not believe that the hon. gentlemen from this side who entered the Union Government would have done so had the carrying on of the war not been the only purpose of its formation. New problems have now arisen. It is impossible for most of the hon. gentlemen who comprise the Union Government and who are either extreme free-traders or extreme protectionists to agree. The only solution of the difficulty is in appeal to the people.

There is another reason, Sir, why the Government should resign at once, and it must be obvious to every one. I do not wish to be disrespectful in referring to members of the Government, but it is a fact that we have to-day only a remnant of the Administration; and they do not represent the feeling and the sentiment of Canada. Moreover, if we are well informed, the ministers are wrangling among themselves on the question of who shall be Prime Minister or leader of the Government. The office of Prime Minister seems to have lost its usefulness in the affairs of Canada. We are told that the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) is critically ill and that he cannot return to his duties for some time. I want to be fair to the Prime Minister. He deserves credit for his services during the war and for the manner in which he did his duty to this country and to the Empire as well. But if he is as ill as people say he is, it is unfair for the ministers to try to force him to stay at the head of the Administration. It is unfair to Parliament, and it is unfair to the people. In such circumstances as these the Prime Minister should either resign his office or remain in full assumption of his duties, so that we may know where we stand. If he is not as ill as people say he is, he should be here to lead the Government and direct the affairs of the country. The Prime Minister is the pivot of the Government. All the other ministers may withdraw, but if he remains the Government still exists. When the Prime Minister disappears the Government falls. He has more real power than the King himself; only Parliament is above the Prime Minister. Everybody looks to the Prime Minister, not to his assistant or substitute, for the direction of the affairs of the country. I am speaking here to-day as a member of this Parliament, and I am criticising the present attitude of the Government of the day, and the Prime Minister in that capacity, as well as in that of the representative of the county of Charlevoix-Montmorency, which I have the honour to represent in this House. We have the right to have the Prime Minister with us to-day instead of having dummies and substitutes and a bunch of green grocers, if I may be permitted to use that term, to administer the affairs of this country when matters come up that must be settled immediately. When I say that we should have the resignation of the Government and a dissolution of Parliament, I do not ask for something unusual or unprecedented. All other countries that have been at war have changed governments since the war; they have had elections, and nobody seems to have criticised them. If I am not mistaken, there was an election in England immediately after the war. Not a new Government, but practically the same Government was re-elected to conduct the affairs of that country after the war. The former Government had a war mandate and now they have a peace mandate. In France, what was done? An election was held recently and a new Premier was elected. The former great Premier, Mr. Clemenceau, who directed the destinies of France during practically the whole period of the war and who is justly called the "Father of Victory," has been denied the privilege of being President of the French Republic. What is the reason for that? Because the people of France now realize that although this Premier was good for war; that he had all the capacity and energy to conduct the affairs of the country during the period of the war, his usefulness had passed; that new problems had arisen, that conditions had changed and that therefore, the Premier and the Government should also be changed. Why not do the same thing in this country, and then after an election we would know exactly where we stand?

We have been told in this Parliament as well as in the legislatures of the different provinces, that we are a democratic country administered by responsible Governments. If that be so in fact, surely, in order to live up to the traditions of England and also to preserve the rights and privileges that have been granted to us by the constitution, and which were acquired by our forefathers from the mother land, we should immediately go to the people of this country and obtain a new mandate, and a new Parliament ought to be chosen that would come to this House and be truly representative of the country at this time.

I said that public opinion must be at the back of the Government, but what do we find is the trend of public opinion to-day? If we look not only in the Chambers of the ministers at Ottawa and in certain of the provinces that are still backing the Government but throughout the country generally, we find that the public opinion of Canada is going against the Government. What is needed to settle the affairs of Canada at the present time?

The peace problem can be settled by peace and work only. The 9 p.m. peace which has been acquired with great sacrifices on the other side, the blood of our sons mingling with the blood of the sons of other nations, must give us life. To live we must work, and in order to work we must be willing and active. It is all very well for the Government to say to the people of Canada: Work; but the people can turn to the Government and say to them: Govern and administer and look after us. We must, in other words, have a government that will not have the weakness and the laissez faire and the laissez aller of the present Government, a government which, instead of conducting the affairs of this country, has rather been led by events and a desire to cling to the treasury benches and who believes that it can continue to hold on to them by its own will and its own consent.

Before resuming my seat, I should like to make a few observations in reference to the speeches made this afternoon by certain hon. members. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) in the course of his remarks intimated that Union Government was a mixture of the best elements of the Liberal and Conservative parties at the time when it was formed, and that there was no reason why Union Government should not go on. That may be so, but it is no reason why the Liberal party here to-day should not stand as it was in years past and as it is at the present time. The hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Burnham) made certain remarks in which I cannot acquiesce. He said that for instance very soon, in a few years, the Liberal party would be a party of the past, and it might be also that the Conservative party would be a party of the past, and he looked at the new agrarian party and said: This is the party of to-day. Listening to the address of the hon. member for Peterborough West, we discover that he is, although I did not want to believe it until to-day, a very bad preacher, a false prophet and a pessimist. The hon. members who sit around me in this House remain Liberals as we were when we entered this House and we stand to fight for the good Liberal cause. I have been a Liberal for over ten years now, ever since I started to mingle in public affairs and politics, and I would not change to-day. A party that has produced such men as Blake, Mackenzie, the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Hon. Mr. Mercier, the hon. leader of the province of Quebec, Fielding, Mackenzie King, is strong enough and good enough for me. Its policy that was advocated in the past and which has given to this country such years of great prosperity as we have seen from 1896 to 1911, a party which has given to this country fair representation and fair franchise and elections in years past, is a party of which every one ought to be proud, and as long as there remains a little bit of the flag of the old Liberal party flying anywhere in Canada, I shall be with it and I will stand and if needs be, fall to support it and I will call every one of the supporters of His Majesty's loyal Opposition, whether they are real Liberals or new members of the Agrarian party, our separated brothers of to-day, to join with us and support unanimously the amendment that was presented yesterday to the Address by the leader of the Opposition in order that it may be carried.

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House very long at this Hour, but I have a few observations which I should like to make as a contribution to this discussion. In the first place permit me to refer to the noble edifice in which we find ourselves to-day, and from which I hope will flow the blessings of sound and sane government for a free people for all time. I find that the dignified lines of this Chamber grow upon me. Its dimensions are spacious, the colour tones are pleasing, and the acoustics are good. The Chamber is well-ventilated and well-lighted. Altogether I think it is a fitting place for the political home of a great people. If one cared to trace the history of our race from its beginning to the present time he would find running through its web and woof a silver thread, which might be interpreted as the principle of a free government for a free people. Wherever this race is found, whether it be on the banks of the Thames or the Ottawa, you will find this same principle underlying their system of government. As to this building and the place it will fill in our history, permit me to say that I have a profound confidence in the future of this country, peopled as it is with a virile race comprising the various factors which go to make a people great. I am satisfied that one of the things, and perhaps it is the chief factor, that has made the British race what it is, is that they draw their power from four of the most virile races of the world—the ancient Briton, the Roman, the Scandinavian and the Norman-French. We have all these elements in this country, as well as another equally important, and that is the French-Canadian. With these various factors I have not the slightest doubt that we shall develop a type of the genus homo on this continent that will be among the very best, and I am glad to think that that type of this great people will have in this building its political home.

Just a word with regard to the mover (Mr. Cronyn) and the seconder (Mr. McGregor) of the address. A fellow feeling makes one kin; I have had the experience of moving the address, and I know exactly how it feels to get up and face an audience as my hon. friends did yesterday. As someone who preceded me yesterday said, the two speeches were different in type, but equally distinguished. One was of the literary type, and the other of the business type. Movers and seconders of an address in this House in later years will no doubt search through Hansard, as I did, and as I presume my hon. friends did, and when they arrive at those two speeches which were delivered in this Chamber yesterday they will find a model for each style.

My hon. friend from Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) has made a rather interesting discovery in the House of Commons. He has discovered that this Chamber is inhabited by devils—devils good and devils bad. By a rather logical process of thought he developed first the idea that the Government was in league with the devil, then that the leader of the Government went through this country preaching the devil, and finally he arrived at the point where he found that the Administration was a whole government of devils, some good, but most of them bad. My hon. friend's idea of devils reminds me of the old couplet:

> When the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
> When the devil got well, the devil a monk was he.

I think the words are applicable to my hon. friend and his friends on the other side of the House at the present time.

I am sorry the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) is not in his seat this evening. He directed his attention chiefly to the speech from the Throne and criticized the Government's policies, home and foreign. He referred particularly to Orders in Council and condemned that method of Government. So do we all. Every one who knows anything about the constitution of this country knows that Orders in Council are not involved except on special occasions, but in the history of the British Empire Orders in Council have played rather an important part. Orders in Council were invoked and used by the British Government with great effect against Napoleon and his armies. They were also used by the British Government in the present war, and by our Government. One would think to hear hon. gentlemen opposite talk that Orders in Council had never existed in this country before the war. I would remind them that they and their predecessors are not at all strangers to Orders in Council. The Territory which I have the honour to represent was governed for years by Orders in Council. Our whole mining system was regulated by Orders in Council. It was not until several years after the Yukon Territory had an established Government, that we had anything else but Orders in Council. In those days it was quite a common thing for speculators in that territory and friends of the Government of that day to come down here and have the Government change an Order in Council over-night, and they would then go back with a good big slice of that gold-producing territory in their pockets. That is just a little history to show that Orders in Council have been used by my hon. friends opposite as well as by this Government. The one important thing about Orders in Council is that they should not be invoked too frequently nor be used to the detriment of the country. The Orders in Council passed by this Government were properly founded and well carried out.

My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition also referred to the instability of the Government. Now what constitutes Government stability? What is the test? Is it fair to say that a majority vote of the Government supporters on all important questions represents stability in the Government? I think that is a fair test, and Hansard of last session will show that by that test the Government is stable. If my hon. friends are anxious for a further test of the stability of the Government, let them wait until a vote is taken on the question now before the House.

The hon. leader of the Opposition finds that there is disagreement among the ministers. Where does he get that information? It was not known to us. Did he get it from his friends of the Opposition? An excellent source, truly! Have there been any defections from the ministry because of disagreement? Only one, so far as I know, and that was when my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) resigned from the ministry over the Budget of last session. Has any other minister who has resigned said he disagreed with the Cabinet on their policies? I think not. If this were a discredited ministry would it be likely that the people of this country would advance to the Government such huge sums of money as they have done in the past few years? It is absolute poppycock to talk of the irresponsibility of the Government and of a want of continuity of thought and action on the part of the ministers. It is very easy to talk like that, but facts are facts, and truth will prevail. What are the facts? My hon. friend accused the Government of instability and non-continuity of thought and action. What are good tests whether a country is prospering or not? Prices are a fairly good test. Prices for practically every commodity are high. Money by common consent is said to be plentiful. Times are good.

There is very little idleness. Our factories are busy and our manufacturers, that from one end of the country to the other, tell us they cannot find enough of commodities to fill the orders they have. Consequently the workmen are employed. Our bank deposits are increasing month by month, and that fact can be taken as fairly good evidence as to the conditions which exist in the country at the present time. I admit that there is unrest; everyone knows that there is. But let us be fair with the people and with ourselves. Have hon. gentlemen opposite mentioned any single thing that can be said to be a cause of the unrest? If there is a cause let us know what it is that we may endeavour to remove it. But do not let hon. gentlemen simply get up and with carping criticism condemn the Government wholesale because the Government cannot do the impossible.

I am firmly convinced that there are more causes than one for the present unrest, which is by no means confined to Canada. The cause is partly an economic one, but it is psychological as well. The whole world is abnormal to-day, and Canada has unfortunately not escaped the common fate. Any one who is tolerably acquainted with history knows, and it can be proven, that after every convulsion such as we have just experienced there have prevailed conditions similar to those which exist at the present time. One hundred years ago, after the Napoleonic Wars, the exchanges of the world were against Great Britain just as they are to-day; not ten per cent or twenty per cent, but forty per cent, and for the identical causes to which are to be attributed the state of exchange at the present time. Following the American Civil War the same conditions prevailed in the United States as prevail there to-day. And so it is throughout history. As our civilization becomes more complex, and as we harness the forces of nature in order to help us develop that complex civilization, the more difficult will be our problems. No government can obviate these conditions, and it is well to realize the fact and face the situation as best we can. We must understand that the high cost of living is not peculiar to Montreal or Toronto, to the province of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, or to the Dominion of Canada as a single country. It is not even confined to the belligerent nations, for if you turn to the neutral countries you will find that the cost of living is greater in those places than it is in the countries that were at war. Now, these are not idle statements. The press of the world will convince you of their truth. For instance, in Spain, a country which never drew the sword at all, the cost of living is higher than in Great Britain; and in the Scandinavian countries, which sold their goods by the million to belligerent nations, you will find that the cost of living is higher than in the United States. I do not make these statements merely for the sake of having something to say, because they can be substantiated. In South America, where there are countries that never sent a man to the war, the very same conditions prevail. The unrest is universal. That being so, what justification can there be for any censure of our Government? Let us be fair, however much we may be critical. I do not say that the Government is infallible. I quite realize that the Government is human like the rest of us and has made mistakes, as it will probably make mistakes in the future. But I reiterate, let us be fair; let us give them a chance to carry on the affairs of the country until times improve. There is only one remedy for the condition that is disturbing the world to-day—I care not whether it is in the Argentine, in Stockholm, London, Paris or Ottawa—and that remedy is the one suggested in the speech from the Throne, a remedy that existed since the moral law was first established amongst men. That remedy consists in thrift and economy and home purchase, and unless we apply it, the same conditions will exist a year hence as exist to-day.

But the leader of the Opposition, whom I am glad now to see in his seat, did not confine himself in his criticism to home affairs. He went abroad and criticised this Government in regard to its foreign policy. Now, Mr. Speaker, Canada has passed the stage of her swaddling clothes and become a nation, and the Canadian people and Parliament must cease from thinking provincially. We must think in a national and an international way; the day has passed when purely provincial problems shall engage our attention. We won by right a place in the greatest Peace Conference that mankind has ever held. We won recognition by the shedding of the good red blood of our men, and by their magnificent bravery in the field, and we therefore have the right to stand side by side with the greatest nations on earth. I therefore deprecate any attempt on the part of hon. gentlemen to belittle Canada and speak disparagingly of its foreign affairs. When they lo so they show a lack of appreciation of the part which the people of this country played in the great war, and such derogatory criticism of Canada's status is little-Canadianism. What have we accomplished? In fifty years we have created a great nation, connected East and West; established a vast system of transportation; dredged our harbours; opened up a great system of lake and river transportation; created great manufacturing industries; and developed in this country the most highly skilled artisans that are to be found anywhere, a fact which was amply demonstrated in the war. From a peace basis we suddenly entered on war conditions and engaged in the manufacture of shells by the same concerns that had formerly made farming implements. We have placed Canada upon the map of the world. Our banking institutions are going abroad for business and expect our manufacturers to follow. And they will follow. We took our place at the Peace Conference and the Labour Conference, anl before this session of Parliament is over, I understand, legislation will be brought forward to give us a status at Washington with a representative there. This is as it should be, Mr. Speaker, and for my part I shall not be satisfied until we have a representative of Canada in every port of the world where we can secure a dollar's worth of trade. If we are to take our place properly amongst the nations of the world we must think in terms of diplomacy and realize that we need representatives in foreign countries; and instead of criticising the Government in regard to its foreign policy it would be well for the Opposition to lend some aid in carrying it out.

My hon. friend wants an amendment to the Election Act. Why does he desire this? Because Quebec is not represented in the Cabinet; that is the one reason. Now, why is Quebec not represented in the Cabinet? How many members from the province of Quebec were returned to support the Government? Three out of sixty-five. How many of these three hold seats in the Cabinet? Two. And where is the other? Representing Canada in Europe. Is this Government to be blamed because Quebec has no greater representation I should think not. But they were not satisfied with that. They went to Quebec and made the Hon. Mr. Blondin Postmaster General with a seat in the Senate. The leader of the Opposition says that Mr. Blondin does not represent the people of Quebec because he was defeated in two constituencies. Mr. Speaker, is Mr. Blondin the only man who was ever defeated in two constituencies and who seeks to advise the House. The hon. gentleman who holds the position of leader of the Opposition was himself defeated in North Waterloo and North York, and he comes and tells us we should have a new election, when he could not obtain a seat at all in his own province nor in Quebec, nor in New Brunswick nor Nova Scotia. Where did he get his seat? In Prince Edward Island. And this is the source from which we get the advice that we should have an election! I do not want to be personal, but I do plead for fairness, and my hon. friend has no more reason to suggest that we should have an election than the man who has not a seat in the House at all. He says that an election should be held because Parliament has outlived its mandate. What does it mean to say that Parliament has outlived its mandate? Is Parliament elected for any particular term other than was provided for in the constitution? The constitution says that Parliament shall be elected for five years. Is there anything in theory or practice that would change that term? I have not heard of it. If there is, I would like to know it, because I am interested in these things.

Is there any other reason he advanced? The Opposition desire it. Did you ever see an Opposition that did not desire an election? The Opposition has no responsibility to the public and it does not need any policy. It devotes itself to lambasting the Government. That is the duty of an Opposition, and that is what it is generally engaged in doing.

Does the press of this country demand an election? Is there any considerable section of the sane press of Canada asking for an election at this time? The press is a very good indication of what the people are thinking. Are the people who direct the policies of the great papers asking for an election? Are the men who write the editorials in our papers asking for an election? No. Why? Because they are sane, straightforward, thinking, Canadians who know that if an election was held it would disorganize this country. What we want is steadiness and to give the people a chance to get down to work again in order that the psychological conditions may become normal.

An hon. MEMBER: And the Opposition.

Mr. A. THOMPSON: The Opposition, I hope, will become normal, although that is perhaps too much to hope for. Do the farmers want an election? No. How do I know? Because a congress of about a thousand farmers was held the other day in Saskatchewan and some one in that body submitted a resolution asking that this Government be called upon to resign. Did they adopt it? No. The farmers do not ask for an election. That is just a sign of the times. Do the people want an election? Is there in this country anywhere a concerted mass of opinion which demands an election? If there is I want to know it, and I fancy the Government want to know it. I defy the leader of the Opposition, or any of the men who follow him, to name any considerable block of public opinion in this country that is at the present time demanding an election.

What about policies? This Government, the leader of the Opposition says has no policy. Has he a policy to put before this country? I have not heard of it. How about the trade policy? I believe that the next campaign in this country will be fought on the question of the tariff, which is a good, clear-cut, straight issue. Where do my hon. friend and his friends stand on that question? Are they a unit on the tariff question? No. How about free trade and direct taxation, amongst the men from the West? How about adequate protection, with my distinguished friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie)? And how about St. James division, Montreal, to-day, where there are two Liberals running, one as a straight Liberal and the other as a Liberal-Protectionist? Whoever heard of a Liberal-Protectionist?

The leader of the Opposition said that this Government is unpopular. One of the things I glory in is that we had a government elected to do unpopular things and that it has done them. Why is it unpopular? Because it took the boys from the home—some of them unwilling homes—and sent them to the front; it told the people what they would eat; it told the people what they would drink—

An hon. MEMBER: What they would not drink.

Mr. A. THOMPSON: Or what they would not drink; it told the newspapers what they would print and what they would not print, and it told the newspaper writers what they would write and what they would not write. Can a government be popular and do these things? Of course it cannot. This Government was not elected to do popular things; it was elected to do unpopular things, and I glory in its consistency. I am sure that the Canadian people who elected this Government to do unpopular things will stand behind these men who have fought the good fight.

The unkindest cut of all from the man who leads the Opposition, and who some day hopes to sit in the seats of the mighty and to lead the Government of this country as Prime Minister, is when he attacks the present Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) because he is away seeking health. Could partisanship go farther?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure my hon. friend would not wish consciously to misrepresent my attitude. If my remarks yesterday were in any way capable of the interpretation which he is placing upon them, or if by any turn they would lend themselves to such an interpretation, I am extremely sorry. Nothing was further from my thought than that I should reflect in any way on the Prime Minister. When I spoke of the desirablility of the Prime Minister being in his seat to speak of matters of policy, I had reference to the principles underlying parliamentary government. I was speaking of the desirability if possible of having the leader of the Government in the House to deal with matters of public policy. The reference was followed immediately by a remark in regard to the Prime Minister's health in which I said that I shared the feeling of regret of everyone in the House that the Prime Minister was not able to take his seat. I was glad to-day to hear that the Prime Minister is so much better that he hopes to be back in this House again before very long. I cannot be too emphatic in saying that any reference that was made to the Prime Minister in that connection was made to the office of the Prime Minister and not to Sir Robert Borden who happens unfortunately to be prevented from being in the House at this time.

Mr. A. THOMPSON: I am not only glad to give my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) an opportunity of making that explanation, but I am extremely glad to hear it from his own lips. My hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) in extenuation of the impression that had been made by the leader of the Opposition yesterday took occasion this afternoon to refer to the incident. I do not wish to impugn the motives of any man or to put wrong words in his mouth, but I have looked at the resolution and I am going to read one or two words from it. I accept without reservation the statement of my hon. friend, but in justice to myself I desire to quote this sentence. In the amendment which my hon. friend moved and which my hon. friend from Cape Breton seconded he regretted the "protracted absence of the Prime Minister, the widely accepted belief that it is not his intention to return to the duties of his office." I took it from that that he was not expected to return by my hon. friend and his friends and that they were trying to force him out of public life. I felt indignant, but I am glad to have the explanation from my hon. friend and I accept it. I hope the right hon. the Prime Minister will return soon in the full flush of health. Of the Prime Ministers who led Governments from the beginning of this war in other belligerent and allied countries, in so far as I know, there were only two living and in office at the end of the war and of these two one has since died. I refer to General Botha, the Prime Minister of South Africa. The other man is the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, our Prime Minister, who has carried a giant's load all these years, and who now, after four or five years of Herculean effort, is broken in health and has gone away for a brief respite from the onerous duties which bear heavily upon him as Prime Minister of this country. I am sure that I voice the sentiments of hon. members on both sides, Mr. Speaker, when I express the hope that he will return, and return in good health this session. But whether he does or not, I am satisfied that the great majority of our people hope that he will stay away until his health is completely restored.

Now, Mr. Speaker, whether this Government wins or loses in the next campaign is in the lap of the gods, but whatever happens I am satisfied, as one of the members of this House and as a supporter of this Government, that Union Government has justified its existence. And, furthermore, I believe that when the work of this Government has been properly placed before the people it will stand a better chance of securing a majority of the seats in this House than any group existing at the present time, including that which is presided over by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. J. E. S. E. d'ANJOU (Rimouski) (translation): Mr. Speaker, I shall first take up some remarks which the hon. member from the Yukon (Mr. A. Thompson) just made. The hon. gentleman fervidly upheld the Government, and it is no wonder because it is owing to this fatherly Government for which he pleaded with so much force that he is privileged to hold a seat in this Parliament. So the people can understand why the hon. member who just resumed his seat was upholding with so much assurance, if not with great conviction, the moribond Government that are still the arbiters of the future of this country.

The hon. member from the Yukon found fault with the hon. leader of the Opposition for not having in his remarks touched upon the tariff question. My experience in public life has been short, still it seems to me that the Government, not the opposition, is called upon to draw up a political program. Last session, the Government named a commission which was to investigate tariff matters. The commission was to report so that the question could be settled during this session. In the Speech from the Throne there is nothing to show that the commission has done anything. Like every commission created by this Government, that commission did nothing and nothing has been put before the cabinet. As I said, it is the duty of the Government to outline a policy, and the leader of the Opposition is not bound to show his hand. While touring the country and specially the Maritime provinces, the leader of the Opposition had occasion to state his policy in that connection, and that policy is known not only to the members of this House, but to the whole country. When the Government sees fit to raise that question, the leader of the Opposition and all those who are proud to follow his lead will be here to uphold the Liberal programme which always was that of the people and opposed to the program of trusts and combines which is that of the Government now swaying the destinies of Canada.

The hon. member from the Yukon said that the leader of the Opposition regretted that the province of Quebec was unrepresented in the Canadian ministry. Sir, that province is not represented, and somuch the better. For my part, I venture to state that I do not wish that the province of Quebec should have representatives in such an administration. It will be represented when the people is called upon to bring the Government to trial and when a Liberal administration rules this country. At that time, when the people has faith in the Government, when the country is led by honest and enlightened men who do not wage their political battles against the province of Quebec, who do not make the most of racial and religious prejudices in order to remain in power, we shall be proud of seeing representatives of that province in such a Government.

From 1896 until 1911, the province of Quebec was represented, and legally represented, in the Canadian administration, for we had as leader of this country the greatest man who ever lived in Canada, the one who has departed and whose memory shall live forever, the one who inspires the present leader of the Liberal party and his followers. When we have a Government of that stamp to head us, a Government composed, I shall not say of men as worthy as Laurier, but of men who strictly adhere to his political principles, his respect for every race and every creed, of men who will avoid offending not only the one province, but any province in the Dominion of Canada; then, gentlemen, we shall be proud of being represented in such a cabinet.

Some contend that the hon. Mr. Blondin represents the province of Quebec, as a member of the Government. Some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have stated that the hon. Mr. Blondin had been defeated in the province of Quebec, only because of his having supported the Government enforcing the Conscription Act. That is not the only reason. He was defeated, because, along with many others, in 1911 he had outrageously misled and deceived the people of that province.

The hon. member for the Yukon, who is always at the fore to defend the cause of the administration, sang the deeds of the boys at the front. Now that the war is over, and that peace has come in, it were high time that a stop were put to that music which grates on our ears. The winning of the war was the Government cry to remain in office or to get a new lease of power; they should like to keep up that war cry and that the war were still going on. It served so useful a purpose for the hon. gentlemen that the war should go on. Unfortunately for them and happily for the people the war is concluded and I hope that a majority of votes will be cast in favour of the amendment so that the Government may be forced to the country. On the Opposition side, we want the people appealed to, without the least fear as to result; we want the people freely to choose their representatives; we want the country to come back to British institutions, to responsible Government; we want the liberties that have been secured to us to be respected.

During the war, all laws and rights were suspended and crying abuses crept in. The present Government was the first to infringe the law, and not so long ago, our prisons were crowded with young men who had not reported for duty, and they were thrown into prison, because it was contended that they had violated the law. The guilty parties are the hon. gentlemen opposite. Those are the men who should be packed like sardines in jail, and not these young men who often acted through ignorance or because they considered that it was better for the country that they should stay behind and remain steadily at work on their farms, to increase the production of foodstuffs, for our own people and our soldiers overseas.

Although the debate is nearing its conclusion, think it my duty to congratutate the mover and seconder of the Address who have so well discharged the task entrusted to them. But I cannot extend my congratulations to the Government itself, the Government has once more ignored the rights of the French language, a fault which has grown into a habit. At the opening sitting of the session, it is true, the Acting Prime Minister was kind enough to say a few words in French; but neither the mover nor the seconder of the Address have said a single word in French. The right hon.

the Acting Prime Minister in referring to the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition queried whether it was not a fine bit of strategical camouflage. Let me tell him that it was his remarks in the French language, at the opening of the session, that could be styled a fine bit of camouflage; for, had he been honest, he wields enough influence over the Cabinet, as he is the substitute of the Prime Minister, to make his followers realize that the rights of the French language should be respected in this Parliament and that the mover or seconder of the Address should at least be able to express themselves in French. This is the third occasion on which I register my protest in this House in the name of my constituents. It is not enough to make speeches in French, but the constitution must also be respected. The two languages are official and the rights of the French should be upheld. The mover or seconder of the Address, under the tradition, has always been a French Canadian or at least a Canadian conversant with the French language. Moreover, during the preceding sessions, I availed myself of the opportunity of saying that there is an hon. gentleman on the Government side who is fully qualified to move or second the Address in French. The hon. member from Edmonton (Mr. Mackie) is quite competent perfectly to perform that task. He has shown himself proficient in Parliamentary oratory, and is eminently gifted in the art of expression in the French language. Were the Government anxious to respect the rights of the French language, they could have, this year, entrusted him with the task of moving or seconding the Address.

From the very opening of the session, all the talk is about national unity and a better understanding; about making love and offering incense to Quebec.

In 1917, Quebec was not coaxed. The main thing was to win an election. The Unionist government saw fit to enforce conscription in order to discredit that province in the eyes of the other provinces, to get them at loggerheads with her and so to win the election and remain in power. It is two late now to cajole Quebec. They see to-day that they cannot be elected without the help of our province, and after vilifying her and treating her in the most outrageous manner, they are intent in making peace with her for political purposes. Well, Sir, Quebec is beautiful, great, noble in her loneliness. There is peace in that province; her government has assured prosperity to her people who live happy. The fault is not ours if the other provinces do not enjoy the same conditions.

It is rather late to flatter Quebec for, I repeat it, during the political campaign of 1917, that province has been used as a scape-goat; everywhere they have fanned the racial and religious prejudices and roused the other electors against her. It has been said: Quebec will not do her duty; the French Canadians refuse to enlist; conscription must be imposed upon them.

Sir, the French Canadians have too chivalrous an ancestry to warrant such aspersions, and the 22nd regiment have distinguished themselves overseas. For the third time I shall say that in Rimouski county we have two Victoria crosses, lieutenants Brillant and Raeble who were killed in action. We are not the descendants of cowards but of a chivalrous race. We wanted to fight, but freely, as men. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said in the electoral campaign that if the Government had been sincere, if they had used the necessary means to boost voluntary enlistment, conscription could have been dispensed with. Moreover, in other British Colonies, in Australia, for example, one of the most important colonies after Canada, conscription has been poohpoohed. Consequently, it is neither more nor less than a political game against the Liberal party, in order to rouse the other provinces against Quebec with a view to remaining in power.

The address is particularly interesting for what it omits mentioning. The only important thing found in it is the plan of a new Franchise Act. It is obvious that the Government are not at all anxious to go to the people, but they are cautiously feeling their way. Why should we not keep the old Franchise Act, the one we had before the war? Owing to the war-time Elections Act, the country is spending monstrous amounts and, if I am not mistaken, the government have decided to maintain the system of enumerators in the making of the electoral lists which were previously the work of the municipal councils, the said lists being used for the federal as well as the provincial elections. They were fair and just to everybody and the country had nothing to pay. But, with the present system of enumerators, those lists cost enormous sums of money, and besides they favour all kinds of frauds which profit to government candidates. I hope therefore that the Government will not exceed the bounds of decency and that if they introduce in the House a Franchise Bill its principle will be more acceptable than that embodied in the War-time Elections Act and that all those entitled to vote shall have their names on the lists.

In the elections of 1917, a great number of citizens who for twenty years past had exercised the franchise, were denied their rights under the War-time Elections Act, because they were suspected of being opposed to the Government of the day. If the Government earnestly wish to put an end to the unrest in the country, they are bound to enact a Franchise Bill which is fair to everybody; they are bound to go to the people at once in order that the electors of Canada may choose their own representatives.

I am satisfied that when the people pass sentence on the present Government they will be anxious to appoint another one which better safeguards the country's interests, that is a Liberal government, worthy of the Canadian nation and the Liberal party, as the one we have had from 1896 to 1911, for the happiness and prosperity of the people.

Besides, the present Government have never represented public opinion. It is no use to say that the Unionist Government were elected to win the war—such was and is still their claim—but these gentlemen have no right to say that they have a mandate from the people, for this mandate was juggled away from them by means of the law of Elections in War time and of the manipulation of the soldiers' vote overseas. I therefore say that the Government have no right to say to the country and to the House that they have the support of the people, that they were elected to win the war and to save the Empire. If the Government are so confident in the success of their administration, if they are so sure that the people are behind them, why do they not appeal to the people, why do they not go and ask them for a renewal of their mandate, not by means of an election that may be juggled away as in 1917, but in an election carried on as they were in 1896 and 1911, when the people were free to express their opinion on the choice of their representatives? When the Government decide to go before the people I am sure of the verdict that they will obtain, and the Government themselves, well aware of what that verdict would be, will do every thing to defeat the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition.

I said a moment ago that there is unrest in the country, an unrest largely due to the present Administration, but also to the high cost of living. During last session, it seems to me, a commission was appointed to inquire into the high cost of living, to examine how to remedy the situation; but unfortunately nothing has been done by this commission. The most efficient remedy with which the Government might meet the high cost of living would be overproduction and the lowering of the duty on agricultural machines and on all the articles needed by the farmer. Overproduction is being all the time preached to the farmer; he is everywhere begged to produce and produce always but he is not given the means to produce any more than he does. Were the Government sincere, they would amend the tariff, they would modify it so as to relieve from duty all agricultural implements and all articles of first necessity to the farmer. In this way the farmer could produce more and at much less expenditure, and the consumer would benefit thereby. It seems to me quite important that the Government should, during the present session, take measures to change the situation, to lower the cost of living; and this could be done by an intensive production, fostered, I repeat it, by a lowering of the duties on the agricultural implements and on the articles of first necessity to the farmer.

I would like, by the way, to say a word about the dismissals which are at present taking place in the Printing Bureau. As you know, employees are being dismissed by fifties at least in the Printing Bureau. The reason given is that their services are not required and after these men are gone, longer hours are in certain offices imposed upon those that remain. If it is necessary to increase the working hours it must mean that these men were not useless. I have been told that these men were French Canadians, were old men, and that they were thrown on the street without pension, without any compensation. This surely cannot be called measures of patriotism. As every one knows, the Government hardly practise economy; they spend lavishly, too lavishly even. Why not keep these men in the Printing Bureau? The Government pretend that these employees were dismissed for reasons of economy. If they were sincere let them begin by practising economy themselves. I protest with energy against these dismissals.

Now, why have Americans been called here to effect a reclassification of the Civil Service? You remember that in 1911, the slogan of the opponents of the Liberal party, the slogan of the Tories, was, "No truck, no trade with the Yankees". And yet, to-day, when anything or anybody is needed, the Government apply to the United States, when we can have here what is needed, when we have Canadians who can do the work with as much intelligence and at less cost to the country. When this reclassification was to be made, why were not the chiefs of the departments taken to do it; they knew the situation much better than the Americans called to do the work and to whom fabulous sums were paid for the insignificant labour they have performed. I protest against this abuse.

I again protest against the dismissals I have referred to, and I hope that the Government will at least see to it that the men thus turned out be treated with justice. Old men of sixty, of seventy, were discharged; I hope that the Government will come to their help and will grant them such pensions as they deserve.

Before concluding, I would like to answer some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) and by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat), concerning the Liberal party. The hon. member for Parkdale used to be a Liberal, he bears a great name, that of a great Liberal, but I see that he has degenerated and he does not honour that name to-day. He stated that the Liberal party existed no more, that is was extinct in this country and that true Liberals could be found, not on your left, Mr. Speaker, but among those who crossed over to the other side and who are supporting the Government to-day.

The Liberal party is just as alive here as it is in Great Britain and the hon. member for Parkdale must have heard, a few days ago, of the splendid victory won by the leader of that party in England, Mr. Asquith, in the constituency in which he was nominated for election. He too had been cast aside because he had refused to compromise on the question of Liberal principles and because he would not follow Lloyd George and enter the coalition. He stayed away, but, to-day, the English Liberals who are just as true to their principles as we are to ours here, rejoice over his return to the British Parliament. I hope he will make it as hot for the coalition Government as the hon. leader of the Opposition has started to do as regard this Government.

In closing, I must say that I support entirely the amendment introduced by the hon. leader of the Opposition. If the Government feel that they have a record worth submitting to the people, if they are so sure of their re-election, why do they not go and face courageously the electors? Why do they not ask the Governor General for the dissolution of Parliament, in order to submit immediately their political record to the people? Personally, I am anxious for it, because we would be able to again demonstrate to the people of Canada that the hope and future welfare of this country are still with the Liberal party and the leader it selected in the great convention, held in August 1919. That convention at which the hon. member for Prince was elected as leader, was really democratic, because all the different parts of the country were represented thereat.

With so distinguished a leader, a loyal disciple of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the bearer of a great name, and a descendant of a proud and noble stock, I am convinced that when we shall go before the people, they will recognize their true friends once more and place at the head of the country the eminent leader of the Liberal party, who, I am sure, will do justice to the Province of Quebec and restore in our country the happiness and prosperity which we emjoyed from 1896 to 1911.

On motion of Mr. L. J. Papineau (Beauharnois), the debate was adjourned.

BOARD OF COMMERCE—RESIGNATION OF JUDGE ROBSON.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House, I desire to lay certain documents on the Table.

Mr. SPEAKER: Sir George Foster desires, with the unanimous consent of the House, to lay certain documents on the Table.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I lay on the Table copies of communications that passed between myself and the Chairman of the Board of Commerce in connection with the resignation of the chairman. The correspondence is as follows:

Board of Commerce of Canada.

Ottawa, 23rd February, 1920.

My Dear Sir George,

It is impossible for me to continue further in the office of Chief Commissioner of the Board of Commerce. I trust the Government will select a successor at an early date. This may be treated as a formal resignation if you so wish or I will send a more formal document.

As I previously informed you I could not see my way to removing my home to Ottawa and I am under the necessity of returning to Winnipeg at once. Under these circumstances I should make way for another appointment.

Sincerely yours,
H. A. Robson.

The Right Hon.
Sir George E. Foster, P.C., G.C.M.G.

Board of Commerce of Canada.
Ottawa, February 23, 1920.

The Rt. Honourable
Sir George E. Foster, P.C., G.C.M.G.,
Ottawa.

My dear Sir George,

My short experience on the Board of Commerce in the administration of The Combines and Fair Prices Act, has led me to views which make it improper for me to hold a position on that Board. The fact is that I am out of sympathy with the Act, and it is my duty to inform you thereof.

The general idea was that the Act was calculated to reduce the cost of living. That impression was largely erroneous. The primary idea of the Act was control of profits on sale of necessaries. To some extent that might affect the cost of living, but high prices and small profits may and in fact do very often coincide.

It is only the thoughtless that imagine that prices should have been brought down and that such was the function of the Board.

The economic policy of the country should be towards high prices and against low prices. Numerous governmental agencies, at the expense of the people of Canada, are doing their best to get the highest world prices for Canadian produce. In view of this, any machinery to reduce prices of this produce is simply abortive.

But taking the Act as merely profit regulating, in my view it is largely fruitless, also because of the fact recited above, that the producer will find the highest market and the highest profit, and if these are abroad he will send his goods there. Once again I remark that the governments encourage him to do so.

It is futile to think of trying to bring down prices or profits on necessaries in view of above facts.

Dealing with it as a measure to repress profiteering, I have further objection to the Fair Prices part of The Combines and Fair Prices Act (which is the important part of that Act) in that it picks out for profit regulation those classes of producers and traders who deal in the necessaries of life. This regulation does not apply to the great number of other branches of business and occupation. We restrain and discourage the citizen who supplies food and clothing but leave free to profiteer as he pleases the man who deals in non-essentials, or luxuries. We do not touch any excessive charging for service involving mechanical or professional experience. There can only be one effect, i.e., to discourage persons from entering into the production and distribution of the necessaries of life.

There is, to my mind, further objectionable discrimination in that the measures for controlling the selling prices of the retailer are in terms fairly effective, while those for reaching the manufacurer are not so.

A profiteering measure to reach the distributing class should, in my opinion, be local in its character and be administered locally. Federal machinery cannot reach the grievance effectually throughout all Canada.

[Sir George Foster.]

It seems to me further that the Act actually contains a provision which removes the last chance the consumer had to do anything for himself in reducing the cost of living. There never was before the Act anything to prevent a group of consumers from co-operating in the purchase of necessaries. They took their chance of being able to buy. But a declaration of parliamentary policy crept into the Act, and a manufacturer or wholesaler is not bound to sell to classes who were not accustomed to purchase from such manufacturers and wholesalers. This was designed to head off co-operative movements, which were likely to make progress for the benefit of consumer members and, as I say, restricted a remedy which elsewhere has been of some effect in price control.

I might also add that I think the provincial authorities should have been left with power to prosecute combines in any case where they might see fit, without being bound to first apply for a finding of the Board. The inquisitorial provisions of the Act, while of a nature useful in war time for ascertainment and control of food supplies and other necessaries, do not, in my opinion, fit ordinary conditions and only harrass and discourage business men.

I do not wish to be understood as saying that I do not think there is a legitimate and useful field for the Board of Commerce. Great good can be accomplished by the spread of information and by careful administration of investigating machinery. Publicity itself as to the reasonableness of cost and profit will to a substantial extent benefit the consumer. He may thereby know at least whether or not he is being imposed on. My idea is that a Federal body of general character working in with provincial authorities who would enforce anti-profiteering laws would be beneficial. But that is a matter which requires discussion and some re-casting of the Acts. My opinion of them as they now stand is stated above.

I am, yours sincerely,
H. A. Robson.

Prime Minister's Office, Canada.

Ottawa, Ont., Feb. 25, 1920.

My dear Judge Robson,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 23rd February, in which you say it is impossible for you to continue further in the office of Chief Commissioner of the Board of Commerce and ask that your resignation may be accepted at once. I have brought the matter before Council and an Order was passed to-day, accepting your resignation. Let me express personally my regret that you have found it, for reasons expressed in your letter, impossible to remain any longer in the position of Chief Commissioner or member of the Board.

Yours faithfully,
George E. Foster,
Acting Prime Minister.

Annual Report of Department of Immigration and Colonization.—Hon. Mr. Calder.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Hume Cronyn for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King thereto, resumed from Tuesday, March 2.

Mr. ARTHUR TRAHAN (Nicolet), (translation): Mr. Speaker, being called upon, for the first time, to say a few words within these new parliamentary precincts, I feel it an urgent duty and a pleasant obligation to express myself in that beautiful French language which radiates among all nations for its limpidity and which owes it to its clearness to have been chosen as the universal language of diplomacy. If, in the course of our deliberations, we happen to use the English language now and then, I pray our friends who represent the majority to believe that we do so only out of courtesy towards them and because we want our remarks to be understood by everybody. But, for the present circumstance, since we are officially inaugurating this new temple of legislation, it is proper, nay, it is necessary that every member from the Province of Quebec should express himself in his own native tongue, showing clearly, thereby, that the most efficient means of turning a right to account is to exercise the same, especially under such solemn and serious circumstances as these. That being understood, I shall now enter upon the discussion of those matters which were laid before us.

The other night, the hon. Acting Prime Minister thought it his duty to review the policy of the "tory", unionist, imperialist government since the beginning of the war. That entitles me, it seems, to take a leaf from the book of the Acting Prime Minister and to review before this national assembly, as briefly as possible, the policy followed during the same time by the Liberal party to which it is my privilege to belong.

In one of his works, Abbé Barthélemy states that "to love one's country is to see to it that it is formidable abroad and peaceful at home". From that quotation, that statement, it might be inferred that there are two kinds of patriotism, that the inhabitants of a country are called upon to give various tokens of their patriotic spirit according to varying circumstances, and that a distinction might be drawn between patriotism in times of peace and patriotism in times of war.

During the last great war there were displayed in this country two different views of the duties imposed on us by wartime patriotism. When war broke out, we were certainly all of one mind in saying that this country was bound to help England and the Allies to ensure the triumph of their just cause. Differences of opinion arose as to whether we were legally, morally or in honour bound to do it; nevertheless, the capital fact remains that we were all agreed there was an obligation on our part, by whatever name it might be called. Starting from that principle, the rulers at that time, headed by Sir Robert Borden, thought that Canada should take part in the world-wide war from entirely imperialistic or solely military considerations, which the opposition forces based their claim upon a truly liberal notion, upon an idea which was Canadian rather than imperialistic.

These were the principles underlying the first view, that is the exclusively militarist view: The interests of the empire were to supersede those of Canada; we had to give up our last man and our last dollar and, if necessary, to lay aside our constitutional law, to rule the country through unusual Orders in Council and even to so break the Constitution as to put upon our statute books a law called the compulsory military service Act, which is unfair, nefarious and unconstitutional. We opposed the passing of that legislation because we thought — and we still think so—the fundamental laws of this country did not allow the Government to sanction such a principle. We opposed it because we hold — and we still hold — that Canada should only take past in the war according to her resources, and that an exclusively militarist patriotism was a dangerous error, that is should be subjected to and guided by the purest economic patriotism.

We begged the Government to protect our economic interests, to spend cautiously, to increase production, to do all those things in order to avoid a financial cataclysm, to prevent the Allies from starving to death. Aud we thought that by the most energetic use of our resources so as to procure food and munitions to the Allies, we would be discharging a large part of our obligations as a self-governing colony of the British empire.

Blinded by their extreme imperialism, their wild militarism, the Government replied to every remark we made to them when there was a question of rebuilding our economic framework, of reducing the expenditure, of taking measures in order to prevent a rise in the cost of living, of obeying the Constitution and respecting the franchise and the constitutional rights of every citizen of this country — to every one of those remarks the Government replied: " The war must be won ", and they would not take the preventive measures we suggested so as to avoid the financial, economic, moral and political cataclysm which now overwhelms our country.

They not only turned a deaf ear to our representation, but they thought fit to insult, to despise and to slander us. During the elections of 1917, which were won through numerous fraudulent practices made possible by the Military Voters Act, through the disfranchisement of a large number of British citizens by that unfair, or rather infernal law named the War-time Elections Act, a campaign of prejudices was especially directed against the inhabitants of the province of Quebec. We were being branded as deserters, cowards, slackers, because we advocated as a minimum of satisfaction, a referendum on conscription.

The present situation through which Canada is passing, the financial unrest with which the country is seething, the labour disturbances we witness with tearful eyes, the radical change which has taken place in the feelings of our population, as a result of the anti-Canadian policy carried out by the tory-imperialist-unionist Parliament, warrant, to my mind, the decided stand we have taken from the very outbreak of the war, and which we have maintained during the prosecution of the war.

How the times have changed? In 1917, we were cowards and traitors. To-day, the Province of Quebec is the best balanced of the provinces of Canada; it is the pivotal province from different viewpoints, such as the maintenant of social order and peace, labour and production. We are being flattered, complimented; in short we are the best fellows in the world. In this connection, let me quote an extract from an editorial that appeared in the columns of The Farmers' Sun on February 11, 1920. This is the headline of this article:

Quebec then and now.

It is funny to hear the big interests making love to Quebec. No Bolshevism there. No Demagogues preaching sedition. No labour agitation. A contented, hardworking, thrifty people. A safe and sane province, where you may invest your money at seven per cent, in privately owned concerns, unmolested by Government ownership. The finest province of Canada, and a glorious example to the turbulent West, with its organized farmers and labour men.

It is for the French Canadian to laugh, perhaps rather bitterly. Only two years ago they were being denounced as slackers and traitors. The whole province was boiling with sedition. The sturdy men of Ontario ought to go down to Quebec and clear the French Canadians out. They were priest-ridden. They were anti-British. "Shall Quebec rule?" was the war cry.

And now these fire-eaters are down on their marrow-bones, offering incense to Quebec. Why? Have the French Canadians changed their character? We have seen no evidence of it. The secret is that their votes are wanted for high protection and the big interests. "Come back" cries the agonized father. "and all will be forgiven." No; even that does not quite describe it. "Come back and we will beg your forgiveness for all the hard things we said in 1917. Instead of abuse we will give you flattery. Instead of charging you with sedition we will give you a certificate of character as bulwarks of defence against Bolshevism. Only stand by the sacred tariff and the big interests and the big profits, and we will exalt Quebec above Ontario as the premier province of Canada."

As we say, it is for Quebec to laugh. But what opinion must French Canadians hold of those who have passed from violent abuse to flattery based upon selfishness?

In this editorial, sir, there is to be found a certain amount of truth, but not the whole truth. Allow me to supply the deficiencies. The French-Canadians were not the only ones who were insulted, branded as disloyal men, traitors, deserters, during the prosecution of the great war. I remember that the farmers of the English-speaking provinces who were opposed to conscription, or at least to its being enforced in their midst, as energetically as we Liberals of Quebec, were opposed to it, were also branded by these gentlemen of the Unionist party as a band of traitors, disloyal citizens, slackers and deserters. It is no doubt within your recollection, Sir, that, during the elections of 1917, as stated by the "Farmers' Sun" that the elections in the English-speaking provinces were carried on and fought on the back of the province of Quebec and of the French-Canadians. As the farmers of the English-speaking provinces felt reluctant to conscription and were by no means favourable to it, an election dodge was resorted to and that famous order in council was passed, supplemented by the decision of Judge Duff in the case of Rowntree, to the effect that farmers should not be called to the colours, but on the contrary, should be exempted; because, as they said, national interest, the interest of the empire required an increase of production and farmers only could produce food for the Allies. Then, after dispelling the fear experienced by the farmers of the English-speaking provinces of being conscripted, they were told: "No popery! no French domination! no Quebec rule! and the election was carried. Six months later, the same national interest under which the farmers in general were exempted, required of the Government, as stated by the Prime Minister, Mr. Borden, that the exemptions be cancelled in the case of young men from twenty to twenty-three years old and that the sons of farmers be conscripted.

This was the occasion of a general protest voiced by the farmers of the English provinces, and we witnessed in Ottawa that monstrous delegation of Ontario farmers at the head of which was the new member from North Ontario (Robert H. Halbert) as chairman of the Ontario United Farmers, and the new Minister of Agriculture in the Ontario government, Mr. Manning Doherty. They came here to ask the government to fulfil their promise, to exempt the farmers' sons. You know how they were received. They were politely turned away by the Unionist government of the day under the leadership of Mr. Borden, with among its members the honourable member for Marquette (Mr. T. A. Crerar), then Minister of Agriculture.

Moreover, the order in council contained a proviso by which it was to be submitted to the House of Commons for its ratification. Three votes were taken on that question at the session of 1918. A motion was made by my honourable friend for Provencher (Mr. J. P. Molloy) to the effect that the said order in council cancelling the exemptions should not apply to the farmers. What was the result? All the Tory-Unionist-Imperialist members voted against that motion, and among the Tory-Unionist representatives was the hon. member for Marquette, the then Minister of Agriculture (Mr. T. A. Crerar), the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), the hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. T. MacNutt), the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Levi Thomson), and all the so called upholders of the interests of the agricultural class in this House and in the country at large.

I am, Sir, a steady reader of the "Farmers' Sun" since its foundation and, previously, I used to read the "Weekly Sun" which has been succeeded by the "Farmers' Sun". Following that rebuff, the new member for North Ontario, accompanied by Mr. Burnaby and Mr. Manning Doherty, travelled all over the province of Ontario, saying that the Unionist government who had among their members the honourable member for Marquette, who had among their supporters the honourable members for Red Deer, Saltcoats and Qu'Appelle and all the other unionists who are to-day the so called farmers, were treacherous to the farmers, etc., because they had cancelled the exemptions for the young men of 20 to 23 years old and had refused to exempt the farmers.

Either the honourable member for North Ontario was a humbug when he came here at the head of the farmers' delegation and was holding meetings to protest; either he is a humbug to-day in accepting as his leader the honourable member for Marquette who was the then Minister of Agriculture, and in accepting also to sit as a member of the same party with all those old unionist members who do not agree with him upon such a vital matter as the Military Service Act.

It can be asserted that if there ever were oppressors of the agricultural class, the Unionist government should be mentioned, as also the honourable member for Marquette, then Minister of Agriculture, as also the honourable members for Red Deer, Saltcoats and Qu'Appelle.

But, Sir, all of those Unionist members, now farmers, including the honourable member for Marquette, have insulted us in 1917 the same as the others; they have insulted Quebec in 1917, just as the others did and to-day they are also dancing attendance on us. The big interests mentioned by the "Farmers' Sun" are not the only ones doing so. Those so-called defenders of the agricultural class of the Western provinces who joined the big interests in 1917 to heap insults on us are now paying their court to us, and why? Because they are anxious that we, belonging of the Liberal party should join hands with them on a question of economies, on a question of free trade. The insults of 1917 did not move us; neither are we moved by the present time fawning, wherever it comes from.

Yesterday afternoon the honourable member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) answering the honourable member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) who had suggested a provincial conference in order to try the settlement of the racial difficulties, said: "Quebec is not ready to discuss just now; it is biding its time." Then the honourable member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham), in his peculiar bombastic manner, asked the representative for St. Hyacinthe if his statement was a threat, and the honourable member for St. Hyacinthe answered, very truly indeed, that it was nothing but a declaration of principle.

We do not see our way, Sir, to discuss with people who want conference without stating the why and the wherefore of such conference.

Is the honourable member for Parkdale going to come, as suggested by the "Farmers' Sun," and beg the pardon of the member for St. Hyacinthe for having called his countrymen traitors and disloyal? Is the honourable member for Peterborough going to beg the pardon of the electors and the members of the province of Quebec, in that conference, for having said that the citizens of the province of Quebec were slackers? Would perchance the honourable member for Red Deer, if he were at this conference, come and beg pardon for having voted for the cancelling of the exemption of the young men of twenty to twenty three years of age? Would perchance the honourable member for Marquette, a minister in the Unionist government, come to this conference and beg our pardon, of us of the province of Quebec, and also perhaps that of the Ontario farmers for having as a minister, refused to exempt the farmers' sons, when six months before, as a member of the Government, he had passed an order in council exempting them? This proposal of a conference has no ground to stand on.

There is no need for discussion at this time. The position we have taken, we took before the country and we will continue to hold it until the Government, who cling to power like grim death, shall give us an opportunity of going back to the electors, as is asked by the leader of the Opposition in his motion of amendement.

The honourable member for St. Hyacinthe did not make an appeal for retalliation. He expressed our feelings, the unanimous sentiment of the whole province of Quebec. For our high-mindedness, our self respect revolt at the sight of such fawning from people of the West and Ontario. Such interested flattery is indulged in with the object of dividing us in order that they may better control and persecute us.

We have always been tolerant. In the province of Quebec, justice is done to whom justice is due; we do not do to others what we do not want others to do to us. Our tolerance is not one of opportunism, as that of the jingoes, the tories, unionists and imperialists of Ontario, nor that of the so-called defenders of the agricultural class in the country. Our tolerance is not a matter of opportunism, it is immutable. It has its roots in our liberalism; it has been taught to us by that great patriot Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who, as every one acknowledges today, spent his life preaching the union of the races, concord and harmony between them; and not preaching the amalgamation or assimilation of them.

If his appeals have not been heard; if today we are threatened with social warfare, with a war of races, with a war of religions, a war of classes, the responsibility is on the heads not only of the Unionist government, but of the members for Marquette, for Red Deer, for Saltcoats, for Qu'Appelle, on all the Unionist members and on all the self-called defenders of the agricultural class,—excepting the four newly elected of this year—who have united to break the given word, to forswear their most solemn engagements towards the farmers of the country, to kindle the fire of passions and prejudices against a race, against a province which has always done its duty towards the Dominion, and which gives to-day to the other provinces of Canada the example of work, of moderation, of tolerance, as is admitted by all the newspapers supporting the Unionist government and the so-called Farmers' party.

In 1918, in the month of November, the armistice was signed, and in the course of the first session of 1919 was brought down the Covenant of the League of Nations. In this document It is said that the principal object in view in the formation of the League of Nations was to prevent future wars, and to that effect to reduce armaments. It was, no doubt, in order to reduce armaments and decrease military expenditure, that the Government caused to be presented during the same session, a Bill the object of which was to double the peace time military force of Canada and to raise it from 5,000 to 10,000 men. It meant a considerable increase of the military effectives, and of the military expenditure. The Opposition fought that Bill. We claimed that the war had been a war against war, and that if the Allies in their triumph had adopted the principle of the League of Nations, it was to the end of reducing armaments and military expenditures. A vote was taken. The whole Opposition voted against the increase of our forces and of our military expenditures; but again, the member for Marquette, the member for Red Deer and the other so-called defenders of the interests of the agricultural class in the country, either voted for such increase or abstained from voting.

The Peace Treaty was signed in June 1919 and the Government, probably in their desire to maintain their majority, called a special session of Parliament for the purpose of ratifying the Treaty. Then what happened? There were differences of opinion upon the future obligations of this country, as regards the interpretation of article X of the Covenant of the League of Nations. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. W. S. Fielding) in accord with the Liberal views, introduced an amendment providing for a reservation—an essential one, in my opinion — to the motion for which we were asked to vote in connection with the ratification of the Treaty. The reservation was asking that the Canadian Parliament be the only one to determine what should be our future obligations and whether we should take part in any future war and to what extent. The Liberal Opposition gave a solid vote in favour of that reservation which was essential, and again on that occasion the so-called friends of the farmers, the hon. member for Marquette and others, voted to have Canada tied hand and foot through the obligations imposed by Article X of the Covenant of the League of Nations, without Parliament being consulted or the people having the privilege and the right to voice their opinion through their representatives.

I remember very well that during the session of 1919, we noticed the extended absence of the hon. member for Red Deer, who, a few days later, came to the House to teach the Opposition a lesson of diligence. It shows the interest hon. gentlemen were taking in the affairs of the country and in the welfare of the great agricultural community.

As regards the question of autonomy, I wish to put on Hansard the following resolution, dealing with the subject, which was adopted at the Liberal convention, held in August 1919.

> Resolved that we strongly oppose any centralization of imperial control and that no organic change in the Canadian constitution as regards the relations of Canada to the Empire, be carried out, after its adoption by Parliament, without being ratified by the people by means of a referendum.

That is true democracy and the best means to assure peace in this country. There is talk of a future imperial Conference to be held in the course of this year or next year. The policy of the Liberal party is that none of the decisions which may be made by the Conference shall be carried out unless they are approved by Parliament and afterwards ratified by the people by means of a plebiscite. This policy which we are supporting, calls for the fullest measure of autonomy and we shall support it to the end.

The speech from the Throne has much more to say about external affairs than of home or Canada issues. Why? Because the Government who are conducting the affairs of this country are still imbued with the same imperialistic ideas as before the war. As I reminded the House a moment ago, they doubled the military forces. We opposed the measure. General Arthur Currie, in addressing the Canadian Mining Institute in Vancouver, claimed that if we wanted to remain within the British Empire, we must be ready to do our share, and should the occasion arise, to send at least 6 or 7 divisions to take part in future wars, failing which we would have to leave the Empire. That is what you would call military imperialism on land. It is an express denial of the provisions of the Covenant of the League of Nations to which our representatives contributed in London and which provides for the reduction of armaments and the annihilation of militarism. As far as we are concerned we are against the plan suggested by General Currie.

Then there is the amazing member for Parkdale, who, in his speeches in Toronto and elsewhere, advocates compulsory military training. That was rejected in United States and we are opposed to it, because we believe it would have no good effect in Canada. This does not mean the elimination of physical training in our schools, but we do not want any military training. There is a big difference between the two.

We are also threatened with imperialism on the seas, namely with a new naval policy.

Admiral Lord Jellicoe came to visit this country and malicious persons say that he took our sickly Prime Minister away with him for the purpose of persuading the people of South Africa to adopt a new naval policy. However the trip was cancelled, because the people of South Africa, who are possessed of a keen sense of national pride, would not be governed either by a foreign Prime Minister—even from Canada—or by an admiral of the British Fleet.

That naval policy is imperialistic in its nature; it means military imperialism both on land and on the seas, and its plans involve considerable expenditure. We oppose them for a good many reasons. It is not absurd to suggest an increase in the public expenditure at a time when the country is on the verge of bankruptcy and social revolution, and when we are not in a position to meet our obligations, compelled as we are to carry on by means of loans which are renewed from year to year. This reason is sufficient in itself. Again I submit that this naval policy is an absurdity under the present circumstances and the Government would do well to abandon their project rather than playing into the hands of the English imperialists and of the profiteers who are interested in the shipbuilding industry.

As to the question of economic imperialism, the House will allow me to defer my observations on that subject until the discussion of the Budget.

Canada fought four years to secure peace. Do we enjoy that peace which we were longing for? What is the policy adopted by the Government to secure and preserve a real peace which is so essential to the progress and to the mental, moral and material prosperity of our dear country? Was it based upon the eternal principles of liberty, justice and charity like any social policy ought to be? Not at all. The Governmeent, in framing their policy, were the slaves of "plutocratic barbarism" and "socialistic barbarism," which are friends and foes at the same time and, though they seem to fight against one another, agree very well to exploit the consumers and to increase the cost of living. The Government have been constantly and faithfully feeding these two kinds of barbarism. They kept in the wake of the "Profiteers" and the "rioters," to use the forceful expression of Maurras of the Action Française.

In the first place, let us take the tax exemption on Victory bonds which was taken off only last year. That exemption was intended to benefit the big capitalists at the expense of the great labouring and agricultural masses, of those who toil and suffer. The same capitalists who exacted from the workers and farmers the sacrifice of their lives were the first to fail in their duty, as far as financial aid to the country was concerned. They were the first to beg the Government to exempt them from paying their share of the war expenses. The result of that nefarious policy is that every year there is about fifteen hundred million dollars' worth of incomes which escape taxation. The Liberal party had to fight for two years before we succeeded in having that crying injustice removed. Therefore, I was right in stating, at least as far as that is concerned, that the Government were the slaves of the profiteers of this country.

At the last session, which was supposed to have been called for the sole purpose of ratifying the Peace Treaty—as intimated in the speech from the Throne—the Government introduced in the dying days of that session and quite unexpectedly, a considerable Bill for the purchase of the Grand Trunk railway. We opposed that Bill very strongly, for the following reasons which we gave out at the time: The Bill is to benefit the English investors, i.e., the capitalists, at the expense of the Canadian ratepayers, and will cost this country hundreds of millions. According to the statement made by the hon. the Minister of the Interior, we are assuming obligations which amounted to $707,929,817 in 1918, besides what we shall have to pay for the common and preferential stock of the company. It increases our debt which is already well above our means, specially if the present Government continues to support the profiteers, regardless of our national resources, which, I am glad to say, are inexhaustible.

That policy will also result in the increasing of our annual deficits, notwithstanding the fact that every year, when the time comes to discuss the Budget, we hear hon. members on the opposite side of the House and the members of the Government say: "Where shall we take the money, where will it come from?"

And these hon. gentlemen, who are always at a loss how to make both ends meet, that expenses and income may balance each other, are in a great hurry to saddle the country with a new undertaking which is bound, from the Government's own admission, to pile up yearly deficits.

Another ground on which we opposed that policy is that it was a further step towards nationalization of public services or State ownership, a socialist principle of German origin which has resulted in destroying competency, responsibilities and any sense of personal interest in administration and in encouraging extravagance.

To quote Sir Herbert Samuel, in any public undertaking socialized or nationalized, either the charges are fixed at a rate exceeding the cost price, and then it is an invisible tax, which is levied on every consumer, and at the same time the most burdensome tax, inasmuch as it is borne by ways of communication, by systems of freight and passenger transportation, or else they fall below the cost price, and in that case they are an invisible subsidy. This outright nationalization of public services has proved a dismal failure in the United States, and no later than March 1 last, after a Bill had been passed by Congress and Senate, the railway companies were handed over to their private owners, while all State control came to an end. The State ownership principle is strongly opposed by the Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Lloyd George, at least as far as the nationalization of mines is concerned, and that great patriot, Mr. Asquith, at his recent election at Paisley, the issue of which contest was a signal victory for him, emphatically condemned State ownership and more particularly the nationalization of coal mines.

Even in France, where are to be found State-operated railway companies and other railways operated by private companies, a recent experience shows that the ratio of losses on operating expenditures as compared with earnings, was higher with State-owned companies than with those under private ownership. This goes to show that when a public interest railway is operated by the State, there is waste and extravagance and inefficiency. Nowadays in France, Socialists, who are the outstanding exponents of State ownership, are becoming somewhat lukewarm in advocating this system, and Mr. Millerand, the new Prime Minister of France, who is a Socialist leader, made, on January 22, 1920, before the House of Representatives, the following statement:

> The condition of its budgets now forbids the State, regardless of our doctrinal predilictions, exclusively to assume outlay on larger public works indispensable to the development of national wealth.
> The development of such works is to be secured through a formula which renders the State, controller and part benefit-sharer, a partner with the interested collectivities and private initiative, which to larger extent than ever must be fostered and encouraged.

What follows from such a statement, Sir? That even in countries with an advanced school of thought, the conclusion reached, from experience, is that it is better to encourage private initiative than to nationalize public services, the more so at a time when currency is depreciated and public finances are so crippled and strained almost to the breaking point.

Were I allowed to put on record my own views in this connection, I should suggest that the Government accept as a basis of its policy in railway matters the principles set forth in a work entitled: "L'Avenir de la France"—The Future of France:

> Legislators, says the author, should not aim at framing a programme squaring with political formulas, but should endeavour to obtain maximum yields; the State should visualize commercial results. The operating earnings and their consequences so far as the increase of collective well-being and national wealth is concerned, ought to warrant the State in controlling private initiative. Therefore, we do not coincide in the views held by certain political men who want the State forcibly to proceed to the repurchase of railway companies. Quite the contrary, an extension of charters is the system which seems to be required, against a rental paid by the companies to the State, under the obligation for the former to improve their systems, their operating methods, and possibly by imposing benefit-sharing for the future.

Such is the principle which, in my opinion, should be adopted.

Another fact which shows the trend of opinion among members of Union Government towards socialism is the principle acted on in the classification of the Civil Service: same work, same salary. It is a socialist doctrine which ignores the fact that qualification for work and co-ordination being quite different in men, the earning power is of necessity different in each individual. Moreover, that method tends to abolish initiative, to encourage routine work and to create an injustice toward those who are better qualified and who, on account of their ability, are producing the most. In fact, the work becomes purely material instead of intellectual. Instead of following the principles as set out in the labour clauses of the Peace Treaty, instead of treating men as human beings and of proportioning their reward to the efforts produced by their intelligence, which is the first and main factor of all our actions, they regard them as mere machines by giving them a uniform status. They say: "For the same kind of work you shall receive the same amount of remuneration, regardless of your qualifications, technical knowledge or special studies." That is the socialist principle which has been introduced in the legislation of this country by the present Government.

We are complaining of the people deserting the land. They say the farms are idle, that agriculture has divorced from modern life and that the young people are leaving the country to go and live in the cities where they become intoxicated with various poisons. There undoubtedly exists a social plague, a moral disease which nobody can deny; it is evidenced by the census figures. What did the Government do to remedy that situation? All they did during the war was to enlist the farmers and their sons, with the support of the hon. members for Marquette and Red Deer, and to let the munition workers earn large wages in their manufactures. That is what happened. The Government saw to it that the farmers sacrificed their lives, being supported in that policy by the members for Marquette and Red Deer and all the so-called defenders of the agricultural class, but they did not exact the same sacrifice from the workingmen. They said to the farmers: "You shall go to the trenches and earn $1.10 a day," and to the workingmen: "Go to the cities, enjoy all the advantages and earn remarkably big wages, much bigger than you ever earned before." That is one of the principal causes of the desertion of the land, namely the adoption by the Government of a shameful and unjust policy for two different classes of the community.

They made city life one of comfort, and they intend to make it still more comfortable. How will they do it? The hon.

President of the Privy Council went to Washington, where he fought with indomitable energy in favour of the adoption of the principle of the eight-hour day. Has the hon. gentleman forgotten that there is a universal law which is as old as the world itself and which provides for the increasing of national wealth, the intensification of production and the reduction of the burden of national indebtedness. We shall have the very opposite result if we adopt the principle of the eight-hour day, and there will be a much greater discrimination against the agricultural workers. No wonder the latter are going to the cities.

Mr. Speaker, if, as unanimously proclaimed, we are enjoying in the province of Quebec to-day greater prosperity than the other provinces, if we have peace, order and harmony, it is because our people have been used by the teachings of the school and the church, to practise the great and eternal laws of work and sacrifice. It is because the people on our farms are not afraid to work effectively to reap from the fertile soil of the province of Quebec its maximum of production. It is because the workers in our cities do not hesitate to follow the teachings of the most competent religious authorities which command them to respect the rights of their fellow-citizens and to fulfil their civic duties properly.

That may be considered as a somewhat doctrinal and religious argument; but, no matter, I agree with those who assert that you must not worship God at home and then forswear Him in public. I contend that a man in public life who is thoughtful of his responsibilities, must adopt the same course in Parliament, on the hustings and in private life, always and everywhere.

We are suffering from another social disease: Luxury. To-day, nobody wants to work; they all wish to enjoy the pleasures of life, and they are all anxious to become rich. The president of Queen's University of Kingston, in an address which he delivered recently, said that the people of Canada were sinking into materialism and that you could hear of nothing else but money, and money all the time.

If we want to carry out this work of social and christian regeneration of our country, we must discard that materialism.

There appeared in the columns of a Quebec newspaper, on February 16, of this year a striking article, under this heading:

> There will be improvement all round when . . in these times of stress when the shrewdest minds are despairing of the future of the country, good sense is here to set our minds at rest, on condition that we do its bidding. And do you know what good sense would tell us, were it questioned as to how the alarming situation of the present times could be remedied? Good sense would tell us that things in general will improve:

When there will be more alarm clocks in our homes than jewellery;

When there will be more flannel petticoats than silken skirts;

When there will be found at home more slippers than fancy shoes;

When there will be more smock frocks or over-alls than fancy dresses;

When there will be more aprons and fewer decolletes;

When there will be fewer people in shops and more tillers of the soil on the farms;

When less time will be devoted to moving pictures and theatres and a little more to work at home;

When "more cows" will be kept on the farm, and there will be fewer pianos in our homes, as remarked one day by Dr. Grignon, an agricultural lecturer;

When there will be a larger number of producers than of consumers;

When people will learn how to bend their energies toward their task, and will entertain a lesser dread of labour;

When people will devote more attention to making deposits in savings banks, instead of squandering their money on trifles.

When people will be able and willing to make sacrifices and deprive themselves, instead of indulging in extravagant expenditures;

When they will realize that idleness is the mother of poverty, and work the parent of wealth;

When they will pause to ponder that this racing towards the abyss has but one issue, at the end of the trail, that is the abyss itself;

When people will set about acting on the principles of Christianity, and a little less over the principles of paganism.

When classes will have a clearer notion of solidarity and social duty.

Mr. Speaker, were those suggestions lived up to, I am convinced that many difficulties we have to grapple with to-day would be bridged over and settled; I have not the least doubt that this seething unrest would soon be on the wane; that every one would faithfully discharge his every day duties and work not only in his own interest, but also in the general interest of the country.

The hon. member for Parkdale told us yesterday, with his wonted flow of words: "I was astounded, when I joined the Unionist party, to meet there so many radicals; it is remarkable how many men with extreme ideas are to be found in that party." May I be allowed to refer for a moment to the etymological definition given by a French journalist of the word radical. Radical, says he, is derived from the word "radis" (radish) which means red outwardly, white internally and it is always found near the butter plate. The hon. gentleman is an enthusiast, a proud man, easily stirred up, who is flushed with joy to-day at being a member of the Unionist party and at being indebted for his election to the insults and slanderous attacks levelled at a sane and honest population. But it is white in the interior that is to say, a whited sepulchre, when he comes down and hypocritically suggests as he did yesterday, that we enter into conferences, without telling us what we are to confer about. Moreover his supreme ambition is to remain as near the butter plate as possible, to support the Government to prevent elections being held, as he is aware that the Government would be defeated, and that is why he feels himself at home and so comfortable in the Unionist party.

We do not want to have anything to do with that radicalism I have just referred to. We spurn those empyric methods, because we abhor materialism. On this side of the House, we are content with subscribing to and acting upon the principles of that pure liberalism we are wedded to, namely, science, honesty, charity, toleration, elevation of thought, justice and faith in the destinies of Canada. We put into practice those eternal laws, love of work and of sacrifice; we are proud and happy to proclaim that we, members of this House, from the province of Quebec, belong to a religous people, and we are not afraid to affirm that a business policy, willing or unwilling, rests upon a religious principle, and not on the worship of the God-state of ancient Rome or of Germany.

Fault is found with us for submitting this amendment to the House and contending that the time is opportune for an election. "Why, you are not in earnest, you know that you have no chance of being returned, and that you shall be beaten at the polls." Let the right hon. Prime Minister allow me to tell him that this is no answer. The question is not whether the Liberal party will be defeated at the next elections, but whether democratic principles and responsible Government are to be upheld or to win the day.

Clemenceau during the war, used to say, just like this Government: "Je fais la guerre"—"I am waging war."

When a successor to that gentleman was to be elected, the French parliamentarians said:

"This will be a peace government and the man who presided over the course of the war may not be qualified to direct the peace government." And they elected another man, M. Deschanel, as president of the republic. It is the same as regards our country. We say: We have had a war government, but peace has come, war conditions have ceased to exist for a year. We should have a peace government now and it is for the people to choose the members of the government which will have to administer the public business in time of peace.

They say: "Why, you will be defeated." And what of it. It is not success that matters, but our duty. We do not seek for honour nor profits; we stand up, not for private interests but for public interest and we aim to build in Canada a nation where greatness shall be based on justice and kindness, on work and social peace, on liberty and sacrifice.

Mr. WILLIAM FOSTER COCKSHUTT (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, this new Chamber has already listened to several very excellent speeches. If the doings of our Parliament, the legislation that we pass and the addresses that we make in this Chamber are to be equal to our surroundings, we shall have to go some in order to attain such excellence as our surroundings indicate we are at present in possession of. I desire to congratulate the architect and those who have been associated with him on the spendid result of their work as I think this legislative assembly chamber will compare very favourably with any others in the principal capitals of the world. I have visited quite a number of them, and I have seen very few that are equal in grace and durability to the splendid Chamber in which we are assembled to-day. I trust the future of Canada may justify the expenditure of the present, in legislating in such a wise and wholesome way for our people as will bring the same excellence to bear in all parts of Canada. The mover and the seconder of the Address have given us excellent speeches, and it is not necessary that I should allude to them more than in a passing way. They have already received many encomiums from other hon. members who have spoken.

One of the principal subjects, however, mentioned in the speech from the Throne has not, up to the present, received that consideration and attention that, in my opinion, is justified. The larger part of the speech from the Throne is taken up with allusions to the Peace Treaty, which is supposed to bring to an end the greatest war of all the ages and to proclaim peace and future happiness to the world. The war was a deadly affair; but the Peace Treaty I think is, in many respects, a bigger disaster than the war. It is now about eighteen months since the Armistice was signed, and during that period the Peace Treaty has been before the various parliaments and legislative assemblies of the nations that were concerned. Up to the present time I have seen no proclamation from any of the great nations that would lead us to believe that conditions of peace have yet been reached, while we know, in the neighbouring country to the south, the attitude of the legislators and of those high in authority towards the Peace Treaty is lamentable in the extreme and is causing and will continue to cause unrest until these matters are finally settled between the great combatant nations of the world. I have been watching fairly closely the doings in the United States capitol with regard to the Peace Treaty and the discussions thereon. I have alluded to this matter already on two previous occasions. I know that I am singular in that respect, as I have heard no one else express the same view; but I have said from the start and I say so again that, in my judgment, it was a great mistake to unite the League of Nations and the Peace Treaty in one document. The plenipotentiaries who were sent to the Peace Conference were charged with making peace with the nations with whom we have been at war. That was their first and main duty so far as I can understand it, and to endeavour to wipe away war for all time and to raise idealistic pillars throughout the world was something that could have been taken hold of later on. Whether the League of Nations, which is really an ideal, and is another term for the balance of power, is finally successful or not, there was no good reason why the matter of dealing with the League of Nations should not have been left until the Treaty of Peace had been fully signed, sealed and delivered. I may be, as I say, singular in that respect, but as the unrest in Canada and in all other countries of the world is one of the most serious subjects with which we have to deal, everything that tends to increase this unrest or to continue it should be removed, and by the bringing to an end of these negotiations and the signing of this Peace Treaty letting the world know that the hatchet is buried and buried for all time, or at least until another war is declared, we would wipe away a good deal of the unrest that at present prevails. In order to show that I am not taking an extreme view in speaking of the Peace Treaty as I have done, I will read a few words only from a review published in London which I have read in this House on more than one occasion. The date of the review from which I am about to read is February, 1920. There is a good deal of this which I shall not read, but I will read this so that hon. members may see a portion of British opinion goes quite as far in that direction as anything that I am able to say:

The Tiger—

Referring to Clemenceau, the former great French Premier, who was one of the greatest and most outstanding figures in the war and in the peace negotiations; and if we have arrived at a sound basis, he has had more to do with it than any other one man not even excepting our own Lloyd George.

The Tiger at large, backed as he would have been by an irresistible public opinion on both sides of the channel, could have achieved much, and even had President Wilson gone home in the "George Washington" and the conference broken up, we cannot see that the world would have been any worse off than it is to-day under the ratification of a Peace Treaty which, in trying to settle everything, failed to settle anything, and in the hope of ending all war has not even made a certainty of ending the only war that concerned it, while it opens up limitless vistas of future and hitherto undreamt of conflicts of which no man can foresee the end. The tragedy of the Peace is worse than any tragedy of the war. As some cynic has observed, the foundations have been laid of many a just and durable war.

Those are the remarks made in a magazine published on the other side. The article goes on to say, and this, I think, is also worthy of notice:

Yet another blunder was made in the drafting of the Franco-British Treaty by the insertion of the unfortunate proviso that it "will only come into force" on the ratification of the Franco-American Treaty.

So that until the United States is pleased to make a treaty with France, the British and the French treaties must be held in abeyance until that is brought to pass, which certainly does not appear likely before another presidential election for which the present treaty is going to furnish great material.

Mr. FIELDING: What is the name of the magazine?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The National Review.

The final blunder was the omission of Italy, who, now that she gets strategic security on land and at sea, could have no objection to joining in buttressing peace in the West. The policy of "deconsidering" Italy was carried so far in Paris under American auspices that this may have been another manifestation of the same spirit. Now that U.S.A. has withdrawn into her shell, we Europeans may perhaps be allowed to put our own house in order without outside interference. Our first duty is to consolidate the Entente.

I shall not read further; but the article is a long one going on to show that in resting on President Wilson to guide the destinies of the world, we have depended more or less upon a broken reed, and that he, going as the representative of and assuming to represent the whole of the American people, has failed to carry his people with him.

While Britain and France were misled to a considerable extent and believed he could deliver the goods that he claimed to have, they have now awakened to a great disappointment, and the Peace Treaty after eighteen months is more up in the air to-day in many respects than when it was first written. Canada, Great Britain, and all the countries of the world are in a state of great unrest because we are all waiting for our brethren to the south to set their pen to the Treaty, to which it appears they are going to add a very large number of reservations. I shall not criticize any body, but I do think that some of the representatives of Great Britain and the Dominions should have known, and I believe they did know, that the American constitution contained a clause to the effect that all peace treaties and all declarations of war by America are subject to a two-thirds vote of the Senate. Knowing that, and believing that the Senate would stand behind the constitution as it had done for more than a hundred years, was it reasonable to suppose that unless President Wilson had with him some guarantee or some representation from the Senate that would warrant him in speaking for the American people, he would be able to deliver to the European people all that he claimed to be able to deliver? It is clear that he has not delivered the goods, and he is not likely to, and the result is that the Peace Treaty is up in the air, and Canada and all the nations of Europe will remain in a state of chaos until the United States holds another presidential election. That is a lamentable state of affairs, and though our Government can do little to remedy it, I think we have a right to tell our brethren to the south that while they must fight out their own political differences, they should not impose upon the nations of the world a chaos that might be removed to a very large extent if they went ahead and did their duty which they have pledged themselves to the world to do. The unrest will never be settled until something of this kind is done, and a peace treaty drawn up in which all can unite.

My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) made a speech that was excellent in many respects. I am going to read a few words of his with a degree of approbation, but I reserve to myself the right of criticism which I expect to exercise a little later on for some other things he said which do not quite gibe with the declaration he made in his speech. Continuing for a moment on the subject of the unrest that prevails in Canada to-day, to my mind it is one of the most, if not the most serious question with which this House has to reckon. Thinking men not only in Canada but in all countries of the world have said that the year 1919 was the most dangerous one for civilization through which the world has ever passed. I believe that is true. We were in danger during the war; in fact, we were in danger of losing the war at one time, but never were we in as great a danger as we have been in since the Armistice was signed. What was the cause of that? An unrest, deep-seated, that cannot easily be removed. The words of the leader of the Opposition, to which I alluded a moment ago and which I will now read, are found on page 27 of Hansard:

> The war has also destroyed, as my hon. friend from London has said, much that is sacred and venerable in all our institutions, religious, political, and of every other nature. That indeed has been one of the most serious of all the effects of the war and to a very large extent accounts for the great unrest that exists in the world to-day. Men have faltered in faith where before they stood firm. Their faith in government is shaken, and in religion, and even in themselves. What we speak of to-day as Bolshevism had its growth in a country where they have had not so much in the way of religious and governmental institutions to cling to. Wherever that has been the case, there the world has suffered the most. What is needed to-day to bring about a change in conditions is a restoration to the faith that has been weakened, faith in an overruling Providence, faith in our political institutions, faith on the part of men and women in themselves.

Except for the first few words, which attribute all these disasters to the war, I heartily agree with those sentiments. My hon. friend, however, has laid a burden upon the war which should not be laid upon it, and I shall deal with that phase a little later on. For the moment, I desire to take as a text the foundation that has been given to me by my hon. friend, and I give him credit for giving utterance to one of the finest thoughts that has been expressed during this debate. In my judgment the unrest, the wrongs, and the violence that threatens Canada are so deep-seated that they cannot be reached by any legislation. You may overthrow Governments and destroy constitutions; you may upset civil and religious order and liberty, but have you got anything to take their place, which will give to mankind that for the lack of which they are now suffering? I say not. We have had an election in Ontario and the Government has been changed, but has that settled the unrest? I shall deal with that election a little later on. One of the most encouraging signs that I see to-day is the splendid Forward Movement that has been inaugurated by the Christian churches of Canada for a return to the old paths and for living again the life that we as a Christian nation have said in our churches every Sabbath day we believed in, but which we are not living up to. At the risk of being accused of sermonizing, I say I believe the unrest in Canada to-day is due to the fact that we have slipped from our moorings and have drifted from the old paths. The old foundation stones of civil and religious liberty that were laid by our forefathers in Canada, the exaltation of the Almighty and of His cause and His church, have been responsible to a very large extent for the splendid institutions under which we have lived for the past hundred years. When we enter the church to-day, and see the empty pews, and the old sound doctrine of the Word of God and the teachings of His Book discarded, we know one reason at least why the people are not easy to govern to-day, and why they have drifted away from the old sheet anchor that has stood the test of two thousand years, and will continue to stand the test if we will but recognize our duty, believe in God, and do the right. The Forward Movement has been inaugurated with a view to bringing us back to the old truths and the old paths, and I think my hon. friend had that in his mind when he made the remarks I have read. I have stated what I believe to be one of the most fundamental causes of the unrest in Canada to-day. It is all very well to ask, why does not your Government do this, or why did not your Government do that, or why did it not do the other thing; but no matter what Government is in power, no matter what legislation you enact, or how heaven-born your statesmen may be, they could not touch all the grounds of unrest in the Dominion of Canada to-day. My

hon. friend laid the whole blame upon the war, but there I disagree with him. Many people who never took part in the war are worse agitators to-day than ever they were. The war has caused some difficulties but not all; it undoubtedly is responsible for some of the present unrest and unsettlement, but not all. But people to-day are disposed to attribute every difficulty to the war, and when anything unpleasant transpires to say, "Oh, it is another result of the war." This is all wrong. There are lots of people who are better off to-day than ever they were before, and are in possession of more of this world's goods than they ever dreamed of owning. They have money to spend galore, resources which they never expected to have at their command, and still many of these very people are in the ranks of those who complain of unrest. The trouble is more deep-seated than any government is capable of reaching. As a rule, when we have had unrest in this country it has been the result of bad trade and hard times, and the suppression of the working man. None of these conditions exist to-day. Wages are higher, work is more abundant, and there is more of everything at one's hand than ever was the case in the history of this country. You cannot therefore lay the unrest at the door of the Government, on any charge that they have not endeavoured to bring about good times. My hon. friend opposite brought nearly every charge that could be laid against the Government. Now, Mr. Speaker, any legislator who undertakes to use derogatory adjectives in the way in which our hon. friend did ought to live in a very substantial house of his own, but I am afraid that when I examine the deeds of the hon. gentleman somewhat closely, as I intend to do, we shall find that he will not stand up under the glare he is prepared to put this Government under. He has applied to them pretty nearly every epithet he could think of so far as their failures are concerned, and after telling them that they had no head he stultified himself before he resumed his seat by the discovery that they had three heads. Well, it is not so long ago since the Opposition had three heads. I think they are all sitting in the front benches to-day, but two of them unfortunately have been deposed, and I am not sure whether the best man is in the lead or not. They are three excellent men and were all leading the Opposition last session, and we had from the east a triumvirate of wisdom and sagacity that has never been excelled, I think, by any Opposition in the history of this country. It appears, however, that it was found that a despotic control was better than one representative of the people, even to the number of three, and therefore the Opposition has reduced its leadership from three to one. It is with the utterances of the nominal leader of the party that I am trying to deal at this moment. The hon. gentleman has moved an amendment to the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, in which he seeks an immediate election. Well, I think His Excellency will rather smile when he reads the appendage which my hon. friend seeks to place to the Address. He will probably consult the history of the last two or three elections and see what was done by the hon. gentleman who now asks for an immediate election. I am afraid that if my hon. friend were granted his request to-day he would not be in the clover as he evidently anticipates. No; not by any means. If he is looking for a seat in Ontario, as he did at two previous elections, I am afraid he will fall sadly short of his expectations; for, notwithstanding his severe lambasting of the Government and his indulgence in all the disparaging adjectives which he could marshal against them, he will have to answer a little on his own account, and one of the questions will be this: "Where were you during the war, and what did you do towards the winning of it?" Because there are yet in the communities of Ontario a very respectable portion of people who measure a man's worth by what he did in the war and not by what he said or where he was; and I fear that, measured by that standard, when my hon. friend goes before the people of Canada he will have some very knotty points to clear with regard to himself before he deposes a government which, bad as they may be, and having made as many mistakes as they have made, still gave us a splendid amount of legislation and endeavoured to carry on the war and see that our boys were supported in order that the struggle might finally be won through the assistance of Canada in keeping at the front one of the best fighting units that were seen in Europe during the whole of the war. Some credit is surely due the Government for having thus "carried on." The leader of the Government gave us a list—and it was only a part of it—of what had been done. It was a very magnificent list which he gave to the House only two days ago of the doings of the Government since they were in power. He might very well, in addition to all the things he enumerated, have told us what we have done in Canada in a trade way in the last year. As he did not do so, I purpose to read just a few words from the Gazette published by Mr. Robert S. White. It is an edition sent out with one of the special numbers giving in concrete form the history of Canada's business for the year 1919. In the light of this article I do not wonder that my friend opposite could not find much reason for criticism:

Business has been excellent in Canada throughout the year 1919. There has been an increased domestic trade, while foreign trade has been singularly well maintained, in view of the cessation of munition shipments. The amount of money in circulation is the largest on record, and probably the most convincing evidence of the prosperity of the people is the large increase in savings deposits in the banks, $198,525,000, or about $25 per head of population, plus a large investment in war bonds. Prices of commodities have remained high, and the cost of living has not been reduced; in fact, some classes of foodstuffs are dearer than ever before. Labour has been unsettled, with numerous strikes in important industries, curtailing production, and usually resulting in higher wages and higher costs of output. The year, however, closed with an improvement in the labour situation, and at the time of writing Canada is comparatively free from strikes. The business mortality was low. Not for many years has the failure list been so light, nor trade so free from losses occasioned by bad debts. The stock market has had unwonted activity, with rising prices for many shares, especially those of paper making companies, who have found a ready sale for their product at profitable prices in the United States and have, in addition, derived a handsome sum from the premium on New York funds.

The crop was a fair one, but by no means bountiful, yet by reason of high prices the money value of the harvest makes a new record, it being placed at $1,452,788,000, against a value of $886,495,000 in 1916. The cost of production has increased in the three years, through higher wages for labour, but there must be a substantial gain in income by farmers who were fortunate enough to reap a good crop. The notable failure was in Southern Alberta and Southern Saskatchewan, due to drought. The number of live stock was slightly increased during the year, except in the case of swine, which show a decrease of about 5%; but as compared with 1914 the official returns show a large addition to have been made to the herds and flocks of farmers. Despite the unexampled high prices, dairy production dwindled, due possibly in part to mid-summer drought. The export of cheese from Montreal was the lowest in twenty years, being 1,172,460 boxes, while in 1906 it had a dimension of 2,227,838 boxes; and of butter only 79,155 packages were shipped from this port, as against 861,400 packages thirteen years before. What was lost in quantity was, indeed, recovered in value, but the decline in this important branch of agricultural industry is not comforting.

[Mr. Cockshutt]

There you have in concrete form the history of the trade of Canada. The banks show a more marvellous development, if such were possible, in spite of Government borrowings which have been close upon $2,000,000,000 and all from our own people. Canada has been in position to finance herself and her war burdens in a way that she never dreamed of and I question if any other country in the world that was involved in the war has a better trade or financial showing than that which Canada has been able to make. Whatever credit may be due to this Government I am not in a position to say, but I think that some credit should be given to them in this regard. Even the leader of the Opposition, in his very crushing speech, was unable to point out anything that was not to the credit of the Government in so far as trade and financial matters are concerned. There is a good deal more that I might read to advantage but I do not want to trespass upon the time of the House to any great extent. This Government, in addition to all those things I have mentioned, and that were recounted by the right hon. acting Prime Minister, particularly in regard to trade development, should also get the credit for the nationalization of our railways. That question has not been mentioned so far in the debate but it has to do with one of the most gigantic projects considering the small number of people in this country that was ever undertaken in the history of the world. It remains to be seen whether the financial results will justify the expenditure. It was a necessity in any case, but whether we can justify that investment by the returns from the railways remains to be seen. I am optimist enough to believe that the railways of Canada, well managed and with proper rates, on both passengers and freight will, in the end, justify their existence and that not only will we be able to pay our way, but that after all costs and charges have been met a substantial revenue will finally come to the treasury as a result of the management which will be given these railways under a commission or other properly constituted board. I think that in the meantime they are doing very well. If anybody questions the kind of service that the National railways are giving, I would ask him to take a ride from Ottawa to Toronto on the new service that has been inaugurated and if he is not satisfied that the Canadian Government is giving a splendid and an expeditious service, he will not have had the same experience as that which I have enjoyed in travelling over the line two or three times lately between Ottawa and Toronto because I believe the service is of a character unsurpassed on the continent.

The labour situation in Canada has caused a good deal of disturbance during the past year. As my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is an expert in labour matters, I had thought that he would have propounded something in the nature of an alleviation for the strikes that have existed in Canada and for more or less of the unrest that has been present in the labour market. I believe that labour is more fully employed and better paid to-day than it ever has been in the history of Canada and that there is very little to complain of in point of the hours of work and the remuneration that is given to the working men of Canada for the services rendered. I am not sure but that when normal times come back, as they may come back, we will be able to keep up the high standard of wages that has been set during the past year. Labour, I think, is an important, if not the most important, factor in the population of Canada to-day. There may be those who belong to the U. F. O. who will dispute that statement and say that labour is not equal in numbers, and should not receive the same consideration, as agriculture. I do not exactly remember the relative figures but I believe that there are as many who are called labourers or artizans in one branch of industry or another as there are farmers upon the land, and therefore I view with a good deal of solicitude the course that is being embarked on by certain sections of the people of Canada. At the risk of receiving very severe criticism from some of our agricultural friends, I am going to say, Mr. Speaker, that I believe that the agrarian movement is a destructive movement for the Dominion of Canada. I believe that in my heart, and believe that those who embark upon it to-day will find it out later. Class legislation in Canada, and class legislation must follow, if an agrarian Government is going to be formed in Canada, as it has been formed in the province of Ontario, can only have one result. We have pulled down one Government in Ontario—I thought it was an excellent Government—and we have put in another. It remains to be seen whether or not we have made a shift for the better or for the worse but for my part, I expect that it is for the worse. I trust I may be deceived. In the first place, we have always thought that population should rule in Canada, but that does not seem to be necessary now. Ontario has a government to-day that represents less than one-third of the popular vote cast in the last election. I have the figures here; I do not know that it is necessary to detain the House by reading them, but you are all familiar with them. There were two other parties in the fight that polled more votes than were polled by the agrarian aggregation in Ontario at the last election, and yet, with the addition of labour, they are in power. I want to give them a fair chance and I hope they will make good but in my humble judgment no class legislation of this kind will finally succeed. I believe that to be a united people we must have all classes represented in the Government. But when I look about I see that only one class is eligible. No speaker is welcomed or permitted, in some cases, on the platform unless he can qualify. I am making an attempt to qualify. They tell me that I am an awfully poor farmer but I do a little bit of farming and I hope that some day I will qualify to go upon the platform with my hon. friends. I will be delighted to address them and I hope they will be pleased to listen to me, especially when they have a chance of coming back as they would be entitled to. I trust that those who now occupy the seats of the mighty at Toronto will loosen up a little bit and remember that while we city people are more or less benighted and dangerous, we are at the same time human beings, that there are quite a number of us, and that we think we are entitled to be heard occasionally even if we are not in power. The Government which has been formed at Toronto consists, I believe, of eleven members, eight of whom represent the U.F.O., two labour and one is a lawyer. The important mercantile community, the community of capitalists, if you call them such, the community represented by the great institutions of the country have no voice, nor are they likely to have a voice in the near future, in the legislation that will take place at Toronto. That is only one province and perhaps it will not do us much harm to have the experiment tried out there but I would hesitate before asking that such a course should be pursued in the Dominion. I believe that the people of Canada cannot afford to try the experiment of adopting a policy that will be one sided, because I believe that all our industries and resources, whether in the country or in the city, should be developed by any Government that is at the head of affairs in Canada. I trust that whether this election which our friends opposite would bring on comes soon or late, or whoever may be called to power and entrusted with the duty of legislating for Canada, we will have a Government that gives every class of the people a chance to be heard in the legislative halls and that the right to take part in the consideration of public measures shall not be confined to any one class. The best interests of all concerned would seem to indicate that in the formation of any Government the various elements of our people, both religious and industrial, should be represented in the councils of the nation. That idea has been tried out in the past, it has succeeded, I believe it will succeed in the future and I trust that those who favour some of the experiments which are being made at the present time will not take unkindly to the suggestions I am making.

Because I believe there are many men in the West, and in the East, among the agrarian communiy, who do not care to see this experiment undertaken and who have said so; my sympathies are with these men. Therefore we have only to hold an even hand between this class and all the other classes, recognizing that all are greater than any one, that all parties are greater than any one party. But I say this, Mr. Speaker, and I do so, I think, without fear of contradiction, that as bad as the party system may be—failure as it may have proved to be in the past, to some extent—that the party system of Government, call it by what name you please, is better—has proved better and will prove better—than the class system of government. Bad as the party system may be, it embraces all classes in every community; and I for one—and I am considered to be a fairly bigoted old Tory by a good many people—would rather see my friend opposite, to some of whose remarks I have taken exception to-day, come into office representing a united Liberal Party than I would see any class—Capitalists, Manufacturers, whatever you may designate them. I would rather see there my hon. friend at the head of a united Liberal Party that comprised all classes than I would any one particular class with which a person might be pleased to associate himself, because I believe that a party of that kind will give us better administrative results than any class system can give.

Now I have spoken very clearly and plainly upon that point, Mr. Speaker, and I may have spoken perhaps more strongly, my friends may say, than wisely; but the matter has been on my chest for some little time, and I thought the time was opportune to get rid of it; and before our good friend the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), after the coming general election assumes the Premiership of Canada—which he is said to be aiming at and is likely to obtain, so we are told by many—I wish to advise him as a candid friend in a humble way, that he should not forget the little chaps outside as well.

With regard to the uplift legislation to which reference has been made time and again in this House, while I am a believer in endeavouring to assist people to live good lives by passing laws with that object in view, I have always been instructed and taught that in order to make men good there must be in the individual a right heart and a right conscience impressed with the verities of the Truth of God and of sacred things, and that we must rely more upon the goodness of people's hearts than the strictures of the law to cause them to be good. In that respect I believe that prohibition, good as some people think it is and necessary as it was during the war, has not justified the expectations of its friends.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I have supported prohibition myself on more than one occasion, but not because I thought it was the best thing to do as an exemplification of Christian duty and Christian charity, but out of deference to the opinions of many of my excellent friends who thought and believed it would work wonders and who promised us that great wonders would result. It is therefore, Mr. Speaker, a matter of disappointment to me that I read, that not only in Canada but practically the world over, a wave of lawbreaking and lawlessness of the most vicious type has been rampant during the past year, the like of which has not been equalled in any previous period. Now I am not laying that at the door of prohibition, and I do not want my hon. friend in my rear who applauds my statement to think that I am going to advocate that we should have the free use of strong drinks. I do not think that would be good for us. I believe in——

Mr. BUTTS: Did the hon. gentleman notice that under the prohibition law 22,000 cases of Scotch whiskey were landed in Halifax from one of the large liners, the name of which I do not at present recall?

Mr. COPP: What became of it?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I understood that that ship had gone down and had never reached port.

Mr. BUTTS: No, sir.

An hon. MEMBER: That whiskey went ashore at Cape Breton.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I do not wish to discourage any of our friends in the House who believe in legislation of that kind—

Mr. BUTTS: Or importations.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: —but I want to impress upon this House that in my judgment if the citizens of Canada are to be as good as we want them to be, adherence to the truth I endeavoured to lay before you in the early part of my address is a very much better, safer and surer road to follow than to enact any compulsory legislation that strives in itself to make a man good when his heart is wrong and he is swearing all the time at being compelled to do a thing he would not do if he followed his own inclination. I do not believe in legislation of that kind. I follow a Church and a bishop whose doctrines I believe are in close unison and in conformity with the stand I have now taken. I draw that inference because at a recent gathering the distinguished ecclesiastic in question said we must rely more upon scriptural truths and upon the law of God and the converting power of the salvation of His Son than we must in legislation, enacted sometimes by a majority and some times by a minority, to force people to go in opposition to their will and inclination. The result is, I think, baneful to the law and bad for our own faith; it is a case of trusting in our own works to do what the Divine Law alone can do. I put in the same category all these kinds of legislation that seek to force good down a man's throat. I believe in the efficiency of moral suasion and of right doctrines and right beliefs to influence a man, rather than forcing him to be good by legislation.

Perhaps I have said too much in that regard. I now want to commend this Government for some things it has done. I think that the right hon. gentleman who at present leads the House has enumerated enough to show that this Government has done more in great acts of legislation of a far-reaching character than any Canadian Government has done in a like period. It must be remembered that this Government is but a little over two years old, and the recounting of its acts would take a long time. Much of its legislation has been very far-reaching, and much of it has involved hundreds, almost thousands of millions of dollars, and I believe that the future will justify the formation of this legislation.

Mr. COPP: That is your opinion.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Whether it will be a continuity or not I do not know; it will have to brace up if it is going to carry the country, there is no doubt about that.

Mr. COPP: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: We on this side will have to get out and talk to the people, because I notice that our friends of the other aggregations are about in the country, and we cannot expect Union principles to flourish while we sit silent in the House of Commons here and allow the other fellows to do all the talking and all the preaching and take all the encomiums for everything that has been done and make the charge that the Government was unwilling to do anything—that it would not have done what it has done if it had not been forced.

Whether that is the case or not, the Government has so far justified its existence. I agree with the member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) in this respect—I shall not discuss the subject now, as I hope to do so on a later occasion—that the economic question will be the next issue upon which the people of this country will be divided at the polls. Whether the member for Nicolet (Mr. Trahan) is justified in believing that Quebec will be just as solid against some other parts of Canada as it was in the last election, I do not know. It could scarcely be more so than it was at the last election, because on that occasion only three members who sit on this side were elected from the province of Quebec.

I believe that Quebec has considerable light on some questions, and of these the trade question is one. I am sorry that the member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) is not in his seat, for I should like to ask him whether his removal from Kamouraska to the manufacturing district of Eastern Quebec has had any effect upon his free trade notions. I miss my guess if his views on free trade and protection are not somewhat modified in the near future when they are applied to the good old city of Quebec. Quebec is a manufacturing centre, and Quebec will have something to say about the fiscal question if that is the issue at the next election. And if it is, I for one am quite ready for the fray. On many occasions the people of Canada have expressed a decided opinion upon that question, and if it is put before them again they will give the same answer. I therefore advise the leader of the Opposition to withdraw his amendment and to think it over for a year. If it should carry and he were sent before the people tomorrow, he would be a disappointed man, because he is not as ready as he thinks he is to face the electorate. I do not wish him any harm so far as his resolution is concerned, but it would be a pity to see him make a failure of his first enterprise in the splendid surroundings of the new Parliament building. I advise him, therefore, to withdraw the amendment; if he does not, it will be ruthlessly slaughtered by the House when the vote is taken upon it.

Mr. J. E. FONTAINE (Hull) (translation): Mr. Speaker, it is my good luck to have my turn to speak after the honourable member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), for it affords me the opportunity to reply to the question which he had the impertinence to put to the hon. leader of the Opposition, when he asked him what he had done during the war. I hold no brief to defend my leader, as he can well do it himself, but I am anxious to give the member for Brantford the following answer: During the war, the hon. leader of the Opposition, most conversant with labour questions, was settling some strikes of miners in the United States and was thus working towards bringing closer together employees and employers, thereby enabling munition plants to give their maximum output. The result obtained by the hon. leader of the Opposition, everybody will admit, was a most valuable assistance to the Allies.

But to you, the hon. member for Brantford, might I be allowed to put the same question? What were you doing during the war? You were here in this House and you were supporting, by your vote, all those who were thriving on the sufferings of the people, and permitting certain companies to realize scandalous profits of from 100 to 200 per cent, and you were yourself increasing the prices of agricultural implements of your own manufacture. Such is your patriotism.

I now wish to congratulate the hon. members who have moved and seconded the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne. They had to put forth a good deal of willingness and, above all, a lot of imagination in order to find means to praise the present Government, during half an hour respectively, and from that point of view, I do offer them my congratulations.

Every citizen in Canada was eagerly expecting the opening of Parliament. Every one hoped that the Government would at last declare in the speech from the Throne a well defined and settled policy which would enable the country to emerge from the chaos which the war had wrought, and make it enter upon the road to progress and promotion.

Empty delusion and empty expectation, Mr. Speaker, for this speech gives us no information. Yet, the hon. ministers have repeatedly told us of a reconstruction programme, of an after-war programme which would regenerate the country. What is then the reason of this predicament? It is because the Government have of union but the name; the ministers are at variance and cannot agree upon a programme. The Tory group wants to continue the policy of protection which brings wealth to one class only, whilst the so-called Liberal group is in favour of lowering the tariff, and so, in order to keep themselves in power and avoid appealing to the people, neither group imposes its opinions and the country goes on aimlessly. Those among the ministers who have preserved the sense of Liberalism and who do not want to become hopelessly ruined in the public opinion resign one after another, and the Prime Minister, unable to meet the situation, puts himself on the sick list and travels through unknown lands in order to recuperate.

Mr. Speaker, we have a debt of two billions, we are overburdened with taxes of all kinds, the cost of living is ever increasing, the people are in the power of the Trusts, and meanwhile the Government remain inactive and do nothing to improve the conditions. We are being told again every day that the remedy can be found in economy and overproduction. Economy, Mr. Speaker. Does the Government practise it? Far from it. Every day large amounts are uselessly spent, the ministers launch us into hazardous ventures, such as the purchase of the Canadian Northern, of the Grand Trunk and of the Grand Trunk Pacific; the militia expenses are doubled, fabulous amounts have been spent during the war in order to favour political friends, and now the hon. Minister of Marine informs us of the construction of a navy, after Lord Jellicoe's inspiration, which will imply an expenditure of several million dollars.

Sir, do you not think it would be more in keeping with patriotism to expend those millions towards developing the country, building railroads or building the Georgian Bay canal, a work required for such a long time and which would help developing and enriching the country to such a great extent? Now, what is the Government doing to encourage overproduction while they so strongly recommend the people to overproduce? Should they not begin by helping the producers? The farmers must be helped, we must give them the means to produce at low cost by doing away with the duty on all implements required for farming purposes. Sir, I cannot believe that the farmer is obliged to pay one hundred and fifty dollars for a binder which he could secure for seventy-five dollars were the duty abolished. He is forced to enrich the manufacturer, and the consumer is bound to pay a much larger price for the goods which he needs.

Last year, the Government, yielding to public opinion, decided to appoint a certain commission called Board of Commerce. That board was to preclude the manufacturers and the big companies from overcharging the consumer, to preclude them from realizing big profits. But this was a mere allurement, the monopolists and the trusts kept forestalling all the products and piling them up in the warehouses so as to increase the prices, and the chairman of that board has just handed the Government his resignation out of disgust, saying that the law was ineffective and his hands were tied up by political influences. That is, Sir, what the Government has done to reduce the cost of living.

It is said, in the speech from the Throne, that a new Franchise Act will be brought down. I am glad of it. I am delighted to hear that the iniquitous War-time Elections Act will be struck off our statute book forever. I ask the Government to give us a Franchise Act fair and just and allowing the people to speak out freely. Let everybody be enfranchised. In a democratic country as Canada is, every citizen, whether rich or poor, whether big or small, should have the right to say what he thinks of the public men and of the political questions. The right to vote is a sacred advantage which should be enjoyed by the workingman and by the manufacturer alike, by the mechanic as well as by the farmer. Though wishing to make no prediction, I feel assured that if we are given a Franchise Act in keeping with ever so little honesty, of those who are now sitting to our right, Sir, not excepting even the honourable ministers, very few will come back to Parliament after the next general election.

I see it is also proposed to amend the law with respect to labour. That is most serious at this moment, Mr. Speaker. You are fully aware of all the uneasiness which now prevails between capital and labour, of all the strikes which have taken place throughout the country. As I have said it in this House on a previous occasion, as a matter of principle, I am not in favour of strikes, but I think that the workingmen are not entirely wrong, they suffered from the war to a greater extent than any other class, and now that the war is over, they suffer from the high cost of living to a greater extent than any other class also; and while they are toiling and enduring all kinds of hardships, the Government allows the manufacturers and the millionaires to double the amount of their fortunes. Is there, in this country, a single citizen who will claim that the workingman was properly treated by the Government? Let us better his position, let us secure for him better protection against accidents and in case he is out of work; in fine, Sir, let us grant him an old age pension. While not wishing in any way to worry the House, I would again repeat my request: It is my earnest belief that when a workingman has kept toiling all his life and, in many cases for a salary which was inadequate, to enrich his employer, who decides to dispense with his services when he has become old and incapacitated, should be protected by the State to the extent of being relieved of the alternative of remaining a burden to his children or of being obliged to take the road to the hospital. I know that this request of mine will not be favourably considered, for the Government is now dismissing hundrreds of employees at the Printing Bureau, under the pretence that they are too old. Such a course is shameful and I protest against such dismissals of old servants.

Mr. Speaker, I have fully appreciated the sympathetic remarks made by the Acting Prime Minister about the French Canadians, the other day; we have been so little accustomed to such flattering compliments, for a few years past especially, that we cannot believe what we hear. Though believing the hon. minister to be in good faith, I may tell him that it will take more than words to make us forget the abuse and the sufferings which we had to endure. He must give us our full share of representation in the Government, the commissions and all public appointments.

Of late years, this Government's policy has favoured the complete exclusion of French Canadians from public service. Today, you praise the the province of Quebec; you find that our citizens are peaceful and clear-sighted. It is a fact Mr. Speaker. The best indication in this connection is the peace and tranquility which have prevailed in our province since the war is ended, while unrest and strikes are rampant in all the other provinces of the Dominion. What is the reason for this, Mr. Speaker? It is because my fellow-countrymen are imbued with the spirit of catholicism and accept the guidance of the Catholic Church which teaches the people to respect and obey all laws.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, I urge the Government and all the hon. members to support the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition asking for an immediate election. A few days ago, I heard the Acting Prime Minister state here that the members of the Opposition were not in earnest and would find themselves in a sad plight if the writs were issued for a general election. Well, then why not accept our challenge, Mr. Minister? Dissolve Parliament and let us go before the electorate. For my part, I am confident of what the outcome will be. I remember that in 1896, the country was getting through a period of depression pretty similar to the one whose effects are being felt to-day. The Canadian people turned their eyes towards the Liberal party then under the leadership of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. There followed a period of fifteen years of wise and progressive administration. To-day as in 1896, the people of Canada turn their eyes toward the Liberal party which is under the direction of a new leader, young and talented, in whom we have placed all our hopes and who will also be able to give to this country of ours a prudent and progressive government.

Mr. FRED LANGDON DAVIS (Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House for the first time in this magnificent Chamber I cannot refrain from complimenting the people of Canada upon the housing which has been provided for their representatives in Parliament. May the noble proportions of this building find reflection in our acts here. Should its magnificence and grandeur subject us to temptations by which we were not assailed in the old, democratic hall of the Victoria Museum; should we be inclined to give way to extravagance and to the adoption of measures without proper consideration, let us be humbled by the thought that much of what has been expended in the construction of this splendid building is borrowed money.

I wish also to compliment the mover (Mr. Cronyn) and the seconder (Mr. McGregor) of the Address. I have seldom listened to a better speech than that of the mover; by old parliamentarians it is said that it will rank with any that has been delivered on a similar occasion during the last twenty years.

Before dealing with the subject which I mean to make the main point of my remarks, I should like to refer for a moment to the amendment which has been moved by the leader of the Opposition. My mind goes back to the fact that in 1911, before the result of the last census was announced, we had an election which deprived the West of its proper representation in this House until the election of 1917, and it seems to me that the demand for an election immediately is going to perpetuate that, as I regard it, evil state of affairs. I think, therefore, that the mover of the amendment will not find very many western members in full sympathy with him in the consideration of that proposition, because the next census coming on in 1921 with redistribution after that, would give the West its proper voice in this House.

This House to-day is facing a situation which surpasses in its strain and stress even the days through which we lived from 1914 to 1918. We find to-day, after having raised vast sums of money to carry on the war, that we have financed this war without having engaged taxation in its carrying on; we have carried on the war with borrowed money. To-day we find our money at a depreciation of anywhere from ten to seventeen cents on the dollar with United States currency. We find ourselves faced with problems of taxation which must leave to our Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) very few nights of full rest, I am sure. Let me say here that while as a member of the party in power, I feel called upon to criticise the course we have followed, I cannot recollect hearing from the Opposition during the years of the war those demands for increased taxation which some of us on this side of the House have been constantly voicing. In the 1918 Budget I asked for $400,000,000 to $500,000,000 in taxation instead of what we were then raising. In 1919 I demanded double what we were raising. Let us compare our 1919 Budget with the Budget in Great Britain. We levied $280,000,000 in taxation and we had before that levied as high as $167,000,000 in taxation. That was an increase of somewhere about 60 per cent. What was Great Britain doing in the same year? £940,000,000 was her levy in 1919, and £207,000,000 was her last levy before the war. In other words she had not merely taken up the slack which had been made by the depreciation in the value of money, but doubled her taxation on top of that. Had we done the same, our troubles to-day would be less than they are. Along with this let me refer to another matter. Mr. Joseph Cannon, who cannot be accused of lack of political experience said: "Creating offices is the easiest job in the world and abolishing them the hardest." We have had a large number of offices created during the war. Are we abolishing them? Recently, I saw a report that 25,000 returned soldiers had been placed in positions in the Civil Service. How many civil servants have been let out to make those places? In the main, there is an increase, a super-addition to a force that was already very large.

We face to-day a net debt of about $2,000,000,000. We face a need for taxation running from $325,000,000 to $400,000,000. Last year we levied for $280,000,000, and it is probable that that will be overrun by $20,000,000 or $30,000,000, partly because of the way in which increased exchange is encouraging imports. I am not going to sketch the whole situation, but I will endeavour to deal with some of the things that can be done to remedy it. One of the things that we have done has been, because of inflation of credit, also to inflate our currency. I hold in my hand a report of one of our great banks showing that the currency in the hands of the people has increased from $10 per head in 1907 to $30 per head in this last year; that the total amount of currency in the hands of the people has risen from figures around $100,000,000, to figures ranging from $210,000,000 to $240,000,000. One of the great causes of the high cost of living has been, without doubt, not merely the waste, the lack of production—these were first causes in themselves—but, adding to them and lending weight and effect to them, the course of our financing, our expenditure of huge sums of money representing the proceeds of Government borrowings put afloat among our people without any due regard to the limits of debt creation has greatly inflated both credit and currency. The consequence is that to-day we have far more currency out than we should have with the result that we have doubled cost of all commodities. We are not alone in this unfortunate position, and that in one sense makes our task the greater. If we have inflated our currency from 100 to 245, Great Britain has inflated hers from 100 to 285; there is a great inflation in the United States; there is four to five fold increase in Italy; there is an increase from 100 to 700 in France, a greater increase again in Germany, and not less than a twenty fold increase in Russia. Every industrial nation in the world has gone out on the same course. Hence, if we want to bring down our currency to proper proportions, we have to row against the tide. We have the pull of all of these other national currencies to contend with. How can you reduce the issue of currency? There is but one way, and that is to have a surplus of taxation over expenditure. When the Government puts out this money it puts it out in return for goods and services. Hence when the Government want to call it in, it can only do so by taxation. It can only withdraw a portion of it when its taxation exceeds its expenditure. If we have an excess of $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 of taxation over expenditure, we can use that in reducing the currency, but not until then can we make the reduction. Hence the man who looks for a reduction in the cost of goods in the next few years is chasing a phantom. It is impossible to do so until we have restored the balance and got the balance on the right side.

Let us now consider what we have been doing in the past year or two. Last year we levied for $280,000,000 of taxation and we spent about $900,000,000. We went $600,000,000 in the hole, and let us not be deceived by the fact that we borrowed a large part of this money from our own people. That does not help us at all; the debt is still a debt which the nation must shoulder. Therefore, if we are going to get out of this difficulty, we must cease borrowing which is one of the sources of inflation; we must make taxation and expenditure balance. That can be done in two ways; first, we can retrench and secondly, we can tax. Let us consider what means we have of retrenchment. There are four points at which there is control of expenditure. The officers in charge of expenditure can effect economy; the departmental auditor in his department can also effect economy, but under our system both of these are practically eliminated because the minister at the head of the department only finds his power and consequence increased the more he spends on his department. His political influence and his own personal record as an administrator are largely dependent upon the amount of money which his department expends, so he is not the person to trust for economy. You come next to the Minister of Finance. If he is not a very careful man, determined to have his own way, he will not effect economy. If, for instance, he is personally ambitious and wants to gain the support of the members of the Cabinet, he will let them have their way. If he is a weak man he will let them have their way, perhaps for more ignoble reasons. The consequence is that Parliament is the one and only means of effectively controlling expenditure. That brings me to a consideration of the method of voting estimates. There is not a member of this House, I am sure, who has not felt the futility of our method. When the estimates are submitted to Parliament some member, on the Opposition side generally, and once in a while, under present circumstances, a member on this side of the House arises and makes a few remarks perhaps about some steamboat that has been taken off its usual course, or wants to know why some clerk has been dismissed. Sometimes these matters take up three or four hours, and finally the estimates go through in bulk, because that has been the practice for the last thirty or forty or fifty years. That is the degree of attention that Parliament gives the estimates. No man can possibly make himself familiar with all the estimates; indeed, it is pretty nearly a life work to make oneself familiar enough with one department to discuss its estimates effectively. How can we remedy this? Let us see what the Mother of Parliaments has done in order to get control over expenditures. In 1912 the British House appointed a committee on estimates. It acted through one session, and it was found that it could deal during the session with practically only one department. It was an ordinary committee of the House, without any clerical assistance, and had to do all its work within the session, and it was going to take thirty or forty years to scrutinize all the estimates. It could not get the necessary information on all the estimates and make a report in time for the House to deal with them that session, and consequently, when the war came, that committee was dropped. The next time you come across a reference to it is in the seventh and ninth report of the Select Committee on National Expenditure of 1917, of which the Hon. Herbert Samuel was chairman. The whole question was dealt with by that committee, and better means were devised for controlling the expenditure, which means I commend to the consideration of this House. The Committee, it was proposed, should have an officer known as "The Examiner of Estimates," as well as a clerical staff acting under the direction of the committee. The committee was composed of thirty members, I believe, divided into two sections, one section dealing with the main estimates, and the other with estimates for new undertakings, or what we would call subliminary estimates. There were two recommendations which must be considered if the project is to be successful. One of these is that the estimates as published should be more significant and that their allocation should be by objects rather than by subjects. The other recommendation was that a vote for reducing an estimate should not be regarded as a want of confidence motion. If it is made a want of confidence motion, the judgment of the House is no longer economic, but political. The Government supporters are not going to turn out the Government because they differ with them on the expenditure of $10,000 or $50,000 or $100,000. There may be cases where the Government would be justified in asking their supporters to pass a particular estimate, but in the main a motion to reduce an estimate should not be regarded as a want of confidence motion. I commend to the House the serious study of that means of retrenchment. It is the only one that will furnish the House with the machinery whereby we can attain the retrenchment that is going to be necessary in the immediate months. I should like to see this House appoint a committee on estimates this year. At the very least, I would ask that a committee be appointed to consider the matter and report to the House. One or two things have struck me in considering this matter. I think the House has been rather slack of recent years in its understanding of financial principles. Certain Bills have been passed providing for an expenditure of money over a series of years. For instance, the Highways Bill provides for an annual grant for the next five or ten years. The same is true with regard to The Agricultural Aid and Technical Education Grants. Now that system practically takes out of Parliament's hands the control over expenditure. It is a wrong principle, and the instance serves to demonstrate the need for more attention and greater care by this House in the passing of financial measures. We have got away from the old ideas which have brought us to where we stand to-day, the fear of the encroachment of autocracy, the fear, perhaps, even of an aristocracy. We are fully democratic to-day, but still we sometimes forget the sound principles which we worked out in conflict, and I take it, that is true in this particular case.

There are other matters in this connection which I think require the attention of the House. I cannot see, for instance, why in the present condition of exchange our Customs Department should not enter imported goods from the United States and England at their Canadian value instead of at the United States or English value. I understand that what our Customs Department is doing to-day is this: You buy, we will suppose, $1,170 of goods in the United States. Owing to the rate of exchange, these goods are valued in the United States at $1,000, and they are entered by our Customs Department at $1,000, and on that the customs tax is levied. On the other hand, when you buy $700 of goods from Great Britain, you get $972 worth of goods in sterling. When the goods enter this country they are valued at $972, and the consequence is that our British preference is wiped out by our application of the customs tax. The application is wrong, because when the exchange is running in our favour, as it is with Great Britain, it encourages exports to us from Britain, and when it is running against us, as it is with the United States, it discourages exports to us from the United States.

How far has the principle of protection been applied in this matter to decide the way in which we should treat the money value of the goods? I take it that this is a matter about which the people of Canada are very greatly concerned. It is contrary to sound principle that we should take the goods at other than our own value. If a man can buy $970 worth of goods in Great Britain for $700, he should have the advantage of his purchase, and I do not think the manufacturers of Canada have any right to say that he should not. I fear, therefore, that on that question our Government has made a concession which is a betrayal of principal. We should also give some attention to the Excess Profits Tax. The fact that a man may take out of 1919 earnings the tax he paid in 1918 is surely one way of adding his taxes to the cost of doing business. It enables him to escape taxation and tranfer the burden to the consumers. I have a very grave doubt as to the soundness of the principle of our Excess Profits Tax, nevertheless, while it is in operation it should be properly applied. I mention the matter now, however, by way of criticism. It seems to me that the Opposition are not the people who have been criticising the Government. Rather it has been the friends of the Government, as far as I have observed since I have been in the House. It seems to me that the matters of practical import and great consequence are suggested by the friends of the Government, —things that should really be done. A good deal of nonsense is talked about politics and the struggle between Ontario and Quebec, and I think we had better relegate to the region of oblivion all questions of the past. They are dead; and as we are faced with present problems which are serious enough I think more of us should get in on the Forward Movement and look to the future.

I should like to say a few words in regard to the question of co-operation. I observe that Judge Robson in his report the other day said that incidentally, and I am sure by oversight, there was in the Combines and Fair Prices Act an obstruction upon the principle of co-operation, and that it was not allowed scope for development. I believe that consumers' co-operation, and growing out of that, probably, producers' co-operation, will prove to be one of the solutions of our present industrial difficulties. There is no doubt that consumers' co-operation will be a regulator of prices as it has been in Great Britain. At present we have nothing but the industrial system and the production of goods for profit. Much criticism has been levelled at the doctrine that business should be carried on for use and not for profit. I have seen but one place where there has been a really practical application of that principle, and that is in connection with the co-operative movement in Great Britain. There profits are distributed in accordance with the amount of purchases, and prices are governed. Out of the retail societies, of which there are nearly fourteen hundred, wholesale co-operatives have been formed and these have started factories, which produce goods only for the use of the retail dealers who are their customers, and are co-operators with them. The fact that you have a large part of industry carried on under co-operation is more or less an index of needs to the remainder of the trade, and it is undoubtedly a governing influence as to prices and what are fair profits and fair dividends. The man who becomes a co-operator very soon comes to understand the use and value of investments. He has an interest in the present system, and is not apt to become a socialist or communist. He has property and understands its value and knows how it can be made to improve his position. In this House the late Mr. Monk, I understand, in 1907 endeavoured unsuccessfully to have enacted a Bill permitting the formation of co-operative societies. I happened to be on the Cost of Living Committee last year, and we came face to face with the fact that the trade of Canada has its face set like adamant against co-operation. From the manufacturer down to the retail dealer there is no use for co-operation, and this House must therefore open the way by proper legislation for the formation of co-operative societies, and give them the opportunity they enjoy in Great Britain. To illustrate what is being done in Great Britain, I may say that the customers number ten millions of people, and there is a membership of two and a half millions. When recently, in connection with the establishment of a Board of Commerce similar to our own, the President of the Board of Trade was about to make appointments, he chose first a chairman, who from a slate, which was prepared by the President of the Board of Trade, selected from amongst the co-operators and trades unions, the men who should be associated with him on the board. Now, what greater recognition could there be of the sound democratic and public-service position to which co-operation had attained in Great Britain than that recognition by the Government of the United Kingdom?

Mr. ONESIPHORE TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few remarks on the Address, I desire at the outset to discharge the pleasant duty of paying tribute to the mover and seconder for the splendid way in which they acquitted themselves in their task. Their speeches were unquestionably excellent examples of oratory, and the sentiments which they expressed were on the whole admirable. I trust that we shall have many such academic treats as those with which we were favoured on that occasion. I congratulate the seconder of the Address, the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. McGregor), whose début in this House certainly must commend him to the attention of his electors as well as of his province and the Dominion. As a business man might be expected to do, he gave a practical address, submitting figures which gave food for thought. I am sure that his electors have been reading his speech with delight.

It had been my intention also a few moments ago when I decided to address this House to extend some congratulations, which I believed were well deserved, to my right hon. friend the acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster). My intention was to have given him my due and sincere congratulations upon the most eloquent speech that he delivered on the day of the opening of the House in the language of Racine, Boileau and Fenelon. His remarks were such as to commend them to the attention of every one who speaks the French language and who appreciates the nobility and beauty of that tongue. I was aware, as were others, that the right hon. gentleman could write the language with correctness and could use it when circumstances required that he should do so, but I was surprised and delighted with the facility with which he expressed himself on that occasion in language which was not a mere translation of English expressions but language which a Frenchman would have used had he been speaking under similar circumstances. I wish to congratulate him not only upon his ability to speak the French language with facility and lucidity but also because he has given an example to the whole of Canada that the French language is one of the dual languages of Confederation and which had the same official recognition as English throughout the Dominion. A few days ago in the city of Ottawa the Educational Conference declared that the French language was necessary in the future not only for the happiness and intellectual enjoyment of the people of Canada, but for the advancement of economic and social conditions. It was my good fortune four or five years ago to tell my compatriots in the city of Ottawa that under the British flag the French language was bound to get recognition and that in a few years that language would be on an equal footing with the languages of other countries. I see that to-day there is a tendency to give full justice to the French language in Canada, as it is being recognized that a wider knowledge of that language must contribute to the greater felicity and prosperity of the Canadian people. I hope my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) will kindly convey my remarks and congratulations to his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I have, in the exercise of my duty, given due credit to the right hon. the Acting Prime Minister, I deem it also my duty to call his attention to another subject upon which I am not able to felicitate or congratulate him; that is the absence of a Cabinet minister representing the province of New Brunswick for the last ten or eleven months, and, indeed, the absence of a Cabinet representative from all of the eastern provinces, including Nova Scotia. We see that the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), who represents that province, is not able to discharge the duties of his office. Personally, I need not say that if my good wishes could restore the Prime Minister to health he would certainly come back full of vigour to resume his official duties. But the eastern provinces have no representative in the Government—those eastern provinces which have been the backbone of Confederation, without which there could have been no Confederation—and it is the duty of the Government not to prolong such a state of affairs. We are told, and we can see, that the only reason why the Maritime Provinces are unrepresented is that if there were a by-election in New Brunswick the people would not be found to be very favourable to the Government. We cannot wait, until a new census is taken, as the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Davis) has suggested, to have representation in the Government from the province of New Brunswick. If for that reason a by-election would not be agreeable, then, I say, let us have a general election. When the Liberal party come back to power we will be able to have by-elections and we will have representatives from New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and the French elements of the province of Quebec. That was the main reason why I rose to-day to give my support to the amendment brought in by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). In a speech which will long remain in the memory when it has been read, pondered and cogitated over by the people of Canada, the leader of the Opposition claimed that it was time for an election, that the Government were not here representing the aspirations of the people of Canada, were not here fulfilling the promises that were made to the people, and were not here for the purpose for which they had been elected. They were placed here as a Union Government for the duration of the war, but now that the war was over the people should be permitted, in the exercise of their right, to select another Government which would be representative of the opinion of the people as it would find expression to-day.

My hon. friend from Neepawa has said that a census will be taken in two or three years and that we must wait until the census is taken in order to give the West the representation to which it will have a right at that time. No one has more consideration for the constitution of Canada than I. At the same time, speaking more particularly as I do for the eastern provinces and for the farming interest, the basic industry of Canada, which is waiting to-day for some relief and some encouragement in its work, which has been clamouring for the last two or three years for a reduction of the tariff, more particularly on food products and the material necessary for carrying on its operations, I assert that the time has come to again consult the people of Canada. Having voted for our amendment last year, are these hon. gentlemen, among whom was the hon. member for Neepawa, going to say to-day: "We are willing to allow the Government to stand by the high protectionist tariff; we will put away our principles and our aspirations and wait for two or three years until the Government has taken the census and provided for a redistribution of seats in this country?"

If the policy of reciprocity for which the West voted almost unanimously—a policy under which the farmers' wheat and other cereals and live stock would have found a ready market in the United States, and which would have resulted in great prosperity in Canada as a whole—had been adopted in 1911 would it not have prevented much of the unrest which exists throughout the country to-day? Had that policy, which was so generally approved by the farmers in Alberta, Saskatchewan and a good part of Manitoba, gone into effect should we have seen as we do to-day the farmers of the West organizing in the manner in which they are in order to secure the passage of legislation better calculated to advance their interests? I must say that I sympathize with the movement because I have been for many years in my own constituency, closely identified with the great industry of agriculture to say nothing of the sister industry of fishing, and I have been very loyally supported for the past twenty years by the farmers and fishermen there. I am confident that they are prepared to continue that support for a like period of time because they know how warmly I am devoted to their interests. Why wait for two or three years until we have another census and a re-distribution of seats when that means the continuance of the policy of protection and the perpetuation of the existing dissatisfaction? Does my hon. friend from Neepawa under the existing circumstances expect to see any immediate reduction of the tariff, is he hopeful of securing free trade to the extent that is practicable, in view of the recent pronouncements of members of the Government, especially the deliverance of my intellectual and genial friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen)? In my opinion the farmers will not see any free-trade policy adopted or very much in the way of reduction of the tariff or of taxation. We are told that the maintenance of a tariff is necessary in order to meet our yearly ordinary expenditures of some $150,000,000, the $35,000,000 to $40,000,000 of pensions to our soldiers, and other obligations. We are told that we must depend upon the tariff to meet obligations which would seem fabulous were it not that the public mind since the war has grown accustomed to think in millions. But the tariff is not the only source of revenue. The taxation of land values has been strongly urged and my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) has been one of its strongest advocates. If the taxation of land values is a good policy to pursue it should have been adopted long before this. But even now why not put it into operation and thus raise the augmented revenues we so greatly need for our public demands? If I recollect aright the hon. gentleman (Mr. Crerar) speaking to this House last year estimated that a revenue of seventy-five or eighty million dollars could be derived from the taxation of land values. Why refrain from having recourse to this tax, especially at this time when the farmers are straining every effort to meet their necessities under the present high cost of living and the high rate of farm labour?

When we ask for an appeal to the people we are told to wait until there is another census and until there has been a re-distribution of seats. It is frequently stated, and some hon. gentlemen opposite as well as the newspapers supporting them take pleasure in repeating the statement, that the Liberals are not sincere in asking for a general election. Well, Mr. Speaker, you have known me for some years and you will admit that I do not make a statement which I do not believe or give expression to a hope which I do not sincerely entertain. I am of the opinion that the time has come when the Government, of its own volition, should appeal to the country. If the present Government should be returned well and good, but the people will not be satisfied until they have had an opportunity of expressing their will at the polls, because it cannot be denied that under the conditions which prevail this Government is not a constitutional Government.

The present state of exchange between Canada and the United States, in my opinion, is responsible for a great deal of dissatisfaction in the public mind. For this condition a great many people blame the United States but does the responsibility rest with that country? Undoubtedly that exchange rate is a matter for concern. It has been urged that the Minister of Finance, (Sir Henry Drayton) for whose financial and legal ability I have the greatest respect, should take steps to secure relief. I do not altogether agree with what has so far been done in that direction. We have been told that we should buy less from the United States and produce more, but in my opinion had the Liberal trade policy of 1911 been carried into effect we should have seen to-day a greater equilibrium in the figures of trade with our neighbours to the south, our exports would have been more on a parity with our imports from that country and eminent financiers of the United States would have had a more exalted opinion of our currency. Gold is the basis of currency in the United States, whereas we might say that Canadian currency is on a paper basis. As a remedial measure our Minister of Finance recently exported some $40,000,000 in gold to the United States. To my mind it would have been much better to have stored that gold in the vaults of Canada and issued against it a proportional amount of paper currency redeemable in gold. Had these measures, which I have urged, been followed I believe that to-day our currency would have been on a basis equally as satisfactory as that of the United States. I suggest that as much gold as can be got together be put in the vaults of Canada in order that the value of our paper currency may be increased and put on an equal footing with that of United States.

When we vote for the amendment which has been submitted by the leader of the Opposition we do so in the hope that the members of the Government will be led to carry out the constitutional duties involving upon them; that they will pass a Franchise Act which is in accordance with the British practice and the British spirit, giving every Canadian who is entitled to vote the right to the franchise, and then go before the people.

It has been said by some hon. gentleman that party government no longer exists in Canada. The member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) suggested yesterday that if hon. gentlemen opposite who were supporting the Union Government should make themselves a party, they would keep themselves in power. But whatever may be done in that respect I hope that when the Minister of Finance brings down his Budget there will be found in it some departure from the old ways of the Tory administration, from the old practice of keeping to the same source of revenue—tariff, and more tariff.

I believe that hon. gentlemen who are supporting the cause of the farmers in this House are in sympathy with our programme. The programme of the farmers and the programme of the Liberal party are, in a sense, but one; there is no considerable difference between them. Whatever is embodied in either may easily be embodied in the other without any great violation of principle.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE (Edmonton): In the event of an election taking place immediately without redistribution, how long will the farmers of the West have to wait before the Government which my hon. friend boasts would come into power would bring about a redistribution of the representation in Parliament?

Mr. TURGEON: It has been the practice of the Liberal party—particularly was it so during the leadership of the late lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier—to appeal to the people at frequent intervals. In order to give the country the benefit of the reciprocity agreement of 1911—

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Will the hon. gentleman permit me? I put a question to him.

Mr. COPP: Let him finish his answer.

Mr. TURGEON: I was proceeding to answer my hon. friend; if he is in a hurry I will speak as rapidly as I can. I was saying that when questions of vital interest to the people have been at issue the Liberal party has always been willing, even after so short a period as a year or six months in office, again to go before the country and submit their policies to the people. In 1911, three years after an election had been held, the then Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, when the reciprocity agreement was brought forward and objection was made to it by the Opposition, might quite properly have let the agreement stand and remained in power for another two years. But in the interests of the people he immediately dissolved Parliament and went to the country. That principle will always be followed by the Liberal party; we are always ready to appeal to the people whenever occasion requires. It is only members on the other side who are talking about prolonging the present Parliament.

We would be well advised, therefore, to persuade the members of the Government that they are certainly holding a false position. The purpose for which the Government was elected has been fulfilled, and they should now appeal to the people. The ministers might not all be defeated, but certainly there will be a great change after the next election, in Ontario as well as throughout the West. The farmers all over the country are agitating for a change, and whoever may make up the new Government I am willing to accept the verdict of the people. The desire of the Liberal party is not so much to attain power as to uphold the principles which it endorses and which it wishes to be enjoyed by the people of Canada. Our object is to promote the interests of the Canadian people; whether we do that in Opposition or otherwise is not the most important matter. In the past the Liberal party have done great things for Canada, not only by preventing the adoption of measures which would not have been good for our country, but also by assisting in the enactment of legislation which, but for our labours, might not have been so beneficial.

I hope that the Government will bring down a Franchise Act which will give the franchise to every Canadian, every British subject in this country who has a vote, whatever his political views may be. The people have been asking for a proper Franchise Act ever since the last election—an election which certainly was no credit to the party which obtained the majority of the votes; an election in which neither the civilian population nor the soldiers were allowed to enjoy the full privileges of the franchise.

Therefore, with all this unrest in the minds of the people, the Government should hasten to bring down a fair and equitable Franchise Act, and also to bring down whatever appropriations may be required for carrying on the affairs of the country. Then let them appeal to the people, and if it be the will of the people to return them to power, we are prepared to abide by the result, although I do not believe that they will be returned to power. We want a just franchise with the British spirit in it. We want it to be just for everybody, for the man of the West as well as for the man of the East; we want it to be just for the man who came here ten, fifteen or twenty years ago under the promise of receiving the advantages of British freedom and British institutions, for the maintenance and preservation of which in Canada as in other parts of the British Empire our sons have fought and died. British principles and institutions form a large part of our constitution. Therefore, let the franchise be in accordance with those principles, and more particularly in accordance with those sentiments which are conveyed in the term "British spirit," which means freedom in every possible way and justice to all. I trust that the Government will see fit to give us such a franchise.

On motion of Mr. H. P. Whidden (Brandon), the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock, the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, March 4, 1920.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS TABLED.

Annual Report of the Department of Customs and Inland Revenue for the year ended March 31, 1919; Shipping Report of the Department of Customs, containing statements of navigation and shipping of the Dominion of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1919.—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

LIBRARIAN OF PARLIAMENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Témiscouata): I should like to ask the acting Prime Minister if there is any truth in the report that the Hon. Albert Sévigny is to replace Mr. DeCelles as Librarian of this Parliament, and if it is true that Mr. DeCelles has asked for superannuation?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No official action has been taken in regard to the matter of which my hon. friend speaks.

BOARD OF COMMERCE.

RESIGNATION OF JUDGE ROBSON.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): Has the acting Prime Minister received any further correspondence in connection with the resignation of Judge Robson from the Board of Commerce or bearing on that resignation. If so, may I ask whether the correspondence will be laid on the Table, and when?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have received letters, but I am not prepared to say just now what will be brought down.

[Mr. Turgeon.]

THE PRIME MINISTER'S HEALTH.

STATEMENT BY SIR GEORGE FOSTER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Beauce): The day before yesterday we were led to expect and hope that a statement would be made to the House regarding the condition of the health of the Prime Minister and his proposed plans. The two members of the Government who went down to New York to meet the Prime Minister have been back for two days now, and the statement which we were looking for with some anxiety is not forthcoming. May I ask whether the acting Prime Minister or some of his colleagues would to-day be in a position to inform the House on this matter?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I could have given my hon. friend the information yesterday or the day before if he had asked for it. I was waiting to give some hon. member opposite an opportunity to put the question. With reference to the health of the Prime Minister, I may say that for the two months that he has been away, the improvement in his health has been marked; and if the same rate of improvement continues as I hope it will,—and I have no reason to fear otherwise—we may expect to have him with us, I think, within two months time.

SPECIAL IMPERIAL CONFERENCE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I ask the acting Prime Minister whether the Imperial Conference which it was expected last session was to be summoned this year, is going to take place, and whether there is any truth in the report that it is likely to be held in Ottawa?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is not definitely known, and up to the present it has not been definitely decided that the Imperial Conference will take place this year. I think I may say that Canada, the city of Ottawa in particular, and all our hon. friends on both sides, would be glad if that Conference could be held here. Canada will not put any obstacle in the way of that; in fact she will be very favourable to it.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Hume Cronyn for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King thereto, resumed from Wednesday, March 3.

Mr. HOWARD PRIMROSE WHIDDEN (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak this afternoon, I wish to join with those who have already conveyed their felicitations to the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne. Mention was made by one of the previous speakers to these gentlemen as "props beneath a crumbling edifice." I had rather thought of them as gentlemen who were pillars in the commercial, social, and political life of their country and in their country's Parliament, pillars that were not alone supporting these objects and institutions worthily, but endeavouring worthily to support a Government which, much as fancy and imagination on the part of some might otherwise desire, seems as yet to give no evidence of old age, senility or decay. I do not believe that they are fragile or failing props. They are stalwart supporters of a well based representation of a people's wish and thought in connection with the affairs of this country. There was also to be noted in their speeches a freedom not to criticise the Government, but to express their own personal views, and in so doing, they have simply carried out the practice of the supporters of this Government during the last two years. It is not necessary to have a dead level of monotonous agreement in order to have unity and strength. It is quite possible to have variety, difference of view-point, and yet to remain united on the great central and fundamental things. One hardly dare venture further to express appreciation of this Chamber in which we are gathered. I can only express the hope that its lines and lighting, its colouring and solidity, and the combination of strength and beauty which characterize this Chamber will more than ever characterize the Canadian people collectively and individually.

I must confess my great surprise at the amendment, though it may not be necessary at this stage to assign reasons for voting against it. One can have great regard for the earnest and able address of the leader of the Oppositnon (Mr. Mackenzie King) in moving the amendment, and yet perhaps because of that find it all the more difficult to understand the why, and the how and the what for. For it is known to not a few hon. gentlemen who have gathered here in the last week since the opening of Parliament that prominent supporters of his have of their own accord come to hon. members on this side of the House and said, "If any such nonsense is introduced by any of our men as to its being the duty of the Government to make an appeal to the electorate, take no stock in it. It is all bunk." This would seem to be evidence of a lack of unanimity of feeling among hon. gentlemen opposite or else of the failure of some of them to understand the mind of their leader.

In connection with the criticism of the speech from the Throne as altogether inadequately disclosing to Parliament the plans of the Government I should like to urge a word of dissent as well as of surprise in view of the references, prolonged and emphatic, to the War-time Elections Act, to the crumbling of representative government, or the ignoring of its principles, and in view also of the criticism of the promise in the speech from the Throne of a new franchise Act. Perhaps the greatest cause for surprise, in my case at least, was the reference to the Government as being infinitely more concerned with external affairs than with the home business of this country. I am reminded that in different words, but in somewhat the same spirit and with the same point of view, similar statements were made for the first time in my hearing a little over two years ago during a very vigorous campaign. Canada, as I shall try to show in a moment, has embarked upon world affairs, and can never consent to remain an isolated colony or nation on the northern half of this continent. Before referring to this a little more extendedly, I must express surprise also that there should seem to be drawn from the splendid edifice in which we find ourselves meeting, and from the way in which it has risen to its present almost completed form, a suggestion and symbolism of what the minds of men can do if they are set upon the great task of building well their country and their country's life, for I remember that in the early stages of the reconstruction of this building there were a great many who did not know what the Joint Committee was doing, and what the Government, the Department of Public Works, the architects and the contractors were doing, and consequently there was criticism right and left day after day and month after month, and yet all the time the work was going on. I take it, Mr. Speaker, that any government which is busying itself at any time in the nation's history with matters of vital importance will be so occupied and absorbed that it will be impossible for it to explain sufficiently and to the satisfaction of all the fact that it is engaged in a great building or re-building piece of business. The work of reconstruction has been going on in our country, and I think time will show more fully that while ministers of the Crown have not been going up and down throughout the land announcing in strident tones their achievements and accomplishments, nevertheless they have been making a good record as stewards of the people.

I should like to urge that in spite of the difference of opinion in the minds of some of the members of this House as to the importance of having a new franchise Act there are at least two reasons why it is time for such an Act. In the first place we all know that there will be, or should be, a Dominion census next year. The people of Western Canada, no matter what their views on the problems that divide us, believe that when that census is taken they can rightfully claim a larger representation in the Parliament of Canada. I do not suppose that western members of the Agrarian party or of the Liberal party, although they are somewhat hard to find from the West, or of the Unionist group, can be expected to favour an early election in view of the fact that we should have something to show as evidence of the growth of our Western provinces, and that evidence we shall have at the conclusion of the next Dominion census. I have something else in mind, Mr. Speaker. There is need for a well-based and adequate franchise Act upon the Statute Books of Canada, as the outgrowth of a conception of citizenship which is to be broader and better-based than anything we have ever had. I am of the opinion that no franchise Act that can be brought down will be adequate unless it provides that only those who know enough and feel enough, and those who will to act enough at all times in the nation's history, but especially in time of stress and crisis, shall be given the standing of citizenship. If we have within our borders those who do not measure up to this standard, then let this Parliament demand of the present Government that there shall be conducted that kind of campaign of education in the interests of true Canadianism that will ensure that all who might oppose the view I have just enunciated will find that every person whom they originally might have desired to see included will be so qualified that, in accordance with the principle I have laid down, they will have the right to vote, and not otherwise.

[Mr. Whidden.]

Citizens, Sir, are not merely human beings living within the confines of a country; they are people who have certain attitudes and cherish attachments not merely to the material things of their land, but to that great undefinable something which is not comprehended within the laws and institutions and the customs of a people, and which perhaps can best be described as the national sentiment, or the national spirit. It is for all such, and none other, that the new Franchise Bill, when it is passed by this Parliament, should make provision. If it observes this principle it will prove adequate and will go far towards the building up of a real and sterling national character and national prosperity as well.

With regard to Canada's relation to external affairs, I am sure that even the dreamiest idealist who ever succeeded in getting into any parliament would believe in a country's representatives planning for the development of its natural resources, and giving their time and attention to the affairs of their country. But I am satisfied, from the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite, as well from those who have spoken on your right, Mr. Speaker, that there is an increasing conviction in the minds of representative Canadians that this does not embrace the whole conception of national life, and that a country's business has become a larger matter in recent years than it used to be. The world was a very big place when even those of us who are young to-day were boys. But the world is a neighbourhood at the present time, and if it is to be a neighbourhood not only commercially and socially, but in the truest economic and international sense, then surely a new country like Canada should not be the last to recognize its part and its place in relation to external affairs.

I desire to read two or three sentences from Sir William Goode's report on economic conditions in Central Europe as presented to the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the month of January; for I am satisfied that we in Canada who sent so many representatives to the war have never fully realized, since the armistice was signed, what the results have been across the seas. Sir William Goode, among many other pointed statements, writes in these words:

> In an endeavour to portray the economic chaos of central and eastern Europe one is apt to take it for granted that the world realizes the human suffering which inevitably follows in its wake. It is a horizon of so much suffering en masse that even those engaged in the work of relief may only be recalled to the individuality of it by a tug at one's overcoat in the snow-covered streets of Vienna from some numb child begging for the food which is not there, or by a glimpse into the typhus stricken villages behind the lines where the Poles are still fighting Bolshevik Russia. Vienna, perhaps more than any city in Europe, visualizes the misery that arises from want of food and coal and from the cumulative effects of over four years of ruinous war. Here, in a city of 2½ million inhabitants, the sharp contrasts between pre-war prosperity and present day insolvency, between the nervous rich and the starving poor, between the relics of ill-fated monarchy and a revolutionary, but rather desperate, government, stand out with brutal appeal to the imagination.

Concerning Poland he states:

It is estimated that 500,000 tons of cereals must be imported in the year ending September, 1920, to supply the deficit of food in Congress Poland and the provinces of the east and the larger towns, and also to provide seed.

Concerning Czecho-Slovakia he states:

Imports of cereals are needed before the next harvest to the extent of 350,000 tons, together with about 400,000 tons of potatoes. The latter can be obtained from Poland. Large quantities of raw materials are required, including wool, cotton, jute, leather, copper, tin, nickel, oilseeds, oils, chemicals, nitrates, and other fertilizers. Czecho-Slovakia is short of locomotives, wagons and materials for repairs to rolling stock.

Not only does Sir William Goode speak in these terms, but in the "Hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means in the House of Representatives," under date January 10, 1920, I find confirmation and support of his views:

According to the best information obtainable the minimum grain requirement necessary to carry Poland until the next harvest, and which can not be filled anywhere but in the United States, is 300,000 tons. This deficiency is due to a partial failure of the wheat crop and to a lack of fuel for threshing. Poland is at present living under a hand-to-mouth regime. . .

In Austria the acute misery and suffering are probably greater than in Poland. Two-tenths only of the present Austrian State are self-supporting in food, and the remaining eight-tenths, even before the war, produced food to supply themselves for six months of the year at most, and were dependent for the remaining six months upon importations. Consequently, the situation to-day, especially in Vienna, has become exceedingly grave, due to a shortage of coal and food. . . .

What the effect of a general social breakdown in Austria would be can of course only be conjectured.

If time permitted I could quote from several different statements made by Mr. Hoover but one or two brief sentences will suffice:

Poland presents one of the most appalling and appealing situations in Europe. . . . The Austrian situation is the worst in Europe.

He estimates the coming crops in Central Europe as follows: Poland 75 or 80 per cent of pre-war normal; Southern Russia 80 per cent; Czecho-Slovakia 75 per cent; and Hungary 85 per cent. If Canada is to secure in a permanent way what has been won by her soldiers and others in the war, Canada must continue not only to have a theoretical and seminar sort of interest in Europe but a practical and political interest. If the members of the Government, who to-day should be specially charged with such matters, are not interested, then we who sit behind them, or in front of them, should see to it that they become sufficiently interested to rightly express the feeling and thought of the Canadian people who gave more than half a million of their sons to win the world war. I believe the Government, as those charged with responsibility, have been giving attention to these matters and that they will continue to give them such attention as Canadian sentiment demands.

Britain and the United States have done much to relieve distress. Canada has done something. Why should not Canada do more? Why should there not be an Anglo-American organization functioning to carry on and complete the kind of work that has already been well begun and in connection with such an organization? Why should not Canada have her own inter-related, and yet independent, part to play?

The Argentine has already passed a Bill to this end. Has the Argentine the same stake in the European situation that Canada has? Sir William Goode, in a later part of this same report, as the British director of relief for Central Europe, has referred directly and definitely to Canada. He says:

Invaluable advice was received from the premiers and representatives of the Dominions at the Peace Conference in Paris, particularly from Dr. J. W. Robertson, C.M.G., who, on the unanimous invitation of Mr. Hoover and his allied colleagues, attended the meetings of the Relief Section on behalf of the Canadian Government.

If Canada is to follow up and conserve what has already been gained in the way of an increasingly definite status, if Canada is to follow up and make secure that fuller and truer recognition of her nationality and increasing importance in the life of the world, let her not for one moment be so busily concerned in minding her own business that she forgets the business of other countries and so forgets her own.

I want, in resuming my seat, to put in a brief plea for a broader Canadianism, a harmonious, a united and a not merely tolerant relationship. Tolerance never exists as between friends, much less as between members of the same family. I want to make a plea for a united life and purpose that will be so broad based that Canada, as her views of democracy and representative government develop—develop at least in their interpretation and application —will recognize some things which were neither recognized nor in existence at the time of Confederation. I believe that a long step in this direction will be taken if we have the right kind of a franchise Act put into effect within the next year.

Then, too, I would like to say, and I am sure we will all agree with it, that in our efforts to legislate, to govern and to develop our own resources and our own life, we will desire and plan so to do these things by co-operation with the other members of the Empire and the other nations of the great wide world.

It is to be hoped that many of the funerals that take place during the next few years will be the funerals of the little Canadians. There are many types. There is the pure MacKay provincial little Canadian; there is the antique colonial; there is the narrow nationalistic Canadian and he may speak more than one tongue. He may have been born to speak the tongue that I am speaking now. There may be the high sounding Imperialist who is a little Canadian, there may be the insular, stay-at-home-on-the-northern-half-of-this-North-American-continent, and let-the-good-old-wealthy-British-mother-pay-the-bills type of Canadian. May these little Canadians rapidly—or as rapidly as a kind Providence sees best—pass off the stage and make room for their nobler and broader chested successors who will see a Canada which actually extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific and which has fair measurements north and south. Canada has moved out too far into the world and the world's affairs ever to be satisfied to retrace her steps. Her status in the Empire and in the League of Nations has been established, though definitions may be made more perfect in the coming years. We cannot go back upon what we have gained and what we have established. While our duty remains here on the northern half of this, the greatest continent in the world, our destiny will be linked up with the great brotherhood of the nations and external affairs will mean more to us in each succeeding year as we continue to take care in a large way of the growing, and increasingly important, business of this our Canadian country.

Mr. THOMAS W. CALDWELL (Victoria and Carleton): Mr. Speaker, after having listened to so many eloquent and able speeches in the last few days, it is with a certain amount of trepidation that I rise at this time to address the House. That feeling is all the more marked because I am the first member of the group of hon. gentlemen located on what is styled "the cross benches" to break the ice at this session, and judging by the remarks of some of the speakers who have preceded me the water will be fairly cold. The impression seems to exist among some hon. members of this House, especially among those sitting on the Government side, that the independent group in this House are here to represent solely the farmers. I would like to correct that impression and to warn hon. gentlemen who entertain such an opinion that while our numbers, as yet, in this Chamber are but few, I believe we represent a majority of the public of Canada to-day. I believe that fact is realized by the hon. gentlemen to whom I refer, and that if it were not for it they would not be quite so concerned about our appearance in this Parliament. It is not our "contemptible little army" they are worrying about; they are apprehensive of the public opinion they must meet at the next general election.

Regarding the amendment before the House, I believe that if the electors of Canada were asked to pronounce upon it they would support it by an overwhelming majority. They would do that not because it was moved by the leader of the Liberal Party or because it is a liberal motion at all. In the first place the Union Government was formed to carry on the war, and its term of office was to be during the war and until demobilization was completed. The Union Administration was also to be composed of fifty per cent Liberals and fifty per cent Conservatives. I may say that I was a supporter of the Union Government at that time and on those terms. Now the war has ended, demobilization has been completed, and it looks to me, Mr. Speaker, as if the Union Government was done, too, as a Union Government, because nearly all the Liberal members of the Union Cabinet have resigned, giving as their reason for so doing that they believed the term for which the Union Government was elected had expired.

In the next place, I do not feel that this Government has been consistent in its policy. It has preached greater production, and has not enacted legislation to encourage production; and although it promised to appoint a committee to prepare tariff legislation to be brought before the House at this session, we have no intimation in the speech from the Throne that this will be done. In fact, the inspired press of the Government has stated that no tariff legislation would be brought down this session.

Some of the greatest economists in the world to-day claim that the most important factor in restoring the world to normal conditions is "Production and Economy," and I believe we will all agree with that statement. As I have said, the present Government has preached greater production but has not passed tariff legislation that would have that result, especially in regard to the necessaries of life. As for economy, I never heard the present Government accused of that. At the time the war was in progress, the Government instituted a campaign for the greater production of food, which was very necessary at that time, and is even just as imperative at the present moment. One would have expected that at a time when the food shortage was so acute the Government would have reduced the duty on fertilizers, which are so necessary, especially to the potato growers of the Maritime Provinces, if the yield was to be increased, and that it would also have lowered the duty on machinery, a very necessary step for the farmers to accomplish greater production, more particularly in view of the very great scarcity of labour. Instead of doing that the Government placed a seven and-a-half per cent war tax on machinery. Thus while the Government preached production, its own policy has been to penalize production.

But your High Protectionist will say "How will you raise the revenue?" While nobody would deny that the customs duty produces some revenue, I believe it is the most extravagant method on earth of raising a revenue.

Take fertilizers, of which we use large quantities in New Brunswick. I speak particularly of conditions in that province because it is that part of Canada I know most about. As I have already said, large quantities of commercial fertilizers are used in New Brunswick; they are devoted to the growing of potatoes, which is a staple crop in that province. The duty on mixed fertilizers, Mr. Speaker, is, as you know, ten per cent; and while the Canadian manufacturers of fertilizers import the raw material, or the chemicals, practically free of duty, they appraise against it the cost of the materials and the cost of mixing—manufacturing as they call it—plus the amount of the duty—and charge us the net result. The result is that you can buy a car of American mixed fertilizers, bring it into any part of Canada and pay the ten per cent duty, at as cheap a rate as it would cost for the purchase of the Canadian mixed material. There are a large number of so-called Canadian fertilizer companies that are merely branches of American companies. These concerns are therefore in the position of charging the consumers of fertilizers in this country with this ten per cent duty. That duty really does not reach our revenue at all; it does not even stay in Canada, it goes to swell the banking account of the American companies.

There are also a number of machinery firms in Canada which are merely branches of American concerns. In some cases they have factories in Canada but in other cases they have not; they merely have assembling plants where the partly manufactured American parts are assembled and put on the Canadian market. These firms also collect the duties on their machinery from the Canadian consumer and the same result happens; it does not go into the revenue of Canada; it does not even stay in Canada, it goes to swell the American bank account. In this way it is manifest that many thousands of dollars are lost to the revenue of Canada.

Now take the Ford car, which is the poor man's car. In singling out the Ford car I have no criticism of it to make; I have a Ford car which is pretty well worn out but it has given me excellent service. What I have said in reference to the Canadian mixed fertilizers and the Canadian assembled machinery applies perhaps more forcibly to the cheap Canadian made car, especially that type produced by American firms. This year in New Brunswick we are paying for Ford cars $240 more than our American neighbours just beyond the boundary line. Take the case of two men living on each side of the International boundary: The American pays only $660 for his car while the Canadian has to pay $900 for exactly the same car manufactured by the same firm. The Canadian car is assembled and put together in this country and sold as a Canadian car but it does not pay any duty into the revenue of the country—that goes to swell the American bank account.

Mr. Speaker, the party to which I have the honour to belong has no desire to "submarine the tariff." I believe that was the term applied with respect to our policy by a Cabinet minister speaking in Montreal a few days ago. We all know that the minister in question (Mr. Meighen) is very apt at phrase making and forming expressions that attract the public ear. But we have no desire to submarine the tariff or anything else. The features of the tariff that we object to are those to which I have made allusion and which permit the Canadian consumer to be robbed without any benefit to the country. These features of the tariff in their operation work exactly the same to-day as the adverse exchange on Canadian money. No doubt the Canadian manufacturer will hail this adverse exchange as a Godsend to Canada, for it will effectually shut out American competition. It works exactly the same way as the items in the protective tariff, to which I have alluded. If you buy American made goods there is a discount on your money of nearly as much as the tariff will amount to—not as much as it would amount to on a Ford car, more than it would amount to on a mower, and as much as it would amount to on some other farm machinery.

Your high protectionist will say, "Oh, yes, it is just as I thought. Your plea is all for the farmers. You want free entry for fertilizers, farm machinery and the cheap car that the farmers use." And perhaps some people will say, "What does the farmer need with a car?" Mr. Speaker, in this day of high wages and scarcity of labour the farmer in the back concessions needs a car more than his city brother does. It is an absolute necessity when he has to leave his work to go on any errand of business for him to be back home as soon as possible. The old-fashioned method of locomotion by foot or by horseback or by horse and buggy is too slow for this day and generation. So it is absolutely necessary as a matter of economy that the farmer should own a cheap car.

On the other hand, if the duty on farm machinery and on fertilizers increases the cost of production of farm produce more than it should, does it hurt the farmer alone? I claim that it does not. If on account of this high rate of duty on his machinery and the raw material that goes into the production of his crop it costs the farmer more than it should to produce that crop, who suffers most? I claim that the farmer is not the principal sufferer, because perhaps he does not use five per cent of the crops that he produces on his farm. The labouring man, the city man—even I imagine my good friend the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) uses some of the products of the farm. Of course, I do not suppose he would lose as much on the farm produce he uses as he would gain, say, by the duty on ploughs—and he manufactures good ploughs, too, I can assure you; I have used them—but I believe that this very feature of the tariff is a big factor in the present high cost of living and the unrest to which it gives rise. I believe that the high cost of living could be materially lowered by making the very changes I have just spoken of.

And here, Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to the letter that the right hon. the leader of the Government (Sir George Foster) placed on the Table on the 2nd of March—the letter from the Hon. H. A. Robson, K.C., Chairman of the Board of Commerce, as I think that perhaps a paragraph or two from it will corroborate the statement I have made, that the present Government or the past Government—I do not know which you would call it; perhaps it is not past yet.

Mr. A. B. COPP: It will be in a little while.

Mr. CALDWELL: The statement I made was that their legislation has not been favourable to production. Mr. Robson writes:

> Dealing with it as a measure to repress profiteering, I have further objection to the Fair Prices part of The Combines and Fair Prices Act (which is the important part of that Act) in that it picks out for profit regulation those classes of producers and traders who deal in the necessaries of life. This regulation does not apply to the great number of other branches of business and occupations. We restrain and discourage the citizen who supplies food and clothing but leave free to profiteer as he pleases the man who deals in non-essentials or luxuries. We do not touch any excessive charging for service involving mechanical or professional experience. There can only be one effect, i.e., to discourage persons from entering into the production and distribution of the necessaries of life.
> There is, to my mind, further objectionable discrimination in that the measures for controlling the selling prices of the retailer are in terms fairly effective, while those for reaching the manufacturer are not so.
>
> A profiteering measure to reach the distributing class should, in my opinion, be local in its character and be administered locally. Federal machinery cannot reach the grievance effectually throughout all Canada.
> It seems to me further that the Act actually contains a provision which removes the last chance the consumer had to do anything for himself in reducing the cost of living. There never was before the Act anything to prevent a group of consumers from co-operating in the purchase of necessaries. They took their chance of being able to buy. But a declaration of parliamentary policy crept into the Act, and a manufacturer or wholesaler is not bound to sell to classes who were not accustomed to purchase from such manufacturers and wholesalers. This was designed to head off co-operative movements, which were likely to make progress for the benefit of consumer members and, as I say, restricted a remedy which elsewhere has been of some effect in price control.

If the remarks I have made need any proof, Mr. Speaker, I think you have it there in what Mr. Robson states, and you have it on the authority of a man in whom the Government had such great confidence that it put him in control of the Board of Commerce.

I do not wish to take up very much of the time of the House, Mr. Speaker, because I find as I travel through the country that the people believe Parliament wastes too much time in discussion on the reply to the speech from the Throne. But before I sit down I wish to assure the Government of my appreciation of the honour they conferred upon me in my recent election by sending three of their ablest cabinet ministers all the way down to New Brunswick to help my opponent to lose his deposit, especially at a time when Parliament was in session and such very important matters were before it for consideration. I believe that one of those ministers, the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) could hardly be reconciled to the statement which I made at that time that I considered that this visit or visitation of these cabinet ministers to my constituency increased my majority by at least one thousand votes.

Well, Sir, I will try to enlighten him. I was nominated and ran as an Independent candidate, pledged to support any measure which I believed was for the best interest of Canada, irrespective of which party should introduce it. So that this very decided opposition of the Government to my election seemed to the electors of my constituency to be an admission by the Government that they did not intend to introduce any legislation that would be in the best interests of the people, and my electors resented it. Some of the electors were even mean enough to say that this assistance to my late opponent was for services rendered in the last general election.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to correct the false impression, which, as I have said before, some hon. members seemed to have or were trying to have: That the Independent party in this House is here to submarine the fiscal policy of Canada in the interests of the farmers, regardless of all other industries or people in this Dominion. I wish to assure this House, so far as in me lies, that we are here not to tear down, but to give what assistance we can towards the building up of a Greater Canada, so that not only the people of this Dominion but the people of the whole world may say, "Surely Canada is a bit of God's own country."

Mr. WILLIAM A. BUCHANAN (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I will be quite frank at the outset and say the remarks I am about to make are not inspired so much by the speech from the Throne as by the amendment offered by the hon. leader of the Opposition. I am in this position that, so far as I am concerned, an election can come at any moment; but at the present time I want to make a choice and in making that choice I desire to consider the interests of the section of the country from which I come, and at the same time I do not want to be sectional in the observations I make though I wish to make them from the standpoint of the western provinces.

The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has moved an amendment demanding an election. Next year we know that a census is to be taken in this country, following which census there should be a redistribution, and in my judgment, as a result of that census and redistribution, we would have, in the Prairie Provinces, or if you were to take all the western provinces, twenty new members in the House of Commons. If I were to support the amendment of the leader of the Opposition and it carried, what would be the result? There would be an election as there was in 1911, and the West would not obtain, for four or five years to come, its full representation on the census of 1921. If the Government is prepared to state that there will be a census and redistribution next year, I prefer to take chances on the Government of the day rather than to withhold for four or five years the proper representation that the West should have in this House. I know there are represented in this country and in this Parliament of the Dominion of Canada interests which are anxious that the West should not have its full representation until the last possible moment. I do not know whether the leader of the Opposition desires to associate himself with those interests in Eastern Canada; but we know that those people do not want Western Canada to have any larger voice in the affairs in this country than it has at present if they could in any way withhold the representation to which Western Canada is entitled. In the West we feel that we are entitled to our full representation, and that, if we are to have an election at this time, that representation will be delayed for four or five years.

May I be personal for a moment and explain my position as a member of this House? I do not feel at the present time that I am wedded to the support of the Government of the day. I feel that I have fulfilled my obligations to Union Government, because I was elected as a Liberal supporting Union Government. I advocated Unionism and supported it; I was elected as a supporter of Union Government for the purpose of carrying on the war, and, in my judgment, that period has elapsed. But am I at this moment to precipitate an election and thus prevent the section of the country in which I live from having its proper representation in the Commons of Canada? I prefer to act as a free lance in this House, and to avoid an election if necessary, in order that Western Canada may have, as soon as possible, its full and proper representation in this House. What would happen if we were to defer the question of an election for another year? We have only this choice to make: We have the Opposition and we have the Government; and so far as I am concerned, the toss of a coin would satisfy me in that respect and probably would satisfy a good many people in this country. I am prepared to take a chance on the Government for another year in order that we should have a census and a redistribution. I believe it would only be necessary to have one session of Parliament following the present session before we could have a redistribution and before an appeal could be made to the country on the basis of a representation in accordance with the census of 1921.

I have no hesitation in saying that I believe that Union Government fulfilled the purpose for which it was elected. I have always said so, and I have no apologies to make for supporting Union Government. But when we come to times of peace; when we are to discuss domestic problems, then there is bound to be a probability that I shall differ with this Government and that I shall want to align myself with those who agree with the views that I have consistently advocated in times of peace. I am perfectly satisfied with the record of Union Government as a war Government, and I think history will prove that Union Government served the purpose for which it was elected and was a great necessity to Canada in war time. I hope I have made my position clear on the question of the amendment.

I am not in favour of the amendment if we can have an election next year following the census and a redistribution. I prefer to carry on for the present in order that Western Canada may have its proper representative voice in the affairs of this country. As I said before, I know there are people and interests who do not want Western Canada to have its proper representation in this Parliament at the present time. I am not prepared to encourage those people in their views; on the contrary I am content to wait for the earliest possible realization of the representation to which Western Canada is entitled.

As I said in rising, my main purpose in speaking this afternoon was to make myself absolutely clear as to my attitude towards the amendment. While I am on my feet I should like to make some observations regarding what has been called the unrest which exists in this country and how it is best for us, as a people and as a Parliament, believing in the institutions which exist in Canada and which are the foundations of the Government of this country, to act towards this seeming unrest. I know there is a good deal of agitation in the country. There is what might be called revolutionary sentiment in Canada. People are going about spreading new doctrines, and what are we as members of Parliament and as citizens of this Dominion doing to combat that sentiment? I do not believe in repressive measures, but I do think we should have educational measures to counteract the agitation which certainly exists throughout a good part of the country. We should go out and educate as to our system of Government the new citizens of this Dominion, the people who are being appealed to by these agitators. We should let them understand that they have in this land the fullest freedom and opportunity to realize their ambitions if they can convert the majority of the people to their views. We should do that rather than adopt repressive measures which would make them feel that that kind of freedom does not exist in this country. It must be remembered that I am not in sympathy with the views that are being advocated by those people, but I am expressing my views as to what we should do to combat them in the best way so as to avoid further trouble and to restore amongst those people confidence in our institutions.

Many charges have been made that there is profiteering in this country; and that the control of the Government is in the hands of a few people. If that be the case, it is our duty to remove that control. If it be not the case we should enlighten the people. I happened to read the other day an article in an American paper concerning a district affected by the recent steel strike. One of the causes at the back of that steel strike undoubtedly was this continual talk of profiteering; that the steel corporation and its shareholders were making huge returns from the business and that the employees were not getting their fair share. One steel factory in the state of Ohio, taking its employees into its confidence, had enlightened them as to the business, as to the dividends that were being paid and as to the cost of operation. And as a result those men were satisfied that the industry was paying them all it could afford to pay them under the circumstances so that, when the steel employees throughout the United States were called upon to strike, the men at this particular mill did not go out. I think there is an obvious lesson there for all the industries of this country, and that is, to enlighten the men who are serving in those industries and to enlighten the people in reference to these charges of profiteering. That can be done quite easily, and it will save a great deal of the industrial unrest that exists, and help to remove a great deal of the suspicion which exists in the minds of the people. I believe that a good many of our industrial troubles in Canada are due to suspicion more than to anything else. The men are suspicious of their employers, and the employers are suspicious of the men identified with their unions, and this feeling of suspicion prevents them getting together. If both sides would only come out in the open and deal frankly with each other, a great many of our industrial difficulties could be avoided.

It has been my custom in this debate to make a declaration of my views on the fiscal policy of the country. I want to say that I stand where I have always stood, in favour of the lowest kind of a tariff. But I would say to the Government and to the House that in regulating the tariff we should aim at relieving the burdens that are imposed upon the mass of the people, and aim also at the development of our natural resources. If we could have had a tariff in this country that would enable all the implements of production that are used in the development of our resources to be got as cheaply as possible, it would do a great deal for the development of our resources and toward relieving the country of its financial obligations. If the implements that are used in mining, for instance, in lumbering, in fishing, and in agriculture, could be made as cheap as possible to the people who are producing along those lines, there would be an encouragement to greater production, and the richer the country becomes in production the better position we shall be in to meet our financial obligations. I am not one of those who believe we can go out and slash the tariff all to pieces at the present time. I know that for some years to come we must utilize the tariff for raising revenue. But, the tariff should be directed wholly toward raising revenue, rather than to protecting certain industries that have enjoyed protection in this country for a great many years. Possibly, members of the Government who are not moving around so much and getting in touch with the minds of the people would like to know what the feeling of the people is with regard to the protected interests. To be frank, the great mass of the people, who are finding it hard to live to-day, and who see everything they buy rising higher and higher in price, realize that the men who are engaged in the protected interests in this country are living in comparative ease and comfort, having amassed a considerable fortune. They say that is due to the high protection given to those industries. Surely if the men engaged in these protected industries have amassed fortunes through a protective tariff, it is time we reduced that tariff and gave the people who are working day in and day out to make an honest living a chance not only to do so, but to save a little. That is the view of the people I come in contact with from day to day. We must have a tariff to raise revenue, but I do not think that tariff should be directed towards the protection of industries that have enjoyed protection in this country for so many years.

I should like to make a suggestion about the income tax. I am an advocate of income tax. I believe that if it is properly administered it can be made to yield a great revenue to this country, but I feel (and I do not place the blame on the Minister of Finance) that the tax has not been efficiently administered up to now, and that we are not getting from it the amount of revenue we should. I believe there are people who are evading the tax. I have only recently received communications intimating that some people are boasting that they have not paid the tax while some of their neighbours paid it. I have not their names or I would be glad to give them, for I have no sympathy with any man who evades paying the taxes imposed in this country. At the same time, I feel the administration has been weak, largely because an attempt has been made to centralize it instead of spreading out the organization a little more widely in the different provinces. In the province of Alberta, for instance, until quite recently I understand we had only one income tax officer, located in the city of Calgary. Another officer has since been located in Edmonton, but the officers must be closer than that to the population of the country, or they cannot reach the people who should pay the income tax. I think there should be officers in all the larger centres of all the provinces. I believe the expense would be repaid a hundredfold by the intimate knowledge they would have of the people liable to pay this tax.

I should like to make another observation. We have at the present time government ownership of railways on a very extensive scale, and I am glad we have it. I believe that government ownership can be made a success, and the Government of the day should see that every effort is made to encourage the efficient operation of our government roads, but I do hear complaints that some of the roads we have had in our possession for some years are not being operated efficiently—that the roadbeds have not been improved to the necessary extent to make operation successful. As an advocate of government ownership I would urge the Government to use its utmost efforts to get at the head of the Government system the most efficient administrator that can be obtained. We have a big system, bigger than the Canadian Pacific. I do not think the question of salary should be a consideration. We should get the very best railroad man on this continent at the head of the system and pay him a big salary. That is the only way to make the system a success. Politics should be kept entirely out of the operation of the system. So far as I know, politics have not entered into the operation of the railway, but the people generally feel a little doubtful of the success of government operation, and it is up to the Government to prove that government operation can be made a success; if they do, the people will be satisfied.

In closing, I should like to pay a tribute to the attitude that has been taken recently by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) in connection with the reservations to the Peace Treaty proposed in the United States Senate, which, if adopted, would take away from Canada its place in the League of Nations. I believe that the President of the Privy Council has the bulk of the people behind him in his attitude. I do not want to see Canada participate in any more wars, but I say that the part Canada played in the recent great war in Europe entitles her to a place in the League of Nations, and to a voice in deciding whether or not there shall be wars in the future. I have no desire to cast any reflection on the United States, but I will boast of this fact, that Canada was in the war from its inception, and sacrificed thousands of men for the principles for which they were fighting; and this nation therefore has just as much right to a voice in the councils of the League of Nations as has the United States of America.

Mr. OLIVER ROBERT GOULD (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise with considerable diffidence to make this my maiden speech in the House of Commons, and I trust that hon. gentlemen at the other end of the Chamber will be able to hear me distinctly, because it is my desire that some of the remarks which I intend to make shall reach them. In my new capacity as a member of the House of Commons I have watched with considerable interest the gladiators, as I may perhaps term them, on both sides of the House. I have seen blows offered and parried, and the proceedings, I must say, have at times been rather diverting. As I have listened to the debate I have wondered whether all these charges and counter-charges have been really indispensable to the conduct of the affairs of the Dominion of Canada, or whether they have become necessary as a matter of tradition. Be this as it may, I beg to add my small mead of praise of the sentiments that have already been expressed by so many hon. gentlemen in this House in reference to the admirable addresses that have been delivered by the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne. The exalted office discharged by those hon. gentlemen has not fallen to my lot, and my remarks must of necessity be more of a practical kind. Nevertheless I can assure this House that I duly appreciate the lofty ideals and the broad views to which expression was given in both of the addresses in question, and though I may lack a full conception of the height and broadness of vision which should characterize a representative of the people, I hope to prove that I am absolutely sincere in my appreciation of the views which my hon. friends, the mover and seconder of the Address, have so well stated. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I was gratified to have the privilege of being present at the opening of Parliament in this beautiful building. As I viewed its imposing magnificence and its beautiful architectural design from the outside; as I have promenaded the corridors; as I have listened to hon. gentlemen describing the beauties of the building, I myself have acquired a deeper conception of true Canadianism than I heretofore had. I have no doubt that this building is a fitting monument to the greatness of the Canadian people; and to the architect and those associated with him I am constrained to offer my congratulations on the splendid result of their genius. I admire, and indeed almost envy, the mind of the man who has such a large conception of everything that is worthy and inspiring as has been so ably exhibited in the beautiful and spacious building in which we are privileged to be assembled. I am sure that this building will stand out as a prominent landmark among all the public buildings, not only of Canada but of the North American continent, and will be a credit to this newly recognized young giant, the Canadian nation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not come here in any fighting spirit; I have come in a measure to tender to hon. gentlemen the olive branch. I am temperamentally a man of peace, not essentially disposed to combat; although it has been known in the past, I think, that I can retort when severely attacked. But I do believe, and sincerely so, that the hon. gentlemen who compose this House on both sides will listen with reason, and I trust with more interest than we have seen displayed in the past, to every statement of conditions as they really are. I am inclined to think that when we express our convictions, and place before this House our conception of conditions as they exist in the country to-day, hon. members may be disposed to revise their ideas, and that possibly some of the decisions that have already been arrived at may be reversed. I think that the consensus of opinion in this House inclines to the view that what we shall have to say will be hearkened unto, because whatever stand we may take on any question that may call for consideration in this House will be taken in all sincerity. Naturally my viewpoint, as I address this House, must be taken from western conditions, and I believe that I am in a far better position to know those conditions than many hon. members in this Chamber. I deplore the fact that any inference should be sought to be drawn that the movement with which we are associated—the Agrarian Movement as it is called—is a class movement. Let me assure you, Mr. Speaker, that in its initiation it was not intended to be such, and that fact has been proclaimed on platforms and in the press. Indeed, Sir, we know that it never could succeed as a class movement. The platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture, called now the new National Policy, is big enough and broad enough to embrace all classes in this Dominion of ours, and to protect the interests of the nation, and if hon. gentlemen refuse to accept this statement as true and insist upon describing us as a class organization, then I can only say that the fault is not with us. For we hold an open hand and are ready to co-operate with all in order to further the interests of Canadian life. This statement is known to be true by those who have had an opportunity of studying our platform at first hand. They know that no distinction has ever been drawn between rural districts and urban centres, and an examination of the returns will show that the people who are best conversant with that platform have all approved of it, whether in the urban centres or in the rural districts. That fact should be sufficient to dispel the idea that ours is a class movement, and it should not be necessary for an individual to stand up in this House in order to proclaim it. It has been stated with great insistence on the hustings and elsewhere that in this movement there is an aim to further the interests of a class.

It is a fact that our own conviction was that such an idea could not, and should not, succeed. If hon. gentlemen accept my statement and my interpretation of our attitude, I am sure we will not have the charge thrown at us that we favour class legislation or a class movement. I am proud to be able to say that that is the feeling of the great farmers' organization of the West, whose platform, as I said before, is big and broad enough for all who may wish to stand upon it and to assist us in our effort to make Canada a better place to live in than it has been in the past.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: If I join your organization, not being a farmer, will I be permitted to take any part in determining its policy?

Mr. GOULD: I am pleased that the hon. gentleman has asked me that question and I will reply in the affirmative. I wish to make this further statement that at the convention which we held—and I believe we held one of the most democratic conventions that ever took place in Canada—there were eighteen names upon the slate. four of them divines, three of them merchants, two professional men and the rest farmers, and that it took five and a half hours to ballot it through. That is a sufficient answer to the hon. gentleman and it is the best evidence that we do not have a class movement. Urban and rural centres both sent their delegates; fourteen hundred men and women sat in that skating rink and it took them five and a half hours balloting in order to find this unworthy individual. Surely that should be a sufficient answer, surely that should be proof that the words that I have spoken here have been spoken in all sincerity and that there is no basis for the fear that some hon. gentlemen seem to have that this is destined to be a class movement.

Mr. HALLADAY: Is it not true that in the rural constituencies in Alberta they will allow no one but a farmer to be a member of the organization?

Mr. GOULD: I speak for the province of Saskatchewan alone where I am best known. I am the only representative from the West who has been elected on the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture. Consequently, the experiences of Alberta are as yet an unknown quantity—I do not know. While I speak to the House to-day I speak across what may be called No Man's Land for what, as my colleague who preceded me said, may be regarded as the contemptible little army. Perhaps I should not use that expression but if we go back to find a precedent for its use on the war-torn fields of Europe we find that the term was made applicable not to the assaulting party but merely to the defensive party. While we take that position here to-day, we hope the day will come, and come quickly, when hon. gentlemen seated in this House will accept our policy and help us. That is our hope and ambition.

My hon. friend who preceded me made reference to the assistance he received during his election down in New Brunswick. I have a somewhat similar tale to tell although the fact is that my opposition did not come from members of the Government. I entertain no animosity towards the hon. gentlemen who came to my electoral district—none whatever; in fact, I believe our friendship has been cemented as a result of their visit. Scripture tells us that wise men invariably come from the east. We were always led to believe that when wise men came from the east they came in bodies of three. It was heralded all over the electoral district of Assiniboia that three were to come. However, when the train pulled into our little station, only two got off. They were dressed immaculately and they carried leather grips, something that was scarcely understood in the west. These hon. gentlemen, as they gazed upon the people who were working in the town, were no doubt filled with wonder that these people simply went on about their work although they were in the heat of a political campaign. Yet it is a fact, to make a long story short, that these gentlemen returned east and I am satisfied that they returned wiser than when they came west. I would give a cheque for a hundred dollars of my sessional indemnity to find out what actually took place among the three when they again met after the election in Assiniboia. An hon. gentleman on the Government side of the House made reference to the election in Assiniboia and said that the majority was approximately 4,000. Let me inform the hon. gentleman that there was a majority of 5,294 which was amply sufficient to tell the people of the Dominion that the electors of that constituency at any rate believed they had a grievance. It was perfectly expressed by the exponents of our new platform and it is a fact that the people of Canada have become educated. They have become educated along lines of progress which they believe it is necessary for this Dominion to pursue and the people of Assiniboia showed the result of their belief in the action they took on the 27th day of October.

A sentiment was given expression to by an hon. gentleman on the Opposition side of the House to which I wish to make a brief reference. That sentiment, expressed by an hon. gentleman who stands high in the Liberal party was that he would not trade with any nation that would not recognize our Canadian dollar as being worth one hundred cents. I would direct the attention of the House to the fact that immediately after the American Civil War the American dollar went down in value to about 37 cents and it is not on record that the Government of Canada refused to take advantage of the difference in exchange in dealing with our neighbours to the south. There must be consistency. If that hon. gentleman lived near the international boundary in Saskatchewan and Alberta and he found that his neighbour within a mile or two of him was receiving from 70 cents to $1 a bushel more for his wheat than he was privileged to receive on this side, I am sure he would take advantage of every opportunity that was afforded to take his wheat across the line, receive that extra 70 cents or $1 and bring back good American money and spend it with the merchants in Canada. That is just as loyal, just as true as the position which the hon. gentleman takes and it is the proper business attitude. Consequently I do not think the sentiment of not trading with a country that refuses to accept our money at par should carry much weight with the real business men of Canada. I do not suggest this so much in a spirit of criticism as I do from the purely business point of view. Business is business and the best interests of the country require that we should encourage an interchange of commodities across the international boundary rather than that we should place obstructions, sentimental or otherwise, in the way. I visited the town of Sherwood, North Dakota, during our campaign to get direct information on this subject. The operator in one of the elevators there had compiled figures, and he showed them to me, disclosing that $12,000 of good American money on the proportion of wheat that had been brought into that town from the Canadian side—a $12,000 equity—had been paid at that time to Canadian producers who had marketed their wheat there. How near will the price we shall receive for our participation certificates equal the price we feel we should receive. I have a few of those in a little box at home for which I was offered five cents a bushel. That was the valuation some of the business men of Canada placed upon our participation certificates. I refused, of course, to accept the offer; but the fact remains that I would prefer to accept nothing for my participation certificates than take a premium of five cents a bushel. I for one never expect to receive for my participation certificates the same amount that my American cousin on the south side of the line enjoys.

The question has been asked "for what do we stand?" From our viewpoint one of the most important things we stand for is a big reduction in the tariff, a question that was well taken by the hon. gentleman who preceded me. He explained the matter in a manner that well commends itself to me and I am not now going to discuss at length the protective features of the tariff. I quite understand that later on an opportunity will be given of going into the subject at length. I shall simply now content myself by placing on record the statement that I am utterly opposed to the high protective principle involved in the tariff and let the matter go at that.

We not only stand for a reduction in the customs duties but we advocate the nationalization of our national resources and various other policies which I will not occupy the time of the House by dwelling upon at the present.

The planks set out in our platform have on many occasions given cause for alarm to many of the "interests" in this country and they have asked in dismay "where will the revenue come from if these policies are carried out?" Some of the planks in our platform have been called destructive, but we have a constructive policy to replace anything that may appear as destructive, a constructive policy Sir that I believe would be in the interests of Canada as a whole. What that policy is can be determined by a close and earnest study of the provisions set out in the planks of our policy.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. gentleman believe in the principle of protection at all, whether it be high or low?

Mr. GOULD: I do not.

Mr. GAUVREAU: That is a plain statement.

An hon. MEMBER: The grain growers do not want any protection.

Mr. GOULD: I would like to further add that I never did believe in that policy and I do not expect I ever will.

Mr. COPP: That is quite explicit.

Mr. GOULD: Now as to the question of where the revenue is to come from. That has been a very interesting subject of debate during our campaign in the West and where the merits of the question have been discussed the people who have heard our explanations have been thoroughly and perfectly satisfied. Let me give an illustration as to possible sources of revenue. On the Atlantic coast, at Montreal, at Fort William, at Hudson bay, and on the Pacific coast there are great stretches of water frontage which have fallen into the hands of private individuals. Providence created them but through the operation of the institutions and organizations of our country they have been acquired by private individuals. The owners of these frontages through their development have become wealthy. Possibly as low a sum of $100 was paid for some of these privileges and ultimately they were sold for as much as $600,000 for no effort on the part of the individual who received the equity. I maintain and I insist that it is only right and proper in the interests of the people of Canada that the Dominion Government should appropriate ninety per cent of the money that accrued to such speculators and use it for the purpose of administering the national affairs.

We are told by scientists that the whole of the province of Alberta and large areas of Saskatchewan are underlined with coal. Up near the Pas in Manitoba we also know that large and valuable deposits of copper occur. I was informed that on one quarter section alone the vein was known to be worth $1,000,000. The profits from these great natural resources are going to the country to the south owing to concessions to American capitalists. They are taking our heritage. Our birth right and heritage is being handed over to outsiders and yet we are bewailing the fact that we cannot find sufficient revenue to run the country. I have indicated possible sources of revenue to say nothing of other planks in our platform with respect to taxation —not indirect taxation. The policy of direct taxation is something that the people can see and understand. That indirect taxation should have been resorted to means that the people have not understood and do not appreciate the conditions involved. It is a form and system of deception and I think no Government should follow out any such principle. At any rate that is my earnest belief.

I desire now for a few minutes to discuss conditions that pertain to my own electoral district. It is a fact which has already been mentioned here that for three sessions Assiniboia has been unrepresented. Let me qualify that statement, in a measure and at the same time pay my tribute to the hon. gentleman who preceded me in the representation of the constituency and who has now been elevated to the Senate. I know for a fact that the hon. gentleman in question on many occasions did his best for Assiniboia and succeeded admirably in having that district represented. That however was a form of indirect representation and owing to the extra burdens that have been placed upon the hon. gentleman in question by his elevation to the Senate the district of Assiniboia has been deprived of the direct representation to which it was entitled. I am not now speaking in criticism of the Government. The time perhaps was not ripe for the great agrarian movement which has since developed such strength to manifest itself had a by-election been brought on earlier. The fact nevertheless remains that Assiniboia has for some time been unrepresented and conditions there have been more or less in a state of chaos. The conditions that have developed there, from an agricultural point of view are deplorable and before I came here I had some correspondence with members of the Government asking that some relief might be afforded to certain of the farmers in south eastern Saskatchewan as a result of repeated droughts, loss of crop, and last year the devastating havoc caused by grasshoppers.

I hold in my hand representations made by six municipalities regarding the deplorable conditions resulting from the devastation caused by grasshoppers last year. I have asked that these settlers, these men that want to produce for the sake of the country, be given an opportunity to retrieve their position. I am told that they are to be given an opportunity—that the Dominion Government will back their efforts to purchase seed. But what is the use of seed for their horses this winter? These men want money. In 1916 rust and hail destroyed a large portion of their crops. I myself suffered a total loss that year. In 1917, 1918 and 1919 there were partial losses. These men need help—not protection, not for a moment. They want assistance so they can purchase feed for their animals and go ahead and produce 100 per cent. I do not wish to read the letters which I have here corroborating the statements I have made, letters from the reeves and the secretaries of the municipalities affected, but I would ask you to accept my word that I am truly representing the conditions that obtain in that Western country. I would respectfully ask for recognition of the appeal I make on behalf of those people that they receive greater assistance than has been tendered to them through the medium of the Provincial Governments, and I would like to know that they will receive such assistance very soon, because at this season of the year they are making strenuous efforts to carry on; but under existing conditions, no matter how strenuous each individual effort may be, those people are going to be absolutely incapacitated from producing what they are so anxious to produce—one hundred per cent, a percentage which the country needs and wishes them to produce.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, referring once more to the three sessional indemnities due Assiniboia, I would suggest that a requisite amount be added to the total of those indemnities and given to these people to afford them a chance to overcome the adverse conditions which have almost overwhelmed them, for it is a fact that they have suffered much, and I am sure that any help that may be accorded to them they will repay one hundred fold. I have spoken in the interests of my constituents, and I am pleased that you have given me your earnest attention, and, thanking you for your kindness, I will now resume my seat.

Mr. SPEAKER: I take this opportunity to say that while there is no disposition on the part of the Chair to restrict debate upon the Address, I would remind hon. members of the subject before the House, and also of the circumstance that there will be a Budget Debate later on in the session.

Mr. WILLIAM F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity in making my first address in this very fine Chamber to appeal for a re-
5 p.m. turn to parliamentary government, to parliamentary practice, and to parliamentary responsibility for the conduct of our public affairs. Partly because of the war no doubt we departed from parliamentary government and from parliamentary responsibility, but I think the time has come when an effort should be made to return to the former well established principles, and, in the first place, I hold the Unionist Party and the Unionist Government responsible for the maintenance of those principles.

I have always been a supporter of Union Government. I pointed out early last session, when opportunity presented itself, that to deal with the war it was necessary to have a union of parties, and that it would be necessary in some measure to depart from the practice that had hitherto obtained in this country. But now the war is over, and to my mind it is high time we got back to the observance of the rules of parliamentary Government that have obtained not only in the Mother Country but in all the Dominions, and which have proved to be the only foundation of democratic government.

I regret to say, Mr. Speaker, that the departure which has been made in this country is most pronounced in connection with the office of Prime Minister. Most of all the Prime Minister must be the actual leader of his Government, and he must lead one at least of the Houses of Parliament. That has always been the practice, and I regret that owing to the illness of the Prime Minister he has not been able to lead this House for many months, and there is not much prospect that we will soon return to the old practice. On behalf of the people of this country, irrespective of any party, I say that it is time we discussed for a moment what constitutes parliamentary government, to see if it is not in the interests of the country to come back to it, and particularly to come back to it in connection with the office of the Prime Minister.

Not only must the Prime Minister lead the House and the Government, but he is also responsible for something else: He must select the ministers of his Government, and he must see that those ministers are elected. We have reached a hiatus when that is not taking place, and the responsibility is on the Unionist Party—the party that won the war and has a very creditable record to its account. Therefore as a friend of Union Government and as one who has supported every proposal made by that Government in this House to win the war, I shall call attention to what I think ought to be done to recover our position.

The main thing I wish to call attention to is that we must come back to the old practice. I regret that the Prime Minister is away. I regret that he saw fit to offer to resign his position because of overstrain due to his strenuous labours of the past few years, and he has my fullest sympathy. But the government of the country must go on, and the Unionist Party must vindicate its position and carry on the government of this country on established lines or something will happen.

Now, what is to be done? I am waiting to hear from ministers of the Union Government to tell us what they propose to do.

Mr. COPP: They do not know.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I am waiting to hear when they intend to resume parliamentary responsibility and to have a Prime Minister in the House who leads the Government, who selects his ministers, who sees that those ministers are elected, and who can make an appeal to our fellow-countrymen who live in the province of Quebec. There never was a period in the history of this country heretofore when that appeal was not made and the Government of the day was not able to get support from the province of Quebec and also from some of the western provinces. It may be all very well to trifle with this question and attempt to "put it over" and to suggest this and that artifice, but in doing that you get away from the question of responsible Government. Let us come back to responsible Government; and will the House bear with me when I say this: That I am making no personal comment or criticism on the right hon gentleman who has led the House so successfully as head of the Government, and who has made a great place for himself in the history of the conduct of this war. But the King's Government must go on, and it must do so under Parliamentary rules and practice. We are getting away from that. The Prime Minister is not here, and he has not done what the Unionist party have been promising for two years now, ever since they came into office. When they first had Union Government formed, we were promised that later on there would be a reconstruction of the Government. Why is that reconstruction not going on? There is some reason for that, and probably it is owing to the absence of the Prime Minister. If that be the case, I say that the responsibility is on this Union Government to correct what is wrong and to try to return to that responsible Government that we have had in this country in the past, but that we do not happen to have at the present moment as we ought, especially now that the war is over. The people want responsible Government. I have been out in the country; I have met the people; I have read the newspapers; I have heard discussions at various public meetings. I saw what took place in Ontario recently when there was an absence of responsible Government there, when not even a caucus of a party was called to see what sort of a policy the Conservative party would have in the provincial election that took place there. And what happened? That party disappeared in a night, because it had failed to call together its friends and the people of Ontario in general to discuss the welfare of the country and the programme under which it proposed to appeal to the people. The same thing may happen in the case of the Dominion if we do not come back to Parliamentary practice and if we do not have in this House a responsible Prime Minister leading the House, forming his Government, having his Government elected, and seeing that all the country is fairly represented in the administration that attempts to carry on the affairs of the country.

[Mr. W. F. Maclean.]

There are many other questions that I should like to bring up on this occasion. I should like to discuss the question of public ownership of railways. I should like to discuss our future relations with the Empire. I should like to discuss what I know or rather what I do not know about the commitments that have been made in connection with the Imperial Conferences that have been held in the old land. We, the people of Canada, do not know what has taken place there; we do not know what commitments have been made in connection with those conferences, and we have not our Prime Minister here to tell us what took place at those conferences although he was one of the chief actors at them. While the war was a great success, I should like to know whether we shared in the proper responsibility of that war, and I should also like to know something about our position in the League of Nations.

I hope to be able to discuss that later on I should like to discuss the fiscal policy of this country. I have heard a good deal about it here to-day, and I heard the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan) and another hon. member speak about a measure of redistribution that should take place next year. I do not want to see an election in this country until that measure of redistribution has been put through this House; but when it has been put through, I want to see representation by population as the groundwork principle in that redistribution. We have not had it. I represent in this House about 100,000 people; some time ago, I represented many more than that, and my constituency is growing rapidly. We ought to have in this House three votes from that constituency in settling the policy of the country and in maintaining Parliamentary and democratic institutions in Canada. You cannot have democratic institutions in this country unless you have representation by population. The United States have that, if it exists anywhere. We must have it here, and I want to appeal especially to my friends from the West who were saying here to-day, and justly saying, that there should be full representation from the West in this House before we have an election. I want to see full representation for every section of the country, for Quebec, for Ontario, as well as for the West. I bring this up merely because I desire to say that that is another topic that I should like to discuss in this House, but I am going to leave all those questions for another opportunity. The debate is not over; and while it has wandered far afield, and while the leader of the Opposition has asked for an election, a proposition which I cannot see my way to accept, what I want to see is a return to responsible Parliamentary Government, no matter who makes the sacrifice in order that it may come back. Especially do I appeal to the members of the Government and to its supporters to see that we come back to a condition of affairs where the Prime Minister is in the country at the head of the Government, where he is reconstructing the Government as he promised to do and as the people expect him to do. I say this all the time remembering that he is ill, but nevertheless, the Government must go on. In all fairness and in the most respectful way I direct the attention of the Government of the day and my fellow members of the House, especially those who have supported Union Government, to try to come back to the principle of responsible Government and to show that the Unionist party is able to strengthen itself, to select ministers, to elect them in the country, and to put forward a policy necesary for reconstruction. If we do not do that—and I am going to speak very plainly, and I think I can see what is going on—we shall have cabals in the ministry instead of leadership, instead of a progressive policy. Every one can see signs of these things. Unfortunately, those who wish to depart from the observance and maintenance of responsible Parliamentary Government in this country seem to be ministers of the Crown. I hope the ministers of the Crown will realize their double responsibility and come back to responsible Parliamentary Government, and have the Government reconstructed. Let us have a Prime Minister in his place who will assume responsibility and lead the House and the country in this great duty of reconstruction.

Mr. H. S. BELAND (Beauce): Does my hon. friend suggest that the Prime Minister should resign?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I do not make any suggestion at the moment. I say that the Prime Minister wished to resign and did resign, and probably that is his disposition now, but apparently some of his friends wish to keep him in an irresponsible position.

Mr. JOHN BEST (Dufferin): Seeing that the hon. member has attacked the Prime Minister, would he be good enough to say whether he has attended one-fifth as many sittings of this House as the Prime Minister during the last five years, during which he has been drawing his full indemnity?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I have not attacked the Prime Minister. I have the greatest respect for him. Many a time has he asked my advice, and I have been pleased to give it to him. Many a time I have spoken on the platform with him in constituencies and helped him to elect his candidates. I have not always been in this House as much as I should have been, but I have been in this House a good deal, and whenever I have spoken it has been on a real question. I am speaking on a real question to-day, one that is uppermost in the minds of the people of this country, and uppermost in the minds of the ministry, many of whom are anxious to lead a way out of the situation. I am not calling for the Prime Minister's resignation. I am calling for the observance of the principle of responsible parliamentary government. I have heard a good deal around this House and have seen a great deal in the newspapers about this very question. I saw it in the Montreal papers, for instance.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): Might I ask my hon. friend whether he was in his seat to-day and heard the statement of the leader of the Government (Sir George Foster) in reference to the absence of the Prime Minister, and if so, whether he approves of the statement that was made?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I heard the statement.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: What objections have you to it?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: The objections will be removed when we return to responsible parliamentary government. That is all I want. We have not had responsible parliamentary government in this country, I must tell the hon. gentleman.

Mr. H. S. BELAND: What do you suggest should be done?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I am calling attention to the situation. Perhaps we shall have a further discussion of it. I am discussing a real question, and I believe I am speaking for the people of Canada to-day. I am passing no reflections whatsoever on the right hon. gentleman who leads the House. I am simply trying to speak for the people of this country on a matter of paramount importance to them. The disturbance following the war is great, the dislocations are many, and all sorts of new conditions have come into existence. One underlying principle of our constitution is that of responsible parliamentary government, and I say that we have got some way away from that in this House. During the war the country was ruled by Orders in Council, and very properly so perhaps; other nations had to do it, but now we should return to responsible government and get on with a policy of reconstruction. There is many a minister in the Government to-day who I would like to see giving most of his time to framing policies of reconstruction to lay before the House. Any such measures will have any little support I may be able to give them. Again I say, I arose in my place here to-day to ask that the Unionist Government come back at the very earliest possible moment to responsible parliamentary government and bring forward the necessary legislation for the reconstruction of the country. I do not think there should be an election, if it can be avoided, until there has been a numbering of the people. That could begin on the first of April next year and be completed thirty days thereafter and a report made, on which a redistribution measure could be based and introduced in the following May, then with a new Franchise Act and a new Redistribution measure, let there be an appeal to the people in a general election.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle). (translation): We are meeting this year in our new Parliament Building which adorns the historic hill of the Capital, resplendent like a gothic marvel of old. Fifty years ago, Mr. Speaker, the representatives of the Canadian people were meeting here for the first time after Confederation.

On that occasion, the representatives of the people came from all the provinces and there were on the ministerial benches the two minsters representing the two great races in this country. Those ministers had joined their efforts to make Canada a great country, a united and prosperous country. They gave the first administration we had in this Dominion the name of Macdonald-Cartier, a name never to be forgotten. If I recall this happening of bygone days, it is to show by what spirit the Fathers of Confederation were prompted and, at the same time, to underline the present policy of the Unionist party, which has become occasionally the successor of the former Governments, of the Macdonald-Cartier Government, and which is, nevertheless, driving the country to disunion and to ruin.

In 1867, we, in the province of Quebec, were associated with the English provinces of Canada and put on an equal footing with them by a federative compact assented to by the Imperial Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. In this agreement the rights of the first pioneers, the rights of my ancestors were preserved; they could say that the survival of all their rights, customs and traditions was secured by this Act.

When the negotiations previous to Confederation took place, Macdonald was not in favour of a Federative Act, he would have preferred a Legislative union; but Cartier, whose opinion finally prevailed, wished the provinces to retain their full autonomy, while Canada would be ruled by a central federal power. The first meeting which took place under the Confederation Act carried with itself a meaning far different from and far more eloquent than that of our present meeting. In 1867, both races were represented in the Cabinet, which took pleasure in asserting this dual character to the extent of styling itself the Macdonald-Cartier administration. Therefore though the House of Commons of 1867 was smaller than that of 1920, it embraced more, because it was taking in, amid the cheers of the people, a ministry, it was taking in members who came from all the provinces and by whom all nationalities were represented. On that occasion, Cartier might well say to the Dominion, as he did " For more than a century, the British flag, which bears the name of Union, has unfurled its folds on the horizon of Canada. That century, now elapsed, was rather marked by quarrels between the two races which are going to constitute a new people, the Canadian people. That protracted strife has known hours of conflict more cruel than others, but the secular contact between the two races seems to have finally resulted in creating a better conception of their respective worth and, as a sequence, a new spirit, born of a friendly understanding which prevails at last. In time, we shall have a country where there is neither victor nor vanquished, neither a superior nor an inferior race. We have Confederation accepted at last by the Mother Country and by the colony. Confederation will give us a Canadian country, a country which will be really united, for on the occasion of an event of this kind, the union of the minds cannot be but a word, an empty word, it carries with itself a cordiality which will make a people endowed with the gifts of the two most glorious nations of the world and, therefore, a people which, young though it be as yet, will undertake, in a masterly way, to carry out its destinies."

On the other hand, Macdonald withstood, in the full measure of his might, the brunt of the attacks of the few British statesmen, more enthusiastic than clearsighted, who required the help of the colony in the wars of England with the nations of the world, his answer being that Canada was under no obligation to contribute money or men to enterprises with respect to which she had no say. How far we are, Mr. Speaker, from the spirit of those leaders all engrossed by the problems of Canadian politics and devoting the whole of their intelligence and the very best of their heart to the realization of the ideal which had inspired the Fathers of Confederation: "Make Canada a united, happy and prosperous country." The policy of the Government, as expressed in the speech from the Throne, deals but with external affairs, matters concerning the world at large, which may offer some interest to the Allies now that the peace treaty has been signed, which may have a direct interest for London, Paris or Washington, for instance, but those questions are of such a nature as to have us, citizens of this country, perfectly indifferent. It might perhaps be interesting to hear it mentioned in the speech from the throne, among the great deeds of the Government, that a commercial treaty has been signed with the most powerful nations; but what is to us the signature of a peace treaty with Bulgaria or with Turkey? Have we ever declared war to those far distant countries? And was war ever declared to us by those countries?

I am sure the Government do not think we are gullible enough to believe them when they say that we should be glad of these signatures being there because they mean a diplomatic success for an ambassador of the Canadian nation. Has not the Government anything besides matters of foreign policy of which they could assume the merit in the Speech from the Throne? Have we become, perchance, an independent state? I should be glad of it, for it means the crowning of a people's legitimate aspirations toward complete autonomy and freedom. But nobody here spoke of breaking our colonial bonds and so far Great Britain has not notified us that starting from a certain date, say from the coming into power of the Union Government for instance, we should become an independent and free country, not a sister nation, but an absolutely independent and self-governing nation.

Fortunately we know by experience what a speech from the Throne means for a Government. It is an official document in which no mention is made of the questionable legislation which the Government intends enacting—as evidenced at the last session when they brought up at the last minute the monster bill for the acquisition of the Grand Trunk—but which gives the Government credit for foreign legislation to which they never contributed, or expresses delight at the occurring of events which we may look upon with indifference but which however are a disguise for the shameful sacrificing of our autonomy to imperialism.

Imperialism, Mr. Speaker, is the enemy. It is on account of imperialism that our national debt reached the enormous figure of $2,000,000,000 and that nothing seems to be able to stop its rise which is leading this country to disaster. It is also on account of imperialism that our expenses, including the cost of administration, the large sum of interest on our loans and the necessary funds for the soldiers' pensions, are continuously widening the abyss of our indebtedness which taxation is unable to fill. That is not all the harm that Imperialism will cause this country. It is bound to lead us to militarism.

The League of Nations finds it impossible to control the war-like preparations of the Allies. The Great Powers have never been so anxious to keep up and to increase their military force than since the signing of peace: Great Britain and the United States, their navy; France, her army.

What is the secret mission on which the representative of the British navy, Lord Jellicoe, was sent to this Government? What new contribution did the Government pledge to Lord Jellicoe? There is nothing in the speech from the Throne about it and the acting leader of the Government remains silent on the matter. But deeds are more eloquent than words. The very warm and cordial reception given to the admiral—thanks to which our Prime Minister was taken aboard the flagship to be carried away to other colonies of the Empire as a living mark of our subjection—the silence observed by the Government and the comminatory stand taken by its leader, are so many facts which are much more telling than any speech from the Throne could be.

Canada is being threatened now more than ever by this dangerous policy and active form of imperialism which will bind our future welfare, our resources and our children to satisfy the ambition of a country devoted to militarism.

I am happy to be a member of the political association which, at its last session, held in Ottawa last summer, did not hesitate to adopt as an important plank of its platform: That the constitution of Canada shall not in any way be modified as regards our relationship to Great Britain, without the people being previously consulted.

We, the descendants of the discoverers and pioneers of this country, as well as the newcomers who wish to make of this fertile land their home, were not entrusted by Providence with the task of perpetuating on this American continent the causes of conflicts which are keeping the old European countries continuously afire, but we were asked to devote our efforts to the beneficent works of peace, to work with a legitimate emulation for the development of our immense resources and to establish here a free, contented and prosperous country.

There is another question which though it does not appear in the speech from the Throne, hovers however in the mind of the Government. I am referring to divorce. At a previous session, the Government had already overlooked an attempt to introduce a bill to make divorce easier. Owing to persistent rumors which have been circulating even in this Parliament, there is some apprehension that the Government will favour such anti-christian legislation.

The country is bound to suffer from such a law if it be adopted by this Parliament. Divorce is the greatest menace to the maintenance of family ties, and the family is the basic social institution.

At this dangerous period where revolutions are about to break out, where the spirit of bolshevism penetrates and spreads almost everywhere, and where strife between classes, animated by passions which are a menace to public order, voiced even in this Parliament, it is time that we should prepare to safeguard the interests of society and see that they are preserved from the scourge of divorce. Christian minds and orderly people understand that such legislation would be most dangerous. Are we not, then, in a Christian country? The Fathers of Confederation themselves had foreseen the disastrous consequences which society would derive from a law by which divorce had been made easy. They have shown toleration for it, but at the same time they have rendered it as difficult as possible at every turn, surrounding the proceedings with all kinds of precautions and intrusting the responsibility of the decree solely to that honourable and revered body which personifies the wisdom of the nation. Such toleration by the constitution may lead to abuse. I would suggest that the British North America Act be amended so as to make divorce an impossibility, in this country.

The Government prides itself of its recent participation in the first international labour congress. If it be an honour for the Government to send representatives to a conference of that kind, where they will meet the spokesmen of capital and of labour, let us wish that this participation may procure such amount of experience as is necessary to solve the anguishing problem of labour in this country.

But who will supply the generating principle of happy solutions in social life? I have the honour to belong to that class of men who believe that this problem can be solved only in the light of christian principles. Such solutions, obtained through a recourse to the great principle of social truth, with which the Church is possessed, are yet the most durable and the most practical. The revered leaders of our church have had very much at heart, for a long time, the happiness of the workingmen, of all the men who toil; but one of them has dealt with the social question, in our age, with more striking effect than the others. His authority was recognized by all the statesmen and his advice was followed, and happily so, in many countries. The great Pope Leo XIII, surnamed the workingmen's Pope, gave the universe the encyclical letter "Rerum novarum". The document was greeted in all the industrial cities, as the charter of the social world, that is, as a full treatise on that subject, as a symposium of the reforms which the working classes of the world have the right to seek for the betterment of their condition and the welfare of their families as well. It is in the light of those two principles so marvelously just and true, that so many national and catholic trade unions were organized in our province of Quebec. Whenever those associations have sought to assert themselves publicly among the working classes of Canada, they have invariably been spurned by this Government.

I pray this Government, as I would particularly pray the hon. minister of Labour if he had a seat in this House, to give a just attention to the legitimate claims of those bodies of workingmen in my province. You will perhaps find, in the useful work which they have already accomplished, some guiding principles which may help you in your future legislation with respect to labour.

Now, Mr. Speaker, much has been said about a particular item of the speech from the Throne relating to a new Franchise Act, which leads us to discuss the opportunity of a new general election in this country.

I was amused, a moment ago, to hear the reflections made by some hon. members on the other side of the House. They would have us believe that they have no fear of the electorate, but they lay down as a principle that we should differ, as long as possible, to consult the people. I think that is a false principle and that it is impossible to wait till the next census has been taken, before we have a general election in this country. The last census was taken in 1911 and the next one will be taken in 1921. That does not mean that the election may be arranged in such a way as to satisfy the claims expressed by the members from the Canadian West and take place during the year 1921, because the delays necessary to complete the work must be taken into account, and therefore, a general election could not be held before the year 1923. What is just and what the people is expecting is that a general election should take place as soon as possible. There seems to be a unanimous chorus of protests not only on this side of the House, but on the other side as well, to the effect that the affairs of the country should be administered by another government.

Quite often and how emphatically have we been told that the present Government was returned in 1917 for the period of the war, that this was a Government formed so as to win the war and styled a Union Government.

Now that war is over and peace is signed, that we enter upon an era of reconstruction, the citizen of Canada are bound to call upon their leaders to lay their policy before them so that they may choose their representatives. The present Government is inclined to wait until the next census before holding general elections. General elections woud be as fair now as in 1923. The people might avail themselves of their privileges during 1920 and again during 1923; they would be at liberty to choose their representatives and their rulers.

As for us, we can see no reason for the delaying of the elections on the part of the Administration.

In the province which it is my privilege to inhabit, where we are under the rule of a Liberal Government, they do not wait, like the Conservatives and the Tories, until the end of a parliament to hold new elections; they know how to respect the rights and bow to the will of the people, every three years, or every four years at the utmost. The Union Government should follow such an example; and we on this side of the House would be only too willing that general elections should be held as soon as possible.

The old walls of the first parliamentary buildings of Confederation had witnessed many events redounding to the glory of our Canadian statesmen. Indeed, within those walls flourished such men as Cartier, Macdonald, Mackenzie, Mowat, Chapleau and Laurier, and many others, and I must be content with mentioning only those who have departed, omitting the men who are still in active life on either side of this House. It is no part of these remarks to extol what they have done. But let us feelingly remember them and hail their patriotism.

The last and greatest of that line of illustrious men used to say: "The twentieth century will be the century of Canada." Like him, let us have faith in the future of this country. Let the new walls of these precincts forever bear through ages the stamp of events which shall conduce to the greatness and success of our common country.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JOHN WESLEY EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) this afternoon, you will have noticed, mixed with his tears and lamentations on the loss of responsible and representative government and the decay of democracy several earnest expressions of hope, together with the utterance of a desire to speak on this, that and the other subject and to deal with matters of various descriptions. The trouble with the hon. member for South York, who, as every one knows, is possessed of a very fertile brain, is that he does not attend the House often enough to have an opportunity to give expression to these excellent ideas of his.

Consequently they accumulate and become an incubus upon the hon. gentleman. We are all, I am sure, in perfect sympathy with that hon. member in his expressions of opinion with regard to representative government. These are good words; they have a pleasant sound. The word "democracy" also, which unfortunately is often misused and sometimes much abused, nevertheless is equally well-sounding, and no person can use it with greater unction and force than the hon. member for South York. It is true that Cabinet ministers, by virtue of the position they occupy, are clothed with special responsibilities; but it is likewise true that members of Parliament who are elected to represent the people in the House of Commons have also certain responsibilities to their constituencies, one of which responsibilities—a most important one—is that they shall be as regular as possible in their attendance and shall give as much time as they can to the business of the country. I say this, Mr. Speaker, merely because I think that possibly a criticism of the absence of the Prime Minister or of any other Cabinet minister would come with rather better grace from any other hon. gentleman in this House than the hon. member for South York. I do not know whether the statement is correct or not, and I will not attempt to vouch for the truth of it, but I have been told that on more than one occasion, notwithstanding the fact that the Parliamentary Guide shows that the hon. gentleman has been elected for a great many years, it has happened that the officers at the doors have been changed and others appointed and the hon. member at such times has had to be identified before being allowed to enter the Chamber, so infrequent was his attendance.

I have listened, as I am sure all hon. gentlemen have listened, with a great deal of pleasure and interest to the speeches delivered by the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Caldwell), and by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould). I hope I shall not be misunderstood when I say that I think that the hon. gentleman who represents the constituency in New Brunswick is a vast improvement on his predecessor. Still, I trust the hon. gentleman will not infer from this statement that I do not think there is room for some improvement in himself so far as his political views are concerned. I do not by any means want him to rest complacently under such an impression.

Now, Sir, in the speech of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) the other day, that hon. gentleman bewailed the fact that there had been some delay in calling on elections, and he waxed eloquent in referring to the lapse of time between the occurrence of the vacancy and the calling of the election to fill it. He drew the attention of the House to what he described as the crime against the constituency in its being unrepresented in the House of Commons, and naturally, of course, he attached the blame to the Administration. I do not think that it just occurred to the hon. gentleman when he was speaking that when the Government of this country was led by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier that gentleman was elected in two constituencies and, if I mistake not, sat for two constituencies in Quebec from 1908 to 1911. I believe also that Sir Rodolphe Forget sat for two constituencies in Quebec during the same period. Now, the remedy lay in the hands of the Laurier Government, of which my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) was a distinguished and shining light even at that time, and it probably did not occur to the hon. gentleman that he might with propriety direct some of his remarks to some of those whose seats would be near him if they were in the House. The former Postmaster General in the Laurier Administration, (Mr. Lemieux) I think I am right in saying, sits for two constituencies at the present time. Why does not the leader of the Opposition get busy and put a stop to that sort of thing? It would put him in a more consistent position when finding fault in this House with the Government for not bringing on an election in the constituency of Elgin, which has been vacant only a few days. This, however, is something which does not seem to occur to the hon. gentleman as calling for some attention on his part. The hon. gentleman also told the Government, and I am sure they were very much pleased to be given the advice from such a distinguished source, that by-elections were of great service to an administration as indicating the trend of public opinion on public events. But the hon. gentleman in that statement was exhibiting a modesty of which I really did not think him capable. He might have said that a by-election was also extremely useful to the leader of an opposition in indicating the same thing. Perhaps he will allow me to remind him that there was a by-election out in Assiniboia. We had a most eloquent speech this afternoon from the representative of that constituency (Mr. Gould), who bears a very attractive name. But apparently, in the mind of the leader of the Opposition, "All is not gold that glitters."

Mr. McMASTER: Oh.

Mr. EDWARDS: At all events,—and this will be particularly interesting especially to the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster)—this afternoon the member for Assiniboia, in answer to a question from this side of the House, said that he did not believe in the principle of protection, either high or low; further, that he had never believed in that principle and did not suppose that he ever would believe in it. I think I am quoting the hon. gentleman correctly. I say that that statement of the hon. member for Assiniboia will be particularly interesting to the prophet from Brome, who has lately on several occasions posed in this House as an out-and-out free-trader. Why, then, did the leader of the Opposition send the hon. member for Brome and the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) out to Assiniboia in order if possible to defeat this gentleman, who assuredly goes as far in the direction of free trade as any man can go? Why was it that a Liberal candidate, a man who occupied a Cabinet position in the Saskatchewan Government, was brought out against this gentleman? Evidently the leader of the Opposition canvassed the situation, and perhaps had heard something about the free-trade proclivities of the hon. gentleman who represents this constituency now, and said to himself: " No, that man wont do; he is too much of a free-trader for our side. We cannot go so far." At all events he sends these two gentlemen out to Assiniboia to defeat, if they possibly could, the hon. gentleman who now represents that constituency. It seems to me one of the cruelest things that ever happened in public life, that a man holding the views of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), who has denounced protection as vociferously as his former leaders did in the eighteen years before they came into power, should have been chosen to go out there to try to defeat an out-and-out free-trader. The hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) suggested the number of votes that had been added to his majority by a visit to his constituency. The hon. member for Assiniboia has not been good enough to give us any information as to how many votes he thinks the hon. members for Brome and South Renfrew added to his majority in that election. Perhaps, when we become better acquainted, the hon. gentleman may open out and give us his candid opinion in regard to the matter.

It seems to me that we can gain something else from the attitude of the leader of the Opposition in moving this amendment, and that the election in Assiniboia has a bearing upon it. Certainly the leader of the Opposition sent his man out there to carry that constituency for the Liberal party. There was no consideration for the farmer movement at that particular time from that particular source but, when he got the returns showing over 5,000 of a majority against his candidate, notwithstanding the magnificent eloquence and arguments which had been advanced, no doubt, by the hon. member for Brome, to say nothing of what was added by the hon. member for South Renfrew, he had that majority staring him in the face. What was he to do? Wait until the next census was taken when the western provinces would have about twenty members more than they have now? No; there was no hope in that for him in so far as the last election returns were concerned. He had nothing to hope for and so he brought in this amendment with the idea of bringing on the election, if he possibly could, before the West had another twenty members to send down in opposition to him. There is no other conclusion to come to.

But Mr. Speaker, let me just say a word in regard to this amendment as it appears to me. If you look at the amendment you will notice that the leader of the Opposition calls particular attention to the absence of the right hon. the Prime Minister of this country (Sir Robert Borden). He makes the absence of the Prime Minister one of the reasons—in fact if I read the amendment correctly the main reason—for moving the amendment in the House. I venture to say that, under the circumstances, having regard to the fact that the Prime Minister is away at the present time in an attempt to regain some of the health which he formerly possessed but which was shattered by his devotion to Canada and the Empire in the most trying time of their history, there is nothing else in the resolution, worded as it is, than a reflection, and a serious reflection, on the Prime Minister. We on this side of the House—and, I venture to say, many hon. gentlemen on the other side—hope most sincerely that the Prime Minister will be entirely restored to health. We hope that the word given to us by the right hon. the acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) this afternoon may prove true, and prove true sooner than he anticipated or mentioned. We on this side of the House hope that within a few weeks, or within a month or two, the right hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Borden) will be restored to health, that he will come back to his place in this House, will once more place his hand upon the helm of the ship of state and direct its affairs. And, hoping that, I for one, and many more in this House, are going to vote against the amendment because we want a chance to see that hope realised. Take it as you will, the vote on that amendment means that those who vote against the amendment are giving expression to the hope that the Prime Minister will recover his health and come back to this House, and those who vote for the amendment are giving expression to the hope that the Prime Minister will not come back to resume his duties in this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No; no.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is exactly what it means. What else does it mean? That is what it means in practice. You cannot disassociate the practical side of it from the wording of the amendment. It means that and nothing else.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would ask the hon. gentleman if he noted the one word "regrettable" before the word "absence" with reference to the Prime Minister?

Mr. EDWARDS: Yes, I did note the one word "regrettable," but I have lived long enough in this world to know what uses and abuses can be made of the English language.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EDWARDS: I am glad to see that sentiment so heartily endorsed and by none more than by the hon. member who represents East Quebec (Mr. Lapointe), because no man has abused the English language worse than he has. I do not attach very much importance to the word "regrettable" as coming from the leader of the Opposition, and I will tell the hon. gentleman why. Throughout his speech he casts reflections upon the Prime Minister and upon the Government which are not borne out by the facts, as I shall show before I sit down.

The leader of the Opposition complained that there is no Cabinet representation from the Maritime Provinces. May I remind the hon. gentleman that the Prime Minister comes from the Maritime provinces, represents a constituency in the Maritime Provinces and that he is a member of the Government yet whether the hon. gentleman thinks he is or not? That, I think, disposes of his statement that there is no Cabinet representation from the Maritime Provinces. But he went farther; he said there was no representation in the Cabinet of the French-Canadians of the province of Quebec. Some hon. gentleman asked him when he had made that remark: "What about the Postmaster General?"—and here is what the leader of the Opposition said: "Well, sir, we will not say that the Postmaster General represents the French-Canadians." His running mate, the hon. member for East Quebec (Mr. Lapointe) frequently, during the speech of the leader of the Opposition, interjected remarks just to call attention to the fact that there were other leaders besides the nominal, recognized one, on that side of the House. The hon. member from Quebec East said that Hon. Mr. Blondin could not get ten votes in any riding in his province. On what does the hon. gentleman base that conclusion? The leader of the Opposition was good enough to point out that Hon. Mr. Blondin, the Postmaster General, was defeated in one constituency in Quebec by 1,247 votes, and in another constituency in which he ran, by 6,623 votes. Those are very telling figures, but the leader of the Opposition might also have added that on the same day that Mr. Blondin was defeated in Laurier-Outremont by 1,247 votes, he himself was defeated in North York by 1,078 votes. While it is true that the Postmaster General was in a minority in the constituency of Champlain of 6,623 votes it is also true that the former great leader of the Liberal party, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was defeated in the city of Ottawa on the same day by 5,258 votes—

Mr. MARCIL: That is not creditable to the city of Ottawa.

Mr. EDWARDS: —and the hon. gentleman might have also said that while the Postmaster General polled 6,196 votes in a certain constituency in the province of Quebec, the leader of the Opposition only polled 2,870 votes in North York, whilst his brilliant side partner (Mr. Lapointe) only polled 3,453 votes. If we are going to take the votes polled by a candidate in an election as an expression of public endorsation, or of public opinion, I have this to say: That even in the province of Quebec, where the tide runs strongly, I admit, against any person who favoured conscription and the Military Service Act, nevertheless the Postmaster General did succeed in polling in one constituency in that province as many votes as the present leader of the Opposition and the gentleman from East Quebec who is associated with him taken together.

May I add a word or two further, and inform my hon. friend (Mr. King)—and I do so because this is not the first time that there have been flings at the Postmaster General—that Hon. Mr. Blondin polled more votes than thirty-two men who now occupy seats in this House from the province of Quebec, of whom thirty-one sit on the Opposition benches. So the Postmaster General polled more votes and had a greater endorsation of public opinion in that regard than did the thirty-one hon. gentlemen in question.

The leader of the Opposition in the course of his fault-finding says that the Postmaster General does not represent the French Canadians of the province of Quebec, and that they have no representation in this Government. I will grant at once that Hon. Mr. Blondin does not represent the great majority of the voters of that province, but I will say this in justification of the appointment of Mr. Blondin to the Cabinet and his elevation to the Upper Chamber: If ever there was a time in the history of Canada when a Government was justified in making two such appointments that justification existed when such recognition was accorded to Hon. Mr. Blondin. There were a number of people in the province of Quebec who did not agree with my hon. friend across the way who has just given utterance to a laugh. That hon. gentleman and other members sitting with him were opposed to the Military Voters Act and the other legislation along that line which the Government caused to be passed. But looking at the returns from the province of Quebec which I have before me it will be found that notwithstanding the fact that the majorities in most of the Quebec constituencies were very large and therefore strongly expressive of disapproval of the Government and the course which it followed, a careful examination of the returns will show that there were thousands and tens of thousands of voters in the province of Quebec who thought just as the Government and Mr. Blondin thought; and in appointing Mr. Blondin to the Cabinet and to the Senate the Government were according recognition to the thousands of men in Quebec who were bold and courageous enough to come out in defence of their principles and for the maintenance of Canada's honour.

The matters to which I have referred the leader of the Opposition might very well have left alone. After all what did the vote in the last general election mean? It was a test of public opinion and the issue was very plain. The issue was whether we should hearken to the appeal our boys overseas who were putting in four times the hours and four times the work in the trenches that they should have done. The question was whether we should send them the help they were asking for. Hon. Mr. Blondin took the ground that that help should be sent, and he received in one constituency over six thousand votes in support of his attitude. I know perfectly well that the stand which he took does not correspond with the view held by the leader of the Opposition, but I venture to say that the attitude and the policy of the Postmaster General will be endorsed by the general public of Canada to a far greater extent than the attitude taken by the leader of the Opposition. That hon. gentleman has told us that the War-time Elections Act was a most infernal piece of legislation.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS: I expected that statement would be given such an endorsation from hon. gentlemen opposite as it has received, but may I ask one or two questions in regard to it. The leader of the Opposition has asserted, and he has correctly voiced the opinions of the hon. gentlemen around him who shout "hear, hear," that the War-time Elections Act was an infernal piece of legislation. I ask why was it so denominated? Was it because the Act gave a vote to the women whose husbands lie buried in Flanders? Did that make the legislation referred to too "infernal" in its character? Was it an infernal piece of legislation because it gave a vote to the sister of the boy who was in Belgium or France doing his bit and doing the bit of lots of fellows who should have been there helping him? Is that what makes the legislation "infernal?" I ask again, why did the hon. gentleman call the law in question an infernal piece of legislation? There were two things which it did. It gave a vote to women in this country whose relatives—sons, or fathers or brothers—were overseas fighting for Canada and the Empire. I challenge the leader of the Opposition to rise in his place now and say that he believes that that particular feature of the Act was "infernal." He will not and dare not say it. Neither dare he open his mouth in regard to the matter for fear of offending some of those gentlemen who shouted "hear, hear" when he designated the Act in question as a piece of infernal legislation. Then the other feature of the Act was this,—it took the vote from certain people in this country. From whom? From certain aliens whose sons or relatives were in France and Flanders on the fighting line and killing our own Canadian boys. Is that why the War-time Elections Act is called an "infernal" piece of legislation? I know of no other reason.

Those are the two salient points of the Act. What has the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition to say in regard to that? The issue, I say again, was clear and distinct. There is no doubt at all that the question put to the people at that election was: Shall we conscript our men and send them overseas to help in the fighting? Imagine putting that question to an alien in this country whose son or brother perhaps was in the fighting line of the enemy! Imagine that man going into the polling booth and saying anything but "No, of course I won't vote to send more men over there to fight against my own flesh and blood"! What else could you expect him to say?

The Act was manifestly fair, and to no people in the country was it fairer than to those aliens from whom it removed the franchise for the time being. We asked nothing of them in the way of equal responsibility as citizens in fighting for the life of this country. We merely asked them to step aside for the time being, so far as that election was concerned, and let the people whose sons and brothers were overseas risking their lives for Canada to say whether further help should or should not be sent. And yet this is what the leader of the Opposition terms "an infernal piece of legislation."

But, carried away by the force of his own eloquence the hon. gentleman also attacks the Military Voters' Act. I desire to pay some attention to that for a moment, for in referring to that Act he implied that it was even worse, if anything, than the War-time Elections Act. Let me quote his own words:

> It has been openly stated in this House, and it will not be denied by hon. gentlemen opposite, that as a consequence of that legislation—that is, the Military Voters' Act—whole bundles of votes of soldiers overseas—votes by bundles—were taken and put into this riding, and into that riding, and into another riding, at the instance of some committee that was in the confidence of the Administration.

[Mr. Edwards.]

An hon. MEMBER: Hear.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is the statement of the hon. gentleman. I hear a little timid voice over there breathing out a faint "Hear"—not quite so certain now as he was a little while ago whether he will endorse his leader; the "hear, hears" were very vociferous at an earlier stage, but now he is not quite so certain. Well, I do not blame him for that. I presume that this gentleman with the timid voice was in the House when this matter came up last session when the then leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) was going to do great execution with a certain telegram, which he thought he had and professed to have, and which fizzled out very badly indeed so far as the hon. gentleman's argument was concerned. But, that aside, the statement is made by a man holding an important position in this country—it does not matter whether the man is very important or not, to hold the position of leader of the Opposition makes a man important—notwithstanding that the statement is made by the leader of a party (though that party is not so big or important as it used to be, and does not show any signs of getting stronger, but no matter, whether it is strong or weak, he is still leader of it as it is) that the soldiers' vote was manipulated in bundles for the benefit of this riding and the other riding. And the hon. gentleman to his right, who was at one time leader of the Opposition but now has to occupy a secondary place—and see the other fellow draw the salary—the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. D. D. McKenzie), if I mistake not, in his remarks made a similar statement—that there were men in this House who owed their seats to the way in which the soldiers' votes were manipulated. I have already dealt a good many hard blows at this assertion, but I am going to ask the indulgence of the House while I give it another crack, in the hope that hon. gentlemen will be satisfied that there is absolutely nothing in the statement that the military votes were pooled for the benefit of members on this side of the House.

Let me call attention very briefly to one or two facts, Mr. Speaker, which I am taking from a summary of the general election returns of 1917. I will take first the province of Ontario with its eighty-two seats. How did the overseas voters affect the return of those members? All but four of the eighty-two were elected by the civil vote, to say nothing about the military vote, and if you give to those four, not the military vote that they polled overseas, but only the same proportion of the vote overseas as they received of the soldier vote at home, every man of them would have a majority. I think that disposes of that erroneous statement so far as Ontario is concerned.

From the province of Quebec with its sixty-five seats only three members were elected to support Union Government. Who were they? The Hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), who had 1,446 of a majority of the civil vote—to say nothing at all about the military vote,—and who had 1,957 of a majority on the soldier vote; in other words, had he been so disposed or could he have done so he could have handed his opponent 1,000 soldier votes and still have defeated him by a majority of over 1,400. Will any person then say that a bundle of soldiers' votes effected the election of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries? Then we will take the member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames), who secured a majority of 1,583 of the civil votes. He could have given his opponent 1,000 soldier votes and still have had over 1,100 of a majority. Finally we will take the Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), who had 2,099 of a majority of the civil votes, and who could have given his opponent 1,000 soldier votes and still have had over 1,930 of a plurality.

So, Sir, we can go on. Take, for instance, the province of Manitoba—and will any person say that the soldier vote was so manipulated as to elect a member from that province? Why, Mr. Speaker, every Laurier candidate except three in that province lost his deposit, so there was not much chance, I think, of applying that there.

In British Columbia, out of thirteen seats, every member but one could have handed his opponent his entire overseas vote and still won out. If we give the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Peck) only the same proportion or percentage of overseas votes as he obtained of the home vote, he would win out with a majority of 469, and is it not reasonable to suppose that that hon. gentleman should be given at least as large a proportion or percentage of the overseas vote as he obtained of the home vote when he was not at home while voting was going on?

Let us take the province of Saskatchewan with sixteen seats, and if you credit every soldier vote to his opponent, that would not deprive any member from Saskatchewan of his seat in this House. The same thing is true of Alberta with the exception of one seat, Edmonton West. But if we give the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Griesbach) no larger a percentage of overseas votes than he obtained of soldiers' votes at home, where his opponent was right on the job all the time, and hand the rest of his votes over to his opponent, the hon. member still wins out with a majority of 2,288. Therefore, he could give his opponent not only the percentage but another thousand votes and still be elected. That disposes pretty effectively of the statement made by the leader of the Opposition in regard to a manipulation of the overseas votes. There never was a statement made by any hon. gentleman in this House on either side further from the facts than that made the other day by the leader of the Opposition.

I should like to call attention to another little thing which, I am sure, will be extremely interesting to the leader of the Opposition. In the course of his remarks and in his hunting around for some cudgels with which to beat the Government, looking through the speech from the Throne the hon. gentleman finds fault with the paragraph referring to restrictions on the opium traffic. The hon. gentleman says that that is simply dabbling in small affairs. I should be astonished at a remark like that coming from any hon. member, but coming from this particular hon. member it is especially astonishing. Why do I say that? Because probably no other hon. gentleman in this House has been more intimately associated with an investigation of the opium traffic than the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition. In 1908, the hon. gentleman who was then, I believe, Deputy Minister of Labour, was appointed to go over to England and from there to China to attend an International Conference dealing with this opium question. On that occasion the hon. gentleman, taking advantage of the opportunity which was afforded to him by the reporters of getting his name into the press, just before he took the steamer at New York, gave an interview in the course of which he said that the only way in which this matter of restricting or doing away with the evils of the opium traffic could be handled was through a conference of the representatives of all the nations concerned. He thought this conference, the one to which he was going, would be unquestionably successful. How could it be otherwise? With the hon. gentleman there, it was bound to be successful. In March, 1908, he was commissioned to go to England; he went over and returned about the end of April, and in May he went out to Vancouver and he issued a report in regard to opium conditions on the Pacific coast. Any person who reads that report will be still more astonished that the man who was so conversant as the hon. gentleman is with the terrible evils of that traffic could speak slightingly of any steps being taken to control, restrict, or put an end to that evil.

I might just incidentally call attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman who was Deputy Minister of Labour and who was slated for Minister of Labour, was away all the session of 1909. Yes, this same gentleman was not in the House at all; his constituency was not represented on the floor of Parliament during all the session of 1909. He was away, I will not say hobnobbing with the Chinese, but over there in Shanghai and other parts of China very properly looking into the evils of the opium traffic. But he was away from Parliament, and he was an important member of Parliament, and soon to become still more important by being a member of the Government. These little things the hon. gentleman has forgotten. In the multiplicity of things which crowd his grey matter, I suppose we should not be too hard on him if he forgets some of them. But for fear he has already forgotten this matter I must remind him, when he condemns the Government for having Cabinet ministers who are not members of this House, that Sir Richard Cartwright, Hon. Richard Scott, Hon. Oliver Mowat, Hon. David Mills, all held portfolios in the Laurier Administration and occupied seats in the Senate, there being no opportunity of questioning them on the floor of this Chamber. A similar condition of affairs is a terrible thing at the present time because we are here and the hon. gentleman is there. But when he sat as a minister of the Crown in the Laurier Administration and some of his colleagues sat as ministers of the Crown in the Senate, that was perfectly all right and no criticism came from the hon. gentleman. Then responsible and representative government was not in danger at all. The hon. gentleman at that time was sitting to the right of the Speaker, and he was a Cabinet minister and, of course, he was a host in himself. What did it matter that three or four Cabinet ministers were away while Mackenzie King sat as a Cabinet minister to the right of the Speaker? He was capable of doing not only his own work, but that of half a dozen others.

[Mr. Edwards.]

There are just one or two other things to which I should like to refer, but I am not going to take very many minutes in doing so. My principal object in rising was to show, as I think I have conclusively and clearly shown, that the remarks of the leader of the Opposition with regard to the War-time Elections Act and the Military Voters' Act were remarks which come with bad grace, especially from him, and that his statements in regard to manipulation is not borne out by facts. I have the facts here in support of my statement which I challenge any person to dispute.

I want to offer a criticism of the Government. We on this side of the House feel we have a right to offer criticism where criticism is needed, and in this case I think it is due. Very briefly, my criticism is this: I want it distinctly understood that I as one of the members of this House of English descent think that the Government of this country should take action, and at once, to stop the Hearst papers from circulating throughout the Dominion. There may be some people in this country who do not object to the lies and dirt which are being circulated throughout the Dominion by this man Hearst, but I as one of the Anglo-Saxon race and the son of an Englishman resent it most strongly. I think it is a shame and disgrace to the Dominion for these papers to be allowed for one minute to circulate through the mails of this country. Let us at least attempt to be consistent. I have no sympathy with agitators like this man Ivens and some of those other fellows in Winnipeg, but what in Heaven's name is the good of putting Ivens behind the bars for giving expression to views which are likely to lead to riot, when we permit the Hearst publications to come into this country and sow seeds which cannot bring forth any other crop than disloyalty and disunion. I say that is not consistent, and I condemn as strongly as I can the lack of action on the part of this Government in not putting a stop to this sort of thing.

This is not the time to go into a detailed discussion of tariff matters. The proper time, as you, Sir, pointed out, to discuss the tariff is when the Budget is under consideration, and I shall therefore refrain from making any reference to the tariff until that time comes.

Before taking my seat, may I say in all kindness of spirit that I was sorry to hear the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) speak as he did the other day. He saw fit to tell this House that one of the great provinces of this Dominion was simply waiting for its "hour." Well, there was a time some years ago when a certain man and a certain people toasted "The Day" and waited for its coming. I did not think I would ever live to hear a man get up in this House and say that one of the great provinces of Confederation, if not toasting "The Day" was waiting for the "hour" when it could get its revenge. The hon. gentleman may think himself justified in making that statement. He may feel that the province of Quebec has grievances against the rest of Canada, but if he will look closely into the history of the past he will find that if there has been one province of this Dominion which has shown a disposition to interfere in the purely local matters of other provinces it is, unfortunately, the province from which he comes. That is undoubtedly the truth, and I merely say that because I want to impress the fact on the mind of the hon. gentleman, and of any others who think and feel as he does. I shall not follow that matter any further. I hope, and indeed believe, that the hon. gentleman when he said the province of Quebec was waiting for its hour and would not confer with other provinces until that hour arrived, was not expressing the sentiments of the people of the province from which he comes, and for whom he presumed to speak.

Hon. THOMAS ALEXANDER CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to speak to this resolution this evening, but as I have some opinions in respect to public matters in Canada that I should like to place before the House at the present time and as I understand a vote is to be taken this evening, I must avail myself of the opportunity that now presents itself.

It is a matter for congratulation that after four years of absence from the regular meeting place of this Parliament we are now assembled in our new home. I wish to express my appreciation of the magnificent building our Parliaments will have for their home in future. I am among those who believe that it is a good thing to have fine public buildings in a country, and I think we are certainly fortunate in the results that have been achieved here.

I also to wish to make a passing reference to the absence of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden). It was my lot to be associated with him for a considerable period of time during the progress of the war. He doubtless may have made mistakes, but I wish here and now simply to bear testimony to this fact that the Prime Minister of this country carried a burden which very few citizens of Canada appreciated, and discharged the most onerous tasks with a conscientiousness and sense of duty that certainly challenged the respect of those who were intimately associated with him.

I also wish to make a passing refer- to the mover (Mr. Cronyn) and the seconder (Mr. McGregor) of the Address. I congratulate the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn) in particular. He delivered an address that will rank high in the records of this Parliament. With a great deal of what he said I am in entire agreement. The seconder of the Address endeavoured to give the House a great deal of useful information, and while I cannot agree with some of the statements he made and some of the conclusions he reached, I wish also to extend to him my felicitations.

In my opinion the speech from the Throne was rather a meagre document. It was reasonable, I think, to expect, at this juncture of our history—shall I say this critical period in the life of the nation—when after the turmoil of war, we are setting about the reorganization of our affairs and the reconstruction of our society upon, we hope a new basis, that the speech from the Throne, which is supposed to foreshadow the legislation that will be brought before Parliament at this session, should contain something more than it did. I say that it was only reasonable to expect this, and had it been done it would have been more to the point. In this regard I would direct the attention of the Government to the speech of the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn), in which they will find much food for thought. If they wisely and closely study that speech they will, I think, find much therein that they could apply in the legislative programme which they may bring before the House. I should like, also, Mr. Speaker, to extend my congratulations to the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) who has assumed a position of very great responsibility. Under our parliamentary form of Government the leader of the Opposition has a duty which, in my judgment at any rate, is only second to that of the Prime Minister; and I am sure, no matter what our views may be we can lay long enough aside the turmoil of party strife to express the hope that his career may be long in the position he occupies.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen opposite sometimes find such little comfort in this House—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: —that I for one have no desire to begrudge any pleasure they may derive from a trivial slip of the tongue. Let me qualify my statement, which I did not mean in the sense in which hon. gentlemen opposite have construed it. I am sure that, whether as leader of the Opposition or leader of the Government in this country, the hon. gentleman who has lately assumed the responsibilities of the office which he now fills has the good wishes both of this House and of the country as well. I have to offer, however, one or two criticisms of the speech delivered by the leader of the Opposition. If there has been any departure in this country from the strict principles of representative Government, I am in entire accord with my hon. friend in his desire to see those principles firmly re-established. But I for one should have liked to hear something from the leader of the Opposition as to what he proposes to do, should he be called upon to discharge the onerous duties of Prime Minister, in respect of many of the matters that are now engaging the attention of the people. After all, his speech, and the admirable speech of the acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) who followed him reminded me a good deal of the days of long ago when it was almost a contest between the "ins" and the "outs" as to who would hold the premier honours in debate in this House. In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, this does not measure up to the occasion and to the needs of the hour. We are facing problems which five years ago we never dreamed we would have to face. We have tremendous issues to settle, and to my mind it would have been more appropriate had the leader of the Opposition and the leader of the Government devoted a little more attention to these great and pressing matters than they did in the speeches they delivered a few days ago. Probably it may be regarded as being a trifle forward in a young member of the House to proffer words of counsel to those who occupy these responsible positions. Nevertheless, there are questions of great and urgent moment before us, and in the brief time I shall take up this evening I shall endeavour to discuss a few of them. When all is said and done, there is not much profit in raking up the past and in resuscitating old party strifes and fighting them over again, I care not which side it comes from; because, with the great problems facing the country at the present time it is the duty of the citizens, and particularly of their representatives in Parliament where our laws are made, to devote their attention with all the ability and energy they can bring to bear, to the solution of the questions in the manner that will bring the greatest benefit to our country.

Now, the speech from the Throne tells us that peace has been concluded with Bulgaria and that the Treaty ratifying that peace will presently be submitted to this House for its consideration. The fact that Canada has found herself in the position of making a Treaty of Peace with Bulgaria carries a great significence with it, and brings home at once to one's mind the place our country occupies to-day among the nations of the world. We have heard a good deal from ministers of the Crown in regard to the altered position which Canada now occupies as a result of our participation in the war, and particularly of our participation in the making of peace. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell), who, I regret, is not in his seat, has told us—and it has also been told us by some of his colleagues—that Canada has attained the full status of a nation, that we have grown away from the position which we occupied in the past. My attention was attracted a few weeks ago by an address delivered by the President of the Privy Council in the city of Ottawa, in the course of which he took strong exception to certain resolutions that were about to be brought before the American Senate dealing with Canada's relations to the League of Nations. If I remember rightly, the hon. gentleman took strong grounds, even going so far as to state that if these resolutions were carried through Congress at Washington either Canada or the United States would step out of the League of Nations. I do not for a moment mention this as a challenge to the hon. gentleman's position on that point, but I would direct this consideration to the House, and particularly to the Government—that at the time the President of the Privy Council was making that speech in Ottawa, one of his colleagues, my esteemed friend the Minister of The Interior (Mr. Meighen) was making a speech in the city of Winnipeg in which he spoke of Canadians as "subjects of Great Britain." Now, there is to my mind a distinction here, and One can understand the position that some of our American cousins take upon this question, and I would offer the suggestion to the Government that they should walk circumspectly in regard to it. After all, this question of Canada's status as a nation has yet to be determined.

We were told by the hon. the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell), in his speech on the Peace Treaty last autumn, that Canada had acquired a new status, that every one recognized it and that at the forthcoming Imperial Conference which was to be held this summer he felt quite sure that the steps would be taken to accord Canada that position. If that is to be done I think it is a question that should be discussed by this Parliament before it is settled by any members of the Government which may attend an Imperial Conference. No matter what these changes may involve, they are too momentous, too far-reaching in their possibilities to be delegated to a small group from our Government, no matter how able or conscientious these representatives may be. Consequently, I for one, take the position that if the Government have in contemplation anything which they propose to place before the Imperial Conference in this regard they should bring it before the House and get an expression of opinion from Parliament before Canada is committed to any particular line of action in respect to it.

There is one other point that has come up in the speeches that have been made in this resolution. There has been considerable discussion of the exchange situation. It certainly is a matter of very great importance to this Dominion. As far as that question is concerned, it does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that the disease, if it is a disease, must run its course like any other disease and find its own remedy ultimately. It was with some regret that I noticed in the speech delivered by the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) in Winnipeg a statement, when he was discussing this question, which seemed to betray upon his part rather a carelessness of expression —because the Minister of the Interior is not one who usually speaks without knowledge of what he speaks about, but his remarks on this occasion would indicate a carelessness of expression or a lack of knowledge of the conditions underlying the question of our exchange at the present time. There also crept into his remarks a note which I was sorry to see there. Let me read a quotation from his speech. After discussing the question at some length in regard to the United States he said:

> Consequently there is one way only in which this country can rescue itself from the humiliation which it is now suffering, of having the value of its dollars dictated by Wall street—and that is by setting our lines of policy so that the adverse balance will be wiped away and if possible sell them as many goods as we buy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: That latter sentiment is one with which I am in entire accord, but I do regret to see the suggestion thrown out by the Minister of the Interior that the manipulation of Wall street is the cause of the unsatisfactory conditions existing in our relations with the United States. Which country suffers the more, Canada or the United States, from this question of exchange? Certainly, the United States does, because if the exchange goes against Canada in the United States to that extent it is more difficult to ship goods from the United States to Canada, therefore, from the plainest business reasons, the business men of the United States are just as much interested as we are in seeing this question of exchange set right.

The minister also stated upon that occasion that the present exchange situation was due to the fact that we had purchased from the United States last year $746,000,000 worth of goods and had exported only $477,000,000. That is partially the reason, but it is not the complete reason. I would point out that in 1911 this country exported to the United States only $112,000,000, while it imported from the United States $274,000,000. In other words, our exports to the United States in 1911 were only 41 per cent of our imports from that country, while in 1919 they were 64 per cent of our imports from the United States. But, there was then no discount on the Canadian dollar in the United States, and consequently we have to seek elsewhere for a reason for this adverse exchange situation. It is found largely in the great disruption of international trade. Prior to the war we exported more to Europe than we imported from Europe, and we settled our adverse balance in New York with the surplus sterling we had from the sales that we had made abroad. In that regard I should like also to take issue with my hon. friend from Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie). In speaking on this question in the House the other day he made this statement:

> Let me say this to the Government and to the country—and I am not particular in what way it will be understood; in fact, it can only be understood in one way—that while I am anxious for the widest possible trade with foreign countries, I would not trade to the extent of one five-cent piece with any country which will not recognize my Canadian dollar to the full face value of that dollar. If this country is loyal to itself, loyal to its principles, loyal to its institutions, it will stand by Canadianism in the matter of having any trade with any country that will not recognize the Canadian dollar at its full face value as international currency.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friends opposite say "hear, hear." Let me draw their attention to the fact that if this is a sound principle of business or of political wisdom for Canada to apply, then it is a sound principle for other countries to apply. We cannot deny to other countries what we would do ourselves. In what position do we find ourselves with the Mother Country? We exported to the United Kingdom in 1919 $560,000,000, but we imported from the United Kingdom only $73,000,000.

Mr. BURNHAM: What was the rate of exchange? It is absolutely necessary to know that.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not understand the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. BURNHAM: In his present reference the hon. gentleman is applying the whole business of exchange to the old country.

Mr. CRERAR: I still fail to grasp the point that my hon. friend is endeavouring to make. We know that while under normal conditions sterling exchange is worth $4.86 in New York, which has been the clearing house for exchange on this continent, it has fallen to $3.20 and even below that, and consequently the English pound sterling in Canada to-day is at a very great discount.

Mr. EDWARDS: The Canadian dollar is not worth one hundred cents in the United States. Is the Canadian dollar worth one hundred cents in England?

Mr. CRERAR: Certainly it is worth one hundred cents in England.

Mr. EDWARDS: I can see that was the point that the hon. member for Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie)

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards) I am afraid does not understand the A.B.C. of the economies of this question.

Why should not our dollar be at a premium in the United Kingdom when we are exporting $560,000,000 worth of goods to that country and only buying $73,000,000 from her? What I am endeavouring to place before the House is this: That if the argument of my hon. friend from Cape Breton North and Victoria is sound it could be advanced with equal force by the Britisher, in the United Kingdom, against trading with Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Stop trading altogether, that would settle it.

Mr. CRERAR: Stop trading altogether? That would not be a very desirabl- way of dealing with the question. I think it is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, that statements and inferences of this kind should proceed from public men in Canada. After all, one of the things that we are aiming at and hope to achieve, is international good will. If we cannot secure as a result of the great war, a better understanding between peoples and nations, then it does make one wonder what this old world is coming to. We know that in private life animosities or differences of opinion that sometimes ripen into strong antagonisms between individuals often arise from very small causes; and it is a duty, indeed I think an imperative duty, resting upon every public man who occupies a position of any responsibility that he should endeavour to avoid leaving wrong impressions in the minds of the people of other countries. If my hon. friend from Cape Breton and my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior should go to Great Britain and preach the doctrine they have preached in Canada I am sure they would not be very well received. We are setting out on the career of Nationhood and such being the case we must develop a foreign policy of some kind or other. I sincerely hope that the one alluded to is not the foreign policy we are going to develop in this regard.

Mr. EDWARDS: Having regard to the rate of exchange between Canada and the United States, and the rate of exchange between Canada and Great Britain, does not my hon. friend think it would be the part of wisdom to direct our trade to England rather than to the United States?

Mr. CRERAR: At the present time?

Mr. EDWARDS: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: I certainly cannot agree with my hon. friend, and again he exposes ignorance of the most elementary principles of political economy. The Minister of the Interior told us in his speech in Winnipeg that we should sell more to the United States. We are already selling over $500,000,000 worth more of goods to Great Britain than we are buying from that country.

Mr. EDWARDS: The minister also said we should import less.

Mr. CRERAR: I grant that is one way to help the situation out.

Mr. EDWARDS: But that does not conform with what the hon. gentleman has already said.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not wish to get into any controversy across the floor with my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) whom I esteem very highly.

Now, Mr. Speaker, where does the remedy lie for this condition of our exchange? It lies in greater production in this country and in selling more goods. It lies also in curtailing imports from United States. But we shall make a mistake if we adopt the policy, by artificial means of controlling and regulating the imports into, or even the exports from Canada. As to this question of greater production I would suggest to the Government—I am not sure that the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) whom I hold in very high respect will be willing to take my advice—but at any rate I suggest for his careful consideration when he is framing the Budget to be shortly submitted to Parliament, that he give due regard to this question of encouraging development of our natural industries and of encouraging production in this country in all its forms.

After all, where does the wealth in Canada come from? It lies within our great undeveloped natural resources. We are producing, for instance, in Canada on an average three hundred million bushels of wheat a year, and we have scarcely touched the fringe of the possibilities of development in that regard. Much of our great mining areas are as yet scarcely touched. We also have large timber resources in Canada. How are we going to make these productive? We must place people upon the land. But when we do that we must furnish them with the implements of production to work with. I would therefore suggest to the Minister of Finance that when he is framing his Budget for the coming year he take this fact into account and that he remove from the tools and implements of production in Canada, whether it is for the forest, the farm, or the mine, the duties that at present increase their cost.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): Would the hon. gentleman go as far as he is reported to have said he would go in removing all duties in this country?

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend should not get excited. If he will wait for a moment he will get the information for which he is seeking.

Now, in what field of development can we most readily and easily find a response in this country? I submit, Sir, that it is in agriculture; and I venture this statement, that if Canada in the last forty years had given one quarter of the assistance in the development of agriculture that she has accorded directly by way of bounties and indirectly by way of a protective tariff, to manufacturing industries in the Dominion, our wealth as a nation would be greater and our population would be larger than it is at the present time. I would point out to the House the excellent and splendid advantage that Canada enjoys in this regard. We have a country that is essentially an agricultural country. We know that our provinces, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, are rich in agricultural possibilities. We can take the Maritime Provinces, and we can take the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario; they contain vast undeveloped agricultural possibilities. We have our Western prairies that are as capable of producing one billion bushels of wheat as they are of producing three hundred million bushels. Finally we have the province of British Columbia where resources, although more varied, still contain great agricultural possibilities. I would direct this thought again to my protectionist friends in this House, that the farmers of this country are to-day in the position, where they are selling practically everything they produce in open competition with the world and are buying in a restricted market everything they require for the purpose of production. I can say also that it will take a very long time indeed to convince the farmers of western Canada, for example, that there is any virtue in the principle of protection, especially in a customs tariff. The argument of the protectionist is that we must have this form of state assistance to industry in order to build up a home market and make us independent of outside countries.

But the fact is that we would require 50,000,000 souls to consume the wheat we now produce in this country, and the same applies to practically every other line of our agricultural products. Let us look at the opportunities that lie ahead of us. Canada occupies the northern half of this continent. Immediately to the south of us. there is a vast country that will soon become a food importing country. To-day the population of the United States probably reaches 112,000,000 to 115,000,000 souls; within fifteen or twenty years that population may reach 140,000,000. To-day they are within measurable distance of becoming a food importing nation—indeed, in some respects they are now importing the food stuffs we produce.

Mr. EDWARDS: They have a surplus of everything the farmer has to sell, and we have not.

Mr. CRERAR: They are reaching the point, I say, when they will be a food importing nation. We have also the excellent advantage of our relationship with the British market, which is a great consuming market. Where does the Britisher get the greater part of the food he eats—the meats and the wheat, and the coarse grains that he requires for his live stock? He has to buy them in the outside markets of the world. When he buys from the Argentine Republic he has to haul his purchases twice the distance that he requires to carry them from Canada; if he buys in Australia he has to haul them three times the distance, and if he buys in India the haul is more than double that from this country. Consequently, I say again, Canada as an agricultural country occupies a unique and splendid place in the world to-day. And it does seem to me, Mr. Speaker,—and I have never stated anything with more sincerity than I state this to-night—that it is the part of very great wisdom that we in future direct our energies to the development of our agricultural resources, and in fact to the development of our natural resources of all kinds.

To-day we are supplying a very large percentage of the pulpwood that is consumed in the United States; over ninety per cent of the pulp and paper manufactured in this country is exported to the United States. We have great pulp forests yet in reserve, and I would offer this suggestion in that regard—that I think the Government might well take into consideration the question of reafforestation. We have large areas that could well be reforested. These bounties of nature will not last forever, and it is the part of wisdom now to lay the foundation for maintaining the supplies of these resources that are necessary for human happiness and human progress.

Now I come to a point that was mentioned yesterday afternoon by my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt). He at any rate is honest and frank; there is never any doubt as to where he stands on any question that he has opinions upon, and, let me say, I have the highest respect for an opponent of that kind. But I do not think that my hon. friend was quite fair in some of his allusions yesterday afternoon. He referred to the Agrarian Movement, and he associated with that the idea of class legislation and class domination. I take issue with my hon. friend in that regard. He has been a Protectionist all his life, he has believed in that principle during the many years it has dominated the fiscal policy of this country, and yet I maintain that there never was perpetrated upon this country a greater instance of class legislation than is to be found in the operation of that principle. What is the purpose of a tariff? It is designed to benefit a particular section of the people, it operates in no other way, and consequently the operation of this protective system in our fiscal policy, which has obtained largely for the last forty years, has conferred upon a special class a privilege that in my judgment is not compatible with a true democracy. And I would point out to my hon. friend from Brantford and to other hon. gentlemen also who believe in a protective tariff, that Protection is nothing more or less than a type of State Socialism. It is State assistance to particular industries, and just as surely as night follows day it will bring this development in its train. If you have a protective tariff you must have your boards of commerce and your regulative bodies that will endeavour to control the thing that you have built up. It was true in Germany, and it was true in the United States, for they were inevitably coming to it if they had not largely modified their fiscal system some seven or eight years ago.

I wish to say this further, Sir, in respect to what my honourable friend terms the Agrarian Movement, that this is not a class movement. It was not a class move in the constituency of Assiniboia, because in that constituency the towns and villages gave as good support to my honourable friend (Mr. Gould) who represents that constituency in this House as the farmers did. It was not a class doctrine in the county of Victoria and Carleton, N.B., despite the fact that my honourable friend, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) went to that constituency and warned the electors against the dangers and evils of "occupational politics." But you must test and judge this by the platform that the Agrarians, if you wish to call them by that title, have laid down. I have stated it on public platforms and in this House, and I challenge any honourable member, Mr. Speaker, to take that platform word by word and line by line and point out anything in it that is of a class character. Such a thing cannot be found within its four corners.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Will my honourable friend allow me a question? Would he say that the new Government formed in the province of Ontario is fully representative of all classes of the people residing in that province?

Mr. CRERAR: I am discussing federal issues, Mr. Speaker. But let me answer my honourable friend in this way: The Government of Ontario, which contains, I believe, eight farmers and one lawyer, is just as representative of the people of Ontario as the Government that preceded it and which contained eight lawyers and one farmer.

Mr. CASGRAIN: There you have got your answer.

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Speaker, the question has also been asked: Where will the revenue come from if we do away with the protective tariff? In that respect I have just this to say, that I am not at all sure that we would not get more revenue, for instance, out of woollen duties if they were on a basis of fifteen per cent than when they are on a basis of thirty per cent. But the Agrarians—and I thank my honourable friend from Brantford for coining that title for me—do not wish to sweep away the tariff at one fell blow as some people are trying to make out; that is not their policy. Broadly speaking, their policy is based on the principle that the implements and tools of production should be free and that the necessaries of life should be made as free as possible, and in that regard they asked for a substantial all-round reduction in the customs tariff. A tariff on luxuries? Yes, keep it on and raise it higher. but I cannot see the exact wisdom of having certain classes of luxuries imported into this country as they are to-day at a lower rate of duty than that imposed on necessities of life such as cotton, boots and shoes. I would offer this suggestion to the Minister of Finance that he might well raise the tax on luxuries to 50 per cent if he likes; but when he does that, he should also impose an excise tax on the manufacturer in Canada of such luxuries.

But those who have been called the agrarians have certain concrete proposals in respect to revenue. We have the income tax, and the income tax has come to stay in this country. I find from the statistics that for the years 1915 to 1918, the little country of New Zealand collected in income tax over $55,000,000. The population of New Zealand, based on its census of 1916, is roughly 1,100,000. I would direct this to the attention of the Minister of Finance, that if Canada in the same period had collected income tax in the same proportion, we would have collected $470,000,000, when as a matter of fact we collected nothing from income tax during those years, and only $34,000,000 in business profits taxes. In other words, during that period, the little country of New Zealand with a population of about one-eighth of that of Canada collected over $20,000,000 in income taxes and profits taxes more than Canada did. I would suggest this as a fertile field to explore in respect of securing revenue.

We are told that if we raise our income taxes, all the wealthy people, who enjoy large incomes will cross the border, and that consequently that source of income would be shut off from us. What do we find in the United States? In the year 1919, for instance, the United States collected in income and excess profits taxes over $2,600,000,000. If Canada had collected at the same ratio according to population we would have collected over $200,000,000. I know the difficulty of organizing a system of income taxation. But I will point this out, that in New Zealand and Australia these income taxes were, I believe, practically in all cases assessed after the outbreak of war. In these countries, British countries like our own, they have perfected their machinery at any rate to the point where they are getting vastly more for their revenue than we are in Canada. Moreover, Canada occupied a very favourable position. We know the orders we had for munitions; we know that our factories of every kind, after the outbreak of war and practically during the whole period of the war, were running day and night to fill the demand for goods to maintain the armies at the front. On the other hand, New Zealand and Australia, from the position they occupied in the world, from the shortage of shipping on the high seas were placed where they could sell practically nothing except the wool which they produced. Yet those countries, with smaller income than that which we enjoyed during the war, far outstripped us in the amount they contributed in income taxes. I believe that one of the mistakes we have made—and I do not wish to attribute blame in any particular direction in that regard—is this, that we have not paid enough of the cost of the war as we have gone along, with the result the inflation of our currency has been increased and our debt larger than it otherwise would be.

We have also the suggestion—and it is a very wise one—that if we are to get out of the difficulties that may be ahead of us, one of the means of assisting in that is to secure additional immigration to this country. With that, I am in entire accord, but I am not sure that I agree with the estimates that have been made in some quarters that within the next ten years the population of this country will have increased to 15,000,000 souls. I hope I am mistaken, but I am afraid that when the next census returns come in, they will be disappointing to the Canadian people. We have spent large sums in promoting immigration to this country, and with what result? We have spent large sums in promoting immigration from the United States to this country, and with what result? Our Department of Immigration and Colonization returns, unfortunately, do not give us the number of people that leave this country for foreign lands. We have records of the number of people that come into this country, but none of those that go out. In this connection I want to give the House a quotation from the last report of the American Commissioner General of Immigration, a United States government report, regarding this matter. To me, it was a surprise, as I am sure it will be to many members of this House. Here is what he states:

> During the eleven fiscal years, 1909-1919, the total immigration from Canada to the United States, including returning American citizens, was approximately 1,288,000, compared with an immigration into Canada from the United States of 1,072,000, or a balance of about 216,000 in our favour. In the movement of United States citizens alone to and from Canada, the balance is in favour of the latter, for during the past ten years nearly 562,000 have gone there and about 367,000 have come to the United States.

In other words, of the immigrants that we have received in Canada from the United States, amounting in that period to 562,000, according to their figures, 367,000 have returned to the United States.

Mr. BURNHAM: Which country had the higher tariff during that period?

Mr. CRERAR: I am afraid that I do not follow my hon friend. I am anxious to get through and I am taking up, perhaps, more time than I should. It continues:

> It should be understood that these groups do not include those who cross the border temporarily in either direction, but only those who come or go for expected permanent residence.

[Mr. Crerar.]

But there is one other statement, and this also is significant.

> The movement of alien immigrants from Canada—

That is alien immigration from Canada as against native-born Canadians.

> —to the United States is very largely made up of persons of northern and western European descent or birth, the chief element in the order of their importance being English, French, Scotch, Irish, German, and Scandinavian. Peoples of southern and eastern European stock form relatively a small part of the movement.

What does that mean? It means that of the immigrants we bring to our shores from England, France, Scotland, Ireland, Scandinavia, and Southern and Eastern Europe, the greater percentage of those who leave us to go to the United States are from those who are considered the best and most desirable class.

These are not pleasant things to contemplate, but I say again to my protectionist friends on the other side, if this is the product of forty years of protection in this country, surely it is time to consider a change. If we are going to keep these people whom we bring to our shores we must make Canada a cheap country to live in for the ordinary man; we must make it a good country to live in. Why do people stay in a country? Because it is a good place in which to get along and raise their families. They will not stay if they are up against circumstances which make it difficult for them to make both ends meet. There is also this fact, which may very well be taken into consideration in conjunction with this: In Canada in 1918—and I would call the attention of my manufacturing friends in the House to this—we raised 80 per cent of our federal revenues by taxes on consumption. In the same year the United States raised 20 per cent of their federal revenues by taxes on consumption. What does that mean? Simply this, that taxes on consumption are taxes on things that people must have in order to maintain existence. The result is that on the whole the cost of living to the working man is lower to-day in the United States than it is in Canada, and if wages are as good in the United States—and they are, and in some cases they are better—I ask my manufacturing friends how long they are going to keep in Canada their skilled workmen and artisans when that condition of affairs exists. There is only one way in which the situation can be met, and it is to use every possible agency to make this country a cheap place to live in. When we have done that, I think we shall have largely found the means of retaining within this country the people who come here.

Perhaps the most important item in the bill of fare presented in the speech from the Throne is a new Dominion franchise. A new franchise measure is to be brought before the House. In my judgment there are two main principles that should be embodied in the Franchise Bill when the Government brings it down. First, it must be a fair and just franchise.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: I am delighted I can make at least one remark that provokes applause from both sides of the House. Secondly, it must provide fair and just electoral machinery.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: From the applause I anticipate that when this measure comes before the House there will be very little difficulty in getting it through. Those are two cardinal principles that should be embodied in our Franchise Act, and in that connection I wish to take issue with my hon. friend from Frontenac(Mr. Edwards) in respect to the War-time Elections Act. I have never been one who supported the War-time Elections Act. I believe it was unsound in principle. I believe it has brought bad consequences that will remain in this country for many years to come. I do not base my criticism of the Act so much on the grounds on which it has been frequently criticised in the past, but rather upon the effect it has had upon the people we have brought to this country, and whom we hoped to elevate into good Canadian citizens. What has been its effect? We invited these people to come here, and they came. I am free to confess that in many cases we gave them the franchise too easily, but I hold that once a man has been admitted into the brotherhood of Canadian citizenship we should be very careful indeed in taking away from him any of the privileges that go with that citizenship. Its effect on our people has been two-fold. Thousands of these men who were disfranchised took no exception to it. They said: You take the franchise from us, but you relieve us from military service; that is a fair trade. Are those the ideals of citizenship we should instil into our people? Sir, I think not. Every man of Canadian citizenship should have been obliged to shoulder the obligations of Canadian citizenship under the Military Service Act. There is no other fair way of working this thing out. On the other hand, there was another class of our foreign-born people who were disfranchised. They had lived here for years and were good Canadian citizens, and they felt that a slight and an indignity and an injustice had been done to them, and they now harbour in their hearts a feeling of bitterness against their adopted country. That is not the way to create good Canadian citizens of the type we wish to have. I repeat, we have been too lax in the past in making easy the way to Canadian citizenship. I would be very careful whom I admit to that citizenship; but once a man is admitted to it he should be protected in all the privileges and enjoyments that go with it, and should be made to shoulder equally with other Canadian citizens the responsibilities and obligations that go with it.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): May I ask a question?

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is prolific in questions, but I have no obligation.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): Would the hon. member give to Germans who had relatives fighting against us, and who were pro-German, the right to vote in this country during the war?

Mr. CRERAR: I would have done this: If he was a Canadian citizen I would have left him his privileges of citizenship, and I would have made him fight. I would have required him to do his duty to his adopted country the same as others had to do. I hope that the defects that exist in the War-time Elections Act will not be introduced in the new Franchise Act. I believe that it is possible for us to make the vast majority of our foreign-born people good citizens. I had the opportunity only a short time ago of coming in contact with some of these people. The first Ruthenians brought to this country were settled within forty miles of the place where I was brought up as a boy and lived to manhood. I saw these people go into what was practically a wilderness, a place where no English-speaking person would ever think of endeavouring to make a home—and what was the result? They got their 160 acres of land, and to-day we find there smiling fields, fine barns, splendid houses, and, let me add, their children going to school and learning the English language. I recently held a number of meetings in my constituency. I did that because I believe it is the duty of every member of Parliament at proper intervals to meet his constituents and give an account of his stewardship and give them an opportunity to meet and discuss public questions with him. A number of Ruthenians were present at one meeting I addressed. Among other things I said: "We can have no divided allegiance in Canada. The man who comes here and is admitted to Canadian citizenship, no matter from what country he comes, must be prepared to accept the responsibilities and obligations of that citizenship, and he should be protected in his rights of citizenship."

After I was through one of these settlers got up and said: "We come here with the desire to be Canadians. We want to be such, and, to use his own words, "We want to place heart to heart and good will to good will with the other people of this country." That is the spirit in which we can make these people into good Canadian citizens. Let us deal with them fairly and justly, and, if we do, I am sure we shall in the future find in them a valuable asset for our country.

I have already spoken at greater length, than I had intended, but I desire to say a word or two in regard to the amendment which has been introduced by the leader of the Opposition. I do not think he has been at all happy in the phrasing of that amendment, and personally I do not like to see in it any reference to the absence of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) that would in any way be construed in the country or elsewhere as being directly or indirectly a reflection upon that right hon. gentleman. Nevertheless, I intend to support the amendment for the following reason. When the Union Government was formed it was formed for one specific purpose. There was just one issue before the country, and I worked in the interests of that issue because I believed it to be right. In this connection I shall repeat what I have said before, that under similar circumstances I would do the same thing again. There was, as I say, no other issue than this one before the Canadian people at that time. But now we are faced with a new condition of affairs in this period of reconstruction. We are spending vast sums of money and are embarking on great national policies of one kind and another, and I know enough of democracy to believe that the people of Canada should have an opportunity at this juncture of electing a new parliament and of expressing thereby their views and wishes on the important questions which are clamouring for consideration at this time. I believe that it is the desire of the people that they should again be consulted and have these questions thoroughly threshed out in debate from one end of the country to the other. After all, Mr. Speaker, we are simply servants of the people, and it is our business to embody in legislation what the majority of the people require; and I submit that in the present state of affairs this Parliament has not a mandate from the country upon the many problems we have to face and solve. I am not speaking particularly of either the Government or the Opposition, but of Parliament as a whole. We are not qualified to express the wishes of the people on the vast issues that confront us because we were not elected upon those issues. The one and only issue upon which the present Parliament was elected has ceased to exist; it has passed beyond the horizon. We are now facing many great problems, and it seems to me only fair and right that the people at the earliest opportunity should be able to express their opinions upon them.

If we survey the past political history of this country we shall find that there has been a great deal in it that has not been elevating, or worthy of our country. I should like to see the members of this Parliament, and those who may succeed them, animated in their attitude to their duty by the splendid spirit of heroic sacrifice that animated our men overseas. If we can bring to bear, in the responsible and important positions we occupy as the law-makers of our people, the vision, the outlook, and the devotion that inspired our men to such heroic deeds, then I have no fear for the future of Canada. We have recently erected this building, with this noble assembly hall, as a fitting evidence of our deep faith in the future of our country, and I say again that if we, as Canadian citizens, seek only what is good and noble and honest and true, and look only for what is best, in one another, I have no fear for our future prosperity and welfare. If we do this we shall rear in this Canada a nation great not alone in the things that are material but in the character of its institutions and of its people.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior): Perhaps the frequent references of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) to my humble self, and, I fear, his very frequent inaccurate references to a speech I recently made, will justify me in departing from the determination I had come to until a few moments ago not to take part in this debate. The hon. member for Marquette, who until recent months was a colleague of my own in this Government, left the Administration on a question of policy, and is now a private member as a consequence. In passing, it is worthy of note that though some others have resigned from the Administration, feeling that they had performed as much service to their country as they could, the hon. member for Marquette alone has left the Cabinet because of a difference in point of policy. That is, possibly just worthy of reflection on the part of the leader of the Opposition, who seems to think that when ministers resign, not on questions of principle at all and still support the Administration, it is a sign of disintegration and decay. The hon. member for Marquette has, through some months, so conducted himself as now to be regarded as the head of what is termed the Farmers' Movement in Canada, a movement which he objects to having called a class movement, which he describes as a national movement, but which, if it is of the character and scope he attributes to it, might in my humble estimation very well change its name. I do not know that it is of very great importance just how you describe the movement or the party; names do not count for a great deal. But I should think that a class movement was one that was originated by a class; and having a very simple and ordinary mind I should conclude that the farmers of this country were a class. If this movement was not originated by the farmers as a class, by whom was it originated? I do not know that any other class in Canada had anything to say in the formation of the platform upon which it now appeals. That platform is now a completed fact. It became a completed fact at the dictation and after the sole consideration of the class that originated the movement.

It is true the leader (Mr. Crerar) who has just sat down states that they are ready to welcome the votes to office of all and sundry in this country. No doubt in the world they are, but does that make it any more than a class movement, being originated as such? However, that matters little. It does matter though what the platform is. It does matter what course of policy that movement calls to have adopted in this Dominion? That is of first and vital consequence? It does matter as well that any Government in office in this Dominion shall be of such a general and cosmopolitan character as may fairly be said to represent all classes of the people. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), when he was confronted with one of the necessary consequences of any movement of this kind—the first outcome of the political phase of this movement in Canada, being the election of what is known as a farmer's government in Ontario, and the fact that it contains eight farmers, two labour men and one lawyer—answered that it was just as representative of all classes of the Ontario people, containing eight farmers and one lawyer, as the previous administration, as he said, which contained eight lawyers and one farmer. I would have expected an hon. gentleman, who had attained to the high position that the hon. member for Marquette has, to see that his statements to this House, however much he might be tempted to indulge in repartee that seemed momentarily effective, would bear some resemblance to the facts. Would he be justified in making that retort if the previous Ontario Government had not contained eight lawyers and had contained more than one farmer? What would be thought of his statement if it should be the fact that the Government contained among its number less than half lawyers? Yet, that is the truth; there were five lawyers in that administration and there were six men of other callings. Was it quite right, or was it treating this House fairly that the hon. gentleman should have made the retort that he did? There was in that Administration in Ontario more than one man who had nothing else to do but farm, who did nothing else and who had done nothing else. I do not know how many it may have contained who were occupied in other things as well as on the farm. I do not know that that makes very much difference if the interests of all the people are taken care of, but facts are facts and should be respected as such.

In this connection, let me remind the hon. gentleman that a Government for which he has great respect, and which I for the moment do not attack at all—the Government of the province of Manitoba, a Government from which he holds back the hand of slaughter of those who follow him—contains no individual at all actually engaged in farming, and Manitoba is probably more of a farming province than the province of Ontario, proportionately speaking. I do not say that this is a charge against the Government of Manitoba but I do say that his profession in this respect reflects somewhat on the consistency of the hon. member for Marquette.

He made some references—such as have been made more than once in this debate by hon. gentlemen opposite who, when they get a subject that they like, do not hesitate to refer to it very frequently—he made some references to the War-time Elections Act, an Act which has resuscitated a whole lot of adjectives and seems destined to live long in the memory of many. I am not going to enter into an elaborate defence of that statute now. It was argued in this House as fully, as carefully, and as thoroughly as any legislation ever presented to Parliament. It received the assent of Parliament and it was not a party assent alone. Independent members of this House when the debate was heard, supported the principle of the measure. The hon. gentleman was put a very pertinent question by my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. Peter McGibbon). Did he, he was asked, favour that men lately arrived from alien enemy lands (and they and none others were disfranchised), men possibly and probably whose brothers or whose fathers were fighting against our country, should be given a vote in the election which determined the course of this country in the war? "Yes," he said, "I would give them the vote and I would make them fight." That was not the judgment of the military authorities of Great Britain or of the military authorities of Canada.

Hon. Mr. CRERAR: It was the judgment of the military authorities of the United States. They enrolled these men and the casualty lists, when they came back to the United States, contained many foreign names.

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: I am informed on authority of the highest character that the military men of the United States did not allow them in the front line. But, I would prefer to take my example, even in matters of the late war, from the British Empire, rather than from the United States. These men described by my hon. friend from Muskoka were voluntarily enlisted. Many of them enlisted—relatively, of course, few compared with the rest of the population—but many of them enlisted. When it was found that they were of the character described by my hon. friend from Muskoka, although they enlisted voluntarily, they were turned back and were refused permission to go to the front for the sake of the safety of the boys of Canada who were fighting. These were the facts and this was the situation that faced us. Were we to stand in our places here and say: "We know better than the men who are actively commanding the forces at the front." Yet, that is what the hon. member for Marquette would have done. That surely is not sound policy. Although I do not like to use the term, it is scarcely common sense.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: Did the Government a month or so after the election was over, not conscript thousands from the class that were disfranchised?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Never in the world—not a single man.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: I am afraid the hon. gentleman is wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We could not do it; the law prevented us from doing it.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: I know of hundreds of cases myself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman cannot know of cases because the statute did not provide for their conscription, nor would we have done so any way because the military authorities would have refused them.

Now, it was of course to be expected that the hon. member for Marquette should refer to the subject of the trade policy of Canada. This is not the appropriate occasion, as you, Mr. Speaker, have taken occasion to remind us, to enter into any specific controversy on that subject. At all events the more appropriate time is the debate upon the Budget. I will enter into no discussion of it at the present time, therefore, because I believe that when we take the question up at all we should do so in a thorough manner—the debate should be full and free and specifically devoted to that subject. But let me say this to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Crerar) and to those who sit around him. They regard—and they have led many others to regard—this question as a great issue between those enjoying special rights and the common people of the country. They affect to believe themselves, and undoubtedly they have led many to believe, that he who associates himself with one side of that cause, who believes that the one principle that I, at all events, affirm is the true principle for this country, necessarily is in some way a subject of high and special privilege and the enemy of the common people. Surely one reflection alone will be sufficient to disabuse that impression. The principle that the hon. gentleman attacks, right or wrong, has been more the subject of debate and has been more thoroughly reviewed on this continent than any other principle ever presented to a free people for one hundred and twenty-five years. Its first sponsor on the American continent was the father of the American Republic, George Washington. Was he the friend and ally of special privilege and the enemy of the common people? The second statute that he placed on the statute books of the United States, after it became a nation, was a statute embodying in very pronounced form the principle that the hon. gentleman impugns. Its next prominent sponsor (indeed very, very few opposed it), was the founder of the other great political party in that country, Thomas Jefferson. Coming nearer to our own time, the man who laid the foundations of the present tariff policy of the United States in general form was the man who emancipated the slaves in the United States, Abraham Lincoln. Abraham Lincoln was an adherent throughout his life to the principle that the hon. gentleman attacks. Was he either the servant or the ally of special privilege? Was he the enemy of the common people of his country? Can such an allegation be levelled at Theodore Roosevelt, whose principles were just the same? Can it be levelled against a single one of the sponsors of that principle during the whole one hundred and twenty-five years of American history? This thought is presented for the honest reflection of disciples of the opposite faith.

A number of other thoughts occur to me at the moment, but I will reserve them for a more appropriate hour. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Crerar), however, spent a lot of time on the question of immigration and emigration. He showed that though we did get a good volume of immigration we lost a lot of immigrants to the United States. Well, I draw his attention to the fact that we have not lost very much to Great Britain, so I do not see how he gets very much of an argument out of the emigration statistics.

The hon. gentleman has spoken about abandoned farms in this country. Let me say that I have seen a whole lot of farms that ought to be abandoned, but on which people are struggling along and making a living in some way or other; but I do not know myself of a single farm that is abandoned that does not deserve to be abandoned from the character of its soil.

An hon. MEMBER: Not one.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know a whole lot though of that type across the Atlantic, for I have seen them, and I also know that the Prime Minister of Great Britain lately regretted that between the year 1870 and the present hour four million two hundred thousand acres in that kingdom had gone out of cultivation, and I do not know that he ascribed it to the same cause that, to the hon. member, seems to be the fount of all evil.

A pleasant reference was made to myself by the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell), whom I am glad to welcome to this House, whom I have always understood to be in actual life not only a farmer but a good one—so good, indeed, that I understand he performed some service for a farming enterprise that is now under my administration. The hon. gentleman thanked me for coming down to his constituency, and ascribed to me the credit of having given him another thousand of a majority. I do not know just how the hon. gentleman figures it out but I do remember this, and I say it without seeking to take any credit to myself—no doubt I was fortunate in the location of the meetings at which I spoke—we were rather busy here in Ottawa at the time of the election and could not get away, but I was able to visit his county. I managed to hold two meetings, one in the town of Woodstock and one in the town of Andover. Both are thriving communities, and in both the hon. gentleman was soundly defeated by a very substantial majority. I am afraid the hon. gentleman placed his gratitude on a rather false foundation, and that he could have found a much better one if he had been inclined to be reasonable. I do not think he would try to tell the House that he would have been beaten by a thousand more votes in Woodstock if I had not gone there, surely he does not think the electors were so badly as that against him. That is not what he had in mind. What he must have had in mind is this: That those who did not hear me, those in the rural parts, resented the idea of any one but a farmer talking in the constituency at all and consequently rolled up an increase of a thousand majority in his favour. That must be what the hon. gentleman had in mind; there is no other legitimate conclusion. If that is the case I am afraid he had better be very careful before he tries to convince this House that what he is supporting is not a class movement after all.

Some reference to me was made also by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould). We are glad to welcome the hon. gentleman here because of the good it will do him. The hon. gentleman devoted some time—I do not know that I gathered his exact point, and if I misinterpret him in any way I hope he will correct me— to lamenting the adverse position occupied this season by the farmers in his province, in the matter of the sale of their wheat, compared with the competing farmers south of the line. The inference that apparently had to be drawn from what he said was that less favourable position was in some way due to the policy of the Government in its creation of the Canadian Wheat Board. I know it has been the practice of many in that country—I hope the hon. gentleman is not one of them—to seek to give the impression down the concession lines that the embargo which the American Government placed against the importation of Canadian wheat was in some way ascribable to the Dominion Government or to the Canadian Wheat Board. I know that impression is very general, but I do not know who can be the author or authors of it, unless it be some who do not wish very well towards the Government of Canada, like the hon. m mber for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould). Surely he is fair enough to admit —and if fair enough why did not he admit? —that the unfavourable position of the Canadian farmer compared with that of the man to the south had nothing whatever to do with Canadian policy or with the Canadian Wheat Board, but that the American embargo was the work of the United States Government, and that we were not consulted in any way, nor had we anything at all to do with it. He also knew, or should have known, that the creation of that board with the purposes and functions that it has was not only recommended by the organization of which he is a member, but has since been endorsed by that organization. But he would like to convey in some way the impression that fairness has not been done to the farmers of Canada in the creation of the Wheat Board and in the course that it has pursued.

Mr. GOULD: Might I ask the hon. minister a question? In reply to the charge of lack of information, I might state that I made no reference whatever to the Canadian Wheat Board, neither can anything I said be misconstrued to have any reflection upon that board. I merely made the statement that the man on the Canadian side received approximately one dollar a bushel less than his neighbour to the south.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why did not the hon. gentleman say why? He knew why it was.

[Mr. Meighen.]

May I ask whether he approves of the policy of the creation of the Canadian Wheat Board and of the course that board has pursued?

Mr. GOULD: I am quite sure, Sir, that we are in favour of the establishment of the Wheat Board, and I think that possibly we are on record that we would like to have that Wheat Board continued. I have made no charges against them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then I hope the hon. gentleman will not again seek to convey to the House the impression that he does not like the idea of having to rely on participation certificates of the Wheat Board.

The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) referred to certain remarks I made at Winnipeg. First of all he quoted me as saying, that we Canadians were subjects of Britain. Well, I do not know that I would be disposed to make any apologies if I had uttered those words, though they would not be strictly accurate, but I have read the speech over hurriedly, trying to fulfil the double occupation of reading it and listening to the hon. member at the same time, and I have not any such words there.

Mr. CRERAR: Oh, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think he is relying on some second-hand criticism. I know that in parts of his speech he quoted pretty much from a criticism in the press that I read myself.

Mr. CRERAR: If the hon. minister will allow me to interrupt him? The words are in his speech. I did not use them in any way to reflect on the hon. minister, but rather to contrast his attitude with that of his esteemed colleague, the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: A contrast!

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is no contrast at all. I am afraid the hon. gentleman spoke too soon. We in this country, as our brothers in Great Britain, are subjects of the King of Great Britain and of the Dominions overseas; that is the correct phrase. As a subject I do not lament the fact; I glory in it. But we can be subjects of Britain's king and at the same time be a nation here with the powers of nationhood that we possess to-day. I think I have stated pretty fairly the common position assumed in this regard by the President of the Privy Council and myself. I do not know that I would feel any better if we changed the word in this country and used that adopted across the line. They use the term "citizen" there. We are just as much citizens as they are; in no respect whatever does the relationship between the individual in this country and the State become inferior or subordinate in any particular to the relationship between the citizen in the United States and the Republic.

My hon. friend also quoted me as making some remarks on the question of exchange, and in that respect he ventured to assert that I was wholly wrong on matters of economics—almost as wrong perhaps as he intimated the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) and the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) to be. I did refer to the fact that the Canadian dollar was quoted at eighty-five or less in Wall street and anywhere else in the United States. I quoted newspapers as to the course we ought to follow, and I gave my own opinions on the same subject. I did state that it was due almost wholly to the fact that because we buy more goods from the United States than we sell to them the demand by Canada for American exchange is so great that our friends are in a position to that extent to dictate the price. I never referred to any financial manipulations. It is a necessary result of the trade conditions that exist. When you buy $746,000,000 worth and sell only $454,000,000 worth you are going to need a whole lot of exchange in New York one way or the other, and when you need a lot there against what they need here, it is very likely to depreciate our exchange.

Mr. CRERAR: Might I ask my hon. friend why did not the same result obtain in 1911 when the balance was even more adverse?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was just about to explain that, and would have done it sooner had the hon. member waited. I have not read the report of my speech in Winnipeg, but I stated there that it was true that we had an adverse balance with the States before the war. We had an adverse balance in 1911.

But I will tell the hon. gentleman the difference then. At that time this country was a heavy borrowing nation, not only in the United States, but to a far greater extent in Great Britain—borrowing as a nation, borrowing by provinces, borrowing by corporations; and the moneys that we borrowed were payable in New York and we got the exchange out of our borrowings. If we could adopt the same course to-day, the situation would be improved; it would be improved as well if we could get actual cash, which we cannot, for the goods we sell overseas. As we are not able to do the latter, would the hon. gentleman suggest that we cure the situation now by the same process by which it was cured in 1911, by recommencing the borrowing habit over in Great Britain and London? He knows we cannot do that, and he knows also that we should not do so if we can possibly avoid it. That method of getting exchange in New York is gone. It existed in 1911; it cannot exist to-day. Therefore, the only possible method of curing the difficulty, is the method suggested by the Toronto Globe, namely, to sell more and to buy less. That is the only method in the world. The hon. gentleman applauds. If that be the way to cure it, is not the opposite the cause of its existence? If we cure it by buying less and selling more, then is not the reason for its existence the fact that we sell less and buy more? The hon. gentleman applauded the first, the second necessarily follows. Why did he dispute the second? Yes, he says, that is true; we have to sell more and buy less, but, for goodness sake, do not, he says, make any regulation to that effect. Do not do it, he says, by artificial means. Well, what means does he propose by which this country shall do that? By exhortation?

Some hon. MEMBERS: By prayer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: By prayer and meditation. I do not know any way in which a country can act effectively except by passing laws that will have the desired result. It was the only way in which we could act during the war, and the hon. gentleman agreed with us at that time. Something that will not have that result will be found in a plank in the hon. member's platform, namely, to tear down duties against the United States. Such is what I argued in Winnipeg, and I do not know anything wrong with the argument yet. I do not know how we are going to buy less from the United States—I have not much faith in the exhortation system—to achieve the desired result by a process of levelling duties against that country.

Mr. CAHILL: Try reciprocity.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Try reciprocity?

An hon. MEMBER: Grievance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, the hon. gentleman has a grievance. In the first place what the hon. gentleman sought to obtain by reciprocity in the way of helping us to sell goods, we have got to the extent of 90 per cent, and now having obtained that he wants to take off our duties 100 per cent and so aggravate the trouble we suffer from to-day. If he wishes duties lowered, surely it must be in order to buy more, not less, from the United States.

So much for the subject of exchange. Let me come for just a moment to the amendment that is before the House. The leader of the Opposition moves this House for what? Have hon. members stopped to consider what he is moving this House for? What he wants is an appeal to the country —at least that is what he says he wants. The hon. member has appealed to the country before, and I do not know that his memories are any too sweet. But according to the terms of this amendment he wants to appeal to the country again. On what question does he want the country appealed to? Has he submitted a principle that he wants debated before the electorate of Canada? Has he told us what he proposes to do that is not being done? No, all he wants is an appeal to the country, and the only conviction he seems to have is this, that this nation is hungering and thirsting to make him Prime Minister of Canada.

This is the first ground of the appeal:

> The regrettable protracted absence of the Prime Minister, the widely accepted belief that it is not his intention to return to the duties of his office.

That is the first condition that he wants appealed against. That is the first reason he gives in his resolution for going to the country. What would the people say about that? Does the hon. gentleman say that it would be well for Canada, because her Prime Minister is ill, that he should immediately resign; that there should be no sufferance at all; that there should be no time to determine whether he will be able to return to his great duties or not? Does he want the people appealed to on that question? What is the next question he wants them appealed to on?—

> The makeshift arrangements for the direction of important departments to which no minister has been regularly appointed.

Because there are certain men acting ministers at the present time. I forget how many there are, but I think there are two. The hon. member was a member of a Cabinet that was in office for fifteen years. Can he tell me a single month in which there was not an acting minister in the whole fifteen years? I do not think there was one month. I have not had time to go back over the record, but I doubt if he can find a whole month in the fifteen years when there was not an acting minister. Were those "makeshift arrangements"? I have heard criticisms from hon. gentlemen opposite that we had too many ministers of the Crown. If we have, the only way to remedy that situation would be to have one minister take charge of two departments. But as soon as we do that, he says that is a "makeshift arrangement".

He says that there are three provinces unrepresented. I think there are two, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, but I am inclined to think that the province of Nova Scotia is fairly well represented in the Prime Minister of Canada even although he is absent. But that, he suggests, is a cause for appeal to the country. Let me remind my hon. friend that no sooner were the three western provinces created by the administration to which he belonged, than the very calamity which he now deplores began to exist and continued to exist through the whole course of that administration. Never from the hour that the three western provinces were created until the day that administration was hurled from power were there ever less than three provinces unrepresented in the Government of the day. One would think that if he were really sincere in his conviction, that such was an awful state of affairs; that he would not have sat in that administration. He was an additional member that edged in from the province of Ontario. Why did he not resign and make room for somebody from the unrepresented provinces? Every hour that he sat as a Minister of the Crown, three provinces of the Dominion were unrepresented in the Government of that day. When Manitoba had a representative, Alberta had none, Saskatchewan had none, Prince Edward Island had none. When Alberta had a representative, Saskatchewan had none, Manitoba had none, Prince Edward Island had none: Did he think that was cause for an appeal to the country? If not, why does he think so now? Then he says:

> These and other things—

He has got to the end of them, but he says:

> These and other things operate to produce a condition of uncertainty an instability from which a vigourous and efficient administration of the Dominion's affairs cannot be expected.

Just before that he says that there are new conditions now that did not exist when this Government was elected to office. We are two years and a half ahead, and, therefore very likely the conditions are different—conditions always change in two years and a half. Were not the conditions of 1914 wholly different from the conditions of 1911? When war broke out in 1914 the conditions differed very radically and very suddenly. Was that a cause for appealing to the country? Why we had the leader of the Opposition of that day, and the hon. gentleman himself, and scores of them across the way crying to high heaven against the crime of a war-time election. They said it was just cause for not going to the country, but surely it was just as vast a change of conditions, far vaster indeed, than any that has taken place between December 1917 and the present hour. It is true, and here let me attract, if I can, the attention of the hon. member for Marquette, that the great issue before the country in 1917 was the conduct of the war, but that was not the only issue before the country, as he would seek to impress upon this House. The Government of that day, in a manifesto to which he subscribed, laid a programme before this Dominion that contained somewhere around eleven to fourteen different proposals, and very few of them, if more than one, referred to the conduct of the war—proposals relating to woman suffrage and subjects of kindred character, proposals relating to reconstruction and machinery for the purpose of reconstruction. Reconstruction, the very thing he says we have no right to deal with at all! He subscribed to that manifesto. Yes, the main issue was the conduct of the war. The main issue in the contest of 1911 was the Reciprocity Agreement, but surely the Government elected in 1911 was not forbidden to treat of other subjects besides the Reciprocity Agreement. The main issue in 1904 was the Grand Trunk Pacific deal, of unhappy memory, but surely the Government elected on that issue was not forbidden to manage the affairs of the country up to 1908. The Government elected in 1917 had a mandate to govern Canada, and there were no restrictions or limitations, express or implied, or referred to in speech or in written programme, more than appertained to any government that ever ascended to power. Then why this cry for an immediate election? Because the Prime Minister is ill, and we have an acting Minister of Public Works; there is I now find no other acting minister. But the hon. gentleman says we have to have a general election in Canada right away because he wants to be Prime Minister. He has been saying that things are uncertain, that there is terrible stagnation, and all the other disasters of the universe in Canada. He has been saying that for months. What are the disasters? What is the matter? What is it that is waiting for treatment by the Government? Does he expect a tariff programme in a speech from the Throne?

He has no time at all to deal with opium, but he had time as the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) said, to go to China about it and miss a whole session himself, the first year he was in this House, and have someone, I suppose, act in his stead. What is it that is waiting for treatment by the Government? What is the subject we are evading? What is the piece of legislation that is so badly needed, and about which there is such great uncertainty and such turmoil?

What else does he say we are suffering from? Instability; that is another disease of the body politic. What is the legislation he is pining for now? Has this Government been afraid to tackle subjects? He says we are a Government by commissions; he told us last Monday that we are governing the the country by commissions. Well, I know the last big problem that was before this Parliament. Was it not the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway? Was it not the determination of a big thing, something that had to be done to really solve the railway problem in Canada? Who was the party of commissions then? Who then was shifting, and wanting to evade and delay? Was it the Government? It was the hon. gentleman himself. He wanted another commission appointed to handle the biggest question that was before this country at that time. He moved an amendment for the appointment of a commission. No, the amendment was moved by the other leader. At all events, he had a part in the formation of that amendment, and I know he supported it, and I know he won't say it has not his sympathy now. Does he not think we should have appointed a commission? Has he changed his mind on that subject? A commission, he said, was the right thing. He could not make up his mind himself what in the world ought to be done, so he wanted a commission appointed to solve the great railway problem of Canada. But the Government of the day brought down a policy which was supported by this House, and the Government has carried out that policy, has carried out the mandate of this Parliament, and ever since my hon. friend supported that resolution for a commission he has been calling this a government by commission and a government of drift, alleging that we relegate subjects to commissions instead of discharging the work ourselves. Does he want an election on that subject? Does he want to appeal to the country to decide whether we should have had another Grand Trunk commission. I think not. Why does he go up and down this country talking about a drifting government and a government by commissions, when he in the last and greatest offender?—when he knows this government refused to drift, and refused to appoint a commission even though demanded by himself and his party? A commission may have been appointed since that time to deal with some particular subject, but with nothing of the nature or the magnitude of the Grand Trunk problem, I do not know of a single commission appointed since. Can hon. gentlemen opposite think of one? Not one of them can. They are the last commission people themselves, so why do they stand and talk about more and more commissions?

That is the position they assume. It has the support of the hon. member for Marquette, a Western member, who wants an appeal to the country just before a census—an appeal which would result in Western Canada being under-represented in this House for nearly four years.

The leader of the Opposition cannot stand to have a seat vacant in Parliament now. There has to be a representative in Parliament for every constituency. He can hardly wait until a deceased and honoured member of this House is in his grave before he appeals to Parliament for an election in that constituency. He wants an election right off in East Elgin, and he thinks we are doing a grave injustice to that constituency because the writ has not been issued already, although the revered member for that constituency has been dead little more than two weeks. When he was talking in that strain he should have remembered that his late leader sat in this House through a whole Parliament representing two constituencies, or affecting to do so, when the whole principle of representation means that in such a case one constituency is unrepresented—and during that Parliament he himself sat as a colleague of his leader. The hon. member who sits to his right, or who should sit to his right at the present time (Mr. Lemieux) was elected two years ago last December for two counties, and he has refused to resign from either of them yet. Does the hon. gentleman think he is going to impress the House with his earnestness when he appeals for an election in East Elgin two weeks after the decease of the member for that constituency, and thinks it is all right for the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Lemieux) to allow Maisonneuve to be unrepresented in this Parliament for two and a half years?

The hon. member for Marquette goes back to his county and the West having proclaimed that, on the grounds set out in this amendment,—because the Prime Minister is ill, because there is an Acting Minister of Public Works, and because of other things of which no one is cognizant, but which he says combine to produce a condition of uncertainty—he thinks Western Canada should do without ten to twenty representatives to whom it is in all justice entitled for three years in the Parliament of Canada. Let not the hon. member think he can separate the reasons given from the conclusion when he votes for a specific amendment. He votes to disfranchise Western Canada to the extent of ten to twenty per cent, if not more, and he votes to do so because the Prime Minister is ill and cannot be here, and because there is an Acting Minister of Public Works.

Now, I have sought to examine the resolution that hon. members are asked to vote upon to-night, and to examine the reasons adduced in support of it by hon. gentlemen opposite, and hon. gentlemen angularly opposite as well; and I appeal to all hon. gentlemen everywhere to allow Western Canada to get its representation, which it assuredly will; because there is no intention to have an election until an opportunity is provided to give Western Canada its full share of representation after the census is taken. I appeal to all to repudiate the preamble and repudiate the conclusion, and to stand by stable, firm and honest government.

On motion of Mr. Michael Clark (Red Deer) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Sir George Foster the House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

RAILWAY ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, to amend the Railway Act, 1919.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This Bill is similar to the one I introduced last year. It is for the purpose of bringing the boats on our inland waters and in our coastwise trade under the control of the Railway Commission in the matter of rates, tolls, tariff agreements and arrangements, time of call, duration of stay, and so forth. The last clause of the Bill I am introducing seeks to amend clause 358 of the Consolidated Railway Act in order that it may harmonize with the principles of this Bill, which is for the purpose of amending clause 33 of the Consolidated Railway Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Hume Cronyn for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King thereto, resumed from Thursday, March 4.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is a very sincere pleasure to be able to congratulate the Government upon the excellence of their choice of the mover of the address (Mr. Cronyn) and the seconder (Mr. McGregor) in this debate. They chose two splendid specimens of different kinds of stalwart Canadian manhood. I did not agree with all they said, but it is all the greater pleasure to one to congratulate both of these gentlemen on the ability, the modesty, and the good taste with which they said what they had to say.

The speech from the Throne gives quite proper prominence to the League of Nations, and to the establishment of an international labour office. It may be truthfully said, I think, that the very endeavour to establish a League of Nations sounds for the first time the note of internationalism in human affairs, and I am sure there is no one in this House who does not re-echo in the shape of a prayer the sentiment of the speech from the Throne which expresses the hope that these arrangements will insure to us the blessings of continual peace. Lord Robert Cecil, who takes a great interest in the League of Nations in Great Britain has foreshadowed what must have occurred to large numbers of thoughtful people at any rate on this question, that if the League of Nations grows into a mature, stable, and effective organization there would naturally follow in time a very large measure of disarmament. I refer to that to point out that that consideration should have an important bearing upon Canadian policy. I think that due weight given to that consideration would help to put a restraining hand upon the activities or possible activities of the First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Ballantyne) and the Minister of Militia and Defence. I say no more on that subject, but point the obvious moral to be drawn from this particular paragraph of the address and the important matter it brings before this House and the country.

The address repeats what I remember specially the leader of the House has brought before the Canadian people in various public meetings which he has addressed in recent times. May I, Sir, in mentioning my right hon. friend, offer to him and to the Parliament and country my very hearty congratulations on the fact that accident has placed so great a parliamentary veteran (Rt. Hon. Sir George Foster) in the position he at present occupies at the time when we are entering our new parliamentary home. I listened, as I am sure every hon. member in the House did, with the greatest pleasure and admiration, to the lengthy speech which he delivered the other evening with all his old-time vivacity and virility. Long may he be spared to grace the halls of Parliament and to teach the "young ideas" how to shoot.

I draw in my mind, Sir, a very clear distinction between the duty of individual economy and the duty of national economy, and I am not so sure that we cannot carry individual economy too far. As a small producer of beef, for example, I should conceive it a great misfortune to myself, and probably to others, if there were too much economy displayed in the eating of good roast beef and good steak; and the same thought occurs to me in connection with other lines of production. I wish some speaker on the Government side of the House would make it clear to the people just whom they expect to economize, and in what. They are not thinking of the veterans, I should think. The veterans did not have too much to spend when they were in the line, and I have it on good authority that some of them in our cities this winter have barely had enough to eat. This has arisen from a perfectly natural cause. The best jobs in the early period of reconstruction were held by men who did not avail themselves of the glorious privilege of going over the top, and the veterans, in too many cases, had to come home and take jobs in the city at sixty and sixty-five dollars a month. Does the Government wish to teach economy to the working men of the country? I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that the working men of Canada and their wives have a bit of very careful calculation to do every week of their lives in order to make ends meet. The farmers are a little better off, with present prices, than they used to be in this country; but even farmers are not extravagant people. With the exception of an automobile, which is often as useful to them in their business as it is for their pleasure, I do not know that there is any luxury to speak of going into the farm houses of the country. The farmers have no expensive carpets on their floors, nor have they any antique furniture. They are a very frugal and careful people, and they need to be, with their income.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when one has dealt with these several classes in the population what is there left? There are none but the profiteers left; and I would suggest to the Government, as I have done before, that in dealing with the profiteers it is not their duty simply to teach economy but to enforce it as well. They ought to enforce economy on the wealthy people in the country, and they have right at their hand a means of doing so. If the wealthy people are spending more money than they should, then I trust no hon. gentleman opposite me will ask that question, which has been so often directed at the head of my hon. friend from Marquette (Hon. Mr. Crerar): "Where shall we get the revenue?" Get the revenue that the rich are wasting, if you are sincere in preaching economy.

Production is of course important. President Wilson, in a message he sent to Congress lately, put a whole volume of politico-economic wisdom into two little sentences. He called the attention of his own people to the fact that the war had taught the United States that in order to sell you must buy. I commend that piece of political economy to my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Meighen): In order to sell you must buy. International trade was never conducted, and never will be conducted, upon any other principle. You do not always buy directly from the nation to which you sell, but there is always a certain relationship between the amount you buy and the amount you sell. The other piece of politico-economic wisdom which Mr. Wilson gave the American people was this. He said: "Restriction of trade always means restriction of production." So that when public men in this Government tell the people to produce, and yet keep up restrictions upon the commerce of the people, they are following a course of absolute contradiction in economic principle.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as somewhat of an old parliamentary hand, and at the same time a politician without any personal ambition, I have been interested, as I am sure large numbers of Canadian people have been, in watching the clash that has been going on in the country and that has been brought into this House, between the aspirations of political youth, and the grim, I might almost say, barnacle-like, tenacity of political veterans. And in watching this fight I must say that I was very proud last night of the leader of what, for want of a better term, I venture to call the National Progressive Party of this country. It must have been noticeable to every one that, with the advent of the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) upon the floor of the House, the discussion livened up and the debate in regard to the discussion of political principles was lifted to a plane a little higher, I venture to think, than that on which it had been before his intervention.

The very fact that the leader of this party has been able to interest the House in its principles and policies is the best evidence we can have that the party and its policies are interesting the country and that the by-elections which resulted in the return of my friends to this House were by no means accidents.

The Minister of the Interior followed the example of, I think, the seconder of the Address (Mr. McGregor), the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), and others, in what appeared to be an endeavour to fasten the title of "class" to this little party. With what has fallen from these gentlemen about the impossibility of any one class permanently ruling in this country, I am in absolute agreement. I believe that the only logical, effective method for men who enter into the activities and the public life of the country is for them to combine upon a common policy in which they sincerely believe as being a policy which will redound to the public good, in which good all ought to participate, and that they ought to so combine absolutely irrespective of the accidents of class. I am in absolute agreement in that with what I understood to be the attitude of the hon. gentlemen to whom I have referred.

I do not quite agree, however, with the Minister of the Interior in tracing class policies to the origin of a given policy. I think it is largely an accident that for the moment those who support the platform of the Dominion Council of Agriculture are, so many of them, farmers. Farmers hold these views because in Canada they have been hit so hard by the tariff that they have had to study economics, and the result of a study of economics would be precisely the same amongst the workmen of the country, amongst the women of the country and amongst those on both front benches in Parliament, if they had the same promptings to study that the farmers have had. They adopted these same views because they were hard hit by the tariff, and they studied economics.

But what is it that is wrong in a class entering politics? It is not only class and class consciousness, but when it becomes the epitome of class selfishness, that is the real evil, and that is the danger which will always arise when men do go into the public life of the country because they belong to a certain class. But the farmers of all men—and particularly the Western farmers—are certainly free from any charge of selfishness in so far as their policy goes, because the first thing they ask Parliament and the Government to do is to take off all duties on the things they produce, in order that the general consumers of Canada may have the benefit of wholesome and cheap food. That is not class selfishness, surely. It is a sample of unselfishness and patriotism that would soon solve the tariff question if certain other members of the community would follow the example of the farmers in that respect.

Let me make an appeal on this point, which I have made before, to the people who do not see their way to stand on their own feet industrially. Let me make an appeal to these gentlemen to use all their endeavours to grow into the same stalwart type of Canadians that stood in the trenches and asked for no protection and the farmers of the West who ask for no protection. I would respectfully invite men engaged in other forms of industry to consider whether they really would not like to belong to the first-rate type of Canadian manhood that you will find in these two other classes of Canadians.

Mr. BRIEN: Would you advocate taking the duty off raw leaf tobacco and early tomatoes coming into this country?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I had thought that my opinion in regard to the tariff was so well known that no one would need to ask me about it again. As far as my opinion goes, I do not believe in tariffs at all. They are an iniquity, and the sooner we get rid of them the better. But there has been a great deal of misrepresentation of our views in that respect, as these views have been presented by my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar). I have been twelve years in this House, Mr. Speaker, under both the old parties, and I never was scared about free trade coming by return of post. I have seen duties go on but I have seen precious little of them coming off. If we do not make any faster progress along these lines in the years that lie ahead of us than we have done during the twelve years I have been in this House, it is going to require quite a considerable portion of eternity to bring about free trade in this country. In regard to the particular articles that are mentioned by my hon. friend (Mr. Brien), that is not a question which should be addressed to me, and it is not a question I can give my hon. friend a special answer upon. I have given him the answer as to my attitude on the tariff generally. In my speech in the Budget debate last year I told the House very fully, and I think with a fair degree of lucidity, exactly how the tariff should be handled, exactly how the tariff should be taken off, pointing out that I was only asking the Finance Minister of Canada to follow the excellent example of Sir Robert Peel in Great Britain and of President Wilson in the United States. President Wilson followed almost slavishly, when he came into office, the methods of Sir Robert Peel in dealing with the tariff in England.

When I asked this question I was going on to say that while I absolutely agree that class representation and class activity in politics would be a curse to the country, I am surprised that these protests should only come at this particular time when for perhaps the first time in the history of the country certain classes are showing a little class consciousness. One would have thought that there never had been any class legislation in this world before, nor any attempt at class legislation.

Hon. gentlemen hold up their hands in holy horror the moment the farmers begin to take hold of public platforms. Why, Mr. Speaker, the history of progressive reform has been a history of the fight of the common people against class domination on both sides of the Atlantic. What was the Family Compact? Was it not a pretty narrow class in its day? What was the House of Lords in Britain but a class occupying the second chamber of that country, and using their position in it continually to look after their own interests. Has there been no class legislation in Canada at later periods than the Family Compact?

What is the Canadian Manufacturers' Association? Is it not the union of men in a class? And I venture to say that so far as I have been able to watch their operations, nine-tenths of the activities of that body are political activities—but not always in the open and on the platform where the farmers go.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Would my hon. friend justify the Canadian Manufacturers Association, as such, nominating and electing representatives to this House?

Mr. CLARK: The Canadian Manufacturers Association has always had candidates in the field and always had members in the House.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The hon. gentleman has missed the point in my question. I asked my hon. friend would he justify the Canadian Manufacturers Association nominating and electing members to this Parliament as representing that body?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Certainly not. My hon. friend scarcely needed to put that question; he could have answered it from what I have said on the general principle. What I assert is that the Canadian Manufacturers Association, and other interests, have been in politics—can my hon. friend deny it? As to having candidates in the field I very much fear that the candidates of all political parties have been much closer to those interests than my hon. friend would like to admit on the floor of this House. What I am objecting to is that hon. members should raise this hullabaloo about class representation the moment farmers and working men begin to make their voices heard as to the political principles which should govern the country. As a matter of fact, and we know it well, these other classes have been in politics and are continually in politics, and no one on either side of the House will deny it. If he did he would produce nothing but laughter and contempt both in the House and outside of it. My point is that the activities that are at present showing themselves for the first time in this country have been provoked by that which is wrong in the body politic and in the public life of Canada; these activities have been provoked by what is wrong in our public life. The fact of the matter, Mr. Speaker, is this: We have only been a nominal democratic country in Canada. We have had many of the marks of autocracy under the forms of democracy; and what I think I see in the public life of Canada to-day, as I see it all over the world, is the evolution of democracy. Did people expect that this little country would send 500,000 of her sons, 60,000 of them to die, to fight for democracy without attempting to get some of it in Canada? If it is a good thing for Europe it is also a splendid thing for the North American continent. We have so much of freedom that we shed the blood and gave the lives of 60,000 of our sons to fight for it in Europe. What shams we are if we go back to our own country and go on as if nothing had happened, bowing the knee to Baal, as we did in the past.

I do not concur in the view of the Minister of the Interior that the debate on the Address is an occasion when fiscal matters should not be mentioned. I have always understood that the debate on the Address constitutes a wide-open door, and that it is a tradition of Parliamentary Government that on the Address members of this House may talk about anything. There is a special reason, if I may say so, Mr. Speaker, why individual members should discuss fiscal questions during the debate on the Address, or make fiscal suggestions. What is the use of making any suggestions when the Budget is brought down? No Government ever alters its Budget if it has a majority behind it. In the very nature of the case suggestions are too late in coming when they come on the Budget. This is particularly true at the present moment, because we of the rank and file of the House hail the opportunity of endeavouring to guide the inexperienced feet of my good friend the new Minister of Finance in the path which he has lately had to try to tread. I condone with him on the burden he has had to take up, and I am sure I am sincere in expressing the hope that he will distinguish himself in the post to which the leader of the Government has called him. If he cares for a little piece of advice—I may try and enforce it later on—I will tell him in a sentence how he will make a very good Minister of Finance. If he will fail by just one hundred per cent to follow the three principal courses followed by his predecessor in the Department. If he will carefully forget all that his predecessor did and do exactly the opposite, or go as far in the opposite direction as he can, he will be a splendid Minister of Finance.

Now while my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) seemed to favour that view he went on himself, as he was merely bound to do in the course of the debate, to reply to some of the points that were raised by my hon.

friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar). The Minister of the Interior seemed to get great satisfaction out of the thought that protection was one hundred and twenty-five years old in the United States. Well, that is a splendid Tory argument, although I never before heard one hundred and twenty-five years put down as the exact date at which institutions became at once venerable and invulnerable. Of course it appeared to me while this point was being made, that cannibalism is much older than that in the Fiji Islands, and yet the last man that I would expect to say anything in praise of cannibalism would be my friend the Minister of the Interior. Some one has put on record a great thought, to the effect that wisdom has been the general accuser of mankind, and I repeat the thought for the benefit of my hon. friend. I might add, off my own bat, that while wisdom has been the general accuser of mankind, error has never failed to advance its hoary head as the reason for its continued acceptance.

My hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) went on to mention the names of some big men who in their day supported the principle of protection in the United States. I want to be perfectly fair with him. I do not know whether he was simply basing his belief in protection on authority, or whether he was only enforcing the point that these men would not have supported a policy which was not a truly national policy. I think there was a little of both designs in my hon. friend's mind. He is a consummate and astute debater, and he would be very glad, I fancy, if a certain number of our people would draw the inference that these authorities gave such sanction to protection that it would be almost an act of sacrilege to say anything against it.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I would rather take for my pattern the United States of to-day than the United States of one hundred and twenty-five years ago. And I must repeat, Sir, until hon. gentlemen get a true grasp of the fact, that when eight years ago President Wilson came into power he introduced what was really a very large measure of free trade. Our tariff was a monstrosity compared with the tariff of the United States. Only thirty per cent of all the articles imported into the United States bear any tariff at all. I am weary of repeating this statement, but I must continue to repeat it until hon. gentlemen fully grasp it. No one who knows anything about the conditions of life in the two countries will compare the tariff of the States with the tariff of this country. I need only mention boots and shoes and agricultural machinery—these are admitted into the United States absolutely free of duty, while in this country they still carry a considerable duty; indeed, in the case of boots and shoes a very heavy one.

I would like to give my hon. friend a little information about the great Scotchman who became a great American—the late Andrew Carnegie. If he thinks that the so-called National Policy of Protection is a benefit to all classes, and wants to persuade intelligent workmen on this continent of that fact much longer, he will have to tackle just such a case as that of Mr. Carnegie. A poor young Scotchman, he came to the United States, and with the help of a protective tariff he amassed a fortune of $500,000,000--I think that is about the sum at which he sold out his interest in the Pittsburg Steel Works. He has given away $300,000,000 in charitable bequests. He who at the end of his life espoused free trade doctrines—having taken full advantage of protection, as any man is entitled to do, even if he does not believe in it—gave evidence before the Tariff Committee of the United States Senate to this effect:

> When I sold out I had forty-three partners, and every one of them was a millionaire.

Now, if my hon. friend, with all his ability, will go down to the workmen at Pittsburg and tell them those two facts and say that nevertheless he believes that protection is equally good for the rich and for the poor, I imagine he will require even more than his ability to carry very much conviction among those people.

Why, Sir, just before President Wilson came into power there was a strike of the woollen workers at Lawrence, in Massachusetts. And what did they strike for, Mr. Speaker? They struck for a living wage. The woollen workers of Massachusetts struck because they could not maintain their wives and families on the wages they were getting in the same country which built up the Pittsburg Iron Works to such a degree of wealth that Carnegie and his forty-three partners were all millionaires. If I were a workingman I would need be greener than the green Englishman I am before I could believe that such a condition of things was equally good for me as for the millionaires.

Now, the hon. minister had something to say about exchange. I should just like to be permitted to give a little warning to the Government on this subject. I have never been able to get the Government to pay much attention to my advice, although I have been most disinterested in giving it to them. I told them when they established the Board of Commerce that they were stirring up a nest of hornets for themselves, but then that board had been called for by my hon. friend the member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie). He takes peculiar pleasure in the fact that he was the joint parent or the grandfather of that particular board. He said, "We have been calling for this board in this House;" and the Government listened to the hon. member instead of to me, and so brought all that trouble upon themselves. I do not mention this for the sake of raking up ancient history, but I do want to warn them most seriously against listening to my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) on this question of exchange. His remedy for the exchange situation would be to rub out about a billion dollars of our foreign trade. Well, that would remedy the trouble with a vengeance, no doubt, but it would be making a desert and calling it peace. I do not think there is another hon. member who would have the temerity to tender such advice. I hope not. However, I want to warn the Government not to take any immediate steps to rub out the whole of our commerce with the United States of America. And I issue that warning the more emphatically because I am very doubtful indeed if the exchange situation is at all connected with the so-called adverse balance of trade. During the whole of my natural life before the war Britain had a so-called adverse balance of trade. Year after year her imports exceeded her exports, while we used to say that the British sovereign spoke all languages—English credit was the highest in the world, as it will be again before we are very much older, in spite of that "so-called" adverse balance of trade. I borrow the phrase from Adam Smith, who did not believe in its being adverse at all.

With very great modesty I venture to assert my opinion that the exchange situation is the result of lowered credit in Canada as compared with the United States at the moment, and I have to go a little further and say that that lowering of credit has been the direct and immediate result of faulty action on the part of our Finance Department. Mr. Speaker, how does a man lower his credit? In the first place, he lowers it if he does not make enough income; in the second place, he lowers it still further if, in spite of not making enough income, he goes on spending; and the result of the two processes will be that he falls into the hands of the money lenders—and when a man takes those three courses his credit will become very bad and his exchange will be bad also. That is precisely the history of the Finance Department of this country since the beginning of the war. I have strong personal grounds for pressing these matters upon my hon. friend who now holds that portfolio (Sir Henry Drayton). It is not yesterday that I began to express these views. I told his predecessor in office that if I were in his shoes in the war session of August, 1914, I would then and there put on an income tax and graduate it up to a very large degree on the large incomes. The Government did that, but they waited until 1917 to do it, and during the years in which they did not do it they spent with a lavish hand,—as, of course, they were compelled to do in the war although there was a great deal of expense that they might have saved—they spent with a lavish hand, and they borrowed what they spent. When my hon. friend who held lately the portfolio of Finance (Sir Thomas White) introduced his loan of $70,000,000 from the United States, I took occasion to express my views to this House—and my hon. friend confirmed my teaching; he agreed with me. I said that I did not oppose the loan; we could not. If the Government had not the courage to put on direct taxation to get the money with which to prosecute the war, we had to get it from somewhere; the war had to be won. I took the opportunity of pointing out to the House and to the country what we were doing in borrowing that money. I pointed out that we were building up American industry, as the whole of that borrowed money would come from the United States in the shape of goods; and my hon. friend the then Minister of Finance agreed that that was so. So that the Government, by pursuing this course, have been largely instrumental in producing the exchange situation which we have to deal with to-day.

Inflated currency, borrowing, squandering, are not new things in this world, and they were never practiced by Governments without bringing financial ruin upon the country, or some approach to it. Mr. Lloyd George recently called attention to the fact that the French revolution was perhaps brought about more by the financial condition of France than by any other single circumstance. Of course the causes were complex, but when Mr. Lloyd George expresses an opinion of that sort, he is well, I think, within the historic facts. One remembers the frequency with which the directors of finance in the old country of France were changed in the years immediately preceding the French revolution. I was interested in looking up Mr. Carlyle's book on the subject the other day and seeing what he had to say about Calonne, who was a famous director of finance in France for two or three years before the revolution broke out. Mr. Carlyle was not only a great prose writer; he had some thoughts on economy which would be very useful to this country if my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) would only take Carlyle for a teacher. In summing up his comments on Calonne and his policy of that day, Carlyle said:

> Nay, in seriousness, let no man say that Calonne had not genius; genius for persuading; before all things, for borrowing. With the skilfulest judicious appliances of underhand money, he keeps the stock exchanges flourishing; so that loan after loan is filled up as soon as opened. . . . The misery is, such a time cannot last! Squandering, and payment by loan is no way to choke a deficit.

Now, there is a splendid picture drawn by the great master of English prose of the condition of France about the year 1789, and every word of it is true, in a degree, of the condition of the finances of this country. No wonder we have class movement and class revolution and people doing things when this is the way the finances of the country are being handled.

The supreme condemnation of the Finance Department of this and of the previous Government—I exclude the present Finance Minister from anything that I may say; we do not yet know whether he is a protectionist or a free trader, and sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof—the supreme condemnation of the Finance Department is to be found in the success of the Victory Loan of this year. For years we were told by that department that you could not raise a Victory Loan if you taxed it. But the Government had to go back upon that opinion; they taxed the loan, and the money of the people was forthcoming just as it had been in previous years. Surely, too, the Victory Loan condemns the Finance Department inasmuch as it shows that there is plenty of wealth in the country to furnish a large amount of the revenue if the Government had the backbone to impose taxes directly on those whose backs are well able to bear them.

I notice in this connection that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) made no attempt whatsoever, at least I cannot recall that he made any attempt—to answer the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) on this particular head when he compared what has been done in New Zealand with what has been done in Canada in the way of direct taxation. Mr. Speaker, I am a Canadian. I have been in this country for eighteen years; everything I have and everything I hold dear is in this country. I should like to be proud of being a Canadian, but in this matter of direct taxation my Government has given me no cause for pride. New Zealand has, roughly, a million people; we have eight millions. In the year 1917-18, New Zealand raised $25,000,000 by an income tax. If Canada had raised the same amount in proportion to her population we would have obtained a revenue of $200,000,000 a year under that head, and if we had obtained that amount each year of the war, our national debt would be one billion instead of two billions and we should not have heard so much about the adverse exchange situation.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): If the hon. gentleman has observed the newspaper reports, he must have seen it stated that the national debt of New Zealand amounts to about $850 per capita, while in Canada it is only about $300 per capita.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I would like something better than newspaper reports from any one who speaks about the per capita debt of any country. I am not going to migrate to New Zealand; my hon friend need not be frightened. I am only comparing what the two countries have been doing along one specific line of national endeavour. If my hon. friend likes the fact, why he can roll it under his tongue as a sweet morsel; but I do not—I would like to think that Canadians had done as well as New Zealand. And we were under a pledge to do it, especially after the last election, because the formula upon which we fought the last election was: "We are in this war to the last man and to the last dollar." Well, some supporters of this Government have a good many dollars standing between them and their last one.

These remarks upon the financial situation which have been raised in the course of this debate are not without their bearing upon the amendment before the House. They have in my mind a very strong bearing upon the amendment, and on the duty that men who hold the views I have just expressed have to perform in connection with that amendment. Let me say that I agree absolutely with every word that fell from the lips of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) as to the unfortunate nature of what I venture to call the preamble of the amendment. I should have liked the amendment much better if it had called for its result upon grounds of policy rather than upon grounds of personnel. I can scarcely speak with patience of that portion of the amendment which brings the illness of Sir Robert Borden before this House. Sir Robert Borden is as much a victim of the war in his illness as if he had been in a front line trench in France. I have again and again expressed what I consider the indebtedness of this country to the leader of the Government and to all the members of this Government, but in case there is any doubt about where I stand on that matter, I want to say once more that I think the men who formed Union Government discharged a patriotic duty regardless of consequences.

I do not quite see the force of all the speech of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in supporting this amendment. Naturally, the speech partook of the nature of what I have ventured to call a preamble. Amongst other things he charged the Government with having no policy. Well, I think there is justice in that charge along certain lines. When you form a Government partly of protectionists and partly of free traders or very-low tariff men it is clear they will not very easily formulate a policy on the tariff, and what is likely to happen to the tariff under those circumstances is that it will be left alone, unless indeed the tariff mongers prove the heavier lot and pull their Liberal brethren with them in raising it. I did not, however, quite understand how my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition could be so light-hearted in charging the Government with having no policy, unless indeed he had gone on to tell what his own policy was. I know that there was a convention, and that a platform was drawn up at that convention, the tariff portion of which was lifted bodily and without apology from the programme of the Dominion Council of Agriculture, with the exception that the western farmers proclaimed themselves free traders in principle at least to the extent of having free trade with Great Britain in five years. So far as I know, that part of the tariff policy of the Dominion Council of Agriculture was not adopted by the official Opposition in this House. That leads me to repeat a statement, which I have no pleasure in making, that the official Opposition has gone back on pre-'96 days in this matter of the tariff, because at that time they were looking towards free trade as they have it in Great Britain. I should like some speakers on the Opposition side to tell us exactly where they stand in this matter of free trade and protection. If it is just a case of tinkering and pottering with the tariff, one side is no better than the other, unless there is some principle asserted, some goal to which they are aiming. When my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) was fighting for his seat in this House on the principle of free trade practically, or near free trade, two of the most energetic followers of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition went out to prevent him if possible from getting into this House.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): Would my hon. friend suggest that the Hon. W. R. Motherwell is not just as sound a low tariff man as he who now represents Assiniboia in this House?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I do not think either the country or I have kept very close track of Mr. Motherwell lately. He was lost in the early snowstorm of the fall. There is one thing, however—and that is that—my hon. friend (Mr. Gould) who represents that constituency is in a vastly better position for carrying out that policy.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): That is no answer.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I do not know what Mr. Motherwell's views are on the tariff; I hope they are all right. The fact is, Mr. Motherwell's opinions have nothing to do with it. I am simply trying to find out where the leader of the Opposition stands on this question, and I hope some of his followers will tell us, for the country has a right to know. I say that if I vote for this amendment I would rather have voted for it on some ground of policy and principle than on the mere matter of personnel which is raised so prominently in it. I was saying I do not know exactly where the leader of the Opposition stands on this question, and if I were to get my information from some of his doings I should think he had changed his attitude on more than one question since the last general election. Why, he sent a cablegram of congratulation to Mr. Asquith on his election the other day. I think this House would almost need to be told whether that was an act of penance on the part of my hon. friend, because he must recall that Mr. Asquith was the father of compulsory military service in Great Britain, and that he is the outstanding and greatest living exponent of free trade. If my hon. friend approves of Mr. Asquith and his policies to the extent of cabling congratulations to him on his election, I think we ought to know whether it was done merely on personal grounds, or whether he really does approve of Mr. Asquith's policy.

I shall vote for this amendment, little as I like its preamble, on grounds of broad public policy. A coalition government has much to say for itself, and there is much to be said for it in time of war, because in time of war you are dealing with an external foe, and a coalition government is frequently the best means of concentrating the whole powers of the nation on defeating the foe. After the war is reasonably over the same argument for the existence of the coalition no longer exists. Indeed, there are many grounds, one of which I just touched upon, why the argument is the other way. The moment the war is over domestic politics become more important. Take the vexed question of the tariff. How can hon. gentlemen in the same Cabinet, holding almost diametrically opposite views on tariff questions, possibly touch the tariff in a coherent and effective manner? The thing is an impossibility. And so along many other lines of policy.

I want to say that in this Cabinet, even now, notwithstanding the withdrawals from it, there is any amount of high political ability. This was still truer before the various withdrawals from the Cabinet. But ability gives no guarantee of Cabinet cohesion. My hon. friend the leader of the House (Sir George Foster) said the other night that the Government had never produced a policy upon which the Cabinet was not absolutely united. That, however, may carry with it, I think, the legitimate inference that policies upon which they could not unite were not produced, which would go far to justify some of us in voting for this amendment. Now, doubt has been cast upon the sincerity of the amendment. I do not take the amendment as indicating merely a personal wish. So far as the desire for an election is concerned, Mr. Speaker, I should say that at the present moment any hon. member who is pining for an election is fonder of adventure than I am. The field of elections is a splendid one for any man who has a fancy for adventures, but I imagine that politics at the present time would impress with great emphasis upon any one of us, who was looking at this matter from a personal point of view, the old doctrine that self-preservation is the first law of nature. But I do not conceive that this amendment is the expression of a personal desire or even of a personal belief so far as the mere holding of an election is concerned. The people have rights as well as the members of this House, and I think that the conclusion of the amendment is an expression of the opinion that the people voted for this Government on certain specific understandings and that the majority of them now think that the time has come when they should have an opportunity of forming another kind of Government if they so desire.

Now, I listened, as I always do, with the greatest pleasure and attention to the speech of the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Meighen) last night. He took up ground which had previously been covered well by my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council (Hon. Mr. Rowell), and stated that there was a considerable programme laid down in the year 1917 besides the winning of the war. Well, after all, that point can be strained rather far. What I would put to my hon. friend, honestly and with a desire that he should get my point of view at least, is this: Were the people in 1917 sufficiently interested in domestic politics ever to have read the programme? I addressed meetings in my own riding every night for six weeks, and I said: "I appear before you as a win-the-war candidate, supporting a win-the-war Government; the winning of the war is the only issue at stake, and I support the steps that the Government believe to be necessary for that purpose." And I venture to think that all over Canada that was the attitude of the candidates on the Government side, and that was the understanding of the people. What did they understand, and what did they vote on? What did they care about patronage when the Kaiser's troops were threatening to take Paris and overrun the channel ports? The only matter in the minds of the people was the winning of the war.

Now, my hon. friend raised another point which is of very great importance to Western Canada, and that is in regard to the question of redistribution being carried out after the census of 1921. This Government cannot give us any guarantee that they will deal with the question of redistribution. If retirements from the Government continue at the rate at which they have been occurring, before redistribution comes about the Government will have become entirely disintegrated. We cannot possibly, in the present state of affairs, expect this Government to give us a guarantee that they will introduce redistribution. As a matter of fact, if an election were held now, my own opinion is that there would be at least sufficient men of truly progressive views returned to enforce a considerable portion of their policy upon the House of Commons or to force a fight on it.

We of this party are in earnest, Mr. Speaker. In saying this I do not suggest that others are not also in earnest. But, I repeat, we are in deadly earnest. We believe that the economic views we hold are vital to the well-being, the progress, and the prosperity of this country. We agree with Mr. Asquith, who has just won an extraordinary by-election, fighting almost exclusively on his economic and fiscal views as being necessary to save the Old Land at this time. We hold our views with equal tenacity and strength, and we believe they will prevail. If there were an unbalanced state of opinion in this Chamber, then we might be on the eve of another election before a redistribution Bill was carried. Many people think we are in for a series of short governments and short parliaments in this country. Now, I mention these matters only to make myself clear, that if we could have a guarantee that redistribution would come before an election it might alter our attitude on this question. I have not the least doubt that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen), my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Sifton), and my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) will fight hard in the Cabinet for that view. It is both their interest and their duty to do it in the Cabinet provided this amendment is not carried. But we can have no guarantee that they will be able to pull the Cabinet their way. As a matter of fact, what has happened in the past in that respect? I am speaking from memory, but I think I am correct in saying that in the early years of Confederation redistribution was twice at any rate carried on the eve of an election. But since that time the East has had the pull. Political considerations have prevailed, and it has rather been the tendency to have an election before redistribution. Human nature is human nature, whether East or West, and I have no confidence that my hon. friends, pull as hard as they may, will be able to keep their colleagues right on this question. As I say, I shall vote for the amendment on grounds of public policy. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior was very emphatic last night in directing to my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, the question, What is wrong with this country? I have tried to answer that question in so far as the finances of the country are concerned as my leader answered it before the minister spoke along that and many other lines last evening. But if the question is put seriously —and I say this not along the line of cheap party warfare—should it be directed to the leader of the Opposition; or could my hon. friend not direct it more properly elsewhere? I do not think the Government have any conception from their utterances of the extent to which public opinion is moved on political questions in this country. What is wrong? What was wrong in Assiniboia? There was no Government candidate, but does anybody for a moment conceive that the presence of a Government, or an Opposition, candidate would have made any difference as to who would win that seat? What was wrong in Carleton, N.B.? These are the places to which to direct this question.

What is stirring in the minds of the people? What are the people thinking? Are their thoughts all complimentary to Unionist Government or do they not follow the thought that was so earnestly and eloquently urged by my hon. friend from Marquette last evening when he said that great questions are stirring the minds of the people of this country and will continue to stir them until they are settled along the lines of democracy, freedom and justice.

My hon. friend should ask the veterans what is wrong with this country. The speech from the Throne takes note of the fact that unrest and disquiet prevail all over the world while claiming, it is true, that Canada is more exempt than other countries from disturbance. Why is it that this class have been heard in this House; or why is it that the farmers are rising in a way they have never risen before and are combining with other men of progressive views? What is moving them? It is a world movement. The movement is bigger than any group and it is bigger than any party in this country has any idea of or any man may guess. It would have been strange if it had been otherwise.

What is wrong with this country?—my hon. friend asks. What is wrong with the workmen, what is wrong with the farmers, what is wrong with the veterans? I will tell my hon. friend—it is the sense of injustice. That is what is wrong. Let him go to the rank and file of the veterans and ask them what is the most disturbing factor in their lives and five out of six of these men will tell him that what disturbs them is the thought that they went overseas, fought and risked their lives—60,000 of them died—for $1.10 a day, the honour of their native land and the progress and safety of civilization and of humanity, only to come back and find that men who did not have two dollar bills to rub against one another at the beginning of the war were speaking of their wealth in millions now. The veterans feel that this is an injustice and especially when it is permitted by a Government that has not the courage to take a fair amount of wealth in the way of taxes. The same feeling exists among other classes that are making themselves heard and felt. We are witnessing the evolution of a new democracy. Men everywhere in this country, consciously or unconsciously, are asking the question: "What did the men fight for?" They have had the answer in stereotyped shape a hundred times that they fought for democracy, freedom and justice. That is what they fought for in Europe and a little bit of that sort of thing would not go badly in Canada. I have seen no tendency on the part of the Government to grasp this situation in the light of what after all is the vital matter of the handling of the finances of the country. It is on that ground that on this occasion I cannot vote confidence in this administration and it is on that ground that I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. GEORGE WILLIAM ANDREWS (Centre Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, like the members of this House who have preceded me, I desire to pay my humble tribute to the honourable gentlemen who moved and seconded the address. I particularly desire to congratulate the hon. the mover of the address (Mr. Cronyn) on the high note he struck. It reflected in this House the true spirit for the defence of which a million men lie dead in France and it was worthy of the occasion and of the man. He hinted that in the days to come we must put our hand to the plough and that there must be no looking back. Yet, at page 39 of Hansard I find there attributed to my right hon. friend the leader of the Government (Sir George Foster) a sort of pious hope, "that we may restore ourselves, our country, and the world to the basis upon which we stood when the war commenced." If this were possible, Mr. Speaker, which it is not, thanks be to God, we would be on the edge of the biggest and bloodiest war in history and where in all Canada could you find men, outside perhaps of a few ghouls of war profiteers, who would desire to face that condition again? I regret that my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) is not in his seat at the moment. I am sure he never intended that his words should bear that interpretation and I would ask him, with all his great experience and splendid ability, to tell us, before the session is over, what he did mean? Undoubtedly he meant us to go back to the good things of the past and not to those things that mean war. There was something about the years 1914, 1913, 1912, 1911 and 1910, that contained the germs of war—possible, probable, actual. We do not want to go back to those days and we are not going back.

At page 43 of Hansard—this made a great impression on my mind—I find a reference to a squawking bird. The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) seemed to have some difficulty in taking up the allusion made by the leader of the Government. Personally, I have none at all. I do not think that any man—particularly any western man—could miss the point if he lived in the neighbourhood of Deloraine in 1896. That squawking bird was a free-trade bird. He was hooked out of the nest on the return of the Liberal Government. But my right hon. friend the leader of the Government will be interested to know that he did not die. He went West, grew up with the country, and to-day is "some bird." I sometimes think he is an eagle. He certainly has bright eyes which look deep into the future, has a strong economic beak, strong talons which grip and hold; and, Mr. Speaker, like the stone that was rejected and afterwards became the corner stone, I have a strong hunch that that squawking bird which was hooked out of its nest in 1896 will yet come back to be master in his own house, and the head of the Liberal party. But I do not wish to talk free trade, although I have my own ideas about it. I believe in free trade absolutely in the same way as I believe in Christianity, but you cannot throw pearls before swine; you cannot tackle a tiger with any Christian tenets so far as I have ever noticed—or a Hun either, for that matter. A little common sense is a very good thing. I think the people of this country have common sense and can be depended on to use it no matter who comes back after the next election. And that is one point. As I have sat in this beautiful Chamber, with member after member getting up and speaking I cannot help wondering how many of us are coming back after the next election. I want you to pay particular attention to that point because I am going to refer to it a few minutes later.

My real reason, Mr. Speaker, for taking my stand to-day is to register my deep regret that no mention has been made in the speech from the Throne of further measures for the re-establishment of our returned soldiers other than those measures already in operation. After all the work that was done and all the evidence that was produced last year, and after we had been told that the door was not closed upon the returned soldiers, I had hoped to find something constructive along the lines of further re-establishment forecasted in the speech from the Throne this session. It does appear, and becomes more strongly manifest every day, that if the returned man wants anything he must fight, fight, fight the whole time. From an eight-dollar allowance for his clothing up to thirty-five dollars, for pensions, it is fight, fight. That should not be, and I desire particularly to register my protest that mention of re-establishment has again been omitted from the speech from the Throne. Neither is there any mention of insurance nor anything for students, nor any comprehensive plan, and this despite the existing unrest. With your permission I shall read an extract from an editorial which appeared in a paper called The Link published in Edmonton by the Rev. H. A. Edwards. I do not know the gentleman but he covers rather well the situation amongst the great body of veterans with whom I am particularly associated. The editorial is headed "The Discontented Element," and it starts as follows:

> The following extract from the Ottawa Ford despatch to the Edmonton Journal illustrates the kind of attitude towards returned men and their problems, with which we dealt at some length in these columns last month:
> "It is generally understood that the discontented element of the returned men will renew the agitation for an increased gratuity at the coming session, although there is no probability of any change in the attitude of the Government in the matter. Positions have been found for nearly all those who desire them, and the total amount spent out of the forty million dollars appropriated has been less than one-tenth that amount."

Upon this paragraph the article comments in these terms:

> As usual, the very wording of the reference to the soldiers' re-establishment proposals is purposely calculated to present both them and their suggestions in an unfavourable light. In a single contemptuous phrase are grouped together, without distinction, both the statesman-like members of the advisory committee on re-establishment, whose carefully considered proposals were so summarily dismissed; and the extreme and unrepresentative Harry Flynn section; all are equally bad, entirely undeserving of any serious consideration; so they are quickly kicked into a fitting chamber of oblivion, the door slammed, and the epitaph written on the outside: Beware the Discontented Element!
>
> It would almost seem as if, in the minds of those who "inspire" these sort of despatches discontent were a vice. Dissatisfaction with things as-they-are must, according to these gentlemen, always come from below, never from above.
>
> Such a position is untenable. It denies all reform and inhibits all progress. It would brand as undesirables most of the greatest names in history. All down the ages thousands of men and women have been "discontented" with conditions affecting the lives of those about them, and have sought to relieve those conditions. Always there were those who scoffed, and those who opposed, abusing and impugning their motives, though later generations erected monuments in gratitude to their memory.
>
> It is the same to-day, abuse is cheap, and misrepresentation easy. Readers of the Link, however, will not be misled by this kind of thing. In these districts at any rate, we are in too close touch with the returned boys to feel anything but intense indignation at the persistent propaganda so sedulously intent on discrediting their position, and alienating sympathy from them. We resent it, and we believe that this resentment is widespread and general, and may unpleasantly astonish the party politician when the time comes for the next vote to be taken.

The foregoing are the comments of an outsider who covers fairly well my own view on the subject.

I may say that I have a letter here from a man who had the honour to serve in the regiment so splendidly commanded by the member for Skeena (Mr. Peck). He went overseas as a private and by good luck and good service, after being wounded twice, eventually became Captain and Adjutant of his battalion. Before the war this man was a railway mail clerk and enlisted in 1914 in another three months his examination fell due—which would have given him civil service pay during his entire military service which lasted over five years—but he did not wait to take that examination before going overseas. If he had been a good business man, a cautious man, if he had waited and protected his own interests before the interests of the country, he would not have been at Ypres in 1915 with his comrades, and if that division had not been there we would not have been here to-day—or if we had been here we would have been saluting his nibs the Kaiser. That is the universal opinion of the military men to-day. But this man did not wait, he jumped into the fight.

He comes back and he finds that he is still a temporary employee of the Civil Service, he has lost five years seniority and he still has to pass his examination. The rotten part of it is that during the strike in Winnipeg civilians who performed one week's service were given permanent appointments. It looks to this man—who is one of the finest possible types—that he has got a raw deal, for apparently one week's strike service is rated higher than five years' service in the field. That is one of the things causing unrest. It is something that can be fixed, and it has got to be fixed. That is the case of a man who has come back with his full health and strength, thank God! We have other cases in thousands.

I do not know any better way of bringing their cases before the notice of the people than by bringing the matter up in this House. We have tried almost every method we can think of, without success so far, but so long as I am a member of Parliament these cases will be brought on the floor of the House one by one if necessary until we get a square deal for those men. That is all I intend to say on the subject to-day, as I understand that the House will be given an opportunity at an early date to debate further the question of re-establishment.

I desire to say just a word as to the amendment. I am going to vote for it, for the following reasons. In the first place, I believe that my constituents desire an election as soon as possible. During the recess I have spent almost every night amongst my constituents, I have seen them by ones and by twos, by tens and by fifties, and once by a group of four thousand, and always I found a majority of them desirous of a change. The old-line Liberal is firmly convinced that we are camouflaged Conservatives, and the old Conservative wanted to get back to the party game immediately after the war. He said that was the arrangement under which he came into the Unionist party. At every meeting which I have attended this confounding subject of taxing wealth has cropped up. It has already been referred to very ably by my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark). There is a distinct feeling amongst all classes that this Government has failed to do what was possible with regard to the taxation of war profits. I know well the difficulty the Finance Minister will have in imposing such taxation squarely and equally. I was once asked at a meeting whom I considered a profiteer. My answer was that any man who during the war made ten cents was a profiteer, and that if profiteering had to be taxed every man must pay his shot. I still am of that opinion. Whether the money so secured would amount to anything I do not know and have no means of knowing; but I am satisfied of this, Mr. Speaker, that something along this line has got to be done before we get very much satisfaction or settlement in the country. Undoubtedly that is one of the causes of unrest to-day; and to my mind, judging from my own constituency and from what other members have stated, a good deal of unrest is also caused by the fact that a majority of the people have largely lost confidence in the government and probably would have lost confidence in any government under these conditions. But it is a fact and we must face it. So far I have not been able to educate my people to the contrary. Possibly if we could have had the able Minister of the Interior at all the meetings I attended conditions might be different. This education has got to be done somewhere and somehow. The hon. minister pointed out how desirable it was to have the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) here so he could get a little further light. If that is true of a man selected by fifteen hundred people, how much more necessary is it that the fifteen hundred who selected him be brought here? That, I know, is impossible, but Mr. Speaker, if the mountain won't come to Mahommet, Mahommet must go to the mountain,—the Government must go to the country. I know of no other way in which you can educate the people unless you spend millions of dollars in sending out personal letters to the electorate, because I regret to say that, like the leader of the Government, a great many Canadians do not now pay much attention to the headlines in the papers.

Just one other point struck me during the debate, Mr. Speaker. I was astounded to hear three hon. members, one of them being a minister, give as a reason for not holding an election that the West would be short twenty seats if an appeal were made to the country this year. What can it mean but that those members doubt that the West could get a square deal unless represented by numbers? If it is true that a man from any part of this country cannot get a just and square deal without a large representation to back his desire by force if necessary, then I say, God help Canada, and the sooner we get a bunch of fresh representatives here the better.

I desire to briefly explain my personal views on the matter of a man voting against his party. I did this once before last session. I have been trained in the old school —I believe in loyalty to leaders and discipline in the party, no matter what party it is. I believe that Sir Robert Borden was entrusted with the affairs of this country at a very critical time, that he "carried on," that he did his utmost level best with the men he was associated with, and although it was a dirty, rotten job he handled it successfully. I felt so keenly on the subject that I wrote to my constituents and told them that I had voted against the Government, and that they might have my resignation. They did not accept it. I have a copy of the letter which was written to me at the time; I showed it to one of the Cabinet ministers. I may tell the House that my constituents gave me an absolutely free hand. I am, therefore, now going over to the cross benches; I shall feel freer there. I do not like to vote against the Government; it goes against the grain. If a man gets a chance in caucus and in the lobbies and finds himself in a minority, he should stay with his party; I cannot see how the business of the country is going to be carried on if he jumps the fence every time he fails to get his own way.

Mr. THOMAS MacNUTT (Saltcoats): Mr. Speaker, I have found it rather difficult to come to a decision with regard to my vote on the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition (Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King). I am not one of those who contend that the Union Government was a failure; despite all obstacles that were thrown in the way it did the work that it was created to do, and did it well. I have no regrets, therefore, for having been a supporter of the Union Government during the war, when we were supposed to put aside all purely domestic issues in the face of the great danger which confronted us. But now the time has come when we should deal with these questions, and I do not think that the Union Government as at present constituted will deal with them in the way that many of us think they should be dealt with.

I believe that an election should be held before long, but if one is held in the immediate future it will be based upon the census of 1911. We are now approaching the end of a decennial period and another census will shortly be taken. There is no doubt that conditions have changed very much since 1911; the population of Canada has largely increased, especially in the West. If any definite statement from the Government was forthcoming to the effect that an election would be held as soon as possible after the next census was taken. I certainly would oppose the amendment, because I think it is worth while waiting a reasonable length of time in order that the people may have their proper representation in Parliament. I was very much pleased to hear the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) make the following statement at the conclusion of his address last night:

> I appeal to all hon. gentlemen everywhere to allow Western Canada to get its representation, which it assuredly will; because there is no intention to have an election until an opportunity is provided to give Western Canada its full share of representation after the census is taken.

However, there is nothing definite in that; an election might not be held until 1923. I would feel inclined to oppose the amendment if there was a possibility of some member of the Government making a definite announcement that immediately following an early census a redistribution would be effected and an appeal promptly made to the people. But I do not know that any member of the Government is in a position to make such a statement; therefore I am disposed to support the amendment.

With regard to the probable result of the next census, I have obtained a few figures from the Bureau of Statistics. They are, of course, only estimates, but they are probably very near the mark. The compilation was made as of March 31, 1919.

The following are the estimated increases in the various provinces: Alberta, 213,337; British Columbia, 325,520; Manitoba, 163,386; New Brunswick, 17,111; Nova Scotia, 26,662; Ontario, 397,626; Prince Edward Island, 272; Quebec, 312,768; Saskatchewan, 261,568; Yukon, 488; total increase, 1,718,738. The estimate for the whole Dominion is 8,835,000.

Taking the estimated population of Quebec as 2,326,000 and dividing it by 65, we arrive at a basis for estimating the number of representatives which each province will have. If this estimate is correct, Alberta will have 16 members, an increase of 4; British Columbia 20, an increase of 7; Manitoba 17, an increase of 2; New Brunswick 10, a decrease of 1; Nova Scotia 14, a decrease of 2; Ontario 79, a decrease of 3; Prince Edward Island 4; Quebec, 65; Saskatchewan 21, an increase of 5. The estimated total increase of members is 18 and the estimated decrease 6, a net increase of 12. The estimated total membership is 247, instead of, as now, 235.

No one knows what the political complexion of the new Parliament may be; that is a matter for the people themselves to determine through their majorities. But I am convinced that from the West, at all events, a great majority will be in favour of a low tariff. A great change has taken place in the West. Men who were very strong partisans have ceased to adhere strictly to party lines. Many prominent men have told me that in a way they were very glad that the break in the old party system did come, because they had been supporting their party at times when they felt that the party was wrong. With these men that will not happen again. Although there are, no doubt, some protectionists left in the West, their numbers are not very great.

If the Government will make a pronouncement along the lines I have indicated I should be willing to wait eighteen months so that we could have a redistribution measure put through the House.

I want to say a few words with regard to the income tax. I certainly am not going to knock the income tax, because I believe in direct taxation. I think that the greater part of the revenues of this country should be obtained proportionately from the people by direct taxation. It seems to me that customs taxation is primarily protection, and incidentally a revenue producer. It benefits mostly the manufacturers of this country. We all wish them well, but certainly they are not entitled to anything more than legitimate profits, unless they are going to make some return for protection, of which I fail to see any signs at present. I do not think the income tax can very well be applied to the farming community. Farmers, of course, must pay their share of the public expenditure, just the same as any other class of the community, but very few farmers keep track of their finances, and it is consequently very difficult for them to know just what their taxable balance is. I therefore think it would be far better to tax farmers upon land values. I have a little book here called the Farmer's Account Book, issued by the Commission of Conservation free to any one who applies for it. I have been instrumental in getting copies into the hands of a number of farmers in my constituency. The book, which is designed entirely for farmers, is in simple form. It was not intended to be an aid in the collection of the income tax, but was issued solely in the interests of the farmers. It will, however, be of assistance to farmers in preparing their income tax returns. I think a book of this sort should be used as a text book in every country school, so that the farmer's children will get into the habit of keeping accounts. Some facts regarding farm bookkeeping are given in a note on the cover, as follows:

> During the summer of 1915, one hundred farms in each of four counties in Ontario were visited by a representative of the Commission of Conservation. In 1916, four hundred farmers were visited in Dundas county. It was found, among other things, that farmers took too little interest in farm accounting. Less than one per cent of the total of eight hundred farmers visited were following a really complete method of book-keeping, and less than thirty per cent were following any form whatever of farm accounting. Those who keep no accounts have, at best, only an estimate of their business and cannot consider one phase of the farm operations distinctly enough to know whether it pays or not.

It is no crime not to be a book-keeper, but it certainly would be helpful to the farmers to have a methodical system of keeping their accounts. Many farmers in the West and even in Ontario are not in the habit of keeping a very strict account of their incomings and outgoings, and consequently it is very difficult for them to tell just where they stand with regard to the income tax. The income tax forms sent out are very complicated, and it takes almost an expert accountant to fill them in properly. For these reasons I think a direct tax on land values, instead of an income tax, should be levied in the case of farmers.

My principal object in rising was to try and get some pronouncement from the Government on the lines I have indicated, to assist me in determining how to vote on this amendment. Before closing, I wish to say a few words on this "contemptible little army," as it has been jocularly called. If, in a much smaller way, and in a different direction, this "contemptible little army" carries out its work in as satisfactory a way as the "contemptible little army" of Great Britain did in the early days of the war, we shall achieve notable results. The real intention was that men, not necessarily farmers, who feel alike on certain great questions, should get together and consult with one another, and perhaps vote with one another, though it does not absolutely follow that we shall always vote together. One of our members is designated with the rather pugnacious term of Whip, but I do not think any of us are much afraid of him or of the whip he is supposed to crack. I do not think he will crack it very often over our heads. He is a gentleman whom we all respect very highly, and for that reason he was given this appointment. His duties will simply be to notify us when some one of us think we should get together and talk things over. Our group is entirely independent, both individually and collectively. It may be that on this amendment we shall not all vote the same way. I do not know; we have not discussed it with one another. Then there will be times, no doubt, when we shall vote as a body, sometimes perhaps with this side of the House, and sometimes with the other. Our object is to derive strength by forming this group of men who think alike on certain great questions.

One of these questions is the tariff. I think we can all in this group say that we are low tariff men. Some people advocate no tariff at all, and I do not know that this principle has not strong merits to recommend it. However, I do not believe that the tariff should be wiped out immediately. Years ago, when a member of the Liberal party, I frequently stated my views in this House on this question and I have had no reason to change them. In fact, I think they are stronger than ever they were. I believe there is greater necessity to-day for production than at any previous time in our history, and it is vitally important that every obstacle should be removed that stands in the way of increased agricultural production. The question may be asked us: "If you are low-tariff men why do you not associate yourselves with the Liberal party?" Although I am perfectly satisfied that many of us are on the best possible terms personally with many members both of the Liberal and of the Union parties, I for one—and I have reason to believe that my colleagues are at one with me in this—do not feel myself justified in being allied with the present Liberal party. I have had some experience of eastern Liberals, and I know that they are not unanimous with regard to the tariff; and although they may have a platform which seems to indicate unanimity, I am not satisfied that they could go as far as we should like in this direction. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Levi Thomson) will remember that some years ago the western Liberals decided to bring before the House a real low-tariff proposition. We got together on various occasions, once at Regina, once at Winnipeg, and frequently here, and framed a resolution which we called the "Oliver Resolution," as it was to be moved by the Hon. Frank Oliver, and which was almost identical with the platform of the Council of Agriculture. In canvassing the eastern Liberals I found that several of them, at all events, were satisfied with the resolution except for the fact that it interfered with some particular industry in their constituencies. They seemed to me to be free traders outside of their constituencies, but protectionists within. I do not say that this is true of them all; no doubt there were some who were sincere. I am of the opinion that a great many eastern Liberals still hold the same views they held then, and are protectionists to a large extent, particularly so far as any industry in which their constituencies are interested are concerned.

Mr. COPP: Judge not.

Mr. MacNUTT: The opposite is the case in the West. The western farmers, I think, are generally in favour of a real low tariff.

Mr. MORPHY: They favour the farm instead of the factory.

Mr. MacNUTT: We ask for no special privileges for the farm, but the manufacturers seek privileges for themselves. They say: "Give us protection; build a wall around us to keep competition from us and enable us to get more money out of the consumer." The farmer, on the other hand, says: "We do not want protection and we ask for none. We simply ask, however, that the obstacles which are in our path and which have no right whatever to be there shall be removed." Eastern men, at least many of them, seem to cherish the notion that they have a right to protection. It is something they have so long enjoyed that they evidently think they have some sort of established right to it. I do not think, however, that they have the slightest right to any special favour, and I personally, with the best will in the world for the manufacturers, whom I should like to see succeed in their enterprises in this country, am strongly of opinion that there should be no legislation which enables them to get something for which they give nothing in return. I think that many former Conservatives who always favoured low tariff, but would not oppose their party, now feel absolved, as it were, and will vote independently.

Mr. Speaker, I think we are fully alive to the fact that we are faced with a very heavy expenditure, and in every part of the Dominion, whether it is in the East or in the West, every man, be he farmer, lawyer or doctor, must as a citizen pay his share towards meeting that expenditure and reducing the debt of the country. This taxation should be levied in a fair way, and it cannot be said that it is so done at the present time. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that our little group—which I am confident will not long be as small as it is at present—will render all the assistance it possibly can to the end that the debt of the Dominion may be reduced and satisfactory conditions brought about.

Mr. MORPHY: In regard to direct taxation, may I ask the hon. member whether he would tax improved or unimproved lands?

Mr. MacNUTT: My idea is that the land should be valued without taking into consideration the improvements upon it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said about all I intended to say. Probably at a later date, when the Budget is before the House, I may go further into details. I rose, however, more particularly to say that in the absence of some assurance that we may expect an election following the census I shall have no other resource than to vote for the amendment.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle) Mr. Speaker, the word "class" has been used somewhat freely in this debate. We have heard such expressions as, "class legislation," "class representation," and "class movement," and last evening the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Meighen) spoke about "class origin." I am no advocate of class legislation or class representation. I am not at this moment condemning the principle, which may be necessary in some cases, as for instance in the case of labour groups. As I say, however, I am neither advocating nor condemning it. As far as the supporters of the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture are concerned, there is no desire for class legislation. Distinctly, we are opposed to class legislation of any kind. Class legislation is not approved of by our group in this House, nor is it approved of by our platform or its supporters. Class representation is not asked for by our platform or by this group in the House; nor is it asked for by the majority of the supporters of this platform. It is true that in some places and communities even leaders have come out in favour of class representation; that is that they, being farmers, should elect farmers to represent them. That view, however, is not general. In so far as Saskatchewan is concerned, we have come out very pronouncedly in opposition to class representation as well as class legislation. I think that in speaking of this group, or, in any criticism that may be offered with reference to this group, that matter should be considered. It must be remembered that while there are twelve seats held by the group of which I speak, seven of the members in the group represent Saskatchewan constituencies where the policy has been distinctly laid down and agreed to that there must be no class representation or class legislation. Every person is free to come in and take part in our nominations or in any convention that is going on. Every one is free, no matter what his occupation is, to be a candidate or a delegate or to take part in a convention or in the work of the organization. I have said that it is possible that some group may find it wise to ask for class representation and may perhaps be justified in doing so; I am not saying whether they are or not; but I want to repeat that the movement which has been spoken of here—the movement of those who are supporters of the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture—makes no distinction whatever as between classes and does not ask for class representation or class legislation. Our platform is big and broad enough for every man who desires to promote the welfare of the country. That is all that is required. Every one who is desirous that all should have equal rights is welcomed by our organization and our platform is certainly broad enough to accommodate all who take that view.

This matter has become somewhat mixed in the utterances of public men and some of the papers. Some people have got the question of class representation and class legislation mixed up. There was a very earnest effort on the part of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) last evening to mix up the question of class origin with class representation and legislation. He claimed that because this movement had been started by a certain class it must therefore be a class movement. I have much respect for my hon. friend's arguments and his ability, as I think every member of this House has, but when he attempts to tell us that because a movement is started by some class, or some person of some class, it must therefore be a class movement and must be a movement of that class, with all respect to my hon. friend, I think his proposition is absurd. If there were anything in it, then because Carey was a cobbler, the missionary movement must be a class movement and a cobbler class movement at that. I do not know what the occupation in life of Cobden was but he is generally given the credit for being the originator of the free trade movement. If he had been a newspaper man, according to my hon. friend's argument, it would be a newspaper movement—a class movement among newspaper men. A group of clergymen might start some movement, but surely it does not follow that it is a clerical movement if the movement is for the benefit of the people as a whole. I do not know that movements started by clergymen as a rule are supposed to be for their own benefit; they are generally for the benefit of the people at large.

If the farmers of Canada have started this movement I think it is entirely to their credit because I believe that it is a movement which will not be for the benefit of any particular class merely but for the benefit of the people of the country generally.

I do not think that the friends of free trade can be consistently charged with a desire for class legislation. Protective legislation is necessarily class legislation. It is the protection of a certain class against outside competition to enable them to charge more for their products than they would be able to charge but for that legislation. That is certainly the reason for protective legislation. Therefore it is class legislation while free trade cannot be class legislation because free traders only ask that there shall be no class privileges. The main point about the doctrine of free trade is that there shall be no class privileges to any one but that there shall be a fair field and no favours.

We have heard something about the adverse rate of exchange from both sides of the House. The remarks of the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) have been several times referred to, and while I do not wish to dwell at any length upon them I would like to read an extract from Hansard. The hon. member says:

> I would not trade to the extent of one five-cent piece with any country which will not recognize my Canadian dollar to the full face value of that dollar. If this country is loyal to itself, loyal to its principles, loyal to its institutions, it will stand by Canadianism in the matter of having any trade with any country that will not recognize the Canadian dollar at its full face value as international currency. I am not in favour of any restriction of trade, but I am in favour of Canada's trading where there is fair trade where she is properly treated. If there is any reason why any country is willing to sell goods to us and yet will not recognize the face value of the dollars with which we pay for them, that reason should be clearly stated.

[Mr. Thomson.]

I do not propose to go into the question of the balance of trade but I think that my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) referred to the fact that after the Civil War the American dollar was only worth 37 cents; we would only give 37 cents for the American dollar. I do not think the Americans ever thought of applying to us the doctrine enunciated by the hon. member for North Cape Breton or of saying that because we would not give them one hundred cents on the dollar, they would not trade with us. The Americans at that time were a little broader minded. Let me refer to a comment contained in a Canadian press despatch published by the Ottawa Citizen under the date of March 2:

> Toronto, March 2—The Canadian Reconstruction Association—

We have heard of that before-- > has issued a long statement pointing out that in spite of the present adverse rate of exchange, Canadian imports from the United States are still increasing according to latest available figures, and drawing attention to the absolute necessity of Canadians purchasing Canadian-made goods in Canada, and lessening national dependence upon foreign industries.

Well, that sounds like old doctrine; we have heard that occasionally before. Our Canadian manufacturing friends are very desirous that we should purchase no American-made goods. They say we should not do so, and they make us responsible because certain American goods are being sold in Canada. What is the result of this adverse rate of exchange between Canada and the United States? Surely it is that the protection of the Canadian manufacturer is increased by the amount of that adverse exchange. But this increase of protection is not sufficient to satisfy the Canadian manufacturers. They want something further, they want more relief, they want Canada to do something more for them. The double protection which they now enjoy is not satisfactory; they want it trebled instead of merely doubled. It seems to me that their demand for relief in order to enable them to supply Canadian-made goods to the home market is not well founded. In my opinion the remedy lies entirely in their own hands. They are the parties who should apply the remedy if any remedy needs to be applied, not the long-suffering public. Surely the double protection to which I have alluded ought to be sufficient to enable the Canadian manufacturers to furnish us with goods at a lower rate than the American manufacturers are receiving for the goods imported into this country. Let the Canadian manufacturers satisfy our people that they are able to supply them with such goods as they need at a lower rate than the American manufacturers, or even at a rate as low. The Canadian consumer is not altogether a fool. He knows what goods he is buying; he is going to buy in the cheapest market he can; and if the double protection which the Canadian manufacturers are enjoying at present is not sufficient to enable them to produce the goods that Canadians require, or to sell them at such a rate as will exclude all outside competition, then surely protection is a miserable failure. How much protection is necessary in order to make the protective system a success? In ordinary everyday affairs, as in political life, when we are dealing with any particular plan we want to adopt the plan that we can carry out successfully. Apparently it is impossible to afford sufficient protection to our Canadian manufacturing concerns to enable them to do the thing which they think ought to be done—that is to have Canadian-made goods bought in Canada. I am quite willing to buy everything that I can from Canadian manufacturers, but I still claim the privilege, if American manufacturers can sell to me more cheaply than Canadian manufacturers notwithstanding the tremendous protection enjoyed by the latter—of buying in the cheapest market. That is apparently what our manufacturers —the Re-construction Association as they call themselves—are anxious that we shall not do. Evidently they wish us to pay still more, to give them still more protection and to pay still higher prices for what they produce. There is no reason that I can see why Canadian manufacturers cannot manufacture the articles produced in this country generally as cheaply as the American manufacturers, leaving outside altogether the matter of the tariff. At any rate, surely the existing tariff and the present adverse exchange rate which makes still further for protection, should enable them to supply us with what we need at a reasonable price and do away with the condition which they are now lamenting when they say that notwithstanding that adverse exchange rate our imports from the United States are increasing instead of decreasing. If such is the case that is the fault of the Canadian manufacturer and not ours. I do not now wish to enter into a discussion of fiscal matters. There will be ample time for that later on, when we in this corner will probably have something to say about the tariff and about kindred questions.

I desire, however, to offer a few observations with regard to the amendment which is now before the House. We have heard a great deal about it, and the Minister of the Interior seems to think that if we cannot agree to every single word in the amendment, if we cannot agree to the dotting of every "i" and the crossing of every "t" we must vote against it. Sir, I must confess that I cannot grasp the reasoning embodied in that sort of argument. To my mind the amendment, stripped of its verbiage, merely calls for an election after the present session has run its course. I think perhaps that if some of the verbiage of the amendment had been omitted it would have been better. Personally I do not like so many preambles, because they sometimes weaken the effect of a proposition. I do not wish to criticize the leader of the Opposition, but I think the object aimed at could have been better accomplished with fewer words. It would be more satisfactory to ourselves in the long run and the public would be better pleased. In my opinion the gist of what we are voting on is merely whether or not there should be a general election after a full session of the present Parliament. That is a question which each of us must settle for himself. Each member must decide whether he believes in and should vote for that principle. Now I realize there is something to be said on both sides of this question, and perhaps we are a little too slow in this House to realize that fact when dealing with matters which come before us. This Parliament was elected on a war franchise, on one issue—to win the war. I have no desire to criticize the Government; I am not here for that purpose at all. I am prepared to support the Government whenever I feel that I can properly do so. I believe it to be the duty of every hon. member who is taking an independent stand to support the Government whenever he feels that its acts warrant that course. We should realize that the Government has onerous duties to perform and so long as it is in power I am rather inclined to get away from the merely party idea. No matter who is at its head we should support the Government as far as possible whenever we believe it to be doing right. Personally I am prepared to do that. I am willing to give the Government credit for everything it has done, especially during the war, and am not inclined to condemn it for all its acts since the war terminated, because I recognize it has had to deal with exceedingly complex problems. The Government is now treading new and unbroken ground and its position is very difficult, very much more difficult than any previous Government in Canada has had to face. On the whole I am not prepared to say that it has not in almost all matters done fairly well. Therefore, although I intend to vote for the amendment, it is not with a view of showing any disregard to what the Government has done or of manifesting any particular dissatisfaction with it. Although I must admit that I am not satisfied with all that the Government has done, still dissatisfaction with its course will not be my reason for the vote I shall give on this question. I have always maintained that there should be no general election until our soldiers had returned and been a sufficient time in Canada to thoroughly grasp or to reasonably well understand the political situation. However, the war is over, our soldiers have returned, and I believe they have been back in this country a sufficient time to enable them to grasp the political situation if they are ever going to do so. We were told last evening—or at least the Minister of the Interior and the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) seemed to argue —that the last general election was like any other general election: That there was the one big issue before us, as there is upon almost all other like occasions, but that in addition the general political issues as at other general elections were fought out. With that view I cannot for one moment agree. There was no contest in my own constituency, but I did my share in trying to support my hon. friend from Saltcoats (Mr. MacNutt) in his constituency.

I took the ground taken by him and which I heard taken everywhere. We threw aside everything else for the time being and we said: "This is a war election; we are supporting and are prepared to support the Government during the war and for any time thereafter necesary for demobilization."

While the hon. Minister of the Interior took the ground that he did last night, I want to read an extract from a speech he made September 6, 1917, when introducing the War-time Elections Act. It will be found at page 5415 of Hansard for that year. He said:

> As the title would indicate, the scope of the Bill,— that is the War-time Elections Bill— so far as the period of its operation is concerned, is limited indeed. Its provisions are to operate only during the period of the present war and of demobilization thereafter.

Hon. Mr. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Thomson.]

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: That was distinctly laid down in the introduction of the Bill. That is a little different from what we heard last night.

> The necessity for the Bill arises out of the precipitation of an election in time of war. But for that becoming inevitable, there would be no justification for the measure;

There would have been no justification for the measure which was introduced but for the fact that we had to have an election in war time.

My hon. friend stated that the provisions of that Act were to operate only during that period. As a matter of fact, the provisions of the War-time Elections Act are still operating; that is, we represent our constituencies in this House by virtue of the elections held under that Act. I do not think for a moment that had that Act never been passed it would have made any material difference in the returns. Perhaps some of my hon. friends may not agree with me, but I believe the results would have been practically the same, and I am confident that there would be a much more satisfied feeling throughout the country had it never been introduced. You are aware what the hon. member for Frontenac said last evening on this subject. I have not his exact words, but I give you the gist of what he said as reported at page 5572 of Hansard of 1917:

> That the pending election will be entirely different from any other election ever held in this country.

That is not what I heard from him last night; on the contrary, he said they were just the same. In 1917 he said clearly:

> The only issue is the conduct of the war.

Those two hon. gentlemen were quite clear in 1917 as they were quite clear last night, but their utterances are remarkably different; in fact, there is not much resemblance between the utterances of two and a half years ago and those of last night. I believe they were right in the statements they made in regard to that measure, I believe they expressed their own intentions at that time; but their intentions are entirely different now, and I believe my hon. friends are wrong in the contradictory statements which they made last night.

In view of this, while, as I say, there are two sides to this as to every question, it seems to me that the only proper course for us to take is to support the amendment. I realize that there is something in what has been said in regard to re-distribution, and I would be very glad to see a re-distribution which would give equal justice to the population of all parts of Canada. I believe that even if we have an election now we should have another election within a reasonably early period thereafter so that the whole country may be fairly represented.

My hon. friend from Saltcoats (Mr. MacNutt) showed a disposition to vote against this amendment provided he got some assurance as to the intention of the Government, but he failed to get any. Personally, I do not think he should have expected anything else.

Hon. Mr. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Quite right.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I do not see how any minister could go further than the hon. Minister of the Interior went last night. No ministry knows how long they may remain in power,—and certainly this ministry does not. Therefore I think they are quite right in refusing to give any further assurance than the hon. Minister of the Interior gave last night. In view of this fact, I feel that the only course I am justified in taking is to vote for the amendment.

On motion of Mr. A. L. Davidson (Digby and Annapolis) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Sir George Foster the House adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

Monday, March 8, 1920.

The House met at Three o'clock.

THE LATE LIEUTENANT-COLONEL G. H. BAKER, M.P.

MEMORIAL IN PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS TO BE ERECTED.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that a Message has been received from the Senate acquainting this House that the Honourable Messieurs Bradbury, Casgrain, Foster and Pope have been appointed a special committee to determine the form of the memorial to be erected in the Parliament Buildings to the late Lieutenant-Colonel George Harold Baker, M.P for Brome, he being the only member of Parliament who lost his life on the field of battle, and inviting this House to appoint a like committee to act jointly with a committee of the Senate.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister) moved:

That the following Members of Parliament, to wit: Sir Sam Hughes, Messrs. Boivin, Kay and Griesbach, be appointed a Special Committee to confer and act with a like Committee of the Senate in determining the form of the Memorial to be erected in the Parliament Buildings to the late Lieutenant-Colonel Baker, M.P. for Brome, who lost his life on the field of battle; and that a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours therewith.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion can only be entertained by unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

GOLD SHIPMENT FROM OTTAWA TO NEW YORK.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JEAN J. DENIS (Joliette): I would call the attention of the Government to a press despatch of March 5 to the effect that gold coin valued at approximately $3,000,000 has been shipped to New York from Canada for the account of the Canadian Government, and that this is understood to be the forerunner of further shipments. I should like to know if this report is correct, and whether, if further shipments are contemplated, they are to be made for the purpose of relieving the exchange situation between Canada and the United States.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): It is quite correct that there is a movement of some gold from Ottawa to New York. It is being shipped in payment of some Canadian obligations payable in New York. This method of meeting our obligations was adopted for the reason that otherwise, in view of the exchange situation, there would have been a serious expense to the country. When shipping in gold, the expense is only one-tenth of one per cent; being our actual cost of transport. As against, therefore, an exchange ranging from 13 to 17, which on a large payment would constitute a very serious loss, we are getting rid of our obligations in New York for one-tenth of one per cent and at the same time keeping within our statutory gold reserve. The movement is not made for the purpose of correcting the exchange but simply for the purpose of discharging our obligations in that market.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Hume Cronyn for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King thereto, resumed from Friday, March 5.

Right Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Ex-Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when I retired from the Government in August last it was my intention for the reasons given in my letter of resignation, to resign my seat in this House. I refrained from doing so at the request of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), and also of many prominent citizens of my constituency of both political parties. I am glad that I followed that course, because the retention of my seat affords me the opportunity of making answer to questions which may arise touching the fiscal policy of the Government and the administration of the public finances during my period of office.

To those who have referred in terms of commendation to the part I took in the Administration I am deeply grateful. Some criticisms which have been passed in the course of this debate I shall deal with, I hope effectually, before I take my seat. While I am upon my feet I should like to speak, and I hope at not too great length, to the amendment which has been proposed by the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King).

May I be permitted a personal digression? I was not in the House at the close of the last session, and consequently did not have the opportunity, which I now most earnestly embrace, of extending my congratulations to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mackenzie King) upon his appointment to the eminent position of head of the Liberal party and its leader in this House. I do so with the greater pleasure because he and I have been old personal friends. Our friendship is of such long standing that I do not like to refer to it for fear it should appear that he and I are growing old. He is a graduate of the same university as I, and I think of the same year. His father was my preceptor in law, a man for whom in his lifetime I always cherished the highest esteem and regard, and whom I bear now in most affectionate remembrance. While our political differences arising from the views which we hold, and doubtless will continue to hold on public questions are not likely to be few or narrow, I assure the hon. leader of the Opposition of a goodly measure of my goodwill and interest in his future career.

Being solicitous as I am for his making a reasonable success in public life, I do not like to see him make initial mistakes. As age is reckoned in politics, my hon. friend is young—not too young. I consider it an advantage in a public man, in no matter what position, or how high that position may be, to be comparatively young because young men profit by their mistakes and old men never do. My hon. friend will recall the criticism which was passed upon the right hon. Mr. Gladstone, I think by Lord Salisbury. Lord Salisbury said that Mr. Gladstone was an old man in a hurry. There is some excuse for an old man being in a hurry because he is near the end of his years politically and physically, but there is not the same excuse for a young man being in a hurry, and that brings me to the amendment which has been moved by the leader of the Opposition, and which seems to me upon the face of it to indicate that my hon. friend is in a hurry. He says he wants an election. He says to the Government, in so many words: You are incompetent; you are disorganized; your mandate has expired; your Prime Minister is sick and absent from his duties; this is not a representative Parliament; I challenge the Government to an election.

That is a bold defy on the face of it. My hon. friend says he is in earnest about it. But when he uses the word "earnest" I think he must use it in the Pickwickian sense. If I believed that my hon. friend was in earnest in moving this amendment, and that he really desired an election, I should be filled with admiration for his temerity because as I estimate public opinion in this country there is nothing in an election for the hon. gentleman or his followers. But the hon. gentleman says he wants an election.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: An hon. gentleman says "hear, hear,"—well, there is a great difference between asking for an election which you know the Government is going to deny you and asking for an election which you are sure to get. There is as much difference as there is between a make-believe lion and a real lion. There is a great deal more danger and risk, Mr. Speaker, in confronting a real lion than there is facing a make-believe lion. And, as a result of this amendment, my hon. friend and his followers in this House get all the exhilaration of courage without any of its attendant risks.

Now that my hon. friend has put forward the amendment, and it has become the subject of debate, I purpose briefly to examine the case for an election at this time. Is there any duty or obligation resting upon the Government to ask for a dissolution of Parliament? What is the position? A little over two years ago there was an election in Canada and this Government was returned by one of the most decisive and overwhelming majorities in the history of the Dominion. There are three years of the Constitutional term yet unexpired. What has occurred, what is the condition either in this House or in the country, that makes it an obligation upon this Government or upon the Prime Minister to ask His Excellency the Governor General to dissolve this Parliament and appeal to the country?

This Government was elected, constitutionally speaking, in precisely the same manner as any other Government that has ever held power in Canada and no criticism can be directed at the Prime Minister if he continues to carry on, as I think it his bounden duty to carry on, so long as he can control a majority in this House,—and I hope it will be shown decisively to-morrow night when the vote is taken that the Government is able, and will continue to be able, to command a majority of this House. I go farther, Mr. Speaker, and I say that if there were any danger that the vote of this House would bring about a dissolution, I would anticipate that some members of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition would absent themselves in order that it might not occur. That is the difference between a make-believe lion of an amendment calling for a dissolution and a real lion of enforced dissolution.

It has been put forward that the Government has no mandate. I never was one of those who attached much importance to the question of a mandate, nor has much importance been attached to that subject by those who have been in charge of the Governments of this country since Confederation. In every election, or nearly every election, there is a national issue upon which the public pronounce at the polls. Legislation dealing with the subject matter of the issue is usually introduced immediately by the new Government but after such legislation has been dealt with, does any one seriously put forward the contention that, the Government having exhausted its mandate, has again to appeal to the country in order to deal with the problems which arise during the balance of the period for which the Parliament was elected?

In 1878 the issue was the National Policy. Legislation was introduced early in 1879, and carried through Parliament, implementing the policy which had been approved by the people and Sir John A. Macdonald and his Government continued to carry on. He did not consider that because the National Policy question had been dealt with by a revision of the tariff, the mandate of the Government was exhausted and that he must go to the country for a fresh mandate.

In 1896 the two issues before the people were the Manitoba School Question and the Tariff, the first being the more important. Did the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier—after the Manitoba School Question was adjusted and after the Tariff had been revised, as it was by the then Minister of Finance, take the view, or would he have accepted the contention, that his mandate was exhausted, and that he was not to continue during the balance of the term of the Parliament to deal with the national problems as they presented themselves. No, he continued to carry on till 1900. Similarly in the election of 1904 the issue was the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. But after that was disposed of by the legislation of the first session of the Parliament that was then elected, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his Government continued to carry on until 1908 as they had a perfect right to do, and more than that, as, in my opinion, it was their bounden duty to do.

One reason for a five year parliamentary term, a fairly lengthy period, is that the country may not continually experience the turmoil of general elections. There is nothing more disturbing to the trade, and industry, and tranquility of the country than general elections at too frequent intervals.

Yet the claim is made by some hon. gentlemen that this Parliament is not representative. I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that never was there in Canada a more representative Parliament than the present one. Was there ever a general election in Canada in which the majorities were larger, or in which public opinion was more unmistakably behind the policies which were placed before the people by the Prime Minister, the members of his Government, and those on this side of the House? So far, therefore, as the constitutional question is concerned we may dismiss it; there is no constitutional question involved. It is the duty of the Prime Minister and his Government to carry on in accordance with their mandate until such time as in the discretion and judgment of the Prime Minister, he feels it proper to advise His Excellency that there should be a dissolution, or, until the Government sustains a defeat in this House.

It has been said that the Franchise Act was not fair legislation. I do not agree with that, but let us give that contention some weight. Then, remember that supposing that not a single vote of the soldiers overseas had been polled the result would not have been essentially different. The individual majorities were too large to make a difference, they ran into the thousands where in ordinary times they would run into hundreds only. And even if you eliminate every woman's vote the result would have been the same. The fact is that at the last general election public opinion in Canada was overwhelming behind the determination of the Prime Minister, and the members of his Government, and the candidates throughout the country, to command the entire resources of the Dominion and place them behind our military effort overseas.

There never was a more decisive result, and there never was a clearer mandate, and in that connection let me say this: That if any one will take the trouble to read the manifesto of the Prime Minister at the time of that election he will find that the mandate was not only for the war, but it was also to deal with the problems arising out of the war. We have many of those problems with us to-day and we shall have them for years to come. I should consider that the Government had entirely misinterpreted the verdict of the people at the last election if they considered for one moment, and I know they are not, a dissolution and an appeal to the country at this time.

Then the contention is advanced that the Government has been incompetent. Well, if I had not been used to political debates during the past eight years, if I thought that that charge was put forward seriously and not as a mere partisan contention, I would feel like dismissing it with contempt. The old Conservative Government under Sir Robert Borden, the Union Government that succeeded that Government under Sir Robert incompetent! Mr. Speaker, we are too close to this war and its events to realize policies and measures in their true light; but I say that when the history of the war is written and when the bearing of policies and actions are seen in truer proportion than they are to-day, it will be the verdict that no Prime Minister ever deserved more of Canada than did Sir Robert Borden, and that no Government has been more efficient or anything like as efficient, as the Government under him. And, Sir, when I say that I do not except even the Fathers of Confederation.

Why, Mr. Speaker, looking back over the five years and the tempest through which the world has passed and through which we have passed, and considering the mighty effort that we in this country put forth under the direction and supervision and on the initiative of the Government, was there ever a more glorious tradition upon which to found the enduring edifice of a political party than the work of the last five years? Take the old Conservatives, and the Liberals who joined them at the crisis of the war—I do not believe there ever was a group of men who could look back to a greater or nobler tradition of patriotic and efficient service.

I do not intend to speak of the achievements of the Government during the war. That has been most admirably done in this debate by a much more competent and eloquent man than I—I allude to the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) and I congratulate him upon his occupying that elevated position. The Government in this House is not lacking in able leadership anyway. Why, gentlemen, the Acting Prime Minister was eloquent before some of us could speak at all.

I purpose, Mr. Speaker, to say a word, but only in general terms, with regard to what the Government has accomplished since the Armistice, because the criticism is directed against the Government as it is to-day and not so much against the Government as it was during the war. Well, look back to the Armistice of 1918, and consider the measures that have been taken since to promote prosperity and to stabilize industry,—and consider also the successful loans which have been made. Do you know of any country, Mr. Speaker, that is in better case than Canada to-day? Social unrest, industrial unrest—how do we compare with the other countries of the world; how do we compare with Great Britain, with France,—even with the United States, which, having regard to her population and resources put forth only a tithe of the effort of Canada and where to-day the relations between Capital and Labour, between rich and poor, are such as to cause the gravest apprehension among thinking men of the Republic?

What do we find in Canada? A certain amount of unrest undoubtedly—a considerable part of it psychological. Does anybody suppose that a nation can go through the mighty strain of a war, with all its tragic incidents, bereavements and poignant suffering without a nervous reaction? But take the situation in Canada and contrast it with that which exists in any other belligerant country—I care not which you select—and we have the best position in the world to-day. Mr. Speaker, we all remember Bairnsfather's cartoon, and I say that if any one in this House or in this country thinks that he knows of a "a better 'ole" than Canada, why, let him go to it;—he will soon be disillusionized.

Now, is the Government to get no credit for all this? Supposing instead of this situation which I have pictured—and not overstated—supposing that you had commercial depression, unemployment, and civil disorders, what attitude would my good friends opposite be taking with regard to the Government? Why, they would visit all the blame upon the Government, rightly or wrongly; there is no doubt about that. Well, is the Government to get no credit for the opposite condition of things? I say that this Government is "carrying on" most capably at the present time, and I say further that no Government in any self-governing country has a more creditable record than the Government of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, not only during the war but since the Armistice, and down to the present moment.

What weighty question is there, Mr. Speaker, that cannot be dealt with by the Government of to-day and by this House? Are there problems more weighty, more intricate, more difficult of solution, than those which arose during the war? There could not be. There are difficult problems, but they are not as difficult and they are not as many as those which were dealt with successfully during the war. It is said that the Government is disorganized, that some of its members have retired. Well, that is not an extraordinary thing. Mr. Speaker, in how many countries have ministers holding important portfolios retained them through the entire war? How many have broken down with the responsibility—continuous, obsessive, the immense responsibility of war which puts a man always to the test for there is no side-stepping; questions must be faced and dealt with, and there is no relief or relaxation. Survey the Governments of the Overseas Dominions and of Great Britain and of France, and how many ministers do you find in office now who were in office when the war broke out in 1914? I shall not labour the point; the House knows the situation as well as I.

But if the Government is "carrying on" capably to-day, and has carried on capably since the Armistice, and has lost so many members, then, Mr. Speaker, what must we say of the excellence of the Government of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden when it could lose so many capable members and still be as efficient as it is to day? You all remember the story of Abraham Lincoln. He had great confidence in General Grant, who was the most successful General of the Northern armies, and who finally brought the Civil War to a conclusion. But General Grant had enemies and they informed the president that General Grant was a heavy drinker. The slow, wise Lincoln said: "What brand of whiskey does he drink; I want it for the rest of my Generals." What brand of men had the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden during the war if he can afford to lose so many and still put up such a front bench as we see to-day?

Now, Mr. Speaker, in my view the great need in this country to-day, politically speaking, is stability of administration. The people do not want an election. What they want is to be assured that this Administration will carry on the affairs of Government and leave them to give attention to their own private and business affairs. Our people do not want an election that will throw the entire country into turmoil. My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, says—and I put forward his contention; it is not mine—"Let us have an election." Now, my hon. friend knows perfectly well that neither he nor those who follow him would have any chance whatever on an appeal to the country. He does not want the Government or those on this side of the House to be returned. Then what does he want? He must desire to have introduced the "group" system in this House.

There is always a national objection, and a serious one, to an election held after a great war and while the public mind is disturbed, and I will tell you why. In the first place, a war makes great demands upon classes as such and upon groups as such. You call upon the farmers; you call upon the manufacturers; you call upon labour; you call upon all the classes of the community by name, and it makes them self-conscious. There is a class-consciousness developed in time of war that is not developed in time of peace. More than that, every class and every group has its problems, its difficulties its grievances; and the result is that if you have an election immediately following a war you do not get what you ought to get in a general election—you do not get a verdict upon a question from the national standpoint; you get a verdict from the standpoint of the classes voting in their own interests. Now, that is precisely the thing that is to be avoided. I cannot imagine anything worse for Canada or for any other country than that groups throughout the country should think in terms of their own group interests and not in terms of the national interest, which should be the supreme interest at all times.

What advantage would a group system be in this House, as compared with the present system? If Government were to be carried on there would have to be continuous coalitions. Even if they did not carry on, you would have further group representation as the result of the next election. In other words, you would have precisely the situation that existed in the old province of Canada, when successive coalitions resulted in so much turmoil that Confederation became absolutely necessary to the life of the country.

No election should be held until the public mind has steadied down; and it is steadying down nicely. One can see a reaction from the extreme views of a year ago. The people of this country are sound in head and at heart. They want to go about their daily avocations. They want security for their persons and their property. They do not care two straws for individual political ambitions; they want stability of Government to enable them to go about their business and work in their own and in the national interest. Why, the result of a series of coalition Governments brought about by a group system of representation in this House would result in chaos in the administraion of the country's affairs. That is the reason why at the last election, as I have pointed out, the Prime Minister's manifesto was not only for the war; if any one will take the trouble to read it he will see that it was also for the period necessary to deal with the problems arising out of the war. The mandate that the Government has from the people, rather than its being exhausted, is unfulfilled. If the Government is to live up to its obligations to the people and to the trust reposed in it at the last election, the Government must, as I know it will, carry on.

Speaking of the reaction that has taken place, the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) said the other day that what Canada needed was a "National Progressive Party." Well, Mr. Speaker, we have hitherto had two historic parties in this country —I have never found that third parties were long-lived; they are not in keeping with our constitutional system. I say this to the Government and to members on this side of the House: if Sir Robert Borden will form a National Liberal-Conservative Party, consisting of the old Conservative party and the members of the Liberal party who joined him in the great issue which was before us in 1917, and who think alike on national, including fiscal, questions, he will sweep the country.

How long have third parties lasted, in Canada, in the United States, or in any other country? They are creatures only of the moment; they are bound to coalesce in time with one or other of the parties. You cannot work out the British constitution unless you have a bi-party system in which there is continuing responsibility on the part of the two great parties. You may have three parties for a time, but you will not have them permanently. There is this difference between a system of government under two great parties and a system in which there is a third party—and this has been the case in Canada—the two great parties have considered always the national interest as opposed to class or group interest.

Now, I desire to say a word or two with regard to an important and very widespread movement which has attracted a great deal of attention in this country—the "Farmers' Movement," so-called. I desire to refer to it only to the extent of making a complaint—and it is a complaint which might be put forward just as well by hon. gentlemen opposite as by hon. gentlemen on this side. The complaint is that there has been misrepresentation addressed to the farming population of Canada as to the attitude of the two historic parties in this country towards the farmers. I have read literature and I have heard speeches in which it was affirmed that both political parties had betrayed the farmers of Canada. I say that is not true. It is not true of the Liberals; it is not true of the Conservatives? Why should it be true? Putting it on the narrowest possible ground, that of political expediency, why should either Liberals or Conservatives betray the farmers, who comprise over fifty per cent of our population? Putting it on that lowest possible ground, would it be in their interest to do so? On the contrary, no interests have been held in higher regard or importance by both political parties than the interests of the farmers of Canada. This side of the case has never been put before the farmers; we have all been too busy during the war. But I hope that in any political discussions which take place throughout the country that point will be cleared up and the farmers told the true facts. While I say that neither Liberals nor Conservatives betrayed the farmers, I say also—and so far as this Government is concerned I speak with some knowledge, having been a member of it for eight years—that no Government since Confederation has done so much for the farming community as the Government which has been in power since 1911. I can prove it by figures which I have in my possession, and which I hope the Government will place before the House when the agricultural Estimates are being considered. Before the war, from 1911 to 1914, the old Conservative Government bestowed far greater attention and spent yearly upon agriculture double or treble the amount—as a matter of fact, the figures are between the two—which was spent in the years preceding the time we took office. I go further than that and say that the figures show that since 1911, including the period of the war and not taking into account agricultural credits, more money has been spent for the purpose of promoting and aiding agriculture than was spent by all Governments from the period of Confederation down to 1911.

Have we neglected the farmers? Why should we? Theirs is the basic industry, as has always been recognized on both sides of this House, and parties have actually vied with each other in measures taken to promote and encourage agriculture in this country. It is a slander to say that the farming industry of Canada has been betrayed by either political party.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) said on Friday: I am going to vote for the amendment, as it means a vote of want of confidence in the Government; and I have no confidence in the Government. Well, that is entirely within his rights. He mentioned tariff and he mentioned finance. I shall deal with both of those subjects later on, but I desire to say to him—and I hope he will look the matter up—that the Government which has been in power since 1911 has, even with respect to the tariff—and hon. members know the criticism which has been visited upon us with respect to the tariff—made material and even great reductions in regard to all the implements of agricultural production as compared with what was done by the Government which he supported in 1911. He was loyal to that Government, and none of us find any objection in that; but from the tariff standpoint, he could refrain from voting for any want of confidence motion with regard to them, but with regard to us who have paid more attention to the special part of the tariff in which the West is particularly interested, he votes in favour of a want of confidence motion.

Let us consider the question of credits during the war. How much do you think, Sir, we raised and were glad to raise for the purpose of finding the money with which Great Britain and the Allies could buy the farm products of Canada? $300,000,000 was raised for the purpose of enabling them to buy our cheese, our wheat, our agricultural products of all kinds. Armchair critics like, after the event, to talk about the ease with which we raised money. Those who went through the war, those who bore the burden and heat of the day, who worked by day and who did not always sleep by night—those men know something of the difficulties of financing the war, or, for that matter, of carrying on during the war, the activities of any great department. I have said in this House many times that I stand for the National Policy. As Minister of Finance, subscribing to the National Policy which was adopted in its principles by the Liberal Party when they came into power in 1896, I was able to make these reductions in the tariff, because the National Policy is not a matter of fixed tariff schedules; it is a vital principle adapting itself to the necessities of the nation from 4 p.m. time to time and capable of such modification as is necessary or desirable in the national interest. I am not going to go into the tariff at this time. I hope I shall have an opportunity of speaking upon it in the Budget debate; but I say this—and it should be said all through the Dominion of Canada—you cannot intelligently consider or deal with the tariff of this country unless you have regard to the national interest as well as to the economic interest.

I was sorry when the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) left the Government—he was such a good fellow. I was sorry to see him, like a bull moose, as it were, taking to the tall timber, and I could not help thinking at the time, with a pang almost of sorrow, that the life of a bull moose in a state of nature or in the realm of politics, is almost sure to end in tragedy—I mean, of course, political tragedy in the case of the hon. member. But I was sorry to see him go, because I liked all the members of the Union Government. I never worked with any group of men with greater satisfaction in my life, and I certainly did not like to see any of them, so to speak, get away. I do not, as I have said, purpose discussing the tariff at this time; but the hon. member for Marquette has touched upon it, and I am somewhat surprised to find that his position has apparently been considerably modified since he made his political tour through Canada. I read some of his speeches, and as I understood him, the tariff was the most iniquitous thing in the world, and he purposed abolishing it root and branch. His policy was thorough. Why, I have read economics, and Adam Smith, John Stuart Mill, and Cobden, were mild in their statements as compared with those which I read in the press as being the opinions of the hon. member for Marquette. Now, he says in this House: No, I do not intend completely to root out the tariff; I do not purpose doing that by "one fell stroke"—that is his expression. He is going to prolong the agony. He did not say that he believed in any gradual decrease in the tariff, but he said that he did not purpose abolishing it all at once. I am sure the House and the country will be thankful for small mercies; and if my hon. friend becomes Prime Minister of this country, I hope he will not, as he says, abolish the tariff all at one fell stroke. I am glad, however, that he has somewhat modified his views, although I should like to know which set of views he really holds. because there does appear to me to be something inconsistent between holding one set of views when speaking to the people of Canada outside this House and another set of views when speaking to the members in this House. Let me say this to my hon. friend: The people of this country will not tolerate any Government with a fiscal policy that regards the tariff only as a means of raising revenue, and disregards the tariff as an instrument, as it has been and will continue to be, for the development of the resources of this country, and the maintenance and stability of our industries in Canada. Let the matter be debated, as I hope it will be debated, before the farmers of this country. I know the farmers of my own province and of my constituency at all events, and I say that the farmers will be the first to subscribe to the doctrine I have enunciated. They have been misled; they have heard only one side of this question, and I shall be greatly disappointed if they do not hear the other side in the course of the next few months. If they do not hear it within the near future, they will hear it at all events on the occasion of the next election. Is the farmer of Ontario going to vote for a policy that will deprive him of his markets immediately at hand in Toronto, and in Hamilton, and in our other great industrial centres which we have built up? Is he by his vote going to deprive himself of those certain markets in favour of the precarious markets of the United States, which can be closed to him at any time by the capricious action of Congress at any of its sessions? Why, Mr. Speaker, it was for the farmer—and I remember it distinctly, although I was but a boy at the time—it was for the farmer as well as for the manufacturer that the National Policy of Canada was established, and the principle was recognized and acted upon by the Liberals when they came into power in 1896. I know it, because I supported the Liberals at that time.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Let me ask my hon. friend from Marquette this question: Does he think that the workmen of this country by their votes are going to deprive themselves of employment and expatriate themselves and their families? If we come to any such conclusion as that, I think we are putting a low estimate upon the intelligence of the industrial classes of this country. There may be a few exceptions, but I see no reason why the principle I have mentioned cannot be maintained in our tariff, and that tariff be made acceptable to almost all hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

Now I come to my hon. friend the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) for whom I have always had, as he knows, a warm spot in my Irish heart, although he made a rather violent attack upon me the other day. Well, I have been so long in public life, and have been a member of the Government here when we had real politics and good old-time partisan fighting that I do not mind that a bit; but I want to set him right, and I hope he will permit me to take up the arguments which he put forward and which are entitled to weight, and to the respect of all in this House, and then to put the other side before the House and the country for their consideration, for there is always the other side. My hon. friend made one sweeping statement. He said to my friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton): "Let me give you some advice. Do just the opposite to what your predecessor did, and you will come along all right." Whether the Minister of Finance will take that advice or not, I do not know. He is an intelligent man, and no doubt he will think over it and appraise it at its true value. My hon. friend from Red Deer in that one sentence arraigned my entire financial administration. Mr. Speaker, I believe the financial administration of the Dominion of Canada during the war and that administration was not singular or unique among the activities of the Government, for all my colleagues did admirable work—was such, and the condition in which Canada found itself at the end of the war has been such as to stir the admiration of Great Britain and the United States and prove acceptable to the great majority of the people of this country. So if the Minister of Finance takes the advice of my hon. friend, he may run the risk of incurring the opposite of the admiration of which I have spoken. The hon. member for Red Deer says: The ex-Minister of Finance did not take my advice. So far as I know, the members of no Government, Liberal or Conservative, have taken his advice. He was giving advice to the Liberal Government prior to 1911, but they never acted upon it. He was putting forward precisely the same arguments then, and he was not voting want of confidence in that Administration as he is to-day in this Government.

My hon. friend's criticism of my Administration runs along three main lines. First, he said, your financial policy was unsound. Well, I believe in a verdict founded on results, and I purpose briefly to take up with the House the question of the aims of Canadian finance during the war, and to consider how successful or unsuccessful we were. I shall deal with the subject only in a general way. We had to find money for the conduct of the war, and our finance was so directed that we also found the money which furnished the necessary credits for the purchase in this country of our agricultural and manufactured products. In other words, the finance of this country was absolutely basic to its prosperity during the war. Without successful finance we could not have maintained our men overseas; we could not have the country in that condition of prosperity which was essential if our war effort was to be adequately supported at home, and which would leave Canada in a position to meet whatever vicissitudes in the way of depression that might come in the aftermath of the war.

One policy which I endeavoured to follow during the war was to maintain confidence. Were there any panics in Canada during the war? As a result of the action which we took from the first day of the war there was supreme confidence as to our financial institutions, and as the war went on and our business increased and prosperity came to the people, the results of our war finance were apparent, and there never was a time during the entire war when there was the slightest sign of lack of confidence in this country, financially speaking.

We appealed to the people, to the farmers, to produce all they could; we appealed to manufacturers to produce all they could and we appealed to those who made munitions to produce all they could. It was all for the purpose of the war. But some one says to me: "Why did you not take away all the money that the farmers made, all the money that the manufacturers made and all the money that the munition manufacturers made?" We had a voluntary system up to 1917. Supposing we had appealed to the farmers to produce all they could for the armies overseas and the civilian population behind them, supposing we had asked the manufacturers to produce all they could and had asked the munition manufacturers to turn out all the munitions they could and, at the same time, suppose we had told them that we were going to take away all their profits? They are a pretty patriotic lot of men. I ask this House—you are all sensible business men—would you have got the same production in the country and in the factory that you did get? You would not.

Further than that if you took away all the money that the producing classes had made, or the greater part of it, what position would those classes be in should there come the depression which always follows war? It was part of my policy as Finance Minister to so supervise the business of this country and to adopt such measures that the prosperity of the country would be maintained during the war and that our farmers and our other producers should be left in a position in which they could face whatever depression might confront them in the period succeeding the war.

Does anybody mean to tell me that the soldiers would be any better off, or the industrial population of Canada any better off, if the employers of labour throughout the country had been stripped of their resources and were unable to take risks at this time when men have to take risks in view of the keen competition which must be experienced once the war is at an end? We maintained confidence and we promoted the prosperity of the country. We desired, as I said in a dozen speeches, to have the business of the agricultural, industrial and commercial community in such a position that they could meet a period of depression if it should come,—and periods of depression always come after war, not immediately, but some time after. Would the situation be any better to-day if the farmers of Canada had not paid off so many mortgages, or if they had all their old mortgages and were putting on more?

There are many questions in war finance that do not appear on the surface. What was Pitt's war finance? Pitt's war finance was to support the war and promote prosperity at home. A monument was erected to him by the merchants of London because he did it. I am quite content to be charged with having so promoted the finances of this country as to maintain stability and confidence, to leave our financial institutions sound and our business industries and agricultural interests in such a condition that they can face whatever the future has to offer.

My hon. friend says: "You made loans in New York." Of course I made loans in New York. What was the effect of making loans in New York? In the first place, my hon. friend is entirely wrong in his statement—at least in the spirit of his statement—that it increased the industrial activity of the United States, that we imported in goods what we borrowed there. Practically that is the case but all the loans which we made in New York were only a fraction of our imports of necessities from the United States. Where does my hon. friend think the proceeds of the New York loans went in so far as we are concerned? I will tell him. The proceeds of these New York loans went, among other things, to assist the British Government to buy goods in Canada. If we had not been able to finance in the United States, if we had not had this alternative market until the United States entered the war, we should not have been able to have provided credits to the extent which we did for the sale of Canada's produce and manufactured goods.

Not only this, but these New York loans stabilized finance as between the two countries. If it were practicable for the Minister of Finance to-day to make a loan in New York, what would be the effect on the exchange situation? We pegged exchange during the war. The Minister of Finance cannot do that to-day. He is at a disadvantage. But we pegged exchange in New York during the war at a point and a half or two points. Yet my hon. friend blames me for having made loans in New York. What has he to say of Great Britain whom he admires so greatly and justly? Did they make any loans in New York? They sent $1,300,000,000 of gold through my office, the greatest transaction in gold in the history of the world, to New York. They sold $3,000,000,000 worth of securities in New York and they made loan after loan amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars secured by collateral which they gathered up in London and which was acceptable to American investors. They poured out their treasure in New York for the supreme purpose of winning the war by levying upon the material resources of the United States. Up to the time the United States entered the war the British Government used hundreds of millions of dollars of the money I have spoken of, raised by loan or sale in New York, and spent it in this country for our products.

Then, take it from the exchange standpoint. I have said to the House that our financing in New York stabilized our exchange. It was a good thing to do. We did not permit extravagance at that time because we had an embargo against luxuries, because we had a food controller, and because the people of this country were denying themselves in order that more food might go overseas. It was not a period in which we had great importations of luxuries as compared with the present time; the loans were sound if for no other purpose than to stabilize exchange. Does my hon. friend controvert that? Then let me tell him what Great Britain did, because I worked in the closest harmony and co-operation with the Mother Country during the war. In one year, 1916, the year before the United States entered the war, Great Britain used one thousand million dollars of American exchange to peg sterling exchange and keep it up. If Great Britain had not supported sterling exchange where would it have been during the war? It would have been lower than it is to-day My hon. friend is on bad ground when he talks about our borrowing in New York. My hon. friend says: Your currency is inflated. It is less inflated than the currency of any country in the world; less inflated than that of the United States now—which, as I stated, if regard be had to her population and resources, did not put a tenth of Canada's effort into the war—she had not the opportunity, she was not in long enough. Will my hon. friend look at our gold reserves. Let him look at the gold reserve of the Federal Reserve Bank; let him look at the gold reserve of the Bank of England

—there is not much to look at—and then criticize the Government of Canada for inflating the currency. We have got one of the best currency situations in the world to-day, and there is not a financial man in Canada, in the United States, or in England that does not know it.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Can the hon. gentleman give the House any idea of what the percentage increase of our currency is over what it was the year before the war?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I cannot offhand but the Minister of Finance can give that information without any difficulty. I placed it on Hansard last year in my Budget speech.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Surely my hon. friend has some idea of that most elementary question in his own department.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend will get the details in due course but the statement that I have made is correct. My recollection is that it was forty per cent of the gold reserve in Canada.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: My question is: What was the percentage of the increase of the currency of Canada over what it was the year before the war?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It does not compare with the circulation of either the British Government or the Bank of England. My hon. friend should look up the facts when he speaks upon this question.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I am looking.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Now my hon. friend (Mr. Clark) also touched upon the tariff. I am not sure whether it was he, or the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) who referred to the fact which has been put forward on more than one occasion to the farmers of this country, that on account of our policy the farmers have moved from Canada. I ask the hon. gentleman where are the farmers who would have been in Canada but for our policy? I ask the hon. gentleman did those who left the farms of Canada to go to the United States engage in agriculture, and if so how many of them? You will find the cities over there full of Canadians who went seeking industrial, commercial and financial opportunities, where they have done exceptionally well; but it seems to me it would be a wise policy on the part of this country to bring about such a development of the industries and the commerce and finances of Canada, as to keep those men at home in the work in which they desire to engage. Because men have varied talents. How many men in this country are farmers? A large percentage, it is true. But farmers' sons have various talents. One is a skilled mechanic, another will make a soldier, another a professional man, and so on. How are you going to prevent the farmers of this country from giving their sons that opportunity if they so desire? All that is involved in this question.

Now my hon. friend says: Oh, but your domestic loans. He shakes his head over our domestic loans and says there is plenty of money in the country. So there is. But does the hon. gentleman think that the loan which was floated last Fall could have been floated in 1914? Will he look at the bank credits of Canada now and compare them with the situation before the war, and will he tell me we could have floated a Victory Loan in 1914? No, we could not; the money was not in the country. What was the result of the floating of our Victory Loans, broadly speaking? Every loan a success. But for that our banks would have had to take the securities as they did in New York. That is one of the difficulties down there at the present time. Those banks had to take too many of the securities because the interest rate was too low. Three thousand million dollars the financial institutions in New York took that they did not want. It is the function of a bank not to buy securities but to loan on securities. We finished the war with a perfectly clean financial situation. None of the banks owned bonds that they did not desire to own and the amount owned was very small. It was a perfectly healthy situation because our loans had been distributed all over Canada among probably two or three millions of people. They are the bond holders of Canada; they have got that stake as well as other stakes in the community. What about our securities, and from a market standpoint? No country in the world—including Great Britain that my hon. friend so properly holds up as an example—where the Victory Loan securities stood at par, or above, at the end of the war except Canada—not one. In the United States, 90-92. How did the bond owners feel all over the country? I would like to have all the bond holders of Canada here that took Victory Loans but you could not gather them in Ottawa, the place is too small—one million and a half and two millions of them. Yet my hon. friend gets up and contends we should have put the loans out at such a figure they would be down to 90 now, instead of par where my tax-free bonds are. That is not good politics even. The public in this country that have bought Government bonds like to see those bonds stand up in the market. Because they need money from time to time they want to realize, and they do not want to realize at a loss. Take the insurance companies that represent the interest not only of stockholders but policy holders. Supposing in the United States they wrote down their securities to the market value? In this country they can show them the market value and there is no loss to policy holders of insurance companies who took tens of millions of dollars of our securities. At the close of the war Canada was in a position to say: The public of this country subscribed enough money to send 500,000 soldiers overseas and to fight thousands of miles from their base; to provide the necessary credits for the purchase of our agricultural and other products; and at the end of the war our banks had no securities, had made loans upon securities to only a limited amount, and our securities stood above par on our stock exchange. I will rest my reputation upon that statement before this House and before posterity.

Why, Mr. Speaker, we appealed to the public to save. By a publicity campaign, by direct personal appeal, by every proper method we asked our people, rich and poor, to save their money and give it to the Government in return for our securities; we took possession of the securities marketed in Canada and would not allow issues to be made except for essential purposes; we shut luxuries out of Canada by Order in Council; through our bond houses and our banks we discouraged the purchase of Anglo-French and other securities in New York in order that all the money of Canada might be available for the purposes of our loan; and we appealed through our Victory Loan organization— the greatest organization ever put together by any country during the war —from the Atlantic to the Pacific for subscriptions to our loan. No Minister of Finance ever had such an instrument as that Victory Loan organization, which, with the patriotism of our people, made those great loans a success.

Now, my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) says, "You made the bonds tax-free." Unhappily for him he has taken a particularly unfortunate time to put that argument forward. It would have seemed more weighty last year than this. Last Fall we put out a taxable loan, whereas before our loans had been tax-free. The responsibility for that is upon the Government, and the credit, if any, for it, is due to the Government. In July of last year, before leaving office, I called together the leading members of the Victory Loan organization and the best bond experts in Canada and asked them to determine, among other things, whether we should put out a taxable or a tax-free loan, telling them that if it could be done, I would prefer the taxable issue. The situation had cleared a great deal since the war, our securities were all selling on a better basis, and we came to the conclusion that we should try the taxable issue. There was some dissent on the part of a few of the ablest bond experts. They said, "You will get the loan out, but we are a little doubtful as to whether you can hold it out, because it is a little out of scale with the price of securities to-day, and those which we expect will prevail." My successor, Sir Henry Drayton, who threw himself with great energy and enthusiasm and ability into the campaign, was able, I am glad to say, to make a great success of that Victory Loan. To-day the securities of the taxable loan are 96 and 97; the securities of the tax-free loan are at or slightly above par. In other words, the advantage of the tax-free privilege is a real market factor, which brings about a constant buying power in the country, which in turn tends to keep your market right.

Now, I say further to the hon. member for Red Deer that on his assumption—in which I do not agree, and I will state the reason later—that on his assumption if we had put out all the loans—$2,000,000,000 of securities—on a taxable basis, instead as we did most of them on a tax-free basis, all the Victory Loan securities to-day would be at 90 or lower, for there is no market situation to sustain them. What has happened the last few months is this, and it throws a little light on the question of exchange—which I am coming to a little later—spoken of by the hon. member for Red Deer in terms rather derogatory to myself: Our exchange has gone down compared with the United States'; but Great Britain's exchange is lower. Unless my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) had taken the steps which he recently took, Great Britain would sell back to us or would offer in our markets the securities of our municipalities,—of our provinces, the securities guaranteed by the Dominion and by the provinces that we sold to her years ago and which have been years overseas—she would have sold and continued to sell those here until our exchange dropped to the level of sterling exchange; that is what would have happened.

I told my hon. friend what would have happened on his theory that we put out 5½% taxable bonds during the war. Now I will tell him that we could not have done it even if we desired to do so. There are two essentials, Mr. Speaker, which a Finance Minister must consider when he is putting out a loan, and he makes a great mistake if he overlooks either. In the first place, he must get his money—the offering must be a success; and, in the second place, he must consider the market situation after the loan, especially if he is going back for another loan. You have got to look a little further than the end of your nose in public finance where you are offering large loans which, to a certain extent, are taken on the inspiration of patriotism. I might at the start have put out a 5½% Victory Loan taxable, and the public would have taken, not as much as I got, but a very substantial amount,—although I know we could not have got anything like the amount we did get because those skilled in investments could have bought scores of securities of the highest quality in New York to yield as high as 7, 8 and 9%, among others the Anglo-French loan backed by the credit of Great Britain and France.

Supposing I had put the first loan out taxable at 5½%, the trouble is it would not stay out, it would keep coming back, and if I desired to stabilize the market I should have had to pay out tens of millions of dollars to keep that loan up, so that when I went back to the public my loans would get the reception which our subsequent loans were accorded, because my loans were as a matter of fact stabilized. I say to my hon. friend from Red Deer, and that there is not a financial man in this country of high standing who will contradict me, that if we had put out taxable loans during the war we would have finished the war on a 6½ instead of a 5½% basis. What would have been the result? My successor would have his interest charges increased in respect to the debt of from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000, and he would not have got one fraction of that amount back from the comparatively few people in the country who derive a substantial advantage from purchasing the tax-free bonds. My hon. friend might say, "Well, I would rather that the Dominion Government should have to pay $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 more annually rather than A, B and C, wealthy men, should be able to buy tax-free bonds and not pay the full amount of taxation called for by the legislation of this Parliament." Well, I would not. You have got to look at this thing as a whole. Any Finance Minister looks at his balance sheet, he wants to get his best result there; and that is what we got.

It is often put forward that a man with an income of say, $11,000 derived from $200,000 of tax-free bonds, does not pay any income tax. Neither does he. But what could he do? He could do what men are doing to-day, buy municipal and provincial and Dominion guaranteed 6½ and 7% securities, and pay his tax and still have more than $11,000 income. I admit that when the income derived is above $25,000, $30,000 or $40,000 a year there is a considerable advantage to those who buy tax-free bonds. But that advantage is negligible as compared with the saving of from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000 a year which I contend has been effected in the balance sheet of this Dominion by reason of our having floated loans at 5½ instead of 6½ per cent.

My hon. friend says that the lowering of the credit of Canada is due to faulty administration of finances. Now, that is a very sweeping statement. Is the lowering of the pound sterling due to faulty action of the British Treasury? What is the world situation in exchange to-day, brought about by the war? The Italian lira, corresponding with the French franc, at 6 cents; the French franc at eight cents; the German mark at one cent; the pound sterling was as low as 3.30 as compared with $4.86⅔, the par of exchange. One third of the pound sterling wiped off—the pound sterling, to which before the war all the currencies of the world touched their hats. Is the British Treasury to blame because its exchange is at a discount with that of the United States? My hon. friend failed to observe that the British pound is at a discount with the Canadian dollar. The Canadian dollar is down 15 per cent; the pound sterling is down 30 per cent. My hon. friend says that it is the free trade policy of England that has brought about the exchange situation which confronts her to-day.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): My hon. friend cannot produce an extract from my speech showing that I said that. I did not make any such remark.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Well, I accept my hon. friend's correction. That, undoubtedly, was the impression he gave. He did say that the lowering of our credit—I think I am quoting his precise words—is due to faulty action of the Finance Department. Why is not the lowering of the British exchange to a greater degree due to faulty action of the free trade Government of England? Now, let me say this for my hon. friend's comfort—

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Is that a question?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, it is a rhetorical question? Let me say this for his comfort; free trade has nothing whatever to do with it, one way or the other. It is the war that has brought about a lowering in the value of the British pound sterling, just as it has brought about a fall in the Canadian exchange. If we had free trade here to-day it could not improve our exchange situation; it could only aggregate it. Would our exchange be any better than it is to-day if there were no tariff in this country; if goods were coming in from the United States under a free trade policy?

An hon. MEMBER: No.

An hon. MEMBER: Worse.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Worse,—I should say it would be worse. Economic laws show clearly that it would be worse, because on top of our tariff with United States you have another tariff of 17 per cent by the reason of the fall in our exchange. This discussion of the respective merits of tax-free and taxable bonds is not new. In fact, there is hardly anything new in the world. If my hon. friend will look up the Democratic platform laid down in the Civil War he will find a plank against tax free bonds. The Republicans adopted tax-free bonds, because they carried on the war; they were the people who had to face the financial situation and get the money. The Democrats could criticise; they did not have to act; and they put a plank in their platform after the war condemning the Republican party. History simply repeats itself. Why, Mr. Speaker, when war breaks out and nobody knows whether it will last one year, or two years, five years or ten years, or whether the country is going to come through bankrupt, or what the taxation is going to be, is it not advisable that there should be some certainty in the amount which a man may rely upon getting for his money, at a time when he can otherwise obtain the highest possible rates for it? The Republicans were confronted with that condition in the Civil War, and we were confronted with it here.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to offer the Government any advice. I have worked with them; I know their zeal; I know their ability. I have entire confidence in them to meet any problem that is likely to arise during the further term of this Parliament. I believe it is the settled opinion of this country that the Government should carry on.

The Prime Minister is ill. I have been pleased with the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the Prime Minister; there is always a chivalry in this House for men under disability. Nobody knows the extent of the work carried on and the burden of the responsibility borne by Sir Robert Borden during the war and in the period since the war. Nobody knows the weight carried by the ministers. After all, men are only flesh and blood, not steel and iron. Sir Robert Borden is not the first Prime Minister of Canada who has been ill. Sir John A. Macdonald was seriously ill on various occasions. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was seriously ill in 1900. He told me about it once; so serious was his illness that it was looked upon as remarkable that he recovered. Prime Ministers are like other men, subject to human infirmity. The Prime Minister should have all the time he desires in which to recover his health. The Government is in good hands; at its head is one of the ablest parliamentarians in this House, if not the ablest. Carry on—that is what the people of Canada desire this Government to do—carry on, always dealing with questions from the standpoint of the national interest as opposed to the sectional interest. Unless I am much mistaken, the public will make short work at the next election of extremists of this kind. I have every confidence in the ability of the Government to deal with the weighty problems that may come before it,—the problem of promoting immigration; the problem of maintaining our trade and industry; the problem of dealing with soldiers' pensions and the Civil Re-establishment and rehabilitation of the soldier; the railway problem.

An election at this time? The leader of the Opposition surely would not want an election unless he had some hope of coming back as leader of the House and of the Government. We have taken over one of the greatest railway systems in the world, if not the greatest. The Government and those on this side of the House have committed themselves to the largest project of public ownership that has ever been attempted. What is the problem? The problem is to organize and administer that system and its finances through competent men, who will not be influenced by nor exposed to partisan interference, so as to get the best results for Canada out of that great railway system. Who is most likely to do that well—the Government that risked its political life on the great experiment, or hon. gentlemen opposite? I must say that if Liberalism be a vital principle, as is so often put forward in this House, I am amazed that when it comes to concrete cases, such as taking over those railways, it does not exhibit something of that principle. This Government, the people of Canada will believe, can take over those railways and provide for their operation much more capably than hon. gentlemen opposite who do not believe in nationalization at all. There is no doubt about that. A great deal can be done in developing all our national resources, such as our fuel resources and our power resources, through the development of our canals. These are great and weighty problems, but not beyond the capabilities of this Government as it exists to-day. I say to the Government: Continue, as I know you have been doing, look at every question from the national standpoint; rely upon the excellence of your administration, and carry on.

Mr. ARTHUR BLISS COPP (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we are all gratified again to hear the voice of the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) who has entertained the House this afternoon with a very long and interesting discourse. It must also be gratifying to hon. members, at least on this side of the House, when they see the hon. gentleman in his place, because it apparently is only when the Government feel themselves in somewhat of a tight corner that the hon. gentleman is hurried down from Toronto to take part in the debate and to whip his followers into line. It must also be gratifying to hon. members on this side when we realize that the amendment moved by my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) is having its weight in the country and in this House, seeing that the services of the hon. gentleman (Sir Thomas White) are required for this particular occasion. This is not the first occasion, I would remind my hon. friend, that he has been brought from his home hurriedly to take part in the discussions in this House. I think it was last session, when the Grand Trunk railway question was before Parliament and when the newspapers from one end of Canada to the other were denouncing the Government for attempting to commit the country to taking over and operating the Grand Trunk railway, that my hon. friend was brought down from Toronto in a great hurry, and he told this House and the country that, because of the prosperity of the Dominion of Canada, we were perfectly able to assume the vast obligations necessary to finance this road; that we could do that without at all injuring the credit of the Dominion. To assume an obligation of some seven or eight hundred million dollars was a mere bagatelle in the mind of my hon. friend, and he so impressed his views upon his supporters that they voted almost as a unit to take over the Grand Trunk railway system, and the Bill was carried through this Parliament. Nor was this the only time that my hon. friend was brought hurriedly to Ottawa to give some information to this Parliament. In the same session and only a few days afterwards, we were discussing the question of giving aid to the returned soldiers. My hon. friend's influence was again sought by his party and he was again brought from Toronto, and he told us that it would be practically impossible to give aid to the returned soldiers and their dependents because it would bankrupt the country. Now for the third time, we have my hon. friend here telling this House what we should do in regard to different matters coming before Parliament. We are glad to have him with us, and I congratulate my hon. friend that he thinks he is still winning the war.

He made some objections to the acceptance of the amendment moved by my hon. friend, an amendment which, he says, means an election in this country. That is exactly what it means. He throws the challenge across the floor of this House to hon. members on this side, that we are not in earnest. Let me tell my hon. friend, that hon. members on this side are absolutely in earnest in their request for an election in this country. We believe that the people are demanding an election; we believe that they are entitled to an election. It does not matter to me what the result of the election may be; the people have a right to say who shall be their representative in the future and whether or not this present aggregation shall carry on as a Government. If my hon. friend thinks that we are not in earnest, instead of expecting us to absent ourselves from this House on this vote, let him and some of his followers absent themselves, and instead of cracking the party whip, let them say to their supporters: Vote the way you please on this question and we shall be satisfied. Then we would find out whether or not the people wanted an election and wanted to keep this Government in office. Another excuse which he gives for not having an election is that Union Government will be returned to power. That, however, is the very best reason, speaking from his viewpoint, for having an election. As a third reason, he says that group systems are dangerous, and he criticizes the farmers of this country because they assumed the responsibility of taking some part in political warfare. For myself, I congratulate the National Progressive party, if that is the proper name, as given by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark), for taking the stand they have. I congratulate them for coming around to my view, because I have followed that policy for the past fifteen years. I sincerely believe that the interest taken by our farmers in the government of Canada will have a splendid influence upon our politics. I believe they are taking a step in the right direction in taking part in the political life of Canada and that they will make their influence felt to the benefit of this country. My hon. friend says that Union Government would sweep the country. I do not know where he gets any evidence of that. What about the recent by-elections? Has he sufficient evidence from those by-elections that the people of Canada are straining eagerly at the leash to vote for Union Government? That is not the conclusion I draw from the result of the by-elections that have already been held.

My hon. friend also spoke of the leader of the Opposition as being somewhat young in the game and of rushing matters too much. I do not know if advice in that regard comes with very good grace from the ex-Minister of Finance. He pretends to have a great deal of confidence in this Government and tells them to carry on, but he also told us that he had intended to resign his seat in this House, and was very glad he had kept so that he could support the Government on this occasion. If the Union Government had a mandate from the people and it was their duty still to carry on, surely it was the duty of the ex-Minister of Finance to stay at the head of his department and assist the Government to carry on, but soon after the resignation of the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar), he left the Government to drift along as best they could. Now he tells them it is their duty to carry on. The hon. gentleman himself was in somewhat of a hurry to get away from the sinking ship and plant his feet upon solid ground. My hon. friend's political career has taken a somewhat zigzag course. It has not always been as straight and circumspect as that of the right hon. gentleman who leads this House. He tells us himself that in 1896 he supported the Liberal party, and he continued to support it, I am told, until 1911. He now holds up his hands in holy horror and says: We must not have a group system of Government, we must not have our farmer friends coming here and having a say as to the policies of this country. Why not? Who is more responsible for the Farmers' Movement in Canada than the ex-Minister of Finance himself? In 1911 the Liberal party led by the late lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier entered into an agreement with the United States for reciprocity, and who were the men who helped defeat reciprocity when it was submitted to the country? The Noble Eighteen, of whom my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance was one. He withdrew his support from the Liberal party, and along with his capitalistic and manufacturing friends helped to defeat the reciprocity agreement which was entered into by the Liberal Government for the purpose of assisting the agriculturists of this country. Now my hon. friend complains because the agriculturists are organizing and demanding something from this Government. I say that the ex-Minister of Finance is one of the few who are responsible for forcing this movement upon the country. The result is that we have now in this House a third party. I am satisfied that they will give a very good account of themselves and take a great part in our future political history.

I do not propose to follow the ex-Minister of Finance in all his meanderings on the tariff, the conduct of the war, the exchange situation, and the other matters he discussed. I am absolutely in accord with the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in moving his resolution that the time has arrived when this Government should submit themselves to the people at a general election. You might ask, why should there be a general election? The ex-Minister of Finance says that there should not be one now, that the Government has a mandate from the people to carry on. I contend that the Union Government, as formed in 1917, had a mandate from the people to carry on during the war, and possibly for a short period thereafter until demobilization was completed. That time has expired, and what better evidence of the fact do we want than to see one member of the Government after another resigning and giving as their reason that their contract had expired. The ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) joined the Union Government for a certain purpose, and gave it his support for a certain length of time because he thought that was his patriotic duty, but he resigned last year and gave as his reason that his contract had expired. Shortly afterwards the ex-Minister of Finance resigned from the Government, and so did the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell), now Chairman of the Railway Commission, and who also gave as his reason that his contract had expired. His resignation was followed by that of the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Mewburn), and only a few days ago by the resignation from the Cabinet of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean). And thus it goes on. Will any one say after all these important and influential members of the Cabinet have withdrawn their support from the Government, that we have a full representative and constitutional government in this country?

I want to say on behalf of the province from which I come, that it is the first time in the history of Canada that New Brunswick has not had a representative in the Federal Cabinet. What do we find as a result of this non-representation? Neglect along every line. The transportation question, for instance, is being neglected by this Government. The great national port of St. John is being neglected because New Brunswick has no representative in the Cabinet. There is not a man in the Cabinet who takes the least interest in Maritime Province matters, and who will speak for New Brunswick when questions affecting it are under consideration. We should have a representative in the Cabinet. That the Government realizes this is proven beyond peradventure because they have been flirting with two or three different names in the province for the last five or six months. One day the newspapers heralded all over the country that the hon. J. D. Hazen, ex-Minister of Marine and Fisheries, was to come back to assume office. Another time a different name was mentioned, and later on a different name still. The Government has not yet succeeded in getting into the Cabinet a representative from the province of New Brunswick, because they are not prepared to risk the chances of an election. I believe that it was practically all arranged that we should have a representative in the Cabinet from New Brunswick just about the time the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) was contesting the by-election in that county, but after the Government's candidate lost his deposit, although he had three Cabinet ministers helping him in his campaign, the gentleman the Government had in mind who was to be provided with a seat in the county of York began to think: I had better leave well enough alone; what I have I will hold, and forget about this Cabinet position. That is the reason the gentleman whose name was mentioned at that time is not now sitting in the Cabinet.

Much has been said in this debate about lowering the tariff and about free trade. In theory we are all practically free traders but it is a question as to what would happen if we should have free trade. I am not an expert on this question. I was brought up to be pretty free-minded and to believe that as free an interchange of trade between nations as possible would be a good thing for everybody. That is naturally the view I take and I think that practically everybody realizes its soundness.

When my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) was speaking the other day, some one threw the question across the House: "Where would you get your revenue?" The question, "where would you get your revenue" is not what is bothering the hon. gentleman who asked it: What is bothering him is: "Where am I going to get my excessive profits if we have a lower tariff?" That was the question that was in his mind; it was not the question of revenue. He realized that if we had a lower tariff he would not make the excessive profits as a manufacturer that he now makes. That is the question that is uppermost in the minds of all those gentlemen who are opposed to a lower tariff.

I would be the last one to attempt to in any way interfere with the manufacturing interests of our country but I have yet to be convinced that if our tariff walls were lowered to a certain degree, so as to give a certain advantage to our farmers who are using agricultural implements, it would not be very greatly to the disadvantage of this country. The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) a few minutes ago asked: "What would the working men do; would they vote to do away with the manufacturers of this country?" No, decidedly not. The question only shows that the hon. gentleman is trying to draw a red herring across the track. If the tariff wall were taken down absolutely in regard to certain articles that are manufactured in this country as well as in the United States, it would not close down our factories. The manufacturers would not be obliged to close up their shops. There is no danger of it. The workingmen will do the work just the same but the manufacturer will not make as much money. The work will go on. Why cannot the manufacturers of this country compete with the manufacturers of the United States and other countries in this market as well as they can in a foreign market? Go to Australia, or go to England, and you will find our manufactured goods there being sold as cheaply as the manufactured goods from the United States. If they can compete in foreign markets they can compete in the home market, and we should have the advantage of the lower tariff. The people should be given the opportunity of cheaper machinery and, indirectly, as you go down the line, there should be cheaper production and a lessened cost of living.

The speech from the Throne contains twelve paragraphs, ten of which constitute a sort of pleasant essay telling us what the Government have been doing during the past year. They tell us that they have been looking after the soldiers' re-establishment and demobilization, and that they have been doing wonderful things along that line. I would rather have the evidence of the demobilized soldier himself as to what the Government have been doing for our returned soldiers. The next two paragraphs give the whole bill of fare which the Government proposes to place before Parliament at the present session. One paragraph says:

> Bill to provide for a Dominion Franchise will be introduced, dealing with the qualifications of voters and the procedure necessary to enable all persons legally qualified to register their votes.

We require a franchise Act if we are to have an election. It is to be hoped that we are to have an election some day unless some means are devised of perpetually continuing this Government in power. If an election does come we must have a franchise Act and the voters must be enrolled so that they can poll their votes. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) referred to this matter the other day. I want to say that I sincerely trust that the Government will realize that there is only one way to frame a franchise Act and that is to draft an honest and just law under which the people will be in a position to independently cast their ballots and that all the people who have taken part in the politics of this country for many years will have the same opportunity of voting whenever the election may be brought about. I am not going to discuss that in detail or what may happen when the Bill is introduced into the House. We will have another opportunity of dealing with the question and I sincerely trust we will be able to get on common ground and have a Bill that will be satisfactory to the House and the country. Another paragraph of the speech from the Throne says:

> Other Bills will be presented for your consideration including a Bill respecting Copyrights and Bills providing for the amendment of the Patent Act, of the Loan and Trust Companies Acts, the Indian Act, and the Exchequer Courts Act.

That is the bill of fare that has been laid down by the Government for the present session. It seems to me that some information might have been given to the men and women of this country who are looking for some relief from the burden imposed upon them by the high cost of living.

We have had a Board of Commerce working for some months but it has been disorganized. As far as I have been able to see there has been nothing done. Nothing has been attempted by this Board of Commerce, representing the Government, or by the Government itself, or by any member of the Government, to contribute in the slightest degree to a reduction of the high cost of living. For a time they forced the newsprint manufacturers to supply the newspapers but I see that they even withdrew from that the other day on the ground that they had no authority to deal with the matter. I do not know why they should have any more right to control the price of newsprint than they have to control the price of any other article or commodity that the people use, but if they have they have not attempted to exercise that power. We find day after day the cost of living climbing higher and not the slightest effort being made by the Government in any way, shape or form to keep the necessaries of life from mounting beyond the reach of a very large number of our people.

The amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition will, I will say, have my hearty support because I believe he is taking the right course in submitting that proposition to the House. In my opinion it is the duty of the Opposition to bring before Parliament, and through it before the country, the views they have on the public questions of the day. I believe, and such is the view of hon. gentlemen generally on this side, that the time is opportune for an election in Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite say: Oh, but you will not have any chance of being returned. That is not the question at all. Regardless of what party will be returned, the Canadian people have the right to express their opinion on the policy of the Government and they have not had such an opportunity since 1911. In that year an election took place on the Reciprocity Agreement, and the Government of the day was defeated. It was succeeded by a new Administration, and in 1917 a general election was brought on when the policy of the present Government was not an issue at all. The questions fought out had reference solely to the conduct by the Government of the war. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) was a supporter, and one of the candidates, of the Union Government in that election, and he has told us that the only question he spoke on during the contest was the conduct of the Union Government during the prosecution of the war. Now that issue is gone, and I maintain the time has arrived when the people of Canada should have an opportunity of expressing their views upon the Government's course and the issues involved. That is what the amendment aims at and for that reason I support it.

The ex-Minister of Finance, pleading with his supporters opposite, has claimed that we ought to have a Union Government—that Union Government should carry on and that we should have a Liberal-Conservative Party not only in name but in substance. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether a continuance of Union Government is possible? That is a matter as to which other parties have something to say. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat), who is not in his seat to-day, also suggested that we should have a continuance of Union Government. I wonder where the hon. gentleman would fit in under those circumstances? The hon. gentleman's observations recall to my mind the report, published I think in the Toronto Globe, of a meeting in that city at which he was nominated some two years ago. Speaking from memory, because I have not the report at present before me, the meeting was a joint one of Liberals and Conservatives in the riding of Parkdale. This very question of the continuance of Union Government came up for discussion, and there appeared to be some doubt as to who should be the candidate for the riding. The hon. gentleman's name was advanced as a candidate, but in view of the hon. gentleman's political antecedents, there was apparently some misgiving. Finally an old Conservative spoke up and said: We will accept him, (Mr. Mowat), but let it be understood we are only borrowing him for the occasion. When the election is over, and when we revert to party lines again we do not want to keep him any longer, and we will return him to the Liberal Party again. I wonder what our good Conservatives friends in the constituency of Parkdale will say if Union Government is continued and what they will do with their borrowed friend. In this matter, I am not here to speak for the Liberal Party, and although we are a democratic party and even though in the case of a man who has sinned, it is sometimes possible to wipe away those sins and make him white once more. What, let me ask, is going to happen to my hon. friend provided the Conservatives who took the stand to which I have alluded, declare they are going to have nothing more to do with the hon. gentleman, and they return him from whence he came?

I did not rise with any idea of speaking at great length or of discussing such questions as the tariff and the rate of exchange. But when my hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) offered advice as to what would be the proper course to pursue in future with respect to Union Government I did not feel like letting the opportunity pass without drawing attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman's own political course has not always been one of marked steadiness all along the line. We are told in one breath that the country is prosperous and that we have great financial resources at our disposal and in the very next breath when it comes to adequately recognizing the claims of our returned soldiers and maintaining soldiers' widows and dependents the statement is made that it is absolutely impossible. The hon. gentleman also tells us that Union Government must carry on but he shakes himself clear of any and every responsibility in regard to it. He declares that it is the duty of the Prime Minister to carry on and to assume great responsibilities, but the ex-Finance Minister himself refuses to shoulder his share of the burdens to be borne. Along with all other members of the House I deeply regret the condition of health of the Prime Minister. We all have a very high regard for that Rt. hon. gentleman; we deplore the reasons for his absence from the House, and we sincerely trust that the reassuring statement with respect to his health made a few days ago may turn out to be well founded. We all want to see the Rt. hon. gentleman remain in good health but would he not be endangering that health by again assuming the responsibilities of office. Personally I would like to prevent any possibility of the right hon. gentleman's health being further endangered by remaining in office and continuing to shoulder heavy responsibilities, and with that object in view I shall gladly vote for the amendment.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to participate, especially, in the discussion of any of the questions alluded to in the speech from the Throne but to refer to a matter that did not find a place there—I refer to the question of the proposed increase in railway freight rates. My intention is to make a few observations on that question at the present time so that the members of the Government and the members of the House may familiarize themselves with existing conditions with respect to the subject and be able to intelligently deal with the proposal for the increase when it is brought forward. A year or two ago the railway freight and passenger rates were increased to a very considerable extent, I think something like twenty-five per cent. It is now proposed, and I presume the matter is before the Railway Board to make another increase of from thirty to forty per cent. In my judgment the existing railway conditions, and especially the circumstances of the people, do not justify that increase. Before I sit down I think I shall be able to make out a case in that connection.

I am told that the increase in rates granted by the Railway Board some two years ago, on the understanding that all but ten per cent of that increase would be returned to the country in taxation in so far as the Canadian Pacific railway was concerned, has not resulted according to that understanding. I am informed, and I am satisfied that the information is correct, that up to the present time the Government has not been able to collect that amount of taxes from the Canadian Pacific railway. It may be in process of settlement, but I am credibly informed that nothing on that account has yet been paid over to the Government.

As you know, Sir, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was endowed by the people of Canada to an amount sufficient to build the entire railway. It was the understanding of Parliament when those vast subsidies were poured into the lap of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that the company would be able to act as a good immigration agent in the Northwest and to carry freight and passengers at a very low rate. I have not the quotation at hand, but I think it was Sir John Macdonald who, when the contract was going through, said that owing to these vast subsidies the company ought to be able to carry freight and passengers for about one-quarter the rate that would be charged by a privately constructed railway. But instead of adhering to the policy which Parliament and the country understood would be followed when these subsidies were given, the company embarked upon a policy which it has followed closely up to the present time of charging "all that the traffic would bear."

In this connection I want to refer to a few figures, Mr. Speaker, and to demonstrate to the House, if I can, that any increase in rates at the present time would be entirely unjustifiable. I quote from an article which one of the best authorities on railway matters in Canada has contributed to a newspaper. In part he says:

> At the existing rates the net revenue has been ample, not only to meet the increased outlays, but to provide a dividend to its common shareholders at the rate of ten per cent per annum, and also to permit of an appreciable addition to its enormous accumulation of surplus assets and undivided profits, amounting, at December 31, 1918, to $233,999,617, as shown on the company's balance sheet. This colossal surplus is over and above the most generous reservations for replacements, taxes, etc., amounting to $44,742,837, and also such items as premium on ordinary capital stock, $45,000,000, and net proceeds of lands and securities, $84,079,084. Altogether the financial position of the Canadian Pacific corporation is so astonishingly strong, and its current earnings are so enormous, as to make the fears and presentments of its president look like consummate farce or consummate hypocrisy.
> The amazing financial position of the C.P.R. corporation is primarily due to the enormous and "insane subventions of which it was the beneficiary." These donations were made, as has been said with the ostensible purpose of enabling it to supply western transportation at low rates and to act as an effective colonization agency. From the first, it absolutely ignored these obligations and conducted its operations on the principle: All that the traffic will bear. It thus not only received the enormous subsidies, grants and privileges, but it also collected, without any effort at restraint by the Dominion Government, the excessive tolls which its position as an unrestricted monopoly enabled it to collect. It caught the people of Canada coming and going, so to speak.

That refers more particularly to the position of the company a little over a year ago. I will now quote more recent figures:

Week ending	1920	Increase	P.C.
Feb. 7.....	$3,288,000	$709,000	27.48
Feb. 14.....	3,546,000	663,000	22.99

This shows an average increase of 25 per cent in revenue over the corresponding period of 1919, and this showing is not unusual, but typical. The operating expenses are not shown in this return, but it is incredible that any increase in these could bear comparison with this revenue increase.

Under such conditions the suggestion of a huge increase in rates (30 or 40 per cent is the figure talked of) is not only ludicrous but criminal.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the value of Canadian Pacific shares on the New York exchange has been steadily falling. Once the stock was as high, I think, as 280, and it has recently dropped as low as 117. Lord Shaughnessy, in order to explain the situation and, I presume, come to the rescue of these shares, had a statement published to the effect that their intrinsic value was $250 on each $100 share. Now, if they are worth that amount, it is because of the excessive freight and passenger tolls which the company has been able to take from the public for the last thirty years. So the proposition will be admitted that the policy of the company has been to take "all that the traffic would bear."

I think I have demonstrated that so far as the Canadian Pacific railway is concerned any increase in rates would be entirely unwarranted—would, in fact, be a crime against our people—and I feel satisfied that this House and the country will agree with me that such an increase should not be permitted for one moment.

Let me now refer to what is known as the National railway system. As you know, Sir, the Government within the last two or three years has acquired, in addition to the Intercolonial and other lines in the Maritime Provinces, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Transcontinental, and the Canadian Northern railways, and is about to take over the Grand Trunk system; so ultimately our national system will be larger than the railway system of the Canadian Pacific Company. As I have already stated, I think I have demonstrated that the circumstances do not warrant any increase in rates to the Canadian Pacific railway. Now, what about the National railway system? I notice with regret, Sir, that the president of that system, Mr. D. B. Hanna, is delivering addresses in various cities advocating an increase in rates on the system. Indeed, I see by this morning's papers that he has been addressing the Canadian Club in Ottawa. I was rather startled by the headlines over the report of his speech. One reads:

National Railways will soon be Factor in Paying Canada's War Debt, Declares President Hanna.

The report says:

Mr. D. B. Hanna, president of the Canadian National Railways, speaking to the Canadian Club Saturday afternoon, predicted that before long all government railways in Canada would be on a paying basis and that the strong probabilities were the returns would in a few years in a great measure help to pay Canada's war debt.

Just think, for a moment, Mr. Speaker, what that proposition means. According to Mr. Hanna, the President and moving spirit in the Canadian National Railway system, rates may be so increased as not only to pay interest on the vast capitalization involved in these railways acquired by the Government, but also to pay interest on the national debt, which now amounts to something over two billions of dollars. Hon. gentlemen must see the utter absurdity of a position of that kind. Even if it only required reasonable rates to pay the interest on that vast capitalization of a billion and a half to pay the interest on the national debt, just think what the suggestion involves. Are the users of freight on the Canadian National railway system, those who send their commodities over those lines, to be taxed not only for the carrying of that freight but also to pay the interest on the national debt? Why should the users of freight be asked to contribute one farthing towards the payment of the interest on the national debt? The national debt has been created for the supposed benefit of all the people. Freight rates, instead of being enhanced to the extend of one farthing, should be kept down to the lowest possible point; those who use the Government railways for freight and passenger purposes should have the benefit of the lowest possible rates. I think it is only necessary to state the proposition laid down by Mr. Hanna to demonstrate its utter absurdity.

While on this point, I want to say that under no circumstances could this Parliament or this country justify an increase in freight rates on the Canadian National railway system at the present time. We may just as well be frank about the situation. During the last twenty or twenty-five years the people of Canada, in order, as they thought, to build up a competing system for the Canadian Pacific railway, embarked upon blunders of most colossal magnitude in connection with our railways. For instance, they built what is known as the Transcontinental railway from Moncton to Winnipeg. I do not believe that that railway is earning much more than sufficient to pay for the axle grease which it uses; certainly it will be a long time before it pays operating expenses. It had been my view that the wisest policy would be to abandon the Transcontinental altogether. Yet it has cost this country $250,000,000; and the argument against abandonment is that along its lines settlers have established themselves, towns have been built up and vested interests have been created, and that abandonment would do great injustice to those settlers and vested interests. Well, let us say that the best policy is that the Transcontinental shall not be abandoned, and that it shall be operated. Its construction was due to the inexplicable folly of the Canadian people. I am not blaming one party more than another, though I might say that these colossal blunders involving the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific were the result of the administration of the so-called Liberal party.

Now, let us take the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, which has fallen into the hands of this country. The members of this House and the people of the country ought to have it clearly in their minds that the Administration has not embarked upon this national railway policy from preference. National ownership of railways is all right, but the national ownership that we are getting through being obliged to acquire these white elephants is not the kind of public ownership that any sane man would care to embark upon. But there was the Transcontinental; it was thrown on our lap, and if we do not operate it it goes into decay. The same with the Grand Trunk Pacific. Some of it is of value, but the portion from Edmonton to the Pacific coast is another line which will probably not earn its axle grease for some years. As the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) said this afternoon, the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental was made an issue in the election of 1904. I remember how it was said that the people of the West were clamouring for this accommodation. They were not clamouring at all. It was the exploiters that were clamouring to get contracts and to institute a cry that would carry the country. Well, the proposal did carry the country, and we have the Grand Trunk Pacific constructed at a cost of two or three hundred millions of dollars. I think the total cost is something like $97,000 a mile. I recall that the Brandon section of the Manitoba system was built at a cost of $9,000 a mile. Of course, I do not institute a comparison, because one line goes through prairie country and the other is over the mountains. But we have the Transcontinental from Moncton to Winnipeg, the Grand Trunk Pacific from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast, the Canadian Northern—of which I shall only refer to the British Columbia section as unproductive and uneconomic—and we have that section of the Canadian Northern from Sudbury down to Toronto. These four vast stretches of railway which have been dumped upon our laps are included in the National railway system of Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, while you may denounce the Laurier-Sifton regime that drove these enormities through Parliament, still, it must be remembered that the people voted upon the issue and that the people are responsible and must take the consequences. It must be perfectly evident to everybody that the Transcontinental and the other lines which I have named are uneconomic portions, white elephant portions, of the nationally-owned system of railways. Some time ago I had it in mind to suggest to this Parliament that those uneconomic portions of the railways ought to be grouped together and labelled "public ward system." They belong to the public, but they are just wards. We are losing immense amounts of money in their operation; they really should not be operated; but to charge rates on those uneconomic systems sufficient to pay operating expenses and to give a return to the public, is a most absurd proposition. The people must take their medicine with regard to those uneconomic portions of the nationally-owned system. I think no one will dissent from that view.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight oclock.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (resuming): When the House rose for dinner I was discussing the undesirability of the Government and this Parliament allowing an increase in railway freight and passenger rates as has been proposed, and indeed advocated, both by the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway and by Mr. D. B. Hanna, president of our nationally-owned system. The House was rather slim when it rose at six o'clock, and is still fairly slim. Perhaps that is in a measure due to the heavy artillery that the members heard with such interest this afternoon. I should not like to attribute it to the speech of my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Copp), and I certainly do not intend to attribute it to myself as the House was rather thin when I started. I think that for the benefit of members who were not present this afternoon I had better recapitulate briefly.

In opposing the granting of an increase in freight and passenger rates to the extent of thirty or forty per cent as has been proposed, I reviewed this afternoon the position of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I stated that the people of Canada had given to that company, in subsidies, exemptions and largess, an amount sufficient to build the entire railway, and I made the point that when these vast subsidies were given the people expected, as they had a right to expect, that this company would be able to furnish transportation to the people of this country at a very low rate. That at all events was the expectation of the late Sir John Macdonald who fathered the great project. I was able to show that the rates this company has charged for the last number of years have enabled it to accumulate an undistributed surplus to an amount of about $230,000,000 or $240,000,000. I was able to show that their earnings during the last few weeks, according to their own returns, were vastly in excess of their earnings for the corresponding period last year, the average increase in earnings being something like 20 or 25 per cent. I therefore felt, and I am sure every member of this House will feel, that no justification exists for an increase in railway rates so far as the Canadian Pacific is concerned. I criticised—and I reiterate my criticism now—the remarkable position that Mr. D. B. Hanna, president of the nationally-owned system, is taking at the present time, going about addressing Canadian Clubs and public bodies, advocating an increase in freight rates on the nationally-owned system. I quoted from a newspaper published in Ottawa to-day Mr. Hanna's statement to the effect that the nationally-owned system, if given proper rates, would soon have earnings enough to pay operating expenses and interest on an estimated cost of a billion and a half of dollars, and he added that if they got such a freight rate as was allowed in South Australia the nationally-owned railways might be expected to pay interest on the immense national debt of this Dominion. I pointed out the folly of Mr. Hanna, or indeed any public man taking the position that rates should be such as would more than pay operating expenses and interest on the cost involved in construction. I referred to the absolute absurdity of expecting those citizens of Canada who use these roads for transporting their goods to pay rates higher than sufficient to pay operating expenses and interest. How absolutely absurd it must appear to any member of this House that any railway, and particularly the nationally-owned roads, should have rates imposed upon them sufficient to pay operating expenses, interest on capital, and interest on our national debt! Just fancy the users of these roads being mulcted to an enormous extent in order to pay interest on our national debt! The national debt of Canada was created for the benefit of the entire population, and this entire population must contribute to the interest on that national debt instead of merely a very limited number of shippers of freight over the Government roads. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that when an increase of twenty-five or thirty per cent was granted in freight rates a couple of years ago, it was generally contended that the Canadian Pacific did not require any increase in rates, that their earnings were quite sufficient to take care of their operating expenses and pay a handsome interest on capital. As a matter of fact you, Sir, know that the Canadian Pacific under its charter is allowed to pay 10 per cent on its capital stock, but it was contended that the lame ducks—the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific, and other lines—were unable to earn sufficient on those rates to make a living, and consequently an increase in rates was granted to all lines including the Canadian Pacific to enable these roads to increase their earnings. You will recall, Sir, that it was provided that if the Canadian Pacific earned more than ten per cent under these new rates the balance was to be returned to the public treasury by way of taxation. Let us assume that the Canadian Pacific is a perfectly honourable and decent corporation; I am not here to say a word against the Canadian Pacific, or to impugn its honour; it is a magnificently managed organization, and has rendered splendid service to the Dominion. Its officers are high-class men. For its new president I have the highest possible esteem. But it can be readily understood how, in connection with a provision of that kind, accountants could juggle figures and charge up to capital account a very large amount, or how expenses for upkeep, replacement and other things might be deducted from the amount the company was able to earn by virtue of the increase in rates. I am afraid—I repeat what I said this afternoon, because there are more members listening to me now, and this is one of the most important questions that will come before the House this session—that although these increases went into effect two years ago or more the Canadian Pacific has not yet paid the amount which it should pay to the Government, as was the expectation and understanding of Parliament when the increase was granted.

Having demonstrated that the Canadian Pacific should not under any circumstances be allowed an increase in freight and passenger rates, I went on to deal this afternoon with the case of the nationally-owned railways. I think it is absolutely absurd and highly improper for Mr. Hanna, the president of the nationally-owned system, to take the position he is taking before the public, of advocating that an increase be granted. I have always had, and still have, a very high regard for Mr. Hanna's integrity and ability as a railway operator, but I question his ethics and wisdom in following the course he is pursuing. The question I dealt with this afternoon was this: The Canadian National system of railways is the result of the most colossal folly and series of blunders ever perpetrated in any country by its public men. I am not going to place blame particularly here or there, but I did single out one Government this afternoon for special mention. We have the National Transcontinental railway, which is a piece of the greatest folly ever carried out in any country. I have given the matter considerable study, and it was my conclusion that the Transcontinental from Moncton to Winnipeg should be abandoned. The argument was presented to me that vested interests have been created, that a large population has gone in there, and perhaps it would be a hardship to these people if that portion of the road was abandoned. We may take it that that country will develop as the years go by, and it might be better under all the circumstances of the case that the road should be operated in the best possible manner and maintained in some reasonable degree of efficiency. The people of this country will understand that, inasmuch as the road was the result of the folly of public men, endorsed by the people itself, and inasmuch as it has been unloaded on the country and is now under the public ownership system, it ought not to be expected that rates should be charged upon it sufficient to pay operating expenses and interest on capital.

In addition to the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific, the uneconomic portion of which extends from Edmonton to the Pacific coast, you have the British Columbia end of the Canadian Northern and you also have a considerable mileage in Ontario belonging to the Canadian Northern. All these uneconomic thousands of miles of road are included with the whole in our public ownership system. The economic end would be the old Grand Trunk, a portion of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and a portion of the Canadian Northern which runs through very good territory, and perhaps a portion of the Intercolonial.

In my judgment, this great system should be divided into the economic and uneconomic portions and separate accounts should be kept. It seems to me utter folly that an increase in rates should be granted in order to make up the deficit on the uneconomic portions. These uneconomic portions constitute a vast mileage. They are the inheritance of this country from the folly of those public men, endorsed by the country itself. That being so, let the country take its medicine, let the uneconomic portion be separated from the economic portion, and whatever the loss is let it be written off against profit and loss. That we should be asked at this stage to increase the freight and passenger rates on our railway system in order to pay operating expenses and interest on cost is, in my judgment, a proposition that should not for a minute be listened to.

I said this afternoon, and I repeat, that we have embarked upon the public ownership of railways. The idea of public ownership is all right in itself if we have the right kind of public ownership. If the people of Canada had built a smaller mileage than that which we now have—some 22,000 miles—and this system had been built upon economic lines, taking in those portions of the country where there was a reasonable expectation of revenue and accommodating large settlements, we would have had the right kind of public ownership. But almost half—at least one-third of our system is uneconomic and it is well that this country and Parliament, when we are starting out with this system, should know the conditions under which we are embarking. We may expect in two or three years the people to hold up their hands in horror and say: "Public ownership is a vast failure; we never should have embarked upon it."

It should be remembered that we have not embarked upon this system, but that public ownership has been forced upon by the folly of our public men and the folly of the people at large. Let us divide the economic from the uneconomic portions and let the country suffer the loss whatever the loss might be of the uneconomic system. Why should the people, living by the tens of thousands along the lines served by the economic system, be taxed to pay the deficit of the uneconomic system? The proposition is utter folly and should not be listened to for a moment. I have no apology to offer for repeating what I said this afternoon, because I believe this is a subject of vital importance to the people of Canada. We must start right if we are going to make a success of public ownership. We must not have it discredited at its inception. There is one other important reason that suggests itself to me here why we should not allow any increase of freight rates at the present time. The arbitration in connection with the Grand Trunk will soon sit. If you allow this increase in freight rates, the arbitrator on behalf of the Grand Trunk will put forward the claim that they are handing over a railway to the people of Canada which is making handsome earnings at the present time. That is a very great risk which we should not think of taking.

I am not sure what the functions or powers of the Railway Board are, or whether it is able to grant an increase without reference to the Government. If it is I think the Government should intervene and that some steps ought to be taken to save the country from this folly. It is not only the $100,000,000 or $150,000,000 that will be granted in increased rates to these two great railway systems that will present the real trouble. Large, colossal, vast as that amount is, and burdensome as it will be to the people, it may be borne, but the result will be that it will enable merchants from one end of the country to the other to increase the cost of their commodities. They will say: "Freight rates have gone up; therefore the cost of commodities must be increased," and the result will be, if these increased freight rates are permitted, that there will be further grave agitation in the matter of the high cost of living, and it will cost Canada $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 before she is through with it. It is too grave a matter to be embarked upon lightly. I repeat the warning to the Government that they should carefully consider this question and take every precaution to see that this proposed increase in freight rates is refused.

Just one other point, and it was brought out by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) this afternoon in connection with the speech from the Throne. Suppose, Mr. Speaker, that if such an unlikely thing should happen as that the Government should accept the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and go to the country. Then, suppose that this so-called Liberal party came back with a majority behind them. Just think what would happen. You recall what happened in this House a few months ago in the Fall session, when this Government, backed by this party, undertook to acquire the Grand Trunk railway.

To operate the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental railway without the old Grand Trunk was a piece of folly, something impossible, because the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental were built to co-ordinate and to co-operate with that system; and when the opportunity offered, this Government, in order to ensure, at least to some extent, the possibility of a measure of success in public ownership decided to acquire the old Grand Trunk railway. And how was this Government met when that proposition came down? Why, it was virulently opposed by the party that sits to your left, Sir, and they even proposed a commission of inquiry to sidetrack the project; they had recourse to every possible expedient in order to block the passage through Parliament of the Bill to acquire the Grand Trunk. Having been brought up in the Liberal party I thought that public ownership was one of its chief planks, and it was with amazement that I found them opposed to the acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway and that they were opposed generally to the principle of public ownership. Now, suppose the unlikely should happen? Suppose the Government should say, "All right we will go to the country," and by some fluke the party on the other side came back, what position would the country be in? Could it rely upon that party administering this public-owned system with honesty of purpose, efficiency or in any manner in the public interest? I am sure, Sir, all will agree that if you expect success in any undertaking those who manage that undertaking must believe in it and must throw their hearts into the management of it. With the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) I cordially agree that it would be most unfortunate if the administration of this public owned system of railways should pass out of the hands of the present administration before it has been thoroughly co-ordinated, thoroughly organized and placed in such a position that there is no likelihood of failure.

Before I sit down I wish to briefly refer to two or three matters that arose out of the debate on the Address. I share very cordially the sentiments expressed by my hon. friend from Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) who is an old Liberal, and comes of prime Liberal stock. That hon. gentleman said that since his advent to this House as a supporter of the Union Government—a Government composed of the best elements of both of the old parties—he had found himself abundantly satisfied. I want to say as an old Liberal that I have never sat behind any Government, nor have I ever observed any Government—whether it called itself Liberal or Conservative—for the last thirty or thirty-five years that in my judgment was more progressive, or was even more radical, than this Government has been. It has—not only in my case but in the case of many others—deserved, but compelled my support. When it made an honest effort to deal with public ownership, and there was no other course it was able to pursue, I had no difficulty in agreeing with it and supporting it on that point.

Now let us look at the achievements of the Government—and I am not going to dwell upon the record in detail as the subject was thoroughly covered by the Acting Prime Minister. The Government, at least, dealt efficiently and satisfactorily with the war. That was the great issue when the Government was elected in 1917, and the war has been won. It is true the war cost a great deal of money, and involved the lives of 60,000 of the flower of our race, but even that was not too great a price to pay for liberty. But the war was won and the Government did all that could be expected of it in that direction. We have also had from the Government women's franchise. We have had the Civil Service, under a commission, removed entirely from the vicious system that prevailed under the old regime. So far as my observation goes there is no patronage in the Civil Service to-day. And there is no patronage in connection with the awarding of contracts as there used to be. Then prohibition was made effective in Canada by virtue of the conduct of the Government. Further, there has been control of prices and accompanying it the creation of a Board of Commerce, and while many may be ready to sneer, I want to say that a great deal has been accomplished in that connection. We have had, in connection with the adjustment of war problems, the demobilization of 500,000 troops, soldiers' civil reestablishment and vocational training, the granting of pensions and the care of returned soldiers. We have had the inauguration of a housing scheme, the establishment of a Health Department, the adoption of public ownership of railways, the consolidation of our Railway Act, and the passage of a bankruptcy law. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this was a very fair programme and a very fair record of accomplishment for the time that this Government has been in office.

There are many other questions that should, and doubtless will, be dealt with, but just why there should be a declaration in favour of a general election at the present time I for one cannot understand. I do not believe there is any public demand throughout the country for a general election. I believe with the ex-Minister of Finance, that the people who do the thinking, the people who have the interest of this country most deeply at heart, are anxious to see this Government carry on. I think with my hon. friend that if you were to have a general election you would not have stability of Government for five, ten or fifteen years. What you would likely have would be Government by groups and a disturbing succession of administrations. It is perfectly true that there is a good deal of unrest throughout the Dominion, but that is inevitable after war and it is inevitable during war time.

Sometimes I have stood by and listened to groups of people denouncing all governments—denouncing municipal, provincial and Dominion governments, denouncing everything that is—and the manner in which that denunciation was carried on was so insensate I could not help thinking of the experience of Samson who pulled down the pillars of the temple and in so doing perished himself in the catastrophe. These thousands of people throughout the land who indulge in general and wholesale criticism of everything that exists have no conception of what their influence is leading to. It might easily result as disastrously as did the act of Samson; it might pull down the constitution of our country. Those who rock the boat in perilous and dangerous times are a menace to the community. In my judgment nothing could occur that would be more likely to disturb the national craft and bring chaos in the country than a general election at the present time. It might be desirable in a year or two. I believe the country is progressing in the direction of settling down, and when that time comes then let us have a dissolution and let the best men, or the best group, or the best party, win.

I wish to offer an observation or two on the same lines as my hon. friend the member for Parkdale. He spoke of the desirability of a rapprochement with the province of Quebec, because it is charged that there are no representatives from the great province of Quebec in this Government. It is true there is one member of the Government from Quebec who sits in the Senate, but it is quite patent to all that that province is not represented as it should be in the country's administration.

I could not help reflecting as to whose fault it was. On the appeal to the country in 1917 the verdict was so overwhelming in favour of Union Government pledged to carry on the war, that I would think nobody, no matter from what province he comes, would care to criticize or question that verdict. If the province of Quebec is not represented in the Government, it is the fault of the representatives, or, perhaps, carrying it further, of the people of that province. But surely that is no fault of the overwhelming majority of the people who voted in favour of Union Government.

Now, I was rather surprised at the retort of my hon. friend the member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) to the olive branch held out by the member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat). He spoke vehemently of Quebec waiting for her "hour." One would almost fancy from his tone that Quebec was waiting for her revenge.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Then I would be the last one to attribute any such sentiment ot my hon. friend, because there is a special bond of friendship between him and me. He came out to Manitoba to assist me in an election contest upon one occasion, and I have always had a special regard for him. Consequently, I am delighted to hear from hon. gentlemen that his words had no such meaning. However, I noticed in the Montreal Gazette this morning that the Progressive Club of Montreal had by resolution repudiated the sentiment expressed by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe.

In my judgment Quebec has proved a great bulwark in our national structure. She is sane, generous, chivalrous and courteous, and I do not believe that her people will ever countenance group government. Quebec, no matter what may be the sentiments of many of her representatives on the question of the Tariff, is in my judgment, in favour of fiscal stability, and I do not believe that she will ever stand by and see the industrial structure of the country ruined. I have always looked upon Quebec as one of the sanest members of Confederation, and I am satisfied that reason will prevail in that province, and if her good people do not in their wisdom see fit to take a hand in the Government at the present time, the occasion when she will cannot be distant. There will be no secession. These two races are joined together for weal or woe, and what God has joined together no man in this country will dare attempt to put asunder. I believe that wiser and more conciliatory counsels will prevail—in fact, I believe they are beginning to prevail in that province at the present time. The war is over. "Let the dead past bury its dead." We cannot make things different now, the only thing we can do is to accept what has happened. There is a great work ahead of this great nation, and the only way in which it can be properly accomplished is for all our people to unite and press forward to the goal of success. In that result, whether the co-operation of the good people of Quebec may be delayed for a longer or a shorter time, it is my conviction that Quebec will play her part, and it is gratifying to observe symptoms here and there that her people are themselves anxious that they should be represented in the administration of our national affairs.

I want to make a brief reference to my hon. friend the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). Like the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), I have a warm personal regard for the hon. member. When Union Government was about to be formed I made it my business to see influential members of the old Administration and urged very strongly that the member for Marquette should be included in the Cabinet. Whether or not my advice had any weight with the powers that be, he was included, and I am not quite so sure but that my advice may have had some weight. I have followed the hon. gentleman's course of action very carefully both while in office and since his retirement therefrom. I have generally regarded him as a man of blunt honesty and integrity, trying to do the best he can according to his lights. I think, however, with the ex-Minister of Finance, that my hon. friend is not quite so sure just where he is getting to on this tariff question. I am an older man than he, and for his benefit I may tell him that I went through the same experience that he is now going through. I was brought up in the strict Liberal school at the feet of the Hon. George Brown, the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie and others, and I believed in free trade. I had the "bug" good and strong, Mr. Speaker. I thought the entire tariff was a curse to the country and should be wiped out. In fact, I had listened to my old friend Bob Watson and a lot of other so-called Liberal barnstormers through the country and come to the conclusion that the Tory party was a pretty bad aggregation. Running a newspaper as I did, I had a busy time keeping out of gaol when speaking my mind about the members of that party. I thought when my good friends the "so-called" Liberals—I suppose I had better use that term—came to office we would have every vestige of protection wiped from the tariff. That was the promise. Consequently, as a young man, I stumped my riding on a coal-oil can, practically telling the farmers that they were being bled white, and that if we could just get our party into office it would be all smooth sailing, for there would be no more tariff, they would have their boots and clothing, their cotton and wool free of duty, and instead of trading a bushel of wheat for a dozen of bananas or a gallon of coal-oil, they would get their coal-oil for fifteen cents a gallon and their bananas for about twelve cents a dozen. Imagine my disappointment, Mr. Speaker, when I came down to Ottawa to find that some of the leaders whom I thought quite as sincere as my friend the present leader of the Opposition, had changed face on the tariff. The question was not whether the duty on agricultural implements should be wiped out altogether because it was bearing very heavily on the farmers. On the contrary an emissary—to be frank, it was L. M. Jones himself—stayed with me nearly all Sunday to get me to agree to an increase in that duty, representing that the Government was willing. That is really what I was up against. It was not a reduction, it was an increase. If we pass by the 33⅓ per cent British preferential reduction, much of which was afterwards recalled, the total reduction made by our friends was 77-100 of 1 per cent. I remember being in the House when the present Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) analyzed the tariff and affirmed without contradiction that that was the total amount of the reduction.

Well, it set me thinking, and I had a pretty uneasy time. The late Dr. Landerkin and many of the rest of "the boys" would tap me on the back and say: "Young man, stand by your party." Well, I did try to, but it got too hot for me, and finally I differed from the party. I had a pretty hard time of it then, because I was told: "We have redeemed our tariff pledges; you are not a good Liberal and should resign; you have all that was promised you." I was expected not only to believe that, but to be pleased and to smile over it. To me it was a deep disappointment, because I had been up and down the country for years denouncing the tariff. I mention this particularly for the benefit of my good friend the member for Marquette (Hon. Mr. Crerar), who has started out to lead a party. I myself once started out to lead a party in the Northwest, but I did not get very far.

I noticed from my hon. friend's speech that it is beginning to dawn on him that the tariff cannot be—or, I should say, will not be—wiped out. I suppose it could, if you could elect a sufficient number of free traders, but the difficulty is that however sincere the member for Marquette may be in his desire to eliminate a great many evil things from the tariff—and I am heartily with him in that—he will find that the people generally will not follow.

Some of the members on the other side from the province of Quebec who applaud heartily when my hon. friend speaks about having the tariff lowered sat behind a Government that practised protection to the hilt, and if put to it to-day when their political existence was at stake, would do so again. That is the insincerity of the whole business. Of course, my hon. friend did say that he was not prepared to wipe it out at one fell swoop—I think that was his expression, if not, it was the substance of it. I am heartily in sympathy with my hon. friend's proposal that the duties should be removed from the implements of production. During the last twenty-five or thirty years I have not changed my views on this question. I would like to see the duties removed from the implements of production. I do not believe that it is possible at this time, owing to the condition of the country and to our international relations, to amend the tariff to the satisfaction of the strongest tariff reformer. So far as my influence and my judgment go, I am just as heartily in favour of a reduction of the tariff as is the member for Marquette. I have had a little more experience in connection with it than he has, and I know something about the tremendous difficulties that will meet him and will meet every strong tariff reformer at every turn of the road. But I repeat that so far as his campaign for having the duties removed from the implements of production goes, he has my heartiest sympathy and I will endeavour to assist in any reasonable way. The Government itself will probably so revise the tariff as to meet in a reasonable measure the aspirations of the West. I do not, however, like my hon. friend, look for such a revision at one fell swoop as will satisfy all people. But I want to say that probably his entry into politics as the leader of a group will have a very good effect in this country, because it is an excellent thing for a number of people or a party to forge strongly ahead in the direction of lower tariffs; it cannot fail to have its effect upon those who are inclined to go the other way.

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Temiscouata) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I should have abstained from joining in the debate on the Address, had not the Acting Prime Minister answered as he did to my question concerning Mr. Albert Sévigny.

I considered that the occasion was favourable for discussing that matter, and that the time had come to raise the question before its final settlement. But, Mr. Speaker, before broaching that subject, let me confess that the speech from the Throne at this session is a document quite in keeping with the Lenten season which is now on.

Never has anything so poor from the legislative viewpoint been submitted to the consideration of the House. It is true that this poor bill of fare comprises a joint of magnificent proportions: the Franchise Bill. However, while ignorant of its contents and judging solely from the record of its promoters I well foresee that only those members of Parliament favoured with the strongest constitution will be able to swallow that measure, while they must have the stomach of an ostrich to digest it.

In unison with my friend from Rimouski (Mr. d'Anjou), I raise my voice to protest in the name of the French race, against the forsaking of that admirable practice of calling on a French-speaking member to be the seconder of the Address in answer to the speech from the Throne.

From the earliest days, that ancient usage has always been held in honour in this House, and had it not been for the advent to power of a Union Government, the outcome of the wholesale theft of ballots, that practice would still hold good.

But, there is nothing to surprise us coming from an administration which has ignored the Constitution as well as old traditions and we would wonder how it is that they did not repeal that usage by Order in Council, as they have done for so many other things.

As a consolation we may reflect that in so doing they have saved our beautiful language the humiliating task of defending something which is indefensible—namely: the policy of this Government.

True, the Senate has been privileged as compared with the House of Commons, since the hon. gentlemen of that High Chamber were afforded the opportunity of listening to an eloquent speaker, the honourable Mr. Chapais. But there is satisfaction to be derived from the fact that the appointment of the Honourable Mr. Chapais to the Senate, is in itself an humiliation for the present Government. The Honourable Mr. Chapais was a recognized adversary of conscription; it is even stated that a year or two ago, he rejected indignantly an offer emanating from the then ministers of a seat in the Senate, as a protest against the almost devilish Bill of conscription which had been brought up before Parliament, not with a view to help win the war but for the purpose of stirring up in the English-speaking provinces an ill-feeling against Quebec.

The Government have thus partially confessed its blunder, by appointing to the Senate the very man who openly opposed conscription a few years ago.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another aspect of this question to which I cannot refrain from calling the attention of this House. It is this: Mr. Chapais' appointment to the Senate consecrates a return as it were to the old practice of the double mandate, which we all believed to have been discarded forever.

I blame the Government for allowing Mr. Chapais, an accomplished and cultured scholar as he is, to occupy at the same time the position of legislative councillor for Quebec and that of Senator at Ottawa.

We heard the other day, the hon. member for Frontenac championing in this House the cause of the hon. Postmaster General. And involuntarily the well-known line penned by the poet occurred to my mind and I started exclaiming:

"How into pure gold was the vile metal transmuted?"

Comment en un or pur le vil métal s'est-il changé?

I shall not pick up a quarrel with the Postmaster General about that. It is the crowning honour for the hon. minister to have his cause championed by the member for Frontenac, the relentless slanderer of the French race in this House, and with such a certificate, the minister may give up his senatorship and have himself returned to the House in any constituency, but never in the province of Quebec.

In Ontario perhaps? We harbour strong doubts about it.

But referring to the Postmaster General puts me in mind of his former nationalist and unionist colleague, Mr. Albert Sévigny, who aims at supplanting Mr. A. D. De Celles, as librarian of the Parliamentary library. Mr. De Celles is in all the vigour of manhood, after running a brilliant career in which so many gifted writers of the younger generation like to follow him as a master and a leader of thought.

Wherefore should Mr. De Celles be shelved, the more so as he does not ask for superannuation? Why should the people's money be squandered to no purpose? For, should Mr. Sévigny be appointed librarian, he will be paid the same salary as is paid to Mr. De Celles, but moreover a pension must be paid to the latter, who is still able to discharge his duties, as he has done so far with such great credit to the country and to our literature.

Has Mr. Sévigny the requisite qualifications to fill the position of librarian? I do not think so, Mr. Speaker.

An obscure lawyer, a second rate politician, a spiritless Minister of the Crown, and a Speaker of this House, with all that is involved in the disgraceful scenes which are a matter of public notoriety, has Mr. Sévigny produced a single work which may show that he is entitled and qualified to fill the responsible position of librarian of this Parliament?

With all those who knew Mr. Sévigny, I answer: No; and the Government should look twice before making the proposed change.

At this stage of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I want to speak in English so that the ministers at their seat may understand what I want to say about Mr. Sévigny and the position of Librarian.

I warn the Government that if Mr. Sevigny is placed at the Library, when the Liberals come into power and after the next election, we would be at your right, Sir, I, for one, and many like me, will insist upon our leaders to cancel that nomination and have the position filled by one that deserves such a position and can show the record of a man and not the record of a Victrola.

Mr. Speaker, the Government is giving a trial to State ownership of railways. So far, the experiment has not proved a tremendous success, and if we are to believe the latest reports, we are going to face a deficit of twenty million dollars.

And no wonder, if we are to judge from the way the business is managed. We had in the city of Rivière-du-Loup splendid locomotive and car shops which had cost over half a million dollars and in which nearly two hundred men worked successfully.

With a view to accommodating the engine works and the employees, the city council of Rivière-du-Loup had municipalized electricity and the water-power, and shouldered a heavy debt.

But when the locomotive and engine works had to be accommodated at St. Malo, in the interest of the National Transcontinental and the Northern Canadian, the Joliette works were closed, 25 machinists were removed from the Rivière-du-Loup shops and 105 men were ordered away from the latter place, to be transferred to St. Malo from now up to May 1.

The removal of a hundred employees, many of whom with families, that means a loss of over 500 people to rivière-du-Loup. Shops are degraded, a city is ruined, a minority of tax-payers are staggering under a heavy debt, which to a large degree has been created in the interest of the shops and employees removed from the city; a whole division is disorganized, everything is thrown into confusion, and now people wonder that so many railway accidents occur on the Northern Canadian and such disorder in the administration is prevailing.

In view of such mismanagement by the Canadian Northern Commission, which had pledged itself not to interfere with the interests of Rivière-du-Loup, all that remains for us to do is to register our protest today, to protest again when the Railway Estimates come before the House, and to go on protesting, until justice is done to the city of Rivière-du-Loup.

Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the leader of the Opposition on having brought down the amendment which we are requested to consider. It was about time to reassure public opinion, poisoned as it was, every day, by newspapers devoted to the ministry. We could read, every day, that the Liberals were eager to go to the people. Well, this amendment will bring that legend to an end, and the public, anxious to get rid of the incapable men by whom we are governed, will feel grateful to the Liberal party for having so gallantly demanded an election.

In concluding my remarks, Sir, I may point out, as the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe has said, that the province of Quebec is biding its time, not for purposes of revenge, for we, in the province of Quebec, are ignorant of that word, for the reason, first, that it is unchristian, and that it does not suit the chivalresque nature of the French race; but we are biding our time to ascertain whether the insulters of the eve and the would-be peace-makers of the morrow are sincere or not, whether their regrets dwell in their hearts or on their lips, and then, but then only shall we choose our allies. All we ask in the province of Quebec, is that our religion, our language and our customs be respected, that we should be treated on an equal footing; we are born of a race which has no reason to be ashamed of its past, we who wish to remain the loyal subjects of the Empire, but with all the liberties implied in that status. When this has been understood by the enemies of our race in this country, we shall have peace and justice, harmony and liberty in a rejuvenated Canada soaring towards the brightest destinies which it is possible for a country like ours to dream of.

Mr. ROBERT JAMES MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I unfortunately have not sufficient facility in the French language to follow completely the speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Gauvreau), but I must say that I am sometimes struck with the fact that there are people in Quebec and people in Ontario who think too much of their respective provinces and forget the Dominion of Canada as a whole. I personally have and always have had, and I hope always will have, the most friendly feelings for the people of Quebec, and I think those from that province who know me understand that I have those feelings. But I have no sympathy—I am not referring to my hon. friend (Mr. Gauvreau)—for any man from Quebec who is an extremist any more than I have sympathy for the man from Ontario who is an extremist.

The hon. member made a statement regarding the appointment of a librarian. I do not know Mr. Sévigny; I have no knowledge of him whatever; I have never met him; but I take it from the remarks of the previous speaker that, if it is necessary to have Mr. DeCelles, who is a personal friend of mine, and for whom I have the highest esteem, replaced—and I trust that will not be necessary, because I think a great deal of him—my hon. friend would object to Mr. Sévigny receiving the appointment. He did not give his grounds for his objection, but I sincerely hope that he is not objecting merely on the grounds of differences of political opinion.

I should like to join with those other speakers who preceded me in offering my felicitations to the mover and the seconder of the Address. It is true that hon. gentlemen to whom the honour falls of moving and seconding the Address are expected, as a rule, to speak in generalities; but when the generalities are placed upon such a high plane, and when they are full of so many ideals to which we should all aspire as were the speeches of the hon. gentlemen a few days ago, we may well rejoice that such capable members have been chosen to move and second the Address.

I should also like to join with those who congratulated ourselves on having the privilege of being members of this Parliament when we moved from the old Museum building into this magnificent edifice. While I join in the congratulations which have been showered upon the architect of this building, I should at the same time, even at the danger of lèse majesté upon architecture, like to sympathise with those hon. gentlemen who occupy the thirty or forty feet of this chamber furthest removed from you, Mr. Speaker, because when any one sits down in that thirty or forty feet of this chamber straining his ears to try—and often vainly—to catch the faintest echoes of some of the whispered conversations which are carried across the floor of this House, he realises that in the construction of this chamber utility was more or less sacrificed to beauty. When I first came into this chamber the other day and sat at this end of it, I was reminded by the distance that you, Sir, were from myself and the difficulty that I had in realising that it was you instead of one of the page boys sitting in the Speaker's chair, of a little incident that happened to me some years ago in the city of New York. I had walked into the rotunda of a hotel and there met a friend of mine who had the previous night visited the Metropolitan Opera House for the first time. He had paid four or five dollars for a seat in a rear balcony to hear Caruso and Farrar, and in telling me something of the distances of the building, he said, disgustedly: "Honest to George, I was a quarter of a mile from the stage." I thought of that incident when I came into this chamber the other day, because the distance seemed almost as great. Therefore, while I congratulate the architect on the beautiful Gothic lines of the building, I sympathize with the hon. members who sit in that thirty or forty feet of which I spoke, and if I may offer any suggestion to the powers that be, I would suggest that they arrange the seating so that the members of whom I speak may not be entirely excluded from participating in the proceedings of this House.

I have listened with a good deal of interest to the discussion so far in this debate on the Address. As is usual on an occasion like this, almost every subject worthy of discussion has been touched upon, and, I think, despite criticism, that is as it should be, because there is no other time so suitable for discussing a variety of subjects as the early days of a session, when members have an opportunity of offering suggestions to the Government and to this Parliament. I have no intention of giving any long dissertation on any of the subjects which have been discussed; in fact, I shall occupy very few minutes of the time of the House and shall discuss only two or three, or four at most, of the points touched upon in the discussion of the speech from the Throne.

First, with regard to the amendment offered by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). That amendment in brief is to the effect that the Government should pass a franchise Bill and then bring about a dissolution and go to the country. The leader of the Opposition has been accused of playing politics in this amendment inasmuch as it is claimed that he has no fear of it carrying in this House, and therefore the question is not to be put to trial. I do not accuse him of that, because it is a disputed question whether or not we should go to the country at the present time. I think there are arguments on both sides of the question. However, I have discussed the question in my own constituency with many men who were followers of this Government, Liberals and Conservatives, supporters and friends of mine; and most of those with whom I discussed the question thought that we should not go to the country at the present time. One man who has always been a Liberal, and who I think will support the leader of the Opposition in the next election, expressed himself so strongly as to say that if we went to the country at the present time it would be an unpatriotic act. I must confess that when I hear the argument of patriotism on a question of this kind, I think that possibly there was something in what Dr. Johnson said. But I mention these things simply to show that there are great differences of opinion on this question, and as far as I have been able to gather, the majority opinion is against an election at present.

[Mr. Manion.]

One thing about the amendment that has struck me as rather strange is this: It is in effect a vote of want of confidence, yet proposes that after the Government is given a vote of want of confidence by this House it should still go on and legislate, and put on the statute books of this country a new Franchise Act. That seems to me a little strange, because if a vote of want of confidence were given, the Government would likely dissolve at once and would not attempt to put any legislation on the statute books. To my mind, irrespective of what has been said by other members, the two main arguments against the amendment are these: First, the Franchise Act is not, as implied in the amendment, the only important business to come before the House this session. There are a number of other very important matters which I think should be dealt with before this Parliament dissolves or even prorogues. One important matter that should be dealt with this session is an increase in pensions for disabled soldiers, and more particularly an increase in pensions for dependents of soldiers who lost their lives at the front. In the last session of this Parliament, the Special Committee which was appointed on Re-establishment, brought in a report that the mothers and children of soldiers who had died at the front were inadequately pensioned, and yet so far the Government and this Parliament have done nothing to make those pensions adequate. To my mind, that is a very important matter, and I do not think the House should prorogue before dealing with it.

Then there is the question of shipping, and the question of the Civil Service Act. There are 60,000 Civil Service employees in this country, and according to the press they are very much dissatisfied that classification has not been adopted or disposed of in some way. Then there is another matter on which I think this Government has been lax, and on which I hope they will bring down a policy very soon, and that is the development of our natural resources—a subject which I have brought up on a number of occasions in this House. Perhaps that is not as pressing as a number of other subjects, but I have named two or three, in addition to the new Franchise Act, which should be dealt with by the House as promptly as possible.

Another reason why I do not support this amendment is that, to my mind, it is a vote of want of confidence in the Government, and I have had no particular reason for thinking I should vote want of confidence in this Administration. Political life at any time is not distinguished for the gratitude shown to its participants, and so far as I am concerned, I have no desire to be one of those to say to the members of this Government: Here are your hats, and there is the door. I feel they have done their best, honestly and fairly to give good Government to this country, and I was pleased the other day to hear the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) make the statement, and I believe sincerely, and it was repeated this afternoon by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) with equal sincerity, I believe, that this Government has given to Canada the best government it ever had. Another thing that struck me when the Acting Prime Minister made that statement was this: So far as I remember, in the political life of this country there has hardly ever been a government of either political colour of which some member, whether rightly or wrongly, has not been accused of grafting or dishonesty, but I have yet to hear of any shadow of accusation of graft or dishonesty levelled against any member of this Government. I have, therefore, no apologies to make for voting against this amendment, and no apologies to make that I have so far given an honest and fair support to this Government. At the same time, while I am not at all convinced that there is the urgent necessity for an election which is implied in the amendment of the leader of the Opposition. I think that after this session of Parliament it is the duty of this Government to give very serious consideration to the claims that the Union Government has fulfilled the purposes for which it was elected, and that it is time for the people to be given a chance at the polls to elect a group of men, perhaps this same group, or a different one, to handle the affairs of this country. I am not absolutely convinced that the election that is spoken of in the amendment should be indefinitely postponed, because, after all, in a democracy the people must have some say in running the country. Therefore, I repeat, the Government should give serious consideration to that question, and if they feel that the demand for an election is as widespread as it is claimed to be by some, it should be their duty to think of going to the country and giving the people an opportunity to express themselves at the polls.

Regarding the Franchise Act, I think two sentences will suffice, and I think they will cover pretty well what most members on both sides of the House feel regarding a franchise Bill. First, it should be fair and honest, and should be based on sound Canadianism; and the machinery for operating the Act should be as fool-proof and as crook-proof as possible. Furthermore, I think the Government should keep faith with any men and any people to whom they have given a promise, so long as those people have neither been disloyal nor done anything detrimental to good Canadian citizenship.

Now I am going to tread on dangerous ground, particularly for a young member like myself; I refer to the tariff. We have listened in this House for some days now to views upon the tariff, some of which were extreme on opposite sides. We have heard the extreme free traders of the West, or one or two of them, and a few extreme protectionists from the East. I am of the opinion that the sane moderate minded people of this country, and I think that means the majority, will not allow this question to be settled either by extreme protectionists of the East or by extreme free traders of the West. I believe that they will ultimately demand that a thorough investigation be made of this question and that the findings of that investigation be utilized as far as possible in framing a scientific tariff of moderate proportions. In that connection there are three principles which appeal to me. First, any industry of which there is no hope that it will ultimately get to the stage where it does not need to be pap-fed, the stage where it can compete with industries of like nature in other parts of the world, should not be given protection. No further attempt should be made to build it up. The fact that there are a number of industries in this country which have been highly protected for forty or fifty years, and which still claim to be infant industries, is one of the reasons why a great many of the moderate-minded people of this country feel a little disgust with high protection. The second principle which appeals to me is that if fifteen per cent of protection is enough to assist a certain industry to compete with the same industry in the United States, there is no reason for giving an industry such as this thirty-five or forty per cent protection. If you give too high a protection to an industry such as this, you simply eliminate completely any competition from other countries, you enable the owners of the industry to overcharge the people of this country, and you may give rise to dangerous combinations in restraint of trade. In other words: A very high tariff gives no revenue to the country. This was well illustrated the other day in an item that I read from Windsor or Sarnia. The city being very close to Detroit, the people went across the border to get a good many of their supplies. Due to the fact that fifteen or sixteen per cent has been deducted from the value of our dollar by exchange and this amount being added to the existing thirty-five per cent of protection on a great many things that come into this country, there was a practically prohibitive tariff and it cut down the customs house receipts at that port by two-thirds of what they had been before. There was only one-third the quantity of goods being imported. This shows conclusively that a high enough tariff excludes goods altogether and gives no revenue; whereas, with a moderate tariff you would receive a certain amount of revenue as well as afford a certain amount of protection. The third principle is that your tariff on luxuries may be as high as you wish but your tariff on the necessaries of life should be as low as possible.

There is only one other subject that I wish to touch upon, very briefly, and that is the question of Canada's status in the League of Nations. Recently the hon. the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) and the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighten) have been making a number of speeches in the country that I think ought to appeal to Canadians. Canada's magnificent war record, the fact that she entered the lists among the very first to fight Prussianism and the fact that she gave more lives in the cause of freedom than did the United States, has not prevented some senators of the United States from suggesting that Canada should take second place to a number of unimportant countries, more particularly some Central American and South American republics. Here is the list of a few of the countries to which Canada is asked to take second place: Brazil, Bolivia, Cuba, Haiti, Liberia, Portugal, Peru, Denmark and the Kingdom of Siam. These are only a few that I might mention but they are much less important countries than Canada, they made very much less sacrifice than Canada, and in fact many of them made no sacrifice in the war whatever. I believe that the Canadian people are not in any mood to give up any of the attributes of nationhood which they won with the lifeblood of their sons.

The right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) has made the statement that in the near future there will be an Imperial Conference, and the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) stated the other day that it might be held in Canada; at which Conference the status of the self-governing dominions will be decided. Canada will have representatives at that Conference. There are two axioms which appeal to me as a native-born Canadian and which I think should be remembered by those representatives. One of those axioms is that under no circumstances must they agree to any arrangement which will lessen the autonomy, or self-governing powers, of this country. The second is that no great change in the constitutional relations of this country in connection with the other nations of the Empire or of the world shall be made without proper consultation with the Parliament of Canada and perhaps with the whole people of Canada.

For, Sir, Canadians are proud of the high position won by the magnificent services and immense sacrifices of their men at the front; they are jealous of that position which they must guard if they are to fulfil their destiny of building up on the northern half of this continent a great Canadian nation.

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD (Restigouche and Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I have followed with great interest the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the Throne, and it is my privilege to congratulate both the mover (Mr. Cronyn) and the seconder (Mr. McGregor) on the part which they have taken in it. The hon. mover has given this House much good advice but I am afraid his efforts to convince the supporters of the Government of his good intentions will have little effect. The hon. member advises us "not to fall into the mortal error of mistaking feeling for thought or of substituting mere passion for argument."

Into this new and beautiful building we members of the House of Commons should come with new ideas and never should we express views the adoption of which would not contribute to the welfare of the Canadian people. Since Confederation this Dominion of ours for some reason unknown to me; has been slow in its progress, except for a certain period. We have had great statesmen, we have great resources; our lands, our forests, our mines and our fisheries are equal to any in the whole world. We have developed to a certain extent many of our natural resources, we have built railways, and developed our harbours; our transportation facilities are equal to the demand to handle in a comparatively satisfactory manner the products of the country. What is wrong? The policy of the present Government? We are asking the Government to-day to make an appeal to the people of this country. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has faith in the Canadian people and we are asking for an appeal to them which will be refused, I am sure, by the supporters of the Government. We can trust the people. If we do not do so we have no right to be here.

There is great unrest in the country, especially amongst the returned soldiers. What are the reasons for that unrest? One great reason is that many of our men came back from the front in poor health with very little means of subsistence and since their return a great number of them have had to be supported by their relatives. They spent months and years in the trenches at a dollar and ten cents a day, whereas in this country lots of people have made millions of dollars. The war has impoverished many and has enriched certain classes. What we need in this country is a large influx of immigrants, not artisans—immigrants who can engage successfully in the great industry of agriculture. These new comers should be drawn from the rural districts of the old country and not from the cities, of whose denizens we have had too many in past years.

What must be termed the great calamity of the present century is the ambition of some people to make too much money. We have been fighting for the cause of humanity and to ameliorate the condition of the smaller nations. To-day in Europe widows and orphans are stretching out their hands to the United States and Canada asking for bread and clothing. The currency of those countries has been so much debased that it is worth very little at the present time, and thousands of these poor sufferers are actually in need of the necessities of life. It is really too bad when realizing how many thousands of men have been sacrificed in the recent great struggle that we are taking such little interest in their poverty-stricken families. Now that the war is over we must forget class feeling and antagonism and go to the rescue of the nations that are so greatly in need of assistance, especially those that we reckoned as our allies.

There is something wrong with our commercial system when it is possible for such great sufferings to occur without the means of redress. Foch has said that "equality of gold should follow equality of blood," and in this sentiment I concur. It is rather amusing, Mr. Speaker, to hear some of the great financiers of this country calling upon the Government to cease borrowing money —to hear them preaching economy and hard work by all classes. I remember not very long ago reading an expression of some such views by Sir Edmund Walker. I wonder if this is the same gentleman who advised the Government not to borrow money when we were buying the Canadian Northern railway. Lord Beaverbrook has called upon the women of the world to give up their gold in order to save the country. These also are noble sentiments. Are these people sincere? I hope they are, but they should at least be prepared to practise what they preach.

It is very timely to ask the question, what is wrong with the country? The more we inquire the more we learn that the National Policy of the present Government has not given satisfaction. There is unrest and dissatisfaction abroad, and an appeal to the country will permit of an unmistakable and unequivocal expression from the people. Therefore the amendment before the House is very timely. By appealing to the people we shall show our confidence in them and we must not fail to respect their views. The popular verdict will be for the advantage of Canada. The present Government seems to entertain a fear of the people at the present time, and does not want an appeal to the country. That in itself seems to suggest that there is something wrong. Let us appeal to the people at once. Let us ascertain what they think of the high cost of living, and whether they are not in favour of reducing the present high taxes on the necessities of life, the imposts on clothing, boots and shoes, farming implements and so forth.

In conclusion let me say that I shall vote for the amendment in the hope that by its means we shall be able to appeal to the people and ascertain what their views are on the vital questions of the day.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): I would like at the outset to join with other hon. gentlemen, even at the risk of being a little tiresome, in congratulating the mover (Mr. Cronyn) and the seconder (Mr. Mcgregor) of the Address upon their notable contributions to the debate. The effort of the mover was, I think, worthy of that great relative of his, who for so many years adorned the popular Chamber and whose voice was so successful in the past in shaping the policies of one of the great political parties. The hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn), in moving the Address, brought to his task a great deal of ability, a great deal of study, and produced a finished effort creditable alike to him and to his great relative Hon. Edward Blake.

I would like also in passing to offer my congratulations to the leader of the Opposition who has this session for the first time taken the actual lead of his party. As that hon. gentleman looks back over the names of the illustrious men who have adorned the position he now occupies I hope that he may be stimulated to guide his party wisely, sanely, and well.

Before proceeding further I would like to associate myself with other hon. gentlemen in supporting the stand taken by the different members of the Government in opposing what is known as the Lenroot resolution in the American Congress. Canada has gone too far in its progress amongst the nations of the world to be content with a position restricted merely to the northern part of this continent, and before the present session prorogues I would like to see a resolution passed by the House backing up the Government's stand and insisting that Canada be given her full status as a nation of the British Empire.

I feel like apologizing to the House by entering upon the discussion of matters that more properly pertain to the Budget—

Mr. CLARK: Not at all.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON—but I agree with the member for Red Deer that the debate on the Address is the great "free for all" the great opportunity that members have of laying before the House, and consequently before the country, at the beginning of the session, their ideas, in order that the Government may shape its policy according to the wishes of the people. And it is for that reason and partly to correct some misstatements that have been made in this House that I ask you at this late hour to bear with me for a few minutes while I discuss matters which as I said, more properly belong to the Budget debate

Now, Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said, and I think rightly said, in this debate about the exchange situation not only in Canada but throughout the world. It has been rightly said, I claim, because that is one of the disturbing influences in commerce to-day. I may say that I think the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) was a little bit hasty and, perhaps, a little bit sarcastic in telling the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) that he did not know even the A.B.C. of the economic principles that govern these matters because that gentleman asked him a simple question or two. I was especially astonished a few minutes later when the hon. member for Marquette asked the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) a question which, to use an expression of his own, was simplicity itself. He asked the hon. minister to explain how it was that previous to 1911, when Canada had an adverse trade balance, her exchange was at par or nearly so—not knowing evidently, as he should have known, if he had gone at all into this question, that previously to that year Canada had been borrowing some five or six hundred million dollars a year from the Old Land.

What are the principles underlying the depression in exchange to-day? The first principle is, of course, the post-war conditions which have led to a heavy adverse balance of trade in many places; another, the abandonment of the gold redemption made necessary by the large issue of paper money; and a third, the diminution of the gold reserve, made necessary in many countries by the export of large quantities of specie. I might say, in passing, that I was rather surprised to hear the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) state that an adverse balance of trade of any kind had, in his opinion, very little to do with the exchange situation.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Might I explain to my hon. friend that I ought perhaps to have been a little more explicit in my statement. I am sure that my hon. friend would not wish to misunderstand, and still less to misrepresent me. When I said that in my judgment there was little connection between the so-called adverse balance of trade and the adverse exchange rate, I meant, and I thought the House would understand me as meaning, that there was little connection as between cause and effect. My hon. friend is a medical man and knows the difference in disease between a cause and a symptom. I meant there was little or no connection between them as related to cause and effect, and I thought I explained afterwards that they are both symptoms of a disease, the characterization of which I did not wish to attempt.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that I am the last one who would wish to misrepresent the hon. member for Red Deer. His statement was that before 1911 Great Britain always had an adverse balance of trade, that the British sovereign "spoke all languages," and that British credit was the highest in the world. My point is simply that had it not been for other conditions British exchange would not have been at par. I am sure he will agree with me when I state that before 1911—and even now for that matter—Britain was the great carrying nation of the world, and it was the receipts from her great mercantile marine that helped to keep the British sovereign at its high point. Then may I remind him also that not only was Britain the great carrying nation of the world, but she was the great money market of the world, and the interest on her foreign loans was also a great factor in keeping British exchange from where it would have been had she relied only on her trade. Before the war Great Britain had no less than $19,000,000,000 loaned to other countries. When we conceive of the interest on that vast sum and take into consideration, as I said, the large receipts from her shipping, we have there the reason why the adverse balance of trade was offset and the British sovereign stood on the highest pinnacle of finance.

And I might just add this for the comfort of those who have any doubt as to the ultimate solution of this exchange question. Great Britain is still the great carrying nation of the world, and she is still, in spite of her external debts, the great money market of the world. The $19,000,000,000 that she had loaned to other countries before the war has been reduced, it is true, but it is still somewhere in the neighbourhood of $13,000,000,000, while her external debts are in the neighbourhood of $6,000,000,000, leaving a balance in her favour of about $8,000,000,000 in foreign lands. I am confident that in the near future British exchange is going to rapidly recover—in fact, it is rapidly recovering now, and I think inside of the next twelve months we will have an entirely different state of affairs as far as Great Britain is concerned, and possibly by that time the British sovereign will have regained its old place. Why do I say that, Mr. Speaker, I have already given you two reasons for the cause of the present exchange situation. A third reason, to my mind, will be the great tourist traffic to see the battlefields, which will help to increase the value of the British sovereign.

Another factor is this, and it is of importance in its bearing not only on this country but on nearly every country with which Great Britain will do business, and what I say regarding Great Britain will apply in a more or less degree to Canada: At a word from the war office in 1914 the whole machinery of Great Britain was scrapped. What took its place? Instead of machines requiring skilled mechanics behind them, the best brains of Great Britain were put to work to produce fool-proof machinery. They succeeded. They have also increased their army of working men by hundreds of thousands. These men have been taught to use the lathe, the micrometer and the gauge, and where before you had tens of thousands of skilled men you now have them in their hundred thousands. She has also greatly improved her ports and her railways—this affords me an opportunity of congratulating our Government on their shipbuilding programme and their amalgamation of our railways, because I think that policy is going to be a great factor in our national trade—I say that Great Britain has improved her ports, she has improved the calibre of her working men and of her machine shops, she is still the great money market of the world and the great carrying nation of the world; and when she gets through, as she will before very many more months, buying millions of dollars every day of food and materials from the American republic and paying for them in cash, not for herself but to turn over to the starving nations of Europe on credit, we will have a different condition in the exchange situation of the world. What applies to England will apply more or less to Canada. If the time comes in the near future when we can collect from Britain, the exchange situation so far as Canada and the United States are concerned will very rapidly improve. I say, therefore, that the time is coming when we shall not be able to buy cheaply from Great Britain and sell to advantage to United States, on account of the exchange rate.

I see difficulties and dangers for Canada as a result of this condition. The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) pointed out this afternoon what we all, of course, know, that the German mark has depreciated from about twenty-three cents down to about one cent. Only to-day or yesterday we have seen in the press a report to the effect that the Supreme Council of the Allies are arranging for a large industrial loan to put Germany on her feet. That loan is to have priority upon the assets that were to secure the liability of Germany to the Allied nations. When Germany gets established, if the exchange rate is anything like what it is now, I see difficulty in Canada's upholding her position in the commercial world. I was told last session—probably many of you have heard of the same thing—that a certain firm needed a certain kind of machinery which in this country or in United States would cost $2,600. They bought it in Germany, paid the duty and practically had it set down in their work shops for $650. I make no comments upon the patriotism of that firm; they were probably doing good business. But I do say that the difficulty involved in the conditions respecting the exchange rate may be very hurtful to the industrial life of Canada.

The member for Marquette (Hon. Mr. Crerar) stated in so many words that what we called protection was a tax on the many for the benefit of the few. Mr. Speaker, I do not hold that opinion. A tax it may be, if you wish to call it so; but it is a tax to keep up the established industries of our country—industries which, as time has proved, are of great benefit to Canada. I do not think it is fair to repeat the assertion that moderate protection is a tax on the many for the benefit of the few. As the ex-Minister of Finance put it this afternoon, it is a machinery for developing our great industries and our great natural resources so that we can take the natural product worth one dollar, and, by the application of Canadian labour and Canadian skill, we can increase the value to three or four dollars, export the product and realize that increased value. I would like to see the products of our forests manufactured into lumber and pulp, a proper system of reforestation being carried on in the meantime. I would like to see a proper return obtained in Canada from our fisheries. I would like to see our wheat ground in this country so that the farmers could have the bran and shorts which they are so much in need of. I would like to see our minerals refined here; I would like to see Canada get the full benefit of her great natural resources. I am absolutely opposed to exporting our raw material to other countries. We have a very good example of the effect of that in Ontario. A few years ago American lumbermen would buy our logs, take them over to the other side and saw them there, the money being used to build up the American republic. What happened when that procedure was forbidden? The American mills moved over to this side; the work is done in Canada; the money is spent in Canada; Canada gets the benefit.

The member for Marquette went down to New Brunswick on the occasion of the last by-election there, and the press reported him as having advocated the abolition of all duties. I do not know whether or not they reported him correctly. I put the question to him on the floor of the House the other night and he said that if I would wait I would get an answer. I have patiently waited for the answer. When he came to that part of his speech in which he dealt with the raising of the revenue he laid down two planks in his platform. First he said he would tax luxuries. Yes; so we all would. But are they not taxed now? Not enough, my hon. friend says? Then I say tax them more; I would tax them to the highest possible degree. But I would remind my hon. friend that last year the value of luxuries that came into Canada was only $88,000,000; the revenue required if we do away with the protective tariff is $170,000,000.

Then, my hon. friend said that he put on an income tax. Have we not an income tax now? Perhaps it is not producing enough money; I shall not quarrel with my hon. friend if it is simply a matter of administration. But if the rate is not high enough, why does my hon. friend not say how high he would put it? He was a member of this Government when these taxes were being imposed; did he ever oppose them as being too low? These, then, are the only two methods that he suggests of raising the $170,000,000 to take the place of the protective tariff. I shall refer later to what that would mean to the poor man of this country, to the working man, to every man. If there is one thing this Government and every Government have to do, it is to keep their hands off the farmer's means of living. He finds it hard enough to live as it is.

The member for Marquette also said—I think I am quoting him correctly; I would not like to do otherwise—that eighty per cent of our revenue was raised by taxation of foodstuffs. I am not just sure that he used the word "foodstuffs," but that is the meaning I took out of what he said.

Mr. M. CLARK: For consumption.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: I thank the hon. member for the correction. I have taken the trouble to go through the tariff to a certain extent, and I want the House to bear with me for a few moments while I cite some of the items. I am speaking now of revenue. Last year we raised on spirituous liquors, wines, sparkling and non-sparkling, which are getting rapidly to be a thing of the past, alcoholic perfumes, silks, fruits, green and dried, nuts, jewellery, $11,731,000. I may be met with the statement that these were for consumption. Some of them no doubt were, but I do not think they were in the class referred to by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr.

Crerar). With regard to the duty on coal—and of course the House knows that this refers chiefly to soft coal used by railways, factories and so on—we raised $7,594,000 last year. On iron and steel products—and in this I am eliminating all farm implements, over $25,265,000 was collected. On a number of items such as blacking, brushes, cartridges, rifles, pistols, cineomotograph (moving picture) films, fancy goods, jewellery, musical instruments, optical instruments, photographic supplies, small express parcels, pencils, polishes and a number of other miscellaneous articles, $5,455,000 was collected. On animal and vegetable products such as furs, feathers, etc., $4,315,000 was collected. On plated ware, silver and such like, we collected $3,054,000. On ores, metals and metal manufactures other than iron and steel, we collected $6,250,000, and on wood, wood products and paper, we collected $5,090,000. If we total all this up, including the war tax, we shall find that in groups of that kind we collected last year duty amounting to no less than the large sum of $90,000,000. I have not the least doubt in the world that if I had had time to go through the list and pick them out, I could have added to that list materially, but I think I have produced sufficient evidence to prove to this House that the statement referred to is, to say the least, not very accurate. I object to statements going out to the country that 80 per cent of the revenue of Canada is collected on articles of consumption. When we make in this House statements that are going out to the press and to the people of this country, we ought, at least, to try to be fairly accurate.

I come to the revenues to which some of our friends object most. I refer first to the revenue collected on boots and shoes. I have not been able to get the latest figures for this year, but the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) last year placed upon Hansard some figures that I think hon. members ought to remember. He quoted from the latest returns of that date, and we find that only $934,000 or less than a million dollars, had been paid in duty on boots and shoes entering Canada. There are two classes of boots; there is the ordinary boot such as the farmer's or workingman's boot, and then there is the high-class boot. On the first class to which I refer it will be found that only about $3,000 was paid in duty. That is, only $3,000 was paid in duty on workingmen's shoes that come into this country. What does that mean? It means that the Canadian-made boot was either a better or a cheaper article and evidently a better seller than the American boot. My hon. friends may say, as probably they will, that that indirectly contributed to the manufacturers' profit. I am not here to defend the manufacturers; I am not interested in their case; I am interested only in the general welfare of the people of this country. I am not a manufacturer not related to any manufacturer; neither do I own any stock in any of their institutions; but I am interested in the question of what is fair and just in the general interest of Canada, and when the Government of this country collects a duty of only $3,000 upon the shoes of all the workingmen of this country, that duty is not excessive. The hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Euler), I think, last year also placed on Hansard figures in regard to this matter, and he showed that the difference in price between the high class shoe in Canada and the same shoe in the United States was only about equal to the duty that is paid on the raw material. I am not arguing for the manufacturers, but I say that the hon. member's statement has never been contradicted, and if it be true, it shows that the tariff is not a means of putting money into people's pockets as it is sometimes claimed it is.

I want just for a moment to refer to agricultural implements. Let me say here again that I am quoting from the speech made by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) the figures he put on Hansard last year showed that the total duty paid on agricultural implements, including the war tax of 7½ per cent, was only $6,117,000, or equal to about 7 cents per acre. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) I think it was, made a similar statement at the same time, namely, that the duty paid by the average man in the West on agricultural implements, figuring the farm at 355 acres, was only $25. I am not assuming that is too much or too little, but I do not think it is excessive. I want to remind the House that these figures are the figures preceding the reduction of last year, and, as hon. members know, last year there was a reduction in duty from 27½ per cent to 17½ per cent, and in some cases, to 15 per cent.

Let me point this out in passing. Last year there came into this country free of duty no less than $390,000,000 worth of goods, and that is something I think our friends opposite ought to remember. Another fact that might interest hon. members is that last year in the three western provinces there were no less than 100,000 automiles. If we value them at, say $1,000 apiece, we would have $100,000,000 invested in automobiles.

I do not think the provinces that can invest $100,000,000 in automobiles should grumble very much in post-war days at paying a few dollars duty on agricultural implements, when we have in Canada a population of 8,000,000 and a debt of two billion dollars. Suppose we take the hon. member at his word and wipe out all this duty and raise by direct taxation the $170,000,000 that we now raise by the tariff. I am interested more in the workingman than anybody else, and what would that mean for the workingmen of this country? It would mean $21 per head, and taking the average family as five—husband, wife and three children—you would have a tax of $105 per family per year. Do you think such a tax should be placed on the workingmen of this country? I do not. Furthermore, when you take into account those who cannot pay, how large a tax would you have to impose on the people who could pay?

Suppose you put a tax on farm lands. The farm lands of Canada are valued at about $4,000,000,000. It would mean that we would have to impose a tax of 4½ per cent on farm values, which on a farm worth $5,000, which is the average price set by the Soldier Settlement Board, would mean an annual tax of $225 on every farm. Are our friends willing to pay that?

We have to have a policy in this country that will develop all our resources, so that we may stand as a unit before the world. While agriculture is the basic industry in Canada, it is not everything. I have in my hand statistics for 1919 of agricultural and manufacturing valuations. First, take agriculture. I find that the capital invested in land was $2,792,229,000; buildings, $927,548,000; implements, $387,079,000; and live stock, $1,102,261,000—or a total of $5,209,117,000. The total agricultural production that year was $1,546,541,000. It is something we should be proud of and should encourage in every possible way, but is not the only thing. Let me remind the House that 85 per cent of the production of our farms is consumed in Canada. Let us now look at the other side. The capital invested in the manufacturing plants of this country was as follows: Land, buildings and fixtures, $705,926,161; machinery and tools, $868,422,191; materials on hand, stocks in process, etc., $692,242,994; cash, trade and operation account, $520,058,381; or a total of $2,786,649,727. Production was no less than $3,015,577,940, making a grand total of over $5,802,000,000. So there is not so very great difference between the two after all. Last year the manufacturers had in their employ 692,067 persons, and they paid out in wages, $553,301,675. Taking the agricultural population of this country as 40 per cent of the whole, and figuring out the male population, we see that there are not very many more people engaged in agriculture than in the manufacturing industries of this country.

I do not want to be misunderstood. I am in favour of doing everything that can be done to promote the great basic industry of agriculture in this country. I agree with the hon. member for Marquette that we have as yet only touched the fringe. We have over a billion 400 million acres of land in this country, over 30 per cent of which is supposed to be arable, and we have under cultivation only the comparatively small area of 53,000,000 acres. I should like to see the whole available area under cultivation, and our western provinces filled with population of the right kind. This question of population is one of the big problems before this country. I have said before in this House that I believed if we took down the barriers and allowed people to come into this country we could double our population in a few years. I noticed the other day that the New York Herald stated that in the lifetime of people now living in Canada we would have a population of 50,000,000, and I do not think that estimate will be very much out. I have given these figures to show the importance of these twin industries, as I might call them, and in the hope that we may look at these things from a broad standpoint, rather than from the standpoint of how any particular section or province will be affected. Let us consider the matter in a broad way and without regard to the effect our decision may have on our political future.

I want to refer for a moment to the Franchise Act. The member for Marquette said we must have an honest franchise and honest machinery to operate it. So say we all, but he spoiled it by saying a few moments afterwards that he would give to Germans in Canada who had German brothers or other relatives fighting against us at the front the right to help determine the destinies of Canada even in the midst of a war. I want to register my most emphatic protest against any such proceeding. I am told by those who know that if the franchise had been extended to these people in 1917, as the hon. member proposes should be done, he would not be representing the constituency of Marquette in this House to-day; I do not know whether that is true or not. I know that the principle this country has to stand for in the future is that of sound Canadianism. The people will not stand for anything else. They will not stand for politicians keeping their eyes on their own constituencies, and framing a franchise that will re-elect them to this House to preside over the destinies of this country.

There is just one more thing and that is the amendment that is before the House. I do not have to tell this House, I hope, what I am going to do. I do not believe for one moment in the sincerity of this resolution. I do not believe that there are ten men outside of Quebec—no, nor five—who do. I ask the leader of the Opposition: Is he ready for an election in Ontario? What happened to his party in the last provincial election? What happened to the boast of the gentleman at present leading the Opposition in the province of Ontario who said he would put up a man against the Attorney General, the Minister of Agriculture and the Premier of the province? Ask the hon. member for East Kent (Mr. McCoig) what happened when that leader turned up in that constituency for the purpose of putting a man in the field. The leader was told to go home and mind his own business. As everybody knows, the minister got his election by acclamation. Does the leader of the Opposition mean to tell me that his member from West Lambton, or Middlesex, or East Kent, where they were practically wiped out at the last election, is ready to go back and appeal to the people? He may say so, but he does not mean it. Bad and all as the proposition is, I would have more respect for him but for his slander upon the health of the Prime Minister of Canada. What does he say? In effect this: We want to vote this Government out, but we will let them stay for a couple of months to pass a Franchise Bill. He knows, if he knows, anything, that inside of two months the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) will be back in this House. Why could he not have withheld his resolution till the Prime Minister was here? Would not that be the honourable, gentlemanly and sportsmanlike thing to do? The Prime Minister, who broke himself down in the service of this country in the great war, is away now trying to regain his health, and they come along with a resolution to vote him out of power. They ask this party to play the traitor to their leader during his absence. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) never said a truer word than when, in his speech the other day, he said that Sir Robert Borden was as real a casualty of the war as if he had served in the front line trenches. Yet they come along with a resolution to vote him out. If the leader of the Opposition had served in the trenches overseas with some of us, he would have known that it was not the custom of the Canadian boys to shoot down their leader who had been wounded on the field of battle.

Mr. JAMES McISAAC (Kings, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I desire to make a few remarks on the question before the House. I shall endeavour to confine myself reasonably close to the subject matter of this resolution. There are many questions of vast importance that could be discussed, and some of them have been discussed during the debate. I am sure there will be ample opportunity later on, when these different questions come up in their order, to give them ample consideration and discussion.

I wish even at this advanced stage of the debate to add my congratulations to those which have been so generously and deservedly accorded to the mover (Mr. Cronyn) and seconder (Mr. McGregor) of the Address before the House upon the admirable manner in which they have discharged the important duty resting upon them. I wish also to refer to that which constitutes the subject of the first paragraph in the speech from the Throne and to say a word, however humble, by way of congratulation to ourselves upon being able to assemble in these magnificent new Parliament Buildings. Buildings of this character constitute important elements in the history of every country and go far to afford some idea of the character of the people, their tastes and aspirations. This magnificent architectural pile, erected as the home of Canada's legislators, is destined in the ordinary course of events to continue for years to come, to pass down the ages and athwart the centuries, standing as emblematic of Canada's greatness. The vast extent of this magnificent structure, its architectural beauty and symmetry surely go far to symbolize our greatness, the loftiness of our hopes and aspirations for Canada's important, honourable and distinguished place in the galaxy of nations. Here we might say that this magnificent, this beautiful architectural treasure crystallizes the thought, the aspirations and the distinguished achievements of the great Canadian people. There is another thought that presents itself to me which may not be inappropriately associated with this subject, and it is that the rebuilding of this magnificent House of Parliament synchronizes, in greater part, with the heroic efforts of our soldiers abroad when they were writing glorious pages in the history of the Dominion and distinguishing themselves by their bravery, their prowess and sacrifices on behalf of Canada, the Empire and civilization.

The thought of war and the mention of battle suggests this other idea—that here, in this arena of the people, we strive one with another for the mastery, that we enter into combats not with mortal weapons but strive with intellectual rapiers, that one may win over the other. These struggles continuing down through the ages while the Parliament of Canada continues to meet and assemble in this stately building.

Having said so much by way of introduction I would like briefly to refer to some of the subjects touched upon in the speech from the Throne. So far as the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) is concerned, the speech did not seem to please him at all. He considered that it did not contain sufficient matter; he thought it was very meagre and that it constituted "a poor bill of fare." If I might indulge in a play upon words I think it was "a pretty fair bill." However, from the very start the leader of the Opposition found fault that there was not enough of the legislation intended to be discussed during the present session foreshadowed in the speech from the Throne. If I remember rightly, and if my knowledge is sufficient, I think it is not customary in our day to anticipate very much of the legislation to be submitted to Parliament in the speech that is placed in the mouth of the representative of His Majesty, because from day to day the facilities exist for expeditiously and easily placing before Parliament and the public the matters that may be decided upon by the Government for legislative action during any particular session. Therefore I do not think any serious complaint can be made on that particular score, and so the objection referred to is not very tenable or very well founded. The whole attitude of the leader of the Opposition, having reference to the subject matter of the speech and the course of the Government, was throughout one of dissatisfaction and fault finding. The hon. gentleman seemed to have drawn his inspiration from the sensational headings of articles in the newspapers and to have supplied what might therein be lacking by drawing upon his own lively imagination.

The hon. gentleman declared and repeated that the present administration led by Sir Robert Borden was unpopular and it was therefore time that it should resign. Let me discuss that point for a moment. The word "popular" has a variety of meanings and I think that perhaps, using the term in its best sense, it will be found on analysis and on investigation that the present Government is a most popular one. This is a Government that did things not only during the war but in peace times. It has been, and is still, engaged in great projects that tend to promote the national interests regardless of whether they may be popular or not. The carrying on of war, I think all will agree, is not a very popular undertaking. When Canada became involved in war and when it became necessary to do everything that was possible to draw upon the resources of the country and to strain every nerve to see that our share in the struggle should be in the highest degree successful it was altogether likely that the Government would be obliged to do a great many things that the leader of the Opposition and a great many other persons would not regard as popular. But the measures adopted by the Government were for the national interests, were for the maintenance of our liberty, were for the safety of our country and our Empire, and generally speaking, for the preservation of civilization. In order that our share in the struggle should be as full, comprehensive and successful as it was possible to be, the Government of Canada, under the leadership of Sir Robert Borden did everything that could be done, and they succeeded to an eminent degree in their undertakings.

It seemed to me that in the course of his address the leader of the Opposition scarcely mentioned the word "war." One would almost think from hearing his speech that there had been no war at all within the last few years. Certainly one would scarcely gather from what the hon. gentleman said that there had been anything of the kind. I do not know exactly what the hon. gentleman's attitude toward the war was. For all I know it may have been one of benevolent or inocuous neutrality. There was nothing it his speech to indicate that he was at all deeply interested in the triumphant outcome of the war, and that he would be willing to make any sacrifices or to put forth any extraordinary exertions in order that Canada's efforts might be successful.

The leader of the Opposition in his references to the Prime Minister seemed to consider that the latter should be here under all circumstances and at all times. I do not think such an argument is a very forcible or substantial one. If we consider the Imperial Parliament we all know that the British Premier, the Right Hon. Lloyd George is very frequently absent from the House at Westminster; and in the case of the leader of this Government there are ample reasons for his absence from this Chamber. Every one knows that the arduous labours of the Prime Minister, his extraordinary exertions, his long continued vigilance and his anxiety during the prosecution of the war that it might have a successful outcome and that Canada might succeed in all she had therein undertaken, as well as the important legislation that was rendered necessary after the war closed, broke down Sir Robert Borden's health, and he was obliged to seek in another climate the renewal of his strength and the regaining of his shattered health. Surely no one would be so ungenerous as not to afford the right hon. gentleman such respite as might be necessary in order to enable him to regain his health. I would like, for a moment, to point out that even some hon. gentlemen who have stated that they intend to vote in favour of the amendment of the leader of the Opposition have been sufficiently generous to accord the Prime Minister his due meed of praise for the most important part which he has played in the administration of the affairs of the country during the last five years.

I will quote first from the remarks of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) which will be found on page 151 of unrevised Hansard, where he says:

> I wish here and now simply to bear testimony to this fact that the Prime Minister of this country carried a burden which very few citizens of Canada appreciated, and discharged the most onerous tasks with a conscientiousness and sense of duty that certainly challenged the respect of those who were intimately associated with him.

Notwithstanding that the hon. member for Marquette intends to support the leader of the Opposition on this amendment, he is sufficiently fair minded, generous and truthful to make that declaration regarding the leader of the Government.

The hon. leader of the Opposition in the course of his speech said that this Government had no policy, and that it had no leader, and then in the next breath he said that it had three leaders. Let us take up the matter of policy and of leadership. What is the policy of the Government regarding the carrying on of our national affairs, and what is their position regarding the leadership? Not so long ago there was a locum-tenens in the leadership of the Opposition, and the real leader when he took his seat last session was a kind of supernumerary, so that we had the spectacle of the acting leader of the Opposition and his chief of staff conducting the business. I think we have a somewhat parallel case just now, There is the leader, then he has his chief of staff on his left, and he who was the acting leader is now relegated to third place, and I think, if I am sufficiently familiar with military terms, he fills the place of what might be called an adjutant or helper. Therefore we have the leader, the chief of staff and the helper —a delectable trinity to be sure!

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have the hon. leader of the Opposition concluding his speech by moving an amendment to the Address. It is quite proper and perhaps not unusual to move such an amendment, but it appears to me that an amendment of this nature surely should have some semblance of being based on a question of public policy. What is the public policy upon which this amendment is based? As the hon. member for Red Deer expressed it, it is made up largely of preamble. Well, Sir, preamble is not a very important question of policy. Then after all this preamble it winds up by saying:

> The regrettable protracted absence of the Prime Minister, the widely accepted belief that it is not his intention to return to the duties of his office—and so on make it necessary that this Parliament should be dissolved and a new Parliament summoned. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman was warranted in saying that he did not expect the Prime Minister might return to his duties. But of course that is in line with most of his expressions of thought throughout his speech, which is largely based on rumour, imagination and speculation. But we have had the very comforting intelligence communicated to us within the last few days that the right hon. Sir Robert Borden, barring unforeseen contingencies, will be back in this House before the session closes, in good health and ready to resume his leadership of the Government.

I would like also to refer to some remarks on this amendment by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), who is distinctly understood to be a leading member of the new party and who has expressed his intention to vote for the amendment. However, the hon. member is sufficiently generous to accord a meed of praise to the right hon. the leader of the Government. At page 177 of unrevised Hansard he says:

> I do not quite see the force of all the speech of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in supporting this amendment. Naturally, the speech partook of the nature of what I have ventured to call a preamble. Amongst other things he charged the Government with having no policy.

Further on he says:

> I did not, however, quite understand how my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition could be so light-hearted in charging the Government with having no policy, unless indeed he had gone on to tell what his own policy was.

The member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Levi Thomson) at page 189, adds his tribute of praise to the Prime Minister and expresses regret at his absence. He says:

> I am willing to give the Government credit for everything it has done, especially during the war, and am not inclined to condemn it for all its acts since the war terminated, because I recognize it has had to deal with exceedingly complex problems. The Government is now treading new and unbroken ground and its position is very difficult, very much more difficult than any previous Government in Canada has had to face.

These are the tributes of respect and appreciation that are accorded to the Government by the members of the third party, who intend to vote with the leader of the Opposition on the proposed amendment.

I should like to refer for a moment to the speech of the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie). As he delivered his speech he seemed to be light-hearted—in the very best of humour. It was a very moderate speech—moderate for him. It abounded in generalities. After listening to him and subsequently reading his speech I said to myself: 'Surely this is a very light performance for an hon. gentleman who occupied such an important position in the councils of his party, although now somewhat degraded from the high office that he held a year ago. I would go further; I would be disposed to regard his speech as a collection of political puerilities. I do not think that many sentences in it were worthy of being embalmed in Hansard. I noticed particularly that the hon. gentleman did not indulge in so many scriptural quotations as was his wont some time ago. I think he might, had he searched the scriptures, have found something that would fit right into his position at the present time. He might have found something like this: "Every one that exalteth himself shall be humbled." He might have found other texts that would be equally applicable. Although the hon. gentleman seemed so light and airy when he was delivering his remarkable speech, perhaps he was not in as good spirits as he would like to have us understand or believe. Perhaps in the secrecy of his chamber he was lamenting in sackcloth and ashes and quoting those words of the great dramatist which were put in the mouth of a really great man: "Farewell, a long farewell to all my greatness!" After listening to his speech I could easily understand why it was that, if I may be permitted to paraphrase the words of the wizard of the North,—

> —from his feeble hand
> Fell the borrowed truncheon of command.

There are several other matters to which I might refer, Mr. Speaker, but the night is somewhat advanced and I do not desire to trespass any further upon the patience of the House. I may say, in conclusion,—although it is, perhaps, not necessary for me to say it—that it will afford me great pleasure to vote against the amendment submitted by the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. WALTER DAVY COWAN (Regina): Mr. Speaker, at this late hour, I promise you, my remarks will be very brief. I intend to vote against the amendment submitted by the leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King), and to support the motion for the adoption of the address in reply to the speech from the Throne. I offer no excuse whatever for the course that I intend to pursue, in fact, I would have to offer an excuse to myself if I did not take that course. Why should I vote to turn the Government out of office?

The member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) made a statement this afternoon which was sufficiently important to be noted throughout the whole of the country. He said that no charge of corruption had been levelled against the present Government. In our section of the country, Mr. Speaker, the people demand ability on the part of their representatives and strict attention to business; but above all they demand honour, honesty and integrity, and these are things that we have found in the present Government. I have given some attention to political matters in days gone by, and I cannot recall an election fought at any time in connection with which charges of some kind were not made against the party in power, whether it were Grit or Tory. I do not say whether or not the charges were true, but this much I will say: that while the Opposition—that is, the direct Opposition—has opposed almost everything that the Government has submitted to the House, there has not been even a whisper against the honour, the honesty and the integrity of the members of this Government. That is one reason why I think the Government should remain in power. When I get a man who is naturally honest I want to keep him as long as I can.

Upon what policy has it been suggested by the Opposition or by the cross-benchers that we should appeal to the country? None that I know of. The only reason given is that we should appeal to the democracy of Canada. Well, Sir, it seems to me that this term "democracy" is being horribly overworked in these days. I recall that in the election of 1911 the members of the Tory party to which I belonged—and I offer no excuses for belonging to it; I am not ashamed of the Tory party—were charged with rolling the Union Jack around themselves and making patriots of themselves. The Opposition at that time said, and I rather agreed with them, that they did not have to get out on the housetops and holler out their patriotism; that they were patriotic and everybody knew it. I sometimes felt that they were right. I knew that I was a sufficiently good British subject and that I did not consider it necessary to inform people of that fact. Well, these very same gentlemen who told us at that time that they did not have to get out and holler their patriotism from the housetops are to-day shouting from the same housetops that they are democrats. I am sufficiently a democrat and sufficiently a believer in democracy to make it unnecessary for me to tell it to anybody. One of the reasons why I intend to support this Government is because in my humble opinion every piece of legislation that they have submitted to this House, without a single exception, has been democratic and in the interests of the common people of Canada.

At this late hour I will not go over the list. I am sorry that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) is not in his seat, because he comes with the latest expression of opinion from the people of western Canada, his constituency adjoining mine. I should like to know what he has brought back as an expression of opinion from the common, ordinary people of western Canada, a very democratic people, in regard to legislation which has been submitted to this House by the Government and which has been passed. Let me take for instance the question of woman suffrage. Was that a democratic measure? Was it a thing you would expect from an autocratic government? Autocratic, hon. members opposite call it, because, they say, it has made most of its legislation by orders in council. Just in parenthesis, let me say, in the language, I think, of an American, that sometimes we have to enthrone autocracy temporarily in order to save democracy, and that was the case while the war was on. During that period we were all willing to forgive a certain amount of autocracy. But to come back to the point I was making, let me ask whether the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould)—and the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) was in the West at that time and he can correct me if I am wrong—appealed to the electors of Assiniboia for election in opposition to that democratic measure, namely, woman suffrage? Not a bit of it. He knew better than to attempt to do so. He knew very well that the people were behind the Government in passing that Bill. And the same is true in regard to the Representation Act. At the time of that election this Parliament had before it the Grand Trunk Acquisition Bill. Was that a democratic measure? Was that in the interest of the Canadian people, to take from those who are generally classed as capitalists, and moneyed people, the control of one of the great railway systems of Canada and to vest it in the hands of the common people? Did the hon. member for Assiniboia in that constituency oppose the action of this Government on that particular occasion? I should like to see him or any other person dare to go out into any constituency in western Canada and oppose the Government on that Bill. Similarly, every other Bill that has been brought in by this Government and passed could have been fought out in that constituency. Was it? Never a particle of opposition—

An hon. MEMBER: Prohibition.

Mr. COWAN: You could not take a jug of whiskey into Assiniboia at all. I know that constituency sufficiently well to know that. The people would not have anything to do with it. I will only say that the hon. member for Assiniboia was not elected by whiskey, and if he had opposed the passing of the legislation which we did pass, he would never have been here. What then is the ground upon which—and tonight I am speaking chiefly to those cross-benchers from the province of Saskatchewan who have seen fit to leave this side and to go over there—they are opposing the present Government? There is only one question upon which there is any difference, and that is the question of the tariff, and I cannot understand the hon. gentlemen taking the position they do take when they do not know what is the policy of the Government which will be submitted to this Parliament on the question of the tariff. Had they waited until after that policy was announced, I could have understood their opposition to a course with which they did not agree. But to take opposition before the Government's policy was announced, on the only question on which there is any difference at all, is quite beyond my comprehension. On the question of the tariff, what is the difference? Free trade against protection? Oh, no. Why, even the leader of the cross-benchers says that he would not enact free trade at one fell swoop. Therefore, according to his own admission, free trade is an utter impossibility for this session or for this Parliament. If he means—and I think this is probably what he has in mind—that five, ten, fifteen, twenty or thirty years from now free trade may be a good policy for this country, then all I can say is that we have no mortgage on brains and ability, and hon. members who come here five, ten, fifteen, twenty or thirty years from now will be quite able to govern this country without our present assistance, and we can leave the future in their hands. What is the sense of speaking about a policy that we cannot enact and which my hon. friends admit we cannot enact at the present time? The only thing, therefore, that is left to us is a possible revision of the tariff, and I think everybody on this side of the House is agreed, because the Minister of Finance at last session announced as a policy of the Government that a revision of the tariff should be made at the earliest possible date, admitting, of course, that such abnormal conditions exist throughout the world at present that a satisfactory revision, one that would endure for any length of time, is quite out of the question. In parenthesis, however, speaking about free trade, let me note what the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) said in this House yesterday. To me, if I were a free trader, it would come as a body blow. The hon. member is probably the most consistent advocate of free trade we have in this House and, perhaps, in Canada. I like to listen to a man who believes in any policy, persistently advocating it, as he certainly does. He has a knowledge, which I wish I had of the question, but what did he tell us? Up to the present time he has been under the necessity of defending free trade; he believes in it and he has defended it consistently and persistently. But yesterday he was under an entirely different necessity; he had to prove that the adverse balance of trade is not responsible for the adverse exchange. What did he tell us? Why, he said if it were responsible for the adverse exchange, Great Britain long ago would have had an adverse exchange, because the balance of trade has been against Great Britain all these years. So, what free trade produces, is, according to his own admission, an adverse balance of trade. Just the day before an hon. member, I do not remember who, spoke of agricultural conditions in Great Britain under free trade, and he told us that thousands of acres of land had gone out of cultivation and required the stimulus of the war to bring them back to cultivation. Free trade giving us an adverse balance of trade! Free trade giving us depressed agriculture! For goodness sake, who has benefited in Great Britain from free trade? Are these the conditions the hon. gentleman wishes to have imported into this country for us to apply here? An adverse balance of trade and agriculture ruined! I hope not. But that is just in parenthesis. The hon. gentleman made the statement in order to prove that an adverse balance of trade does not produce adverse exchange.

Mr. M. CLARK: Mr. Speaker, I must rise to a point of order. My hon. friend is not quoting me correctly. I said, a so-called adverse balance of trade. I never for a moment admitted that the adverse balance of trade, so-called, was really adverse to Great Britain.

Mr. COWAN: The hon. member, however, admitted that there was an adverse balance of trade in Great Britain, and I think statistics prove that he is correct. Let me point this out to the hon. member, that all these years Great Britain has been building up a great monetary system until to-day she is—and she has been for years—the money market of the world, the result being that the wealthy people of Great Britain have their money invested in all parts of the world. Before the war, practically the whole national debt of Canada was carried by the moneyed men of Great Britain as were also the provincial and municipal debts, all our debentures being sold in Great Britain, and the same may be said of the United States, billions of pounds being invested in that country as in every other country in the world. But, while the adverse balance of trade existed, the interest earned was pouring into Great Britain in great streams and, in that way, counterbalancing the adverse balance of trade. The result was, as the hon. gentleman said, that "the sovereign spoke in all languages." That proves to me, and to every one I should think, that if we are going to exist as a nation we must produce those things that will make us, as far as possible, a self-sustained nation. That leads me to this conclusion, that it is up to us in Western Canada, instead of always cursing the financial interests and our system of protection, to turn in and take advantage of the privileges which are accorded to us under that system. If we develop the industrial resources of Western Canada, as I think we should, far more than we have ever done in the past—and I am certain we can do it—we shall be able to meet many of the objections which hon. gentlemen on the cross benches are urging.

Is the tariff responsible for all of the troubles we have in Canada to-day? Is it entirely responsible for the high cost of everything in this country to-day? If it is then I for one would say, let us wipe it out, because the cost of living in Canada to-day is exceedingly burdensome. It is the one great problem this Government ought to tackle just as quickly as it can, and through whatever medium it can. Let us take two or three articles for the sake of illustration. Western Canada is suffering most acutely from the excessive cost of lumber. In the little city of Regina, which is the most progressive city in Canada to-day, we shall spend in building this year $5,000,000. If the price of lumber were reasonable I believe we would exceed that by another $5,000,000. Our building operations will be limited solely by the price and supply of lumber. The cost is almost prohibitive to-day. Is the tariff responsible for that? Does the tariff come into it at all? As a matter of fact, lumber is free; it is only dressed lumber that is taxed. Is lumber coming into Canada or going out of it? There is no question at all that the export of lumber from Canada to-day is the cause of the high prices. Why then keep up this everlasting cursing of the tariff? Why not let us unite our efforts in discovering the cause of these high prices? If it is the tariff then let us apply the remedy, but if it is not, there is no use concentrating our efforts on the tariff alone and leaving the real causes untouched, because that will only mean we will continue to suffer. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) would not treat a case of the flu by vaccinating for smallpox, but that is about what he proposes to do here. They are cursing the tariff and ignoring other causes of high prices. The consequence is that high prices continue to exist longer than they otherwise would. Anthracite coal is absolutely free. Before the war we could buy it in our part of the country at $10 a ton, but to-day we are paying $22, and according to Government analysis thirty per cent of it is ash and fifty per cent rock, which means we are really paying from $50 to $60 a ton for coal. Is the tariff responsible for that? Most undoubtedly it cannot be. So I say we should not concentrate our attention entirely on the tariff, leading our people to denounce it as if it were the only cause of high prices in this country to-day, and leaving all the other causes untouched. I say if we do, we are the worst enemies of our people. My suggestion is that we make an inquiry into the operation of the tariff as quickly as we can, and wherever it is found to be responsible for high prices, let us apply the necessary remedy as soon as we can. If it is not the tariff, let us find a remedy as quickly as we can from whatever source we can. In that way we shall better be able to overcome the present difficult situation.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say that there is disunion or disorganization in the Unionist ranks. I suppose it is possible that if you used a microscope you could find some sign of it, but I have been too busy performing the duties I am sent here to perform to notice anything of it. I believe in supporting constituted authority until they show some reason why I should not. Have we any evidence of union directly opposite on this fiscal policy, which is the only thing that might separate us on this side of the House? I have not seen any. Are the cross-benchers united in their policy? I have not seen any evidence of it at all. In fact, it is the very opposite. Only the other day their leader got up and advocated an income tax. He did the same thing in our little city when he was holding a public meeting there. I think he was hardly fair in the manner in which he advocated it in our part of the country and in the House, in that he compared the amounts raised by Great Britain and New Zealand by income taxation with the results obtained in Canada, but he failed to tell his audience in Regina that in New Zealand there is only one Government that levies all taxes. There is no taxation field there pre-empted by provincial governments, whereas in Canada there are at least ten governments all having the right to levy income tax. My opinion is that the federal government, by reason of the fact that by common consent we have given to the provinces the right to levy income taxation, will be limited in its income tax possibilities to the residue left by the highest taxing province in Canada, because you have to make your income tax equitable throughout the Dominion, and if British Columbia has a high income tax for provincial purposes and gives to the municipalities the right to levy income tax, which tax the municipalities do levy, you have there two bodies levying income tax, and soon you reach the point where there is no income left to tax. I think the Minister of Finance will agree with me on that. So our revenue possibilities in that direction are exceedingly limited. Immediately after his leader had advocated income taxation, the hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. MacNutt) said he objected to income taxation and did not want any income tax imposed on the farmers. Is that an evidence of union? What is going to happen when the whip of the cross-benchers whips in the hon. member for Saltcoats to assist his leader on the question of income tax? What is going to happen when he starts whipping himself in to support his leader? I should like to know.

Again, the leader of the cross-benchers strongly supports a tax on unimproved lands. Just what he means by "unimproved lands" I do not know. Are they lands that are not in any sense cultivated? Or is he advocating a tax on all lands according to the value of the unimproved land? I could not gather from his remarks just what he meant. The hon. member for Saltcoats comes along and says he wants a tax on improved lands. Now who is going to run that party? Where are the farmers going to get off at? If the leader means unimproved lands, I would also ask where they are situated. In the province of Ontario there are mighty few unimproved lands except those owned by the Crown, in right of the province, and is the Crown as represented by the Dominion going to levy a tax on the Crown as represented by the province? And it is the same in Quebec and all the other provinces except Saskatchewan and Alberta. Under the policy of the leader of the cross-benchers, who is supposed to represent the western people, the lands of Western Canada are going to be taxed for the whole Dominion. That is a nice policy upon which to appeal to the people of Western Canada. I hope he comes along with that policy any old time. The hon. member for Saltcoats wants a tax on improved lands. That might apply more equitably at the present time, but let me draw his attention to the fact that the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta have a far greater area of arable land than any other province, and it is only going to be a question of ten or fifteen years before Western Canada, if my hon. friend's policy is followed, will be paying an outrageous portion of the taxes of this Dominion. Is that a policy that would appeal to Western Canada. Not much. It does not appeal to me. I want to look a little bit ahead, and the rest of Canada must pay their share of taxation if I have anything to say in the matter. So the union they have over there is not alluring to me, not a bit.

There is one other point, and the leader of the Opposition will kindly take note of this. He and his whole party have been condemning the War-time Elections Act. Why? Because it disfranchised a certain number of foreigners who had become Canadian citizens. We have another Franchise Act coming on; we must have it. If I interpret this amendment aright, he is going to disfranchise as many women as we disfranchised men under the War-times Elections Act. We are not going to naturalize people in Canada in the way we did in days gone by. I know what it was in our part of the world, because I helped to do it. At election time Grits and Tories alike both did it. They would say: "You vote for us and we will naturalize you." It cost us $1 apiece. I helped to do lots of it. But that day has gone by, and it has got down to the time when people have to be real British subjects in spirit before they will be naturalized in Canada. I take it that under any franchise Act which we are likely to enact any man or woman who is a British subject, or who can become a British subject within the period necessary, and can qualify, will have the right to vote. But they will have to be naturalized in their own personal right. I approve of that, and I think the great bulk of the people of Canada approve it. I believe that will be the policy which will be followed by this Parliament; I cannot conceive of any other.

We have in Western Canada some thousands of women who have been here for some ten, fifteen or twenty years, who have proved themselves loyal though of foreign extraction, and who have never been naturalized in their own personal right. They will have to be naturalized in their own personal right, to my way of thinking, before they will be able to vote. How long is that going to take? Can they be naturalized within the period of time specified within the amendment submitted by the leader of the Opposition? It cannot be done. In Saskatchewan alone we have probably 300,000 foreigners, and the courts of Canada are going to take their time to see that every person who applies for naturalization has the necessary qualifications. It cannot be done in less than a year's time and do justice to Canada and its people. A lot of these people do not know yet, and cannot possibly know until the Franchise Act is passed, that they will have a vote. They will then have to go to the courts to be naturalized. But by that time the election, if held as proposed, would be over and these people would be left without votes in that election. And there are some, I am sure, who should have the right to vote, because I know many of them and, while they are foreigners, they will make good British subjects. On the other hand, there are many who have not proved themselves sufficiently British in spirit to entitle them to vote. It is absolutely necessary, if we are to carry out the principle of an honest and just Franchise Act, that the elections should not be held for at least one year to come.

Just a word about the Board of Commerce and I am through. The high cost of living is the big trouble to-day. It is the one thing that the people are up in arms about, and I do not wonder at it in some cases because it is a real hardship to those who have been living on salaries, those who have retired on what they thought was a competency or those who held bonds other than industrial bonds. These people are suffering very keenly. The Board of Commerce was appointed to meet a popular demand—there is no question about that. It was appointed because the Government recognized that something should be done to try and lower the cost of living and to stop profiteering. I am satisfied that the Board of Commerce has already accomplished satisfactory work and that a great deal of benefit has resulted to Canada. If the Board of Commerce has not succeeded under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Robson in accomplishing what we all desire, it could not be accomplished by anybody in Canada. I know Mr. Hugh Robson, as I call him. He is a rank Liberal and always was before he was appointed, and that is why I know him so well. He and I fought each other on many platforms in Regina. I know him to be a thoroughly honest man. He is one of the best citizens that Regina ever turned out. He has ability, and, as I say, if he could not accomplish what we desire in this matter of prices, it could not be done. But the fact that he has resigned should not deter the Government from continuing the work which they have started, and which, if carried out, should be a benefit to this country. We should continue the Board, or if not that board, one similarly constituted, and if Mr. Justice Robson, in his letter of resignation, has indicated to the Government that there are defects in the law, it is our duty to remedy those defects as quickly as possible. We should study his report and see where the defects actually exist and remedy them so that we can meet, somehow or other, the conditions which exist at the present time in Canada and which are affecting so keenly the comfort and happiness of our people. I am going to vote against this amendment because the Government deserves something from this country, it deserves the support which all loyal subjects can give to it.

On motion of Mr. Robb the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty, the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

REPORTS.

Report of the Minister of Agriculture for the year ended March 31, 1919; Report of the Dominion Experimental Farms for the year ended March 31, 1919; Report upon the Agricultural Instruction Act, 1918-1919.—Hon. Mr. Tolmie.

ST. LAWRENCE SHIP CHANNEL—ICE CONDITIONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly-Verchères): Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the Government to a most important and urgent matter. I am informed from reliable sources that the ice jam on the St. Lawrence is much deeper this year than ever before. At Cap Rouge, above Quebec, there is a gorge, and I am informed the ice has frozen 40 feet deep, and that the water behind has risen 6 feet higher in some places. There is an ice barrage. If this barrage is not immediately broken up there will be serious floods from that point up to Montreal. We had ice-breakers that were built for that purpose. I understand that the "Earl Grey," the "Minto" and the "John D. Hazen" were sent to Russia in 1915-1916 and 1917.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman is beyond question bringing forward a subject of public importance, but he should not attempt to enter into any argument. If he will state the ground work and put his question, he will be quite in order.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The "Montcalm" is at Halifax and I understand the "Lady Grey" is not powerful enough to break the ice there. I am informed that unless dynamite is used to break the ice very serious floods will occur with resulting damage. What I wish to know is if the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) is aware of the facts, and what steps he intends to take.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE. The hon. member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Archambault) was good enough yesterday to give me notice of the question he has just asked. I am afraid that the information that has reached the hon. member is not accurate, and I shall be very glad indeed to give the information that the hon. gentleman asks for. First of all I wish to say that the first part of the winter was not very cold, and no ice bridge formed on the St. Lawrence up to Nicolet Traverse (a distance of 90 miles above Quebec), until the last week in January. The ice jammed several times during the winter at Cap Rouge—the Quebec Bridge site—which is considered the key of the ice situation, but was successfully broken up by the ice-breaker "Lady Grey." With no ice bridge formed at this point, there is no fear of disastrous floods occurring above. The channel is now clear of ice up to a point near Portneuf, 35 miles above Quebec, where the "Lady Grey" is working to-day and is making good progress.

I will not take up the time of the House by going into further details except to say that the conditions this year, I am happy to inform the hon. gentleman, are not much different from those of former years. The "Lady Grey" hopes to reach Cap Charles, 50 miles above Quebec, very shortly. In regard to the "Montcalm," I think hon. members are aware that first of all she had to go to Belle Isle to take the place of the steamer "Arranmore" that was wrecked, and to relieve the lighthouse people there. She afterwards had to go to the assistance of the Canadian Government steamer "Canadian Spinner" that was stuck in the ice below Father Point. After releasing that steamer she proceeded to the Magdalen Islands carrying provisions for the distressed people upon those islands. Owing to the severity of the weather and the thickness of the ice she was delayed a month in making that voyage. She returned to the city of Halifax requiring repairs, especially propeller blades, but owing to the wreck of the steamer "Bohemian," she had to go to her assistance. The "Montcalm" is now in Halifax and will go on the dry-dock as soon as possible. I do not anticipate any serious results from floods this spring—no one can accurately tell—but I am pleased to say that the "Lady Grey" is working so well and that the ice bridge is broken.

PEACE WITH ENEMY COUNTRIES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): I would like to inquire from the Acting Prime Minister whether a state of Peace now exists between the Dominion of Canada and its former enemies? If not, I would ask what action is necessary on the part of the Government to bring about that consummation so devoutly to be wished, and, if it is necessary to have a Declaration, or an Order in Council passed for that purpose, how soon may we expect such customary action on the part of the Government.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister): In answer to my hon. friend may I congratulate him on retaining his voice after his excursion to the far West. A state of Peace actually and presently exists between Canada and the Empire, and Germany. A state of Peace will be proclaimed between the Allies and former enemies as each Treaty of Peace comes to its final ratification and the Proclamation is made. I cannot think of anything that will hurry this along, except that perhaps the hon. gentleman might introduce a resolution.

Mr. McMASTER: May I explain to the right hon. gentleman who leads the House that this is not a mere rhetorical matter or one of mere abstract interest, but I am informed that in one of the departments which my right hon. friend is in control of—I think the Patents Department is under the jurisdiction of the Department of Trade and Commerce—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have to inform the hon. gentleman that he is taking a course which he may not pursue on the Orders of the Day.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Hume Cronyn for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the Session, and the proposed amendment of the Hon. Mackenzie King, thereto resumed from Monday, March 8.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I desire to associate myself with the congratulations that have been offered by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate to the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne. If I do not dwell upon the speeches of these two hon. gentlemen, or upon those of other hon. gentlemen who have followed them in this discussion, it is because I have a good deal to say on other subjects and I do not want to occupy the time of the House at undue length.

Let me, then, Sir, at once begin by implementing a promise that I made to this House some four or five months ago. It will be recalled that in September last, during the session that was then in progress and while I was absent from Canada, the President of the Privy Council (Hon. Mr. Rowell) delivered a speech which he and his kept press were pleased to describe as a reply to a speech that I had made about eighteen months previously. It will be further recalled that when I returned to the city I spoke in this House on a question of privilege, and as the rules of the House prevented me from saying all that I wanted to say I gave the House an assurance that I would return to the subject at the next session of Parliament. That, Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose to do in extenso this afternoon.

Before dealing with what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rowell) said last session it is desirable that the sequence of facts leading up to his speech should be first presented to the House. Let me then state briefly what had occurred prior to September last. During the last general elections when the anti-Laurier, anti-Quebec and anti-Catholic madness was at its height, the President of the Privy Council fanned the flames of sectarian hate and added fresh fuel to the fire by a speech which he made at North Bay on December 6, 1917. In the course of his inflammatory harangue the hon. gentlemen indicted the people of Quebec for their alleged lack of sacrifice, and he then made an attack on the members of the Religious Orders from France who had been in Canada and whom he falsely said had not gone back to help their Mother Country in the war. As reported in the "Toronto Globe" the hon. gentleman, after denouncing the attitude of the Quebec Nationalists towards the war, said:

> In this attitude they were undoubtedly encouraged and abetted by the members of the Religious Orders from France who found an asylum in Canada and used that asylum to undermine Canada's strength in the struggle.

Believing this statement to be made with knowledge of the facts, and that it was true, many newspapers and speakers who were supporting Union Government used it throughout the country, and in this way spread the flames which the President of the Privy Council had deliberately kindled. A short time after the election the President of the Privy Council was written to and asked to give the proofs in support of his attacks on the French Religious. His reply was a brief letter in which he said he was investigating the facts. In other words, Mr. Speaker, he admitted over his own signature that although he had made a wholesale charge of treason against a body of men several weeks previously, he did not know whether the charge was true or false; but the elections being over, and his purpose accomplished, he was going to take time to inquire whether his statement was true or false. I do not pause here, Sir, to use the only terms that would fittingly describe the self-confessed turpitude of the hon. gentleman—in fact I need not do so in view of the judgment the public has already pronounced upon him. In addition to the written request that I have mentioned, the hon. gentleman was publicly challenged by two newspapers—the Catholic Register of Toronto and the Catholic Record of London—to prove his statement about the French Religious, or withdraw it. He did neither. Then it was that I decided to expose him, not for any personal reason —and this I want to emphasize—but to vindicate the characters of the men whom he had maligned and to remove from the public mind the false impression that he had placed there. Accordingly, Sir, I spoke in the House on March 19, 1918, in refutation of the attack made by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) at North Bay in the previous December, and I proved, by the facts and figures I submitted to the House, that the hon. gentleman's statement about the French religious orders was a foul slander. Incidentally, I applied to the hon. gentleman's political record the test of sacrifice that he had applied to the people of the province of Quebec, and the evidence I submitted proved conclusively that the hon. gentleman did not measure up to his own standard. So convinced of this were his own colleagues who were in the House at the time that they did not continue the debate nor move its adjournment, but they allowed it to collapse after I had spoken.

It might possibly be within your recollection, Sir, that on March 19, 1918, I rose to speak just before six o'clock, and that through your courtesy and the courtesy of the right hon. the Prime Minister I was not obliged to begin my speech then, as the House adjourned for dinner. All the members who were present, including the President of the Privy Council, knew that I had the floor and would be the first speaker when the House resumed its sittings at eight o'clock the same evening. However, the hon. gentleman did not reappear at the evening session, but for that I am not to blame. I am recalling these facts now, Sir, because of some whining the hon. gentleman has indulged in about being absent through sickness so as to gain the sympathy of certain innocent people of both sexes.

When the House met the next day, March 20, 1918, the hon. gentleman was in his seat reading Hansard. I naturally expected him to rise on a question of privilege and tell the House that in view of the facts and figures I had presented the previous day he desired to withdraw the statement he had made at North Bay about the French religious orders, that he apologized to the members of those orders who were living and that he desired to make reparation to the memories of those who had died gloriously on the battlefields of Europe. But not he. That is not the way of commercialized Christianity. I recall, too, Sir, that several Government supporters spoke to him as he sat in his seat, and judging by their gestures towards the copy of the previous day's Hansard that he held in his hand, they were asking if he was going to make reference to my reply to his attack. I can also recall his weary smile that afternoon, for the reason that when I noticed it I understood for the first time what O'Connell meant when he compared Sir Robert Peel's smile to the shine of a silver plate on a coffin.

But the hon. gentleman remained silent throughout the afternoon of March 20, 1918. On the evening of that day, however, he was well enough to hand the Press correspondents the following interview:

OTTAWA, March 20, 1918.

Hon. Newton Rowell to-day told newspaper interviewers that he would have no statement to make in reply to the vitriolic attack made on him in the House last night by the Hon. Charles Murphy of Russell.

On the following day, March 21, 1918, the hon. gentleman was again in his seat. Again he said nothing. But on the evening of that day he handed out another interview to the Press, in which he placed the responsibility for his silence on his Cabinet colleagues. This is the way he put it:

OTTAWA, March 21, 1918.

Mr. Rowell said to-night: "The opinion of my colleagues is that having regard to the circumstances and the animus of the attack, no answer on my part is necessary."

Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not giving away any Cabinet secret when I remark that that is not what some of his colleagues said to me.

That set of facts, Sir, is sufficient to dispose of the hon. gentleman's whine that he was absent through illness on March 19, 1918, and on the days immediately following.

Having allowed the Session of 1918 to close without any explanation of his conduct, the hon. gentleman found that public opinion had hardened against him, and after receiving sundry prods from behind —and notably one or two from the vicinity of Peterborough—he decided at length to make what would look like a defence. This he did in a speech at Bowmanville on December 17, 1918,—nine months after I had given the facts to the House. In that speech he not only did not withdraw his false charge against the members of the French religious orders, but he aggravated his original offence by meanly and untruthfully alleging that the French law of compulsory military service compelled these men to return to France.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is exceeding the rules as well as the amenities of debate in attributing untruthfulness to another hon. member.

Mr. MURPHY: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and I shall observe the amenities of debate in what further I have to say.

I was proceeding to state, Sir, that the hon. gentleman sank to a depth that was never plumbed by Mr. Pecksniff or Uriah Heap when he added—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MURPHY: Those names seem strange to some hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House.—when he added:

If I had known of the position of those members of the French clergy I should have paid a tribute to them.

The Catholic Record of January 4, 1919, dealt with the hon. gentleman and his Bowmanville speech in the following article:

Mr. Rowell vs. Mr. Rowell.

In our comments last week on Mr. Rowell's charge against the members of French religous orders living in Canada we took the report of the Free Press as quoting his very words so far as he touched, in his Bowmanville speech, on his famous—or infamous—accusation. The Free Press report we find was incomplete.

Before us now is the Globe's full verbatim report of Mr. Rowell's Bowmanville address, and we shall quote his every word of explanation or justification.

Our readers will have noted that we have always confined our comments on Mr. Rowell's North Bay speech to this single charge against the French religious orders. Cleverly enough, perhaps, for the audience, as well as that portion of the wider public to which he addressed himself, Mr. Rowell first appeals to anti-Bourassa and anti-Quebec prejudice, reiterates his general charge against the clergy of Quebec, deliberately and dishonestly transfers some of the very words of his particular charge against the French religious orders to the general charge against the French-speaking clergy of Quebec:

"The substance of my statement about the French-speaking clergy in Quebec was that the majority of them were supporters of Mr. Bourassa in his attitude on the war, and that in the course they were pursuing they were undermining Canada's strength in the struggle."

The words we have italicized referred, in Mr. Rowell's North Bay speech, solely and exclusively to the members of the French religious orders who had found an asylum in Canada. It must be admitted that Mr. Rowell is a good "mixer"—when he has reasons for not being straightforward.

Then the sometimes Liberal leader poses theatrically as the bold and fearless champion of free criticism of any class of citizens.

"If their objection was to my discussing the question at all, then I can only say that this country does not and will not recognize any immunity of the clergy from just and fair criticism of their acts as citizens or residents of Canada."

As no one ever hinted at or thought of claiming any such immunity the speaker delivered a knockout blow to this straw man which he had set up to show his prowess—and his courage.

"Fair and just criticism"—that is an important limitation to all criticism. It is fair and just criticism to quote,—in Mr. Rowell's own words,—the most serious accusation ever made against any class in Canada's population; to point out that if true the Government have a duty in the matter that cannot be shirked without such moral cowardice and betrayal of trust as would brand them as accessories after the fact to the alleged monstrous abuse of hospitality charged against the immigrant French religious; to demand, therefore, that the allegation publicly made by a public man be substantiated; or if made under misapprehension of the facts or misinformation, then for the sake of decency, honour, truth and justice, public and private, that the charge be withdrawn, the amende honourable made, and the injury repaired.

Mr. Rowell makes a high patriotic virtue of his long silence in face of the peremptory challenge to prove or retract. He brings in Mr. Bourassa's name at every turn: "Mr. Bourassa and those who think with him" is his favourite way of using the proverbial herring.

"While the war was on," asserts this high-minded patriot, "I ignored all these attacks." Yes, just such "attacks" as the Kaiser repelled when he inaugurated his war of self-defense! Mr. Rowell is even less frank than the Kaiser. The patriotic and long-suffering Liberal-Unionist leader conveniently forgets that it was he who made the attack, a wanton attack, an attack which he has never justified, against a whole class of Canada's population. He gently and virtuously insinuates that he has been wantonly attacked and plainly boasts that it was from patriotic motives alone he remained silent. Oh Spartan patriotism!

So far as Mr. Bourassa and the clergy and laity of Quebec are concerned they have their press, their full representation in Parliament, and are well able to take care of themselves. We have never troubled about them; Mr. Rowell is as disingenuous here as elsewhere in insinuating that it is only sympathizers with Mr. Bourassa and his Nationalist party who called him to account for his public accusations. Mr. Rowell of course knows better; but he is playing to the gallery.

The charge which we challenged Mr. Rowell to prove was this:

"In this attitude," added Mr. Rowell, "they were undoubtedly encouraged and abetted by the members of the religious orders from France, who found an asylum in Canada, and used that asylum to undermine Canada's strength in the struggle."

This is a specific accusation against the religious from France; it is a sweeping charge without any reservation whatsoever against these men, all of them or at any rate as a class. If any doubt remained as to the general application of this sweeping charge Mr. Rowell cleared the minds of his hearers and readers most effectually by adding:

"It is a misfortune that they did not follow the example of the priests of the Catholic Church in France, who threw themselves into the struggle of their people to preserve their national existence, and by their courage and sacrifice won for themselves a new place in the hearts of the French people."

Challenged to substantiate so grave a charge Mr. Rowell remained silent; confronted with the statistics adduced by Mr. Murphy in Parliament Mr. Rowell was dumb.

These statistics proved incontrovertibly that the maligned French religious who found an asylum in Canada not only emulated the priests of France, but by their courage and sacrifice, by their unselfish devotion to their beloved France whence they had been exiled, they wrote the most sublime chapter in the sublime record of patriotism during the Great War. We reprint in this issue that portion of Mr. Murphy's speech which dealt with these heroic dead and no less heroic living Frenchmen to whom Canada will ever have been proud of having opened wide her hospitable gates. Their glorious record cannot be read and reread without a thrill of pride by every Catholic, by every Canadian.

Nevertheless these slandered dead and slandered living heroes Mr. Rowell allowed to rest under his baseless calumny for a full year. At last in his Bowmanville speech he makes this allusion to them:

"In order, however, to make political capital and stir up religious and racial feeling against Union Government, it is suggested that my references covered the French reservists who were members of religious orders, and who, when called to the colours by their Government, returned to France and fought as members of the French army. My references were not to men who had gone forth to fight but to men who stayed at home, men who were in the province of Quebec during the war, supporting Mr. Bourassa. Of the men who went forth to fight none can speak in too high terms."

And this is all that Mr. Rowell feels called upon in honour and justice to say in explanation or justification of his wanton and unwarranted attack on the gallant religious, "a body of men," to quote Mr. Murphy when marshalling the facts to rout Mr. Rowell's slanders, "whose courage, devotion to duty and self sacrifice in the present war stamp them as worthy to follow in the footsteps of that noble band of French missionaries who first made this land known to Europe and blazed the way for its colonization and development."

And the reason that even this tenuous, disingenuous, quasi-retraction, quasi-justification was so long delayed was that Canada's part in the war might not be impeded!

Note the impudent charge and the base appeal in the opening sentence; and then in what immediately follows:

"The trouble is, not that I misrepresented anybody, but that I told the truth about the situation then existing in the province of Quebec. An explanation of the campaign of misrepresentation now being pursued by Mr. Bourassa and those associated with him in this province is that they hope by representing that their faith is attacked, and by posing as defenders of that faith, to unite behind them in one party, for political purposes and political action, all those who share their religious views."

Dr. Johnson is sometimes quoted in a more comprehensive sense than he intended when he said that patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel; but that honest and sham-hating old Briton could find to-day in Mr. Rowell's speech an apt illustration of his meaning. "Patriotism" and prejudice, partizan, racial and religious, are the last refuge of Mr. Rowell.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There is an imputation in the latter portion of the letter editorial, or newspaper extract from which the hon. member is quoting which he might not himself make in the ordinary course of debate. The hon. member may go no further in reading from an extract than he could go if the remarks were his own. I sincerely hope that the hon. member will, during the further course of his remarks, adhere more closely to the amenities and the technicalities, if I may so term them, of debate.

Mr. MURPHY: Anything which in your judgment, Mr. Speaker, is objectionable in the editorial I quite agree should be excised. The editorial then proceeds:

Mr. Rowell's charge a year ago was plainly, unequivocally, directly, against the French religious resident in Canada, and against them as a class without qualification or reservation.

Now he has the effrontery to say that "in order to make political capital and stir up religious and racial feeling against the Union Government it is suggested that my references covered the French reservists who were members of religious orders and who, when called to the colors by their government returned to France and fought as members of the French army."

When Mr. Rowell meets Voltaire in the Elysian fields the famous French infidel will greet the Christian statesman from Canada as a man after his own heart—"l'Audace l'Audace, toujours l'Audace!"

In the first place few if any of the slandered religious were reservists. They were not obliged to return and fight in the French army, as Mr. Rowell insinuates, though he dare not say so outright.

Mr. Rowell knew this. Mr. Rowell knows that it required a special treaty to enable the United States, after entering the war and puting conscription in force, to reach American citizens subject to the draft who were by accident or design in Canada or Great Britain. Mr. Rowell knows that with Ireland exempt from conscription Great Britain could not reach the tens of thousands of Englishmen subject to the draft who sought refuge in Ireland during the war.

Mr. Rowell knows that the French government, which had exiled the men whom he maligned, had no jurisdiction over them in Canada to compel them to return and fight in the French army.

If Mr. Rowell had told his audience that every single man of military age and fitness of that class which he had slandered had, in spite of any feeling of resentment he may have felt at being expatriated, gone freely back to fight for France, that a score of them had laid down their lives in that cause which he had accused them of undermining, that military honors and military orders had recognized the valor and gallantry of those who still lived, the honest feeling of even that partizan and misinformed gathering would have found expression in applause and cheers. Then he might, in the contagion of that honest and honourable and manly feeling, have found it in his heart to admit that he was ignorant of the truth when he spoke a year ago at North Bay. But, like many other politicians, Mr. Rowell has too low an opinion of the sense of decency, the sense of honor and justice, the manliness and mental capacity of the common people if he does not realize that in honestly acknowledging his error he would stand in their estimation of mind and heart in a place which he has chosen to abdicate.

Some families gave their every member capable of bearing arms to the cause now crowned with victory. Not one of these exceeded the record of the French religious resident in Canada.

By their action at the beginning of the war in rushing to the colors and giving a tremendous impetus to Canada's effort, a magnificent inspiration to Canada's loyalty, the British-born who had chosen Canada as their home won for themselves undying honour and gratitude.

The British-born as a class, magnificent as in their record, can not equal the sublime record of the men whom Mr. Rowell accused of monstrous abuse of Canada's hospitality and of undermining the cause for which they were ready to die.

At the conclusion of his recital of the evidence which crushingly refuted Mr. Rowell's charges, Mr. Murphy on the floor of the House of Commons thus summoned their author to retract:

"If the hon. gentleman's statements were not made for a wicked and a malicious purpose, then by every standard of public and private honour he is required to retract what he has said, to offer an apology to the living and to make reparation to the memory of the dead."

Mr. Rowell's friends can hardly be proud of the way he has attempted to measure up to the standards of public and private honour.

Upon reading that editorial, a Toronto gentleman with whom I was not then acquainted wrote me in these terms:

TORONTO, JANUARY 7, 1919.

The Hon. CHARLES MURPHY,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—I read an article in the Catholic Record which was a summary of your reply to the Hon. N. W. Rowell's shameful allegations regarding the French Religious. I had not read his speeches but was so disgusted, although not a Catholic, at his want of fairness, I immediately sat down and wrote him a letter, a copy of which I enclose herewith.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is proceeding to quote from a letter written by a gentleman outside of the House, in which letter that gentleman attributes certain allegations to the President of the Privy Council, stating that they were shameless and also using other words which no hon. member in this House might use in debate. Much less may they be used by quoting some person outside of the House. I must ask the hon. member to delete those portions of the letter.

Mr. MURPHY: Very well, Sir. The enclosure that accompanied the letter which I read is as follows. It is a copy of a letter that was sent to the President of the Privy Council:

TORONTO, JANUARY 7, 1919.

The Hon. N. W. ROWELL,

Dear Sir,—I came across the enclosed article in the Catholic Record this evening, and if the speeches in which you made the accusations referred to are correct, I am amazed, shocked and grieved that a man occupying the position in Canada you do could be wilfully guilty of such calumny. From the article containing the refutation of your charge, it appears you are challenged to give proof of the truth of your wicked allegations, and you remain silent. Shame on you! How can you ever hope to be great?—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. One hon. member may not say anything of that character to another member of this House, and the hon. member for Russell cannot shield himself behind a letter from some person outside of this House. I must ask the hon. member to withdraw those words "shameless" and others of like character, whether they be written or spoken.

Mr. MURPHY: I will see that these are deleted from the report. The letter proceeds:

If you have done wrong, be a man and apologize. I am not a Catholic nor party politician, but a British subject who loves fair play.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) ARCHIBALD BROWNE.

Any comment on that enclosure is quite unnecessary. I need only add that since the date of the correspondence I have learned that the writer is a sturdy Scotchman whose sense of decency and fairness was so outraged by the conduct of the President of the Council—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is going very far beyond the rules of debate when he uses such language in the course of his comment on a letter written by a person outside of this House.

Mr. MURPHY: Surely my allusion to a gentleman outside of this House does not bring the remark within the rules of the House when I state the reason that this gentleman had for writing the letter which I have just read.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot shield himself behind any remark made by some person outside this House. What he may not say himself, he certainly may not quote.

Mr. MURPHY: I am not trying to shield myself behind any remarks made by anybody in or out of the House, and I think I may appeal, Sir, to your knowledge of me to justify that statement. I do not want to use in debate any language that is not in accordance with the rules of debate, and if in your judgment Sir, anything contained in the letters that I have read should not be repeated, then they may be deleted from the copy.

Thus matters stood until last session, when, during my absence and while the debate on the Address was in progress, the President of the Privy Council for the first time in the House professed to deal with my speech delivered eighteen months previously. What the hon. gentleman said in the House was largely a repetition of what he had said in his Bowmanville address of December, 1918, and before I deal with certain specific utterances of the hon. gentleman, I want to point out that neither in his Bowmanville speech nor in his speech of last session does the hon. gentleman dispute the correctness of the following charges contained in my speech of March 19, 1918:

1. That his support of the Ross Government entailed no sacrifice on his part, but on the contrary resulted in his securing control of the reorganization of the Clergue industries at the Sault, and that he derived therefrom the profits that I described.

2. That while the hon. gentleman acted as Provincial leader, there was a fund of about $3,750 raised to enable the hon. gentleman and his press agent to go on a Cook's tour to the battle front.

3. That in his North Bay speech of December 6, 1917, the hon. gentleman garbled the facts relating to the Conservative alliance with the Nationalists of Quebec in order to conceal the fact that his present leader was in active personal alliance with the Nationalists in 1911.

4. That he had sent as his agent to the city of London, Ontario, Colonel F. H. Deacon to induce a prominent Liberal of that city to desert the Liberal candidate by offering him as a bribe the Chairmanship of the War Purchasing Commission.

5. That he deputed another Toronto gentleman to interview various Liberals as to whether they thought the public would stand the appointment to the Ontario Supreme Court Bench of a member of the present Union Government.

6. That he sent a third Toronto gentleman to eastern Ontario to urge Liberal candidates to desert Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and that this emissary pointed out the advantages by which such treachery would be awarded.

7. That as charged by the Toronto Telegram in its issue of March 14, 1918, Mr. Robert A. Mulholland, who had been nominated for the House of Commons in Durham county was bribed with a seat in the Senate, to make way for the hon. gentleman as a candidate in the county of Durham.

That is the indictment which in his two speeches the hon. gentleman has not dared to challenge. It is too late for him to do so now, because no credence would be given to any belated statement he might now make. With reference to these unchallenged charges, I have only to observe that many a man has forfeited his position in society on a much less serious indictment than the one which the hon. gentleman has allowed to stand against him.

Now let me examine what the hon. gentleman pretended to explain or refute in his speech in the House last September. Here is what he said about his North Bay charge against the members of the French religious orders (unrevised Hansard, September 17, 1919):

Mr. PROULX: Will the minister cite the figures which were given by the hon. member for Russell as to the number of members of each religious order who crossed over and fought?

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend simply anticipates the point I am coming to. At the time I spoke at North Bay I was not aware that the French law of compulsory military service covered members of the French-speaking clergy of military age who had come to Canada, and who remained citizens of France; that they were obligated by this law to return to France for military service; and that those who were physically fit, and were not exempted temporarily or otherwise, did return to France when called by their government to do so. As I did not know this, I could not specially refer to their service, but my attitude to all who went forth to fight was clearly shown by my reference to the clergy of France. If I had known of the position of these members of the French clergy, I should have paid a tribute to them.

Further on he is reported to have spoken as follows:

Had I known that the law of military service had applied to those men and that they had gone forth to fight, I should have paid a tribute to them with greater cheerfulness than I paid the tribute to the French clergy in France.

Still further on, he is reported to have said:

I do not question the figures set out by the hon. gentleman in his speech, as illustrating the part which those men took in the struggle.

With that tissue of amazing evasions, and the hon. gentleman's failure to do what any other man in Canada would have done under similar circumstances, the Catholic Record, in its issue of October 11, 1919, deals in this fashion:

The Honourable Newton Wesley Rowell, President of the Council, has at last summoned up courage to refer on the floor of the House to a subject that affects his honour as a public man, his conscience as a private individual, and his personal reputation for truthfulness, decency and fair dealing.

It is worth while recalling and setting forth in all its naked malignity the foul and unfounded charge which Mr. Rowell made against a body of men whose record in the war compels the grudging admiration of even Mr. Rowell himself. The enormity of the original and still unretracted charge and Mr. Rowell's shiftiness and evasion demand, even at the expense of brevity, a clear and full restatement of the question at issue, and an analysis of Mr. Rowell's explanation or palliation or whatever his latest pronouncement may be called.

In the course of a speech delivered at North Bay, December 6, 1917, after discussing the attitude of Quebec Nationalists, lay and clerical, Mr. Rowell added:

"In this attitude they were undoubtedly encouraged and abetted by the members of the religious orders from France, who found an asylum in Canada and used that asylum to undermine Canada's strength in the struggle."

No charge of graver or more menacing import was ever preferred against any body of men in Canada; and this charge was publicly preferred by a man prominent in Canadian public life.

It was promptly and peremptorily challenged; it was never substantiated; it was never withdrawn. It still retains, after Mr. Rowell's recent speech in the House of Commons, all its importance, all its implications, all its menace. Its truth or its falsity does not and can not lessen its tremendous import or alter the fact that it was made by a responsible public man now holding a high position in the Government of Canada.

If the charge were true then the Government was bound to stop this monstrous abuse of Canadian hospitality, and by interning or deporting the ingrates prevent further undermining of Canada's strength in the struggle in which we were then engaged; nor, if true, can the Government evade its plain duty in the premises now that the war is over. To maintain its truth is to point out inexorably that plain governmental duty; to admit its falsity lays on Mr. Rowell, if he desires to retain his position of leadership in Canadian public life, the duty of clearing himself from the imputation of being a slanderer and a coward. It will be a bad thing for Canada and a worse thing for Mr. Rowell if he be allowed to escape the responsibility and evade the duty of making good his hideous accusation, or of retracting it, admitting his misinformation and making the amende honourable like an honest and honourable man.

In his recent speech in the House, which in so far as it deals with the question in issue we reproduce on page 5, he does neither the one thing nor the other; he advances not a shadow of proof of the truth of his charge, but he does not withdraw it. He writhes under the lash of Mr. Murphy's facts and figures with regard to the French religious; he makes an oblique admission that these figures prove the class he had branded as ingrates, who shamelessly abused Canada's hospitality, were "gallant men who left Canada and went overseas to fight for the cause of liberty," but he does not withdraw the charge that they "used their asylum in Canada to undermine Canada's strength in the struggle." It is a difficult feat of shiftiness and evasion; but Mr. Rowell accomplishes it. Still one can see that he is not proud of his performance and one can admire the prudence of selecting a time when Mr. Murphy was out of the House and out of the country; and when the rules of debate preclude all possibility of reply this session.

Mr. Rowell is progressing. On the 17th of last December, at Bowmanville, nine months after Mr. Murphy's crushing refutation of his charge against the French religious resident in Canada, he deliberately transferred the very wording of his charge against these French religious to make it read as though it applied to the French-speaking clergy who were supporters of Mr. Bourassa. That was crude work for an artist in evasion. Mr. Rowell has evidently come to be ashamed of it. In the House he read his infamous accusation verbatim. But as he comes to his reference to the priests of France he interrupts himself to exclaim:

"I am accused of belittling the work of the priests; I am magnifying the work of the priests."

Now, that is less clumsy than the Bowmanville method; but not less disingenuous. "I am accused," says this eminent patriot and long suffering, pious Christian, "of belittling the work of the priests." No, Mr. Rowell, you are not accused of anything. You, Mr. Rowell, made an infamous accusation, you admit you made of it; that accusation was proved up to the hilt to be a foul and baseless slander. You admit that, too, in a half-hearted way; you dare not deny it. You are the accuser. You pretend to deal with the accusations you made and you whine or boast—"I am accused." Then you glory in the tribute you paid to the priests of France as showing your breadth of mind and freedom from bigotry, when you know that you referred to the priests of France solely for the purpose of making their brother French priests in Canada stand out in odious contrast.

Mr. Rowell concludes his tribute to the priests of France by saying: "No one can speak disparagingly of the work of those men at that time." In what did the conduct of the priests of France differ from that of the French priests who had found an asylum in Canada? In no single particular, save that the patriotism of those gallant men against whom Mr. Rowell levelled his false and foul accusation of shameless ingratitude to Canada and treason to France, stands out in higher relief than even that of their brethren of France. Those resident in Canada had that magnanimity of patriotism which impelled them, despite the fact that they were despoiled and robbed and expatriated, to go back and fight shoulder to shoulder with the priests whom Mr. Rowell professes so much to admire.

Does "the magnificent service of those gallant men" shame Mr. Rowell into withdrawing his charge? Not at all. On the contrary. These are his own words:

"At the time I spoke in North Bay I was not aware that the French law of compulsory military service covered members of the French-speaking clergy of military age who had come to Canada and who remained citizens of France and that they were obligated by this law to return to France for military service; and that those who were physically fit, and were not exempted temporarily or otherwise, did return to France when called by their government to do so. As I did not know this I could not specially refer to their service. . . . Had I known that the law of military service had applied to those men and that they had gone forth to fight I should have paid a tribute to them. . . ."

Magnanimous Mr. Rowell!

With "damned iteration" and awkward repetition Mr. Rowell seeks to convey the impression that some of these men "who were not exempted temporarily or otherwise" went back to fight for France because they were compelled by French law and the French Government to do so.

This is a clear case of deliberate suggestio falsi made with malice aforethought.

Mr. Rowell knows, as everybody knows, that the exiled French priests resident in Canada were beyond the reach of legal compulsion and beyond the jurisdiction of the French Government. These men whom Mr. Rowell accused of using their asylum in Canada to undermine Canada's strength in the struggle went freely back to France to take their heroic part, yes, to die in that very struggle. But Mr. Rowell " did not know," he " was not aware" or he "should have paid a tribute to them." Yet now that he does know, he still has the infinite meanness of spirit to suggest a new falsehood while failing to retract the old false accusation.

Could any one in Canadian public life other than Mr. Rowell be guilty of this:

"I have no hesitation in saying that if the general expression I used hurt the feelings of any in that I did not recognize the fine service of the men of whom I did not know, I would be the first to withdraw any such suggestion. I recognize the service they rendered. But when my friends say that I have attacked the Catholic Church I say there is no foundation whatever for that statement."

In the very pretence of dealing straightforwardly with the specific and definite charge against the French members of the religious orders he flounders into this rambling profession of ignorance, withdrawal of the "suggestion of his general expression," and denial that he attacked the Catholic Church.

But he allows the definite and specific charge to stand.

"I do not question," says Mr. Rowell, "the figures set out by the hon. gentleman in his speech as illustrating the part which these men took in the struggle;" but he does not withdraw the charge that these same men used their asylum in Canada to undermine Canada's strength in the same struggle.

"Again I repeat," said the conscientious and truth-loving President of the Council, "my references at North Bay were not to the men who had gone forth to fight, but to the men who stayed at home, men who were in the province of Quebec during the war supporting Bourassa;" but he offers no suggestion of proof or ground for suspicion that of the religious whom he maligned as a class the members who stayed at home because of military unfitness were a whit less enthusiastic in the cause than their militarily fit brothers who fought and died in the struggle.

Should some unscrupulous politician for sordid purpose accuse certain families, whom he disliked, of shirking and slacking during the Great War; nay, should he go further and accuse those families of treason and sedition, traducing them where they were not known; and then should some well-informed friend confront the traducer with incontrovertible proofs that every single member of every slandered family was serving at the front, some of them having already given up their lives, what would happen?

[Mr. Murphy.]

Amongst people with instincts of decency and fair play the traducer would be called to account. Suppose in a sanctimonious, self-sacrificing way he explained that he did "not question the figures," and that he "did not know that they were obligated by the law of compulsory military service," had he known "he would have paid them a tribute;" and professing again his ignorance of the record of these families, expressed his willingness, if any one felt hurt, "to withdraw the suggestion of his general expression." Why, such an unscrupulous politician would be hooted down by his very friends and made either to prove his charge or withdraw it.

But a Christian statesman may do just that sort of thing when he traduces the members of religious families, and poses as a martyr while doing so.

In his speech in the House of Commons Mr. Rowell has not substantiated his infamous charge; he does not question the accuracy of the figures which are its crushing refutation; but he has not the honesty or manliness to withdraw it. Mr. Rowell's position no honest or self-respecting man can hold. No public man can be allowed to hold it without degrading the standards of Canadian public life.

After that masterly analysis of the hon. gentleman's performance in connection with his base and unfounded charge against the living and the dead members of the French religious orders, there is nothing left for me, or for any other hon. gentleman who might be disposed to defend the living and the dead members of these orders, to say. In his speech in this House on the 17th September last the hon. gentleman put up a number of straw men so that he might display his prowess in knocking them down. One of them was that I had said that he had received moneys from the Secretarial Fund. I never said anything of the kind. In support of his assertion the hon. gentleman said that I had received letters of protetst from Liberals in Ontario asserting that my statement was untrue. Out of the hundreds of letters I received in approval of my speech of March 19, 1918, there were two in which it was mentioned that I had been in error in saying that the hon. gentleman had been paid out of the Secretarial Fund. One of the writers was Mr. Bowman, the former Liberal whip in Ontario, whom the hon. gentleman mentioned in his speech of September last. Upon receiving Mr. Bowman's letter, I wrote him on the 7th May, 1918, as follows:

"Let me point out that you have fallen into the error that a number of others fell into, namely, that you have interpreted my statement as being one to the effect that the gentleman referred to shared personally in the fund mentioned. I did not say that. My information was derived from three contributors to the fund, and, therefore, I was too well informed to make any such statement as the one you seem to think I did make. This correction of your misunderstanding should be made as early as possible, and that is why I am sending you this line."

What I made plain in that letter to Mr. Bowman, and what I said in this House, I repeat, namely, that the secretarial fund was raised to guarantee the hon. gentleman against any loss while engaged in his work as provincial leader. Briefly stated my argument was that in the field of provincial politics, as in other fields, the hon. gentleman had made no sacrifice because this secretarial fund had provided the money to defray the expenses of his work which otherwise he would have had to pay for out of his private means. I am going to prove by evidence that not even the hon. gentleman would controvert that what I said was absolutely correct. I hold in my hand a document with this heading:

Mr. Rowell's Secretariat, Third Annual Report. November 1st, 1914, to October 31st, 1915.

It bears at the end of the signature "Main Johnson, private secretary." I will read a few extracts from this report:

To the Committee:

Gentlemen,—I beg to submit the report of Mr. Rowell's secretarial office for its third year.

1. Private Secretarial Work. One of the principal duties of this office from its inception has been to do private secretarial work for Mr. Rowell in connection with the various phases of his public work. A new aspect has been given to this activity during the present year by Mr. Rowell's speeches on the war, and his visits to all parts of the country in connection with recruiting meetings. The private secretary accompanied Mr. Rowell, for example, on his visit to the Canadian West this summer and the office has been kept busy securing and keeping material for Mr. Rowell's use in his addresses.

In addition to these special features of the work, the secretariat has continued to do the ordinary, daily work of a political private secretary's office, both during the session of the Legislature and during the rest of the year as well.

2. Publicity. A considerable portion of the work has consisted in complying with the request of newspapers that we keep them supplied with reports of Mr. Rowell's speeches on the war.

Then there is reference to the Liberal Club Federation of Ontario and after mentioning that this federation had been formed in 1913, the report proceeds:

The Federation has adopted as its motto the word "service"——

I would like you to note that, Mr. Speaker, because I shall refer to it several times in my subsequent observations:

The Federation has adopted as its motto the word "service," a choice which has aroused much favourable comment in the press of the province.

And listen to this, Mr. Speaker. In view of the denial of the hon. gentleman,—just listen to this paragraph:

The Liberal Club Federation has its own officers and is entirely independent of the Liberal Party or its organization. The secretarial office, however, acts in co-operation with the Federation as its business office, and the private secretary assists the officers in their activities throughout the province.

And then the gem of the lot is in the concluding paragraph, No. 5. "Staff" is the heading:

The office staff remains as in the two previous years—two stenographers—one for Mr. Rowell, who does Mr. Rowell's legal and political work and whose remuneration is divided between this office and Mr. Rowell's legal firm, and a stenographer for Mr. Rowell's private secretary who does political work exclusively.

Now, that report, Mr. Speaker, proves several things. In the first place, it proves to the hilt my assertion that the Secretarial Fund was for the purpose of guaranteeing the hon. gentleman against any loss while engaged in his work as Provincial Leader. In fact, the last paragraph of the report shows that a portion of the fund was even used to assist the hon. gentleman in his private legal work. That alone, Sir, should dispose of all further pretentions about "sacrifice." What further does the report prove? It proves to the hilt my assertion, which the hon. gentleman pretended to dispute, that the organization of which the hon. gentleman was the Provincial head was separate and distinct from the Liberal Party, and was designed to advance not the cause of Liberalism but the "uplift" fads of the hon. gentleman himself. The adoption of the word "service" as the motto of the so-called Liberal Club Federation makes it clear that it was intended that the Federation should be a kind of glorified Sunday School with the hon. gentleman as its teacher, and not a political organization to advocate or press forward Liberal principles. And what else, Sir, does this report prove? It proves that the Secretarial Fund was used largely to advertise the war speeches of the hon. gentleman, and that he did not hesitate to use the war and all connected with it for his personal glorification. Other public men in this country did their duty quietly and at their own expense, but the hon. gentleman had his war activities financed by special funds and advertised by a special staff. More sacrifice, Mr. Speaker!

In his speech of last September the hon gentleman denied that Sir Joseph Wesley Flavelle had contributed to the Secretarial Fund, because he said, and mark the reason, "the fund was a Liberal fund and Sir Joseph is a Conservative." But we all know, Mr. Speaker, that as between commercialized Christians a little thing like that does not stand in the way. However, the fact is that my information on that subject came from two prominent gentlemen in Toronto whose veracity and good faith I have no reason to doubt, and as they have not corrected their original statement, which I repeated, I must continue to rely upon it. But even if my informants placed Sir Joseph's name on the wrong list of contributors, that would not be surprising in view of the number of funds raised for the purpose of assisting the President of the Privy Council to make sacrifices.

I have spoken of the Secretarial Fund, and the fund raised to send the hon. gentleman and his press agent on a Cook's tour to the battlefront. My further information is that there were at least two other funds into which the hon. gentleman dipped. One was a Prohibition Fund to which very generous subscriptions were made. Several of those whose names have been given to me are represented to have subscribed in amounts that reached four figures. Now, I have been told that for his services as a Prohibition speaker some years ago, the hon. gentleman was paid out of this Prohibition Fund. Then I am informed there was another fund, a campaign fund, raised by his friend Colonel F. H. Deacon a little over five years ago, and that subscribers to this fund in the city of Ottawa were told that it would amount to $25,000 and that it would be used to assist the hon. gentleman in his public work. Possibly Sir Joseph Wesley Flavelle's name should have been placed as a subscriber to either of these two latter funds, but if any error of that kind was made the hon. gentleman could easily rectify it by giving the House a complete list of the subscribers to all the funds from which he has benefited together with the amount of their contributions. That, Mr. Speaker, would stop all controversy and besides it would be illuminating—very illuminating, Sir, I can assure you.

Now, Sir, although the hon. gentleman has lived, breathed, and had his being in funds of various descriptions, he was not content with that; and his frugal mind, constantly running in the direction of sacrifice and service, suggested to him that a Cabinet Minister might also become a tax dodger and no one would be any the wiser. Sir, let me expose to you how he, as a Cabinet Minister, tried to work this little game of the tax dodger. An item in the Toronto press in October, 1918, tells the first part of the story. It was this:

SEEKS TO ESCAPE INCOME TAXATION.

Hon. N. W. Rowell Claims Exemption Because No Longer Resident.

Hon. Newton Wesley Rowell, President of the Council in the Dominion Government, is appealing to the Court of Revision against an income assessment of $5,000. He claims that being no longer a resident of Toronto the assessment should be cancelled. The Assessment Department contends that Mr. Rowell secures the income from his law practice in the city, and is therefore liable for income tax.

That is the first part of the story; the second part of the story was supplied here at Ottawa. You will observe that the newspaper item states that the hon. gentleman appealed against his income assessment of $5,000 in Toronto because he was no longer a resident of that city. In other words, he took the position that as a Cabinet Minister he was a resident of Ottawa. Now at the time that he launched this appeal in Toronto, both his salary as a Cabinet Minister and his sessional indemnity as a member of Parliament were exempt from taxation in Ottawa under a special agreement that then existed between the Government and the local municipal corporation. The result, Mr. Speaker, therefore would be that if he escaped taxation in Toronto on the ground that he was living in Ottawa, he would escape the payment of taxes in both cities. The publicity given to the hon. gentleman's Toronto appeal apparently killed it. In any event, the papers were taken off the files in the Toronto City Hall so that no record would remain there of this remarkable act of sacrifice and service on the part of the President of the Privy Council. And by the way, as I see my hon. friend the Minister of Finance in his seat, I would suggest to him that before we are put to the trouble of getting a return brought down in the House, he would make examination and find out what kind of Government income return his colleague the President of the Privy Council has made.

Now, Sir, it is a singular fact that the individual who is most careful about his own money very often displays the utmost recklessness in spending other people's money. That is particularly true of the President of the Privy Council. His abnormal craving for notoriety, combined with the pushfulness that distinguishes the commercialized Christian, has resulted in the wasteful expenditure of enormous sums of money since he came to Ottawa. The public records contain some items, others have not yet been made public, but the character of them all may be seen by running over a few of those that have come to light.

According to a calculation made by the Toronto Telegram in its issue of March 14, 1918, the capital value of the life interest in the seat in the Senate, acquired by the candidate who made way for the President of the Privy Council in the county of Durham, amounts to $50,000. The payment of that sum the hon. gentleman saddled the country with in order that he might get into Parliament.

A second obligation of the same kind was imposed on the country last year when the President of the Privy Council had appointed to the Senate another gentleman who had been rejected in turn by the Liberals, by the Conservatives, and by the United Farmers of his own county. Thus, according to the calculation of the Toronto Telegram, another $50,000 charge upon the country must be credited to the hon. gentleman.

Speaking in the House on March 27, 1918, the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), in reply, I think, to the then leader of the Opposition, said that the Food Controller's branch was in the hands and under the direction of the President of the Privy Council. Up to that time the cost of the department averaged close to $200,000 per year, and the Farmers' Sun has described it as the most useless as well as the most costly of all the commissions that had been appointed by the Government.

Within a few weeks of assuming office the President of the Privy Council summoned a women's conference here at Ottawa. In due course the women delegates came to spend an afternoon, and were received by the hon. gentleman. There is no record of whether they put in the time crystal gazing or denouncing cigarettes, but it is on record at page 875 of Hansard for 1918 that the country paid $4,427.91 for that afternoon tea.

As an offset to this conference and just to show his impartiality and versatility, the President of the Privy Council next summoned a conference of organized labour. The delegates came at the appointed time and met the hon. gentleman, and for the afternoon of mutual improvement the country paid another $4,427.

Then, Sir, you have heard of the Department of Public Information. That was a "Puffery Bureau," operated for the especial benefit of the President of the Privy Council, and down to the 30th of September last it had cost the country $168,000. That amount, Sir, must have been greatly increased since September, because to the expenses of the office here must be added the expense of opening up and maintaining a similar office in New York.

Another of the hon. gentleman's fads was the Repatriation Committee. To give it an air of usefulness and respectability, there was attached to it an advisory committee of the Great War Veterans' Association. The gentlemen who composed this advisory committee endeavoured to give the President of the Privy Council and his colleagues the point of view of the returned men through a series of recommendations on a large number of practical subjects, but when they found nothing was done they resigned on October 29 last, and in their letter of resignation they said:

> To our regret and disappointment the greater part of these recommendations have been ignored or only partially considered. Had these matters been dealt with in a statesmanlike manner the present Parliamentary Committee would have been unnecessary, and the unrest among returned men,—the direct result of inaction and half conceived measures,—would have been prevented. Even after the Parliamentary Committee met and the facts had been presented to them its recommendations are apparently such that we are constrained to regard them as unsatisfactory, and we are therefore placing our resignations in your hands, once more as a protest against the inadequate measures of re-establishing the man from the battlefields of Europe.
> (Sgd.) "William D. Tait,
> R. B. Maxwell,
> David Loughnan."

Now, Sir, up to the 29th of October last, the date of the resignation of the Great War Veterans' representatives, the Repatriation Committee had cost the country $194,309.08, and no doubt that amount also has been increased since that date.

Another creation of the President of the Privy Council was the Canadian Official Record. This publication was used as a medium for boosting the Government in general and the President of the Privy Council in particular. Its contents were largely reprints of articles that had appeared in other publications, and so indefensible was the expenditure of public money on such a sheet that Government newspapers like the Toronto News and the Ottawa Journal made strong protests against it. However, in less than eleven months the President of the Privy Council made this country pay $40,134.36 for this toy of his.

Then, Sir, the President of the Privy Council went into the moving picture business. Although the Department of Trade and Commerce has a splendid outfit for the production of moving pictures, and has expended upon it and its Publicity Bureau a sum that must now approximate $100,000, the President of the Privy Council insisted on attaching to his Department of Public Information another moving picture outfit. According to a return brought down in the House, the hon. gentleman after paying $5,000 in connection with moving pictures, entered into a contract for one year with the Pathescope Company of Toronto for producing other moving pictures, to be approved by him, and he is paying the company $50,000 for their year's work. It is significant of the flouting of Parliament in the matter of public expenditure that that $50,000 payment is to be made out of moneys provided by the Demobilization Appropriation Act of 1919. In that way the transaction would be covered up and thus escape criticism in Parliament. Now that it has been exposed it will, I hope, open up a field of work for those who believe that the Government should practice economy.

In regard to this moving picture business the Farmers' Sun a short time ago drew the attention to a Government expenditure of $504.80 for bacon-hog moving picture films. Now, Sir, that is a suspicious looking item.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: At once it raises the question of whether Sir Joseph Wesley Flavelle, through his fellow Christian the President of the Privy Council, has succeeded in getting an advertisement for his bacon at the public expense. That will also bear investigation at the hands of those who believe that the Government, particularly at this time should practise economy. In view of this indefensible waste of public money the "Farmer's Sun" is moved to say: "But still we, the common people, are adjured from Ottawa to 'produce, produce; and save, save.' Isn't it about time Ottawa itself set an example in economy?"

Now, Sir, if we pursue a little further our scrutiny of what the President of the Privy Council has been doing here at Ottawa it will be plain that, in his case at all events, appeals for economy will fall upon deaf ears. He believes in bolstering up his political fortunes at the country's expense, and there is no field in which he is not prepared to make a new venture, regardless of the cost. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that not long ago the hon. gentleman announced that the Canadian people were suffering from neurasthenia, and as his colleagues were insensible to this national affliction he took it upon himself to act as national physician. Accordingly he established a new Department of Health at an initial cost of $66,000 and put himself at the head of it as Dominion Physician-in-Chief. This was too much even for Toronto, and, as if to ridicule the minister's new pose, that city at once proceeded to develop an outbreak of smallpox. This lack of appreciation by the city in which he had tried to dodge his taxes must have astonished the minister, because even though he may have consulted all the pharmacopoeias in the Toronto Star office and the Methodist Book Room, he did not emerge from either place with any remedy adequate to meet the new smallpox situation. In fact, while he was trying to think up something that would make his new Health Department function, the health authorities of the ctiy of Montreal first, and later those of the province of Quebec, issued regulations forbidding any person coming from Ontario to enter the province of Quebec unless proof of recent vaccination could be furnished. This was done, of course, purely as a measure of self-protection, but in view of the hon. gentleman's record and temperament nobody need be surprised if he should issue an order in council declaring that after careful analysis his Health Department has found that the action taken by Quebec is a dangerous symptom of French-Canadian lèse-majesté, and that to prevent its becoming contagious a new branch will be created to deal with it exclusively.

Mr. Speaker, not only has the hon. gentleman taken our national health under his wing; he has done likewise with our national morals. He is not only the national physician; he is also the national big policeman. If we will not be good, he will throw us all into jail; and for this purpose he has organized a new police force. This he did by prying loose the Dominion Police Force from his easy-going colleague the Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Doherty) and then merging it with the Royal Northwest Mounted Police force under a new name. The combined force, according to an official announcement handed out by the minister, is to consist of a mounted section and a dismounted division. The duties of the former were defined in this official announcement in these words:

> The mounted section of the force will be extended in its operations to the East, so that a series of detachments will be available in all the Provinces for the enforcement of Federal laws and also to assist the Provincial authorities at any time.

Mr. Speaker, when I read this language I was astounded. It was such a plain intimation of future encroachments upon provincial rights and suggested so many possibilities of stirring up trouble in the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, that I wrote the premiers of those provinces directing their attention to the announcement the minister had given to the press and inquiring in each case if the province had asked for the assistance of this new "Rowell Police" or if any situation in which these police would be required was likely to develop. The replies from the provincial premiers were to the effect that their provinces had made no request for the new police; that they were not aware of any situation in which the services of these police would be required, and that, speaking generally, the provinces were able to look after their own affairs without any outside assistance. The reply from Sir Lomer Gouin, Premier of Quebec, states the case so admirably that I will read it:

Office of the Prime Minister,
Province of Quebec.
QUEBEC, February 4, 1920.

Honourable Charles Murphy, M.P.,
46 Elgin Street,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Murphy,—I have your letter of the 31st ultimo, in which you are so good as to call my attention to the official announcement of the merging of the North West Mounted Police and of the Dominion Police.

You ask me if I can let you know whether any request was made on behalf of this province, at any time, for the services of this new police force and, if not, whether any condition of things exists, or is likely to exist, that will make it necessary for us to call in its assistance.

In answer, I have to state that we made no request in connection with police assistance to the Federal Government and that we do not anticipate that any condition will arise necessitating our having recourse to the Federal Police.

I must add that I felt an astonishment equal to your own when I read the announcement you refer to as I have always considered that police matters, in the province, are within the exclusive attributes of the provincial governments as being a part of the administration of justice, of municipal and local matters in the province.

Mr. ROBERT H. BUTTS (Cape Breton South and Richmond): Will my hon. friend read the reply made by Hon. George Murray, Premier of Nova Scotia?

Mr. MURPHY: I would like to oblige my hon. friend but I prefer to read the reply which I am now reading to the House.

I have grave doubts as to there being any jurisdiction at all in the Federal authorities in this connection. Some time ago Lord Rosebery stated something which I believe has its application here. The Imperial Government had advertised the sale of a part of his property which it had used during the war, without in any way consulting Lord Rosebery in the matter. The latter, on seeing the advertisement, gave out to the press that the Government and its Commissions had so frequently and to such an extent encroached upon the rights of private individuals during the war that it probably had come to think that these rights existed no longer. I am inclined to believe that the numerous encroachments upon Provincial rights and powers of which the Federal Government and its Commissions have been guilty during the last four or five years have also given them the idea that Provincial rights exist no more.

I can assure you that we feel capable of coping unaided with every thing that occurs in this Province in the way of administration of justice and the protection of the life and property of its inhabitants, and that we are perfectly secure in the opinion that nothing will occur that will be beyond our powers.

Believe me.

Yours faithfully,
LOMER GOUIN.

Of course, there is another purpose for which the new police force could be used. While the hon. gentleman remains at the head of the force, it can be used for raids on private houses, colleges, and libraries, that may contain books or papers objectionable to the hon. gentleman or his friends. In point of fact, that very thing has been done in several parts of the Dominion in a way as high-handed and unjustifiable as if the Kaiser himself was directing the raids. On this point, the Grain Growers' Guide made a few timely observations. In a recent issue, that paper said:

The people of Canada will not be true to their instincts, their traditions, and their just rights, as a free, self-governing people, if they do not demand, and insist upon getting, an explanation from Ottawa, in regard to the arbitrary proceedings that have taken place recently, months after the cessation of hostilities, in the invasion of private houses, colleges and libraries, under the provisions of an order-in-council framed explicitly for war-time conditions, the seizure of books and papers, and the sentencing of individuals to terms of imprisonment for having in their possession literature under the war-time ban of the censorship.

In Alberta, and in Ontario, these searches, arrests, confiscations, and punishments have been carried out in a manner which would have been more in keeping with the old methods of the old autocratic regime in Russia than with the institutions of government in this free country.

But, Sir, the invasion of private rights has not been restricted to the cases referred to by the Grain Growers' Guide. Of late, a new line of activity has been opened up for the new police force which apparently has instructions to make war on women whose political opinions do not happen to please the President of the Council and his friends. The latest instance of this kind that came to my notice happened in Toronto, an dthe particulars of the incident are set out in the following letter:

DAUGHTERS OF CANADA, INCORPORATED 1919, DOMINION CHARTER.

TORONTO, Feb. 25, 1920.

Hon. CHAS. MURPHY, M.P.,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir:—I am sure that you will be interested to know that we have got as far as the Dominion Mounted Police.

Our first intimation of this was that the Y.M.C.A. refused us a room. The President, the Secretary, and I, called to see the man in charge, and to ask why—since many organizations have meetings there—the Daughters of Canada were excluded.

He told us that a man had called from the Mounted Police, armed with some newspaper clippings (!) and asked for the address of our officers, as he was going to take action against us for disloyalty. Our Corresponding Secretary Mrs. Stevens, then went to the headquarters of these Police, and found an Englishman, Inspector Bates, in charge. She demanded his authority for interfering with our organization, and asked to see the newspaper clippings. He told her that they had been passed on. She could get no further information. I can't help wondering if they were "passed on" to the minister whose special brand of courage is attacking women from afar off.

Yours truly,

(Signed) CHRISTINE ROSS BARKER,
Treasurer D. of C.

Making war on women! Imagine what a degradation that must be for the gallant members of a force with the magnificent record and the world-wide reputation of the Royal North West Mounted Police. As the Ottawa Citizen, in its issue of February 6, said:

Changing the name of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, or the Dominion Mounted Police, does not necessarily mean that law and order is being promoted. Royal Northwest Mounted Police is a name known and respected in every part of the world. When a man joins the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, he becomes conscious of having to live up to the traditions and reputation of the force, created by half a cenury of service on the side of law and order. Mr. Rowell's new police begins without any such name, and with nothing very inspiring at its political head. When the present government, itself governed by fear, gives place to government with confidence in the good sense of the Canadian people, the Royal Northwest Mounted Police should have their honored name restored to them.

Not only should they have their honoured name restored to them, but they should be returned to the work which they have done so long and so well. To use the phraseology of the Ottawa Citizen, "the good sense of the Canadian people" will commend any action of this Parliament that will restore the Royal North West Mounted Police force to the enviable position it occupied in our national life before the President of the Privy Council succeeded in pulling it down from its high estate.

The hon. gentleman poses as an exemplar in so many lines, and by reason of that so often assumes the right to set standards for other people, that a few minutes may be profitably employed in examining the kind of an example he sets the public in the matter of loyalty to his own colleagues. Last year, during the debate on the Budget, we had the spectacle of the hon. gentleman conveying to the House and to the country the intimation that his former colleague, the ex-Minister of Agricutlure (Mr. Crerar), had taken in Council a position on the tariff inconsistent with that which he afterwards took in this House. Up to the time the President of the Privy Council made his appearance in Dominion politics, the proceedings of Council were regarded as secret, and the members of Council were regarded as being bound by their oath of office not to reveal them. Only certain decisions of Council were made public, and those only in an official and a well-understood way; but the hon. gentleman, with that fine sense of honour that distinguishes him from common folk introduced a startling innovation when, in replying to the speech on the Budget of his former colleague the ex-Minister of Agriculture, he gave the House and the country plainly to understand that the attitude which the ex-Minister of Agriculture had taken in Council, where all that is said and done is of a confidential and secret character, was at variance with the attitude which the ex-Minister of Agriculture took later in this House. This is what the President of the Council said. I quote from Hansard of June 12, 1919, page 3407:

Every man must exercise his own judgment on an important issue like this and I have the greatest respect for the judgment and sincerity of my hon. friend, the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), but I say to the House and to the country that if I was prepared, as all my colleagues were, to support the Finance Minister in coming down to this House during this war year without any revision of the tariff, I do not believe that I am absolved from supporting him when he has revised the tariff in a measure according to the lines that I desire.

Hon. members will note the oblique and tortuous way in which the President of the Council, in the words which I have just quoted, put his former colleague the ex-

Minister of Agriculture, who was known to favour tariff revision, in the position of having first agreed in Council that there should not be any revision of the tariff in 1919, and then of having later opposed such a revision as he desired when it was brought down in the House. The President of the Privy Council did this knowing that the only way in which the ex-Minister of Agriculture could refute him would be by disclosing what that hon. gentleman had said and done in Council, and the President of the Privy Council knew perfectly well that as an honourable man the ex-Minister of Agriculture would make no such disclosure. So, relying on the sense of honour of his ex-colleague, the President of the Privy Council in violation of his oath of office did not hesitate to place his former colleague in a false position before the House and the country.

The precise character of the offence committed by the President of the Privy Council will be made more clear if I read that portion of the oath bearing on this matter, which he took as a Privy Councillor. The oath was in these terms:

> You Newton Wesley Rowell do solemnly promise and swear that you will serve His Majesty truly and faithfully in the place of His Council in this His Majesty's Dominion of Canada, you will keep close and secret all such matters as shall be treated, debated and resolved on in Privy Council, without publishing or disclosing the same or any part thereof, by Word, Writing, or otherwise to any Person out of the same Council, but to such only as be of the Council.

That is the beginning of the oath which is taken by all Privy Councillors, and which the President of the Privy Council took when he was sworn in as a member of that Council, and it was in violation of that part of the oath which I have read that he made the statement in the House to which I drew attention a few moments ago. I have only to observe further, Sir, that even if the intimation given to the House by the President of the Privy Council about his colleague's attitude in Council were true, that would not justify this breach of the spirit and the letter of his oath of office.

Now let me recall the attitude this same hon. gentleman has displayed in the House and in the country towards his colleagues the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and the late Minister of Customs, now the Secretary of State (Mr. Sifton). These two hon. gentlemen represented Canada at the Peace Conference. The President of the Privy Council was not there, although he and his kept press made frantic efforts to induce the right hon. the Prime Minister to send him there. When the Peace Treaty was signed, it was the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and the then Minister of Customs (Mr. Sifton) who signed it on behalf of Canada, but when anything is to be said about the Peace Conference or the Peace Treaty or the League of Nations the President of the Privy Council, who was not at the Conference, and who did not sign the treaty, coolly elbows his two colleagues out of the way and tells the House and the country what was done at the Conference, what the Peace Treaty means, and particularly what the League of Nations means. There, Sir, you have another example of the hon. gentleman's modesty and of his fine regard for the feelings of his colleagues —of his always doing that which will promote harmony in the Cabinet and in the Government ranks.

In case some one might be tempted to say that an Opposition member should not complain if the President of the Privy Council is acting in the way I have described, let me point out that I am not complaining; far from it, I am simply drawing attention to what is going on.

We had another example of the hon. gentleman's loyalty to his colleagues and his fine regard for their feelings when the Grand Trunk Bill was under discussion last session. The Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) had charge of that measure, but on a number of occasions the President of the Privy Council shoved them aside and took the conduct of the Bill out of their hands. That was particularly the case on a memorable evening when, after the hon. member for Cape Breton North (Mr. McKenzie) had moved an amendment to the second reading of the Bill, the President of the Privy Council struggled with his colleague the Minister of Railways for possession of the floor. The incident is embalmed in Hansard of October 21, in these few lines:

> Mr. J. D. REID: Mr. Speaker—
> Mr. ROWELL: Mr. Speaker—
> Some hon. MEMBERS: Who has the floor?
> Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.
> Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

To our surprise the Minister of Railways gave way and allowed this great railway authority to make the speech which under all the rules of the House the Minister of Railways should have made on that occasion.

Having disposed of the Minister of Railways and the Minister of the Interior, the President of the Privy Council next displayed his loyalty to his colleague the Minister of Labour by going down to Washington and usurping his place there at the International Labour Conference. Incidentally, he found time during the Conference to make a trip from Washington to Detroit, at the public expense,

5 p.m.

I have no doubt, for the purpose of addressing a Y.M.C.A. conference in the latter city. He is reported by the Toronto Globe to have said when speaking at Detroit:

> No nation can go out to the other nations of the world as a Christian leader until it establishes social justice within its own boundaries. We have not achieved social justice. We have not succeeded in amplifying the ideal of human brotherhood sufficiently to entitle us to be spiritual leaders.

He must have had an access of modesty that day. He continued:

> I think quite probably there will be some funerals in both your country and mine before we accomplish that.

As you will observe, Sir, the hon. gentleman's remarks at Detroit were somewhat doleful, and they have a sound like that which a person makes when he is preparing a soft spot for himself to fall on. In point of fact, that is just what the hon. gentleman was doing. He spoke at Detroit shortly after the Ontario elections, and as the county of Durham, which he represents in this House, by way of a senatorship in another, had just elected a Liberal and a Farmer as its provincial representatives, he felt it was high time to begin practising his political swan song, and so he began at Detroit with this reference to funerals. He added another verse at Port Hope, and of that I shall speak a little later.

Meanwhile I want to deal briefly with a few of the hon. gentleman's other activities which have combined to create confusion in the public mind. The misleading propaganda in which the President of the Privy Council habitually indulges has been given free rein in connection with his utterances about the League of Nations and the eight-hour day. Although it has taken the United States Senate many months to discuss the Covenant of the League of Nations, and the obligations that the United States will assume if the Treaty is adopted without reservations, the Parliament of Canada, after a superficial and brief discussion was induced, chiefly by the hon. gentleman to swallow the Treaty and Covenant and to reject the eminently proper amendment proposed from this side of the House by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). Since that time the President of the Privy Council has adopted a truculent attitude towards the United States, and in addresses before various clubs has laboured to create the impression that principally through his efforts Canada has assumed the moral leadership of this continent, that the United States Senate in not swallowing the Treaty and the League of Nations with its eyes shut has forfeited public respect, and is derelict in its duty towards other entente nations, and that the chief, if not the only objection of the United States Senate to the Treaty was the number of votes given to Great Britain and the Overseas Dominions.

Just to illustrate the difference between such a dabbler in world politics as the hon. gentleman and a man of trained experience and sound judgment in international affairs, I am going to refer you to a notable article in the North American Review for January last written by the Hon. J. M. Beck who was deputy attorney general of the United States in the Garfield Administration. Mr. Beck has delivered many important addresses in Canada and he was well known here as a staunch friend of the Allies long before his country entered the war. Mr. Beck's article begins with a reference to the traditional policy of the United States towards world politics and after recalling an unsuccessful effort that was made one hundred years ago to have the United States join a European League of Nations, Mr. Beck points out that under the American constitution no official, however great or illustrious he may be, could commit the United States to any treaty obligation except upon the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate. Mr. Beck then recalls the storm of protest throughout the United States with which President Wilson's announcement that he was going to Paris was received; the refusal of the American people in the State elections of 1918 by a majority exceeding 1,000,000 votes to grant the President an unlimited moral authority to commit them to any peace programme; the formal notice given by more than one-third of the Senate on the return of the President with the first draft of the Covenant of the League that it would not be accepted by the American people, and the fatal blunders that were made by the European nations in not heeding these notices and warnings. Notwithstanding these blunders and the Senate rejection of the Peace Treaty on account of the League of Nations, Mr. Beck declares that

"the Anglo-French-American entente is not dead" and that "the best hope of the world for the preservation of a just peace lies not so much in the League of Nations as in the spirit of mutual co-operation between the members of the great alliance which called it into being." In final explanation of the attitude of the United States Mr. Beck says:

> It is now obvious that the United States while willing to be the helpful friend of her sister democracies was not disposed to be a partner of a large number of nations, some democratic and some autocratic and with some of whom she has scant sympathy.

Throughout the article there is but one allusion to the votes allowed Great Britain and the overseas Dominions and that is made merely for the purpose of explaining that the multiplied vote of the British Empire was desired by the Overseas Dominions rather than by England. Mr. Beck makes it clear that the action of the Senate was in no way influenced by these votes or by other alleged considerations but that it was based upon constitutional principles and upon the broadest grounds of patriotism because the covenant would permanently affect the destinies of the American people. He adds that a majority of the American people take a just pride in the fact that the Senate "refused to permit its high prerogative to be defeated by that which was virtually a policy of coercion." For us Canadians that article in the North American Review is full of significance. It shows how careful our neighbours to the south are about entering into foreign engagements of any kind and how rigidly opposed they are to the surrender of any constitutional privilege they now enjoy. In a word, Sir, the article is instinct with the spirit of a people who are free and who are determined to remain free without giving offence to any other people enjoying the same freedom.

If, in conjunction with that article, there be borne in mind first, the testimony of William C. Bullitt before the foreign relations committee of the United States Senate to the effect that Secretary Lansing had said in Paris that if the United States knew what it was being let in for it would never ratify the Treaty; secondly, the recent statement of Mr. Asquith during the Paisley election that the peace arranged at Versailles was a bad peace, and, thirdly, the still more recent statement of Earl Curzon that the Peace Treaty will have to be rewritten, that it was never intended to be permanent—if, I repeat, these things be borne in mind, is it not about time for the Canadian people to call a halt to the wild capering of the President of the Privy Council through the mazes of the Treaty and of the League of Nations and that they read for themselves what men who understand both the Treaty and the League of Nations are saying about them. In any event, Sir, should not Canada be as little disposed as the United States, in the words of Mr. Beck, "to be a partner of a large number of nations, some democratic, some autocratic and with some of whom she has scant sympathy?" The future of this country, like that of the United States is on this continent. That being so, I ask why should Canada be less careful than the United States in committing herself to foreign engagements of which she knows nothing? Why should this Parliament as the guardian of Canadian interests allow herself to be stampeded in the dark in reference to such vital matters as the Treaty and the League of Nations when eminent jurists on both sides of the Atlantic make it plain that neither is what the President of the Privy Council says it is.

Let me make a few observations in reference to the hon. gentleman's performances in connection with the eight-hour day. Having elbowed his colleague, the Minister of Labour out of the way and assumed the role of labour leader of the Dominion, the President of the Council then put himself forward as the leading authority on the eight-hour day and the forty-eight-hour week in this country. More than anything else, his speeches created the impression in the public mind that the Peace Treaty made or would make the eight-hour day obligatory in the countries which signed it. The Treaty does nothing of the kind. The Treaty only sets forth as a principle that the eight-hour day should be a "standard to be aimed at," the inference being that it should be adopted by a country when the economic conditions of that country justified such action. Beyond that the language of the Treaty does not go. The pretensions and performances of the President of the Council in reference to the eight-hour day received some attention at the hands of a newspaper which is a supporter of Union Government. In its issue of December 19 last the Montreal Gazette said editorally:

> Mr. ROWELL'S MISSION.
> Having committed the Canadian Government to the principle, if not the practice, of the eight-hour day, at the Washington Conference, Hon. Mr. Rowell is now engaged in discussing the matter with the Canadian public. A reversal of this procedure would have been more in harmony with the theory of responsible government. Mr. Rowell's ministerial record does not reveal him as a consistent apostle of that theory, and it is due as much to his instrumentality as to that of any other member of the Administration, that responsible government has so largely given place to Cabinet rule in this country. Mr. Rowell spoke for the Canadian Government at the Labour Conference in Washington. He did not speak there for the Canadian people nor for Canadian labour. He was quoted as stating that the matter was one to be determined by the Government, and having enunciated that progressive principle, he announced his support of the eight-hour day convention.

A little later the same article reads thus:

The reduction of the aggregate hours of labour means a reduction in the amount of work done. Experience has by actual demonstration shown that to be the case. Yet Mr. Rowell talks in the same breath of the desirability of the forty-eight hour week, and the necessity of increased production. It would be difficult to imagine two more inconsistent propositions, and yet Mr. Rowell presents them as complementary.

Further on the article says:

Some further effort might probably be made toward a declaration in definite terms as to the exact nature and scope of the conditions attached to the acceptance of the eight-hour day. What limitations were made, and how far do they go? Is it proposed to apply the so-called principle of the eight-hour day to the basic industry of Canada, that of agriculture? Are the fisheries to be operated on an eight-hour day basis, and is the forty-eight hour week to prevail in the great lumber industry? These are all seasonal occupations, carried on under conditions which do not lend themselves to the operation of an eight-hour day, or, if at all, only at enormous additional cost, which must be borne by the consumer. As against this increase in the cost of production there is, of course, the alternative of a reduction in the production itself, again with its burden of higher prices to be paid by the consumer.

Take agriculture as an example. It is hardly necessary to state that a reduction in the agricultural yield means higher prices for the amount actually produced. The eight-hour day in agriculture would inevitably reduce production, unless more labour is employed, and more labour, if it can be secured at all on the farm, means increased cost of production, which the consumer must pay. The question as to the practicability of applying the eight-hour day to farm work was answered only a few days ago in Toronto by J. C. Dixon, of Warfield, presiding as master of the Dominion Grange. It would mean, he said, that the people would have to pay 30 cents a quart for milk, $2 a peck for potatoes, $5 a bushel for wheat, and $1 a pound for butter, and would "come nearer to jarring the Canadian people back to a level of common sense than anything else that could possibly happen at present." If the eight-hour day means this in agriculture, how is it to result differently in other industries? Does it not mean reduced production, or the maintenance of production at greater cost, and increased prices to the public either way?

So much, Sir, for the vapourings of the President of the Privy Council and the misapprehension which he has created about the terms of the Treaty relating to the eight-hour day. What has happened in this regard furnishes another proof of the mistake Parliament made by allowing itself to be hurried into ratification of the Treaty before examining and discussing its contents in detail.

Mr. Speaker, apart from anything the Treaty may contain, if you want sane leadership in Canada on the question of an eight-hour day you can get it from the National Trade Unions in the Province of Quebec. There was a labour convention held in Three Rivers in September last, which was attended by delegates representing sixty-three National organizations and 30,000 workmen from all parts of the province. The convention adopted a number of resolutions of the most practical character. Here is the resolution that was adopted with reference to hours of work:

The Convention expresses the opinion that any provision enforcing a fixed number of hours for the legal working day is arbitrary, unwise and inopportune, but it maintains that the length of working days should be such as to give the workman a reasonable time to recuperate, to perform his duties as husband, father, citizen, and Catholic, and to do justice to the reasonable obligations of commerce, industry and finance.

A report of the convention contains this summary of the discussion about the eight-hour day:

"We see no advantage," declared some of the speakers, "in legalizing a uniform eight-hour day for trades requiring little effort and carried on under favourable sanitary conditions. On the other hand, we find the same eight-hour day excessive for other very exhausting trades practised under most distressing conditions. Instead of claiming an arbitrary regulation which ignores obvious differences, we lay down the principles governing the whole question and let the various trades conform to those principles according to their respective needs."

"Less working hours and a higher salary is all very well," remarked a speaker, "but if every one does less and earns more, the cost of living will go rising and where will it stop? Then what about the poor devil who belongs to no union and can get no increase? Will his condition improve?"

Thus you see, Mr. Speaker, that the labour unions of the province of Quebec keep in mind not only the welfare of their own members, but also the welfare of those workers who are not represented in unions. While doing this for the workers, they acknowledge their duty to do justice to the reasonable obligations of commerce, industry, and finance.

Mr. Speaker, is it any wonder that, industrially, Quebec has become the admiration and the envy of this continent, and the one province in Canada where foreign capital seeks investment? Is it any wonder that a man who knows the conditions in Quebec as Sir Andrew MacPhail does should speak of that province in these terms:

"Quebecers were referred to as Canadians and there was nothing more true. It was very significant that the spirit of Quebec governed Canada, and without that spirit Canada could not be governed.

"The people had inherited the qualities of their forefathers, and these qualities, which had kept France to the fore in Europe had also kept Quebec in the lead in Canada.

"It was the spirit of Quebec that made of the province a paradise of common sense, of political wisdom and of personal liberty. If that spirit could be maintained, Quebec would be the last refuge of civilization on the continent."

Mr. Speaker, no more deserved tribute was ever uttered than that paid by Sir Andrew MacPhail to the spirit of Quebec. Splendid at all times, that spirit has been particularly splendid during the past two years and a half. Reviled, insulted, and outraged on behalf of Union Government, Quebec went quietly and steadily upon her way. In less than eighteen months after winning a criminally conducted election, Union Government was on its knees to Quebec praying that some of its public men would join the Government and save it from destruction. What a spectacle, Mr. Speaker, was presented last summer when the head of the Union Government, the right hon. the Prime Minister himself, and his new Minister of Finance, went sailing up and down the St. Lawrence river calling at every other wharf and beseeching one French Canadian after another to enter the Government and save the country. But the men of Quebec were true to the spirit of Quebec; and as their province had gained in national fibre and in national respect by resolutely refusing to have anything to do with Union Government, they could not be coaxed, bribed, or cajoled into an alliance of any kind with the vilifiers of their province, their race, and their creed. And so, Sir, they remain aloof and apart from this Union Government conserving their strength for the day upon which the spirit of their province will be triumphantly justified by the defeat of the cowering politicians who let loose the floodgates of passion and prejudice, and who to-day cry aloud to be saved from the ghosts of their own raising.

Mr. Speaker, we hear from time to time a great deal of talk about the need of unity in this country; we have heard during this debate declarations of that kind from the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn), from the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Whidden), and from other hon. gentlemen. As I listened to these hon. members I could not help reflecting that they were somewhat late with their appeals, and that there would have been more point in those appeals if they had been made, for instance, two years ago last December, while the general election was in progress. As the result of that election the present Government attained office. This Government is called a Union Government, but Sir, it has destroyed every vestige of unity in this country. How could it be otherwise when the head of the Government is a gentleman who, a little over two years ago, used language in this House calculated to incite returned soldiers to turn their arms against those who dared oppose him and his policy? So that there may be no doubt of what the right hon. gentleman said I will quote his exact words. They will be found in Hansard for 1917 at page 2195. He then stated:

If what are left of 400,000 such men come back to Canada with fierce resentment, and even rage in their hearts, conscious that they have been deserted and betrayed, how shall we meet them when they ask the reason? I am not so much concerned for the day when this Bill becomes law, as for the day when these men return, if it is rejected.

That is the language used by the Prime Minister, and its meaning admits of no doubt. Naturally, with such a man at the head of this Government national unity is an impossibility. But, Sir, it is doubly impossible when the aims and objects of a body from which the right hon. gentleman derives his chief support are made known. That body is the Orange Order of Canada; and I propose to disclose to the House and to the country the kind of contribution to national unity that this chief prop of Union Government has been making.

Mr. Speaker, if I were to quote statements about the Orange Order made by persons not members of the Order it might be objected that such statements were prejudiced or were incorrect or unreliable, because made by persons without actual personal knowledge of the aims and objects of the Orange Order. In order that no such objection may be urged, I propose letting the Orangemen speak for themselves, and I am going to read from a circular which carries the names of the leaders of Orangeism in the province of Ontario. The circular is self-explanatory, and while I will not read the whole of it on account of its length, I will be pleased when I am through with it to hand it over to any person who may be desirous of seeing all that it contains. It has to be kept in mind, Mr. Speaker, that I am about to quote from this circular for the purpose of making it clear that while the sentiments that find expression in its pages are held by any considerable number of our people, and are sanctioned by any government in this country, national unity is a hollow phrase and a mockery of existing political conditions.

The circular, which might well be termed "A Canadian Hymn of Hate" begins in this fashion:

(Strictly Confidential.)

To be referred to or read only within the tiled doors of lodge, chapter or preceptory, and must on no account pass out of your possession.

Report of the Joint Legislation Committee of the Orange Order.

70 DEWSON STREET,
TORONTO, ONT., March 1, 1918.

Dear Sir and Brother,—As soon as you receive this copy of the report of the Joint Legislation Committee, will you very kindly return a note acknowledging the receipt. This is very important, as we are anxious to know that the document comes into the right hands. A stamped addressed envelope is enclosed for this reply.

A further report will be presented to the coming session of the Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of British America at its meeting in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, next July.

Our financial year ends on March 31, and the report will be issued shortly thereafter.

I am, faithfully and fraternally yours,

Signed W. BANKS,
Secretary-Treasurer.

R. W. Sir and Brethren—Your Joint Committee on Legislation beg leave to report as follows:

The black clouds of war still overshadow God's beautiful world, and the bloodthirsty and impious War Lord of Germany continues, with the aid of his willing and equally guilty satellites, to pollute the earth, to break every promise, to boast in his sinfulness that he is God's representative on earth, whereas we know he is the Devil's most faithful ally.

Then they come down to matters more prosaic:

At our last meeting we reported that the Premier, in answer to our urgent request for compulsory military service on the draft principle, had said if an emergency arose he would not hesitate to follow such a course.

We continued our effort for this military service law, and shortly before the Military Service Act was introduced into the Commons a deputation from our committee which went to Ottawa, were assured that a measure of compulsory military service would be introduced, and this has, of course, now become law.

We have renewed our request for the exclusion from Canada of all evil-disposed and disloyal people who may desire to enter our Dominion from the British Isles or other lands, under whatever name or disguise they may assume.

We have asked for the exclusion of alien enemy immigrants, for the refusal of land grants to all alien enemies, and we are pleased to report that by instructions to the customs officers, immigration officers and land agents, our requests along these lines are being carried out.

Naturalization of people from alien enemy countries is at a standstill, and the War Elections Act was passed, as we urged it should, by which alien enemies in Canada were almost entirely disfranchised.

Acting in hearty co-operation, as we always do, our own Order, through its M.W. Grand Master, Dr. Ellis, and the Royal Black Knights through their Grand Master, Bro. A.A. Gray, issued an appeal to both memberships to use every legitimate means to secure the support of the members of Parliament in every constituency for the Military Service Act and the War-time Elections Act. We must see to it that the safe-guards of this Election Act are not thrown away when the war is over.

I commend that to your notice, Mr. Speaker, in view of the new franchise Act we are promised.

We are urging the Government to see to it that people who, by reason of peace treaties at the close of the war may be entitled to come here from alien countries, should not be enfranchised at all, and that under no circumstances shall their descendants, or the descendants of people of alien enemy countries now naturalized here be enfranchised until they can read and write in the English language and until they sign a document agreeing to obey our laws, learn the English language, have it efficiently taught in their schools, and to forfeit all their property and civil rights and be liable to deportation on conviction of failure in these matters.

* * * * * *

We congratulate the Ontario Government—

Of course, this was drafted, Mr. Speaker, long before the recent Ontario election.

—on its new land regulations, which provide against any alien enemy or military shirker securing lands in New Ontario, and for the first time in the history of this Dominion it is made part of the contract for securing the land that the would-be settler agrees to forfeit his claim if he disobeys the military and other laws of the Dominion, and if he refuses or neglects to have his children educated thoroughly in English, or disobeys the school laws, or other laws of the province.

With Bro. the Hon. G. H. Ferguson, as Minister of Crown Lands—

There no longer, Mr. Speaker.

—with R. W. Bro. Dane as Commissioner for these new lands, and W. Bro. W. D. McPherson Chairman of the Soldiers' Aid Commission, which is helping to settle soldiers in the North, we hope soon to have the disloyal French Canadian element on these new lands in their proper place.

We regret that the Ontario bilingual school fight is still unsettled. We repeat what we said last year on this subject:—

Then the report goes on to deal with the usual arguments about bilingualism in Ontario.

Then it proceeds:

We have, at the request of our Princé Edward Island brethren, secured the legal opinion of two eminent lawyers on the question of the right to use French in the schools of that province. We believe the opinion will greatly help our Island brethren in their fight against French aggression.

It has become quite apparent that the school situation in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Alberta, must be thoroughly investigated, and our brethren in each of these provinces, assisted by legal advice, organization and investigation, so that effective steps may be taken to put an end to Rome's tactics in using French in schools wherever she can.

Mr. GEORGE BOYCE (Carleton): I may inform the hon. gentleman that the members of that band belong to the most loyal race in the Dominion of Canada. That cannot be said for his followers.

Mr. MURPHY: I did not quite catch what the hon. gentleman said, but in view—

Mr. BOYCE: Do you want to hear it again?

Mr. MURPHY: In view of the contents of the circular and of the fact that the hon. gentleman's name is attached to it I can understand his anxiety at the present moment.

Mr. BOYCE: Mr. Speaker, I have to say that these are the most loyal men in all Canada; they stood boldly for their country when Canada stood in need of loyal men.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MURPHY (reading):

We have notified the Government that the 446 French signs on post offices outside of Quebec, and the 859 bilingual post office signs, also outside of Quebec, must all be removed, as we believe such signs, with any other language on them than English, are illegal. An order has been issued, forbidding the putting up outside of Quebec of any more bilingual or French signs, and an inquiry is to be made into our complaint.

Fortunately we can raise these and other matters in the House of Commons and the Senate, and trust in this way to be able to force the removal of these signs, put up to irritate English-speaking people. Dr. Coulter, Deputy Postmaster General, told us that he had very little control over the French-speaking inspectors. Your committee believe it is high time some one with a steel backbone and club undertook the control of the French officials.

We have complaints about French Canadians being on the railway mail service all over the province outside of Quebec. In view of the fact that the Quebec mail clerks will not allow a clerk from any other province to secure a Quebec appointment, it is time we gave them a dose of their own medicine. Our investigations along these lines are still proceeding.

Permit us to remark here that every French-Canadian who comes to Ontario to take the place of the "White men" who enlisted should be sent back to Quebec at the close of the war and a heavy tax levied on their Ontario earnings.

We are pleased to report that the Protestant Alliance we organized in Montreal is going ahead slowly but surely, and is already doing good work in looking after returned Protestant soldiers.

We are quietly continuing our investigations in the case of judges, school boards, councils, and other official bodies using the French language instead of the English. We have a good deal of territory to cover and have to proceed with caution.

We still have to watch Rome and her emissaries. She is ever on the watch for opportunities to help her cause, and interferes in public library matters, especially in rural centres, to keep out Protestant literature and introduce Romish. She also tries for control of parts of high schools, and in a thousand other ways endeavours to get her grip wherever she can. We appeal to our members everywhere to notify us of any incident of Rome's interference.

We say in the most emphatic manner that all our public business and correspondence must be in the English language and all records of courts, councils, school trustees and other public bodies, all tax bills and official notices of every kind, must be in English only. French and German languages or any other language than English must not be recognized in Ontario, and we must heartily endorse the Bill dealing with the German language presented to the legislature by Dr. Forbes Godfrey. We must respectfully suggest that he add after the words "German language," "or any other language than English."

We have complaints of Romish priests and nuns in hospitals and homes, supposed to be public institutions, interfering with Protestant patients, trying to get their money first, and then to join the church on their deathbed. We have had several investigations of this kind to undertake and the Provincial Secretary's Department has always helped us.

We do not for a moment desire to prevent our fellow Roman Catholic citizens from their fair share of public positions,—

I cannot read that without a smile, Mr. Speaker.

——but we do believe that in view of present conditions no Roman Catholic should be in charge of important public papers or in a position where he can favour people of his own race or creed.

We must not, however, stop at this. We must now begin a systematic campaign for the inspection of every convent, nunnery, monastery, and other secret places, places men and women are immured. We must demand legislation for the registration of every inmate, for the registration of all births and deaths, for the notification of every removal from one institution to another, for the absolute prohibition of the removal to places outside of this province of any inmate of these institutions, and for the holding of an inquest in case of every death in these places, as is necessary in the case of the death of any other prisoner.

Now is the time to act, and to act persistently and continuously, until we win.

In spring and early summer there were rumours that in some Romish centres arms were coming in and drilling taking place among Romanists. We immediately started searching investigations, and the Provincial Government employed secret service men also to investigate. The Dominion Government, at our request, also investigated.

And then, Mr. Speaker, listen to this.

No definite case was found, but there is an almost absolute certainty that these investigations put an end to any action Rome had planned for causing trouble here. The Dominion Government insists now on knowing the actual contents of packages, cases and other articles coming here from the States, as Britain does on all shipments from there.

Once again we desire to impress upon all officers and members the wisdom of doing everything possible to assist our returned soldiers. Our secretary has had scores of cases, in which our Orange members at the front have asked that their children, their wives, and their parents, be looked after. Some cases were very sad. In every case prompt attention was paid and many letters of grateful thanks have been received. Our secretary is a member of the Ontario Soldiers' Aid Commission, and is thus better able to attend to those cases. He has now the names and addresses of over 15,000 returned Ontario soldiers,——

Possible voters, you see, Mr. Speaker. (Reading):

——and in the course of the next few months he intends supplying every County Master with the names and addresses of these men in his county, so that those eligible can be induced to join the lodges in their respective localities. The entrance fees in such cases might be entirely abolished or reduced to a minimum.

The advisability of getting these men to join our ranks has been made perfectly obvious by the results of the general elections. It seems to us that parties are so changing that this Order, if our leaders are far-seeing and wise, will become the governing force in Dominion affairs, gathering to its side all loyal English-speaking and Protestant people. Very, very few Roman Catholics will aid us,——

Well, they at least give us credit for having a little sense. (Reading):

——and the vast majority of the French Canadian people will follow their British-and-Old-France-hating priests as they have done in the past.

When it became evident that a war-time election was to be forced on the country, this committee, knowing how the vast majority of our members desired the triumph of the loyalists, took steps to see that loyal candidates were chosen. The Union Government was formed, and then it became for us a loyal and patriotic duty to support the Union candidates. Some mistakes were made by the Government in the choice of these candidates.

I wonder if this refers to the constituency of Parkdale. (Reading):

We rejoice that so many of our Orange leaders were victorious in the campaign. So far as we have been able to secure definite information relative to the results, fully thirty or more Orangemen now have seats in the Commons. We anticipate that they will organize as a loyal Protestant party, with their own Whips, and act fearlessly and independently on all questions in which we are vitally interested.

They will have to be the watchdogs of the loyal Protestants of the Dominion. We congratulate every one of our members who, in the great battle for our country, our King, and our Empire, carried the Orange banner to victory. We have a right to expect the members of this Order, who are now Commoners, and Senators, to consult together and to work together, using their united influence to defeat all traitors and conspiracies, and we believe this they will do.

We have urged on the Government to see to it that sound Orangemen are elevated to the Senate in place of the late M.W. Bros. Sir Mackenzie Bowell and Hon. Dr. Sproule. We will continue this demand until we succeed.

All through this war the vast majority of French Canadians, blindly led by priests who hate Protestant Britain and who hate modern France, because she freed her schools from the licentious priesthood, have stood with our enemies and against all that is true and loyal and noble. We have nothing but sorrow and sympathy for the vast majority of the people of Quebec. They are a quiet, simple, and uneducated race, and easily fall a prey to priests and disloyal politicians. No wonder the mongrel crew which leads the Quebec crowd feared the results if from 60,000 to 70,000 men went to Britain and France and learned what it is to be free of priest rule. The conglomeration of superstition and selfishness which now rules Quebec stood aghast at what might follow the return of these men to the province.

And I may interject here that it was this conglomeration that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance went down to Quebec to woo last summer.

This explains the Priest-Bourassa-Laurier combination against recruiting and the Military Service Act. Let it be part of our work to help educate the people of Quebec to help themselves. The first result of Quebec's attitude in the war will be to sink her to the lowest depth of contempt among the people of the Dominion and the United States, and to see her pointed to as the "Coward Province." It will take either an immediate revolution among her people, the removal of priestly rule and the freeing of her schools, or generations of degrading servitude ere she emerges from her present miserable position.

From this day forward we must insist that just what Confederation gave Quebec is all she shall get in future. She has been the spoilt child of this Dominion. From now on her language must be barred from every other province. Favours must cease and the Civil Service of the Dominion be rid of every official who cannot speak English.

Aye, Sir, but here comes the milk in the cocoanut. Here is why the report is made. Here is why race is set against race, creed against creed, and province against province. Listen to this paragraph:

We repeat, with more emphasis than ever that the wider circulation of the Sentinel has become more and more a necessity if our Order is to continue to grow and prosper and if Protestant principles are to be sown broadcast over this continent. We who are in the fight every day of our lives are constantly reminded of the immense value of the Sentinel in our battle against Rome. We urge every Orange brother to be a subscriber and to endeavour to get others to subscribe. A member who does not take the Sentinel cannot be quite so earnest and active a member as he would were he a careful reader of the paper.

We have not wearied you with details of all our work. There is not a day passes but we have to deal with various matters. We are human and liable to err. We have ever held the banner of Orangeism high and trust as the years go by that our cause will grow and prosper and be blessed of the Lord.

With our earnest prayer that victory may speedily crown the arms of our beloved Sovereign and his Allies and that the Kaiser and his war lords may be utterly routed, peace may be proclaimed in Berlin, and all the peoples of our world-wide Empire be enabled to sing with heart and soul.

God Save our King.

Within the limits of Parliamentary expression, it would be impossible to use language that would fittingly condemn the contents of that circular and the men who are responsible for its production and circulation. While that is the fact, there is one feature of it upon which public attention should be concentrated until official action is taken to put an end to what is now a public scandal. You will observe, Sir, that two of the names signed to the nefarious circular from which I have quoted are those of Judge Scott, and Judge Evan H. MacLean. In view of the anti-Catholic sentiments to which they have subscribed and of the rancorous bigotry of the whole circular bearing their names, these men, I submit, should be at once given the choice either of resigning from the Orange Order or of resigning their positions of Judges on the bench. Imagine the chance of obtaining justice a Catholic would have in a court presided over by either of these judges! And if, in addition, the Catholic were a French-Canadian, just picture for yourselves what would be likely to happen to him!

In times past, we boasted of the impartiality of our courts, and we were accustomed to point to our judges as administering justice without fear, favour or affection. No boast of that kind can be made in connection with any court presided over by either Judge Scott or Judge MacLean while they entertain such opinions about their Catholic fellow-citizens as those to which their names are subscribed. Both of these judges were appointed by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty); and while he may have been unaware of their characters in the first instance, he will have no excuse for not applying the proper remedy now that their unfitness to occupy judicial positions has been exposed.

Before dismissing this subject, I want to express my appreciation of the position taken publicly by the hon. member for Ontario North (Mr. Halbert), with regard to those who set race against race and creed against creed in this country. In his public speeches, the hon. member for Ontario North has said on a number of occasions that he used to think that the greatest criminal was the man who looted the public treasury, but that he has revised his opinion, and that he now believes the greatest criminal to be the man who raises racial and religious issues in Canada. I congratulate my hon. friend upon the soundness of his judgment; and as he has now reached the point of view that I have always held, I invite his co-operation and the co-operation of his friends in the task of smoking these vermin out of their holes, so that, by joint action, we may enlist the help of a sufficient number of decent people to destroy even the last specimen of these pests, and thus pave the way for those neighbourly relations which ought to exist between the different elements that make up the population of our common country.

To establish those relations of mutual respect and good-will the Liberal party struggled for many years, and more than once it went down to defeat; but with clear vision and steady purpose it held to its course, and National Unity is as truly the key to its policy to-day as it ever was in the days that are past. Hence, Sir, I unhesitatingly affirm in this House that in the return of the Liberal party to power lies the hope for national unity in this Dominion of Canada.

Much of the discussion, Sir, to which you have listened in this debate has centered on the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). That amendment calls for a dissolution and an election. Speakers on the Government side of the House have challenged the arguments advanced from this side in support of the amendment. I now propose to offer them an argument used by a member of the Government which, in my judgment, affords the strongest possible justification for the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition.

Not long ago, the President of the Privy Council made a pilgrimage to the town of Port Hope. He spoke there, and he proved the case of the people against Union Government more convincingly than even an opponent of the Government could have done. In effect, the hon. gentleman told the people of Port Hope that he knew that Union Government was singularly unpopular everywhere, and then he proceeded to state the reasons for this unpopularity. Why, Mr. Speaker, he should have sought any reason beyond his own presence in the Government is something the ordinary man cannot understand. However, he did give another reason—the most extraordinary one a Canadian audience ever listened to. The Government's unpopularity, he said, was due to its shining virtues as reflected by its administration of public affairs.

Now, Sir, here is a distinct admission by the most moral member of the Government, that it no longer possesses the confidence of the country, and that it is merely holding on to office in the forlorn hope that something may turn up. In our political history never before has a minister of the Crown said publicly and so distinctly, that he knew that he and his colleagues were hanging on to office in defiance of the will of the people they are misgoverning. How his colleagues must have blessed him for that speech! It gave their whole case away. It placed them in the position of men who are too good for this world, and not yet ready for the next, and, as you know, Mr. Speaker, such ethereal creatures as that are liable to be roughly handled by the sinners who constitute the great majority at election times. No wonder, then, that the Toronto Globe and other papers like it are telling the Government to get out —to dissolve and hold an election. It is because this feeling is so widespread that I regard the amendment placed in your hands as most timely, and it is my intention to support it with my vote.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, this House was called for the despatch of public business, not to give an opportunity to an hon. member to gratify his personal spite as against another member of this House. Hon. gentlemen have left their homes, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and have come here to transact the nation's business in the hour of the nation's need; yet this House spent the entire afternoon in listening to an address from an ex-Privy Councillor, the whole subject of which was simply to gratify an apparently unsatisfied personal animosity against a member on this side of the House to whom he attributes some responsibility for the disappointment of his political ambitions in the year 1917. I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, if it were my privilege to take part in this debate, to discuss some of the important public questions now before the people of this country and demanding the consideration of the House. I deeply regret, as I am sure you all regret, that by reason of the character of the address delivered by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) it is necessary for me to take up some of your time at least in dealing with the matters which he has mentioned. I may, however, say that I think hon. members are to be congratulated on the fact that there is only one member of the House, who would make such an exhibition of himself as did the hon. gentleman.

I rise to reply to the hon. member not because the statements he made this afternoon demand an answer at my hands, nor to satisfy the members on the other side of the House nor on the Government side. The unsympathetic manner in which the remarks of my hon. friend were received by his own colleagues on his own side is the best evidence to the House and the country that the men who know him best trust him least. Nor is it necessary that I should reply to the remarks of the hon. member to the people who know me in this province or throughout the Dominion of Canada. My record in the public life of this country is a sufficient answer to what the hon. member has said. Nor is it necessary that I should rise to reply to the people of this country who know the member for Russell. His record and his conduct are a sufficient answer to his own accusations. I rise because there are some people, no doubt, in this province and in this Dominion who may not know either of us, who may not know the record of the hon. member or of myself as well as the members of this House do, and by whom, therefore, my silence might be misconstrued if I did not pay some attention to the hon. member.

Every man recognizes that the good opinion of decent, honourable and public-spirited citizens is one of the most valuable possessions that any man can have—a priceless possession. Every man recognizes and values the good opinion of his fellow-citizens. But there are some men—and the members of the House will recognize them—whose hostility and opposition constitute the greatest compliment that can be paid to a man. I congratulate myself on having earned the hostility of the hon. member for Russell.

The hon. gentleman started out by telling us that he delivered a speech in this House in 1918. He did. He made an even worse exhibition of himself in 1918 than he did to-day. He made it at a time when this country was in the midst of a war; he made it at a time when this country required to combine all its energies and resources to back up the men overseas and to help to win the war. He made an inflammatory declaration and appeal in this House, not for the purpose of backing up our men overseas, not for the purpose of uniting the people of Canada in support of the war but for the purpose of dividing the people of Canada. If the hon. member had expended one tithe of the energy in helping Canada to prosecute the war and defeat the Germans that he has in his speeches attacking me he would have been rendering a real service to Canada.

The hon. member said that he rose in the House on that occasion before six o'clock and that, due to the courtesy of the Speaker and the leader of the Government, his speech was adjourned until the House resumed in the evening. That is perfectly true. I was here up to six o'clock but I was not here in the evening for the reason that I have stated before, but I repeat that the hon. member knew when he rose that he was going to spend a great part of his time in a personal attack upon me and yet he had neither the manliness nor the courage to give me notice of the fact so that I might have an opportunity of making answer in his presence and in the presence of hon. members of the House to the false statements that he was about to make, statements which he knew to be false when he made them. He said that he expected that I would rise in my place to a question of privilege when I returned to the House. Well the hon. gentleman had the opportunity last session of rising to a question of privilege in order to attempt to reply to me?

Mr. CAHILL: He did.

Mr. ROWELL: He did, but his inability to proceed because the rules of the House prevented showed how utterly absurd it would have been for me to attempt to reply to him.

Mr. CAHILL: Show some courage.

Mr. ROWELL: I will deal with my hon. friend in time; do not worry. At that time I inquired of the Speaker of the House and I found that the rule is perfectly clear, that a debate once closed cannot be reopened during the session, and that when a debate is closed it cannot be referred to in a subsequent debate. So it is clear that I was precluded by the rules of the House from dealing with the matter on that occasion. The member for Russell said my colleagues "let the debate go by default." My colleagues reported to me—hon. members in the House will appreciate the reason—that in view of the inflammatory character of the appeal made by the member for Russell their view was that if a reply was made in the same spirit it might involve an acrimonious racial and religious controversy in this House which would greatly aggravate the conditions in Quebec at that time; and it was their desire to avoid that. They permitted the debate to close in my absence, and I was a victim of the situation; I was unable to reply on that occasion.

My hon. friend has stated that although I did reply in December, 1918, in Bowmanville, and in September, 1919, in this House, I only dealt with some of the accusations he made, and the other accusations still stand undenied and unanswered. Mr. Speaker, that statement by the hon. member is but another evidence of his recklessness in regard to the truth. Let him turn to my address delivered at Bowmanville—he has a copy of it—and he will find that I said I was taking up but a few of the idle and false stories that had been circulated as samples of the character of the whole; and speaking in this House last session I dealt with the matter in the same way. My hon. friend will find on page 415 of the Unrevised Hansard of 1919 this statement:

> I will not trouble the House with the other petty matters mentioned in the speech of the hon. member for Russell. They are as misleading and as false as the one with which I have dealt.

Yet in the face of these statements in both speeches, the hon. gentleman rises in the House this afternoon and tells hon. gentlemen that I did not deny his statements. I have practised in the Courts of the Province of Ontario for almost thirty years, and I speak with a consciousness of what I am saying when I state that in all my experience of witnesses in the box I never met one more reckless as regards the truth than the hon. member for Russell.

May I now take up some of these other matters. I will not take up the time of the House to go into them all; I will just take a few more samples so that hon. gentlemen may see the character of the statements made by the hon. member for Russell.

The hon. member started off this afternoon by saying that I had not answered the charge he made out that I had served the Ross Government for profit, or had found it very profitable to become solicitor in the re-organization of the great Soo Corporation. In the statement which he made on that occasion he said that in the course of four or five years I had added to my personal earnings, or profits a sum over $100,000. Well, Mr. Speaker, when I read that, it reminded me of the story of the death of Mark Twain. The report of Mark Twain's death was cabled across the sea and when the newspaper reporter went to his residence to inquire about it he was shown into the presence of Mark Twain himself. Asked about the truth of the rumour, Mark Twain said the report of his death was greatly exaggerated. The statement of my hon. friend is greatly exaggerated. I do not recall at the present time what the fees of my firm were during those years, but I will say to the hon. member that the greater part of those fees were not earned because of political association with the Ross Government or any other Government. My firm were appointed counsel to the Soo Corporation in July, 1904. The Ross Government went out of power in January, 1905, and when there was a Conservative Government in power in the province of Ontario, the greater part of these fees were earned by my firm as counsel for the Lake Superior Corporation. From the very fact that the Government had guaranteed a loan of $2,000,000 that company did have fairly close relations with the Government. In some respects it was dependent on the Government's good will; and I am not violating any confidence, I am simply stating a fact, when I say that when the Government of Sir James Whitney came into power, Sir James thought the position of solicitor for the corporation was a political appointment, and he sent to the president of the corporation the name of a Conservative lawyer in the city of Toronto whom he desired to have substituted for myself as solicitor for that corporation. Although the company was to some extent dependent on the Government they said "the choice of our counsel is a matter for the board of directors of the corporation. We are satisfied with the service that is being rendered and we intend to continue the same counsel." So, notwithstanding the representation of the Prime Minister of Ontario my firm was continued as counsel for the Soo Company. Now, if my hon. friend had said that in the practice of my profession, I could earn $25,000 a year I am not prepared to deny it. The fact is that I could in the practice of my profession earn that amount but I would, Mr. Speaker, like to ask this: If I could earn that amount in my profession and I came down here to serve my country at $7,000 a year, what evidence is that of my desire to profit at the expense of my country?

The hon. gentleman seemed to attach great weight to the fact that when I made a trip overseas some political friends contributed to the expense, and I think he mentioned in that connection three thousand and some odd dollars. Well, that again, like the report of Mark Twain's death, was greatly exaggerated. The amount was not so large as that, but it is true that some of the Liberals of the Province of Ontario did provide the bulk of the expenses of that trip. Why did they provide it? They said they believed I could do more valuable work in recruiting throughout the Province of Ontario if I had the opportunity of coming in touch with the actual conditions at the front—seeing the men in the trenches and the work they were doing, and then come back and appeal to my fellow citizens to support them. The only contribution I made was giving my time, I took it away from my profession—and the consequent loss such as any man must meet in absenting himself from his profession—but the expense was paid in that way. My only regret is that some of the friends of the hon. member for Russell did not do the same thing for him. If he had seen the conditions overseas—the actual need of reinforcements to fill up the ranks of our gallant men and of making every effort to support them in their struggle against Germany, it is incredible to me that the hon. gentleman would have taken the course which he afterwards did in reference to the war.

The hon. gentleman also says that I sent a friend of mine, Colonel Deacon, up to bribe a citizen of London to desert the Liberal party on the promise of a position as Chairman of the War Purchasing Commission. That is just as false as the other statements of the hon. member for Russell. What are the facts? The hon. members of this House know the character of the War Purchasing Commission. Membership in it was not a position of emolument, it was an opportunity for service. The members of that War Commission were not paid a salary, they gave their services in an honorary capacity. When Sir Edward Kemp was appointed and went overseas as Overseas Minister of Militia there was a vacancy on the Board. It was not the position of Chairman because it was understood that Sir Hormisdas Laporte, who had rendered such splendid service would be made Chairman, but it was the position of one of the members of the Commission. What did I do? I am glad my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) is in the House.

I consulted my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) as to who in his judgment would be the best man to select from among the business men of Western Ontario who were Liberals as a member for this board. We discussed the matter together and agreed upon three names, as my hon. friend will remember. The first was Mr. Gordon McGregor, of the Ford Company at Windsor, the other was Mr. Gartshore of the McClary Foundry Company, London, and the third was Mr. Little of the Robinson, Little Company. My hon. friend and I agreed that if we could secure any one of those men as a member of the War Purchasing Commission—not in an office of emolument, but without emolument the Government and the country would be fortunate. I first asked Mr. McGregor if he would accept a position on that commission. He was not a supporter of this Government; on the contrary, he supported my hon. friend from North Essex (Mr. Kennedy), and if the latter gentleman was in the House he would tell us so, I have no doubt. Mr. McGregor was not asked if he would support this Government or not; he was asked if he would be prepared to serve Canada in that position. After giving the matter due consideration he was compelled to decline owing to urgent business demands. Then we approached Mr. Gartshore, who declined to serve for a similar reason. The third gentleman to whom the hon. member for Russell referred this afternoon was then offered the position. But the circumstances stated by him this afternoon in connection with that offer I can only characterize as a yarn concocted out of whole cloth. The sole object which animated my hon. friend from West Lambton and myself was to get one of the best possible Liberal business men in Ontario to take that important and responsible post in the public service.

Then the member for Russell referred to another matter. He stated that I had not answered his charge that my place in Parliament was practically bought by offering a seat in the Senate to the Hon. Senator Mullholland. I am sorry that my hon. friend is not in the House to-night. "He who fights and runs away may live to fight another day." But, Mr. Speaker, I desire to place my answer on Hansard so that he can read it if he will not hear it: If after the bluster of the past two years of what this giant would do to me if he had an opportunity, he has done his best this afternoon, I am prepared for him to return to the attack as often as he likes, but I can assure the House that anything he can say will be as false no doubt as the statements he has already made.

I would like to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Murphy) if he were present what he would say to these parallel cases: When the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) joined the Cabinet of the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier Mr. F. G. Forbes was the member for that constituency and was appointed to the Bench in order that Mr. Fielding might have a seat in this House. Would the hon. member for Russell say that Mr. Fielding bribed Mr. Forbes in order that he might get a seat in this House, or that the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier bribed Mr. Forbes for the same purpose?

When the late Hon. A. G. Blair entered the Government he had no seat. Did Mr. Blair or Sir Wilfrid Laurier bribe Mr. E. G. King, the then member for Sunbury and Queen's who resigned in favour of Mr. Blair, by a seat in the Senate. Will hon. members on the other side suggest that when Hon. Mr. Templeman came into the House Mr. George Riley from Victoria, B.C. was bribed because he retired and was given a seat in the Senate in order to provide a place for Mr. Templeman? When the Hon. Mr. Graham entered this House did he bribe Mr. Derbyshire the member for Brockville to make way for him by the promise of a seat in the Senate? Did the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier bribe Mr. Derbyshire by a similar promise? When the Hon. Senator Beith did not accept nomination in Durham in 1904, but gave it to Sir Alan Aylesworth, was he bribed to do so? It is true he was not appointed to the Senate immediately, and some of his friends thought he was passed over, but in due time he was appointed. Will my hon. friends opposite suggest that Senator Beith was bribed? Then came a change of Government and Sir Robert Borden came into power. Dr. J. W. Daniel retired from St. John, N.B. and was made Senator to make way for Hon. J. D. Hazen; and Mr. George Taylor retired from Leeds to make way for my hon. friend, the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White); and Mr. George Gordon retired from Nipissing in order that the late Hon. Frank Cochrane might become Minister of Railways, were these members bribed to give up their seats? No hon. member will make any such suggestion. Every hon. member knows that it has been the custom and tradition in both political parties when an hon. member makes way for a Cabinet minister to recognize the public spirit of that member by appointment to the Senate or to the Bench, or to some other suitable public position.

Now, my hon. friend may say that that is not a wise policy nor a good practice. Well, if he will advocate a reform of the Senate and a complete change in the method of appointment, I for one will support him. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those Liberals who believe that the Liberal Party failed in its duty while in power in that it did not carry out its pledge to reform the Senate. I still believe that the Senate should be reformed and made more representative of the sentiment of the people, and I stand on the policy upon which the Liberal Party stood during all that period.

But the crowning piece of casuistry, Mr. Speaker, of which the member for Russell has been guilty is his reference to the "Secretarial Fund." Let me read to you, Mr. Speaker, the exact statement made by Mr. Murphy in the House in 1918 with reference to that fund. He then said:

> Now, Sir, what happened when the hon. gentleman entered the provincial field of politics? With his usual presence of mind he arranged with his friends to form a committee for the purpose of raising a fund to guarantee him against any loss while engaged in his work as Provincial leader. Mr. A. E. Ames, of Toronto, was chairman of the committee, and in addition to Sir Joseph Flavelle, the contributors included several other Toronto gentlemen. The fund itself was called the "Secretarial Fund," and I am informed that it varied in amount from $9,000 to $11,000 a year. Again, the exact amount raised in any one year is immaterial; the point it establishes is that as Provincial leader the hon. member for Durham was protected against any sacrifice while he retained that position.

I appeal to hon. members, just as I did last September, what meaning did you take out of that statement; and what meaning did the hon. member for Russell intend that you should take out of that statement? Exactly the meaning that you and the people of this country took out of it, namely, that out of that fund moneys had been paid to me to compensate me for my loss of time in connection with my work as Provincial leader.

The hon. member for Russell referred to the letter he wrote to Mr. Bowman, Chief Liberal Whip. Why did he not read the letter he received from Mr. Bowman? Mr. Bowman is a supporter of my hon. friends on the other side of the House. When he read the statement by the member for Russell, knowing how false it was, although he was not a political supporter of mine, he felt compelled to enter his protest against such a false statement. It was the same with contributors to the fund. Let me read a letter, Mr. Speaker, that the committee got from one of the most distinguished Liberals and one of the most influential supporters of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, in Eastern Ontario. His name is known from one end of the province of Ontario to the other. What did this contributor say in his letter to Mr. Ames, the chairman, in reference to this matter? I quote:

> After being in the South the latter part of the winter, I have read the speech of the Hon. Mr. Murphy on my return home, and, amongst other things in his attack on Mr. Rowell, I note with considerable interest and surprise that he states that the Secretarial Fund to the extent of nine to eleven thousand dollars a year was paid to Mr. Rowell.

The member for Russell did not say that, but that was the inference that was conveyed and the inference that this contributor to the fund drew from the hon. gentleman's remarks.

> As I know, you were chiefly instrumental of raising this Fund, and I think were the Treasurer. I would ask if Mr. Murphy is right in this. I cannot conceive that such a thing is possible, for, when I was asked to subscribe to this Fund, I was not only told it was a Secretarial Fund, but actually for the purpose of paying Mr. Rowell's secretarial expenses, such as secretaries, postage, etc., etc.

While Mr. Rowell will wait his own good time, I have no doubt this point is one he should not fail to take up on the floor of the House, and, in the meantime, as a subscriber, I would like to know if Mr. Murphy is wrong.

Now, the member for Russell said this afternoon that in his letter to Mr. Bowman he had said that he did not say I had shared personally in the fund mentioned, but that it was to guarantee me against loss. Well, if it was to guarantee me against loss it meant that I would have to take money out of the fund, because I was losing in the practice of my profession on account of the time that I was giving to the work of leader of the Opposition. But I want to take the statement of the hon. member as it stands. According to his own admission he knew that I had not received one dollar out of that fund; yet he came to the House of Commons and with deliberate ingenuity frames a statement conveying a totally false impression and framed it in such a way that he thinks he can crawl out from responsibility when it is found out. Mr. Speaker, the man who with cool calculation, deliberately surveying a situation, believes that it is to his profit to lie and does deliberately lie, open and above-board and is prepared to take the consequences if he is found out—we may have no respect for that man, but we do not despise him. But the man who by ingenuity conveys an equally false impression and does it in such a way that he thinks he can escape the consequences of his falsehood, that man adds to the sin of falsehood that of cowardice.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to have to ask the hon. gentleman to retract the statement, which obviously refers to the member for Russell, with regard to deliberately concocting a false statement. The remark is certainly unparliamentary.

Mr. ROWELL: Mr. Speaker, I was putting a hypothetical case.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may not evade the rule by putting forward in the form of an hypothesis what he cannot put forward in a direct statement.

Mr. ROWELL: Then, Mr. Speaker, when the speech comes round for correction I will strike out the words.

Mr. SPEAKER (rising).

Mr. ROWELL: In deference to your ruling, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ROWELL: I do withdraw in deference to Mr. Speaker's ruling. I want to keep within the rules of Parliament, although it is difficult to do so when describing the conduct of the member for Russell.

Now, then, the hon. member suggested—it is so small a matter that it is hardly worthy of note in passing—that some of my firm's legal expenses had been paid out of this fund. The extract he read to the House showed that that statement was untrue. May I refer for a moment to the report of the secretary which the hon. member read to the House. He appeared to get a good deal of entertainment out of that. Well, if it afforded him any comfort I am glad, because so far as I was concerned it was of interest to me, and I am glad he has drawn attention to it. But the point which I desire to draw particular attention is the reference in the report to the Young Men's Liberal Federation. The hon. member referred to that organization as being wholly independent of the Liberal party and conveyed the impression that that was the organization of which I was the head in connection with the work of the provincial Liberal party. If that is his view he is wholly mistaken. That organization was a federation of the young Liberal clubs of Ontario. The leader of the Opposition knows of the organization; other hon. members on the other side know of it. It was independent of the actual political organization, for this reason: The young Liberals of Ontario, the members of these clubs, desired to have freedom to express their own opinions on public issues. I believed that it was in the public interest that they should have that freedom; they preferred independence to any association with the political organization. But the point to which I particularly wish to refer is this. The hon. member said that the motto of this Young Liberal Federation was "service," and he seemed to get a great deal of pleasure out of repeating that word. He said it looked as if this was the organization of some Sunday school class having no relation to the Liberal party. Mr. Speaker, it is because a section of the Liberal party of Ontario, the section which could be influenced by the member for Russell, had wholly lost the spirit of service and were in politics as part of the game and for what they could get out of it, that the Liberal party received such a crushing defeat in Ontario on more than one occasion. My hon. friend should learn the meaning of the word "service." I say it to the credit and the honour of the young men who were members of these clubs and who had as their motto the word "service" that when a few months later war broke out and the call went forth for young men to volunteer, the ranks of these clubs were depleted because of the numbers of their members who, inspired by the spirit of service, went forth to fight for their country. I can only regret that the member for Russell did not even during the course of the war learn the true significance of the word "service."

The hon. member made light of what he called the "Sunday school idea of service." Well, if that be the Sunday school idea of service, then I stand in this House for the Sunday school idea of service; for it is only the spirit of service that can save the country in such an hour as this, just as that spirit saved it in the critical days of the war. It was because that spirit of service did not animate the member for Russell and others that when the critical hour came and members of the Liberal party and others had to decide whether they would choose the ideal of service—service for the men overseas; service to their country—service to the cause for which we were fighting—there was a cleavage, and the men who stood for service joined together in the formation and support of Union Government. I do not wonder that the hon. member for Russell does not care for the word "service," neither voluntary nor compulsory, neither civil nor military.

The hon. member for Russell said that there were several other funds. I think, if I recall aright, there were two he mentioned; the prohibition fund and the campaign fund of 1914. Well, his knowledge is somewhat better than mine. So far as I am aware, there was only one fund, the prohibition campaign fund of 1914, which was the one fund for the two purposes, because that campaign was fought on the issue "abolish the bar." The hon. member for Russell said that he would like to see a list of the contributors to that fund. I have never seen the list myself. The fund was raised by a provincial Liberal committee in Ontario and was administered by them in connection with the campaign of 1914; but I can tell you this, Mr. Speaker, because it came to my knowledge, that while other Liberals in the city of Ottawa contributed to that fund and their names will be found on the list, the name of the hon. member for Russell will not appear there, for he declined to give a contribution to assist the provincial Liberal party in its campaign of "abolish the bar" in 1914. Therefore, I was not surprised when, in the June session of last year, we came to vote on the Government Prohibition Bill, the hon. member for Russell led the Opposition in rising to oppose the resolution which the Prime Minister moved in the House. Perhaps that is another reason for his opposition to me, namely, that he does not agree with my views on that issue as he does not on some other issues. He suggests that I received some compensation at some time out of the prohibition fund. Here he makes a direct statement. Well, that is equally false with the other statement. I never received a cent of compensation, direct or indirect, out of that fund nor out of any other fund for my personal service at any time whatever. I never received a cent of contribution for any address that I made on that question or on any other question at any time in my life. I am glad to say that I have always been able to afford—if you care to put the case on that ground—to render a measure of service in the causes in which I believe, without accepting any compensation for my service.

My hon. friend next finds something in which he takes a great delight. He says: Now, I have this man; he is a tax evader, and he says that I appealed from taxation in Toronto because I was living in Ottawa and my income as a Privy Councillor would be exempt in the city of Ottawa. If a Privy Councillor's salary was exempt under the law why was I not entitled to the benefit of the exemption. My recollection, however, is that the matter was taken up while I was in England by my office and they lodged the appeal, but may I add I did not know at that time that, under the agreement with the city of Ottawa, a Privy Councillor's salary was exempt from taxation. I do not believe it is a sound principle that either a Privy Councillor's salary or a Civil Servant's salary should be exempt from municipal taxation, and I am glad that I am a member of a Government which has negotiated with the city of Ottawa a new agreement whereby that exemption has been wiped out. No longer will a Privy Councillor's salary be exempt from taxation.

My hon. friend devoted much time to my North Bay address. I dealt with that matter at the last session of the House, and it is not my intention to-night to go over the matters I then discussed. Hon. members who wish to see my statement can find it in Hansard as of that date; but there are just one or two observations I wish to make in view of the remarks of the hon. member for Russell to-day. The hon. member stated that he had a letter that I had written to somebody, I think, he said in the month of January, 1918, in which letter I, in effect, admitted that I had made a statement without any knowledge of the facts and that I was only then proceeding to investigate the facts. I am sorry the hon. member did not produce the letter, and he did not tell us to whom the letter was written. So far as I can find in my records, I can only locate two letters written about that time. It may be that either or both of these letters have come into the hands of the hon. member for Russell. If they have, I only regret that he did not read either or both of them to the House. But just to see what I did say on that occasion in reference to this matter, permit me to turn to one of these letters, because my statement on this point does not materially differ in the two letters. I received a letter which enclosed a clipping from my North Bay address, and I was asked as to the correctness of that statement, the writer stating that I had many Roman Catholic friends and he was sure I did not desire to say anything disrespectful to my Roman Catholic friends. I replied:

> I realize that many of my best friends are Roman Catholics, and I should deeply regret saying anything that would hurt their feelings, and particularly anything that was not fully warranted by the facts. I think the extract quoted hardly gives a fair view of what I said. I enclose herewith the context so that you may see just what I stated. If I am incorrect in the statement I should be very glad to know it, but my statement was based upon information received during the past two or three years from sources which I believe to be absolutely reliable. The position, which I was informed the members of those Orders took, was that this war was a judgment of Heaven against France for her apostasy from the Church and for the manner in which she had treated the Church.

Then, in discussing the matter further, I said:

> I shall make further inquiries about the matter and see what the result is.

If the hon. member for Russell had either of these letters before him, he had before him the statement that what I said at that time was based on information which I had received during the past two or three years, but in view of the letters which I had received that I purposed making further inquiries in respect to the matter. I only want to add this one further word in reference to it. As I said in the House last session, and as I said in Bowmanville the year before, at the time I spoke, I did not know that members of religious orders had gone over to France to fight in the war. I said that, had I known that, I would have paid them the tribute that I did to the other clergy of the Roman Catholic Church and which was undoubtedly their due. My view —and a fair reading of my statement will show it—was that I was not referring to the men who had gone overseas but to those in the province of Quebec who had remained behind. But I said then, and I repeat now, that if my language was capable of the construction that it applied to the men who had gone overseas, I regret it, because I would be the last man in the world to say anything disrespectful to or anything other than the warmest word of appreciation of men who had gone overseas to serve their country as these men did. But I should like to add this one word, that I am sure it is a matter of regret to all the members of the House that, with these magnificent examples before him of heroic patriotism on th part of members of religious orders in Quebec, the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) did not become a veritable Peter th Hermit, going from one end of the country to the other to rouse the people to follow the example of these men who went overseas. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Russell only magnified their service and their sacrifice when he thought he could gain some political advantage and kudos for himself at the expense of a political opponent.

I shall not attempt to follow the hon. member through all the meanderings of that rambling and lengthy address of his. It is a case where the mountain laboured and brought forth a mouse. But I must mention one or two other matters.

The hon. member for Russell referred to loyalty to colleagues. I could hardly believe my ears when I heard him speaking of loyalty to colleagues, and I am sure there was more than one member seated either beside him or behind him who must have been astonished when tney heard those words from the hon. member for Russell. Hon. members on the Opposition side are not ignorant, and hon. members on the Government side are not ignorant of the situation that has developed. The hon. member for Russell is a veritable political Jack-the-Ripper. When he cannot find an hon. member on this side of the House on whom to practise the peculiar art in which he professes to have such skill, he turns to hon. members on his own side of the House. No hon. member on the other side of the House enjoys in larger measure the confidence and esteem of members on both sides of the House than the chief Opposition Whip, the hon. member for Chateau-guay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb). Everybody knows that the hon. member for Russell has been after his scalp. Why, Mr. Speaker? Because the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Chief Whip (Mr. Robb), and the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), and other hon. members on the other side of the House want to make that section of the Liberal party a national Liberal party, but the hon. member of Russell is determined to keep it merely a religious group. It is even reported that he does not stop at the Chief Whip and others but challenges the supremacy even of the leader himself, and I have heard that the threat has been made that if he cannot have his way he may leave the party and join the United Farmers. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what crimes the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) and those who sit around them have committed, that they should deserve such a fate. We all know the No Man's Land down there which they have established between themselves and the official Opposition, and I can imagine that if the hon. member for Russell started to move his seat down that way, No Man's Land would soon be barricaded with benches and barbed wire to protect the farmers' group from receiving his assistance.

Mr. M. CLARK: Keep your squabble to your own end.

Mr. ROWELL: That is what I am trying to do, Mr. Speaker. I am trying to protect my hon. friend from this addition to his ranks.

Mr. M. CLARK: We do not need any protection.

Mr. ROWELL: Speaking of the question of loyalty to colleagues the hon. member for Russell stated—and he read into my speech a statement which is not there—that I had said or words to that effect, that certain statements made by the hon. member for Marquette in Council indicated a position which he afterwards changed. There is no such statement in my speech. There is nothing in my whole speech which would justify such an inference. The hon. member for Russell knows if he read Hansard that when such a statement was hinted at by an hon. member on the other side of the House, it met with a very prompt and vigorous denial. No statement made by me was a disclosure of any confidence of Council, and the hon. member for Russell must have known that, if he read Hansard.

It is just on a par with the other matters he mentions.

His childish talk about the Grand Trunk, the Peace Treaty, and matters of that kind I shall not go into, nor shall I attempt to follow his ramblings through various other matters that came up in the course of his speech. In connection with a number of them, there will be plenty of opportunity later on in this House to discuss the real merits of the case. There may be differences of opinion on the question of the labour clauses of the Peace Treaty. If there are, there will be an opportunity in the House for hon. members to express their honest convictions, and I shall reserve what I have to say on that subject until that occasion.

9 p.m. It may be that some hon. members on the other side of the House have repented of the approval given to the League of Nations. If so, when the Bulgarian Treaty comes up as the Covenant of the League is repeated in that Treaty, there will be an opportunity for my hon. friends to express their views on that occasion. I shall, therefore, not take up the time of the House in discussing it to-day. The hon. member for Russell also referred to the Mounted Police. There is a Bill before the House, and there will be estimates, relating to the Mounted Police, and I shall be glad to discuss the whole question of the Mounted Police either on the Bill or on the estimates. There is nothing that the hon. member has mentioned that I shall not be prepared to discuss at the proper time and give the House full information, and make a defence, so far as any defence is needed, though I think none is needed of the position of the Government in connection with these matters.

But there is one thing I cannot pass over. The hon. member for Russell referred in a sneering way to the calling together of the patriotic women of Canada in a women's conference in the city of Ottawa in the early part of 1918, when the heads of the principal women's patriotic organizations from the Atlantic to the Pacific, met in conference in this city in order that they might devise plans for more effective co-operation with the Government in the prosecution of the war. These patriotic and public-spirited women of Canada are made the butt for the jests of the hon. member for Russell. I cannot believe that in those jests he voiced the sentiment of any member on the Opposition side except his own.

He also referred to the calling together of the Labour Conference. We shall have an opportunity of discussing that question when the Labour estimates come before the House, but I want to say that the Union Government took no wiser step than when the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) included in the Cabinet one of the recognized leaders of labour in Canada and further I believe the Government took a wise step when they invited the leaders of labour from all parts of Canada to come to Ottawa for a conference with the Government in order to establish the most harmonious relations possible between labour and the Government in the prosecution of the war. That policy of co-operation with labour has been pursued by Union Government from the day it was formed down to this date, and I submit with confidence that the magnificent position which labour has taken in Canada throughout the war, and the comparative industrial peace we have in this country as compared with practically every other country, is in no small measure due to the really sympathetic attitude of this Government towards the cause of labour in Canada and its desire to co-operate with labour.

The member for Russell referred to the Department of Health. The hon. member, Mr. Speaker, suggested throughout that I was unfair to the Roman Catholics and the French Canadians. What I have stated before, I repeat here to-night: I challenge any man to point to any statement I have ever made reflecting upon the French Canadian people of this country; I challenge any man to point to any statement that I have ever made reflecting upon the Roman Catholic church. The most important appointment I have been called upon to recommend since I became a member of the Government has been that of Deputy Minister of Public Health. Who was appointed to that position?—a French Canadian and a Roman Catholic—not because he was a French Canadian and a Roman Catholic but because, surveying the whole field with a desire to choose the best possible man to serve the people of Canada in that important post, I came to the conclusion that Dr. Amyot, the present Deputy Minister of Health, with a splendid record overseas, with great professional achievements to his credit, was the best man in Canada for the post. So long as I am in public life, so long as I am called upon to administer public affairs, I shall seek in all appointments, in so far as the Government has any voice in them, and in all my dealing with the people of this country, to consider and deal with every man on his merits irrespective of his race or religion.

The hon. member announced in opening that the reason he had made his speech was to vindicate the members of his church. I have too much respect for the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic church to believe that the hon. member for Russell had been commissioned for any such business. I do not believe he speaks with any right or authority on behalf of the ecclesiastics of that church. But I have no hesitation in saying that if he did speak with authority, there are not enough ecclesiastics in that church, or in any church, or in all the churches of Canada combined to induce me to depart from the path of duty as I see it in the administration of public affairs.

The member closed with some references to Union Government and the amendment before the House. I have already taken up a longer time than I had intended and I will not discuss these matters further, except to say that Union Government was formed in an hour of grave, national crisis for a great national purpose. It was formed for the war and for reconstruction after the war as the programmes presented to the people showed. What were its achievements during the war? By reason of the strength of sentiment behind the Government, by reason of the compulsory Military Service Act which they had at their command, they were able to reinforce our troops at the front and keep them up to strength. Nay, more, they were able to keep every battalion at the front one hundred men over strength; they were able to add to our machine gun equipment and personnel; they were able to add to our engineers and to all the forces that made the corps a real effective fighting unit, so that when the critical time came, when the hour struck for the great advance on the 8th August, 1918, the Canadian armies in association with the Australian troops struck the blow, and started the movement which culminated in the rolling back and decisive defeat of the German forces and which finally led to the victory of the allied forces on the western front.

That was made possible by the unanimity of sentiment of the Canadian people on the war issue and by the power of the Government to secure the necessary reinforcements to back up the troops overseas. If Union Government had no other reason for its existence the achievements of our heroic troops in 1918 will always be the justification, the vindication, and the glory of the men and women throughout Canada who formed and supported this Government.

What our troops achieved on the field of battle, our representatives at the Peace Conference secured in the council of the nations. It is a great record. It has been ably presented to the House. I wish I had had the opportunity of expounding some of its features rather than dealing with these small personal matters which have distracted the attention of the House for the greater part of the day.

I leave the matter in the judgment of my fellow members. I would be prepared to leave it to the judgment of hon. members on the other side of the House. I leave it to the judgment of the people of this country. I claim no special virtue, no special privileges. All I can claim is that to the measure of my ability, in the hour of my country's stress and need, I have sought to do my duty as God has given me the light to see it.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I desire to confine the few remarks I intend to make to the amendment moved by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and I shall reserve for other occasions the discussion of the few subjects which are mentioned in the speech from the Throne and such other questions as are of great interest at the present time to the people of Canada. Being a man of peace, I feel still less inclined to interfere in the conflict between my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) and the hon. the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell). Of course, as my hon. friend from Russell has shown this afternoon, successfully, I believe, the President of the Privy Council is a man of many activities but I think that his importance does not justify my taking up any more of the time of the House in discussing his personality. May I tell him that I have read many of the speeches he made in 1917 or thereabouts. I am sure that when he recalls some of the statements he made then he would to-day rather that they had been unmade. They will stick to him. They are like the shirt of Nessus that clung to the body of Hercules and they will cling to him as long as he remains in public life in Canada.

I desire to offer to the mover and the seconder of the Address my most sincere congratulations. The hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn) has made a speech possessing qualities and delivered in a manner we would like to admire very frequently in this House. After all, attractiveness of speech only adds to the power and strength of argument. Many of the statements made by my hon. friend from London show that he has been rocked in the cradle of Liberalism and it is a matter of regret, and a painful sight to us, to see him in such bad company. I hope he will not remain there very long, for it is hard to compromise with the devil. As to my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. McGregor), his wrong political principles are firmly rooted and his case is desperate, although I congratulate him for the excellence of his speech.

The leader of the Opposition has made a case which, though we are at the end of this debate still stands unanswered. Every hon. gentleman in this House, notwithstanding denials to the contrary, knows that this amendment embodies the wishes and the practically unanimous opinion of the people of Canada at the present time. The first thing we must do to help the solution of our national problems, the first step towards re-establishing the normal affairs of this country, is the restoration in its entirety of responsible Government and the election of a representative Parliament. In order to be effective, in order to ensure the proper and normal representation of this country, or of any democratic country, Parliament must reflect and be the image, must return and must reflect the peculiarities of the nation: It must be the expression of the general will and the conscience of the people. Parliament is the instrument by which the will of the people is executed, therefore it must represent the views of the majority of the people; and every citizen has a sacred right to his proportionate share in the representation. When the majority in a Parliament no longer represents the majority of the people in the country, the decisions of that Parliament carry no influence and have no weight. Those principles are so elementary, they are at the basis of the proper working of constitutional government to such an extent, that they cannot be challenged; and I am sure that every member of this House agrees with me in so far as these premises are concerned.

Mr. BURNHAM: May I ask the hon. gentleman if he considers that the members of the Liberal Party do not represent the constituencies which they stand for?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will answer my hon. friend in a few minutes if he will be good enough to wait. Who will dare say, Mr. Speaker, that the present Government represents the majority of the Canadian people? It does not represent, it does not possess and enjoy the confidence of an appreciable portion of the Canadian people at the present time. Why, the Government which is supported by the majority of the members of this House is afraid to meet the Canadian people. It has let, and is letting, the elections go to its opponents by default. The habits of the ostrich are instinctive in many human beings, but they have never been the means of noteworthy success. The only comfort my hon. friends opposite can derive from electoral results was in the case of Assiniboia, and they have referred to that election in most of their speeches. Indeed my hon. friends seem to have a deplorable lack of humour. It is a piece of delightful irony to hear them mention that election as a blow at the Opposition. There was a constituency which elected a supporter of this Government in 1917 by a majority of over 5,000 votes. The Government kept that constituency without representation for a few sessions, and then when it was compelled to issue the writs it had no candidate in the field to represent its views. True, a Liberal candidate was defeated by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) who, I am told has always been a supporter of the Liberal Government. But, Sir, what is one of the main arguments which are used by the group of which that hon. gentleman (Mr. Gould) is a member? Their strongest, and apparently most effective, argument—erroneous though it be as a statement of fact—is that the Liberal party are not vigorous enough in its Opposition to this Government, that we have too many points of resemblance with hon. gentlemen opposite. Surely if the Liberal candidate in Assiniboia was defeated because his political views were not far enough removed from those of the members of the Government then the Government have little ground to hail his election as a victory, a moral victory, for them. Of course they are getting panicky and men in a panic grasp at shadows. Why should not my hon. friends opposite be candid and frank with themselves and members of the House? They still quote statistics of the election of 1917 to substantiate their claim that they have the support of this country. I understand my hon. friend from Leeds (Sir Thomas White) advanced this argument to support his speech yesterday. But, Sir, we are not living in 1917. We are Canadians of 1920 and we must discuss political questions and facts in the light of conditions as they are to-day.

Mr. WALLACE: How many members supporting Union Government would be elected in the Province of Quebec in 1920?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not one. No longer will the Government and its supporters be allowed to evade facts and responsibilities by self indulgence in the monotonous repetition of war cries. Why did the hon. gentleman mention the large majorities secured in 1917 with the help of a doctored franchise?

Mr. BUREAU: And badly doctored too.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The constituency of Assiniboia, in 1917, gave to the Government a majority of over 5,000; in 1919 it gave not a single vote to the Government. The County of Glengarry-Stormont unanimously elected a supporter of this Government in 1917; my hon. friend from that riding (Mr. Kennedy) was elected in 1919 by, I believe, about 5,000 majority.

Mr. SMITH: What was he before politically?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know he is a United Farmer of Ontario now, but I judge by the glow of conscience which I see on his face that he was formerly a Liberal. The County of North Ontario elected the late Colonel Sharpe as a supporter of this Government in 1917, by a majority of over 1,600, in fact, he polled twice the number of votes that were given his opponent; this year my hon. friend, the new member for North Ontario (Mr. Halbert) was elected by a majority, I believe, of 200 or 300 votes.

Mr. SMITH: Not quite.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will take off a few votes if it pleases my hon. friend. The County of Quebec East in 1917, gave 600 votes to the Union Government; in 1919 it did not give one single vote to that side, the two candidates vying with each other in their opposition to the Government.

How many hon. gentlemen opposite would be returned if the amendment of my hon. Leader were to carry? I do not wonder that the prospect of an election should be so abhorrent to gentlemen whose parliamentary life is limited by and based upon the life of this present Parliament. Three by-elections are to be held presently, and there are now Liberal candidates in the field. Has the Government a candidate in any of those constituencies? There is none in Kamouraska at the present time. I most cordially invite my right hon. friend the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) to inaugurate in that splendid country the campaign of political education which he told us the other night he was about to open. There are no finer and more courteous people in the world than the good electors of Kamouraska, and my right hon. friend would certainly get a fine welcome from them, though I could not give him much hope as to the degree of support they would give to his movement. The Government have no candidate in St. James at present—perhaps they may have one shortly. They have no candidate in Timiskaming, though the Conservatives of the division have nominated a straight Conservative candidate—nobody would consent to run as the candidate of this worn-out, abnormal and unpopular Government. I have no doubt that that Tory gentleman will be defeated, but even if he were elected, would that be a victory for the Government? He does not represent the Government in his candidacy, he represents the party led to-day by the Hon. Robert Rogers, who said a few days ago that the members of this Government were a lot of second-hand dealers, tinkers and jobbers.

We have to come to this point, Mr. Speaker, that the Government does not replace the Ministers who are withdrawing because their successors could not be elected in any constituency, and as a result whole provinces are no longer represented in the Cabinet. The threat that this Government may hang on for another year or two years, as was insinuated by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) the other night, is a challenge to the people of Canada, it is a challenge to democracy; it is a challenge to the proper and normal working of our constitutional Government—I will go a step further and say that when ministers disappear and cannot be replaced, such a threat is a challenge to Providence. And it is always dangerous, even for men stronger than my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, to defy the Almighty.

One of the speakers on the other side stated that the question raised by the amendment was a question of "ins" and "outs." This hon. gentleman should realize that whoever succeeds the present Government—and the succession cannot be very long delayed—will have a terrible mess to clear up and that nobody is very anxious, from a personal point of view, to take the succession. This Government has made matters easy for their successors in one respect only: that in almost all fields the latter are bound to shine in comparison. But the hon. gentleman is right to this extent, that the difference in the point of view as to this Parliament having no right or mandate to exist any longer—a difference which must be very great as between members on the other side of the House and the members on this side of the House and the other citizens of the country—is the normal difference between the men who look on from without and those who share from within. But perhaps this attitude of the Government was to be expected. The instinct of self-preservation is strong in all created things, and governments are not more free from it than the men of whom they are composed. However, they cannot deceive anybody—not even themselves,—and their voice during this debate was rather uncertain and nervous, being at times like the voice of a scared child who in the dark forest sings in an attempt to keep its spirits up.

The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) said that the present undeniable hostility of the people towards the Government was temporary and would soon pass away. Is this the opinion of the Government? Is this the cause of their present humiliating attitude? Do they believe that this great, steady, long, continued movement of the public mind is going to stop? Do they expect any change in the public estimation of their misdeeds and omissions? Are they waiting until such a change occurs? If so, they resemble the man in Horace who lay on the bank of a river expecting every moment that it would pass by and leave him a clear passage, not knowing the depth and abundance of the fountain that feeds the river, not knowing that it flows and will flow on forever.

I have referred to my hon. friend from Parkdale (Mr. Mowat). I am not surprised at the stand he takes on the present amendment. Looking the other day over the files of the Toronto newspapers for the year 1917—you will see, Mr. Speaker, that we have had so many bouquets thrown at us of late that I thought the reading over of certain literature would provide the antidote which would prevent the poison of pride overwhelming one, and I did not know at the time that my hon. friend from Russell would read his little circular this afternoon. I happened to see a report of the proceedings of the convention which selected my hon. friend (Mr. Mowat) as a candidate for the constituency of Parkdale. There was a letter from the Right Hon. Prime Minister beseeching the good Conservatives of Parkdale to select my hon. friend; and then one of the Ministers—I believe it was the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid)—arose and spoke to the delegates. He told them that it was necessary in order to impress the country that this was a real Union Government that a Liberal should be selected as the Government candidate for one of the Toronto seats. The president of the Tory Association then made a little speech. He said: All right; we are going to make the sacrifice, but remember, it is only a loan. So, valuable as my hon. friend is in this House, he is only a borrowed article. His contract will expire with the life of this Parliament, and these magnificent buildings will be deficient forever of one of their finest adornments.

Sir, as the leader of the Opposition eloquently said, we shall have unrest in Canada; peace and order will not be restored until the Canadian Parliament is brought into harmony with the Canadian people. It is indispensable to public safety that this should be done without any further delay. Everybody is longing for the time when things will come back to normal. Let us start at the most conspicuous point; let our politics, let our public life, come back to normal. This Government cannot pretend much longer to unite this country by dividing it. I do not now speak of the past. I respected the men who differed from us in 1917 through patriotic and conscientious motives; I would not have respected them if, feeling as they did feel at that time, they had acted otherwise. But I repeat, Sir, that I do not now speak of the past, and I emphatically state that any man who today proclaims this a Union Government is maintaining a sham and supporting hypocrisy. Why, Sir, having arrayed province against province and race against race, they have succeeded by their disastrous policies, by violating their pledges, by breaking faith with their own supporters and dividing classes against classes, groups against groups, and occupations against occupations, in separating into fragments what was, under the illustrious leader who is now in his grave, a great united people.

No Government in the history of this country ever represented in lesser degree a united Canada. For the first time since union of Upper and Lower Canada one of the two great branches of the Canadian family is practically not represented in the administration of the affairs of the country.

Mr. SMITH: Whose fault is that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will tell my hon. friend. It is indeed a tragical joke to apply the word "Union" to the work of disruption which the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) has been unfortunate enough to achieve. It has been urged by gentlemen on the other side—and I am free to admit it—that the Prime Minister has endeavoured to afford some sort of redress to an awkward situation. But under the present conditions, in view of the circumstances which preceded, accompanied and followed the accession to office of the present Government, no true and worthy representative of those to whom I now have reference can, with any sense of dignity, become one of its members. Some gentlemen opposite have said that the Government is not responsible for that anomaly; that those of the Canadian people who refused to elect supporters of the Union Government cannot complain of being unrepresented. They are indeed quite right as to the utter impossibility of the people of whom I now speak electing a member of the present Government. Sir, it only goes to show that the situation is abnormal and unnatural. In order that we may resume the sane, safe and healthy conditions of our public life and of the civilization established by the builders of the country, by the great men of the past, the members of the Government must realize that they are an obstacle to our national progress and are blocking the way to the unity of Canada and to a fair and normal working out of the constitution.

Mr. WALLACE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend has put questions to me which are really not of sufficient importance to justify my allowing him to interrupt my remarks.

This Government was elected in 1917 for a special purpose; it has now no further mandate to carry on the affairs of the country. What is the present task of Parliament? To place the national Budget on a stable foundation; to work out new plans for the promotion and regulation of trade; to cope with the problems of inflated currency and depreciated exchange, and to establish satisfactory working relations between capital and labour so that national production may make headway against industrial disorganization and general want. But the present Parliament was elected on an issue that had no bearing upon the work that is to be done. It has no mandate to formulate a programme or to execute one when it is decided upon. In refusing to accede to the clamour of public opinion, to the request that they relinquish the reins of office, the members of the Government and their supporters in the House are breaking faith with thousands of electors who voted for Union Government upon the understanding and subject to the pledge that such Government was formed for one purpose and one purpose only, and would automatically go out of office with the coming of peace. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) and other hon. gentlemen to the contrary notwithstanding, such a pledge was given on all the public platforms of the country. Even members of the Government made it clear to the electors. I have here a few statements which will bear out my contention in that respect. I take from the Globe of Tuesday, October 23, 1917, the report of a meeting in Winnipeg, at which the Minister of Immigrartion (Mr. Calder) spoke: I am glad to see him in his seat. Here is the report:

It was on that understanding they had come in. He was not deserting Liberalism, nor the principle for which Liberalism stands. They were not absorbed nor submerged by the Conservative party. They had simply consented to Union for the purpose of this war, and reserved their views and opinions outside of the war. Union had been achieved only by each side agreeing to sink for the time being purely domestic problems.

The Minister of the Interior spoke at that meeting, and this is what he said, according to the report in the Globe:

No man or woman is asked to reverse or abnegate convictions on fiscal or other subjects. The accepted basis of union was the only basis on which Union was possible under present condition, and our appeal is that the people of Canada unite on the same basis on which the members of the Government have united, and get behind this union and stay behind it until it achieves its end.

In the town of Sarnia a meeting was held which was addressed by the former Minister of Public Works, now chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners. I take the report of that meeting from the Globe of October 25, 1917. This is what that gentleman, then a member of the Government, said at that time:

This Government is formed for a definite purpose and for a definite period. I am in it as a Liberal for that purpose and for that period, and for that purpose I intend to give the best that is in me.

I am in the Government to do what I can toward winning the war. I went in freely, and if there are things happen of which I cannot approve I can get out just as easy. This is not a Conservative Government; it is not a Liberal Government. (Mostly Conservative, interrupted a voice). This is a war-Government. Its purpose is to carry on the affairs of this country in a non-partisan way until the war is won. After demobilization the contract is concluded, and each man can take the course he thinks best. (You'll all be Tories then, exclaimed another.)

Mr. BUREAU: He was wrong.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He was wrong as regards some of the gentlemen, but I am afraid he is right as regards a few.

Does someone say I would become a Tory? asked Mr. Carvell. Well, I don't believe it. (Laughter and renewed cheers.) There is only one thing for a man to do in a crisis like the present, and that is to do what he thinks is right.

What about the electors? A meeting, largely attended by Liberals of the province of Ontario who supported conscription was held, I think, in the city of Hamilton. I take the following from the report of that meeting in the Globe of November 3, 1917:

Ex-Mayor J. G. Kerr of Chatham introduced the following resolution, seconded by Mr. F. L. Fowke of Oshawa:—

"That, whereas since the notice calling this convention was sent out, a Union Government has been formed, in which Liberals throughout the Dominion have joined, this convention, recording its belief that the formation of a Union Government for the duration of the war was highly desirable and in the best interests of Canada and believing that thereby the share of Canada in the conduct of the present world war will be best served, and the Government of the country most effectively and satisfactorily carried on during the period of the war expresses its approval of the action of the Liberal members of the present Union Government in entering same."

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), whom, I am sorry, is not in his seat, spoke at a meeting at Hamilton. These are his words as reported in the Globe of November 23, 1917:

I prefer to take my Liberalism and my patriotism at this juncture from men like Hon. W. S. Fielding in Nova Scotia, or men like Mr. Fred. Pardee in Ontario, together with every Liberal Provincial Prime Minister save one in Canada, Hon. Mr. Ballantyne declared, rather than take it from Bourassa, Lavergne, Lemieux and company. (Prolonged cheers).

I should like to ask my hon. friend from whom he takes his Liberalism to-day? He does not seem to take it from my distinguished friend, the hon. member from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). He does not seem to take it from my esteemed deskmate, the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Pardee). Surely he does not take it from the nine provincial Premiers who are all supporters of the leader of the Opposition. From whom does he take it? Perhaps, from the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen), whose brand of Liberalism I do not trust very much. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) spoke at Durham, and these are his words as reported in the Globe of November 28, 1917:

"In all the many nations at war," Hon. Mr. Rowell declared, after relating a few overseas incidents, "it has been found impossible for any people to put their own energy into the war as long as they are divided by party lines, and the whole object of the Union Government is that the nation may stand united in this crisis. After Prussian militarism has been defeated we can go back to settle our own domestic affairs by party methods, if we so desire."

The President of the Privy Council was not so emphatic as the others. He is an old fox, although I do not wish to refer to the fox which had lost its tail at the battle. But I have still better documentary evidence. I hold in my hand a printed circular which was distributed in the trenches and in all the military camps in 1917, and a copy of which was given to every soldier who registered a vote at that election. That circular, which was sent and distributed by the Government, reads in part as follows:

DOMINION OF CANADA,

SOLDIERS' ELECTION.

Comrades, this is our election, because the only issue is selective conscription. Without its immediate enforcement there can be no rest or relief for Canadians at the front. The Union Government is neither Grit nor Tory. It is composed of the following gentlemen:

I do not wish to read the whole circular, but I desire only to impress upon the House the fact that every soldier was told, before he registered his vote, that there was only one issue and that was selective conscription. Thousands of electors, the young manhood of this country, voted for this Government, because they were told that the only issue was selective conscription; that it was purely and exclusively a soldiers' election held for one purpose only, and the mandate they were asked to give was for that purpose alone and would expire when such purpose was achieved. Furthermore, those hundreds of thousands of electors were not given an opportunity to vote for a man of their own choice to represent them in Parliament; they were not afforded the advantage of voting for men whom they considered qualified to discuss questions of interest to them and to the country. They voted simply for a Government without any regard to the candidates. In many instances they did not know the candidates. They were asked to vote for a Government which would be entrusted with a mandate to enforce a certain war policy and nothing else. This mandate has expired. This policy has disappeared from the political field. Is it fair to the men who voted in such a peculiar and unprecedented way, to use and abuse for other purposes the special mandate which they gave to a special set of men, many of whom are no longer members of the collective body for which the soldiers' votes were registered.

Sir, there are issues at hand that will cause a clear cleavage between progress and reaction, between Toryism and reform. The very fact that the resources of Canada as a result of our war effort have been strained as they have been, and that we have a huge national debt, compels us to face grave and great problems and the two traditionally opposite sides cannot but face each other when the settlement is effected, and one or the other must give way. It is impossible for gentlemen of different ideas to agree on these great problems. They cannot sit together and be true to their principles. No gentlemen who has not altogether renounced his liberalism can remain in this Government to-day or support it. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) has stated that the real Liberals are on that side of the House, and he said he was saving Liberalism by remaining there. Sir, when he makes those professions publicly before the country, while continuing to support the present Government, he is saving Liberalism in the same manner and to the same extent and degree as another gentleman, who two thousand years ago contributed to the salvation and redemption of the world by publicly kissing his Master to betray Him to the Roman soldiers. I am willing to admit that in the multitude of arbitrary and reactionary measures that have been passed by this Government some Liberal policies may have been adopted on minor points. It was Theodore Roosevelt who once said of an American politician, he was so wicked he could embrace a good principle if it helped him. On all vital issues, on all issues that had to be definite and would be controversial, we have witnessed a policy of indecision on the part of this Government. We are told that the country is in a state of unrest and that this is no time for change or the adoption of any definite policy. The argument was made by the hon. member for Leeds (Sir Thomas White) yesterday. Yet in 1911 when the Liberal Government sought to enact a treaty of reciprocity for the purpose of affording relief to the great farming community of this country, and went down to defeat on that issue, we were met by the cry: Let well enough alone; the country is too prosperous and peaceful for a change. My hon. friend from Leeds was a leader in that campaign, and now in 1920, when the country is convulsed from one end to the other, the very same gentleman says: Would you alter our policy in such agitated times as these? Such is the dilemma of a vicious Tory government and selfish interests—if the people are turbulent, they are unfit for reform, and if they are quiet they do not want reform. After every meeting of supporters of the Government at which policies were to be enunciated, it is officially reported that they have unanimously come to the decision that no decision should be taken. Hon. gentlemen opposite are simply asking for time. The hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) wrote in the Evening Journal yesterday that he was going to vote against the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition just for the purpose of gaining time, for he has no confidence in the Government. Ninety per cent of the political energies of the members of the Government are wasted on expedients to patch or piece out the political machine as often as it breaks down.

The right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) is sick and absent, and we all regret it. I think it was unfortunate and most unfair to charge the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) with discourtesy in alluding in his amendment to the illness of the right hon. the Prime Minister. The hon. leader of the Opposition was the first man to express the sympathy of the House with the right hon. gentleman in his illness. On the very opening day of this session, speaking right after the right hon. the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster), who never said a word about the right hon. the Prime Minister in his speech, the hon. leader of the Opposition spoke as follows:

> Sir, may I join my right hon. friend in giving expression to other sentiments which we experience in common on this historic occasion? It is not more a source of regret to supporters of the Government than it is to hon. members of the Opposition that the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) is prevented, because of the impaired condition of his health, from being present at and participating in these opening ceremonies, certain, as they are, to live in the memories of all who are privileged to witness them. It is gratifying to us, as it will be to the people of Canada, to know that the change of scene and thought, and most of all, the freedom for a time, from vast responsibility, which the Prime Minister is at present enjoying, have not been without their beneficient effects; and that restoration of health, which we all hope may be speedy and complete, appears now to await him. Still, we regret his absence, and we miss his presence.

We all regret the unfortunate illness of the Prime Minister, but we shall not allow hon. gentlemen opposite, who for years have prevented the free discussion of their misdeeds and extravagant administration by sheltering themselves behind the glory and the sacrifice of our brave Canadian soldiers, to screen themselves to-day behind the weakness of a sick man. The Government has no right to exploit the illness of the Prime Minister, and they are most unfair to him when they try to do so. We all hope that his health will speedily be restored, but my duty to this country compels me to state that I object emphatically that Canadian policies—the solution of reconstruction and other national problems—should also travel around the world with the Prime Minister on Viscount Jellicoe's ship, or rest with him in Florida. Canada cannot afford to waste another year, and still less two whole years.

The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) asked the House the other night what was wrong with the Government and with the body politic. So far as he could see, everything was all right. The hon. gentleman has a short memory. Only a few weeks ago he went to the city of Kingston and virtually pleaded for a new alignment in the political field. Why is he advocating a new union if everything is all right to-day? I have in my hand the Montreal Gazette containing a report of a speech of the Minister of the Interior and it reads as follows in part:

> I am asked what it is proposed to do. The air is filled with clashing demands, conflicting criticisms and contradictory appeals. One extremist calls for one thing, another extremist for another thing. The extreme labour man wants labour domination; he wants the one big union and all that it involves. The extreme protectionist wants a high tariff. The extreme free trader wants no tariff at all. The extreme Socialist wants the nationalization of everything. The extreme individualist thinks we have nationalized far too much already. The extreme farmer partisan wants an agricultural dynasty. He believes he will make this country a land of Canaan by a system of free imports, by buying more goods from others.
> What I say is, let all moderate men get together. There are sane and moderate labour men, thousands of them, the vast majority. Back of this restlessness and discord we have a sane business community. We have manufacturers of moderate views. We have hundreds of thousands of steady and thoughtful agriculturists, thoughtful citizens who read from experience as well as from books, men of patriotic principles, just as big a proportion of such men as in any class in the nation. Let these men and these women get together. Let them not be stampeded. The hope of this country is to be found in such a union, and such a union is right now taking place. It will draw strength from every group. It will gain in vigour from attacks. Its numbers will multiply as the danger becomes clearer. It will hold the ship steady, and it will bring us through.

Let me ask my hon. friend what is wrong with him and his friends? Is it not enough to make angels weep to hear the Minister of the Interior classifying himself amongst the moderates of this country? He was the father, and the godfather, of the most arbitrary and despotic legislation and Orders in Council which have been executed and enforced by this Government. He is very clever and has many high qualities, but he is the last man in the world I would trust to adopt a moderate course in the political field. Again I ask, if everything is right in the Unionist family, why form a new union, why this appeal for a new alignment? If everything is right and if nothing is wrong, why should a close friend of the Prime Minister and a strong supporter of the Unionist party, Senator McLennan, launch a new political party under the name of the National party? Why should all these gentlemen try to dress or redress, the Unionist child with more fashionable clothes?

But, Sir, the Unionist house is divided against itself. We on this side of the House are witnessing with equanimity and calmness the disintegration and decay of that unnatural organization. One part wants to remain Unionist; another wants to be purely and simply Conservative or Tory; the Minister of the Interior wants a new Union; Senator McLennan wants a National Party; and my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who, apart from being a farmer, is a medical man, the other day attended at th birth of a new party under the name of the National Progressive Party. Yesterday the hon. member for Leeds (Sir Thomas White) not only attended as a medical man but was the generator and creator of a new party under the name of the National Liberal Conservative party. I shall not be surprised at all if before the end of this debate some practical joker on the other side stands up and advocates the formation of the National Liberal-Conservative, Progressive, Reform Farmers' party — they would all, except the Farmers, come from the same mother, to wit: the Tory party.

Facing all these groups and factions, fighting one another in a hopeless struggle, the Liberal party stands united, vigorous, reorganized, ready and prepared for political action. The good old cause, as our late lamented leader called it so often—the good old cause, vanquished or triumphant, insulted or victorious—is still the good old cause with us. Liberalism is the application of the eternal principles of justice to all classes, elements, interests and trades. Liberalism means evolution, along reasonable and progressive lines. But, as Burke said, innovations are not necessarily reforms. The Liberal party holds the middle course between dangerous, violent changes that would bring disaster to our institutions and obstinate resistance to progress and the spirit of the time. The Liberal party stands between capital and labour, between the weak and the strong, between the individual and the corporation, between the big interests, so dear to the heart of the hon. member for Leeds, and the plain citizen like you and me, Mr. Speaker. It stands between conflicting interests and classes, it stands between that class which is the Canadian Manufacturers Association and that other class which is the Canadian Council of Agriculture, having as its only aim and ambition to do only what is fair and just to all and to each.

All the organized forces of selfishness are attacking it and questioning its motives and its aims. The extremists dislike it extremely, and, Sir, when I hear on one hand, the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cochshutt) denounce us as dangerous free traders, and on the other hand, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), Mr. Musselman of Saskatchewan, or Mr. Wood, of Alberta claim that we are only protectionists in disguise, I take it as conclusive evidence that we are discharging the true and normal functions of Liberalism holding the sane and safe middle course.

When I read in the Ottawa Journal that I am, in common with friends on this side of the House coming from the province of Quebec, a reactionary and an obscurantist, as was stated in an editorial last week, and when almost at the same time I am branded in that other Unionist Tory paper, L'Evenment of Quebec, as being a wild radical, just as bad as my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and almost as dangerous as my hon. friend the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), which is still worse, I take it as an indication that I am but a plain and unadulterated Liberal, and I do not mind the abuse.

I have just mentioned the name of my hon. friend from Brantford. The hon. gentleman in the course of his speech the other night expressed regret that I was then absent from the House, because he was anxious to know whether my removal from Kamouraska to the constituency of Quebec East has had any effect on my views with regard to the fiscal policy. I understand the anxiety of my hon. friend from Brantford; I understand why he is so nervous at the present time. He has had many events in his province lately that he does not like, things he considers as plagues—he has had a Farmers' Government, smallpox, and prohibition, and now he is threatened by a reduction in the price of ploughs. He ventured the assertion that my views must be modified as a result of a change in the constituency which I represent in the House. Mr. Speaker, I challenge my hon. friend to quote one word of mine, uttered at any time, in support of an absolute free trade policy in this country. For the purpose of revenue I have always stated, and I state to-night, that we must have a tariff, and we must have it much more to-day because of the great war debt that we have to pay. But let me tell my hon. friend that he has missed his guess. I was in favour of a lower tariff when I represented Kamouraska; and I am in favour of a lower tariff when I am representing Quebec East. I was in favour of a policy that would reduce the price of ploughs to the farmers when I was in Kamouraska, and I am in favour of that policy to-day when I represent Quebec East. I was in favour of the policy expounded by my right hon. leader who is now dead, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, three weeks before his death, when he spoke before the Eastern Ontario Liberal Association. That speech on the fiscal question stands as his political will. By that policy enunciated by my late leader, and by the policy which was adopted at the Liberal Convention last summer, I stood in Kamouraska and I stand in Quebec East. I am even ready to go and discuss that policy in Brantford if my hon. friend will give me the opportunity. He may rest assured that I do not, and never will, modify my principles and opinions according to conditions of time or place.

Now, Sir, I wish to say a word on the question of the new election law which is going to be introduced and enacted. The leader of the House does not like the references that are made to the War-time Elections Act. It is a worn-out subject, he says, that has been fought and discussed over and over again and should be left aside altogether. Let me tell him that the discussion of this famous piece of legislation will be of permanent interest as long as the Parliament which was elected by virtue of such Act remains in office. There is an old proverb that says, "When the spring is muddy the stream is muddy, too," and the stream in this case will flow on as long as the present Parliament lasts. All I wish to say is to express the hope that the new Bill will not reproduce and embody any of the bad features of that legislation. All British subjects by birth or naturalizationo are entitled to be represented in this Parliament and to exercise all the privileges of citizenship. If you want our naturalized citizens to feel for Canada more than half patriotism you must make Canada more than half a country for them. The monstrous doctrine of collective responsibility which makes men hate and revenge themselves not only on the evildoer or the guilty but on all those of the same name, race, or colour, was a pernicious product of the war mentality, and must be discarded and destroyed if we are to have sanity, peace and progress in this country. The question to my mind is not only one of justice; it is a question of safety. It is neither wise nor prudent to deprive any class of our population of their right to the ballot. It is cheaper, after all, to lift men up than to hold them down, and the ballot in their hands is far less dangerous to society than a sense of wrong in their heads. I hope we shall have a fair and honest franchise, followed by a fair and honest election.

With regard to the coming elections some hon. gentleman opposite used as a justification for voting against the amendment of my leader the argument that there should be a re-distribution before the elections take place for the purpose of giving a larger representation to the farming community of Western Canada. Those gentlemen are not serious. Firstly, such a re-distribution cannot be made before two or three years. And they do not know—have they not read in the Ministerial press, that it is the intention to do away with the custom of having a different unit of representation for the urban and rural constituencies, so that by increasing considerably the number of representatives in the cities it will be possible for them to drown the voice of the farmers? Have they still some faith in the pledges of this Government? Moreover, Sir, the estimated figures quoted by some gentleman as to the probable increase in the population of the various provinces are wholly misleading as far as Quebec is concerned, if the statistics of the Provincial Government are correct, as I have no doubt they are. The increase in the population of the province of Quebec is much larger than the figures quoted in this debate indicate, and Quebec being the pivot of the representation our friends from the West would not get the increase of representation which they seem to expect. You see, we do not increase our population in Quebec by artificial means such as Government regulations or immigration policies. Our process of increase is the old law of multiplication as prescribed by the Creator. Quebec does not import her population, she makes it, and that may be the reason why our population is sane and safe.

There is another subject I desire to refer to and which should be an additional argument in favour of the amendment before the House. A great Imperial Conference is going to take place this year for the purpose of deliberating upon and considering the constitutional relations of the Empire and the various Dominions. I submit that it is necessary that only a Government with a popular mandate, that only a Parliament representative of the majority of the Canadian people, should be entrusted with the duty and task of representing Canada and speaking for its people at this very important gathering. This weak, impotent, leaderless Government has no right to assume to speak with the great voice of Canada at that Conference, has no right to engage our future or pledge our destinies to any extent.

Last year when speaking on this subject I strongly urged that no question affecting Canada's future should be discussed at any Conference without having been first submitted to the Parliament of Canada, and that our delegates should go to that Conference with a clear mandate and with no other rights or missions than those agreed upon and conferred by this Parliament. I am glad indeed that the opinion I then expressed has received the support of hon. gentlemen who have spoken in the course of this debate. During the last few years Parliament has been treated in this respect with scant courtesy. These great problems must be considered from a purely Canadian point of view. We are prepared and willing to do our part amongst the nations of the world, but our main policy is and will remain the policy of Canada first; we are and shall remain one hundred per cent Canadians, and will not allow anybody to change our status for us without our participation.

My last words, Sir, will be an appeal to all the members of this House to listen to the voice of the country which is heard from the Atlantic to the Pacific asking them to support the amendment of the leader of the Opposition. The Government has always represented itself as being a war Government—as being purely and simply a war machine. This Parliament was elected as, and has been always stated to be, a war Parliament. The war is over. The Government have demobilized everybody else; I ask them to-day to demobilize themselves.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Customs): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate until the conclusion of the speech of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), when he put his amendment and challenged the whole administration of the Government of which I have been a member since its inception in 1917.

I wish to express, in common with other speakers who have preceded me, the gratification that we all feel on coming into this beautiful building. I do not know that any higher compliment could be paid to the building or to its designers than to say that judging from the feelings of all the members and the great satisfaction they have expressed on getting into these new quarters, we all feel that we can at least enter a building that shows beauty and strength somewhat in comparison to the strength and beauty of the parliamentary institutions which are carried on on this north half of the American continent.

I wish also to say a word in passing in reference to the speeches of my hon. friends, the member for London (Mr. Cronyn) and the member for Pictou (Mr. McGregor), the mover and seconder of the Address. I have been a member of this House for twelve years, and have necessarily therefore heard the speeches of a great many movers and seconders of the Address, but I cannot recall in the whole of that time any speeches which have been permeated with a finer spirit. The address of my hon. friend from London was not only characterized by great breadth, but also by a full recognition of the problems that are facing this country to-day, and contained valuable suggestions towards their solution, and both as to matter and manner was an admirable speech from beginning to end. I can only say that my hon. friend from London is a type of representative that we sorely need to have and to keep in our public life. I would not say any less than that of my hon. friend from Pictou. He gave a sane and thoughtful presentation of the problems of war and of the problems that have come to us with the conclusion of peace, and his solution for those problems are worthy of consideration. I was particularly interested in, and I think it would be well for hon. members to read and re-read, what he had to say about the soldier questions which now confront us.

Sir, there was one thing that struck me as particularly pleasant about those speeches, and that was their absolute freedom from political rancour; a generous spirit breathed through them. I also would like to say that it is a pleasure for this House to notice that the same generous spirit characterized the speeches of the leaders of that small group at the further end of the Chamber known as the cross-benchers. I heard with great pleasure my old friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) give that fine eulogy on the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden). It was not less appreciated by members on this side of the House and indeed by many on the other side, when my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) paid a similar tribute to one who is literally a "casualty of the war." I would like to add that it gave us all on this side gratification to hear my hon. friend from Red Deer pay that fine tribute of his to a political opponent in the old days, the right hon. the leader of the House at this present moment (Sir George Foster). He did it in a manner worthy of the best traditions of this House.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, that I could speak in the same appreciative tone of the attitude adopted by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. I noticed that when he commenced his speech he said:

> It would be strange, indeed, if, under the spell of the noble and dignified proportions of this Chamber, we were not all impressed with the spirit of the Canadian people in rising out of the difficulties of the past.

I must confess that when he proceeded with his speech I thought he was freeing himself from the spell of the building with remarkable success, and the further he proceeded the more completely he freed himself, until when he came to his amendment he was absolutely free from any such spell.

And if I can say this of the speech of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, I can surely say it with greater force of that of the member for Russell (Mr. Murphy), who made one of the most extraordinary speeches that I have ever heard since I became a member of this House. I think the best thing to do with that speech would be to absolutely forget it. But I would call attention for a moment to his closing statement: That the Liberal party was established for the promotion of neighbourly relations, mutual respect and good-will. If that is so, I never heard a speech so singularly calculated to thwart the purposes for which the Liberal party was established.

The hon. minister (Mr. Rowell) who was the subject of that attack needs no defence from me; he made a pretty good defence for himself, I think. As one of his colleagues, I have only to say that he has the fullest esteem and confidence of his colleagues as a valued member of the Government. I would commend to my hon. friend from Russell, as to other hon. members who are apt to indulge in rancourous debate and acrimonious personalities, the words—which I cordially endorse—with which my hon. friend from Marquette closed his speech the other day. He said:

> If we as Canadian citizens seek only what is good, noble, honest and true, and look only for what is best in one another, I have no fear for our future prosperity and welfare, nor need, I think, any of us.

Now, Sir, my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is a young man and a Canadian, he has worked at industrial problems not only in this country but in another country, and I think it unfortunate that the style of his speech should have been what it was. He seemed to have a strange misapprehension of the spirit of the last three or four years as shown not only in the world generally but in this country particularly. He seems to have forgotten that men are no longer cleaving in the selfish way they did years ago to the old party system and shouting the same old acrimonious party battle-cries. I think if he had realized that more he would have changed the tone of his address and have discarded some of the methods which characterized the unrestrained party methods of years ago. When he referred to the members of this Government as having only the desire to hang on to office, he surely must have known that he was not speaking the truth. He must have known something of the strain that Ministers have undergone during the frightful struggle of the last few years. He certainly must have known that so far as material rewards go we have had no reason to hang on to office. So that it is a matter of regret that a gentleman starting out as leader of a once historic and still, in a sense, big party, should descend to this line of argument,—speaking of his opponents as men only capable of hanging on to office, of violating popular rights, and of banishing freedom. These are old cries that are very much out of place in these days.

My hon. friend lamented the loss of faith in our institutions and in ourselves that exists in Canada and generally throughout the world. I can only say that in his speech he himself, as the leader of a great party, adopted a very poor method of restoring it. I am not so pessimistic as my hon. friend. It is true that the millenium is not here; that the results of the war have not been as happy as they might have been in the establishment not only of a speedy peace but of something approaching a finer spirit of brotherhood all over the world. Nevertheless, while there may not be on the part of the people the same ready assent to formulas and conventions that there was, and while there may be an impression that people are getting loose in their moorings, I as a Canadian do not believe for a moment that the millions who have gone through this awful struggle, who have displayed unselfishness and courage and self-discipline during these years of war, have faced the realities of life for nothing, nor will they fail as a great and steadying influence in our future progress.

My hon. friend did himself scant justice when he complained of members of this Government being continually away and suggested that we in Canada should primarily attend to our own affairs. He complained that a thing like the Grand Trunk agreement had not been brought down, too much attention being given in the meantime to external matters. Well, he only had to wait a day or two before he got the Grand Trunk agreement. And surely my hon. friend of all gentlemen in this House should be the last to complain on this score. It is true that we have to attend to Canadian affairs first, but can we say that Canadian affairs are not in a very real sense bound up with world affairs at this time? My hon. friend should not be a little Canadian. He has been a member of different commissions. He was a member, I think, of a commission to inquire into immigration from India and the vexed problems connected with that subject. He was a member also of a commission to deal with troubles in Japan. He has spent some time in the United States studying great labour and industrial problems. He, therefore, of all men should be the last to complain. Does he say at a time when the after-problems of the war and the steps to be taken following the conclusion of peace had to be decided, Canadian Ministers were not in their proper place when they were amongst those by whom the solution of these things had to be brought about? I think that my hon. friend has not taken very good ground on that point. If I could stretch my imagination sufficiently to imagine him as Prime Minister of this country,—and it would be a difficult thing to do—I would think that in that capacity he would take a somewhat broader view. As one illustration of the prestige which our country has attained among the nations of the world, I may point out that when the one representative for the British Empire was to be appointed on the Saar Valley Commission, a body to govern the Saar Valley for a period of fifteen years, the British Government asked that Canada name that representative. That suggestion has been met and a Western man has been selected, a high type of Canadian, who has since been made Chairman of the whole Commission.

My hon. friend says that we are suffering at this time from the inability of the Government to meet the needs of the country. I do not know to what extent my hon. friend has followed the problems of the last few years or the manner in which the Government has dealt with them. As my hon. friend has no responsibility so far as governmental office is concerned, he feels that he is free to criticize. But he has been a member of a government; he is now leader of an Opposition. He will appreciate that saying of M. Diderot: "Il est si difficile de produire même une chose médiocre; il est si facile de sentir la médiocrité." This Government has produced constructive legislation which is not by any means of a mediocre character. It has had to deal with immense problems and has settled them satisfactorily. At a meeting in Ottawa the other day my hon. friend welcomed the advent of women into the political life of this country, but he did not think of giving credit to this Government for introducing that great reform, the enfranchisement of women. There are other things that he might have had in mind so far as the accomplishments of the Government are concerned, but these have been so ably dealt with by the member for Pictou (Mr. McGregor), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) and others that I shall not do more than touch very briefly upon them.

I should like to refer to one thing which at least many of the people are giving the Government due credit for, but which my hon. friend seems to pay little attention to namely, the exceptionally successful work initiated and carried on by the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Meighen) in connection with the settlement of soldiers upon the land. If that is not appreciated by my hon. friend, at least it is appreciated in other countries. Although the Act has been in force only one year, more than 15,000 men have been settled upon the land under its provisions; loans amounting to $57,000,000 have been approved and 35,000 returned men have received qualification certificates. Without dilating upon the subject, I may say that in what has been done in this respect we are 100 per cent in advance of Great Britain, the United States, or, in fact, any other of the countries that were engaged in the war.

My hon. friend has said a great deal about unrest. So far as I am able to judge, there is less unrest in Canada than there is in any other part of the world. The problems that have been so acutely before the people of all countries since the war have been just as acute here, and they have been met. I say without fear of contradiction that in the volume of our trade; in the small extent to which we have been troubled by labour difficulties; in the successful solution of such problems as the railway question and other important matters, no country in the world has greater cause for gratitude than the Canada in which we live.

It is interesting and not a little amusing to watch my hon. friend's attitude with regard to the Farmers' party. My hon. friend has shown some alarm with regard to the formation of this Farmers' party. He says that the Liberals are not opposed to the farmers. He argued at a recent meeting that in so far as the farmers had any virtue, any qualifications such as were enumerated by the member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) just now, they were in reality Liberals. Evidently he looked forward hopefully to the time when he could amalgamate the Farmers' party with his own. Well, I think the member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) would say that a man once bitten is twice shy. He was for many years a member of the Liberal party. During all that time he preached pretty strongly the economic doctrines which he believes in—and he thought that within the folds of the party which my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King) leads to-day, he was a kind of voice in the wilderness.

I do not think it is likely that he will join it in the very near future, but it is somewhat amusing to this House to see the way in which the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has cornered the group of cross-benchers in this particular amendment. My hon. friend, at a Liberal gathering in the city recently, challenged the Farmers' party on this motion, and on what they will do, he said, on "the fundamental question as to the attitude they will take towards the Government". He is not concerned about great questions of policy or great economic questions, but he is deeply concerned as to what attitude they will take in regard to the desire to put out of power the Government which is now in office. I am not surprised that the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) laboured somewhat in his reasons for supporting the amendment, and I would think his friends on the cross-benches would have been entitled to vote with the members on this side against the amendment of the leader of the Opposition. The hon. member for Red Deer had a fundamental difference with the leader of the Opposition and his party in 1917, and I can understand the reluctance with which he would join with him in any kind of a vote, much more in a vote of this sort. We on this side, much as we may differ with the hon. member for Red Deer, are never likely to forget the loyal and consistent support that he gave to the war when he was a whole-hearted member on this side. A certain famous divine, Archbishop Magee, used to say that there were three kinds of speakers in the world—the men you can listen to, the men you cannot listen to and the men you cannot help listening to. I would put my hon. friend in the last class, namely, those you cannot help listening to. I should be sorry, as I think many of us here would be, to lose my hon. friend from this House. If he votes for this amendment and if the amendment were to carry and an election follow, we might lose him. The hon. member for Red Deer has been somewhat franker than some of his friends who are voting for this amendment. My hon. friend in his speech said:

> So far as a desire for an election is concerned, ... any hon. member who is pining for an election is fonder of adventure than I am. . . . . The doctrine of self-preservation is the first law of nature.

If I can infer anything at all from that, I can infer that my hon. friend does not want this amendment to carry, and he has a pretty shrewd idea that it will not carry. He justifies his attitude and his support of the amendment, as does the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), on grounds of public policy, namely, that the Union Government had only a mandate for the war, also that there are now before the country issues which require an appeal to the country for a fresh Government. It is not necessary for me to point out to this House, or to members who have sat in it for a long time, that this is not a mere formal vote of want of confidence, but that, as a matter of fact, it is an arraignment of the present administration and couched in language so partisan and unfortunate that I do not wonder that the group of cross-benchers, including the hon. member for Red Deer, are extraordinarily reluctant to swallow the dose prepared for them by the leader of the Opposition.

For a short time, and hurriedly, I should like to refer to the speeches made by the hon. member for Marquette and the hon. member for Red Deer. The hon. member for Red Deer referred to his fellow-member as his leader. I do not know whether he is his leader or his pupil, but, I should rather be inclined to think, the latter. At all events, they preach the same doctrine, and they justify the establishment of a third party on the ground of their common desire for the abolition of tariffs which they saw no hope of abolishing through the instrumentality of either of the old parties. Before touching on the economic views advanced by my hon. friends of the cross-benches, I should like for a few moments to turn to what has been said as to the new farmers' political organization being a class movement and as such not in the interest of the State as a whole. This morning's paper had rather a significant item to the effect that there were seven hundred canvassers going out from the United Farmers of Manitoba to canvass the whole of the farmers of Manitoba for funds with which to carry on a campaign for capturing the citadel at Ottawa. Well, that is fairly good evidence, I think, that this is a class movement. Certainly, the dominating spirits of this movement in the West are men who have appealed to the class to which they belonged, initially to those who are purely grain growers, and embracing perhaps a large number of those who are farmers and practically at that time all in the West, and they have used from time to time some sound arguments, some very specious arguments, and some, I think, we must admit, rather unfair and very misleading arguments in their appeal to their constituencies and in trying to point out the alleged injustices under which the farmers were suffering and the remedies which were to be applied. Political action, political methods, party organizations have been preached and practised. In Ontario, if the report is correct, methods of organization have gone so far that they have actually countenanced by prearrangement resignations in the party of those who are nominated if they should attempt to break away from the party, and the organization is to be used for the distinct purpose of aiming at control of federal affairs. In British Columbia a similar energy has been shown in the attempt to organize the United Farmers of British Columbia. This attempt has not met with quite so wide a response, and perhaps, for obvious reasons, because conditions in British Columbia in respect to matters which I have touched on, are not those of the Prairie Provinces. The president, however, of the United Farmers of Alberta, at a convention held the other day at Victoria, B.C., made this statement, that when the United Farmers of British Columbia went to the polls as one man, they would become the economic force that nature destined them to be. It is quite evident that although differences of opinion exist, there is not the ground for the same response that was given in the Prairie Provinces. The hon. member for Red Deer the other day in his speech made this remark:

> —The farmer of all men—and particularly the Western farmers—are certainly free from any charge of selfishness in so far as their policy goes, because the first thing they ask Parliament and the Government to do is to take off all duties on the things they produce, in order that the general consumers of Canada may have the benefit of wholesome and cheap food. That is not class selfishness surely.

I am afraid I cannot follow my hon. friend in his argument. He is perfectly aware of the fact—and I am not criticising the ground upon which my hon. friends base their action—that the main product of the Western farmer is wheat which has to find its market in the world market unprotected, and it is perfectly natural for him to feel that, if his product has to meet without protection its price in the world market, everything else in the way of tax should be removed from the things he buys. You can call that self-interest or you can call it selfishness; but what it seems to me our friends in the prairies fail to realize is this, that the abolition of tariffs goes a good deal further than this. In the West as elsewhere there are selfish and sectional protectionists; there are selfish and sectional free traders, and if men of extreme views of this kind insist on pressing their views, and could press them to a point where they would obtain power to put them into effect, they would simply jeopardize the whole state structure. As the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) pointed out in his able speech yesterday, any kind of economical policy that has to be carried into effect in this country must be absolutely national in its character, and not sectional.

What are the doctrines and political ideals which my hon. friends from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and Red Deer (Mr. Clark) and the rest of the cross-benchers are advocating? I shall quote the exact words of my hon. friend from Marquette so as not to be misunderstood. He said:

> It will take a long time indeed to convince the farmers of Western Canada that there is any virtue in the principle of protection, especially in a customs tariff.

Further on he said this:

What is the purpose of a tariff? It is designed to benefit a particular section of the people, it operates in no other way and consequently the operation of this protective system in our fiscal policy which has obtained largely for the last forty years, has conferred upon a special class a privilege that in my judgment is not compatible with a true democracy.

My hon. friend from Red Deer expounds his views in these words:

As far as my opinion goes, I do not believe in tariffs at all. They are an iniquity, and the sooner we get rid of them the better.

My hon. friend from Red Deer holds his views on economic questions, as we all know, very strongly indeed. We may not agree with him. Perhaps I would not be going too far if I were to say that he is inconvincible on these questions. I do not believe that in his cherished hold of the doctrines which he has advocated so consistently for so many years he has an adequate conception or an adequate appreciation of world conditions. He scoffed at the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) the other day for referring to Lincoln's views on tariff matters. He said that simply because protection had been preached for so long it did not follow that it was any good. He pointed out that the Fiji Islanders have practised cannibalism for a good many years, but he could not see that there was any virtue in cannibalism simply because it had been practised all that time. It may be interesting to put on record Lincoln's exact words in reference to this matter. They are contained in his address to the people of Illinois in 1843, when he was a candidate for President. He said:

Some of them boldly advocate direct taxation, and all the rest—or so nearly all as to make exceptions needless—refuse to adopt the tariff, we think it is doing them no injustice to class them all as advocates of direct taxation. Indeed, we believe they are only delaying an open avowal of the system till they can assure themselves that the people will tolerate it. Let us, then, briefly compare the two systems. The tariff is the cheaper system, because the duties, being collected in large parcels, at a few commercial points, will require comparatively few officers in their collection; while by the direct tax system the land must be literally covered by assessors and collectors, going forth like swarms of Egyptian locusts, devouring every blade of grass and other green thing..... By the direct tax system, none can escape. However strictly the citizen may exclude from his premises all foreign luxuries, fine cloths, fine silks, rich wines, golden chairs, and diamond rings,—still, for the possession of his house, his barn, and his homespun he is to be perpetually haunted and harassed by the tax-gatherer. With these views, we leave it to be determined whether we or our opponents are more truly democratic on the subject.

I do not suppose for a moment that my hon. friend from Red Deer would accept Lincoln as a very able exponent of economics, but the point I wish to make is that Lincoln at all events was a sane, strong, big man, and we therefore, in these more modern days who may share the belief that the tariff is the main way in which we can carry on the fiscal policy of this country, and do justice to all, may not be blamed for feeling satisfaction that we had so sane a man as Lincoln on our side years ago. My hon. friend drew comparisons with the United States, and went to the extreme length of saying that President Wilson in the United States tariff of 1913 was almost a slavish follower of Sir Robert Peel. I am afraid I cannot follow my hon. friend to that extent. He added that in that tariff about thirty per cent of the whole of the imported articles into the United States were free of duty. That statement, of course, may be accurate, but may I call 11 p.m. the attention of my hon. friend to this fact. While it may be true that thirty per cent of the 657 articles are on the free list, he must not forget that as regards a very large number of those articles it matters little whether they are on the free list or not, because they are almost negligible in character. I turn to the tariff of the United States and read a few articles at random that are free. Here are some.—Curling stones, curry and curry powder, cuttlefish bone, Dandelion roots, Divi-divi, Dragon's blood. Take those under the letter "J"—Jalap, jet, joss, junk. Under the letter "M" we find—Manna, manuscripts, marrow, marshmallows; and under the letter "S" Silkworm eggs, skeletons, skins of hares. Under the letter "T"—Tumeric, turpentine and turtles, and so on.

I don't suppose it matters whether these articles are free or taxed. Thirty per cent of the articles may be on the free list, but I think my hon. friend's deductions are somewhat misleading. I am quite well aware that a large number of articles were put on the free list of the United States in 1913, but there are still many very important articles which are not yet free. On woollen clothing, for instance, there is still a tariff of thirty-five per cent in the United States, the same as here, and all cotton clothing is subject to a duty of thirty per cent. With respect to those articles on which the tariff is lower or is abolished altogether my hon. friend and his friends will not forget that years ago they were taxed as high as 80 and even 100 per cent and bore that high tariff for years until it had practically eliminated all competition and there was built up such a powerful machinery that no competition need be feared. My hon. friend knows, because I am quite sure he is as familiar with these things as I am, that if we adopted the policy which he and his friends would advocate to their logical extreme, it would absolutely mean the transplanting of a large number of our industries into the United States, and would tend towards making Canada as was truly said in 1911 simply "a hewer of wood and drawer of water" for the United States. We would supply them with the raw material, and they with their large amount of skilled labour would work it up into the manufactured product, reaping thereby about three-quarters of the benefit. We see what is going on in the United States to-day. We have seen the frantic appeal in the United States Senate and Congress that Canada shall not go on manufacturing her pulpwood into pulp and her pulp into paper. They are urging in the strongest possible way that we ship the whole of our raw material to the United States and let them do all the manufacturing of the material themselves.

Without wearying the House with this, I wish to deal for a moment with the case of England because my hon. friend is very fond—and I am not blaming him—of turning to England as exemplifying the ideas for which he stands; but I sometimes think that here again he is rather misleading. I think that those members of the House who have not followed what England has been doing in the last few years in regard to tariff matters may be surprised to find that the tariff iniquity is very far from having been abolished in the land which my hon. friend comes from and for which he has, and rightly, so warm a feeling in his heart.

I quote from a book which I have in my hand and which is the Trade and Navigation Returns of the British Government for December, 1919. England has been held up to us as a model of free trade and we have been led to believe that the principle of free trade is being carried out and that the amount collected by tariffs is negligible. But members of the House will be rather amazed when I give them the cold facts as set out in these official figures. These are matters which are not purely luxuries and in some cases we see that the duties collected are of an absolutely protective character. We will start with chicory, including roast or ground, on which there is a duty of £2.2s. per hundredweight and 6d. per pound. From that they collected a very considerable revenue—remember these are straight customs duties. They collected a revenue amounting to over $1,000,000 from cinematograph films. They have a duty on clocks and watches of 33-1/3 per cent from which they collected many millions of dollars. That is distinctly protective in its character and we must regard clocks and watches as more or less necessities. On cocoa there is a duty of £2.2s. per hundredweight which gives a revenue of something like $15,000,000. Coffee they tax to the extent of £2.2s. per hundredweight and 6d per pound which gives a revenue of something like $3,000,000. When we come to the subject of fruit, they have customs duties on dried fruit, or otherwise preserved without sugar and other fruit as well which amounts to over $4,000,000. They have a duty on matches, practically the same as our own, and also an excise duty and they extract from this source a revenue of no less than $4,627,000. There is a duty on motor cars and motorcycles of 33⅓ per cent in "free trade England", and if that is not protection I want to know what is protection. On that item alone they collect something like $5,000,000. They have also a duty of 6d, or practically twelve cents, per gallon on motor spirit or gasoline from which they collect no less than $15,000,000. There is a duty of 33⅓ per cent on musical instruments. I will not touch on the question of spirits on which they have heavy duties but I will come down to an article that is used by rich and poor alike—sugar—on which they have duties up to 5½ cents a pound as against our less than 2 cents a pound and on which they collect no less a sum than $41,148,000. They have a duty on tea of 24 cents a pound as against our 10 cents on which they also collect a very large amount indeed—something like $38,000,000. They have heavy duties also on tobacco; in fact so heavy that they collect $329,000,000 from that source. The result is that, not counting the excise at all, the total customs duties collected in 1919 in free trade England amounted to $743,775,000.

My hon. friend of course looks back with great veneration to Mr. Cobden whose name he often mentions in this House and who stands forth as one of England's big men. I do not think he will dispute that Cobden and his followers actually expected to see the day when England would be the workshop of the world and that she would receive cheap food from the rest of the world to supply her operatives. Cobden certainly never anticipated, never realized, the disastrous effect of this particular policy on one of the great national industries, namely, that of agriculture, in the old country. The figures that I have quoted will show not only that a tariff for revenue is in operation but that the protective principle also is in operation. Let me illustrate it in other directions. I have not time to go into the details of what has been done in connection with wheat, bread and flour during the past few years in England. My hon. friend of course knows that by fixing a guaranteed price of wheat for years, which is still in operation,—and a greater price is being clamoured for now with, I think, some success—and by fixing the maximum price of the four pound loaf at 19 cents, the British Government not only gives a protection to the farmers but gives practically a gratuity to the consumers to the extent of millions upon millions of dollars which is taken from the general taxpayers of the country. I am not criticizing their action or questioning the wisdom of adopting protective measures of this kind. I would venture to say that with the increasing pressure of the farming community in England still higher protection will be adopted. I might point out to my hon. friend and his friends also that in their handling of the dairy products of England there has been in operation the protective principle, for which I am not criticizing them. They have had such a control of the imports from this country and such a control of the production of their own dairy industries in Great Britain that it has given, what I think they are justified in giving, such a measure of protection to the dairy industries in that country that they will not be wiped out and jeopardized as the whole agricultural industry was jeopardized when the crisis arose and which they had to face during the past four years in the old country. I need not point to another direction in which they have adopted the protective principle in England. I refer to the question of livestock. Under the very thin disguise of a health measure one of the strongest forms of protection to the cattle industry of Great Britain has been maintained by an absolutely unjustifiable embargo against the cattle of the United States and especially of Canada where not the wildest straining of the facts could elicit anything but the cleanest bill of health in regard to our cattle, and in regard to which they have hardly attempted to veneer their action by denominating it as a health measure. Admittedly it is intended to be a protection to their own agricultural interests. I do not think that in view of the facts I have stated, England's march towards abolishing all tariffs or the element of protection of its own industries has been so rapid or complete as the member for Red Deer would have us believe.

My hon. friend referred to the victory achieved by the Right Hon. Mr. Asquith recently as a triumph of the economic principles for which he stood. I think the facts, if we knew them, would rather be that another man running in the constituency of Paisley holding the same economic principles that Mr. Asquith holds but not with the powerful personality and great traditions that pertain to Mr. Asquith's name, would have met a very different fate. I am glad, as every man is glad, that any English constituency would return a statesman who has served his country so long and so ably as Mr. Asquith has done.

I was rather surprised and a little interested when my hon. friend from Red Deer in his speech from Friday last in giving an illustration as to the evils of protection asked us to follow the example of the men in the trenches. I will quote his exact words. He said:

> Let me make an appeal to these gentlemen to use all their endeavours to grow into the same stalwart type of Canadians that stood in the trenches and asked for no protection and the farmers of the West who ask for no protection.

I think that of the men whom he mentions for the purpose of illustration he could not have made a more unhappy choice than when he referred to the man in the trenches as the man who was not asking for protection. I think he would find that the man in the trenches when he was getting the benefit of some high explosives from the German positions would send up a flare for the artillery in his rear to give him protection. Or if there was the likelihood of an aggressive movement from the German front he would want to have the protection of all the barbed wire he could get, and rightly so. What did the adoption of the helmets used in the last years of the war mean but protection? What was the object of every form of manoeuvre and device that could put the forces of the Allies in better condition than the German forces but protection, and protection of the sanest and soundest character. I do not think a more unhappy illustration could possibly have been drawn than the illustration my hon. friend advanced in that respect.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to keep the House much longer for I know the hour is late and we are shortly to vote on the amendment before us. The farmers' party, as represented by the group at the other end of this Chamber, are apparently going to support the amendment. I can only regret it. They are certainly not going to support that amendment for the same reasons that the leader of the Opposition and his friends are going to support it, because they have not manifested any particular hostility toward the policies that were put into effect by this Government, or the principles for which this Government stands, apart from this particular tariff question. In fact I think my hon. friend from Marquette and my hon. friend whom we highly esteem from Red Deer, and their associates were with us on this side of the House when great problems were undertaken, and I think successfully undertaken. They, I think, will not only have sympathy with the difficulties which we encountered and the way in which they were surmounted, but will admit that, apart from this particular measure of tariff reform, which they think we are not hastening to as quickly as they anticipate, they have no very strong cause for voting for this particular amendment especially in the way in which it has been framed. It is quite a different matter with my hon. friends opposite—certainly in the case of the leader of the Opposition because when addressing Liberal friends in this city the other night he put the matter this way: "If we do not win on Parliament Hill in this particular amendment by carrying it, we will carry it from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and we expect the people of the country to rise up with us and demand that this Government get out of office." That is all he is aiming at. It does not matter what the Government has done or what it stands for—and he seems to comprehend very little of what it has done—his chief anxiety is to get this Government out of office so that he and his friends may take its place. Well, as citing a fairly independent and pretty sane opinion from the West on this matter I might direct my hon. friend's attention, and especially the attention of the hon. gentleman who last spoke (Mr. Lapointe), for whom we have a warm regard, let me quote from a paper which has a very considerable influence in the West namely the Manitoba Free Press. In its issue of March 3 last, that newspaper says:

> Members of the present Dominion Parliament were elected for a five year term, and they are under no moral obligation to vote for Mr. King's amendment providing for an early election. If a majority of them want an election they will, of course, support Mr. King's resolution, and no one will question their right to make such a decision. On the other hand, if their decision is adverse, they are equally within their rights in deciding, so far as the decision rests with them, they will continue to represent their constituents for the period for which they were originally elected.
>
> Should the House of Commons reject Mr. King's amendment, as it no doubt will, it does not follow that there will be no general election until the present Parliament completes its term. The right of the Administration to consult the electorate in its discretion is inherent in our constitution, and an appeal to the people by the Government during the present year is regarded by all political observers as well within possibilities.
>
> A House of Commons elected during the present year, while it may be more representative than the existing Chamber, would fall far short of being truly representative of Canadian opinion at the present time. Election on the basis of the present constituencies would leave the West under represented to at least the extent of twenty members. The West has never had its full representation in the Canadian Parliament. By accident or design it has always happened that a general election is held on the eve of redistribution, the effect of which has been to keep the western representation always far below its proper strength. Further, the cities are, under the present scheme of representation under-represented to a degree that is not longer defensible, and it is quite clear that there must be extensive adjustments in this respect, which ought to be accompanied by the adoption of proportional representation for at least the urban areas.
>
> It is a quite arguable proposition that upon the whole the interests of Canada will be best served by putting up with conditions as they are for another two years until it will be possible to have a proper redistribution of seats which will do the West justice; will give the cities at least a percentage of the additional representation to which they are entitled; and will provide a more accurate method of election. With these reforms it will be possible to elect a truly representative Commons, which is not attainable under existing conditions. A general election now means that a truly representative Parliament could not be elected until 1925.
> Inasmuch as it is already quite evident that in the next Parliament there will be a contest between the policy strongly backed by the West and an alternative policy, which will draw its strength from the East, it is desirable that the West should have all the members to which it is entitled. The fact that under a proper redistribution the West will gain at least twenty more members, while the East will lose ten, may have some bearing upon the demand that is being heard in the East, and which Mr. Mackenzie King voices for an early election.

Now, Sir, in closing, may I say that I hold the opinion, as many people do, that the plunging of the country into a general election at the present time would not be in the best interests of Canada. In spite of what my hon. friends argue, and in spite of what they present to this House, no man would deny that under the present war conditions, with conditions such as they are economically, industrially and socially all over the world to-day, and to a greater or lesser extent in Canada, to plunge this country into the chaos of a general election would not be wise in the interests of the country or in the interests of any individual party. My hon. friends need not cherish the belief that this Government and its supporters are afraid to meet the country at any time. They are not afraid. My hon. friends seem to entertain some dissatisfaction, not only with so many Liberals joining this party in 1917, but feel an acute distress that those hon. gentlemen are still staying with the Ministry at the present time. I would like to say to my hon. friends that when this Government does go to the country my belief is a policy will be enunciated which will not only justify the strong grounds upon which my hon. friends from the Liberal party joined the Coalition in 1917, but will also justify in the fullest way the continuation of their adhesion to this party and what it stands for before the people.

If when this Government does go to the country the people should choose to put in another Government, I cherish the belief that whatever Government does come into power will undertake the administration of this country in the sane constitutional methods to which we here, at all events, are so strongly adhering, and that those elements which would rather reverse all the constitutional principles for which we on both sides of the House have stood for so long will have such a severe lesson taught them that they will realize that no party, however violent or however influential, can divorce from the minds of true Canadians the determination to cherish the institutions and to maintain the constitution for which they have stood so long. However, when that appeal is made, I believe, as I stated before, that this Government, which has met the conditions of the war and the problems which have arisen out of the war with courage and success, will have no difficulty in justifying their stand to-day and in bringing back to this House a party that will successfully carry on the affairs of this country for many years to come.

Mr. ROBERT H. HALBERT (North Ontario): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the cross-firing which we have had for several days it requires considerable courage on the part of a new member to make what is called his maiden speech. As a new member I was greatly interested in the able addresses of the hon. members who have spoken, although, Mr. Speaker, some remarks have been made which I think in the interests of Canada would have been better unsaid.

I was pleased with the deserved tributes paid by previous speakers to leaders, both past and present, of His Majesty's Government and of His Majesty's loyal Opposition.

The subject of the designing and carrying out of the design of this magnificent building in which we have the honour to meet for the first time has been pretty well exhausted by men capable of doing justice to the subject and needs no further comment from me. In fact, the ground has been so well covered that there is very little left to be said. The reference made to the war and the Peace Treaty and the deserving tribute paid to our boys whose manly courage and work well done overseas made the Peace Treaty possible, I am sure, Mr. Speaker, is heartily endorsed and concurred in by every member of this House; but there are some matters mentioned in the address from the Throne and in the course of this debate upon it to which I wish to draw your attention, as you will notice that some do not appreciate any too well the fact that in four of the by-elections just held the electors of all shades of politics, callings and professions, sent men to sit in the cross-benches whom they believed would represent them and not misrepresent them; and just here, Mr. Speaker, permit me, representing, as I do, the federal riding of North Ontario, represented previously in the House by the late lamented Colonel Sam Sharpe, to pay tribute to his memory by saying that he was a man who was held in the highest esteem by the electors of his riding, revered by his men overseas and, I believe, Sir, was esteemed and admired by his fellow members of the House of Commons, of which he was a member for some years.

Reference has been made to the farmers' organization as a "class" movement and it has been said that all classes should be represented. We believe so, too, and that is why we are here representing rural constituencies. We are here, Mr. Speaker, as a protest against class rule and class legislation. The Organized Farmers stand for British fair play, equal rights to all and special privileges to none. We are here to assist any Government that will give us sane, honest, economic and progressive legislation; and Government not subservient to the Big Interests, but truly representing the ideals and aspirations of the great masses of the people. As some hon. gentlemen apparently do not want to believe that we are not advocates of class legislation, permit me to read one clause from our constitution in reference to that matter:

> By endeavouring to suppress personal, local, sectional, national, political, partisan and class prejudices, and thereby to promote the best interests of Canada as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, attention has been drawn to the unrest in this country. No doubt there is unrest and a great many people believe that the present Government has outlived its usefulness and would like to see a Government in power that would pay more attention to ascertaining the real will of the people and carrying it out than to territorial boundaries and winning an election. If Canadian politics are to be saved from utter disgrace and if the bloodshed which has taken place in other countries is to be avoided we must have sufficient faith to trust democracy with democratic methods. If our grievances are to be settled by ballot—which I think should be—people must be allowed to use the ballot, and, what is more, the gerrymandering of present day partyism must be absolutely abandoned. When autocracy interferes with the channels of public expression it causes unrest and invites direct action.

Canada is essentially an agricultural country. Its chief asset is the soil, the foundation upon which all the superstructure stands. While we admit that the products of sea, forest and mines are known to be great, yet the possibilities in plant and animal production far exceed them all in magnitude and importance. The products of the mines are taken, never to be restored; the forests to be perhaps partially renewed after many years; but the farm production where intelligently carried on has been secure without depleting to any appreciable extent nature's storehouse of resources.

The manufacturing industry, it is true, has come to play an important part in the nation's progress, yet a great many of them are dependent on farming for their raw material, and a great many of them must look to the rural districts for the great bulk of the market for their finished product. Therefore, the progress in agriculture in Canada is a national concern. It affects every one, and everything possible should be done to make agricultural life attractive and remunerative so that labour and capital will be attracted to the land instead of away from it as it is at present.

Mr. Speaker, every one who has the true interest of Canada at heart desires to see the present unrest satisfactorily settled. This can be done by an honest effort on the part of all. To my mind, one of the greatest causes of the unrest lies in our tariff laws, which affect to a very great extent the high cost of living; but, Mr. Speaker, as you have intimated that will be discussed in the Budget debate, I will not discuss it at the present time, except to refer to what has already been said with regard to re-establishment of the returned soldier.

In connection with the re-establishment of the returned soldier it has been urged that he should go on the land. We hope to see a good many returned soldiers go on the land. But when they do so they find that the tariff affects them very materially so far as the cost of the implements of production is concerned. It has been said that a large amount of the money necessary to pay our war debt has to be taken out of the top six inches of the soil. You ask the returned soldier to go on the land and to take out of the top six inches of the soil enough to pay for the canned goods he eats as well as for the shells he fired when over in the trenches fighting for democracy. Well, suppose he does that for a number of years and eventually succumbs under the heavy burden, what does the tariff do then? It collects from the heirs a percentage by way of taxation even on his shroud, on his coffin, on the screw-nails that fasten down the lid of his coffin, and on the shovel with which the grave digger digs his grave. No doubt the same people who impose these tariffs may be lamenting the fact that they cannot follow him over the Jordan and put a tax on his royal robe.

With regard to the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition, I may say that while I do not agree with the wording of it, I shall support it because I believe that the present administration has not the confidence of the people, as the by-elections just held go to prove. If their record is as good and their policy as popular and pleasing as they would try to make us believe, they should be anxious to go to the country and get the endorsation of the people to carry on. The question is not who will be in power, but who will give the people the best legislation in the interests of Canada; and of that the people should be the judge.

Mr. Speaker, there is one other matter mentioned in the Address about which I wish to speak before taking my seat, and that is the Franchise Act. We who have been born in Canada sometimes fail, I think, to realize the great heritage which we enjoy in being born Canadians.

> Breathes there the man, with soul so dead,
> Who never to himself hath said—
> "This is my own, my native land!"

The war has taught us many lessons and none more forcible than the need of true and unadulterated Canadian citizenship. We are all aware that most nations have been formed from different elements, as their flags are formed of silk or wool of different colours sewn together. Stone and brick are not the same, yet both are employed in making this magnificent building in which we now meet—a building that the people of this generation will be proud to hand down to future generations. Both stone and brick are employed in building the most lasting and the most solid monuments. What is needed to unite them? A little cement, that is all. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have in our country people of different tongues, from different lands, and of different ideas. The thing that is needed to cement them together is the gospel of Canadian citizenship—the establishment in this country of the true brotherhood of man. We shall not bring about a united Canada by throwing stones at each other. Our boys died for a better and more democratic Canada. It is our duty to build up a united citizenship, loving liberty from whence springs peace and harmony, in a country inhabited by people of different nationalities and religions. I am willing to work with any man, regardless of colour, race, creed or nationality, who has the true ideal of Canadian citizenship and is willing to work with me for the welfare of this country and to help make it the best country in the world to live in. And yet, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say that we have in this country even to-day, even in this enlightened age, men who are fanning the flames of discord, jealousy and antagonism. I once thought that the man who looted the public treasury was the greatest enemy of our nation. But to my mind there is one man who is even worse, and that is the man who, whatever the reason may be, stirs the fires of racial and religious passion, thereby setting in motion agencies that are the greatest menace and danger to our public weal to-day. Such agencies should be crushed and crushed so mercilessly that they will never again arise from the oblivion into which they should be forever consigned.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a few observations at this point chiefly because I think that my hon. friends on the other side would be disappointed if I did not. What has been said this afternoon will, I am sure, lead them to expect me to say a few words.

The attack that has been made upon the President of the Council (Hon. N. W. Rowell) was so thin, so stale, and so vindictive that it will leave no impression on the country unfavourable to the President of the Council. That kind of thing always reacts on the man who is responsible for it, and I am sure that that will be the case in this instance.

The attack on the President of the Council was due to his criticisms of some of the religious orders in the war. As to the accuracy in detail of what he said I have no knowledge. But in support of what he said at North Bay I desire to quote a very eminent and brave French-Canadian, who for many years was a much admired citizen of my own city, a man with whom I enjoyed very pleasant social relations, I refer to General Lessard. Here is a report of something that he said during the progress of the war:

> There is a general complaint that the lower clergy of the Province have not lent an attentive ear to the voice of the higher Episcopal authorities so as to bring its message in regard to the duty of the French-Canadians at the present time to recruit the race as a whole.
> He pointed out the grave responsibility that the lower clergy assumed in putting a damper on the appeal of the hierarchy to its children. As far as he himself was concerned he expected a more wholehearted co-operation from the clergy in conformity with the great influence which it exercises on the destinies of the French-Canadian. He might say the same thing about their leaders—those who directed opinion in Quebec. It was long enough that politics had been a bar to the complete spirit of union necessary to rouse up the French-Canadian people to rally to the great cause.

I desire to read also a paragraph from a letter written to Colonel Obed Smith, a Liberal, by a French-Canadian who was serving at the front, about the time of the disturbances in the city of Quebec. It reads:

> 'The question should be handled with steel gauntlets,' he says, 'Ignorance is rampant in my native province. The blame is on the shoulders of the Fathers of Confederation, who allowed two official languages. A dual language begets separate schools, they beget ignorance. It may require a small army to enforce the radical changes after the war, but we shall have it. The indifference of Quebec in this struggle will be a powerful lever in the hands of a bold leader.'

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What is the name of the miscreant who wrote that letter?

Mr. HOCKEN: The letter was given by the writer to Colonel Obed Smith.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Who wrote the letter?

Mr. HOCKEN: A French-Canadian at the front.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Anonymous?

Mr. HOCKEN: No, Colonel Obed Smith was a man who was serving and who had a good deal of prominence in this country. Therefore, there is a good deal of support for what the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) said and for which he has been criticised so severely on at least two separate occasions.

The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) produced a document from which he read a number of extracts. I am familiar with the literature of the Orange Association, and this bears none of the earmarks of that organization. I venture to say that this document from which he read was printed in either Nova Scotia or Quebec; a document something of this kind has been sent out, but to what extent it is garbled, I do not know. I can, however, say this for myself and for the names of those Past Grand Officers that appear on the document; I did not sign such a document, and I have no reason to believe that they did. As to the position taken in this document with regard to schools, with regard to the war, and with regard to the association of which I am a member, I am prepared to defend the substance of everything that appears there. I want to point out to the House that in this debate I am not the aggressor; I am doing as every true Orangeman ought to do, standing on the defensive, defending his principles and convictions as straightforwardly as it is the practice of members of the association to do. I will endeavour to do that, Sir, without saying a word that should give my hon. friends opposite who disagree with me in matters of faith any just cause for offence.

My course, since I came into this House —and this is my fourth session—has been one of conciliation. I think I may fairly say—and my hon. friends opposite will agree with me—that I have not sought any occasion to stir up racial strife or to express any opinions that I thought might be offensive to any one of them. At the same time, I do not purpose sitting in my seat and hear the institution with which I am connected attacked without making a reply. This document refers to the language question which has been the bone of contention between Quebec and Ontario. It arose shortly before the war and was the occasion during the war of a very serious agitation in certain parts of Ontario as well as in Quebec. The charge was that the province of Ontario had proscribed the French language. That is not so. I have before me regulation 17 which says:

> Where necessary in the case of French-speaking pupils, French may be used as the language of instruction and communication; but such use of French shall not be continued beyond Form 1 excepting during the school year of 1912-13, when it may also be used as the language of instruction and communication in the case of pupils beyond Form 1, who owing to previous defective training, are unable to speak and understand the English language.

Further than that, upon a report of the chief inspector, the French language may be used for communication and instruction up to the fourth form.

I think that is a reasonable regulation, especially when we all realize, as has been admitted even by the counsel for the French-Canadian Educational Association that, under the constitution of this country, there is no obligation upon the province of Ontario to allow French to be taught at all, and when so many believe that it is impossible in the primary schools to teach two languages successfully.

Mr. CANNON: When was that proved?

Mr. HOCKEN: I say that is the general belief in the province of Ontario.

Mr. CANNON: That is a wrong belief.

Mr. HOCKEN: It is the belief of that eminent Episcopal Divine, Bishop Fallon, of London, and I am in his company when I say that in my belief two languages cannot be taught successfully in the primary schools. We make provision in the secondary schools for the teaching of French, and practically every child that goes into the secondary schools studies French.

Mr. BELAND: Has the Bishop to whom the hon. member refers ever learned French?

Mr. HOCKEN: I have never tested him, so I am unable to answer that question.

Mr. CANNON: If it is impossible in the primary schools of Ontario to teach both languages, English and French successfully, how is it that both languages are taught successfully in Quebec?

Mr. EDWARDS: They are so much cleverer than we.

Mr. CANNON: I think so.

Mr. BEST: Sit down. You started it; take your medicine.

Mr. CANNON: Let the hon. member answer the question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for Toronto West has the floor, and I hope he will be permitted to continue his speech without interruption.

Mr. CANNON: I put him a question, and I think my question is legitimate and I would like to have an answer.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is within the right of the hon. member to answer the question or not, but he should at least be given an opportunity to do so.

Mr. HOCKEN: If it be the case that in Quebec the children are so bright that they can learn two languages in the primary schools, that is not the case in the diocese of London, because that was the very basis of the objection of Bishop Fallon to the continuance of bilingual schools. If a child going to school in Quebec is taught during the greater part of the day in English, he gets a conversational knowledge of his own language in his home, and greater success may be attained that way than in our province where he would never hear the French language outside of school. But it is impossible that we should give the greater part of the time to teaching French in Ontario and at the same time fit the children of our provinces to fight their way in life. But this regulation was based upon the report of Dr. Merchant, a copy of which I have, and you will find set out in that report that there were 268 schools in Ontario in which it was impossible for an English-speaking child to get an education in his own language. They had to go to schools where they were taught wholly in French, and their parents had to submit to the choice of sending their children to a school that was conducted in French entirely, and where the catechism of a faith in which they did not believe was one of the principal subjects of study, keeping their children away from school altogether, or selling out at a sacrifice and moving to western Canada. That was the condition of affairs that the people of Ontario said they would not tolerate.

The people of Ontario would not tolerate it, and so they took the necessary steps to have their children learn the English language. The fathers of these children inherited their lands from the United Empire Loyalists, and thousands of them sold out and went West solely that their children might get a chance in life. If this had been simply an accidental movement, instead of an attempt to fill up the province of Ontario with French-speaking people and get control of one section after another, it would not have gone as fast or as far as it did. The French have come into the counties of Ontario without ten dollars in their pocket and have been able to buy a 100-acre farm, until finally, one after another the school sections would come under the control of the French, and from that time the school became a French-language school instead of an English-language school. At the time regulation 17 was adopted, there were 268 sections in that condition.

Behind this is the claim that the whole of Canada should be colonized and dominated by the French people. That was stated even by so eminent a man as Sir Wilfrid Laurier in an address in the city of Quebec. He is quoted by the The Toronto Star of June 24, 1912, as saying that not only the province of Quebec but the whole of Canada should be claimed by the French-Canadians as their country.

Mr. CANNON: Why not?

Mr. HOCKEN: Behind that claim is this: that the French language shall have the same status in every province as it has in the province of Quebec.

Mr. CANNON: That is the constitution.

Mr. HOCKEN: No. I should like to read the opinion of Hon. Senator Belcourt, who was specially delegated to prepare a reasoned opinion of the law upon the subject. He said:

> The true fact, regrettable as it may be, is that for the federal domain and the provincial domain of Quebec, there is but the constitution which defines equality of both languages at the Dominion Parliament, at the Quebec Parliament, before the Federal tribunal or courts, and also before the courts of the Province of Quebec is the French language on an equal footing with the English language. Section 133 of the British North America Act which proclaims equal rights of the French and English before the Federal House, the Federal courts and before the provincial house of Quebec and the provincial courts, and in section 93 of the same Act which gives to each province the exclusive power to legislate in matters of education, constitute the sum total of the rights officially recognized in favour of the French-Canadian people of the Dominion of Canada; these are the only rights recognized in favour of our race; they are the only rights which cannot be stripped from us without the intervention of the Imperial Parliament; they are the only rights which the constitution and the law formally guaranteed to us; they are the only rights which the law will permit us to exact and about which it gives us the means whereby to exact the same.

I hope my hon. friend will accept the reasoned opinion of Senator Belcourt. That was also admitted by Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Mr. CANNON: If I understand Senator Belcourt's opinion properly, federally speaking, the French and English languages are on an equal footing. Is not that the case?

Mr. HOCKEN: No. They are on an equal footing in the federal courts, and in the Houses of Parliament, but not in the schools. It is just as well to have this matter out now we are at it. There has been a movement vigorously and energetically pressed, to surround the province of Ontario with a French population which would enable the French to secure about twenty seats in the legislature, and thus dominate the policy of the province.

Mr. CANNON: Why not?

Mr. HOCKEN: Why not resist it, if we do not agree with the principles that prevail in your province? Father Hamon, the head of the Jesuit order, has admitted that this movement is going on. He wrote a book on French-Canadian aims and ambitions in which he said this:

None of the obstacles met have checked the settlement of the valley of the Ottawa and of the Province of Ontario. And yet, for the French-Canadian, is not Ontario a country different from theirs, both in religion and language, and even in politics, in that, at least, which relates to local interests? In spite of these difficulties, in spite of a tenacious English element, hostile to the invasion and seeking by all possible means to prevent it, the French-Canadian pushes towards the end for which he set out. The French-Canadian infiltrate themselves everywhere in those counties of Ontario which divide it from the province of Quebec, and continue bravely to march toward the West .

Mr. CANNON: That is their right.

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes. To continue:

The policy of the church is to guide the movement, plan and forward settlement, and especially the parish system, the parochial school, and the religious and national societies.

Mr. CANNON: That is their duty.

Mr. HOCKEN (reading):

——Then to watch and wait for providential developments, that she may mass and lead the people for the effective overthrow of Protestant error and paganism.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is their hope.

Hr. HOCKEN (reading):

——The French-Canadian race is God's chosen people to save North America and to restore its population to the bosom of the church of Rome. Is this a dream? No, it is more; it is an everyday issue.

Mr. HOCKEN: As far as the people of the Protestant section of Ontario are concerned we have just as much right to oppose that movement as the hierarchy of Quebec has to encourage and promote it?

Mr. CANNON: Who is preventing you?

Mr. HOCKEN: Nobody yet. We are doing the best we can to resist the movement, but we have not succeeded quite so well as we would like.

Mr. CANNON: Would my hon. friend allow me a question?

Mr. BEST: Keep quiet over there.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) has asked permission to ask a question of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken). Had the hon. member for West Toronto retained the floor, the hon. member for Dorchester would certainly not have had that right, but as the hon. member for Toronto has taken his seat the hon. member for Dorchester is perfectly justified in asking his question.

Mr. CANNON: Will the hon. member for West Toronto give me one example where the Catholic church in the province of Quebec has impeded or tried to impede any Protestant movements in the province of Quebec?

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not live in the province of Quebec.

Mr. CANNON: Happily for us.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: We do not grow your kind.

Mr. HOCKEN: In answer to my hon. friend from Dorchester I could give many instances, and I may do that later. Just now I am trying to give my reasons why the institution which I represent as one of its officers, resists the extension of the French language into the province of Ontario, believing it to be inimical to the interests of the English-speaking people of that province, and contrary to the constitution. I am supported in that by some of the most eminent members of the Roman Catholic church. There are clergymen in this city, as well as the Bishop of London, who say that this is being done by the bishops and the French hierarchy.

There is another reason why we do not want this to go on because the aim is to extend ecclesiastical government to the province of Ontario. The province of Quebec is ruled by the ecclesiastics. The people must take their politics as well as their religion from the bishops. We do not want that kind of thing in Ontario, because we have discovered that when clericals rule a country there is always restraint upon freedom. It is even worse, Mr. Speaker, when this restraint is imposed by the members of a faith whose religious leaders have the power, according to the belief of those who follow them, to open or close the doors of heaven. The Protestant preacher has his own personal influence and nothing more, but the bishop of the Roman church has the sacraments and that makes a good deal of difference. My hon. friend dissents from my statement that in politics they are governed, as they are in spiritual matters, by their clerical leaders. Let me give an instance to prove my point. It is a well known fact that if a newspaper publishes matter which is offensive, or thought to be injurious to the interests of religion in Quebec, that newspaper can have the ban put upon it, and it can be closed up. It has to suspend publication. That happened to one of these papers some years ago.

An hon. MEMBER: How many years ago?

Mr. HOCKEN: I cannot give you the exact year but I remember the case very well. It does not apply to newspapers only but to pamphlets. A man cannot write a book in Quebec that declares for freedom in politics without having to take it back.

An hon. MEMBER: Ah.

Mr. HOCKEN: Ah; I will give you a notable instance of that. I will tell you all about it. The most interesting I have to present is that of a book or pamphlet written by the Hon. L. O. David. The writer's object was to uphold the proposition, that the priests ought to confine themselves to the spiritual domain, and as his reason for so saying he quoted from history to show that whenever they meddled with secular affairs it was to their own hurt and that of the province. Starting by laying down "that bishops and priests are men subject to error" he went on to point out how, in his view, they erred in 1837 and at each subsequent crisis when French nationality was in jeopardy. Professedly a devout Catholic, Senator David deplored this, blaming the mistaken course of the priests to ignorance of public sentiment. "The truth," he declares, "reaches them (the priests) with difficulty through the fumes of the incense which envelops them," and he warned them to awake from their sleep of false security and escape the storm which menaced them by leaving politics alone.

The little book, which was issued in September, 1896, was condemned by the bishops in a joint pastoral in January following. After stating the book had been submitted to the Holy Office at Rome and been formally condemned "with the approval of the sovereign pontiff," the rule is laid down that no layman "has authority to judge, condemn, or approve of doctrines or writings. . . It is, by your bishops and the priests, who are united with them, that you are to receive the teachings of the Holy See. . . . to be with the Pope you must not be in opposition to the bishops."

Mr. CANNON: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HOCKEN: No, not just now. The judgment against this book was that every person having a copy should destroy it and that any copies in the hands of the author should also be destroyed. Senator David said:

> When I wrote the little book I had no idea of the storm I was raising. I thought I was doing the clergy a service in speaking out the thoughts that I could not drive from my mind. After the last general election I noticed a growing feeling against clerical interference in politics, and simply gave it publication. They may condemn me; they may excommunicate me. I cannot help that, but I shall remain a Catholic—that is my religion, and they cannot take my faith from me.

This is the significant paragraph to which I am trying to lead up. He said:

> I thought when I wrote my book that, as a British subject, I had a perfect right to do so. If not, there is something wrong, for I feel that, as a French Canadian and a Catholic, I should have the same rights in politics as my English-speaking brethren.

A more lamentable confession by a public man has seldom been made than that he is not allowed to exercise his own judgment in writing a book criticising the political activities within his own province. If that does not prove my case that there is an ecclesiastical government in Quebec I do not know what more would be required. We do not want that in Ontario. We do not want the peculiar laws established by the church in Quebec. We do not want the tithing system. Down in the county of Prescott, although there are no such laws in this province, a county judge gave a judgment that the tithing laws of Quebec operated in the province of Ontario and he compelled a man to pay his tithe for the building of a church. That is introducing something into Ontario which we object to.

Mr. PROULX: I do not think that was the purport of the judgment. It was not that the tithing system of Quebec was in force in Ontario but it was that when a man enjoys the services of a priest he ought to pay for them.

Mr. HOCKEN: If my hon. friend can see any distinction I would like to know it. If this man enjoyed the services of a priest he ought to pay for them but my point is that he should not be compelled by law to pay for them because there is no such law in Ontario and it is a law that we do not want in Ontario.

Mr. CANNON: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HOCKEN: No, not now.

Mr. CANNON: It is significant; the answer must be hard.

Mr. HOCKEN: It is so late that I would rather not be interrupted. There are many other things of that kind that I do not propose to go into but I want to explain why it is that we object to these things.

Now why should the French desire to engraft these laws on Ontario? It is to get control of that province. That may be a perfectly legitimate ambition; they have the right to do so if they can; but I submit that they have no right to condemn us for resisting such a policy when we do not believe in it. If the French Canadians desire that kind of Government in the province of Quebec well and good, let them have it; but they should keep it there and not try to drag it into the province of Ontario. How does it come, Mr. Speaker, if there is not a settled purpose by powerful and wealthy organizations to get control of Ontario—why is it they infiltrate into Northern Ontario and do not go into Northern Quebec? There is a lot of good land in the northern parts of Quebec, the people of that province could go and live under their own laws and under their own peculiar institutions. Nobody in the province of Ontario has ever suggested we should go down and interfere with their local autonomy. They can have any kind of government in Quebec that they desire, but we are not going to have it brought into the province of Ontario if we can prevent it. A prominent public man told me that he got on the Transcontinental train at Quebec, about a year ago, and it was occupied by a number of colonists and for a distance of many miles fresh colonists at intervals boarded the train. Not a single one of them detrained in the province of Quebec; they were all billed for the northern parts of Ontario. They go there to develop their own institutions and to overcome the institutions that we have established there at the present time. I repeat that the French Canadians have a perfect right to do that, they have a perfect right to go into the province of Ontario, but we have an equal right to fix the terms upon which they shall come. This policy to which I have reference is one that politicians are working out for their future aggrandizement and they are looking forward to the time when the peculiar institutions of their province will be spread over the province of Ontario.

Another matter to which reference was made in the circular in question was the war. We were aggrieved at the action of Quebec in the war, and it could not be otherwise. I am not going to rub it in, but I want to state our case. We were fighting for France as the ally of our Old Motherland, and we thought that surely the people who claim French descent, and had French blood in their veins, would do as much for their Mother country as we were doing for our Mother country. Especially, in our opinion, should that have been the case, when the very existence of France was at stake—

Mr. CANNON: What about England?

Mr. HOCKEN:—much more so than that of England. England had a navy that could resist invasion, but the very existence of France hung in the balance in that war. And we expected our French Canadian fellow citizens to join us at least in proportionately equal numbers to go to her defence. Now they did not do that, and it surely cannot surprise my hon. friend opposite—

Mr. CANNON: Not from you.

Mr. HOCKEN:—that in the province of Ontario, and in the city of Toronto, some resentment should be felt on that account. We had not, perhaps, so much right to respond to the call that was made from Europe as the men from the province of Quebec. I remember, Sir,—as I stated in this House once before—an old friend of mine, and a faithful follower of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier as long as he lived, who used to come to my office and say that if there should be a war in which England and France would fight together that would be the thing that would unite Canada. We agreed that if such a thing should ever occur—

Mr. CANNON: Were you consulted?

Mr. HOCKEN:—that would certainly bring the two races in this country together; and if those who my hon. friends opposite represent had taken the part they should have taken there would have been in our province and in every other province, an open door to every ambition they had. Sir, in practically every home—certainly in every Orange home in Canada—there was the deepest anxiety and there were broken hearts over the boys who were fighting in the trenches, many of whom had laid down their lives in France and in Flanders. Go to the West and the records of the Institution that I, as an officer, represent, will show that in some cases practically every eligible member of the Institution in a particular section was off on the firing line. In the city of Toronto there were more Orangemen went overseas voluntarily out of approximately 30,000 members than there were out of the 1,800,000 French Canadians in the province of Quebec.

Mr. CANNON: Will my hon. friend let me ask him a question?

Mr. HOCKEN: Not just now.

Mr. CANNON: How about the Orangemen who armed themselves against England before the war.

Mr. HOCKEN: Mr. Speaker, I am discussing Canada.

Mr. CANNON: Discuss the Orangemen for a while, be honest.

Mr. HOCKEN: I am doing so. Let me say to my hon. friend that when the war did break out in no part of the British Empire did the men respond as cheerfully and as numerously as they did from the province of Ulster.

Mr. CANNON: Not any better than anywhere else.

Mr. HOCKEN: The Ulster Brigade, and the Ulster people had nothing to be ashamed of in the war. They went out and laid down their lives just as freely as the Canadians did, and they performed good work. Mr. Speaker, I ask you, and I ask this House, if it is any wonder that men who sent their members out, as this organization did—sent more out of one city than were sent by the French Canadians out of the whole province of Quebec, numbering probably 1,800,000 of that race—is it any wonder that there should be resentment on our part, and is it surprising that sometimes strong language was used in that connection?

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. CANNON: What about our part?

Mr. HOCKEN: There has been a good deal of talk about the insults that were levelled at Quebec but I do not want to go into that.

Mr. CANNON: You have been into that already. Do not worry about that.

Mr. HOCKEN: The course adopted by the members of this institution was exactly in line with their record ever since 1912. Every time rebellion has raised its head in this country, or invasion has been threatened, the men who belonged to this organization were the back-bone of the force that put it down.

Mr. CANNON: Edward Carson.

Mr. HOCKEN: In 1837 the rebellion in what is now the province of Ontario was put down by the members of this Institution; and they bore a large part in the fights in 1866 at Ridgeway and Fort Erie. Yes, and they went up to Fort Garry in 1870, and in doing so they committed a crime in the estimation of my hon. friends opposite. They took their part in the fight there, and they had to go up again in 1885 when the rebellion was revived. The members of this organization went out to South Africa by the thousand in the Boer war of 1900, and again in 1914 almost to a man went to the Front, the members of the Orange order who were eligible for such service. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that men who have served Canada in that way, men who have played a noble part in the terrible crisis that we have gone through deserve respect of the country and are entitled to credit for the patriotic services they have rendered.

Why is that, Sir? Because they are trained in loyalty to the British Empire. They have in the past resisted every attempt to dismember the Empire, and they will be true to their convictions in that regard as long as they exist.

My hon. friend will remember that in some places an Orangeman is spoken of as a bigot. Nothing could be further from the truth. Orangemen are the most tolerant body of men in the world. Civil and religious liberty is nowhere so universal as in those places in which this institution is strong. In no province and city of this Dominion are the people of the same faith as my hon. friends opposite given more freedom than in the province of Ontario and in the city of Toronto. Why, Mr. Speaker, the people of Toronto contributed $260,000 to carry on the work of the Knights of Columbus— an organization composed entirely of men of the opposite faith, and I suppose three-quarters of that sum came from the pockets of Protestants. Is that intolerance, is that bigotry? And yet such is typical of the organization.

Do hon. gentlemen forget that the Orange organization has invariably stood for its principles and convictions regardless of the personnel of our Governments? In the days of Macdonald and Cartier the Orangemen of Ontario were supporting them. Why? Because, Mr. Speaker, Macdonald and Cartier had a policy that was approved by the members of that institution—a policy for the building up of this country as a part of the British Empire, and they supported those two leaders as faithfully as did any of their fellow Canadians.

They did more than that, Sir. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the late leader of the party across the floor first became Prime Minister he had no stronger supporters in the province of Ontario than the members of this institution. In the City of Toronto, his opponent, the late Sir Charles Tupper, was not allowed to speak. The men who prevented him from speaking were members of the institution which I am trying to defend here to-night, and they worked energetically for the return of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the party that he represented. They did that, Sir, because his party expressed their convictions, and they have done that in every instance from the time the institution was founded ninety years ago to the present day.

I venture to say that had it not been for the members of this institution in the City of Montreal, my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) would not have been elected. They did not do that, Mr. Speaker, in any hope of reward, they knew they had nothing to expect from the Minister of Justice, but he stood for the things in which they believed. And I submit to this House, Mr. Speaker, that there is nothing finer in a citizen than that he shall stand for convictions that he honestly holds. If he does that he is a man to be admired; if he does not, he is not a good citizen.

My hon. friends opposite may think that the Orange order is a Conservative organization.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOCKEN: Well, what about their supporting the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier; what about their defeating Sir Rodman Roblin in Manitoba if the order is a Conservative organization? Orangemen went solidly against Sir Rodman Roblin, and he admitted from the windows of his newspaper office, the night of his defeat that his overthrow was brought about by the desertion of his old-time Orange friends. I state that, Mr. Speaker, to emphasize the fact that these men stand for their convictions as good citizens ought to.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, if I so desired and make some reference to another organization—the Knights of Columbus—an organization of just the same kind as the Orange Order.

Mr. BUREAU: Why don't they fuse?

Mr. HOCKEN: They are both patriotic and religious; their only difference is in their religious faith. I have here the Congressional Record, and I find in it the oath taken by the Knights of Columbus of the third degree. I have the right, I presume, Mr. Speaker, to put this upon Hansard, but I am not going to do so.

An hon. MEMBER: How fickle.

Mr. HOCKEN: I will tell you why. My friends in the Knights of Columbus deny the accuracy of this oath. I am not able to prove that it is correct, and as it is not my practice to use anything here or elsewhere unless I can substantiate it, I am going to try to convince my hon. friends that I desire to be fair with them and with all they represent.

Mr. Speaker, the Orange Order is a bulwark of the constitution—a powerful force for orderly government and evenhanded justice. The late Mr. Justice McMahon, himself a member of the same religious faith as my friends opposite, had an opportunity during the course of a trial presided over by him to have all the ritual and obligations of the order put before him, and he gave it as his unbiased opinion that any institution founded upon the principles therein stated was one that ought to be supported, and one that must be a benefit to the community.

In closing, Sir, I just want to say that if the Roman Catholic church will cease to be a political institution—will surrender its claims to temporal power and confine its activities to spiritual things, there will be no need for the Orange Order. But until that time comes the order will exist and will grow in strength and power, because we do not believe in the union of temporal power with spiritual domination, and as long as the Vatican maintains that it has the right to rule the world, and in the final analysis to be the sole judge, it must get resistance from Protestants and from members of the Orange Order.

There are just one or two reasons why the Order should continue to exist, Mr. Speaker, but I will only give you one reason. It is because there are such men in public life as the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy).

Mr. CANNON: And yourself.

Mr. HOCKEN: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Russell, while Secretary of State, filled the Printing Bureau with so many men of his own faith that they were bulging out of the windows. At the time that the investigation was made into the conditions prevailing at the Bureau, there were on the staff four hundred more men than were needed for the carrying on of the service rendered by that Department. As long as we have men in public places who will favour one class as against other classes, we must expect resentment and resistence.

The member for Russell has done more than any one in Ottawa to build up this institution in which he does not believe. He made some reference to the Sentinel. Well, the Sentinel speaks for itself. It appears regularly every week: it is increasing in influence and in circulation. One of its subscribers and readers, and one who, I hope; profited by it a good deal, was the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It is read in almost every episcopal palace in Canada, and in view of the fact that it has such readers there would appear to be sufficient ground for my hope that before long I shall have as subscribers the member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) and all my hon. friends from the Province of Quebec.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I will not occupy much of the time of the House—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: —but I can assure my hon. cheering friends that I will take the necessary time. I shall not repeat the arguments that were put forward by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the others who spoke in support of the amendment to the motion for an Address in reply to the speech from the Throne.

Before making my argument, which will be an historical argument in favour of the early dissolution of Parliament, I wish to join the other members who have offered their felicitations to the mover (Mr. Cronyn) and to the seconder (Mr. McGregor) of the Address. But at the same time, Mr. Speaker, I must again this year protest against the seconder of the Address being an English-speaking rather than a French-speaking gentleman. As to the other speeches made by hon. members on your right, may I be permitted to mention just a few typical remarks?

The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) made a very frank and honest remark—the most honest, I believe, he ever made in this House—when he said that the reason why he did not go back to the Liberal fold when the war was over was because there was no coal in the bin and the larder was empty. That remark was quite superfluous; we knew all along that his reason for not coming back to the Liberal party was a "stomachal" one.

A somewhat similar typical remark, I observed, came from the member for Yukon (Mr. A. Thompson), who stated emphatically that he did not want an election. Sir, some people have an uncouth way of making their sores and their fears conspicuous.

The other two typical remarks to which I wish to direct attention were made by the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Meighen), and may be found on page 161 of Unrevised Hansard. The member for Marquette (Hon. Mr. Crerar) had stated that he would give the votes to aliens and make them fight. The Minister of the Interior made reference to this assertion, and the member for Marquette said, page 161:

> It was the judgment of the military authorities of the United States. They enrolled these men and the casualty lists, when they came back to the United States, contained many foreign names.

The Minister of the Interior replied in this way:

> I am informed on authority of the highest character that the military men of the United States did not allow them in the front line. But, I would prefer to take my example, even in matters of the late war, from the British Empire, rather than from the United States.

Very good; but not a week, a day, or an hour afterwards, but something like two minutes afterwards, the Minister of the Interior took his example, not from the British Empire, but from the United States. On the same page he is reported as follows:

> The principle that the hon. gentleman attacks, right or wrong, has been more the subject of debate and has been more thoroughly reviewed on this continent than any other principle ever presented to a free people for one hundred and twenty-five years. Its first sponsor on the American continent was the father of the American Republic, George Washington. Was he the friend and ally of special privilege and the enemy of the common people? The second statute that he placed on the statute books of the United States, after it became a nation, was a statute embodying in very pronounced form the principle that the hon. gentleman impugns. Its next prominent sponsor (indeed very, very few opposed it), was the founder of the other great political party in the country, Thomas Jefferson. Coming nearer to our own time, the man who laid the foundations of the present tariff policy of the United States in general form was the man who emancipated the slaves in the United States, Abraham Lincoln. Abraham Lincoln was an adherent throughout his life to the principle that the hon. gentleman attacks. Was he either the servant or the ally of special privilege? Was he the enemy of the common people of his country? Can such an allegation be levelled at Theodore Roosevelt, whose principles were just the same?

Well, Sir, is this in accordance with the minister's previous assertion that he would prefer to take his example from the British Empire? Not quite; but the reason is very clear to me. In the one case it suited his argument to cite England as an example; in the other case to cite England as an example would have destroyed his argument. So that the minister displayed his ultra-loyalism when it would be effective, but hid it very carefully away when it might have been harmful to his argument, showing the suppleness of which he is a past master.

The hon. minister also referred to his "successful" trip to New Brunswick and to the "successful" part he took in the Victoria and Carleton election. I will not chide him on the success of his trip, but I cannot let the incident pass without bringing to the attention of the House the fact that the candidate whom he, with the Postmaster General, Hon. Mr. Blondin, and the Minister of Labour, Hon. Mr. Robertson, supported, was the notorious Colonel Melville, who organized wholesale perjury during the last election at St. Johns barracks, and who tampered with the franchise in an effort to defeat the will of the electors of Chambly and Verchères. I have nothing to add, Sir, but simply to cite the French dicton: "Dis-moi qui tu hantes, je te dirai qui tu es."

I wish also to reply briefly to the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken):

I am informed that at the first sitting of this House in the month of March, 1918, when the hon. member did not protest in the House against the nomination of the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin) as Deputy Speaker, he was censured by his lodge. It is evidently for fear of being chastised again that he has tried vainly for half an hour to-night to answer the grave and irrefutable charges brought forward by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy). His answers are in the same spirit as the articles written in the Orange Sentinel.

My hon. friend read a letter purporting to be from a French Canadian, an anonymous letter, published evidently in his paper to enlarge its circulation, as all letters published in that paper are. I should not say that all the letters are anonymous, because I find a letter signed very courageously by a gentleman who does not give his proper name, but signs himself "a Royal Purple Marksman." My hon. friend stated also that he never raised any race cry in this House and claimed that he was a most tolerant man. He reminds me of the ancient dragon with two heads, one blowing cold and the other blowing hot. He very seldom raises a race cry in this House, that is true but he edits a race cry in his rag. I take the edition of the 11th of March, the last number, on the front page of which there are twelve articles, every one of which, with one exception, is a race cry. The first article is entitled, "Our Point of View" and it is an attack on the French people of Ontario in regard to the school question. The second article is entitled: "Rome, the Bible and the Public School." The third article is entitled, "Possibilities in the New Plan for Ireland," an attack on the Catholics of Ireland. The fourth article is entitled, "The Pope and the Turk"; other articles are entitled respectively, "A Clerical Grafter", "The Vatican Mission", "Irish Land Purchase", and "Evading the Facts",—the last being an attack upon Toronto Saturday Night for defending the Irish Catholics of Ireland. I fail to understand why my hon. friend states that he is very moderate, and that he is not taking his full share in spreading racial prejudice in this country.

My hon. friend also stated that he had a great fear of the immigration of the French-Canadians into Ontario. He did not state the ground for his fear; he will not state it, but he knows it. The reason is one that was given to-night by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), namely, that the increase of our population is by nature and not by artificial processes. The fear of my hon. friend is that the love that the French-Canadians have for cradles and children might interfere with the love that my hon. friend's brothers have for kennels and Pomeranians. My hon. friend also stated, in order to show that his brothers are broad-minded, that the Orangemen elected the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty)—and I am sorry that the Minister of Justice has left his seat—in St. Anne's. I will give the House an example of the love the hon. member for Toronto West (Mr. Hocken) has for the Minister of Justice. This is a letter published in the Orange Sentinel of January 29, page 3:

The House Leadership.

Sir,

I am sorry to read that C. J. Doherty will be House leader during the coming session. That news would be more in its place under a heading like this: "Just one more slap in the face for Protestants". Is there no other man in the Union party capable of taking Borden's place? I lost my two nearest neighbours by supporting Union Government when they went into power. I would do it again under the same circumstances, but under no condition could I support that party now. Who is running the country, Borden, Doherty, or the Pope? Could we expect much less from either of the latter two? Why does Borden still bend under pressure from Quebec after the rest of Canada told him at the last election that he could run Canada without the French? What did he do under conscription any more than drain the protestant farms of the last of its manhood? I do not think he will be proud of the fact or results at the next election. Remember—

And this is probably the reason why the hon. member does not want an election.

Remember, I am not sore over having to part with a son, as I did not have any, and was physically unfit myself.

This Orange brother evidently made a tremendous sacrifice for his country. To continue:

But I sympathize with those that had sons. All this while the French looked on or hid in the timber. Why were they pardoned? Was it to cheer up the boys who fought, bled and in many instances died for them? I can't agree with you in having any further use for R. L. Borden. Give us a Leader who can stand alone, not one that looks for a prop from the French. Surely there are such men among Protestants who could fill Borden's place. Kindly enlighten me if I am on the wrong track, although all I have ever done to merit the granting of this favour, is paid my subscription (none too prompt at times) and read the paper regularly and found much information of great importance and help. Keep up the good work according to your views. Raise the price if necessary, for I am sure no person could reasonably complain, even if we can't always see the same as you. Though not an Orangeman I fully agree with the principles.

David J. Jones.

The hon. member is responsible for everything published in his newspaper, responsible, perhaps, to Jones too, but he did not answer this letter. Let me now come to the amendment.

One reason why I rose to-night in support of the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) was to give the House an historical argument regarding the early dissolution of Parliament. History is a subject which is very useful to men who study political questions. My second reason is that, being a descendant of one of the first settlers of Montreal, I am very fond and proud of Canada, and I deplore the fact that some people in this country are under the impression that the history of Canada started in 1867. Some even think it started only when the Western provinces came into Confederation. I never felt so miserable as one day last year when an hon. member asked me, "Who was that man Cartier whose centenary they are celebrating in Montreal?" The period which I wish to bring to the attention of the House is from the year 1841 to 1847, covering the passing of the Act of Union of 1840 and the elections following the passing of that Act.

For a thorough understanding of the underlying currents existing before 1841 it is necessary to describe briefly the turmoil into which Canada was plunged from 1760 to 1840 by the autocratic rule, not of England, but of its governors and their entourage. In Upper Canada the autocratic creed was represented by the Family Compact, composed of men who kept for themselves all the high and remunerative positions, as well as the wealth of the country in the granting of lands and who were bitter opponents of the reformers who were preaching and figthing for responsible government. Those who wanted to protest were ostracized. Robert Gourlay was arrested in 1818 for preparing a petition to the Mother Country, and, although acquitted, and although a thorough Scotchman, he was deported by the Government of that time. William Lyon Mackenzie because he had stated that "the powers claimed by the Tory executive were nearly as arbitrary as the iron rule of the Czar of Muscovy," was charged with a breach of the privileges of the House and expelled from Parliament. Five times he was re-elected by the electors of York, and five times he was forcibly prevented from taking his seat, the autocrats of that time ruling that "they could not prevent the electors from electing whom they please." Evidently they were not aware of the refinements of the War-time Elections Act, "but that they could by a mere resolution pass judgment on the eligibility of the persons elected to sit and vote." Colborne and Sir Francis Bond Head, enslaved by the elements who mistrusted the people, refused to apply the principles of responsible government, and the dissatisfaction of the masses came to a head in 1837 with the result that we all know. It brought the Rebellion, which was crushed with unnecessary severity.

In Lower Canada the same elements were playing the same havoc with the liberties of the people. Here a population of 65,000 people were left without their leaders who, after the cession of 1760, and especially after the Treaty of Paris on February 10, 1763, went back to France, and the people were left at the mercy of greedy speculators and profiteers who were granted the lands, and who dominated and ground down the people with the complicity of the governors. In 1774, the Quebec Act, which was framed by England to redress some of the grievances of the Canadians, was jeopardized in its effects by the rapacity of the same element. The Act of 1791, framed by Pitt, created a Legislative Council and, for the first time, an elective House. But that was again nullified by the despotism of Craig and his Tory favourites who controlled the Council, and a bitter fight ensued. The war of 1812 with the United States stopped politics for a while and again, as in 1775, the French Canadians fought the Americans and saved the colony for the British Crown. The victory of de Salaberry at Chateauguay was the most conspicuous fait d'armes of the whole war. But Toryism was only sleeping, and reforms necessary to the existence of responsible government, such as no taxation without representation, the independence of the judges, the control of subsidies, the exclusion of public employees from both Houses, the reform of the Legislative Council, the responsibility of the government members to the Legislative Council, were all refused. At last, the famous Ninty-two Resolutions were formulated, embodying all these revendications, but were unfortunately rejected and, as in Upper Canada, the only logical sequence followed, the rebellion of 1837-38, with all its immediate unfortunate results. I said "immediate" unfortunate results purposely because, although one might judge severely the actual occasion of the uprising both in Upper and Lower Canada and condemn some deeds of the patriots, no one will deny now that responsible government and the political liberties we have enjoyed since 1848 are due in great part, if not altogether, to the patriotism and courage of William Lyon Mackenzie and Louis Joseph Papineau. Be that as it may, these simultaneous upheavals opened the eyes of Great Britain, and Lord Durham was sent to Canada with full powers to investigate and report respecting a form of government for the provinces. His report contained a detailed statement of the causes of the rebellion, recommended the introduction of responsible government and the union of Canada under a single government. He stated in that report that the two provinces were to be consolidated with the definite purpose of submerging the French Canadian nationality and this was so true that in the enlightened province of Ontario to which my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Hocken) has referred, there is a school book on the history of Canada which is read probably by every pupil in the schools. It is written by W. L. Grant and at page 208 I find the following:

> What remedies did Durham propose for the evils which we have described?
> 1. Extinction of the French nationality.—The first was that the French Canadian language and customs must be extinguished by being ringed round with a circle of English speaking majorities.
>
> 2. The two provinces must be united in order to swamp the French.

In the report of Lord Durham itself there is the following:

> I recommend that the alteration of the character of the province ought to be immediately entered upon, and firmly, though cautiously followed up; that, in every plan which may be adopted for the future management of Lower Canada, the first object ought to be that of making it an English province; and that, with this end in view, the ascendency would never again be placed in any hands but those of an English population as means of anglicizing French Canada. I advocate the gradual substiution of the English for the French language. I have little doubt that the Frenchmen, when once placed by the legitimate course of events and the working of natural causes in a minority, would abandon their vain hopes of nationality.

The French Canadians took advantage of that doubt. The same school which in 1840 wanted to deprive a large part of the French Canadian population of their constitutional rights still exists as we can see from speeches, such as that which was made by the hon. gentleman who preceded me, in the year of our Lord 1920. Let me remind these gentlemen that like the soul of France, the soul of French Canada is immortal and like all just causes the stronger the attacks upon her the stronger will remain her surviving vitality. Lord Durham failed to realize, as my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) fails to realize, the permanence and virtue of our nationalism. He returned to England and Poulett Thomson, who later became Lord Sydenham, replaced him as governor. He was entrusted with the duty of having the Act of Union ratified by the Canadians. It had passed the British Parliament but to become law it had to be ratified. He at once convened the local council in Lower Canada with which Lord Durham had replaced the Assembly. It was not elected but although not representative it insisted upon three sine qua non conditions before entering the Union. The first condition was adequate and proportionate representation for the two provinces; the second condition was that united Canada was to assume, not the whole debt of the two Canadas, but only that part of the debt of Upper Canada which had been incurred for works which had been beneficial to both provinces, and the third condition was that both languages would be official. Lord Sydenham then went to Upper Canada and the Government of this province only consented to the Act of Union on the condition of equal but not proportionate representation, that the whole debt of the two Canadas would be assumed by the United Canada and that the French language would be abolished. This arrangement was absolutely against the conditions laid down by Lower Canada. The French Canadians, assisted by the broadminded English speaking citizens of Lower Canada, at the time protested and an address containing 40,000 names was sent to the Imperial authorities. But Lord Sydenham sent a false report to England stating that the two provinces had ratified the Union. Although the Act of Union was opposed in the House of Lords by Lord Melbourne, the Duke of Wellington and Lord Ellenborough, as well as by Lord Brougham, the Count of Hardwicke and Lord Gosford, it was finally voted. It is very interesting to read what these most eminent and fair English statesmen said on the subject. Lord Ellenborough said:

> It is the most fraudulous and unjust measure ever presented to Parliament; the Act will not attain the ends in view of its promoters because, what is its real practical object? It is not to give liberal institutions to Lower Canadians, but to disfranchise the French population. You are placing the great mass of people of Lower Canada under the absolute domination of Upper Canadians, and a small minority of Lower Canada. You are punishing by disfranchisement a whole population for the fault of a small portion of that population accomplished two years ago. If you wish to deprive the French Canadians of a representative Government, it would be far better to do it frankly and openly than to try to establish a permanent system of Government on a basis that the whole world will qualify as an electoral fraud.

Lord Gosford, Ex-Governor of Canada, said this:

> I cannot fail to entertain the view that the Act of Union is one most unjust and tyrannical, depriving the Lower Province of its Constitution, and delivering it into the hands of those, who without any cause, have shown so much hatred towards her; because this Act will drown the Lower Province. You are giving to 300,000 or 400,000 souls the same representation as Lower Canada with 700,000 souls. Then you are imposing the debt of over 5 millions of the Upper Province on a province that practically has no debt. I must declare again that the origin of this Act is a financial intrigue. I maintain that the great majority of both Canadas is opposed to this Act. I cannot consent to an Act based on injustice.

But, Sir, these protestations were of no avail. As mentioned in Lord Gosford's speech, financial interests in London—I nearly said the financial ring of Toronto—wanted the Act passed. The six millions debt of Upper Canada was owed to Baring and Company bankers of London, and one of the associates of this banking house was the Finance Minister of the Government. (He had the Royal National Trust.) The Act was sanctioned on the 23rd of July, 1840. It established a Legislative Council of 20 and a Legislative Assembly of 84—42—for each province. Parliament was elected for four years. The English language was the only official language. It changed the division of the counties, fixing new electoral divisions, and gave the executive only, the initiative of money grants. This Act, Sir, I repeat again was most unjust to Lower Canada. The equal representation was unjust, part of the French population was disfranchised by new electoral divisions giving two-thirds of the representation to the English population because populous French counties were united, while English counties, less populated, kept their limits, and a member was allowed to small cities of few thousands. As an example of inequality of representation let me cite some figures. The city of Kingston with a population of 6,292 had one member, and the county of Huntingdon in the Province of Quebec with a population of 36,204 had one member. The town of Cornwall with a population of 1,407 had one member, and the county of Dorchester with a population of 34,817 had only one member. The town of Niagara with 2,287, the town of London with 2,078, and town of Ottawa with 3,000 had one member; and the counties of Dorchester, Two Mountains and Beauharnois with respectively 34,817, 26,835 and 28,746 had one representative. As you can see, Sir, five towns with a population of 15,064 had the same number of representatives as five counties with a population of 153,461.

Two other clauses, unjust to both provinces, were the one giving the Executive only, the initiative in money votes, and the one imposing a Civil List of £75,000 without the control of Government. On the 5th February, Lord Sydenham proclaimed the Union Act and called the hon. W. H. Draper, of Upper Canada, the Chief of the Tories of the time, to organize a Union Government. They tried to bribe Sir Louis H. Lafontaine the Liberal leader, to join the Government, but he refused stating that he did not understand responsible Government as they did, and that he could not endorse the policy of Union which had not been approved by the people of Canada. The Cabinet was finally formed and it included five members from Upper Canada—Draper, Sullivan, J. H. Dunn, Harrison and Baldwin, who resigned as soon as he saw where he was; and three from Lower Canada, Ogden, Daly and Day.

The writs were issued on the 19th of February, Lafontaine, Morin and Neilson in Lower Canada, and Baldwin, Price and Hincks in Upper Canada joined hands and organized against a Union Government.

The speech of Lafontaine is a remarkable piece of oratory. His opposition to the Act of Union is condensed in the following words:

> Another question of no less importance is the Act of Union of the two Provinces. It is an act of injustice and despotism because it was imposed on us without our consent; because it deprives Lower Canada of her legitimate representation, because is deprives us of the use of our language in the Legislative proceedings, notwithstanding the Treaties and the word of the Governor, because it forces us to pay without our consent a debt which we have not contracted, because it allows the executive to take possession illegally, under the name of the Civil List, without the vote of the representatives of the people, of an enormous part of the revenues of the country.

Lafontaine exchanged views with Baldwin and Hincks and they united their efforts. The Government would have been overwhelmingly defeated if it had not resorted with the aid of the Governor to the most unconstitutional and shameful practices. The Governor had introduced in the Union Act a clause which allowed him to change the limits of the cities fixed by the old laws. He and Draper made use of this clause for the disfranchisement of the electors in many ridings. By a proclamation the greater part of the population in Montreal and Quebec were deprived of their votes. Here is their excuse. Writing to Lord Russell in March 1841, Sydenham said:

> There were attached to the cities both of Montreal and Quebec, very extensive suburbs inhabited generally by a poor population unconnected with the mercantile interests to which these cities owed their importance. Had these suburbs been left within the electoral limits, the number of their population would have enabled them to return one, if not both, of the Members of each city. I was compelled in fixing the limits of Quebec and Montreal, to transfer to the county a large portion of the suburbs of each.

Professor Morrison of Queens University referring to this action of the Governor says:

> The actual result of his action was to secure for his party four seats in the very heart of the enemy's country and the French Canadians, naturally embittered, resented the Governor's action, which had practically disfranchised many French votes.

In the county ridings, the Governor, in order to favour Government candidates, fixed the polls at the extreme limits, far from the centres. In the county of Terrebonne, for instance, the polling station was fixed at New Glasgow, which was in the wilds at that time, it taking two days to make the trip from Montreal; and when Lafontaine and some of his electors arrived at the poll they were received by a mob armed with pistols and sticks, and paid by the Government of the time to win the election.

Mr. BUREAU: A regular war-time election!

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Then the Government added to this, most shameless corruption and patronage, and resorted to violence not only in Terrebonne but in other counties, and serious riots occurred in Upper Canada as well as in Lower Canada. Amongst the nineteen Unionists elected in Lower Canada, six were elected through violence in the counties of Beauharnois, Vaudreuil, Rouville, Montreal county, Chambly and Terrebonne; three through the disfranchisement of the suburbs, and seven were public employees. Robert Baldwin, who had been elected for York and Hastings, gave one of his seats to Lafontaine, a courtesy significant of the broadmindedness of the great Reformer, which was returned in 1843, when Baldwin was defeated in Hastings but was offered and accepted the seat of Rimouski in the province of Quebec.

Sir, I shall not try to describe to you the administration of the Tory regime which remained in power until 1848, with the exception of the short recess in 1843, but it was the most autocratic regime that ever ruled in Canada until the advent of the Union Government in 1917. The Government of that day was always on the verge of collapse, but kept its supporters in line by promises of positions. Enormous sums of money were voted for the public works of Upper Canada, while practically nothing was voted for those of Lower Canada. The same favouritism displayed itself in the distribution of Government jobs—a minister by the name of Viger, defeated in two counties, nevertheless retaining his portfolio. The Prime Minister tried to bribe prominent Liberals, such as Caron, by offering them seats in the Cabinet. The servile majority of the Government presented a seat to a gentleman by the name of Robinson, although illegally elected according to a report of a Committee of the House. Orders in Council replaced Parliamentary legislation—in a word, it was the clear rule of those who had not the confidence of, and who had no confidence in, the people.

Then the reaction which inflexibly follows the spirit of autocracy brought forth came to a head, sweeping and complete. Lord Elgin realizing that the Government was not representative, after the resignation of Sir Henry Draper on account of ill-health, and a year of misrule by Sherwood and Daly, dissolved the House and issued the writs, and on the 5th December, 1847, an election was held, with the result that Baldwin and Lafontaine came to power and gave to Canada an Administration which was called by all historians the Great Administration of Canada. Lafontaine and Baldwin, the Liberal of Lower Canada and the Reformer of Upper Canada, the true conquerors and defenders of responsible Government, had a clear vision that in order to make this country great and prosperous the paramount essentials were a thorough understanding, mutual concessions, equality of privileges, a fair compromise and a substantial unity between the two races.

I said at the beginning of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, that history always repeats itself. The elections of 1917 and the administration of public affairs since then is a repetition of the elections of 1841 and the regime that followed until Lord Elgin dissolved the House. Allow me to sum up. The Act of Union of 1840 and the Military Service Act of 1917 were both engendered by the Tory spirit and directed against French-Canadians in order to win the elections by stirring up the English-speaking population against their fellow-citizens. Both Acts were adopted without consulting the people, both Acts were pressed, one by the financial interests of London, the other by the financial ring of Toronto, so well described by my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration. In both cases a Union Government was formed.

Sir Henry Draper tried to induce the liberal chieftain, Sir L. H. Lafontaine to join them, Sir Robert Borden tried to induce Sir Wilfrid Laurier to enter his Cabinet, but both refused for the same reason—their respect for the liberty of the people.

Realizing that their policy is unpopular and that they will be defeated at the polls, the Government of 1917, like the Administration of 1841, determined first of all to win the elections, have no scruples in tampering with the franchise and resorting to shameless patronage and corruption and using the race cry to the limit. In 1841 it was the fixation of the polls at the extreme limits of the counties like in Terrebonne, the skilful and deliberate disfranchisement of the suburbs of the big cities, the unjust gerrymander of the counties, and violence and intimidation. In 1917 there was also some fixing of the polls and a scarcity of ballots, as in Edmonton, for instance, a skilful and more modern placing of votes by codified telegrams and otherwise, the disfranchisement of thousands of electors by the War-time Elections Act, a complete loss of memory when the oath of residence was required, the bribing of conscience by bribes as valuable as lieutenant-governorships, and a few expensive advertisements in the newspapers.

Later on the Draper Administration allowed Viger, who had been defeated in two counties, to keep his portfolio; the present Administration has been equally generous to the Postmaster General. A gentleman by the name of Robinson illegally received a seat from the Draper Government after his election had been declared illegal by a Committee of the House; an analogous privilege is granted in 1918 to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Thompson). The Government of that period has only one son of Erin in his Cabinet; his name is Dominick Daly, and Professor Morrison calls him the perpetual secretary, faithful among the faithless and faithful because of his lack of political feeling, combined with the need of a salary; for fear of being discourteous or unparliamentary I will not express my opinion about the position of a Minister of the Crown who draws an emolument on account of his physical debility and feebleness.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am sure that the hon. gentleman would not knowingly state an untruth. In so far as he states that a Minister of the Crown is drawing an emolument on account of his debility and feebleness, he is stating that which is not true. I do not say that he knew it was not true, but he should know it now.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: According to the rules of the House I have to accept my hon. friend's statement, but everybody knows that there is a Minister of the Crown who draws a pension as an ex-judge of the Province of Quebec. I may be mistaken, but if I am well informed a pension is given only to a servant of the public who is not in a position to retain his office on account of illness, debility or feebleness.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman will permit me? If he will read the statute he will see that a judge who has served fifteen years is as matter of right entitled to his pension, without regard to his state of health. I may add for the hon. gentleman's information that his late leader the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who was Prime Minister when the pension he speaks of was granted, fully and openly and frankly admitted that to be the fact.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: However; the Draper Government is the most anti-democratic and nefarious Government of that period. It has not the confidence of the people; it completely ignores Lower Canada so far as public works and positions are concerned, but keeps its partisans in line by promises and fear.

Are the terms "nefarious" and "anti-democratic" strong enough for the present Government, which also is not representative of the people; which ignores the rights of the Province of Quebec in the matter of public works and positions, as is clearly shown by the appointment of James Murdock to the Board of Commerce, Hon. Lorne Webster to the Senate, Sir William Hearst to the International Waterways Commission, and which holds its partisans in line by promises, as the warm refuge of the Railway Commission can easily prove?

Finally Draper resigns on account of ill-health. There is a fight for his succession. Sherwood and Daly succeed in winning, but their existence is short. Lord Elgin, realizing that the Government has no longer the confidence of the people, dissolves the House; Lafontaine and Baldwin, representing Liberal principles in their broadest sense, assume the reigns of Government.

With the persistent rumour that the Prime Minister will have to resign on account of ill-health comes also the rumour of a merry battle for his succession. Who will be the modern Daly and Sherwood? Will it be the best-dressed gentleman of the House, the âme damnée of the financial ring of Toronto? Will it be the ever smiling and debutant Minister of Finance? Will it be the mysterious and silent ex-Liberal who enjoys a trip to Quebec or to New York once in a while? Will it be the High Executioner from the West, the hon. gentleman with telegraphic proclivities? Or last, will it be the unctuous sin-hound of Canada, the nursing sister of the League of Nations? I could not tell you, Mr. Speaker; I am not in the lap of the Gods. Will the amendment carry? Or, if it does not, as a similar amendment did not carry in 1847, will His Excellency the Governor General, following the footsteps of his predecessor, dissolve the House? I do not know. But I do know that the period of Government based on the mistrust of the people is due for a solid tumble; that the hour is pregnant with the reaction that inflexibly follows such periods, and that an opportunity will soon arise for the people of Canada to put again into practice the democratic and harmonious principles inspired by our departed leader, whose living spirit is still the undimmed guiding star of Canadian ideals.

Mr. JOHN A. MAHARG (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I am not so sure that what I have to say will be altogether as entertaining or will stir up quite as much discussion as some of the speeches to which we have listened this afternoon. But it may stir up the minds of some of those who are responsible for the fiscal policy of our country—I assure you that it will not stir up any racial or religious animosity.

I did not intend to take any part in this debate, but in view of remarks made by one or two of the ministers and also by one or two of the members on the other side, I decided that I would make a brief contribution to the discussion.

The Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Meighen), during the course of his address, saw fit at least to attempt to cast a discredit on the new movement which has been named for the time being by the member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) the "National Progressive Party." The Minister endeavoured to the best of his ability to show that this was purely a class movement. He gave no attention whatever to the platform laid down by those who are responsible for the movement, claiming that the fact that it was inspired by the agriculturists proved, regardless of everything else, that it was a class movement. I was reminded of the words of one of our coloured porters addressed to a passenger who was insistent upon standing upon the platform of the railway coach.

He informed this gentleman that that platform was placed there to get in on and not to stand on. That is obviously the reason why the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) did not dwell at any length nor place much significance on our platform, as apparently platforms in the past have been used to get in on and not to stand on after the election was over. I can quite understand the minister's attitude and pardon him for entirely ignoring our platform.

I should like to direct the attention of the House to some of the remarks of the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). The fact that the appearance of the ex-minister in this House has been somewhat spasmodic since he retired from a position in the Government seems rather strange to me, and possibly it may strike other hon. members similarly. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) had stirred things up somewhat, and evidently an S.O.S. call was sent out and the ex-minister appeared on the scene very promptly. During his remarks he also endeavoured to make this appear as a class movement. In this respect, I am afraid he was not very successful, as some of his ideas advanced later on in regard to the future formation of parties somewhat lessened the force of his argument that the new movement was a class movement. I may touch on that matter a little later on. Possibly the most significant thing was the thought that was aroused in the minds of some as to just who was speaking while the ex-minister was addressing the House. You speak of class legislation, Sir, but I make the assertion that class representation was never more clearly placed before the House than by the ex-Minister of Finance yesterday.

Mr. GLASS: Explain.

Mr. MAHARG: Who spoke through the ex-Minister of Finance? Who spoke through the same gentleman in the year 1911, although he was not then a minister of the Crown? And what were the results? My answer to those questions is that the big interests of Canada spoke in this House at the time the ex-Minister of Finance was speaking. I am delighted that the hon. gentleman saw fit to come all this distance and give us one of his periodical visits and also give us a little bit of advertising. We have no objections to that whatever. The more advertising we get, the better we like it; we have nothing whatever to hide, and the more they advertise us, the better satisfied we shall be.

What was the result after the 1911 election? I said that the Big Interests spoke at that time. In what condition did we find the country during the year 1913 and the early part of 1914? I do not wish to dwell on that as the subject is not a pleasant one; but we all have a very vivid recollection of conditions in the country at that time. And what would the result have been had not war broken out and made a change in conditions, a change that the fiscal policy of Canada could not make and, if continued, will not make in the future? The war is over now, and I hope we are not going back into the same old rut, although it is quite evident from the speech of the ex-Minister of Finance that that is where he intends we shall go. The hon. gentleman said some very significant things, things that at least give us food for thought; and if I might judge from the expression on the faces of some hon. gentlemen very close to the Government on the other side, they were not entirely enamoured of some of his statements. I wonder if any particular S.O.S. call was sent out from this House. I wonder if those generally supposed to be on the lookout for things that will benefit the particular party that they support were very anxious for the speech of the hon. gentleman. I venture to assert that it was not the astute politician refered to by way of telegrams a few minutes ago by the last speaker, nor the more astute politician who now occupies the position of Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) who sent out the S.O.S. call. Possibly they may have, but I am very doubtful. The hon. gentleman (Sir Thomas White) came, however; he delivered his message, and we are grateful to him for doing so.

The more light that is thrown on the new movement the better we like it; and my request to them is that they will oil up the dynamoes at once, keep them well oiled, increase their voltage to the very limit of possibility, and then turn on the searchlight. Turn it on if you will in such a way that the labourer may get a view of what is in our platform. Turn it on also that the labourer's wife, when she goes to make her purchases, may see what is contained in our platform. Turn it on in such a way, if I might just mention one or two articles, that she may be able to discover what is taking place, that she may see that the apples that she purchases for her kiddies are taxed very heavily, and that the grape fruit, a more expensive luxury which does not very often visit her table, is on the free list. Turn the searchlight on the silks that enter our country and let her see the duty that is paid on them, and at the same time turn it on to the cotton goods so much required by the average person in Canada, so that she may see that the duty on that is almost double the duty on silk. You might go a little further and turn it on the boot and shoe business, also the hides which are the raw material which go into the manufacture of these boots and shoes. Let the facts appear in contrast with the statement made by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Peter McGibbon) who quoted from Hansard of the first session of 1919, stating that the duty paid on boots and shoes was just about equal to the duty paid on the raw material. If hides are not the raw material that goes into the manufacture of boots and shoes, I am under a great misapprehension as to what our boots and shoes are made of.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): Might I correct the hon. member? What I referred to was the leather that was brought in, not the hide?

Mr. MAHARG: Raw material is what the hon. member referred to, and if the House wished, I could easily quote Hansard to show that the words used were "raw material". The raw material for boots and shoes, if I am any judge, is hides. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) might also have pointed out that there was about $45,000,000 or $50,000,000 worth of Canadian boots and shoes sold in this country in each year. He took very good care to point out that there was less than $1,000,000 worth of duty collected on boots and shoes entering Canada and that about $3,000 of duty was collected on the boots and shoes that the farmer and the labourer wore, meaning the cheaper class of boots and shoes. He described them as those with pegged soles, but I notice that the words "pegged soles" are not mentioned in Hansard, although the hon. gentleman used that expression. I should like the farmers and labourers in the electoral district of Muskoka to ask the hon. member when he next appears before them, if he ever should, if he does not think they might be permitted to wear a little better class of boot than those with pegged soles. I have worn this kind and I know what they are like; the pegs come through the soles continuously, and I did not wear them any longer than I had to, and I hope I shall never wear them again. The hon. member for Muskoka also took a fling at the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and criticised him for making what he considered inaccurate statements to the House. He objected to what the hon. member for Marquette said with regard to the amount of duty collected on articles of consumption, and proceeded to enumerate certain articles other than articles of consumption and gave the duty collected on them. In his enumeration he included fruit, both green and dried, and nuts. I can only say that either his knowledge as to what articles of consumption consists of is very faulty, or else he is trying to place the hon. member for Marquette in a false position. He even went a little further in giving these figures and mentioned animal and vegetable products such as furs, feathers, etc. Now that word "et-cetera" may cover a great deal, and if it does in proportion to the number of articles which I regard as articles of consumption, but which evidently the member for Muskoka does not, then I think his criticism of the hon. member for Marquette was very much uncalled for.

The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) evidently had some particular object in coming here. This is the second visit he has paid us at intervals since his retirement from the Cabinet. Since he resigned from the Government he appears to have gone into seclusion, at all events from political life. However, he breaks that seclusion to a certain extent and the Great War Veterans were the first, if I may use the expression, to smoke him out of his lair. Things were getting pretty warm here last session. A committee had been appointed to inquire into the possibility of giving further aid towards the re-establishment of the returned men. That committee had several different organizations before them, one of which was the Great War Veterans Association, who submitted a plan to the committee which evidently members of the Government thought it would be just a little difficult to get over, and called for playing their very best cards.

2 a.m. Consequently the ex-Minister of Finance was called before the committee and the remarquable thing about his visit was not his appearance, but what he told the committee, at that time and what he told the House yesterday. The inference to be drawn from his evidence before the committee was this: That the financial condition of the country was so critical that it would me impossible to raise further sums than those already provided for the re-establishment of the soldier. Now what did he say yesterday when addressing this House? Here are his exact words—unrevised Hansard, Page 201. He is referring to a statement made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark):

> My hon. friend says: Your currency is inflated. It is less inflated than the currency of any country in the world; less inflated than that of the United States now.

Again on page 202 he says:

> No country in the world—including Great Britain that my hon. friend so properly holds up as an example—where the Victory Loan securities stood at par, or above, at the end of the war except Canada—not one. In the United States, 90-92.

He might have gone a little further and told this House what interest the United States are paying on the bonds they sold. He might have told us that the rate of interest of a bond bears some relation to its selling price, and that the highest rate of interest the United States bonds bear, if I am properly informed, is 4¼ per cent, and the majority of their issues bore a less interest rate than that.

On page 202 of unrevised Hansard the ex-Minister of Finance has something further to say with regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Red Deer.

> Unless my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) had taken the steps which he recently took, Great Britain would sell back to us or would offer in our markets the securities of our municipalities,—of our provinces, the securities guaranteed by the Dominion and by the provinces that we sold to her years ago and which have been years overseas—she would have sold and continued to sell those here until our exchange dropped to the level of sterling exchange; that is what would have happened.

In one page our Dominion securities are such and such, and on the next page they are entirely different, and we are told that if a further flotation of bonds had been made they would at least have gone down to the level of sterling. A little further down we have the hon. gentleman's answer to the criticism of my hon. friend from Red Deer of the floating of loans to such a large extent in New York. The ex-Minister of Finance refers to Great Britain's action in regard to the floating of loans in New York as a reason why it was good business for Canada to seek the New York market. He does not say why Great Britain floated these loans. He did not tell this House that Great Britain had lent to her Allies an amount far in excess of the total amount of her borrowings on the New York market. He might have told us that there was something else that Great Britain did while she was borrowing on the New York market. He might have told the House that Great Britain was also raising a large percentage of the money required for her war expenditure by direct taxation. If he had compared what was being raised by direct taxation under his adminstration with what was being done by the British Government he would have found that the amount that we were raising was as nothing compared with what Great Britain was doing in this respect. If there is one thing that we do dislike in this House it is a failure to state the whole of the facts. At page 200 the hon. gentleman deals with the question of direct taxation in regard to excess profits and there he says:

> Supposing we had appealed to the farmers to produce all they could for the armies overseas and the civilian population behind them, supposing we had asked the manufacturers to produce all they could and had asked the munition manufacturers to turn out all the munitions they could and, at the same time, suppose we had told them that we were going to take away all their profits? They are a pretty patriotic lot of men. I ask this House—you are all sensible business men— would you have got the same production in the country and in the factory that you did get? You would not.

That would have been all right, but he goes a little further and says:

> Further than that if you took away all the money that the producing classes had made, or the greater part of it, what position would those classes be in should there come the depression which always follows war?

What does he mean by the greater part of their profits? It means that you would at least have to take 51 per cent of their profits, or over 50 per cent. What position would they have been in if a greater portion of their profits had been taken? I will answer that by saying that if he had taken all their profits their position would at least have been as good as was that of the great proportion of the returned men when they came back. If he had taken the greater portion of their profits their position would have been much better than that of the great majority of returned men. I do not think his argument is very sound. He said something about slander. He made the statement that the two parties had been slandered by the charge that they had betrayed the farmer. The word "slander" is not a very nice one to use, and I doubt whether I would have used it if the ex-Minister of Finance had not introduced it. But I say that the statement of the ex-Minister of Finance is a slander upon the patriotic people of Canada who remained behind while the boys went overseas to do the fighting. Was it the expected profits that caused the boys to go overseas and do their bit? I think not. They could not expect to realize very great profits out of $1.10 a day. I do not think that was the incentive that took them overseas. But if we are to accept the words of the ex-Minister of Finance the incentive for those of us who remained at home was that we should be permitted to make nice, handsome profits, that we might produce. It seems to be an absurd argument to be used by a member of this House, and it is an insult to the people of Canada who remained at home and in a patriotic way did all they could to help to win the war. The inference can only be that our patriotism was largely of the lips and not of the heart; otherwise, we should have been prepared to carry on without the hope of making large profits. I would like to say a word or two about what the policy of the ex-Minister has done for Canada. One of the things was to build up tremendous fortunes to be loaned to the Government at nice, comfortable rates of interest. We have evidence of that everywhere throughout the country. We do not need to go far afield to find it.

The ex-Minister of Finance went further and possibly the most significant statement that he made was that the protective principle in our tariff must remain. His words were something to this effect: Do not think for a moment that the people of Ontario are going to be satisfied with a tariff for revenue only. The system of protection has to remain. That is a very brief statement, but there is very much implied when you read between the lines. His statement during the first session of 1919 was that we must have a tariff to raise revenue.

Now, Sir, something has intervened and it is said we must have the tariff for protection—in fact the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) made the statement last night that it was a tax for the protection of industry. It seems rather strange, Mr. Speaker, that we should be compelled to pay a tax in order that our industries may flourish.

In conclusion, there is just one more statement the hon. gentleman (Sir Thomas White) made which is of considerable significance at this particular time, viz., that a new Liberal-Conservative party should be formed. What does that name imply? Can you have such a thing as a Liberal-Conservative party? I doubt it very much. If my interpretation of what Liberals claim to be the meaning of Liberalism is correct, it seems to me that such a thing would be absolutely impossible and that the name would only be used for the purposes of deception. I cannot understand how you can have a Liberal-Conservative party, and I would like to ask the ex-Minister of Finance in what way the Liberal-Conservative party—if you can have such a thing—would differ from the party that we have been pleased to name the new and National Progressive party. The new Liberal-Conservative party can only be composed of former Liberals and Conservatives; it cannot be the old Conservative party and it cannot be the Liberal party, consequently it must be a third party. Yet the ex-Minister of Finance told us yesterday in the early part of his speech that third parties could not survive; although towards the conclusion of his remarks he proposed what in substance—if it could be brought into existence—means nothing more or less than an additional party.

I would repeat that I am delighted that the ex-Minister of Finance saw fit to come here and direct so much attention to those of us who occupy the cross-benches. It suits us very well, and the harder our opponents hit us the better pleased we shall be. Let me close with this statement: The harder you are thrown the higher you will bounce. Don't think of the blackened eye, nor yet of the fact that you got licked, but how did you fight, and why.

The House divided on the proposed amendment of Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, which was negatived on the following division:

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT (CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.)

Mr. JOHN W. EDWARDS (Frontenac) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 11 to amend the Criminal Code (Capital Punishment).

Mr. CASGRAIN: Explain.

Mr. EDWARDS: In one sentence, Mr. Speaker, the object and purpose of the Bill is that in all cases where persons convicted of murder have been sentenced by the Courts to be hanged, such persons, instead of being conveyed from the court room to the gaol of the county in which the crime was committed, shall be conveyed to the penitentiary of the district or province, to remain there in confinement until the date for their execution, which execution will take place within the walls of the penitentiary.

Mr. BUREAU: What improvement on the present system will my hon. friend accomplish by getting the execution carried out in the penitentiary?

Mr. EDWARDS: I think it will be a very great improvement on the present system.

Hon. Mr. FIELDING: Does the hon. gentleman propose to adopt electrocution, or is the present method of execution to be adhered to.

Mr. EDWARDS: The Bill itself does not propose to make any change in the method of carrying out the death sentence, but I may say very frankly that my purpose in introducing the Bill was to make possible a change along that line.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

NAVAL POLICY.

*Hon. Mr. MURPHY (Russell):

1. Has the attention of the Government been directed to a despatch from the special correspondent in Canada of the London Daily Telegraph, which was published by that paper on December 22, 1919, and reprinted by the Empire Parliamentary Association, and in which the following paragraph occurs:—

"So far as relations with the Empire are concerned, the most important matter that will be considered at the beginning of the next session will be the submission to Parliament of the Naval Policy of the Government, as a result of the advice which is being tendered by Lord Jellicoe. The Government have already determined that the ships they are to build shall be the last word in efficient naval construction."

2. Is it true, as stated in the despatch that "the Government have already determined" to build ships as part of their naval policy?

3. If so, when was such determination reached, and when will the details be given to Parliament?

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE:

*Hon. Mr. MURPHY (Russell)

1. Referring to the Government's announcement that Canada's net debt on January 31, 1920, was slightly over $1,900,000,000, and that the increase of $62,000,000 shown in the said debt for the month of January last was the result of "Closing up and adjusting Overseas Accounts."

Was such increase $62,000,000 due to the payment of claims made by the British Government for extra remuneration on account of maintenance of the Canadian Corps in the field during the later period of the war, and to the payment of certain other claims made by the said Government for the cost of the artillery ammunition used by the said Canadian Corps."

2. What are the particulars of the said increase of $62,000,000 in the said debt?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1 and 2. The total increase of debt for the month of January, 1920, was $62,015,109.67 made up, as follows,—

Surplus Consolidated Fund		164,624.51
Other Expenditure—

		$62,179,734.18
*Less Surplus Consolidated Fund		164,624.51
Increase of Debt during January		$62,015,109.67

£9,000,000 or $43,800,000, being adjustment of balance due the Imperial Government for the period March 2, 1917, to October, 1918, for Canada's share big gun ammunition. Amount arrived at by calculation of total number of rounds fired in each period and the proportion chargeable to Canada is based on total number and calibre of Canadian guns in France during that period and this amount was then divided by the number of "Man Days" charged in the bill for maintenance. The account was audited on London personally by the Auditor General for Canada assisted by Col. L. A. Dowie and D. M. McClelland, C.A.

(b) France. Under agreement dated May 15, 1919, the Dominion Government agreed to make advances up to $25,000,000 for purchase in Canada of Canadian products during the period ended December 31, 1919. The total advances including contracts entered into and still unpaid amount to $5,519,047.60.

Sterling treasury bills have been deposited to the order of the Minister of Finance in London which are to be exchanged for dollar treasury bills as soon as the above mentioned amount has been paid in full. The bills will carry interest at 5½ per cent and are to be repayable December 31, 1924. The first payment of interest has been fixed for June 30, 1920.

(c) Greece. Under agreement dated March 31, 1919, the Dominion Government agreed to make advances up to $25,000,000 for purchase in Canada of Canadian products during the period ended December 31, 1919.

[Mr. Lavigueur.]

The total advances including contracts entered into and still unpaid amount to $8,119,347.86.

The Greek Government are to deposit debentures of the Kingdom of Greece payable in dollars and maturing five years from the respective dates.

These bills will carry interest at 5½ per cent payable June 30 and December 31 in each year. So far two debentures have been deposited, No. 1 for $565,157.92, dated September 30, 1919, and No. 2 for $763,948.81, dated October 31, 1919. The first interest under the agreement amounting to $7,834.79 was due December 31, 1919, and has been collected by the Canadian Mission in London. The next payment of interest covering interest on debenture No. 2 and subsequent debentures for the balance of the advances will be due June 30, 1920.

(d) Belgium. Under agreement dated March 31, 1919, the Dominion Government agreed to make advances up to $25,000,000 for purchase in Canada of Canadian products during the period ended December 31, 1919. The total advances including contracts entered into and still unpaid amount to $1,735,634.58. The Belgian Government are to deliver debentures payable five years after date in dollars for the total amount of the advances, which bills are to carry interest at 5½ per cent, to be paid when the bills mature. There is a further proviso that the Belgian Government has a right to pay these bills at any time after receipt by them of compensation from the enemy powers. The necessary debentures have been deposited in London to the order of the Minister of Finance.

(e) Roumania. Under agreement dated April 18, 1919, the Dominion Government agreed to make advances up to $25,000,000 for purchase in Canada of Canadian products during the period ended December 31, 1919. The total advances including contracts entered into and still unpaid amount to $22,542,223.76. The Roumanian minister in London deposited in the Bank of Montreal, London, to the order of the Minister of Finance, a bond for $25,000,000. A statement of the advances made including interest from the date of the advance to the end of the month is sent forward and the Bank of Montreal endorses on the bond the total amount of such account. As soon as all payments have been completed the Roumanian Ministry will furnish five year dollar debentures dated from the date of each statement referred to above, and carrying interest at 5½ per cent, payable June 30 and December 31. It is expected that payments will be completed and the bond exchanged for the necessary dollar debentures before June 30, and if so, the first interest period will be as of that date.

HIGH COST OF NECESSARIES—FUEL, ETC.

Mr. JOHN H. BURNHAM (Peterborough West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, whereas the rise in the price of necessaries is leaving many of the people of Canada in a desperate condition, and whereas the fuel question has become an acute one in many parts of the country, it is desirable that the Government select a time for a full discussion of these matters to the end that the people may be protected and served and peace and order be continued.

He said: Mr. Speaker, those of the members who are accustomed to go to church—and I have no doubt that some of them—

Mr. BUREAU: Why doubt?

Mr. BURNHAM: —will realize that it is necessary on the part of the speaker to speak to his text, and on the part of the congregation to give him some attention.

Mr. BUREAU: That all depends on the speaker.

Mr. BURNHAM: While I am getting ready to descant on food and other necessaries which form the subject matter of this resolution, I will give hon. members something to think of on the fuel side of the question which was very well comprised in a letter which I received to-day from a large structural steel company in Toronto, namely Messrs. McGregor and McIntyre, Limited, Mr. McIntyre being the writer of the letter, in which he says:

Dear Sir,—I have read with much interest your notice of motion in connection with the rise in price of necessaries, particularly in connection with the fuel question. May I, therefore, bring to your attention the action of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association in authorizing the appointment of a special committee, of whch the writer is a member? This committee is to investigate the possibilty of using Canadian coal for the whole of Canada.

There are several phases of this fuel situation which I am sure need not be brought to your attention. However, you will recall the experience Canada had during the middle and latter period of the war, but more especially would I draw your attention to the serious coal miners' strike in the United States last year, which at one time promised to create a more serious situation for Canada than during any part of the war period. The conditions were so grave that even the United States Government did not appear to be fully in control of the situation. The special feature in this strike was that Canada had nothing whatever to say in adjusting the strike one way or the other, but particularly was Ontario solely dependent upon that part of the United States affected by the strike for our supply of coal.

You will also have noticed on several occasions in the newspapers that a suggested threat was made since that time to retaliate provided Canada would not supply the United States to their satisfaction with pulp and paper. I will not go further into the whole situation other than to quote an extract from the "Industrial News Survey," published by the National Industrial Conference Board, 15 Beacon street, Boston, Mass., for week ending March 1, 1920:

"Wages and Hourse of Labour.—Anthracite miners' convention has voted to demand 60 per cent wage increase for contract miners and $2 a day increase, six-hour day and five-day week, for day-workers; about 170,000 men are affected; present agreement dates from May, 1916, and expires March 31, 1920; supplemental agreements have adjusted wages to war conditions; operators are to meet March 9 to discuss a new agreement."

This will at once bring very forcibly before the Canadian people the further seriousness of depending upon the United States for supply of coal. I will now try to outline in short what our committee hopes to accomplish:

As you, no doubt, are well aware of the enormous coal resources in Western Canada, particularly in the province of Alberta, where it is stated that twelve per cent of the supply of the known coal of the world is in that province, and also that every kind of coal necessary for the fuel supply of our country is to be had, from any kind of domestic to any kind of steam coal, including the very finest coking coal in the world. Also Nova Scotia has a supply; of this area I am not at all familiar.

I suppose he means, "With this area I am not at all familiar."

The solution of our fuel situation would appear to the writer to be a matter of transportation, and the Government now owns two transcontinental railways.

I will enclose a copy of a resolution passed by the Edmonton Board of Trade at a special meeting held to deal with the coal situation. As a result of their co-operation with our committee in Toronto, this resolution will give you an outline of what I think is most practicable.

[Mr. Burnham.]

May I, in closing, offer you the co-operation of our committee in any scheme that will assist in this section of your motion, also may I ask in return your co-operation with us in our scheme. Thanking you in advance,

Yours very truly,

R. L. McIntyre.

The resolution referred to in the letter is as follows:

Report of Coal Section of Edmonton Board of Trade or Chamber of Commerce on the matter of Coal Production in Alberta for use in the Province of Ontario.

Inasmuch as the Canadian Manufacturers' Association from their head office in Toronto and Montreal are considering the advisability of seeking coal supply from Western Canada, and have appointed a committee to investigate the resources, development and qualities of coal in Western Canada; and the cost of transporting coal to the Province of Ontario giving as some of their reasons and objects, the following:—

1. Whereas Ontario is not possessed of any coal deposits, and is therefore dependent upon a supply of its fuel coming from a foreign country over which the Ontario consumers and the Government of Canada have no control; and,

Whereas the industrial life of Ontario is largely dependent upon the good will of the American people for its supply of coal; and,

Whereas there is always the possibility of the United States being so situated that its whole supply of coal might be required to insure its own protection; and

2. Whereas the Government railways in Canada, particularly the Canadian National, and the Grand Trunk Pacific which apparently the Government contemplates operating, are nearly faced with heavy deficits which arise through lack of sufficient traffic to assure a profitable conduct of their business; and

3. Whereas the Province of Alberta is possessed of unlimited quantities of all varieties of coal suitable for Ontario's needs; and,

4. Whereas Alberta is a large market for Ontario manufacturers, and that this market will best be maintained and consolidated through the correct methods of commerce being applied, namely, by selling to Ontario as well as buying from them; and

5. Whereas Canada is largely indebted to the United States through the development of our own resources and industries, with the result that the time seems to be approaching when we will only be able to purchase from the United States for cash.

Therefore, it is in the best interest of Canada that the Dominion Government, and the Government of the Province of Alberta should co-operate to help bring about the desired condition of making Canada independent of any foreign country in its fuel supply, and thus retain for the development of Canada the means of exchange which comes about through using our own coal, and thus stimulating every branch of industry through the good results which would follow, which may be summed up in a variety of ways:

First: Relieving Canada of a large portion of the annual deficit of the railways.

Second: The building up of an industry in the province of Alberta which would be a large consumer of Canadian made goods, and

Lastly: By having the foresight to assure a supply of fuel for all of Canada, so that industries of Ontario would not at any time be in danger of competition, or otherwise, of having their factories closed through inability to obtain coal.

They suggest that the freight rates from any mine in Alberta to any point in Ontario should be equalized with the freight rate prevailing from the mines in the States to the point of consumption in Ontario. For example, if the freight rate from any mine in Pennsylvania to any point in Ontario is $5.40 per ton, then the same freight rate should apply from any point in Alberta; in addition that the freight rate from Alberta might also bear the duties and exchange charge, which would go to help out the railways. In other words, the freight rate from Alberta to Ontario to be on an equality with all charges assessed against the American coal, and

Inasmuch as according to estimates carefully made and generally accepted, Alberta contains approximately one twelfth of the world's known supply; and that according to figures submitted by the Mines Branch of the Alberta Provincial Government, the mines of this province are now developed to produce approximately ten million tons of coal per year in the following tonnages: Anthracite, one hundred and fifty thousand tons; bituminous, four million tons; domestic coal, five million tons, and

Inasmuch as the development could and would be rapidly increased to meet enormous additional needs to almost any extent whatever in any or all of the three grades of coal available, and

Inasmuch as the operating of coal mines in Alberta up to and including the present time is hazardous and usually unprofitable as evidenced by the fact that approximately sixty coal mining companies cease to operate during each year on account of insufficient market, and, because the increase in market would enable the coal mine operators in Western Canada to make enormous increase in their development, insuring labour a more nearly constant employment, and at the same time reducing the cost of mining in this province, as well as stabilizing the industry generally. All of which would bring an enormous amount of money into Western Canada.

And for many other good and sufficient reasons too numerous to enumerate at this time be it therefore resolved that this Edmonton Board of Trade or Chamber of Commerce goes on record favouring a most thorough inquiry into the cost of transportation of coal in railway cars to Ontario, as well as by lake and rail; and pledging ourselves to assist the Canadian Manufacturers' Association in every way possible to secure necessary information to lay before our Federal Government on this matter with a view to enlarging the markets for Canadian coal in Canada, as well as benefiting Canada as a whole; and also be it resolved that this board through its organization pledges itself to endeavour to secure the co-operation of the Provincial Government in this endeavour, and that the president appoint a strong committee to present a copy of this resolution to the Premier of the province, and ask his assistance along all necessary lines in order that a definite conclusion may be arrived at; and every effort be put forth to secure the Ontario market for Alberta coal.

Respectfully submitted,
(Signed) C. G. SHELDON,
Chairman Coal Section.

Edmonton, Alta., Feb. 14, 1920.

I think, Mr. Speaker, I am safe in saying that the foregoing is an excellent presentation of the whole situation in Canada, and of the possibilities in the future provided the railway situation can be accommodated to the requirements outlined in that report. It has been a source of grave anxiety to the Canadian people, but especially to the people of Ontario, that at any time they may find themselves in the appalling position of having no coal. They have very little wood (their alcoholic energy is as yet quite limited)—altogether insufficient for the supply of heat, and as a consequence, unless the coal situation is solved, we may encounter the severest difficulties at any moment. This would not only be a serious matter for the people from the domestic standpoint, but might result in the demoralization of our railway transportation, and Ontario might probably cease to be a fit place to live in, to say nothing of its continuing to be a manufacturing centre. This condition of affairs, Mr. Speaker, is by no means exaggerated. All those public bodies that have taken the matter into consideration—and I assure you Sir, that they are numerous—have come to the same conclusion; and private individuals who are interested in the questions of this kind are aware that what is here set out is perfectly correct. They realize that Ontario is in danger of a coal famine, and all the horrors incident to a fuel famine, and this is a disaster that may be imminent. It is therefore of prime necessity that we should consider this question in all its bearings now. Heretofore people simply threw up their hands, and impotently asked: "What are we going to do?"

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is offered by the Alberta people a very fair solution of the question with regard to coal, and I purpose also to introduce the matter of industrial alcohol, which, as I ventured to intimate the other day, has undoubtedly appealed to the eastern world, at any rate, as a source of all forms of energy including heat of course. Lest the people generally, who are so concerned in Ontario about alcohol, should step in the way and oppose any legislation having to do with that product, I wrote to the Prime Minister of the province at Toronto and asked him if we might consider the question of alcohol for Ontario. I live in Ontario and represent a constituency there; and whilst, of course, I am deeply concerned in the welfare of Canada and, for that matter, the world at large, still I am more particularly interested about the welfare of Ontario. The Prime Minister,

Hon. Mr. Drury, in a letter dated February 24, wrote:

> I am in receipt of your letter of the 21st instant, in which you ask whether the manufacture of alcohol for mechanical purposes is to be permitted in Ontario in the future. I am not aware that this is a matter on which the provincial legislature has any control or jurisdiction. So far as my advice goes, the matter is entirely within the purview of the Parliament of Canada.

A very large source of alcohol lies in grain —corn, potatoes, etc.—and the alcohol thus produced is the drinkable liquor, which constitutes by far the greater portion of all alcohol used for industrial purposes. At the present time it is shipped to Ottawa to be denatured: That is to say, it is so poisoned as to be unfit for drinking purposes. In other words, it is methylated. Having been rendered unfit as potable liquor it is despatched to the various users who employ it as they see fit. Heretofore industrial alcohol has been so expensive in the production as to have been practically out of the question. Its universality, of course, at once appeals to the whole industrial world, and industrial chemists everywhere have been bending their energies to find some solution of the difficulty with regard to price. This difficulty decreased with the rise in the price of the rival of alcohol, namely gasoline. It was found possible in the course of time to manufacture industrial alcohol at a price that put it on a par with gasolene; and now, owing to the scarcity of gasolene and its consequent high price, alcohol has come into the market. The price of alcohol has been going down, while the cost of gasolene has been going up. Alcohol will really be the source of energy of the future, and the National Council of Industrial Research has consequently appealed to the Government to effect, if possible, an increase in the natural sources of alcohol, such as corn, potatoes, etc. It is not necessary that these products should be all of the highest quality, but they must be that from which can be secured all the alcohol, and therefore all the energy, we need, without fear of exhaustion. So long as there is seed-time and harvest, so long will there be a source of alcohol and a source of energy which we can utilize. While this may have seemed for a time largely fanciful, it is now well within the realm of practicability. We know this on the authority of our scientific men, who are the only persons that are really capable of expressing an opinion on the subject. And in Canada, which at last has reached that stage of civilization in which the people are able to appreciate that form of organized or systematized knowledge, known as science, we are prepared at least to investigate, and probably to adopt, in very many particulars, the recommendations of scientific men.

They have control of heating; they have control of industry, they have suggested means to us now for increasing our power over nature and our resistance to climatic change as well as our ability to generate domestic heat. These things being so it is only for us to open our mind and receive the information which is now of a certain and undebatable character so that we may make use of it. And let me say, Mr. Speaker, that it does not do for the members of Parliament of Canada at any time to shrug their shoulders and wait for somebody else, or some other body, to take up these questions, because it is from the Parliament of Canada that the people expect all advances in this particular. The people of Canada expect that Parliament will look after their public affairs and rescue them from anarchy, scarcity, deficiency and weakness of every kind. It is therefore our duty to take advantage of the advice of experts and to see to it that we place in an organized way before the people all means of energy for their use, especially such forms of energy as are practically within our reach at the present time.

The struggle for existence is such that it never really changes. It is always a struggle for enough to eat, for sufficient clothing, for a place to live, and for those general requirements with which we are familiar. What is the function of Government? All the authorities, and there are many, clearly indicate that the function of government is to protect the individual—to protect the liberties of the individual from the encroachments of one another, and of the State, and to so guide and order the affairs of the people that they will all co-ordinate and reciprocate to the end that there will not be confusion, strife, discontent or suffering.

The idea that a government should keep the balance between the taxes collected from the people and the amount paid in, and that was all they had to do, is, in a country as large as Canada, entirely erroneous. It might do in some small country, or in some country where they have not reached that stage of ambition which would prompt them to greater effort, intellectually and otherwise. What is it that has made France great? Her chemistry. What is it that made Germany once great? Her chemistry and chemistry only. What is that is making England great? Her chemistry. We see from day to day how she is advancing in that particular; and some of the most interesting articles in English books and English magazines are upon the fact that whilst their chemists and people discovered ways and means greatly to the profit of humanity, they had neither the brains nor the energy to develop them. They were picked up by Germany, and other countries, and made use of; and England, instead of benefiting, suffered in the long run. Great Britain has given that up. She has turned her attention to the use of those things that have been invented and discovered for her advantage. It is unnecessary to point to the United States in that particular. From one end of that country to the other they are throbbing with intelligence; they are throbbing with energy; they are seeking for every known means of bettering what we may call at large the physical condition of the world and their own people.

It behooves us to advance in that way; and I say that you will look in vain on the Order Paper for many years to find much which bears on questions which we are now about to consider. There are people who will say that the high cost of living should be left to take care of itself. Well, we find that such a state of affairs is absolutely impossible, unless we say at the same time that anarchy may run riot in the country, There must be a balance, an equilibrium in the country or you cannot have contentment, you cannot have satisfaction, you cannot have reasonable comfort, you cannot have progress. You will have what you are on the verge of having in this country, an upheaval; and I say that if we have discord, that if we have discontent, if we have disturbances in the country, it is largely the fault of this Parliament in that it has given no great intelligent consideration to the questions which stare it directly in the face.

We are supposed to control transportation; we are supposed to control all the adjuncts of transportation; we suppose ourselves to have reached that advanced stage in which we enable one part of the country to trade with another, working men to reach their work, and labour to secure work. They say there is plenty of labour in the country, plenty of work. Well then surely it must be the fault of the people who are administering the affairs of the country if labour cannot get to work and work is out of reach of labour. This happens in a great many cases because, of course, as we are all aware, it is a matter of serious expense on the part of labour to get to its work. Therefore it is for us to take an intelligent consideration of these matters and to remember above all not to bring forward weekly budgets from a Ministry of Labour that absolutely fail to tally with the week's earnings of the wage earner. It is a matter of the simplest possible logic that when the weekly budget amounts to a sum—mind you of necessaries, and really not all the necessaries but as a matter of fact less than two-thirds of the necessaries —in excess, and considerably in excess, of the weekly earnings of the average wage earner there can be no escape from discontent, anger and disturbance. People are very much inclined, especially those who have reached a certain stage of comfort and luxury, to wave off all these troubles as if they were necessary troubles arising from the struggle for existence, and to take the view, as the free-trader says, that they will settle themselves. Of course they will settle themselves. If a man is in trouble and if he becomes desperate he will settle the question by going out and snatching what he wants from somebody else. The questions will settle themselves, the problems will find solution, but such a solution as no civilized society could endorse or endure. Now when we have reached the very apex of the situation, when the high cost of living is so high that it is beyond all bounds, when it has nothing whatever to do, as at present, with the old time-worn doctrine of supply and demand,—when there may be a great supply and corresponding great demand, or a greater supply and a less demand, or vice versa,—it makes no difference, the cost of living mounts, the struggle for existence becomes more frightful, until at last every man who considers the question at all must ask himself: What will be the result?

The labouring men of this country will in the end solve the question for themselves if we do not solve it. There is a certain class of people not up to what we call the standard mechanic or the regular wage-earner, people who depend upon the precarious supply of unskilled labour—for example, the ordinary digger. If the winter is hard he has little to do, and the harder the winter the less he has to do, but the more it costs him to live. In a country sensibly managed such people should have every means afforded them of earning their livelihood and enjoying reasonable comfort, and not be condemned to a miserable existence because we are too lazy or too selfish or unchristianized and have not brains enough for the proper conduct of the ordinary affairs of life.

Christianity, the great ideal of the people as it was originally preached, is applicable first and foremost to the poor. But who in the wide world has tried to monopolize it, to dictate about it and to patronize it? The rich. God forbid that the rich should try to get into Heaven, for they will find it more difficult of entry than even the Scriptures have said! Their selfishness, their active hostility to the great body of the people, their hostility to any consideration of reason in the treatment of affairs will bring its revenge upon them; Nemesis awaits them, and it will be some satisfaction to see what it does with them ultimately.

In a word, we have a country with boundless resources, we have a people energetic, ambitious, well-intentioned, and desirous of getting on, but with no great power of settling their own affairs. That power rests largely with Capital and with those men who undertake to represent the people in houses of parliament. And if those people to whom I have last referred do not show consideration for the mass of the people, what can there be but discontent and dissatisfaction and an uprising of the people to seize the reins of power, to seize those resources which lie near at hand and which would satisfy all their wants and give them that labour which they are willing to expend in the satisfaction of such wants, but which they cannot afford under present conditions.

We talk of protection, which is a most admirable form when we speak of it as self-control. My hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) shakes his head, but if he is to be a consistent Free Trader his motto must be: Let the Devil take the hindmost. There is absolutely no qualification of Free Trade, no qualification of free competition, no opposition whatever to the importation of Chinese labour, no possibility of regulation. Oh, I have read Adam Smith, Ricardo, John Stuart Mill, and his father James Mill; I know them all word for word. You cannot fool me. Their idea was to take the bonds off industry, to let industry go free. And what happened? Of course, Capital in a short time had complete mastery of the situation, and the people became as nothing. Our friend John Bright was perfectly willing to see men, women and children working fifteen hours a day.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr Speaker, I want to correct my hon. and learned friend, because that is the second time he has repeated that slander against John Bright. John Bright did not object to factory laws protecting children. My hon. friend should not make such a statement; it is not true.

Mr. BURNHAM: In the English House of Commons he voted against the laws for shortening the hours of labour.

Mr. McMASTER: Not the hours of labour for children.

Mr. BURNHAM: I say he did, and it was the greatest possible surprise to the people of England. When the member for Rochdale, as John Bright was, addressed the people of Birmingham, they were very much taken with his plea for lower prices of food. They said they could not understand, however, why he was so opposed to shorter hours of labour and opposed to the relief of children, at least, if not of women, from long working hours. But he himself had shares in the Rochdale factories, and he began to shiver and tremble lest this freedom of trade, carried too far, might interfere with his pocket. His humanity was academic; it was not real.

Protectionists above all things seek to control the affairs of the country, to put them on a reasonable basis, to make them like a reciprocating engine so that they will work harmoniously. Protectionists do not want any one class to control the country. They do not want the farmer to say: "I do not care a brass farthing for the manufacturer or the wage earner, I want to get my goods from the Chinese workmen if they are cheap enough." Much as I esteem the farmer, if he only knows it, that doctrine will mean finally the sale of his own soul.

I am a Protectionist because I have some consideration for the people. It is not the protection of the capitalist or even of the wage-earner that I care about. I am anxious to see our industries so controlled that all men can be made to fit in reasonably together and all people given a fair chance. Let us have fair play. It is idle to pick out instances in which protection has not been up to the mark. We all know that. We all know there are people in churches who pretend to be good, but who ought to be in gaol. We know there are people sheltering themselves under protection and advocating further measures for their own selfish interests.

The whole trouble arises because some of these gentlemen have not at all considered the case broadly and exhaustively. They are so anxious to have all difficulties cast aside, being perfectly willing to sacrifice the people if it will result in success to themselves. That is what Free Trade means, and that is what the people know it will result in if we do not put the brakes on Humanity is of that kind; we are all the same. But public opinion as one great speaker remarked, is a universal brake.

While we individually in our own affairs are only too anxious to do what we can for ourselves, and would even stretch the matter too far, there are others who will not suffer that condition of things. It is, therefore, when the whole mass of the people come together and work together that the desired and proper level is attained. That is what public opinion, which is public thought, means; that is what public effort really means. These two things together are the greatest safeguard that we have so far as human endeavour is concerned.

I think that I have said enough to indicate the great necessity that there is for the consideration of this question at the present time and to indicate that in my humble opinion it is essential to the continuation of order and good government that we reconcile the earning power of the people with the amounts that they have to pay for the necessaries of life. There can be nothing but danger ahead if we do not. I know the people well enough to be able to say that if the logical and reasonable request which they make can from time to time be satisfied in a sensible and absolutely fair way, the people will rest content; they will go about their business; they will be a happy and industrious people. But if we fail to measure up to the standards which we set for ourselves,—that self-contained ways of doing things; in the last analysis, that selfish way of doing things—we can only expect that the people at large will learn their lesson from us, and just as the prohibitionist who uses force may expect in the end to have force used against him, so we may expect that the mass of the people will take these matters in their own hands, and that those who fail to read the signs of the times will wake up some fine morning to find that the times have got ahead of them.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the question which the hon. member (Mr. Burnham) has dealt with so ably is one to which more importance, perhaps, should be attached than we have been in the habit of giving it. The hon. member has dealt with the question of fuel as bearing upon the cost of supplying the needs of the ordinary household. In the country from which I come we have an abundance of splendid fuel. In Ontario and perhaps further West there are thousands of people who have not readily available a plentiful supply of good fuel. The coal which we have in Nova Scotia is soft or bituminous coal. A great many of the people of this country do not want to use this coal; they desire the more luxurious article,—anthracite or hard coal. I suppose that hard coal may be used more conveniently than soft coal, and perhaps it is cleaner and less productive of dust and smoke. Well, I like a comfortable home as well as anybody, and I have been burning bituminous Nova Scotia coal in my house for the last thirty years, with the exception of one or two years when I used a few tons of hard coal. What I regard as good enough for my home would be fairly good, I think, for the average home in this country. Of course, in many cities and larger centres of Canada the houses are not equipped for the burning of soft coal, the furnaces being constructed to burn hard coal. It is worth while considering the advisability of having these furnaces changed and of installing furnaces which will burn soft coal. Thousands of people who have no furnaces depend upon the ordinary stove and the ordinary grate. For people of that class no fuel is more satisfactory than the good coal which we in Nova Scotia are able to produce.

Of course, it is all very well for me to talk about the people of Port Arthur and other places that are far from Nova Scotia using our bituminous coal; the question for the consumer is: Can I, at reasonable cost, get that coal delivered at my residence? The question, therefore, is largely one of transportation. How are we to get the coal from Nova Scotia to these different parts of the country where it is most needed? I have several times spoken in the House upon this question. The member for East Lambton (Mr. J. E. Armstrong) brought the matter up in an indirect way last year or the year before and thus gave us an opportunity of discussing it. Now, the only way of getting the coal of Nova Scotia as far west as Port Arthur, the extreme western limit of our inland navigable waters, is by developing the St. Lawrence route. I suggest to the Government, and particularly to the Minister of Railways and Acting Minister of Public Works (Hon. J. D. Reid) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce that in my judgment nothing calls more urgently for the expenditure of public money than the opening of the St. Lawrence trade route between Port Arthur and the Atlantic seaboard, so that coal may be loaded on a vessel at Sydney, North Sidney, Pictou or Parrsboro and conveyed to Port Arthur, and, of course, intermediate points, by water. The return cargo can be made up of manufactured goods, fruit, meat, or whatever else the people along that route have to supply. The miners and steel workers of Nova Scotia would be delighted to obtain some of that excellent fruit which is produced in Ontario and for which, I understand, the market is not what it ought to be. It may be surprising to some to hear people from Nova Scotia speaking of getting food from anywhere else, as we have beautiful orchards and we raise large quantities of fruit in that province. That is quite so; but instead of the fruit that is raised in the Annapolis valley going to the eastern part of the province, it finds its way to the United States, only very little of it going to the eastern part of Nova Scotia. Therefore, a magnificent market is left open for fruit which could be cheaply carried from parts of Ontario to Cape Breton if we had navigation from the seacoast as I have stated. This is the point which I wish particularly to bring to the attention of the Government, namely, that we have coal in abundance, in almost inexhaustible supply, and of its kind as good as any coal that there is in the world, and the question is one of opening up a way by which we in the East can send our products to the far West as far as navigation is possible, and bring back to our province wheat, flour, meats, fruits and other products which a vessel could bring back after having carried a cargo of coal and steel to points in the West. We produce abundance of steel, and we are only, so to speak, picking up pebbles on the seacoast of what is forthcoming in Nova Scotia as regards the production of iron and steel. Millions of English capital are, I understand, about to be invested in those great industries, and it would be well that we be able to supply the raw material for the manufacture of farm implements and such other articles as require the use of iron and steel in their manufacture. We shall be able to furnish, of our own production within Canada and for our own people, those goods, if we have the proper facility for transportation as I have stated. The difficulty now is that by rail the distances are great, and the freight rates, although possibly reasonable, will, on account of the long distances, make the transportation of those goods prohibitive. My reason, therefore, for taking part in this discussion was to impress on the Government, and particularly on the Minister of Mines (Mr. Meighen), that the subject touched upon by the hon. member (Mr. Burnham) is far-reaching in its effect, and that the motion should not be passed as a perfunctory matter that has no bearing upon the development of this country and of our resources. I am very glad that the hon. member has brought this matter, even in this somewhat indefinite way, before the House. I do not quite agree with him that it is necessary to set any time apart for the discussion of the subject, because that would be almost like asking us to set a time apart to prove that two and two make four. The question is what will the Government do? How can public money be utilized in bringing about the condition which I have outlined and which everybody knows? The Department of Mines should and, I suppose, have information in regard to the available coal in the different provinces. I suppose it will be found in the report of that department how coal may be utilized, whether it is fit for domestic purposes, and the prices at which coal, providing there are proper facilities for bringing it to the points which I have mentioned, may be laid down at those points. Finally, I have in mind the necessity of this country being indepedent of any other country in the world in regard to fuel. We get a large quantity of fuel from across the line now, and we are neighbourly and good friends. But should anything happen by which troubles might arise and an embargo be placed upon fuel coming into Canada, we could be starved out or frozen out in less than ten days if we were entirely dependent upon that country and not equipped for the use of our own coal and not able to bring our own coal to the points where it is required. This is an important question, and this is the place and the time that hon. gentlemen should give such an important question due consideration.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, the opening sentence of the resolution calls attention to the high cost of living and to the consequences thereof; but I observed, I am sorry to say only after the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Burnham) had commenced his address, that the latter half emphasizes in particular the fuel situation in Canada and the need for a time being selected for its discussion in this House. The sources of fuel supply of this Dominion are indeed ample; they are prolific. Fuel, as at present consumed, consists mainly of coal; but coal is only one source of supply; oil is another; wood is another; peat is a fourth, and oil from our oil shale deposits may be said to be a fifth. I have a little knowledge of one subject of fuel supply mentioned by the hon. member for Peterborough West, namely, alcohol. I would not be in a position to discuss how far we might rely upon that for the development of energy, other than human energy.

Mr. McMASTER: Only briefly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The coal of the Dominion lies mainly in the extreme provinces. In the province represented in part by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie), there are, of course, huge deposits of the character of coal he describes. There are also deposits in the other Maritime Provinces; but the great central provinces of Ontario and Quebec are in the main bereft of that supply. In Western Canada, coal is found in Manitoba in considerable abundance, in Saskatchewan in greater abundance, and in Alberta in abundance so very great as to make that province one of the main sources of supply of the world. The province of British Columbia also contributes its quota, and no meagre quota either. It is fortunate that in those provinces and areas of Canada where coal and, in the main, wood are not to be found, and where oil appears only in very limited quantities, we have another source of supply as yet only partially developed, though developed in greater degree than does any other country in the world develop it, namely, water-power. When one says that all those coal deposits lie in the provinces that I have named, that does not get us much further in the way of reaching a solution of what is called the fuel problem of Canada. There are many who loosely think or say that, inasmuch as there lies in Alberta 12 per cent, it is said—I think the percentage is larger—of the reserve coal of the world, we there may immediately rely upon a great bank against which we can issue cheques for the discharge of the national debt of Canada, or even a bank against which we can call for the supply of the fuel needed to heat our homes. There are a lot of graver problems associated with this question than the mere existence of what is described as an inexhaustible source of supply in the bosom of mother earth. If one talks in those terms it would be correct, I suppose, to say that in most sections of farm land in Western Canada there lies the potentiality of a million dollars' worth of value for the good of the people of Canada. The value is there all right. The content of the soil is there, the sunlight and the rains fall upon the lands, and if human brain and human muscle are brought to bear and time does its work, then doubtless the wealth will come. The very same argument applies to our coal. There is in the province of Alberta alone, speaking from memory, 400,000 million tons of coal deposits, chiefly lignite, very largely bituminous, but with some anthracite, which, though not as hard as Pennsylvania anthracite, is claimed to have an oil content and other contents which make it a better fuel. But the fact is undisputed that the invested capital heretofore applied to the coal of that province has returned to the investor something like only one-eighth of one per cent of annual revenue. It has been charged against the policy of Canada dating back for decades that we have given these deposits away to speculators and others, but the fact of the matter is that up to the present hour the Dominion, as a Dominion, has not at all lost its fair share of the wealth of those deposits. It is true some of them have been fee alienated, but even in those cases a return has been secured, and I think a comparison between the position of the country on the one hand and the alienee or purchaser on the other would show that the country came off rather the better. The purchaser for the most part, though there may be exceptions, has secured very little at all on his capital invested, whereas the country has secured at all events the purchase price and the advantage of some development. Dating back I think to 1914, the alienation of natural resources ceased, except by means of leasing. A fee has not been given since that time, and the coal deposits, the same as other resources, have been let on rental terms and subject to royalty, both bringing in revenue to the Dominion, and subject to carefully devised regulations to protect the public interest so far as the best experts at our command could advise us how those interests could be protected. The difficulty is mainly that the market within transportation range of the coal pit is so limited that to turn out the coal on such a scale as would admit of cheap production is very difficult indeed. When we reach the day when that country will have developed and industries have become established there and population increased, the market will grow with the growth of the nation, and the output of coal will reach a scale where it will more easily compete in point of cost of production with coal fields in other lands.

Another factor in the situation is this: Western coal, and particularly Saskatchewan coal, is mainly a lignite deposit, and not of a nature that admits of much ex-posure and transportation. Consequently, efforts have been made by this Government and by the previous Government to devise some scientific means whereby that lignite coal could be put in a form not only to be of use in competition with anthracite coal, but to admit of transportation the same as anthracite, and be made available for the consumers of Western Canada, who are now compelled to use mostly anthracite from Pennsylvania. A board was formed in co-operation with the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and appropriations were made to that board, whose duty it was to engage in scientific research in order to devise carbonizing methods, and study the briquetting that follows the carbonizing, in order, if possible, to put the briquetting of lignite coal on a commercial basis where it might succeed. My information is that the results so far obtained by that joint board are very encouraging indeed. It is even intimated that private capital would be disposed now to attack the problem and possibly to relieve the Dominion of further financial obligations, but I have nothing definite to say in that regard. It is, however, a pleasure to me to intimate to Parliament that the members of that board are encouraged by the results so far attained, and hope to be able to reach results more complete which will make certain the commercial success of the briquetting process.

Mr. NESBITT: Has the minister any idea of the actual cost of transport of a ton of coal from Edmonton to Toronto?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not definite information, but I rather think the actual cost of transport is now not less than the amount charged. I am inclined to think that the coal rates, generally speaking, are placed as low as they can be placed, unless it is to be assumed that coal must be carried at a loss.

Mr. NESBITT: Is it not a fact that the cost of freight and handling alone would be greater than what we have to pay now for bituminous coal on the other side?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it is.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does that take into consideration water transport?

Mr. NESBITT: You have to have water transport for a certain distance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I could not give the details, but I can assure the hon. member that all these subjects have been most carefully inquired into by those who would like to develop these mines and to reach the very market the hon. member has in mind. They are the most anxious people of all. There is no doubt in the world that the Edmonton Board of Trade would be delighted beyond measure if some means could be found that would reduce the cost of transportation, possibly at the expense of the Canadian National railways, to such a figure as would bring about a larger area of consumption for the coal of Alberta. We all would like the same thing, but these things must be put on a common sense business basis, and the efforts of the Mines Department are devoted to the finding of ways and means for putting the business on that basis in order that it may be made a success, on its own merits, and not at the expense of failure of some other national enterprise.

It is a fact that at the present time we import into this Dominion huge quantities of anthracite coal and, indeed, of bituminous coal as well. Our importations altogether from the United States last year amounted to $740,000,000. Of that sum, about $200,000,000 worth consisted of one article which I do not think it is necessary that I should mention at this moment; but $61,000,000 represented importations of coal.

Mr. BELAND: Seventy millions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Sixty-one million dollars. Those are the figures given me by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. BELAND: I saw it given as $70,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is possible that the hon. gentleman saw the figures for another year terminating in another month. The figures given to me for the year 1919 by the department aggregate $61,000,000. However, if it were $70,000,000 my argument would be all the stronger. That is a stupendous sum, to save which it is worth making considerable sacrifice. It is noteworthy as well that while our consumption of coal has kept on increasing during the last few years, our consumption of imported coal has advanced far more rapidly than the consumption of domestic coal. I speak now from memory and am therefore subject to correction, but I think that in five years we have advanced in production of domestic coal from thirteen to fourteen million odd tons, while in the very same time there has been an advance in the use of imported coal from twenty-six to thirty-four million tons—a far greater advance in the consumption of imported coal than of domestic coal.

Mr. PARENT: In view of the figures cited by the minister, I should like to know if Canada would be in a position to supply its own market in the event of the United States Government prohibiting the exportation of coal from that country into Cnaada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would be the last to admit that any action on the part of the United States would put us entirely off the map of the North American continent. We would have to meet the emergency, which I think is unlikely though not impossible; and in this connection I commend the prudence of the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) in his assertion that we should guard against all such emergencies to the utmost of our power. The doctrine is a sound one and every Canadian should subscribe to it. But if the emergency suggested by the hon. member (Mr. Parent) did occur, while there would be hardship and suffering which would undoubtedly put us to our wits end and tax all our resources, we have the coal. Indeed, we have more than the coal; we have wood; and though it would cost a great deal, I do not think the time would be long before we should be able to meet even a disaster so great as the one in consideration. The question of transportation is of course relevant, and it is just because the coal of this country must be transported over distances so vast, our country being so extensive in proportion to the population, that this nation has gone to such colossal expenditures in the matter of transportation. We are now engaged in the enterprise of deepening the Welland canal to a twenty-five foot capacity. It is hoped that the St. Lawrence route will ultimately be made of the same capacity, and I should not like the word "ultimately" to be interpreted as being synonymous with "eternity." I trust it may be given a reasonable interpretation. It is not a matter of merely finding a method of using Dominion moneys to achieve this result; it is a matter of finding Dominion moneys to use for the purpose. The deepening of the Welland canal had to be deferred during the progress of the war, and just how far we shall be able to go in resuming operations is purely a matter of finance. It is not a question of desire nor one of the wisdom of the undertaking, because so long as the coal and grain and other huge resources of the Dominion must be transported east and west, so long is it clear that water transportation must be provided therefor.

Coming to other sources of fuel, I have briefly stated what is being done in the way of endeavouring to make available our softer coal deposits. I might go further and say that the transportation problem is being thoroughly studied in the department, whose officers are only too anxious that larger appropriations shall be made to enable them to go forward with this work, which is a question of money, too. I gave the figures of the coal deposits of Canada, and I think I referred to Alberta at the time. If so, my figures were wrong. The coal deposits of Canada are estimated at four hundred thousand million tons, and the peat deposits of Canada at nine thousand million tons, or two and a quarter per cent of the coal deposits. The coal deposits of this country would last for centuries for all the people whom the most optimistic of us could contemplate as likely to inhabit this land. The peat deposits would afford very considerable relief, though their development should also be put upon a commercial basis provided some process could be found to make them available. Some progress has been made along that line, but I fear it is not the most encouraging.

As to oil as a source of fuel—and this is a matter which is becoming of more and more importance as the years advance—we are still in a rather unfortunate position. I am not sure that I can give the figures correctly as to this, but I think we imported last year something like four hundred and fifty-one million gallons of oil, as against two hundred and thirty-odd million gallons five years ago—a tremendous advance in the oil importations of the country. Our own oil production during the same period increased from nine to ten million gallons; so that just two per cent of the oil consumed in Canada is produced at home. It is hoped by all that this condition of affairs will not last long. Oil is much more easily transported than coal, and there is every reason to hope, if not to believe, that we may see a very considerable oil discovery in this country. This Government, the previous government, and the government that preceded it —and particularly the last—offered considerable inducements to enable private enterprise to discover oil; and those of us who have given any thought to this question will not hesitate long to decide that private enterprise is the most likely agency to lead to mineral discovery; yea, to mineral development. Bounties have been, and are being paid, in oil production. Some ten years ago the minister of that day, under his powers granted him by Parliament, put through an order whereby it was provided that in all oil leases issued thereafter a clause might be inserted protecting the lessee against royalty on his oil or gas up to 1930. That was done in order to induce to the utmost extent oil and gas prospecting in this country. All these efforts have resulted in, at least, a very great deal of prospecting and, as a consequence, the Dominion Treasury has benefited to a very considerable extent. I think if a comparison was made between the results to the Treasury on the one hand, and the results to the prospector on the other, the Dominion Treasury would be found to be the furthest ahead a long way. We have had a lot of money from oil leases, a great deal of money has come to the Treasury; but taking it all in all, and in the aggregate, not very much has come to the prospector. Believing that there was reason to expect better results in the near future, steps have recently been taken whereby that clause is no longer inserted in oil leases, and the Government will be empowered, as respects all leases issued after the change was made some months ago, to collect such royalty as may be deemed to be fair and reasonable in respect of oil and gas production. Also leases now held are being cancelled much more quickly than in past years, the object being to reduce as far as possible those within the exempted class and to bring them as far as possible within the non-exempted class, to the end that the State may conserve what may be deemed the rights of the whole people of Canada in respect of oil and gas deposits. But let it not be thought that this is a field where the State is likely to intervene as a commercial exploiter, and to succeed better than private enterprise. It seems to me that this field of activity is one where private enterprise will succeed most, and where the results will consequently be best for the State as well as best for the citizens of the State. So much for that.

As regards the source of oil from oil shales, not very great progress has yet been made. We have a number of officers who have given considerable attention to that work, and some investigation has taken place. It is our great desire that investigation be made more thorough and more expeditious. We have great oil shale deposits in New Brunswick, in Nova Scotia and in Alberta; I think, as well, there are some in Prince Edward Island. Of course the extracting of oil from oil shale is a much less agreeable way of getting it than merely watching it come through a pipe out of the earth. It will not likely be found that oil can be produced from oil shales in immediate competition with oil deposits in the bosom of the earth. Nevertheless it is of great value to the Dominion that those oil shales exist; and I think the time has come when we ought to try to spare the money, if we can, to investigate their possibilities. I take second place to none in the desire that the utmost progress be made as to coal, as to gas, as to oil, as to peat, as to every other source of fuel supply, to the end that this Dominion in that regard, as in all others, be to the utmost extent economically independent, and that we be to the least possible degree dependent upon the legislation, or the whim, of any other country. We cannot move too fast to that end, consistent with our financial capacity; and so far as my influence goes I intend to urge that these investigations proceed. I believe, however, that more has been done than is generally known to the people of Canada. Indeed one of the things that come under the notice of public men, and I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite have had the same experience, is this: It is very general to find an eager and honest desire for investigation and an impatience that all these things are not known; but those very men who express such impatience usually know themselves very little as to what actual investigation has gone and is going on. To my own knowledge services are being rendered by public officials, officers of departments and their branches—services rendered assiduously and efficiently and that possibly have been rendered for years. Nevertheless resolutions are received from public bodies, boards of trade and the like, demanding that something be done immediately to institute investigation into the very thing which has long been investigated, and thoroughly investigated, and in respect of which reports have been issued and findings made that the parties complaining have never even taken the trouble to refer to or read. I would commend to hon. gentlemen the desirability of communicating with the department in such matters. We will be only too ready to give the results of the inquiries that have been made by its scientific officers; and invite them further to stand behind any estimate that may be presented—estimates which are necessary and which will permit the officers of the department to achieve greater results more expeditiously, and more thoroughly.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: What objection is there to amend the regulations so as to permit the extraction of the oil from tar sand?

Mr. MEIGHEN: You cannot extract oil by regulation.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: You can get oil from tar sand but there is a restriction in the lease which prevents its extraction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is a point which I would like the hon. gentleman to write me about. I do not know the exact point to which he refers but if his statement is correct there must be some good reason for the regulation.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I endeavoured to get the department to permit the extraction of oil from tar sand but they refused.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must remind hon. gentleman that the House is not in Committee and therefore questions cannot be promiscuously put at this stage.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): I did not intend to take part in this debate and I propose that my entry into it shall be of very short duration. A remark dropped by the minister at the conclusion of his interesting remarks, however, gives me encouragement to bring up a matter which I think is of the utmost importance in connection with this and other allied possibilities. I would imagine that the work of the Dominion Government in connection with matters such as the one before the House this afternoon largely depends upon the success of the operations of the Geological Survey. That is, if the Geological Survey is in good working condition we may expect success, and if it is not in as good operation as it should be that success cannot be looked for. It has come to my attention that six months ago there were—and I speak subject to correction—about twenty-four qualified members of the Geological Survey, men whose reputation in Canada and on the Continent is of the highest, and my information is that a very substantial number—I think some six or eight— have in the last six months resigned from this very valuable service. No doubt the competition of mining and industrial companies to avail themselves of the expert knowledge of these men is responsible in no small degree for their leaving the public service to enter private employment. Nevertheless, according to the information which I have received, there is another reason for their resignation and it is that they have not been given the opportunity to carry out, as they would have desired, scientific investigations and to make known to the public the result of those investigations. These men, many of whom are scientists of the highest repute, have been for years induced to remain in the public service—not for the salary which they can obtain, because that was not commensurate with what they could gain elsewhere, but from the fact that they were doing valuable scientific work which would redound to the material interests of their country and to their own professional reputation.

Now, it has come to my knowledge that these men have not been given an opportunity of completing and making known to the world the results of the investigation which some of them have been conducting for many years. I place the matter before the minister, assuring him that I believe my information to be correct, and I would invite his careful attention to the matter at the earliest possible moment in order that an opportunity may be presented of dealing with the subject.

Mr. BURNHAM: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Before the hon. member addresses the House it is my duty to remind hon. members that he is exercising his right to close the debate. Therefore if any other hon. member wishes to speak he must do so now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The motion calls for a time to be selected for the discussion, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact we have already fulfilled the purpose of the motion and discussed it.

Mr. BURNHAM: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. minister to note that the day remains open. It would, in my opinion, give a very bad impression throughout the country to negative this resolution, because it can be passed, and to show the good-will of the House, without being brought to that severe concrete stage which might in view of the admirable statement given by the hon. minister embarrass him unnecessarily.

The object in discussing this question was, of course, to discover what condition Canada is in at the present moment with regard to fuel and the other necessaries of life. I touched generally upon those necessaries, because I did not think it incumbent upon me to carry about a pound of butter or a basket of eggs in order to impress hon. members with the details of what I meant. However, the subject dealt with by the minister has been exhaustively and satisfactorily handled by him, and therefore we may repose a measure of confidence upon the fact that the Government is doing all that it possibly can, even to spending money in the interests of the people, in that respect.

Time and again people have asked me: What is the Government doing? The people did not know, and hon. members did not know; and, replying to the hon. minister, I may say that the ministry did not take the trouble to inform the House. The books and pamphlets which are issued from time to time in this respect convey a certain amount of information of a geological or mineralogical character, but without discussing economic questions in any satisfactory way. I wish to give to the National Council of Industrial Research the highest possible praise, their intentions are of the best, and they earn far more than the miserable pittance we give them.

I would therefore ask the minister to let this resolution go through in order that the people at large may be impressed with the idea that our minds are not closed to suggestions of progress.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no objection to the motion going through, but I would suggest to the hon. member that the first portion of the resolution might be amended. Having secured discussion of the motion I thought it was the intention of the hon. member to withdraw it, as I see no purpose to be served by not taking that course. It does appear to me that it would not be good judgment on the part of this House to announce to the world that a large portion of the people of this country are in a "desperate condition." While of course we have our poor the same as other countries, I think we have a smaller proportion now, and undoubtedly fewer people are at present depending on charity, than ever before in the history of Canada, and certainly no more than in any other part of the world. Therefore, whatever opinions hon. members may entertain, I do not think it would be wise on the part of this House to propound to the world that our people are in a "desperate condition."

Mr. BURNHAM: I am perfectly willing to accept the hon. minister's suggestion and to let the resolution go through as he amends it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move that the resolution be amended by striking out the first recital:

—whereas the rise in the price of necessaries is leaving many of the people of Canada in a desperate condition.

Amendment agreed to.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

[Mr. Burnham.]

A NATIONAL EIGHT-HOUR WORKING DAY.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (Peterborough) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that to the extent of the jurisdiction of this Parliament a national eight hour working day should be established immediately, subject only to the right of express private contract.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we might as well have a field day on labour questions while we are at it; they do not often adorn the journals of the House. This is a question of establishing what might be called in legal parlance a technical working day. I might illustrate what I mean by saying that if a suit were brought in court to recover wages for so many days, it would be understood that according to law those days would be composed of eight hours each, if not otherwise provided for in writing.

But it is, of course, always necessary that an individual should have the right of compromising, of altering the length of the day, or in some other way qualifying his control of the circumstances under which these contracts are usually given if he wishes. Therefore if a man should say: "I will work to-day fourteen hours or sixteen hours;" that would mean he would get two days' pay, or a proportionate amount of two days' pay. It throws the onus on the employer, instead of leaving it, as at the present time, upon the employee.

This change of onus is a very great advance, Mr. Speaker, and from what I hear I do not think that the employer would object to it at all, and I know that the employee is very desirous of having it brought about.

One of the contentions of the whole labour world is that it is best for labour, best for the human being, for the comfort and happiness of the people, best for industry, best for the quality of the work, that people should, as a rule, work eight hours a day—if necessary they may work longer on occasions, but eight hours should be the length of the working day. Industrial employers, I think, without exception, philanthropists and social reformers, labour itself—all agree that eight hours is the proper length of time for the standard working day.

We have lately assumed control of great railways. We are taking control of vast public works. We have territories in Canada outside the provinces over which the Dominion has exclusive jurisdiction. We have, therefore, all the elements that will enable us to pass a statute reciting that after a certain date the working day shall be understood to be eight hours. That being the case, since the resolution calls for the exercise of our jurisdiction only—and that jurisdiction we have—steps should be taken to enact this legislation. It is advisable from all points of view that the working day should be stabilized and that there should not be what we might call the pulling and hauling that is going on now in different countries and in different parts of the same countries regarding the length of the working day. We may hope that when the western powers have established a reasonable working day, all the eastern powers will have regard to international interests by doing the same thing.

The greatest argument in favour of the adoption of the eight-hour day is the finding of the Peace Conference, if such we may call it, at Paris. At the Conference held in Switzerland and at the Conference lately held in Washington, which the President of the Council (Hon. Mr. Rowell) attended, it was agreed that eight hours was the proper working day. I do not understand, nor have I been able to gather, that we have made it a law in Canada that eight hours shall be considered, except by special provision or express private contract, to be the working day. There was a time, of course, when employers of various kinds took advantage of competition to require their employees to work unconscionable hours. That day has gone by. No employer wants such a thing now; no employer attempts to exact such a length of toil. Labour has become classified, as it were, and is not going about seeking what it may do to be saved and what might be for its benefit without having anybody to legislate for it or look after it. Having ceased, as I say, to be in that position, it now presents a united front, and its attitude is a reasonable one. It asks the employer to agree to a universal eight-hour day, and it asks the lawmakers of this country to crystallize that understanding into a statute. I fancy that it will be done, and we shall then have obtained the support, for the peace and good government of this country, of the great body of organized labour—a most reasonable body; a body which is seeking for the settlement of its affairs on a reasonable and logical basis. When these have been settled we may look for some degree of industrial peace and progress.

In connection with this whole industrial question, no charge of profiteering has been made against labour. Labour, except in a few individual instances, has made no attempt to indulge in profiteering; but the many cases of companies and individual employers who have been profiteers has excited the dismay of labour and the anger of all the consumers that I know. Therefore, when you come to examine the stand taken by labour in this particular and the aspirations of labour, surely you will realize that labour is entitled to every consideration. As I say, all these conferences have agreed that the demand is reasonable and that compliance with it would make for the prosperity, health and good government of the whole world. Surely, therefore, it is time for us in Canada, if we have not already done so, to say: Let eight hours be the understood legal national working day.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to state very briefly the reasons why I consented to second the motion submitted by my hon. friend (Mr. Burnham). I hold in my hand a copy of Hansard of the second session of last year, which contains the statement of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and his report to the House of his activities as our chief representative at the Peace Conference. In that statement I find an account of the tentative agreement entered into with regard to improving the conditions for labour, and also a very clear statement that world-wide peace was largely dependent upon industrial and social peace within the bounds of each country, and that this industrial and social peace could best be brought about by instituting certain reforms which apparently were deemed by all to be necessary.

I shall not weary the House by making any lengthy remarks on the subject; I shall simply read one or two brief paragraphs from the statement officially presented to the House last September. The Prime Minister said:

> Side by side with the Covenant—

That is, the League of Nations.

> —stand the provisions of the Labour Convention. It was my privilege to attend the earlier meetings of the Commission which framed the articles on that subject now embodied in Part XIII of the Treaty. At one of these meetings the preamble of the Labour Convention was framed. It is as follows.

That preamble contains the following paragraph:

> And whereas conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled;

That is a statement in which this House concurred, and in which I believe all the nations represented at the Peace Conference also concurred. It goes on:

An improvement of those conditions is urgently required; as, for example, by the regulation of the hours of work.

Surely we were serious a year ago when we, as a nation, proudly, I think, entered into this great League of Nations, became a party to it, took our place at the forefront of it. Indeed, Sir, our Prime Minister, if I remember rightly, presented to that Conference these very articles arrived at by the Labour Commission or committee. A little further on, it says:

Whereas also the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries.

And a little further on, it says also:

Holding as they do,—

That is, this particular portion of the Peace Conference, the Labour group.

—that labour should not be regarded merely as an article of commerce, they think that there are methods and principles for regulating labour conditions which all industrial communities should endeavour to apply, so far as their special circumstances will permit.

Then follow a series of nine specific articles citing what in their opinion should be the process of working out these improved conditions, and this series contains one article, No. 4, reading as follows:

The adoption of an eight-hours day of a forty-eight-hours week as the standard to be aimed at where it has not already been attained.

Upon this very important statement, presented to this House by the Prime Minister of Canada (Sir Robert Borden), the leader of the Government that I am now supporting, and arrived at at a conference which studied these problems from a world-wide as well as a national standpoint and at great length and in great detail, I propose to this House in support of the motion moved by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Burnham) that Canada should, by action of its Parliament, take the first national step, as I believe it would be, to bring into actual existence by law the intimation or suggestion made in this proposal at the Peace Conference.

I take another reason, and it is this, that it is common, ordinary justice. I believe that industrial peace, or the settlement of industrial disputes, will be arrived at more speedily and will be made more permanent by the introduction of the elements of justice into the consideration of these disputes than in any other way. Compromise is good; but a frank recognition by a nation of the elements of justice, so far as it is possible to ascertain them, will, I say, bring about permanent industrial and social peace within our boundaries more quickly, directly and effectively than in any other way, and I hold that the demand for an eight-hour day is a just and fair demand on the part of labour. I do not wish this House to infer that I stand behind the extreme demands of labour as they are made in some of their presentations; but there are some of their demands which have the elements of justice pre-eminently present, and I think we should hasten to accede to these.

Another point is this, that already a very large proportion of the great industries of Canada recognize and practise the eight-hour day as a standard day. Therefore, it would be infinitely better, in the interest of a stable industrial condition in Canada, that there should be a national standardized eight-hour day, so that in different parts of the country, manufacturing interests, for instance, would know that in estimating the cost of their products they would have to take into account a standard eight-hour day. Why, for instance, should a factory in British Columbia recognize an eight-hour day, having been forced to that perhaps by the organized strength of labour, and a factory in Quebec, or in the Maritime provinces, or in Ontario manufacturing the same article, recognize a nine or a ten-hour day? The immediate consequence of such a condition is that one manufacturer is undoubtedly handicapped to a greater or lesser degree. In any case it does not provide for those who are considering investment in industrial concerns any idea of the stability of the hours of labour and of what is commonly called the conditions of the labour market. Therefore, I say it would be fairer to all if we had a standardized day of labour for the whole of Canada rather than to have in one province an eight-hour day and in another a ten-hour day, and in another a nine-hour day, and so on.

In conclusion, let me say this, that the industrial condition of Canada is not by any means in a hopeless state. I look over the world to-day and I read with the utmost attention and interest the reports we are receiving from all quarters, and weighing these with the greatest care and discrimination, I feel that I am not boasting when I say that Canada is in a better condition than any other country as regards industrial and social conditions within its own boundaries. That being the case, I contend that it is strong evidence that we have made no mistake in treating labour with a generous hand, as we undoubtedly have done in Canada in comparison with other countries, and it warrants us in taking this forward step and establishing a standard eight-hour day in Canada. I shall, therefore, support the motion moved by the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham).

Mr. EDMOND PROULX (Prescott): Mr. Speaker, I am not in sympathy with my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens), because there is a danger of having too much governmental regulation. This question, I believe, can be left to employees and employers to settle. Labour unions are now very powerful; they can dictate their terms to their employers, and in certain industries if an eight-hour day is sufficiently long, I think they can manage to get their requests acceded to by their employers. In certain industries ten hours would not be harder than eight hours a day in others. Most of the industries which run night and day and which require three shifts, have adopted the eight-hour day; but where industries work only in the day time, eight hours would be a short day, and those industries could not produce the same quantities of goods in eight hours as they could in ten hours. Countries like Germany have maintained the ten-hour day, and Germany is producing more to-day than probably any of the allied countries. This question will also affect agricultural industry. Labour unions are satisfied that it should not be applied to agricultural industry or lumbering operations, but it cannot otherwise than affect agricultural industries. Farmers who live near a town or village will not be able to get their men to work ten hours a day when those men see others in the town or village working only eight hours, and we shall have diminished production. What we need is greater production, particularly in agriculture, and greater export if we are to stabilize the trade of this country. Decreasing the hours of labour will mean diminished production. Agriculture, like lumbering, is a seasonal occupation.

I think this is a question that can wait, and that can very well be dealt with by the employers and employees. It came before them at the Industrial Conference last September. The labour unions represented there were strong for the eight-hour day, but I think the majority of the employers were against it. I am sorry that all the labour unions in this country were not represented at that conference. There are some labour unions in the province of Quebec which are doing good work and have a large membership that were not represented at that Conference, and these unions are not in favour of the eight-hour day for all industries, although they favour it for certain industries. We have a great war debt, which has to be paid, and how are we going to pay it if we decrease production in this country and lessen the means of earning?

Mr. BURNHAM: There is nothing in this resolution which would prevent a man from working twenty-four hours a day if he wanted to. The eight-hour day simply means payment on that basis. If anybody wished to make an agreement to work longer than that, it would be quite open for him to do so.

Mr. PROULX: But if you make the eight-hour day the standard, you would not be able to get men in many industries to work longer than that, or you would have to pay them perhaps fifty or one hundred per cent more than the regular rate for overtime. I am not in favour of this resolution, and I hope the Government will not be in a hurry to present to this House any measure for standardizing the hours of labour in this country or adopting the eight-hour day.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE (East Edmonton): I desire to speak to this resolution more particularly on account of what took place in the dying hours of last session, when there was a great disturbance throughout the Dominion, and more particularly in the Western provinces. Having been solicitor for the United Mine Workers of Alberta for ten years, I was deluged at that time with letters and telegrams in connection with the trouble. I brought the matter before the ministers and asked what steps would be taken to meet the situation. The agitation at that time was for collective bargaining, but it also involved the question of wages and hours. I was advised by those in authority that collective bargaining was a provincial matter as it related to the question of wages and hours, and this Government would take no steps to meet the demands of the people who were agitating at that time. On the contrary, federal assistance was given to the provincial police authorities in quelling some disturbances which had arisen through the demands which are now embodied, in principle, in this resolution. Subsequently, and during the recess, I was advised through the medium of the press that as the Covenant of the League of Nations and the Treaty of Peace contained references to working hours that might be adopted all over the world, the Federal Government was ascertaining from the Supreme Court of Canada whether it was competent to legislate along the lines which had been demanded at the last session. I am also advised through the press that this Government has jurisdiction in these matters, and I was therefore surprised that in the speech from the Throne a matter of such great importance to the welfare and stability of society in Canada was not referred to. One need give only a cursory study to the progress of labour matters in the Old Country as well as here to learn that labour has been exploited to the extent that in some cases it has sought a remedy by revolutionary methods. Fortunately those methods have not been adopted in Canada, for there has been a disposition on the part of the provincial and Federal governments to assist in every possible way. That very excellent piece of legislation, the Lemieux Act, passed by the late Liberal Government, has given great satisfaction all over this Dominion and has saved the people of this country from many difficulties. Now that we are engaged on reconstruction, which is the word that is used to describe what is going on all over this world, it is only right that this Government should take steps of its own initiative to see that labour is given that measure of consideration which it has been demanding. Rather than adopt this resolution I should like to have the Ministers of the Crown announce that they intend to introduce a Bill this session along the lines suggested in the resolution.

The hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Proulx) has expressed the fear that a reduction in the hours of the working day will mean diminished production. That is an argument that has been advanced in all countries by those who oppose legislation such as is being sought by the labour people in Canada to-day. I have here a book published by Mr. John R. Common, Professor of Political Economy at the University of Wisconsin, in collaboration with Mr. John B. Andrews, Secretary of the American Association for Labour Legislation, after a very careful study of labour conditions in America and elsewhere, and I find—page 202—the following statement:

> Aside from their weaker physique, the "long day" is especially onerous for women workers because of the double burden of domestic duties and wage work which many of them carry. Ordinarily, men can rest when their day's toil is over, but there are few working girls who do not have at least mending and laundering to do in the evenings, and many married women must take the entire care of their homes and children before and after work.
> Moreover,—

And this is in answer to the remark of my hon. friend opposite—

> Moreover, long hours do not necessarily make for the greatest economy and efficiency in production. It is sometimes argued that if hours are reduced output will decline proportionately. This might be true if human beings were mere machines and not living creatures who grow tired. But as a matter of fact the law of diminishing returns operates nowhere more strikingly than in regard to hours of labour. Studies of output before and after a shortening of hours show that where the human element enters into production, hour reductions by no means necessarily imply a decrease in output.

On motion of Mr. H. A. Mackie, the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

FRANCHISE ACT.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE ELECTORAL FRANCHISE BILL INTRODUCED BY HON. HUGH GUTHRIE.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Militia and Acting Solicitor General) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 12, respecting the Election of Members of the House of Commons and the Electoral Franchise.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted to explain briefly the Bill which I have just asked the leave of the House to introduce. The purpose of the Bill is threefold: In the first place, to fix a uniform franchise throughout the Dominion; in the second place, to provide a uniform method for the preparation of voters' lists; and, in the third place, to provide a simple and satisfactory method for the conduct of elections.

The franchise is to be established upon very broad principles. The only requirements will be those of British citizenship, residence in Canada for one year and in the particular constituency for two months, and the attainment of the age of twenty-one years; these requirements will apply in the case of male and female voters alike.

In regard to the preparation of voters' lists, the principle adopted is that the existing lists in any province which are authorized by law for use in provincial elections shall be utilized in Dominion elections, provided that they are not more than one year old, or that not longer than twelve months has elapsed between the completion of such lists and the issue of a writ for the Dominion election. Where such lists are not more than one year old they are to form the basis for the Dominion lists. In provinces where such lists exist they are adopted under the Bill; but power is given to add to such provincial lists names which should be added, and power also is given to take from such provincial lists the names of those persons which should be taken therefrom. That will provide an up-to-date list in all the provinces for use at a general election.

Where no such provincial lists exist the principle adopted by the Bill is, in urban municipalities, that of registration and, in rural municipalities, that of registration by way of enumeration. Urban municipalities are described in the Bill as cities, towns, and incorporated villages with populations of not less than 1,000. In such municipalities the principle of registration is very simple: All persons, male and female, will be required to register within the time prescribed by the Bill. When the registration period has expired appeals are permitted either by those whose names are not upon the lists, or against those whose names have been placed thereon. Those appeals in all provinces where there are what we know as County Judges are to those judges, who are appointed revising officers. In provinces where there are District Judges, as opposed to County Judges, the appeals are to the District Judges.

In rural municipalities the procedure is a little different. Where there are no provincial lists which can be utilized under the terms of the Bill a registrar is appointed to prepare the list. He makes an enumeration of the voters in the rural polling sub-divisions, notifying the community of the days during which he will act. When his list has been completed it must be returned to the proper officer. But in this case there is no revision or appeal, because there is a clause in the Bill which provides that any person who claims to be entitled to a vote, in a rural sub-division, and whose name has been omitted by the registrar, shall be entitled on polling day, on taking the prescribed election oath, to receive a ballot and cast his vote as any other elector is entitled to vote. It is therefore not necessary under this system to provide for any appeal or revision.

The machinery provided by the Bill for the conduct of elections does not differ very greatly from the machinery which has been utilized in this country during the past twenty-five or thirty years. A great many clauses of the old election law have been retained, some new ones have been added, and some have been incorporated from the English election law. I would call the attention of the House to the references which appear at the end of the various sections in the Bill. The Bill will be printed in a day or two and then distributed. These references relate to the Dominion Election Act of 1896, to the subsequent election Acts passed in this country, and also to the British Election Act. But when you see a reference to any of these Acts at the end of a section, it does not mean that that section has been copied verbatim into the new Act, because in a great many cases the old sections have had to be modified.

There are one or two innovations—I think they are innovations in this country. The Bill proposes to abolish the office of Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and to substitute an official to be known as the General Electoral Officer. The duties of the General Electoral Officer will be, generally speaking, to take charge of the election machinery and the conduct of elections in general throughout the Dominion. These duties will correspond to a large extent with those performed by the Dominion Returning Officer in the election of 1917.

Hon. Mr. BELAND: Will he be a permanent official?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Bill provides that the General Electoral Officer of Canada shall be a parliamentary counsel of the House of Commons. He is to be a permanent officer. His tenure of office will be the same as that of a Superior Court Judge, and he can only be removed from office upon grounds similar to those upon which a Superior Court Judge can be removed. He will be in every way a permanent and independent officer.

There are other innovations, such as the provision for advance polls to enable railway employees, sailors, commercial travellers, and other persons whose usual business takes them away from home from time to time to record their votes, the object of the provision being to give these classes of persons the right to vote notwithstanding their absence from the particular locality on polling day. That provision, I think, was in force during the election of 1917, but its terms have been somewhat elaborated in the new Bill. The period fixed between nomination day and polling day is fourteen days under the new law. I think I am correct in saying that as the Act is now drawn it will take about one month to carry out all preliminaries between the time when the registrars start to prepare their voters' lists and polling day.

When the Bill comes before the House on the second reading I hope to have an opportunity of making a more elaborate statement in regard to its provisions. Some of the methods proposed are quite new so far as Dominion elections are concerned, although all the systems, I think, which the Bill proposes have heretofore been adopted in some parts of Canada, and from the reports that have come to the Government's knowledge these provisions have worked exceedingly well. The Bill has been prepared with the idea of bringing about uniformity in all parts of Canada; of providing a simple, safe and expeditious method of compiling voters' lists; of providing generally as simple and expeditious election machinery as it is possible to provide. When hon. members have had an opportunity of reading, analysing and discussing the measures, I think they will come to the conclusion that the Bill has been prepared and is now offered to the House upon the foundation of equality and justice in every part of the Dominion.

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): May I put a question to the hon. minister just to make one point perfectly clear? I understood him to state that the only requirement for the franchise under the proposed Bill is British citizenship. Will that restore the franchise to all citizens who were naturalized under the old naturalization law—which, I think, gave not British citizenship, but only Canadian citizenship? In other words, will the disabilities be removed that were imposed on citizens of foreign birth under the War-time Elections Act?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Any disability which takes place under the Naturalization Act will still continue. Any person who under the Naturalization Act is precluded from naturalization cannot vote under this Act, because he is not a British subject.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. EULER: Will people who were naturalized under the Act of 1914 and the Act prior to that be disfranchised under the proposed Act?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The only disfranchising clause in regard to naturalization is the provision which was in our former law: That no person should claim to be a British subject by reason of marriage or relationship with any other person. That provision is continued in the present Bill.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): My hon. friend has said that the basis of the franchise under the proposed Act is citizenship. Is there any exception to that rule?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, there is an exception which was provided under the Act of last session. It provides that where any person is disqualified by reason of race under the laws of any province from voting at any election in the province, the disqualification is continued for the purpose of Dominion elections.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I inquire when copies of the Bill will be available?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I expect that it will be printed in two or three days.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

EMBARGO ON CANADIAN CATTLE.

Mr. FOURNIER:

1. Is there an embargo on Canadian cattle exported to Great Britain?
2. If so, have any representations been made since January, 1918, to the Imperial Government asking for the repeal of such embargo?
3. If so, when were these representations made?
4. What is the nature of these representations, and what was the reply of the Imperial Government?

Hon. Mr. TOLMIE:

1. Yes. The legislation (United Kingdom) of 1896 prohibits the landing of cattle from all countries in the United Kingdom, except for purposes of immediate slaughter.

2. Yes. The representations, however, were of an informal nature and were not made through the usual official channels.

3. During the year 1919.

4. The representations for the removal of the embargo were made by Dr. Robertson and Mr. Arkell, the Live Stock Commissioner, through Colonel Amery, Parliamentary Secretary of the Colonial Office, and Lord Ernle, President of the Board of Agriculture. Both these gentlemen were seen on several occasions and the matter of the embargo discussed in detail. With Lord Ernle's approval, Dr. Robertson and Mr. Arkell conveyed similar representations to the Scottish Board of Agriculture; The Scottish and English Farmers Unions; the Scottish Chamber of Agriculture, The Agricultural Committee of the House of Commons, Special Committee of the London County Council and to several other important bodies in Scotland and in England, with the view of furnishing information which would enlist their support in Canada's position. The arguments used made reference to the health of Canadian cattle; to the fact that Canada regularly grows more cattle than she can finish; to the advantage which British feeders had previously obtained in feeding Canadian cattle; to the interests of British consumers in increasing the supply of fresh killed meat and to the very great importance of building up an Empire source of supply in competition with the control of the British meat trade which had already been secured by American packers.

The campaign which was carried on by Dr. Robertson and Mr. Arkell led to the matter being taken up in the Imperial Parliament. A question on several occasions was asked respecting the position of the Government. In substance the reply of the Government fully recognized that the embargo could no longer be continued against Canadian cattle on the grounds of disease but that, in consideration of the unsettled condition of British agriculture and the lack of confidence amongst feeders and breeders which would be created by removing the embargo, the Government regarded it as inadvisable to take any action in the matter. It may be added that, in personal conversation with Dr. Robertson and Mr. Arkell, Lord Ernle gave it as his considered opinion that, in view of the unsettled state of British agriculture following war conditions, it would be quite inopportune to take any action toward the removal of the embargo at the present time.

DOMINION NOTES IN UNITED STATES.

Mr. POWER:

1. Are the notes of the Dominion of Canada taken at their face value on Canadian-owned railroads over the portions situate in the United States?

2. What value is placed on the above notes when presented on American branch lines of the Grand Trunk Railway system?

Hon. J. D. REID:

1. Canadian National Railways accept Canadian funds at face value for transportation to or from points in Canada to points on system in United States.

2. Canadian currency is accepted at face value for tickets sold from points in United States to Canada on lines of Grand Trunk Railway system.

MR. G. M. PONTON.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. Is Mr. G. M. Ponton of the Canadian Trade Commission conducting an industrial survey of the Dominion?

2. Has he made a report?

3. If so, what is the nature of the report?

4. Is it the intention to continue this useful work?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. Mr. G. M. Ponton left Ottawa January 17, to conduct a preliminary survey concerning matters affecting production and commerce in Western Canada. It was the intention of the Commission to continue the work throughout the Dominion. The original time allotted for this preliminary work in Western Canada extended to the middle of April but under instructions Mr. Ponton returned to Ottawa on March 2.

2. Mr. Ponton's report is in the course of preparation, and will be ready within the next fortnight.

3. The report will deal principally with recommendations for continuation of the work, as owing to time allotted being cut short the work planned could not be fully carried out.

4. Answer to this question must be delayed until Mr. Ponton's report is prepared.

*Mr. TOBIN:

1. How many medical officers and nurses were sent over to Europe after the 1st December, 1918?

1. 20 Medical officers; 61 nursing sisters.

2. To report to the Director General of Medical Services, London, England.

2. Since the close of navigation in 1917.

3. No.

4. Yes, the Gulf of St. Lawrence Shipping & Trading Co. of Quebec hold a contract for this service.

5. The Gulf of St. Lawrence Shipping & Trading Co. ran fortnightly trips last year between Montreal, Quebec, Gaspe and Paspebiac. There was no service to Campbellton.

3. Who is the present owner of each of said steamers or vessels?

4. What is the tonnage of each?

5. What port or ports is each one of them plying between?

3, 4, and 5. Answered by No. 2.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

SUPERINTENDENT OF SOREL SHIPYARD.

Mr. GERVAIS:

1. By whom has Mr. Jackson been replaced as superintendent of the Government shipyard at Sorel, and at what salary?

2. Has he a practical knowledge of the English and French languages?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1. No permanent appointment has been made. Louis Lacouture is Acting Officer in Charge. Salary, $2,100 plus bonus $228 per annum.

2. Yes.

SHIPMENTS OF GOODS TO ROUMANIA THROUGH AMERICAN PORTS.

Mr. DUFF:

1. Are Canadian goods, purchased by Roumanians on the credit of the twenty-five million dollars, established by the Government, and destined for Roumania, still being shipped through an American port?

2. If so, why does not the Government insist that such goods, destined for Roumania, be forwarded through a Canadian port?

3. Will the Government give this important matter its most serious consideration?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Shipments to Roumania are being forwarded from Canadian ports. The total quantity shipped via Canadian ports has been 32,881 cubic tons, and via New York 2,850 tons. The traffic from Canadian ports has been handled in full ship loads. At the close of navigation last fall it was necessary to relieve the various manufacturers of their accumulation of goods packed ready for shipment, although this quantity was not nearly sufficient to make up a cargo. About 75 per cent of the material consisted of roofing, a comparatively low-priced commodity, which made the cost of storage, insurance and other charges prohibitive. There is no regular steamship service from Canadian ports to the Black sea, but the Furness-Withy company have a regular sailing from New York. In order to relieve the accumulation of goods in the manufacturers' stores, it was necessary to forward these goods through New York where they could be shipped without storage or insurance charges being incurred.

Meanwhile, the remainder of the goods to be shipped are being accumulated at Sydney and St. John, and as soon as there is a sufficient quantity to warrant chartering a vessel the remainder of the shipments will be made from these ports.

EXPORT OF HIDES TO UNITED STATES.

Mr. FOURNIER:

1. Has an Order in Council been passed by the Government preventing the exportation of hides to the United States?

2. If so, on what date was that Order in Council passed?

3. Since the passing of that order, how many manufacturers or exporters have obtained permits to ship hides to the United States?

4. What are the names of these favoured manufacturers and exporters of hides?

5. Under these special permits, how many carloads of hides have they exported up to date?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. Yes.

2. On the recommendation of the War Trade Board June 13, 1918, and on the recommendation of the Cost of Living Commissioner August 2, 1919.

3. Under the War Trade Board order hides were first offered to the Canadian trade and after ten days if they were not absorbed in the domestic market licenses to export were granted. On January 1, 1919, the War Trade Board issued a general license covering the export of hides, but an embargo was reimposed on August 2, 1919, at the instance of the Cost of Living Commissioner. After a consultation with the Canadian tanners, hide dealers, and boot manufacturers, it was decided to grant permits on all applications.

4. There were no favoured exporters; all applications were treated alike and no one was discriminated against.

5. Since August 2 permits were issued covering the exportation of 631 cars of hides.

MAIL CARRIERS.

Mr. DESAULNIERS:

1. How many mail carriers were appointed in 1919, and what was the name of each person appointed, place of residence, date of appointment and salary?

2. What distance are they required to cover each day when delivering mail?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: I should like to inquire of the hon. member whether, in using the words "mail carrier" he means letter carriers or mail contractors?

Question stands.

GROSSE ISLE PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. DECHENE:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to construct wharves at Grosse Isle this coming season, and extend same to deep water so that delay to ships may be prevented whilst inspection and disembarkation of passengers is being effected?

2. If so, what amount will be expended therefor, and when will construction be started?

Hon. J. D. REID: This information will be given when the Estimates are laid before Parliament.

Mr. DECHENE:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to make improvements to those buildings at the Quarantine Station in Grosse Isle which are intended for immigration purposes?
2. Will the hospital, the construction of which has been started, be completed in the coming summer?
3. Will the sheds, which at present serve to shelter immigrants, be replaced by more suitable buildings? If so, when will such improvements be started?

Hon. J. D. REID: This information will be given when the Estimates are laid before Parliament.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN.

Mr. McKENZIE:

1. How many officers are being retained in the service of the Militia Department at Headquarters at Ottawa who have not seen service overseas?
2. Give the names and positions and salaries, and length of time in the service, respectively.
3. Are returned men available for those positions?

SAAR VALLEY COMMISSION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. W. PECK (Skeena): In view of the fact that a statement was made in the House by, I think, the Minister of Customs, that Mr. Waugh had been appointed to the Saar Valley Commission, I should like to know whether or not a returned soldier was available for that position, as a returned soldier would be particularly and peculiarly qualified to fill the position.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister): The Saar Valley Commission is a body which is under the direction of the League of Nations, and the appointees are the appointees of the League of Nations. Certain countries have representation on that commission, the British Empire being one of those countries, and Mr. Waugh has been appointed as the representative of the British Empire on that commission. The Government of Canada was asked to name a fit and proper person as a member of the commission, and the Government gave the very best attention that it possibly could to the selection of the proper man in the time which it had at its disposal, for it was very pressing that this appointment should be made early. The names of a number of gentlemen were canvassed, and what we particularly wanted was to get a man of practical experience in municipal utilities and their working, and after the best consideration that could be given to the selection of a man of that kind who was available, Mr. Waugh was recommended to the position. Since that recommendation, I understand, though no official communication has been received—and it was not necessary that there should be—that he has been appointed as the chairman of the commission; that is, the chairmanship of the commission fell to the British Empire, and Mr. Waugh will take that position. Mr. Waugh was not in service himself across the seas, but he had two sons in service, one of whom, if I am correctly informed, met his death in battle; and whilst Mr. Waugh was not himself an actual soldier, he has thus a claim of high character in connection with war service.

OLIVER—ST. PAUL DE METIS RAILWAY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. HENRY ARTHUR MACKIE (Edmonton East): I should like to ask the Minister of Railways when we may expect to have completed the Oliver-St. Paul de Metis railway, a portion of which is in my riding. A number of the farmers there drove their cattle to fields where there was feed, and now they want to utilize the road to get their cattle back. The road has been under construction since 1909.

Hon. J. D. REID: I could hardly catch what the hon. gentleman said. Does he ask when construction will be commenced on a road in his locality.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: When will the Oliver-St. Paul de Metis branch of the Canadian Northern, which has been under construction since 1909, be completed?

Mr. J. D. REID: I could not answer offhand, but I will make a note of the hon. gentleman's question and be able to answer him probably to-morrow or Monday.

Mr. SPEAKER: The fact that the answer to that question cannot be given offhand is evidence that it is one that ought to have been put on the Order Paper.

ADMIRAL JELLICOE'S REPORT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: The Minister of Marine and Fisheries laid on the table of the House yesterday a copy of Admiral Jellicoe's report. Will copies be available for all the members?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE: Ony a limited number of copies are now printed, and in the English language only; but to-morrow I will place before the House a motion, which I hope will receive approval that a sufficient number be printed in both languages for every member of the House.

NOISE IN THE CHAMBER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): I should like to call your attention, Sir, to the circumstances under which we are met at the present moment, and which are very disconcerting. I have been endeavouring for a number of years to practice the apostolic maxim or to follow the apostolic example and say to myself: "In whatsoever state I am, therewith I shall be content." But there has been, during the half hour we have been in session to-day a periodic knocking which has made it absolutely impossible for us at this end of the Chamber to follow the proceedings in the House. The Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie) is a very fine speaker, and when the knocking was not going on I could hear everything he said; but the knocking immediately took away my ability to hear him, and what was much worse than that, Sir, I could not follow you in prayer. May I suggest that in the few hours that we meet in the afternoon, the knocking so near the Chamber should not proceed?

Mr. SPEAKER: I might inform the hon. member as well as the House that the Speaker has not been spared more or less knocking whether the House was in session or not, in consequence of the inconvenience to hon. members of occupancy of the new building. I appreciate, however, the difficulty at the moment, and I will endeavour, if possible to have the workmen cease working so near the Chamber during sitting hours as to inconvenience hon. members.

LETTER CARRIERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOHN A. CURRIE (Simcoe North): I should like to ask a question of the representative of the Postmaster General in the House. There is a good deal of unrest amongst the letter carriers, and there are threats of a strike in the city of Toronto. I understand that some arrangement has been reached between the letter carriers and the Government, and that some delay has occurred in putting that arrangement into effect. Is there any possibility of anything being done to avert that strike and trouble such as we had a few year ago.

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: I assume that what my hon. friend refers to is the question of the classification going into effect with reference to the letter carriers. The Bill passed last session re reclassification of the Civil Service was to go into effect on the 1st of April, 1920. It was contended that it should have gone into effect a year earlier, and when the Bill was before the House, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), who was in charge of it, stated that the question would receive further consideration at the hands of the Government and, if necessary, an amendment would be brought down this session making the change. It is the intention of the Government to submit an amendment at this session providing that reclassification shall go into effect from the 1st of April, 1919. I think that is the point upon which there is some complaint; but until the amendment is passed, I presume no compensation can be paid on the basis of it.

Mr. CURRIE: When will this legislation be introduced?

Mr. ROWELL: There are under consideration, I believe, certain other amendments to the Civil Service Act, and the view was that it was much better to have one Bill covering all the points than to introduce separate Bills dealing with separate matters, but the Bill will be brought down at the earliest possible moment.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I should like to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) whether the National Railway Company, the organization of which was provided for by the National Railway Corporation Act, if I remember the title correctly, passed in 1918, has been formed, and if so, who are the officers. If nothing has been done in the matter as yet, when may we expect action to be taken under that legislation?

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways): No action has been taken in that direction as yet. We have been waiting until it was decided what action was to be taken in connection with the Grand Trunk Railway system, so that in forming the organization we could take into consideration all the railways that go to make up the National system.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. McMASTER:

For a copy of all correspondence, agreements and contracts, between the Government and any banks touching the payment of officers and men in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, especially as regards the rates of exchange prevailing between Canadian and British currency and the manner in which the same affected the pay of said officers and men, together with copies of all departmental or other Government orders or regulatioons dealing with the subject of soldiers' pay and the effect of fluctations of exchange thereon.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH BULGARIA.

INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTION AND SPEECH OF HON. N. W. ROWELL.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council) moved the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Commons

That it is expedient that Parliament do approve of the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Bulgaria, signed at Neuilly-sur-Seine on the 27th day of November, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, a copy of which has been laid before Parliament, and which was signed on behalf of His Majesty, acting for Canada, by the plenipotentiaries therein named, and that this House do approve of the same.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: Are copies of the Treaty available?

Mr. ROWELL: Copies of the Treaty have been distributed. An order was given for the printing of it the second day the House was in session.

Mr. FIELDING: How have they been distributed?

Mr. ROWELL: Through the post office.

Mr. BUREAU: I never received a copy.

Mr. BELAND: Nor have I received mine.

Mr. ROWELL: A special order of the House was given for distribution of copies.

Mr. BUREAU: I have gone to the post office regularly but have not so far found a copy in the box.

Mr. DENIS: I for one have not received it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that hon. members desire to have the resolution stand?

Mr. BELAND: We do not object to a statement by the Minister.

Mr. ROWELL: Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I will make a statement with reference to the Treaty, and if my hon. friends desire that discussion on it shall stand there will be no objection to this course. I assumed however, that hon. members had received copies of the Treaty.

[Mr. McMaster.]

The adoption of this Resolution involves:—

(1) The recognition of democratic control of foreign policy and that Canada should not be finally committed to important international engagements such as are embodied in this Treaty without the consent of Parliament.

(2) A recognition that in any war in which the British Empire is engaged and in which Canada has taken part is a matter of concern to the people of Canada; that the terms of the Treaty of Peace bringing such a war to an end are also a matter of concern to the people of Canada and that such a treaty should be ratified by His Majesty until it has been approved by Canada as of the five nations of the British Commonwealth.

(3) A reaffirmation by Parliament of its approval of the creation and maintenance of a League of Nations for the promotion of international co-operation and the achievement of international peace and security by the methods set forth in the Covenant of the League.

(4) A reaffirmation by Parliament of its approval of the Labour Clauses and of the creation and maintenance of the International Labour organization under its provisions.

(5) A reaffirmation by Parliament of its approval of the position and status accorded to Canada in the League of Nations and in the International Labour Organization and of its determination to maintain that status.

Dealing first with the terms of the Treaty, may I briefly point out to the House its main provisions, and say in passing that the general lines of the Treaty are similar to those contained in the Treaty of Peace with Germany which has already been approved by the House, and similar also to those embodied in the Treaty of Peace with Austria which was likewise approved by Parliament. These general lines were discussed and agreed upon when the Prime Minister and his colleagues were in Paris. The necessary adaptation of those general provisions to the situation in Bulgaria also came under consideration and review, and the Prime Minister was himself the Vice Chairman of the Commission of the Peace Conference on Greek claims, which gave special consideration to certain aspects of the territorial situation in the Balkans.

Part One, as in the German and Austrian treaties, incorporates the Covenant of the League of Nations. As in those cases, Bulgaria is not an original member, but may be admitted when two-thirds of the assembly have consented. Hon. members will recall that under the covenant of the League of Nations none of the enemy countries are made members of the League, but they have the right to become members, under Article One of the covenant, upon a vote of the assembly and after compliance with certain conditions such as other nations, not members, are required to comply with.

Part Two defines the frontiers of Bulgaria, under which Bulgaria parts with most of the territory which, with the assistance of her then allies, Serbia and Greece, she won from Turkey in the war of 1912. Western Thrace, including the rich tobacco district of Xanthi and the Port of Dede-Agatch, is ceded to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers for future disposition; but in return these Powers undertake to ensure to Bulgaria commercial access to the Aegean Sea.

To the Serb-Croat-Slovene State she cedes the district of Stroumitsa, which experience has proved was too great a menace to the Serbian main railway to Salonika, while in the hands of a presumably hostile state. A further small rectification of the frontier is made in favour of Serbia on the west of Bulgaria in order that the Serbian town of Nish shall not be so exposed to the menace of the Dragoman Pass through the mountains. Roumania keeps the Southern Dodrudja which she seized when Bulgaria was at war with Serbia and Greece in 1913.

The territorial result is that both the Serb-Croat-Slovene State (Yugo-Slavia) and Roumania are more than treble the size of Bulgaria and have become Danubian or European States, while Greece, if she retains the territory now occupied by her in the smyrna region, will be more than twice as large as Bulgaria, and will have ceased to be a purely Balkan State. Henceforth that term would apply strictly only to Bulgaria and Albania.

The overlapping and confusion of races in the Balkan Peninsula is such that no line can conceivably be drawn by which each State would include all its nationals within its boundaries, while entirely excluding men of other races; nor is it practicable to pay much attention to Greek, Bulgarian and Serbian historical frontiers in a region where the tide of conquest ebbed and flowed during centuries prior to the absorption of the whole by the Turks. Consequently there are few districts which cannot be claimed on some grounds by at least two States and to satisfy them all would be a superhuman task even were the settlement not complicated by the fact that in the world war Bulgaria was on the losing, and Serbia, Roumania and Greece were on the winning side.

Mr. CANNON: Is there any provision about Macedonia?

Mr. ROWELL: There is no specific provision dealing with Macedonia.

Part III relates to various political adjustments. Bulgaria recognizes the Serb-Croat-Slovene State. She recognizes the other peace settlements concluded by the Allies and Associated Powers with the other enemy Powers. She undertakes to ensure full protection of life and liberty to all inhabitants of Bulgaria irrespective of birth, nationality, language, race or religion, and these guarantees are placed under the guarantee of the League of Nations. There is a provision also by which Greece agrees to afford protection to racial, religious or linguistic minorities.

Although at first recalcitrant Roumania, Serbia and Greece have now signed the Treaty with Bulgaria, (December 9th), thus concluding the Balkan settlement. Roumania and Serbia have also signed Treaties with the Allied and Associated Powers providing for the protection of minorities.

Part IV is a limitation of Bulgarian armaments. Universal compulsory military service is abolished and the voluntary system, with a twelve year period of service, is substituted. Bulgaria's total military forces are not to exceed 20,000 men. There are stringent provisions for the reduction of munition stores, guns, air craft and other armament, while the production of poison gases and liquids is forbidden. The manufacture of arms and munitions of war shall be carried on in a single factory under the ownership and control of the State. Bulgarian war ships are to be surrendered and Bulgaria may only maintain a few small boats for police and fishery duties on the Danube and the coast. Air craft and equipment are to be surrendered and no air forces are to be maintained in the future.

These disarmament provisions are to be carried out under the supervision of an Inter-Allied Commission of Control.

These provisions, providing for disarmament and limiting the strength of military forces are incorporated in the Treaty in pursuance of the policy set forth in the Covenant of the League of Nations for the reduction of armies and armaments. These reductions are imposed under the treaties on enemy countries but provision is made by the Covenant of the League of Nations for the appointment of a commission to investigate the strength of the armies and armaments of countries which are members of the League and to make recommendations to those countries in reference to a reduction in the size of their armies.

Part V provides for the repatriation of prisoners of war and interned civilians who are Bulgarian nationals. An Inter-Allied Commission for inquiry and control is set up to search for non-repatriated Allied nationals, and for establishing the criminal acts punishable under the penalty provisions. Each side agrees to respect and maintain the graves of the soldiers and sailors buried in their respective territories.

Part VI binds Bulgaria to hand over persons accused of crimes in violation of the laws and customs of war, and to recognize the right of the Allies to bring such persons before military tribunals for trial and punishment.

Part VII provides for reparation by Bulgaria. She recognizes that by joining in the war of aggression waged by Germany and Austria she has caused the Allied Powers great losses and sacrifices for which she ought to make complete reparation. On the other hand the Allies recognize that her resources are not sufficient for this. Bulgaria agrees, therefore, to pay, and the Allies agree to accept, as being such reparation as Bulgaria is able to make, the sum of 2,250,000,000 francs in gold to be discharged by a series of half yearly payments with provision for the payment of interest and for a sinking fund. She also agrees to return to Greece, Roumania or Serbia the securities, records and other objects seized from the territories of those countries, and to these States she also undertakes to hand over large numbers of cattle, horses, mules and sheep in reparation for seizures made. In compensation for the destruction of Serbian coal mines by Bulgarian armies Bulgaria is to deliver to Serbia fifty thousand tons of coal a year for five years. To oversee the execution of these reparation provisions an Inter-Allied Commission, composed of three members appointed by the British Empire, France and Italy, is to be set up at Sophia. It is in the nature of a Sub-Commission to the Reparation Commission established under the German Treaty. It will have power to recommend to the Reparation Commission either a reduction or a postponement of the sums to be paid by Bulgaria if it finds that her resources and capacity to pay are inadequate.

Part VIII is concerned with the financial aspects of the settlement. It determines the priority of the charges for the cost of military occupation, for the service of the external pre-war Ottoman public debt, and for the costs of reparation. Provisions are made for the protection of allied nationals in respect of their pre-war financial dealings with Bulgaria or Bulgarian nationals with regard to state securities, private mortgages, etc.

These provisions relating to debts and financial matters are of special interest to Canada in view of the fact that there are a number of Bulgarian nationals living in Canada and there is a certain amount of enemy property in this country. The provisions of this clause are similar in their general terms to those contained in the treaties with Germany and Austria. The same may be said in regard to the clauses dealing with aerial navigation, wharves, docks and railways. Provision is made that the Danube shall be declared to be an international waterway and also for an international commission to govern it. The labour clauses of the Treaty are identical in their terms with those embodied in the Treaty with Germany and Austria.

The foregoing is a brief outline of the terms of this Treaty. To go back to the two groups of clauses in the Treaty which are of most immediate concern to Canada, I should like for a few minutes to speak in reference to the League of Nations and to the labour clauses of the Treaty.

First in reference to the League of Nations —and I mention this because of its relation to the question which is now before us of Canada's position and status under the treaty. Hon. members will recall that the League has two definite objectives: One is the promotion of international co-operation; the other is the establishment and maintenance of international peace and security. Four methods are proposed by which those two great objectives are to be secured. The first is an agreement by the nations not to resort to war—I shall not now go into the details of the provisions for attaining that object—but the agreement of the nations not to resort to war is, I venture to think, having regard to all the conditions, the most important feature of the Treaty. If any nation does resort to war in violation of its obligations, it immediately becomes at war with all other nations members to the League.

The second is what we might describe as the abolition of secret diplomacy. In the Treaty it is defined as "the prescription of open, just and honourable relations between nations." To secure that result it is provided that all treaties which are inconsistent with the terms of the Covenant must be modified or terminated without delay, and the nations parties to the Covenant agree that they will take such action in order to bring their international obligations into harmony with the terms of the Covenant. It is also provided that all treaties concluded in future must be filed or registered with the Secretary of the League, and such treaties are open to all the members of the League so that their contents may be known.

Mr. CANNON: Will the hon. minister permit me a question? Has this been done as far as the Anglo-Persian Treaty is concerned?

Mr. ROWELL: The Anglo-Persian Treaty was concluded before the League went into effect. But that Treaty must be brought into conformity with the terms of the Covenant, if it does not now actually conform to it. The Covenant provides for all cases of treaties concluded prior to its going into effect.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: Do I understand the minister to say that the treaty-making power of Great Britain is now made subject to the approval of the League of Nations and, to that extent, the independence of Great Britain taken away?

Mr. ROWELL: I would not put it in that way, but rather that Great Britain binds herself, as do all the other nations parties to the League, not to enter into international obligations inconsistent with the provisions of the Covenant. All treaties when entered into must, as I said, be filed or registered with the Secretary-General of the League, and they do not become valid until they are so registered.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand that past treaties also must be registered with the Secretary of the League?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes, past treaties must be either rescinded or amended so as to bring them into conformity with the Covenant.

Then the third method for attaining the objects of the League is the establishment of the firm understandings of international law, as the rule of conduct among governments. In other words, just as in all civilized communities where law is administered individuals are governed by the rule of law in their relations one with another, the Covenant of the League provides that the firm understandings of international law shall be recognized by the nations parties to the League as binding upon them and as governing their conduct in relation to one another.

Then the fourth is the maintenance of respect for all treaty obligations. Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that at the outbreak of the war Germany laid down the principle that an international obligation should not be considered binding upon a nation longer than that nation considered it to be in its own selfish interest to so recognize it; when in the view of the nation it no longer served its purpose, it might repudiate, just as Germany repudiated her obligations under the treaty with Belgium. The principle that nations must respect their international obligations is embodied in this Covenant. The only way they can escape these obligations is by terminating the treaty in the manner provided in the treaty itself, or by a reconsideration of its terms under the provisions of the Covenant of the League.

Mr. BURNHAM: If it is regular, I wish to ask the hon. minister—at a somewhat inopportune juncture I admit—if the vote of Canada in the League of Nations is as part of the British Empire?

Mr. ROWELL: If my hon. friend has no objection I will come to that in due course and discuss it. I wish to deal with this in logical order.

Mr. CANNON: I would like to ask the minister if the reservations adopted by Switzerland when she decided to enter the League of Nations are not conflicting with the general principles just laid down and explained by him?

Mr. ROWELL: We have not yet received any official information as to the reservations adopted by Switzerland. I am therefore not in a position to give my hon. friend an answer to that question.

The organization of the League—and now I come to the question of the Council and the Assembly—consists of a Council, an Assembly, and a Secretariat. The Council, as hon. members will recall, is a body of nine, composed of the representatives of the five Great Powers, and four others representing the smaller powers, to be chosen by the Assembly when it meets. Pending the meeting of the Assembly the names are specified in the Treaty. As I now recall them they are Belgium, Brazil, Greece and Spain. When the Assembly meets it will be in a position to choose the four members who are to represent the members other than the five Great Powers.

The Assembly is composed of representatives of the members of the League. Each member of the League is entitled to send three delegates to the Assembly, but each member has only one vote. The Council will under normal conditions be the working body of the League. Its powers are set forth in the Covenant. It has all the powers of Assembly, with but few exceptions. It has the power to do the important work of the League.

The Assembly has all the powers of the Council, and it has also certain specified prerogatives. One of the most important is that of choosing the representatives on the Council of the powers other than the Great Powers. It must decide on the admission of new members to the League. Under certain conditions it has power upon reference from the Council, to investigate and pass upon matters originally referred to the Council

The actual working operations of the League are carried on by the Secretariat. That is, an international organization acting under the instructions of the Council carries on the work between the meetings of the Council and is the real working instrument of the League.

It is important to bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that except as otherwise expressly provided in the Treaty, all decisions of both the Council and the Assembly must be unanimous. The cases where unanimity is not required are relatively few. In other words, the great bulk of the work of the League can only be done if the members of the Council or the Assembly are unanimous. Some objection has been urged from some quarters to unanimity being required. The answer—which, I submit, is a good one—is that it is essential that public opinion should support this great international experiment, the greatest which the statesmen of the world have ever tried. After all, the success or failure of the League will depend upon the public opinion and the moral sentiment of the world. If public opinion and the moral sentiment of the world—the sentiment for justice, for peace and good international relations—are not sufficiently strong to back up the decisions of the Council and the Assembly, the League must fail, as other international experiments have failed. Therefore in the great majority of cases the decision must be unanimous.

I now come to the question of the status of Canada and the other self-governing dominions. I pointed out a moment ago that the Council was composed of representatives of the five great powers and of four others to be chosen by the Assembly. The question was raised overseas whether Canada and the other Dominions were entitled to be chosen as members of the Council, or whether by reason of their relation to Great Britain as part of the British Empire they were disqualified from being so chosen. A reading of the terms of the Covenant makes it perfectly clear, I should say, that they have exactly the same rights as all other members and are entitled to be chosen members of the Council.

Mr. FIELDING: Who raised the question? Who raised any doubt whatever about the matter, when a reading of the terms of the Covenant clearly shows that there is no question about it?

Mr. ROWELL: I understand that the question was raised in some quarters at Paris; I am not in a position at the moment to say who were the parties who raised it. But in order to prevent any misunderstanding so far as the great powers were concerned, the Prime Ministers of Great Britain and France and the President of the United States signed a statement, which was submitted to the House last session, in which they affirmed that that was their interpretation of the provisions of the Treaty and that it was clear that Canada and the other Dominions were entitled to be chosen among the nations to nominate members to the Council.

Mr. FIELDING: Eligible.

Mr. ROWELL: Yes, they are eligible.

Mr. BURNHAM: Shall we have that statement laid before the House?

Mr. ROWELL: It was laid before the House at the last session. My hon. friend will find it in the address made by the Secretary of State (Hon. Mr. Sifton) with regard to the Treaty.

Mr. CANNON: Is that document an official interpretation or simply a personal opinion?

Mr. ROWELL: It is the opinion—it could not be anything more—of the Prime Ministers of Great Britain and France and of the President of the United States. I assume that should any question arise in the Council with regard to the matter, the representatives of these nations would not depart from that interpretation. But my own view is the same as that of the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), that on the reading of the Covenant itself it is clear that Canada and the other Dominions are eligible for election to the Council. The statement to which I have referred is more for the purposes of confirmation than anything else.

Mr. W. D. EULER: If there were a difference of opinion, upon what authority would the interpretation finally depend? Could the matter be referred to any authority that had jurisdiction?

Mr. ROWELL: I assume that if a dispute arose the matter would finally be decided by the Council, unless it was referred to the Court of International Justice when constituted under the Treaty. But in this statement the Prime Ministers of Great Britain and France and the President of the United States say that the terms of the Covenant should receive a broad and generous interpretation in order that it may accomplish its obvious purpose, and that in their opinion no question could be raised on that point.

In reference to the Assembly, it is expressly provided that it shall be composed of representatives of the members of the League and as Canada and the other Dominions are members, there is no question about their right to vote in the Assembly, the question of our voting rights under Article 15 has been raised. Article 15 of the Covenant of the League provides as follows:

> If there should arise between members of the League any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration in accordance with Article 13, the members of the League agree that they will submit the matter to the Council.

That is, for investigation and conciliation. Another clause of that same Article provides:

> The Council may in any case under this Article refer the dispute to the Assembly. The dispute shall be so referred at the request of either party to the dispute, provided that such request be made within fourteen days after the submission of the dispute to the Council.
> In any case referred to the Assembly, all the provisions of this Article and of Article 12 relating to the action and powers of the Council shall apply to the action and powers of the Assembly, provided that a report made by the Assembly, if concurred in by the representatives of those members of the League represented on the Council and of a majority of the other members of the League, exclusive in each case of the representatives of the parties to the dispute, shall have the same force as a report by the Council concurred in by all the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute.

To illustrate, suppose a dispute should arise between any two nations. Simply in order to bring the point home, we will assume that the dispute is between the British Empire and the United States. If that dispute is of such a character that it is likely to lead to a rupture in international relations and is referred not to arbitration but to the Council for investigation and conciliation, then either party may ask that it be referred to the Assembly. If it is referred to the Assembly and the Assembly investigates the matter and reports upon it, that report, if concurred in by the members of the Council who are members of the Assembly and by a majority of the other members of the League has the same force and effect as if decided by the Council and concurred in by all the members of the Council, exclusive in each case of the parties to the dispute.

Two questions have been raised under this article. In case there is a dispute, to which any portion of the British Empire is a part, with any foreign country, could the other portions of the British Empire vote in the Assembly in such a case? The view of the Government, and it is the view of the Government of Great Britain also, is that no other portions of the British Empire could vote under those conditions, and the reason is simple. If it be a dispute likely to lead to a rupture, so long as we acknowledge allegiance to the same Sovereign as does Great Britain, as do the other portions of the Empire, then such a dispute is a matter of interest to all portions of the Empire.

Mr. BELAND: Then Canada has no discretion in such a case?

Mr. ROWELL: In a case like that, Canada would be a party interested and would not claim a right to vote.

Mr. BELAND: In the Assembly?

Mr. ROWELL: In the Assembly.

Mr. KING: And would not have the right?

Mr. ROWELL: And under the Treaty would not have the right to vote.

Mr. BELAND: That is what is contended in the United States.

Mr. ROWELL: That is contended, but there is no objection, and there never has been any objection on the part of the Government of Canada, nor on the part of the Government of Great Britain, to that contention. Lord Grey, in his letter, made that point perfectly clear, and I hope I have made it perfectly clear, so that there will be no misunderstanding about it.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does not that mean that the status of Canada is not the same as that of any or every other member of the League?

Mr. ROWELL: No, I do not think that is the meaning at all. It simply means that Canada and the other dominions bear such a relation to Great Britain and to each other as nations of equal status in the British Empire under a common Sovereign, that a dispute likely to lead to a rupture which may result in war, is a matter in which all are interested. Therefore, by reason of being interested, they are not entitled to vote.

Mr. BURNHAM: Do I understand that that is not a matter of right, but a matter of good taste?

Mr. ROWELL: No, it is a matter of right, because, according to the Treaty, parties interested are not entitled to vote.

Mr. FIELDING: Canada being in the Assembly as a nation, independent of and separate from Great Britain, is not Canada an independent party?

Mr. ROWELL: Canada's position is as independent as Great Britain's but she is not independent of the British Empire, she is a part of the British Empire.

Mr. BELAND: In a case where Canada would be immediately interested, as, for instance, in the Alaskan boundary question, would Canada then be precluded from registering a vote through her representative in the Assembly of the League?

Mr. ROWELL: If a dispute of that particular character arose, and it were dealt with in that way, yes. The provisions of the treaty provide for arbitration, judicial determination and conciliation. If a matter is referred to arbitration, this provision does not apply at all, and all nations agree that matters suitable for arbitration must be referred to arbitration, and all agree to accept the award of the arbitrators. Therefore, if it be a proper subject for arbitration, this provision does not apply. It may be a matter for judicial determination when the International Court of Justice is established. If it be a matter for judicial determination, then this question does not arise. It arises only in the case of a question not suitable for either arbitration or judicial determination, where it is a question for conciliation which has been referred by the council to the Assembly for report.

Mr. CANNON: Do I understand the minister aright when I interpret his opinion as having the following effect, that Canada will have a vote or have something to say on all questions in which she is not directly interested as Canada nor a part of the British Empire, but that otherwise she will have nothing to say?

Mr. ROWELL: That is not the understanding.

Mr. BELAND: That is what it is.

Mr. ROWELL: Let us take one step at a time. If the matter be one for arbitration, then if Canada be concerned, she has full say in reference to the submission, the same as any other member. If the matter be one for judicial determination, she has exactly the same right of reference as any other country. If the matter be one for conciliation and if it be referred to the Assembly in the way I have mentioned, a report made by the Assembly with the majority I have indicated will have the same force and effect as a decision by the council concurred in by all the members except the parties to the dispute. What is the effect of a report of the Assembly under those conditions? Simply this, the report is published to the world, and the other nations bind themselves not to go to war with any nation which carries out the recommendations contained in that report. Dealing first with the Council. The dispute is investigated. If all parties, other than parties interested, reach a unanimous conclusion; they make a report and recommendation. All the nations bind themselves not to go to war with the nation that lives up to that report. That is the whole obligation. If that report is referred to the Assembly and the decision is concurred in by the members of the Assembly, who are members of the Council, and by a majority of the other members of the Assembly, then the report has the same effect and no more. In the great majority of cases, as I intimated in opening, the decision of both the Council and the Assembly must be unanimous; and Canada, as a member, if she dissents from the conclusion, by forcing her dissent, prevents the unanimity necessary to the Assembly reaching a decision on the point. In the same way in the Council, dissent by any one of the members prevents the unanimity necessary to the decision. Let me take a case which was raised last session as an illustration. If a dispute should arise and war should break out, and the Council, under the terms of the Covenant, meets to recommend what military forces should be used with a view to putting an end to that war and bringing about peace, the Council cannot make any recommendation except a unanimous one, and any nation which might be called upon to make a contribution is made a member of the Council for the purpose of considering that matter. Therefore, if the question of military contribution should come up in reference to any country concerned, that country thereby becomes a member of the Council for considering that very matter. The Council could not reach a decision that the contribution should be made without the consent of that member. Therefore, the matter goes back to the principle I mentioned before, namely, that the League can only be effective if it carries the goodwill and hearty co-operation of its members.

Mr. BELAND: There is no provision in the Covenant that a member of the Assembly who is called into the Council for the purpose of discussing a certain matter shall have a vote.

Mr. ROWELL: They are made members of the Council for that purpose.

Mr. FIELDING: With the right to vote.

Mr. ROWELL: They have the right to vote. That has never been questioned.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend knows very well that that is not stipulated in the Covenant.

Mr. ROWELL: They are made members of the Council, and every member has the right to vote.

Mr. BELAND: The nine members have the right to vote.

Mr. ROWELL: The others too. That has never been questioned by any of the members of the League.

Mr. BELAND: But—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must remind hon. members that we are not now in Committee and arguments between hon. members cannot be permitted.

Mr. ROWELL: I would also draw my hon. friend's attention to this consideration. The British Government issued an official commentary on the terms of the Covenant. That commentary was prepared by General Smuts and Lord Robert Cecil. No two men would know better what was intended, for no two had a larger share in framing the Covenant, and they make the point I have mentioned perfectly clear in their commentary on the Covenant. So far as I am aware it has never been questioned by any of the nations parties to the League. Now if the dispute referred to the Assembly is one in which the British Empire is not a party, the various nations of the British Empire, as members of the League, have certainly the same voting rights as all other members.

Mr. CANNON: Is it not a fact that at Paris it was decided that the five great powers were always interested in questions of an international character? That is why the Council was formed, which decides practically everything. If that interpretation is to remain, would the minister mention a case of an international character in which the British Empire would not be interested?

Mr. ROWELL: The answer is that that is not the correct interpretation of the Covenant. In discussing the conditions of peace, the five great powers assumed the leadership and control. They considered themselves interested in everything, and therefore retained in their hands the final decision as to everything, but under the terms of the Covenant the great powers have no more interest in an international dispute in which they are not individually as nations involved, than have the smaller powers. They are members and no more.

Mr. CANNON: Would my hon. friend give me an example?

Mr. ROWELL: Take, for instance, a dispute between China and Japan. Japan is one of the great powers. She is interested; the others are not. In that case the others would not be precluded from voting. China and Japan would be the only nations precluded from voting.

Mr. BURNHAM: As regards the members of the British Empire I suppose their status is something like that contained in the Athanasian Creed—not three in one, but one in three.

Mr. ROWELL: That is not wholly the situation, but it may convey an idea of it to some hon. members.

Mr. FIELDING: Might not the British Empire be interested, in a given case, by reason of its alliance with Japan?

Mr. ROWELL: These questions as to who are and who are not interested must, I presume, be finally determined in some authoritative way, either by the Council itself or by the Court of International Justice when constituted, but the general understanding, as I have gathered from those who took part in the Conference and in framing the Covenant, as well as from all the literature on the question so far as I have been able to peruse it is that "a party to the dispute" means that the nation itself must be involved. Let me illustrate it in another way. My hon. friend will recall that there is a proposed treaty between Great Britain, France and the United States for the defence of France against an aggressive attack by Germany. There are treaties between the United States and a number of Central and South American States. If a treaty between two nations such as those I have referred to is held to disqualify the parties to the treaty from any participation, it would greatly limit the number of those who could vote.

Mr. FIELDING: It would depend upon the nature of the treaty.

Mr. ROWELL: Quite so. One would be very foolish to express a dogmatic opinion offhand as to what the situation would be under any particular clause of the treaty. All that one can say is that all nations would be treated alike in that respect.

May I refer for a few minutes to the International Labour Organization, because what I have to say with respect to voting rights and status will apply to both organizations. The organization provided under the Treaty is (1) an International Labour Conference, (2) the Governing Body, and (3) the International Labour Office.

All the members of the League, by virtue of that membership, are members of the international labour organization. Each member is entitled to representation at the International Labour Conference by two Government delegates, and by one delegate representing the employers of the country, and one representing the employees. In this case the voting differs from the voting in the Assembly of the League. In voting in the Assembly there is only one vote per member. In the International Labour Conference all the delegates from each nation are entitled to vote. They may vote together or against each other, just as they see fit. At the International Labour Conference at Washington it was a very frequent occurrence for delegates representing the same nation to vote against each other. Particularly was that the case as between the employers' delegate and the workers' delegate on a number of questions that came up.

The question of representation in the governing body came up for consideration at the Peace Conference, and there was a direct conflict of opinion as to what should be done. In the original clause relating to the composition of the governing body, a provision was inserted that no high contracting party together with its self-governing dominions should be entitled to more than one representative on the governing body. If that clause had remained in the Treaty it would have cut down the rights of Canada and the other self-governing dominions as full members of the organization. It would have denied them eligibility to election to the governing body, which other members of the League enjoy. That governing body was composed of twelve representatives of governments, six representatives of employers and six of employees. Eight of the government representatives were to be named by the eight nations of chief industrial importance throughout the world. The other four were to be elected by the other members of the International Labour Conference, at the meeting of that conference. As Great Britain is undoubtedly one of the eight nations of chief industrial importance, she was bound to have a representative on the governing body; and if no nation, plus its self-governing dominions, could have more than one representative on the governing body, it meant that the representative of the Empire must always be a representative of Great Britain. The Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and his colleagues took the ground that that restrictive clause should be eliminated from the covenant because it did impair the position and status of Canada and the other Dominions, and the Prime Ministers of the other Dominions shared this view. The result was that that clause was eliminated, only, however, after the greatest pressure on the part of the representatives of Canada and the other Dominions; and the treaty as finally submitted to Germany and accepted and signed by her, contained no such provision. Canada's eligibility for election to the governing body of the International Labour Organization therefore stands in exactly the same position as her eligibility for election to the Council of the League. It is not my intention this afternoon to refer to the proceedings of the International Labour Conference at Washington, because another opportunity will arise when these matters can be more properly discussed. But I would point out, in regard to the question of status, that at the International Labour Conference at Washington, when the four other nations were selected—that is to say, the four which should be entitled to name the four additional members, Canada was chosen one of the four. Spain had been in the original eight of chief industrial importance and had been crowded out by the agreement to admit Germany. Every one agreed that Spain should be elected. It was also agreed that South America, with between fifteen and twenty members in the League and in the International Labour Organization, should be entitled to at least one member on the governing body, and Argentina was therefore selected. That left two places for the other countries of Europe, Asia, and America; and the House, I think, will be gratified to know that, by a vote of the representatives of nations of the world assembled in Washington, Canada was one of the two so chosen.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will no doubt remember that prior to the creation of the League of Nations there existed in Switzerland what was known as the International Labour Office. Different countries were entitled to send representatives to that conference each year. Is there any privilege or right which the Dominions may have to-day under the League of Nations which they had not, prior to the establishment of the League, in connection with the International Labour Office?

Mr. ROWELL: The two organizations are entirely different.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the difference?

Mr. ROWELL: The International Labour Office in Switzerland was a purely voluntary organization, the sole purpose of which was to promote international co-operation in matters of labour legislation and questions of interest to labour. The International Labour Organization under the provisions of the Peace Treaty, has a very important jurisdiction in dealing with labour problems and in imposing certain obligations upon the Governments concerned.

Mr. FIELDING: Has it power to enforce them?

Mr. ROWELL: Perhaps it would be desirable to discuss the whole question of the work of the International Labour Conference at Washington, on some other occasion when we have time to go into the entire labour situation. I shall be very glad to do so on the estimates of the Department of Labour, or when some other suitable occasion offers.

Mr. McKENZIE: Was the United States of America represented at the Labour Conference at Washington? If it was, was it represented by virtue of the Treaty of Peace which it has so far refused to ratify?

Mr. ROWELL: The United States was not officially represented at that conference. Under the terms of the Treaty, the conference was to be called by President Wilson, and he did call it, with the approval of Congress. The United States was not represented under the terms of the Treaty, but on the invitation of the Organization Committee of the Conference, and with the approval of President Wilson, Mr. Wilson, Secretary of Labour in the government of President Wilson, accepted the position of Presiding Officer of the Conference. The Conference passed a resolution inviting representatives of the employers and employees of the United States to be present at the conference and to take part in its discussions, and pursuant to that resolution organized labour in the United States nominated Mr. Gompers as their representative to be present at the conference. Mr. Gompers was present and did take part in the discussions, although he was present only on a limited number of occasions. Apart from that the United States was not represented at the conference.

Mr. EULER: Was it eligible for representation on the governing body?

Mr. ROWELL: No, the United States was not eligible for representation, and I should perhaps add, in that connection, that when it came to a question of electing the six representatives of labour on the governing body—Mr. Draper of Canada was elected as one of the number. So that at the present time Canada is represented by two members on the governing body. It is only right to say, in this connection, that Mr. Draper recognizes that if the United States comes into the International Labour Organization organized labour in the United States should be represented and Mr. Draper will make way for Mr. Gompers as head of the American Federation of Labour. That was understood among the labour delegates at the conference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has Mr. Draper any authority to bind this country in any way in regard to any action which he may take?

Mr. ROWELL: None whatever.

Mr. FIELDING: Then, what good comes of it?

Mr. ROWELL: With all deference to my hon. friend, I may say that great good comes of it. Both the governing body and the conference deal with questions of labour affecting Canada as well as all other countries. Now, while one may have the greatest respect for the representatives of Great Britain who attend this conference, I venture to say that neither employers nor employees of Great Britain are in a position to present the viewpoint of Canadian industry or Canadian labour, and that is of great importance, when questions come up for consideration, that the Canadian viewpoint should be presented in regard to both employers and employees.

Mr. FIELDING: With what result?

Mr. ROWELL: With the same result as would attend the representations of any other member, so far as discussion is concerned, and with the same right to vote as any other member.

Mr. FIELDING: Without power to bind the Dominion? They have merely the right to express their private opinions.

Mr. ROWELL: Not only that but they have power to take part in the proceedings.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my hon. friend appears to be desirous that the Canadian point of view shall be presented to the Conference, I wish he would make clear to the House wherein Canada's status is changed from what it was under the old system whereby different countries sent representatives to an International Labour Conference. I remember having the privilege of representing the Government of Canada at one of the International Labour Conferences. I think that the powers given me then were quite as considerable as the powers given to any representative under the League of Nations. If there is any difference I wish my hon. friend would explain it so that the House may understand wherein Canada's status is altered one way or the other.

Mr. ROWELL: Although I will answer my hon. friend's question, I am not concerned in discussing how Canada's status is altered. What I am concerned with is to make clear Canada's status in the League of Nations and in the International Labour organization. I thought I had answered my hon. friend before by saying that the two organizations were entirely different, that one was a voluntary organization without any powers whatever except to confer and to agree if possible on certain matters submitted by their consideration. Under the labour convention the powers go beyond that. Perhaps, in view of the question raised I had better explain what these powers are although I had not intended doing so at this time. My hon. friend will recall that under the provisions of the labour clauses of the Peace Treaty these conferences are to be held once a year and an agenda is to be prepared of the subjects which are to come up for consideration at the conference. To illustrate, I will give you some of the questions that came up at the Washington Conference. The Peace Conference in Paris settled the agenda for the Washington Conference. That agenda was as follows:

1. Application of principle of the 8-hours day or of the 48-hours week.
2. Question of preventing or providing against unemployment.
3. Women's employment:
   (a) Before and after child-birth, including the question of maternity benefit;
   (b) During the night;
   (c) In unhealthy processes.
4. Employment of children:
   (a) Minimum age of employment;
   (b) During the night;
   (c) In unhealthy processes.
5. Extension and application of the International Conventions adopted at Berne in 1906 on the prohibition of night work for women employed in industry and the prohibition of the use of white phosphorous in the manufacture of matches.

These were the matters with which the Washington Conference had to deal.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is that agenda different in any particular from the agenda of the International Labour office? It seems to be exactly the same.

Mr. ROWELL: The International Labour office might adopt any agenda it chose.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the agenda that the International Labour office had been adopting for years.

Mr. ROWELL: Well, they did not achieve results.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. That very matter of phosphorus, which is dealt with, was taken up at the conference held at Basle, Switzerland, and as a result of the convention arrived at a Bill was introduced into this House and passed. That was the proceeding under the old International Labour office. I would like my hon. friend to explain wherein this present body is going to act in any different way or wherein it has power to go beyond that?

Mr. ROWELL: Take the very point that my hon. friend mentions; why does it appear on this agenda?—because although some countries may have adopted legislation as a result of the Basle conference, the convention was not adopted by all the nations represented there, and it is necessary to have further action taken. What are the powers of the labour conference. Take the eight-hour day and the forty-eight hour week. I mention this as an illustration simply because it was the one that excited the greatest interest. The conference appointed a commission, consisting of five representatives of governments, five representatives of employers and five representatives of employees. They met, considered the whole question, and finally agreed upon the terms of a draft international convention covering the question of the eight-hour day and the forty-eight hour week. I do not now intend discussing these terms because I am only discussing the procedure. Upon the convention being submitted to the Conference, for the final vote, it was adopted by a two-thirds vote. Then it became an obligation on all members of the Conference, whether they approved or disapproved of the terms of the convention to sumbit the convention to the competent legislative authority in their respective countries for action. The obligation is to submit the convention for consideration and the action which is finally taken must depend upon the public opinion in the countries concerned. But it does ensure that the convention shall go before competent legislative authority in each country for consideration and action.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There can be no final, binding effect except with the approval of the parliaments of the different countries concerned?

Mr. ROWELL: That is all and I submit that was all it was wise to do.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly.

Mr. ROWELL: They were not constituting, as some of the continental representatives desired, an international industrial or labour parliament with power to enact legislation binding all the nations of the world. They only went so far and no farther, namely, that each government should obligate itself to submit this convention to the competent legislative authority.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is exactly what was done under the old International Labour office.

Mr. ROWELL: All right, then; if my hon. friend was satisfied with that, he should be entirely satisfied with this.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am.

Mr. ROWELL: Under these circumstances I do not see what is to be gained by labouring the point.

Mr. EULER: Might I ask the minister whether the necessary two-thirds vote was obtained on the eight-hour day?

Mr. ROWELL: It was carried by a vote of 90 to 2.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It has no effect in so far as this country is concerned until the legislatures of the different provinces act upon it?

Mr. ROWELL: It has no effect in so far as this country is concerned until it is submitted to the competent legislative authority of this country.

Mr. EULER: The Government is under obligation to bring in legislation on that matter?

Mr. ROWELL: The Government is obligated to submit it to competent legislative authority. I do not want now to enter into the discussion. We will have plenty of opportunities of discussing the question of the eight-hour day and other matters and I do not think it is well to enter upon that discussion when we are dealing with other matters at this time. Now, I wish to go back to the first matter with which I was dealing and to say that in both the League of Nations and the International Labour organization Canada has the same status in the assembly and the conference as has every other member of these assemblies. Canada is also eligible for election to the council of the League and to the governing body of the international organization. In the labour organization Canada was actually elected a member of the governing body. The question of her status is not theory; it is a question of actual accomplished fact.

Our position and status in the League has been called in question by the reservations which have been adopted in the American Senate, and I think it is only right that I should bring the matter to the attention of the House, because it is a matter of vital concern to Canada. The reservation dealing with voting rights is generally known as the Lenroot Reservation. It is as follows:

> The United States assumes no obligations to be bound by any election, decision, report, or finding of the Council or Assembly in which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of the empire in the aggregate gives more than one vote, and assumes no obligation to be bound by any decision, report, or finding of the Council or Assembly arising out of any dispute between the United States and any member of the League, if such member, or any self-governing Dominion, colony or part of empire united with it politically has voted.

Hon. members will see that this reservation contains two distinct proposals. First, the United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any election, decision or report in any dispute before the Council or Assembly in which any member of the League and its self-governing Dominions give more than one vote. The second part of the reservation deals with a dispute to which the United States is a party, and it states that it will not obligate itself to be bound in any such dispute if more than one vote is given by any member of the League and any self-governing Dominions or Colonies politically united with it.

With the latter part of the reservation there is no ground of complaint, because it simply sets out what we understand to be the effect and meaning of the Covenant as it stands. It is the first part of the reservation to which we cannot accede, because it challenges our whole position and status in the League. If the United States can claim that it is under no obligation to be bound by any decision in any dispute in which it is not a party, then all the other nations should be entitled to take the same position.

That reservation has since been somewhat modified, and as recently voted on in the Senate is in this form:

Until Part I, being the covenant of the League of Nations, shall be so amended as to provide that the United States shall be entitled to cast a number of votes equal to that which any member of the League and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire in the aggregate shall be entitled to cast, the United States assumes no obligation to be bound, except in cases where Congress has previously given its consent, by any election, decision, report, or finding of the Council or Assembly in which any member of the League and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire in the aggregate have cast more than one vote.

In considering this reservation, Mr. Speaker, one must bear in mind the terms of the preamble, which, as originally drafted, was as follows:—

That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the Treaty of Peace with Germany concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, subject to the following reservations and understandings, which are hereby made a part, and condition of this resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted by an exchange of notes as a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by at least three of the four Principal Allied and Associated Powers, to wit, Great Britain, France, Italy and Japan.

Subsequently Mr. Lodge gave notice of the following amended resolving clause:

That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the Treaty of Peace with Germany concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, subject to the following reservations and understandings, which are hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted as a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by the Allied and Associated Powers, and a failure on the part of the Allied and Associated Powers to make objection to said reservations and understandings prior to the deposit of ratification by the United States shall be taken as a full and final acceptance of such reservations and understandings by said Powers.

The effect of this resolving clause is that none of the reservations that may be adopted by the United States Senate, can go into effect unless they are accepted by all the Allied and Associated Powers. And they may be accepted by the Allied and Associated Powers by the failure of any one of these Powers to dissent within the time mentioned in the resolving clause.

If, therefore, final action, should be taken in the form now proposed, the question which would face every nation party to the Covenant would be: Whether they would or would not assent to the reservations proposed by the United States. If they failed to dissent their assent would be presumed. It is on that account that Canada feels that there is only one possible course open to her, namely, that if any country should say that its ratification of the Treaty was conditioned upon our assenting to our own position being impaired, our status challenged, and our right to vote denied, we as a self-respecting people could not give that consent. Mr. Speaker, we all recognize the great importance of the United States coming into the League of Nations. No country is more interested in the United States coming in than Canada. We should be the last people in the world to put any obstacle in the way of her entry. I am sure that is the sentiment of the country and of the House. But if the United States should finally say: "We will only come in on condition that you practically get out or have your status impaired," we can only reply: "Well, you have a perfect right to say that if you choose, but we, as a self-respecting people, have an equal right to say that we cannot accede to your terms." This position the Government has made perfectly clear to the proper authorities.

What is the constitutional position of Canada in relation to the other portions of the Empire at the present time? Some hon. members have said: "You should not change the constitution in any respect without first submitting the matter to Parliament." With a written constitution you could submit to Parliament any change which required legislative sanction. But the constitution of the British Empire is not embodied in any document. It is not a dead thing; it is a living thing. It grows from day to day and from year to year; it develops to meet exigencies and new conditions as they arise. That has been the history of the development of the British constitution.

Mr. CANNON: Is not our constitution a written constitution?

Mr. ROWELL: We are working under the British North America Act, but that is not the whole constitution of the British Empire.

Mr. CANNON: Have we any other?

Mr. ROWELL: We have very important rights outside the British North America Act, as I shall be glad to show my hon. friend. Up to time that the British North America Act was passed in 1867 and for many years thereafter, none of the Dominions were taken into consultation by the representatives of the Mother Country in matters of common Imperial concern. The first time they were called in consultation was in 1887, twenty years after Confederation, when the first Colonial Conference was held. That was not a formal gathering such as the Imperial Conference later became, but it was attended by representatives of the different self-governing colonies of the British Empire, as they were then called. It was the initiation of co-operation between what were then called the colonies and the Mother Country on an Empire-wide scale. Because of its significance I wish to quote a few words from the Marquis of Salisbury, then Prime Minister of Great Britain, on the occasion of the initiation of this movement for co-operation and consultation throughout the Empire. He said:

> We all feel the gravity and importance of this occasion. The decisions of this Conference may not be, for the moment, of vital importance; the business may seem prosaic, and may not issue in any great results at the moment. But we are all sensible that this meeting is the beginning of a state of things which is to have great results in the future. It will be the parent of a long progeniture, and distant councils of the Empire may, in some far-off time, look back to the meeting in this room as the root from which all their greatness and all their beneficence sprang.

In that historic statement the Marquis of Salisbury saw into the future. He saw that the time would come when there would be co-operation between the Mother Country and the Dominions along lines much more important, far-reaching and significant to the future of the Empire and of the world than that which was exemplified by the preliminary meeting held in 1887.

The next important step in the development of our constitutional relations was in 1897 when the first Conference, attended by the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was held. You will remember that in the session of the Canadian Parliament in 1897 the Government decided to grant the British Preference. That could not go into effect by reason of the existence of the Belgian and German treaties, and the matter was taken up during the sessions of the Imperial Conference in 1897. Speaking from recollection, I believe that a resolution was passed at that Conference urging the Mother Country to denounce those treaties. At that Conference it was agreed by the Mother Country that the treaties should be denounced, and they were denounced accordingly. When the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier returned to Canada after that meeting of the Colonial Conference he stated in very clear and very vigorous language what he conceived to be the result of that development. Speaking in Montreal, Toronto, and other parts of Canada, he declared that by the action of the British Government in denouncing these treaties Canada had become a nation and that her name was known throughout Europe and the world. The Conference of 1897 marked a great advance over the Colonial Conference of 1887.

Ten years more elapsed.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Do I understand the minister to say that as a result of these conferences and the fact that they are being held from time to time they have become part of our constitution? Suppose the British ceased to call these conferences, what would we do about it? What right have we to interfere?

Mr. ROWELL: There is a difference between legal right and constitutional authority. There is nothing binding Great Britain to summon these conferences; we could not compel her to do so. But it has become the settled policy of the British Empire to summon these conferences; and the basis upon which they are now called is a resolution passed at the Conference of 1907, assented to by the Mother Country and all the Governments of the self-governing Dominions. It is quite true that the British Government could ignore this resolution, just as they could repeal the British North America Act. They have the legal right to do so, but they have no constitutional authority to do so, it would provoke a revolution if they exercised their legal right so far as the British North America Act is concerned. No man in the British Parliament would be insane enough to make such a suggestion.

Mr. CANNON: Does the minister contend that Great Britain has not the constitutional authority not only to amend but even to repeal the British North America Act?

Mr. ROWELL: I said she had the legal right, but she has no constitutional authority to do so, because she has recognized now for nearly half a century the rights and privileges given us by the British North America Act.

Mr. CANNON: Does not the British North America Act exist simply as a law of the British Parliament?

Mr. ROWELL: The British Parliament has in theory the legal right to impose taxation on Canada. That is, the constitution of the Empire has never been changed so as to take away from the Imperial Parliament, its legal right to legislate for the whole Empire. But they have no constitutional authority to legislate for Canada, they have no right to levy taxes on the self-governing Dominions. That is recognized by every statesman of the Empire; it is questioned by no one. No publicist, no man in Great Britain with any respect for his opinion, would venture to suggest that the British Parliament had any such constitutional right.

Now, at the Colonial Conference of 1907, also attended by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, it was decided to change the name from "Colonial Conference" to "Imperial Conference" and to give it permanent form. The following is the resolution:

That it will be to the advantage of the Empire if a conference, to be called the Imperial Conference, is held every four years, at which questions of common interest may be discussed and considered as between His Majesty's Government and His Governments of the Self-governing Dominions beyond the seas.

The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom will be ex officio President, and the Prime Minister of the self-governing Dominions ex officio members, of the conference. The Secretary of State for the Colonies will be ex officio member of the conference and will take the chair in the absence of the president. He will arrange for such Imperial Conference after communication with the Prime Ministers of the respective Dominions.

Provision is made for a permanent secretariat, and that the conference shall meet once every five years. This resolution marked a great advance in the development of what one might describe as the constitution of the Empire. During the twenty year period from 1887 to 1907, the more or less casual meetings of the Colonial Conference for consultation had developed into a settled organization with fixed periods of meeting, and with certain defined subjects of common Imperial interest for consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. gentleman speaks of constitutional right. Would not the term "constitutional practice" be more appropriate?

Mr. ROWELL: I am not concerned which term my hon. friend uses, because under the British constitution, constitutional practice develops into and becomes constitutional right, generates constitutional right. They become the conventions of the constitution and are just as binding, so far as the actual practice is concerned, as if we had a written constitution. It is because this constitutional practice can be developed into constitutional right, that the constitution of the Empire has proved itself so adaptable to meet all the changing needs and varying conditions which have surrounded the Empire in the course of its history.

In 1917, there was another and still more important constitutional development. In 1917 the Prime Minister of Great Britain called together the ministers of the self-governing Dominions for consultation on vital matters of policy—relating to the prosecution of the war. They met as equals as Prime Ministers of the nations of the Empire, to discuss matters of common concern to the whole Empire. Great Britain recognized that with the growth in power and influence of the Dominions, the time had come when the Government of Great Britain should frankly recognize that the Dominions had ceased to be in any sense States dependent upon the Mother Country, and had become sister nations, standing on an equality with the Mother Country. It does not require, as I have already pointed out, any enactment of the Imperial Parliament to bring about that change; it has come about as a matter of constitutional practice. But certain constitutional adjustments will be necessary and provision was made for calling a constitutional conference in the future, as follows:

The Imperial War Conference are of opinion that the readjustment of the constitutional relations of the component parts of the Empire is too important and intricate a subject to be dealt with during the war, and that it should form the subject of a special Imperial Conference to be summoned as soon as possible after the cessation of hostilities.

They deem it their duty, however, to place on record their view that any such readjustment, while thoroughly preserving all existing powers of self-government and complete control of domestic affairs, should be based upon a full recognition of the Dominions as autonomous nations of an Imperial Commonwealth, and of India as an important portion of the same, should recognize the right of the Dominions and India to an edequate voice in foreign policy and in foreign relations, and should provide effective arrangements for continuous consultation in all important matters of common Imperial concern, and for such necessary concerted action, founded on consultation, as the several Governments may determine.

I hold in my hand the report of the War Cabinet of the Government of Great Britain for the year 1918, and under the heading "Imperial Affairs" on page 7, I find the following statement:

The common effort and sacrifice in the war have inevitably led to the recognition of an equality of status between the responsible Governments of the Empire. This equality has long been acknowledged in principle, and found its adequate expression in 1917 in the creation or rather the natural coming into being of an Imperial War Cabinet as an instrument for evolving a common Imperial policy in the conduct of the war. The nature of the constitutional development involved in the establishment as a permanent institution of the Imperial Cabinet system, was clearly explained by Sir Robert Borden in a speech to the Empire Parliamentary Association on the 21st of June, 1918.

The following is the extract from Sir Robert Borden's speech as set out in this official document of the British Government:

A very great step in the constitutional development of the Empire was taken last year by the Prime Minister when he summoned the Prime Ministers of the overseas Dominions to the Imperial War Cabinet. We meet there on terms of perfect equality. We meet there as Prime Ministers of self-governing nations. We meet there under the leadership and the presidency of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. After all, my Lord Chancellor and Gentlemen, the British Empire, as it is at present constituted, is a very modern organization. It is perfectly true that it is built up on the development of centuries, but, as it is constituted to-day, both in territory and in organization, it is a relatively modern affair. Why, it is only 75 years since responsible government was granted to Canada. It is only little more than fifty years since the first experiment in Federal Government,—in a Federal Constitution,—was undertaken in this Empire. And from that we went on, in 1871, to representation in negotiating our Commercial Treaties, in 1878, to complete fiscal autonomy, and after that to complete fiscal control and the negotiation of our own treaties. But we have always lacked the full status of nationhood, because you exercised here a so-called trusteeship, under which you undertook to deal with foreign relations on our behalf, and sometimes without consulting us very much. Well, that day has gone by. We come here as we came last year, to deal with all these matters, upon terms of perfect equality with the Prime Minister of the Unitel Kingdom and his colleagues. It has been said that the term Imperial War Cabinet is a misnomer. The word 'Cabinet' is unknown to the law. The meaning of 'Cabinet' has developed from time to time. I see no incongruity whatever in applying the term 'Cabinet' to the association of Prime Ministers and other ministers who meet around a common council board to debate and to determine the various needs of the Empire. If I should attempt to describe it, I should say it is a Cabinet of Governments. Every Prime Minister who sits around that board is responsible to his own parliament and to his own people; the conclusions of the War Cabinet can only be carried out by the parliaments of the different nations of our Imperial Commonwealth. Thus, each Dominion, each nation, retains its perfect autonomy. I venture to believe, and I thus expressed myself last year, that in this may be found the genesis of a development in the constitutional relation of the Empire, which will form the basis of its unity in the years to come.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So that we may appreciate the significance of the matter, I should like to ask my hon. friend who speaks of equality of status amongst the self-governing Dominions of the Empire, whether that means that Canada's status is the same as that of Australia or South Africa.

Mr. ROWELL: And New Zealand?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What about India?

Mr. ROWELL: And of the United Kingdom. India's position is not the same.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In what way does it differ?

Mr. ROWELL: Because India, as a nation, is not completely self-governing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What about Newfoundland?

Mr. ROWELL: Newfoundland is completely self-governing and under the terms of the covenant of the League of Nations, Newfoundland will be entitled to apply for admission to the League.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is not India given a place?

Mr. ROWELL: India is given a place by the Peace Conference itself. Therefore, her status cannot be challenged; but it is by virtue of the place given her in the League by the Peace Conference that she acquires her rights.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it not correct that in the League of Nations Canada's status is not different from that of India?

Mr. ROWELL: Canada's status is not different from that of the other members of the League. Once they are members of the League by international recognition and consent, as embodied in the Treaty, they have the same rights.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I understand the minister correctly, he informs the House now that Canada's status as regards the League of Nations is identical with that of India.

Mr. ROWELL: No, I did not say so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But is not that true?

Mr. ROWELL: Once a nation is in the League, then under the terms of the League Covenant, it possesses all the rights of membership; but if India had not been admitted by unanimous consent by delegates at the Peace Conference, she would not be entitled to admission under the terms of the Covenant and Canada would. If Canada had not been named in the Treaty Canada would be eligible for membership under the provision for admission of new States. India would not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I get this perfectly clear? At the present time has Canada in the League of Nations any rights or privileges which India has not?

Mr. ROWELL: Surely I cannot make myself any clearer that every member of the League of Nations has the same rights.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then they have the same rights and privileges.

Mr. ROWELL: India, by special agreement of all the nations, has been given the same right in the League as France, Great Britain, the United States, every other nation.

I presume that the reason why India has been given this exceptional treatment is because of the size of India—a nation of 300 millions—secondly, because of the part India took in the war, the magnificent contribution her troops made to the war, particularly in the East; thirdly, by reason of the fact that at that time there was before the Imperial House of Commons a proposal which has since become law under which India, in some important respects at least, obtains the right to manage her own affairs—the greatest experiment in the devolution of power from the Crown to the people which Great Britain has ever undertaken. By reason of these exceptional conditions a special case was made of India, and she was admitted as a member of the League; but, as I said, if she had not been admitted she would not have been qualified for membership under the terms and conditions on which new members can be admitted. Canada is qualified; Canada comes within the qualifications. If she had not been named in the Covenant, she would have been entitled to apply for admission, and should have been admitted. Therefore, their status is not the same.

Mr. CANNON: The minister has mentioned the Imperial War Cabinet. Is it his opinion that under our constitution there can be a cabinet without a Parliament to which that cabinet is responsible?

Mr. ROWELL: As that point is discussed in the extract from the speech of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) I do not think it is necessary for me to take up the time of the House to deal with it now. My hon. friend will be able to read the extract in Hansard.

I have pointed out the status which the Dominions have under the treaty. I want also to point out that the position the Government of Canada has taken on this matter is fully supported by the Governments of the other Dominions. I have before me the debate in the South African Assembly on the Peace Treaty and the statement of General Smuts. It is exactly to the same effect as the statement made by the Prime Minister and members of the Government to this House, namely, that the British Empire had become a commonwealth of nations, equal under a common sovereign. It is interesting to note that the objections made in the South African Parliament by Mr. Hertzog and his Nationalist associates were almost the same as those made in this Parliament, and the reply of General Smuts to the criticism of the treaty is substantially on the same lines as the reply of the Government to criticism of the treaty here. In view of the position of General Smuts as a great constitutional lawyer, and of the part he took in framing the Covenant of the League of Nations, and also as the Prime Minister of one of the other dominions of the Empire, I am sure hon. members would like to have his statement upon Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: The remarks I made a moment ago apply also to this document. It can only be put upon Hansard with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. ROWELL: In moving the resolution to approve the treaty, General Smuts said:

The hon. gentleman who argued the previous motion last asked the question why there should be ratification by us, seeing that the British Parliament has already ratified this? He asked why we should trouble ourselves about this at all. Was it necessary for us, he asked, or was this merely a sham to put before His Majesty the King. Hon. members by arguing that way only show that they do not know what the constitutional position is to-day. We have nothing to do with the ratification by the British Parliament. We signed this Treaty in Paris through the Prime Minister and the Minister of Defence but His Majesty the King wishes the authority of the Union Parliament to ratify this. The King is not going to be influenced by the ratification given by the British House of Commons, and therefore the position is this, that until we have given the ratification which is necessary, until all the British Dominions who have signed this have agreed to this ratification, we are, so far as the British Empire is concerned, hanging up this final exchange which is necessary before this Treaty is brought into force. . . . . .

I remember when the report of our National Convention was made I made the statement that the most important thing about that document was the list of signatures at the end of it. And it is very much the same in regard to the Peace Treaty. For the first time in history the British Dominions signed a great international instrument, not only along with the other ministers of the King, but with the other ministers of the great powers of the world—(Hear, hear) —and although the tremendous importance of this great act has not yet been fully recognized there is no doubt that this Treaty, signed as it has been with parties to it not only representative of the King in the British Isles, but in the Dominions, forms one of the most important landmarks in the history of the British Empire. . . . The British Dominions did not fight for status. They went to war from a sense of duty, from their common interests with the rest of the world, vindicating the great principles of free human government. Not only has victory been achieved for the objects for which they fought, but, what for the British Dominions is equally precious, they have achieved international recognition of their status among the nations of the world. In a large sense this world is one of small nations, and certainly none of those had had larger results accruing to them from this war than the young nations of the British Empire. They have deserved this through the magnitude of their efforts. It has been proved and has never been challenged that two of the British Dominions—Canada and Australia—made a greater war effort than any other powers below the rank of first-class powers. Their achievements have been outstanding ones. Australia alone lost more than the U.S.A. They have, of course, lost heavily; they are handicapped with enormous debt, but they have at any rate emerged with victory, honour, and a new standing in the world in that they are internationally recognized to-day. No wonder after what they have done that their great performance all through the war, and especially towards the end of it the other powers and nations of the world were only too willing to welcome and recognize them within the new great family. It took some time for the position to be realized at Paris, because so many of the powers were under the same impression which, according to the debate in the House that afternoon, appeared to exist in South Africa, viz., that everything seemed to be under tutelage of the British Parliament and Government. They could not realize the new situation arising, and that the British Empire, instead of being one central government, consisted of a league of free states, free, equal and working together for the great ideals of human government. It was difficult to make people realize this, but afterwards they fully applauded, and their approval was given as embodied in this international document. No doubt new forms would have to be made. No one recognized this more strongly than the British Government itself, but, whatever the forms, there was no doubt whatever about the substance of the new status of the Dominions.

There is the other aspect—the recognition which is thereby given to British Dominions in the League. The British Dominions are equal members, both in the Assembly and also with a full right to be elected into the Council of the League. The Council consists of five great powers now, together with the representatives of four smaller powers, and among the latter which have to be elected on the Council of the League the British Dominions have the same right as any other power to be elected. I see in the American Senate some difficulty has arisen about that, and they think that it is giving too large a vote to the British Empire. There is no doubt that there are British Dominions important enough in the near future to secure a seat on the Inner Council, and I can well understand that in other parts of the world this enormous preponderance which the British Empire will enjoy, and which may be accentuated, is not looked upon with very great favour. This matter of our status in the League of Nations was not one of the original conceptions of it. It took the British delegation at Paris a good deal of time to hammer out this new machinery for the recognition of young nations. The Dominions felt very strongly that here was their chance, and that if there was to be a League of Nations on which the nations were to be equally represented, then that League should include the British Dominions. We were determined to see that that recognition was given to us, but we were equally anxious to see that nothing was done which would loosen the ties which bind together the British Empire. (Cheers.) We kept both these things clearly before our eyes. Still, we wanted our equality with the rest of the world recognized. We also wanted to remain in the British League of Nations, which has worked with such enormous success in the past—(cheers)—and has worked together in this war, probably becoming the real organizer of victory for all the Allies and the rest of the world. (Cheers.)

Fears have been expressed in certain quarters, and fears have been given expression to in South Africa, that the ultimate tendency of the League of Nations would be to break up the British Empire, but that is an entirely misleading idea. On the contrary, I can well imagine great dominions arising which may be as important as Great Britain in the world, and if that motion had been dropped there would have been a danger of the breaking up of the British Empire. We have secured an inner League, and the world has agreed to it.

In his speech in reply on the resolution General Smuts stated:

As regards the question of status, General Smuts said that until last year British ministers had signed all documents and dealt with all matters affecting the Dominions. But a change had come about in Paris, when representatives of the Dominions had, on behalf of the King, for the first time signed that great document on behalf of the Dominions. The change was that in future the representatives of the Dominions would act for the Dominions. This precedent had now been laid down for the future. The British Constitution was most elastic, and the precedent might bring about the greatest changes. Where in the past British ministers could have acted for the Dominions, in future ministers of the Union would act for the Union. The change was a far-reaching one which would alter the whole basis of the British Empire. In future all parts of the British Empire stood on exactly the same basis. (General Hertzog: In the past you would have been put in prison for saying that.)

There was no misconception among British statesmen as to what the position was, and it was on that basis that matters had been agreed to in Paris. . . . . The Dominions of the Empire would in future, therefore, stand on a basis of absolute equality. The British Empire would, therefore, be a league in which all the Dominions would be on an equal basis as regarded their Governments. The Prime Minister repeated that in the League of Nations, all the Dominions, with England, would stand on an equal footing, and would be recognized as such. The only difference would be that England would be a permanent member of the Central Council. Therefore, in future all parts of the Empire would equally be consulted in matters of war and peace.

I shall not take up the time of the House to quote Mr. Hughes or Mr. Massey, who took exactly the same position. Not only is that the position taken by the statesmen of the self-governing Dominions, but it is the position taken by the Government of Great Britain itself in reference to the effect of the Treaty of Peace. I have the statement of Lord Milner, Secretary of State for the Colonies made in an official statement issued by the Government of Great Britain, I shall be glad if it can be put upon Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must again draw the attention of the House to the fact that it is most unusual to incorporate in Hansard any document that has not been read in the House, but in view of the importance of this document, I take it that the House consents to its being incorporated in Hansard.

Mr. ROWELL: Lord Milner's statement is as follows:

The Peace Treaty recently made in Paris was signed on behalf of the British Empire by ministers of the self-governing Dominions as well as by British ministers. They were all equally plenipotentiaries of His Majesty the King, who was the "High Contracting Party" for the whole Empire.

This procedure illustrates the new constitution of the Empire, which has been gradually growing up for many years past. The United Kingdom and the Dominions are partner nations; not yet, indeed, of equal power, but for good and all of equal status. A time may come when one or more of these Dominions will equal or even surpass the United Kingdom in wealth and population, as they already surpass it in geographical extent. It is the paramount duty of British statesmanship to see to it that the free union between them and us, which has been so gloriously maintained during the war, shall be continued and strengthened in the years to come. If we are successful in that effort, the "Commonwealth of British Nations" will be the greatest instrument of peace and progress, the strongest influence making for freedom and civilization that the world has ever seen.

MAINTAINING WAR UNITY.

During the war unity of policy between the self-governing states of the Empire was maintained by means of the "Imperial War Cabinet," and during the peace negotiations in Paris by the "British Empire delegation." In both these bodies Dominion ministers and British ministers sat and deliberated freely together, under the presidency of the British Prime Minister, and the policy of the Empire was thus shaped by consultation between representatives of all its self-governing states.

FUTURE CO-OPERATION.

We have still to devise the means whereby this fruitful co-operation may be preserved in future, and the several independent nations of the Empire may always consult and act together on great international issues. The surest guarantee that such means will be found lies in a growing intimacy of intercourse between them. To foster that intimacy, to strengthen all the moral and material bonds which unite the different parts of the Empire, is a task to which we must constantly apply ourselves with the utmost energy. It is rendered easier by the progress of science, by inventions such as wireless telegraphy, the airship, and the aeroplane, which tend to annihilate distance. The encouragement of trade within the Empire, of migration within the Empire, the progressive improvement of means of communication by sea and air, are the methods by which we must seek to strengthen that community of interest and of sentiment, which is the only sure foundation of Imperial unity.

I have quoted these statements to show that there is complete unanimity between the Government of Great Britain and the governments of the Dominions as to the constitutional status of the different nations of the Empire. It is not a question of conflict of opinion or authority. All are agreed that the status is one of equality, that we are nations all equal in status, though not of equal power, under a common sovereign, and bound together by interest and sentiment, by ties which, though light as air, are strong as iron in binding together this League of Nations which we call the British Empire or the Britannic Commonwealth.

It goes without saying that there must be some constitutional readjustments in order to put into more practical and workable form the new situation that has developed, and it was in order that that might be done that provision was made in the year 1917 for the calling of a special Imperial Conference. When that conference is held—we do not know yet when it will be called—these questions must come up for consideration, and the representatives of Canada and the other dominions will attend, not as representatives of inferior or dependent nations, but as representatives of nations which by unanimous agreement are equal in status with the Mother Country. Canada's representatives will attend the conference, not for the purpose of creating any new Imperial organization, but for the purpose of developing a system of consultation and co-operation which will absolutely preserve the autonomy of the dominions, and at the same time enable matters in which the dominions are vitally concerned to receive that attention and consideration by the dominions which, under the existing system, it is not possible to give them. I am sure all citizens of Canada desire to see this result secured.

What are the alternatives we must face if our position in the League could be successfully challenged? We may go back into the old colonial position where the Mother Country would deal with all matters of foreign policy and settle for us the issues of peace and war, matters in which we are vitally interested. That, to my mind, is unthinkable. It is incredible that a young nation like Canada, with the achievements of this war to her credit and with the future opening before her, will ever consent to occupy a dependent position with reference to any country.

Then, Mr. Speaker, what is the other alternative? If we cannot stand on an equality within the Empire, the other alternative is Canadian independence. I say—and in this I voice the sentiment of the Government—that we stand unhesitatingly and unequivocally for the maintenance of the British connection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why does my hon. friend limit that position to the Government? Why not say this Parliament?

Mr. ROWELL: I believe that is the position of this Parliament; I did not wish to convey any inference that any one differed. If we do not proceed along the line of equality of status and co-operation under a common sovereign, I submit that there are just two alternatives: Either dependency, with Great Britain controlling our foreign policy and the issues of peace or war, or independence, and we will not accept either alternative. If the reservation I have read, or anything similar in character, should be adopted finally by the Senate and approved by the President, and if it is stipulated as a condition of the ratification going into effect, that all the Allied Powers, parties to the Treaty, shall give their consent, and Canada gives her consent, she is relegated back into a colonial position and has not a voice and a vote among the nations of the world. That position is unthinkable; and we must, if we are to preserve our position and status and the unity of the British Empire, maintain our place in the family of nations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the hon. member say that any action of the United States could alter the status of this country in the League of Nations?

Mr. ROWELL: Not unless we consent. If they submit as a condition of their ratification going into effect that we must consent, then the Government will not consent. In the exercise of our sovereign right to control our own affairs, we will not give our consent; hence the importance of Parliament standing behind the Government of Canada on this issue. Desiring, as we do, that there should be no misunderstanding, we thought the best way to avoid misunderstanding was to make our position clear, and this we have done to the proper authorities.

Mr. CANNON: Suppose Great Britain should accept these reservations, what would be our position?

Mr. ROWELL: I do not believe Great Britain would accept these reservations as against Canada's protest.

Mr. CANNON: But supposing she did?

Mr. ROWELL: If Great Britain did and Canada dissented, as she would do, by filing her dissent, the ratification could not go into effect, because it would not be assented to by all the Allied and Associated Powers.

Mr. FIELDING: Even though assented to by Great Britain? Does my hon. friend claim that the failure of Canada to assent to the reservations would put an end to the whole treaty?

Mr. ROWELL: If the United States insisted on its resolving words, it would put an end to the ratification, because Great Britain has no right to give consent on behalf of Canada.

Mr. FIELDING: Great Britain is a party to the Treaty distinct from Canada. For the purposes of this discussion, Great Britain and Canada are separate nations. The hon. member has asked what would be the effect of Great Britain assenting to the reservations. Surely the effect would be that Great Britain would remain in the League while Canada would leave it.

Mr. ROWELL: That would not be the effect, because Canada is in the League. The League has become effective by the ratification of the treaty and by its formal inauguration, and Canada cannot be put out except by her own consent. And even though the situation in Europe might be such as to influence Great Britain to give her consent, if Canada did not assent, ratification could not go into effect.

Mr. FIELDING: On the part of Canada?

Mr. ROWELL: The hon. member has missed the terms of the resolving clause which I have read. The United States might change its resolving clause so as to accept less than the assent of all the Allied and Associated Powers. Thus far it has not done so. The resolving clause as it stands at present requires the assent of all the Allied and Associated Powers, and if Canada did not assent ratification could not go into effect.

Mr. FIELDING: And the whole treaty would be abortive?

Mr. ROWELL: The treaty is in force to-day. The League of Nations is functioning and is carrying on its work to-day.

Mr. FIELDING: The treaty would cease to be effective as regards Canada if she refused to ratify it.

Mr. ROWELL: I do not wish to be at cross purposes with my hon. friend. I am sure he is only anxious to arrive at the truth, and that is also my desire. Let me go back a step. The treaty is in force by the deposit, of ratification, on January 10, by more than three of the great powers and by Germany. Under the express terms of the treaty it becomes effective on the deposit of these ratifications. The treaty going into effect brings the League of Nations into existence. The League was duly organized on January 16 and is operative to-day. Canada is one of its original members and has all the rights and privileges of every other member of the League. We have every respect for the opinion of the United States, they are entitled to say whether they will or will not come in, but they are not entitled to push us out without our consent, and we cannot be put out otherwise. This is the situation, and it is therefore not a question of our dropping out of the League, for we are already in it. If the United States adopted this clause the misfortune would be that they would come into the League because they had imposed a condition which could not be complied with.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not say that Great Britain will or should accept the reservations. I do not for a moment take that position; but if Great Britain should assent to the Lenroot reservations what would be our position under the treaty?

Mr. ROWELL: If my hon. friend will turn to the treaty he will see that the contracting party, so far as Canada is concerned, is the British Empire by its representative, His Majesty The King. The British Empire is composed of Great Britain, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, etc., and no one nation of that group has the right to give assent for all. The British Empire's assent, having regard to the constitutional practice that has developed, and in view of our acknowledged status cannot be given without our consent.

Mr. FIELDING: That is very debatable.

Mr. ROWELL: In order to avoid argument I read from the statement issued by the British Government itself to the British Parliament (the War Cabinet in part) defining our status. Now, when they made that statement, not only to us but to the British Parliament and to all the Dominions, how can it be contended that the Government of Great Britain could give an assent which would bind Canada even although Canada opposed such assent.

Mr. FIELDING: It is not a question whether they could, but would they?

Mr. ROWELL: I do not for a moment think that they would give an assent that would bind Canada. I feel absolutely confident that I am speaking well within the mark when I say that the British Government would not think of doing such a thing. No public man in Great Britain would entertain such an idea.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the point of my hon. friend's remarks in regard to the United States?

Mr. ROWELL: What I desire to point out, so that the House will appreciate the position, is the fact that should the United States adopt the resolutions now before the Senate, and should the President give his approval, a situation would arise in which the question of the United States coming into the League or not might depend on the action of Canada. It would be a grave responsibility for us, in the face of the serious conditions in Europe and elsewhere, to say that we would not give the necessary consent. But because we believe, Mr. Speaker, that the question goes to the very basis of Canada's national position, and that her future depends upon it, we could not possibly give that consent.

I have felt it desirable to put the House in the possession of all the facts and I am sure we have the unanimous support of the House in maintaining Canada's status in the League of Nations. The adoption of this resolution by the House will be an intimation to the Government that the House approves the position taken by the Government on this matter of such grave importance to Canada.

The position won for Canada by her soldiers on the field of battle, maintained by her statesmen at the Peace Conference, recognized and established by the ratification of the Treaty of Peace, and the formal inauguration of the League the Government of Canada will maintain. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that this stands for discussion.

Mr. ROWELL: I will move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion (Mr. Rowell) agreed to and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

REPORT TABLED.

Report of the Royal Commission on Racetrack Meetings and Betting.—Hon. C. J. Doherty.

A NATIONAL EIGHT-HOUR WORKING DAY.

Resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed Resolution of Mr. Burnham:

That in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that to the extent of the jurisdiction of this Parliament a national eight-hour working day should be established immediately, subject only to the right of express private contract.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE (East Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, last night when six o'clock was called I was in the act of pointing out to the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Proulx) that the existence of shorter hours of labour did not by any means imply a reduction in production, and I was reading a passage from an authority already cited. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to continue the citation.

The last sentence which I gave to the House last night was this:

—that where the human element enters into production, hour reductions by no means necessarily imply a decrease in output. For instance, the Federal Industrial Commission of 1898 made special comparisons between the output of the bituminous coal mines before and after the introduction of the eight-hour day, and found that output even increased under the shorter work day. In Illinois in 1895 and 1896 under the ten-hour system, the average daily output for each mine employee was 2.53 to 3 tons; in 1898, 1899, and 1900, with an eight-hour day, the average output was 3.11 and 3.21 tons, though the proportion of coal mined by machinery was not increased.

In the New England textile industry, also, it was found that the shorter work day consequent upon the enforcement of the ten-hour law improved either the quality or quantity of the output, or both. Similar evidence has been gathered for a number of other industries, showing the beneficial effect of a full day's rest each week. This increase of output through increased efficiency probably largely explains why wages have seldom fallen, but have frequently even risen after a reduction of hours, and why the industries in which wages are highest are often those in which hours are shortest. Practical experience, therefore, gives weight to the old eight-hour league slogan: "Whether you work by the piece or the day, decreasing the hours increases the pay."

Now the principal objection to long hours of labour is that they tend to the breakdown of health, and again I desire to quote the authority in hand, because the mere assertion by one hon. member that a certain condition exists, and the mere contradiction of that assertion by another hon. member, is not going to get us any further with the subject. There is only one way to deal with it, and that is through the investigations which have been made regarding labour conditions. This authority states:

Under modern industrial conditions such excessive hours of work break down health. Even with short hours the strain of modern industry, with its speed, its piece-work, its division of labour, involving the monotonous repetition of the same process, sometimes even of the same movement, is a heavy tax on the worker. But with the eleven or twelve-hour day, or the seven-day week, a man must go back to his job before he has had sufficient rest to recover from the excessive fatigue of the long work period, and a progressive decline in health results. "In my judgment," said a former official of a large steel company, "a large proportion of the steel workers, who from early manhood work 12 hours a day, are old men at forty."

Though it is the health dangers of long hours which are most often emphasized, the lack of leisure for family life, for recreation, for all the requirements of citizenship, is no less an evil. It should not be forgotten that the time spent in going and coming from work and the dinner hour often adds two hours to the length of the work day proper, and that an 11-hour day is likely to mean 13 hours away from home. Said a Pittsburgh steel-worker of the results of such a work day, "Home is where I eat and sleep." The ultimate effects of such hours of labour were thus summed up by the Supreme Court of Georgia, in upholding a Sunday rest law: "Without specific leisure, the process of forming character can only be begun; it can never advance or be completed; people would be merely machines of labour—nothing more."

I claim, Mr. Speaker, that this absolutely refutes the contention of the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Proulx).

I now come back to the general proposition contained in the resolution before the House, that an eight-hour day should be declared in the Dominion of Canada. It appears to me that before you can go into this matter very fully some investigation must be had of all that is necessary to be taken into account, otherwise a declaration of that sort might not meet all the conditions existing in Canada. You have, for instance, the question of child labour, and at first sight one might be led to ask himself: Is there such a thing as child labour in Canada? Answering only for the province of Alberta, I can say that we have a local statute dealing with that particular subject. The question of child labour has been dealt with exhaustively in Europe, and the fight over it has been particularly severe in the United States. Again, in order to impress the House with the true facts of the case, and also to give data upon which we may base any action which may be thought desirable to take, I may be permitted to quote from the same authority what has taken place in the United States, and also to endeavour to show how the corporations there have sought to evade the statute governing child labour. This is the passage I wish to quote:

The first legislative regulation of the hours of labour in this country applied to children. In 1842 a petition was presented to the Massachusetts Legislature by certain citizens of Fall River, who pointed out that the existing hours of labour must be permanently injurious to the health of children and detrimental to their education, and prayed that prohibitory legislation be enacted. The agitation resulted in the passage during the same year of a ten-hour law for children under twelve years of age in manufacturing establishments. In the same year, also, Connecticut enacted a ten-hour law for children under fourteen in cotton and woollen mills.

By the beginning of the Civil war laws limiting the hours of children in manufacturing establishments to ten a day had been enacted in the five additional states of New Hampshire, Maine, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Ohio. The Connecticut statute of 1842 was, however, superseded thirteen years after passage by a new law which set back the limit to eleven hours, followed within a year by an amendment which still further lowered the standard to twelve hours a day. Like the first Connecticut law, the early Pennsylvania laws applied only to textile mills, but in the other states the acts covered manufacturing in general. The ages of the children affected varied from twelve in Massachusetts to twenty-one in New Jersey and Pennsylvania. In addition to the states already mentioned, Rhode Island enacted in 1853 an eleven-hour law for children from twelve to fifteen.

These early laws were, however, to a great extent unenforced and even unenforceable. The still frequent provision, for example, that only violations committed "knowingly" are punishable, which to quote a Government report has "put a premium on ignorance and....serve to balk the intent of so much labour legislation," originated in the Massachusetts law of 1842 and was copied in New Jersey and Rhode Island. In New Hampshire children under fifteen could work longer than the statutory ten hours if provided with the "written consent of the parent or guardian." In New Jersey and in Pennsylvania under the earliest laws, a child could not be "holden or required" to work more than ten hours a day, but if the child worked longer the employer, in order to escape all responsibility, needed only to declare that the extra labour was not required, but voluntary. Ohio even went so far as to legitimatize this subtle distinction by declaring that minors under eighteen might not be "compelled" but that minors under fourteen might not be "permitted" to work more than ten hours. Only in two states were any provisions made for enforcement; in Connecticut constables and grand jurors were to inquire after violations, and in Pennsylvania constables could take action—but only after complaint.

That is what took place in the United States as regards child labour. If I refer particularly to the United States, it is not because in England and in Europe generally there was not the greatest possible abuse in the matter of child labour. Some of you will be astounded to hear the following statement of an historian with regard to the development of child labour in Europe:

Terrible cruelty characterized much of the development of industrial capitalism, both on the continent and in England. The birth of modern industry is heralded by a great slaughter of the innocents. Like the Royal Navy, the factories were recruited by the press-gang. Cottages and workhouses were ransacked for poor children to recruit the factory staffs, and these were forced to work by turns during the greater part of the night. As Lancashire was thinly populated and great numbers of hands were suddenly wanted, thousands of little helpless creatures, whose nimble little fingers were especially wanted, were sent down to the north from the workhouses of London, Birmingham, and other towns. These apprentices were flogged, tortured and fettered. The profits of manufacturers were enormous. At length Sir Robert Peel brought in his Bill for the protection of children.

With the growth of capitalist production during the manufacturing period, the public conscience of Europe had lost the last remnant of shame, and the nations cynically boasted of every infamy that reinforced capitalistic accumulation. Liverpool waxed fat on the slave trade. The child slavery in the European manufactories needed for its pedestal the slavery, pure and simple, of the negroes imported into America. If money, according to Marie Augier, "comes into the world with a congenital bloodstain on one cheek," capital comes dripping from head to foot, from every pore, with blood and dirt.

That is the indictment which has been levelled against the employer of labour in Europe, and the statutes of the United States show conclusively that there is matter for serious indictment against the people of that country as well. I repeat that little of that may be charged against our country, although Alberta has a statute dealing with the subject. The argument of the employers is that if you do not permit this class of labour it will be impossible for the employers to meet other manufacturers in competition.

In connection with the subject of this resolution, the employment of women must also be considered. I propose merely to mention a number of commissions or investigating bodies that inquired into the condition of women regarding labour, with a view to giving you an idea of what was the result in the end. There is the Report on Condition of Women and Child Wage-Earners in the United States, volume IX; "History of Women in Industry," by Helen L. Sumner, page 67; National Trades' Union, September 13, 1834, quoted in "Documentary History of American Industrial Society," by John R. Cummings and Helen L. Sumner; Treatise of Charles E. Persons on "The Early History of Factory Legislation in Massachusetts," in "Labour Laws and Their Enforcement," Susan M. Kingsbury; Report on Conditions of Women and Child Wage-earners in the United States, volume X, "History of Women in Trades Unions," by John B. Andrews; "History of Women in Industry," by Helen L. Sumner; Report on Condition of Women and Child Wage-earners in the United States, volume IX, page 73.

Briefly, this is what followed regarding labour conditions in the United States for women.

IV. States having no laws regulating hours of labour for women: Alabama, Florida, Iowa, Indiana, Nevada, New Mexico, West Virginia.

The result therefore is quite satisfactory, and when you consider that in 1916 the agitation by all these societies and trades unions brought about a general recognition of womenkind in United States.

In Canada very little has been done to improve the condition of the working woman. In connection with the resolution before the House the conditions as affecting women must be taken into account. The only case in which I have been able to find that action was taken in Canada touching the matter of working hours for women was the appointment of a Royal Commission at Toronto in 1907 to inquire into a dispute between the Bell Telephone Company and its operators. There evidence was given by physicians who declared that if the health of the workers was to be preserved the working day should not be longer than six hours spread over a period of eight hours. So that any legislation which is put on the statute book of this country with regard to the hours of labour must necessarily take into account the conditions under which women work.

Of course, it does not follow that because in some cases women demand a working day of six hours or even eight hours there are not employments in connection with which the hours may be extended over longer periods without impairment of health or safety of the employees.

So far as legislation affecting men is concerned, very little is to be found in United States or in Europe dealing with the matter of hours. The only data that I can find relating to the hours that men should work are in relation to such employments as transportation, street railways, mines and work done under great pressure of air. Representations have been made from time to time to Federal Governments relating to the hours of men on the ground that the State itself is responsible as one of the parties to the contract, but little has been accomplished.

So far as transportation companies are concerned, the labourers themselves are responsible to some extent for what they have obtained. On the other hand, corporations are quite ready to recognize the demands of the labourers, for the simple reason that in many cases an army of men is involved, and it is expedient for the corporations themselves to have the good-will and co-operation of the labourers. Take the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. They have never had any trouble so far as hours of labour are concerned because their employees constitute an army of three hundred thousand men or more, and it is of vital importance to Canada that there should be no tie-up in the work which these men are doing. The company has, therefore, established what is known as a system of runs, so that a man may not necessarily have to work much more than eight hours at a time; and at the end of his run he has an opportunity for rest, enjoyment and repose.

In the matter of mines and tunnels the Provincial legislatures all over the Dominion have passed laws with regard to conditions of labour, it being apparent that these were necessary to the protection of human life. There are, however, cases where a day of even eight hours is too long, and in that respect I wish to quote a number of cases where employment is limited to only one and one-half hours:

> The beginnings of such adjustment are, however, to be seen in the laws of New York and New Jersey governing work in compressed air. Under both of these statutes not only are daily working hours regulated by the degree of pressure under which the work is done, but they are divided into two equal periods, the rest interval between which also varies according to the pressure as follows:

If the pressure exceeds:	But does not exceed:	Number of hours' work in 24:	Interval between working periods:
Normal	21 pounds	8 hours	½ hour
21 pounds	30 "	6 "	1 "
30 "	35 "	4 "	2 "
35 "	40 "	3 "	3 "
40 "	45 "	2 "	4 "
45 "	50 "	1½ "	5 "

So that when this matter is to be taken into consideration, this Parliament must go into details as to what is the class of work to be performed. Even a universal law providing for an eight-hour day is not going to meet the whole situation in the Dominion of Canada. There is something else besides the consideration of hours; there is also the question of rest at meal time. The labourer should be given all the time necessary and a reasonable rest at mid-day. There is the further consideration of night work. In that respect all authorities agree that night work brings forth neither the quality nor the quantity, and that as regards women and children it is, in many respects, an occasion of danger.

In dealing further with this resolution, the House should take into consideration the question of holidays. As regards Canada, I do not think there is any difficulty now, because both municipalities and provinces have seen, I believe, that the labouring classes get a half day a week at all events; but authorities who have given this matter a great deal of study, claim that the holidays should be increased for the labouring man and that provision should be made for absence yearly with full pay.

The Labour Conference which was held at Washington took up this question and approved what the authority that I have placed before the House says, because provision has been made in that report to define what is industrial undertaking in one class of work and what is industrial undertaking in another; makes provision for extra long hours in cases of accident or accident being apprehended and also deals with a certain number of cases where the Government is supreme. If the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) intends to deal with that Conference at Washington, I shall not take up the time of the House in reading some of the provisions dealing with questions of labour. If the hon. gentleman will say that he will deal with that, I shall leave the matter alone.

Mr. ROWELL: I think my hon. friend had better continue his speech, and anything he covers, I need not repeat, if I find it necessary to say anything later on.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: There are, therefore, reasons why this Government should take into consideration legislation along those lines, first because the constitutional question has been dealt with, as I am informed through the medium of the press, and because the International Conference at Washington shows that it is the business of federal authorities to deal with such matters. There was adopted at Washington the following draft dealing with the question of the Treaty of Versailles of 28th June, 1919, and the Treaty of St. Germain of 10th September, 1919:

ARTICLE 1.

For the purpose of this Convention, the term Industrial undertaking includes particularly:

(a) Mines, quarries and other works for the extraction of minerals from the earth.

(b) Industries in which articles are manufactured, altered, cleaned, repaired, ornamented, finished, adapted for sale, broken up or demolished, or in which materials are transformed, including shipbuilding and the generation, transformation and transmission of electricity or motive power of any kind.

(c) Construction, reconstruction, maintenance, repair, alteration, or demolition of any building, railway, tramway, harbour, dock, pier, canal, inland waterway, road, tunnel, bridge, viaduct, sewer, drain, well, telegraphic or telephonic installation, electrical undertaking, gas work, waterwork, or other work of construction, as well as the preparation for or laying the foundation of any such work or structure.

(d) Transport of passengers or goods by road, rail, sea or inland waterway, including the handling of goods at docks, quays, wharves or warehouses, but excluding transport by hand.

The provisions relative to transport by sea and on inland waterways shall be determined by a special conference dealing with employment at sea and on inland waterways.

The competent authority in each country shall define the line of division which separates industry from commerce and agriculture.

This is a very important point in that there is a good deal of apprehension throughout the country that the effect of the declaration of an eight-hour day will be to infringe upon the rights of the farmer to make private contracts with labourers. Any legislation that is to be passed by this Dominion must be legislation in accord with the principles laid down in this concention and in accord with the principles enunciated in the Treaty of Peace and League of Nations:

ARTICLE 2.

The working hours of persons employed in any public or private industrial undertaking or in any branch thereof, other than an undertaking in which only members of the same family are employed, shall not exceed eight in the day and forty-eight in the week, with the exceptions hereinafter provided for.

(a) The provisions of this Convention shall not apply to persons holding positions of supervision or management, nor to persons employed in a confidential capacity.

(b) Where by law, custom, or agreement between employers and workers' organizations, or, where no such organizations exist between employers' and workers' representatives, the hours of work on one or more days of the week are less than eight, the limit of eight hours may be exceeded on the remaining days of the week by the sanction of the competent public authority, or by agreement between such organizations or representatives; provided, however, that in no case under the provisions of this paragraph shall the daily limit of eight hours be exceeded by more than one hour.

(c) Where persons are employed in shifts it shall be permissible to employ persons in excess of eight hours in any one day and forty-eight hours in any one week, if the average number of hours over a period of three weeks or less does not exceed eight per day and forty-eight per week.

Therefore provision must be made in any Federal Act that may be passed for cases where a man may work the maximum of week hours and still not necessarily put in eight hours every day of that week.

ARTICLE 3.

The limit of hours of work prescribed in Article 2 may be exceeded in case of accident, actual or threatened, or in case of urgent work to be done to machinery or plant, or in case of "force majeure," but only so far as may be necessary to avoid serious interference with the ordinary working of the undertaking.

ARTICLE 4.

The limit of hours of work prescribed in Article 2 may also be exceeded in those processes which are required by reason of the nature of the process to be carried on continuously by a succession of shifts, subject to the condition that the working hours shall not exceed fifty-six in the week on the average. Such regulation of the hours of work shall in no case affect any rest days which may be secured by the national law to the workers in such processes in compensation for the weekly rest day.

ARTICLE 5.

In exceptional cases where it is recognized that the provisions of Article 2 cannot be applied, but only in such cases, agreements between workers' and employers' organizations concerning the daily limit of work over a longer period of time, may be given the force of regulations, if the Government, to which these agreements shall be submitted, so decides. The average number of hours worked per week, over the number of weeks covered by any such agreement, shall not exceed forty-eight.

ARTICLE 6.

Regulations made by public authority shall determine for industrial undertakings:

(a) The permanent exceptions that may be allowed in preparatory or complementary work which must necessarily be carried on outside the limits laid down for the general working of an establishment, or for certain classes of workers whose work is essentially intermittent.

(b) The temporary exceptions that may be allowed, so that establishments may deal with exceptional cases of pressure of work.

These regulations shall be made only after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, if any such organizations exist. These regulations shall fix the maximum of additional hours in each instance, and the rate of pay for overtime shall not be less than one and one-quarter times the regular rate.

An eight-hour day law cannot be passed so summarily as all this. Exceptions must be provided to cover cases where the eight hours may be exceeded. Labour must also be consulted. The International Labour Conference which sat in Washington passed a resolution declaring that before any law was passed relating to labour, or to questions of hours and wages in this or any other country, the labour organizations must be consulted. I believe that is the proper thing to do.

A great deal was said at the International Labour Conference in Washington regarding the question of unemployment. If we are going to deal with the question of hours, which involves the question of wages, we might as well deal also with unemployment and social insurance. I shall not discuss those questions to-night, but the Bill ought to deal with them, because these questions are all related to one another.

Before sitting down I should like to draw attention to the resolution itself. I am in favour of the eight-hour day, and to that extent I support the resolution, but the resolution in effect means this: That we should declare it desirable, to the extent of the jurisdiction of this Parliament to have a national eight-hour day established immediately, subject only to the right of express private contract. What is the use of making such a declaration and pass a statute when we leave it open for a telephone operator, for instance, to come along and say to her employer: You are not prohibited from making a contract with me under which I shall be obliged to work sixteen hours a day. If the State is concerned with the welfare of women, and that it is so concerned is evident from what I have read to you this evening, is it not absolute folly to ask us to put on the statute books of this country a declaration that we have a national eight-hour day, when the principle of that law can be contravened at any time by employer and employee if they choose? If we are going to deal with this question of the eight-hour day at all, it must be from the point of view of the necessity of protecting the individual, whether man, woman or child, from engaging in a longer working day than eight hours. It may be necessary to legislate that the working hours in some cases should be limited to six or even four hours a day, but it should not be permitted to an employer to contravene the law by entering into a private contract with his employees. Otherwise, the legislation would stand merely as a farce, and have no force or sanction behind it. A law that merely says that such and such a thing shall be established, that provides no penalties for its enforcement, that can be contravened at the will of employer or employee, would not meet the conditions at all. I believe that the resolution as drawn up is weak and futile and does not meet the case. It should be amended for the purpose of meeting the actual conditions as they exist in Canada, so as to come to the relief of the labouring men, or it should not be dealt with at all. In any event, I would hesitate to say that I would support any measure dealing with this question, affecting as it would the whole of Canada, unless the labour organizations are first consulted, because they are familiar with conditions that actually exist and as to which we have very little information.

In conclusion, I wish to say a few words on the attitude of our capitalists and manufacturers. Shortly after the English labour platform was issued, there was such a fear on the part of manufacturers in the Dominion of Canada that they immediately formed a committee composed of the principal manufacturers in the city of Montreal and district to consider what steps should be taken. That committee issued circulars to all members of Parliament, I believe, and to all those they thought they could possibly influence, dealing with such questions as co-operation and various other phases of reconstruction that were being much discussed at that time, leading us to believe they were very anxious to do everything they could for labour. They even intimated in their pamphlets and circulars that in some cases labour had not been properly treated. What has become of these gentlemen? Nothing has been done. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), then a member of the Cabinet, was chairman of a committee dealing with labour conditions throughout the Dominion, but so far as I know no report was ever made to this House. The Government must have secured data from various sources dealing with conditions throughout the Dominion, but I have not been able to secure any report.

I would point out that there is a great deal to be done by the manfacturers themselves. It is not by legislation alone that you can bring about remedies. There is always some way of evading the law, always some loophole, always something that has not been provided for. The courts might not be in sympathy with the legislation, and very often the labouring classes are not in a position to carry cases to higher courts. What we need in this country is a readjustment of the relations between capital and labour. There must be some disposition on the part of the employers to treat their employees properly, and once they have this disposition the same good relations will prevail between employer and employee in every other industry as prevail in the railway world. You see very few strikes or labour difficulties on the Canadian Pacific railway. Why is it not possible for other employers of labour to obtain the good will of their employees in the same way? It is not by legislation alone that we can have a perfect understanding between these two forces, And I exhort the men who, at the beginning of the reconstruction period, were issuing pamphlets and letters all over Canada admitting their own shortcomings and promising to do better for labour, to proceed immediately to fulfil those promises. If they do, the necessity for legislation will be dispensed with in a large measure. In any case, Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that the resolution as drawn would be null and void as regards any effect which it might have if it were law. I think that a committee should be appointed to consider the matter so that a proper act might be brought in which would take into consideration all classes of labour in the country under all conditions.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prince, P.E.I.): It has been intimated that an opportunity will be given later in the session for the discussion of the question of an eight-hour day, and I shall not take up much time this evening trying to consider the merits of that question on this resolution. My purpose is rather to point out that in dealing with industrial questions it is of the greatest importance that the meaning of a resolution such as this should be made perfectly clear. Anything either misleading or uncertain in the note sounded by Parliament as to what it proposes to do in regard to this great problem cannot work other than injury to the relations between capital, labour, and the community. This resolution may mean very much or it may mean nothing at all and I desire simply to ascertain its real significance.

My hon. friend who has just resumed his seat (Mr. H. A. Mackie) points out that the resolution concludes with the words, "Subject only to the right of express private contract." In other words, we are asked to enact an eight-hour day law, with the understanding that individuals notwithstanding shall have the right to enter into express private contracts in the matter of hours. I trust that the mover of the resolution will correct me if I am wrong, but I gather that the meaning of these words is that any individual who employs another may make a contract with him as to his hours of labour on any terms upon which the two are agreed. If that is not the meaning of the words I shall be obliged if the hon. member will make the position clear.

Mr. BURNHAM: The resolution is on all fours with the law that applies to the percentage which may be charged in case there is no percentage mentioned in any legal document or instrument. As the hon. gentleman well knows, the principle observed in such cases is that unless there is an express agreement to the contrary the legal percentage shall be considered as the percentage in the instrument. All this resolution proposes is that it shall be understood that the working day is eight hours unless there is an agreement to the contrary. It is not intended to deprive the working man or any other citizen of the right to make an agreement which he himself considers fair and just, and as for the compulsion that may be behind that, and which the hon. gentleman evidently fears.

I can only say that organized labour will take care of that matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that the purpose of my hon. friend, so far as to afford an opportunity to members to express their views on the eight-hour day is concerned, has been well served. But the resolution itself, worded as it is, will not, I fear, be of any real service to labour. I may frankly say that I am pretty sure that labour would not regard very favourably a resolution of this Parliament approving an eight-hour day with the option to any one who might care to do so to make any contract he wishes in regard to the hours of labour.

Mr. BURNHAM: If the eight-hour day were enacted without this clause may I ask my hon. friend if there is anything on earth to prevent a man working eighteen hours a day if he chose?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If this Parliament enacted an eight-hour day as labour is demanding in certain industries, it would be necessary to provide certain machinery to see that the law was complied with. In many factories in the country to-day the working day is fixed at eight hours, and if in these factories any effort were made to work men for eighteen hours the owners would be liable to the penalty provided. Simply to pass a pious resolution saying that Parliament is in favour of an eight-hour day but also in favour of allowing the individual the right to make any contract he pleases in regard to hours is to raise a hope which it is impossible to realize.

Mr. BURNHAM: All this resolution does is to raise a presumption.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend's purpose is served in giving an opportunity for discussion, and in doing so I think he has undoubtedly rendered some service. But in pressing the resolution to a division, I think it would be wise that we should all understand that if we did vote for it we would not be enacting anything one way or the other that is material so far as labour and capital are concerned.

There is another clause in the resolution to which some attention should be devoted before a vote is asked upon it. The resolution refers to the extent of the jurisdiction of this Parliament.

That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that to the extent of the jurisdiction of this Parliament a national eight-hour working day should be established immediately

[Mr. Burnham.]

There is an old-time saying, Mr. Speaker, that it is not a wise thing to buy a pig in a poke; and I think my hon. friend will agree with me that it is equally unwise to legislate in the dark. Without knowing what the jurisdiction of Parliament is on this question of an eight-hour day, whether Parliament has a wide jurisdiction or no jurisdiction at all, I submit that it would be unwise to pass a resolution of this kind. My purpose, when I rose, was to point this fact out to the President of the Privy Council (Hon. Mr. Rowell) and to express the hope that when he speaks on the resolution he will inform the House whether the Government has considered the question of ascertaining what the jurisdiction of this Parliament is in the matter of eight-hour day legislation. I think it is important that that phase of the subject should be made perfectly clear before any considerable discussion takes place in Parliament on the eight-hour day problem. The one thing we are interested to know is, what is the jurisdiction of this Parliament in the matter. When we have ascertained that, we should proceed to the next step and say how far we think this Parliament should go under such jurisdiction as it may have. If the Government has not already taken steps to ascertain the proper jurisdiction of Parliament, I think it would be in the interests of labour and capital and, indeed, of all classes, that this should be done and that the House should be informed accordingly.

Mr. JOHN BEST (Dufferin): Canada at the present time, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, is trying to devise ways and means of increasing production and retaining its men on the farms, and this resolution, it seems to me, would have the effect of luring boys from the rural districts. It must be remembered that half of our population reside on the farms. It may be said that this has nothing to do with the farmers, but I do not see how we can deal with this matter without considering how it will affect the farmers. The young man is going to try and get the largest wages he can and to work the shortest hours. We are all doing that; we are all trying to make the most out of the shortest time. How the farmers are going to secure help to work twelve or thirteen hours a day when there is a legal eight-hour day is something I cannot understand. That is one of the principal reasons why there is this great exodus from the farms to the cities. Too many of our young men—and middle-aged men too—are going to the cities. Ask them the question and they will tell you that they are going from the farm to the city because they cannot work the farms themselves and they cannot get help. I think that there should be no legislation put on the statute book at the present time that will take men away from the farms to the cities. Many men I know would be quite willing to stay on the farm if they could get help. But the farmer and his wife have perhaps got too old to work the farm; they cannot get help, and they are forced to give up the farm and go to the city. As soon as the war started wages became extremely high, young men went to the city, and you cannot get them to return to the farm.

I am not in favour of any class of men working extremely long hours. There are some kinds of work at which six, and probably four hours would be enough, but if these industries can hire men to work for whatever hours they wish, why should we put a law of this kind on the statute book? We are told that it is only for the factories, offices and shops. If that is so why not say that they can hire them for as many hours as they choose the same as the farmers can? We are told that the farmer can hire his help for whatever hours he wishes. That is all very well; I suppose he can, but the question is to get the men. Why do farmers work such long hours?—they are asked by the people in the cities and towns of Canada. City people are howling about the high cost of living, and I quite agree that it is very high. Farm products in many cases are high, but I want to say that the very moment you enact the eight-hour day you are going to increase the cost of living. If we attempt to work on the farms even ten hours a day we will reduce, in the first place, the production of milk and butter to the extent of one-sixth at least. When I was on the farm we tried to milk the cows at seven o'clock in the morning and at seven at night. We did that in order to milk them at a regular hour, twelve hours apart. If we wanted to have less milk or to put the cows dry we would milk them at intervals, probably sixteen hours apart. It is impossible to produce the same amount of milk, butter, cheese, wheat or grains of all kinds if we are going to have an eight-hour day. The difference between the farm and the shop and factory is this: They can get a supply of men and they can put on different shifts to keep the work going, but who could say that a farmer in this Dominion could hire two sets of men? It is impossible, you cannot get one, let alone getting two. Are you going to tie down the farmer, who has worked for fifty or sixty years twelve or fourteen hours a day, to an eight-hour day? If he is willing to give the wages to get men to work eight hours a day in the field must he and his wife work twelve and fourteen hours in order to feed the stock and milk the cows? This is a great injustice to the farmers of the country. If we want to put legislation on the statute book to take more men off the farm we could not devise anything more calculated to bring that about than the measure suggested by this resolution, and if we adopt it we are going to be up against a greater difficulty than many of us are aware of.

I realize, the same as my hon. friend from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) and many other members of this House, that there is a great clamour for short hours but the people living in the cities, as well as others, should not do anything that is going to injure the great basic industry of Canada, which is agriculture. I feel satisfied that many thousands will leave the farm if, as a result of this Bill being placed on the statute book, they cannot get farm labour. As I said before, a young man going out and seeking a job will say: I will look where I can get the most pay and the shortest hours. That will not be on the farm. With all respect to the labour men, I believe as the hon. member for Peterborough said, that they should be allowed to hire at whatever hours they wish, and I believe that that view is shared by many hon. members of this House. Therefore, the law would be no good; as the hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said, the law would be a farce if it did not bind anybody. If you put a law on the statute book and say that we must stick to the eight-hour day you will ruin the farmers whereas if you put it the other way and say that the manufacturers or the employer can hire as he wishes the law will be ineffective. There are jobs that are so hazardous and extremely hard that four, six or eight hours would be sufficient for them, but out in the open air, where the conditions are favourable and conducive to health, there is nothing to hinder a man from working ten or twelve hours a day. We see masons, carpenters and other mechanics clamouring for eight hours a day instead of nine or ten. Any one who says that you can get as much work done in eight hours as in ten does not know what he is talking about. We have had too much of this practice of limiting the amount of work that a man can do in a day. Where a man could probably lay double the amount of brick that another man could he is restrained, he is not allowed to work to his capacity, but he must only lay so many brick. There is no encouragement for the man who is willing to work and make an honest living. I would ask the members of this House to remember that agriculture is the basic industry of Canada, and that if you support this Bill you will do more to take the boys off the farm than could possibly be done by any other measure that could be brought before this House.

Mr. GEORGE BOYCE (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have always been a farmer and I know the conditions under which work on the farm is carried on. I think that this measure to limit the day's work to eight hours is one of the most dangerous that could be brought before this House, and I am of the opinion that before it is adopted it should receive the most careful consideration. The agricultural industry represents a production of $1,500,000,000, an amount which exceeds the production of all the other industries in Canada. Such an important industry as that of agriculture should be given due consideration and any measure affecting it so vitally as this one does should not be hastily dealt with. The House would do well to bear in mind the fact that four and a half per cent of the farmers and seventeen per cent of the farm labourers have gone to the cities. Why? Because of shorter hours and greater pay. A measure, such as is now proposed, to legalize the eight-hour day would be very dangerous from the point of view of agriculture. There is not a farmer who could get any hired help, no matter what price he offered, because the men would have gone to the cities for shorter hours and still larger wages. Eight hours a day is very short. For instance, how can you get a crop in if you start at eight o'clock in the morning and finish at five in the evening? How are you to take your harvest off within such working hours? And how are you going to get your seeding done? I know I could never get my farm work done within those hours, and I would very much like to see some of those men who are advocating the eight-hour day go out on the farm; undoubtedly it would teach them a lesson. It is an utter impossibility to talk of farming on an eight-hour day. I never was an advocate of long hours—I never went into the field earlier than seven o'clock in the morning, and I always left at six o'clock in the evening. If a man cannot stand that many hours in the field he is no good at farming; he should become an inmate of some charitable institution.

I think it would have been better had this matter not been brought forward. Factory men are well looked after by their local unions; and I say, let farmers hire as they can. There is no doubt that at the present time no farmer or his help has to work excessively long hours, but if this law goes into force it will 'cause trouble. If you hire a man for a month, six months, or a year, he will turn round and tell you that he has to work only eight hours a day, and if you want him to work beyond those hours you will have to pay him, not regular wages, but, I suppose, time and-a-half. We see that in connection with railroads and business concerns, and it is safe to assume that we farmers would be treated in the same way.

Our farmers do not work for fun—I certainly never did—and I want to tell you that just as soon as you pass this Bill your cost of living will rise fifteen or twenty per cent higher— and God knows it is high enough already. It cannot be otherwise. Again, look at the European nations; there is not one of them but has a twelve or fourteen-hour day. How are you going to compete with them? We will have 1878 conditions back again, when you could not sell a pound of butter for more than ten cents. I myself have sold oats at nineteen cents a bushel, and potatoes at fifty-five cents a bushel.

I trust, gentlemen, that before voting in favour of this resolution you will look into it very carefully. As a member of this House I am just as anxious for the welfare of our people as anyone, but if I voted for an eight-hour day I believe I would be voting against the best interests of the Dominion.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I understood yesterday from the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) that this eight-hour question would be discussed at a later date, and I had no idea it was coming up to-day; in fact, it is not on the Order Paper so far as I could see.

The resolution reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that to the extent of the jurisdiction of this Parliament——

Before pressing a resolution of this kind, would it not be wise for us to find out what is the jurisdiction of Parliament? I understand from certain legal authorities that there is a difference of opinion as to whether that jurisdiction is within the provinces or the Dominion. Therefore, I am sorry that my hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) insists on pressing his resolution to a vote to-night.

Mr. BURNHAM: Might I ask the hon. gentleman, who does he suppose has jurisdiction outside the provinces?

Mr. NESBITT: Outside the provinces?

Mr. BURNHAM: Yes. Are there no lands outside the provinces?

Mr. NESBITT: Those lands are worked principally by the wolves; we have not much jurisdiction over them.

Mr. BURNHAM: You said we could have no jurisdiction.

Mr. NESBITT: I agree absolutely with my hon. friend from Dufferin (Mr. Best) that labour is perfectly safe——

Mr. BURNHAM: Oh, oh.

Mr. NESBITT: ——to be left alone to regulate its hours. Employers fully realize that the labour unions are quite capable of making arrangements as to the hours of labour in the various industries. Of recent years, so far as I know, there has been no trouble on that score. One business, on account of the work being very concentrated, may require very short hours of labour. We can leave it to the employers and employees to decide whether a man can do his best working four, six, eight or ten hours a day.

I think it would be a mistake for Parliament to pass a resolution of this kind, which commits us to legislation, until we know just exactly what jurisdiction we possess. As I said before, I think it is perfectly safe to leave the regulation of this matter for the industries concerned. I know industries that work their men in some branches in four-hour shifts only. I know of other industries where the shifts are six hours, and others where they are eight hours, depending on the amount of concentration required during the hours of labour. In some industries a man can work just as well ten hours a day as eight hours. Farming is an industry, as mentioned by my hon. friend from Peterboro, that has always worked ten or twelve hours, it being a type of labour that does not call for excessive concentration. If you watch farmers you will observe that as a rule they work very leisurely except at certain times of the year; for instance, during harvesting and haying, when for a few days they may work at considerable pressure if the weather is threatening or there is some other reason for haste. Under such circumstances you very seldom see men refuse to work even at night to save the harvest in the field. I do not think we should interfere with arrangements such as those. We have got to be guided by circumstances, and farming is very much of an industry, indeed, in this country—an industry of such vital importance that we should not attempt to interfere with its hours of labour in any shape or form.

If it is provided by statute that the length of the working day shall be eight or even ten hours, the probabilities are that men who are employed by the day and not by the year will work only during the hours specified by the statute. In that case, work on the farm would be thrown out of gear; because on the farm some of the men work certain hours and others have to work, or do work, longer. I cannot help thinking that it would be a great mistake for this House to adopt this resolution committing us to an eight-hour day for the whole of Canada. It has been very well said that so far as our industries are concerned we compete with many other countries. Of course, if all the countries which are signatories to the League of Nations accepted the eight-hour day, and it became universal, enabling all countries to compete on the same basis—except perhaps, in the matter of wages—it would be a different matter. But I think it would be a great mistake to adopt a resolution of this kind until we know exactly what our jurisdiction is and until we have discussed the matter thoroughly from the standpoints of the various industries throughout the country. I hope that the hon. member will not press his resolution to a vote; if he does, I shall be obliged to vote against it.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, in many respects I have a good deal of sympathy with the resolution. Labour has had the heavy end of the work of our country for many years. It is thought by many that the hours of labour could be reduced to the advantage of the general industrial community. But before giving my view upon that question I wish to touch upon the point raised by the member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) with regard to jurisdiction.

As I understand it, this House has not the jurisdiction to carry into effect legislation based upon such a resolution as that which has been submitted by the member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham). The jurisdiction in the matter is confined largely to the provinces. But I think that we would go a long way toward meeting the view of my hon. friend and giving an example to the provinces in connection with legislation which they might later introduce if we adopted a resolution providing that in all Government contracts of every description, whether carried out as piece work or as work sub-let to contractors, it be stipulated that eight hours a day shall be considered the legal working day for the men engaged in these enterprises. I have not studied the matter from the legal aspect, nor am I in a position to do so; but I believe that this would be a good step to take.

I do not think it would be any infringement upon the liberty of the subject or work hardship to any contractor or working man if, in accordance with the last few words of my hon. friend's resolution, the right to arrange for longer hours under certain circumstances should be accorded. There might be a case where an employee would be willing to work ten hours a day in order to bring about the completion of a contract at a given time, provided, of course, that the employee was recompensed accordingly. The proviso in the latter part of the resolution, therefore, is quite in order.

I believe that it is not possible for all industries to comply with any regulation establishing the length of the working day at eight hours. There are processes of manufacture in this country to which such a law could not be very readily applied. Six or eight hours of labour in certain callings takes far more out of a man than ten or twelve at some lighter work. I see a good deal of force, therefore, in the argument put forward by the member for Dufferin (Mr. Best) and member for Carleton (Mr. Boyce) with regard to the farming community.

I did not hear the address of the member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) on this subject and I do not know whether he made any allowances for weather conditions —these sometimes prevent the labourer from carrying on any work on the farm. For instance, in harvest time no work can be done in the field when the weather is wet. I am sure the member for Peterborough does not wish to suggest that if there are two or three wet days in succession the eight-hour day provision shall be considered as having been fulfilled even though no work at all was done. If, therefore, his resolution called for a forty-eight hour week instead of an eight-hour day, it would be better. For instance, one day might be wet and the next day fine, and the farm labourer could put in twelve or fourteen hours on a fine day if it were necessary to do so in order to save the crop, instead of saying: Well, it rained yesterday and I could not work, but it must be counted as an eight-hour day; and to-day I will only work eight hours. In fact, I am doubtful, as I have said, whether such legislation could be applied to the farming community; nor do I think it is desirable that it should. We should differentiate between the different industries. I come from an industrial city where from eight to ten thousand workmen are employed, and our factories are endeavouring to adhere very closely to the principle of the eight-hour day. In fact, the eight-hour day is actually in vogue in some of the best factories in our community; so that without legal enactment of any kind, labour and capital have in these cases agreed that eight hours is the workingman's day. But to other industries the principle could not be applied. Suppose a man is running a single machine which has cost his employer $15,000 or $20,000, and which represents the work of fifty, or, perhaps one hundred men under the old system of hand labour. The work that used to be done by the sledge hammer and the multiplication of sledge hammers is now done by a single machine which, when a button is pushed, strikes a twenty-ton blow. When that machine, therefore, comes to a standstill a large amount of capital comes to a standstill; and if the eight-hour day principle were applied to the industry in connection with which that machine was operated it might be necessary to run two shifts of eight hours each, perhaps even three shifts, in order that that machine might be worked to full capacity. If the eight-hour day had been in vogue during the war, how many of our requirements for munitions could have been fulfilled? Not very many. It was necessary to get the very highest amount of production, and that cannot be done by limiting the hours of labour to eight hours a day in all callings. But I am favourable to the eight-hour day; I believe that the system should be brought into effect in Canada so far as we are able to bring it into effect. As I understood the President of the Council (Hon. Mr. Rowell) to say, it is important that in legislating for an eight-hour day for Canada as a whole we have some regard to what the other nations of the world are going to do about it. We in Canada cannot, if we establish an eight-hour day, compete with our neighbours to the south if they work on a basis of ten hours a day. If Germany is going to work twelve, fifteen or sixteen hours, to say nothing of Japan, China and other countries which underpay their labour and exact very long hours, the eight-hour day cannot bring about the best results. An international arrangement between labour and capital throughout the whole civilized world is the final consummation for the eight-hour day proposition.

Mr. BURNHAM: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the Chinese must agree to this first?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I did not say so, but I say it is desirable that all nations so far as possible should agree to it. I hope we are a little more advanced than the Chinese, but they are coming up pretty fast and they are competing with us, and we must have some attention to what is going on in outside nations. That is the point I wish to make, and it should be taken into consideration. I am not clear as to what a day's work should consist of, but it should really consist of a certain product. A certain product should be turned out in a day's work. I know the hon. member for West Peterborough has a great regard for the ten commandments, one of which says: Six days shalt thou labour and do all thy work. Whether we can do that in an eight-hour day or not, I am not quite clear, but we are commanded to do six day's work in the week whether we are engaged as labourers or otherwise. Whether we are working with our hands or our heads, it makes little difference, everybody in this country is supposed to work for his daily bread. Labour has thought—and I think justly—that they have been oppressed somewhat in the past in being compelled to work too long hours. Therefore, while I have a very broad and strong sympathy with the resolution of my hon. friend,—and, in fact, I am personally committed to it, but that does not amount to much, because I am only a humble member of the House—I should like to see a large measure of legislation along the lines I have indicated.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE (Edmonton): Is there a commandment that forbids one from robbing a man of his health or killing him by making him run a fifteen thousand dollar machine?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Some of those expensive machines are run with less individual effort than is expended on very much lighter work, and take very much less out of the operator than does some very much lighter work. What is necessary is that the man should be very careful not to get his hand or leg or something of that kind into the machine. It requires constant attention and great activity on his part to see that he does not get hurt. The mere pressing of a button and stopping the machine when the operation is completed could be performed by a child, but it requires an expert man to know when the process is completed. I suppose the hon member is aware that the Workmen's Compensation Act is in force in Ontario, and if any manufacturer has a man injured in his factory, he has to pay very heavily, and, I think, rightly so. Therefore, the workingman is very well protected against accidents that may occur in factories, and an employer is obliged to pay what is considered a fair recompense to a man for the loss of any member of his body or for being maimed in any way whatever.

Mr. JOHN ALBERT SEXSMITH (Peterborough East): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be a great mistake to adopt this resolution just at present and to say that an eight-hour day was the legal working day for the labourers of this country. I have, however, no objection to the eight-hour day. My heart goes out to the labouring man of Canada and, in fact of the world, who works eight hours or ten hours a day or whatever number of hours a day he has to work and works hard. If present commercial and financial conditions in Canada will allow a citizen of this country to make a good living by working eight hours a day, aye, by working only six hours a day, then I say: Go to it, and let that be the working day, but I do not think circumstances will permit that. Never before in Canada were we looking and waiting and asking more anxiously for greater production, and I do not think I am saying anything wide of the fact when I say that there never before was a time when people wanted to do less and get more for the little they did. A few weeks ago I noticed that the Post Office Department of the United States sent out what one might call questionnaires to 200,000 different farmers asking them what that department could do to assist the farming community in the way of greater production or in getting labour on their farms. A short time ago they had received some forty odd thousand replies, of which over ninety per cent, if my memory serves me aright, indicated the intention of either quitting the farm altogether or curtailing it to such an extent as to permit the farmer to run it with his own labour. They said in their replies that the reason for their intention was that they could not compete with the high prices paid in the city and the short hours. We all know that labour in this city, as in every city not only of Canada but of this continent, is shouting about the high cost of living. Some speakers have already said that they would not object to the eight-hour day if it were not applied to the farmer. I am not speaking particularly in the interest of the farmer; I am convinced that the farmer cannot operate successfully with an eight-hour day; but if the eight-hour day were applied generally in the industries in cities and towns, what would be the result? Why, you would not have in a county a baker's dozen of young men on the farms. Just last night, I happened to look over the municipal statistics for the province of Ontario, and according to the census statistics sent out by the department, from the end of 1915 to the end of 1917 there were 28,000 fewer people living in the rural municipalities. That means that 28,000 people had left the rural municipalities and, I suppose, had gone to the cities where probably they could get $6 for eight hours' work. Just in conclusion, I would say that I am heartily in sympathy with the very shortest hours of labour under which the work this country may be carried on successfully, but I do not think it would redound, physically, mentally or in any other way, to the benefit of Canada for our men to work six hours a day and play eighteen. Why, when Adam was put out of the Garden of Eden he was told "By the sweat of thy brow shalt thou earn thy bread," but nobody wants to sweat these days. While I am in sympathy with the labouring man, I think it should be left to the employers and the men themselves to work the hours they choose. If Canada could carry on effectively on a six-hour day, I would not object; but under present conditions, not only in Canada but throughout the world, I do not think that is possible. If this resolution is pressed to a vote, I do not think it would be wise for us to say by our action in this House that an eight-hour day should be the standard working day all over Canada.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): The hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) has brought before the House a very important subject, and it has been the means of bringing out a very interesting and instructive debate. I would indulge the hope that in accomplishing that my hon. friend had done all that he could expect to accomplish at the present stage. I do not quite see what good end is to be served by dividing the House on this matter. His resolution, naturally enough, does not enact anything. It expresses a broad general opinion in favour of the eight-hour day, and most of us, I think, are prepared in general terms to subscribe to that. I quite realize that for most occupations eight hours is a fair day's work, and if a man can avoid working more than that, in most occupations, it would be better for himself and I hope better for the community. But we have already declared in general terms that we subscribe to the eight-hour idea. It has been included, as the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) has mentioned, in the Peace Treaty which we approved a year ago. So we have already done in effect what my hon. friend asks us to do now, and that is to give a broad general expression of approval of the eight-hour system. It seems to me that before we can go beyond that we ought to have something more definite before us. We ought to have the Bill, because a man may be in favour of the principle of an eight-hour law, but when you come to apply it in detail, it may not be so easily worked out as some of us would like it to be. I do not think that my hon. friend by pressing this to a division can get one step further than he has already gone. We have already declared our approval of the eight-hour idea, and that is all my hon. friend wants us to do here. The President of the Privy Council in discussing another matter to-day told us that as a consequence of the discussions and conferences that had taken place rising out of the Peace Treaty the obligation rested upon every government that was a party to the International Labour Conference to bring forward legislation in favour of the eight-hour law, and of course it follows that he must bring forward a measure of that kind this session, so far as it is within the competence of this Parliament to deal with the matter. With that assurance, for that was the effect of the statement of the President of the Privy Council, I do not see what good we can accomplish by dividing the House at the present time.

Mr. BURNHAM: Do I understand the hon. gentleman practically to identify my resolution with the statement made by the President of the Privy Council?

Mr. FIELDING: It is not for me to put interpretations on the statement of the President of the Privy Council, except as they occur to everybody present. I do not think I have misstated his position. I asked him to-day what would be the consequences of this Labour Conference, and he replied that every government that participated in the Conference is under an obligation to submit to its Parliament the results of the conclusions arrived at. Very well; the conclusion arrived at is favourable to the eight-hour law.

Mr. BURNHAM: Hear, hear.

Mr. FIELDING: And the President of the Privy Council told us in effect that the Government would be prepared to carry out its obligation.

Mr. BURNHAM: Certainly, and we will vote for the measure.

Mr. FIELDING: I am a little more patient than my hon. friend. I am willing to wait a little while until the Bill is before us in all its details.

Mr. DANIEL LEE REDMAN (East Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I would care to give any opinion on the extent of jurisdiction which this House might have in this matter. Generally speaking, one would think that under the British North America Act, it was a matter primarily for the provinces to deal with. Whether our new relationship in the League of Nations gives the matter an international or a broadly national aspect is another question. There is no precedent to guide us, for these conditions have but newly arisen. However, the mover of this resolution has guarded against any question of jurisdiction arising, by limiting his resolution to the extent of the jurisdiction which this House may have, and so I regard it more or less as calling for an expression of general opinion in regard to the eight-hour day.

I think reason is largely on the side of the eight-hour day. A day's work may sometimes be too short, but many a day's work has been made too long in the past. Personally I think eight hours is a fair and reasonable working day, and I believe that in most instances you would get just as much work done in eight hours as in nine or ten. Making the working day eight hours would not limit production so much as do certain feelings which sometimes exist among working men. In some parts of Canada, for instance, among members of certain organizations, not labour organizations, but which have among their membership some labour men, there has been an absolute propaganda against production. That is the kind of influence we must be in a position to fight, and if we want to be in a position to fight unreasonable demands such as those for a six-hour or a seven-hour day, we must be in a clean position ourselves; we must give our opinion in favour of the things which are fair and the things which are right. I believe the eight-hour day is a fair and reasonable proposition, and I think it would be a mistake if this House declared itself as being opposed to it. I think it would be giving the wrong sort of leadership to the country, and would create feelings of unrest which would not tend to increase production. We have had a Factory Act in Alberta for the last year or two, which among other provisions limits the hours of work in many industries to eight. The Act has worked fairly well; there may have been some difficulties, but on the whole we have carried on, and I believe that with the better feeling and co-operation that came when labour was given this reasonable working day, we got greater production than when we forced the men to work longer hours. The eight-hour day will give them more time for recreation, self-improvement, and for looking after those interests which a man must attend to outside of his ordinary business. I have no hesitation in stating that I am in favour of the principle of the eight-hour day, but I realize that it would not be wise to make the law operative in some industries for some time to come, until they have got on a basis where they could carry on successfully under these new conditions.

Mr. ALPHONSE VERVILLE (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, this is not a new question in this House, although to many members it may be new. An eight-hour measure was presented to the House in 1911, and got its second reading and was considerd in committee, but the dissolution of the House prevented the Bill from going through the Senate. In 1912 no Bill was presented; there was a change of Government. I presented that Bill myself in 1911 and was in hopes that it would become law. Nothing was done in 1913. In 1914 the war broke out. This resolution proposes nothing new. I believe my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) supported the Bill when it was before the House on the occasion I speak of, and he either said that it did not go far enough or that it went too far. If my memory serves me well, I am inclined to think his opinion was that it went too far. I think we should bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, the important fact that any legislation that may be introduced by any government in regard to the working classes should pay due respect to the welfare of the sound element in labour. As we all know, there are two elements of supreme consequence in the life of the civilized world to-day: One which is seeking to bring about destruction, and the other which is endeavouring to be constructive. And I think that the sound element of labour will assuredly win in the end. They are doing so in this country and also in the United States. Any legislation, therefore, which can be enacted for the relief of those who are now asking for an eight-hour working day will serve to create a better feeling and understanding in the country and will do more towards the reconciliation of classes and the restoration of peace than anything else. I think that any one who reads what is transpiring in this country and elsewhere will agree with me when I say that the unsound element—if I may classify certain people under that term—are not very numerous, although they are very noisy and will drag along with them large numbers of men who follow them inconsiderately, not really knowing where they are going. On the other hand, the sound element has been fighting to counteract the influence of destructive agencies and I believe that a great deal of success has attended the efforts of those men in the community who have tried to bring about peace and goodwill. It is no more than right that every consideration should be given to this question, which is one of the most important that could be brought before Parliament. My hon. friend from Brantford made the statement that the principle could be applied to public works. That was exactly the object of the eight-hour Bill of 1911. I am not prepared to say just how far the Government can go in its jurisdiction; but I am confident that during the present session we shall have a measure of this nature that will furnish an opportunity to discuss the merits of the eight-hour day. At the present time I do not think I need enter into that question.

Mr. CHARLES ROBERT HARRISON (Nipissing): I feel myself somewhat in the position of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), I had been in hopes that the debate would not come on at this time, because I have a lot of data in connection with the eight-hour day from different corporations proving that they have been more successful, and that their output has been even greater, under an eight-hour day than it was when they worked ten and twelve hours a day. Those data, I regret to say, I have not with me at this moment, and I cannot give to the subject that degree of justice which I should otherwise have been in a position to give to it. I cannot agree with the hon. member for North Oxford in the statement that labour organizations should look after the working hours for labouring men. Practically speaking, the labour organizations take care of the union men of the country, but there is a great army of labouring men and women who do not belong to any organization. I should therefore like to see some legislation put on the statute book affording those people whose occupations do not entitle them to membership in labour organizations some degree of protection. There seems to be an opinion, almost an apprehension, on the part of some members that Canada may be in the lead in enacting an eight-hour day; but there is no ground for this assumption, as the following extracts in regard to the eight-hour day movement abroad will clearly show:

United States—

In the United States, federal legislation providing for an eight-hour day in certain Government contract work existed prior to 1892, but it was vaguely worded and uncertain in effect. An Act of 1890 provided for a straight eight-hour day for labourers and mechanics employed by the Federal Government or by contractors or sub-contractors on public works.

Twenty-nine states of the union have enacted legislation reducing to eight hours the working day for employees in public employment or in private employment on contract work for national, state or municipal governments. At the end of 1918, fourteen states had enforced the eight-hour day for miners and eight states had forbidden the employment of men in smelting operations for longer than eight hours per day. Eleven states provide for an eight-hour day for men employed in industries involving special hazards.

By agreements between employers and workmen or by the award of an official labour adjustment body, an eight-hour day has been put in force in several industries. The members of the International Typographical Union won a concession on this point in 1906. An eight-hour day and forty-four week is the rule for the greater part of the building trades. The American Woollen Company, the largest of its kind in the United States, the United States Steel Corporation, the Ford Automobile Company and other large industrial establishments have adopted the basic eight-hour day.

Australia—

In Australia hours of labour are limited by law in the case of factories and shops, the general working week being forty-eight hours, and this period has been standardized in most occupations. A strong demand has now arisen for a week of forty-eight hours.

New Zealand—

In New Zealand the Factories Act, 1908, made the forty-eight hour week legal in all places of occupation where two or more persons are employed in the preparation of goods for trade or sale.

France—

In April of the present year, an Act was passed by the French Parliament providing that the working hours of all workers shall not exceed eight a day or forty-eight a week, or an equivalent limit over some period other than a week. The application of this principle to particular industries and localities is entrusted to the government.

Italy—

A working day of eight hours has been introduced recently in the metal, engineering and shipbuilding industries, and in the principle textile trades in Italy. An unanimous decision by the agriculturists and representatives of agricultural workers was reached in April, 1919, whereby the hours of work for agricultural labourers hired by the day were to be reduced to eight. Overtime was to be allowed under certain conditions at special rates.

I had an opportunity of going through the country with the Industrial Commission last year, and in the great majority of places we visited we found a demand for a shorter working day based on the desire for more leisure and energy to devote to things of life other than work, and a general approval of employers in this regard. In our report we mentioned such industries as farming, fishing and logging. These three were mentioned as being industries in which it is almost impossible to adopt an eight-hour day. I hope this motion will not be voted down. I expect that the question will come up in the House in the shape of a Bill and I will be prepared to say a great deal more on it than I have to-night. But if it comes to a vote I can assure you I am going to vote in favour of this resolution.

Mr. WILLIAM D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, last year I asked the question of the Government as to whether they intended to enact eight-hour legislation. At that time a member of the Government gave the reply to the House that this Parliament had no power to enact such legislation. Since that time the principle has been embodied in the Treaty of Peace, and later still it was endorsed by the Canadian representatives to the Industrial Conference held at Washington. In the early days of this session I again placed upon the Order Paper a question as to whether the Government was still of the opinion that Parliament had no power to deal with this question, and also, if it was no longer of that opinion, whether it intended at this session to enact the eight-hour day. Up to this time no reply has been given to that question. During the debate this afternoon the hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) who was one of the delegates to the Industrial Conference at Washington made the statement that the eight-hour day principle was endorsed at the session of the Conference by a vote of something like 90 to 2. He made the further statement that if a resolution of that kind was carried by a vote of at least two-thirds of the members of the Conference the Governments of the respective countries were obligated to translate that action into legislation. I inquired of the minister this afternoon whether it was the intention of the Government to bring in legislation to enact the eight-hour day in Canada and I received the reply, as perhaps most of the members of the House know, that there is still some question as to the power of Parliament to enact such legislation. It seems to me that the Government has had sufficient time since last year to come to some decision on this matter. Perhaps it is an uncharitable thing to say but the thought that is present in my mind is that the Government is evading the issue or perhaps, in other words, is doing what it has done before, especially with reference to the daylight saving matter—it is passing the buck. It is true that the motion as framed has no binding effect. It still leaves it open to the men and the employers to bargain as to the number of hours they desire to work in a day. That may be quite true but it does affirm the general principle that in the opinion of the Canadian Parliament eight hours of honest work should under ordinary circumstances, constitute a full day's labour. With that sentiment I am heartily in accord. I am free to admit that in certain activities, such as farming and others which might be named, it would not be possible to conduct these activities on the basis of an eight-hour day, but I do believe that in industrial centres, such as the city which I have the honour to represent, the city of Kitchener, in many industries and perhaps in most, where the men must time their actions according to the demands of the machines which they serve, and which put in many instances an intense strain upon them, eight hours of real, strenuous, hard, faithful labour is sufficient for any man. I would also affirm that, while I believe that at the present time, succeeding the conclusion of the war, production is more necessary than ever it was before, yet man, after all, if he is not simply to consider living as existing, is entitled to just a little more than the hours of labour and the hours of sleep. I believe he might very well divide his life up into three shifts,—eight hours of labour, eight hours of recreation and eight hours of sleep. For that reason I am going to vote for the motion if it is pressed to a division. Although it does not bind the employer and employee definitely, it does affirm the one principle that eight hours of real, hard work, constitutes a sufficient day of labour. While that principle has already been affirmed by the League of Nations and by the Industrial Conference in Washington, such an affirmation coming from the representatives of the people in the Canadian Parliament, will constitute a good deal of an object lesson and serve as an ideal for both employer and employee.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Speaker, the motion under discussion moved by my hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) is certainly one the principle of which has engaged the attention of the people not only of Canada but of all the civilized countries to a very great extent for many years past. Organized labour has been agitating for something of this nature for quite a number of years. In many occupations, when labour organizations were first formed, it was absolutely necessary that some reforms should be made in the conditions under which they were operating at that time. I have listened to the discussion to-night, and the question to my mind is one of such great importance that I question very much the wisdom of hastily arriving at a decision on this resolution at the present time. Undoubtedly there will be other legislation dealing with it as it is now embodied in the Treaty of Peace and the question will clearly have to be dealt with by nations which are members of the League of Nations.

We have all heard it stated repeatedly that since the war has ended there is a good deal of insanity prevalent throughout the world. If there was ever a time in the history of the world when people required their sanity to enable them to carry on it is at this time, and under the conditions which have to be met. During the years prior to the war there was a worldwide movement from the rural districts to the industrial centres. This movement attained such proportions that it was predicted by far-seeing students of economics who had studied the question very closely that the day would soon be reached when this world was likely to find itself up against starvation.

The removal during the war of hundreds of millions of men from the productive activities of life to that of destruction has brought about a condition of affairs that to my mind is most serious. I am firmly convinced that should the world experience a short crop during the present year starvation will be experienced in many countries, and many people will suffer terrible privations as a consequence of the very low food supply.

I do not like to contemplate the effect that such legislation will have on agriculture, it having been already referred to. Personally, I firmly believe that the fixing of an eight hour day will ultimately benefit those who remain in agriculture, those who persist to the end, just as much as it will benefit those more immediately affected. I firmly believe that those who to-day are agitating for such legislation are going to defeat the very object they now have in view, that is, to reduce the cost of living. It is absolutely impossible to bring that about and do what they are now urging this Parliament and the Parliaments of other countries to do.

We have heard a great deal about organized labour, but the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Harrison) has referred to the fact that we have in this country a tremendous army of unorganized labour. And, Mr. Speaker, I want to point out again that it was somewhat significant that last year we had an International Industrial Conference in the Victoria Museum building which was supposed to deal with all such questions of labour and industry as we are discussing to-night and if possible find a solution for them, but at which this great army of unorganized labour was not represented, neither was the great basic industry of agriculture. I ask, Sir, whether that was a proper means by which to arrive at a satisfactory solution of this question?

An eight-hour day seems ideal, and under most conditions it is. As a matter of fact, it is much longer than a great many people work to-day. I could not help wondering whether the hon. member for Peterboro would compel some people to work eight hours a day, as he refers to this as a National Eight-hour Day. The Government of this country for many years past have established a national working day of much fewer hours. How many people do you suppose work eight hours a day in the Civil Service? Why, a whole army of them never think of working that many hours, and the Government by legislation made this possible many years ago,—they blazed the way so far as this agitation is concerned. But certain people doing business for this country have more than an eight or a ten hour day and some of them get very little for their services.

I am going to use this by way of illustration, although it may lend strength to the argument advanced by the hon. member for West Peterboro. Personally, I may say that I have always been a strong believer in competition. I believe that it is as essential to proper development as anything could possibly be. But unfortunately there is a tendency on the part of this country and many other countries to enact legislation to keep people all their life in a sort of straight jacket or in the nursery, so to speak. There is too much of a tendency to legislate people into doing things whether they really feel disposed to do them or not. I have always believed that when boys and girls reach adolescence they become endowed with sufficient intelligence to be thrown on their own resources. One of the first things that a child meets with when it enters the school is competition, and I believe competition is vitally necessary to the proper development of the child. The fact that children are in competition with one another during the course of their education develops faculties which enable them as they grow up to make the best of their opportunities in life. Now we propose legislation that will make such competition unnecessary.

Legislation has been passed by many bodies of organized labour restricting the amount of work that a man shall do, so that he is held in check. Now, according to this resolution, it is proposed to say to him: You must work only so many hours a day. Work is what is required in the world to-day, and it does not matter how much we may be favourable to an eight-hour day, I believe it is absolutely essential that we should defer taking any action in the matter until we get on our feet again and have overcome some of the difficulties now facing us, the natural result of sacrifices due to the war.

The late James J. Hill, the sage of the West, some years ago stated that inside twenty years the world would be up against starvation. To-day the situation is a very serious and critical one indeed. It is somewhat significant that almost all those who have spoken on this resolution are not employers of labour to any great extent. I believe that the large employers and their employees are arriving at a satisfactory solution of their difficulties, and that Parliament is not called upon at the present time to enact legislation to make it compulsory for people to do what they ought to do by mutual consent.

Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of discussing this matter at length, but I want again to reiterate that these restrictions on output are bound to affect industries that may not be organized and have taken no steps to protect themselves. I believe the very fact that you make conditions so much more desirable in certain walks of life has a tendency to attract people to them, until eventually you have an over-supply, with the result that some other industry essential to the welfare of the community suffers. I am convinced that that is what is the matter with the world to-day so far as food production is concerned. It was the case in most of the countries in Europe prior to the war, it is the case in the United States to-day, as it is also the case in Canada. This condition has not come about quickly; it has been a gradual growth extending over many years, until it has eventually brought about the very thing that organized labour sought to obtain for itself, that is, the elimination of competition. Production has become so curtailed and supplies consequently have become so scarce that prices of food are abnormally high, unorganized industry is reaping advantages that it would not have secured had there been a great many more people in that class. That is the way it is affecting agriculture at the present time. As I have said, I am not too sure that those who engage in agriculture would suffer as the result of the establishment of an eight-hour day. But I do want to utter a word of warning against the danger which will threaten the lives of millions during the coming year if we curtail and restrict the production of food, which an eight-hour day will undoubtedly do. Weather conditions are variable and uncertain, and in view of the extent to which people are deserting agricultural occupations all over the world I think it would be foolhardy on our part to consider such legislation as is suggested by this resolution under present conditions.

On motion of Mr. I. E. Argue (Swift Current) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

Friday, March 12, 1920.

The House met at Three o'clock.

VISCOUNT JELLICOE'S REPORT.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved:

That 1,000 copies of the report of Admiral of the Fleet Viscount Jellicoe of Scapa on the Naval Mission to Canada be printed, 750 in English and 250 in French, and that Rule 74 of the House be suspended with reference to such printing.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING: I do not imagine that there would be any objection to the motion, but one is led to inquire what need there is for a motion of this kind. The Government are constantly bringing down documents and laying them on the Table; why is it necessary to delay procedure in order to have a motion put through the House for a small job of public printing?

Mr. SPEAKER: There would be delay until the matter was attended to by the Committee on Printing, if such a motion as this were not adopted by the House.

Motion agreed to.

BRITISH COLUMBIA INDIANS.

SETTLEMENT OF DIFFERENCES CONCERNING INDIAN LANDS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 13, to provide for the settlement of differences between the Governments of the Dominion of Canada and the province of British Columbia respecting Indian Lands and certain other Indian affairs in the said province.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Explain.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the year 1912, a Royal Commission was appointed by the Government of Canada in pursuance of an agreement entered into between the British Columbia Government of that day and the Dominion Government, which agreement called for a reference to that Joint Commission of differences that had arisen in relation to a reversionary right in Indian lands claimed by the province, and in relation as well to supposed surplus lands belonging to different Indian reserves, and other matters. The agreement provided that the report of the commission should be sympathetically received by both Governments and, so far as deemed wise by each, adopted. By reason of the very great caution exercised in the commitments in the agreement it has been found impossible yet to ratify the findings of the Commission. The Dominion Government has been ready to ratify for some time—in fact, ever since the Commission reported. The British Columbia Government desires modifications. Negotiations are necessary. The Bill is to enable us so to negotiate and conclude upon the basis of the Commission's finding. The British Columbia Government has passed similar legislation.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 14, to amend the Indian Act.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This Bill contains many important modifications of the Indian Act. Its principal clauses look to a more ready enfranchisement of the Indian; I mean by "enfranchisement" the elevation of the Indian to the status of a citizen. The old Act in its original form contained certain provisions to that end which were very slow of execution. An Act was passed a year ago providing for a class of cases being more expeditiously dealt with. This Act is general in its terms and looks to the enfranchisement of all who are fit to enfranchise. Other clauses of the Bill make clearer provision for the compulsory education of Indian children. There are other minor clauses.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RESIGNATIONS FROM THE CABINET.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, since the last session of Parliament there have been two resignations from the ministry. May I ask the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) whether the Government has any statement to make to the House and through the House to the country concerning these resignations, and whether there is any correspondence in connection with them, which will be laid on the table of the House?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Acting Prime Minister): I will bring the matter up on Monday, if my honourable friend is agreeable.

IMMIGRATION OF IMPERIAL EX-SERVICE MEN.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Béauce): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct the attention of the Government and of the House to a subject which in my judgment is of urgent public importance. I shall follow up my remark by putting a question. A despatch signed by "Windermere," published last night in the Montreal Star, refers to a debate that took place in the Imperial House of Commons in the course of which Mr. Briant, member for Lambeth, directed the attention of the House to the fact that two young men, one a discharged soldier and the other a discharged sailor, had proceeded to Canada and had been taken across the continent to British Columbia. He stated that after they had remained in British Columbia three days they had had to proceed to the United States, because they found that British Columbia was full of unemployed Canadian soldiers. In the course of his remarks Mr. Briant said:

> This seems to show that the Dominion Government is at fault in taking them right across the Canadian continent. The whole problem should be re-discussed between the British and Canadian authorities so that the emigrant be left with no reasonable ground for complaint.

According to the report Mr. Briant concluded by saying:

> If the members saw the muddles of the Canadian emigration officials as he had seen them in Canada, they would not be so enthusiastic over these British assisted passages.

Mr. Briant is one of the most prominent members of the British House of Commons, and in view of the fact that this is the season during which the tide of immigration is generally turned to Canada and also of the fact that the reputation of this country is seriously involved, I should like to ask the Government whether they have taken or intend to take some steps to remove this impression, whether it be based on actual facts or whether it be incorrect.

Hon. Mr. CALDER (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): I have no knowledge of the facts as set forth in the statement read by the hon. gentleman, and no intimation has come to me in any way, shape, or form with reference to the two persons mentioned, a soldier and a sailor. Moreover, there is very close co-operation at the present time between our officials overseas in London and the British authorities in reference to Imperial ex-service men who are coming to Canada. Some weeks ago there came to Canada a number of ex-service men who should really not have come considering the conditions existing in the country during the past winter. But that matter is now well under control, and no one of those men—I am speaking of those who receive assisted passages from the British Government—is permitted to come without the approval of our officials in London. So far as I know, the whole problem is now well under control, and I doubt very much if any incidents such as are referred to in that statement are likely to occur in Canada

Mr. BELAND: What about the "muddle?"

Mr. CALDER: The gentleman who made that statement—

Mr. JACOBS: Is not a Government supporter.

Mr. CALDER: — is privileged to make any statements he pleases as to what his view of the position is.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE. AMENDMENT ACT.

On motion of Hon. N. W. Rowell (President of the Council), the House went into Committee on the following proposed resolution; Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

> Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that paragraph (c) of subsection (3) of section sixty-six of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, as proposed to be enacted in the Bill entituled an Act to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act and to transfer to the Commissioner of Dominion Police the powers heretofore vested in the Commissioner of Dominion Police, (Bill 2), now before the House, be amended to provide that the pension of a constable shall not exceed two-thirds of his annual pay and allowances at his retirement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend explain?

Mr. ROWELL: The resolution relates to the Bill now before the House which will come up for second reading to-day. The object is to correct a clerical error which occurred in the pension provisions of the Act passed last session. The basis of pensions for members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is a certain percentage of their "pay and allowances." These words appear throughout the Act with the exception of a single subsection in which apparently, through some inadvertence, the words "and allowances" were omitted. This is simply to correct that subsection and bring it into harmony with the other provisions of the Act.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver): I did not hear a single word the minister said, and I do not know whether he hears me, and in a reciprocal mood, I do not care very much whether he does or not, because no effort seems to be made to speak so that we can all hear. I could hear, Mr. Deputy Speaker, every word that you uttered, when reading the resolution and consequently I must say that the fault is not ours. I am going to add this further observation that I think the architects, while they deserve a great deal of credit for the beauty of this Chamber, lost sight absolutely and entirely of the use to which the Chamber was to be put.

I do not know whether my remarks are relevant to what the minister said or not, as I could not hear his remarks; but I wish to bring the attention of the Government to a matter that has already been brought to the attention of the House in connection with the pensions of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. I did not know that this matter was coming up to-day or I should have been prepared to discuss it more in detail, but briefly my point is this: There are in Canada a large number of pensioners of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, who, I understand, gave twenty or more years' service, and who, after having given this period of service, were retired and granted a pension. We all know that a man who has given twenty years, the prime of his life necessarily, to the service of his country in this particular branch or in any other branch, is certainly not fitted, at the conclusion of that period or on his discharge from the Force, to earn his living upon the ordinary labour market. That, I think, goes without question and without any doubt. The pensions of the older members of the force are based on the rate of pay that they received ten, twenty or thirty years ago as the case may be. You will at once observe, Sir, that the older a man is, and the less capable he is of sustaining himself, the smaller is his pension, because of the remote period at which it was granted to him and the small salary of that date, on which the pension was based. Consequently, there are a large number of veterans of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police who to-day are receiving very small pensions. This matter has been brought to the attention of the Government, and it may be that the minister said something about it when he was speaking, but that I do not know. It may be that the Government has reached some conclusion in this matter; but I wish to urge upon the attention of the Government and, in particular, of the minister, the fairness of the request of the veterans of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. There are in the House a number of members who, I know, are interested in this subject, and who, I think, desire to give it their support. I should like to ask the minister if the request made by the veterans of this force that provision should be made for granting a bonus to supplement existing pensions has been considered and will be acceded to by the Government.

[Mr. Rowell.]

Mr. ROWELL: I may say I do not think the House, on most occasions at least, has any reason to complain that it is unable to hear me. I think my voice is usually heard in the Chamber, and regret if members were not able to hear what I have said. I explained that the object of this amendment was simply to correct a clerical error in one subsection of the Act passed last session, so as to make the subsection read that pensions to members of the Mounted Police shall be based upon their pay and allowances. That is clearly provided in the Act, but in one particular subsection, the last subsection relating to pensions, the words " and allowances " were left out. Although that omission was purely a clerical error, the words cannot be inserted without an amendment, and that amendment, as it relates to a charge on the public funds of this country, cannot be made without this resolution having been previously adopted by the House. That is the sole object of this resolution which, when it is approved by the committee, will come up for consideration when the Bill is before the committee of the whole House.

Referring to the point raised by my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens), there is no doubt, having regard to the present cost of living, that pensions granted some years ago upon the scale of pay then existing are not nearly so adequate to-day as they were when granted, and many pensioners are suffering hardships by reason of the change in conditions, and I sympathize with them in the position in which they find themselves. My hon. friend will realize, however, that it is not a simple matter to deal with. There are thousands of persons who have retired from various branches of the public service and who are receiving pensions granted in years gone by. Take, for instance, all the militia and Civil Service pensions that have been granted prior to the present time. These persons have made representations that their pensions should be increased, but up to date, having regard to the other charges upon the revenues of the country, the Government has not seen its way clear as a matter of general public policy to increase the pensions that have hitherto been granted in the different branches of the public service. The same thing is true of judges, and in fact of all those who under the various laws enacted by this Parliament are in receipt of pensions granted under the conditions which prevailed prior to the war. It is true that this matter has been brought to my attention, and I brought it to the attention of my colleagues in the Government, but in view of the general situation we felt we could not deal with the pensioners of the Mounted Police in any different manner from that in which we dealt with all other public servants who had retired from the public service and are in receipt of pensions. The Government has not been able to see its way clear to make provision for increased pensions for all who have hitherto retired.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS: The minister must realize that there is a very great difference between the pensions that are being drawn by different members of the public service who have retired. The minister even mentioned judges. Justices of the Supreme Court upon retirement receive a pension of something like $4,500 a year. Surely the minister recognizes that there is a difference between the graded pensions of the Civil Service and the judiciary, and a pension of $30 a month granted to a man who has spent the best of his life in the public service on a salary on which it was impossible to save, and who now in his old age is practically dependent on this pittance from the Government. I would suggest, and I wish to press this matter strongly, that a solution could be found by increasing the pensions to the minimum on which a man could live decently. I do not know what that minimum would be, but certainly the pensioners of the Mounted Police and all other pensioners in the same position should have their pensions increased. I know a light-keeper who has served this country for thirty years in an isolated lighthouse, who is to-day receiving a pension of only $30 a month. That is not justice. Surely this Parliament is not going to deliberate on the finances of this country and disregard such a flagrant case of injustice as that. It will not do to dismiss this question by saying that the same conditions apply to the whole Civil Service of Canada, and that to increase the pensions would involve a sum too large to be faced. We are not asking the Government to raise pensions that are fairly adequate to-day, but I would urge the Government as strongly as I can to bring pensions that are obviously grossly inadequate up to a minimum that would give a man a reasonable chance to live decently. The Government are granting pensions to-day to the Mounted Police based on their present pay, of from $2 to $3 per day, whereas in days gone by the rate was based on the pay of 75 cents or 90 cents a day, so there is no sense or justice in the Government refusing to raise pensions granted in years past that are obviously inadequate to-day. I know many old pensioners who have no means of support except their pension and such doles as are handed out to them by charitable friends. That is not a desirable condition; it is not fair or just. While I do not desire to embarrass the Government with perplexing problems, I feel it my duty to urge as strongly as I can that the Government should bring pensions up to a standard of decent living in the case of those receiving only a small amount.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (Peterborough): I have no hesitation in embarrassing the Government in connection with this matter. Until this Government or any other understands that the basis of remuneration for fair work is human life and not simple arithmetic, there will be no contentment or justice or common decency in the country. The trail of the serpent is over it all. It is profiteering in another way—inversely, if you like, but nevertheless it is so. Until we appreciate the elementary fact that good honest toil is worthy of good honest and decent recompense, and that one man requires just as much of the necessaries of life as another, no matter whether he is at the head or the foot of an organization, we have not appreciated the very elements of civilization, we lack brains. It is almost incredible that after 2,000 years of Christianity and preaching we have reached such a miserable stage that we have no regard for a man's life and livelihood, but hand out to him just the dole that happens to be opposite his name. On the other hand, I have noticed that people with big salaries and big positions to keep up are always sustained in their position by Governments and the people generally. That sort of thing simply breeds discontent in the country. It is one of the very great things in British public life that the British understand these facts, and are anxious to see even the humblest toiler get at least fair play and reasonable comfort. In this country we are too much inclined to pass over all that sort of thing with a sweep of the hand, and I say we had better embarrass the Government, and embarrass it rapidly and deeply until it reaches the understanding that life is the basis of reward and not simple arithmetic.

Mr. R. J. MANION: I wish to support what my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) has said, because the sooner this or any other Government recognizes the principle that a man who has given the greater part of his life in the service of his country is entitled to a pension equal to a living wage, the sooner they will have the people of this country solidly behind them. Last year the special committee appointed to deal with soldiers' civil re-establishment, under the chairmanship of my hon. friend (Mr. Calder), brought in a recommendation in favour of higher pensions for certain classes of dependents of soldiers who were not getting an adequate pension, but no action has been taken by the Government in that regard. I think it is a very live question. All these helpless people, whether they be dependents of soldiers killed at the Front, or men who have retired from the Mounted Police or of any other branch of the Civil Service, should be looked after and given an adequate living wage by this Government.

Mr. W. D. COWAN: In Regina, where I live, and which has been the headquarters of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police ever since that body was established, we have probably a larger percentage of Mounted Police pensioners than has any other city in Canada, and I find that some of their families are suffering real hardship. Most of these men are so old that it is utterly impossible for them to do any work to speak of. We all know that it is a matter of the greatest difficulty for a man between the ages of fifty and seventy to get any sort of remunerative employment at any time, and it is particularly difficult for these men to obtain work, because their employment in the service has been of such a nature as to render them unadapted to other occupation. Those men to-day in Regina have pensions ranging from thirty to fifty dollars a month on which it is absolutely impossible for them to exist in any state of decency. Hitherto they have not complained very much, but they feel a grievance now that pensions have been increased for men henceforth entering the force. They were quite prepared to struggle along as best they could, but now they feel that they are being unjustly discriminated against; and for that reason they are today somewhat—indeed I might say, quite —antagonistic. A goodly number of them have interviewed me on the subject and I had intended to bring the matter personally to the attention of the President of the Privy Council. So far, however, I have not had an opportunity to do so. I would emphasize as strongly as possible the view of the hon. member for Vancouver, and urge that adequate attention be given to this class of pensioners. Personally I think it is beneath the dignity of this Dominion to expect married men who have spent twenty years or more in the service of the country to live on from thirty to fifty dollars a month, when because of the very character of their services every other form of occupation is now denied them.

Mr. C. W. PECK: I desire to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member (Mr. Stevens) on this subject, although I do not intend to enter into any lengthy discussion of it. I have contended repeatedly in this House that the pensions of our soldiers are inadequate, and I intend to continue to do so until something is done. I have some faith in this Government that it is favourably disposed—and I think that if we can fully impress upon them the necessity for increased pensions they will appreciate that necessity and do something. I endorse what has been said in favour of the pensioners of the Northwest Mounted Police in both the regular and the overseas forces, and I trust that the Government will this year take the question into earnest consideration and deal with it effectively. At present I am ashamed of the pensions that are paid, notwithstanding the fact that they are larger than those paid by any other nation. I think, indeed, that it is to the glory of Canada and its Parliament that we have put through pension measures which are the most liberal in the world. But for men of this class everything possible should be done. History has proved that the soldier has always been scandalously treated in the matter of pension, and Kipling and other writers have shown that people have always been ready to applaud the soldier and glorify him when he stepped to the front rank in the hour of danger, but that when it came to a question of pension they were always rather stingy. I think therefore that everything should be done so that none of the dependents of the men who have served the country either at home or overseas will suffer want, but will have proper provision that will afford them a decent livelihood, and care for and educate their orphans.

Hon. Mr. FIELDING: I think the question is somewhat broader than it appears on first view. Hon. gentlemen have spoken of inadequate pensions granted to the retired members of the Mounted Police, but there are also other classes of pensioners in Canada. For instance, there are plenty of judges still living who were appointed years ago under the old system of pensions, and the same remark applies to civil servants generally. Their pensions were all fixed in former years when salaries were perhaps more adequate compared with the cost of necessaries than they are to-day, and the recipients are no doubt suffering considerable hardship at the present time. I appreciate the remarks that have been made in regard to the Mounted Police, but the question of pensions is a very large one and naturally moves one's sympathies. It is not a question concerning the Mounted Police alone, but one that affects the whole pension list of Canada.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS: I have no objection to the Bill proposed by the President of the Privy Council. I am one of those who for many years have thought that the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, having regard to the character of their work, have never been adequately paid—double the wage they got would not have adequately paid them. Their salaries have been shamefully inadequate, and if the Bill suggested by the President of the Council will secure these men any more recompense, I wish it every success. Speaking generally, however, in regard to pensions, apart from those which are given for military service, I want to disassociate myself from several statements that have been made.

One or two hon. gentlemen have referred to men who have "given their lives in the service of the country." Well, there may be some, but I cannot put my finger at the present moment on one who has "given" his life. Speaking generally, they have not given their lives in the service of the country, although I think there are some exceptions. Those in the service of the country are receiving larger pay than men doing equally hard work in other lines of employment. Talk about giving their lives! Why, as soon as there is a vacancy there is a scramble of hundreds to get it because they know they are going to be paid more than they could earn anywhere else. I want to repeat, Mr. Chairman, that there are exceptions. I think we have some men—comparatively few—in the public service who are not sufficiently paid, and I would be among the first to increase the salaries of such men. But on the whole, apart from military service, I am opposed to the principle of pensions or superannuation. Two young men come to Ottawa, let us say—one goes into the Civil Service at a larger salary than he would get anywhere else in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, and when he has served twenty or twenty-five years he expects to be superannuated and put as a charge upon the country for the rest of his life. The other young man, of equal ability and education, goes into a private concern, a bank or some mercantile establishment, and after his service of twenty or twenty-five years, with a smaller pay than his more fortunate friend in the public service, notwithstanding that he himself has had to provide against old age and the inevitable rainy day, if he does not want to be thrown upon an institution of charity, he is nevertheless obliged to contribute to the support of the man who has gone into the Civil Service and draws a pension. This is absolutely unfair, I contend.

We have no trouble whatever in filling all the positions in the Civil Service, with the exception once in a while of a position of technical character. Let me reiterate, Mr. Chairman, lest there should be any misunderstanding, that these remarks do not apply to those men who served the country in the hour of peril. Nothing is too good for those who risked life and limb and passed trying days for the preservation of freedom. I will do everything I possibly can to assist such men. Generally speaking, however, I disassociate myself from any contention that the pension or superannuation list should be enlarged.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the object of restricting the pension to two-thirds of the annual pay and allowances at retirement?

Mr. ROWELL: The pension is two-thirds based on the years of service. A man does not become entitled to pension as a matter of right until he has served a certain number of years. If he has served twenty years he becomes entitled to a pension as of right on the basis set out in the Act. If he has served for ten years and is retired by reason of physical disability, there is power to grant a pension, but that is the basis upon which the pension is granted—two-thirds of the pay or salary that he is receiving.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not understand why you make it two-thirds. There are cases where men are entitled to more than that. When they retire they are not all absolutely in the same position. Some men may retire after twenty years and be absolutely unfit for anything else and two-thirds of their salaries would be insufficient to keep them. In some cases it might work an injustice if you had a hard and fast rule that two-thirds will be the maximum to which they shall be entitled. I do not think you would be doing justice to these men as a class.

Mr. ROWELL: It has always been the law, both in connection with the Mounted Police and the Permanent Force that where a pension is granted based on the period of service, the pension should be based on a fixed percentage of the salary paid. It is not a disability pension. If this were a disability pension, it would be based on the character of the disability. This is a pension for length of service, and in that case the pensions have always been on a uniform basis, being a certain percentage of the salary received proportionate to the length of service. In this respect there is no change in the law.

Mr. FIELDING: I would not like the observations of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) against the whole principle of superannuation to pass without some word of dissent —I will not say protest. I am afraid, however, that the view which my hon. friend has taken is the popular one. A great many people will ask that question, as the hon. gentleman did: Why should two young men coming to Ottawa fare so differently? One of them goes into the public service and ultimately gets a pension, while the other goes into private service and gets nothing. In spite of that, if the Government have any intention of introducing a measure to restore the principle of superannuation I would like to help them, and I do not want the observations of my hon. friend, which are against that view, to pass unchallenged. It is not a question of what is just to the individual; it is a question of what is just to the public service. You cannot expect to get good men to remain in your service either in public or private life unless you see that they have adequate salaries, and unless you have some reasonable provision by which you can give them something for the rainy day. Even with the larger private employers to whom my hon. friend has referred, that principle applies. He spoke of the banks. All the banks and other large financial institutions have found it necessary to adopt pension systems, not for the sake of the individual, but in order that they may secure efficient service. I have a case that came to my knowledge—I will not mention the name—of a well known official in connection with one of our Government departments, and in this I speak of my own experience. As minister it came to my knowledge that he had been offered a very handsome salary to leave the department. He did not leave. He did not say anything about it; he was a modest, unassuming man. When I met him I said I was very much pleased that he had decided to remain in the service. He said: "I am remaining in the service because, among other reasons, I have been contributing some years to the superannuation fund, and with the supplement which the Government is making to that, I will one day be able to retire." If we had not had that superannuation arrangement, that man, one of the most valuable officials in the service of the Government, would have gone to New York, where he would have received a much larger salary than he was getting in the public service. From my own experience and from my observation of my successor's work, I know that in the Finance Department we have been losing valuable men because we do not seem to be able to pay them adequate salaries in comparison with what they are able to receive outside. I was, I am free to confess, a minister in the Government that changed the superannuation system. We had for many years a superannuation system. It was claimed that it had been abused. How far that was correct I do not need to assert, but at all events that was the impression throughout the country. In consequence of that impression, an impression that men had been pushed out of the service to make way for friends of the Administration, there was a strong feeling against the superannuation system, and when the Liberal Government came into power in 1896-7, in view of that prevailing sentiment, we made a change in the Superannuation Act. We decided that superannuation should remain with respect to the old officials, but that thereafter there should be none. As respects all the officials, with the exception of those of the Militia Department and Mounted Police who seemed to have fared better, the members of the Civil Service of Canada, since 1896-7, have had no place on the superannuation list. There was a retirement fund established as a sort of substitute. It was entirely insufficient. It is only a system of compulsory saving, and all the Government pay is a slightly higher rate than the common rate of interest. But this retirement fund is insufficient to enable a man to retire with a reasonable degree of comfort. There are many men in the departments, who may have done excellent work, but who are kept there when they are no longer efficient, simply because there is no arrangement for their retirement. It is not so much in the interest of the individual as in the interest of an efficient public service that I am free to say that I think the then Government made a mistake in that respect, and I am willing to help the present Government to correct the mistake. The illustration which I have given confirms that view, and there have been many such cases. If you want to keep good men in the public service you must hold out some inducement to them. The chances of men saving up for the rainy day, whether in the Government service or private service, are not very good. All our large financial institutions are recognizing that. My hon. friend from Elgin referred to the banks. If a young man goes into a bank to-day he comes under a superannuation system; if he goes into the service of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or into that of any of the larger corporations, he comes under the operation of a superannuation system. I do not want to enlarge upon it. I simply say that not only in regard to the individual himself but in regard to the efficiency of the service, it is a sound policy to have a superannuation system, to which the official should make some contribution himself. I am sorry to differ from my hon. friend from Elgin. I know he has the popular end of it, and I rather suspect that some of my good friends who sit on what are called the cross benches may sympathize with the hon. gentleman. But, in the interest of efficient public service, every civilized nation has found to-day that it is necessary to have a superannuation system, and I hope we will have it in Canada.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend has insinuated that the stand I have taken is a popular one and that probably I likely had some personal interest—

Mr. FIELDING: I will state at once to my hon. friend that I did not say anything of the kind and I did not mean to convey any such impression.

Mr. CROTHERS: The implication was made, and repeated, that I had taken the popular side on this matter. I may inform my hon. friend that I have never sought to take the popular side on any question. The hon. gentleman has referred to one case where a gentleman in the Civil Service was offered a larger salary and went to other employment. I covered instances of that kind when I said that there were some members of the Civil Service who were not sufficiently paid and whose remuneration ought to be increased. Let me tell my hon. friend that one swallow does not make a summer.

I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that when the Government, of which he was a prominent member, abolished superannuation, in 1897, I think it was, they made a mistake. I do not think they made a mistake by abolishing the system but they should have substituted something for it.

One plea in favour of superannuation is that there are gentlemen in the Civil Service who, perhaps because of an extravagant family, live beyond their means, spend every year all they earn, and when they have reached the age of sixty-five or seventy and ought to be retired in the public interest, it is said "they have been in the public service for twenty-five or thirty years, they have no means, we cannot put them out and therefore they must be retained, after they have survived their efficiency." I think that position ought to be met but, in my judgment, it should not be met out of the public exchequer. The man who is in the public service ought to provide for old age in the same way as does the individual who is in private employment. It is said that these men do not do it and that they will not do it. Well the Government can compel them to do it. What I suggest is that every man who enters the Civil Service should be taxed on his salary—not to afford a retiring allowance such as my hon. friend refers to, because I quite agree with him that is not adequate at all—but he should be insured by the Government on premiums paid by himself just in the same manner as men in private employment have to provide for their children or for old age or for a rainy day. I ask would not such a plan as that meet the case? Let the civil servant contribute enough each year from his salary to enable the Government when he reaches the age of sixty-five to retire him on an allowance adequate to his station in life and protect him during the remainder of his life. In such a case as that the civil servant would be independent and he would have paid for this insurance himself out of his own salary. We seem to lose sight of the fact that where a man is superannuated —always excepting the men who have fought for their country—he is in a humiliating position, not to use even stronger language; every time a man holds out his hand for something he has not got, a little bit of his manhood oozes out of the end of his fingers. As I see it the members of the Civil Service should be compelled, in the way I have suggested, to make provision for old age. Then they will be entirely independent of anybody. No good reason has been assigned by my hon. friend in his remarks why the civil servant should be relieved from what is an imperative duty in the case of the man in private employment of making provision for himself and family. There is no justice that I can see in granting him relief from such responsibility.

Mr. FIELDING: The system we now have is a system of contribution to the superannuation fund.

Mr. COWAN: It seems to me there is absolutely no comparison between the cases submitted by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) and many of the cases now cited. I agree with the last speaker that the man who is in receipt of a sufficiently large salary ought to save enough to provide for old age. But what are you to do with men who serve in the mounted police for years on a stipend of seventy-five cents or a dollar a day? I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Crothers) how a man could save enough from a per diem wage of that amount to keep himself and family when old age comes? What we want is provision to meet the case of those men who have left the force after a service of many years, and are now trying to live in various parts of Canada on $30 or $50 a month—men who have reached the age of fifty, sixty, or seventy years. It is a past condition with an existing obligation that we have to deal with. These men have served their country for years on a daily pay of fifty, sixty, or seventy-five cents or a dollar and they found it absolutely impossible to put any money by. Some of these men married when they were in the service—perhaps they should not have done so but they did—and have wives and children dependent upon them. I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Crothers) to inform me how they could save enough out of their pay to make provision for their old age?

Mr. CROTHERS: I repeat my previous statement that I think the members of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police have never been adequately paid,—I do not think they receive one half of what they should receive and perhaps their superannuation allowance is not sufficient. I have no objection to making suitable provision for the members of the force.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Boivin): Before any further discussion takes place on this resolution I must remind hon. members that speeches in committee must be strictly relevant to the question, clause or resolution under discussion. The present resolution deals with pensions for the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and any discussion of superannuation or retiring allowances for Civil Servants is entirely out of order.

Mr. STACEY: I labour under the disadvantage referred to by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Stevens) inasmuch as I scarcely know whether or not any remarks I may make will be strictly apropos of the real subject of discussion, as I have not heard what has been said, but before stating my views I wish to throw out a suggestion which possibly is worthy the consideration of the Government, and incidentally of the leader of the Opposition. Would it not be possible for the members of the Cabinet and the leaders on the Opposition side to occupy as seats of honour the centre benches in this Chamber.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STACEY: There is no special virtue I presume attaching to the seats which they occupy at the upper end of this Chamber, consequently the centre would be the natural and the logical place for the leaders on each side to sit. If they are agreeable to that change being made I am sure it will meet with the hearty approval of practically all the other members of the House.

As to the question of further recognition of the services rendered by the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, the position taken by the minister that they must be put upon the same basis as other employees of the Government may be technically and perhaps legally and otherwise correct. But I wish to point out that the members of the Northwest Mounted Police during the last half century have stood between civilization and chaos in the country west of the great lakes, and they are deserving of special consideration, not as a matter of charity, but as a matter of right, honour and common justice. Those who know the work of these men in the Northwest will answer in the affirmative every question as to their having served the country faithfully and well. I grant that in some cases the men were lead to join the service through motives of adventure or possibly through a desire to lead a life in the open. These motives may have served them for a time but now they have to face the sterner realities of life; with the cost of living as it is to-day the glamour of the past entirely fades away and they are face to face with serious responsibilities and obligations. Of all the classes of the people who have served this country, at any rate west of the great lakes, the Northwest Mounted Police deserve at our hands special consideration and anything in the line of pension or bonus which it is within our power to give them. I trust, therefore, that the House will grant them the prayer of their petition so far as it is reasonable and right.

Mr. STEVENS: I again suggest that a minimum should be fixed in regard to these pensions applicable to the old veterans whose pensions are now based upon the absurdly low sum of 50 or 75 cents a day. I am somewhat disappointed that the minister has not vouchsafed any intimation that he will give the matter further consideration. I may be trespassing upon my rights as a private member in urging this point so strongly, but at the risk of incurring the minister's displeasure I wish to press the matter and to advise him that I have a little bit of the stick-to-itiveness of the Cornishman, for I am one by birth. If he does not vouchsafe me an answer today, I shall bring the matter up at the first opportunity when the Royal Canadian Mounted Police estimates are before the House. I do not wish to be disrespectful, but the matter merits the attention of the Committee and some further statement by the minister.

Mr. A. W. BUCHANAN: I wish to say a word on behalf of the members of this force who in the by-gone days went out into the western country, endured great hardships and practically saved the western plains for Canada. These men are entitled to generous treatment. Many of them are in need of increased pensions; I know that from personal experience. I do not want to try to force upon the Government or upon the country any unnecessary expense, but I do say that as long as these men give efficient service to the country Parliament should look after them in a decent and respectable way. I have particular reference to the pioneers in the force who went out there at a time when it was difficult to get men to serve the country. The services rendered by these men should be recognized.

Mr. J. A. MAHARG: Except in the case of officers high up in the force and who would be permanently stationed at any one place, only single men are enlisted in this force. The men are handicapped, therefore, because of its being practically impossible for them to settle down, provide a home for themselves, and lay up a little competence for the future. In that respect they are in an entirely different position from any other employees in the public service. The minister would be well advised not to follow strictly the wording of the resolution. I am not aware of what their pay is now, but in the early years these men were paid 50 cents a day and you can easily have an idea of about how much they could lay by as a competence for old age at that rate of pay. The resolution provides that pensions shall not exceed two-thirds of the amount of the annual pay and allowances. I do not think that is fair; as my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) says, a minimum amount of pension payable to these men should be established.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Rowell, the resolution was referred to the Committee of the whole House to be considered in connection with Bill No. 2.

On motion of Hon. N. W. Rowell (President of the Privy Council), Bill No. 2, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act and to transfer to the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police the powers heretofore vested in the Commissioner of Dominion Police, was read the second time.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, before the House goes into Committee I should like to say a word on the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion for the second reading of the Bill has been declared carried. We can cancel the Order if the hon. member so desires, but perhaps it would be better under the circumstances that he make his remarks in Committee.

Mr. McMASTER: If I shall not be out of order in doing so,—because my remarks will be of a general character—I accept that suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

The House went into Committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On Section 1—Powers of Commissioner of Dominion Police transferred to Commissioner of Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. McMASTER: The matter which I wish to bring before the committee deals rather with the general organization of this force than with the item now under discussion, and I crave the indulgence both of the Chairman and of my fellow members if I do not hold as strictly as I should to the letter of the clause under consideration. During the recess, since last session, two disturbing matters in connection with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, have come to the public attention, and I am taking this opportunity of bringing them before the minister in order that he may either free our minds by telling us that we are misinformed, or state that such things will not occur again. It was reported in certain parts of the press of Canada that the Mounted Police, who had been the upholders of British traditions throughout the Northwest for the last generation, had made a raid upon a library in Alberta, removing therefrom books which dealt with socialism. I do not know whether the New Testament was amongst the books removed from that library, because we all know that the early Christians had all things in common and were in that sense the first socialists. But we understand that books such as Plato's Republic were removed from the shelves of that library. If this be true, this constitutes a very sad reflection upon the mentality of the Canadian people and the wisdom of those in charge of the Mounted Police. I hope the minister will be able to assure me that my information is incorrect; but if he cannot do so, I hope he will assure the committee that such practices will not be countenanced in the future, and that those guilty of them will be brought to a speedy reckoning.

The next matter which I heard about came from somewhat further to the East. It happens that in the city of Toronto there is an organization called the Daughters of Canada, which has for its objects the creation of a national spirit and the study and investigation into Canadian matters. With the objects of this association no patriotic citizen can find the slightest fault. The information that comes to me in connection with this is that on a certain day, I do not know what day, an official functionary of, I understand, the Dominion Police—I do not know whether he was a mounted man or not—came to one of the ladies interested in this association and said: "What is this 'Daughters of Canada'; we have heard unpleasant, disturbing comments upon this organization; we have read in the press comments about this organization, and we want to know what it is." This sort of thing may be quite in place in Russia, but it has no place in Ontario, nor in any other part of Canada. I bring these matters before the committee; I cannot think that the minister has any sympathy with such goings on, and I hope either he will be able to tell us that our information is incorrect; or, if it be correct, that he will put a stop to all such proceedings, for of all the liberties which we need to preserve on the North American continent are liberty of opinion, liberty of free discussion and liberty of free investigation. Without those very bases of liberty, no true national liberty is possible.

The CHAIRMAN: Having allowed the remarks just made by the hon. member for Brome, I am sure the committee will give its unanimous consent that the minister make the required reply, but I must afterwards insist that the committee hold itself strictly to the clauses under consideration. I may point out to the hon. member for Brome that his remarks would not have been in order even upon the second reading of this Bill; that the proper time for the remarks would have been upon a motion to go into Supply or when the Estimates of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were under consideration in committee.

Mr. ROWELL: With the general principle which my hon. friend (Mr. McMaster) has laid down, I have no quarrel whatever; I believe in freedom of thought, opinion and speech just as firmly as he does. I think I shall have no difficulty in relieving my hon. friend's mind in reference to the matters which he has just mentioned. I first learned of them, or, that there was any talk about them, by reports in the press, and I regret to say that statements do appear in the press that require investigation before one accepts them as absolute facts. In reference to the so-called raid on a public library, I have not heard of one in Alberta; I did see a report in the press that a raid had occurred on a public library in Saskatchewan. I do not know whether that is the one to which my hon. friend refers or not, but it is the only one that has come to my attention. It came to my attention through the press and I asked for a report upon it, and I am very glad to give the committee the facts in connection with the so-called raid. Hon. members will recall that, under the censorship orders which were in force during the period of the war, but which have since been repealed, certain books and pamphlets were put on the prohibited list, because they were considered to be of a treasonable, or seditious character, or were of such a character as would tend to militate against Canada's war effort. There was an American publishing house which published large numbers of those books, and as I recall the matter, the Department of the Censor, after prohibiting a number of those particular publications found that this publishing house was sending in books of a different character, books to which there had been no objection, but was accompanying those books by those seditious pamphlets that were on the prohibited list. The Department of the Censor reached the conclusion that the only way to deal effectively with this house—it was Kerr and Company, of Chicago,—was to prohibit any books published by this house from coming into Canada. This house, it so happens, did publish Plato's Republic; it did publish books to which there was no possible objection; but it was part of the duty of the Mounted Police, the Department of the Censor having as a matter of public precaution prohibited all the publications of this house from coming into Canada, to assist the Department of the Censor and the Department of Justice in carrying out those orders. It was brought to the attention of the Mounted Police that there were books published by this house in the library in Regina, and they were asked to investigate the matter. They did so; they spoke to the librarian about the matter, and the statement that there was a raid upon the library is absolutely incorrect. There was no raid upon the library; they interviewed the librarian; they were given some of the books; and the police transmitted such as were considered possibly objectionable to the office of the Chief Censor at Ottawa in order that they might be passed upon.

Mr. McMASTER: What did the police think were possibly objectionable?

Mr. ROWELL: I did not see the books, and I do not know what it was thought was possibly objectionable. The matter came to my attention only after the event, and these are the facts.

Mr. PECK: Not the New Testament?

Mr. ROWELL: Not the New Testament. So that my hon. friend will see that the whole story in the press, inspired no doubt by those who wanted to criticise the action of the Government in connection with the censorship regulations, was without any real foundation and the reflection on the administration of the police was wholly unwarranted. The police were simply carrying out an order promulgated by the Government for the protection of public interest during the war period, and were investigating the character of these books.

Now let me deal with another matter my hon. friend has mentioned. I first heard of it this week. I find that here also my hon. friend's information is at fault. What happened was this. A request was made to the Superintendent in charge of the police here in Ottawa for the addresses of the officers of the Daughters of Canada; an innocent request, but, frankly, one that I do not see any particular reason why the police should have carried out. The police went to the headquarters where this association met, at the Y.M.C.A., and ascertained the addresses of the officers in order that they might transmit them to Ottawa. They did ascertain and transmit those addresses, and so far as the police is concerned, that is all that was done. I regret to say, however, that an officer of the Y.M.C.A., not knowing that the police had gone there simply for the purpose of ascertaining the addresses, reached the conclusion that possibly there was some objection to this organization, and, therefore, when they made application to hold further meetings he offered some objection to it. The moment the matter was drawn to the attention of the police they said: "There is absolutely no objection. There is no reason why this society should be investigated; we are not investigating it; there is no complaint against it." I regret that by reason of the inquiries, made by the police for a perfectly innocent purpose, any inconvenience was caused to the ladies connected with this society. My hon. friend and the House may rest assured that the Mounted Police are preserving the best traditions of the force, and will continue to do so in the days that lie before us.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Constable after ten years may be pensioned if infirm, after twenty years entitled to pension.

Mr. ROWELL: I now move to amend subclause (c) of subclause (2) by inserting after the words "annual pay" on line 20 the words "and allowances."

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister not also consider including a provision providing a minimum pension applicable to those who have retired on pension in the past, as well as to those retiring in the future?

Mr. ROWELL: I appreciate what the hon. member has said, and what other hon. members have said in support of his suggestion, and I am quite prepared to bring the matter to the attention of my colleagues and ask that it be further considered. Certain facts have been brought out this afternoon indicating conditions of greater hardship than had hitherto been presented to me in connection with this matter. It is only right, however, to say that when I brought this matter to the attention of my colleagues before, the view was that we could not deal with the Mounted Police apart from the larger problem which has been discussed. I shall be glad to give the matter further consideration, but I do not wish to hold up the Bill, for if we reach the conclusion that something further should be done on the lines suggested by my hon. friend, I think it should be dealt with in a separate Bill. I am afraid it would have to be part of a larger matter than simply the Mounted Police.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ROWELL: I should like to make an announcement in connection with the work of the police which I am sure will gratify the House and the country.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Before the minister proceeds with that, can he tell the committee how many men there are at present who will be entitled to receive pensions under this clause?

Mr. ROWELL: I cannot give my hon. friend that information with respect to the men who are now receiving pensions under the law as it existed prior to the Act of last session, because I have not got it here. Those are the men to whom reference has been made by hon. members of the House who have advocated a change in the law to increase their pensions. Since the legislation passed last session increasing pensions, I do not suppose that up to date half a dozen have retired. When they will retire, of course, I cannot say. A man is not entitled to retire of his own volition until after twenty years' service. There are quite a number in the Mounted Police who have served twenty years. As a matter of fact the majority of the men desire to continue. There are a limited number of men in the service who have served for thirty years, but I cannot give my hon. friend the number of those who have served for any definite period. I regret I have not that information.

[Mr. Stevens.]

On the Title:

Mr. ROWELL: The matter which I desire to mention to the committee arises out of the visit of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to Canada. While His Royal Highness was in Western Canada, the Mounted Police provided him with an escort in the various cities which he visited; and, like other distinguished visitors, he evinced a very great interest in and appreciation of the work of the Mounted Police. I am glad to say that I have received a cable from Sir George Perley, Canadian High Commissioner, to the following effect:

> With His Majesty's approval, Prince of Wales has graciously consented accept position Honourary Commandant Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and His Royal Highness asks me tell you how pleased he is to be associated with force in this way.

Needless to say the Mounted Police greatly appreciate this conspicuous evidence of His Royal Highness' favour.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The people of the Dominion, as well as the Force, will, I am sure, appreciate the honour which has been thus conferred upon that body by His Royal Highness. Most of the hon. members on the other side have spoken of the force as the "Royal Northwest Mounted Police." That title has much in the way of historic significance and naturally brings to mind past associations and traditions to which considerable importance is attached, particularly by those who reside in the West. There is a considerable body of opinion in the country which favours the retention of the old title. I should like to ask if the Government have further considered that matter.

Mr. ROWELL: The Bill of last session simply changed the word "Northwest" in the title to the word "Canadian," the title now being "The Royal Canadian Mounted Police." As the work of the force has been extended into Eastern Canada, I am sure that members of the force in the West, as well as the people of the West, who are good and true Canadians, will be quite prepared to accept the change. The matter was carefully considered, and the approval of the executive officers of the force was secured before the change was made. Generally speaking, I have found that it has met with a great deal of public approval, although I am ready to admit that a few representations have been made to retain the old title.

Mr. McKENZIE: I should like to have some information in regard to the ticket-of-leave question referred to in the first section of the Bill. Is any material change contemplated in the procedure with regard to people who obtain ticket-of-leave? We know that Mr. Justice Archibald, as an officer of the Department of Justice, had to do with obtaining tickets-of-leave for certain prisoners throughout Canada, in whose welfare he has shown a very deep interest in seeing that they observe the regulations, secure proper employment and become as far as possible good citizens. I rather fear that this paternal care which Mr. Justice Archibald has exercised will not be continued under the new régime with an official who cannot possibly be as familiar with this system as is Mr. Justice Archibald, who was practically the originator of it. I should greatly like to be satisfied that this system will not deteriorate in any way, and that the service rendered to men who are unfortunate enough to be sent to the penitentiary will not cease by reason of the change.

Mr. ROWELL: I am pleased to be able to assure the hon. member that no change is contemplated in the method of administering the law. The change here proposed is simply to vest in the Chief Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police the duties which have hitherto been vested in the Commissioner of Dominion Police.

Bill as amended, reported and concurred in.

THE CURRENCY ACT, 1910.

On the motion of Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance) the House went into Committee on the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Currency Act, 1910, by providing (a) that the standard for gold coins shall be the same as at present, that is to say, that of one thousand parts by weight nine hundred shall be of fine gold and one hundred of alloy; (b) that the standard for silver coins shall be such that of one thousand parts by weight eight hundred shall be of fine silver and two hundred of alloy; (c) that provision be made for the standard weight, fineness and remedy allowance of silver coins; and (d) that silver coins heretofore struck by authority of the Crown or by order of the Governor in Council shall continue to be current and a legal tender.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The object of this resolution and of the proposed legislation is simply to prevent the coinage of Canadian silver being accompanied by a loss, and to a small degree to restore the position of the Mint, in regard to coinage, to what it was under former values. During last year there was a very extraordinary increase in the price of silver. Silver ran from 80 cents an ounce up to as high as $1.41 an ounce, and silver at 80 cents was comparatively high compared to what it could be bought for at the time Canada started silver coinage. Under the Act, our coinage has a fineness of 925; that is, out of the thousand points 925 are pure silver and 75 alloy. When Canada first started her coinage operations, with a coinage of that fineness there was a resultant profit to the Mint of seventy-seven cents, plus a decimal which I have forgotten. As a result of the tremendous increase in silver values which occurred last year, that profit of seventy-seven cents would not only have disappeared but we would have been coining silver actually at a loss of 4.7 cents per ounce.

The matter is an important one. The coinage operations have become very large. The Mint has a very heavy duty now thrown upon it and is turning out an immense amount of coinage. The original expectations of my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) when he, as father of the Mint commenced operations, have been far surpassed. With a view to giving the House an idea of the seriousness of coining silver at a loss, or indeed at an approximate loss, I will give the figures for 1914, which may be taken as representative, or fairly characteristic, of the coinage operations. For silver alone they amounted to $734,000 in 1914, while last year the demands for silver coinage were such that the duty was thrown on the Mint of turning out new silver coinage to the amount of $3,258,000. Of course, in so far as the silver content of the coin is concerned, as the House well knows, that is an entirely arbitrary matter. It is a matter which turns not upon the value of the coin as such, but rather upon the question as to what will make a good coin. Different countries have different standards of fineness. Our standard has been 925, the standard of Great Britain 925, and the United States 900, while that of the Scandinavian countries—which we now propose to adopt—the Straits Settlements and some other countries, is 800. To-day legislation is even advanced in Great Britain—I forget whether it is actually through the House or not—to reduce the fineness of the British silver coin to 500.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not think that there is any question but that the minister is adopting a wise policy in this matter. As to the question of profit or loss, in bygone years there was only one side to it—we always made a profit from the coining of silver. Now we have reached the stage when, as the minister points out, owing to the advance in the price of silver, it is an absolute loss to us. I do not suppose that any object would be gained by continuing on that line. I am glad to learn from my hon. friend that not only in respect to the coinage business, but in other respects, the Mint has proved a very valuable adjunct to the Department of Finance during the period of the war. I entirely agree with the action he is taking in practically reducing the quantity of silver, so that if we do not make a profit we may at least guard against a loss. Did I understand my hon. friend to say what profit he hoped to make?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We hope to get a profit of 17.3 cents.

Mr. FIELDING: In bygone years the profit was so large that sometimes it was a question as to whether we would be justified in treating silver as specie on a gold valuation. However the volume at that time was not very large. Occasionally reference has been made to the use of nickel in coinage. There is something to be said in favour of a nickel coinage in Canada purely from reasons of national pride. Canada is the largest nickel-producing country in the world, and it seems strange that when we have this valuable mineral at our doors we should not use it. I do not say that in the way of fault finding, but rather as a matter of inquiry. Our five-cent piece is rather too small a coin to be useful. One can lose it very easily, and it is not easy to handle. I have no urgent view to express, but I would suggest for the minister's consideration that we might utilize nickel for making the five-cent coin at all events. I entirely agree with the view that hon. gentleman has taken with reference to this measure.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I very much agree with the remark of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). I had thought of making the remark myself, as it is desirable that nickel should be introduced immediately into the coinage of Canada for the reasons specified by the hon. gentleman. We have about 85 per cent of the world's supply of nickel and its use in coinage would be a good advertisement in itself. A nickel coin would be very much easier to handle than the very small five-cent piece that we have. It is hard to keep track of that coin—though, for that matter, it is hard to keep track of any money these days. Nickel is a metal that is very substantial. I hope the minister will at an early date consider the suggestion that has been made. It may not perhaps be introduced into this resolution, but it should be introduced in the near future because it seems to me to be a most desirable thing. The minister did not state that we have been bothered with the reduction of coinage by reason of the fact that it is being absorbed by foreign nations, but I imagine that a great deal of it has been shipped to other countries and melted down into bullion. I have seen it stated in the newspapers that when it is reduced into bullion it is worth more than the face value of the coin. If that is the case I cannot understand why we should consent to being robbed of our silver on that basis. Another explanation is that silver is worth three times what it was before the war. It was worth from 40 to 43 cents an ounce in 1914, while to-day it is worth about $1.40. Although it has over three times the value that it had a few years ago we have been putting practically the same amount of silver into the coin that we did originally. That means a loss. I do not know what the relative value as between gold and silver is. We always used to hear about the relative value of 16 to 1. The minister might tell us what the ratio would be as between silver and gold. Is it 13 or 14 to 1? I have very great pleasure in supporting what the minister proposes to do. I think it should have been done earlier.

Mr. McMASTER: Before the minister replies to the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), I have a suggestion to make that he can reply to at the same time. The minister said that the United States had a certain standard of fineness for silver coinage, that Great Britain had another, and that we propose to adopt the standard of the Scandinavian countries. Would it not be advisable for the different civilized countries to get together and have a common standard of fineness for silver coin? If I mistake not, the fineness of gold coins is pretty nearly the same. I think that the amount of gold in the 20 franc piece is about the same as the amount in the sovereign. I would like to hear the minister express his view as to the wisdom and practicability of having the different nations get together and establsh their silver coinage on the same basis of fineness.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In answer to my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) as to the silver and gold ratio, he would be a very able man, but I do not think he would be an accurate man, who would say what the ratio of silver to gold was at the present time. It is a matter that is fluctuating constantly. Gold is about the only thing that is standing still. We know its value even if it is not standing still. But silver is something that is constantly moving. We have no fixed ratio of value in this country as between gold and silver. The basis of Canada's currency is—or was—the gold basis. There is the same basis back of Canada's currency as there is back of that of any country to-day in the world, and that is the country's credit; because, as a matter of fact, there is no country that is to-day really upon a gold basis. Silver, so far as we are concerned, is merely token money. As token money the question of ratios really does not come up at all. Silver does not pass as currency in value because the coin is worth thus and so. In Canada it is merely a token of value which is adopted. In China where they are on a silver basis, their coin is of value having regard to its fineness and the amount of silver in it; but with us, as with Great Britain and with the United States, silver is merely token currency. At one time when my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) was looking after the minting of Canadian coinage he was making profit on his silver coinage of two and one half times the value of the silver that went into it. It is quite clear therefore that that coinage was token money.

Mr. McMASTER: Is it token money to-day?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think it is absolutely token money to-day.

Mr. McMASTER: There is the value of the silver in the coin.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is as silver, but as coin it is still token money. We may regard the token as too expensive, but the underlying measure of value was never the silver in the token; and the merely accidental fact that to-day silver has became more expensive than it was could not very well make a difference in the nature of the currency. As it is merely token money I do not think that very much is to be gain d by having a standard value for silver coinage. It may be a nice thing to retain as token coinage but I do not think it is a matter of any great importance. Of course my hon. friend is absolutely right in connection with gold. Its value is on such a basis of currency everywhere that the question of standard fineness is a very important one.

I am very glad my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) has made the suggestion in reference to nickel coinage. We have now a company in Canada that is going to refine nickel in this country, and very shortly after I knew it I brought up with that company the question of a supply of proper nickel blanks of Canadian nickel, refined and supplied by a Canadian nickel refinery, for the purpose of a nickel coinage. The matter is not quite far enough advanced to be able to say exactly when we will be in a position to get those nickel blanks and to submit a considered proposal to the House. If it is at all possible it will be submitted at this session.

Mr. PROULX: Does this change affect the face value of our silver currency in the United States?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It cannot very well do that except for one purpose. Our currency in the United States is handled in the ordinary way by bankers or by the express companies; they are shipping that coinage back into Canada. They are taking the silver mainly at a discount of fifteen per cent, allowing a value in American currency of eighty-five cents for our dollar in silver, but it is expressed back. As to the difficulty, which it is suggested is taking place, that is the difficulty resulting from the melting down of our coinage into silver, the hon. gentleman will see that for currency purposes it is not a national interest that the value should be considered for melting purposes of token coin. On the basis which is now proposed of 800 fineness it would no longer avail one in Canada or the United States to take our silver and melt it down. That is one of the reasons why it was necessary, apart from the question of cost, to reduce the fineness of our silver coinage. The value, therefore, of the silver coinage, having in view the question of melting it and returning it to bullion, is decreased. The hon. gentleman says it is a pity it was not done before. Well, it has been done and it is being done; we will not go on losing money. I think it was the last expiring governmental action taken under the much abused War Measures Act which enabled us to stop losing money on our silver coin.

Mr. FIELDING: On the question of token coinage it is worth while remembering that in principle there is no difference between bronze and silver. Our bronze coinage and our silver coinage are alike in that respect—they never professed to be based on intrinsic value. As the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMaster) has pointed out our silver coinage is better than tokens inasmuch as it is now worth more than an equal amount of silver. That however, arises only from a temporary condition.

Some years ago a great deal of American silver was circulated in Canada and there were many reasons why that was not very desirable. One reason was that these American coins were displacing our own silver on which we made a profit. Steps were taken to collect that silver through the banks and ship it away. The result was that for some years we have had little or no American silver in Canada. I think that is quite important. There is not the same inducement to-day for shipping it away, but I would ask my hon. friend whether the banks still continue to export American silver under the arrangement with the Finance Department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We stopped paying the banks anything for that about eighteen months ago in view of the shortness of our own silver. When we return to normal conditions the former practice will again be adopted.

Mr. McMASTER: Under the Gresham law poorer money always drives out the better, and almost as a matter of economics the American importations have been leaving Canada and finding their way over to the United States.

Mr. BELAND: I would like to ask another question with respect to the new one-cent pieces which were provided for in a measure passed last year and which were to be much smaller in size than those now in circulation. I know the minister does not deal very much with these coins, but to me, and to a good many of my colleagues this coinage is a matter of some importance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Possibly my pocket has been worn out by the large Canadian cent just as much as the pocket of my hon. friend. It is a coin I am very familiar with bearing in mind what the salaries of Cabinet Ministers are. However, the character of the coin is settled. The orders were given a long time ago for the necessary dies from Great Britain, but they are not here yet. We are doing the best we can to get them, and as soon as they reach here I do not think more than forty-eight hours will elapse before we will be turning out those one-cent pieces.

Resolution reported.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 15, to amend the Currency Act, 1910.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

[Mr. Fielding.]

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS.

JOINT COMMITTEE OF BOTH HOUSES ON UNIFICATION OF CERTAIN BRANCHES.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate requesting this House to unite with the Senate in the appointment of a Joint Committee consisting of an equal number of members of both Houses to consider and report upon the desirability of uniting certain branches of the two Houses performing similar duties and particularly the Law Branch, the Law Translation Branch, and the Debates Translation Branch, and, if in the opinion of the committee, it is desirable to unite any of the branches, to submit a scheme therefor, and that the Honourable Messieurs Belcourt, Dandurand, Dennis, Foster, Fowler, Sharpe and Thompson be appointed as members of such committee to act on behalf of the Senate.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES.

On motion of Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance) the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Government Annuities Act, 1908, and to provide (a) for the sale of annuities to any person resident in Canada; (b) for the increase of the total amount which may be paid by way of an annuity or annuities to an annuitant or to joint annuitants from $1,000 to $5,000 a year; and (c) for the increase of the rate of interest from three to four per cent per annum payable on moneys repaid to the purchaser or his legal representatives when the annuitant or the last survivor of joint annuitants dies before the annuity becomes payable and moneys have been paid or deposited as consideration for the annuity.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, the object of this resolution and the legislation to be based upon it is to make Government annuities more popular than they are at present, to stimulate public interest in them, and to raise larger sums of money than have been raised in the past under the Government Annuities Act. The changes proposed are not very great, but they are considered necessary by the department having the matter in charge in order to make possible a greater sale of the annuities, in the interest not only of the country but also of those who purchase them.

The first change is to provide that annuities may be sold to any person resident in Canada. The department desires to be in a position to sell annuities to any one in Canada; they do not want to be confined to selling them only to persons who can prove domicile in this country. That is merely in the direction of removing a barrier which has stood in the way of selling these annuities.

The original intention in connection with the sale of annuities by the Government was to provide for an income to the annuitant of comparatively small amount. Of course, the first idea of the annuity was that it was entirely for the benefit of the annuitant, not of the country. That idea has long since been exploded, at any rate in so far as matters on this side of the Atlantic are concerned. The large insurance companies have gone very extensively into the business of selling annuities and in this connection are making very large sums of money. The sale of annuities ought to be a good thing for the Government; it is a transaction in connection with which the country ought to receive a large amount of money. If it pays ordinary commercial companies to sell annuities, it ought to pay, and I have no doubt will pay the country to sell them. Now, the total amount payable yearly by way of annuity has been $1,000; the department have requested that the amount be increased to $5,000 so that they may be enabled to do business with individual or joint annuitants to the extent of that amount.

Then there is the matter of the age at which annuities may be drawn. Under the present law no one can obtain payments under an annuity until he has become fifty-five years of age. That again limits the field in which annuities may be sold; and there would seem to be no reason for the restriction. The insurance companies do not impose any such restriction; they charge more, just as the Government would charge more for annuities payable at an earlier age. The profit obtained in connection with the sale of annuities which become payable at forty or forty-five when the charge is based upon a proper table of rates is just as good as that obtained in connection with the sale of annuities payable at fifty-five. The department, therefore, ask that that barrier also be removed.

The fourth matter covered by the resolution, that of providing for an increase of the rate of interest from three to four per cent per annum payable on moneys repaid to the purchaser or his legal representatives when the annuitant dies before the annuity becomes payable, is an important one. There are different kinds of annuities. There are guaranteed annuities, in connection with which a certain number of annual payments are payable after the annuity becomes payable whether the annuitant is alive or not. Then you have an annuity issued at a much lower rate under which the annuitant, if he dies before the date on which the annuity becomes payable, loses everything he has paid. Then you have an intermediate class which falls short of the guaranteed payment of annuities but which is entitled to a return of moneys paid with interest at three per cent. This intermediate class offers a two-fold inducement: It encourages savings and it guarantees their return with interest in case the annuitant dies before he attains the age at which the annuity is to commence. Now, at the time this rate of three per cent was fixed, money was a great deal cheaper than it is now, and the department says that in order to make effective any argument regarding the benefit of annuities from the standpoint of savings the interest rate should be four instead of three per cent.

Mr. PROULX: Would this apply to annuities that have been issued already?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, this would not necessarily apply to any existing contract. All annuities turn upon contract.

Mr. FIELDING: The objects of those who devised the original annuity scheme are not quite the same as those of the Minister of Finance. The original scheme was devised for the benefit of the annuitants, whereas my hon. friend is devising a scheme for the benefit and convenience of the Government. He wants to draw more money into the public treasury, and I suppose no objection can be taken to that, because he needs it badly This Bill is designed, not for the benefit of the annuitant, but to get more money into the public treasury. It was never intended that this should be a scheme to compete with insurance companies. Inasmuch as it was a privilege that was granted, it was not considered necessary to give it to everybody. But I do not think any harm can come from extending it as my hon. friend suggests. Then it was intended that the annuitant should receive a moderate sum; I do not think it was intended that he should get $5,000; I think the original sum was $600—at all events, the sum was a small one. The scheme was never intended as one to compete with insurance companies, but to meet the case of many simple people who did not understand insurance, who had great faith in the Government and who would take up a Govern-
