Mr. BLAIN. We have here returns showing a large number of cattle exported from Canada to the United States when the fact is that a great many of these were sent to Great Britain.

Mr. FIELDING.

Mr. PATERSON. You do not know that.

Mr. BLAIN. I do not know it in every case, but I do know that from my own county a number of cattle set down as exported to the United States, ultimately found their destination in Great Britain. This is a very important matter in the present discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is out of order at this juncture.

Mr. BLAIN. I will take the matter up later.

THE FARMERS' BANK.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What further action if any has been taken by the government during the past month towards investigating the affairs of the Farmers' Bank? This is a very important matter for many people in western Ontario.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No action has been taken by this government, but as everybody knows this matter is now in the courts of Ontario.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Then it is not the intention of this government to take any action until the courts of Ontario decide?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend asked what action had been taken, and I told him no action had been taken.

PRIVATE BILLS.

MONTREAL PARK AND ISLAND RAILWAY COMPANY.

On the order for the third reading of Bill (No. 45) respecting the Montreal Park and Island Railway Company.—Mr. Ecrement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Stand.

Mr. MONK. I have an amendment to propose to this Bill. The Bill has been postponed several times, and I have a letter from the hon. member (Mr. Ecrement) promoting it, asking me to be present to-day when the Bill would be proceeded with. I do not wish to take advantage of the absence of my hon. friend. but private Bills will be called to-morrow, and I shall expect him to proceed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is a private Bill; it is not in our hands.

CANADIAN BAPTIST FOREIGN MISSION BOARD.

House in committee on Bill (No. 161) to incorporate the Canadian Baptist Foreign Mission Board.—Mr. Fowke.

On section 7: limit of time of holding property.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. When the committee was last considering this Bill I was pointing out certain anomalies in this section which I was unable to understand. The first part of the section says:

The board may receive, take and hold real estate by purchase, gift or devise, and determine by by-law the manner in which such property shall be held and conveyed, subject always to the laws of the province in which such real estate is situated.

Then, the third subsection says:

The board shall, within ten years after its acquisition of any real estate, sell or otherwise dispose of and alienate so much of such real estate as is not required for the use and occupation of the board.

The first paragraph practically says that the real estate shall be held subject to the laws of the province, while the last one says it may be held for ten years. As I understand it, the tenure of real estate is a matter exclusively within the jurisdiction of the province, and, therefore, if the province said that such real estate might be held for seven years only, while this Act says it may be held for ten years, there would be a conflict. I think the Act of the provincial legislature would override any provision which this parliament might make limiting the tenure of land. I would like to have the opinion of the Minister of Justice on that point.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Might I ask my hon. friend if there is any law of any of the provinces making a limitation of seven years or of any number of years?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I would not like to answer that off-hand; but in the Ontario Mortmain Act there is a provision limiting the holding of real estate to two years. I think this clause should be struck out and a clause inserted to this effect:

Any such conveyance shall be subject to the laws relating to the conveyance of real estate to religious corporations which were in force at the time such conveyance was made, in the province in Canada in which such real estate is situated.

I am quite aware that the Minister of Public Works has pointed out one or two other Acts in which provisions have been made similar to this, but I do not think that should be a precedent for this parliament cutting into the jurisdiction of the provinces as to property and civil rights.

Mr. PUGSLEY. When this Bill was last before the committee, some reference was made to the law of Ontario, and I think the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) was only able to give as proof that there was such a law that in one particular case, in the letters patent incorporating some real estate company, it was provided that there should be a limitation of the holding. Of course, that would not apply at all, as my hon. friend knows, to this case. My hon. friend has called the attention of the committee to chapter 112 of the Statutes of Ontario, the Mortmain Act; but that applies simply to lands devised by will for any religious or charitable use; the land must be sold, except as otherwise provided in the statute, within two years of the death of the testator. That would not apply to a case like this, where a company or an association like the Baptist Foreign Mission Board is incorporated for the purpose of carrying on foreign missions. My hon. friend says, it is true that this parliament has incorporated a number of companies with similar powers and similar limitations, but our attention having been now called to the contention which he has made that this parliament cannot limit the right of the association to hold real estate, therefore, we ought to depart from what has been done in the past and leave the matter entirely to the provincial legislatures. The provinces he argues have exclusive jurisdiction over the tenure of real estate. Now, this I entirely deny. It is true, that property and civil rights are assigned by the British North America Act to the different provinces; but that is always subject to the other provision of the British North America Act, that the incorporation of companies with Dominion objects rests in the exclusive authority of this parliament. Take the case of a railway company. This parliament is the only legislative body which can incorporate a railway company with power to build a railway extending beyond the limits of any one province, and the courts have held on more than one occasion that in that incorporation, parliament can also legislate with reference to the tenure of real estate by the railway company. It can declare what land can be taken for the purposes of the railway, such as right of way, station grounds, &c. What the courts have said is that this parliament, once it is given the legislative authority over a company, must be the sole judge of what powers shall be conferred upon the company. So in this case. My hon. friend surely would not dispute that, having the power to incorporate this company, parliament can say what property it shall have the right to hold, whether real estate or personal property or both; and if parliament has that right, parliament and parliament alone has the right to say what shall be the limitations upon its holding of real estate. With all deference to the opinion of my hon. friend, for whose views I have very great respect, I have myself not the shadow of doubt as to the power of parliament to pass clause 7 of this Bill. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice did not hear the discussion the other evening. Of course, I would be guided by his judgment in the matter; but according to my interpretation of the British North America Act and my study of the cases which have been decided under that Act, I have not the slightest doubt that parliament is competent to pass this section.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. If that is the case, there is certainly a manifest contradiction in the section, because one portion says that the real estate shall be held by this corporation subject to the laws of the provinces, while the latter part of the section says that it can be held for ten years. I take issue with my hon. friend. If his contention is right, then the parliament of Canada has absolute jurisdiction as to the tenure of land, and not the provinces. I put it the other way. There was left to the provinces sole jurisdiction with reference to the tenure of land and there was only given to the Dominion what was left, that is the incorporation of companies. It is one thing to incorporate a society such as this, to make it a corporate entity, and an entirely different thing to say it shall hold land on a tenure different from that which the province sets up.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). What would the result be if we did not put in a limitation of term? They might hold the property for ever.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The amendment I suggest is in the line of all previous incorporations of such societies prior to the last two or three years.

The object of the incorporation is just to make them a legal entity; and if property be devised to them, they take it subject to the same tenure as is stipulated by the province in which the property is situated. In all these other cases, it is provided that the tenure shall be according to the law of the province, and they could not hold it on any other tenure.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Suppose the provinces have no law upon the subject, clearly this parliament would properly exercise its power of limiting the time within which the association must dispose of its property. It might possibly be that putting in the words 'subject to the law of the province,' might subordinate this clause to provincial law, if the time ever should arrive when the province would deal with the subject; but until the province does, it is eminently proper that this section should be enacted. Otherwise in all the provinces there would be probably no limitation whatever on the time during which this association could hold on to its real estate.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The only reason I suggest this amendment is that if a province should pass an Act of this kind, it will come in conflict with this section. There is no province which has no mortmain statute.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The Mortmain Act does not apply to this.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I would move that section 3 be struck out, and that would leave the tenure of real estate to be such as is provided by the various provinces.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has not given notice of the proposed amendment.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Surely we can amend an inconsistent provision in a Bill without notice. I understand it is only important amendments which require notice.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If the society wanted the privilege of holding real estate for ever, they would ask that my hon. friend's amendment should succeed. Unquestionably in every province, so far as I know, and so far as the province of Ontario is concerned—from the reading of the statute to which my hon. friend called my attention—this association could hold this real estate in perpetuity unless the provincial legislature should at some future time place a limitation on its holding. So far as I am aware, there is no statute in any province which would prevent this association holding its real estate without limit. Therefore, it is right to follow what has been done for several years in this parliament and put some limitation on the tenure.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. If the hon. gentleman's contention be correct, the Missionary Society of the Methodist Chuch and the Missionary Society of the Church of England have been given power to hold real estate for ever. You can take one line of argument or the other. In each of these cases there is no expressed limitation on the tenure of property except such as is contained in the provincial Acts.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). What law is there in the province of Ontario which required that a corporation acquiring property by deed shall only hold it a certain number of years?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I have no doubt there is such a law but have not looked into the matter. I understand, Mr. Deputy Speaker to rule that I have not the right to move this now.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has the right to vote against the whole section.

Mr. SPROULE. Could not the Bill stand over so as to allow my hon. friend to give notice?

Mr. PORTER. What is the object of those words in the main clause 'subject always to the laws of the province in which such real estate is situated,' if you subsequently declare that the society shall hold the property for 10 years? Suppose this parliament declares that they shall hold it 10 years and then the provincial legislature declares that they can only hold it 5 years?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not know what was the object of inserting those words in the Bill, but possibly the draftsman may have had this in his mind, that in holding this property, it must be held subject to the laws of the province—that is as to any law relating to taxation; or possibly he may have had in his mind the mode in which the conveyance of such property ought to be executed, and that the laws of the province shall apply to the conveyances to be made by this association. Or he might have had this in his mind. At present there is no law in any province which would limit the time this association may hold real estate, but in the future there might be some limitation, and yet, in the absence of any such legislation, the tenure should be limited to 10 years. But that if, in the future, the provincial legislature should legislate in reference to this subject, then the legislation of the province should prevail. It may be that that was the intention of the draftsman. But my point is that this parliament has a perfect right to legislate upon the subject, having authority to incorporate the company, it must also have authority to give it the power to hold real estate. Parliament must be the judge of the extent to which it will give the association that power and also there must necessarily go with it the authority of parliament to limit, if it chooses, the time within which the association must sell the property. Parliament may also, if it pleases, say that whatever legislation we may pass with regard to the tenure of real property shall always be subject to the legislation of the province. At the same time it does not appear that any province has so legislated as to put any limit whatever upon a corporation like this holding real estate. Therefore, having the authority to legislate, it seems to me eminently proper that parliament should place a limit upon the period during which the association may hold real estate.

Mr. PORTER. Granting what the minister says, for the sake of argument, that parliament has power to limit the holding of real estate in the way indicated in this Bill, what is the sense in saying that the land shall be held subject to the law of the province, and at the same time saying it shall be held for ten years? If the legislature should say to-morrow this land should be held for five years, then this parliament has said it shall be held for ten years, and at the same time it shall be held according to the law of the province. That is quite inconsistent.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). It does not say shall hold it for ten years, it says, shall dispose of it within ten years. That would not conflict with the five years.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I would suggest that we insert the phrase:

Except where otherwise provided by the laws of the province in which such real estate is situated.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. If the committee decided to take up the clause subsection by subsection the hon. member would be at liberty to vote against subsection 3, alone, but at the moment the whole section is before the committee, and this amendment could not be accepted without notice.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Perhaps the promoter will accept my suggestion.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not know what my hon. friend in charge of the Bill (Mr. Fowke) will say, but it does not seem to me it is worth while to send this Bill back to the Senate amended as suggested. I do not think it carries it any further because by providing that the tenure be subject to the laws of the province, that is that if a province were to legislate in reference to this association limiting its tenure of real estate to five years, I think the provincial statute would override this provision in clause 7.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. To show the inconsistency of the minister, it is not 10 minutes since he said, upon his authority as a lawyer, that we had absolute jurisdiction, and right to pass this Bill, and that in that view we would have the right to state the tenure of real estate. Now he says that if any province passed an Act limiting the tenure to any time they choose, that provincial law would govern. We must be consistent in this, and the section as it stands is inconsistent. One part says it shall be subject to the laws of the province, and the other that it shall be 10 years, no matter what the province may say. That is simply inviting litigation. The suggestion of the Minister of Public Works that the laws of the province ought to govern is correct, and that is why we have been putting into statutes similar to this for 40 years a proviso that the tenure shall be subject to the laws of the province. That is only fair as the provincial legislatures have jurisdiction over property and civil rights, and that would cover tenure. If this amendment is not accepted, then I might give notice of it. If we insert ten years, then perhaps to-morrow another association will want 15 years, and another 20 years, and we will be completely overriding the wishes of the people in the various provinces with respect to the time that real estate may be held.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend, I do not think deliberately, I think unintentionally, misrepresented the statement I made. I said that in my judgment this parliament has absolute authority to deal with the holding of property by this company. It has been granted authority to hold property and we can place a limitation on the number of years during which it may hold a particular piece of real estate or personal property, but that is not at all inconsistent with the authority of this parliament to say that its tenure shall be subject to the laws of the province in which the property may be situated. That is what this section says. If the legislature should deal with the subject then probably the provincial legislation would prevail over the legislation of this parliament. The federal or a provincial legislature may have a perfect right to legislate upon a subject until it comes into conflict with legislation of the other. Therefore I do not wish to be understood as taking back one word as to the authority of this parliament to deal with the subject. I do not think that this parliament has the exclusive authority to deal with real estate. All I say is that it has authority, when it incorporates a company within its power, to say whether or not that company shall hold real estate, and to place any limitations it chooses on its holding of real estate. I do not think my hon. friend's amendment would carry the matter any further than it is carried by the section, and as we have apparently no legislation by any province which would apply to this company I see no objection to letting the matter go as it is, placing the limitation at 10 years. Then if any legislature chooses in future to legislate in regard to it, very likely these words: Subject to the legislation; would make the legislation of a province superior to that of this parliament upon that particular point.

Mr. LANCASTER. The trouble is what the minister argues is not the section in this Bill; the Bill as it stands is conflicting. The minister apparently thinks that the probability is that the court will decide that legislation passed hereafter by a province, be applicable to this company under the early part of section 7.

Subject always to the laws of the province in which such real estate is situated, and in regard to any real property which, by reason of its situation or otherwise, is subject to the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO.

Now, there is a distinction between lands which are vested in the provinces, under the general laws applicable to the provinces, and property which, by reason of its situation, is subject to the legislative authority of the Dominion of Canada. There are two classes of lands dealt with there. Then we have that state of affairs before us when we are asked to pass subsection 3 with a ten-year limit. Unless language is put in there to show that we intend that subsection 3 shall apply only when a legislature passes a law which the early part of section 7 will apply to, we have got absolute chaos here. I could make as strong an argument one way as the other, whether the early part of the section means what the Minister of Public Works thinks, or whether it means subject to the laws of the province with regard to everything else except the ten-year limit. As to the time in which you shall dispose of it, that is specifically dealt with in section 7, and to make the statute consistent, you must hold that section 7 does not apply a time limit. It is just one of these things that will create litigation. Are we to pass statutes here that can be read both ways, or should we make them clear and distinct? The fact that we have to send it back to the Senate will not hurt them. They are not overworked, they are only divorcing a lot of people that they ought to leave alone, in my humble opinion. I do not sympathize with the argument of the Minister of Public Works that the Senate will get cross with us if we send this Bill back to them. They should be more careful in the legislation they send to this House. Let them divorce section 3 from this Bill, and they would be doing the proper sort of thing.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I move that subsection 3 be amended by inserting after the word 'shall' the following words:

Except where otherwise provided by the law of the province where such real estate is situated.

Mr. FOWKE. The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) has not given notice of his intention to amend this clause, and therefore his motion is out of order. I would like also to say that the hon. member who has been obstructing the passage of this Bill in two sessions of the committee of this House, is himself a member of the Private Bills Committee, and raised no objection to this clause when the Bill was before that committee. I should like also to point out that at the last session of this parliament, three Bills of a similar character passed the Private Bills Committee, and also this House; the hon. gentleman was a member of the Private Bills Committee then, and I do not know that he raised any such objection as he is raising now to this ten-year clause. The clause to my mind is a reasonable one. It was granted to two different religious orders of the Roman Catholic Church at the last session of parliament, and a similar Bill was granted to the Congregational Union. No inconsistency was apparent then to the mind of the hon. gentleman who is opposing this Bill.

Mr. LANCASTER. What does the hon. gentleman say himself as to whether provincial or Dominion legislation would apply to the Bill as now drawn? Does the hon. gentleman wish the limit fixed by the provincial legislature, or does he wish the ten-year limit we are fixing?

Mr. FOWKE. The hon. gentleman has asked me a question which I am not prepared to answer. But I would like to say that if there were fewer country lawyers in the House we would have less difficulty in arriving at sensible conclusions in relation to Bills of this kind. The clause does not require that the property vested in this organization be held for a period of ten years, but that some limitation should be placed upon it. As a member of this House, I prefer to assume that this House has jurisdiction to deal with a question of this kind.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I take exception to the statement of the member for South Ontario (Mr. Fowke) in characterizing my action as obstruction when I endeavoured to point out to the House the inconsistency of the present Bill. When an hon member rises in this House and, in a disinterested manner, gives his views on proposed legislation, it is very small politics to characterize his action as obstruction. It is also small politics for the same gentleman to characterize the action of certain other gentlemen of this House as that of country lawyers. I can tell my hon. friend that when hereafter he wants to pass other legislation through this House,he may have more difficulty than he is having now. I have pointed out before that the hon. gentleman is unable to say whether or not the ten-years' stipulation put in this Bill will apply, or whether the law of the province will apply. The Minister of Public Works says that he thinks the law of the province will apply, if they have a law in the province, or when they pass a law. If such is the case, what is the objection to making it perfectly clear? All we want is to pass legislation that will not be open to litigation; and if my hon. friend is looking after the interests of the Baptist Church, he will not favour any legislation that will give country lawyers an opportunity of making money out of his church in litigation. It will do no harm to introduce a clause saying that the ten-year limitation shall only apply when there is no provision in a province to the contrary. Under these circumstances, what right has the hon. gentleman to characterize the action of members on this side of the House, taken in good faith, as obstruction?

Nothing whatever, and I am surprised that he would say such a thing on the floor of this House. I can only say that I will move an amendment with the consent of the House, and if not I will wait till we come to the clause, to have that struck out altogether as being absolutely inconsistent with the other portion of the section. If wrong legislation was passed last year or the year before it is no argument for wrong legislation passing this House now. We passed legislation 25 or 30 years ago allowing the holding of real estate by these corporations subject to the laws of the province, and because we have departed from that Act is that any reason why we should continue that wrong now? If this House is supreme with regard to the tenure of land held by these societies then what we have done before has had the effect of giving societies the absolute right to hold real estate for ever.

Mr. LANCASTER. I would ask the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Fowke), to consult some of the country lawyers on his own side and find out just how this Bill should be drawn. First of all I would pay them this compliment, which my hon. friend does not see fit to pay to his colleagues on his own side of the House, of saying that all the lawyers in the province of Ontario, whether they live in a metropolis or a country village, have the same qualifications. I wish I could say the same for the storekeepers and merchants. I wish I could say that country merchants knew as much about business as the large merchants and manufacturers to be found in the great centres. I am afraid that I cannot say that, and I would say to my hon. friend that if he would acquire that same high standard of knowledge that all lawyers have to acquire in the province of Ontario, and which explains why so many of them are sent here to represent the people at Ottawa, and if he would set up that same standard for himself in his country store business, he would find a better reason why there are so few country merchants coming to this House. We find a great many lawyers in this House because the people in the constituencies think they are able, understanding the laws of this country, to make legislation which will be sensible and proper and who will not disagree with their leaders as to the construction of the legislation which they are asking the House to pass. The next time he is in caucus, if he is allowed into the caucus of his own party, because it may be that he is a bolter on reciprocity, let the hon. gentleman consult some of the lawyers of his own side and see if it is not possible for him to draw a Bill which will not contain provisions which contradict each other. I think this committee ought to rise as far as this Bill is concerned. This legislation is going to do a public wrong if it is passed in the way in which the Bill is now drawn, and I think the committee had better rise for the purpose of allowing my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro') an opportunity of complying with the rules of the House and putting on the Order Paper his notice of motion to amend this Bill, so that he will not be met with an objection which is technically correct that without notice the amendment cannot be passed. It is manifest that this is not proper legislation and even the Minister of Public Works would not endorse the construction of the promoter, that provincial legislation would apply. Whether it be by country merchants or country lawyers, the Bill should be put in some more sensible shape. I think the committee ought to rise until we can get the necessary notice given which will result in having this legislation put into proper shape and prevent a lot of litigation which otherwise would take place if the Bill is adopted as it now stands.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). It seems to me that there is a misconception with regard to the nature of this legislation. As I read it I think the section is perfectly right and is more in harmony with the law than the amendment which has been proposed by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro). A doubt was raised at one time whether or not the Dominion parliament had authority to give what is equivalent to a license to hold property under mortmain. It was urged with respect to a railway company in Ontario that it was only the Crown, as represented by the province, that could authorize a corporation to hold property. That came up in connection with one of the railways, but I forget which one. Chief Justice Armour, who tried the case, decided that the Dominion parliament, representing the Crown, had the right to license any corporation incorporated by the Dominion to hold property. Then the question comes up: what are the terms of the license that this parliament is to give? I submit that we can give a license to hold property forever if we wish, or we can give a limited license to hold it for a certain number of years. It has been usual to limit the duration of that license, and if this parliament is legislating, and giving a license to a corporation to hold property, this must be the parliament and the power which should say what the extent of that license should be. That is exactly what is determined by this clause.

Mr. LANCASTER. That license that you are referring to has only reference to such real property, by reason of its situation or otherwise, as is subject to the legislative authority of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Quite so. We can only give a license for what is subject to the Dominion of Canada, but whatever license we do give, we, in the first paragraph, give a license to hold real estate. Without that license this corporation could not hold real estate. There is no law in the province of Ontario which could authorize this Baptist Missionary Society to hold real estate unless a license were given by this parliament. If we give that license surely it is a proper thing to limit the time within which the property shall be held, that it is a proper thing for this parliament to say that it shall be limited to ten years or such other period as may be named. It is quite true in some respects, under the Companies Act of Ontario, under which a charter is obtained, that when a particular limitation is fixed the charter ceases. It is a mere arbitrary term, there is no general law which says that it shall be one year or that it shall be ten years. In this case they have chosen to make it ten years. With regard to the paragraph making it subject to the laws of Ontario, I submit that whether or not we say this shall be subject to the laws of Ontario, if Ontario has the right to legislate, then it shall be subject to those laws whether we say so in these words or not. But, there is another reason why these words are put in and it is by reason of these words 'the board may receive, take and hold real estate,' and 'determine by by-law the manner in which such property shall be held and conveyed, subject always to the laws of the province.' If you did not make an exception that it should be subject to the laws of Ontario it might be said that it was intended to give the board power to deal with the property in any way they saw fit. They might convey the property by by-law or they might convey it by word of mouth or by writing not under seal. The power is given to convey property but it must be done subject to the laws of Ontario.

Mr. LANCASTER. And it may be held.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Held and conveyed. It gives them power to do that and when that is done it seems to me that it is only proper, to make it consistent, to say that it must be in accordance with the laws of Ontario. I do not have very much fear of litigation over this matter. I do not see any great difficulty in the working it out and it seems to me that there is not sufficient objection to warrant the House in hesitating to pass it as it is.

Mr. PORTER. Does not my hon. friend see the inconsistency in the language? He says we can give a license to hold forever if we see fit. Granting that we can why say in this Bill that the land shall be held subject to the laws of the province and that it shall be ten years? Does not my hon. friend see the inconsistency of that? Why say that they can hold land for ten years and at the same time say that they shall hold it subject to the laws of the province? You are in effect nullifying the provincial legislation.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Is there any objection to amending the clause so as to make it read:

The board shall, except where otherwise provided by law of the province where such real estate is located, within ten years after the acquisition, &c.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). My objection to that is that it is not in harmony with the theory of the mortmain law. We are giving this license to hold land and we must complete it by saying what the duration of that license shall be.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Does the hon. gentleman say that we have the absolute right to declare that it shall be 10 years or 50 years, in disregard of the law of the provinces?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I suppose the provinces having jurisdiction over property could take away the property or do anything they like with it?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. And therefore regulate the tenure.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I suppose, in one sense the provincial legislature could deprive a railway corporation or any other corporation of its property.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I am referring to the rights given by the British North America Act.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). It seems to me that when we are giving certain rights we should complete them. We should not say we will give a license in mortmain and let some other authority say how long that license shall continue.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. That is inconsistent with the Minister of Public Works who said that if a province passed legislation saying that the land could only be held for seven years the provincial law would prevail. My proposition is that this shall be subject to the legislation in the various provinces.

Mr. MACDONELL. I wish to preface my remarks by saying that whatever criticism I offer is intended solely in the view of making this Bill intra vires of this parliament, and putting it in such shape as to best carry out the object of the promoters. The Minister of Public Works argues that it is necessary to retain the language in the Bill subjecting the holding and granting of lands to the laws of the province, because forsooth there may be no laws at present governing the holding of land of this kind in a province, and that until the province enacts such law the ten-year period mentioned in this Bill shall govern. The hon. gentleman from Essex (Mr. Clarke) knows, if the Minister of Public Works does not know, that all lands acquired by this corporation in mortmain for charitable purposes are governed by the law of the province, and if a province has no law of mortmain it would be held, as it has been held in the past, that the English law of mortmain would govern. We would therefore have a law of mortmain in every province of Canada except Quebec. In so far as the lands which this corporation may acquire of itself and not by demise or gift, the province of Ontario, and I think all the provinces, have laws governing the length of time within which such corporations shall dispose of such lands.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Where is that law?

Mr. MACDONELL. The hon. gentleman mentioned a case a moment ago; the laws are not codified.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). That law would not apply to this company.

Mr. MACDONELL. I think it would. I differ fundamentally from the statement of the Minister of Public Works; that this parliament would have the right to say to any province: we shall incorporate such a society to hold land for a longer jeriod that the general law of the province would permit. The jurisdiction over property and civil rights enables the province to govern entirely in regard to real estate.

If the minister be right in his argument, then if this House chose to pass a thousand Bills providing that such and such a corporation should hold lands for a certain length of time in defiance of the law of the province you might have one thousand exceptions to the general law of the province, which of course would be absurd. If they are not bound by the law of the province with regard to the tenure then they are not bound with regard to any other feature of acquiring and disposing of property. I believe that this Act would be futile unless the laws of the province are allowed to govern. It would not only be futile, but it is so contradictory that I think the hon. gentleman in whose name the Bill stands should be thankful to those of us who are trying to get it into proper shape. Last session this parliament passed, chapter 82, to incorporate the Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Timiskaming, but in that Act there is no provision such as is in this Bill stating that these lands shall be held subject to the law of the province in which the lands are situated. True, the Act says the land shall be held for ten years, but there are many provisions in that which are not in this Bill, and there is not in that Act the contradictions we have in this Bill, namely, one section stating that the land shall be held subject to the laws of the province as to granting and tenure, and then another section stating that the lands are to be held only for ten years.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This Bill follows the Act of last year.

Mr. MACDONELL. The Act incorporating the Roman Catholic Incorporation of Timiskaming says nothing about the law of the province governing. I think the objection of my hon. friend from West Hastings is well taken, and it would be in the interest of the Bill that it should be made consistent and avoid the contradiction contained in these two paragraphs.

Mr. PORTER. Perhaps the object of the promoter of the Bill is that inasmuch as there is no limitation provided by provincial statute to the holding of these lands, there should be some limitation passed by this parliament on the incorporation of this society. If that is his object, might I suggest that subsection 3 be amended to read thus:

The board shall, within ten years after its acquisition of any real estate, unless the limitation for holding such lands shall be otherwise declared by provincial legislation, sell or otherwise dispose of.

In the event of the provincial legislature not passing any legislation at all, this Act would limit the holding to ten years; but if the provincial legislature does pass an Act limiting it to a different number of years, that would have effect, just as the Bill declares it shall have effect.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The proposed amendment of the hon. member for North Grey is one which I think should be given notice of.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Then, with a view to putting the Bill in workable shape, I would move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion to report progress, negatived.

Mr. FOSTER. Though I am not a lawyer, it does seem to me that there is an inconsistency in these two sections. According to subsection No. 1, the provincial legislature must govern, while in subsection 3 an arbitrary period is set. It would seem to me that the suggestion of my hon. friend from West Hastings (Mr. Porter) would do away with the appearance of inconsistency and make the whole clause homogeneous. Has my hon. friend who has the Bill in charge any objection to equalizing these two subsections in that way?

Mr. FOWKE. As this House is granting the license, it seems reasonable that it should say what the length of the license should be. I do not myself see any inconsistency in the section.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Allow me to point out that my hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonell), in referring to the statute of last year, incorporating the Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Timiskaming, did not refer to section 7 of the present Bill, which combines the provisions of sections 5 and 8 of the Act he referred to. I think section 7 is perfectly plain. The limitation, 'subject always to the laws of the province in which such real estate is situated,' applies to the words 'may receive, take and hold real estate by purchase, gift or devise.'

Mr. PORTER. If you do not limit it, but you do limit it by the third subsection.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Let us consider the first subsection by itself. Is it not perfectly clear that if the law of mortmain applied in any province, it would apply as far as subsection 1 is concerned? Subsection 3 refers to all property, whether held in mortmain or not, and provides that this corporation shall within ten years after getting it take steps to dispose of it.

Mr. PORTER. That limits what you have said before.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I beg pardon, so far as property held in mortmain is concerned, the laws of the provinces would apply. The third subsection does not in any way take away the effect of the laws of a province regarding lands held in mortmain. Subsection 3 does not say that the board shall hold this land for 10 years, but that it shall within 10 years dispose of it. If there be any law in Ontario which would limit this holding to two years, that would apply.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose it made it 12 years?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am not quite sure whether this would override this clause.

Mr. PORTER. Why leave it uncertain?

Mr. PUGSLEY. You cannot make it more certain than it is. The Bill says that the real estate held by the board shall always be held subject to the laws of the province. But the effect of subsection 3 is, that if there be no provincial law limiting the holding, the company must sell within 10 years. If there be any provincial law requiring the company to sell within two years, that law must prevail.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the word 'convey,' in the subsection imply sale and conveyance for the purpose of giving effect to the sale. If that word 'convey' were not there, section 1 would apply only to the reception or holding of property. But the word 'convey' being there, seems to imply that that subsection refers to the sale and disposal of the property as well.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would think that the words 'subject to the laws of the province' apply to the receiving of the property by the company and holding.

Mr. FOSTER. And to the sale of it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, it is all subject to the laws of the province.

Mr. FOSTER. That is where there is an inconsistency. Subsection 1 says that the property is to be subject always to the provincial law. But suppose the law of a province says that the tenure must be 12 years and this law says it can only be 10 years. Is there not a contradiction?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There might be possibly a conflict, but surely we ought to be reasonable and realize that there is no law in any province against the holding of property by an association of this character unless the property is held in mortmain. This parliament wants to put a limit, and it makes that limit 10 years, but that does not prevent any province making the limit two or three or five years. This would not at all conflict with the provisions of the statute of mortmain which in Ontario imposes a limit of two years. The land could not be held in mortmain longer than two years, notwithstanding the subsection, because the provincial law would apply.

Mr. SPROULE. If there were no other object except doing away with the chance of litigation, it would be very much better for the society to have this Bill amended by striking out the third subsection. Once the board acquires the property, if there be no provincial law to the contrary, they own the property forever, and consequently cannot suffer, but if there be any provincial law limiting the tenure, that provincial law would prevail in any event, according to the Minister of Public Works, so that no injustice would be done the board in that regard. But what I want to point out, is that in enacting a statute, we ought to see that we are not making an opening for litigation.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If we struck out the third subsection, they might hold the property forever.

Mr. SPROULE. Would that do them any injustice?

Mr. PUGSLEY. They do not want that.

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite to consider whether after all more anxiety has not been felt than there is really any necessity for This board is being incorporated for a good object. It is very likely to have gifts of lands made to it. These lands may be situated anywhere in the Dominion. Now the laws governing real estate in the different provinces are not uniform. It has been said that in Ontario the limitation during which a corporation of this character may hold land, is very short, although learned gentlemen opposite are not at all certain whether that short period, as applied to this board or organization, would be seven or two years. But, however that may be, the laws of the different provinces on this matter are not uniform. Is it not in the public interest that there should be some limitation by this parliament, even if there be a province, as there may be, in which no provincial limitation now exists? I am not going to talk about the ancient subject of statutes of mortmain. Students are told that the reason which prompted the passing of those statutes five or six hundred years ago was because it was to the advantage of the feudal lords that there should be frequent transfers of property, and that property should not be held by the one owner for generations or forever. And so a limitation was put upon it. It is in the public interest still, for the reasons which were stated in the discussion on Friday evening, that land should not be held unimproved, tied up, not transferred, for long periods of time, by religious bodies or any other corporations, so that some limitation is usual, and is it not better that this statute which we are proposing to pass, incorporating this board, should contain some limitation than that it should be silent? Because it may very possibly be that the holding of land in some of our provinces would not be restricted by any provincial law. And is there any danger in passing a Bill such as this that there should be an outside limitation of ten years, that is a limitation presumably beyond the period which at present may be fixed by any provincial legislature? Bear in mind that this proposal is not in the shape of an enabling clause which purports to empower the company to keep its land for ten years; it is put in the negative, you must get rid of it within ten years, you must not keep it longer than ten years. However much that may imply the power to hold for ten years, it does not, in terms, profess to confer upon this board any power to hold for a longer time than the provincial laws would authorize and the presence of such a clause as this might be very valuable in this way: When the period, whatever it is, which is fixed, expires, if the land has not been disposed of by this association such land is not transferred simply by the Act of parliament, the title to it does not pass out of the society and into somebody else without something being done and that something usually takes the form of legal proceedings. The Crown, either the Dominion Crown or the provincial Crown, whichever may be the proper authority, takes proceedings in court to declare the lands forfeit. The court then deals with the whole subject and can decide, and is in a better position to decide these interesting, old and abstruse legal questions, many of which were raised on Friday night, and which I understand have been a good deal discussed today. The presence of some limitation is very desirable and where we cannot have uniformity the presence of a period fixed by the Dominion statute, which period may be longer than any of the periods mentioned in the provincial statutes, will not embarrass anybody that I am able to see. If land which may be attacked by the Dominion Crown or the provincial Crown, at some future time, is situate in a province where a shorter period of limitation than ten years is fixed, I have no doubt that the attack would be based on the contention that both those statutes might and should be complied with by the incorporated body, the provincial statute saying, you shall within two years get rid of this land, and the Dominion statute saying, you shall within ten years get rid of it. It is, of course, manifest that both could be complied with, and in such circumstances I have no doubt the argument would be that the shorter period must govern. But the circumstance that some period of limitation seems advisable, is one which appears to me to be very manifest. This question sprang up on Friday night just in that way, it was not started as a lawyer's question of interest, but my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) questioned whether ten years was not longer than the period given in previous instances and suggested shortening it to seven. I have no views on the subject one way or the other. It is a matter simply of what is expedient. Is there any danger to anybody by leaving it at ten years, especially as that is the shape in which the Senate has passed the Bill and the Private Bills Committee has reported it? Instances were cited on Friday evening where ten years had been fixed, and where it is fixing an outside limit the danger which appears to be apprehended by many members in naming that period, is one that certainly does not appeal to my mind, and which I am not able to appreciate.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. If there is conflict between the provincial law and this Act as to the period during which real estate may be held, which law will govern?

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. My hon. friend is asking a question much easier to ask than to answer. It does not seem to me there is any occasion to trouble our minds over it. These are the very things which courts are for, we are not creating any conflict, we are not proposing that this body may hold lands for any given length of time, but putting an outside limit and saying: Beyond that limit you must not go.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Would there be any objection to inserting the amendment which I proposed?

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. I have not considered and am not in a position to express an opinion as to the effect of this amendment. But when a Bill is proposed and asked for by the body being incorporated, if the Bill is granted it becomes substantially a contract from which the body incorporated cannot afterwards recede. That view of it, it seems to me, is of particular consequence when you are dealing with a question of this sort, where proceedings in the courts would necessarily be against the body incorporated. The courts would view with strictness such proceedings, because of the fact that they would work a forfeiture, to take from them their property without compensation. Anything of that kind the courts would deal with, with great strictness and in that view of it, it would be of value that the Bill should stand as they propose it, unless there is excellent reason for changing it, and where it has been passed upon not only by the other House but also by our own committee, I would not be favourable to making any change unless there is some strong necessity for it.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. After hearing all the argument it boils itself down to this, taking the language of the minister himself: The Minister of Public Works says that subsection 3 is subject to the laws of the provinces where the real estate is situated, and I think that is right. If that is so, what is the use of us arguing here for hours as to the insertion of a few words that would put the question beyond doubt and remove any chance of conflict? Even the Minister of Justice will not say that there is any objection to my amendment.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Suppose after ten years they come to get a renewal of their license; will they come here or will they go to the province? Who represents the Crown?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. We are all contending that the law of the province prevails, and that they do not need any renewal.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). After the time is up they may want an extension of their license to hold the land, and which power will give it?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Being an incorporated entity, and having power to hold the land, they hold it just as any other corporation would hold it. If in the province of Ontario, they are subject to the laws of that province. I have not heard any argument why we should not make the tenure subject to the laws of the various provinces in which the real estate is situated just as it has been for years and years—until the last two or three years, when somebody has sought to change it. The member for South Ontario himself admits that the matter was never called in question, nobody ever observed that there was a contradiction between the two portions of this section.

Mr. PORTER. It strikes me that if, for the reasons given by the Minister of Justice, it is expedient to have a limitation to the holding of land by this corporation, and if this parliament has authority to enact such a limitation, then why not say that the limitation shall be so and so, without making it subject to anything? If on the other hand, it is not desirable for this parliament to pass such legislation, and if it is desirable to leave it to the provinces, why not leave it to the provinces and let the limitation rest where it is placed by the local legislature? As it is now, you say virtually that the local legislature shall have absolute control as to how the land shall be held and conveyed, and in the same breath you say that the holding shall be for ten years, which is inconsistent.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, you say it shall not be for more than ten years.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 11,

Mr. LANCASTER. I would like to ask the promoter of this Bill for a little information with regard to this Baptist convention which shall cease to exist. In line 14 and 15 it says:

Upon such transfer being made the Foreign Mission Board of the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec shall cease to exist.

By what power is that convention incorporated? What is the nature of its existence?

Mr. FOWKE. It is a missionary organization wholly.

Mr. LANCASTER. Under what authority?

Mr. FOWKE. Do you mean as to provincial or Dominion authority? I have no doubt it is an incorporated body.

Mr. LANCASTER. Well, is it an incorporated body? I don't think it is.

Mr. FOWKE. I have always supposed so, but I cannot answer definitely. This society has existed for the purpose of carrying on foreign missionary work, it is a society of the Baptist church in the province of Ontario, and in the province of Quebec. The idea now is that provincialism so far as its work is concerned shall become a thing of the past, and that the work of the denomination shall become national in its operation. This clause is to enable the merging of the provincial into the national idea to take place.

Mr. LANCASTER. What troubles me is the nature of the legislation. We are enacting that a certain convention shall cease to exist. I do not know what would authorize us to declare the confiscation of the rights of that body. My hon. friend says frankly that he cannot tell us whether it is a provincial or a Dominion organization, or whether it is incorporated at all. I would suppose it was one of those concerns incorporated by registration under a provincial statute. If that is so, what right have we in the Dominion parliament to declare an incorporated institution to be out of existence, an institution incorporated by a provincial legislature?

Mr. FOSTER. I think it will be found that this is incorporated by a Dominion statute; it is one convention of the two provinces. If you look at the Bill from the Senate (J-1), it is an Act respecting the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec, and it is stated therein to be incorporated under chapter 105 of the statutes of 1889.

Mr. SPROULE. The preamble says:

Whereas, by an Act of the legislature of Nova Scotia passed in A.D. 1865, the Foreign Missionary Board of the Baptist Convention of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island was incorporated for the purpose of carrying on foreign mission works——

That is part of the board that will be transferred to the authority of this new corporation.

—and whereas, the name of the said board was subsequently, by an Act of the said legislature passed in A.D. 1890, changed to 'The Foreign Mission Board of the Baptist Convention of the maritime provinces'——

That adds another one.

—and whereas, the members of the said board are appointed by the Baptist Convention of the maritime provinces; and whereas, by an Act of the legislature of New Brunswick passed in A.D. 1890, the said board by its changed name was granted perpetual succession and given all the powers, rights and privileges made incident to a corporation by the law of the province of New Brunswick; and whereas, by chapter 105 of the Statutes of Canada of 1889, entitled 'An Act respecting the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec,' the said convention appoints the members of 'The Foreign Mission Board of the Baptist Convention' a corporate body.

I take it that the last Act included the whole of them and that it is now only necessary to refer to the last one passed.

Mr. LANCASTER. I have read the preamble and it may be as my hon. friend says, although its language is very peculiar.

And whereas, by chapter 105 of the Statutes of Canada of 1889, entitled 'An Act respecting the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec,' the said convention appoints the members of 'The Foreign Mission Board of the Baptist Convention' a corporate body.

Of course, the preamble may only be a meagre statement, and the statute itself may throw more light upon it. The promoter of the Bill ought to know about it, but if he does not that is all the more reason why the Bill should stand over until we can rightly understand it, and see what the effect will be of what we are doing here. This preamble recites that the 'said convention appoints the members of the Foreign Mission Board.' It does not get to the question I asked as to whether the convention itself was incorporated originally by provincial statutes, or letters patent, or how. I do not like assenting to legislation which declares that a company or institution of any kind shall cease to exist, as this section 11 undertakes to say in line 16, without having some very good reason for making that declaration.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think we may safely assume——

Mr. LANCASTER. We are assuming a lot here to-day that we should not assume.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We are not assuming a lot. Those who prepared this Bill and who profess to set forth the various statutes relating to the different religious bodies connected with this association, or what is akin to the association, had a full and complete knowledge of what they were doing. I take it for granted that the Private Bills Committee was informed on the subject. As the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) has said, there is no question that the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec was incorporated by this parliament, because section 1 of the Bill, which my hon. friend from North Toronto read, speaks of the Act of 1889 which was an Act dealing with this very Baptist Convention. Then, the preamble of the present Bill recites that the convention appoints the members of the Foreign Mission Board of the Baptist Convention. My hon. friend (Mr. Lancaster) is wrong in saying that they appoint a corporate body.

Mr. LANCASTER. I did not say that they appointed a corporate body. I was trying to find out who did appoint that corporate body. I was pointing, because of the reference made by my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule), to the actual language of the preamble which says that: Whereas this Baptist Convention appoints the Foreign Mission Board, a corporate body.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If my hon. friend will read a little further he will see that it says:

'The Foreign Mission Board of the Baptist Convention,' a corporate body constituted under the said chapter for the prosecution of mission work outside of Canada.

But that Foreign Mission Board is a corporate body constituted under the chapter that is referred to in the preamble. That chapter constitutes the Foreign Mission Board a corporate body, and then the convention appoints that body to prosecute foreign mission work. If my hon. friend will look at section 11 of this Bill he will see that there can be no harm in providing that this foreign mission board shall cease to exist, because it is only in the event of it transferring its property over to the present board that such a thing can take place. It does not cease to exist until it does that and, therefore, it will itself be the instrument which will cause its existence to terminate. This statute does not put it out of existence, but it only goes out of existence after it has conveyed all of its property to the board with which we are now dealing. It will only cease to exist when it has denuded itself of its property and transferred it over.

Mr. PORTER. By section 1 certain persons are declared to be incorporated under the name of the 'Canadian Baptist Mission Board, hereinafter called the board.' Under section 7, which we have just been discussing, the board—that is the Canadian Baptist Foreign Mission Board—may hold and convey property in a certain way. As I take it the Foreign Mission Board of the Baptist Convention and these others mentioned in section 11 are really branch institutions of the church and they are, by this section 11, given power to transfer all the property that they now have to the board which is now created by this Act. Then, let me put this case. You will notice that the last paragraph of section 11 says that:

The board shall hold all moneys, funds and property so transferred to it subject to any trusts to which the same may be subject at the time of the transfer.

But they may get property from these other auxiliary or subsidiary institutions that would be, or ought to be, governed by clause 7 which provides that they shall hold property subject to the laws of the province or subject to the ten year limitation, while under clause 11, they would hold it only subject to any trust which might have affected it before it came into the hands of this board.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Does not my hon. friend think it would be subject to the laws of the province which govern the property? But, in addition to that it is subject to any trust upon which it is already held by the association or board proposing to convey it to this board.

Mr. PORTER. I would certainly think that if the words had been that the board shall hold subject to the limitations hereinbefore enacted and subject to any trust. If that were the declaration I would think so, but with this declaration that it is only held subject to the trust——

Mr. PUGSLEY. It does not say 'only.'

Mr. PORTER. No, but it says 'subject to any trusts,' and that language would not be a broad enough declaration to indicate that it held it under the provisions of section 7 as well.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would think so.

Mr. PORTER. I should not think so. We might use specific language as to what it shall be held subject to. If you leave it general and say subject to the limitations herein contained, and to any trust then it certainly would cover it, but as the section is now framed it is clear that it would be subject only to any trust which might affect it, and would not be subject to the provisions of section 7. If the intention is that it should be subject to both of those clauses then it should be amended by declaring that it shall be held subject to limitations hereinbefore enacted and to any trusts.

Mr. SPROULE. The Minister of Justice observed in the course of the discussion that we need not worry ourselves about the meaning of this law or as to whether it was conflicting or not, because as he said it was the duty of the courts to determine its meaning. Let me tell him that there is a feeling prevalent all over the country that parliament passes too many laws which are obscure and contradictory and invite litigation. Indeed, some of this legislation cannot be understood by either laymen or lawyers, and the judges themselves disagree upon it. In my opinion it is our imperative duty to make laws so plain that they can be understood by all. Wherever it is brought to attention that there is obscurity or conflict in the wording of a Bill it is our duty to provide a remedy for that. Such an argument coming from the Minister of Justice is unworthy of him.

On section 12,

Mr. LANCASTER. What is the language of the existing section which we are repealing. Will the promoter tell us?

Mr. FOWKE. Not being a country lawyer, perhaps, I cannot say off hand.

Mr. LANCASTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fowke) who introduces this Bill has told us several times that because he is not a country lawyer he is supposed to be a know nothing. Whether the promoter of a Bill be a country merchant or whatever else he should know something about the legislation he introduces, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fowke) sits there and laughs and thinks he ought to know nothing. The committee should rise until the hon. gentleman learns something about his Bill. Whenever he is asked for information he answers in the most flippant way that because he is not a country lawyer he does not know anything about the Bill.

Mr. FOWKE. I did not say that.

Mr. LANCASTER. If he were a country lawyer he would know something about this legislation. There are dozens of lawyers on his own side of the House (besides those who have bolted on the recent question, and others who are ready to bolt), and if the hon. gentleman knows nothing about this Bill he can consult them, and they will perhaps tell him, as several of them are fairly representative country lawyers.

Mr. FOWKE. I would like to suggest to the hon. member for Lincoln as to whether he means to insinuate that he is getting ready to bolt himself. We are not looking for bolters, and are not overly anxious to receive them.

Mr. LANCASTER. You get more than you want without looking for them.

Mr. FOWKE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lancaster) being learned in the law I thought he would know the statutes referred to here, but if he does not the eminent solicitor who prepared this Bill does, and in the absence of that gentleman I shall inform my hon. friend.

Mr. LANCASTER. Then it is the first thing that you knew about the Bill.

Mr. FOWKE. Paragraph (b) reads:

The board for the prosecution of mission work outside of Canada to be called the Foreign Mission Board of the Baptist Convention.

That is what is referred to.

Mr. PORTER. By section 11 of the Bill you have already put that out of existence and now you are repealing it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Under this statute that paragraph becomes useless, and it is right that the draftsman should provide that thereafter such a board should not be appointed by the convention.

Mr. PORTER. Under section 11 you declare that the foreign mission board shall go out of existence when it transfers certain property; and by this paragraph you declare that it shall go out of existence after the next session of parliament which is another inconsistency.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Evidently they fixed the end of the next session of parliament so that if there is any delay or hitch there may be new legislation.

Mr. PORTER. I do not see how that works out. If the foreign board transfers all its property it is out of existence under section 11 but under section 12 it shall not go out of existence until next session of parliament so that you have it out of existence and still in existence.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The duty would rest on the convention to appoint a board until next session of parliament, and as I suppose that is done to give ample time to have the property transferred, what harm can be done by leaving paragraph 12 as it is?

Mr. LANCASTER. There is this harm. Why should we give them power to go out of existence before we know it is right it should be done. Suppose they do not carry out what the Minister says they will, why give them this clearance so to speak?

Mr. PUGSLEY. What would the hon. gentleman suggest?

Mr. LANCASTER. I would try to protect the people, and make sensible legislation, and I would not be always satisfied that it is sound legislation because some solicitor promoting the Bill asks for it. I try to approach all our legislation whether public or private, from the standpoint of the interest of the country, and I am getting a little weary of hon. gentlemen opposite taking the position that it does not matter very much what the legislation is so long as its promoters are satisfied. We are not supposed to pass this legislation simply to benefit a private corporation, but because it is presumed to be in the interest of the country.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think my hon. friend has misunderstood me. I was suggesting that if my hon. friend could show how this could be improved, my hon. friend from South Ontario, I was sure, would be glad to accept his suggestion.

Mr. FOWKE.

Mr. LANCASTER. Surely the hon. minister does not expect me to try to improve a thing I do not approve of. He wants to do a thing which I do not think ought to be done, and he coolly asks me to suggest a way in which he can do what I think should not be done at all. I do not think paragraph 12 should be in the Bill at all, for the very reason given by my hon. friend from West Hastings, that it is inconsistent with section 11.

Mr. PUGSLEY. With the object of meeting the views of my hon. friends, I would suggest adding at the end of section 12 the words, 'provided that the transfer mentioned in section 11 shall by that time have been completed.' That is to say, if they have done all their work provided for in section 11, so that they have no further property, it would be quite right that paragraph (b) should be repealed.

Mr. PORTER. To use my hon. friend's own argument in regard to section 7, would not that be mere surplusage? I take it that the object of the clause is to retain the Foreign Mission Board in existence long enough to enable it to transfer its property to this new creation, and as soon as that has been done, it shall go out of existence. All that is declared by section 11. Then by section 12 you say that it shall go out of existence, no matter what happens, after the last day of the session of parliament next following the passage of this Act.

Let us take an extreme case. Suppose the Foreign Mission Board is not in harmony with this new creation and should refuse to hand over to it its property, and the last day of next session of parliament arrives and that property is still in the Foreign Mission Board. That board goes out of existence by section 12, and there is no corporate board or association against which proceedings could be taken by the persons incorporated by this Bill to force the transfer of that property. If you strike out that clause 12 altogether and simply leave clause 11 as enacted here, which declares that upon the transfer of the property, the Foreign Mission Board should cease to exist, you have effected the whole purpose. There would be no inconsistency, nothing which any one cannot perfectly understand, and the board is always in existence until that property is transferred, so that there is some one against whom proceedings could be taken to compel the transfer, if such became necessary.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I suppose the object of the draftsman was to do away with the apparent obligation upon the Baptist convention to appoint this foreign mission board. It is one thing to say that on the transfer of the property it shall cease to exist and another to leave on the statute an obligation binding on the convention.

Mr. PORTER. What I suggest is that instead of having the words in section 12 'and after the last day of the session of parliament next following the passing of this Act,' these should be struck out, and we should say that upon the transfer of such property, clause B shall be and is hereby repealed. That will effect the purpose.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have no objection.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is moved that clause 12 be amended by striking out all the words in the clause after the word 'Quebec' in the third line, and by inserting the following words thereafter:

Shall immediately after the transfer of the said property, as mentioned in clause 11, be repealed.

Amendment agreed to.

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On section 13, rules and regulations.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. That section is slightly irregular. It says that the board shall be governed by the rules and regulations set out in the schedule until the said rules and regulations are altered as therein provided. The rules and regulations are a unit and if the word 'until' is left in then if the least change is made in one of the rules and regulations, the balance would be no longer valid. I would move that the word 'until' be replaced by the words 'except in so far as.'

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RESTIGOUCHE RIPARIAN ASSOCIATION.

House in committee on Bill (No. 176) to incorporate the Restigouche Riparian Association.—Mr. Geoffrion.

On the preamble,

Mr. MONK. I have received a number of communications from the localities to which this Bill is to apply stating that there is something in this legislation affecting the rights of municipalities in the district to develop and avail themselves of the water-powers. I have looked over the Bill with care and I see nothing in it of the nature complained of; in fact sections 6 and 9 absolutely safeguard the rights of the province, and all other rights generally guaranteed by law. I fail to see anything that puts in peril the rights of the public in that locality.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 163) for the relief of Mary Jane Beatty.—Mr. Congdon.

Bill (No. 165) respecting a Patent of the Goldschmidt Thermit Company.—Mr. Rivet.

REVILLON FRERES TRADING COMPANY, LIMITED.

Mr. DEVLIN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 158) to incorporate the Revillon Fréres Trading Company, Limited.

Mr. FIELDING. When this Bill was last before the House, an hon. member suggested that it should go to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, for the reason that some of its clauses were of a financial character. I see no objection to that course being pursued; but with the understanding that the committee will still, at a later stage, send it to the Committee on Railways, because some of its clauses come distinctly within the authority of that committee. I move that for the present the Bill be sent to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, with that understanding.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

ADMINISTRATION OF FEDERAL AFFAIRS AT PILES.

Mr. BLONDIN:

1. Has the government received complaints, petitions or warnings with respect to the administration of federal affairs at Piles, county of Champlain, during last summer or autumn, 1910, and especially a petition of the citizens of Piles, dated 5th August, 1910, requesting a public and general inquiry respecting federal affairs at Piles?
2. Has the government taken action on this petition, and has an inquiry been granted?
3. If so, who represented the government at this inquiry and what was the result?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I feel a difficulty in answering this question, because the complaint referred to was submitted by the hon. member who has asked the question in a confidential letter addressed to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur). That letter was referred to the officers of my department, and I have appointed an engineer to make an inquiry into the facts set forth in this letter, and the report is necessarily confidential because it refers to the letter. Now, if the hon. member will withdraw the seal of confidence from his communication, I will be glad to lay his communication and also the report upon the table.

Mr. MONK. There are two other questions.

Mr. PUGSLEY. They all relate to the same thing. I took action upon the confidential communication, and the report makes reference to that confidential communication and the complaints therein. Therefore they would both, I presume, be necessarily confidential. I will be glad to lay the report upon the table, if the hon. gentleman will say that his communication is not confidential.

Mr. SPEAKER. Stand.

CANADIAN LIGHT AND POWER COMPANY.

*Mr. MONK:

1. Has the Canadian Light and Power Company submitted to the government the plans of the new works the company intends to execute in connection with the development and increase of its power on the Beauharnois canal?
2. On what dates were said plans sent in for approval?
3. Has the government caused a report to be made upon the said plans and proposed works, who has been intrusted with the preparation of said report, and has the report been completed?
4. Is the government satisfied that the proposed works will not interfere with the navigation of the St. Lawrence river?
5. Has the government taken any action in respect to the application for the approval of said plans?
6. Has any order in council been passed?
7. On what date was such action taken, and said order in council passed?
8. Will said plans be laid upon the table of the House?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Would my hon. friend let me know whether he refers to the application which has been lately made and which is now pending in my department for the large works, and I will be glad to give the answer?

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—WESTERN DIVISION.

Mr. LENNOX:

Based upon the latest information available to the government, what will be the cost to Canada incurred for the building of the western division of the Transcontinental railway, given in such detail as to show how the total is arrived at?

Mr. GRAHAM. The estimated cost to Canada is the interest for seven years on the bonds required to finance 75 per cent of the cost of construction of the Mountain section, and this interest is estimated at $13,293,000. In addition, the direct cost to the government for inspection, auditing, &c., in connection with the western division, is estimated at $135,000.

The details upon which the above estimate is based are as follows:

Estimated cost to complete, March 31, 1914:

Cost of construction, as per estimate attached	$ 58,520,000
Terminals, Prince Rupert, as per estimate attached	3 000,000
Interest during construction	6,000,000
Total estimated cost	$ 67,520,000
Amount to be financed by 3 per cent government guaranteed bonds, 75 per cent of $67,520,000	50,640,000
Par value of government guaranteed 3 per cent bonds required to finance cost of construction, estimated to be sold at net price of 80 per cent	63,300,000
Interest on $63,300,000 at 3 per cent for 7 years	13,293,000
Estimated direct expenditure by government for engineering, auditing, &c., in connection with western division	135,000

The above estimate is made on the assumption that the liability of the government as guarantor of the bonds, will be in accordance with the judgment rendered by the Supreme Court of Canada, as to the meaning of paragraph 5 of the agreement of February 18, 1904, schedule to chap. 24 of the Acts of that year.

ESTIMATED COST OF CONSTRUCTION OF THE MOUNTAIN SECTION OF THE TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

Description of Service.	Amount.
Preliminary and legal expenses, engineering	$ 3,200,000
Right of way and real estate	250,000
Grading and tunnels	33,000,000
Bridges, trestles and culverts	10,000,000
Ties	1,500,000
Rails, fastenings, frogs and switches	5,700,000
Tracklaying, surfacing and ballasting	2,390,000
Buildings and water stations	1,500,000
Fencing, crossings and cattle guards	20,000
Snow sheds	500,000
Docks	200,000
Telegraph line	260,000
	$58,520,000
Terminals at Prince Rupert	3,000,000

The foregoing details of estimates are subject to revision. The fluctuating labour conditions prevailing, and the tendency to an increasing cost for labour, on the line of construction, renders this statement necessary.

ELMIRA RAILWAY STATION, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. FRASER:

1. Who is the contractor for the railway station at Elmira, P.E.I.?
2. What is the amount of the contract?
3. What is the date fixed by the terms of the contract for the completion of same?
4. Is the minister aware that it is alleged nothing has yet been done towards the erection of this station?
5. Is it the intention of the government to insist upon the completion of the contracts, or will they call for new tenders?

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. F. S. McDonald.
2. Bulk sum for station $1,655.37 and estimated schedule prices for foundations and platforms.
3. October 31, 1910.
4. When the contractor was about to commence the building of this station, last year, objection was taken to some of the timber he proposed using; he then said he could not replace this material until it could be got out in the winter, so asked for an extension of time on his contract till the 1st September, 1911, which was granted by order in council.
5. The department will insist upon the completion of this contract within the time specified.

HILLSBOROUGH BRIDGE.

Mr. FRASER:

1. What quantity of material has been purchased for repairs to the covering of Hillsborough bridge, P.E.I., during the last twelve months?
2. What is the name or names of the persons who supplied this?
3. What price was paid per 1,000 feet, superficial measure?
4. At what date is the contract to be completed?

Mr. GRAHAM:

1, 2, 3 and 4. No material has yet been purchased for repairs for the covering of the Hillsborough bridge, P.E.I., but a contract was entered into with F. S. McDonald, Souris, for 22,300 superficial feet of yellow birch or rock maple plank for covering of Hillsborough bridge, contract price $13.50 per thousand superficial feet, f.o.b. cars. Contract to be completed on or before April 15, 1911. Eighteen thousand superficial feet already supplied. No payment yet made on account of this contract.

2. What are the quantities and values of the importations of shafting not exceeding 2½ inches in diameter which have been entered at the different customs ports in Canada since 1st April, 1910?

Mr. PATERSON.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—MR. JOHN GASKIN.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds):

Was a letter or memorial, signed by J. R. Coggon and others, presented to the government or any member thereof, during the month of February, 1909, or at any subsequent date, by one Mr. A. F. Landry, asking that an investigation be held respecting certain charges contained in solemn declarations accompanying said letter or memorial, concerning one John Gaskin, an employee of the government in the electrical department of the Intercolonial railway at Moncton, N.B.?

Mr. GRAHAM:

Yes, a memorial was received, addressed to the honourable the Minister of Railways and Canals, dated January 28, 1908, asking that an investigation be held concerning Mr. John Gaskin, an employee of the Electric Department of the Intercolonial railway, at Moncton.

WILHELM TELEPHONE FACTORY.

Mr. LALOR:

1. Was there a seizure of the Wilhelm telephone factory, located at Dunnville? If so, what is the amount of the duties due the government?

2. Has there been any offer of compromise? If so, what does the government offer to accept?

3. Who was the informant and officer responsible for the seizure?

4. What is the amount due him as commission upon said seizure, and has he been paid? If not, what is the cause of the delay?

Mr PATERSON:

1 and 2. Certain imported articles in the telephone factory at Dunnville have been seized for contravention of the customs laws. No definite offer of payment has yet been made in respect of the customs claims in this case. The decision rendered in the case calls for payment of $3,000 to cover customs duties and penalties—the goods to be forfeited in default of payment.

3. The customs officers named in the report as making the seizure are John E. Potts and James R. Dunlop.

4. There has been no award made to the officers concerned in this seizure, as the minister's decision has not been accepted and the matter is not yet closed. The awards to seizing officers are discretionary with the department, but not exceeding one-fourth of the amount forfeited.

ESCOTT POSTMASTERSHIP.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds):

1. What is the present salary of the postmaster at Escott, county of Leeds, Ontario?

2. When was this salary last increased, and why was it increased?

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Present salary $95; rent allowance, $6; total $101.

2. (a) April 1, 1909; (b) the revenue of the office for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1909, entitled the postmaster to an increase.

MOTIONS AGREED TO WITHOUT DISCUSSION.

For a return showing in detail the expenses incurred and paid for the Paris exposition in 1900, as payments of the colonial committee on account of space, &c., $87,000, as shown in the report of the Auditor General for 1899-1900, page D—15.—Mr. Paquet.

For a return showing all convictions and fines reported from the electoral division of Victoria, N.B., including the county of Madawaska, for violation of sections 148 and 150 of the Criminal Code, respectively, with the names and residences of defendants and of the persons to whom the said fines were paid, and showing the disposal made of the fine in each case; also for a return showing all fines collected in said electoral division for violation of said sections without the formality of a conviction, with the names and residences of the persons paying the same, and of the persons to whom paid; and showing the disposal made of the fine in each case; also for a return showing all weapons seized under section 148, or delivered under section 144, and the disposal made thereof.—Mr. Crocket.

WAYS AND MEANS—PRESS REPORTS OF PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go again into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. LENNOX. Before you leave the Chair, I wish to call the attention of the House to the manner in which the proceedings of this House are being reported by a journal which was once regarded as trustworthy in the province of Ontario particularly, and throughout the Dominion of Canada—I refer to the Toronto 'Globe.' I regret to say concerning the report of the proceedings of this session, I can not give it much of a certificate. There was a time, notably when Mr. Matthews represented that journal in the Press gallery, that the 'Globe' contained what I regarded as exceedingly honourable and straight reports. I recognize that this article of which I am complaining, may not have emanated from the press gallery, but it emanated from some one identified with the 'Globe,' of course. I have been in public life for some time; I recognize that it is not necessary for the members of this House to be thin-skinned and that if it relates to a mere matter of comment, although injurious, ill-timed and unjustifiable, I generally think it all right to let it go. If I had been sensitive about the conduct of this journal, for instance during the present session—I refer as much to editorial comment as otherwise—I would have spoken very often of the slanders with which that journal has distinguished me. But, naturally, under the circumstances, I would be disposed to subscribe to the doctrine enunciated by Sir John Macdonald, that the most stones and sticks are found beneath the best apple trees. I need not be sensitive about that matter, but when it comes to a deliberate, inexcusable falsification, not comment, but a representation of fact and an absolutely untruthful, unfounded representation of fact, a slanderous statement which goes perhaps beyond anything that we have had for many years in journalism in Canada, I think it is time, not so much for myself, but for the vindication of the honour of parliament, that the matter should be dealt with, on Saturday last——

Some hon. MEMBERS. At an early hour.

Mr. LENNOX. At an early hour, I should say on Saturday morning. A few members of the House were here attending to their duty. We acting, as we believed, in the public interest. The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey), chose that time to discuss a very important phase of the reciprocity question, and to move that, in so far as the schedules now before the House relate to fruit and vegetables, the tariff, as it at present exists, should remain unaltered. We, on this side of the House, did not consider that—speaking for myself at all events, I can say that I did not think that there was very strong evidence that the hon. member for Wentworth was acting in good faith but being, to a man, I believe, opposed to the reciprocity proposals of the government, and this being an amendment in opposition to a portion of them, we seized that opportunity to evince our thorough opposition as far as it went to the reciprocity scheme. It will surprise you, Mr. Speaker, to know that our action in that regard has been characterized by the 'Globe' as a Conservative vote for reciprocity, taking the black and big headlines as a starting point.

CONSERVATIVES VOTE FOR RECIPROCITY.

That naturally means the Conservative party. It would surprise you, Mr. Speaker, it would more surprise, I suppose, the Deputy Speaker, who was here at the time, to know that that was followed by other headlines almost as black though not as big.

Mr. LENNOX.

ALL BUT FRUIT AND VEGETABLE SCHEDULE RECEIVES THEIR APPROVAL.
MR. SEALEY'S RESOLUTION.
OPPOSITION EAGER TO SUPPORT AMENDMENT TO AGREEMENT.
Ottawa, April 23——

That is Sunday. If this nefarious, this diabolical, this utterly unjustifiable, concocted falsification had occurred next morning in the newspaper there would not be much to say in mitigation, but there might be a little. But, when we find that, perhaps under the sanctimonious ægis of the pious editor of the 'Globe,' it was conceived and concocted on Sunday, I was going to say we are surprised, but we are not surprised very much at the hypocrisy and the dishonesty of that gentleman. I am not going to say for certain that he is the father of this; I do not know. He would make a very good step-father, however, judging from some things that have occurred before.

Mr. REID (Grenville). He reads it.

Mr. LENNOX. He may read it and is responsible for it to some extent.

Ottawa, April 23.—At an early hour on Saturday morning, six Conservative members of the Commons joined Mr. Sealey of Wentworth in voting general approval of the reciprocal trade arrangement negotiated for Canada by Hon. Messrs. Fielding and Paterson. It was a striking commentary on the insincerity of the 'annexation,' 'disintegration,' 'no mandate' and 'lack of information' objections raised in turn by the opposition against the whole proposal.

The Wentworth man submitted his amendment to Mr. Fielding's resolution approving the schedules——

Mark you, approving the schedules.

—shortly before 3 o'clock, at the conclusion of an address in which he upheld the agreement with the exception of the single schedule dealing with fruit and vegetables. He moved that that portion be struck out, and that the entire balance of the proposals be confirmed and approved—'that the resolution as amended be adopted,' to quote the words of the amendment.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That was the amendment.

Mr. LENNOX. The Minister of Public Works is always too quick in suggesting something that he does not know anything about. That was not the amendment, nor does any hon. gentleman say it was. This will not be the last time, judging from what has already occurred, that the hon. gentleman would get up and rush in where honest men or angels would fear to go. It was not the amendment and I have the records by me. I will prove what the amendment was. The hon. member for Wentworth rode two horses throughout his whole speech. It was good lord and good devil all the way through, nobody on this side of the House was deceived, and from expressions by hon. gentlemen on that side, I judge that they too were not deceived as to the utter insincerity of the hon. gentleman in his motion. As I noticed that he was trying to gain some kudos where he was not entitled to any praise I asked him a question before he moved his resolution. I wanted to point out that the hon. gentleman was insincere and I, for my part, was determined that when he moved the resolution, which was part of what we wanted, I would support him and I would not allow him to sneak out by having it withdrawn from the House and saying that he could not get a vote for it. I did not want to put this hon. gentleman in a hole, but to enable him to still save his reputation if that is what he would call it. So I asked the hon. gentleman this question:

Mr. LENNOX. The hon. gentleman having spoken about one schedule, and about trying to get an amendment in there, does he recollect that the Minister of Finance has declared distinctly that we will have to support this measure as a whole or not at all, that it is not divisible in any way? Has the hon. gentleman noticed that?

Mr. SEALEY. I have noticed that, and I referred to it a short time ago. I said that that was contended, but that I did not agree with it, and that I think the majority of this House can differ from it if they choose.

Of course the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey) is a very high authority. He is the gentleman who went over to the United States and introduced this whole scheme. I have a record of his speech on this famous occasion, and I hope to make some remarks upon it when the proper time comes.

Mr. LENNOX. Does the hon. gentleman not realize that the majority of the House have either to adopt this as a whole or reject it as a whole?

Mr. SEALEY. Well, that may be the result; may you be a good prophet.

Mr. LENNOX. They must do that.

Mr. SEALEY. I do not agree that they must do that. If they adopt my view they will not do it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. Pugsley rushes in here where he had absolutely no business, but because he wanted to detract from the force of my remarks, he interupted ; and he had no right to do so because I had the leave of the hon. member for Wentworth to ask a question. Mr. Pugsley says:

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lennox) is not entitled to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor.

And for that gratuitous interference which was thoroughly unjustifiable and characteristic of my hon. friend, the Deputy Speaker called him to order. I may say that the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey) although he gave me liberty to interrupt him continued standing and the Deputy Speaker says:

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is usual that the gentleman who is allowing permission to interrupt to sit down while the questions are being asked so that two may not be standing at once.

Mr. Sealey then sat down. Then I made this remark which shows pretty well what my attitude was:

Mr. LENNOX. Does not the hon. member realize that the proposition he makes is absolutely impracticable, and has no common sense in it?

Well I think that was a little harsh. I felt so utterly indignant that such a fake motion should be brought before the House that I probably expressed myself a little more strongly than I ought to. I do not think that was quite the proper language to address to the hon. gentleman, but at all events he answered that everybody was entitled to his view of what was common sense and he was quite right in that. Now I will read to the House, and it will be specially and directly intended for the Minister of Public Works who was not here but who has been recently posted.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Who was here.

Mr. LENNOX. I was wrong then, I thought he was not here, the hon. member for Wentworth, by way of riding for a fall and hoping and praying that the amendment would not be put from the chair, recited a number of authorities pro and con and beclouded the issue to some extent, and then he says :

Thus the rule in committee is the same as in the House; in the House no seconder is required and no notice is needed. Based upon the authorities the following amendment is moved.

Then what was moved, and what was voted upon, and what is said by the 'Globe' to have been an endorsement of the reciprocity part, and what I say I am prepared to stand by any time as part of what the country is entitled to, and what I am prepared to meet any hon. gentleman on that side of the House including the Prime Minister and discuss before the people and I will tell the people then what I have already told them that this is an absolutely unjustifiable pact from beginning to end, was :

Mr. Sealey, moves in amendment to the resolution 'that it is expedient to amend the Customs Tariff, 1907.' That schedule A, thereto be amended by striking out in lines seven and eight thereof the words 'onions, cabbage, and all other vegetables in their natural state,' and in lines nine and ten thereof the words 'pears, peaches, grapes, berries, and all other edible fruits in their natural state,' and in lines eleven and twelve thereof the words 'peaches, pears and apricots, dried, desiccated or evaporated.'

That is the motion that Mr. Sealey read, that is the motion that was read to the House, that is the motion that we voted upon, if the Minister of Public Works will bear it in mind, and that is the motion upon which the 'Globe' founded its utterly lying article in saying that six members of the Conservative party voted their approval of reciprocity. Now having read that, I may say that the 'Globe' does make one true statement and that is that I said it was an excellent motion or something of that kind, by way of sarcasm. I propose to read part of what the 'Globe' has to say for the purpose of specifically characterizing some of it in a way that such a lying disreputable article deserves. I see the Prime Minister smiling—I hope he likes this kind of thing. I hope he thinks that the 'Globe' has done itself credit by this article. I beg to say to the right hon. gentleman for whom I entertain a very great respect, that I also have the right to judge of what is fair play, and what is not. I am prepared to give the press every latitude and I am prepared to get a thrashing when I deserve it, and I have got some blows and some of them I deserved.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LENNOX. Yes. I have. But I have fought for what I thought was honest in this House from first to last, and I have never said behind any man's back what I was afraid to say to his face. While I have not the ability, I have just as keen a sense of honesty and fairness as any man in this House. I have said in the House—and I am not a wobbler—I have said in the country that this pact is the most unfair proposition so far as the farming community is concerned that was ever imposed upon any farmers in any country at any time in the history of the world. Yes, and I will meet the right hon. gentleman if he likes, and although I recognize that his ability towers mountains high over mine, I will meet him upon that platform, and I have no fear that I will carry with me the sensible, thoughtful, earnest, intelligent people of the country, against my right hon. friend.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Some people also say the same thing in the United States.

Mr. LENNOX. I am not guided by the United States, and thank God I am not guided by my right hon. friend either. I am guided by the sober-second thought of the great farming community of this country, and they are going almost to a man against my hon. friend.

Mr. LENNOX.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LENNOX. Not when they get these lying articles, but when they get the truth from the Conservatives upon the public platforms of the country. Here is the heading in the 'Globe:

Conservatives vote for reciprocity.

There are some men on that side of the House who like the tailors of Tooley street think that two or three of them constitute the whole people of Canada, but the men on this side of the House do not think so. The 'Globe' says:

Conservatives vote for reciprocity.

That is the first fair square falsehood of the "Globe' and it is put in big headlines. Then it says:

All but fruit and vegetable schedules receive their approval.

That is falsehood number two deliberately concocted on Sunday by the pious people who represent the 'Globe:

Some hon. MEMBERS. Shame.

Mr. LENNOX. The hon. gentleman who interrupts can just look after his own kitchen. If he has nothing more to be ashamed of than I have, he is more respectable than I think he is.

Mr. TALBOT. Once more.

Mr. LENNOX. Yes, twenty times more, if necessary. There is one hon. gentleman in this House who fills but one role, and fills it often, but fills it badly, because he fills it to the discredit of his own party, and that is the hon. gentleman who has no ability except to interrupt other hon. gentlemen when they are speaking.

Mr. TALBOT. He does not block any.

Mr. LENNOX. Now, here is a statement, which is true:

Opposition Eager to Support Amendment to Agreement.

They were perfectly eager to support it, because the hon. gentleman who moved it wanted it bowled out to save his friends and himself at the same time. But we did not want him to play that game on us. I said it was a good motion, and urged the opposition to vote for it, and tried to prevent the Chairman ruling it out of order, although the hon. member for Wentworth was praying that he should rule it out of order. There was a note on the resolution that it should be ruled out of order, and he scratched that part out, and the motion stood as originally read, and was of course voted down by the government. Now, I will read another few lines:

Ottawa, April 23.—At an early hour on Saturday morning six Conservative members of the Commons joined Mr. Sealey, of Wentworth, in voting general approval of the reciprocal trade arrangement.

Mark you Mr. Speaker, the wording 'General approval.'

That is lie number three. No one member of this House on the Conservative side has ever voted general approval of that arrangement, and I do not think any hon. member on this side of the House ever will. Now, I will skip a few lines, although it is all good reading:

The Wentworth man submitted his amendment to Mr. Fielding's resolution approving the schedules shortly before three o'clock.

That is falsehood number four. There was no amendment submitted approving of the schedule. Then, further down:

He moved that that portion be struck out—

That is, referring to the portion dealing with vegetables and fruits—— —and that the entire balance of the proposals be confirmed and approved "that the resolution as amended be adopted."

These quotation marks are intended to indicate that the words quoted were taken from the amendment. Well, the hon. member for Wentworth and another hon. gentleman who has had a good deal to say about this will have to get up a little earlier in the morning before they can fool the Conservative party or any one of them on any such bogus ideas as that. The hon. gentleman read out no such resolution, and no such resolution was read in the House. I hold in my hand the records of the House, and I challenge the hon. gentleman to say that he can find in them one word to justify falsehood number five of the 'Globe' article. The article goes on, under the head, 'The Conservative vote,' and says:

And after weeks of denunciation of everything in connection with the agreement, every Conservative in the House at the time, with one exception, voted for confirmation of the remaining proposals.

Now, I want to characterize that as the meanest and most contemptible falsehood that I recollect ever having read in the journalism of the Dominion of Canada. There is no excuse for it. There could be no mistake. It was not one of those hurried messages sent from the press gallery. Whilst we can compliment the press gallery for their general accuracy, we can realize that there will occasionally be some misapprehensions. But this was done in cold blood, on Sunday, after going to church and praying for the general evangelization of the world, I presume——

An hon MEMBER. And the peace of the world.

Mr. LENNOX. Yes, and the peace of the world, because the pious editor of the 'Globe' is right at that business now, in order to distract attention from the proposals of the two gentlemen who went to Washington. After all this, and with 'Hansard' lying before him all Saturday, they make the most contemptible attempt at falsehood that has appeared in Canadian journalism for a very long time.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman has thought proper to refer to me, and at first said that I was not present.

Mr. LENNOX. I corrected that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I was present and I voted against the amendment of the hon. member for Wentworth, and I may say that we all noticed that the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) rose at first as if to vote for it, but apparently it dawned upon him that he would be voting for a resolution approving of the reciprocity agreement, with vegetables and fruits struck out.

Mr. LENNOX. That is not true.

Mr. BLAIN. The hon. member for Hamilton gave his reason for not voting. Why does the hon. gentleman not give that?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. member for Hamilton immediately took his seat, and I did not hear him give his reason.

Mr. BLAIN. 'Hansard' will tell you.

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is no doubt a reason why hon. gentlemen opposite should be angry. I would be angry myself if I had gone about the country telling the people that the reciprocity agreement meant annexation and the dismemberment of the empire, and then found myself voting for a resolution which approved of the agreement with that portion referring to vegetables and fruits struck out. I would have been angry too, even on Sunday.

Mr. LENNOX. You cannot be angry; we cannot make you angry.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Now, I think my hon. friend who has just taken his seat has not been just to the reporter of the 'Globe.' I think he has treated him most unfairly. That gentleman is in a position where he cannot reply, at the present time at all events, although he may have an opportunity, and I trust that he will avail himself of it, of doing that in another way and on another occasion. Now, I wish to say, as one who was present, and I am sure that the Deputy Speaker will verify what I say, that the amendment as moved by the hon. member for Wentworth stated distinctly that the resolution should be amended by striking out those portions of the schedule which referred to vegetables and fruits, and that the resolution as amended be adopted. The Deputy Speaker read those words twice. The deputy clerk told me a few minutes ago that he had given it to 'Hansard,' and that one line had been omitted by 'Hansard.'

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If any one looks at the resolution and sees the portion erased in pencil by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey), he will see that the words below the part erased escaped the attention of 'Hansard.' The amendment, as read by the hon. member for Wentworth and twice by the Deputy Speaker, contains the words: 'That the resolution as amended be adopted.' This is the resolution:

Mr. Sealey, moves in amendment to the resolution 'that it is expedient to amend the Customs Tariff, 1907.' That schedule A. thereto be amended by striking out in line seven and eight thereof the words 'onions, cabbage, and all other vegetables in their natural state,' and in lines nine and ten thereof the words 'pears, peaches, grapes, berries, and all other edible fruits in their natural state,' and in lines eleven and twelve thereof the words 'peaches, pears and apricots, dried, desiccated or evaporated', and that the resolution as amended be adopted.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Let my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) look at the amendment itself—the amendment obtained from the assistant clerk in the last ten minutes.

Mr. BLAIN. May I ask if this document is the one which was handed by the hon. member for Wentworth to the Deputy Speaker—the original copy?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, and handed me within ten minutes by the assistant clerk. Whether or not hon. gentlemen opposite, in their frenzied desire to vote for any motion which apparently was against the government, stultified themselves, I know not, but certainly the reporter of the 'Globe' cannot be blamed for having taken the resolution exactly as it was read, and the votes of hon. gentlemen exactly as they gave them. So far from any fault being found with the reporter of the 'Globe,' he ought to be commended for having reported correctly the amendment submitted to the committee and the names of those who voted for it. He could not be supposed to know that hon. gentlemen opposite did not understand what they were doing. He would assume that they had understood the amendment moved by the hon. member for Wentworth, and twice repeated by the Chairman of the committee before it was put to the vote. I think that on reflection hon. gentlemen opposite, though they may regret having placed themselves in a position in which the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) says they had no intention of being, will acknowledge that the reporter of the 'Globe' can in no way be blamed, because he reported exactly the amendment as it was moved by the hon. member for Wentworth, and as it was voted upon by hon. members.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). As an old newspaper man, I can quite understand a reporter making an error, especially at a late hour of the night, but I have no hesitation in saying that the man who reported this was not present that night at all. There can be no doubt that there was a small clique present that night who intended to put up a plant on the Conservative party, and this was part of their game. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) may have been one of them for all I know. But I know that the facts were not such as the hon. minister says they were because I was present during the debate and distinctly heard the Deputy Speaker ask the hon. member from Wentworth to read over the resolution a second time. He did so and the hon. member for Wentworth read it over. Then the resolution was sent back, and the hon. member for Wentworth was asked by the Deputy Speaker, if he wanted the portions struck out with the pencil put to the House, and he said he did not. Then something was said with reference to hogs, but the strange part of the thing was that the news about what was going to happen was known in the wine room.

Mr. LENNOX. I thought there was none.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). There happens to be a wine room or a boozarium. I took the trouble the next morning, as soon as I got hold of the 'Hansard,' to see if there was such a clause in the resolution, but found nothing of the kind. I did not hear that clause read in the House nor could the 'Globe' reporter have heard it because he was not present. I was here and did not see him, and I know the reporters of the 'Globe' as a rule. I consider that this article is a deliberate attempt to falsify what took place in this House; and if the traditions of the 'Globe' newspaper hold, as they always have hitherto done, the man who wrote that article will be dismissed. He would be without any hesitation on any respectable newspaper. The records of the House, with the exceptions of some errors, are shown plainly on 'Hansard' the next day; and if that resolution had been offered to the Deputy Speaker, with that clause added to it, he would have ruled it out of order. But it was struck out, and for that reason the amendment was accepted, and put to the House. The whole thing is a tempest in a tea-pot, but I quite understand how frantically the government grasp at straws in the hope of making out that some members on this side are supporting this pact. They know that they are sitting on a keg of gunpowder, and that at any moment something may go up, and they are anxious to impress upon the public that prominent members of the Conservative party are supporting this proposed agreement. This is not the first sample which the Conservative party have had of this sort of thing. One Liberal paper had a commissioner going through my riding, doing what is called back-firing. Those who live on the prairies will understand what is meant by that expression. It was trying to make the public believe that the Conservatives are supporting something which they are not. They sent a commissioner through my riding who put down a large number of Conservatives as supporting this pact, which was not the case, and some of them publicly repudiated his yarns. I know that the members of the press are as a rule highly honourable and desirous of telling the truth, and that reporting is usually correct. It is not the news colums but the editorial which is usally the lying end of a paper. But the man who wrote this as an item of news did it deliberately, and he got his news from parties who get their information in the boozarium of the House, and who did not give the facts as they were.

Mr. SPROULE. As one interested in this because it is really a question of privilege, I desire to say a few words regarding it. I say deliberately that the article is a libellous reflection on the members of this House, and that the party who wrote it knew—if he knew anything at all about what took place—that he was absolutely writing a libel. I want to say that every reporter representing the press of this country is here by the courtesy of parliament and enjoys the privileges of parliament under certain conditions, one of which is that he must observe the rules.

One rule is:

> Any stranger admitted into any part of the House or gallery, who misconducts himself, or does not withdraw when strangers are directed to withdraw, while the House, or any committee of the whole House, is sitting, shall be taken into custody.

Every member of this House enjoys freedom of speech. Every one who reflects upon the conduct of members of the House or misrepresents what they have said or the records of this House, is reflecting upon the members. This is a libellous reflection on the members. The third edition of Flint & Bourinot says, at page 151:

> Any scandalous and libellous reflections on the proceedings of the House is a high breach of the privileges of parliament, but the libel must be based on matters arising in the usual transaction of the business of the House.

This was the usual transaction of business. This refers to the record of parliament. This refers to what members of parliament said and did. This is an absolute libel on those members of parliament, a libellous reflection. It is within the rights of any member of this parliament to move to bring before the Bar of the House the man who wrote this and have him dealt with by the House as to his merit or demerit deserves. This has been done before and no doubt will be done again, and if the writer of that article got what he deserves he would be brought before the Bar of this House and made to apologize for his libellous conduct.

Mr. PUGSLEY. For telling the truth?

Mr. SPROULE. I say I am justified in saying that because there is the record of parliament. Does the record of parliament bear that out?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. There is the 'Hansard.' What does the 'Hansard' say? The 'Hansard' gives the resolution as read by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) and there is not one single word of the concluding portion of it that the writer in the 'Globe' declares it contains. Then is it not a libel on the members of parliament and of the House? The hon. Minister of Public Works, wishing to defend this reporter, said it was quite clear from the conduct of the member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) that there was something wrong because he first started to get up and vote for it and then, thinking he would be committing himself (this appeared to be something that emanated from the inner recesses of the Minister of Public Works mind), he sat down again. How did he know he did it for that reason?

Mr. LENNOX. He did not do it at all.

Mr. SPROULE. He did not do it. The Minister of Public Works said the 'Globe' said the same thing that the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey) read at the end, finishing up as the 'Globe' article says, 'and that the motion as amended be adopted.' What does Mr. Sealey say in 'Hansard' with regard to that? When the motion was read from the Chair the hon. Deputy Speaker said: I find at the bottom here, something to the effect that this may be withdrawn. Does the hon. member wish that to remain here? That note was evidently intended to let the Chairman know that the mover was willing to have the motion ruled out of order. He went on to say that there was something about pork. The Minister of Public Works said that the motion if adopted meant that the whole resolution as amended be adopted in Committee and yet the hon member for Wentworth himself says after he had read it:

I had included in the resolution, or proposed in the first place, to put hog products back where they formerly were, but with the view of getting the best possible support for the fruit and vegetable industry, I propose to leave hog products to be taken care of a little later.

How could they be taken care of a little later? By another resolution. If the resolution as amended had been adopted, then how could it be amended again? Is it not as plain as it could be that that was the intention of the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey) to move another resolution or have some of his friends do so, to put hog products on exactly the same footing as they were before this resolution was introduced. That is what the member for Wentworth says, and yet the Minister of Public Works said that the member read and included in his resolution that the motion as amended be adopted.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. SPROULE. I can only say if the Minister of Public Works makes that statement that I was sitting a good deal closer to the chairman than he was, and I will take my solemn affidavit that I never heard such words read out. I was listening very closely, and I say positively that they were not read out, and the man who made the statement that it was a portion of the resolution is a liar and a libeller, and is unworthy to occupy a position in the gallery, or receive the privileges of this House to do so. I say this with the greater pleasure and force, because I have generally recognized that the reporting that goes to the 'Globe' newspaper is tolerably fair and correct, and this was to my mind the most outrageous, the most untruthful, the most slanderous, and the most libellous article I have ever known to go from that gallery to the 'Globe' during the 33 years I have been here. If justice was meted out to that gentleman he would be brought before the bar of this House and made apologize for his libellous article.

The authorities quoted by the hon. member for Wentworth all go to prove exactly what I have said that he had the right to move that resolution, because he gave the quotation showing that according to English practice:

Every member has a right of moving an amendment without giving notice thereof. This amendment may propose:
1. To leave out certain words.
2. To leave out certain words, in order to insert or add others.
3. To insert or add certain words.

And:

'When a member intends to move an important amendment in Committee of the Whole, to a Bill, he is not required, according to Canadian practice, to give notice of such amendment.'

Before that he quotes:

'Committees are regarded as portions of the House, limited in their inquiries by the extent of the authority given them; but governed for the most part in their proceedings by the same rules which prevail in the House.'

He read all these authorities to justify his right of submitting the resolution which he had, and that resolution was submitted, and read. I listened to it carefully, and the resolution was word for word as it appears in the 'Hansard'; there is the official record of this House that it was so. Now, when and where was the devilish scheme concocted to libel members of this House? (Was it inspired by the Minister of Public Works)? I am much inclined to think it was, from the observation he made with regard to what he quoted from the member for Hamilton.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I rise to a point of order. I ask you whether it is competent for an hon. gentleman to state that he believes I inspired this devilish scheme, or language like that? I ask you if it is parliamentary, and I ask him to withdraw that statement. I desire to say further that not until I heard this statement read by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), did I know that it was in the 'Globe.' But I have seen a similar statement in one of the Ottawa papers. Now while I am on my feet I do think——

Mr. SPROULE. Is the hon. gentleman talking to a point of order?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw his statement.

Mr. SPROULE. I have a right to speak to the point of order, and I say that the Minister of Public Works deliberately misstates what I said. I asked the question whether it was inspired, and I asked again, was it inspired by him? Then I said, I am very much inclined to think it may have been—those were the words—and I respectfully submit to you that they are within the rules of parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER. As I understand, the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), does not directly charge the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley), with concocting a devilish scheme, but I think he, as an old member of the House, must know that he comes very near being out of order.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will you not agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that it is a cowardly thing to say on the part of the hon, member for East Grey?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for East Grey says that he did not make the statement, but merely asked the question.

Mr. LENNOX. I ask the Minister of Public Works to take back the expression that the statement of the hon. member for East Grey was a cowardly statement.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The question I asked you was this: Do you not think it is a cowardly thing for a man to say that he believes I did such a thing, and afterwards to say that I may have done it? Do you not think that is cowardly?

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member for East Grey had made the statement affirmatively he would have been out of order. I have already ruled several times that the word 'cowardly' should not be used in debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I was simply endeavouring to obtain your opinion. If it is to be inferred that I called the hon. gentleman or his action 'cowardly' I will take it back of course.

Mr. SPROULE. I would not feel too much inclined to follow it up, knowing the source from which it comes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Mr. Speaker, do you think that is in order?

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand the hon. member for East Grey to say he had not made the statement that the Minister of Public Works had inspired or concocted this devilish statement. I understood him to withdraw that statement.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not make that statement, therefore, I have no occasion to withdraw it. I said, from the circumstances connected with what he said concerning the member for Hamilton, was it not likely that he inspired it? And I said circumstances led me to believe it. I was quite within my rights in saying that. Now, I have only to say in conclusion that it is a libellous reflection upon the members of parliament. Hon. gentlemen may laugh. They would do well to take to heart that psalm which speaks of 'the noisy laughter of the fool.' That laughter is the greatest reflection on the hon. gentlemen who indulge in it. I say the characters of members of parliament are sacred, and they should be respected by those who are allowed to enjoy the privileges of sitting within the precincts of parliament and sending out reports to the world of our proceedings. The rules of the House provide that severe punishment may be meted out to any one who violates the privileges of parliament, as this hon. gentleman has done. He has done it, I have no doubt, knowingly, done it deliberately, done it I believe maliciously, done it untruthfully, and, therefore, he is unworthy the name of gentleman, either in this House or out of it. Now, I listened carefully to the resolution, I heard every word of it, and I am willing to make affidavit to every word I have said with regard to the resolution that was read, and it is corroborated by the records of this House. Any one that will go beyond that and falsify a record, and libel members of this House, deserves the supreme contempt of every honest and truthful man in this country.

Mr. BLAIN. I wish to voice my complaint that we on this side of the House are not fairly reported by the Toronto 'Globe,' as set out in the copy that is before you, 'Conservatives vote for reciprocity. The fruit and vegetable schedule receives their approval.' Mr. Sealey's resolution. Opposition eager to support amendment to agreement.' I will not read the balance of the report, because my hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), has read it all, with the exception of one statement which refers to myself, and my conduct in the House on this question, both on the occasion which is under discussion, and when I spoke previously on the general question some time ago. I have before me what was in the original motion handed in by the hon. member for Wentworth to the Chairman, and I will read it:

Mr. Sealey moves in amendment to the resolution 'that it is expedient to amend the Customs tariff, 1907.' That schedule A thereto be amended by striking out in lines 7 and 8 thereof the words 'onions, cabbage, and all other vegetables in their natural state,' and in lines 9 and 10 thereof the words 'pears, peaches, grapes, berries, and all other edible fruits in their natural state,' and in lines 11 and 12 thereof the words 'peaches, pears and apricots, dried, desiccated or evaporated.'

That is the motion as it was read by the Chairman, and read by Mr. Sealey, the member for Wentworth, as the 'Hansard' I have in my hand will show. The resolution continues in these words, all of which have been erased, either by Mr. Sealey, who made the motion, or by the Chairman of the committee.

Also that schedule B thereto be amended by substituting the figures '2' for '1¼' in the fourth line thereof, and by substituting the figures '2' for '1¼' in the seventh line thereof, and by substituting the figures '2' for '1¼' in the eleventh line thereof, all of which refer to hog products.

By way of explanation, I am willing to withdraw for the present, the section which applies to hog products, if any hon. members hesitate to support it on that account, because I am most anxious that the favourable support, I trust the House will give the fruit and vegetable industry, should not be disarranged in any way.

An hon. MEMBER. Who is that addressed to?

Mr. BLAIN. It is the resolution as handed by the hon. member for Wentworth to the chairman, as stated in the House tonight, and the chairman is within the hearing of my voice when I say that the former part of the motion that I read is the only part of the motion that was read by the chairman, either when it was handed to him or subsequently to these erasures having been made by the hon. member for Wentworth. I was here in my position in the House of Commons and in the presence of my hon. friend the Deputy Speaker and the Chairman of the Committee when this was up for consideration, and I make the statement without any fear of successful contradiction that the Deputy Speaker did not read the resolution as stated by my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Mr. Speaker, it is with very great hesitation indeed that I say anything with regard to this matter, but the words of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) become almost to me a distinct challenge to give my memory at least of what occurred. I have seen 'Hansard,' and I have read it. With regard to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey), it appears in 'Hansard' only where it was read by the hon. member for Wentworth; it appears as part of his speech. With regard to its correctness or incorrectness as it appears in the speech I have nothing to say; I offer no opinion whatever. When the amendment was sent down to me in the chair I read it to the committee. At the close of what I read I added some words to the effect that there appeared other words in the paper that did not, to my mind, have anything to do with the amendment, nor do I recall his having read them. I sent the amendment to the hon. member for Wentworth, and he having said that these words had nothing to do with it, the amendment then came down to me with these words erased. They were not the only words erased in the amendment; unfortunately there were other words in a previous part erased as has been mentioned by the hon. member for Peel. Unfortunately, 'Hansard' does not in any way report the fact that I read the amendment at that stage, nor the remarks that I added after reading it, so there is nothing but my memory and the memory of the hon. members of this House as to what actually was read at that moment. If the reporters had taken what I read, not from any copy nor waiting for a copy, but if they had taken my actual words it would probably have cleared up some of the misunderstanding that now exists. Whether hon. members paid very much attention to my reading or not I cannot tell, but the fact that I had to send the amendment back to the hon. member for Wentworth probably took up their attention. In addition there arose two points of order that had to be discussed to some extent, and had to be ruled upon. This probably took up the attention of members more than the reading of the amendment. When these were disposed of and it became necessary to submit the amendment to the committee I read the amendment again, but unfortunately 'Hansard' took no note of the fact. The amendment was put and lost. There is now, therefore, on 'Hansard' as a report of what that amendment contained only 'Hansard's' report as it appears in the remarks of the hon. member for Wentworth. It therefore comes back to this that as to what the chairman did and what he read, the members of the House having heard it, they will have to decide whether he read all of that amendment or not each having his own view. Acting as chairman, I have always endeavoured to read carefully every amendment, and not only have I done that, but I have endeavoured to read it in a clear, careful, tone of voice, with careful articulation and careful attention to punctuation, in order that the meaning may be conveyed. I believe that I gave that same careful attention to this amendment that I have given to all. It is true that the memory of men as to their actions is sometimes deceptive. I accept fully the good faith and honesty of hon. members who have declared that they did not hear these words read. I can quite understand and believe that these words could be read under these circumstances and read clearly and distinctly and not sink into their attention. It was two o'clock in the morning, it was after a long day's debate, and it was after they heard this amendment proposed by the hon. member for Wentworth himself. It frequently happens—and hon. members, if they look into their inner consciences will agree with me—that the ultimate reading of a motion or amendment by the presiding officer is considered a perfunctory act and the members of the committee pay slight attention to it. It is with great reluctance that I rise to make these remarks, and I would very much have preferred not to have done so. I had not seen the amendment from the moment I disposed of it, and declared it lost until a moment ago when the hon. member for Peel showed it to me to ascertain if it was the same document. It appeared to be the same document, and in the same condition. If that document was read properly and correctly by me, I should have read the words 'and that the resolution as amended be adopted,' because these words exist in the amendment now and are not struck out. If they were not read it would be a fault of mine. I have some reluctance in speaking exactly and clearly from memory with regard to these words inasmuch as 'Hansard' has not reported them at all, inasmuch as in all these matters, when a man does not hear, he may think perhaps that certain things were not done and inasmuch as a man may perhaps be somewhat clear about doing a certain thing while he may not have done it. But, I must say that, as a matter of justice both to myself and to others, I believe I read all of that resolution as it now stands. If I have made an error I am sorry for it, but I can tell the House that there was that special character to these words that held my attention, I was conscious of it when I read them, and it would not have been a surprise to me if some point of order had been raised with regard to them because it is a debatable point as to whether such words could properly be added to such a motion. It is, therefore, with me, a case in which my ordinary memory is strengthened by that particular feature of it. If you ask me do I remember any particular allusion with regard to certain vegetables I would say no, I do not remember any such single allusion, but I must frankly tell the House that I have a consciousness of reading these particular words for the reasons I have given.

I read them with as much emphasis and clearness as I gave to other parts, but I would say this, that I do not believe the hon. members who voted for that resolution, apart from the hon. member for Wentworth, realized the force and effect of these words; I do not think so. I did not feel that it was my duty to call attention to them unless I was prepared to rule them out of order, and I therefore put the amendment as I believe it existed, and I think I may fairly say that I gave the amendment word for word, including the particular words that have been objected to. I say this in consciousness that any man might believe very distinctly as to what happened on a certain occasion, and yet may have been mistaken, and I say this believing that the members who say that they did not hear these words, speak in all honesty and good faith.

Mr. BLAIN. I am not going to offer any comment upon my hon. friend's statement. I am going to say for myself that this is what was read:

Mr. Sealey moves in amendment to the resolution 'that it is expedient to amend the Customs Tariff, 1907.' That schedule A. thereto be amended by striking out in lines seven and eight thereof the words 'onions, cabbage and all other vegetables in their natural state,' and in lines nine and ten thereof the words 'pears, peaches, grapes, berries, and all other edible fruits in their natural state,' and in lines eleven and twelve thereof the words 'peaches, pears and apricots, dried, desiccated or evaporated.'

I am going to say that I was sitting here in my place in the House, and took part in the discussion; that I listened very carefully because I was particularly interested in what was read, and I make the statement from my place in the House, that the motion which I have just now read, is what was read, not only by the chairman, but by the member for Wentworth. Now, as to whether I was fairly reported or not in the 'Globe,' I have a word or two to say. The 'Globe,' newspaper says this:

Mr. Blain went further and intimated his readiness to second the amendment should his services have been required. I wish to say, declared the member for Peel, that I am heartily in accord with it and I shall now or at any other opportunity give it my hearty support. The significance of this twist in position is emphasized by the fact that Messrs. Blain, Lennox, Sproule and Currie had already spoken and condemned the entire agreement.'

That is the statement of the 'Globe,' and now I shall read what I did say, and it is reported in 'Hansard,' so that the House and the country will see whether there was any occasion for misrepresenting me as the Toronto 'Globe' did in this article. I quote from page 7703 of 'Hansard':

Mr. BLAIN. The explanation given by my hon. friend (Mr. Sealey) and the authorities he has quoted prove that the resolution is in order. I wish to say I am heartily in accord with the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Sealey), and I shall now or at any other opportuuity give it my hearty support. It is along the line of justice and fair play to a very large proportion of the people of this country who will be injuriously affected if the motion of the Minister of Finance is carried in this House.

Surely that is plain, surely there can be no misunderstanding about that. And, there was no misunderstanding of it by any member on either side of the House when I made that statement. And there was no misunderstanding about it on the part of gentlemen on either side of the press gallery. Had the report been sent by telegraph to the 'Globe' and appeared the morning after I made the statement there might be a mistake, and I would not offer special criticism, but when that statement was made, and Saturday intervened, and Sunday intervened, and in cold blood on Monday morning the Toronto 'Globe' absolutely misrepresents my position and falsifies my statement to the House, I have a right to complain. I may tell the 'Globe' and all that are associated with it, that the gentlemen who read the 'Globe' in the county of Peel, will believe my statement in preference to the statement of the 'Globe' upon this occasion. I shall say nothing further on that point. I may add that my position on this question was explained long ago. Every man on this side of the House, and every man on the other side of the House too, knows that I was always in favour of a fair measure of protection for every interest of the farmer. I have moved resolutions in the House, and I have voted for resolutions moved by other gentlemen in this House in favour of not only leaving the protection to the farmers, as it now is, but in favour of the government increasing the protection afforded the farming interests of this country. For the 'Globe' to say now that I have twisted—when it is the 'Globe' itself that has been twisting—is untrue. I may add that if the reports which appear in the Toronto 'Globe' from day to day, as to the converts it is making, and that the government is making, in favour of their reciprocity proposition, have no more solid foundation than has this article, the people of the country will, when they get an opportunity to vote, condemn the government and its policy.

Mr. ROCHE. I have only a word or two to say in corroboration of the statements which have been made by my colleagues in regard to the untruthful character of the reports appearing in to-day's 'Globe.' I was one of the seven who voted in favour of the resolution of the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey). I was fully seized of its contents. I think my character for sobriety is well enough known in this House, even at that hour in the morning, and my intelligence is at least of the average. I think I know the effect of every motion that is read in this House before I cast my vote upon it. I will not vouch for it that the gentleman who wrote that article possesses the same qualities that I have just laid claim to in regard to myself. If he was temporarily bereft of his senses I could understand him writing such an article, or if he deliberately wrote the article knowing it to be untrue, it is a still worse position for him to occupy. But at any rate I wish to state that I heard the motion read by the hon. member for Wentworth, and it did not contain these words that the 'Globe' states it contains, namely, that the resolution as amended be adopted. And when the Minister of Public Works states that he heard the chairman read that twice he states something that is absolutely without any foundation. I heard the resolution read by the chairman. I do not impeach his veracity in any way. I give him the credit that he thinks he read these words, but I say the chairman is mistaken and that these words were never read by him or by the member for Wentworth either. When the Minister of Public Works states that the reason the member for Hamilton did not vote for the amendment was because these words were in, he states something that is not so. I sat behind the member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) and 'Hansard' gives his reasons for not supporting the amendment because it reports his statement that it was a fake motion. The member for Hamilton raised the point that the member for Wentworth could not amend the tariff law, and this is what occurred:

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sealey) is at liberty to move an amendment to the resolution.

Mr. BARKER. Not an amendment to the law.

Mr. SEALEY. The resolution reads: 'Resolved that it is expedient to amend the Customs Act, 1907,' and my proposal is to amend that resolution.

Mr. BARKER. An amendment to the law might not be an amendment to the resolution.

This was the reason the hon. member for Hamilton did not vote for it. Further on he stated that it looked like a fake resolution. The Minister of Public Works should have noted that before making the statement he did. Some of the reports sent out to the 'Globe' newspaper would be a disgrace to a country newspaper, and possibly we could have expected nothing else. We are not surprised when we find them characterized by gross partisanship but when we read in the 'Globe' untruthful accounts of the proceedings of this House, they become a disgrace in a paper that claims to be a great moral leader. We had our doubts as to the sincerity of the hon. member for Wentworth in bringing forward this amendment. He waited till the small hours of the morning before moving it, no doubt with the idea of deluding his constituents to believe that he was doing his best for them; and having shot his bolt, he swallowed the whole resolution after his amendment was defeated. But he is paying a very poor compliment to the intelligence of his constituents if he imagines that they cannot see through his very transparent trick. I am not going to discuss his position any further; I simply desire to state, on my honour as a member, having followed closely the resolution moved by the hon. member for Wentworth, and put to us by the chairman, that those words were not contained in the one or the other. That is what I unhesitatingly avow.

Mr. CONGDON. Mr. Speaker, it is always unpleasant to take part in a debate in which any question of veracity arises, as in this case; and in saying what I do, I do not wish to question the veracity of any hon. gentleman who makes the opposite statement. I was present on the occasion in question, and distinctly heard the chairman read that portion of the resolution, and I made remarks upon it to gentlemen sitting about me, expressing my wonder how members of the opposition could vote for the resolution with those words in it.

Mr. HENDERSON. As one who has obtained his information on the matter only from 'Hansard' and the 'Globe' newspaper, I am not able to speak of the report as other gentlemen have done. I confess I was surprised when I heard the Minister of Public Works declare, in the most emphatic terms, the absolute truthfulness of the report of the Toronto 'Globe.' He was satisfied with its statement of the men who voted for the resolution. But if the hon. gentleman had asked myself whether that was correct or not, I would have told him that it was absolutely untrue.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I was here and heard it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, I was not here, and I did not vote for it. Now, what does the hon. minister say about the truthfulness of the 'Globe' report and his own as well? He was only trying to bolster up something that I scarcely know how to characterize. About two o'clock in the morning I was not feeling very well. I had had a cold during the week, and I went to my room; the motion had not been presented when I left; I never heard it. I do not know what was in it except by what I got from 'Hansard', which I had a right to believe was a correct report. But I cannot conceive why the 'Globe' newspaper should couple my name with something which it denounced. Evidently it thought it was going to have a nice slap at the member for Halton, and present him to his constituents in a light that they would not approve of. I have been here 23 years, and I think the 'Globe' reporter knows me very well, and it was not necessary for him to insert my name along with those who voted, because he must have known that I was not in the House. This leads me to believe that the whole report was not intended to be a truthful report of what took place. If it had been, the writer would never have mentioned me as having been present, and having voted for the resolution. I need not say what I would have done had I been here. The motion was a very simple one. I would have been heartily in sympathy with any motion to strike out all the items relating to fruit, to vegetables, to swine, to horses, to cattle, to butter, to cheese, or to a hundred other things. I would have supported a resolution of that kind, but I never would have supported a resolution approving of the pact that has been presented to this House by the Minister of Finance, and I never will. Consequently I can only conclude that the writer of that article desired to do me an injury when he inserted my name under the comments he made with reference to those who voted.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I was present during the whole discussion on Saturday morning, and I listened very attentively to the speech made by the hon. member for Wentworth, during the course of which he distinctly stated that he was in favour of the reciprocity agreement with certain exceptions, including fruit, and a few other articles. He said:

> As to the natural product our lumbermen and others expect to be immediately benefited by having that free access to the United States market, which the United States have had in the Canadian market for years past. The mineral people, who are interested in coal, nickel, iron, are also well pleased with the agreement, and the agriculturists, on the whole, seem to be more than satisfied with their expected vantage, except possibly as to hog products. We must give those who are engaged in these various pursuits credit for understanding their own business, and knowing something of their own needs and advantages.

The whole speech of the hon. member for Wentworth was in that line. He was taking exception to the agreement with respect chiefly to fruits, while approving of it with respect to other matters. I was not at all surprised, therefore, to find that at the close of the amendment he was willing to ratify the agreement with respect to other matters, and I have a distinct recollection of hearing the Deputy Speaker read the resolution to that effect, and I was at the same time surprised to see hon. gentlemen opposite voting for it. It may be that they did not understand what they were doing——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. SINCLAIR. —but there is no doubt that they voted for it as it stood.

Mr. RUTAN. I was present on Saturday morning and paid very particular attention to what was said by the chairman, and I distinctly remember that he read every word in that amendment clearly and distinctly so that every one could understand it.

Mr. BLAIN. How does the hon. gentleman explain the fact that neither 'Hansard' nor any other newspaper in Canada reported it as read?

Mr. RUTAN. I am not responsible for that.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey) read the resolution as it was sent to the chair, and the chairman repeated the resolution as the hon. member read it. The chairman then asked him—which of course is not in 'Hansard'—if he wished him to read any further, and the hon. member for Wentworth said that he wished to move another resolution with reference to the hog matter. Now if the hon. member for Wentworth had desired that the resolution should be adopted subject to the amendment he moved, that would have precluded him from making a subsequent amendment, but he struck out the reference to hogs because he intended making that the subject of another amendment later on. That is my view, and I think the Deputy Speaker will bear me out.

Mr. NESBITT. My recollection is that the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey), started in about something which the Minister of Agriculture was going to do.

Mr. LENNOX. That was after it was all over.

Mr. NESBITT. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) interrupted him, and it was then he said he would bring that up again under another resolution.

Mr. BLAIN. The statement which my hon. friend has attributed to the hon. member for Wentworth was made after the resolution was read.

Mr. LENNOX. And the other thing he spoke about occurred after the vote was taken.

Mr. NESBITT. That is my recollection. That was after the vote was taken. With reference to the resolution——

Mr. BLAIN. Not after the vote was taken. The statement made in respect of that was made by the hon. member for Wentworth before the vote was taken and immediately after he read the resolution.

Mr. NESBITT. After the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) had spoken, the chairman said: 'The resolution as a whole is before the chair' and practically allowed the hon. member for Wentworth to go on. It was then that the hon. member for Wentworth said:

> The resolution makes a proposition that it is hoped will be beneficial to Canada generally and to the agricultural interest in particular. I trust that it is intended for the horticultural interest as well. If I do not quite agree with the method proposed for benefiting that interest, I think it is fair to suggest that the minister might benefit it by assisting it to reach that standard of excellence which he sets up for it, by establishing an experimental fruit and vegetable farm.

Then the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) spoke again and also the Deputy Speaker and the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey) said:

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe).

I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the suggestion, and I will remould my remarks and submit them at a later time.

Mr. LENNOX. Does the hon. member not see that what he has spoken of was not at all a reference to the hog products, but after a motion had been negatived—Yeas 7, Nays 22, as shown on page 7703 of 'Hansard.' The hon. member for Wentworth then began to call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the desirability of establishing an experimental farm in his locality. I objected to that as being irrelevant because it had no reference to what the hon. member for Wentworth referred to when he said he would at a subsequent time move with reference to the hog products.

Mr. NESBITT. I am not pretending to say that what the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) states is not correct. There was considerable discussion at that time, but coming to the resolution itself, I was arguing the point of order and trying to find an authority and therefore did not pay much attention to the resolution as read. But I was seated beside the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Miller) and when the vote was taking place, he drew my attention to the fact that hon. members opposite were voting for the balance of the resolution. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. GOODEVE. I was present during all the discussion and I was one of those who voted for the amendment, although my name does not appear in the Toronto 'Globe,' which is another evidence how very untruthful that report is and how utterly regardless of the facts in connection with the debate. I would say further that the explanation as given by the Deputy Speaker bears out to my mind clearly the contention we have made on this side. He has clearly and deliberately stated that the resolution, as it appears in 'Hansard,' is the one which was read by the hon. member for Wentworth. When an hon. member is presenting a resolution, that is the regular order of procedure. He first reads his resolution and then sends it to the clerk of the House. The Deputy Speaker has assured us that the resolution, as it appears in 'Hansard,' is the resolution as read by the hon. member for Wentworth.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. When I said that the amendment as it appears in 'Hansard' is part of the speech of the hon. member for Wentworth, I did not intend to convey the meaning that I believed it to be exactly word for word the amendment which I read. If my remarks have been taken properly by 'Hansard,' it will be found that what I said was that the only report of the amendment which appears in 'Hansard' is where it appears as part of the hon. member's speech. That is the point I was making. I was not in any way guaranteeing the accuracy of the report. The amendment appears as part of the speech, but does not appear on 'Hansard' as subsequently put by me.

Mr. LENNOX. That amendment appears as part of the speech of the hon. member for Wentworth, and after it are these words:

I had included in the resolution, or proposed in the first place, to put hog products back where they formerly were.

Now, I call the attention of the Deputy Speaker to this fact. The hon. member for Wentworth concluded his speech with the resolution, and sat down, and then the Chairman, after reading, as I submit, exactly what is in 'Hansard,' called attention to the matter. The hon. the Deputy Speaker called attention to the fact that he found at the foot of the resolution a memorandum about withdrawing the motion or a portion of it. He said in effect: I do not understand that the hon. gentleman intended to include this in the amendment. The hon. member for Wentworth intimated that he did not and it was then sent back to him and he amended it by striking out certain words and added:

I had included in the resolution, or proposed in the first place, to put hog products back where they formerly were, but with the view of getting the best possible support for the fruit and vegetable industry, I propose to leave hog products to be taken care of a little later.

And then the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) says:

Does it require a seconder?

That is the order of events. This passage which appears by 'Hansard' to be a portion of the speech made by the hon. member for Wentworth, occurred after the amendment had been sent back to him to be amended.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is quite possible that the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) is correct as to the order of events. It is true that when the amendment was sent to me, I found at the bottom of it words that did not appear to have anything to do with it, and it was sent back, just as he states. I am not controverting that in the least; I am simply pointing out to the hon. member from British Columbia (Mr. Goodeve) that I did not in any way intend to guarantee the accuracy of the events as given by 'Hansard,' I only pointed out that the resolution was not given in 'Hansard' in any place except as part of the speech of the hon. member for Wentworth, and I was not pretending to guarantee the accuracy of that in any way.

Mr. GOODEVE. I agree with what has been stated by the Deputy Speaker, but I was proceeding to take the line of argument of the member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), which effectually answers the argument just advanced, namely, that the member for Wentworth, in submitting his amendment, distinctly says that the amendment is based upon the authorities. He first quotes his authority, and then distinctly submits an amendment that is taken down by 'Hansard,' but he sends down an amendment that has certain other additions to it, and lays it before the Chairman. The Chairman of the committee proceeds to read the amendment submitted by the member for Wentworth. Having read the paragraph already read by the hon. member, noticing that there were other paragraphs, he mentions them, he turns with a note of interrogation towards the member, and the member gives an explanation, which immediately follows in 'Hansard':

I had included in the resolution, or proposed in the first place, to put hog products back where they formerly were, but with the view of getting the best possible support for the fruit and vegetable industry, I propose to leave hog products to be taken care of a little later.

And asked that the amendment be sent back to him. A messenger immediately takes that to him and he strikes it out, that was our understanding. He agreed to strike it out, except the portion read. The amendment was then submitted, and certainly as I understand it, was worded as it appears in 'Hansard.' The whole attitude of the members, the well-known attitude of the members on this side, the very explanation given by the 'Globe' itself, all bear that out. But, Sir, if we wanted to prove the utter unfairness of this article, it is seen not only in the heading but in the way in which partial truths are worked in. I think it is the very best illustration we could possibly have of the oath that is submitted to every man who goes to give evidence in a judicial court, that he will speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. This man has deliberately, and with great cunning, worked in certain partial truths in order to make out a strong case for his own particular object. Since the debate opened there has not been advanced an argument so strong against this iniquitous measure on either side of the House as this article headed 'Conservatives Vote for Reciprocity,' in this daily 'Globe' of Monday, April 24. When we find a paper of the place and standing of the 'Globe' in the Dominion of Canada taking pains to falsify the debates in the House of Commons, in order, if possible, to prove that certain members on this side of the House had decided, as this paper says, to twist, in order that they may support this reciprocity pact, shows how very hard they are pushed. There is nothing I would prefer to having this article published in every Conservative paper in Canada, but side by side with it I would like to have the actual facts, as brought forth in the debate of Friday evening. I am sure nothing further would be wanted to show how this measure is received throughout the length and breadth of this land, when they would deliberately take the names of Conservative members on this side who have spoken very strongly against every portion of this pact, not only schedule 'A,' but also schedules 'C,' 'B' and 'D,' realizing that it is to the detriment of this country, to the injury of every class of people, not only the farmer, the producer, but the consumer, the manufacturer, and every one who has part and parcel in the building up of this country. It is iniquitous for such a paper to publish such an article as this, and I can only add that I trust those papers which are favourable to this side of the House and agree with the position we have taken, believing that it is the best for the country, will take pains to make it known throughout the country that the 'Globe' has taken this action. That is all I ask from the press of Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It seems to me that the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), ought to feel that he owes an apology to the reporter of the 'Globe' for the statements which he has made regarding him. The member for Peel——

Mr. SPROULE. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has spoken on this question; has he the right to speak again?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Other gentlemen have spoken two or three times, and I think I should be permitted to say a word.

Mr. SPEAKER. The point is raised; I have got to enforce the rule.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think it would be seriously raised because the member for Peel (Mr. Blain), spoke two or three times.

Mr. BLAIN. He did nothing of the kind.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), certainly spoke more than once.

Mr. LENNOX. On matters of personal explanation.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I wish to speak for the reporter of the 'Globe,' just for a moment. The hon. member for Peel said that he would appeal——

Mr. GOODEVE.

Mr. SPROULE. I ask your ruling again. The hon. member is not rising to a point of explanation but is again attacking the member for East Grey, and I claim he has already spoken and has not the privilege of speaking again.

Mr. KYTE. I hesitated to take part in this debate, inasmuch as it appears to be a question of veracity or at least of recollection between the hon. members who have spoken on opposite sides. For my part I sat during the whole of Friday evening and Saturday morning, and when the resolution was placed in the hands of the Deputy Speaker I was sitting beside the Minister of Agriculture. My recollection of the circumstances is very distinct, and I paid particular attention to what occurred, and with all deference to hon. gentlemen whose recollection varies from mine, I must say I am quite positive that the words in the resolution presented to the House by the Deputy Speaker contained the line which is omitted in the 'Hansard' report. With all deference to hon. gentlemen whose recollection differs from mine, I am quite positive that the words in the resolution presented to the House by the Deputy Speaker contained the line omitted from the 'Hansard' report, the words being that the resolution as amended be adopted. While I am on my feet I desire, in justice to the reporter of the 'Globe,' to read a note which he has sent in to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. BLAIN. Who is the writer?

Mr. KYTE. H. W. Anderson, reporter of the 'Globe.'

Mr. BLAIN. Are we to understand that that gentleman wrote the article?

Mr. KYTE. Yes.

Dear Sir,—I would be well satisfied to appear at the bar of the House on this matter and justify myself. I was not only present, but wired the story out that night briefly. Especially in view of the charge of 'liar and libeller' made against me, I would be gratified if the House summoned me.

H. W. ANDERSON.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Does not the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), think he owes an apology to the reporter?

Mr. EDWARDS. This article in the 'Globe,' along with others, indicate that there is a mania for misrepresentation in the offices of more than one of the Liberal newspapers in this country. The Kingston 'Whig' of Saturday the 22nd instant, has an article headed 'After Frontenac's member. J. A. Robb, M.P., made hit at Dr. Edwards' expense.' The article goes on to refer to Mr. Robb's speech in the House and to say:

Considerable amusement, resulted from Mr. Robbs' response to Mr. Edwards', who interrupted to criticise the sending of Hon. Messrs. Fielding and Paterson to 'bind Canada in this manner.'

Now, as a matter of fact, I did not interrogate any one at all at that particular part of Mr. Robb's speech, which is to be found on page 7488 of 'Hansard,' neither did any other gentleman in the House ask any questions in regard to it at that time. It could not be taken as something that the member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb), said in answer to my speech, because the member for Huntingdon preceded me. So the article to which I refer has not a particle of foundation in fact. I did not interrogate the member for Huntingdon at all in regard to the matter, nor did any other member of the House. So this article in the Kingston 'Whig' is an absolute misrepresentation from first to last.

Mr. LENNOX. Before you leave the Chair I would ask the hon. member who has just read the communication from the reporter of the 'Globe' to lay the paper which he read upon the table of the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have no objection.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Ways and Means.

WAYS AND MEANS—RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH UNITED STATES.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). I am glad, even at this late hour, to have an opportunity of saying a few words in opposition to the resolution which is in your hands. When this reciprocity measure, or agreement as it is called, was launched in the House of Commons, it was followed by an argument which I confess I did not put much weight in. But it seemed to be the stock in trade of a number of hon. gentlemen in the earlier part of the debate who undertook to discuss this question. It was that we had a reciprocity measure away back from 1854 to 1866, and it was declared by hon. gentlemen supporting this resolution that that reciprocity measure had been a great benefit to Canada; and consequently, if we could get another treaty along similar lines, Canada would be greatly benefited by it. Amongst others who spoke to that effect was the Prime Minister himself who, on the 7th of March, said that:

The treaty which was negotiated by Lord Elgin, with Frances Hinks as his Minister resulted in immediate abundance of prosperity.

Now, the Prime Minister, as well as myself, recollects, no doubt, the occurrences of those years. My memory carries me back to the time of that treaty from 1854 to 1866. But I could not for a moment endorse the statement he has made that that treaty was immediately followed by an abundance of prosperity, if that means that the prosperity was the result of the treaty. I can well recollect when this treaty came into force. I am not going to deny that we had prosperous times during the first three or four years of that treaty; I am quite sure that we had; but I do assert, and I think the older members of the House who remember as well as I do the occurrences of those days, will agree with me, that in no way was that treaty responsible for any prosperity that Canada enjoyed during its operation. It will be in the recollection of members that about the time this treaty came into force the Crimean war broke out, and that Russia, in her own defence, closed her ports against the export of wheat and thus deprived Great Britain from getting her supplies of breadstuffs from that quarter. Great Britain was obliged to look to this continent for her wheat supply, to Canada and the United States. No doubt during the first few years of that treaty, owing to the demand for wheat in Canada, there was what we would call very good times. Wheat advanced in price, to my recollection, to $2 per bushel, and to $2.50 per bushel. This indeed would tend to give very good times in the old province of Canada. But this wheat was not for export to the United States, that price was not paid for wheat to go across the line into the United States, that price was not brought about by reason of the treaty of 1854, but by reason of Britain's necessities, owing to the closing of the ports of Russia against her wheat supply. Now, during the first few years of this treaty, as I recollect, and I know there are other gentlemen here who recollect it as well as I do, land values increased enormously. I can remember men who bought farms during those years when wheat was at a very high price. But, when the war was over and wheat dropped back to its normal price about 1855 or 1856, these men who had bought farms at a high price found themselves stranded. The result was that from about 1856 to 1860 we had all over Canada the severest depression that we have had during the last sixty or seventy years. I believe that will be admitted. I have a recollection of reading a speech by the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, delivered in 1879 when the National Policy tariff was under consideration, in which he made reference to that. My recollection of what he said is that the depression from 1855 to 1860 was more severe than the depression that occurred during the years from 1874 to 1878. In 1861 the American war broke out. I want to trace all the way through the condition of Canada during the existence of this treaty. The American war which broke out in 1861 continued until 1865. During those years Canada was in receipt of good prices for her natural products and manufactured goods. The people of the United States were engaged in a terrible struggle. Their able bodied men were drawn away from the factories and farms to take part in that war. Production in natural products and manufactured goods practically ceased resulting in a good market in the United States for the natural products and manufactured goods of Canada, and we secured good prices during those years for the reason I have stated, there being a large demand for such products.

I think this fully explains why it was that during the time of that treaty we had fairly good times in the provinces of Canada. But, that the good times, when we had these high prices, were not at all in any way due to the fact that we had a reciprocity treaty with the United States, I am sure, is perfectly apparent to those who lived during those years as well as to those who have read the history of that time. During those years Canada largely lost her British trade connection and it was only reasonable that after the treaty was abrogated the people of Canada should look to the United States again for a renewal of the treaty. I believe that during the time the Liberals were in power, from 1874 to 1878, the Hon. George Brown, as has been repeatedly stated here, was sent to Washington to negotiate a treaty. He did so, and I believe that he negotiated a treaty on pretty broad terms but the Senate of the United States failed to approve of it and pigeon-holed it. It was never ratified. I have a brief article here written by Mr. E. B. Biggar, of Toronto, and published in the 'Canadian Century,' which, to my mind, gives the history of those times as briefly and correctly as anything I could say, and I propose to read an extract for the benefit of those whose memories do not carry them back to those days to which I have referred. The extract is this:

> Most of the Canadian farmers ascribed to reciprocity the prosperity really due to the high prices of farm products, brought about by the Crimean war and the American civil war; and, though time has partially corrected this misconception, both political parties in Canada had to reckon with this belief. It is easy, therefore, to misinterpret Sir John Macdonald's offer of limited reciprocity.
> We must remember that the prime object of Sir John's negotiations at Washington in 1871 was not reciprocity—though that question was proposed—but the adjustment of the fisheries dispute. Nearly all his private correspondence on this mission related to the fisheries and showed that reciprocity was neither expected nor much considered. Sir John was a statesman, but he was also a politician, and while not wishing to antagonize those who desired a renewal of the treaty, he trusted to time and the development of Canadian nationality to wean the coming generation of Canadians from dependence upon the United States.

It will be in the recollection of hon. gentlemen that from 1876 to 1878 Sir John Macdonald made his famous appeal to the people of Canada to adopt a protective policy, not a reciprocity policy, but to establish manufacturing industries in this country and to build up a home market for the manufacturing and agricultural interests of Canada. He never advocated during those years a renewal of the reciprocity treaty although he did in 1879 place in his tariff a friendly offer to the United States of reciprocity. In discussing the tariff of 1879 Sir John Macdonald did not express any favour for reciprocity with the United States. His whole policy at that time was to build up interprovincial trade and establish a home market in our country. Following the adoption of that policy Sir John Macdonald immediately took up the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway for the purpose of linking together the various provinces of this Dominion with the view of creating a home market and interprovincial trade. So strong was he on that point and so anxious was he that his policy should not be interfered with in reference to the United States, that he actually placed a clause in the charter of the Canadian Pacific railway which prohibited the construction of branch lines from that road to the United States boundary, trusting no doubt in his mind that he was going to be able to build up in this country a home market for the people of Canada, and that he was going to build up interprovincial trade and hence it would not be necessary to appeal to the Americans again for a reciprocity treaty.

Under the tariff of 1879 Canada prospered, went on prospering and is now prospering because practically the policy inaugurated by Sir John Macdonald in 1879 is the same fiscal policy that we have to-day. The policy of the present government is founded on that. I think I can safely say that the entire tariff of to-day on natural products is practically the same tariff as that which was left by the Conservative party when they went out of power in 1896 and that was practically the tariff of Sir John Macdonald. The only two exceptions I can recall are that corn was added to the free list and mutton was raised from 35 per cent to 3 cents per pound. With these exceptions, I believe we have on the statute-books today the entire tariff with regard to natural products that was in force when the Conservative party left power, and very largely the same tariff that was brought into operation in 1879. Now during the years prior to 1896 we had an aggressive policy by the Liberal party; they were anxious for a change; they proposed various policies with a view to destroying what was known as the National Policy of Canada. But when the Liberal party came into power and were entrenched in office and it was found they were not going to interfere with the old policy but were going to perpetuate it, which they practically did, especially on the natural products of the country, confidence was established, and capital, which is always sensitive, asserted itself. The result was that Canada's prosperity continued and to-day we are enjoying a prosperity of which we are all proud, and which, I repeat, is based on the same policy that was inaugurated in 1879. We are sometimes told that reciprocity was the policy of both political parties for about 40 years. I read in the Toronto 'Globe' that the Minister of Customs made that statement the other day at Paris. I have followed the trend of public events closely since 1878, and I cannot endorse that statement of the Minister of Customs. I contend that reciprocity has not been the policy of the Conservative party for a very considerable time. There was a time, no doubt when we would gladly have sought better markets from the United States, but that time has passed and gone. That also seems to have been the opinion of the Liberal party, because in 1899 the right hon. Prime Minister said in this House—and the words cannot be too often ground into the minds of the people of this country to show what the true policy of the Liberal party is, and how at the present time the Liberals are departing from their policy. Speaking in the House in 1899 the right hon. gentleman said:

> If we know the hearts and minds of our people at present, I think I am not making too wide a statement when I say that the general feeling in Canada to-day is not in favour of reciprocity. There was a time when Canadians would have given many things to obtain the American market, there was a time not long ago, when the market of the great cities of the Union was the only market we had for any of our products. But thank Heaven, these days are past and over now. We are not dependent upon the American market as we were at one time.

I am sure the right hon. gentleman could just as truthfully make that statement to-day. To my mind the time for making a change in our fiscal policy is inopportune. The country is prosperous and no one is asking for a change. The result of the wise policy of the previous Conservative government, in initiating a splendid fiscal policy and of the present government in continuing it has made the country prosperous. In view of the coming into power of a party in the United States which we all know favours a lower tariff we could reasonably have waited a short time to give that party an opportunity of developing their policy, and possibly we would then have found access to the United States markets if we wanted it, on conditions, perhaps not as favourable as under this treaty, but on satisfactory conditions without sacrificing our own home market in which we consume about 85 per cent of all the products of Canada. What more need we desire? Speaking on the 7th of March here is what the right hon. gentleman said about the home market when replying to the leader of the opposition :

> My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), when he spoke upon this subject, stated that our policy ought to be to favour interprovincial trade. To this, Sir, everybody agrees; we all favour interprovincial trade in preference to trade with other nations, and I am prepared to admit with my hon. friend that the home market is the best for all kinds of products.

Let us analyze that statement: The Prime Minister says the home market is our best market. It is so because it consumes the largest volume of our products and because it pays the best for them. And yet we have before us a resolution which proposes to throw the market open to the entire United States and not only to the United States but to 13 or 14 other food producing countries that they may come in and enjoy this home market that we have been building up for the last 30 years. It seems to me, agreeing as we do with the statement of the Prime Minister which I have cited, that our position is a happy one, we have something we can be proud of; our products are of the best quality; our home market consumes the greater part of these products, and we get in Canada the best price for these products that can be obtained in any part of the world.

Why should we disturb this happy condition of affairs? Why destroy the industries of this country of which we are all so proud? Why overload our home market with like products from the United States or from favoured nation countries who will participate in the benefits that we shall accord to the United States? We are told by the Prime Minister that the excellence of our goods will find a market for them in the United States. It is quite possible that our best products can find a way into the United States, but is it wise for us to ship out of our country everything that is the best? How are we going to retain markets like Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and the great west if we send across the line everything that we have that is best and most acceptable to the people, and how are we going to dispose of that part of our products which is not so good if we are in the first place going to allow the American people to get everything that is best? We surely will destroy our home market by adopting a plan of that kind. I say that we should retain our best in order to sell as well in our own country that which cannot be classed as best. Our home market, besides affording us the best price and consuming the largest volume of our products, is the best asset Canada has to-day, and I think it a pity that we should trade it away. I believe we are as justified in defending our home market with a reasonable tariff as we are in calling out the militia of the country to defend the soil. Why should we invite others to come in and share our prosperity? If they want to get the advantage of our country, of our excellent markets, we do not object to them coming in, bringing their money, and living in our country. We have a country that we are proud of. We have a great country, rich in soil, rich in minerals, rich in timber. The Americans say to us, with a jealous eye, send us your raw materials and we will send you our manufactured goods. That is very kind, but we do not propose to accept their invitation. They say, send us your hard wheat, and we will send you our soft wheat. They cannot grind their wheat satisfactorily until they get the hard wheat to mix with it. They say, send us your splendid fruits and vegetables, of which the Prime Minister often boasts, and we will send you our cheaper and inferior vegetables. I say without any hesitation that our vegetables are fresher and better, our fruits are finer, than theirs. Listening to the Prime Minister when he replied to the deputation that waited on him a short time ago, no man could mistake what his opinion was of the products of Canada. I say, then, why send them our best products and only get back from them an inferior product? They say, send us your fresh eggs, laid in a cooler climate, and take back something produced in a warm climate, and not at all as good. They say, send us your firm bacon, produced from hogs fed on peas, oats and barley, and we will send you our soft bacon produced on corn. That is the kind of invitation the Americans extend to us. Why all this generosity? What has the United States done for Canada that they should be so favourably treated? What has Russia done, what has Austria-Hungry done, what have Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Spain, Japan, Venezuela, Colombia, Bolivia, Argentina or even New Zealand and Australia, done for Canada that we should treat them so kindly as to permit them all to come in and enjoy our good market? All these favoured-nation countries, if this agreement ever goes into force, will have the right to send into Canada their natural products, on the same terms as the United States, but we shall have no right to export our natural products to those countries except over their high tariff walls. There might be some justification for admitting the United States when they give us something in return, although we do not value it so highly, but certainly there is no justification for opening up our markets to 12 or 14 different countries who practically close their doors against us and only permit us to enter by climbing over their high tariff walls. Our market has been built up by our farming community largely by patience, by perseverance, and by toil. It is our own market, and we ought to be bound to keep out all invaders. Do any of these countries contribute a dollar a year to the support of our institutions? Which of them has contributed a dollar to the building of our railways, to the construction of our canals, or to the deepening of our waterways? Have any of them contributed a dollar to support our government, or our municipal institutions, or our educational institutions, or our administration of justice, or the building of roads and bridges in our country?

Then, why, I ask again, should we be so liberal as to hand over to these countries the great advantages that we have in our own market? Why should they come in on even terms to deal with us? Why should they come in with their horses, their cattle, their sheep, their swine, their butter, their cheese, their eggs, their fruit, their vegetables, their wheat, barley and oats, on even terms with us, without contributing a single cent to the support of our country or its institutions? Why should they come in with their fresh beef, their lambs, their mutton, their bacon and hams, even at a low rate of duty, when they do not admit us to their markets except on very unfavourable terms?

One very peculiar feature of this debate is the absolute failure to show that any better market can be found in any other country—either the United States or anywhere else to which we could send our products. A short time ago the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) made the statement that from his county a few steers had been sent to Toronto, and thence transhipped to Chicago, and there sold at an advance of one cent per pound. A steer weighing 1,400 pounds had practically brought $14 more to its owner than it would if it had been sold in Toronto for export across the ocean to Great Britian. That struck me as a very peculair statement because I know that the farmers of Ontario are a very intelligent and studious people. I know that they are a very wide awake and careful people, and it seems to me most remarkable that all our farmers throughout westen Ontario and the great west, if they could find a market in Chicago so superior for our beef, would have during the last year exported to the British market 140,424 animals for slaughter. I cannot understand why our people should do this if they have a better market lying at their own doors. And if that be the case, how comes it that this gentleman, ever since he has had a seat in this House, should have supported a duty of three cents per pound on fresh beef—practically Chicago beef—in order to keep it out of cheap country? If a higher price could be obtained in Chicago, why was it necessary for him to support a tariff of that kind. The same hon. gentleman claimed that his constituents were going to get a better market in the state of New York for their turnips, which they raised in large quantities. That hon. gentleman was willing to turn over the trade of this country to the United States for the sake of getting a little advantage, as he thought, on turnips. I am aware that a large quantity of turnips are sold from his riding, because they are also shipped from my riding which immediately adjoins his; but I do not suppose for one moment that if we had free trade in turnips, the farmers in Wellington or Halton would get one cent per bushel more for them. Our turnips are of superior quality, the people of New York state want them, and are willing to buy them even though they have to pay a duty of 25 per cent. That duty is not paid by the Canadian producer, but by the American buyer who wants to get this superior quality of turnip. He said also that his farmers could sell their potatoes in the United States at a better price. That struck me as very remarkable, indeed, and I fail to see why it was necessary to disturb the whole trade of our country for the sake of shipping a few carloads of potatoes to the United States. We did last year produce in Canada 74,000,000 bushels of potatoes. What would signify an export to the United States of some 678,000 bushels—the amount we exported last year —compared with the 74,000,00 bushels we raise? Why disturb a market which consumes the greater part of this 74,000,000 bushels of potatoes for the sake of sending less than three-quarters of a million bushels of potatoes into the United States. The hon. gentleman also claimed that his farmers were going to get an advantage on barley. There was a time when the Americans wanted our barley. Whether they want it or not to-day is a more doubtful problem. Why, according to the information I have, one-half of the counties in the United States have gone dry. That means that they will not require our barley to make malt or beer. Therefore a demand which existed 40 years ago may not exist to-day. Conditions are very much changed, indeed. Why, the United States sent to Canada 164,532 bushels of barley. That is a very peculiar feature indeed. If they require our barley, why would they ship theirs to this country. Another very peculiar feature is this, that whilst it is claimed that the United States want our barley, and cannot do without it, as a matter of fact last year Canada imported from them 2,185,463 pounds of malt, and that is what we are told the people of the United States want our barley for. Instead, however, of our sending them barley, we are actually importing malt from the United States. They, therefore, cannot be in any need of our barley.

This hon. gentleman (Mr. Guthrie) advanced a very peculiar theory in his speech, in support of which he quoted from 'David Harum.' I persume that nearly every hon. member has read that very interesting book. He quoted 'David Harum' saying that when you make a horse trade it is always well to let the other fellow get something out of it. Well, my opinion is that the hon. member for Wellington, (Mr. Guthrie) was too anxious that the other fellow should get too much out of it, and consequently I do not agree with him; and I would tell him that we are not trading our own horses on this occasion. If we are giving away our home market, we are trading away a horse which does not belong to us individually, but which we hold as trustees, and it is our duty to see that the other fellow does not get the best of the bargain.

Another hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) made a statement which I think is worth repeating. He told us that he was a Liberal, brought up in the Liberal school, that practically he was nursed on the essence of the 'Globe' newspaper. I am rather sorry for him since we have heard so much to night about the essence of that newspaper. However, that hon. gentleman was very candid and outspoken, and made a splendid speech. He did say that for poultry, eggs, butter, and nearly everything the farmer had to sell, he could get a price right in the market of Welland, St. Catharines and Niagara Falls nearly equal to what he could get in Buffalo, and sometimes better. Here was a gentleman, representing a border county, a county alongside the United States, declaring that we should not interfere with present conditions, that these conditions were eminently satisfactory, and that we should reject the pact proposed by the government, and continue the policy we have had for so many years, and in which we have been so successful.

The weak part of this debate has been the failure to show that we can secure better prices in the United States. I have listened to nearly every speech delivered in the House on that question, and I say that no one has succeeded in convincing the House that, on the whole, better prices can be obtained for our products on the other side of the line. Then why should we disturb present relations? True we have been told that there is a market there of 90,000,000 people, and that we can step in and take possession. But, if there are 90,000,000 people, there are also 90,000,000 producers; that market is fully occupied. Great Britain affords an excellent market. Why? Because Great Britain has a small area and a large population. Great Britain could not support herself, I believe, for more than two or three months of the year and depends entirely on the outside world for what is necessary to carry her over the other nine or ten months. Consequently, we can always make sure of a good market for our products in Great Britain, or the balance of our products that we have to sell there. But this market of 90,000,000 people is not of that character. The people of the United States supply their own country with food products and after having done so, perhaps importing a quantity of some articles, I do not know just how much—the United States exported last year of natural products no less in amount than $903,238,122. Then why should we expect to get a market in the United States for our products, if the United States is able, after supplying largely her own demand, to export such an enormous quantity of natural products. It seems to me absurd. It may be as the Prime Minister said, that our good products, our good fruits, our good vegetables, may find a way into that market, but to say that we are going to get any extended market in the United States, which has such an enormous surplus to export, is, to my mind, perfectly ridiculous. The favoured nation countries with a population of some 307,000,000, do not afford us any benefit; they are permitted to come in and enjoy our markets, but we are not permitted, except over a very high tariff wall, to send a dollar's worth to these countries. Unless we can get all round higher prices in the United States I fail to see that we are going to get any advantage whatever from this, I shall not call it reciprocity measure, from this free trade measure, because I do not think we can properly call it reciprocity, we cannot reciprocate with them, they do not want our products; what they want is our market; they want to come here and sell us their surplus products; they want to get our raw material and manufacture it and send it back manufactured goods, but it would be a misnomer to call it a reciprocity treaty; it is simply a free trade treaty. The policy is free trade into Canada by the United States. We have been told that the time is near at hand when the United States will require our wheat or bread stuffs for their own purposes because the wheat production of the United States is falling off. I have heard that said so often that I have made some investigations, and I find that whilst in 1901 the production of wheat in the United States was 522,229,505 bushels; in 1910 it had reached the enormous total of 773,199,000 bushels. Why, their production is increasing at a greater ratio than their population. Hence I say that the time must be very far distant indeed when we can expect to get into that market by reason of their failure to supply themselves.

I wish to refer to an industry which I shall designate as the mortgage raiser, that is the hog trade. I have here a table of prices prepared with care which has already been placed on 'Hansard' showing the average price for each of five years of hogs in Chicago and Montreal. That table is as follows:

Average price of hogs in Chicago and Montreal for the five years ending December 31, 1910:

	Chicago.	Montreal.
1906	$6.20	$7.77
1907	6.10	7.43
1908	5.70	7.10
1909	7.35	8.64
1910	8.90	9.60

I have been informed that in October, 1907, live hogs sold in Chicago as low as $3.80 per cwt., as against $6.65 in Montreal. There is no doubt that would be a very exceptional case. But there is evidence here to show that the farmers of this country, right at home in their own market, what the Prime Minister calls the best market, the market that consumes the most of our products, the market that pays the best price, right here in our own home market, have the best market for hogs that can be secured. I have a brief statement along the same line which I propose to read. It is a comparison of prices in a similar way between Ingersoll and Chicago. Ingersoll, I may say, is right in the centre of the hog trade of western Ontario. All around that town the hogs are produced. There is no fictitious price added for transportation, the hogs are practically in the middle of the country where they are raised, and nothing has to be added for any long haul to the price of the animal itself.

	Chicago Average delivered Price, at Chicago.	I. P. Co. Average Price, delivered at Ingersoll.	Ingersoll Price above Chicago.	Chicago Price above Ingersoll.
1902	6 85	6 68		0 17
1903	6 00	6 07	0 07
1904	5 15	5 32	0 17
1905	5 25	6 41	1 16
1906	6 25	7 17	0 92
1907	6 10	6 85	0 75
1908	5 70	6 87	1 17
1909	7 35	8 04	0 69
1910	8 90	9 11	0 21

This statement is prepared by the Ingersoll Packing Company, Limited, and is certified by C. C. L. Wilson, the managing director, who states that the books are open to the inspection of any government official for verification. I take that to be one of the most excellent and fair comparisons that can be obtained with regard to products of this kind. Now I say again, why exchange a market such as we have in Canada for such as they have in Chicago for hog products? A short time ago the pork packers of this country waited on the government and placed their case fairly before them. I want to quote a few extracts from the interview of the pork packers with the government on the 13th of February last. I believe in taking the opinion of practical men, men who are in the business, and who know what they are talking about, I prefer that to newspaper interviews. A short time ago I read in the Toronto 'Globe' a report of a 'Globe' reporter who went into the county of Wellington to attend an auction sale, and he consulted the farmers there as to their views on this reciprocity measure. He gave the opinions of three of them, and they all favoured the compact. They favoured the reciprocity treaty by all means, and what do you think was the reason for it? It was that under it they would be able to get free corn to feed their stock, never thinking, or perhaps not knowing, that for many years corn had been free to come into this country. Therefore I say that I always prefer to take the opinions of practical men who are in the business, on a question of this kind. When the pork packers were assembled in Ottawa to interview the Prime Minister, they said:

The Ontario and Quebec packer has marketed his cured pork products in Canada and in Great Britain. Exports to Great Britain, which, in 1890, were $600,000, thirteen years later aggregated $15,000,000, and at present aggregate between $6,000,000 and $7,000,000 annually. During this period of twenty years the domestic trade has steadily enlarged. In recent years large quantities of produce hitherto exported have been consumed at home. This increased domestic demand has come chiefly from the western provinces.

Then they add further:

The continuance of this domestic and export trade we believe to be vital alike to packer and farmer in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Each supplements the other and provides invaluable inflexibility. It is because of this combined trade that during the last twenty years the average price of hogs in Ontario and Quebec each year has exceeded the average price of hogs in the United States.

They add further:

Under the proposed reciprocity agreement the trade of the western provinces, now so important and becoming increasingly so, will be lost to the Ontario and Quebec packer. . . . Deprived of his western business through the lowering of the tariff, deprived of his export business during longer or shorter periods each year, the Ontario and Quebec packer would find his dependable trade confined to his local provincial business. This would be of insufficient volume to pay operating charges. The irregularity in the operating of packing houses under such conditions would introduce labour and other troubles and would so increase the operating charge per pound of product that the continuance of the business would be impossible.

We believe, therefore, that the interference with the regularity of export shipments, the interference with the existing market for domestic products, and the consequent interference with the regularity of operation of the packing houses would follow the adoption of the proposed reciprocity agreement, would result in the destruction of the meat packing industry in Ontario and Quebec. . . . We believe that forced into lower values by the United States feeders, farmers in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec would become discouraged and would ultimately largely go out of the business of hog raising.

That would be one of the most deplorable things that could happen to the farmers of Ontario. Now I want to make a brief reference to another industry which, at any rate in the part of the country where I live, is a very important one; I want to make a reference to the important industry of fruit and vegetables as it is carried on in my county as well as in adjacent counties. I purpose to quote from statements addressed by Messrs Bunting, A. W. Peart, and E. D. Smith, to the Prime Minister and the other members of his cabinet on the 10th February when the most valuable information with regard to the industry that could possibly be given was given. I shall content myself with giving a few extracts from the opinions which they expressed on that occasion, because I prefer, as I said a moment ago, to take my information from men that do know rather than from men who do not know. Those of us who heard Mr. Bunting's address will remember that it was very interesting, well prepared and instructive. Mr. Bunting prefaced his remarks by the following observations:

My apology for appearing before you in this capacity is the emergency of the case and the fact that having been actively engaged in fruit and vegetable growing for over thirty years, having seen these industries grow and develop from comparatively small proportions to considerable magnitude, and having taken some share in many movements that have had for their object the advancement of horticulture in Canada, I may fairly claim to have some slight knowledge of conditions that are likely to advance or retard its development.

No one will dispute that Mr. Bunting was exceptionally well qualified to speak upon this subject and I am sure that those of us who listened to the valuable paper which he read and were edified perhaps surprised. He said:

After a careful survey of the whole situation I am forced to the conclusion that the proposed agreement in so far as it affects the tender fruit and vegetable industry of this country, is likely to have disastrous, and in some cases fatal, effect.

Then Mr. Bunting presented his appeal. I do not think I ever heard a more pathetic appeal made to a minister of the Crown than that which he presented on that occasion. He no doubt was speaking his sentiments, he was stating what he thought and what he sincerely believed to be in the interest of himself and those with whom he was associated:

Encouraged by what was popularly supposed to be the settled policy of this country, many thousands of happy, contented and industrious people are busily engaged in producing from their gardens, orchards and vineyards, ever increasing quantities of fruits and vegetables of the high quality for which Canada is noted, both at home and in the countries beyond the seas.

Then Mr. Bunting adds the following sentence which is a most pathetic appeal, an appeal that I think this government should not have failed to listen to :

A dark cloud has, however, suddenly appeared in the horizon and the fruit growers are everywhere anxiously asking each other, what does this portend? On every side the fear is expressed by those best qualified to form an opinion that it means disaster and in many cases destruction of the hopes that for years have been cherished, of being able to own a home free from encumbrance in some one of gardens of Canada which abound in so many of her beautiful valleys.

I say the appeal was a pathetic one and I regret very much indeed that it was not listened to with more interest. The Prime Minister and his colleagues may think that this is a small industry. I can assure them that it is not, but that it is an industry of very considerable proportions. I am not going to speak of the extent of it in British Columbia, because I am not familiar with it, but it has been referred to by my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell), who is so deeply interested in the industry in that province, so fully as not to require any further reference from me. But, of the province of Ontario Mr. Bunting states, and states with knowledge:

There is approximately 200,000 acres of land devoted to the production of tender fruits and vegetables—at least 50,000 persons directly or indirectly engaged in the business, forty millions of capital invested and about 15,000 regular employees—to say nothing of the thousands of extra people employed throughout the busy season from June to October, many of them from the adjacent towns and cities. These figures apply to Ontario alone, and do not include the extensive fruit areas of British Columbia.

Mr. Bunting went on:

This industry has grown up and developed under conditions which have existed for the past twenty-five years and which, as far as the trade policy of this country is concerned, were popularly supposed to be stable and permanent.

That is where the great hardship comes in for these people. They believed they were living under a government which had a stable policy, a stable tariff, and when they retired to bed at night on the 25th of January they little dreamed that their morning newspaper would bring them the word that practically the whole industry had been completely destroyed, or, at any rate so far destroyed that it practically became useless for their purposes. These men say that they are willing to stand up in a fair field under conditions that are fair and equal and work for a livelihood for themselves and their families, but the conditions are not equal and it is unfair that they should be forced into a position of unequal conditions. A very interesting quotation was given by Mr. Bunting and one that shows what the American people think of this free trade treaty:

Under the proposed arrangement this will be largely cut off, and in order to recoup ourselves for this loss, we are pointed to a market already supplied to the full and stated by the productions of our more fortunate neighbours. In such products as melons, tomatoes, potatoes, berries, plums, peaches, grapes and early apples the markets will be loaded weeks before our crops are ripe, and our early fruits will meet a glutted market in the height of the season, while our later fruits will be like an after season bargain sale—if indeed we can dispose of them at all.

Then Mr. Bunting quoted an article from the Boston 'Globe,' in which Mr. Arthur T. Cummings made the following statement :

Arthur T. Cummings, ex-president of the Boston Fruit & Produce Exchange who has laboured a year and a half to bring about reciprocity with Canada, said: Dealers in green things in New England have nothing to fear from Canadian competition. Reciprocity is going to open a great market for all our New England hothouse stuff. Indeed it will provide an outlet for stuff of all sorts, from Miama, Fla., to California. For all sorts of green stuff reciprocity is what we've been working for and praying. It is the best that could have happened to New England, on that line, anyway?

The United States are not anxious that we should gain by this pact; what they are anxious for is that they should find a market for their own products:

In other words, Mr. Cummings believes that notwithstanding the proximity of such great markets as Boston, New York and Philadelphia and other large cities that might be mentioned—he not only hails with delight the opportunity of exploiting the Canadian market with the surplus New England products, but also the prospect of being relieved to some extent from the keen competition of the Southern States, which will no doubt flood our Canadian markets.

I could read extract after extract to the same effect, and I think it my duty to detain the House while I read a few because I think these statements should go on 'Hansard' where more people will see them than in the blue-book, a comparative few copies of which have only been printed.

As far as the Canadian consumer is concerned, he will not be greatly benefited, for instead of enjoying a regular and rapidly increasing supply of Canadian fruits and vegetables produced in his own country, he will to a large extent be dependent upon the overproduction of southern centres, which cannot be counted upon for a regular and constant supply. It must be admitted that even if our people are obliged to wait for a few days or a week until the Canadian crop is ready, that the satisfaction of obtaining fresh home-grown products will more than compensate for the patience that may be exercised.

One more extract, and it is a very important one because, it goes on to show the great importance and extent of the market that the fruit growers of western Ontario have in the west, and which they believe will be entirely lost to them in the event of this agreement going through. Mr. Bunting said further:

In 1904, a sample car of mixed fruit was sent to Winnipeg from St. Catharines shipping station, under the especial care of the Department of Agriculture, in order to settle some questions that were in doubt. This car proved a success. It was followed in 1905 with 28 cars, 44 in 1906, 62 in 1907, 56 in 1908, 130 in 1909 and 264 in 1910. These, be it remembered, from only one shipping point, and there are nearly a dozen in the district. It is estimated that at least 600 cars of mixed tender fruits were sent out to the west from the section between Hamilton and the Niagara river during the past season. We believe not less than 1,000 cars will be the output for 1911 from this one section alone, if the market is not destroyed, and from present appearances this trade should increase rapidly from year to year as time goes on.

He was obliged to put in the proviso 'if the market is not destroyed.' I read this to show the growing extent of that industry and how much it depends on the present condition being maintained. I shall take the liberty of detaining the House while I read from the statement of Mr. A. W. Peart, of Burlington, who is a well known grower of fruit, who lives in my county and is well known to me. Mr. Peart said:

It has been estimated that in the Burlington district alone; as we consider the great amount of vegetables and fruits shipped and carried to Hamilton and sold on the market there, and sold elsewhere,—if we consider the amount of fruit sent out by the express companies—the Dominion Express and the Canadian Express—and freight, and also delivered to the canning factories,—it has been estimated that if we put it in carlots of ten tons to the car, there are 1,000 carloads of fruit produced around that district. I therefore submit that the Burlington district should be considered from that point of view. I wish to submit that if the proposed schedules come into effect competition will hardly be equal. Everything we have to buy will be bought practically in a protected market; that is to say, we would have to sell in the markets, on their open market, but when we have to buy the probabilities are that our raw supplies, such as ploughs and cultivators, &c., would be higher than what they are in the United States and in that way the growers here may be handicapped. I think there is another point of view we might take. It seems to me if we take the trade figures during the past few years—unfortunately I have not got them here—not only during the past three or four, but during the years 1904, 1905 and 1906, and if we consider the balance in trade in fruit such as we grow, it seems to lay against us in the proportion of 2 to 1, and if we take that and consider the population of the United States, which is about 90 millions, and consider our population of 8 millions, it would seem that while we import double in value from them than what they import from us, that for every dollar per head they spend on our fruit we per head spend $22 on imported fruit. Still they with their great capital invested in the fruit business wish to invade our markets. Another thing is this: I have been trying to find out the amount of capital invested in the fruit districts in the United States, leaving out bananas and other tropical fruits, but taking the varieties of fruits we grow in this country. I find this gives me an estimate of some $400,000,000. I do not know how that is; it seems low. They are farther south than we are. The total investment in Canada at the present time appears to be around $100,000,000, and when we consider the fact that our latitude is north of the States, that their population is ten times ours, they would probably have ten times, or twelve times, the amount of capital invested in their business that we have;—however it is very difficult to get at that. I think we may agree their capital is much larger than ours. Here we have two men engaged in turning out the same line of products; one man has a capital four or five times greater than the other man. In the business world it seems there is no heart, no conscience; the tendency seems to be to crush the poor competitor; and it seems to me that would be the result if the proposed schedules were passed.

Another matter that has been touched upon is that the season is earlier. It seems to me there is a great deal in that. A great quantity of strawberries are grown in this province. Probably half of the small fruits are strawberries. Their season is earlier than ours—perhaps a week or two earlier than ours. When our early berries are ready their main crop is on the market and they will get the cream of the market and we get what is left; and when our strawberries are on the market, their strawberries are on the market; and it seems to me that our early fruits, in all the varieties would suffer in that way.

I read from the remarks made by Mr. Thomas Rowley, of Leamington:

Does it seem fair, that after our growers have spent millions of dollars in planting orchards, building green-houses and hot-houses and clearing land that we should be asked to stand aside and allow a foreign country to take our markets from us without giving us a material advantage on theirs. I claim it is impossible for us to compete with the United States market when we consider their cheap labour and tropical climate. It seems to me impossible to get in fair on these lines. Even under the existing tariff the Americans are getting the margin on the market because they are dumping the dull end of their market on us, when our fruit is just ready. Owing to their varying climatic conditions they have a continuous crop, and they could flood our market with inferior fruits and vegetables, leaving us at all times to a slump in prices, which will leave our grower in a much worse state than what he is under present circumstances.

That is a very strong appeal from Mr. Rowley. Mr. E. D. Smith, a gentleman well known to many members of this House, also spoke. He was a member here for two parliaments and he retired of his own accord. He was not driven out of parliament, but retired to attend to his own business. Mr. Smith said:

We didn't think that this industry would be singled out and made to bear the burden. Seeking as you naturally would do to make some concession, we feel that the fruit-growing industry are asked to give the whole of what is required for the concession granted. The other concessions are small reductions in certain lines of manufacture. So far as our fruit growers are concerned, we do not wish for them. We are of opinion that all the fruit growers in this country believe implicitly in protection. They no not wish to see any other industry crippled, and so they feel it is taking a step in the wrong direction. They only expected a small concession, whereas the whole of the duty of the fruit and vegetable growers was swept away. When the great delegation came here from the west they asked that duties be taken away from agricultural implements, but we wish to submit candidly that if some great concession had to be given, if some great industry had to be sacrificed, then that great industry is much better able to stand it than the fruit growing industry. The main argument that is advanced in regard to the manufacturing industry is that they must be put in such a position as to meet the cheapened labour of other countries, and the great capital of the other countries. We have not only to meet the great capital of the United States, and the earlier climate of the United States—almost every state in the Union can grow the products that we grow—but we have to meet the conditions that have been submitted to you, that are vastly different from the conditions in our country. Our markets are filled with their products before our products are ready to be put upon it. How long could any industry live if put in that position? Suppose any of our manufacturing industries had to lie idle through certain seasons of the year, and during that time the United States manufacturers were able to put their products on the market, and during the rest of the year we had to compete with them. That is the position of our fruit growers. I have heard it said, and no doubt it is believed by the members of this government, that we have some compensating advantage; no doubt it is urged by you that we will have a compensating advantage in turning our goods into their market. First of all, their markets have been filled with all the products we grow, so that we only get the 10c. basket; when our fruits are on the trees ready to pick, their fruits are ready to pick. While our main crop is on the market—while we are marketing our early crop of peaches they are marketing the later varieties. It is a great mistake to think that we have their market to ship our products to at any time of the year. Their markets are filled at the same time ours are ripe. So that we have no compensating advantage whatever. On the other hand, we are handicapped by the reasons stated that we are compelled to work at a disadvantage. Take our land: In the best fruit sections of Canada land is worth from $175 an acre up even as high as $1,000 per acre. It may be said that that $1,000 per acre land is all through the Niagara district; peach land is as high as $3,000 or $4,000 per acre. The lowest is $150 or $175. We were in the United States this week—for this came upon us so suddenly we were not ready for it before. In the western portion of the State of Michigan there is at least 100 miles, stretching back into the country ten or twenty miles, of excellent peach land. Previous to 1903 there were shipped from that section, 8,000,000 bushels of peaches. They are now shipping 2,000,000 bushels, and yet in spite of that, their product is reduced to one-quarter, they are getting just about one cent a pound less than we are. They are only 100 miles from Chicago and yet the price they get for the best is 2 cents a pound or 1½ cents a pound, but our canning factories have never paid less than 2½ cents per pound. Profits are cut down by those who are dealing in these fruits to as low a point as possible. I asked a gentleman in Minnesota, 'what do you pay for peaches in the cheapest time of the year?' he said, 'we sometimes pay as low as $1.75.' I asked a gentleman from Regina, and he said the highest price he paid was $1.75 per crate. The present competition in the Niagara peninsula keeps the prices lower than they would be on our side of the line.

I would like now to read a few words from the reply made by the Prime Minister when this petition was presented. He said:

As a Canadian I am proud indeed of our garden and of our orchard; and I am proud as a Canadian to say that I speak the truth, which is acknowledged at the present time and which will be more acknowledged as time goes on, that in this particular class of products which you represent—fruits and vegetables—the Canadian gardens and the Canadian orchards are the finest in the world. The difference is rather, as has been pointed out to us, the climatic differences of our country. The difficulty, that we are on the northern extremity of the zone—but the advantages there are also in those climatic difficulties.

Then he spoke of the Montreal melons, in reply to Mr. McElvoy, saying:

The Montreal melons are to be found on the tables of the first-class restaurants of New York—the Sherry and Delmonico. Even under the present tariff treaty, their excellence is such that the Montreal melon is an article of luxury to be found on the tables of wealth and luxury.

I think I have said enough to appeal to the hon. members of this House not to destroy an industry of this kind, which certainly will be destroyed, if our doors are opened to the free admission of everything the United States sends to us, and we shall practically have no opportunity of sending to them.

Now, I am going to quote a few extracts from the Trade and Navigation Returns of our own government; so they can be relied on. I want to show the terrible disadvantages we are going to be placed in when the favoured-nation countries, apart from the United States, are permitted to send their natural products into this country. What I dread most in connection with this whole matter is the destruction of our home market. I regret very much that many of the people of the country simply look at one side of this question. They look over to the United States, and they say: that is a great country, and they seem to have got the idea that if only they can sell their products in the United States they will get a bigger price for them, and if they can buy in the United States, they will buy cheaper. There is no doubt that is a common opinion, but it is just as erroneous as it is common. The most unfortunate part of this whole agreement is that our home market is going to be destroyed. That is, the market that all parties agree is the best market. It consumes the largest volume of our products and pays us the best price. There is nothing that we can see in the invasion of our markets by the people of the United States that will prove to be an advantage to us. But it seems to be worse when we come to deal with the favoured-nation countries. Twelve countries under treaties with Great Britain, Canada being a consenting party, are entitled to send into our market anything they choose on the same terms as the United States will get under this agreement. I will take a few of these articles as an illustration to show the terribly unfortunate condition in which our people will be placed. I will take the article of butter, and will give the exports of last year of several of these countries, after supplying the demand of their own people:

Argentine..	$ 1,500,000	worth.
Australia..	11,500,000	"
Denmark..	45,000,000	"
New Zealand..	8,000,000	"
Russia..	26,000,000	"
Sweden..	9,000,000	"
Total..	$101,000,000	"

Some of these countries make just as good a quality of butter as we can make in Canada. I think the butter produced in Australia and New Zealand is produced under the most favourable circumstances. Their cows can pasture practically the year round. With no stable taint to milk or butter, I do not see why those countries, and Argentina as well, cannot produce the very highest class of butter that can be produced anywhere in the world. These countries have enormous surpluses, and they will all be permitted, under this agreement, to send some of their surplus into Canada, but not into the United States. The United States are very careful, and do not allow these other countries to invade their market. Canada is the only new country to be invaded by these 12 or 14 countries.

I just want to bring this to the point where the terrible injury can be understood. These six countries alone exported last year in the aggregate $100,000,000 worth of butter. Where they sent it all I do not know but some of it came to Canada. It only came however, in small quantities because we have a duty of 4 cents per pound on imported butter. That duty kept out foreign butter but did not keep it all out. From Australia in 1910, Canada imported 547,149 pounds, so that even under a 4 cents per pound duty Australia was able to force this product into our market. What then may we expect when that duty is removed? Britain of course takes Australian butter free of duty but there are many other countries shipping that product to England. Britain is the only free market now for the world's surplus of butter, but after this compact comes into force if it ever does—I hope it never will and I think that is the hope of the great majority of our people—if it does come into force, these countries, Australia, New Zealand, The Argentine, Denmark, Russia and Sweden, will all be ready to send their butter to Canada and capture part of our free market. Suppose they send in only 3 per cent of their output, where then would be the farmer's wife with her basket of fresh butter? Where would she find a market for it? Three per cent only would swamp the market our people have. I remember a few years ago when the question of the duty of sole leather was under consideration, a tanner in the village where I live was very anxious to have the duty increased, and he said to me: If the American tanners sent in to Canada 2 per cent of their output, I could not sell a dollar's worth of leather in this country. The whole Canadian market would be flooded by merely 2 per cent of the product of the American tanneries. Now our farmers are asked to submit to an invasion from these favoured nation countries I have mentioned of $100,000,000 of butter over and above what the United States would be willing to send in free of duty. And if 3 per cent of this $100,000,000 worth should find its way into Canada, the farmer's wife, with her basket of fresh butter to sell or trade for a week's groceries, would fail to find a purchaser, as our market would be overloaded; or if she did find a purchaser, she would have to accept a price which would not pay her for her trouble.

With regard to eggs, which is another important product of Canada, Canada sent last year to the United States, 35,732 dozens but the United States in spite of a 3 cents duty per dozen, succeeded in sending to our country 757,316 dozens. What would be the amount of eggs they would send to Canada if the duty were entirely removed. The production of eggs in the United States is enormous. The statement was made in the house the other day—which no doubt was perfectly correct because the gentleman who made it is a very careful student of figures—that corn was the biggest product of the United States and that eggs came next. I confess that was a surprise to me, but I have no doubt he was right. Now out of that enormous surplus of eggs which the United States can produce, if they attempt to force them into Canada or only a small percentage, I do not think that our farmers need bother going into poultry raising because there will be no market for their products. Eggs are now a very important money maker, and it is unfair that an agreement should be come to which would deprive our people of the best market they have. Why should we hand that over either to the United States or any country that has never contributed a dollar to build our railways, to construct our canals, to deepen our waterways, to meet the expenses of government or education or build our roads and bridges? And yet the government are going to allow those other countries to enjoy all these benefits of all our toil and labour. A more unfair proposition was never presented to our people.

In eggs Russia had a surplus last year of $28,000,000, Sweden half a million, Austria-Hungary, $21,000,000, Denmark $6,500,000, or in all $56,000,000. Let 3 per cent of those come into Canada and that would practically wipe out the business of producing eggs in this country.

Take the Argentine with regard to frozen beef, she had a surplus of $21,000,000 worth and Australia had a surplus of $3,500,000 worth. Let them send 3 per cent of that to Canada, and what effect will it have on beef and cattle? As a matter of fact, I question whether it would be so injurious because if we are going to have free trade in cattle, I do not think many cattle will be raised here. Such a policy will almost drive our farmers out of the market. It will take away anything profitable and make it impossible for them to secure anything out of their industry. Australia last year exported $6,000,000 and the Argentine $5,000,000 worth of frozen mutton. Of other frozen meats New Zealand sent out $17,500,000 worth. Of cattle the Argentine sent out $4,000,000 worth. Remember that these cattle will come direct into Canada and pay no duty, the door is open, the way is just as clear as it would be for the cattle raised in our own country. All this is apart from what the United States would send to us. Of cheese New Zealand had an export of $5,000,000 and Switzerland, of $11,500,000, all liable to find their way free into Canada. I do not mean that it will all come into Canada but a small percentage may, and if that percentage was not more than 3 per cent it would have the effect of making our own good market, our best market, entirely unprofitable. What we ought to do and what the government ought to do is to hold on to a good thing when we have it; do not permit the invasion of our market by these other countries that have never done anything to earn it.

Of vegetables, Switzerland had a surplus last year of $1,000,000 and Spain of nearly $6,000,000. We will get our share of these, depend on it; the products of Switzerland and Spain will find their way to Canada and as water rates are very low indeed, the freight question will not be material. We need not be in doubt as to whether Australia can send mutton and lamb and butter into Canada. The long distance is nothing when the produce is carried by water the freight is a mere bagatelle, because you know the Australians can produce mutton and lamb so much cheaper than we can that they are able to pay freight and land the meat in our country at a lower price than our people can possibly produce it at. We all know that in Australia, sheep are not produced for the carcase, but rather for the wool, the carcase is a by-product, it is all profit, their sheep are raised for the wool and consequently, the carcase being all profit, can be sold at a very much lower price than our farmers can afford to sell our mutton at when the mutton is raised for the carcase, the wool being the by-product.

A short time ago the right hon. the Prime Minister sent a telegram to Toronto to be read at a public meeting in order to induce the people of Toronto to go over and support his new-fangled pact. He said:

We have not hurt the manufacturer, and we will not do so.

I would like the Prime Minister to take a flying visit up into the county of Halton and to go to Georgetown and ask the paper manufacturers there whether or not he is hurting them. I think he would get just that kind of a hearty welcome that would prevent him from ever going back again or ever sending anybody else into that county to support his policy. To say that the manufacturers of paper have not been hurt is something that I cannot understand. These people carry on a large business, the firm has been in business since 1837 and this is the worst stroke they have ever received. The firm have been operating, employing labour, doing a large business and I have no doubt a profitable business which it had a perfect right to do, because there is a very large amount of capital invested, and the government that would attack an industry of that kind without a moment's notice is doing something absolutely unfair to honest men.

The duties on print paper range, I believe, from 15 per cent to 25 per cent. To wipe that out, to open the market for free competition from the United States and from other countries that produce paper, is utterly unfair. Why did not the hon. gentlemen give at least one year's notice to enable the men to change their business arrangements in some way so that the blow would not fall so heavily upon them. There is where I think the unfairness comes in. I think that is a sufficient answer to the statement that the government have not hurt the manufacturers and will not do so. It is useless to add the words 'we will not do so,' because if this pact goes through, the people will know they have injured the manufacturers.

We have benefited the farmer and consumer.

If the hon. gentleman can get consolation in the way of benefit out of what I have said, I wish them luck with it. I do not think the farmer will get much out of this pact. The member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), who represents a splendid agricultural county did make a statement a short time ago in this House. He said:

But I hear on the other hand the cry that if this trade arrangement goes into force the cost of living will be increased, and I hear, on the other hand, the cry that the cost of fruit to the grower will be lowered, the cost of vegetables to the grower will be lowered, and that the price of meat and bacon and beef products will be lowered—so the Packers' Association tell the people of Canada.

He says:

I will give my own best judgment.

And what do you think was his best judgment?

The great farming community of this country, representing 60 per cent of our population, is going to be very materially benefited. The farmers are going to make money, they are going to make a lot of money.

That was his best judgment. It is said that that hon. gentleman may very soon find his way to the bench. I would not object to his going on the bench, he is a good lawyer and I think might make a very good judge, but I would mortally hate to think he would give judgments like that from the bench; I do not think the people would have very much confidence in them. He did say something, however, in closing his remarks with which I can agree. He said of the people who lived in villages, towns and cities:

It would be illogical to declare that there would be an increase in the price of farming commodities and no increase in the cost of living.

I quite agree in that.

Not only is the farmer to be helped but the consumer is to be helped. I take the consumer to be the man who does not produce, who is dependent on somebody else for what is necessary to support him. He buys his food stuffs entirely, he does not produce anything. Let us see what is done for him. The Prime Minister says he is going to help him. He is going to help the farmer and the consumer, he says. Wheat is put on the free list. I do not know whom that is to help unless it is to help the American farmer. The farmers of Canada do not eat wheat; if he had wanted to give them something cheap, he should have given them the product of wheat. Wheat is free, but to help the consumer he puts flour at 50 cents a barrel. I don't think they will thank him much for that. Oats are free. The pact tells us that oatmeal is put down at 50 cents per hundred pounds, presumably to help the consumer. I rather think it is intended to help the member for North Wellington, who is an oatmeal miller. Buckwheat is free, but buckwheat meal, which the consumer wants to make his pancakes, is put on the dutiable list at 50 cents per 100 pounds. That seems to be the way the Prime Minister is going to help the consumer. Corn is free, but cornmeal is 12½ cents per 100 pounds duty.

Then we come to another, and one of the most extraordinary cases of helping the consumer that I think is contained in the whole agreement. Wheat, I said, was free, and so long as we grind our Canadian wheat into flour, the flour will be free. Then salt is free. Siberian butter is free, because you can send to Siberia and get all the butter you want to make biscuits; and then to help the consumer biscuits are put on the dutiable list at 20 to 32½ per cent. That is the way the consumer is to be helped. Here is something that I absolutely fail to comprehend, and I cannot understand how these two gentlemen who went down to Washington ever arrived at such a conclusion. I am not going to refer to this because the Minister of Customs is a shareholder in a biscuit factory, there is nothing personal in the reference, I am simply putting this forward as a fair argument. These two gentlemen went down to Washington and came back with an agreement which had this effect: A man out in the Niagara peninsula, or in my county, can buy land at a high price, cultivate it, manure it, plant on it a peach orchard, wait for eight years before he can get a dollar's worth of return, and he has got to sell his product in a free market, a market which, if they had only let it alone, would have been the best market he could have had. But they have permitted it to be invaded by the United States and other fruit-producing countries. Now, the man that makes biscuits can get his flour practically free, because wheat is free; he can get his salt free, and he gets his Siberian butter free to make the biscuits with, and then he is allowed a protection of from 20 per cent all the way to 32½ per cent. Now if any member of this House can explain that anomaly to me I will be agreeably surprised. I do not believe that even the men who made the pact can give a reason for what they were doing. Wheat is free and corn is free, but the shredded wheat biscuit and the corn flakes for your morning's breakfast are taxed 17½ per cent. I would not have thought so much of 17½ per cent being added on the products if the basis of that product had not been put on the free list; but when you put the basis of the product on the free list and then make a high duty for the product, it does seem to me a monstrosity, something uncalled for and unfair. Barley is free, but pot barley and pearl barley are both charged 50 cents per 100 lbs. duty. The same remark applies, the basis of the article is free, but when the consumer gets hold of it and wants to make use of it for food purposes, he can only get it by paying a high duty. Corn is free, canned corn is put on the dutiable list. Vegetables are free, free as the air. The man who grows vegetables in this country after this pact comes into force, has got to sell his vegetables in an open market, he has got to sell them in competition with all the decayed vegetables from the United States or from any other country that has the entree into Canada. And would you believe that these two gentlemen who negotiated this treaty, combined with the superior wisdom of the Prime Minister, who no doubt knew what they were doing from day to day, actually put pickles at 32½ per cent made from vegetables that were put on the free list. How is any living man going to explain away a thing of that kind? Poultry is free, but canned chicken, which we all like to taste now and again, is dutiable at 20 per cent Milk is free, I am glad it is for the sake of the children, but condensed milk is to be taxed 2 cents a lb. when it is prepared. And yet Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Prime Minister of Canada, goes to the trouble and expense—perhaps there was no expense connected with it—to tell Mr. Robinette in Toronto to tell the people up there that the consumer is going to be helped, and that is the way he helps them. Milk is to be admitted into this country free from the United States or other place, and then the condensed milk that is made from it is taxed 2 cents a lb. Oranges are free, but when the housewife makes her fancy cakes or Christmas cakes she finds that she has to pay 32½ per cent for orange peel. It is a glorious compact, the most extraordinary production in the shape of tariff legislation that we ever had in this country. I do not know how to characterize it. I do not believe it ever got five minutes' consideration beyond what Mr. Taft gave it when he handed it to these gentlemen on their arrival at Washington. Tomatoes are free, but the tomato catsup the consumer uses pays 32½ per cent. The consumer is to be hit every time. It was necessary that Sir Wilfrid Laurier should wire to Toronto, and tell them that the consumer was going to be helped, or I am quite sure the consumers of this country would never have known it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have detained you perhaps too long. But if you did not enjoy it I did. It is not only a delight to talk to the House, but it is a duty which I owe to this House to analyse this tariff and to point out the iniquities of it, the unfairness of it, the absolute destruction it is going to bring upon our country, the hardship it is going to entail upon our people after many days of toil and struggle to build up a market for themselves, and then to find, as the fruit men said, that between Thursday night and Friday morning, their living was actually taken away from them, and their industry largely wiped out of existence.

I feel it my duty to stand here and say what I can to endeavour to get this government to withdraw this measure. Leave it over for another year if you cannot do any better. I believe that if it were left over for another year we would never hear of it again. Once the people got to analyse it and to thoroughly understand it I do not think the government would ever think of reintroducing it. To my mind they will act wisely in their own interest if they want to retain power, and wisely in the interest of the people of the country if they simply come down to-morrow morning and say to this House that they have decided to withdraw the agreement which it was proposed to enter into between Canada and the United States or rather between the United States and Canada.

Mr. H. E. ALLEN (Shefford). Mr. Chairman, I wish, Sir, with your permission to occupy for a few minutes the time of the House on the subject which is before us to-day. The question of better trade relations between this country and the United States of America is one of such great interest in both countries, and of such great importance, especially to this country that I feel it my duty as a member of this House to express by approval of the principle. I have listened to arguments of hon. gentlemen of the opposition, and I have yet to hear therein anything which, in my humble judgment, has tended to weaken the position taken by this government, on this, the most important measure which has been brought before this House in years, and one which I firmly believe will be of the greatest benefit to this country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me explain very briefly some of the statements advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite. One of their chief grievances is that this agreement will be the ruin of our great east and west transportation lines. Nearly all the hon. gentlemen who have spoken in opposition have commented very strongly on this theme, of the immense sacrifices this country has made, and is still making to develop these lines of transportation, and to what end? For say they, if this agreement is carried out the great bulk of all our western traffic will go south, and the business of the Canadian Pacific railway, Grand Trunk Pacific railway and Canadian Northern railway will be ruined.

Now, I am sure, Sir, that these hon. gentlemen are not ignorant of the fact that the Canadian Pacific railway already has lines to the international boundary, that J. J. Hill has at least two lines running into our western country, and, they are already carrying south thousands of tons of freight to the great benefit of the west, as well as bringing freight from the south into our country, and they know that as soon as it is possible for them to do so the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and Canadian Northern railway will have lines to the boundary as well.

The hon. the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) told us in his excellent speech on this question that over 20,000,000 bushels of wheat went south from Port Arthur and Fort William alone, in bond for shipment to Europe through United States ports, and while I am speaking of wheat let me ask if when the time had come, when it was imperative for the United States to have our wheat, could we prevent their government from taking off the duty? Manifestly not, and the same condition would have applied in that case, as will apply if this agreement is carried out so far as wheat and our east and west transportation lines are concerned.

Now, Sir, if these predictions of ruin were well founded one would think that the railways which are so vitally interested would be alarmed, but what do we see? Never in the history of this country has there been such great activity in railway building, and the securities and credit of the railways are on a higher plane than ever before. Does this show alarm on the part of the railway companies, or on that of the investing public? I submit that it does not, and that argument of hon. gentlemen opposite falls to the ground. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, wheat, or any other kind of freight, of this country, or any country, has always, and will continue to follow the line of least resistance; it has gone by the route that affords the lowest rates. That, Sir, is what has enabled the port of Montreal to capture the wheat shipments from the great port of New York, and the lowering of the tariff will not affect this business in the slightest.

I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite that were they in power would they follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, (Mr. Ames) and further tax the western farmer by putting an export duty on wheat for the benefit of our railways?

The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) in his remarks on this question some days ago, gave us some very interesting figures showing the progress of this country since confederation, progress which we, as Canadians, may be justly proud of. But, Mr. Chairman, let me analyse these figures very briefly. The hon the leader of the opposition in making his comparison takes the figures for the years 1868 and 1910, and to be brief I only propose to take the figures relating to the exports of agricultural products. I take this particular branch of our exports because it is the greatest, and of most interest to the large majority of our people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in 1868 the value of our exports of agricultural products was, taking the figures of the hon. the leader of the opposition, $13,000,000. In the year 1896, $14,083,000, an increase of a little over $1,000,000 in 28 years. In 1910, after this government had been in power 14 years, the exports of agricultural products had increased to the enormous sum of $90,433,000, or an increase in the 14 years of $76,350,000. The increase in the other lines of export during the past 14 years, while not showing such a great expansion, yet are far ahead of the preceeding 28 years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, all this has happened since this government made a very material reduction in the tariff by the introduction of the British preference, a measure for which this country is deeply grateful to this government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said before, if all this great increase in the export business of this country can be accomplished, in a market 3,000 miles away, the possibilities of a market twice the size, and at our very doors are enormous, and I cannot see, Sir, where the danger is in reducing the tariff on natural products between the great republic to the south of us, and this country. It has been said many times in the course of this debate, but it will bear repeating that the Tariff Bill of 1879, brought down by the then Conservative government contained a clause providing for practically the same agreement as is proposed to-day, except that in some instances it went further than this one, and why, Mr. Chairman, is the policy of the Conservative party in all the years from 1879 to 1896 such rank heresy to-day when brought down by this government? It is the same policy that they supported and tried to get, but could not. I fancy I can hear these hon. gentlemen a couple of years from now, when this agreement shall be working to the great advantage of this country say: Oh, you have stolen our policy. I think I remember a similar remark made in regard to the first tariff of this government and granting for the sake of argument that such was the case, I am thankful, Sir, that we have had for the last 15 years, and still have a government able to apply that policy to the great advantage of this country, something the government of hon. gentlemen opposite were unable to do during their long term of office, if the trade returns of those days are correct, and I think they are. But hon. gentlemen opposite say times have changed, we have gone on and developed our country, and our trade relations, and are now able to stand alone. Why throw ourselves into the hands of the United States, for the end will surely be political absorption. Now, Sir, I cannot think that hon. gentlemen opposite really believe that the people of this country who stood the test for so many years,—as was eloquently pointed out by the hon. the Postmaster General in his remarks on this question a few days ago, are going to weaken in their loyalty to the mother land because the privilege of trading with their cousins to the south is extended. It is conceivable Mr. Chairman, that if that right was to be forever denied them, they might in the course of time become discontented and endeavour to gain by political union the markets they could not otherwise enjoy, but with this agreement in force the only possible incentive for promoting such a union is removed, and in place of leading to annexation this agreement will make for the prosperity of the people, and a prosperous and contented people are always loyal.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is very difficult for me to understand the position taken by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association on this question, and the violent opposition they are making against it. A year ago we saw their representatives here before the Banking and Commerce Committee urging very strongly what was for the large concerns, free trade in insurance, which they obtained. The farmer is obliged to buy his insurance in a protected market. At the present time, under the existing tariff, large quantities of raw materials are admitted free of duty for the benefit of these manufacturers, which I think wise and in the best interest of the country. Why do they object to allowing the farmer the privilege of selling the products of the farm in the great market to the south of us? Increased prosperity for the farmer means greater purchasing power, and must necessarily be to the benefit of the manufacturers as well. They are not hurt by this agreement, their protection has been maintained and it certainly seems to me that the course they are taking, and which will tend to antagonize the great farming population of this country, is a most short-sighted one. Mr. Chairman, the people of the county of Shefford, which I have the honour to represent in this House, are chiefly engaged in Agriculture. Now, Sir, what does this agreement mean to them? It means that the market for their butter, cheese, eggs, cattle, horses, sheep, swine, maple sugar and lumber is greatly increased, it opens a market near at hand, and better prices for their produce will result. But, more than that, Sir, and from my point of view, the greatest advantage that will accrue will be the stimulus which will be given to production. Having an assured market near at hand, our farmers will increase their production 25 or 50 per cent, which will make for their own prosperity and the general prosperity of this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite are making great efforts to prove that the result of this agreement will cause a reduction in the price of farm products. I contend the reverse to be the case, for the fact that we already ship large quantities of farm produce to the United States in spite of a high tariff, has helped to keep the price up here. In proof, Mr. Chairman, let me relate an incident which took place at a meeting of the Cowansville Dairy Board, in the county of Missisquoi, a short time ago. The head of the greatest exporting firm in Montreal of butter and cheese was present at that meeting, and during the course of his remarks in opposition to this proposed agreement, inadvertently made this statement: 'Why, gentlemen,' said he, 'had it not been for the export of cream to the United States during the past two seasons, the price of butter would have been two cents per pound lower here.' Too late he realized what he had said, and tried without success to make some other explanation; but it was a statement of plain fact, and known to be such by the large number of butter producers who were present.

There is one item of production, Sir, that will be greatly aided if this agreement is passed, and while not of such great importance as wheat, butter, or cheese, is still quite large and especially of importance to the eastern townships and province of Quebec. I refer to maple sugar and maple syrup. The reduction of the tariff from 4 cents per pound to 1 cent per pound is going to stimulate immensely the production, and will mean a great deal to our farmers. The market in this country is not nearly large enough to absorb all that can be produced, and the present duty of 4 cents per pound is almost prohibitive. The result is that thousands of maple trees are not tapped, and the farmer and the country lose the revenue that might easily be derived from them. And worse still in my opinion, Sir, is the fact that because there is no other revenue to be derived from these maple trees, they are being rapidly cut down and converted into firewood. This is a great economic loss, for besides the loss of the revenue that these trees could produce each year in sugar, there is the greater one of lesser rainfall, rapid evaporation of moisture and injury to our water-powers caused by the denudation of the land. It will thereby tend to preserve one of our natural resources which hon. gentlemen opposite are so worried about all at once, and should commend itself to them for that reason.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me say in conclusion that I have heard no substantial reason advanced why this proposal should not be ratified. It gives us three markets in place of two, and every interest of Canada is guarded. We are free to abrogate it at any time if we see fit. I am convinced that it will be of immense benefit, not only to the farmers, but to all classes in this country. We have made a good bargain, and this government will, I am sure, again have the confidence of the people of this country when the time comes for them to give expression of it by ballot.

On the motion of Mr. Stanfield the committee rose and reported progress.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 12.45 a.m. Tuesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TUESDAY, April 25, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 180) for the relief of Mary Kathleen Crittenden.—Mr. Rhodes.

Bill (No. 181) for the relief of Pauline Winslow Saunderson.—Mr. Carvell.

Bill (No. 182) for the relief of Nellie Bridgland Morrison.—Mr. Harris.

Bill (No. 183) for the relief of Frances Whittington Truesdell.—Mr. Smith (Nanaimo).

VICTORIA MUSEUM.

On the orders of the day being called:

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) to the promise which he made on April 20 with regard to the correspondence in reference to the foundation of the museum. I find in the 'Journal' of April 21:

Mr. PUGSLEY. As this is a matter of some importance, perhaps Col. Hughes will allow his question to stand, and I will make the necessary inquiry.

May I ask, did the contractor, or any one on behalf of the contractor, write to the Department of Public Works drawing their attention to the fact that this foundation was not adequate or that the situation required investigation in any way?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I expected to have the information to-day, but I was very busily engaged this morning otherwise than in my office, and I overlooked it. But, I will get the information for to-morrow.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the minister bring the letters down?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will bring down all the information.

RECIPROCITY AGREEMENT—MR. SEALEY'S AMENDMENT.

Mr. SEALEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I regret that I was unavoidably absent from the sitting of the House yesterday, owing to an engagement before the Railway Commission at Toronto.

where a matter of interest to my constituents was under consideration.

From the proceedings in parliament as reported in 'Hansard,' I notice that I was the innocent cause of considerable, and I regret to say acrimonious discussion, which arose out of a question of privilege raised by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), who called in question the validity of a report apearing in the Toronto 'Globe' of Monday as to an amendimg resolution of mine relating to the reciprocity agreement, and the discussion which ensued therefrom.

The hon. member for South Simcoe went out of his way to impute motives to me in regard to the proposition, which I had the honour to submit for the consideration of the committee, and I do not feel under any necessity whatever for disabusing the minds of the hon. gentlemen in that regard, being as I am, quite content to leave myself to the judgment of the House, and to that of the electors of Wentworth.

My one concern at the moment is to speak in the interest of truth, and of a clear understanding of the subject under review. I hold in my hand a carbon copy of the original amendment in the possession of the House, and it is exact in every particular with the original. I will read the amendment as I read it on Saturday morning before the Committee of the House, and as the chairman of the committee read it distinctly in the presence and hearing of the committee:

> Mr. Sealey moves in amendment to the resolution 'that it is expedient to amend the Customs Tariff, 1907.' That schedule A thereto be amended by striking out in lines seven and eight thereof the words 'onions, cabbage and all other vegetables in their natural state,' and in lines nine and ten thereof the words 'pears, peaches, grapes, berries, and all other edibles fruits in their natural state,' and in lines eleven and twelve thereof the words 'peaches, pears and apricots, dried, desiccated or evaporated,' and that the resolution as amended be adopted.

'Hansard' omitted the last line in the amendment. That is no affair of mine, the facts are precisely as stted by me at this moment, and I feel in doing as I did, that I voiced the opinions of the electors of Wentworth on the subject under review, and felt I had accomplished something for the cause, when six Conservatives stood up with me, and supported my amendment as read before the committee, in the early hours of Saturday morning——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SEALEY——and which was in the exact terms of the amendment read by the chairman of the committee before the vote was taken.

Mr. SEALEY

WAYS AND MEANS — RECIPROCITY AGREEMENT—MR. SEALEY'S AMENDMENT.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House again go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BLAIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct the attention of the House, since my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. Sealey) has felt it to be his duty to say something upon the matter, to the subject that was up for discussion last night. I have been making an effort, Mr. Speaker, to find out if it was possible for a member to trace the original documents of this house with any degree of accuracy in the interest of the discussion of public questions. I have here the original resolution sent by the hon. member for Wentworth to the chairman. It is stated that this is the resolution. This resolution was sent by the hon. member for Wentworth to the chairman of the committee, some parts of it were read, other parts were struck out after having been sent back by the chairman to the member for Wentworth, it was then returned to the chairman, a portion of it was read again, it was subsequently put to the committee for the vote, the vote was taken, a number standing up for and a number against, and the motion was declared lost. This resolution passed through all these stages and there is no signature or initial of anybody in charge of this document to be found on the resolution. I have a right, Mr. Speaker, and I propose to put my own construction upon it whether it is the original document or not.

Mr. TALBOT. What signature do you want?

Mr. BLAIN. All I want is fair play when a matter of this kind comes up. Here is a supposed resolution to amend a very important international matter that is up for discussion in this House. This resolution was debated, this resolution was returned to the member who moved it, it was subsequently put to the committee by the chairman, or some portions of it, I say, members on both sides stood up for and against it, it was declared lost by the chairman and not one sign of any initial is put upon that document so that any man in this House can trace it and ascertain if it is the original document. That is a matter that should receive some attention by the government.

Mr. HUGHES. How does it compare with 'Hansard'?

Mr. BLAIN. It does not compare with 'Hansard' at all. The very words which caused an acrimonious discussion in this House were left out altogether from 'Hansard' who took the motion down as it was read. The hon. member for Wentworth has his own rights here, he has made his statement; I make mine, and again I say it without any fear of successful contradiction that the words which my hon. friend has read out this afternoon were never read by any man during the discussion.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to say that if the words that the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey) read out were in the resolution it would be the duty of the chairman to rule the resolution out of order because it would not be a regular resolution. The resolution has been moved by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), and the member for Wentworth had no right to move such a resolution. Only a member of the government had that right, it was moved by the Minister of Finance and any motion proposed by any member of this House must be an amendment to that resolution. The question put is whether that amendment shall be adopted, and not whether the original resolution as amended shall be adopted. If the amendment is carried in the affirmative, the following question is, shall the resolution as amended be adopted? That is the proper procedure, and it would have been the duty of the chairman, if the motion had contained those words, to have ruled it out of order or to draw the hon. member's attention to it before it was put. I was here listening attentively to the discussion all the time, and I say most positively that those words were never read out by the chairman or by the hon. member for Wentworth either.

Mr. FISHER. I was not here last evening when this discussion arose, and unfortunately I did not hear what the hon. member for Wentworth said. I have no doubt that my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is perfectly sincere in what he says now; but I was sitting here at the same time that he was sitting there, and I went forward and took notice of the motion with the Deputy Speaker when he was trying to make out its exact wording, and my positive recollection is that the hon. member for Wentworth did read those words, and that the Deputy Speaker did read those words, and I noticed the way in which the words were in the document. It was a typewritten document. The first part of it was left as written, then there was an erasure of four or five lines, then the words in question were left, and not erased, and below them there was another erasure; but certainly I saw those words in the document, and my recollection is just as positive as that of the hon. member for East Grey that they were read by both the hon. member for Wentworth, and the chairman.

Mr. SPROULE. Let me ask the hon. gentleman one question. As the minister of the Crown whose duty it was to see that the work of the House was carried on regularly, would he not have called attention to the fact that no private member could make that motion? He was on his feet to debate the question whether the motion proposed a tax on the people or not. That was the question engaging his attention at the time he looked over the resolution. But with regard to the other question, I want to ask him, as a member of the cabinet, and an old member of parliament, would he be doing his duty, as the leader of the government side of the House at the time, to allow that resolution to be put in the form in which it was?

Mr. FISHER. I consider that an open question. I am not prepared to give an opinion off-hand whether that motion, with those words in, was in order or not. I left that matter in the hands of the Deputy Speaker, who was perfectly competent to deal with it.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. minister say that any private member could make a motion of that kind?

Mr. FISHER. The question is not whether those words were in the motion or not, and other things point to the fact that the words were read, and were in the motion voted on by the committee. I do not myself consider that it is of very great consequence whether they were there or not. Hon. gentlemen are taking to heart a matter which is not of very great consequence; but, of course, it is their privilege to do so if they wish.

Mr. HUGHES. There is a much more important question than that of whether the words were read or not read. The question is: Is it possible to have a resolution pass this House without the signature of the chairman, or the officer in charge being endorsed on it. I have a proper recollection of history, one of the main clauses of the Bill of Rights was to the effect that no resolution or Bill should be passed or amended in any way without having therein the endorsation of the chairman. I want to know why that was not done in this case, or is this thing trumped up to get some of our friends on the other side out of a little difficulty? I would like to ask the chairman of committees, why his endorsation was not on that resolution?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I will very willingly answer the hon. gentleman. When a resolution or a Bill is carried, the chairman signs the resolution or the Bill with his full name. As a Bill passes in committee, he initials each section of the Bill as it passes; but an amendment submitted in writing on a piece of paper handed to the chairman, and declared lost after a debate and division, has never been, as far as I know, initialled or marked in any way. I do not know what the custom was previous to my time. I have never initialled or put my name upon an amendment that was defeated. In this case I left the amendment after it was defeated, with the deputy clerk of the House. As I stated before, I never saw it again until I saw it in the hands of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain).

Mr. LENNOX. We had a very full discussion of this matter last night, and I do not propose to discuss it again at this time. I stated last night exactly what I knew to be true. I have since had time to consider, and I wish to be understood as repeating what I said last night, that those words were never read in this House either by the Deputy Speaker, by the hon. gentleman who proposed the motion, or by anybody else, and that is about as much as I have to say in reference to it. But while on my feet I wish to reply to the Minister of Agriculture when he says that everything points in the way of his contention. If he will take the trouble to read 'Hansard' not only will they find that the resolution as recorded by 'Hansard', and which is supposed prima facie to be true, is contrary to what he says is the way in which it points; but he will find also that the hon. member for Wentworth distinctly stated after he had moved the resolution, and after he had handed it in, and after he amended it, that he proposed at a subsequent time to move a resolution in the line of restoring meat products to the same position that they were in before. And the Minister of Agriculture, I suppose, will appreciate that if he were adopting the Fielding resolution in all particulars except as regards the amendment then presented to the House, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sealey) would have an opportunity at a latter stage of moving any other amendment as he indicated he would.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It seems to me that it is now time we ought to put an end to what I think is an unseemly incident. The question is whether or not the motion moved on Saturday morning was put in a certain way or in a certain other way. Men of honour in this House have a different version of it. My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule), whose honour I would trust in anything—except in politics—says that the words in question were not read, and my friend, the Deputy Speaker, says he read them, and there it is. The instance is related of Sir Walter Raleigh, that when in the zenith of his power, he had undertaken to write a history of the world by way of amusement, and something happened in the yard outside his window, and he and two of his friends went to see what was going on, but when they returned not one of them could give the same version of what had taken place before their very eyes. It seems to me this is a somewhat similar case. It is evident it was two o'clock in the morning; people were tired, perhaps a little angry; their memory is confused about what took place. Let us understand that the members on the other side of the House did not want to vote for reciprocity in any way or shape. I am sorry I cannot pay them the compliment that they voted for it even in error. They did not vote for it, and that is all there is about it, and it does not matter what actually passed. We have their testimony that they did not want to vote in any way, shape or form, for reciprocity, and that ought to be sufficient.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I had not the advantage of being present when the incident took place last night, nor was I present when the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey) made his motion. If the hon. gentleman made the motion in the shape contended for by hon. gentlemen opposite he must have made it with the express object of its being defeated; there is no doubt about that. I may say that I have had the advantage of being present in this House, I think, for sixteen sessions, and I never before saw a motion of that kind made—a motion that the resolution should be amended, and coupled with that in the same motion, that the resolution, as amended, should be adopted. I cannot remember that such a motion was ever proposed in this House, unless it was proposed on this ocassion by the hon. member for Wentworth. And if he proposed it in that way, he proposed it with the object of cutting out his further amendment, because that is the effect it would have had. And what would have been the result if that motion as said to have been proposed by him had been carried? It would have prevented every other hon. member in this House from moving any amendment whatever, and if it carried it would also have the effect of shutting off any further debate in committee, because the whole debate would have been at an end, the chairman would have reported the resolution, and the House would have proceeded to another stage. I would suppose it would be perfectly obvious that the hon. member for Wentworth did not intend that. If he did intend that, then he intended a certain kind of a game which would not place him in a very high position before his constituents. The motion alleged to have been made was out of order, for two reasons: In the first place, you could not combine these two motions in one, and in the second place, the motion that the resolution as amended should carry, could only be proposed by a minister of the Crown. Therefore, so far as the question of order is concerned, I think it is perfectly plain that if the resolution was put in that way, the Deputy Speaker had not sufficiently regarded the rules of the House in that respect when he accepted it. But, as the Prime Minister says, it is perfectly clear that hon. gentlemen on this side who voted on that motion voted in the belief that no such proposal was included in it. There can be no doubt about that. I am not going into any discussion of the facts. The 'Hansard' reporter understood the motion in the same way that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House understood it, and it has been so recorded. At the same time, I am willing to admit that gentlemen in the Press Gallery, and gentlemen on the other side of the House, are perfectly sincere in their statements with regard to the matter. I agree entirely with what the Prime Minister said as to the difficulty of obtaining two similar accounts of the same incident from half a dozen people within half an hour after they have witnessed that incident.

Mr. SEALEY. As to the genuineness of the original document, I have it here as handed to me by Mr. Blain, and I recognize it as genuine by reason of the erasures, and further by reason of its being an exact copy of this carbon that I hold in my hand and that has not been out of my possession yet, and especially by reason of an error in spelling. As to the reference that I could not have intended the resolution to be adopted as amended, because I could not have proposed my further amendment, I wish to say that I did not intend to make a further amendment to the resolution. I intended to deal with the hog question later ; I intended to deal with it on the lines of quarantine and more rigid inspection and exclusion, and I was prompted to that course by a statement which appeared in a newspaper dated from Ottawa, August 19, and which says :

A disease suspiciously like cholera has been discovered around Ottawa. Forty-three animals have been destroyed by order of Dr. Rutherford, Chief Dominion Veterinarian, and five other herds are under quarantine. Dr. Rutherford attributes the outbreak to the practice of feeding hogs about Ottawa on garbage gathered in the city, and thinks the disease may have originated from Ottawa hogs being fed on scraps of American pork.

I proposed, through the health authorities to cut out American pork to a very considerable extent and improve the situation in this way.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I quite agree with the Prime Minister, and also with the leader of the opposition, that so far as the House is concerned this incident may very well be regarded as closed, but it does seem to me that we have still a duty to perform to a gentleman who occupies a position in the press gallery, and who has been attacked in the severest possible manner by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and also by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox). The hon. member for East Grey stated that that reporter had been guilty of uttering a libel and he said that he was both a liar and a libeller.

Mr. SPROULE. And I repeat it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think you will agree with me that if the amendment was actually moved by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey), with the words in it which he says were in it, and if it was read by the Deputy Speaker with the words in it which he says were in it when he read the amendment, and if the reporter of the 'Globe' heard these words and he honestly sent his report to the newspaper which he represents, I think my hon. friend upon reflection will agree that that young man was simply discharging his duty. He could not and he would not be supposed to consider as to whether or not the members of the opposition knew or did not know what they were voting for. He would have been guilty of great impropriety if he had placed an interpretation upon their vote.

Mr. LENNOX. He did put an interpretation upon it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It was his duty to report the amendment as he understood it. It seems to me that if it were possible that there could be an investigation held or that this young man would have an opportunity of appearing before a committee and giving evidence and calling other gentlemen who were in the press gallery, representatives of Liberal and Conservative newspapers alike, it would be only fair to that gentleman. The matter is a serious one to this young gentleman. I realize it very strongly because early in life I had the advantage of occupying a seat in the press gallery myself, and I know how very great an injury may be done to a young man by a member of this House speaking with all the responsibility attaching to the position of a member of parliament. I would ask whether my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule), or my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden), might not consider that it would be possible to afford this young man the opportunity of having the matter investigated under oath.

While on my feet, let me call attention to a statement made by an hon. gentleman opposite who said that the 'Hansard' reporter did not understand the amendment to have in it the words which the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey), said were in it.

Mr. LENNOX. Nobody on this side said that. No one here said how the 'Hansard' reporter understood the amendment, but simply said what was contained in 'Hansard' and nothing else.

Mr PUGSLEY. In order to show how 'Hansard' did understand it and correct any wrong impression which hon. gentlemen opposite are labouring under, let me read a letter sent by the chief reporter and addressed to the Deputy Speaker :

Dear Mr. McIntyre,—The whole explanation of the omission from 'Hansard' of the words, 'And that the resolution as amended be adopted,' at the end of Mr. Sealey's amendment is that though they appeared in the copy as sent from this office to the Printing Bureau, the printers, evidently by inadvertence, omitter them.

The copy as sent to the Printing Bureau is in this office, and will bear out this statement. So the error was one, not of the reporters, but of the printers.

Yours very truly,
ALBERT HORTON,
Chief Reporter.

Will you permit me to read also a letter written by the young gentleman who sent this report to the 'Globe':

Press Gallery, April 25, 1911.

Dear Sir,—From the shelter of parliamentary privilege, certain members of the House last night attacked me from their places, charging that I had made a distorted and wilfully dishonest report of the proceedings at the close of Friday's sitting.

With the political consistency or inconsistency of the gentlemen concerned, or with their understanding of the amendment, I have nothing to do. But I am concerned as to the accuracy of the report, and the recriminations made upon my honour as a newspaper man. Dr. Sproule stated concerning the clause reported by me as having been read to the House prior to the taking of the vote: 'I say positively that they—the words of the clause in question—were not read out, and the man——

Mr. SPROULE. I rise to a point of order. Has any member any right to bring from the outside a letter or an article reflecting upon or calling into question any statement made in this House? I ask the ruling of the Chair?

Mr. SPEAKER. It is a well known practice that no member can be contradicted by a statement from the outside.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This letter will be found entirely within the rules.

Mr. SPROULE. I object entirely to the reading of that letter as improper.

Mr. SPEAKER. There are older members in the House than myself and they will bear me out when I say that the custom of parliament, is that the statement of a member cannot be contradicted by anything coming from the outside.

Mr. PUGSLEY. When I read the letter, Sir, you will see——

Mr. SPROULE. No member has the right to bring from the outside a letter or an article impugning a statement made in this House. I would refer to Erskine, May, Bourinot's Parliamentary Companion, and Todd's Parliamentary Practice.

Mr. PUGSLEY. You cannot, Mr. Speaker, determine whether this letter contains any reflection on any statement made by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) until you hear it read. These are the words quoted——

Mr. SPROULE. I object to the quotation. I am within my rights and am borne out by the best parliamentary authorities, and I ask the decision of the Chair before the hon. minister is allowed to read that letter.

Mr. SPEAKER. I presume that a mere statement without allusion to what has been said in the House might be allowed, but it cannot be allowed in contradiction of any hon. member.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I propose to show——

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a point of order. The minister has already in that letter impugned correctness of a statement made by an hon. member and, therefore, under the rules of parliament, and your ruling, Mr. Speaker, he is obliged to withdraw the whole letter.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Let me say that I had not got to any part of the letter which disputes the statement of any hon. member. I was simply reading from the letter what had occurred. Let me read it again.

Mr. SPROULE. I stand on my rights as a member of parliament, and object to the reading of that letter. Until the rule of parliament is altered, it cannot be read.

Mr. SPEAKER. Unless the letter is read I cannot tell whether it reflects on any statement made in this House or not.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not agree with your Honour. When a document of this kind is presented to the House, the right hon. the Prime Minister ought to have some control over his colleague the Minister of Public Works and prevent procedure which will convert the House into a very disorderly body. If this letter is proper to be read, it should be read. If it is not, the minister should not read it. What is done in the British parliament is this. The letter is submitted to the Speaker, and he comes to a conclusion about it, and thus they avoid scenes of disorder such as this promoted by a minister of the Crown. The way to decide whether this is a letter the reading of which is allowed by parliamentary procedure is to hand it to the Speaker, and let him read it, and then give his decision. But the way to do is to submit the letter to the Speaker, and not read it out piecemeal as the Minister of Public Works is trying to do.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I was endeavouring to read it right along, but the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), backed up by gentlemen who tried to howl me down, prevented me from doing so. Perhaps I should withdraw the words 'howl down,' and I would substitute 'prevent me from reading the letter.'

Mr. NORTHRUP. I rise to a point of order. Sitting in my place in this House, I heard the Minister of Public Works read from a document which he said was a letter from an outsider, and, in that document, the writer referred to a member of this House as speaking under the shelter of his privilege as a member. I find that the following is laid down in Bourinot as to what the rights of a member are in regard to such documents. I refer to page 460:

> Nor is it in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or other communications, whether printed or written, emanating from persons outside the House, and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member, or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that when this letter is read you will say it is a reflection——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) was listened to with great respect when he spoke. Why should not the same courtesy be accorded to me? Why, as the hon. leader of the opposition has said, convert this parliament into a bear garden?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What I was going to say is that, when the letter is read, you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that it does not reflect upon any member of the House.

Mr. BLAIN. Hand it to the Speaker

Mr. PUGSLEY. It states what the young man heard from his place in the gallery; that is all.

Mr. BLAIN. That won't do. What was the letter written for?

Mr. PUGSLEY. To put this young man's position fairly——

Mr. BLAIN. It was to contradict a member of this House.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This young man had been called a liar and a libeller and surely he has a right to state his reasons why——

Mr. HUGHES. Won't the 'Globe' publish his letter?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is better it should be read here.

Mr. HUGHES. No, let the 'Globe' publish it.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to say a word on the point of order. You, Mr. Speaker, have already given a ruling on what you have heard of the letter read. The quotation which my hon. friend from East Hastings read is clear and inclusive. It certainly includes that letter—I will leave that to the Prime Minister himself; I do not see how there can be the least doubt about it. What protection will a member have under the rules of the House if the member who wishes to make an attack upon him is to be the judge of whether a letter is to be read or not, and shall read it all before the Speaker gives his decision as to the letter? That is the whole point of view. If my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works wishes to relieve himself from the odium of seeking to introduce disorder into this House, he will not insist on reading that letter, but will send it to the Speaker and let the Speaker decide. I do not think there is any other way of doing it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will take my hon. friend's (Mr. Foster's) suggestion, and send the letter to the Speaker. If Mr. Speaker decides against the admissibility of the letter, well and good.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The rule is well known to be as stated by my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) a moment ago, that whatever is said by a member of the House cannot be contradicted from outside, even if it is not true. But one would expect that when an hon. member has made a charge against a man outside the House and finds afterwards that charge is unfounded, or at all events that there is cause to believe that it was not exactly accurate, he would think it his duty —that would be for him to consider—to withdraw the offensive words.

Mr. LANCASTER. The Prime Minister, it seems to me, entirely misapprehended this matter; he has got it upside down. The charge is made by the 'Globe'—'Conservatives vote for reciprocity.'——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No.

Mr. LANCASTER. Why, here is the statement in this paper that I hold up, And the members are named in the article.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question of order had better be settled——

Mr. LANCASTER. I am only answering the Prime Minister, who misapprehends the case, and thinks that the charge is made against this gentleman instead of against members of this House by the 'Globe.'

Mr. SPEAKER. Perhaps the House will allow me to read Bourinot on this point——

Nor is it in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or other communications, whether printed or written, emanating from persons outside of the House, and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the House.

During a debate on the tariff in the session of 1877, Mr. Mills referred to the opinions of Sir Alexander Galt, formerly a member and Minister of Finance, subsequently one of the Canadian papers published a letter from Sir Alexander in answer to some of Mr. Mills' remarks; and the latter rose and proposed reading from the paper in question; but the Speaker interrupted him and questioned the propriety of his course—a decision entirely in accordance with the English rules of debate.

Therefore, this letter cannot be read.

Mr. TURRIFF. I was in the House on Friday night, and distinctly heard the resolution read as the Deputy Speaker states he read it, and within two or three minutes after it was read I was discussing it with the hon. the Minister of Agriculture and pointing out that all the members on the other side of the House who were present, except the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker), had voted for reciprocity except in vegetables and fruit.

Mr. BLAIN. How did my hon. friend vote?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Order. Question.

Mr. BLAIN. I would ask my hon. friend what his position was. If the hon. gentlemen on this side voted for it, did the hon. member himself vote against it?

Mr. TURRIFF. Yes.

Mr. BLAIN. Against reciprocity?

Mr. TURRIFF. Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. TURRIFF. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HENDERSON. Come over with us.

Mr. TURRIFF. There is not a large enough proportion of members on the other side of the House who size up with the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), to allow any one from this side of the House to go over with them. My hon. friend opposite asks what was my position. I voted against the resolution of the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey), simply because I am in favour of reciprocity in everything, including vegetables and fruit. That was the reason why I voted against the amendment.

Mr. LANCASTER. Since the Minister of Public Works and the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), will not take the advice of the Prime Minister and let this matter drop, one or two of us who did not happen to be in the House at that early hour on Saturday morning, had perhaps say how we view this matter from a fair and independent standpoint. It is manifest from what the hon. member said just now that he himself does not know how he voted on that occasion. It is also evident that if the Prime Minister is to be overruled,in the wise suggestion he made half an hour ago, by his supporters, led by the Minister of Public Works, then on every resolution coming up in this House, hon. members opposite are going to differ with each other just as the hon. member who has just spoken and the member for Wentworth differ as to the effect of the resolution for and against which they voted. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works have this matter entirely upside down. They are undertaking to defend a newspaper man who, under the privilege of sitting in the gallery, misrepresented entirely a vote given by hon. members on this side and they are seeking to continue that misrepresentation by saying that hon. members who put him right are to be attacked in this House and their veracity inpugned. I am quite impartial, I was not in the House, and I am more fair than the Minister of Public Works has been in attempting to read an article which he knew in his heart the Speaker would not allow him to read if he saw it first, in attempting to get a letter on 'Hansard' which he knew, and the Prime Minister knew, as soon as it was shown to him, should not be read and which you, Mr. Speaker, declared should not be read. The Minister of Public Works, with his usual astuteness, must have known that it was improper to read the letter.

What are the merits of the case? I am interested in upholding the honour of every man in the press gallery as well as in the House. I am not going to say that because a gentleman in the press gallery has no rights on the floor of the House he should be ill-treated, and there is no member who will go further to protect a person who is not able to protect himself than I; I would go further than the Minister of Public Works would go; but when an hon. gentleman sitting in the press gallery under the privilege of this House, and by virtue of that privilege only, undertakes to say upon the front page of a newspaper what has been proved here by the hon. members referred to, to be absolutely untrue——

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. LANCASTER. Yes, proved here, by the hon. members whose words go here in this House, I repeat, whose words go in this House, as the Prime Minister said they must go——

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. LANCASTER—who voted upon that resolution as read by the chairman. These matters are not in dispute. I have listened to what has been said pro and con. I have thought it all over and I am in the position of an absolutely impartial judge in the matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LANCASTER. I am not like the Minister of Public Works who voted against reciprocity, according to his own argument in the House to-day, when he says that these hon. gentlemen voted for reciprocity, who tries to assist a gentleman in the press gallery who made a mistake, who for the most contemptible kind of party capital—

Mr. PUGSLEY. He made no mistake.

Mr. LANCASTER. —as the 'Globe' has been doing since it has found how the people look on this matter, trying to find some way to say that the Conservative party is not a unit on this subject—that newspaper man printed on the front page: Conservatives vote for reciprocity. These members say they voted for nothing of the kind. The record of 'Hansard' is behind these hon. gentlemen, it gives the resolution as these hon. members say it was read, but the Minister of Public Works has, I do not say the audacity—

Mr. PUGSLEY. Say it?

Mr. LANCASTER. —it would not be in order, but the extreme assurance, under the pretext of trying to do justice to a gentleman in the press gallery, to permit that gentleman to reiterate what has been proved upon the floor of this House to be absolutely untrue.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. LANCASTER. That is the position the matter is in to-day. I do not think the Prime Minister can expect that there is going to be very good order in this House when the Minister of Public Works and those behind him will not obey him when he gives an order as to the time when a discussion should cease. The Prime Minister tried to be fair, and if he had control of his party he would have succeeded in being fair. But evidently in anything that relates to reciprocity there is trouble among hon. gentlemen opposite. The Prime Minister, if he had not been impotent, would have succeeded in being fair and his party behind him would have realized the sense and wisdom of what he was saying, and would have let the matter rest with the statement of the hon. members, who ought to know what they voted for better than the Minister of Public Works or the member for Assiniboia. The Prime Minister pointed out that the statements of these hon. gentlemen must be taken.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. LANCASTER. What was read is what they voted upon. It is quite unfair of the Minister of Public Works to pretend that these hon. gentlemen should have known exactly what was in the resolution, except from the chairman reading it. How many copies of the resolution were there? Only one copy in the hands of the chairman, no man in the House is able to know what he is voting for except from the lips of the chairman. Whose duty was it to record that? The gentleman reporting for 'Hansard' who recorded the words as these hon. gentlemen say. The evidence is overwhelmingly in favour of the statements of the members for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), East Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), and Peel (Mr. Blain).

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did not say that the Conservative members who voted for this amendment know what it contained. What I said was that the reporter of the 'Globe' knew what it contained, and sent a correct report.

Mr. LANCASTER. The Minister of Public Works, knowing that the statement made by the 'Globe,' by all parliamentary usage and by overwhelming weight of evidence also, is untrue.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, it is not.

Mr. LANCASTER. Absolutely untrue. A motion is put before the chairman, the chairman reads it, no one else has a word or a letter of it before him. The chairman read it and, as hon. gentlemen opposite did, the hon. gentlemen on this side voted. I am not going to make any suggestions that I know nothing about, but I am going to say that there is just as much reason for saying that that motion now produced is not the one which was before the Chair as for saying that it is. There is no ear mark on it. There is not a single item of identification, and there is no way of telling whether it should be accepted as the one which was before the Chair. The 'Hansard' report indicates that it is not the resolution. The statement of the hon. gentleman who voted in regard to it indicates that it is not, and the speech of the hon. member for Wentworth shows that in his opinion it is not. In addition to that we have the fact that the hon. gentleman went on to say that later on he would move in regard to hog products. If the Minister of Public Works or anybody else in this House undertakes at any time during this session or any other session to say that the Conservative party voted for reciprocity, and if any newspaper maligns or misrepresents members of this House in that regard, I am going to produce the evidence to show that the statement is overwhelmingly proved to be untrue. The minister does not care anything about the rights of these hon. gentlemen who are sitting around me here, and he has endeavoured to prove what the evidence overwhelmingly shows is not correct. He has argued that a member of the press gallery had a right to make the statement that he did in regard to this matter. How does a member of the press gallery know what was before the chairman? Has there been collusion or connivance here? How does a member of the press gallery know better than I do what was before the chairman? Will the minister tell me?

Mr. PUGSLEY. A member of the press gallery is attending here all through the sitting, he is immediately over the Deputy Speaker and he can hear——

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. HUGHES. I draw the attention of the House to the fact that the Minister of Public Works has spoken at least seventeen times on this question already.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is not a point of order.

Mr. HUGHES. That is not a point of order? I say the Minister of Public Works is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Lancaster) has the floor, if he wishes to continue.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara is asking me a question.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the House is anxious that its dignity should be maintained it will allow the discussion to proceed.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara asked me a question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. HUGHES. No he did not.

Mr. LANCASTER. I was proceeding to say, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara asked me a question.

Mr. LANCASTER. It is quite manifest that I am anxious to have the House keep order as well as I can, and it is also quite manifest that the Minister of Public Works stands in such a position that the House does not want to hear him answer questions or say anything more. Personally, I would not care, but I am anxious to see that proper order is maintained in the House. I was proceeding to say the Minister of Public Works is outside of the facts entirely when he announces that a member of the press gallery could tell what was in the chairman's hands. A member of the press gallery would have to have a telescope and a pretty long one before he would be able to read a resolution that lay on the desk of the chairman.

Mr. PUGSLEY. But he could hear the chairman read it.

Mr. LANCASTER. There is the unfairness again of the Minister of Public Works. He could hear! Did not the hon. member for Peel hear, did not the hon. member for South Simcoe hear, did not the hon. member for East Grey hear, and did not every hon. member who voted upon this question hear? Does the Minister of Public Works mean to tell me again, notwithstanding the lecture that he received from the Prime Minister with regard to this——

Mr. McLEAN (Huron). Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. LANCASTER. I am talking to people who believe in British institutions, who think that the parliament of Great Britain and the members of the parliament of Great Britain amount to something. I am not talking to gentlemen who say: What has Great Britain done for us? I have too much respect for the mother of parliaments to listen to the interruptions of gentlemen who say: What has Great Britain done for us? I am proceeding to show how this strikes me. I was not in the House on that occasion, but I have gathered the information on which to form a judgment from the undisputed facts. That resolution is read and the Minister of Public Works is not ashamed to intimate that the word of a member of the press gallery should be taken about what he heard read rather than the word of any of the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who voted upon the question.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What about hon. gentlemen on this side?

Mr. LANCASTER. An hon. gentleman on that side of the House says that he does not know how he voted, he says that he voted for reciprocity, and afterwards that he voted against reciprocity. I do not know what happened after that. I do say that there is some reason for supposing, according to the argument of the hon. Minister of Public Works, that there has been an undue interference with the document that is before the House on this occasion. I have a great deal more right for saying that than the minister has for saying that the hon. gentleman who voted upon this question did not vote exactly as they say they did. How is a vote taken either in this House or in the Railway Committee when the motion has not been previously printed and distributed? We simply vote on the resolution as we hear the chairman read it. Supposing that these hon. gentlemen did not hear these words read—I do not believe they were in there—but supposing they were in there, and were not read, or were read in such a tone of voice that hon. gentlemen did not hear them, would the Minister of Public Works think he was justified in saying that he did vote for them because he did not hear them? Does the Minister of Public Works vote for something that he does not hear?

Mr. PUGSLEY. How would the reporter in the press gallery know if he did not hear them?

Mr. LANCASTER. Does he vote for things that somebody else hears in the press gallery, or does he vote for what he hears himself? Let him put himself in the same position, and we can prove by half a dozen members of the press gallery that something has been said in the House that the minister did not hear. The hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) never hears anything in this House, and is the Minister of Justice to be bound by anything that he does not hear? The Minister of Public Works has shown a desire to make as much trouble as he can over this matter, although he knows that he is wrong upon it. He must know that he is wrong when he says that the Conservative members can be accused of voting for such an outrageous proposition as reciprocity, that every one of them, in able and convincing speeches, has spoken and argued against. The hon. gentleman knows that the country is behind them, and he knows that the 'Globe' newspaper has its emissaries in almost every county in Canada trying to get the members of the party to agree to support this agreement which has been opposed by three prominent members of the party. We have heard the statement of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) that he is both for and against reciprocity, and that he does not know which way he has voted.

Mr. TURRIFF. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lancaster) has no right to state in this House——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. TURRIFF—that I did not know which way I was voting, or how I was voting. I know just as well as my hon. friend knows.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. TURRIFF—and I say that I voted against that resolution because I was in favour of the whole.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the House will follow the usual custom of allowing a member to speak to a point of order.

Mr. TURRIFF. The hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara has misrepresented me all through, and I object to being misrepresented. I am in favour of reciprocity, and I voted against that resolution because it was not fully in favour of the reciprocity agreement that is before the House. I object to being misrepresented.

Mr. LANCASTER. I will try once more to help the hon. gentleman understand what he is voting for.

Mr. TURRIFF. You do not need to; help yourself.

Mr. LANCASTER. The 'Globe' newspaper——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lancaster) must accept the statement of the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. LANCASTER. I do not know which way he voted.

Mr. SPEAKER. A member's statement is generally accepted.

Mr. LANCASTER. If the statement shows which way he voted I am bound to accept it. Will the hon. gentleman now state which way he voted?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on; go on.

Mr. LANCASTER. I cannot accept both because they are absolutely contradictory. I am pointing out that this 'Globe' newspaper undertakes to say that the hon. gentleman who voted for that resolution voted for reciprocity. I am going to leave this with the Minister of Public Works, and the rest of them to find out amongst themselves how they can say, if that 'Globe' newspaper statement is right, that those who voted against the resolution did not vote against reciprocity. You would think that the 'Globe' should know enough to know that when a man votes against such a motion he votes against reciprocity, if, when he votes for the motion he votes for reciprocity. Therefore, 22 of the gentlemen on the other side of the House must have voted against reciprocity, or else they have to agree with me, and disagree with the Minister of Public Works, that the man in the press gallery who wrote that statement ought to be called before the bar of the House and punished, instead of being defended by the Minister of Public Works. That is the way I leave it with the hon. gentlemen opposite.

ST. GEORGE'S DAY—FLYING THE FLAG.

Mr. HUGHES. If I can get the attention of the Minister of Public Works, I desire to ask what steps he had taken, in accordance with his promise made yesterday, to ascertain why St. George's flag was not flying on St. George's day? Also, what steps does the hon. gentleman intend to take to see to it that the officials of his department look after this matter of flying the flag which was neglected both on St. David's day and on St. George's day.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Was the flag not flying from the post office?

Mr. HUGHES. I am speaking of the parliament buildings?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have not had an opportunity of inquiring. If the flag did not fly from the parliament buildings on Sunday, I should think it right, because the flag is supposed to fly when parliament is in session. I think that is the rule that would guide the caretaker, and unless he had special orders he would not fly the flag from the parliament buildings except when parliament is sitting, because the flying of the flag is the sign to all the world that parliament is then in session.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to ask, then, why the Minister of Public Works did not issue special orders to have the flag flying from the buildings on Sunday? I did not see the flag floating from the post office, nor do I find any of the members near me who saw it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It should have flown.

Mr. HUGHES. The minister promised——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. HUGHES. But the minister promised——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has a right to ask a question, but there is the regular way to do that, as he knows.

Mr. HUGHES. I am asking why the Minister of Public Works has not carried out his promise and furnished an answer to the question I asked yesterday?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did not promise to give an answer to-day. I cannot do everything at once. I will get the information as soon as possible.

PRINTING BUREAU.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings). Before you leave the chair , Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few observations about the management, or rather mismanagement, of the Printing Bureau, and I shall conclude my remarks with a motion. I must confess some embarrassment in bringing this matter before the House, for two reasons. The first reason is that I feel that no one can read the evidence taken before the Public Accounts Committee and the evidence taken in the trifling, abortive inquiry made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Murphy), without, as a Canadian, feeling deeply humiliated that such an augean stable as the Printing Bureau can be found among the departments of the government of Canada in this twentieth century. And, Sir, bad as it is to have such an augean stable as that Printing Bureau has been proved to be, amongst the departments, it is still worse to think that the other departments seem to have been combined in attacking that building, not for the sake of mending it, but in the hope of carrying off some of the malodorous stuff to be found there. I feel too, embarrassment on this account. That it is not only humiliating, but it is exasperating to ask this House to allow an inquiry into any branch of the public service unless we have some reason to think that the right hon. gentleman who leads the House will, under any circumstances, allow an inquiry to be made. I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman before I begin my remarks, if the policy of the government is so fixed and determined that in no circumstances whatever, no matter what evidence can be laid before the House as to the propriety of the investigation, will the government allow a commission to be appointed to investigate a department? I think, Sir, that is a fair question to ask the right hon. gentleman and I wait for a reply.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What is the question?

Mr. NORTHRUP. I asked the right hon. gentleman if the policy of the government was so fixed and determined. that in no circumstances, no matter what evidence is laid before the House as to the propriety of the investigation, will the government allow an investigation into any department?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Oh, no; we have already under such circumstances, allowed a Royal Commission to investigate. There was a Royal Commission of investigation two years ago for example.

Mr. NORTHRUP. If the right hon. gentleman is prepared to allow an investigation in case sufficient evidence is shown, I would like to ask him if, assuming I prove the following facts, he will allow an investigation by Royal Commission into the conduct of the Printing Bureau? Assuming I can prove the incompetency of the officials in connection with the Printing Bureau; also the lack of frankness on their part towards their superiors; also the lack of a spirit of loyalty and co-operation, destroying their efficiency; also that the employees have become to a certain extent agents of the house of Shylock and have spent their time lending money to one another at rates simply fabulous; also that the employees have become lazy and insubordinate; also that the employees were addicted to excessive drunkenness; also that contracts in connection with that Bureau were made without writing and also without competition; also that there was defective bookkeeping, making it impossible to tell the state of affairs existing in the Bureau; also that there was dissipation; also that there was conspiracy; also, that there was dishonesty; also that there was forgery; and also that there was perjury; the result thereof being tremendous financial loss to the country. I would ask the right hon. gentleman, if I can prove beyond demonstration to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State, that such was the condition of affairs in the Bureau, will he grant the Royal Commission for which I propose to ask?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If my hon. friend can prove all that, I do not see what reason there is for further evidence and further investigation. I think the Secretary of State has done it already.

Mr. NORTHRUP. That is what I was afraid would be the difficulty. After I have proved that all that did exist and shown that practically nothing has been done to remedy it, I feared the right hon. gentleman would still say—although no heads have fallen, although the procedure is to be in the future as in the past; I was afraid he would say: I see no reason why there should be further investigation. Let me tell the right hon. gentleman that also, I can prove and will show to the satisfaction—no, perhaps I should not say to the satisfaction—but, at all events, to the conviction of the Secretary of State, before I resume my seat—that every one of these charges is true. They are proven, let me tell the right hon. gentleman, not by an investigation, not even by an inquiry, not by a ploughing of the soil, not even by a scratching of the soil, but by a mere desultory walking about the department on the part of the Secretary of State and one or two of his officials—no examination under oath, no attempt to probe any of the matters that fairly oozed to the surface, and yet even under these circumstances what charges I have made are proven, and I make my case by simply producing the report of the Secretary of State himself. I will read a few choice selections from that report for the benefit of the House. On page 2 of the Blue-book published by the Secretary of State, the right hon. gentleman will find that the Secretary of State himself has found in the department every one of these evils to exist, which I have charged. And, if one goes further and takes the evidence of the Public Accounts Committee with regard to that Bureau, you will find that what the Secretary of State has admitted has been more than ten-fold proven. Take for example such a passage as this from the report of the Secretary of State:

> The incompetence of some officials, the dishonesty of others, and a complete lack of frankness on the part of those whose duty it was to keep their superiors informed as to the actual working of the Printing Bureau, were the chief causes that combined to unduly prolong the inquiry.
> If the parliamentary investigation into the Printing Bureau scandals of 1891 had been followed by the application of vigorous measures to correct the abuses that were then shown to exist, it is probable that the present inquiry would not have been necessary. There can be little doubt that if a thorough overhauling had been made at that time the radical defects in the organization and management of the Printing Bureau would have been discovered and corrected, and that such action would have led to a more faithful discharge of their duties by the officials and employees. But, with the exception of a few dismissals, nothing was done. As a consequence, the evils that were left untouched spread and flourished to the serious impairment of the Bureau's efficiency and the gradual destruction of that spirit of loyalty and co-operation which ought to prevail in an establishment of its size and public importance.
> The condition of affairs above alluded to is very fully dealt with in the annexed sub-reports numbered from 1 to 8, inclusive. As these sub-reports also contain a mass of detail in connection with both the Printing and the Stationery Branches there remain to be considered only those matters with which the undersigned had to deal personally.
> Lax management had favoured the growth of many abuses that told against discipline. Among the employees money-lending in small sums at excessive rates of interest was extensively practised. In several instances the borrowers were sued and the Division Court bailiffs usually effected service on the debtors at the Bureau during business hours. This had a demoralizing effect, not only on the parties concerned, but also on many of their fellow-workmen as well. Then it was found that private business was transacted at the Bureau during business hours. In other cases there were certain employees who made a practice of coming late to work, and these, as well as a number who occasionally drank to excess, set a bad example to the more punctual and sober workmen. Some of the late-comers added to their offence by making false entries of their hours of arrival in the attendance books. It was discovered that another kind of falsification was also indulged in. An examination of a large number of orders issued for goods in the Printing Branch revealed the fact that after the signature of the undersigned had been obtained to such orders, additional goods had been entered on many of the orders without his knowledge. And this was done despite the fact that specific instructions had repeatedly been issued that no purchase were to be made or orders given unless the approval of the undersigned had first been obtained.

Again:

In sub-report No. 1 the divided authority that existed at the Bureau is discussed at length. Owing partly to such divided authority, and partly to the lack of business methods, contracts, as a rule, were entered into without securing competitive prices and without complete written records of the transactions being made. In fact written contracts appear to have been unknown at the Bureau until they were introduced less than two years ago. Prior to that the details of each contract could be secured only by collecting and reading the correspondence on file in different offices and by getting verbal statements from the different individuals who might have had something to do with it at various stages. Notwithstanding the frequent instructions issued in this regard, orders were placed without inviting competition, and in every instance without the approval of the undersigned.

Then there is a long account of what took place under the management of the late Superintendent of Stationery. Now, without going any further, the admissions here made by the Secretary of State are enough to show a deplorable state of affairs existing in the department. But there were other matters even worse, in my humble judgment, than those to which he referred, if we look at the practical results on the service in general, and on the country. There seems to have been a carnival in all the departments in their desire to break the law in regard to printing. The Secretary of State has pointed out in his report, very properly, that the law of the land requires all the printing to be done at the Printing Bureau through his department; but whether because the profits in connection with printing contracts are so great or because the lust for patronage was so irrepressible that the other departments found it impossible to forego it in the matter of printing, the fact remains that other departments, who had no right to do their own printing, arrogated to themselves that right instead of handing it over to the Printing Department. It is a striking fact that in one case, to which I shall refer presently, where apparently most exorbitant prices were paid, and two firms were enabled to make great profits, the justification offered was that those were the prices paid by the Department of the Interior. Then it was pointed out in the report that in many minor matters large losses were incurred by the country. Take, for example, the matter of the voters' lists. The law of the land requires that the voters' lists shall be printed at the Printing Bureau, and that they shall be left in type so that, if required in an emergency, new lists could be obtained. I do not think myself that it is a very wise provision, and I think the Secretary of State might very well have directed his attention to having the law amended, seeing that with the new mode of printing it is rather an extravagant and useless procedure to require the type to be kept standing. But still that is the law, and as long as it is, it should be observed. But instead of the law being observed and the printing being done in the Printing Bureau, and the type being kept standing, I find that prior to the last election, the lists for forty-one constituencies in the province of Ontario were printed outside of the Printing Bureau, and no type kept standing, in Quebec fourteen, in Nova Scotia three, in New Brunswick one, and in British Columbia six, making altogether sixty-five constituencies out of 221 with regard to which the law was wilfully and deliberately broken. Then, as to requisitions. One great reason for the tremendous loss in the Department of the Secretary of State is the recklessness with which requisitions are made by other departments, and the heedlessness with which they are honoured by his department. He has pointed out in his report that the statute and the regulations passed in Council require that the requisitions from the various departments shall go to the Department of the Secretary of State under the hand of the deputy head of the department from which they come; but, instead of that, a custom has grown up that any Tom, Dick or Harry, who happens to be in the Civil Service and who desires any article of any kind, from a law book to a library of books, has merely to send in his requisition, and it is honoured as readily and fully as if it came from the head of the government himself. In this way a double loss naturally occurs. More goods are purchased than should be, and goods of a kind that never should be purchased at all are purchased; and it is possible that the unfortunate man Gouldthrite, who came to such a sad end, may have been led astray by the recklessness of other departments, he thinking that he too might break the law when the opportunity was afforded for his own benefit. Another way in which the department have been breaking the law and causing the country great expense is in the utter recklessness with which they send in their proofs to the Printing Bureau. In asking for an investigation into the Department of State, I wish to be fair and just to the Printing Bureau, and I think it would be only just, in investigating what is wrong there, to investigate also what is done wrong in other departments in connection with dealings with the Printing Bureau. It appears in the evidence that among the offenders the Department of Militia is perhaps the worst. They seem to have an idea there that the proper way to edit their reports is while they are being printed. The evidence is given again and again that the cost of printing in the Militia Department is double what it should be by virtue of the recklessness with which improper proofs are sent in and the work is edited while being printed. In the Department of the Interior, in connection with the printing of maps, the same recklessness exists. But in the Department of Militia there is not the same hurry as in many other departments, and when we find a work like the King's Regulations sent down to the Printing Bureau at a time when the department is overworked and when consequently increased expense is incurred, it would be well for the head of that department to consider whether or not it would not be well to suspend for a few months the printing of such a work if the expense is to be so much increased by hurrying it up at a particular time. Then, many works, such as the Civil Service List, are printed both in English and in French. Now, one would have thought that the most elementary idea of business principles would have prompted the department to recognize that in a work like the Civil Service List there is very little difference between the English and the French edition. The names and the figures are the same; the only difference is in the change of a few words. Therefore, as is pointed out in the evidence, the French edition could be printed from the English at a very trifling expense, for only a few changes in the names of the months or days would have to be made. Yet, as a matter of fact, an English edition is printed in this printing house and a French edition in that, utterly regardless of the fact that they are practically the same, and a double expense is thus imposed on the country. Then there are illustrations of the way contracts were let that were rather startling. In looking through the evidence I found a case that occurred when one Cook was in the department. He has since been dismissed, but his dismissal does not alter the fact as to how the work was done in the department at that time, and gives us no guarantee that any better system will be adopted in the future. I found this taking place during his incumbency of an office. A certain book was required—if I remember rightly, a book on weeds for the Department of Agriculture. The contract was let by this young man in Toronto—let without the knowledge of his superiors. Later on the Secretary of State wished to look into the matter, and did look into it, and it appeared likely that he would repudiate that contract. So an official of the department went around the country—to Toronto, to Buffalo, to New York—and got tenders from other firms at the very time the work was being done by a Toronto firm, that he might have something to lay before the minister. I am not going to waste time on that, because that is merely preliminary to the point I wish to make. The minister's attention was called in some way to what was going on, and he insisted on seeing the files, and knowing how the matter had been handled, and what tenders had been put in. In consequence of the inquiries made by the minister, I find the following letter, on page 297 of the report of the Secretary of State, which fully explains itself and shows how business is carried on in the Printing Department even under the present Secretary of State.

Secretary of State,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—Referring to our letter of April 22 last, addressed to the King's Printer, and containing prices for an edition of Farm Grasses, we beg to say that the circumstances under which Mr. R. E. Cook obtained the letter mentioned are as follows:

At an interview in the Printing Bureau in April last, Mr. Cook stated to our Mr. Wm. Mortimer that you had given a contract for the edition of Farm Grasses to the Toronto Lithographing Company, and that as the contract amounted to more than $5,000 you desired to have on file correspondence showing that you had invited tenders for the work, and that the Toronto Lithographing Company was the lowest tenderer. Mr. Cook added that this correspondence was required in case a question was asked about the matter. Mr. Cook asked Mr. Mortimer to put in a tender slightly higher than that of the Toronto Lithographing Company, and as the tender of the latter company had been placed on Mr. Cook's desk where Mr. Mortimer could see it, the latter copied the figures, and returning to our office made up a tender as requested by Mr. Cook. We assumed that Mr. Cook's statements were correct and did not make any inquiry from you. We were aware, however, when we wrote the letter of April 22 that the contract had previously been given to the Toronto Lithographing Company, and that our figures were not in the nature of a tender, but were to be used merely for the purpose of justifying the giving of the contract to the Toronto Lithographing Company, as explained to our Mr. Mortimer by Mr. R. E. Cook.

Yours truly,
THE MORTIMER CO., LTD.,
A. E. Mortimer,
Managing Director.

Would one think it possible that in Canada the head of one of our largest firms would put the name of his firm to such a letter addressed to the Secretary of State, frankly admitting that he had deliberately and wilfully taken part in a fraud, by sending in a bogus tender to deceive and rob the public, and said he believed he was doing this at the request of the Secretary of State. That would be enough to startle any one, but one possibly finds some explanation of it when he takes the trouble to look into the Auditor General's Report and finds the following interesting items paid to Mortimer & Company. In order that there may be no question as to the accuracy of my figures, I shall give the pages. Mortimer & Company seem to have had dealings with every department in the public service. This firm, which put its name to this letter, that I have just read, fared as follows at the hands of the government last year, according to the Auditor General's Report:

25..	1,969 57

I may have overlooked some items, but the sum total of those I have read is $67,075.25 paid by the various departments to this firm whose mode of doing business is proved over their own signature to the Secretary of State which I have read.

In going through the report of the Secretary of State, another striking feature is presented. His report starts off as follows:

Shortly after assuming office in the month of October, 1908, the undersigned addressed the following letter to the then acting King's Printer:

Ottawa, Nov. 27, 1908.

Dear Sir,—Please do not make any purchases or give orders for outside printing without first consulting me. Also be good enough to furnish me with a list of all persons receiving patronage from the Printing Bureau, so that any who are not principals may be struck from the list.

Yours very truly,
CHARLES MURPHY.

So that as early as November 29, 1908, a letter was written, and the first sentence of the report is a letter marking the date on which the inquiry was to begin and which was to continue at such times and under such circumstances as the other duties of the undersigned would permit.

Mr. NORTHRUP.

The first time any evidence was taken was on June 20, 1910, so that we have one of the two results. Either the Secretary of State failed entirely to do anything from November, 1908, until June 20, 1910, or has entirely suppressed in his report to the House the result of his inquiries during that interval. And during that interval it was that the mischief was done. The evidence of witness after witness is clear and positive that this wrong-doing was all committed during the last two or three years. I have read the evidence carefully and there is no evidence of any fraud or robbery of the public until within the last two or three years. Apparently the Secretary of State had a hint in November, 1908, that something was wrong. If he had not a hint then, he had one a year before he did anything. Evidently one of his officials named Patenaude happened to be a man with a conscience, even in that department, and was so worried over the transactions which were going on that, after he had reported them to a minor official above him and nothing had been done, he spoke to Mr. Boudreau, a man outside of the office altogether, and left the matter in his hands. Mr. Boudreau was a man of honour, and reported the matter to the Secretary of State, so that in 1909 the Secretary of State was warned and yet apparently nothing was done until the climax was reached and Gouldthrite disappeared and, it is said, was found drowned a few days after. When we find this laxness in the beginning, when we find that there was a shortage in the stock and that apparently no effort was taken to ascertain how it arose and who was the guilty party, when there is nothing to show that any head fell because of it, I think we have ample reason for asking that a Royal Commission be appointed which will investigate without fear or favour, and tell us who is responsible for the shortage and possibly find some way of recouping the government for the money lost.

As an illustration of the utter recklessness with which the public money was handled, let me point out that at one time toilet paper was bought at some $3 or $4 a roll. But a happy inspiration no doubt struck some official that here there might be a chance for graft, so the price was worked up to $13.75 and $14 per roll. It seems that the officials were a little afraid to send this paper, so they judiciously sent one lot to the penitentiaries. There was not much danger of any one there being brought into contact with any member of the opposition, and therefore these extravagant purchases of toilet paper were got rid of by sending large quantities to the penitentiaries. They sent some to the Department of the Interior. I suppose that was for the use of the Indians. The rest was sent to the Department of Militia and Defence. I do not know what could have been the object in that, unless it was to furnish armour plate for the Canadian navy, something stronger and safer than we had; at all events, that is the department to which it was sent. The Secretary of State found out by simple calculation that over $1,400 a year was taken out of this country on that item alone by ruinous extravagance which, apparently, it was nobody's business to watch or check.

Then, it was shown that it was a very common thing for workmen in the department to bring in books from outside to be bound. One case was investigated, and it turned out that the loss to the department on one book alone was about $10—leather, gold leaf and other material used and time employed. Many workmen were engaged in the same occupation—bringing in outside books, binding them with materials belonging to the department and using time that was paid for by the department. The country footed the bill, and apparently all was well.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman mean that the binding was done for outside parties?

Mr. NORTHRUP. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). For the general public?

Mr. NORTHRUP. One man was connected with a theatrical company and bound books for them. Another man bound them for his friends. Others bound books for people outside the department, using the department's time, leather, and gold leaf. That went on with the knowledge or the foremen, and seems to have been regarded as a reasonable and proper practice;—as long as the men were there at all, apparently that is all that was required. Evidence is given by some men—it is only just to say that it is denied by others—that the men at the department were in the habit of staying there after hours, sometimes all night, to do extra work, and the next day they would sit round idle because there was nothing for them to do. It is true, as I have said, that that is contradicted by the men themselves. But there is nothing in the report to show that investigation was made into the matter. There must be some way of finding out whether the statement is true or not.

Mr. FOSTER. Was it stated on oath?

Mr. NORTHRUP. No, no inquiry was made on oath. And that is another point worthy of attention. This inquiry of the Secretary of State was not even under oath. And, when we find that, even with no penalty for twisting the truth, the statements of these parties reveal such a horrible state of affairs, surely, we who represent the people whose money has been squandered, have the right to ask for a royal commission, that we may see how deep these sores extended of which only the surface is revealed to us.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). How could it happen that the officials in the Printing Bureau could be doing this general contract work in binding for outsiders and apart altogether from the country's needs?

Mr. NORTHRUP. Simply because the foreman thought it a small matter and allowed it to go on. The evidence is clear that in several cases the foremen were aware what was done. One man said he did this work in the hour between twelve and one, but others did not even pretend to say that. I have already referred to the case of one book concerning which an investigation was made, and $10 was the amount it was thought right to charge as a fair return to the country for the time expended and the materials used in the binding of this one book.

Then, the pleasing practice grew up in the department of lending money at 'reasonable' rates. At first, apparently, the parties were not so utterly unreasonable. A man who had a little money was willing to make on that fifty or seventy-five per cent and his fellow employees, apparently, were willing to pay it. But, I suppose emboldened by success, and with appetites whetted the money-lenders demanded more. I suppose a dozen or fifteen witnesses were examined on that question, the question of the usurious rates charged in a regular money-lending business done within the department. Five cents on the dollar for a fortnight was the charge made in the first place by those who were willing to lend at 'reasonable' rates. But that was hardly a living rate, apparently, so they asked as high as ten cents on the dollar for a fortnight. There were eight or ten money-lenders apparently doing a brisk if not cheerful, business in the department, lending money right and left to their less successful employees at rates of five to ten cents on the dollar for a fortnight's interest.

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand it, these were outside money-lenders who came in and made loans to the people in the department?

Mr. NORTHRUP. No, that would be bad enough. But I speak of the operations of men whose time was paid for out of the public treasury, and who spent their time, some as Shylocks in lending, and some as victims in borrowing. Both lender and borrower were workmen on the pay-roll, and in these transactions they spent time that was paid for by the country, and the minister reports that, as one result of these proceedings, bailiffs came down occasionally to serve summons, and violent altercations took place, which had a bad effect, of course not only on the discipline of the men involved, but on the discipline of all those working with them. But the very fact that such practices could be carried on to such an extent openly and unblushingly must have had an extremely bad effect upon discipline.

Another small matter—it may be hardly worth mentioning in connection with these other things, but it illustrates the want of discipline in the department—is referred to at pages 235 and 242 of the Secretary of State's report. The point referred to is the waste of material, and the taking away from the Bureau. A notice was put up by the King's Printer with relation to this matter. One of the men, called Charbonneau, had his attention directed to it. He admitted that he had seen it, but he said that it did not make any difference to him, it was not put up in French, and it would have to be put up in French before he would take any notice of it. When we take that statement of this gentleman, who explains these matters, we get some idea of why affairs at the Bureau were as they were. At page 237, the minister inquired:

Mr. Walsh has expressed the opinion that the lack of discipline which has prevailed in the bindery for years, and which now prevails, is due to some extent at present to three individuals in particular—Parrington, Harry Allan and Johnson. What is your opinion with reference to Mr. Walsh's view upon that point?

And the man replied:

I think he is pretty nearly right, these men presuming a good deal upon their political pull.

I think no one can read this report of the Secretary of State himself without seeing revealed on every page of it the secret of the state of affairs that existed in the Bureau, and it is to be found in those words, that some were 'presuming a good deal upon their political pull.'

At page 148 of this blue-book is a very interesting sub-report, made by Mr. O'Connor, who was appointed by the minister to investigate the mode of carrying on the business in the department. The blame is placed on a man named Cook, a subordinate official, and I am not prepared to say that blame should not be placed on him, but there is something monstrous in saying that a department can be carried on in a scandalous way for years, and no one be blamed except such a man as Cook, a subordinate.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is O'Connor?

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. O'Connor is an experienced practical printer from Montreal, formerly on the 'Star' and 'Herald,' brought in to assist in this investigation.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Mr. O'Connor is a suitable and proper man to make the report. At page 149 Mr. O'Connor says:

This price list provided for arbitrary prices for lithographic press work, and for cheques, with no regard for the relative value of the work to be done. For type work, which the Bureau knew something about, different prices were made for different sized forms, but for litho work, in which there is a wide range of value, the price was $5 per thousand impressions, without any regard to the size of the sheet or the character of the work to be done. Moreover, these impressions were counted in the lithographic room by the unit without any apparent knowledge of the fact that in many cases several units were repeated on the same sheet, printed with one impression, and cut up, after printing, into units before delivery to the Bureau. But in the case of cheques and kindred forms, such as certificates and receipts, the evidence of the duplication of units in the printing was constantly being thrust upon Mr. Cook's attention, apparently without raising the slightest dissent. The price list above referred to read: 'Cheques $5 per thousand up to 4,000, and $4 per thousand for quantities above 4,000,' and cheques were paid for at $5 or $4 per thousand, irrespective of the fact that in many cases the price was nearly ten times the commercial value of the work. In lithographing cheques, for instance, one plate only is engraved. From this ten transfers may be made on the lithographic stone from which the printing is done, and ten cheques are printed in one sheet at each impression. In considering an account for lithographic work the number of units printed from each impression should be considered. Thus I have an account before me for the printing of 100,000 grain certificates at $4 per thousand certificates, equalling $400. Now this work was done on government paper furnished large enough to print ten certificates at one time on one sheet, and it was so done. The charge then should have been for 10,000 impressions at $4 per thousand sheets, and $4 for making the necessary transfer, in all $44, which is a fair price in these days of close margins, as against the price of $400 charged according to the absurd interpretation of the scale. These absurd prices appear to have been paid for years without protest by Mr. Cook or any other official until I called attention to it during my inquiry, and, by your authority, had it stopped.

That is along the same line as the printing of the Civil Service list, a more grievous case, but in principle much the same. A little common sense in the conduct of the Bureau would have taught them at once that in order to have a French edition of the Civil Service list they had merely to make a few changes in the dates and have it reprinted instead of having the English version printed here and the French there, at double the cost, without any attempt to save anything to the country. When I find items like grain certificates and cheques printed in that way I wonder if the same rule is not applied to post office orders, customs blanks and these innumerable public documents which might be printed with comparative cheapness, but which would cost an enormous amount if printed in the same way as the documents to which I have referred.

An immense amount of stock is, of course, purchased by the printing department. I have already said that a Royal Commission might well inquire into the conduct of other departments in sending their requisitions into the printing department. If clerks were employed, they could do what I certainly decline to do, go through the thousands of requisitions and trace out the individuals who had been sending in these reckless requisitions for absurd articles. How were tenders obtained? After the requisitions came in what goods were bought by tender and what without? Everything was bought without tender except paper and envelopes (pages 7, 21 and 22 of the report). Everything bought in the United States or Great Britain was bought without tender, as one of the employees told us under oath in the Public Accounts Committee, about $200,000 a year would be bought under contract and between $300,000 and $400,000 not under contract. Then when that department came to purchase by tender, how was that done? There was no list, they are all very clear about that; there was no advertising as a rule, but the head of the branch had in his mind certain houses suitable to do that kind of work and so he inquired of them for tenders and they got the work. That is all the check the country had, as to the expenditure of this money in that department, no pretense of competition, and if we may judge from the one case, namely that proved by Mr. Mortimer, which I read to the House, the public would not be necessarily any better off if the tenders could be produced here to show that there had been even keen, excessive competition. A Royal Commission might shed a light into these tenders, by going deeper than has so far been done.

There is another incident that would justify further inquiry in which the Deputy Minister is involved. The hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) moved for a return showing the cost of printing and lithographing done in certain years. An employee was instructed to prepare a return showing the cost of printing and lithographing. He prepared his return and handed it to Mr. Mulvey, the under Secretary of State, and Mr. Mulvey's evidence, given under oath, without a blush, is that he honestly believed he was obeying the order of this House and doing his duty when, in answer to a return for the cost of printing and lithographing, he subtracted the cost, as he estimated it, of the paper on which that printing and lithographing was done, thinking that if the House asked the cost of printing it meant literally printing. Here was not a case in which the paper was supplied; they were pamphlets printed by an outside printing office, and although the Auditor General's Report gave the cost including the printing, the amount paid to the firm, this astute official, in his anxiety to do something, I do not know what, deliberately sent in a report to this House giving cost of printing and lithographing when he knew he had subtracted the cost of paper on which the printing and lithographing had been done. If the man had been both honest and intelligent and right in what he was doing, should he not also have subtracted the profits that the printer had made? If it was only the cost of printing that this House wanted to know, what had profits to do with that cost? If the cost of the paper which was used be subtracted surely the profits could be subtracted too.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there nothing in the return to show that?

Mr. NORTHRUP. No, but the return should show the cost of the printing. The figures of the Auditor General's Report show that so much was paid for printing, and this return shows so much less, and the explanation is that the paper was subtracted. I do not wish to say anything against the deputy minister, whom I do not know, but it seems to me that if I were a royal commissioner and I had one case of that kind brought to my notice, I would look very closely into the management of that office by that deputy minister.

There is another case of contracting which shows how things have been done. This young man Cook, who has since been removed, probably on his own motion, gave a contract to the Gananoque 'Reporter' for the printing of a certain number of pamphlets. He informed the King's Printer that he had done so, and it might be a perfectly justifiable thing, as it was pointed out that the proprietor of the Gananoque 'Reporter' had been a candidate for parliament in the interest of the Reform party, that he was unsuccessful and was hard up. In the face of such meritorious claims as this, of course, the contract was given. It is true that the gentleman never had been a candidate for parliament; it was his brother who had been a candidate for parliament, away back in 1887, but still there were as good reasons for giving that contract as for some others which were given in connection with this department. The contract was given to this man, the statement being made that he was particularly well supplied with the necessary amount of plant to do printing of this kind. When the proofs came in to be corrected it was seen that the work was being done by the Ottawa 'Free Press.' The work was done by the Ottawa 'Free Press' and the Ottawa 'Free Press' was paid for it. I do not know what profit it made, but I do know that the Gananoque 'Reporter,' that had nothing to do with it at all, got $200 profit. We find that they got $200 profit for doing nothing, and that the other printing company got its profit. When taken to task about the high price which was paid for this work, the convincing answer came back at once: You can find no fault with the price, because it is the price paid by the Department of Agriculture. The Department of Agriculture has no more authority to spend public money on printing than I have. It is a piece of impertinent presumption, because the statute says that all this printing shall be done in the Printing Bureau, and my hon. friend, the Secretary of State (Mr. Murphy), has very properly sent circulars to all his colleagues, asking them to observe that provision of the law. But here we see the Printing Bureau, which should have been an exemplar to all others, is led astray by the reckless extravagance of the Minister of Agriculture, who has been paying such fancy prices for printing and who has improperly permitted this paper to receive $200 for doing nothing, while another company is making a living profit out of the work.

Now, I do not intend to occupy very much of the time of the House further, but I would like to give a few figures to show the absurd way in which this department has been honouring requisitions and the iniquitous way in which these requisitions have been sent in. I think that the right hon. Prime Minister, when he hears my figures, will be inclined to have a Royal Commission to probe, not merely into the public Printing Bureau, but into other departments in so far as they have dealt with the Printing Bureau, and to see who is to blame for these outrageous expenditures. When one looks at the Auditor General's Report—for the present 'T' is the page with which we are most concerned—he will find a great deal of evidence bearing on this subject. There are so many items that I do not pretend to have fished out all under the different heads to which I intend to refer, and although the figures I give may not be complete, they are, at all events, accurate, as far as they go. The only exception that might be taken to them is that probably, if I had had more time and gone more fully into the Auditor General's Report, I would have found more items of this kind than I have. I was struck with the frequency with which the word 'dictionaries' appeared in that book, so I made this little note:

T—6, Beauchemin, Librairie, 34 dictionaries, cost..	$164 00
T—6, Beauchemin, 3 dozen at $5.. ..	15 00
T—8, Can. Law Book Co., 5 law dictionaries..	50 40
T—9, Duffill Standard Dictionary of Facts, 27 at $6.75..	181 75
T—10, Hope, 7 dictionaries..	13 90
T—17, Baker & Taylor, N.Y., 19.. ..	137 15
T—20, Dawson & Sons, Imperial Dictionary, 16 vols..	62 29
	$624 89

The department spent $624.89 for dictionaries alone. It is not as if we were starting departments in Canada. These departments have been doing business at the old stand for years, and inasmuch as in one year they have bought over $600 worth of dictionaries, I think there is good ground for inquiry.

Take the question of law bags. What earthly right has a civil servant to purchase law bags at the expense of the country? I have nothing like the full list of law bags purchased, because there are a great many entered as leather bags, which I fancy, from the places where they were bought, were really meant for brief bags. But I do not include these. These are merely described as brief bags:

T—8, H. Carson, Ottawa, brief bags, 2 at $10, 2 at $8, 12 at $7.50, 1 at $6..	$132 00
T—13, Ottawa Trunk Store, brief bag. Fibre case, $8; special strap, $2.50..	15 00 10 50
T—16, Western Leather Goods Co., brief bags, 6 at $12.50, $75; 6 at $11 50, $69; 6 at $8.50, $51..	195 00
	$352 50

They paid out $352.50 for brief bags. Again I think that a little investigation into such an expenditure as that would not do any harm. Then, let us take almanacs. There seems to be a craving for almanacs. I find that the following purchases were made:

T—6, Beauchemin, 24½ doz. at $1.80..	$ 44 10
T—6, Beauchemin, 225 at 15 cents.. ..	33 75
T—15, Thorburn, 538..	276 62
T—10, Hope & Sons, 86⅞ doz. at $6.30, 4¾ doz. at $4 20; sundry, $3.71.. ..	569 25
	$923 72

Then we have the directories, and I am sorry that the right hon. Prime Minister is leaving the room.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I will come back in a minute.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I will suspend my remarks with regard to directories until the right hon. gentleman returns. Then there are law books. I have no objection to the government providing all the law books that are required, but it seems to me that it is impudent extravagance, when there is a good law library in the Supreme Court, a fair law library in the Library of parliament, and a fair law library in the Department of Justice, that we should have every tu'penny ha'penny law clerk in a department thinking that he is entitled to set up a law library for himself at the expense of the country. I find that the following amounts were expended for law books:

T—6, Code Civil du Bas Canada, 3 vols..	$ 54 00
T—8, Canadian Law Book Co.. ..	2,387 61
T—8, Carswell..	299 00
T—11, J. Lovell & Son..	386 71
T—13, Poole & Co..	113 43
T—14, Richardson & Bishop..	7 50
T—17, American Law Book Company, 33 vols..	120 00
T—19, Thompson, Edward, Co., 42 vols..	209 85
T—19, E. G. Allen & Son, 45 vols. commercial treaties..	114 00
	$3,861 78

That was the expenditure for miscellaneous law books around among the various departments. It seems high. Then I would like to call the attention of the Secretary of State to the fact that while typewriters are very proper articles to have, when it comes to an expenditure of $60,000 or $70,000 for typewriters and typewriter supplies it is a little high. One cannot help suspecting that an intelligent investigation by an outside party would discover some means of conducting the affairs of the country at a less expense for typewriters. I have only taken a few samples among the expenditures to show how grossly absurd they are. Let me mention the item of subscriptions to directories. There are subscriptions of all sorts, and I do not see why the civil servants should be entitled to subscribe so liberally to all sorts of periodicals and magazines and newspapers, Canadian and American. The subscription list for magazines and periodicals which amounts to $2,214.89 are to be found at page T—6, T—8, T—10, T—16, T—20 and T—19. I submit to the right hon. gentleman whether this extensive subscription list is not superfluous at best and extravagant at worst. Then we come to directories and they are perhaps one of the best illustrations of the way the departments have helped themselves. The Canadian Gazeteer Publishing Company sold 37 at $10 each; the Canadian Legal Publishing Company got $196; Henderson Directories, Limited, $315; Henderson Publishing Company, $140; Hope, of Ottawa, 19 at $4.50 each, and 3 at $3 each; the International Railway Publishing Company sold to the extent of $1,728; J. Lovell & Son, Montreal, 4 directories at $12 each, 10 at $7.50, and 90 at $6, amounting to $573 and $265; the McAlpin Publishing Company of Halifax, $97.50; the Might Directories, $1,536; The Union Publishing Company, Ingersoll, $55; Vernon of Hamilton, $300; Baker & Taylor, of New York, $30—heaven only knows what they wanted American directories for—the Kelly Publishing Company of New York, $77; Boulanger & Marcotte, Quebec, $150; the Provincial Publishing Company of Victoria, $25; Guild & Hewson, Kingston city directory, $95.45. That all comes to considerably over $5,000 paid for directories last year. Take 43 directories of Quebec and Point Levis, and if there was any proper system of requisition I venture to say no deputy head would dare to put his name at the foot of a requisition for 43 directories of Quebec and Levis, and so on from Halifax and Moncton and St. John right through to Vancouver and Victoria, in some cases dozens, and in other cases hundreds bought to the extent of altogether $5,000 for directories last year. I submit that also to the right hon. gentleman as an illustration of matters that do not appear to have been touched on in the investigation so far. Without occupying the time of the House, I will say that if under any circumstances a Royal Commission would be justifiable to look into the affairs of a department, it has been shown that it would be proper in the case of the Printing Bureau: First, as the investigation which has been made was not under oath, it may be said in one sense that no investigation has been held at all; and the investigation not being under oath it would be such an investigation as would give the accused parties every possible hope of escaping from the charges that might be made against them. And yet even under those circumstances what I have already stated has been disclosed. I move:

That all the words after 'that' in the proposed motion be left out and the following substituted therefor:

A Royal Commission be appointed to make inquiry into the management of the Printing Bureau for such time past as the commissioners may consider in the public interest with instructions to inquire fully into the causes of the want of system therein and to report who is to blame therefor and what safeguards be provided to protect the country for the future.

And that said commissioners be further instructed to investigate how far other departments have violated that law by usurping the powers of the Printing Bureau in the matter of printing or by sending in requisitions for supplies in contravention of the statute and regulations in that behalf.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Secretary of State). Mr. Speaker, although spring has arrived for the rest of the world the winter of his discontent seems still to hang heavy upon the member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup). If I may be permitted to coin a phrase that would describe that hon. gentleman's recent political condition I would say that it has been one of progressive disappointment. A few weeks ago the reports in certain newspapers credited the hon. gentleman with being sorely disappointed at that time on account of the fact that a certain agitation which was then said to be on foot had not focused in his immediate vicinity and did not result in an exchange of positions between himself and the hon. the leader of the opposition. A short time later the hon. gentleman's reputation as a parliamentary wit was rudely shattered by a little 7 x 9 story which was told at his expense by the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), and now, Sir, it falls to my lot to further increase his disappointment by declining to accept the motion which he has just presented to the House.

In passing, I might say that the ordinary courtesy extended to a minister whose department is to be placed under review was not, it appears to me, extended on this occasion, because I was not furnished with a copy of the hon. gentleman's motion until late this morning. However, I am willing to treat that as an oversight and I found no complaint upon it.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Then why mention it? Did I understand the minister to say that he was not informed?

Mr. MURPHY. I say that I did not get a copy of the hon. gentleman's motion until late this morning.

Mr. NORTHRUP. It was not drawn until this morning.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). As I understand it the rule is that such a motion is generally sent on the morning of the day it is to be moved.

Mr. MURPHY. I merely mentioned the incident because I have seen on other occasions that the motion was forwarded earlier.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I notified the chief whip of the opposition several days ago and told him such a question was to be brought up and that is the usual custom.

Mr. MURPHY. I am not raising any objection to the notice; I merely mentioned that the copy of the motion was not sent.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The practice is to give notice that a motion is intended to be made and to send a copy of the motion some time in the forenoon of the day on which the motion is moved. I never heard any complaint about that practice before.

Mr. MURPHY. The motion, as it reached me, is somewhat wider in its terms than the notice given by the hon. member to a gentleman on this side of the House who transmitted it to me. But, be that as it may, let us look at the motion of the hon. gentleman and consider it for a few moments. In the first paragraph the hon. gentleman proposes 'that a Royal Commission be appointed to make inquiry into the management of the Printing Bureau for such time past as the commissioners may consider in the public interest.'

Now, Mr. Speaker, the inquiry which has been conducted into the management of the Printing Bureau covers about twenty-five years, and the motion made by my hon. friend, as well as his speech in support of it, totally ignore both the period of time covered by that investigation and the report made as a result of it, so far as the findings of that report are directed to correct the abuses that were discovered during the course of the investigation. The first paragraph of this motion proceeds: 'With instructions to inquire fully into the causes of the want of system therein.' Why, Mr. Speaker, that is precisely what has been done; that is precisely the work I and the experts whom I engaged to assist me put in a great many months at doing; and the result of that work is spread upon the pages of this report which has been before parliament and the country since last November. Then, this paragraph further proceeds: 'And to report who is to blame therefore, and what safeguards are to be provided to protect the country for the future.' Mr. Speaker, all of that has been done in the most minute detail. A great deal of that detail is set forth in the report which was presented to parliament in November last; and for his own purposes my hon. friend chooses to ignore that report and the work which it indicates was done before the report was in shape to present to parliament. In fact, the motion of the hon. gentleman, and the speech which he has made in support of it, go to the extent of treating the report and the investigation as two things that never happened. Now, it is taxing the credulity of this House and carrying absurdity to its extremest length to ask the House to accept any such proposition as that which the hon. gentleman lays before it in this motion.

The second paragraph of the motion begins in these terms: 'And that said commissioners be further instructed to investigate how far other departments have violated the law by usurping the powers of the Printing Bureau in the matter of printing.' Now, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact, the powers of the Printing Bureau were not usurped by other departments; but when printing was done through other departments, the reason for that printing having been done under the direction of another department rather than under that of the Printing Bureau was elicited in the course of the investigation, and appropriate remedies were applied to prevent that being done in the future. So that, as in the case of the first paragraph, this clause in the second is absolutely unnecessary, because it deals with matters which have been thoroughly investigated. This paragraph proceeds further: 'Or by sending in requisitions for supplies in contravention of the statute and regulations in that behalf.' Here again, a full investigation has been made, and where any irregularity has been found to exist with regard to these requisitions, that irregularity has been promptly stopped. Now, Sir, let me point out to you and to the House that this second paragraph of the hon. gentleman's motion covers the most ordinary matters of every-day departmental routine. To adopt this paragraph, I submit, would be to establish a precedent whereby parliament would be substituted for all the departments. Governmental responsibility would cease——

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). And time it did.

Mr. MURPHY. My hon. friend from Leeds says it is time it did. I would just say that the country has a different opinion, and that is the reason my hon. friend is on that side of the House and we are on this side. I was proceeding to say that governmental responsibility would cease and legislation would be rendered impossible by the mass of detail which is now looked after by the several departments, and which would inevitably be transferred to parliament if the principle laid down in this second paragraph of the hon. gentleman's motion were once adopted. Briefly—and I desire in this respect to follow the example set by the hon. gentleman, as far as it is possible for me to do so—let me say that in my judgment this motion should be rejected for the very simple reason that the affairs of the Printing Bureau have been investigated, not once, but twice—first, by the responsible minister who is charged with that duty, and, secondly, by our hon. friends opposite in the Public Accounts Committee. It is true, that the investigation conducted by our hon. friends in the Public Accounts Committee was abandoned. Of late hon. gentlemen opposite have manifested a strange desire to abandon in the committee investigations for which they have pressed in this House; but in this particular instance the fact that they did choose to abandon the investigation in the Public Accounts Committee is not my fault, and certainly is not the fault of the government. Whatever blame or disadvantage may attach to hon. gentlemen opposite for having adopted that course, is a matter which concerns them and with which I am not called upon to deal. Now, Mr. Speaker, all the facts relating to the management and the conduct of the business affairs of the Printing Bureau were given to parliament and the country in November last. I assert now, from my place in this House, that so far as the Printing Bureau is concerned, there is nothing left to investigate, and I further express my belief that that is the opinion of the country as a whole. To admit that there is at the present time any ground for the motion made by the hon. gentleman would be to admit his contention that the investigation conducted at intervals during the last two years and a half was partial and incomplete. Mr. Speaker, I do not admit anything of the kind.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Did not the hon. gentleman himself promise to refer this report of his to a committee?

Mr. MURPHY. No. What I did promise, and what I still intend to do, was to refer those portions of the report which relate to certain phases of the printing of parliament to a special committee, and to ask that committee to deal with the recommendations in the report, which suggest means for improving the facilities for parliamentary printing and for the smoother running of business generally between parliament and the Bureau. I was observing that the investigation which was held was a complete and a searching investigation. I think I may say without egotism that no more thorough or searching investigation was ever held into any department of any government. During my first session in this House I heard the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) describe, in the course of a debate in which he took part, how closely he had applied himself to the business of the Department of Marine and Fisheries when he was first appointed to take charge of it. I listened to the hon. gentleman with a good deal of attention on that occasion, because it happened that just at that particular time I was very busily engaged with the Printing Bureau. Again I hope I am not open to the charge of egotism if I say that I have never worked harder in my life than I have worked during the last two years in endeavouring to bring about reforms in this department, and to make it all that it should be, all that its importance calls for, because the Department of Public Printing and Stationery, or, as it is commonly called, the Printing Bureau, occupies a very unique and important relation towards the other departments of the government and towards parliament itself. Parliament and all the departments have to do with the Printing Bureau. If the Printing Bureau is not run properly, if its work is not turned out as it should be, if the purchases are not made and goods supplied to the several departments as they ought to be, then not the Printing Bureau alone, but every other department of the government suffers. For that reason it struck me that I could not do any more useful service than devote my time and energy towards bringing about reform in that establishment. That I attempted to do and that I maintain I have done, and I assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that the Printing Bureau is as well managed as any department of government in this country, Dominion or provincial.

When an hon. gentleman proposes at this stage that a third investigation should be undertaken, and when he chooses to ignore all that has been done, he reminds me of the Irishman who rushed breathlessly into a railway station too late to catch his train. A bystander said to him: You did not run fast engouh. Oh, yes, he said, I ran fast enough, but I did not start soon enough. That is the trouble with the hon. gentleman. He started about two and a half years too late. As I have pointed out, the investigation I conducted was begun in November, 1908. If the hon. gentleman had before that date moved the resolution which he has presented to-day, or some other such resolution, there would be some justification for his action, but there is absolutely none now.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to say that I did move a resolution including these several departments, and the right hon. the Prime Minister refused it, and his followers voted it down.

Mr. MURPHY. I am referring particularly to my hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Northrup). No doubt my hon. friend the leader of the opposition moved the resolution to which he refers, but he must have moved it previous to the time I had the honour of taking my seat in this House, because no such resolution has been moved since I have been a member.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My hon. friend is mistaken. The resolution I refer to was moved before he came into the House in 1908, but a similar resolution was also moved by the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) after the Secretary of State had occupied his seat in this House. It was not confined to any one department.

Mr. MURPHY. I must take issue with my hon. friend when he says that a resolution calling for an investigation into the Printing Bureau was moved by the hon. member for St. Anne since I have had a seat in this House. The hon. member for St. Anne did move a resolution calling for a general inquiry into the affairs of the departments generally.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The spending departments.

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, the spending departments, but the terms of that resolution did not particularly apply to the Printing Bureau. In fact, a reference to 'Hansard' shows that the members who supported that resolution had in their minds the spending departments, as the leader of the opposition has just said. But the fact still remains that when my hon. friend from St. Anne's division moved that resolution on the 1st April, 1909, I had already begun an investigation into the Printing Bureau. I had begun it on November 27, 1908, four months prior to the introduction of the resolution in question. It would therefore, have been absurd for me to have handed over the Printing Bureau to any committee, or commission that might then be appointed after an investigation into the Bureau had already been begun, and was considerably advanced by the minister in charge, who was responsible to parliament, and the country.

Mr. PORTER. Do I understand the hon. minister to say that he began that investigation in October, 1908?

Mr. MURPHY. In November, 1908.

Mr. PORTER. And continued it until Gouldthrite ran away. How is it in those two years Gouldthrite's defalcations were not discovered?

Mr. MURPHY. I began the inquiry in 1908, and continued it at such intervals as my other duties would permit me to carry it on. That inquiry extended over two years, and why Gouldthrite's dishonesty was not sooner discovered is also set out in the report. I could amplify and go into details, but I do not think it is necessary on the present occasion.

Mr. NORTHRUP. How is it that when the work was begun in 1908, the hon. minister has suppressed in his report every word of the inquiry between 1908 and 1910?

Mr. MURPHY. I do not know what political company the hon. member for Hastings has been in the habit of keeping, but I have only to say to him that I have suppressed nothing which ought to appear in this report. The hon. gentleman has never been charged with such a duty as that which, I may say unluckily, fell to my lot in connection with this department. If by any unlikely accident of political fortune, such a duty should be cast on him, he would realize that, in the multitude of details with which a minister is called on to deal, in the hurry of business transacted from day to day, it would be impossible for him to collect and note down everything he does, or to summarize every inquiry he has to make and keep a record of the thousand and one things that go to make up the daily routine of his duties. For that reason thousands of things done in connection with this inquiry do not appear in the report. No record was made of them, and it was impossible that any record could be made. But let me turn to the subject I was pursuing when my hon. friend the leader of the opposition interrupted me a few moments ago. I was referring to the motion introduced by the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) on April 1, 1909, and debated in this House on that day, and the day following. I refer to that again for the reason that the duty of the government and of its individual members in regard to just such matters as we are now discussing was very clearly set out by the right hon. the Prime Minister in the course of that debate. Let me quote his words. They will be found in 'Hansard' of 1909, pages 3861 and 3862 :

It is our duty to administer the affairs of Canada, it is our duty to manage the departments of the government. Our intention is to discharge that duty efficiently. If we do discharge that duty efficiently, well and good; if we do not, we are open to censure.

Further on the right hon. gentleman added:

I deny that it is the right of the parliament of Canada to look into the administration, that is a thing which is the duty of those charged with the administration, and for the proper discharge of that duty they are responsible to the people.

The position taken by my right hon leader on that occasion is sustained by all constitutional writers, and more particularly by Todd in his work on parliamentary government in England. In volume 1, page 418 of that work Todd says:

In fact the ministry of the day are responsible for everything that is done in any department of the state. While it is true that the House of Commons ought to have control and supervision of every such department, its functions are those of control and not of administration.

The House can interfere with great advantage in prescribing the principle on which the executive government should be carried on. But beyond that it is impossible for the legislature to interfere with advantage in the details of the administration of the country.

And the same author, in the same volume, at page 419, says:

The intrusion of parliamentary committees into matters which pertain to the jurisdiction of the executive government is equally to be deprecated as it tends inevitably to overthrow all genuine responsibility.

Now, the principle laid down by the right hon. Prime Minister, sustained by the author whom I have just quoted and approved by this House, has been applied by me to the Printing Bureau. And still, it seems, our friends opposite are not satisfied. However, that is not to be wondered at. Hon. gentlemen opposite will be found to be consistent chiefly in their inconsistency. Speaking in the debate in 1909, the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Crothers), referring to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, said:

It would be unreasonable to find fault with the minister or the government if the minister, on ascertaining the wrong-doing, or at the time when he should have ascertained it with ordinary vigilance, had dismissed the wrong-doer and punished him as the law provides.

And yet, in the present instance, for having done the very thing that the hon. member for West Elgin indicated, the government is now brought to book by the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup), who I have no doubt will expect his political friends and associates to support him in presenting this motion. I do not know whether it is too much to expect, but, having regard to consistency I might be pardoned for saying that the hon. member for West Elgin at least should oppose the motion of the hon. member for East Hastings, and vote with this side of the House because, in the present case, I have followed precisely the line he laid down in 1909 when discussing the affairs of the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Let me run over some of the citations made by the hon. member for East Hastings in support of this motion, and deal briefly with certain arguments that he advanced in presenting them to the House. Let me premise by pointing out that everything the hon. gentleman has mentioned in support of his motion has been taken from the report which is before parliament or from the evidence adduced before the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Quite incorrect.

Mr. MURPHY. The hon. gentleman has announced nothing new. I made very full notes of what he said. He did not mention a single thing with which I was not perfectly familiar by reason of the facts elicited in the inquiry into the Department of Printing and Stationery. And, so far as that department is concerned, he did not cite a single case requiring attention that had not been attended to as a result of the inquiry I conducted, beginning nearly two years and a half ago, into the affairs of that department. At the outset, the hon. gentleman propounded a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. He cited a number of deeds of commission and omission on the part of officials in the Printing Bureau, and asked the Prime Minister whether, if he could prove these things, the Prime Minister would grant an inquiry. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman merely made a summary of what I had brought out in that investigation. Every word uttered was taken bodily from the report which has been before parliament since November last. I challenge him or any other hon. gentleman on that side to dispute my statement.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Has the hon. gentleman (Mr. Murphy) ever heard of the Auditor General's Report? I quoted very fully from that.

Mr. MURPHY. I will come to the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. NORTHRUP. The hon. gentleman should not make the statement he is making.

Mr. MURPHY. In making that statement, I am supported by the facts. I am confining myself to the list of deeds of commission and omission which was cited by the hon. member at the beginning of his speech, when he propounded a question to the Prime Minister, and asked him to say whether, if these things were proven, he, the Prime Minister, would grant an inquiry. That is what I am dealing with, and I repeat, in regard to that, that every word uttered by the hon. member was found in the report which has been before parliament since November last. Therefore, how ridiculous it is on the part of the hon. member to cite matters which are now ancient history, to rise in this House and propound such a question to the Prime Minister as if what he proposed to cite was the result of labours of his own and to ask whether, in the event of his being able to prove these things an inquiry would be granted. Why, all these things were proven in the course of my investigation. That is the only way the hon. gentleman knew about them. Never by any industry or assiduity of his own could he have found them out. He comes here and poses before you and the House, and gravely asks if an inquiry will be granted on these things being proven. Why, Sir, not only have these things been discovered, but the people guilty of them have been punished, and the wrong practices that prevailed in connection with them have been stopped. There is absolutely no support for the position taken by the hon. member this afternoon except that indicated by the newspapers that support him namely, the disappointment which they have shown ever since the facts were made public, because of what might have happened to help their political fortunes if they had been alert enough to get the conduct of this inquiry.

The hon. gentleman did me the honour to quote somewhat fully from my report as it appears from page 1 to page 8 in the volume that was presented to parliament in November last. He made these quotations for the purpose, as his after remarks proved, of showing that certain other departments had arrogated to themselves the right to get their own printing done, and from that he argued that they had invaded the territory of the Printing Bureau, and he, forsooth, assumes the attitude of the friend and champion of the Printing Bureau. We appreciate his interest, but we are not in need of his championship. Let me inform the hon. gentleman that after all the months that he has put in upon this work he would have been better advised if he had paid less attention to the information that was given him by the gentleman whose name he quoted a number of times during his speech and to whom I will refer a little later on. In connection with the matter now being immediately dealt with, the reason that the other departments were from time to time forced to get their printing done otherwise than through the Printing Bureau was due to the ineffective methods pursued, principally by the gentlemen on whom my hon. friend places so much reliance to make a case in the present instance against the management of the Printing Bureau. Take, for instance, the Interior Department in connection with its immigration work. Immigration literature is required in a great hurry; if it is not turned out within the time specified by that department, that literature is practically of no value. When the Interior Department found in years past that their requests in that regard were not attended to at the Printing Bureau, they were of necessity forced to notify the Bureau that they would get their own printing done and supervise its speedy issue themselves. That is not a matter for which they could be blamed. True, it is contrary to the Act, but the immigration work is so important that the printing of this literature would not wait. I point out to my hon. friend that the man who was responsible for the giving out of that work and for the delay, is the man with whom my hon. friend and some other hon. gentlemen opposite have been incubating since that man was dismissed last fall for incompetence, dishonesty and falsehood.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

MONTREAL PARK AND ISLAND RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. ECREMENT moved the third reading of Bill (No. 45) respecting the Montreal Park and Island Railway Company.

Mr. MONK. I have a motion to recommit the Bill to the Committee of the Whole. I do not know if the promoter of the Bill, the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Ecrement), has any objection to its recommittal. If not it might be recommitted and I will explain in committee the nature of the amendment I desire to propose. If my hon. friend has any objection to the recommittal of the Bill I will explain it now. It would save time if it were recommitted and then we could discuss the amendment in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ECREMENT. I have no objection at all.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I think it would meet the wishes of the people and our people if he would just amend the Bill a little more and say that the company cannot operate in any city or town without first obtaining the permission of the authorities.

Mr. MONK. That is what I was intending to propose. I think that is satisfactory if it is satisfactory to you.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I think it will be satisfactory to everybody and then my hon. friend (Mr. Ecrement), can get his Bill through to-night.

Mr. MONK. I will move in committee in order to make that change. There is no objection to the motion. Then, I beg to move, Mr. Speaker:

That all the words after the word 'that' in the main motion be omitted and the following substituted therefor:

That said Bill be not now read the third time but be referred back for further consideration to the Committee of the Whole with instructions to (a) erase the word 'sixteen' in the fourth line of section 1 and in lieu thereof to substitute the word 'fourteen'; (b) add the following clause: 'The company will not construct upon any road or public highway in any municipality without first obtaining from the municipality having jurisdiction on said road or highway its consent expressed by by-law.'

Mr. SPROULE. If the Bill is recommitted I think the standard amendment should be inserted that we put in all these Bills providing that the company shall only build and operate with the consent of the municipality by by-law and upon such terms as the municipality may agree to. We put that into two Bills in the Railway Committee to-day and we put it into all Bills of this character. If we insert it in this instance we shall have a standard clause in this Bill the same as we have in the others.

Mr. MONK. I think this is the clause generally added in the Railway Committee. This is what is given to me by the clerk of the Railway Committee as the general clause. Of course that the consent will be on the conditions which the municipality may impose goes without saying.

Mr. BRODEUR. In view of the fact that there is some divergence of opinion as to the nature of the amendment which should be proposed in the committee, I think that if my hon. friend (Mr. Monk), instead of moving that the Bill be referred to the committee with instructions to do this and to do that, simply moved that the Bill should be referred to the committee to consider further the said Bill, without any instructions, we would be able better to deal with the question.

Mr. SPEAKER. Mr. Monk moves:

That the said Bill be not now read the third time but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole for further consideration.

Motion agreed to, and House went again into committee.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Do the committee desire that it be taken up section by section?

Mr. MONK. I think it would help the committee to understand more easily the purport of this legislation if I just briefly refer to the history of this Park and Island Railway Company, to indicate the course of legislation. The company has a provincial origin. It was incorporated in 1885 by chapter 74 of 48 Victoria, Quebec. By section 2 the company was prohibited from building within an acre of the Turnpike Trust roads on the island of Montreal or on any highway within the city of Montreal without the consent of the Turnpike Trust in the one case and of the city in the other. I may say that the object of the company was to extend electric lines outside the city of Montreal and over the island of Montreal in the counties of Laval and Jacques Cartier. By chapter 85 of 49-50 Victoria, Quebec, sanctioned on the 21st June, 1886, the Act of 1885 was amended, but the restrictions that I have just indicated about building on the Turnpike Trust roads or within the city were renewed. Furthermore, it was decreed that the works contemplated upon the island of Montreal were to be begun within five years of 1886. In 1893, by chapter 65 of 56 Victoria, Quebec, assented to on the 27th of February, section 3, provision was made that the works contemplated by the Act of incorporation were to be executed within five years of the coming into force of the Act. On the 27th February, 1893, five years were granted for the execution of the work. But in the following year the company came under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament by chapter 24 of 57-58 Victoria, sanctioned on the 23rd of July, 1894. It was provided, in section 2 of the Act, that the company, as organized and constituted by the provincial legislature of Quebec, was to become subject to the parliament of Canada and the Railway Act of Canada without decreeing that the enterprise is in the general interest of Canada. By section 8, certain restrictions already referred to in favour of the Turnpike Trust and the city of Montreal were renewed. In 1896 the parliament of Canada again amended the Act of 1894, but this amendment only concerned the internal administration of the company. In 1906, finally, by chapter 129 of 6 Edward VII, assented to on the 26th June of that year, it was decreed that the company's works were to be finished before the 1st July, 1911, to which date the termination of the works contemplated by the company was extended. But in section 6 of the Act of 1906, it was enacted that:

Notwithstanding in this Act or in the company's charter, the company shall not construct any part of its railway or tramway along the streets of any municipality without the consent being first obtained by by-law from the municipality.

The object of the amendments I desire to propose is twofold. In the first place I would like parliament to put a shorter limit on the execution of these works. I have stated that in 1886 the provincial legislature, which then had jurisdiction over this company, fixed the extreme limit of five years for the beginning of the work. By the statute of 1893 of Quebec the limit was fixed at five years from the date of the sanction of that statute and that delay expired on the 27th of February, 1898. The company had come under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament by Act of 1906, and it was provided that the undertaking should be finally terminated on or before the 1st of July, 1911, next coming. I remember the discussion in the House at that time, and I pleaded for a shorter delay, but parliament extended the delay to the 1st of July, 1911. On the island of Montreal, where the works of this company are contemplated, we require immediate transportation facilities. The city is extending in every direction, the facilities to reach the city are insufficient, and there is no reason why we should at this late hour renew the delay which we considered satisfactory five years ago, and which ought to be final. I, therefore, submit that the delay be limited to three years, and that it shall expire in 1914 instead of 1916. At the inception of this company there was difficulty in financing it, but the company is now practically under control of the Montreal Street Railway Company, and a complete merger has been sanctioned in the case of the Montreal Street Railway by a statute passed at the last session of the Quebec legislature. This company will therefore have behind it or with it all the resources of the Montreal street railway, and there is no reason for granting such an extension of time as is asked for by the Bill now before us. I therefore move:

That the word 'sixteen' in the fourth line of section 1 of the Bill be erased and that the word 'fourteen' be substituted in lieu thereof.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I have a compromise to suggest. As our hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) says, the company cannot operate in any city or town without having the permission of the municipality, but I do not know that that would apply out in country places.

Mr. SPROULE. It does not apply out in country places.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I would suggest, if my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) will accept it, and I think it would be satisfactory to the promoters, that the company shall not operate its railway in any city or town without first obtaining the consent by by-law of the proper authorities, and then we could split the difference by making the delay expire in 1815. I think that would be satisfactory to the parties interested, and it would protect the cities and towns which my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) and I are both interested in.

Mr. MONK. I intended making the question of municipal control the subject of another amendment.

Mr. SPROULE. In the case of a certain railway passing through the city of Toronto, the original Bill—and I think it passed exactly as I have it here—contained this clause:

The company shall not construct its railway or any extension thereof along, under, above or across any highway or public place within the limits of the city of Toronto without first obtaining the consent expressed by by-law of the city of Toronto, and upon such terms to be agreed upon by the said city.

I draw special attention to the fact that not only was it provided that it must be by by-law of the municipality, but it must be upon such terms as the municipality agrees to. It has been held by the courts that when a railway is chartered, although there is a provision that the municipality must consent, still the municipality must consent upon terms that will enable the railway company to carry out the undertaking. That was not considered a sufficient guarantee for the protection of municipal interests, and this amendment was, therefore, proposed and has since been incorporated in more than one Bill.

Mr. MONK. You must suppose that the municipality will only consent on terms acceptable to the ratepayers of the municipality, and, therefore, I deem that provision surplusage. The amendment I have proposed was given to me by the clerk of the Railway Committee as being the one that was generally adopted.

Mr. SPROULE. I drew attention to this question many years ago in the case of the Bell Telephone Company. Its charter read that it must have the consent of the municipalities to go through them, but a municipal corporation restricted it in the matter of cutting shade trees, and the courts finally decided that the municipalities could not put on any restrictions which would make the charter of the company unworkable. It seems to me that the special reasons which actuated the insertion of this clause in the Toronto Railway Bill would apply equally to Montreal, because it is a large city which must have a defined plan for its electric railways and highway traffic. It seems to me that such a clause as this would better protect the city.

Mr. MONK. I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) is aware of the local conditions in Montreal. A railway authorized by charter to go from one place to another cannot be prevented by unreasonable restrictions from carrying out its charter, but in this case we are dealing with a tramway company which is establishing a network of tramways over the island of Montreal, and not so much going through the municipalities as serving these municipalities in the execution of its own charter. The case is, therefore, somewhat different. As to the suggestion made by my hon. friend (Mr. Bickerdike), does he think we are justified in making a distinction between a town municipality and a village municipality? The principle is the same for a small municipality as for a large one, particularly with respect to tramways. In a case of this kind it is more important that the tramway company should have the consent of a small municipality, because the company will be disposed to give as small and insufficient a service as possible to a small municipality, where the traffic is not very great, in return for the permission to extend its franchise into that municipality. In the island of Montreal there are municipalities which are not town municipalities, and laying down this principle, I do not think we should make any distinction between small municipalities and large.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. MONK. This is the amendment which I wish to suggest in regard to the other point:

To add to the Bill now under consideration the following clause: The company will not construct upon any road or public highway in any municipality, without first obtaining from the municipality having jurisdiction on such road or highway, its consent expressed by by-law.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I think our hon. friend from Jacques Cartier is not asking for as good protection for the municipalities as I am in my amendment, which reads:

A company shall not construct or operate its railway in any city, town, or village (if the hon. gentleman wishes to add the word) without obtaining consent expressed by by-law from the proper parties.

Mr. MONK. If my hon. friend will put in the words ' any municipality,' I am satisfied.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I think that would perhaps be going a little too far, as some small municipalities might prevent the railway going through. I think the words ' any city, town or village,' fairly cover the case, and I think such an amendment would be satisfactory to the promoters of the Bill and to the railway company itself.

Mr. MONK. I would be quite prepared to accept my hon. friend's amendment, but I do not see that it fully meets the case. A parish, which is not included, has very often interests to protect which are larger than those of a small municipality. My hon. friend knows that situated as we are on the island of Montreal, no municipality of any kind would vexatiously obstruct the progress of the company. I think it is more prudent to leave in the word referring to municipal authorities generally, and not confine the provision simply to towns.

Mr. FIELDING. I noticed when the hon. member for Jacques Cartier was referring to the early history of this enterprise, that he mentioned that there was a provision that the company should not construct a line across or along the roads of the Montreal Turnpike Trust without their permission. I would like to ask him if that condition remains unchanged or is affected by this Bill?

Mr. MONK. I think the provision disappears now from the legislation, and I will tell you why. The Bill now before the committee says that the company will continue its work subject to section 1 of chapter 129 of 1906; that is the last statute passed. In that statute there is only one restriction imposed on the company; it shall not build within the Mount Royal Park of Montreal. It is true, in previous statutes there is the restriction referred to by the Finance Minister as regards the rights of the Turnpike Trust; but that does not reappear in this Act, and, as a matter of fact, to-day the Turnpike Trust is ceding its rights to the municipalities on conditions made in each separate case. I presume it is for that reason that in this Bill the consent of the Montreal Turnpike Trust is not provided for.

Mr. FIELDING. I quite agree that it is desirable that the Turnpike Trust should carry out the policy which my hon. friend has indicated, so that the roads should become public roads; but if it was desirable to have that clause in at an earlier stage, it seems to me that it would have been only reasonable that the Turnpike Trust should have been notified of the proposed change. It seems hardly reasonable to legislate it out of all control without being made aware of the fact.

Mr. MONK. That restriction exists in the previous Act.

Mr. BRODEUR. If there is any doubt about the rights of the Turnpike Trust being preserved, would it not be advisable to insert in the amendment of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, after the word 'municipalities' in the last line but one the words 'or the Montreal Turnpike Trust having jurisdiction over the said highways or other public place.' I think that would meet the objection which has been raised.

Mr. MONK. I do not ask for it, but I have no objection.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I move in amendment to the amendment that:

The company shall not construct or operate a railway in any city, town, or village without first obtaining the consent, expressed by by-law of the proper authorities.

Mr. NESBITT. Why does my hon. friend object to the word 'municipality.' Surely they all have the same rights.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I quite agree with my hon. friend, but there are some little municipalities that might object and prevent a road going around the island of Montreal, and I do not want any parish to stop the road.

Mr. SPROULE. Safeguard against that by saying 'city, town or village.'

Mr. MONK. I think that the words 'proper authorities' would cover the case mentioned by the Minister of Finance because the proper authority to build on a turnpike trust road is the Turnpike Trust. But where I cannot accept the amendment is that it does not include a parish municipality, but limits it to town or village, and leaves out the parish which covers a much greater area.

Mr. SPROULE. Just use the word 'municipality,' and you cover the whole of it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The amendment is that the company shall not construct or operate a railway in any city, town or village without first obtaining the consent expressed by by-law of the proper authorities.

Mr. BRODEUR. I am afraid this amendment goes further than the committee would be disposed to go. It proposes that a railway shall not be built in any municipality without its consent. That would mean that if there be any objection on the part of one small municipality, the work would have to be stopped. Take the case of St. Anne's. St. Anne's desires some day to have a railway going there, but some intervening municipality might block that railway should this amendment be adopted. I think that the consent of the municipality should be exacted only where the railway companies build along the streets or public roadways.

Mr. NESBITT. Why not adopt the regular standard clause, which we put in all railway Bills the last two or three years, namely, that the railway shall not go along any highway without the consent of the municipality.

Mr. BRODEUR. I am entirely in accord with that suggestion.

Mr. MONK. The amendment of the hon. member for St. Lawrence division (Mr. Bickerdike) would apply in the case where a tramway does not touch the road at all but goes through the expropriated lands of private individuals.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I do not want to place any awkward restrictions on the company, but the municipality ought to have something to say as to when a railway should cross and and how it should cross. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries suggests that this restriction should apply only to streets. I have no objection if it applies to crossing the streets as well as going along the streets.

Mr. MONK. I think we had better adopt the usual enactment and not compel the tramway company, if it does not touch a public road, to deal with the municipalities.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. Perhaps we had better simply adopt the standard clause.

Mr. MONK. That is the best.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The amendment before the Chair now is as follows:

The company shall not construct or operate its railway along any highway, street or any other public place without first obtaining the consent, expressed by by-law, of the municipality having jurisdiction over such highway or other public place and upon terms to be agreed upon with such municipality.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. The only objection I have to that is that we do not bind them to get consent for their crossing. There is just as much danger at the crossings as along the streets.

Mr. NESBITT. We might as well say that they shall not build without the consent of the municipality at all. For my part, I could not consent to that, and—it is not uniform, it is not usual. We have fought this clause out dozens of times in the Railway Committee, and it has been in all railway charters for the last three years.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. But, I appeal to my hon. friend (Mr. Nesbitt), does he know any case where a tramway runs in Ontario without the permission of the municipality? This is not a steam railway, but a tramway, a street railway. Not only should the municipality have the right to say where it shall go, but they should have the right to fix the rates they should charge.

Mr. NESBITT. This is what has been quarrelled over by the city of Toronto in the Railway Committee for three years past. And we insisted that they should not have the whole say as to what they should charge, and where they should go.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the provision was made in the case of Toronto that no road should be constructed except with the consent of the municipality expressed by by-law, and upon such plans as were agreed upon. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) says he sees no reason why they should prohibit the crossing. In going into the city of Montreal from the west you cross 15 or 20 streets on a high level crossing. The streets are below, and the people pass along them free from danger. But if you allow this tramway to cross the same streets, would you not give the municipality power to say, if desired, that they must cross either above or below the street level so as not to interfere with the use of the streets or increase the danger to those using them. In cities whose thoroughfares are crowded this is very important. Municipalities are responsible for the highways, and if people were injured, in many cases, the corporation might be mulcted in damages. There is every reason why, in a great city like Montreal there should be power in the municipality to make the railways run in a way to avoid as far as possible interfering with the thoroughfare?

Mr. BICKERDIKE. Is not that the general clause now?

Mr. NESBITT. There was a special clause drawn for Toronto.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand that all amendments have been dropped except the one of the hon. member for Montreal, St. Lawrence (Mr. Bickerdike)—and, perhaps I should ask the 'Hansard' reporter to report the exact words I shall speak. Shall this proposed clause carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Carried.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I did not catch whether the word 'across' is in that amendment or not?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I will read it:

The company shall not construct or operate its railway along any highway, street or other public place without first obtaining the consent, expressed by by-law, of the municipality having jurisdiction over such highway or other public place and upon terms to be agreed upon by such municipality.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I think the word 'across' should be there.

Mr. MONK. Does not my hon. friend think that is covered?

Mr. BICKERDIKE. No, 'across' is not mentioned.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. No, I will have to vote against that if I have to vote alone. I do not see why this company should have any advantage over any other company. If the regulation states 'across or along' or 'along or across', why is the word 'across' left out in this particular case. I cannot understand why my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) objects.

Mr. MONK. I have no objection whatever. I thought it was covered.

Mr. BRODEUR. I understand this is a clause that has been put in several Bills of the same character, and I ask why in this case we should change the phraseology which has been considered very seriously by the committee. I think that perhaps in this case as in all the others we should have a uniform clause.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. It is a uniform clause.

Mr. BRODEUR. No, I do not think 'across' is in the other, and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier has just stated that this is the standard clause.

Mr. MONK. It is the clause given me by the clerk of the committee.

Mr. BRODEUR. In that case I have reason to suppose that this clause has been drafted according to the usual terms which are used. We had better, perhaps, confine ourselves to that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member moved——

Mr. SPROULE. This is the standard clause put in some Bills, but we made exception in regard to the city of Toronto, and, in my judgment, the same exceptions to that are applicable to the city of Montreal. I have before me the clause placed in a Bill that was considered to-day. It refers to a railway far back in rural Ontario and Quebec. It provides that the company shall not construct and operate its railway along any highway, street, or other public place without first obtaining the consent by by-law of the municipality having jurisdiction over such street, highway or other public place, and upon terms to be agreed upon with such municipality. When we came to the cities of Toronto and Hamilton, we made a further description and put in the word 'across' as well

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I move that 'across' be added.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is moved that after the word 'along' be added the words——

Mr. BICKERDIKE. 'Or across'.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. 'Or across'. Shall this proposed amendment carry? Carried.

Mr. BRODEUR. I move the following:

The company shall not construct or operate its railway along any highway under the control of the Montreal Turnpike Trust without first obtaining the consent of the said corporation.

Mr. FIELDING. Better make it uniform—add 'across'.

Mr. MONK. Here is the difficulty I see in that clause. In many cases, the Montreal Turnpike Trust has handed over in perpetuity its road to the municipality. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) will remember that that applies in the case of Westmount, it applies also in the case of Cote St. Paul. And parts of the Turnpike Trust road have been handed over to the municipality of Montreal. These roads are not any longer under the control of the Turnpike Trust, though that corporation remains the owner of the land.

Mr. BRODEUR,

Mr. FIELDING. Would my hon. friend think they would not come under the preceding clause, that they would be held now to be municipal roads?

Mr. MONK. It is upon that question that I have some doubt, and I think there is room for a great deal of litigation. I do not know if you could maintain in a case of that kind that it would be necessary to obtain the consent of the Montreal Turnpike Trust. They would still have an interest in the road, they would still own it but would have transferred the road subject to certain conditions to the municipalities, and it seems unjust to compel the railway to obtain their consent when they do not control the road.

Mr. FIELDING. I would not desire that, I was referring to roads still under their control. I quite agree that in a case of Westmount, these roads having passed now to the control of the municipalities, should be dealt with as municipal roads.

Mr. MONK. It might be well to add a word to that effect.

Mr. FIELDING. It might read: which remain under the control. This would show that there was a distinction.

Mr. MONK. I think that would be satisfactory.

Section as amended, agreed to.

Mr. ECREMENT moved that the following section be inserted:

16a. The company may enter into an agreement with the Montreal Street Railway Company, the Montreal Terminal Railway Company, the Public Service Corporation and Montreal Tramways Company for conveying or leasing to such companies or to either of them, in whole or in part, its undertaking, including its charter, contracts, franchises, powers, privileges, exemptions and also the lands, railways, tramways, right-of-way, surveys, plans, works, plant, machinery and other property to it belonging, or for a consolidation with either of such companies, on such terms and conditions as are agreed upon, and subject to such restrictions as the directors see fit; provided that such agreement has been first sanctioned by the majority of the holders of the shares issued by the company, present or represented by proxy at a special general meeting of the shareholders of the company duly called to consider the same.

Mr. MONK. I do not want to open up a discussion of that question, but I would call the attention of the government to the fact that this contemplates a merger of all the electric companies on the Island of Montreal. If that merger is carried out under the conditions which generally accompany mergers of this kind, it will result in a very large over-capitalization of the new company, and necessitate heavier burdens or charges upon those who will use those railways.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. This legislation has been passed by the legislature of Quebec, and, as my hon. friend knows, water is now so scarce that they do not use it at all in those mergers.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE PRINTING BUREAU.

House resumed on motion for Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock I was dealing with certain reasons adduced by the hon. member for East Hastings in support of the motion which he presented to the House this afternoon, and that branch of my remarks I now desire to resume. In the course of his observations the hon. gentleman cited as one of the reasons why his motion should be adopted that requisitions for supplies had in the past been sent to the Printing Bureau which had not been signed by the proper officials. It is true that to some extent that did prevail, and having regard to the number of these requisitions and the magnitude of the business done between the departments and the Printing Bureau, it would be surprising if at some time or other some irregularity of that kind did not arise. But what my hon. friend failed to inform the House was that this also was a matter which was dealt with in the report, not in one place but in several places, and I am now in a position to assure you and the House that the practice has been completely stopped. Precautions have been taken not only in the departments themselves, but also in the Printing Bureau to prevent a recurrence of that practice. It did not prevail to any great extent at any time, but it has now been completely stopped.

Another trouble mentioned by the hon. member for East Hastings was that of, as he styled it, sending in proof improperly. He referred, no doubt, to what is technically known among printers as bad copy. That subject also is dealt with in several parts of the report before parliament, and one of the most important recommendations made by the experts who assisted in the investigation at the Printing Bureau deals with that very matter. The recommendation in question is, in my opinion, such an important one, that I would ask the indulgence of the House for a moment while I read a very brief extract from the report upon it. At page 40 of the joint report of Messrs. Hyde and O'Connor, there will be found recommendation No. 3 under the heading of 'Improved Copy.' There they say:

> Bad copy, editing in the proof and the revise, and revision of French translation are not defects in the management of the Printing Bureau, but are evidences of slipshod work on the part of the officers of parliament and of the departments of the government where the material to be printed originates. Nevertheless, it appears to us that a recommendation upon the subject is pertinent to our report.

Then, after considering what has been done in this regard by other countries and mentioning particularly what has been done by the Imperial Sessional Committee at Westminster, the two experts, to whom I have just referred, proceed in their recommendations as set out on page 41 of the report:

> Hence a different remedy must be applied, and in our opinion it is advisable, in the interests not only of the proper management of the Printing Bureau, but of the conduct of the printing business of parliament and of all the departments of the government, that there should be some body, bureau, committee, or commission charged with the following duties:—
> 1. Supervision of the material to be included in departmental reports.
> 2. Supervision of copy for reports and other publications.
> 3. Supervision of the translation of all reports and publications.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as you will observe, this matter mentioned by the hon. member in support of his motion, is one that is very particularly dealt with in this report. The remedy that is here prescribed for the evil is one which is deserving of the serious consideration of this House. Briefly, what is here proposed is that there should be established, between the Printing Bureau, on the one hand, and parliament and the departments on the other hand, a clearing house to which all copy from parliament, and the different departments should be sent. In that bureau, committee, or, for the sake of more apt illustration, clearing house, as I prefer to call it, there would be a corps of officials especially skilled in dealing with work of that class. If copy was not in proper condition to be sent to the Bureau it would be sent back to the department from which it came in order to have the necessary corrections made. Such a bureau or clearing house would also perform another very necessary function, if properly manned, and there would be no trouble in having it properly manned. If the officials now doing work of this character in the different departments and in the offices of parliament were all assembled in such a bureau they would perform another necessary work namely that of supervising translations from one official language to another. If that were done the work of these departments and parliament would, in my opinion, not only be very much simplified, but there would also be a very great saving to the country and the standard of our official publications would be materially raised.

That, Sir, is one of the matters which I shall ask the special joint committee, that I hope this parliament will later appoint, to deal with particularly. In this regard might I also point out that the experts whom I have mentioned make another recommendation dealing with this very evil and, as a remedy within the Bureau itself, they suggest the appointment of an officer who would have charge of composition—the comptroller of composition, I believe, he is called. I may say, Sir, that such an officer has been appointed.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Who is it?

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. P. M. Draper.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Was he an official of the department?

Mr. MURPHY. An official of the department and one of the most capable officials employed therein. He has been appointed comptroller of composition so that there also another recommendation of the experts has been acted upon and effect given to it. My hon. friend quoted some material sent from the Department of Militia and Defence and founded some argument upon the condition of the copy as a further reason why his motion should be adopted. If my memory serves me correctly, the copy to which he referred was copy furnished for the publication known as the King's Regulations. Regarding the printing of that volume a difference of opinion arose during the inquiry between the former Superintendent of Printing, Mr. McMahon, and the gentleman who had charge of this outside work—Mr. Cook. It appeared from the evidence that Mr. Cook had sent this work to be done at an outside office, and a great many of the difficulties encountered in connection with the printing of the volume were due to the work having been sent outside. The former Superintendent of Printing contended that it could have been done just as well in the Bureau, and cited in support of his contention the fact that the French edition of the book was being printed in the Bureau at the time that work was given out.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Who sent it out?

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Cook, so that, if there is any fault to be found in that regard it is a matter for which Mr. Cook was responsible. The bad copy that afterwards was mentioned, the changes that were made in connection with the work and the resulting increase in the cost were explained by the Department of Militia and Defence and it was simply one of those occurrences that are bound to happen in connection with a publication of that character.

Now, my hon. friend made a reference to the letting of a contract for a publication called Farm Weeds by Mr. Cook, and said that after the contract had been made another official went around the different offices in the United States and Canada, and got prices to lay before the minister. Inadvertently my hon. friend quoted the wrong publication. It was not Farm Weeds, but another publication called Farm Grasses. In connection with that transaction it might be well for me to give the House somewhat full details, so that hon. members may appreciate exactly what kind of a gentleman Mr. Cook is, and what trouble such a gentleman can make for the officials at the head of a department. It will also be of some interest to the House to get these details in view of the fact that the hon. member for East Hastings, and possibly one or two of his associates, have pinned their political faith to Mr. Cook now that the bottom has dropped out of the anti-reciprocity league.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Who are the associates?

Mr. MURPHY. I presume the course of this debate will reveal who they are. Now, Mr. Speaker, there was a publication called Farm Weeds issued by the Department of Agriculture and supposed to be printed at the Printing Bureau; at least, the work was sent to the Bureau to be excuted. The arrangement in connection with that publication was that the lithographing was to be done by the Toronto Lithographing Company, and the printing and binding by the Printing Bureau. When the book was issued an early copy was sent to my office, and in looking through it I noticed that the imprint of the King's Printer, which is supposed to appear on the first page of all official publications, was absent. I made inquiry about that and was told that it was an oversight and that care would be taken to see that it did not occur again. So that at the time the book was issued I was again given the impression that the work had been done partly by the Toronto Lithographing Company, in so far as the lithographing was concerned, and partly by the Printing Bureau, in so far as the printing and binding were concerned. Later on, in answer to a question by some hon. member opposite, I heard my colleague the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) state that the Mortimer Company, I think it was, had been paid a certain amount for doing some work in connection with this publication.

That started me making further inquiries and eventually I found that the book had not been printed or bound in the Printing

Bureau at all as had been originally arranged, but that the printing and binding had been done by the Mortimer Company. There was a still further inquiry and I discovered that this change in the arrangement had been made by Mr. Cook without my knowledge and approval, and, as I believe, without the knowledge or approval of the King's Printer at the time the book was presented to me. Having had that experience with Mr. Cook, when this new publication called 'Farm Grasses' was proposed, I was naturally somewhat careful to see that at the beginning the work was started properly. I insisted that tenders be asked for, notwithstanding the assurances that were given me over and over again that there was only one firm in this country that could do that work. Without my knowledge or approval Mr. Cook went to Toronto, and, on February 28th, 1910, he gave the contract for that work to the Toronto Lithographing Company. On the 26th March, 1910, I made inquiry as to the obtaining of competitive prices for which I had asked, and to that inquiry I received no reply. Two weeks later I inquired again, and then Mr. Cook, accompanied by the King's Printer came to my office. Cook had some figures which he said had been supplied by the Toronto Lithographing Company and which I declined to consider as there were no other prices produced. He said something on that occasion about paper having been ordered and as that excited my suspicion. I made inquiry later on and heard at the Bureau that Mr. Cook had been in Toronto and that some arrangement had been made with the Toronto Lithographing Company, but just exactly what, no person seemed to know. To protect the department and myself, I then wrote to the Toronto Lithographing Company stating I had heard in an indefinite way that an official had gone to their place of business and had made some arrangement with them regarding the paper, and that as he had done so without any authority the department and its head would not recognize any transaction that might have been entered into by him. Some weeks later Mr. Cook again made his appearance in my office and produced a typewritten sheet on which he had placed a list of alleged tenders that he had received for this work. I demanded that I would be shown the invitations to tender and the replies. He did not have either invitations or replies. I then inquired how he got these prices, and he said he had gone around and got them verbally. Not to make the narrative too long, the fact is that Mr. Cook had given that contract to the Toronto Lithographing Company on the 28th of February, 1910, that he had paid these visits to my office and had misled me in the way I have described, knowing perfectly well that the Toronto Lithographing Company had been engaged on that work all during the month of March and part of the month of April. I have here the official file with the letters that passed back and forth from the Toronto Lithographing Company to the Printing Bureau; those from the Printing Bureau being either signed or dictated for signature by Mr. Cook, and notwithstanding that fact up to the end of April he continued to act towards me as if nothing at all had been done in connection with that contract, and as if he had bona fide got these tenders a summary of which he produced in my office. As I was still in doubt as to the strange proceeding that was being carried on, I made further inquiry, and later on I found that a number of the firms whose names appeared on Cook's list had not only not submitted tenders but had not been asked to tender. Finally to get a record of the transaction I wrote to all the firms asking them to let me know just what had transpired between them and Mr. Cook. One of the firms to which I wrote, and the name of which appeared on the summary of tenders, was the Mortimer Company, of Ottawa. When the firm received my letter, Mr. William Mortimer went to the Printing Bureau and there saw Mr. Cook and produced my letter of inquiry. Mr. Cook told him that was all right, and said he would go into the King's Printer with him, but later he said that Mr. Mortimer should not come in but should wait for his return. Mr. Cook went into the office of the King's Printer alone, and later returned with two letters which he had presented to the King's Printer for signature. Although both of these letters were written in the middle of June, both were dated back to the 22nd of April, the day on which Cook had obtained the alleged tender from the Mortimer Company. These letters he handed Mr. Mortimer, the one asking the firm to submit a tender for the lithographing work in connection with 'Farm Grasses,' and the other asking them to submit a price per pound at which they would be prepared to supply the paper. Now, the circumstances under which the firm did hand in the alleged tender are set out in the letter which was read this afternoon by the hon. member for Hastings, and at this stage I need not further refer to it. Then Cook carried out a similar performance with the Toronto Lithographing Company. Mr. Speaker, what will you and this House think of a man, who, having given a contract to the Toronto Lithographing Company on the 28th of February, 1910, wrote that company on the 11th of June, 1910, dating the letter back to the 28th of February, and going through the solemn farce of asking the company which he knew had been doing the work through the month of March and part of the month of April to submit a tender for the lithographing and for the paper. With the letter that he sent that company on the 11th of June, he, without the knowledge of the King's Printer, sent the following letter as well:

Ottawa, June 11, 1910.

Gentlemen,—The enclosed letter is purely formal, being simply to place on file the facts concerning my submission of the 'Farm Grass' drawing and the specifications for printing and paper for same. The matter is now being taken up by our minister, and I hope in the course of a few days to be able to inform you as to whether you are the successful tenderer or not.

Yours truly,

R. E. COOK,

For Supt. Printing.

Imagine a man writing such a letter as that on the 11th of June, 1910, when he had given the firm a contract for the work on the 28th of February, 1910; when he had received letter after letter throughout the month of March from that firm showing the progress that they had made on the work; when he had gone to that firm and taken the copy away from them, and made an arrangement with them to return it so that they might proceed with the work.

I leave you, Sir, and this House, to characterize conduct of that kind as it ought to be characterized. But it will probably be illuminating if I direct the attention of the House to one or two other letters written by the same gentleman to other firms with whom he had the same kind of dealings. One of the firms from whom he got a price was the firm of Stahl & Jaeger, of New York. It appears that when he visited them, they gave him certain specimens of their work, and on the 24th of May they wrote to him this letter:

Dear Sir,—We gave you our estimate April 20 for furnishing your coloured plate, will you kindly advise us if the contract has been given out. We gave you a sheet of Vases, specimen of our printing, will you kindly return same to us and oblige,

Yours very truly,

STAHL & JAEGER.

To that letter Mr. Cook sent this reply:

Ottawa, May 25, 1910.

Gentlemen,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday re coloured plates, for which I have your estimate.

In reply, I have to say that owing to the death of King Edward, which has caused a lot of extra work, and the absence from the city of our minister, the Secretary of State, the contract has not yet been awarded. As soon as the successful tenderer is known you will be advised of the fact. Regarding your specimens, I will have to ask you to let them remain with me until the matter of the contract is settled, when they will be returned to you.

Yours very truly,

R. E. COOK,

For Supt. of Printing.

On the 11th of June, 1910, he also wrote Stahl & Jaeger one of the stock letters which he sent to the other firms from whom he had received the prices which he set out in the summary, produced to me as a set of tenders which he had received for this work. All the prices were received in practically the same way, and they were all of the character of that described in the letter from the Mortimer Company which the hon. member for Hastings read this afternoon. Now, Sir, when the hon. member read that letter, he asked, in a burst of simulated indignation, 'Is it possible to think that a firm would sign such a letter?' Certainly it is. There was nothing strange about that firm signing a letter of that kind. When the members of the firm and I got together and compared notes, and each found how the other had been deceived, there was nothing remarkable about it at all. It had been represented to the firm by Mr. Cook, in his great solicitude to protect the minister—and here I should tell the House that the statement made to the different firms was that the minister was having trouble with his colleagues about this contract—and some of my colleagues who are listening to me now are hearing about it for the first time—that as the contract was over $5,000, the minister might be asked a question about it, and he wanted to fix up the file. And this gentleman, in order to assist his minister if you please, to carry out a dishonest transaction, extracted these prices from these different firms, and got the alleged tender from the Mortimer Company. What more natural than that the Mortimer Company, when they found out all the facts in their interview with me, were willing to write that letter, and gave it to me to place on file as I did in connection with the evidence given by Mr. Wm. Mortimer, and as it appears in the volume presented to the House in November last.

The hon. member for Hastings, in the course of his further observations, read my letter of the 27th of November, 1908, as it appears in this published report, and then drew attention to the fact that what he called the evidence as reported here was first taken in June, 1910, and from these two circumstances he deduced this argument, that either the minister failed to do anything between November, 1908, and June, 1910, or if he had done anything, then he had suppressed what had been done. Well, Mr. Speaker, that deduction was just as unfounded as all the rest of my hon. friend's speech. It suited my hon. friend's purpose to deal with this report as though it were something that was available to his hands for the purpose in which he was engaged to-day, but that it was not to serve any other purpose whatever. He would treat it as existent or non-existent just as it suited his purpose. Well, Sir, I object to that use of this report; I put too much time upon it, I spent too many days and nights in its preparation, to allow it to be used in any such way; and while it may suit the purpose of my hon. friend to use a part of the report and ignore the great bulk of it, I do not intend to let him escape with tactics of that kind. If he had taken the trouble to read this report, he would have found that on page 6 I had said this:

> The measures adopted at different times within the last two years to effect reforms in the organization and methods of the Printing Bureau, to improve its relations with the other departments, and to secure the earlier publication of the annual reports for parliament, are indicated in the correspondence forming appendix 1 to this report.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I would like to ask the hon. minister just there, if the part he is reading has any reference to any wrong-doing in the way of commissions, and so on, previous to his taking charge of the department; in other words, was there any evidence of wrong-doing during the time the Hon. Mr. Scott was minister of the department and Mr. Dawson was in charge of the department?

Mr. MURPHY. I can only say that the practices of which the late Superintendent of Stationery was without doubt guilty, had extended back for a period of at least a year or a year and a half prior to my entering the department.

Mr. REID (Grenville). By that do I understand that the wrong-doing extended back only a year or a year and a half prior to the hon. minister taking charge of the department, and that it did not really take place during the time that Mr. Dawson was in charge of the department?

Mr. MURPHY. I regret that I cannot give my hon. friend definite information so far as dates are concerned. The only way in which we could arrive at a knowledge as to when these practices started was to trace back the beginnings of the dealings with those firms in New York which undoubtedly had dishonest relations with the late Superintendent of Stationery, and those dealings began about a year or a year and a half prior to my entering the department.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I would like to know if the minister, in the investigation he made, had any facts to prove that during the time Mr. Dawson was in charge of the department there was any commission paid or any crookedness of any kind.

Mr. MURPHY. Dr. Dawson was undoubtedly in charge during the year or the year and a half that those dishonest relations existed between the late Superintendent of Stationery and certain New York firms.

Mr. REID (Grenville). There was nothing prior to the one-and-a-half year.

Mr. MURPHY. I am not prepared to say that there was not prior to the year and a half

Mr. REID (Grenville). Did the minister not go back as far as necessary to find out?

Mr. MURPHY. I went back for 25 years and further, and the only date I am in a position to give my hon. friend and the House with regard to the dishonest dealings that undoubtedly took place, is the date I have mentioned—about a year and a half prior to my entering the department. Just when my hon. friend last interrupted I was drawing attention to the fact that in my report and the appendix attached to it, covering some ten and one-third pages, are to be found in a general way the indications of what was going on from time to time in connection with this investigation. I have under my hand the reports from the late Superintendent of Stationery, furnished me at different times within the same period, in reply to inquiries I made as to his dealings with these firms. These would also indicate what was going on, so that it was a very unfounded assumption on the part of the hon. member for hastings (Mr. Northrup) when he said that either nothing was done between these dates, or that if anything was done, it had been suppressed.

Then he made a much more remarkable statement. He said that my investigation had revealed that there was a shortage, but that there was nothing to show that a single head had fallen on account of it. Now, I take it that an hon. gentleman occupying a seat in this House does not make a statement of that kind unless he is prepared to substantiate it; and if he does make it without being able to substantiate it, then I submit he has done something which no hon. gentleman ought to do. That is precisely the position in which the hon. gentleman put himself this afternoon. What are the facts? There were shortages and heads did fall. It might be alleged that it would be impossible for members of this House to know what has been done in the way of disciplining the staff down there if there was no information outside of what might have been furnished within the Printing Bureau itself. In such a case, an hon. gentleman might very easily be mistaken, and

I would understand his making a statement in good faith such as was made by the hon. member for Hastings this afternoon. But unfortunately my hon. friend has no such excuse, because the facts appear in a document which is a document of record in this House. No later than the 12th of this month, a return was brought down in response to an order secured by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), showing the number of dismissals made from the Printing Bureau. That document was available to the hon. member for Hastings just as it is to any other hon. member. Yet in face of the fact that this document, on record in this parliament, reveals, not that one, but that a dozen or more heads fell, the hon. gentleman has the hardihood to get up and make the statement that not one head fell as a stricture on my conduct in connection with this investigation. What does this return show? It shows, first of all, that the late Superintendent of Printing had to retire.

An hon. MEMBER. What was his name?

Mr. MURPHY. I may tell my hon. friend from Grenville that his name was Mr. McMahon.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I did not ask his name.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). He was superannuated; his head did not fall.

Mr. MURPHY. He had to retire. He resigned and was superannuated.

Mr. REID (Grenville). If that gentleman did wrong, why did the minister superannuate him?

Mr. MURPHY. In reply, I would say that if my hon. friend means that he did wrong in the sense of being dishonest, I say no.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Then he should not have been superannuated.

Mr. MURPHY. He was superannuated because it was proved that he was not competent for the office, and it was in the interest of the public service that he should be superannuated. But there were the following dismissals: Edward Auger, J. G. A. Harwood———

Mr. REID (Grenville). What were their positions?

Mr. MURPHY. That does not appear in the return. It was not called for. Only the name and date of dismissal was asked. J. G. A. Harwood, falsifying entries; John E. Bailey, loss of time, usury; Arthur Simard, intemperance; Charles Lacroix, intemperance; Alex. Baker, jr., intemperance; John Gooden, incompetence, untruthfulness, neglect of duty and responsibility for shortage of goods in his charge. The very matter mentioned by the hon. member for Hastings this afternoon.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Have you the dates of their appointments?

Mr. MURPHY. No, the order did not call for that. The other names are: Thomas Murphy, intemperance; Walter Kane, intemperance; R. E. Cook, disobeying instructions, waste of public moneys, placing of orders outside of Bureau without securing competitive prices, and for untruthfulness and incompetence; Greg. Burns, intemperance; Aristide Parent, intemperance.

There is the list of these dismissals, furnished this House in response to an order of this House, and yet the hon. member for Hastings this afternoon asserted that while all these things had been found out not a head had fallen. I leave you, Mr. Speaker, and the House, to characterize the conduct of an hon. gentleman who would make a statement of that kind in the face of evidence to the contrary, which was available if he chose to seek it.

The hon. gentleman further commented on certain purchases at excessive prices of toilet paper, bought in the United States. That also was exposed during the investigation, but my hon. friend thought proper to make this facetious observation with regard to it, that this paper had been sent to the penitentiaries because no one there was likely to be brought in contact with members of the opposition. Well, my hon. friend's humour is of a character that sometimes it is difficult to appreciate; and I must confess that while I did not appreciate it this afternoon, I thought it was incumbent upon me to explain to the House that the sending of this paper to places remote from Ottawa was part of the system of fraud carried on by the late Superintendent of Stationery. Had this paper been sent to any of the offices in this city or vicinity, the prices paid for it and the surrounding circumstances would have been detected very soon; but in order to prevent detection, the late superintendent of stationery was careful to see that this expensive paper was sent to the penitentiaries and some of it to the distant N. W. M. police barracks, where an investigation could not be made and where no questions were likely to be asked.

The hon. gentleman proceeded to deal with certain other matters set out in the report. He referred to the binding which was done by certain officials for themselves; and judging by the question which was asked by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, I think that the hon. member for Hastings unintentionally gave him, and possibly the House as well, a wrong impression as to the extent to which this binding was carried on. Let me say that there was very little of it done. There was on the part of certain employees a good deal of loose talk and extravagant statements in that connection, but upon investigation these proved to be in the main incorrect. There was the case of one book, the binding of which cost $10. The hon. gentleman mentioned that incident, but he failed to inform the House at the same time that the man who did the binding was obliged to pay for it. He only mentioned that incident a little later on when the leader of the opposition asked the question. But the question put by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) was a very pertinent one, and the hon. member for East Hastings did not answer it. I am not surprised at that, because the things the hon. member for East Hastings does not know about the Printing Bureau would fill a very much larger volume than the one which has been presented to the House. Now, let me answer the questions asked by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden). That hon. gentleman inquired: How could these men do this contract binding? There was nothing of that kind. The binding that was done was usually small books. The evidence disclosed that the material used was not obtained at the bindery and there was only a portion of the work done and that usually at the noon hour or when the men had some leisure, apart from their usual work. But in every case the employee who did anything of this kind was reproved or punished as the circumstances of the case warranted, and I have the assurance of the officials there that nothing of the kind has been done since the facts were brought to light. The hon. gentleman also dealt with another matter which is very fully exposed in the Report —the money lending. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) inquired if this money lending was done by persons outside the Bureau, and it was explained by the hon. member for East Hastings that the lending was done by employees of the Bureau themselves. And here again I may remark that if the hon. gentleman had wanted to be fair he should have mentioned that the chief usurer, Mr. Bailey, had been dismissed for his practices in that connection.

The hon. gentleman referred to a question which is such an unimportant one that I can only conceive that he brought it to the notice of the House in order that it might be used for home consumption in the county which he represents. I cannot conceive that it would serve any other purpose than to be used along the side lines and on the back concessions at election time. He referred to a notice posted in the Bureau warning the officials and employees regarding waste, and quoted the evidence given by one of the employees who was examined during the investigation, and said that another employee, who happened to be a French Canadian, was referred to the notice and said that it did not concern him because it was not in French. If the hon. gentleman wanted to be fair he should have gone further and quoted the evidence given by this French Canadian employee who explained fully the incidents referred to. He stated that the other employee who questioned him about it was a man he did not like who was making himself officious in and about the Bureau, and he answered as he did simply because he did not recognize the right of this man to question him; and added unreservedly, that, of course, the notice applied to him as to others, and he felt himself bound by it. And I may say for the benefit of the hon. member from East Hastings and of any other hon. gentleman who might be disposed to raise such a question that the French Canadian employees in the Printing Bureau will compare very favourably indeed with any other class who work in that institution.

The hon. gentleman also quoted some evidence given in the report tending to show that political pull existed in the Printing Bureau. He referred to a question and answer appearing at page 237 in which the names of three employees are given and an expression of opinion is given by the witness that these men presumed a good deal upon political pull. That was a mere expression of opinion, because as a matter of fact, there is no such thing as political pull in vogue in the Printing Bureau.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MURPHY. I make that assertion with the knowledge that, not one but several of my hon. friends on the opposite side of the House know that it is perfectly true, they having had personal experience in that regard since I assumed charge of the Printing Bureau. Then the hon. gentleman proceeded to read the report of Mr. E. G. O'Connor regarding the lithographic room and Mr. Cook's connection with it, and said that if Mr. Cook was to blame some one above was responsible, and no one had been punished. There again he is incorrect. The man above Mr. Cook was responsible, and he was punished. I gave his name a few minutes ago, the late Superintendent of Printing, Mr. McMahon. But there is this to be said in this connection—that Mr. Cook, on his own admission repeated, not once but several times in the evidence, ignored the Superintendent of Printing and professed to deal with the King's Printer direct, although the Superintendent of Printing was, by Mr. Cook's own acknowledgment, his superior officer. When that sort of a relation existed in an establishment of this kind, it is not surprising that irregularities happened, and that Mr. Cook did some of the things that have been already communicated to the House and others of which I will tell the House before I take my seat. But, Sir, in this connection my hon. friend should have read further, and he should have had the fairness to tell the House that in the same report from which he quoted, that of Mr. E. G. O'Connor appearing at pages 147-8-9-50 of the report, it is stated by Mr. O'Connor that the practices therein disclosed for which Mr. Cook above all other officials in the Bureau was chiefly responsible, had been stopped, as reported at the top of page 150:

These absurd prices appear to have been paid for years without protest by Mr. Cook or any other official until I called attention to it during my inquiry, and, by your authority, had it stopped.

Then my hon. friend (Mr. Northrup) dilated at considerable length upon the list of purchases to be found in the Auditor General's Report and referred to the evidence given in the Public Accounts Committee in connection with several of these purchases. It is true these purchases are extensive, but they are not Bureau purchases—that is, not in the sense that these goods are intended for the Bureau. The Bureau, as is well known, makes purchases for all the departments of government and for parliament as well. My hon. friend (Mr. Northrup) did not allege that anything wrong was shown in connection with these purchases. He rather dwelt upon the number of them and expressed the view that all these goods could not have been required. No evidence was given to that effect, so I fail to see in what regard the citation of these purchases assists in any particular the position taken by my hon. friend.

The hon. gentleman also referred to a return that has been more or less discussed, which was prepared in response to an order passed at the instance of the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong). In connection with that return he chose to animadvert somewhat severely upon the bona fides of the present under Secretary of State, Mr. Mulvey, and having given his version of how that return had been prepared stated that if Mr. Mulvey had been honest and intelligent he would not have prepared it in the manner described by my hon. friend. I hold no brief for Mr. Mulvey. Mr. Mulvey's character is such that it is not necessary for any hon. gentleman to hold a brief for him, but I may say that there is no man more honest and there are few men as intelligent and zealous in the service of Canada as Mr. Mulvey. That is a reputation which he did not need to come to Ottawa to make; he enjoyed it while in the service of the Ontario government, both under the Ross administration and under the present Whitney administration. Having said that much in reference to Mr. Mulvey, let me say further that this return was asked for in the Public Accounts Committee. When it was asked for, I informed the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup), and I think one other hon. gentleman who was there present, possibly the member for Marquette (Mr. Roche), that the return had been brought down. Certain papers were produced and it will be within the recollection of hon. gentlemen who had these papers in hand on the morning of the meeting referred to, that I pointed out the fact that the papers produced were not the return of which we were speaking. As the return could not be found, certain drafts were produced from the department and these drafts were used in place of the original return for the purpose of examining the witnesses. In that way these drafts became exhibits in that committee. It has since transpired that what we thought were drafts were in reality the original return, and they have, in consequence, been a matter of record in the Public Accounts committee since January 20 last. What the member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) complained of was that while the order of the House asked for a return showing the printing, advertising and lithographing done outside the Bureau, Mr. Mulvey in having the return made up excluded the cost of paper, that being a matter which in his judgment did not enter into the return, having regard to the terms of the order. That was discussed in the Public Accounts Committee. Mr. Mulvey's view regarding it was fully and frankly stated and it is not necessary to go further into it now. But as the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) inquired this afternoon whether the return on its face showed that the cost of paper had been excluded, and he was informed in reply by the hon. member for East Hastings that it did not, let me correct that statement by informing you, Sir, and the House, that while one of the two documents now on file in the Public Accounts Committee, neither of which it so happens was ever brought down to the House, although I was under that impression when we met in the Public Accounts Committee, and so stated, would show only the cost of printing lithographing and advertising; another shows specifically the cost of the paper as well. Thus all the information that was asked for may be obtained by any hon. gentleman who desires to have recourse to these two documents. My hon. friend referred also to a transaction in connection with which Mr. Cook obtained considerable prominence and I desire to give the particulars which my hon. friend did not have in his possession; possibly if he had had them he would not have referred to the question at all. He spoke of an order given to the Gananoque 'Recorder' and told the House what had been done in that regard, practically in the same terms as Mr. Cook, on a certain occasion, explained it. As this is a matter of some importance and as it illustrates even better than any other example I can give what kind of methods were pursued by Mr. Cook in connection with the office he held in the Printing Bureau, I will ask your indulgence and that of the House while I read Mr. Cook's evidence on the subject as given at pages 266 and 267 of the Report:

Q. There has also been some evidence given regarding an order for 100,000 pamphlets which you placed with the Gananoque 'Reporter' for the Interior Department, and in his evidence the King's Printer has said that when he got an explanation of the matter from you, he was told that you had stopped off in Gananoque and had inspected the plant in the office of the 'Reporter,' had satisfied yourself that they were equipped to do the work, and gave that as one reason why the order was placed; and an additional reason stated by the King's Printer, as given to him by you, was that Mr. Britton, the proprietor of the Gananoque 'Reporter,' had been at one time a Liberal candidate. What have you to say as to the placing of that order?—A. I asked the King's Printer, as he had several of those immigration pamphlets, and as I thought that Mr. Britton had been a good friend to me, and had never had anything which I felt he was in a position to do, even when all that work was placed under my distribution by Dr. Dawson. This afforded a good opportunity to put something in his way and show him that I appreciated what he had done for me. I may say that I served part of my apprenticeship in that office. Naturally I had a warm spot in my heart for it, and I asked the King's Printer, who consented, seeing that the price was a reasonable one, and the work was executed in good time.

Q. But I understand from the King's Printer that he did not know anything about the work being placed until after you had gone there?—A. No, he understood it before I went there.

Q. That is not what he stated?—A. That is the fact all the same. I may say that it has been my unfailing practice to consult Mr. Parmelee in regard to everything that has been sent out.

Mr. Murphy.—When there is a very serious conflict of opinion as to fact between you and Mr. Parmelee, I would like to get at the bottom of the matter.

Mr. Parmelee.—My recollection of the facts is that Mr. Cook was at Gananoque, his old home, not on Bureau business at all, and that he came back here and spoke to me about the 'Reporter' office, told me how it was equipped, that Britton was publishing a paper there in the face of a good many difficulties, and that there was a little pamphlet which they might print. What followed was that if they were in a position to do the work cheaply and well, with prompt delivery, I did not object. I did not intend to say that I did not know the order was placed until long after. What I intended to say was that I did not ascertain until long after that the 'Reporter' office did not do the work.

Mr. Cook.—I had not been near the 'Reporter' office or consulted them before I mentioned the matter to Mr. Parmelee. I was going to Toronto in connection with other work, and I dropped off from one train to the other——

Gentlemen in the habit of travelling between Toronto and Ottawa will notice what a direct route Mr. Cook followed:

——and I dropped off one train to the other and visited the 'Reporter' office to see what they had there. I had not been near them before or broached the subject, not did I know that there was such a thing when I was on my holidays long before. I found that they had the same power press as we had, a folding machine, a trimmer, and everything that was necessary to do the work.

Q. There has been further evidence given here by Mr. Parmelee, corroborated by another witness, that on one occasion in this room, when this particular order was under discussion, you mentioned that when the proofs of the work came to the Bureau, you saw that it was not being done by the Gananoque 'Reporter,' but by the Ottawa 'Free Press,' and that you did not make any mention of the matter because you did not want to bring Mr. Norman Smith down about your ears or something to that effect?—A. That is practically right. When the first proofs came here, the manager of the 'Free Press,' Mr. Barker, told me that he had made arrangements with Mr. Britton to do the work. After thinking the thing over, I thought, well, so long as they did it, we had a hard and fast price fixed. I did not know just exactly what to do, and I let the matter go.

Q. You did not report it to Mr. Parmelee?—A. No, I did not. I thought that so long as we got the work, and got it at a reasonable price, I did not want to incur the displeasure of the 'Free Press.'

Q. You were aware that the 'Free Press' was not doing it for the price you had fixed for the Gananoque 'Reporter'?—A. No. I asked Mr. Barker afterwards what he was doing it for. He said there was not much margin in it for them, he was kicking at what they had to do it for. As a matter of fact, he told me that they were doing it for something in the neighbourhood of $200 less than the Gananoque 'Reporter' got it for.

So that as a business transaction the Bureau could have paid what the 'Free Press' charged for it?—A. I do not know. We were paying for that work the ordinary rate the Immigration Department had been paying right along, and it was a pretty close price.

I might interject here that that statement is absolutely untrue as are most of Mr. Cook's statements.

Q. But not so close that the 'Free Press' was not able to shave it off a couple of hundred dollars?—A. I asked Mr. Barker how he could account for that. He said: 'We are dead, we are dormant, and it is a filler; there is not much in it, but it is better than nothing—better than having our presses standing.' I made up my mind that if we had pamphlets of that kind in the future, it would be a bidding proposition. I know that prices vary according to the amount of work in offices at times. You will get high tenders at certain times and low tenders at others. It depends on how busy they are.

Q. After the work was completed, the Gananoque 'Reporter' rendered their account, did they not?—A. Yes.

Q. And it was presented to you in due course, and vouched for by you?—A. Yes. We had a complete delivery of the work, and we put through an account for it.

Q. And to that account you attached this certificate: 'Examined, prices fair and just. (Sgd.) R. E. Cook?'—A. Yes.

Q. When you put that on the account rendered by the Gananoque 'Reporter,' you knew, as you have just explained, that the work was done in the Ottawa 'Free Press office?—A. Yes, I must admit that I was aware of it at that time.

The effect of that evidence was to leave me under the impression that this gentleman knew nothing about the Ottawa 'Free Press' having done that work until the proofs came to him from the 'Free Press' office; yet he admitted that when he certified the account as fair and just he had knowledge that the 'Free Press' had done that work for $200 less than he had certified the Gananoque 'Reporter' account for, and he explained that by saying that he thought that was the best thing to do.

But, there is another chapter of this transaction that has come to hand since this report was printed. You will observe in the evidence given by this worthy gentleman, upon whom the hon. member for Hastings places such reliance, that he mentions an interview that occurred with Mr. Barker of the 'Free Press'. After this report was printed and circulated the attention of Mr. Barker was drawn to the evidence given by Mr. Cook. After Mr. Barker had read that evidence he came down to my office to explain that Cook's version was absolutely false from beginning to end. He further explained that Cook had first of all arranged a price of $1,160 with the Gananoque 'Reporter,' that later on Cook had arranged a second price of $950 with him, and not only arranged that, but he had arranged that the proprietor of the Gananoque 'Reporter' was to come to Ottawa, get the copy from the Bureau and go up to the 'Free Press' office with it; later still that when the proprietor of the Gananoque 'Reporter' came to Ottawa, Cook actually telephoned, and made arrangements for him to go up; that later still, when the Ottawa 'Free Press' inquired as to how they were to be paid, this worthy gentleman told them to render their account to the Gananoque 'Reporter,' and that he would notify them when the cheque was issued from the Bureau to the Gananoque 'Reporter.' He also directed them to send the proofs to him while the work was in progress. This was such an astounding statement, in view of the evidence given by this gentleman who is now regarded as one of the new props of the Conservative party——

An hon. MEMBER. Order.

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, my hon. friend may well call 'order', but he should address his remarks to his own friends. This was such an astounding statement that I asked Mr. Barker if he would put it in writing; he did so, and I have here the following letter which I shall read to the House:

Ottawa, February 3, 1911.

Hon. Chas. Murphy, M. P.,
Secretary of State,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—My attention has recently been called to certain statements in the published report of the Printing Bureau inquiry which I desire to correct. The statements referred to were made by Mr. R. E. Cook in his explanation of the way in which he gave an order for the printing of 100,000 pamphlets to the Gananoque 'Reporter'. The facts for which I can vouch are as follow:

About the middle of January, 1910, I went to the Printing Bureau and interviewed Mr. Cook on business. In answer to my inquiry he said it was not likely that any work would be sent outside for some time, but that an order for 100,000 pamphlets had been placed with the Gananoque 'Reporter,' and that they were not in a position to handle it as they had not the necessary plant. He added that if I, on behalf of the Ottawa 'Free Press,' would quote a low enough price on the work he would advise Mr. Britton, the proprietor of the Gananoque 'Reporter,' to give it to us, and that if our price was not satisfactory Mr. Britton would very likely send the work to Montreal. He said he would prefer to have it done in Ottawa, as in that case he could look after it and see that it was properly done. Mr. Cook then handed me a sample pamphlet from a prior edition, and asked me to get the price down low as Mr. Britton had a low figure.

After figuring the cost of the work I again went to the Bureau and told Mr. Cook our price would be $950.00. He said he thought this would be satisfactory, and that he would advise Mr. Britton when he came to Ottawa for the copy to leave the work with us. On January 25, 1910, Mr. Cook telephoned me that Mr. Britton was on his way up to our office with the copy, and that everything was satisfactory. Upon Mr. Britton's arrival at our office he stated that Mr. Cook had sent him up and I gave him a written quotation for the work which he then turned over to us at $950.00.

While the work was in progress I telephoned Mr. Cook as to where the proofs were to be sent and be told me to send them to him. This was done.

When I inquired from Mr. Cook as to the manner in which payment would be made, he told me to send our account to Mr. Britton, and that the latter would send this acount to the Bureau. He further informed me that he would notify me when a cheque was forwarded from the Bureau to Mr. Britton, and advised me to draw on the latter at sight. These instructions were followed and payment was duly made.

Yours truly,
(Signed) A. H. BARKER,
Superintendent Printing,
Ottawa Free Press, Limited.

I do not wish to characterize, in language that would be either harsh or unparliamentary, the conduct of any man, but, Sir, I leave it to you, and the House to say whether or not Mr. Cook was treated harshly or too leniently when he merely lost his position in the Printing Bureau. I am still prosecuting this inquiry, and when I have all the facts elicited, delay having been caused in getting some of them owing to the departure of Mr. Barker from the city, I intend to hand the matter over to the Department of Justice.

I do not wish to weary the House. I have been obliged to go into these matters in some detail, but the balance of the speech of my hon. friend does not, it seems to me, call for any special comment at this late hour. He did in one particular address himself especially to me, and asked me to give him my opinion of the fact that $60,000 had been expended for typewriters and typewriter supplies. He asked me if I did not consider that a little too high. Certainly I did, and I do. That also is a matter dealt with in the report, and it is because of the opinion that I hold in regard to that, that the purchase of these supplies has been stopped, and that the Bureau, since the investigation, has not purchased any supplies except those that were urgently required and which they had not in stock.

Now, my hon. friend read a large list of directories, dictionaries, and other goods that had been supplied to the various departments, and he seemed to find fault with that. Again, I have only to make this observation that it is not the business of the Bureau to determine what parliament or this or that department requires for its use. The Bureau's business is to purchase goods when they receive requisitions for these goods properly vouched for, and properly signed, either from parliament or a department. As my hon. friend has chosen to treat the investigation that was held by me, and which is still going on, as something that has never happened, and as he has chosen to disregard this report of nearly 500 pages, and to treat it merely as something which can be used to bolster up his motion, and to serve no other purpose whatever, let me, Mr. Speaker, draw your attention, and the attention of the House to some of the changes that have been introduced into the Printing Bureau in consequence of that investigation, and by reason of the recommendations made by the experts who assisted at that investigation.

In the first place the proofreaders who were formerly scattered throughout the building have been assembled in one room; the stereotype room has been consolidated; the stores department has been separated from the purchasing department and taken over by a chief storekeeper who is independent of the purchasing agent; six monotypes have been ordered and installed; time-recording clocks have been ordered and installed, and these are intended to do away with the irregularities that were found to exist in connection with the attendance books. A number of small offices have been torn down, and a long room established in which the whole clerical staff has been accommodated; the stationery storeroom has been made secure so that no one can have access thereto after office hours; a woman's lunch room established; a chief electrician has been appointed; a loose leaf and office device expert has been appointed; it has been arranged that all correspondence shall pass through the King's Printer's office instead of through those of various officials as formerly; additional ruling machines have been ordered; a controller of composition has been appointed; a purchasing agent has been appointed in order to keep the stores department separate and distinct from the printing department; the main entrance, halls and corridors of the building have been cleaned and painted; an internal telephone system has been installed; modern methods of requisitioning for supplies on purchasing agent and on stores clerk from the printing division have been introduced; an officer has been appointed to watch work jackets for the purpose of expediting work and to check overlooked orders for printing; a cost system has been introduced and its installation is in progress in the several branches of the Bureau where it is expected to be completed within a month; arrangements have been made to lessen rush orders from the departments so that they may be dealt with in a businesslike way; a register of correspondence has been established; linotype cleaners have been appointed so that the half hour lost each day by the operators in cleaning their machines may in future be saved; a lithograph expert has been appointed to supervise copy sent by departments and to check lithograph and map accounts; the practice of securing advance prices in all lithographic work has been established; a new stamp embossing machine has been ordered; a mechanical superintendent has been appointed; an internal fire brigade has been organized among the employees for the protection of the building and the valuable property stored therein. The stock, regarding which so much has been heard from some hon. gentlemen and from a number of the journalistic Hessians who support them, has been reduced by over $100,000. The order in council that requisitions shall be made by the Deputy Minister or by an official appointed by order in council has been strictly enforced; a system of checking has been introduced into the stores branch which prevents stores being handed out without entry; the inward checking of goods has been improved and a receiving clerk appointed; weekly meetings of chief officials have been established, and weekly reports of these meetings sent to the Secretary of State; a catalogue of loose leaf devices and instructions for ordering the same have been prepared for use in all the departments; a new stock list is being prepared. Then, Sir, in addition to these reforms which are some only of those that have been introduced, the experts who assisted in the investigation of the Bureau have visited the establishment at least once a month since this report was presented to see that their recommendations have been put in force, and to make such further investigations as they think necessary. Now, Mr. Speaker, not further to take up the time of the House, I will merely say that on account of what we have done, on account of what we are still doing, on account of what we further intend to do, I must ask the House in view of the results of my investigation, of the reforms that have been introduced and of the saving that has already been effected to the country, to reject the motion proposed by the hon. member for Hastings as it is both unnecessary and impracticable in the form in which he has presented it.

Mr. T. W. CROTHERS (West Elgin). The Liberal party took charge of the Printing Bureau in July, 1896, and they have had control of it now for nearly fifteen years. The present Secretary of State took charge of it in 1908, and he has spent a good portion of his time this afternoon in showing us the rascalities which have been growing up in it while it has been under the management of the Liberal party. He has set forth in his report nearly every offence in the Criminal Calendar as having been perpetrated in the Printing Bureau; offences that have grown up while it was under the management of the Liberal party during the last fifteen years, and under his special management for about two years and a half. One would imagine that he was talking about something that grew up while the Conservatives had control of that department, but that is not the case. It will scarcely be believed that the Secretary of State has made such a report as the result of Liberal management for fifteen years. On page 2 of the report he says:

The incompetence of some officials, the dishonesty of others, and a complete lack of frankness on the part of those whose duty it was to keep their superiors informed as to the actual working of the Printing Bureau, were the chief causes that combined to unduly prolong the inquiry. If the parliamentary investigation into the Printing Bureau scandals of 1891——

He has not said anything about these matters that happened in 1891 while he was on his feet, but in his report he attempts to show that it was owing to some lax conduct of twenty years ago that all these rascalities in the Bureau have now occurred.

—If the parliamentary investigation into the Printing Bureau scandals of 1891 had been followed by the application of vigorous measures to correct the abuses that were then shown to exist, it is probable that the present inquiry would not have been necessary.

Of course not; something that happened twenty years ago had nothing to do with the lax management during the last fifteen years.

There can be little doubt that if a thorough overhauling had been made at that time the radical defects in the organization and management of the Printing Bureau would have been discovered and corrected, and that such action would have led to a more faithful discharge of their duties by the officials and employees. But, with the exception of a few dismissals, nothing was done.

That is the position of affairs to-day. If I remember right, most of those who were dismissed by the minister were dismissed for drunkenness, and as I understand hardly a man was dismissed by him for dishonesty. He has spent a good deal of time telling us about this man Cook, who he says falsified figures, altered orders, was guilty of forgery, but I am not aware that he has prosecuted that man. He finds fault with these people for not doing anything but making a few dismissals.

As a consequence, the evils that were left untouched spread and flourished to the serious impairment of the Bureau's efficiency and the gradual destruction of that spirit of loyalty and co-operation which ought to prevail in an establishment of its size and public importance.

That has all been going on for the last 15 years while hon. gentlemen opposite have been in power. It is not an opponent of the government who is making these statements; it is the Secretary of State, the gentleman who has had the conduct of this department for the last two years.

He said a good deal more in that connection, part of which was read by my hon. friend from East Hastings, and I will not repeat it. On pages 6 and 7 he says:

The undersigned would respectfully urge the speedy adoption of all the recommendations made in sub-report No. 1. These recommendations are the result of months of work, of great care and of a practical knowledge of the subjects to which they relate. On the score of economy alone the strongest argument may be advanced in their support. By adopting them in their entirety it is estimated that a saving of $150,000 per annum might be effected. That this is not an extravagant estimate is easily shown.

So that we have a system here, after the Liberals have been in power 15 years whereby, according to the Secretary of State, they are wasting $150,000 a year. At the bottom of that page he says:

An Act amending the Public Printing and Stationery Act is in course of preparation. It will be submitted to council without delay so as to ensure its early introduction in parliament.

Now, I may have overlooked that, but I do not remember having seen that Act this session; and this report is dated November 8, 1910. I am not aware that the Act there promised has been submitted to council or that we have seen anything of it in this House. Now, the hon. Secretary of State has told us that he has been investigating for two years, that he began his investigations in 1908. Well, let us see what has been going on while he has been investigating. Nearly the whole of these rascalities of which he is now complaining have occurred while he has been investigating. Let us look at page 105 of this report, where we have set forth overcharges on goods purchased in the United States, extending from October 30, 1907, down to June, 1910. That was a year and a half after he began to investigate, after he was appointed Secretary of State in October, 1908. In the case of one firm, G. W. Millar & Company, New York, the overcharges amounted to $49,691.77. The next was L. W. May, New York, from whom the purchase extended from November 30, 1908, down to May, 1910. You will remember that the Secretary of State began his investigations on that very day, the 30th of November, and the overcharges on these purchases amounted to $2,561.22. He was investigating then, and he has been investigating ever since, and these overcharges were going on during all the time that he was investigating. The next firm is the Heslop Paper Company, of New York, from whom the purchases extended from November 4, 1908, down to May, 1910, and the overcharges of that firm during that time amounted to $10,297.64. Another New York firm is the Gresham Blank Book Company, from whom the purchase extended from November 20, 1907, to September 21, 1910, and their total overcharges during that time were $10,104.69—and the Secretary of State was investigating all the time. Then we have W. H. Addoms of New York, from August 21, 1908, to May, 1910, and the overcharges during that time were $3,097.91. We have the Peerless Supply Company, from April 4, 1908, to November 24, 1909, with overcharges amounting to $6,793.69. Next, we have the Rogers Manifold and Carbon Company, of New York, from November 12, 1907, to June, 1910, with total overcharges of $11,621.44. We have a total of overcharges, while the Secretary of State is investigating, amounting to over $94,000. And that is the sort of investigation that we are asked to accept as being perfectly and thoroughly satisfactory.

Now, let us look at some of these sub-reports to see what they have to tell us. On page 37 we have the report of Messrs. Hyde and O'Connor. Speaking of the stock ledger they say:

This book is supposed to be written up every week so that the storekeeper by reference to it might be able to keep his stock properly assorted. However, as a matter of fact, at the time of our examination, the ledger for the present fiscal year was over three months in arrears, and for all practical purposes was useless. The clerk who keeps the book says that the reason he cannot keep it posted up is the length of time that elapses between the receipt of goods and the furnishing to him of the invoices to be entered in the ledger.

Again, at page 42, they say:

No time should be lost in putting into action a plan for doing away with the excessive amount of hand composition now done in the Bureau. About 160 men are so employed, on salaries of $16 a week, aggregating on full time $133,120 annually. It is a fair estimate that half of this amount might be saved by the introduction of machine composition, in addition to the saving in the purchase of expensive type, and the carrying of it in standing matter, as now has to be done.

On page 47 they recommend that a purchasing agent be appointed. At page 100 we have sub-report No. 2, dated June 23, 1910, made by H. O. Wilson, in which he says:

I beg to report that, in accordance with your request, I inspected the Stationery Department on Tuesday and Wednesday of this week, and found a condition of affairs that is simply appalling——

Simply appalling, after the Liberals had been in power 15 years and the Secretary of State had been in office two years—— —and there was palpable evidence on every side of gross mismanagement in the method of purchasing stationery supplies. It appeared to me that the stock in the basement is in a chaotic condition.

There are rows after rows and tiers upon tiers of all sizes and grades of papers, and no one seems to be able to tell with any degree of accuracy, how long any particular pile has been in stock, or could even hazard a guess as to the length of time it was likely to remain there.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the date of that?

Mr. CROTHERS. 23rd June, 1910. Where was the gentleman at the head of the Printing Bureau all this time? Did he ever go about to see the conditions of affairs? Did the minister ever go down and look around these various rooms? Neither of these gentlemen seem ever to have done so. The King's Printer never seems to have made any examination.

The only reason which could evidently be advanced was, that an order from the Printing Bureau might be received at any time for a supply of paper the same as a sample submitted, and it was therefore necessary to carry in stock a complete assortment of many kinds of paper in various sizes. There is paper stacked alongside steam coils, although nothing destroys the life of paper like artificial heat. There are also piles of wrapping paper, blotting paper and coloured paper, which, I should judge, are far in excess of necessary requirements, and I might say here, that even at the entrance to the building one is confronted with cases of paper piled in rows as high as possible. In my opinion, the paper should be standardized, that is to say, certain paper should be selected for certain forms and this would not necessarily imply that the paper should all be obtained from one manufacturer. The manufacturers should carry the stock which could be purchased from them as might be found necessary to keep it up to the limit of, say, two or three months' supply. If arrangements were made with the paper manufacturers that they could depend upon receiving orders for certain quantities within stipulated periods, they would certainly arrange to carry on hand a sufficient supply to make complete and prompt shipments.

There are cases by the score of Stephen's ink, piled here and there, and even in dark recesses where there is a possibility of them being overlooked. There is a large supply of Sanford's ink, which was discarded some time ago, and another ink called David's was purchased from New York recently. There are many cases of Sanford's mucilage, which have stacked there for months and months, and this brand of mucilage is not being used now because some one objected to the smell of it.

No wonder, even the mucilage smelt bad.

I would suggest that the surplus stock of paper, ink, mucilage, &c., be worked off as soon as opportunity will permit. A reference to the stock book reveals the fact that in a number of instances many reams of one kind of paper have not been touched during the twelve months, and there is no doubt that such paper could be substituted for some other kind requisitioned for by the Printing Bureau, even if it were a little better in quality than the paper desired. This would help in a great measure to relieve the congestion, the better supervision could be given to the stock, for under present conditions there must be some that is overlooked.

More prompt advice should be given by the Printing Bureau to the Stationery Department of paper required. I learned of one instance several months had elapsed after the job had been put in hand before the paper was ordered and it so happened that the particular kind of paper required was not carried in stock at the time. For the purpose of better service there should be continuity between the two departments in regard to the ordering of paper and the supplying of same. I mean by this, that the Printing Bureau should follow up their orders after a reasonable time has elapsed, and not wait until the stock is furnished them which may be some months after the order has been placed, leaving it in the meantime entirely to the judgment of the stock man whether he should institute inquiries to the paper dealers about the shipment.

I examined also the stock of sundry stationery supplies, and found that there was a large surplus of nearly every article. Pencils, which were the first article I looked at, I mention as an example. There are all kinds, grades and marks of pencils, and indeed there are pencils which were purchased at some remote date because some department fancied this particular kind and they were obtained in various grades from the softest to the hardest lead. After the demand for them had ceased no attempt was made to issue them in place of some other brand of pencil requisitioned for, and, in consequence they have lain as dead stock for months and months. An examination of the inventory book showed that there were more pencils on hand at March 31, 1909, that would have filled all the requisitions during the ensuing twelve months, but there were extensive purchases of pencils made during that time and consequently there was a still larger surplus on hand at the end of March this year. There are half a dozen cupboards filled with especially ruled ledgers and journals which may never be used.

Nearly every item is a repetition of another as far as surplus stock is concerned. There are several dozen different kinds of rubber erasers and scores of different kinds of pens. The records show that there is enough carbon paper on hand to fill all requirements for the next three years, and enough typewriter ribbons to meet every demand for the next five years, and I understand additional quantities of these goods have been purchased within the last three months.

They had enough to last five years, and yet were purchasing more, and the investigation was going on all this time. They had five years supply of typewriter ribbon on hand; and, yet while the Secretary of State was busily engaged in investigating they were buying more ribbons all the time. And we are asked to accept an investigation of this kind.

I visited two of the three outside stores and found carbon paper and typewriter ribbons piled in every conceivable corner, and there were also large quantities of waste baskets, twine, packing cases and other goods. Inquiry about so much twine being on hand elicited the explanation that for instance the postmaster at Toronto might at any time call for three bales of twine. Instead of carrying the twine in stock to fill such a requisition it could be ordered direct from the maker, and thus save the freight both ways between Toronto and Ottawa, and the necessary handling by the Stationery Department.

I suggest that an embargo be placed upon the purchasing of all stationery supplies until the stock is reduced to a proper level, and unless it is shown that it is necessary to order supplies to replenish the stock to keep it at a working limit. The department should not get tied up with any more contracts until the existing conditions are ameliorated. The stock on hand at the present time can be easily ascertained by having a statement made showing the quantity of each article on hand at March 31, 1910, the supplies purchased since, and the goods issued to date. A statement should be made giving details of existing contracts, and the quantities still to be taken to complete same.

In connection with the shipment of supplies, I found that there were three men employed in filling requisitions and six men packing the goods. There are certainly too many engaged in this work, as I have one storeman who parcels the supplies collected by three other storemen, and even the man who is parcelling goods finds time on occasions to fill requisitions himself.

It would be in the line of economy if the present requisition was discontinued, and one similar to the attached sample put into use, with an additional column for the stock on hand, and another line added in the heading for entering the number of clerks to be provided from the supplies ordered on the requisitions, and this form should be used by all the departments, instead of as at present some departments having special requisitions printed with supplies in detail, such as the Customs, Post Office and Militia Departments.

And so on for page after page of that report, but I do not think I will read any more of it. I want to refer to pages 128 and 129, sub-report No. 5 by Mr. Ryder, in which I find the following:

Having completed the taking of stock of the stationery branch of the Government Printing Bureau, and the checking of the stock ledger with the inventory, I herewith submit my report of the discrepancies in the stock ledger with the stock list as it stood on 8th August last. It shows shorts to the extent of $14,830.19, and longs to the extent of $9,010.32, leaving a net shortage of $5,819.87. In arriving at this result, I compared the stock lists as of the 8th August last with the stock ledger, and also with the stock list as taken by the Auditor General as of the 1st of April last.

For a full consideration of this statement, the deficit which it shows, and the methods pursued at the Bureau, it is necessary for me to add some further comments in the premises.

The stock ledger shows a shortage of 18,243 No. 6 manilla shipping tags. I investigated the day-book and the accounts for the purpose of ascertaining how this shortage arose, and I discovered that it was merely an apparent shortage, as a number of shipments to the departments had not been charged in the day-book or carried forward to the ledger. The result in this case was that there was no shortage whatever.

The ledger also showed a shortage of 3,187 pounds of twine. On further investigation in the manner followed in respect of manilla tags, the shortage was reduced to 1,100 pounds.

The stock ledger shows longs of 351 yards of buckram. On further investigating the day-book and accounts this was increased to 456 yards, a result indicating that in this instance also correct entries had not been made.

The stock ledger shown a shortage of 126,873 No. 7 manilla envelopes. Investigation of the books and accounts reduced the shortage to only 5,000.

These criticisms, I think, show, as my investigation of the stock convinces me, that to a great extent the shorts and longs as shown in the statement may be accounted for by defective bookkeeping, as the books do not show the actual transactions that took place in this branch of the Bureau. I ascertained that when goods are received they are not properly checked. In some cases only are the cases and other packages checked over to ascertain that the exact quantity shown by the invoices is received by the Bureau.

Then, there is not a proper method of describing the goods. It frequently happens that goods are entered in the stock ledger under one designation and distributed to the departments under another.

To illustrate the idea which the Secretary of State had as to proper conduct I would like to call your attention to another circumstance. A few moments ago he attempted to justify the Mortimer Company, Limited, in writing the letter to him of August 13. How does he attempt to justify it? He tells you the facts are that Cook had given a five thousand dollar contract in Toronto, and went to Mortimer and told Mortimer that the Secretary of State wanted him to put in a tender of over $5,000, so that the Secretary of State might have some writing to justify his paying $5,000 to the company in Toronto, and he tells us that Mr. Mortimer actually has the courage to write such a letter, and the Secretary of State we find, has the courage to put that letter into print in the public report telling us that his friend Mortimer was quite willing to join Cook to deceive this House and the country and to try to make them believe that tenders had been called for this work. That is what the Secretary of State comes forward and justifies before the representatives of the people in this House. Let me read that letter. And you will notice that the writer of it says that he believed that the story came from the Secretary of State through Mr. Cook. What was Mr. Mortimer's opinion of the Secretary of State? It was that the Secretary of State was prepared to enter into a fraudulent deal with him. And what does the Secretary of State think of Mr. Mortimer when Mr. Mortimer was prepared over his own signature to falsify the facts in order to provide a paper for the Secretary of State to submit to the people's representatives in this House, if he were asked to do it, stating what was absolutely false. And the Secretary of State puts that letter in print and submits it for our consideration and actually has the courage to read it and I will read it also:

Ottawa, August 16, 1910.

Honourable Charles Murphy, M.P.,
Secretary of State,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—Referring to our letter of April 22 last, addressed to the King's Printer and containing prices for an edition of Farm Grasses, we beg to say that the circumstances under which Mr. R. E. Cook obtained the letter mentioned are as follows:—

That is what Mr. Cook told him. And relying upon what Mr. Cook told him, he joined in that attempt to commit a fraud upon the people of this country.

At an interview in the Printing Bureau in April last, Mr. Cook stated to our Mr. Wm. Mortimer that you had given a contract for the edition of Farm Grasses to the Toronto Lithographing Company, and that as the contract amounted to more than $5,000 you desired to have on file correspondence showing that you had invited tenders for the work——and that the Toronto Lithographing Company was the lowest tenderer.

Showing something that was false.

The Secretary of State had sent Mr. Cook —so Mr. Cook said—to Mr. Mortimer to get this fraudulent tender in order that he might have it to give to the people's representatives in this House in case they should call for a return and ask if the lowest tenderer had got the contract.

Mr. Cook added that this correspondence was required in case a question was asked about the matter. Mr. Cook asked Mr. Mortimer to put in a tender slightly higher than that of the Toronto Lithographing Company, and as the tender of the latter company had been placed on Mr. Cook's desk where Mr. Mortimer could see it, the latter copied the figures and returning to our office made up a tender as requested by Mr. Cook. We assumed that Mr. Cook's statements were correct and did not make any inquiry from you. We were, however, aware when we wrote the letter of April 22 that the contract had previously been given to the Toronto Lithographing Company, and that our figures were not in the nature of a tender, but were to be used merely for the purpose of justifying the giving of the contract to the Toronto Lithographing Company as explained to our Mr. Wm. Mortimer by R. E. Cook.

Mr. CROTHERS.

Could a more damnable document be presented to the people?—to come forward and admit that they were parties to a deal to defraud and deceive this country. Have we any other reports coming before us month after month in which the same trickery is being used? I do not know, but very likely we have. I want to emphasize the idea of the Secretary of State's view of morals such as that when he asks us to accept an investigation he has made into the Printing Bureau. Now, what the Secretary of State should have done, I think, when he came into office in October, 1908, was to make a thorough investigation of this Printing Bureau and familiarize himself with it. He had had brought to his attention irregularities, and worse than irregularities, in other departments of the government. It will be remembered that this government in May, 1907, afforded a royal commission on this basis:

On a memorandum dated May 7, 1907, from the Minister of Finance, stating that while the general principles of the Civil Service Act are regarded as satisfactory, there are matters connected with the operation of the Act and the services and compensation of officials of the government which require more careful inquiry and consideration than can be given by the ministers of the several departments and, therefore, it is desirable that such matters be inquired into by a commission composed of gentlemen specially chosen for such purpose.

The minister, therefore, recommends that the following gentlemen,—J. M. Courtney, C.M.G., Ottawa, chairman, Thomas Fysche, Montreal, and J. G. Garneau, Quebec, be appointed commissioners, to inquire into and report on the operation of the existing Civil Service Act and kindred legislation with a view to the proposing of such changes as may be deemed advisable in the best interests of efficiency in the public service.

That such inquiry should include the following subjects.

1. General operation of the Civil Service Act.
2. Classification of the service.
3. Salaries.
4. Temporary employment.
5. Technical employees.
6. Promotions.
7. Discipline, hours of service, &c.
8. Efficiency and sufficiency of the departmental staffs.
9. Retiring allowances.
10. Any other matter relative to the service which in the opinion of the commissioners requires consideration.

These gentlemen proceeded to carry on the inquiry, and they made a report. I will read from that report at page 20, and I read this in order to show that the Secretary of State, when he was appointed in the autumn of 1908, knew the probability that irregularities were going on in the Printing Bureau as these gentlemen found there were in other departments:

Without going so far as to say that the official who has been appointed through political influence and whose friends are in power is not amenable to discipline, the commissioners have found in certain instances that officials appointed by virtue of political patronage and remaining under its ægis have taken to themselves the idea that their services are altogether beyond the control of the higher officials; that, in fact, except from observance of office hours, their country or their chief is of no consideration.

I shall be able to show that there is evidence in this very report of men who say there was political pull. The Secretary of State in reading from that page this evening did not read the whole of it. If he had read the next question or the one after that, he would have found the witness stated that under the minister's predecessor there was political pull? Did any one charge the Secretary of State with anything in the way of political pull?

He accused the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) of not reading all of the evidence. It would take a week to read it all. The hon. member for East Hastings requires no assistance from me or from any other hon. member in this House; he is quite capable of taking care of himself here or anywhere else, but I cannot refrain from expressing the surprise I felt at the language with which the Secretary of State opened his remarks this afternoon, the paltry unprovoked and ungrounded statements he made with respect to the hon. member for East Hastings was a humiliation, coming as it did from a minister of the Crown, to every hon. member in this House, and I cannot but think the Secretary of State is a smaller man than I had ever considered him if, when he sees his words in cold print to-morrow, he is not ashamed of himself for having used them.

That the annual increase will follow is a matter of course, for their immediate superior in his report would not say absolutely that they were disobedient. Your commissioners are agreed that in the expansion that has occurred in Canada in recent years, which has been followed by a large increase in the ranks of the Civil Service, the later arrivals do not actively respond to regulations laid down in the government of the several departments. . . . .

In dealing with this subject, your commissioners have to submit that in the vast service such as exists at Ottawa, in the limited time at their disposal, it has been absolutely impossible for them to inquire fully into the efficiency of the officials in the several departments. There are probably, including labourers, some three thousand employees at Ottawa. In the Department of the Interior alone there are five hundred employees. In that department the junior branches are made up almost entirely of women. As has been pointed out, in Ottawa seven hundred women are now employed. That is a fact that must be taken seriously into account in considering the future of the service. It would take many months to examine the work of the Department of the Interior alone, and when so many officials are engaged in the several branches it would be hard to gauge with accuracy the extent of character or style of the work turned out by each.

Leaving the question of superannuation, your commissioners wish to refer again to the question of efficiency and sufficiency of the service. In addition to the efficiency in the administration of the departments a wider and broader question is raised, and that is how far the departments are efficient in looking after the best interests of the Dominion as respects their several expenditures.

You commissioners are of opinion that in many instances stores are ordered unnecessarily.

The very thing that was done in this case at the Printing Bureau.

And it may be doubtful that a good quality is always delivered. . . . .

In instances which have been brought to the notice of the commissioners, stores have been received which were not wanted and which it is difficult to get rid of. In fact, at different points stores have been shelved where in all probability they were unnecessary. The commissioners of 1892 dwelt on this matter and stated that they had had under consideration the question of having a director general of stores or a supply agent to purchase supplies for all services, but they had not had an opportunity of developing the subject. Your commissioners have come to the conclusion that the time has now arrived when it would be desirable in the public interest that purchasing agents, probably three, should be appointed at good salaries to make all purchases of goods required for the public service, and that all purchases required by the several departments should be procured by this means. In this connection your commissioners respectfully beg to recommend that inquiry be made as to the working of the Prevention of Corruption Act of the Imperial parliament passed in 1906 and the bribery clause in connection therewith.

Speaking of the Railways and Canals and Interior Departments they say:

Your commissioners have not visited this department, believing that other departments required more immediate inspection.

The same remark to a certain extent applies to the Department of the Interior. With its large staff of 500 employees at Ottawa, it would require months to thoroughly inspect the work and see that the several officials are properly employed.

The commissioners regret extremely that with the short time at their disposal they were unable to visit the Northwest, much as they desired to see how the land, and more especially, the timber sales are affected.

Of the Marine and Fisheries Department they say:

Your commissioners have taken up, and at great labour have followed through some of the files in this department, making extracts as they went along, which have been rewritten, as nearly as possible in chronological order, and which are now available and can be examined if required. The judgments they have formed are based largely on those extracts and on what they have seen in the offices. . . .

No effort seems ever to have been made with a view to cutting down this enormous mass of correspondence, a large amount of which with better organization could in our opinion be done away with and the rest of it more effectively handled.

There are officers enough in the department, both inside and outside, to do all the work efficiently if they were properly trained and organized; but there is no efficient organization. The only attempt at it is the appointment of men whose titles would seem to indicate what their duties are; but those duties have never been specifically defined. There is no record of anything of the kind, and there are no written or printed rules and regulations known in the service, which your commissioners think is lamentable.

It is practically impossible to fix responsibility on anybody.

This seems to answer the condition of things down in the Printing Bureau very closely.

The deputy is supposed to shoulder responsibility for everything as his signature shows; but that means that he speaks for 'the department,' and 'the department,' like the King, can do no wrong. There seems to be a huge redundancy of work which proceeds in a lumbering, haphazard way, giving rise to constant blundering and confusion. There is no sign visible of a single directing head, or an intelligent purpose, unless it be that of spending as much money as possible. Zeal for economy and good management, or pride in the work, is not visible. Perfunctory and mechanical discharge of duties is the rule, with apparently no perception of any need of improvement.

The lack of organization and of organizing power in the department has recently been very conspicuously and painfully illustrated by the fact that the accountant's or bookkeeping branch had apparently fallen into such confusion that expert accountants had to be called in to put things to rights, and create some intelligible system. After months of work by these highly paid experts the result has been at least greatly improved books as far as mechanical form is concerned, but probably little else; and this achievement has been accomplished at an almost fabulous expense.

There is not only a lack of efficient organization and method in the department. There would also seem to be a lack of conscience. In connection with the enormous expenditures which are deemed necessary, the word 'discount' never appears. It is tacitily assumed that there is no such thing; but the whole commercial world knows otherwise.

I would like to read extracts touching other departments, but I shall not take up time to do so. I am simply reading extracts from this report to show the conditions that must have been before the mind of the Secretary of State when he came to the office he holds, in October 1908. The government, after getting that report, had to do something and they appointed another commissioner to inquire whether or not certain officers of the Marine Department were men of integrity. We have Mr. Justice Cassel's report as to that. We have him finding that there were scores and scores of men guilty of bribery, bribers and bribees; some men had been guilty of theft but none of them were prosecuted. One or two were dismissed, one was superannuated on a large superannuation allowance but the rest were all allowed to go. What is the result? The result is that we have in that department to-day the loosest of methods and the loosest of morals, as is shown in the Lanctot job which we will discuss in the House during the next few days. The Secretary of State tells us that a man called McMahon, who occupied the position of King's Printer, as I am informed and verily believe, between the time when Mr. Dawson—

Mr. MURPHY. —Not King's Printer, Superintendent of Printing.

Mr. CROTHERS. I mean between the terms of office of the two King's Printers.

Mr. MURPHY. He was called the acting King's Printer.

Mr. CROTHERS. His name appeared on all documents as acting King's Printer, I am told, between the time that Dr. Dawson retired and the present incumbent was appointed. He was a man whom the Secretary of State told us to-day was superannuated for incompetency, and he was put in by a Liberal government to manage the Printing Bureau. I should like to read some of this evidence that we have, but I do not think that at this hour of the night I would be excused for doing so. I do not think I will go into that evidence. I call the attention of the House to the report of these commissioners to show what the Secretary of State had in his mind at the time he was appointed to this office. It will be remembered that the hon. member for Montreal, St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) moved a resolution that a Royal Commission should be appointed to inquire into every large spending department, but it was voted down. If that commission had been appointed they would probably have ascertained the condition of the Printing Bureau and we would have escaped the exposures which have been made within the last few months. They refused to have that investigation and they refuse now. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) recited in that minute of council appointing these commissioners that it was necessary to have commissioners, because the ministers had not time to look into these matters. If that was a good reason in reference to the conditions at that time it is a good reason now. This motion is that we should have a Royal Commission not only to look into this department but to look into every department that is connected with this department. The hon. Secretary of State read a sentence or two from some remarks which I made in the House in 1909, wherein I stated that if men were dismissed at once on its being shown that they were incompetent or dishonest, as soon as it came to the knowledge of the minister, or as soon as he should have known it, there would be no serious objection. Well, I did make that remark at that time, and I stick to it now, but the evidence that has been brought forward by the minister in this Blue-book and the evidence that was taken in the Public Accounts Committee shows that there was not a man in the Printing Bureau big enough for the job—not a single one. Do you suppose that if the King's Printer had been a man big enough for the position, conditions could have existed there such as I have pointed out to you this evening? Impossible. If the Secretary of State desires to carry out my ideas he will dismiss the whole outfit down there and get men big enough to run an institution of that kind in the interest of the people, and you will have it run honestly and efficiently. I think we have shown sufficient to cause us to doubt whether or not we can get a satisfactory investigation under the present Secretary of State. He dismissed Cook, but there is no prosecution. I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the House at this late hour, as there are others who desire to speak. I think the matter should be committed to a Royal Commission to have an investigation open and above board where witnesses can be examined and cross-examined under oath. That is what I think the people of this country desire, and that is what the members of this House should insist on having.

Mr. F. T. CONGDON (Yukon Territory). Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Murphy) is to be congratulated that this motion has been made, because he has been given an opportunity of presenting to the House the history of his dealings with the Printing Bureau since he assumed charge of that branch of the public service. In order, as I understand, to make a case in behalf of the appointment of a Royal Commission the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup) started out to establish two propositions. The first was that irregularities had been committed in the Printing Bureau, and the second was that these irregularities had not been ended. In order to obtain his evidence that irregularities existed it was necessary for him to go to the report presented to parliament by the Secretary of State, and in that report he undoubtedly found evidence of the existence at a former time of great irregularities in the conduct of the Printing Bureau. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Crothers) referred to the irregularities connected with the over-stocking of the department and purchases in New York, and inquired why no prosecution had been made against any person, why no one had been punished for these irregularities connected with over-stocking and with purchases in New York. If the hon. gentleman would take the trouble to read the report that is on the table of the House, and which was in his hands while he was making that speech, he would see that the reason was that the man who is guilty of these irregularities took his own life and was no longer open to prosecution before any earthly tribunal. The gentleman who was guilty, Mr. Gouldthrite, was undoubtedly a very remarkable man. His career in the Printing Bureau shows that he went into that Bureau as a mere messenger in 1878, and, step by step, through various gradations, rose to the high position of Superintendent of Stationery in that department. He was a man who was well liked by every one. He was held in very high esteem by the King's Printer, under whom he had served for so many years; he was recommended by the King's Printer to his successor in office, he was courteous, gentlemanly, and competent, and when he appeared before the Public Accounts Committee he conveyed to the committee the very finest impression of his integrity and businesslike management of all the details of the Bureau. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat wonders why there was no discovery made in respect to his misdeeds for so long a period. That also is explained on page 5 of the report. The mere facility which enabled him to deceive the King's Printer, which enabled him to deceive the Public Accounts Committee, enabled him, for a period, to deceive the Secretary of State. It is not an uncommon thing in large institutions. We know of a great many instances in which banks in this and other countries, where there seems to be a businesslike and perfect conduct of their affairs, have been for years victims of the defalcations of clerks in their employ, and when these defalcations are disclosed it is always a wonder to those connected with the bank that such a thing was possible. So it was with regard to Gouldthrite. The evidence shows that whenever inquiry was made with respect to any transaction he had a most ready and plausible answer to offer, and that only step by step was the Secretary of State led to the discovery that there was some irregularity. He started a most thorough investigation with regard to it, the accusations were established against this man, and he took his own life, and thus escaped punishment before any tribunal. That is a matter that may happen under any government, and department or any business in the world.

You may devise as many checks as you choose, but if you get a clever man who is dishonest he will in some way and on some occasions always be liable to escape from them and commit crimes of the kind which were committed in this case. The evidence shows that every possible investigation was made of the misdeeds of this gentleman, and that every endeavour was made to save the country from the loss as far as possible at the time that they were discovered. Over $23,000 was recovered after the discovery, and the only reason why he was not further punished was that he took his own life.

Now, I would ask what further disclosures in reference to these transactions could be made by referring this matter to a commission? The evidence is overwhelming, I submit, in this report against this man and of all the officials in the Printing Bureau he was the sole one responsible. I would refrain above all things from saying a word to impugn the honour of Dr. Dawson, the former King's Printer, but every one knows that for some time before he retired he was too old to actively discharge the duties of such an important office where he had so many subordinates under him, and which required great activity to cope with the complexities of the business. He further had the misconception of the law, that the Superintendent of Stationery in the matter of purchase and the Superintendent of Printing in the matter of printing were independent of him, when not even a country lawyer could read the statute without seeing that both officials were subordinate to the King's Printer. It was an error of judgment on the part of the former King's Printer when he supposed that he was not absolutely the head of the Bureau.

The hon. member for Hastings on the basis of the evidence laid before the House by the Secretary of State, was able to prove that irregularities formerly existed in the Printing Bureau, but the Secretary of State, instead of being blamed, is in my opinion to be complimented upon the fact that he placed fully and frankly before the House all the information that came to him in the course of his investigation. It would have been easy for the Secretary of State merely to have submitted a report dealing with the defalcations of the late Superintendent of Stationery; but the hon. minister frankly laid before us every detail in connection with the many transactions dealt with, and in consequence of that frankness the hon. gentleman from Hastings and his friends are able to make their charges to-day. Any one who reads the report of the experts employed by the Secretary of State, Messrs. Hyde, O'Connor, Wilson and Ryder, must come to the conclusion that no better qualified men could have been selected for that purpose. The logical excellence of the masterly report made by Messrs. Hyde and O'Connor is apparent to every one who reads it, and any one who wants to test the improvements made in the Bureau should read that report and compare the conditions formerly existing with those which exist to-day. I understand that one of these gentlemen is a well known Conservative in politics, but whatever his politics he is undoubtedly able and competent and his recomendations and those of Mr. O'Connor are being carried out as promptly as possible. It is rather an irony of fate that the very frankness of the Secretary of State, in placing before the House the full evidence of the investigation has been made the foundation of the motion of the hon. member for Hastings that a commission shall be appointed. It seems to me that before such a course is taken it would be necessary to show, not only that irregularities existed in the Printing Bureau, but that they still exist and that the recommendations which have been made have not been carried into effect. I cannot conceive how it would be possible for anybody of men to be more competent to investigate the Bureau than are the men appointed by the Secretary of State and to whose valuable report and recommendations effect is being given. The hon. member for Hastings urged as another reason why a commission should be appointed, the fact that a large number of directories and dictionaries and law almanacs had been purchased, but the evidence before the Public Accounts Committee showed that every requisition for every one of these was in the hands of the Auditor General, and the hon. member for Hastings and his friends could have examined them and if there was any impropriety further investigation might be demanded. However, these are matters that could properly be investigated by the Public Accounts Committee, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Northrup) could have had these vouchers produced and ascertained if irregularities in connection with them existed. But when one remembers that every office in Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific is supplied by the Stationery Department with these articles it is easy to understand that large purchases of them would be necessary. After all, the minister can do little else in connection with such an institution as a Printing Bureau than to see that a competent man is appointed in charge of it, and that his subordinates are competent, and that has been done. We may remember, too, that the defalcations took place in spite of the King's Printer and of the Public Accounts Committee and of the Auditor General, who made a careful inventory of the stock, but who was deceived by the unfortunate man formerly in charge of the Stationery Department, who succeeded in deceiving so many others.

The last hon. gentleman who addressed the House punctuated his speech by saying that all of this had occurred at a time when the Secretary of State was investigating the Printing Bureau.

Undoubtedly it takes a long time for a man who is not an expert to go into a printing office and get at the root of the evils there. The Secretary of State had much else to do besides investigating that Bureau. For a considerable period after he was appointed to office the session of parliament was current, and his attendance there was required ; but as soon as that was over, he began this investigation, and the evidence in this report is that from the very first he began to accomplish those reforms which are now satisfactorily inaugurated in the Printing Bureau.

I was glad that my hon. friend referred to the return of some of the evidence in respect to which was taken before the Public Accounts Committee, because it seems to me that the Under-Secretary of State, Mr. Mulvey, was correct in his idea with regard to what should be included under the term printing. Any one who went into a large printing office, and found on inquiry that a certain amount of the printing of that office was required to be done outside of the office, and asked what that printing cost, would, I think, get the cost of the printing without the cost of the paper. Mr. Mulvey thought that what was required was the material which would enable a comparison to be made between the cost of printing in the Bureau and the cost of printing outside. Whether the printing is done in the Bureau or outside, the paper must be bought by the government. In some cases in which the printing is done outside, the paper is furnished by the government and in other cases it is not furnished by the government, and I think Mr. Mulvey was taking the trouble to make his report such as the hon. gentleman, who asked for the information, desired in order to make a comparison, when he showed the cost of the printing without the paper, and in a separate return furnished the committee with the cost of the paper and those other items which he had deducted as being not printing, advertising or lithographing.

I do not think that at this late hour any useful purpose would be served by my delaying the House in going over the various items which were dealt with by the hon. member for East Hastings, and the hon. member for West Elgin. It seems to me that every one of those matters was well answered by the exhaustive reply of the hon. the Secretary of State. My hon. friend from West Elgin did return to the Mortimer letter, and he returned to it as though he were endeavouring to fasten on the hon. the Secretary of State the responsibility of endeavouring to fix up the file in view of the contract having been given to the Toronto Lithographing Company; but the evidence is overwhelming that the Secretary of State had nothing to do with that, but that it was due to the misrepresentation and false statements made by Mr. Cook to Mr. Mortimer, and that the Secretary of State knew nothing about it until the letter was written to him by Mr. Mortimer. I think the hon. Secretary of State is to be congratulated on this fact, that the moment he found that that contract had been let to the Toronto Lithographing Company in improper circumstances and without tenders, he cancelled it, and the company did not complete it. The honest and successful endeavour of the hon. the Secretary of State is shown in every line of this report to make public everything wrong in connection with the Printing Bureau and to put in operation improvements; and instead of a Royal Commission being required to investigate further, he should have a vote of approval from this House for his strenuous efforts to reform the Printing Bureau.

The hon. member for West Elgin referred to these things as though they had originated under a Liberal administration. I agree with him that no good purpose could be served by going back to the old Senecal investigation. There is no doubt that at that time there were irregularities there, and that those irregularities led to the dismissal of prominent officials; but that investigation was not followed up as it should have been. The report of Dr. Dawson, in 1892, pointing out things that should be done, was not acted upon, and it is a great surprise to me, after going over that report, that he did not call the attention of subsequent ministers to the reforms he then recommended and to the fact that they had not been carried out. I suppose it will never be possible to conduct so large an institution as the Printing Bureau without some irregularities and some peculations; but I cannot think that all the gentlemen engaged in that department are worthy of the condemnation passed upon them by the hon. member for East Hastings and the hon. member for West Elgin.

I believe that any one who makes inquiry and endeavours to find out the condition of the Bureau at the present time will find that it is manned by an excellent class of officials, that their conduct is most praiseworthy, and that the work of the government is being well and efficiently done. I for my part will vote against this resolution, because it appears to me that it is not a legitimate subject for the appointment of a Royal Commission, and that no investigation by a Royal Commission would do any good either in disclosing irregularities which have not been disclosed by this report or in effecting a cure which has not been effected by the means which have already been adopted.

Mr. EDWARD GUSS PORTER (West Hastings). Mr. Speaker, I recognize the futility of endeavouring to convince the government that it is a proper thing to investigate any department of government at the present time. I am sure that hon. members of the government must be growing weary, as hon. members of the opposition are growing disgusted, at the frequency of such scenes as have been enacted in this House this afternoon and to-night. Every once in a while, with very short intervals, some evidence leaks out or is brought forward which is convincing, and unanswerable, that wrong-doing, crookedness and inefficiency exist in the various departments of the government, and some hon. member of the opposition, having investigated that evidence and satisfied himself as to the sufficiency of it, rises in his place in this House and asks the government for an investigation of a particular department; and ever since the investigation into the Department of Marine and Fisheries, such a request has been invariably met with a flat denial on the part of the government. The government does not see fit to answer the reasonable request that is made, founded on good and substantial evidence, for investigation, by any substantial reasoning or argument; but it is always the same answer, namely, that no good will come from it and there is no necessity for it. In my view, that is no substantial answer to such a request at all. Unless the government is able to convince this House that there is no wrongdoing in the particular department attacked, when evidence is produced, such as has been produced in the present instance, if the government is desirous of maintaining what it claims to be its good name before the people of this country, it seems to me to be in the interest of the government as well as of the country as a whole, that an investigation should take place. But the government invariably meets such a demand with an absolute refusal.

Notwithstanding that fact, the government invariably meets such demands with an absolute refusal, and in addition an attempt is usually made to attack the character or political reputation of the member of the opposition who has the courage to stand up in this House, and upon sufficient evidence demand an inquiry into the conduct of any one of the public departments. In common with my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Crothers) I too was very much surprised at the attitude taken by the hon. the Secretary of State, when opening his address. His speech to-day is the first effort, to my knowledge which the hon. gentleman has made in this House, and I think it will be generally admitted that he made a very bad beginning when he challenged a comparison between his own political record and that of my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup). I think that the political record of my hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Northrup) is in such an atmosphere that it would compare more than favourably with that of the Secretary of State himself. To say the least, it is just as honourable for my hon. friend from East Hastings to be a member of the opposition and have aspirations, as it is for the hon. the Secretary of State to occupy a seat in the cabinet and owe his appointment to political expediency or force, and not because of any political ability. If there is any difference between the two, my hon. friend from East Hastings has certainly the advantage most materially on his side.

I do not intend at this late hour to detain the House at any length; but in reading the report presented by the hon. the Secretary of State, it occurred to me that he has characterized the work of the Printing Bureau in such elegant and illuminating language, that his language ought to be collocated and put upon the public records of this House. From pages 2, 3 and 4 of his report, I take these choice expressions in which the minister has characterized the officials, and the work performed in the Printing Bureau under his control:

Incompetency of officials; dishonesty of others; complete lack of frankness; destruction of the spirit of loyalty; lax management; private business transacted during business hours; practice of coming late to work; a number of employees drink to excess; making false entries; alterations of orders after they had been signed by the minister; forgery; lack of business methods; contracts let without competitive prices; no written records of transactions; details of transactions only obtainable from correspondence and verbal statements and these statements frequently conflicting; deceiving the Auditor General; deceiving the King's Printer; deceiving the Bureau accountant, deceiving the Secretary of State; engaged in dishonest buying; false swearing in investigations; perjury; explanations could not be relied on; buying from three firms, two of whom had no existence in fact; dishonest relations with American firms; dishonest buying; collusion between buyer and seller; intermediary planned and attempted frauds on the government; conspiracy to defraud the government; loss, $94,168.36.

That is the language in which the hon. minister himself has characterized what he found to exist in the department as a result of an investigation extending over a period of about two years or a little more. What language would be required to describe the findings of a Royal Commission? It is a little singular that in the report of this investigation which, according to the answer given by the hon. the Secretary of State to my question this afternoon, extended from November, 1908, until June, 1910, not a single date is given as to when these irregularities, and that crookedness, and the incompetency of the officials began. A very pertinent question was put to the minister this afternoon by my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Reid). He asked whether in the investigation, any of this crooked work, incompetency and graft was shown to have existed prior to the hon. the Secretary of State assuming charge of this particular department, and the only answer that could be obtained was that the system which the minister found in force when he took charge had been in force for a period of about a year and a half previous. But you will see that that practically was no answer to the question at all. I am informed that in the whole investigation, not one single item that could be characterized as a dishonest or improper transaction was discovered during the time when the hon. Senator Scott was minister of the department or the late Mr. Dawson was King's Printer. If I am not correct in that statement, it will be very easy for the hon. minister, who has all the evidence, facts and figures in his possession to point out any one instance of dishonesty or improper conduct during the incumbency of those two gentlemen. If he does not do so, the conclusion to be reached is simply this, that all he has found in the way of crookedness, improper dealings and dishonesty in his department have existed only since he himself took office.

It is also somewhat singular that the hon. minister should have endeavoured, but in a very clumsy way, to shift the responsibility for the conditions of affairs that exist in this department. In the third clause of his report, he tries to lead to the conclusion that such conditions was only a continuation of the bad system inaugurated by the Conservative government, and he makes reference to an investigation into the Printing Bureau in the year 1891. He was attaching all the blame to the Conservative government which was in power from 1891 down to 1896. Well, Sir, I can only say in answer to that, that the minister has not taken an occasion to refer to one single tittle of evidence to show that there was any such condition of things existing in the department from 1891 down to 1896. And even if he had, even if he had shown that the Conservative government during that time was lax or was guilty of any wrong-doing in not further investigating that department, he would only have shown that this government is three times as guilty, because, whereas the Conservative government had only five years after that date, this government has had three times as long. The government on every occasion when evidence is brought forward to show dishonesty, crookedness, graft, incompetency in any department of government simply declare, as on this occasion and many others, that their policy is that the lid must be kept tight down and that no investigation is to be allowed. This may satisfy hon. gentlemen on the government side of the House, but I venture to say it will not satisfy the people of this country. The last speaker (Mr. Congdon) seemed well pleased that the Secretary of State has conducted an investigation into the affairs of the Printing Bureau. He thinks that that is all that is necessary. But does it not occur to the hon. gentleman that this so-called investigation is simply an ex parte one, one where the desire would not be, I venture to say, to make conditions as bad as the evidence could possibly make them, but to make known only what it was impossible for them to keep back. And, if a Royal Commission were granted on this matter and this matter gone into thoroughly, the minister of this department could have knowledge of the conditions upon which he could reorganize the affairs of the department so that they could be administered in the interest of the country as a whole. I think this is only one more illustration of the desire of the government to avoid investigation to prevent the country from gaining information to which the people are entitled as to how their affairs are conducted by the men who have those affairs in charge.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac). Mr. Speaker, you have no doubt observed that the discussion so far in regard to this matter has been carried on by lawyers. And, while I do not hope to present any remarks I shall make with the ability which has characterized these gentlemen I nevertheless wish to say a few words before the motion is put. I have always had an impression up to a couple of years ago, that the fact of a man occupying a position as a cabinet minister was an indication of superior ability and breadth of mind. I say I held that view until I came to this parliament. But I have had that view shattered since I came, and I regret to say that the Secretary of State (Mr. Murphy) in his opening remarks in answer to the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) in the very evident animus he showed against one person who was dismissed from the department has not left on my mind an impression at all complimentary to himself. However, that is of very little consequence. The hon. member for East Hastings, in presenting his case, said there was ample evidence in the inquiry made by the hon. Secretary of State of incompetency, lack of frankness, lack of loyalty on the part of employees, of moneylending on the part of employees, of laziness and insubordination, of drunkenness, of defective bookkeeping, of dishonesty, of perjury, and in fact of all the crimes in the calendar excepting murder.

The Prime Minister said that if the hon. gentleman from East Hastings could prove that this incompetence, and lack of frankness and other evils existed in the Printing Bureau there was no need for further investigation. We have frequent instances of the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the government desiring to run away from anything in the shape of an investigation. I remember that, not very long ago, when the Minister of Public Works was put through a political Turkish bath by one of the members on this side, the Prime Minister said he was 'prouder of Pugsley than ever.' So, we have had on the part of the government frequent instances of their desire to prevent everything in the way of investigation. The Secretary of State says that his investigation has been a thorough one and there is no need of anything further. But he also said that he started this investigation in November, 1908, that he has been carrying it on ever since and he now differs from his leader who says that if these things are true there is no need for further investigation. The Secretary of State says he is not through but must carry it on further. It will have appeared to you, Mr. Speaker, as to other hon. members that, notwithstanding the investigation began in 1908 there was nothing material came to light until after Goldthrite disappeared; before that the investigation does not seem to have resulted in very much.

Now, I wish to refer to the manner in which this investigation was carried on. Suppose a man was on trial for some crime which he was supposed to have committed and witnesses were brought forward and examined privately, not under oath, the man on trial was not given any opportunity to cross examine these witnesses, but after a time the person hearing the evidence says: The man is guilty of dishonesty. What would any person think of that sort of a course? It would not be tolerated in any civilized country, yet that is precisely what has been done by the Secretary of State.

Mr. EDWARDS.

Mr. MURPHY. If the hon. gentleman will read the evidence he will find the proof that that was not the way in which it was done. He will find witnesses cross-examining each other showing that they were in the room when the examination in chief was being conducted.

Mr. EDWARDS. Were any witnesses examined under oath?

Mr. MURPHY. No, no one was examined under oath.

Mr. EDWARDS. No one was examined under oath. Since the Secretary of State has referred particularly to Cook, was Cook allowed to cross-examine the witnesses brought forward in reference to charges made against him?

Mr. MURPHY. He had that opportunity, he was in the room, and could have examined the witnesses, and my hon. friend must have heard me this afternoon read from the report an observation made by Cook to the King's Printer.

Mr. EDWARDS. My information is that Cook did not have an opportunity of cross-examining the various witnesses, that nearly all the evidence was taken by one person at a time being brought in before the minister, and being examined, and that the person interested in the matter did not have a fair opportunity of questioning the various witnesses brought forward. Not only that, but in a matter affecting not merely their position, but their character, the parties interested should have the right to have counsel there, men competent to cross-examine witnesses, if the minister was desirous of giving the person accused of wrong-doing a full opportunity to justify himself, or to give him what is generally called a fair deal in the matter. That was not done. Nor do I think that the evidence brought out justifies the course which has been taken in regard to some persons dismissed. I wish to refer to the position of this man, R. E. Cook, who was referred to at length by the Secretary of State. The hon. minister referred to the book 'Farm Weeds' which was got out some years ago. Mr. Gliddon, I believe the accountant of the department, went to Toronto, and finally the work was given to the Toronto Lithographing Company. Shortly after the Secretary of State took office, a requisition was made for a new and enlarged edition of this work 'Farm Weeds' and Mr. McMahon, acting King's Printer at the time, wanted to ask for tenders. On that occasion I am told that Mr. Cook suggested that since the Toronto Lithographing Company had the plates for the illustrations they would have a decided advantage in the matter, and a better bargain could be obtained privately. That suggestion made to the Secretary of State was acted upon and Cook, I believe, was sent to get prices from the Toronto Lithographing Company to which the work was finally given.

I now come to that little pamphlet 'Farm Grasses.' The former book, 'Farm Weeds' had received a good deal of favourable comment all over the country, and I understand that the Minister of Agriculture made no secret of his very great pleasure and satisfaction with the way that book was received. When this further work was to be got out the King's Printer told Cook that as the Minister of Agriculture was so well pleased with the Farm Weeds book this order would have to be given to the Toronto Lithographic Company, but he was instructed to ask the Copp Clark Company for prices as a protection. Cook got prices on the book 'Farm Grasses' from the Toronto Lithographing Company, and the prices he obtained were $1,100 lower than the prices for the similar work at a previous time. No mention was made of the fact by the Secretary of State in referring to Cook's connection with the matter to-day. Cook left a copy of the work to be done, and got such a favourable price from the Toronto Lithographing Company that he was told by the King's Printer that the work must be given to the Toronto Lithographing Company, and he told the Toronto Lithographing Company to go ahead and order their paper.

Mr. MURPHY. Has the hon. member been informed where the Toronto Lithographing Company got their paper for it? He is repeating statements made by Cook.

Mr. EDWARDS. From the old country.

Mr. MURPHY. It was in that fiction that Cook, if I may use the term, bluffed the Copp Clark Company from putting in a price by representing to them that the paper was to come from the old country. He said the paper had to come from the old country, when as a matter of fact the Toronto Lithographing Company got the paper from St. Catharines.

Mr. EDWARDS. These differences in statement between the Secretary of State, and the person who is very deeply interested in this matter go to show the need for a thorough investigation into this matter.

Mr. MURPHY. It has been investigated.

Mr. EDWARDS. It should be investigated in a way it has not been so far. It is only British fairplay to give Cook's statement in regard to this matter; he has been characterized here to-day as being dishonest, not only incompetent, but a dishonest man. He has had no opportunity to defend himself. He had no opportunity to defend himself in the inquiry carried on by the Secretary of State. He is a man whom I have not met half a dozen times in my life. He was in the Printing Bureau for 23 years. He rose from the bottom to a position where he commanded a good salary, a salary high enough to excite the cupidity of certain favourites of the Secretary of State, and if he had not drawn such a good salary possibly he would be in the Printing Bureau yet, and I contend he has not had an opportunity to give his side of the case. As a matter of fairplay I propose to give his statement, and if the Secretary of State is not satisfied, he as Secretary of State can make his statement, but in fairplay to the man to whom he has referred, and whom he has deprived of his office and has to-day endeavoured to deprive of his character, it is up to him to vote for, and allow this resolution to go through, granting a thorough investigation which will show the position which Cook occupied in the department, and if he was as dishonest as the Secretary of State says, something further should be done. Charges have been made here against Mr. Mulvey. I dare say a thorough investigation into his conduct would not be amiss.

In regard to that pamphlet, 'Farm Grasses,' Mr. Cook says that the King's Printer, when he came back and stated the price which he had obtained from the Toronto Lithographing Company, told him that he had done well. It was about a week later that Mr. Cook met the hon. Secretary of State and told him what had taken place. The Secretary of State appeared to be very angry about that, said that he should take prices from other firms and told the King's Printer to get prices from different American firms. The King's Printer informed him that he did not know what American firms to apply to. That did not satisfy the Secretary of State, he must have prices from these other firms, the King's Printer secured the necessary funds for travelling expenses for Mr. Cook, and Mr. Cook was sent on this journey to get prices. Mr. Cook visits Toronto, Buffalo, and New York, consults the large firms which are engaged in this work, obtains prices from these firms, comes back and reports to the King's Printer. The prices given by these firms were in every case very much higher than the price he had obtained from the Toronto Lithographing Company. The Secretary of State at that stage of the game insisted on letters of submission to these firms asking for tenders. The King's Printer told him that there were no letters of submission. When Mr. Cook went on his journey to see these firms he did not know the names of the firms to which he was going, he had to hunt them up and consequently this submission was a verbal one and there were no letters of submission on file. That made no difference to the Secretary of State who insisted that he must have letters of submission. The King's Printer then decided that formal letters of submission would be sent to each firm with a covering letter explaining that the inclosed letter was purely formal, and merely intended to place on file in the department.

Mr. MURPHY. I do not like to interrupt the hon. gentleman while addressing the House, but the information given him is so far from the fact that I dislike allowing him to proceed when he has been informed in error. I was not insisting that a letter be written, but that I should be given in writing the verbal request that was made to each of the alleged tenderers in order that I might ascertain what were the conditions of submission to each.

Mr. EDWARDS. Did not the Secretary of State receive from the King's Printer a letter stating that letters of submission had not been sent to these firms.

Mr. MURPHY. No.

Mr. EDWARDS. I think that possibly is another thing that might very well be investigated. I think that if he looks over his file he may find such a letter stating that no letters of submission were in existence when Mr. Cook was sent away, that he submitted the matter verbally to these men and that consequently such letters could not be produced. However, the demand was made then, as alleged by Mr. Cook, that these letters of submission be placed on file. These letters, if the statement of Mr. Cook is correct, had to be handed in. When Mr. Cook got the prices he had no letter of submission and consequently he was not able to obtain letters of submission. If his statement is correct in that regard then it means that these letters had to be ante-dated, and the Secretary of State was actually forcing Mr. Cook to ante-date the letters. The Secretary of State asks what we would think of a man who would ante-date letters? I might answer that question by asking what would we think of a Secretary of State who would force a man into that position. We see this man sent to get these prices, and he was ordered by the King's Printer to obtain these letters. Mr. Cook says that he is ready to swear that he only carried out the instruction of the King's Printer given to him before his departure, and the fact that he was supplied with the necessary funds for travelling expenses by the King's Printer lends colour to his statement. I say that when we find this great discrepancy between the statement of the Secretary of State and the statement of Mr. Cook it furnishes us with another reason why we should have an investigation, which would be an impartial investigation, where witnesses would be examined under oath in order to give every man a fair show. Just a short time before Mr. Cook was dismissed—about an hour before—he states that he was ordered to send $5,000 to the Montreal 'Herald' by this man Mulvey, who is the Under Secretary of State. When he was told by Mulvey to send this $5,000 to the Montreal 'Herald,' he replied that he could not do so because he had no voucher or account from the Montreal 'Herald,' and that he had nothing to protect himself. Mulvey insisted that he send the money. Mr. Cook says that he told Mulvey that he would wire to the Montreal 'Herald' asking that they forward their accounts before the money would be sent. Within an hour of that this man was suspended for three months and at the end of three months he found a letter of two or three lines in his letter box when he came back telling him that he was dismissed without one reason having been given him.

It struck me this afternoon that it is a very serious matter for any member of this House, and especially for a man who is a cabinet minister, to rise in his place and charge a man, who has been in the public service for 23 years, and who has risen by sheer ability from the bottom on towards the top of the ladder in the department, with incompetency and dishonesty after having deprived him of his position. That is a very serious matter indeed. Well may we say:

> Who steals my purse steals trash, but he that filches from me my good name robs me of that which not enriches him, and leaves me poor indeed.

In this case the Secretary of State robs this man—deprives him of his position which he has held for so many years, and this afternoon he arose in this House and in so far as he could do so deprived him of his character.

It is very interesting to look over some of the items in connection with this overstocking at the Printing Bureau to see where these supplies actually came from. I have been told on what I believe to be good authority that some men who profited by the over-stocking of the Printing Bureau, by the ordering of supplies, figured very largely in the last election on behalf of the Secretary of State, that they were travelling around in their automobiles doing their best to elect him, and that they figure to a large extent in the sales of typewriter ribbon, carbon paper and supplies of that kind, the result being that the Bureau has three or four years' supply on hand. That is a matter which possibly the Secretary of State would not delve into very deeply in his little investigation, but which a Royal Commission would go into, perhaps to the discomfort of the Secretary of State. We could well understand why the Secretary of State would not care about an investigation which would be an investigation. When the Secretary of State was examining one of the men he laid down the rule that if a man came to the department the worse of liquor he was to be suspended for a week, and that for the second offence he was to be dismissed, and nobody will find fault with that, but at page 251 of the report we find him make this statement to a witness.

Although the penalty is not to be enforced in the case of men who do not drink, I want to ask you to inform the members of your staff that the regulations for the future is that if any man comes to the Bureau under the influence of liquor he will be suspended for a week without pay for the first offence, and will be dismissed for the second.

Mr. MURPHY. May I give an explanation of that? The witness under examination then is one of the chief officials in the Bureau, but he is unfortunately deaf, and when I was explaining to him the rule regarding intemperance I was first amused and them somewhat discomfited to find that he interpreted it to mean that it applied to all his staff even though they did not drink, and I was repeating what he had wrongly thought to be my instructions to him, and it is the repetition of the remarks of the official by me, that is reported at page 251.

Mr. EDWARDS. I read not the words of the man who was hard of hearing, but the words of the Secretary of State, and it struck me as amusing coming from a lawyer who was acting in a judicial capacity, that he had laid down the rule that the penalty for drunkenness was not to be enforced against men who did not drink. I thought that if that was an indication of the ability of the Secretary of State to act as judge in an investigation, we had better have a more competent tribunal. The Mortimer letter was touched on very much to the discomfort of the Secretary of State by the member for West Elgin (Mr. Crothers), but I may inform the House that Mr. Cook alleges that Mortimer told him that letter was written at the dictation of the Secretary of State himself. I would not be at all surprised at Mortimer, whatever one may think of the Secretary of State in that matter, because a man who would take the position that Mortimer does here would be ready to do almost anything that some person in a higher position might ask him to do. There is no doubt, judging from the evidence, that there has been gross incompetency in the Bureau, and that the law has been violated openly in regard to the printing of the voters' lists. The King's Printer is supposed to keep in type a complete copy of the last list used, but notwithstanding that forty-one lists in Ontario, fourteen in Quebec, three in Nova Scotia, one in New Brunswick and six in British Columbia have been disposed of in violation of that Act, the department itself thus breaking the law. It has been stated here and not contradicted by the Secretary of State that everything has been bought without tender except paper and envelopes, and that the stuff bought without tender is more than twice what is bought by tender. Surely if the Secretary of State knew anything about the business at all, he would know that supplies like carbon paper and rubber bands deteriorate very rapidly, and that the stock on hand should be not more than sufficient to meet current requirements, and when he found the supplies piling up year after year and month after month, it seems to me that the minister himself was incompetent in not looking after that matter sooner than he did. The Secretary of State threatened to-night to refer a matter to the Justice Department, but I do not think there is any danger of his doing anything of the kind. It was currently reported some time ago that there was a difference of opinion between the Secretary of State, and the head of the Civil Service Commission in regard to the appointment of officials, and at the request of the Secretary of State the matter was referred to the Minister of Justice, and my information is that the Minister of Justice being absent at the time the Secretary of State himself was acting Minister of Justice, so that in suggesting that the matter be referred to the Minister of Justice for settlement he was suggesting actually that it be referred to himself. I doubt very much if he carries out his threat to refer this matter to the Justice Department, because it appears to me that the government is not inclined to investigate the matter thoroughly although we have ample evidence that the Printing Bureau requires thorough investigation. I do not wish to cast any reflection on the Secretary of State, but I do not attach any importance at all to such an inquiry as he has made. An inquiry without the witnesses being under oath is not a fair inquiry. When men who have held official positions for many years and whose reputations are at stake, are called to give evidence I do not think the minister is justified in speaking as he did to-night. It could not be expected that in an inquiry conducted by the head of an important department all the facts would be obtained as they would be by an impartial tribunal. Many persons coming forward to give evidence, knowing that they were in his hands, would not speak as freely as they would before a Royal Commission. But sufficient has been elicited by this inquiry to show that there is incompetency and that there is need for a more searching inquiry.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.). Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I would not have taken any of the time of the House were it not for one statement made by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) which I think ought not to be allowed to go unchallenged; that is, his statement that Mr. Cook, about an hour before his dismissal, had been asked to send $5,000 to the Montreal 'Herald.' While the hon. gentleman has not stated that he was dismissed for not sending the money, that is the only inference that can be drawn from his statement. The hon. member states that he is not a lawyer, but he has certainly made a very strong plea for a royal commission to clear up the character of this one man Cook. The gravamen of his plea is that Mr. Cook would have an opportunity to be examined under oath and to state the facts as he knows them. Perhaps the hon. member is not aware that Mr. Cook had that opportunity on the 20th of January, 1911, when he was examined by the hon. member for East Hastings and other members of this House before the Public Accounts Committee. He had there every opportunity to tell his whole story. If he had any cause of complaint against the Secretary of State, he had a chance then to say so. If there was anything he required to explain in reference to the report made by the Secretary of State, he had then the opportunity to do so under oath. I cannot see what object would be gained by giving this man Cook any further opportunity to make statements under oath, because he had all these opportunities and he took precious good care not to avail himself of any of them, but confined himself to giving evidence on two points: first, on the manner in which the report was compiled, showing the cost of the printing and paper, saying that the report contained only the cost of the printing and not the cost of the paper; and, secondly, as to the manner in which contracts were let in the department. Now, my hon. friend from Frontenac evidently has talked this matter over with Mr. Cook and comes here with a special brief to protect Mr. Cook. Well, if my hon. friend wanted an investigation in order to have this done, I would not find so much fault; but when an hon. member wants a royal commission in order to protect a man who is guilty of the letter and the conduct which has been narrated here by the Secretary of State, it seems to me that he ought to be handed over to the civil authorities for prosecution rather than be given a chance to clear himself before a royal commission.

Mr. EDWARDS. Why don't you do it?

Mr. CARVELL. It is not my business to do it. I think Mr. Cook and his friends ought to be well satisfied that he is allowed to go scot free without being dragged before a royal commission. If my hon. friend from Frontenac knew as much about the law as he does about other things, he would know that the result of an inquiry by a royal commission might be that his friend Cook would find himself before the civil authorities or perhaps the criminal authorities to answer for his conduct. In order to give the history of this man's action regarding the Montreal 'Herald,' I want to quote a letter which was sent by the superintendent of immigration to the King's Printer, as follows:

6th July, 1910.

Sir,—With regard to the application of the Herald Printing Company for a further advance on account of the Atlas being printed for this department, I beg to say that the following is a statement of what was ordered and what has been shipped, with the values of shipments in each case:—

	Ordered.	Shipped.
French	60,000	60,000	$5,400
Flemish	50,000	52,000	2,860
Finnish	5,000	5,700	313
Dutch	10,000	10,000	550
German	75,000	15,000	825
Swedish	15,000	5,000	275
Norwegian	15,000	5,000	275

The total value would be $10,498 and after deducting the advance of $5,000, which has already been made, leaves a balance of $5,498. I would recommend that they be given a further advance of $5,000.

Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) W. D. SCOTT,
Superintendent of Immigration.

C. H. Parmelee,
King's Printer,
Ottawa.

You will bear in mind that just previous to the date of this letter the 'Herald' building in Montreal had collapsed, and they had written to the Department of Immigration asking for their money. That was followed by a telegram from the 'Herald' to the Secretary of State, as follows:

Montreal, July 8.

Hon. Chas. Murphy,
Ottawa, Ont.

If you could authorize King's Printer to pay amount due us for printing atlas, it would accommodate us greatly.

J. S. BRIERLEY.

The next day the following telegram was sent by the Secretary of State to Mr. Brierley:

July 9, 1910.

J. S. Brierley,
The Herald,
Montreal.

Will ask King's Printer to expedite payment as requested. Pleased to assist in any way.

CHAS. MURPHY.

On the same day, I am informed by the Secretary of State, this telegram was taken down to the King's Printer by Mr. Mulvey.

While Mr. Cook may tell his friends that he was dismissed because he would not send $5,000 to the Herald Publishing Company, we have the evidence to show that he was saying what was not true.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Cook did not tell me why he was dismissed because he was not told himself.

Mr. CARVELL. Then my hon. friend admits that he was in conversation with Mr. Cook.

Mr. EDWARDS. Certainly. I make no secret of that.

Mr. CARVELL. And he admits that he wants an investigation before a Royal Commission in order to have this man reinstated?

Mr. EDWARDS. I did not say anything of the kind. It is unfortunate that the hon. gentleman cannot speak without misrepresenting.

Mr. CARVELL. I said I did not believe that Mr. Cook had ever been asked to send this money, and I say so still because instead of sending $5,000 or any amount of money, the Herald Publishing Company was asked to send an account, and on the 13th of July they sent an account. That account is headed the Herald Company, Limited, Montreal, July 13, 1910, and they give an itemized account of all the printing they had done for the Interior Department, and the total was $10,212.75. That was on the 13th July, 1910. It was sent to Ottawa, and on the 14th July, the day following, two cheques were sent, one for $5,000 and the other for $5,212.75, issued by the King's Printer in favour of the Herald Publishing Company.

With that evidence before the House I do not see that there is any necessity for appointing a Royal Commission in order to clear the character of Mr. Cook. In my opinion he has had all the opportunity any one could require to give his evidence before the Public Accounts Committee. He did not choose to give his evidence or his friends did not give him a chance to do so, and I again say that I can see no reason why a Royal Commission should be appointed to go into this matter again.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Were I so easily satisfied as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Carvell), it would be unpardonable for me to take up time at this hour in the morning. But I would like to take a few minutes in showing some reasons why a Royal Commission should be issued notwithstanding the attitude taken by my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell). But before doing so I would like to remind hon. members that since this House last voted to refuse a commission of inquiry into the departments then remaining uninvestigated, we have had in three of these departments, startling and most ample evidence of the necessity that then existed for such an inquiry. We have had the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Customs combined—not at that time under suspicion, but since brought into the lime light by the proceedings at Vancouver, indicating operations on the part of officers of various ranks in those departments, combined with the patronage committee at Vancouver, which caused losses to the revenue of this country that may reach to $1,000,000. The ministers and their supporters in this House, however, were quite satisfied that there was nothing to investigate with respect to the Department of Customs and the Department of Trade and Commerce. But they have now $1,000,000 loss to the revenue to show how foolish they were in their self-satisfaction. Then we have had the operations at the government yards in Sorel, and I am not referring simply to the matter which has been under investigation before a committee of this House and which is shortly to be discussed. I am referring in addition to further evidence that this department at Sorel is a sink hole of iniquity, that it is being exploited in all directions and in every manner in which a department of that kind can be exploited for the benefit of friends of the government. Evidence has been offered and rejected because of the limited scope of the inquiry incidental to which this evidence came out. That is another department as to which these hon. gentlemen were quite sure there was no necessity for any investigation.

Now we have this Department of Printing. Hon. gentlemen opposite were equally confident that there was nothing which could be profitably investigated in that department. But the evidence in this blue-book shows that their misplaced confidence caused this country a direct loss in the neighbourhood of $100,000, as to which the minister has now the most conclusive evidence.

Without attempting to detract from the credit due the hon. the Secretary of State, for the courage with which he undertook this investigation so soon after he assumed the responsibility of the department—a courage which brought out this volume of startling testimony—I wish to ask him whether he is now prepared to blight the reputation he got for that display of courage by appearing before the country—as he will if he persists in refusing this commission—as simply a quitter, as a man who entered upon a noble task but abandoned it on the first appearance of danger to his associates. The danger is not to himself since he was not there at the begining of these affairs, and it was perhaps impossible for him, as they had gained such strength, to check them sooner than he did. But now he comes before this House, with this volume opening up so many avenues of inquiry, and tells us by implication that he dare not, that the government of which he is a member, dare not, that its supporters in this House dare not take the responsibility of following up the inquiry and disclosing the whole ghastly story to the country.

Without attempting to limit the possible scope of an investigation by a commission such as we ask for, I might mention a few of the subjects disclosed in this volume of evidence. In the first place we have the plain statement made by the Secretary of State himself that one of the officials in the Printing Bureau systematically forged orders for supplies to that department—forgeries which cost this country a large sum of money. Now, forgery is an offence punishable under the Criminal Code. The minister must have had conclusive evidence of that offence or he would not have taken the responsibility of branding a former employee of the government in the way he has in this book; and yet after having branded him before the country as a forger, he is content to let the matter rest and let him go unpunished. We ought to have a Royal Commission to find out why this man, guilty of forgery, is, with many other persons in the employ of the government or dependent on the government for favours, protected against the consequences of his crime.

Mr. MURPHY. To which employee does the hon. gentleman refer?

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). To this much discussed Cook. He was the man who committed the forgery, was he not?

Mr. MURPHY. I thought the hon. gentleman was referring to another man who had forged requisitions, and I was going to explain that no large amount of money had been lost.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I am not sure that Cook is the man indicated by the remarks of the Secretary of State himself, which are contained in the preliminary portion of this book.

Mr. MURPHY. He is not.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I was under the impression that he was the person referred to. However, there is something to be discovered there which should be brought out by a commission or otherwise.

Then there is another statement by the minister. He said that there was an intermediary between Gouldthrite—the one man who has been punished because he punished himself—and a New York firm, which was grossly defrauding this government. The name of the intermediary has not been given. I think this is a fit subject for an investigation by a Royal Commission, and that this Royal Commission should find out who is the intermediary and why he is protected and is not now serving the sentence provided for by the law of this country for the work in which he was engaged in defrauding this government.

Then, we had the promise by the ministers to which the hon. member has referred already, of a Bill to amend the Printing and Stationery Act so as to make it impossible for these abuses to continue. We were promised on the 8th of November last that that Act would be immediately submitted to council, that it might be placed before this House at an early date. Now, we have passed the natural limit for the presentation to parliament of the last of the government's business for this session, and we have not that Bill before us so far as I know. If it is before the House it must have been presented within the last few days during which time I have not been present. I submit that we are entitled to hear from some of these gentlemen why that Bill has not been presented; who in the council has blocked it,—because I presume that the minister presented it according to his promise—why it has been blocked, and who is to be protected by the keeping back of this Bill.

Then, we have a very significant inquiry by the minister in one of the exhibits in this book as to the dealings with Business Systems, Ltd. No result appears to have come from that inquiry. I take it for granted that, without some very convincing reason of wrong-doing in connection with the orders given to that firm they would not be branded in the significant way in which they are branded in this letter written by the minister. I would like to hear before a Royal Commission what Business Systems, Ltd., have been doing in connection with the government to deserve the reputation given to them in this blue-book.

Next, we have a reference to a very material shortage in the government supplies. The minister, seemingly, has found himself unequal to the task of discovering what has caused that shortage, in other words who secured possession of these supplies. If the minister cannot find out that I would like to have that point investigated by a Royal Commission. It seems to me a most ordinary work of police duty, a duty for which the Dominion police or the police of any city should be quite competent. There has been a robbery of a large quantity of supplies—so large as to attract attention even in an institution so loosely administered as the Printing Bureau within the last eight years—and it should not be beyond the power of the police to get some clue as to the locality of those goods.

Next, we have a reference to what is called 'loading'—that is overcharging for printing orders, overcharging to such an extent that the Printing Bureau now has a credit for manipulation, dishonest manipulation as this book shows, amounting to some $300,000. The effect of that loading—a very polite term—has been that department after department comes to this House asking for an appropriation for printing considerably in excess of the amount required. All these twelve ministers have read the statement in this book that they are paying more for printing than the printing costs the Bureau; they have read of the improper use being made of the money which is illegally obtained by them from parliament; and yet they sit silently in this House without a shadow of a sign of any desire on their part to know how this has been brought about, and why, it having been brought about, a remedy has not been sought in the way of a reduction by which their departments might save the money expended in this 'loading' process. I would like to find out through a Royal Commission who benefits by this 'loading'—to what extent the friends of the government have benefited, of whom the department has been making the most extraordinary purchases out of the savings provided by this form of fraud on the people.

Then, there is an exhibition made in this blue-book of extraordinary incapacity throughout all the departments, incapacity causing the addition of 50 per cent to the cost of printing the great majority of the reports, incapacity or worse so great that even in connection with the budget speech—which one would think could be safely printed as delivered—it causes great unnecessary expense. While it took 425 hours to put into type the original budget speech, 312 hours were spent in making changes. That is only a sample of what is going on through all these departments, something that would not be tolerated in any business institution in the world. Some sort of excuse might have been imagined for such a state of things in the days before the typewriter came into vogue. With the fatigue of pen writing and the illegibility of copy prepared in that way, you were always confronted with the difficulty of properly editing manuscripts before they were placed in the printer's hands. But with the typewriter universal, it is as easy to make the changes and edit the copy in typewritten form as in the proof of the type in the Bureau. And yet, in the face of that, through all these years we find this sinful waste going on in every department, and the ministers and their followers sit back and with one accord say there is no subject for investigation in such a state of affairs.

Then, at page 100, one of the expert investigators refers in general terms, and without attempt to supply details, to the condition of affairs at the Bureau as 'simply appalling.' The minister meets that condition by dispensing with the services of twelve unfortunates out of the hundreds of employees he has at the Bureau. I submit that further investigation is required to ascertain which part of this condition so 'appalling' has been dealt with by dismissing eleven inebriates and one untruthful man as we are told in this report; and which part yet remains to be dealt with.

Then, we come to the statement of large quantities of goods abstracted from the warehouses outside the Printing Bureau before the Printing Bureau was used as a storehouse for supplies of paper, large quantities of goods, amounting to thousands and thousands of dollars. There is not the least suggestion of police investigation or any other investigation to find out who profited by the removal of these goods. There is only one inference to be drawn from that. It is impossible for these goods to disappear surreptitiously in the sense that a sneak thief would take two chickens from a shed at night. These goods must have been taken by the dray load. There must be some men connected with the government service who know when the drays arrived, who filled them, where the drays were delivered, and the beneficiaries by these removals. Here is another subject for investigation by this commission, yet these gentlemen see nothing to investigate. We have a statement of an extraordinary and sudden change in the departments generally in the typewriters they use, a change so sudden, that it left the Printing Bureau with thousands of dollars worth of typewriter supplies, ribbons particularly, which have now become obsolete, because the government have ceased to use these particular typewriters. I do not think there is a member in this House who believes that there was any legitimate reason for suddenly dispensing with all the typewriters of the make for which this Bureau had laid in this enormous mass of supplies and thus to make those supplies entirely useless. There is a subject for investigation right in that; what influence was at work to secure this extraordinary displacement of one typewriter and the installation of another? What friend of the government benefited by it? What contractor? Was there a contract? Were tenders called for? Why did the transaction occur? There are many subjects there for inquiry by a commission. Then we have a statement that at the time of this investigation a large number of accounts for lithographing were examined by the expert called in by the minister, and this expert declares he made a deduction from nearly every account. The deduction seems to have been accepted by the parties rendering the accounts without protest, a fact which indicates that the accounts in the first place were fraudulent and were part of a system to defraud the government by the padding of accounts. These were not one or two accounts, but this expert says that the extortion prevailed in nearly every account submitted to him. Here we have a subject for investigation, that the names of the firms responsible for putting these dishonest accounts before the lithographing department of the Printing Bureau should be pilloried just as the names of others are pilloried in this Blue-book. There is a subject for investigation by a Royal Commission.

Then we come to a reference to political pull producing disorder in the Printing Bureau. We have specific references on page 185 and page 237, in one case with the name of the person exercising it. It is the merest passing reference to political pull. It seems to me extraordinary that the inquiry into this branch of the subject stopped there, that further light was not thrown on the nature, results and beneficiaries of the pull at the Bureau. That in itself would occupy a Royal Commission for quite a time, and is a subject which could more properly be investigated by a Royal Commission than by any other body, and which certainly cannot be satisfactorily investigated by any minister.

Then we have the most serious statement made by the minister himself, referred to in several paragraphs, starting at page 233. This is information which must have come from reliable sources, or the minister would not take the responsibility of stating it. It is said that machinists in the employ of firms in Ottawa, paid by this government for attendance on machinery at the Printing Bureau, are deliberately damaging the government's machinery so that they may be called in again to effect further repairs. That statement was made in the most deliberate way by the minister himself. I take it for granted that he had authority for that statement, or he would not place these firms under this terrible ban from which they must suffer through this unsupported statement.

I think it is due to every firm of machinists having dealings with the government that we should hear more as to this transaction, that we should find out through a royal commission or otherwise, precisely what machinists are under suspicion by the government, what wilful damage to government property has been brought about.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster).

Although this amuses the Minister of Inland Revenue who has roused from his lethargy to take an interest in the proceedings, I want to tell him that in the eyes of the people of the country it is no matter for amusement, that if this occurred in reference to his own printing office in Victoria, if, after calling in a machinist to make repairs to a press he found the machinist loosening a bolt, or removing a part causing injury to the machine, and perhaps stopping the issue of his paper, he would not regard it as a joke, or any laughing matter. Why should a minister of the Crown regard as a joke in connection with the Printing Bureau, something which would be a police court offence if practiced upon his private plant?

Lastly, I wish to refer to this man Cook, whose crimes have been so vividly depicted by the Secretary of State to-night. I want to ask the Secretary of State and his colleagues whether he and they supposed that Cook performed all these villainies simply because of original sin, whether it ever occurred to them that there must be some motive if Cook is the man the minister portrays, that there must have been something behind his actions. In other words that there must have been something in it for Cook. That is the impression conveyed to myself, and I think that is the impression that will be given to any unbiassed reader of that book, that the man who went through all these extraordinary operations, placed orders here, there, and the other place, where in ordinary course they would not have gone, was animated in his placing of these orders by some thing more than mere friendship, and when he went to the extent of risking his position by making false statements to the government, by forging documents to present to the government, by writing letters months after the dates they bore, and handing them in to the minister, it appears to me that he did not take all these risks simply for the sake of fooling the minister; it seems to me that the minister has said too much about Cook unless he proceeds to investigate who were the beneficiaries of the Cook transactions, and what benefit Cook got out of these transactions.

The hon. member for Carleton opened up a new field for speculation. It seems to me that he said too much about the Montreal 'Herald' or too little. The Montreal 'Herald' is at any time a legitimate subject for inquiry in this House. The extraordinary amount of money received by that institution every year, and the suggestions as to the proprietorship, and the secrecy observed as to who are the beneficiaries of this extraordinary bounty on the part of the government, all call for inquiry. I would like to know whether the Montreal 'Herald' really engages in the class of work covered by the specification read by the hon. member for Carleton to-night. Perhaps the Montreal 'Herald' does; I do not know whether it does or not. I was under the impression that it did not go in for printing in all these foreign tongues, and the production of lithographic maps on the elaborate scale called for by the atlas of Canada. It also occurred to me, as I am familiar with the trade, that it is an extraordinary position for a printer to be put in to say to one of his customers immediately after the total collapse of his building—and for the fact that it is mentioned here I am indebted again to the hon. member for Carleton—Here, I have a very large order on hand for you, you have made me a payment on account, now my building has totally collapsed and is a wreck, you pay me the rest of the money that is coming to me. If the hon. member for Carleton were better versed upon this subject as to which he undertakes to enlighten the House it might have occurred to him that none of these books would be ready for delivery to the government until the work, with the exception of the binding, was all completed.

Mr. CARVELL. I read a letter from Mr. Scott, the Superintendent of Immigration, stating that certain quantities of each kinds of books had been delivered, and I gave the price he figured them at, and it amounted to something over $10,200.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Those quantities had been delivered?

Mr. CARVELL. Quantities delivered. That presented the amount ordered and delivered.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I did not understand it in that way.

Mr. CARVELL. Then the hon. gentleman could not have listened very carefully.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I listened very carefully, but it is some time ago, and the hon. gentleman has made a number of extraordinary statements. While he is in a communicative mood I would like to trouble him further with the question whether or not he has any information as to whether that work was performed in the 'Herald' office or in some other office?

Mr. CARVELL. I have not.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). He has no information. His recent answer then is quite in keeping with what I said a moment ago when we recollect that these books were printed in a number of languages. Of course, each language would be delivered separately; so, it is quite possible for a quantity of these books to be delivered, and yet the remnant not delivered, but totally destroyed in the wreck of the 'Herald' building. But, on the face of it this is a transaction requiring explanation too. I do not think it is reasonable that these books should remain in the 'Herald' building, and not be destroyed in the collapse of that building. If they were there they certainly were destroyed and yet the government has paid in full for them.

Mr. CARVELL. Would not that properly come under the purview of the Public Accounts Committee?

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I have not the privilege of being a member of the Public Accounts Committee, but I have very often been a spectator at that committee, and from my experience as a spectator, if I wished to find out something which it was the desire of certain members of this House to conceal, the Public Accounts Committee is the last place to which I would go seeking for information. I have detained the House longer than I intended, but I think I have shown some reasons why we should have a commission to further prosecute the inquiry commenced by the Secretary of State.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, before the question is put, I would like to say one or two words. It is rather a remarkable thing in the first place that none of the colleagues of the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Murphy) have found themselves in a position to come to his rescue in connection with the matter which has been brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup). I would not be prepared to say that the colleagues of the hon. gentleman have not shown their wisdom in that regard. I shall not attempt to go into detail with regard to this subject for it has already been very fully and thoroughly discussed, but I may say to my hon. friend the Secretary of State that I was extremely astonished at one remark that he made in the course of his speech this afternoon. That was his statement that it was the most natural thing in the world—I did not take it down but I remember it very well—for the Mortimer Company, Limited, to have written the letter to him which appears on page 297 of the report. I hope I am not quoting the hon. gentleman incorrectly. I noticed the observation when he made it. It arrested my attention immediately because I had just been reading the letter, and if he has such an appreciation of the letter and the circumstances attending it I am bound to say that his ideas of such matters are absolutely on a different plane from those which I entertain. The letter of the Mortimer Company, if it means anything, means that an employee of the department of which he is the head, came to that company and told them that he, a minister of the Crown, the Secretary of State for Canada, desired a letter to be used in parliament for the purpose of deceiving parliament and deceiving the people of this country, and that the company thought it was the most natural thing in the world that such a request should have been made and were prepared to comply with it at once. If that letter means anything less than that I would like the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to tell me what it does mean. I cannot, by any construction of the English language contained in that letter, make it amount to anything less than what I have just now alleged. I will read it if any hon. gentleman in this House doubts my statement. When we hear a minister of the Crown, speaking for his colleagues in the government, speaking on this occasion for the Prime Minister of Canada, tell the parliament of Canada and the people of this country that it was the most natural thing in the world for this company to have written that letter under these circumstances, I am bound to say I am surprised that the Prime Minister sits dumb in his seat. It is the most remarkable statement that I ever heard made in this parliament. What does it mean? Does it mean that the Mortimer Company have been doing this thing before that it is only an incident of the enormous business that they have been carrying on with the government? Why, Sir, if there were no other reason for an inquiry by a Royal Commission then, I say that not only in justice to the people of Canada, not only in justice to the government of Canada, but in justice to the Mortimer Company themselves, a Royal Commission ought to be granted at once in order that it may be made to appear to the people what this letter does mean and what the circumstances are under which they have been carrying on business with the government.

It is idle to expect that the Prime Minister or any of his colleagues will consent to any investigation of this kind. I repeat what I have said before: That if they were sensitive about such matters they would pay out of their own pockets the hundred thousand dollars that have been lost to the people of Canada by their refusal to grant the inquiry I asked for on the 30th of April, 1908. According to the statement of the Secretary of State the $94,000 or $100,000 which have been lost to the people of the country in these Printing Bureau scandals that are a disgrace to the government, have been for the most part if not altogether lost since I asked the Prime Minister and his colleagues to grant an investigation which would have saved every dollar of this money to the people and probably hundreds of thousands of dollars besides the particulars of which we do not know because the lid is kept closely upon some of these departments. On the 30th of April, 1908, I moved for that investigation, and the answer of the Prime Minister was a quibble, nothing more than a quibble. He had the audacity to state, and he repeated it the following year, that the Civil Service Commission, which had entered into an investigation that the government never contemplated, had done this work thoroughly and completely. I challenge that statement now and if he doubts it I can read to the Prime Minister statement after statement from the report of that Royal Commission showing in the most unequivocal and definite manner that they only touched the very fringe of the inquiry that ought to be made. In face of that the Prime Minister ventured to burk that inquiry, to refuse that inquiry and the people of Canada are to-day out of pocket nearly $100,000 in one item alone, because of that refusal. In 1909, on the 1st of April, after the general elections, when the Toronto 'Globe' and the Montreal 'Herald' and other Liberal papers had called upon the Prime Minister to cleanse the Augean stable of the filth that had accumulated, my hon. friend from St. Anne (Mr. Doherty), in a speech in which there was not one line or word of partisanship, in a studiously moderate speech, implored the government of Canada not only for their own sake but for the sake of the coutnry to grant the inquiry he then moved for. Again the answer of the Prime Minister was that the Civil Service Commission had made a complete and exhaustive inquiry, a statement which was absolutely denied and falsified by paragraph after paragraph in the very report to which he alluded. I make that statement deliberately in the face of the Prime Minister, and if he ventures to deny it I can give him the proof. There was the further statement made by the right hon. gentleman on that occasion in reply to the moderate and patriotic speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Doherty), when the right hon. gentleman said: To the pure all things are pure, and therefore every department of this government ought to be pure in the eyes of my hon. friend from St. Anne. I say that the answer of the Prime Minister cannot be characterized as anything higher than a quibble. To-day, his Secretary of State gives the same answer. We had it in 1908; we had it in 1909; we have it again in 1911. The Civil Service Commission in 1908 spoke of the awful condition of some of these departments and expressed their belief that other departments which they had not time to investigate should be investigated forthwith, but yet the Prime Minister says that that investigation was full, complete and exhaustive. True, with respect to one matter and one matter only mentioned in that report, they appointed Justice Cassels to investigate a particular feature of one department and Mr. Justice Cassels investigated that particular feature of that particular department with the result that his report shows that not only the suspicions of the Civil Service Commission were correct but that he himself unearthed matters that were not even dreamt of by the Royal Commission which made that scathing report upon one department of this government. Then we came to parliament and we pointed out that Mr. Justice Cassels had not only expressed the belief, but pointed to the almost absolute certainty that a certain species of graft and corruption and dishonesty which appeared in that particular department could not possibly be confined to it alone, and in 1909 my hon. friend (Mr. Doherty) moved his resolution and we were told there was nothing to investigate. To-day the Secretary of State repeats the futile answer of the Prime Minister in 1908 and the equally futile answer of the Prime Minister in 1909. I shall not go over the facts that have been set forth with great force and cogency by my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) as to why this inquiry should be granted. Let me ask, why should it not be granted? What detriment can there be to the public interest by the granting of such a Royal Commission of inquiry? The investigation by the minister was not held under oath, and I refer to the statute upon public inquiries to be found in Vol. 2, R. S. C., pages 1779, 1780, under which the Secretary of State could, if he so desired, have conducted the inquiry under oath:

> The minister presiding over any department of the Civil Service of Canada may appoint at any time, under the authority of the Governor in Council, a commissioner or commissioners to investigate and report upon the state and management of the business, or any part of the business, of such department, either in the inside or outside service thereof, and the conduct of any person in such service, so far as the same relates to his official duties.

A commissioner so appointed has the most ample power and authority to examine witnesses on oath and conduct the inquiry to the very end in a thorough and exhaustive maner. When my hon. friend the Secretary of State tells us that he was very much engaged in connection with the session of parliament, and his duties as a minister of the Crown, all of which I sincerely admit, he simply shows us that he undertook to do a work for which he was not very well fitted, a work which ought to have been done, and might have been done, and better done, by the appointment of a commissioner with power to take evidence under oath. That has never been done up to the present time, and I say that until that is done, there has been no inquiry into that department of such a character as the public interest of this country demands. Look at the very conditions revealed to us this afternoon by the hon. the Secretary of State. When did he begin this investigation? In November, 1908. When did he end it? In the summer of 1910. When were these frauds upon this department committed? As to nine-tenths of them, between November, 1908, and the summer of 1910, during the very time in which he was engaged in this investigation. A better comment on the investigation could not be made. I am not finding fault with my hon. friend the Secretary of State in one respect in that regard, because I know that as minister of the Crown he has many matters which must necessarily engage his attention outside of his investigation of this department; but I am pointing out to him that if at the time when he first conceived that an inquiry was necessary, he had appointed a commissioner, or commissioners, selecting some of those very technical men whom he afterwards called in to assist him, and if he had enabled those men to give their undivided attention to a thorough and complete investigation of the department, he probably would have saved the people of this country between $75,000 and $100,000, and the investigation would have been of so thorough a character as to satisfy the people of this country, and that has not been done up to the present time. I can only say in conclusion that I do not regard the investigation that has been made as a thorough or satisfactory one; I do not regard the attitude of the government with respect to this as any more satisfactory than it was on the 1st of April, 1908, or on the 30th of April, 1909, and I am prepared to support the motion of my hon. friend from East Hastings.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend opened his remarks by saying that he was astonished that none of the colleagues of the Secretary of State had come to his rescue. For this there was a very good reason, that the Secretary of State did not need any rescue from anybody. The Secretary of State—I submit it to the judgment of every impartial man in this House—made an honest, a fair and a complete defence of his position. Every man in this House must admit that he made his defence in a frank and open manner, and that it did him infinite credit. Anything that could be said in his support by any of his colleagues or by anybody else could not add to the effectiveness of that defence. I will take just one point mentioned by my hon. friend a moment ago as a cause of reproach to the Secretary of State; but in my judgment it is to his credit as showing that he wanted to make his defence thorough. My hon. friend commented on the letter written by Mr. Mortimer, stating that it had been written at the suggestion of the Secretary of State to cover up certain transactions in the department. My hon. friend the Secretary of State, when he undertook to probe the department, did not conceal anything, but exposed everything in the department, favourable or unfavourable, and his object in asking for that letter from Mr. Mortimer was to have evidence against a dishonest official, to see how far his dishonesty had gone, and the consequence of that and other evidence is that that officer has been dismissed, and is no longer in the service. Does it seem extraordinary that conditions in the Printing Bureau should have been so lamentable as they have been proved to have been? Even in the best regulated departments there may be dishonest officials, and even while the rascality is going on the man at the head of the department may not be aware of it. But when it is called to his notice, it is his duty to deal with it, and there his responsibility commences. What more can be asked of any man, whether at the head of government, or in any other position, than that as soon as he has reason to believe that something wrong is going on in his department, he should take all precautions to eradicate the wrong and improve conditions. This is what has been done by my hon. friend the Secretary of State.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In connection with that, what does the right hon. gentleman think of the conduct of a company in writing such a letter for such a purpose, and is the government still doing business with that same company?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What I think is this: that a company which is seeking for business will always try to get the business it is seeking for. The methods may not always be very honourable. It does not follow that they are dishonest; but the companies are very apt to take the methods of the men with whom they deal. This company was dealing with one of the officers who were dishonest. Of one of them we do not need to speak, because he is no more. I believe that all the work and supplies which he had charge of are now done by tender. Now, my hon. friend the Secretary of State took office in the month of August, 1908, and he was not very long in office when he thought he should give particular attention to the affairs of the Department of Printing. He began by writing two letters, one to the Acting King's Printer and the other to the Superintendent of Stationery, informing them that henceforth they were not to buy any supplies. That was the first thing to be done. But my hon. friend had reason to believe that the Superintendent of Stationery had fraudulent transactions with a firm in New York. Such transactions are always hard to discover. My hon. friend did not rush into the investigation at once, but he went to New York and got information, and as soon as he got it, he started the inquiry. The result was effective and immediate. The moment the investigation commenced in earnest, that officer disappeared from the country. That was the first result of the long preparation which had been made by my hon. friend the Secretary of State, for the investigation. It was taken the moment he started it and brought out a revelation of the conditions which formerly existed in the department and which my hon. friend has done everything possible to remedy. The only reason why hon. gentlemen opposite now ask for an investigation by a Royal Commission is that the investigation by the Secretary of State was not under oath. True, it was not under oath, but it was none the less effective. The book we have here, and which has been copiously quoted from, shows that the work was effective.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If my right hon. friend will allow me, I said that I would not enumerate the reasons gone over by other speakers and particularly by my hon. friend from New Westminster and then I said that I would add one other reason.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I will come to the further reasons given. The investigation was not under oath but it was thorough and effective, and the result was put upon the table early this session. But is that all we have? No, since that time there has been an investigation under oath on this very thing. These gentlemen who now want a Royal Commission have been investigating this very department in the Committee on Public Accounts the last two or three months. Why then should they ask for another investigation? My hon. friend, the Secretary of State, investigated his department and placed his report on the table. Gentlemen of the opposition were not satisfied, and they themselves had another investigation before the Committee on Public Accounts, and still they are not satisfied and want another. What is there more to investigate? All the facts have been disclosed. There is enough to show what was the condition of the department, and it is shown also that the minister has taken every precaution to undo the wrong that was done and establish a new condition of things. I appeal to the fairness of every man on the other side that there is no more reason for another investigation. If at the opening of the session, when the report was laid on the table, the opposition had said: We are not satisfied, we want another investigation, we do not want it before a committee of this House but want a Royal Commission—I could understand that. But at the opening of the session, they took their own course. They did not ask for a Royal Commission but they asked for an investigation before the committee on Public Accounts and they got it. And now they have it, they ask for another. What is there more to investigate before a Royal Commission which could not be investigated before the committee on Public Accounts? What witness is there whom they want to examine before a Royal Commission who could not be examined before the committee on Public Accounts? Is there any reason why there should be more security in the one case than in the other? There is no sense in their asking for this Royal Commission of inquiry. They have taken their course, and if they want more investigation, the committee on Public Acounts is still there and they can have it.

House divided on the amendment of Mr. Northrup.

*Mr. MONK:

1. By whom were the plans prepared for improvements and extensions submitted for approval by the Canadian Light and Power Company in connection with the Beauharnois canal?

Mr. BRODEUR:

1. It has no information of a dam having been built there since 1904.

2. If so, what is the reason for this discrimination, and is it the intention of the Intercolonial railway authorities to continue it?

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Yes.
2. Because the city of St. John, who own the wharfs there, charge side wharfage and as the railway adopts the tariff of the city, the Intercolonial railway charges wharfage, at, and should continue to do so, so long as the city of St. John does.

THE COPYRIGHT ACT.

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture), moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Copyright Act, chapter 70 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, by providing for—
(a) the protection in Canada of the copyright in original literary, dramatic, musical and artistic works;
(b) the fees to be paid for the registration of copyrights;
(c) penalties for the infringement of copyright; and
(d) the prohibition of the importation into Canada of certain reprints of copyright works.

He said: Perhaps it would be well I should give a little explanation of this resolution which covers a subject of very considerable importance. The passage of the Act which it is proposed to found on this resolution will, I trust and believe, mark the termination of the discussion in regard to the important subject of copyright which has extended over the whole period of our existence as a dominion. Under the British North America Act, copyright in Canada appears to be entrusted to the parliament of Canada. However, uunder the Imperial Act of 1842, the copyright law of the empire prevails in Canada and in all the other parts of His Majesty's dominions. The result has been conflict between the imperial legislation having force in Canada and the Copyright Acts passed by the parliament of Canada. Efforts have been made by the representatives of Canada to solve this difficulty. So far back as 1872, there was a Canadian Copyright Act passed which was disallowed. Later, in 1889, a copyright law was passed in Canada which the then Governor General assented to because it contained a clause saying that it should only come into force by proclamation of the Governor General in Council and that proclamation has never been issued, due to objection on the part of the imperial authorities. The result has been that in Canada the Imperial Act is in force and up to the present time no important Canadian legislation, in regard to copyright, has been permitted. It is true that in 1900 this parliament passed a Copyright Act which the imperial authorities, when it was submitted to them by the then Governor General, Lord Minto, considered not to be in conflict with their own law, and, therefore, His Excellency assented to it, and it is now on our statute books. The allowance of that Act was due to the acquiescence of the imperial authorities and not to a successful assertion of the right of the parliament of Canada to legislate. For a long time back representatives of Canada have insisted on the exclusive right of Canada to legislate in regard to copyright in Canada. Sir John Thompson was perhaps one of the most prominent of those who took this ground, and I wish to refer to the memoranda and despatches which were drawn up by him dealing with the whole subject most exhaustively, and to my mind, most successfully, in the light of Canada's legal right as well as her right as a matter of policy.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Where are Sir John Thompson's memoranda to be found? A very important state paper such as that undoubtedly was, ought to be easily accessible to members of this House. When I wanted to look at it, I had the greatest possible difficulty in having it hunted up.

Mr. FISHER. I think it will be found included in the returns brought down to the House in 1891 or 1892. I could refer to it myself because it is in the file of the department, but I quite agree with my hon. friend that it ought to be accessible, and I shall be glad to make it accessible to everybody who wishes to study the question. Canada took the legal ground as well as what I might call the ground of imperial policy to legislate. Our legal right, however, has always been disputed by the imperial authorities, and Sir John Thompson failed to secure assent to his views as expressed in this memorandum.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is, briefly stated, the argument of the imperial authorities that the British North America Act does not give to Canada the complete right to legislate?

Mr. FISHER. I did not intend to go into that question. I am just giving a short historical statement of what led up to the present situation. I shall be glad in the discussion which will follow, to give further information on that point. The question of copyright was taken up in the Imperial Conference of 1907, but it was not discussed at any length, being reserved for what was called a subsidiary conference. That subsidiary conference was held last spring in London, and I was authorized by the government to represent Canada there. Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Newfoundland were also represented, as well as the imperial government. That conference was presided over by the right Hon. Sidney Buxton, by whom copyright matters are looked after in the imperial government. The conference lasted for several weeks, a number of meetings were held, and a series of resolutions were adopted embodying the conclusions of the conference. At that conference the exclusive right of the self-governing dominions to legislate in regard to copyright was conceded. The impediment to this right was contained in the statute of 1842, of the imperial parliament, and it was agreed that, in the Bill which was to be introduced into the imperial parliament by Mr. Buxton as a result of that conference, that Act should be repealed, so as to leave the way clear for the principle of self-government of the overseas dominions with regard to copyright to be recognized and maintained. In reply to the invitation to take part in that subsidiary conference last spring, the Canadian government said they wished to discuss the question from all points, and not to be hampered by any particular part of the question being laid down as not open to the discussion, and the work of the conference took that shape. There was no restriction in the discussions, and, therefore, we were free to present our views in regard to the whole question of copyright. Speaking as a representative of Canada at the conference, I took the view that was laid down by Sir John Thompson in regard to Canada's right to legislate. I did not dwell so much upon the legal aspect, which had been decided against us, as upon the question of imperial policy. I took the ground that the British North America Act appeared to give to Canada the right to legislate, and that it was a necessary, inherent right in our general right of self-government, and I am glad to be able to say that the representatives of the imperial authorities and the delegates of the other self-governing dominions unanimously agreed to that proposition. Therefore, I think I am justified in saying that the result of that subsidiary conference is the solution and the finish of the difficulties which had existed for many years as between the Canadian view and the imperial view on this question. Immediately after the conference was over the right Hon. Sidney Buxton introduced in the Imperial House of Commons, a copyright Bill, the terms of which had been discussed in that conference. In consequence of the dissolution of the English House shortly afterwards, the Bill was not proceeded with, but in the new parliament which is now sitting at Westminster, he has introduced practically the same Bill, with some very slight modification, and I was glad the other day to receive a despatch from him informing me that the second reading of the Bill had passed. This entitles me to say that the House of Commons of Great Britain has accepted the principles that were agreed to at the Copyright Conference, and I am, therefore, the more entitled to say on behalf of Canada that the principle which we have contended for so long, that Canada should have the sole right to legislate in regard to copyright in Canada, is accepted by the imperial government and House of Commons, and I have no doubt will be accepted by the imperial parliament and become law. I might say, in answer to the hon. leader of the opposition, that the contention against this, from a legal point of view, as I understood it, was that the British North America Act of 1867 did not repeal the Copyright Act of 1842, and did not do away with the powers or rights conferred on British authors by that Act—that although the British North America Act did permit Canada to legislate on copyright as far as the Dominion itself was concerned, it did not repeal the imperial Act which had force all over His Majesty's dominions, and that the two powers were concurrent, and the British law officers had always maintained up to the present time that while Canada had a right to legislate, that right was subject to her legislation not being in conflict with the legislation of the mother country. That is a legal point on which I would not presume to give an opinion, but Sir John Thompson took very strong ground upon it, and to my mind his argument seemed conclusive. However, it did not appeal to the imperial authorities in the same way, and the home government never acknowledged or recognized its force sufficiently to accept it and allow it to control.

Mr. LENNOX. That is subject to the legislation which existed in British North America in 1867.

Mr. FISHER. Yes. Our contention was that the British North America Act affirmed the exclusive right of the parliament of Canada to legislate on copyrights in Canada, but the imperial authorities contended that while it conferred the right on the Canadian parliament to legislate on copyright in Canada, that legislation must not be in conflict with the Imperial Act which had force in Canada, and which was in no sense impaired or repealed by the clauses in the British North America Act.

I want to speak briefly about some provisions of the Bill I propose to introduce. A great deal of it is the same as our present copyright law. There are one or two things, however, that I ought to explain. In the first place one of the chief objects of the imperial authorities in the holding of an imperial copyright conference last spring was to secure uniformity of copyright legislation throughout the empire. They also desired to harmonize British copyright legislation, whether of the motherland or the overseas dominions, with the copyright legislation which had been accepted by the Berne Convention or international union. The British authorities adhered to the International Berne Convention, and a little over two years ago there was held in Berlin a continuation of the Berne Convention, now commonly known as the Berlin Convention. In that certain new ideas were introduced into the International Union Convention, and the question arose as to whether Great Britain, on her own behalf, and on behalf of the rest of the empire, should adhere to the Berlin Convention. At that meeting the representatives of Great Britain agreed to the changes subject to the indorsement by the authorities at home. The authorities at home had studied the matter, they appointed a commission under the presidency of Lord Gorrell to study the whole question, and the commission made a report to the home authorities. But before taking action on that report the imperial authorities wished to hold this imperial conference. Therefore the question came up, not only as to imperial legislation, and legislation of the different self-governing dominions, but also as to legislation in connection with the International Union, and the subject of adherence to the International union on the part of the British Empire was part of the work of the British Conference. In addition to the acknowledgment of the rights of the self-governing dominions to complete autonomy with regard to copyright legislation, the British Act also recognizes the complete right of these dominions to decide upon the question of adherence to the International Union. Of course any such adherence being an international matter, must be dealt with by the Foreign Office of the imperial government, but it must be dealt with by that Foreign Office at the request of the self-governing dominions. There is in the Act now before the British parliament complete and absolute freedom for each of the self-governing dominions to adhere to the International Union or not as they may decide for themselves. One of the chief objects of the conference was uniformity; and in the draft Bill which I propose to introduce, we have endeavoured to follow the lines of the British Bill as much as possible. Therefore, it will be found in quite a number of instances that clauses which really cover the same point as other clauses in our present law are framed in a different way so as to be as much as possible in harmony with, and follow the lines of the imperial Act, but the meaning is exactly the same as in our present law. However, there are a few things in which the new Act will materially differ from the old. A very important one is the period of copyright protection. The International Union adopted a period longer than was formerly the case. It adopted the period of the life of the author and 50 years thereafter. The British imperial authorities discussed that point at length. There was a great deal of doubt and hesitation as to the acceptance of it, but finally Mr. Buxton adopted it in his Bill. I have included that in our own Bill, and am proposing to ask parliament to give the same copyright protection under the Canadian law as is given by the Imperial government, and the different countries which are adhering to the International Union. I do this in the interests of harmony and similarity in the copyright law, not only of our own empire, but the world at large.

There is another very important item in this Bill which I might as well allude to now. Under it we define and provide for Canadian copyright very much the same as the old Act did. That is to say the conditions for obtaining copyright in Canada are practically identical with what they have been. There is one provision in this Bill, however, which we have never had before. In view of the desirability of imperial uniformity of copyright in the different parts of the empire, and perhaps with a certain deference to the fact that heretofore the imperial copyright law obtained over the whole empire, I am going to ask the House to provide a machinery by which we can have the same reciprocity in copyright protection all over the empire. That is to say that, if Canada secures for her copyright holders copyright protection in the mother land, or in Australia, New Zealand or South Africa—copyright protection the same as the people of these various countries have—I propose to ask parliament to authorize the granting of copyright protection in Canada to the owners of copyright in the various parts of the empire. I call this for the sake of simplicity, imperial reciprocity in copyright. There is one condition, however, which I wish to embody in this Act. Those who have studied copyright at all, know that in Great Britain no formality as it is called is required to secure copyright. Great Britain will give copyright to the foreigner who prints his book abroad and who does nothing in the British Isles in regard to his book except to put it on the market. He is not required to print it, or to publish it, or even register it in Great Britain, but only to put it on the market. That is inconsistent with the provision of our copyright law, for we have required that a book must be printed in Canada and registered in Canada in order to secure copyright here, and I do not propose or wish to lessen these conditions. Therefore, when it comes to a question of reciprocity with, let us say, Great Britain, while I propose to give to anybody who has copyright in Great Britain copyright protection in Canada, I would propose to make it a condition that he shall be a subject of His Majesty or a resident in Great Britain, and that the article that is to be copyrighted shall be made within Great Britain. The same will be the case with regard to Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and Newfoundland.

Mr. SPROULE. That will not be exactly reciprocal with Great Britain.

Mr. FISHER. I propose to make that a condition of reciprocity. I may explain that the international union does not impose this condition; it gives copyright protection on works published and printed and copyrighted outside the union provided these works get copyright protection in any country of the union. To my mind, that is a blemish on the conditions of the international union. It seems to me that under that provision there is no inducement to countries which are not within the union to enter the union. The subjects or citizens of countries outside the union, by simply getting copyright we will say in Great Britain which is a member of the union, enjoy all the advantages of copyright in the union countries. That, as I say, to my mind, is a weakness in the union. I think it would be a weakness in imperial reciprocity, largely because of the fact that the mother country in her copyright legislation is so liberal and free. I confess, that, so far as Canada is concerned, I would not like to propose or adopt the same absolute liberality and freedom. Therefore, if we grant reciprocal copyright to the people of Great Britain, give them copyright protection in Canada by reason of the fact that they have copyright protection in Great Britain, I think it is only just and fair that it should be restricted to the people of Great Britain and to the works or objects made in Great Britain instead of being free to the whole world. If we did not make that a condition, everybody and anybody in the whole world could secure copyright protection in Canada by simply getting copyright in Great Britain, as Great Britain allows them to do.

This proposition of reciprocal copyright would come in under a clause of the Act which provides that the Governor in Council, on being satisfied that the other country to the reciprocal arrangement has granted similar privileges to Canadians in that country, shall be empowered to allow that country's subjects or citizens the privileges provided in Canada under the Bill. I also follow the English Act in another point, and that is in authorizing, as the English Act does His Majesty in Council—here authorizing the Governor in Council—to make initial arrangements with foreign countries in regard to copyright protection. If a country will make a special arrangement to grant us privileges equivalent to or compensating for the privileges we grant to them the Governor in Council, if this Bill passes, will be authorized to make that arrangement.

One point I have omitted to speak of which is important. There are different kinds of copyrights—literary, musical, dramatic and artistic. In this Act they are all grouped together, and they all get the same treatment and come under the same conditions. In Canada that has not been altogether the case heretofore. In Great Britain it was still less the case. There have been a great number of copyright Acts in Great Britain, and the law has been extremely complicated; and one of the desires of the conference was to secure uniformity and simplicity in the law, and, for that reason, the British Act groups all these different kinds of copyright together making the necessary conditions and detail to conform to the particular object. I propose to do that in the Act. There is another point of interest that I think the hon. member for Simcoe has alluded to, and that is in regard to penalties. In this Act I propose to introduce a penal clause which will cover dramatic and musical copyright as well as literary and artistic, and will secure, through criminal action, protection to owners of copyrights. I think

I have fairly covered the ground in a general way to enable the House to understand the resolution. When we come to discuss the Act in committee we can take up the details more at length.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister speaks of a British subject or a bona fide resident in Great Britain, what interpretation does he give to the words 'bona fide resident'?

Mr. FISHER. Foreigners who come to reside in Great Britain, and make it their home, but who do not take out naturalization papers, or take the oath of allegiance, would still be considered bona fide residents and would be treated the same as a citizen. That is the way in which the British Act is framed. For instance, we might have an Italian or an American residing there, as a number of Americans have done. They are really, to all intents and purposes of the copyright, British subjects, but they have not taken out naturalization papers or sworn allegiance. That is their authors' home or residence.

Mr. SPROULE. Suppose a foreigner goes there, and desires to get the reprint of a book, and he enjoys the copyright of the country, and after that was under way for a length of time he left the country, would his work still enjoy the benefit of the copyright?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, I think it would if he was a bona fide resident at the time he secured the copyright. That would not apply to what might be called a colourable residence. If a person went there only for the purpose of securing a copyright, I think he would not be called a bona fide resident. I discussed that at considerable length in London, and objection was taken to any definite period being fixed, and the decision of the conference was that we should use terms which would fairly treat the people concerned. The idea of the conference was to give liberal protection to the creator of a literary, artistic, dramatic or musical work, to give him such an interest in his production that he and his family might enjoy all the reasonable profit and advantage of his having created that work. There is no doubt that it is a complex subject. The older countries are a little more appreciative of what I might call intellectual work. I found a strong feeling, not only amongst authors, but amongst the general public, that it was only fair and right to give to authors of these intellectual productions a reasonable protection for the fruits of their labour. I would commend to hon. members the study of the report of Lord Gorrell's commission. It is probably the most exhaustive and complete compendium of information in regard to the copyright that can be found anywhere, and it influenced me a great deal. As to the question of the duration of the copyright, I personally thought that 50 years after the death of an author was a ridiculously long period in which to give copyright protection. But the argument was put forward, and discussed before that commission, and the report shows conclusively, that long as this period seemed at first, it is only a just and fair protection to the intellectual product of the author. As a matter of fact, I suppose nine out of ten copyright works die long before the fifty years have expired; then nobody wants them, and copyright protection is of no further value. But for those who do live, it does not seem too long a period, for the fact that they do live shows the work to have been the product of genius, and in that case fifty years is not too long a period to give copyright protection. A work which lives for that length of time is of such value to the world at large that the author deserves for himself, and for his family to reap the advantage which the copyright will give them. This feature was adopted after very serious discussion. In England, when Mr. Buxton first introduced his Bill last year, and announced that copyright was to be given for fifty years, there was almost a howl of protest; but I see that the second reading of the Bill was passed without any objection whatever being raised to it.

Mr. SPROULE. Take a country that is not included with those who took part in the Berne Convention. Suppose a subject of that country proposed to get copyright in Canada, could it be got entirely independently of any reciprocity arrangement between that country and Canada, and when it was secured independently from that country, if there was an arrangement between Canada, and that country, would the copyright which was secured by a foreigner in Canada extend to every other country that was included in the Berne Convention?

Mr. FISHER. Under this Bill the foreigner cannot obtain copyright in Canada. Therefore, any foreigner can only obtain copyright in Canada by reason of an arrangement or convention between Canada and the country to which he belongs. The Act says that the Governor in Council may make an arrangement, whenever they are satisfied that a country gives an equivalent or compensating advantage to that which is given in Canada. If the copyright protection is obtained in Canada and Canada is a member of the international union under the present regulations of the union, that copyright would hold in every country that belongs to that union. Canada is now in the international union. Unless the regulations of the international union are somewhat modified I would not suggest that Canada should in the future adhere to the union, because one of the chief difficulties I see in adhering to that union is the condition which my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule), has cited. At the present time Great Britain is a member of the union. The United States is not a member of the union. A United States author, by simply selling his book in England, can get copyright in England and that gives him copyright throughout the whole union, although the United States gives absolutely nothing in return for it. I do not think that is fair.

Mr. SPROULE. That is the feature of it that appeals to us. We give the advantage and get nothing in return.

Mr. FISHER. No. Therefore, I would propose, if this Bill passes, not to adhere to the union except on the condition that only citizens of the countries of the union should get the advantages of copyright protection in Canada. But, I must say frankly, that is contrary to the present rules and regulations of the union. There is, however, a provision in the union that by permission, a country may adhere to the union with reservations, not adhering to the whole of the regulations of the union. I believe, although I am not positive about it, because a change may have taken place, that England proposes to adhere to the union with a reservation. Whether the countries of the union will permit adherence with that reservation I do not know. Negotiations are going on. I would propose to adhere to the union only on condition of the reservation that it would be only citizens and subjects of the countries in the union that would have any rights to copyright protection in Canada.

Motion agreed to, and House went into committee on the resolution.

Mr. LENNOX. Has the minister a copy of the Act which has just received its second reading in the British House of Commons?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, I have just one copy. If my hon. friend would like to ask any question I will try to look it up.

Mr. LENNOX. The minister referred to the law as it existed prior to 1867, and said that, that law, existing at the time when we were confederated and when we obtained the British North America Act, it was understood or determined that the law would not be repealed by force of the British North America Act. Does the Bill which is now before the British House of Commons purport to repeal that Act?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, it repeals all existing copyright legislation in England.

Mr. LENNOX. So that we will begin at the beginning?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. LENNOX. I understood the minister to indicate that we will have protection by way of penalty. We will probably have under the Act the ordinary right to suit against a person who infringes a literary or dramatic work, but what I am more interested in is that we shall also have a penal clause in the Act so that those persons who are without substance but possess great activity and ambition in taking the works of others will be amenable and we will be able to get at them?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, that is included in the Bill.

Mr. LENNOX. That is something that the Bill aimed at a session or two ago?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, exactly.

Mr. PORTER. May I inquire from the minister if it is the intention to amend the Copyright Act in such a way that the production of an opera by a resident or citizen of Canada will be protected by the granting of a copyright for it here in Canada? In the city where I live a man produced an opera a short time ago and I applied to the office here for a copyright for the protection of that work. I found I could not obtain it here and that I had to obtain it in London, England. It appears to me that if it is not the intention to provide for such a copyright it ought to be taken into consideration and an amendment should be made to cover that point.

Mr. FISHER. The Act as proposed will include that.

Mr. LENNOX. There is nothing in our Act is there, with reference to securing reciprocal rights between ourselves, say, and the United States?

Mr. FISHER. Only that the Act empowers the Governor in Council to enter into an arrangement with a foreign country provided the Governor in Council is satisfied that the foreign country gives as much as it gets.

Mr. LENNOX. I have no doubt the minister appreciates the importance—I know he does—of what has taken place and of securing fair reciprocal rights between ourselves and the United States in that regard. That will be done, the minister says, by order in council, and by an arrangement between the two powers.

Mr. FISHER. Heretofore the people of the United States have secured copyright in Canada by reason of securing it in England and only in that way. They may do that by the simple sale of the article in England. This law does away with that because English copyright will no longer be in force in Canada after this Act passes.

Mr. SPROULE. That gave them the right to publish cheap reprints here.

Mr. FISHER. This will prevent that.

Mr. SPROULE. But they have exercised that right for years, have they not?

Mr. FISHER. There has not been very much of what is called the sale of cheap reprints here. I am speaking of the American author or publisher, and he gets copyright protection in Canada by securing copyright in Great Britain.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, we objected to that.

Mr. FISHER. That was one of the difficulties we have had, and the new law both in England and here does away with that absolutely. Another of our difficulties was that it has been the practice of British authors to secure copyright in the United States, the United States publisher setting up the type and printing and publishing the book in the United States, and the British authors include in that arrangement the Canadian market which they throw into the bargain, with the result that the United States publisher is able to sell in Canada the books printed in the United States under the United States copyright. The new law will prevent that.

Mr. FOSTER. The minister, of course, does not mean that the right heretofore obtained in England under copyright will not be preserved?

Mr. FISHER. Oh, certainly, the rights already obtained will be preserved.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does this Bill establish in Canada a system of copyright practically along the same line as that of Great Britain and the other dominions of the empire?

Mr. FISHER. As nearly as possible.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is similar legislation to be introduced in Australasia, South Africa and New Zealand?

Mr. FISHER. The British copyright Bill introduced by Mr. Buxton supposes first that it may be accepted by the different dominions by legislation of their own; second, that where it is impossible to accept the British Bill in its entirety, the Dominions will adopt legislation practically identical with it; and the third supposition is that one of the Dominions may insist upon legislation which is in conflict with the British Bill. Under the first supposition the British Bill will come into force in a Dominion beyond the seas by the legislation of that Dominion. There are provisions in the British Bill which would be inconsistent with our present copyright, which I do not think Canada is prepared to abandon, and we aim at passing legislation which is practically identical with the British Bill. That will have to be judged by the home government, and if they declare that our legislation is practically identical with theirs, then the provisions of the British copyright law, so far as they affect British copyright, will be open to us in Canada. If, however, we adopt legislation which is inimical to the British copyright law, and the Secretary of State declares that our law is inconsistent with the British law, we then have the privilege under Mr. Buxton's Act, of repealing the British law now in force in Canada to the extent it is in force here. The British Act itself repeals these laws as applied to Canada if we shall adopt the British Act. If we adopt legislation which is practically identical with the British legislation, the Secretary of State for Great Britain will declare that the British Act applies and, therefore, the laws of Great Britain heretofore in force in Canada are repealed. If we decide to pass legislation which is inconsistent with the British Act, and the Secretary of State so declares, we are given authority to repeal the British laws which are to-day in force in Canada in so far as they apply to Canada. Under the three modes of procedure, we have, therefore, absolute freedom by the new British law.

Mr. DOHERTY. The minister said that no foreigner will be in a position to obtain copyright; do I understand that a person must be a British subject to get copyright in Canada?

Mr. FISHER. A British subject or a bona fide resident.

Mr. DOHERTY. The present law requires that a person shall be domiciled here; are we to understand that it is intended to diminish that?

Mr. FISHER. I would not like to give a legal opinion on that point. The intention is that the person shall not merely be a casual visitor coming here for the purpose of getting copyright, but a real resident of the country. The question of domicile as discussed in the conference seemed to be hedged round with a good deal of difficulty, and the legal members preferred the term in the Bill to the term 'domicile.'

Mr. DOHERTY. I am afraid that 'bona fide residence' will be more difficult to determine than 'domicile.'

Mr. FISHER. Perhaps so.

Mr. SPROULE. What steps will a foreigner require to take to obtain copyright under that provision?

Mr. FISHER. As I understand it, he would have to be really residing in Canada.

Mr. SPROULE. Suppose he just came here and declared his intention of remaining here, would he be required to do anything further to show he was a resident of Canada?

Mr. FISHER. His residence here would have to be practically permanent. It would not do for him to come here to reside simply to get the copyright.

Mr. SPROULE. He would not be fool enough to tell if that was his object.

Mr. FISHER. I understand that, but if he merely came here for a few months without getting a house and showing intention to reside, I think the courts would hold that his copyright was not valid. The question would have to be settled by the courts on a trial as to the validity of his copyright.

Mr. DOHERTY. His good faith would depend on what he intended, and I understand from the minister that he would have to intend to take up permanent residence.

Mr. FISHER. Practically permanent.

Mr. DOHERTY. I always understood that residence was a pure question of fact, and when you take up residence with the intention of making it permanent you get domicile. You will only create confusion by changing the term, because you may get to a point where it would be almost impossible to determine the question of fact whether the residence here is bona fide.

Mr. FISHER. There was considerable discussion on this point. Instances were given of foreign authors who had made their residence in London and others who had made their residence in Italy. We have the case of Marion Crawford, a well known American writer, who resided in Italy, though not a citizen, for many years. Many such instances were brought up, and the idea was that persons who were really residents were entitled to a copyright of the country in which they resided. But there was no hope or expectation that a person should be able to reside for a short time in a country for the purpose of obtaining a copyright. I remember many years ago, for instance, that Mark Twain came and resided for six weeks in Montreal for the express purpose of obtaining not a Canadian, but a British copyright. I think that kind of residence would indicate a colourable purpose, and I would not desire that under this Act a foreigner should be able to obtain a copyright in that way. But if a writer from abroad came to reside in Canada, and made himself a resident here, though he did not choose to swear the oath of allegiance, and take out naturalization papers, I think he would be looked on under this Act as a Canadian resident and entitled to Canadian copyright.

Mr. DOHERTY. I would like to have a little more than residence and a little less than domicile.

Mr. SPROULE. Can the minister give us a list of the countries in the union, or where can a list of them be obtained, and what provisions are necessary to enable a country to join the union?

Mr. FISHER. To become a member of the union a country has to agree to abide by the conditions of the union, which are embodied in a long and complicated series of resolutions. The chief idea of it is, however, that each country will give to the subjects or citizens of every other country in the union the same copyright protection that it gives to its own citizens. For instance, Canada is to-day in the Berne Convention, and every copyright in any of the countries in that convention is valid in Canada. That is the essential of the Berne Convention—in the last few years called the Berlin Convention.

Mr. LENNOX. I presume that the word 'residence' is used in the English Act as now introduced the same as in ours?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. LENNOX. Was that the word that was in our Act before?

Mr. FISHER. No, the word 'domicile' was used.

Mr. LENNOX. Does the minister happen to recollect the word used in the English Act now being repealed?

Mr. FISHER. I can not say off-hand.

Mr. LENNOX. There is a good deal to be said on the question whether domicile or residence is the better word. As I understand it, you can have several residences, but only domicile. Take a case of this kind. An American author resides in Canada for a portion of each year. Suppose he resides here one year, and the next year applies for a copyright. That is a case in which I presume he would be thoroughly entitled to a copyright, would he not?

Mr. FISHER. The English Act does not even use the words 'bona fide.' It simply says 'a British subject or resident.'

Mr. LENNOX. I was referring to the intention of the Act. We have some cases of this kind. American authors live in Canada for a portion of the year and in the United States for a portion of the year. Some of them will own houses in Canada. Suppose there is evidence that a person had lived here a portion of last year, we will say, that would be evidence of good faith, I should think, and he would be entitled to a copyright.

Mr. FISHER. I should think that, under those circumstances, reading the British Act, he would be.

Mr. LENNOX. The minister referred to resolutions that were passed at the subsidiary conference last year. Can he furnish us with some copies of those?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, we have a large number of copies of the proceedings of that conference, and I will see that they are distributed among the members.

Mr. LENNOX. Then, I presume it would be easy for the government to get a few copies of the Bill now before the British House of Commons.

Mr. FISHER. We might get a few. We have only one now. I will cable and ask for a number of copies of it to be sent here, but I would not like to delay our discussion till they came.

Mr. LENNOX. Then, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition spoke of Sir John Thompson's argument in reference to this matter. It would be a great satisfaction to the members of the House if they could have that argument before them. If it was the subject of a return, copies of that return, I should think, could be obtained.

Mr. FISHER. I will look that up and see whether or not it was printed. There is, of course, a copy of it in my department, which any hon. gentleman is welcome to come and look at, but I could not allow it to be taken out of the department.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The memorandum of Sir John Thompson was printed on heavy blueish foolscap paper, and there were copies of it at one time available. It would be worth while to have that reprinted so that it would be available to members of parliament.

Mr. FISHER. There may be some available, and I shall have a search made for them.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I agree with my hon. friend from St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) in what he said about the word 'resident.' I am trying to puzzle out what that word may mean. When you substitute it for the word 'domicile,' it is obvious that some distinction is intended, and it is rather complicated by the use of the words 'bona fide.' When we have the Bill before us we can discuss it, but I am inclined to think it will afford a very satisfactory condition of affairs for members of the splendid profession to which my hon. friend from St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) and I belong. Whether it would be equally satisfactory to the public at large may not be quite so evident.

Mr. FISHER. I would not like to give an opinion as to the respective meanings of the different forms of expression. But as I have explained, that was the idea of the conference, and I think they were unanimous, and the British draftsman of the Bill chose that word. I wish to follow the imperial Bill as much as possible in every particular except where it conflicts with what I consider the necessary conditions of copyright in Canada. The only object for substituting that word for 'domicile' was to have similarity with the imperial Bill.

Resolution reported, read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. FISHER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 184) respecting the Copyright Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ADDRESS TO THE KING.

Mr. MONK. Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to ask a question. I have seen it stated in the newspapers that my right hon. friend is leaving for England to take part in the Imperial Conference on the 12th of May, is it the intention of the government to have an address to His Majesty on the occasion of his coronation adopted in this House? I believe that is the usual practice; and as the days now remaining are all in the hands of the government, I suppose steps will be taken to that end. The reason I ask now is that if an address is to be conveyed to His Majesty by the right hon. gentleman or his colleagues, it will have to be properly engrossed, and the time remaining would scarcely be sufficient to put it in proper shape for presentation. Possibly the matter has escaped my right hon. friend's attention.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, it has not. I have asked a gentleman, on whom I rely in these matters, to inform me what is the precedent with regard to this. I remember very well that we adopted addresses on the death of a sovereign, but whether we have had addresses to the incoming sovereign has escaped my memory. I shall let my hon. friend know at an early date next week.

THE SONGHEES INDIAN RESERVE.

Bill (No. 179) respecting the Songhees Indian Reserve—Mr. Oliver—read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

Mr. OLIVER. This Bill is to give the necessary statutory authority to a transaction for the surrender of an Indian reserve situated near the city of Vancouver, B.C., which has been a source of difficulty for a number of years. Recently the British Columbia government made an arrangement with the Indians of this reserve for the surrender of their rights. This arrangement was not within the terms of the Indian Act, and required the sanction of parliament to give it proper legality. This Bill is simply to confirm the agreement, the terms of which are in the schedule of the Bill. It is somewhat extraordinary legislation, but the case was an extraordinary one, and such a one as warranted this radical departure from the ordinary procedure.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It is dependent on the surrender by the Indians?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). To carry out an agreement between this government, and the government of British Columbia respecting a piece of land which, I suppose, is required in connection with the growth, and extension of the city?

Mr. OLIVER. Exactly.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. OLIVER moved the second reading of Bill (No. 177) to amend The Indian Act.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will the minister please explain this Bill. I may say that I have had some inquiry from Indians in various parts of the country, including, if I remember correctly, the Six Nations, who desired to know whether or not the Bill affected ther rights, and, if so, in what way?

Mr. OLIVER. This Bill is made up of four sections each independent of the other and each intended to meet a condition now existing in connection with the administration of Indian Affairs. I do not know that the Bill would especially affect the right of the Six Nations, but, if the conditions contemplated exist in the case of the Six Nations the Bill, of course, would be applicable in their case. But I may explain that it is not because of anything in connection with the Six Nations that the Bill is being brought forward. Several provisions are considered desirable owing to the changed conditions resultant from pressure of population. The Indian reserves throughout the country have been selected, one may say, with very good judgment; the reserves are probably the choice locations in the Dominion of Canada from one end to the other. Consequently, with increase of population and increase of value of land, there necessarily comes some clash of interest between the Indian and the white man. Now, while the purpose of the Indian Act is to protect the rights and interests of the Indians, and while the administration of the Indian Department is also for that special purpose, it is not right that the requirements of the expansion of white settlement should be ignored, —that is, that the right of the Indian should be allowed to become a wrong to the white man. Certain provisions of this Bill are made with a view, as far as possible, to protect the rights of the Indians and still protect the public interest, which, as the House is well aware, sometimes clashes to a certain degree with the rights of the Indian as set out in the Indian Act. I shall have to explain each provision in order to make my point perfectly clear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the minister goes into the details, may I ask whether this Bill will be in conflict with any contract made between the Crown and the Indians, or in conflict with any treaty rights secured to the Indians during the period since this country was first settled? That is, by this Bill are we over-riding rights which have been secured to the Indians by contract or by treaty?

Mr. OLIVER. I can hardly answer the question as directly as it is asked. In taking the right to expropriate a right-of-way for a railway through an Indian reserve, it may be, we are infringing upon the treaty rights of the Indians; I am inclined to think that possibly we are. At the same time, it has been an established principle that, in the case of a railway, as the public interest is supposed to demand its construction, private rights must give way to the public interest. And it has been held—and it is a matter of law and administration that the Indian right stands in the same position as a private right of other parties and must give way to the public interest in this construction of a railway. The law as it stands makes provision for the expropriation of a right-of-way for a railway under a Dominion charter, but it does not make provision for the expropriation of right-of-way for a railway under a provincial charter. Certain cases have arisen in which railways under provincial charter required to cross an Indian reserve, and the present condition of the law practically means that the will, or wish, or it may be said even the whim, of a small band of Indians actually stands in the way of the will of the people of a whole province and of the development by railway of a certain section of that province. The first section of this Bill embodies the principle, that, as it is considered right and proper to give expropriation rights against Indian lands to railways chartered by Dominion authority, it is also right to give that same right of expropriation to railways chartered by provincial authority. That is the purpose of the first section as it appears in the Bill, and the principle of that section I think will hardly be disputed.

The second section is the most important; it contains a very radical departure from previous legislation in regard to Indian rights and Indian land. But, it is the belief of the government that, in the light of recent circumstances, and particularly, I may say, in the light of the circumstances surrounding the surrender of the Songhees reserve—a Bill confirming which has just been consented to by parliament—some such action as is suggested in the second clause of this Bill is necessary for the mutual protection of the actual rights of the Indians and the well-being of the white people. For while we believe that the Indian, having a certain treaty right, is entitled ordinarily to stand upon that right and get the benefit of it, yet we believe also that there are certain circumstances and conditions in which the Indian by standing on his treaty rights does himself an ultimate injury as well as does an injury to the white people, whose interests are brought into immediate conjunction with the interests of the Indians. I have had the question of the Songhees' reserve under consideration for several years. It has been a difficult question to settle. The form of the settlement recently made has not been such as could be approved as a general principle. The settlement that was made could only be approved as a very exceptional case, and under exceptional conditions. The government believe that when such cases occur in the future, as they certainly will occur, it would be very much better that there should be a statutory provision having the sanction of parliament, that would adequately protect the material interests of the Indians, and at the same time would protect the interests and the welfare of the white community residing adjacent to the Indian reserve.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). How many heads of families in the Songhees band?

Mr. OLIVER. Forty-one, I think. The whole number of the band is about 100. It was the case of the Songhees reserve that brought particularly to the attention of the government the desirability of this provision in section 2. There was a band of Indians owning as well as occupying in common about 100 acres in the city of Victoria, most valuable land for the water front, and valuable for many other reasons; and their occupation constituted not only a bar to the progress of the city, and, therefore, to the welfare of its inhabitants and to the enterprise of the transportation companies, but by reason of the Indians remaining in occupation of this land in the city of Victoria, they themselves were not only not benefited, but were absolutely injured; they were worse off by reason of living upon this land than they would have been if they had been living in some other place. There was the question of title as between the provincial government and the Dominion government that seemed to complicate the case; but I need not discuss that now. But here was a case of 40 heads of families owning as well as occupying land that had a very great money value, but receiving absolutely no benefit from the ownership of that land beyond their mere occupation of it, and by reason of their occupation, the land being situated as it was, they themselves were suffering great moral deterioration. While we want to pay every respect to treaty rights—and I think nobody will accuse any government of Canada of doing otherwise than paying the fullest respect to treaty rights—it is absolutely necessary, in a progressive country, that existing circumstances and existing conditions should be taken account of. It does not seem to us that the condition existing in regard to the Songhees reserve should be repeated. We wish to prevent it, and we have provided a remedy that we believe is contained in section 2 of the Bill.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Is there any definite clause in the Indian Act whereby all the sales of Indian lands are conducted in a manner similar to the sales made by the government of other lands?

Mr. OLIVER. I could not answer my hon. friend directly without reference to the Act, but I do not think there is any specific requirement as to the form of sale; that is to say, there is no statutory requirement that the sale shall be by auction, or by tender after advertisement, or in any particular way; there is no provisioin in the Indian Act which is on all fours with the School Land Act, which makes the sale by auction mandatory in every case.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I understand that the sales conducted in the past have been made along very different lines. Some sales are made where the bushranger, or the man who has charge of a certain tract of country, disposes of that for the Indians, and reports to the department; and I notice they have many other ways of disposing of the land.

Mr. OLIVER. I would not be able to give my hon. friend definite information without reference to the Act, but it is scarcely necessary, because whatever may have been the practice in the past, the present practice is that in all cases the land is sold by auction. I think the only exception is in the case of small islands in the Georgian bay, valued at less than $100; in those cases the land is sold at the valuator's price. All other Indian lands are sold at public auction. If it is the wish of the House I could give an explanation of the provisions of clause 2. The principle is that it is not to the interest of the Indians that they should occupy land immediately adjoining or forming part of a large town; and it is also accepted as a principle that wherever an Indian reserve does occupy land adjoining or within a town site, the existence of that reserve is ordinarily a detriment to the town. Therefore, we make provision in section 2 that when these conditions exist, that is to say, that the reserve lies close to a town or within a town, the town having a population of 10,000, then it shall be possible to bring before the Exchequer Court the merits of the case, and all the conditions which bear upon the Indians and the white people respectively. On the case being heard by the judge of the Exchequer Court, a decision may be given as to whether the Indians should be transferred from that reserve to some other locality. Provision is also made that when such a decision is rendered it shall cover the question of compensation for the land, and the question of exchange. The different subsections deal fully with the matter. It is first to prevent purely speculative demands for the removal of Indians, and next, when the case has been tried before an impartial tribunal, to provide to the full for the protection of the monetary and material rights and interests of the band the protection of which rights are a charge on the country.

Mr. PORTER. That object, of course, is one that commends itself to the reason of every person, but it appears to me that the provision, as made in this clause 2 of the Act, of which the hon. gentleman has just been speaking, delegates the authority of parliament to the judge of the Court of Exchequer. It appears to me that that is an erroneous principle. If in parliament the power is vested to deal with the matter, parliament alone should deal with it. I can quite understand that parliament could not, as a body, investigate the conditions as well as perhaps the judge of the Exchequer Court could do it, but it seems to me that if the judge of the Exchequer Court were empowered to investigate the conditions and then report to parliament and allow parliament to deal with the matter, parliament would be aware of the facts and circumstances and there would be no possibility of such a controversy arising in connection with the disposal of Indian lands as that which took place in parliament recently. It would be a wiser provision that the judge of the Exchequer Court should ascertain the facts, then present these facts to parliament and let parliament deal with the matter.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the principle laid down by the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter), would be at all conducive to what we have in mind in introducing this Bill. Let me address myself to the question which was put a moment ago by my hon. friend opposite to my colleague as to whether or not this legislation is interfering with the treaty rights of the Indians. To a certain extent this legislation does interfere with the rights of the Indians. It has been at all times under British government, on this continent a principle that the rights of the Indians must be preserved. That is the primary law, and we have had evidence of great inconvenience to the public and to growing communities arising out of strict adherence to that principle. My hon. friend (Mr. Oliver), has just introduced a Bill —an exceptional Bill—to deal with a question such as this is. We had this question brought to our attention in connection with the Songhees Indians of British Columbia. Some forty or fifty years ago, perhaps more, Sir James Douglas made a treaty with the Songhees tribe and he gave them a tract of land on the shore of the ocean. Then it was nothing but the bleak shore, but in the course of time, the city of Victoria grew up around that reserve. It has been for a long time a grievance with the city of Victoria, that they could not improve the Songhees reserve. I need not say to my hon. friend that the Indians, with their habits, did not at all improve the tract of land which was in their possession. As this land bordered the ocean it was essential to the development of the city, but the Indians would not surrender their rights and for years it was a constant subject of dispute between the Indians and white men of Victoria. I am quite sure that when my hon. friend opposite visited Victoria he must have heard of it. All those who visited Victoria heard of it. At last it was settled by a happy compromise between the Dominion government, the provincial government and the Indians, but it was settled, as stated by my hon. friend, in a manner which would have been more acceptable if we had had a general law.

Now, there are other communities, especially in British Columbia, who are in the vicinity of Indian reserves. The city of North Vancouver is in the vicinity of such a reserve and there is a reserve also in the vicinity of Vernon, in the Okanagan valley. Every one knows that when a city is growing up in the vicinity of an Indian reserve it is not a benefit, but rather an injury both to the Indian and the white man. What are we to do under such circumstances? We must preserve faith with the Indians. That is the first principle which we must adhere to. On the other hand we cannot ignore the condition of cities growing up in the vicinity of Indian reserves. How then is the matter to be settled? We have come to the conclusion that it should be settled under general principles, not as stated by my hon. friend from West Hastings, that parliament should be called upon to interfere and settle each particular case, but that every case should be settled by itself as the matter arises. What is the principle that is involved in this legislation? The principle involved in this legislation is that whenever there is a reserve in the vicinity of a city, or rather, whenever a city has arisen in the vicinity of a reserve, and has grown to the proportions of 10,000 souls, under such circumstances, not everybody, not every individual, but the Indian commissioner, may apply to the Court of Exchequer and put the question to the court whether or not it would be in the interest of all concerned, the Indians' interest first of all, and the interest of the communities in these growing cities, that the Indians should be dispossessed, upon fair compensation of course, and given another reserve, as we have done with the Songhees. When we made the agreement with the Songhees that they should give up their reserve, the provincial government undertook to give them a reserve elsewhere and pay them a certain sum of money. That would be the first question to be settled by the court. The Indians would be represented by the Indian commissioner, the city may be represented by its own counsel, the Court of Exchequer will determine, having taken all the circumstances into consideration, and having taken evidence, as to whether or not it is to the advantage of both the city and the Indians that another reserve should be provided for the Indians. If the court is of opinion that it is not in their interest, of course, the demand is not to be granted, but if the court is of opinion that the time has arrived when, in the interest of both the Indians and the city, the Indians should be transferred to another reserve, then the court will fix the conditions by which compensation will be given and under which the rights of the Indians will be preserved. I think it is as fair a settlement as it is possible to provide, and if you have general conditions embodied in a statute that course is preferable to leaving each case to be decided by parliament as it may arise.

Mr. PORTER. I think that the right hon. Prime Minister and myself are perfectly agreed; at least, I quite agree with the statement that he has made as to the advisability of determining this matter in the interests of the public and also in the interest of the Indians themselves. I only differ from the right hon. gentleman as to the manner in which the final act should be done. I quite agree with the procedure as it has been pointed out, down to the point where the judge of the Exchequer Court, having taken all the evidence and considered the conditions, will make a report to council recommending that (he thinks) that it is for the advantage of the Indians and of the white settlers as well, that a new reserve be given to these Indians, or that they should be allowed to continue where they are. That report, based upon the evidence submitted to the court, I think, ought to be submitted to parliament, and let parliament say whether the recommendation of the judge shall be approved, or whether it shall be rejected. That is the only point of difference between my right hon. friend and myself. It seems to me to be a bad principle for parliament to delegate its supreme authority to the court to deal with a matter of this kind.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think every hon. gentleman realizes that conditions exist to-day in the vicinity of cities and incorporated towns, particularly in western Canada, where it would be in the interests of the white population, and of the Indians themselves that the Indians should have lands allotted to them elsewhere. I suppose the government justifies this legislation upon the principle underlying the power of expropriation which is vested not only in the Crown, but in companies carrying on work of a semi-public character such as railways. On the other hand it must not be forgotten that this is a very extreme step and one altogether out of the path of tradition so far as the Canadian government is concerned. For the past two hundred years, it is our boast that the British government has scrupulously observed its contracts and treaties with the Indians, and the Indian has learned to know that he can look forward at all times with confidence to the sacred fulfilment of any treaty he makes with the British Crown. It may be that the necessities arising out of the growth of this country, especially in the west should justify parliament in taking the extreme step now proposed, but I do not believe that this parliament or this government has any warrant to go about it in the wholesale way proposed by this Bill. The breaking of treaties with the Indians of this country—because you cannot put it lower than that—is a thing that should not be entered on with precipitation. I have letters from men whose ancestors fought under the British flag in the war of the American Revolution, and came to this country under solemn treaty made with the British government at that time, and under these treaties, which are in force to-day, these men have been allotted lands in this country. When you ask parliament to pass a law under which treaties that have been sacredly observed for a hundred and fifty years shall be departed from at the instance of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs upon the order of a court, and without any right to the Indians so far as this legislation shows, to be represented on that proceeding, except by the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, you are proposing a very extreme step. The Indians in Canada have certain rights granted to them by treaties, and, heretofore, these treaties have never been departed from except with the consent of the Indians themselves. You treat the Indians as not being capable of dealing with their own affairs, you treat them as wards of the government, and you who are their guardians propose to judge for yourselves and through your own courts as to whether or not treaties made with the Indians shall be departed from, and you do not purpose that that proposal shall come before the parliament of the nation every time a treaty is to be violated. On the contrary your purpose is to create a procedure and a practice by which every one of these treaties can, without the future sanction of parliament, be departed from without any effective means being afforded the Indians to oppose the carrying out of any particular project in any particular instance. I venture to think that the suggestion made by my hon. friend (Mr. Porter) is a wise one. If we take the extreme step of departing from any one of these treaties without the consent of the Indians, each particular instance should be brought before parliament in order that parliament may determine whether or not such a condition has arisen as would justify any such extreme step. We ought not to go further than that.

Mr. G. H. BRADBURY (Selkirk). I heartily concur in the remarks of the leader of the opposition, I believe that the power that the government is asking in this Bill is altogether too arbitrary when they propose to take from the Indians the reserves granted to them by the Crown without giving them any voice in the matter. I have here two letters addressed to me by the Six Nation Indians who are very much concerned in the matter. They have a magnificent reserve lying within six miles of Brantford which has a population of over 10,000, and if this legislation is passed their reserve is liable to be confiscated under this extraordinary power given to the Exchequer Court. The letters are long, and I shall only read one or two paragraphs from the letter addressed to the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. Their letter to me reads:

We have inclosed herewith a letter of inquiry to you which with its questions is almost verbatim identical with letters of inquiry addressed to Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Hon. Wm. Paterson which we believe will fully explain the subject matter to you.

We ask these questions because we consider that should this Bill apply to the Six Nations it would be trampling upon our conceded rights from the British Crown. The Six Nations having been granted their lands by special deeds (Haldimand and Simcoe deeds) from the British government with whom they formed an alliance both offensive and defensive, and having been always in the early history of British North America, recognized and treated as allies of Great Britain, in the various wars in North America at that early period were given a special deed of the lands bordering upon the Grand river, and which were set apart as their reserve as compensation for the lands which lost and forfeited in the State of New York and other parts of the United States while fighting for the British cause in the battles of the American revolution. In view of these facts the Six Nations are on a different footing from those of any other band of Indians in Canada, in that they hold a special deed of it from the British Crown, for reasons as already stated herein.

Should it appear to you and your colleagues in the loyal opposition that this Bill apply to and disastrously affect the Six Nations we would be pleased if you would ask the government to supply you with more data and particulars bearing upon the peculiar and unique position which the Six Nations occupy in their relation to the Crown and in the holding of their lands.

As the city of Brantford is within ten miles of this reserve we are of the opinion that an aim is being made by some unscrupulous persons to legislate us out of our reserve, by virtue, of this enactment, in a similar manner as was done on the St. Peters reserve.

We will furnish you further details of this matter, should it be required by you and your colleagues. We shall also esteem it a favour if you will kindly send us copies of the unrevised 'Hansard' during the time that this Bill is pending before the House.

This is signed by Chief Josiah Hill, Chief Jamieson and Chief J. W. M. Elliott. Secretary of the Correspondence Committee of the Six Nation Indians. I have another long petition from the Indians which I do not intend to inflict on the House, but there are some questions here to which they ask me to secure answers from the government. After reciting the different clauses of this Bill, this petition goes on to say:

We therefore, in behalf of the chiefs of the Six Nation council and of the people of the Six Nations, beg to request that you will kindly ascertain, and tell us from information which you may be able to obtain, either from private members or from the floor of the House, answers to the following questions, to which we will be pleased to receive answers from you.

1st. Is it the intention of the government to make this enactment a general one, and applicable to all Indian reserves in Canada?

2. This committee also asks; what is the full intention of this Bill?

3. Does it include or apply to the Six Nation Indians or their reserve, or not?

This is signed by the same chiefs who signed the other. They point out in an earlier part of this petition that you are taking power to run a railway through a reserve, and may at any time confiscate part of the reserve for railway purposes without obtaining the consent of the band. The Indian Act provides how Indian lands shall be alienated. Clause 49 of that Act sets forth clearly that no land can be alienated from a band of Indians until the band have been called in council and a full majority of the male members of the band have voted in favour of the alienation. The present Bill seems to be a departure from the provisions of the Indian Act. It is a drastic change which I do not think ought to be enacted at this time. I concur most fully in the suggestion that there should be a thorough investigation. I believe that it is quite proper for the minister to take power to have the matter investigated by the court; but after all the information has been obtained, I believe that information should be submitted to parliament, and parliament should say whether or not it is in the interest of the country and in the interest of the Indians themselves that their lands should be alienated and that they should be removed to some other reserve. I feel that the powers asked for in this Bill are altogether too arbitrary. They would violate treaties made with the Indians by the Crown of Great Britain. We have always boasted of the manner in which we have treated the Indians in this Dominion, contrasted with the treatment they have received in other parts of this continent; but if we enact this measure, we shall be taking power to violate every treaty that we have made with the Indians in British North America without consulting them. We shall be giving the Superintendent General powers that I do not think any Superintendent General or the Department of Indian Affairs ought to have. I think it would be just as reasonable for the minister to propose a Bill to do away with the dual language in Canada as one to deprive the Indians of their treaty rights, and if any man brought before this House a Bill for any such purpose, it would raise a howl in the country that would open the eyes of the government. I can conceive of special cases like that in Victoria; but in that case the arrangement was made after consultation with the Indians by the British Columbia government and the Indian Department of this government, which is supposed to protect the rights of the Indians; so that the Indians had an opportunity of bargaining what compensation they should have and how the change should be brought about. But this legislation, if it goes through, will deprive the Indians on every reserve in Canada of that right. The minister in charge of the department might see fit to ask for the removal of any band of Indians in any part of Canada who came within the scope of the Bill without giving them any opportunity of arguing their side of the case or voting according to the regulations provided by the Indian Act. It has always been well understood that no lands could be alienated from any Indian band in Canada without the full consent and concurrence of the Indians themselves, and I think it is an arbitrary act on the part of the government to ask for power to take that right away from them.

Mr. PARDEE. I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) that the Bill contains such arbitrary provisions as he tries to make out. I think the primary question to be considered is how to get at what is to-day in a great many vicinities a pretty burning question. There ought to be some principle laid down by this House, either the way the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Porter) has suggested, or otherwise, or at least some measure ought to be adopted by this House providing some means to meet just such cases as are covered by this Bill. That instance is not the only one of a community which adjoins an Indian reserve in which it is in the interests of the Indians, as well as the community, that they should be moved to another reserve. There can be no question about that at all in the minds of any one who has actual knowledge of the conditions on such reserves. Whether or not the case is as the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) puts it, I am not prepared to say; but it does appear to me, although it may not be specifically said in this Bill, that the Indians on any reserve have a right to be heard before the reserve is taken from them in the way provided in this Bill. It would not be in the mind of any one that a reserve could be taken without the Indians being given a chance to state their case, and I have no doubt that such opportunity will be given them by the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. Taking the Bill as a whole, I am entirely in accord with it. Although it is very desirable that the Indian rights should be fully taken care of, these rights should not be allowed to overshadow everything else. The interests of growing communities have to be recognized. If you take nine-tenths of the Indians throughout the Dominion on reserves close to growing communities, and remove them to some other reserves, where they have equal rights and privileges, 99 per cent of the Indian population will be just as happy and well off as they are to-day, and in many cases better off, because it is usually to the detriment of the Indian that he should live near a large municipality. I think, therefore, that the principle of the Bill should be adopted whatever may be the way finally decided upon as the proper way in which to carry it out. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) says that the only way in which a portion of an Indian reserve can be taken from the Indians is by vote of the tribe or surrender. But the moment you go to an Indian for a large or small surrender, he will make the price upon the land so absolutely prohibitive that it is almost impossible to get it. Even though the Indian may have treaty rights, which he undoubtedly has, I do not think that he should be allowed to retain a position in which he can absolutely refuse the surrender of lands imperatively needed for a growing community. Therefore, I support the principle of the Bill; and whatever conclusion this House may come to as to the ultimate machinery by which these lands may be taken from the Indians, or surrendered by them, after a decision by this House, or the Supreme Court or otherwise, some machinery ought to be put upon the statute-book in order that that may be accomplished.

Mr. FOSTER. It is all right for the superior power now in this country, the white power, that came in at first and dispossessed the original possessors, and has taken nine-tenths, and possibly more, of all the lands the Indian then possessed, and has pushed its settlements right up to the treaty lands which these Indians supposed they had preserved to them by the honour of the British sovereign, the great father of the Indians—it is all right for the supreme white power now to come and say that this sort of thing ought not to be continued, that it is against the interests of civilization, and then add the comforting plea—of which the supreme white power makes itself the sole judge—that it is also against the interests of the Indians themselves. But although we have the power to-day, we must recollect how we came to have it. We must take into consideration our position as compared with that of the Indian. If you take away from him the rights conferred on him by treaty, you must be magnanimous in the first place, and in the second place, if any change be made, you ought to surround it with every possible precaution. I am not so unreasonable as to say that instances will not occur in which it will not be for the benefit of both that other reserves be given the Indians, and that they should vacate their present reserves. But they should not be compelled to give up their reserves arbitrarily. And no reserve should be taken from them without the most sacred sanction possible that they will receive fair consideration, and fair treatment. I think the least that can be put around the Indian right in the first position of things is to give him the opportunity of believing and knowing that the supreme authority in this country will have final supervision, and that is the parliament of Canada. Now, I hope my right hon. friend will not allow this legislation to go through in the way it is proposed. I believe it would be an outrage. I have not as much confidence in the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs as I had when I was much younger. I used to think that he was a sort of God in equity, whose whole object was to conserve the rights of the Indian first and entirely. I have modified my opinion, and look upon that official now as the paid officer of a party government, and certain things which have occurred within the experience of men who have been in public life the last 25 years would, I think, bear out that conclusion.

Why, by this legislation you put it in the power of a man who gets his position because of public service, who holds it at the will or whim of a party, and who is under the absolute domination of one of the members of the cabinet to practically dispossess the Indian of what he holds by right of solemn treaty. I do not think that will commend itself to the people of this country, and I do not believe it commends itself to the good sense of this House. You must have some method and means, some mechanism ; but there is one body to whom, before his rights are taken from him, the Indian should have the right to appeal, and that is the parliament which represents the whole people of this country and not merely a part of the people or a party from amongst the people. You make it possible under this Bill to dispossess any Indian tribe of all they possess, and to do it in the absence of parliament, and without the knowledge of parliament. Is not that true? After we separate, after the prorogation of parliament, your Superintendent General is told to get busy. He does; and when he is told he does it quickly. The matter of the dispossession of the Indians is brought before another paid official of this government specially appointed—not before a board of judges, but one single judge, who, however able he may be, has not the wisdom, nor in his court can there be the co-ordinating and corrective power that there is in a bench of justices. He undertakes the examination and makes his award, which goes to council, and council, within three or four or five months after the commencement of the proceedings may dispossess a band of Indians of their solemn treaty rights even against the protest of those Indians themselves. I say that is not right; I say it is outrageous. You may argue that it is not the government that does it, but parliament which has given the authority. The majority of parliament gives the authority, that is the majority of the party in power. Now, I say that the parliament of Canada, itself should have the first say about the matter. I am met with the argument that the government is responsible to parliament, which can punish them if they do wrong. What an empty thing that is! Any who have been in this parliament for the last ten years know how empty a thing it is. Suppose that the grossest injustice is done and a member of parliament brings up the matter and asks for a Royal Commission of investigation, has he the least chance in the world of ever getting it? We know that now it has come to be an absolutely tenet of the party opposite to allow no investigation. You will get no investigation, and consequently you will not be able to get any facts, but the facts that the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs chooses to give you, including the report of the judge as to matters of examination and compensation. But suppose you did get an investigation, the Indian is dispossessed, his property is gone from him. I believe there should be no general plan, no mechanism which can be used in this way, but that if a case occurs that case should be submitted to parliament, and parliament should be wise enough to do the right thing in the matter. Submit it to parliament, with the report of the judges, and all other information that can be given to enable parliament to be seized of the facts of the case. But I believe that parliament should deal with the case before the Indian is dispossessed; and I shall be deeply sorry, and I believe that a great wrong will be committed, if this matter is made an order in council—Superintendent General of Indian Affairs matter, to be decided outside of the cognizance of parliament. The Indian holds what he holds by virtue of the honour and sense of justice of the British Crown. It is conferred upon him by treaty, and it is a mighty solemn piece of business when we undertake to dispossess the Indian of that which belongs to him by treaty—a mighty solemn piece of business—and ought to be surrounded with every safeguard. I have in memory instances of how Indian lands have been dispensed within the last ten years in this country, and by this government, and it does not enamour me more of this mode of operating through the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs—the will of the minister with an order in council which he gets to bear him out.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln and Niagara). I wish to confirm what has been well said by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) as to the undesirability and, in fact, the wrong of interfering lightly with treaties made with these Indians. The views of hon. members seem to be affected in some cases by the question of whose ox is gored. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) no doubt, takes the view that this Bill would be popular from the white man's standpoint; but we should remember that these Indians are in our power, and we should try to defend those who have no other defenders. I therefore, take the side, as I generally do, of the weak, and the weak in this case are the red men. They have treaties which it is suggested by this legislation we should practically set aside. It seems to me the first question involved is not the question whether it will be better for the white man living in the neighbourhood of the red man's land, but the question of breaking a pact made with the ancestors of these Indians. It will not do the country any good to start in that line. If this country has a standing in the world to-day, it is because it is supposed to keep its pacts; it is a child of the British nation which always keeps its pacts. I do not want any new or twentieth-century ideas in that regard ; the idea which for hundreds of years have been the strength and the honour of the British nation are the ideas that I would prefer to see maintained. These pacts have been made and they are not to be altered without conference and negotiation. The Indians have located upon certain pieces of land, and they are entitled to the luck—if you like to call it that—and the benefits derived from the fact that their land turns out to be in a progressive part of the country. If land taken up by our ancestors turned out to be valuable, we should not expect that fact to be made a reason why we should hand those lands over to somebody else. And we must give the red man the same quality of justice that we would give to the white man similarly situated. If the Indians see it to be in their interest to change for a larger quantity of land, they should have the right to negotiate; and I think, with all due deference to the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, that they are more likely to make a good bargain for themselves than he to make it for them. But they should be allowed to negotiate and not have their land confiscated. They should not be obliged to change to another location even if it is, as the hon. member for West Lambton says is a fact, absolutely blocking some deal that white men want to put through. They have a right to block anything they do not think in their interest. Supposing we did pass some legislation, who is to judge of the expediency in this matter? What qualification has the judge of the Exchequer Court to deal with the question of expediency here? He is not authorized to make but only to administer the laws which this parliament makes. Then there is no provision made here that any particular people shall be notified. It is true judge of the Exchequer Court would have the right to call any one before him he saw fit, but he is not obliged to; and the imputation throughout the statute is that he is to be guided by the opinion of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. I do not think we ought to delegate to any judge a large question of this kind. Where it is proposed to break a contract made by His Majesty's government with these people, this parliament is the only competent authority to deal with the question. We should be very careful indeed, even as a parliament, before we undertake to interfere with that contract. I do not think even a bench of judges, not even fifty judges, have a right to interfere with this solemn contract, simply because they are not elected by the people and are not responsible for the honour of the country, and we should not lay upon them the responsibility of an Act so grave. But if the government is bound to pass this Act, notwithstanding the protest of the leader of the opposition, the minister should, when he comes to section 5, consent to have this matter reported to the Governor in Council, and let the Governor in Council report it to parliament at its next session for parliament to act upon.

Mr. GORDON (Nipissing). I have no hesitation in saying that I am in thorough accordance with the principle of this Bill. In saying this I do not mean to say that it is a principle that should apply to Indians all over Canada, but it is a principle that does thoroughly apply to an Indian reserve with which I am acquainted. There is an Indian reserve of something over 100 square miles situated between North Bay and Sturgeon Falls. The Indians on that reserve would not be benefited if they were represented on a board to take care of their own interests. They are simply children, children of the forest, and I believe they would be protected just as well under the provisions of this Bill as they could be in any other way. I desire to see the interests of the Indians protected in every way, protected just as well as those of the white men, and even better, because they require more protection from the fact that they are not able to look after themselves. Take the case of this reserve between Sturgeon Falls and North Bay. It would help the Indians, it would help the country, and it would help the surrounding towns to have a road built through that reserve, but the Indians will not agree to it. It would be a very material help to the Indians if they were moved into some other place away from the white people, and I think the Indians are of the same opinion. What may apply to Indians in other localities, Indians who are more intelligent, if you like, may not apply to the Indians I refer to. I would only say in conclusion that I think the principle laid down in this Bill would be a good principle to adopt with regard to the reserve situated in my constituency.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I would like to ask the Minister of the Interior how many acres of Indian lands he has disposed of within the last ten years?

Mr. OLIVER. I am not able to give my hon. friend the information offhand, but I could give it to-morrow.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. In reference to this matter, I wish to say that as to the way the Indian lands have been disposed of in the past, they have been sold at ridiculously low prices, practically given away to friends of this government. Now, this Bill proposes to give to the Superintendent of Indian Affairs more power than he has had in the past. I think it is our duty to investigate this measure thoroughly before taking action. I ask you to remember this fact, that on the 9th of March, 1908, I asked the Minister of the Interior how many acres of Indian lands had been sold since 1896, and what was the total amount received for them, and the answer was that 620,000 acres had been sold from the 1st of July, 1896, to the 31st of March, 1907, and the amount of money received was only $1,525,000, or about $2.50 an acre. This method of disposing of the Indian lands has been continued year after year up to the present time. When we find that a Bill now is to be introduced whereby the Superintendent of Indian Affairs can simply dispose of Indian lands without coming before parliament or making any public sale I feel satisfied that we are taking a very serious step in reference to the Indians.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. At six o'clock I was calling the attention of the House to the manner in which the sales of Indian lands have been conducted and arguing that if the object of this Bill was to hand over the disposal of Indian lands to the Superintendent General it would be most unwise for parliament to pass such a measure. I realize that in some cases it may be wise to dispose of Indian lands, but is it not possible that some better scheme could be adopted. On June 15, 1906, the Minister of the Interior submitted a Bill to amend the Indian Act and the discussion on that measure is reported in 'Hansard' as follows:

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. What is the policy of the minister in reference to these reserves? Is he going to sell any of them that are not utilized by the Indians?

Mr. OLIVER. That is the suggestion as it was put forward in the House, and that is the policy of the department as I will take occasion to point out. It may be interesting to the committee to know just how much land is affected this way. I have had some figures prepared which show that in the province of Manitoba the Indian population is 6,870, and that the area of reserve is 326,013 acres. The Indians are entitled, under the treaty, to 160 acres to each family of five, but, taking the Indian population and the area of the reserve, there are to-day held in Manitoba a surplus of 106,073 acres over and above what was recognized in Manitoba as their treaty right. That amounts to one-third of the area to which they are properly entitled in setting apart those reserves. Of course, the Indian Department or the government have no right or authority to interfere with their holding, although it is in excess of the amount contemplated by treaty. The only way they can be induced to release their holding is by purchase, as they are proprietors in every sense. In Saskatchewan and Alberta there is an Indian population of 14,020 and the acreage of the reserve is 2,619,154. In the Northwest the Indians, under the treaty, are entitled to 600 acres to each family of five. But, on that calculation, there is left a surplus of 824,954 acres in Saskatchewan and Alberta over and above the treaty allowance of 640 acres to each Indian family of five. If the Indian treaty in the Northwest was on the same basis as that of Manitoba—that is, 160 acres to each family of five—the surplus in the Northwest would be 2,171,114 acres. That is to say, that the Indians in Saskatchewan and Alberta are holding to-day 2,171,114 acres over and above 160 acres to each family of five.

If it is the intention of the Minister of the Interior that he should dispose of all these lands so as to leave each Indian in the Northwest with 160 acres or 640 acres as the case may be, then he is taking a very advance step in the Indian administration. The Indians are our wards, and it is our duty to look after their interests as we would our own. This Bill places in the hands of the Indian Department extraordinary powers. Subsection 2 of clause 2 reads:

2. The order in council made in the case shall be certified by the Clerk of the Privy Council to the Registrar of the Exchequer Court of Canada, and the judge of the court shall thereupon proceed as soon as convenient to fix a time and place, of which due notice shall be given by publication in 'The Canada Gazette,' and otherwise as may be directed by the judge, for taking the evidence and hearing and investigating the matter.

Subsection 5 reads:

5. The judge shall transmit his findings, with the evidence and a report of the proceedings, to the Governor in Council, and the Governor in Council may thereupon give effect to the said findings and cause the reserve or any part thereof from which it is found expedient to remove the Indians to be sold, aliened or leased upon the best terms which, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, may be obtained therefor.

This enables the Superintendent General and the Governor in Council to dispose of these lands as they see fit. Would it not be wise, if it is necessary to take such a course as this, that each case should be submitted to parliament, and that parliament be allowed to have something to say in the matter. We all know how 48,000 acres of the St. Peter's Indian reserve was disposed of for $5 per acre and less, and now that the Indians are removed from that reserve there is little in the treasury to represent the value of that land which to-day is worth $20 or $25 an acre. I call the attention of the minister to the fact that some years ago 500,000 acres of Indian lands were disposed of by the agents of the department at an upset price which I submit is a most unfair way in which to sell the heritage of the Indians.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). Does not the hon. member know that for years past not an acre of Indian land has been sold except to the highest bidder at public auction?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. That may be.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). Why don't you say so?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What I say is that previous to 1906 the lands were sold in the way in which I have described. I placed the whole story on 'Hansard,' and since then the minister has been more careful. But when it comes to selling lands at public auction in the way in which the St. Peter's reserve lands were sold, there is no doubt in the world but that the Indians do not receive justice. Then, another section of this Bill says:

171. The annuities payable to Indians in pursuance of the conditions of any treaty expressed to have been entered into on behalf of His Majesty or his predecessors, and for the payment of which the government of Canada is responsible, shall be a charge upon the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, and be payable out of any unappropriated moneys forming part thereof.

It seems that even the government can go to work and dispose of the money in compensating the men who have been carrying on the sale and in that way distribute to a large extent the amount received from these lands. If the government is determined to push this measure through there ought to be a clause inserted in it providing that Indian lands shall be sold by public auction, and that not less than three months' notice by advertisement shall be given of the sale, and, further, that all sales should be ratified by parliament. I call the attention of the minister, in this connection, to an article which appeared in the Toronto 'Globe' of Saturday, February 28, 1908, which is well worthy of his consideration. That article reads:

When, in the year 1869 the Hudson Bay Company surrendered the vast territory which they had held for two centuries to the British government, it was immediately transferred to Canada, but the purchase was made at an immense outlay. It would seem at a casual glance that all that was necessary was to bring immigrants to the country, but there were other claimants to the fertile lands, and their claims could not be overlooked.

It was the Indian tribes who for centuries had been lords of the western empire, where they chased the buffalo over the plains and caught fish from the lakes and streams that formed the great obstacle in the way of peopling the new possession. Something necessarily must be done, and the claimants opened the way by asking the government to make treaty with them. They feared they were to be driven from the land of their fathers, and they wanted something in return.

The passage of the Manitoba Act brought matters to a head. Hon. Joseph Howe, who was at that time Secretary of State, appointed Wemyss M. Simpson, Indian commissioner, to go to Winnipeg, and by treaty secure the extinction of the Indian title to Manitoba and all fertile lands possible. The new commissioner secured the assistance of Hon. Jas. Mackay, who was widely known and respected by all the Indian tribes of the west. On the advice of Governor Archibald all the Indians of the Chippewa and Swampy Cree tribes were invited to gather at lower Fort Garry, twenty miles from Winnipeg, and there they would be met by a representative of their great mother who would talk to them.

The great meeting took place on June 27, 1871, and more than one thousand Indians, men, women and children, gathered outside the fort before the day set. When their tents were pitched along the banks of the Red river it formed a most interesting sight. To prevent the sale of liquor and also to make an impression upon the savages, Major Irvine, in charge of the troops at Winnipeg—now governor of Manitoba penitentiary—was present with a body of soldiers. All the provisions during the nine days' negotiations were furnished by the government, and it was no inconsiderable item.

Governor Archibald first addressed the Indians. He told them that they were not to be driven out by the incoming settlers, but that the most fertile lands would be given to the Indians. Nothing was to be left undone to better the condition of the red men. 'Your great mother,' said Governor Archibald, 'wishes the good of all races under her sway. She wishes her red children to be happy and contented. She wishes them to live in comfort. She would like them to adopt the habits of the whites, to till land and raise food and store it up against a time of want. She thinks this would be the best thing for her red children to do, that it would make them safer from famine and distress, and make their homes more comfortable.

'Your great mother, therefore, will lay aside for you "lots" of land, to be used by you and your children forever. She will not allow the white man to intrude upon these lots. She will make rules to keep them for you, so that as long as the sun shall shine there shall be no Indian who has not a place that he can call his home, where he can go and pitch his camp, or if he chooses build his house and till his land.'

The address of Governor Archibald, whom the Indians recognized as a friend, created a deep impression upon the assembled red men.

The Indians were promised that their rights would be reserved in that western country. We cannot be too careful in passing legislation such as this, and I would urge on the minister to insert a clause in the Bill which will provide distinctly that from this time forward all Indian lands to be sold shall be sold at public auction after three months' advertisement has been given of that fact, and that a statement of all the Indian lands which are up for disposal in that manner shall be laid before parliament for our general approval before they are disposed of.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1,

Mr. OLIVER. In connection with the proposed amendment, I wish to offer, for the consideration of the committee, a further suggestion in the same line. I recognize that it is somewhat irregular, and I merely bring it before the committee for its consideration, as a substitute for the section in the printed Bill. If we agree to it, we may not be able to make the substitution to-night. As I have said, the Indian Act, as it now exists, provides for the expropriation of a right-of-way for a railway which has a Dominion charter. The section in the printed Bill extends that principle to the case of a provincially chartered railway. There are other cases in which the public interest requires that there should be a right-of-way across or through a reserve, for instance, for a public road or a power transmission line. It seems to me that in such cases, where the public requires that private right in private property shall give way to the public interest represented by the enterprise, whatever it may be, it is only reasonable that the Indian reserve should be placed in the same position as private property. For that reason I am taking the liberty of offering to the committee a substitution for the proposed section which would have the effect I speak of. The section has been drafted by the Department of Justice, so that the committee may assume that it is correct and in legal form. The only question is, will the committee be willing to extend the principle beyond railways and to other rights-of-way that may be necessary in the interest of the white people adjacent to a reserve, of course with adequate compensation to the Indians for any detraction from their rights. The proposed substitution is as follows:

No portion of any reserve shall be taken for the purpose of any railway, road, public work or work designed for any public utility without the consent of the Governor in Council, but any company or municipal or local authority having statutory power either Dominion or provincial for the taking or using of any lands or any interest in lands without the consent of the owner may, with such consent as aforesaid, and subject to the terms and conditions imposed by such consent, exercise such statutory power with respect to any reserve or portion of a reserve, and in any such case compensation shall be made therefor to the Indians of the band, and the exercise of such power and the taking of the lands or interest therein and the determination and payment of the compensation shall, unless otherwise provided by the order in council evidencing the consent of the Governor in Council, be governed by the requirements applicable to the like proceedings by such company, municipal or local authority in ordinary cases.

The intention of this section is to place the Indian reserve in the same position as private property when required for the purpose of right-of-way for a railway, Dominion or provincial, a public road, a power transmission line, or other public enterprise, but on the responsibility of the Governor in Council, both as to permission to exercise the right of expropriation and as to the conditions upon which that right may be exercised. I think those members of the committee who reside or have interests adjacent to Indian reserves, have found in many cases that the public interest is being seriously hampered by the inability to get right-of-way across or through a reserve, and it seems to me that this is a proper extension of the principle that has already been established, and it would seem to me that in the terms laid down the interests of the Indians are absolutely safeguarded while the interests of the public are given due consideration. I have no wish to force the amendment on the committee at all, and if it is not considered desirable to deal with it to-night, I would like to have the Bill reprinted with this section substituted for the printed section.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Is it the intention of the hon. minister in the later clause to enact that all lands shall be sold at public auction, and that three months' advertising shall be given?

Mr. OLIVER. I think the suggestion a very fair and reasonable one, but I would suggest that it only be made applicable to the lands affected by this Bill.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Why not to all Indian lands?

Mr. OLIVER. I would be quite willing if we were dealing with the general question, but we are now dealing with a special question and conditions and should restrict our enactments to these.

Mr. STAPLES. I notice that in section 2, 49a, this Bill is restricted to incorporated cities or towns with a population of not less than 10,000. In former sessions I endeavoured to have the hon. minister open up a certain Indian reserve located near a village in the constituency I represent, the village of Swan River. According to this section, this Bill will not apply to that reserve. The people of that particular district are very anxious to have this reserve opened up. A portion was opened up a little over a year ago, and sold by auction, and in so far as that particular reserve was concerned, everything was perfectly fair and straight. In my opinion this Bill should cover such a case as I have cited. The citizens of that town are very anxious to have that valuable land brought under cultivation. I, therefore, would suggest that the Bill not only apply to incorporated cities and towns with a population of 10,000, but to such cases as I have brought to the attention of the committee.

Mr. OLIVER. I think that in view of the very strong position taken by some prominent members of the House—and I think quite justifiably taken—as to the radical departure from the usual practice of Indian administration that is embodied in this section, I do not think that the committee would care to go further than we are now doing. We are only making this departure under the absolute stress of circumstances, such as every one admits, prevail where an Indian reserve abuts upon a town or city of 10,000 population. We desire to have the principle involved, put outside of argument as to its merits, and for that reason I would not like to carry the principle further than it is in this Bill. While I do not wish to carry this principle further, I want to justify it as applied in this case, on the ground of absolute right. I wish to be distinctly understood that the last thing the government wishes to do is to depart from the traditionary policy of Great Britain and Canada, of absolutely fair dealing with the Indians in every particular. When the Indian is given land for occupation, or a reserve is set apart for him, that land is given him, not for speculation but for use and occupation. It is given him so that he may be afforded the opportunity of earning his livelihood; but it was never contemplated that a reserve should be held for the speculative value, which it is bound to have by reason of its being in the immediate vicinity of a town of 10,000 inhabitants. The Indian land gains its speculative value through causes which did not enter into consideration when the reserve was set apart; and we think that this new and unexpected condition coming into the question alters the case very materially from what it originally was when the land was deeded to the Indian and declared absolutely inalienable. The Indian having, for reasons over which he had no control, come into property which has a large cash value, it is the duty of his guardian to see that he gets the benefit of that increased value, and that benefit he does not get by simply occupying the land. I want to deny the suggestion that in the proposition we have placed before the House there is anything but the fullest and most complete regard for the rights and the interests of the Indians. I submit to the committee that if a band of Indians is living in poverty on land that is worth a large amount of actual money, it is not fair to the Indian that he should continue to live in that condition when, by a proper sale of that property, he could realize an amount of money which, even if it would not support him in comparative comfort, would at least put him in a position in which he could use the remainder of that particular reserve or reserve land in some other place to his own greater advantage. That has been the object which has guided our action in bringing this proposition before the House. The object is not to derogate from the right of the Indians in any way, but to secure to the Indians the benefit of the rights which have been given to them. And, inasmuch as these rights have come to the Indian, not by his own action, not as contemplated by the treaty, we believe that we are justified in taking extraordinary means in order that he may get the benefit on the one hand and that, on the other, the progress of the white population shall not be unduly impeded. To repeat, as to the suggestion of my hon. friend, while I think this is a sound principle, it is only sound when it is supported by absolutely incontrovertible facts and by extreme conditions. That being the case, I would not feel that we were warranted in dealing with the case which my hon. friend mentioned, which is the case of agricultural lands, not lands of special value because of the proximity of towns.

Mr. STAPLES. I have listened carefully to what the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) has said. He proposes to make the Bill applicable to Indian reserves adjacent to cities or towns of ten thousand population. No doubt the citizens of these respective towns wherever they may be, are jealous of their position. I want to tell the minister and the committee that the citizens of Swan Lake and Marieopolis, between which this Indian reserve lies, are quite as zealous, and quite as anxious to develop their localities as are the people of cities that wish to extend their boundaries. That reserve is the most fertile land in the province of Manitoba. The citizens of the towns I have mentioned have petitioned the government, and I presented the case to the minister, and have succeeded in getting a portion of it opened up. If you are going to make this applicable to towns and cities, then I say that the smaller places are as much entitled to the same consideration. While I agree with the minister that the Indians should be dealt with in a lenient manner, and should get full value for their land, yet I claim that if we are going to make such legislation as this, you should make it apply to all the cases brought to the attention of the committee as well as to cases affecting a population of ten thousand.

Mr. MAGRATH. Legislation of this kind, it seems to me, is along right lines. We must not, of course, overlook the fact that the Indian is our ward, and we have to look after his welfare. The reasons why legislation of this character is necessary are two. The first is that it may not always be desirable to have masses of white people thrown up against the boundary of an Indian reserve. It is not good for the Indian physically or morally. The second reason is that the situation frequently precludes the settlement immediately adjoining the reserve from expanding. I think the attitude taken by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) is fair and right. Treaties are sacred, and I believe that the only tribunal in this country that should have the power to do away with them is the people themselves through their accredited representatives in parliament. The machinery in the Bill appears to me to be satisfactory. I cannot see any reason why it should not be added to, so as to provide that where the Act is enforced, each case dealt with must be finally ratified by parliament. I do not think it would delay matters very much, and it would be a safeguard. I see the force of the remarks of the Minister of the Interior in reference to fixing a limit of ten thousand people. But if the presence of ten thousand white people are not good for the Indian, it seems to me that the same idea holds as to a smaller population, say two thousand people. The situation, however, that the two thousand people find themselves in, is that they have to remain there until they have increased to ten thousand before this feature of the law can be put into effect. I think the difficulty could be overcome in this way by providing that the value of the land to be taken from the Indians must be based upon the prices that would prevail should the population be ten thousand. If the two thousand people are prepared to pay such prices, I do not see why that should not be satisfactory. To settle the thing in that way would enable the two thousand people to develop as they would like to, and it would equally protect the Indians, and give them the enhanced values created by the larger population. I throw that out as a suggestion for the consideration of the minister. He knows that in my own constituency there is a town that is suffering for want of adjoining Indian territory needed in its development. That town will grow in time to ten thousand. Then why hold them back from a privilege which will be theirs at a later time, and the enjoyment of which now will greatly help them in their development?

Mr. OLIVER. The question is a very involved one; and I am afraid my hon. friend (Mr. Magrath) did not pay as strict attention to the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) and his colleague from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) as I did. But I may say that I did not need their remarks to impress me with the truth and weight of everything they said as to the vast importance of a departure of this radical character; and I would caution everybody concerned that in making such a radical departure, we must be very careful and not allow to be created in any way the impression that the Indian's rights are made, or are to be made, the subject of what you might call speculative transactions. The suggestion that my hon. friend made that wherever the land would bring the ten thousand population price that would be a sufficient justification for the expropriation of the land is all right in theory, but I do not know any way in which we could satisfy the world at large that we are getting for the Indian the full value for his land except a sale by auction after advertisement. Then, if a large population is not there, I do not know how we are going to get the price, I do not know any way to fix it.

Mr. MAGRATH. Sell by auction at an upset price.

Mr. OLIVER. That hardly meets the case. We fix an upset price, that is true, but there must be an actual pressure of population in order to justify this very drastic action we propose to take. I am not insisting upon the number of 10,000, but I would be willing to shade it only a very little. I do not see how we could, in administration, meet the suggestion my hon. friend has made. I think at any rate, in putting this departure from traditional usage on the statute-book, it would be far better not to carry the principle too far, but to keep within a limit that every body will have to admit to be perfectly justifiable. I would ask my hon. friend to consider all sides of the question, and if he is willing to endorse the radical proposition that we place before the House, then, in view of the expression of lack of confidence in the righteousness of the administration, if at a later date another House has greater confidence in some other administration, it might be right to push the principle a little further.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I was impressed with the reasonable character of the amendment of the minister. If we are to exercise the powers of expropriation it seems to me that the safeguard he has suggested is a reasonable one; that is to say, you are to extend to an Indian reserve the same principle of expropriation which is applicable to the private property of any man in this country, but you are not to do that unless the Governor in Council shall have first investigated the matter and given consent to the adoption of that course. I would suggest that the Bill be reprinted with that amendment, and that section 1 shall stand in the meantime. The proposal does not seem to me to be unreasonable.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I understand that in the Pas Mission reserve a grant has been given for railway purposes, and I would like to know under what Act that was given. The Canadian Northern railway has right of way through the Indian reserve at the Pas Mission, to the west end of the island. A road that is being built to the bridge, I presume, has another right of way. Under what Act is that done?

Mr. OLIVER. The existing Railway Act gives the power that I have already explained, the power of expropriation through an Indian reserve to a railway under a Dominion charter. But it is not given to a railway holding only a provincial charter. The provision of this Bill is to give that authority to a railway holding a provincial charter. In the case of the Pas Mission, the Canadian Northern railway holds a Dominion charter and, therefore, had a right to make an expropriation.

On section 2,

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). My remarks will apply to the working out of this Bill. In section 2 there is an important reference made to the judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada. He has to inquire and report, first, as to the expediency of removing the Indians; then in another section, machinery is provided for this inquiry, and after that again, he has to fix the compensation. Now a reference like that would be a lengthy one and somewhat tedious. Now we have one judge of the Exchequer Court, and his time is pretty well occupied with his present duties, this new duty might be the cause of very serious delay at times. If it were provided that the reference should be to the judge of the Exchequer Court or the judge of any superior court in the province in which the reserve is situated, I think the working out of the Bill would be facilitated. We all know the work that is thrown on the judge of the Exchequer Court now through the Department of Railways and Canals and other departments. and it might entrench upon his present duties to have a few of these references thrown upon him. The reference might take weeks, it might take months. We know how tedious it would be. I think that consideration is worthy of the minister's attention.

Mr. OLIVER. There is a good deal to be said in favour of my hon. friend's (Mr. Haggart) suggestion. But on the other hand, this is not a thing to be done hurriedly. It seems to me that, until we find that the judge of the Exchequer Court is not able to attend to the work, it would probably be better to accept the Bill as it is. The proposition to employ the judge of the Exchequer Court is made by reason of the position he holds as independent of any local consideration. Of course, we assume that every judge, once he ascends the bench, is absolutely independent of all considerations; but every one recognizes that the judge of the Exchequer Court is undoubtedly independent because his jurisdiction extends all over Canada. We are anxious that the operation of this Act should be relieved from any suspicion, or even the possibility, of any consideration other than the actual merits of the case.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). Does not the minister know that the judge of the Exchequer Court has a great deal to do now?

Mr. OLIVER. That may be. I am not really familiar with the circumstances, but still I do think that, given sufficient time to the judge of the Exchequer Court, it would be more satisfactory to all parties if he were appointed, and I suppose that if one judge of the Exchequer Court is overworked it would be possible to appoint another. I think that objection, while it is to be considered, might, for the present at any rate, be allowed to await developments.

Mr. STAPLES. No doubt the minister's attention has been called to different cities and towns of 10,000 population adjacent to Indian reserves. To what localities, towns and cities is this legislation especially intended to apply? What cities and towns of 10,000 population are adjacent to Indian reserves? The minister speaks about obtaining the real value of Indian lands that are sold. As regards the land adjacent to Swan Lake and Marieopolis, the sale of this land was properly advertised, the minister having promised me, when I asked to have that reserve opened up to have it advertised in the Winnipeg and local papers, and the result was that the land was sold and its value was obtained. The price was as good as that paid for any land in that particular vicinity. When the minister says that all this is to be guarded there is no reason why it should not be guarded just as well in the case I have cited as in the case of a reserve adjacent to a city of a population of 10,000. I do not see any reason why, if you are making this applicable to the case of cities and towns, you should not make it applicable to that of an agricultural district. An agricultural district or town will never grow so long as these conditions exist. I am not discussing the principle, or the justification of passing such legislation, but I say that if you are going to deal with one case you should deal with a case such as that I have mentioned. What cities and towns do you propose to apply this legislation to?

Mr. OLIVER. At the moment I think I would be justified in saying that the city we have in mind is Vancouver. Hon. gentlemen from British Columbia will know the circumstances there. There is a reserve in Vancouver that only differs in degree from the case of the Songhees reserve in Victoria.

Mr. STAPLES. Is that the only one that the minister has in mind?

Mr. OLIVER. That is the only one that has been pressing upon our attention very strongly.

Mr. STAPLES. Have you had applications from any other cities?

Mr. OLIVER. I think we have, but I cannot just give the definite facts. There is no doubt that there is no other case on an exact par with the cities of Vancouver and Victoria, where the Indian reserve occupied a very important part of a very large and progressive city and where property is at a very high value. I do not think there is any other case that is nearly so extreme as in these two cities, and we are only providing this Bill for extreme cases for the good reasons which have been placed so ably before the House by the hon. leader of the opposition and his colleagues

Mr. BURRELL. Mr. Chairman, the minister says that this is a new principle for which there should be the fullest justification and that its application should be limited to cities of 10,000. Of course the principle is new, but if it is justified at all I do not quite see why it should be confined to such arbitrary limits as 10,000. I can quite conceive that there might be a case where there would be a fuller justification for 4,000 or 5,000 than there is for 12,000 or 15,000. If I understood the minister aright he did not believe that the lands of the Indians were meant to be given in such a way that the Indians should get the speculative value, that is that they were not supposed to get the unearned increment, because they allowed their land to remain unused while it acquired great value, and at the same time retarded the progress of the adjoining community. The minister knows that in our province there are a great many districts where there are towns, not of 10,000 perhaps not half of 10,000 because the growth is not often so great in the towns as it is in the territory closely adjoining them in a country of this description. Take the country from the boundary line up the Similkameen, Okanagan and Kamloops valleys, and there you will find a lot of these reserves pressing upon the thickly settled communities where the land has increased tremendously in value in contiguity to these Indian reserves, the value of which has become very great. This, it seems to me, would justify the application of the principle of this Bill. If there is any justification for its embodiment in the Bill I am inclined to think that the minister might very well reconsider the limitation of it to 10,000 so that it would at least give a discretion under proper circumstances to apply the principle in cases where it would be just and fair to apply it.

Mr. OLIVER. I would not wish to be thought unreasonable in this matter, and I do not even wish to be thought overcautious, but the committee will realize that with the form which the Bill takes there must be a line somewhere. I struck the line at 10,000 because it was in my mind that in some of the provinces a town that has a population of 10,000 becomes entitled to be called a city, and it seemed to me that the round figures would be satisfactory. It is not that 10,000 is a magic amount. If the committee would be agreeable I would be willing to move to reduce it to 8,000 but I only do so because I do not wish to appear to be unduly adhering to a certain fixed number. I am sure the committee will agree that there must be a line, that the line must not be too low, and that we had better, upon the introduction of this measure err on the side of safeguarding the interests of the Indians than err on the side of possibly trespassing upon their rights. I will accordingly move that 8,000 be the figure instead of 10,000, and I would urge upon hon. members not to press the reduction further.

Mr. MICHAUD. Mr. Chairman, if the principle of the Bill is good when applied to a population of 8,000 in towns and cities, it is equally good for towns of 2,000 or up to 8,000. I beg to state that I live in a town of 2,000 population and that the limits of that town adjoin an Indian reserve. Some of the ratepayers of Edmundston recently interviewed the minister and represented that we cannot extend the limits of our town in any way without taking some of the Indian lands. In order to help the progress of the town, we need some of that land and if a city of ten thousand inhabitants is to be enabled to get Indian lands to extend its boundaries, the same principle should apply to smaller towns. I ask the minister to place the limit at 2,000 instead of 8,000.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). I cannot see the object of using the words 'city, town or village' in the clause, because there might be just the same reason for removing an Indian reserve if it were surrounded by one municipality or two or three thickly populated municipalities. I think the principle should be defined in some other way.

Mr. NESBITT. I cannot agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart). For instance, it would be a great hardship to remove the Six Nation Indians from the reserve, some of whom are very good farmers and keep their lands practically as well as the white settlers. I contract with them and employ them more or less, and I find them very good workers and decent chaps all round. They do their work well, and I have no fault to find with them any more than I have with the white people. The principle of applying the law to large towns is that in such cases there is more temptation to immorality and drink, but in an agricultural section, no matter how thickly settled, Indians may make very good citizens. We want to be decent with the Indians and if any special circumstance should arise not covered by the Bill, I have no doubt that parliament will deal generously with them, but so far as I am concerned 10,000 is the proper limit and I would not even reduce it to 8,000.

Mr. BRADBURY. The discussion is proceeding along the line that the principle of the Bill is fair, but I reiterate my objection to the principle, because you are asking this parliament to over-ride the treaties which Great Britain has made with the Indians and I do not think you are justified in doing that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Does not the hon. gentleman think that the principle should have been discussed on the second reading, rather than in committee?

Mr. BRADBURY. I was about to point out that under the existing law the Indian has to be consulted before you can take away from him one acre of his reserve but by this legislation you deprive him of the opportunity he should have as a citizen of this country to say whether he will consent to the surrender or not. I read to the House a petition from the Six Nation Indians asking me to draw the attention of parliament to the fact that their reserve would come under the operation of this Bill, because they are living within ten miles of the city of Brantford.

Mr. NESBITT. It does not apply to them.

Mr. BRADBURY. They think it does. At any rate we should be as careful of the rights of all other Indians in Canada as we should of the rights of the Six Nations.

Mr. NESBITT. Certainly.

Mr. BRADBURY. The minister left the impression on my mind that his opinion was that when these lands were given to the Indians there was no intention that they should enjoy the increased value of the lands.

Mr. OLIVER. I did not say that. I said it was not contemplated at the time that there would be such abnormal increase of value and that an unexpected condition had arisen.

Mr. BRADBURY. When these treaties were made Indians were powerful in this country, and the government of England undertook to protect them in these lands and surely they are entitled to every dollar of the increased value. Surely it is the duty of the government to see that the fair value of the lands is secured to the Indians in every case. I admit frankly that there is room for some legislation to make it possible to secure a surrender, but I cannot agree that the Indians should be ignored and not consulted in any way. Speaking from my own knowledge of the Indians in Manitoba, I think it fair to say that the average Indian is intelligent enough to discuss, to some extent anyway, whether he wishes to sell his land or not. I admit frankly that they are not competent to decide what is a fair value for their land; I admit they are not competent perhaps to be placed in a position in which they could themselves sell their land, because they are not trained in a business way, but the minister is the guardian of the Indians and it is his duty to look after that feature of it. This legislation ignores the Indian, and it practically violates a sacred treaty that was made with these Indians without giving them a voice in the matter. I believe that principle of the Bill is wrong.

Mr. OLIVER. I have to repeat what I have already said, that we object altogether to the contention that in dealing with the Indians as we propose we are violating the rights intended to be conveyed to them by the treaty. It is true that the treaty guaranteed to them a certain area of land; but the principle of the treaty was that they were guaranteed the benefit and advantages of that land, and I maintain that their mere occupation of lands worth large amounts of money is not a beneficial occupation, and that the government is not seeing that they get their full benefit of their treaty right if they are left in the mere occupation of lands the value of which would either maintain them in comfort or assist them in carrying on their avocations in a proper way. Let me bring a concrete case. I speak of the Piegan reserve, near the foothills of the Rocky mountains, occupied by a branch of the Blackfoot Indians. They were making no progress in agriculture, their cattle were limited in numbers, their condition was anything but progressive or prosperous. By selling a portion of their reserve at a very good price they were enabled to secure a traction engine for breaking purposes, threshing implements, stock, and all the necessaries of farming; so that they were in a position to take advantage of the balance of the reserve and to turn it to good account. Now, I do not think it would have been to the advantage of those Indians to have remained in mere occupation of a large tract of valuable land which they were not turning to good account.

Mr. BRADBURY. Was not that done under the Indian Act?

Mr. OLIVER. That was done under the Indian Act by surrender of the Indians in the ordinary form; but my point is that it was to the benefit of the Indians that the surrender should be made. Where abnormal conditions exist, as, where the Indians are in occupation of land which has town-site value, the Indians, whether they think well of the project or not, should, under the guardianship of the government, having the authority of parliament, get the benefit of that town-site value, and if parliament is not prepared to authorize the government to take such action as will secure it for them, I do not think parliament is doing fairly by the Indians or carrying out the original intent of the treaty.

Mr. DOHERTY. I do not desire to enter into a discussion as to what the theory was on which the Indians were granted these reserves, nor do I want to question that the desire of the government is to do what is good for the Indians in this matter; but we have to face the fact that whatever may have been in the people's minds as to the interests of the Indians, the Indian Act gives to the Indian tribe the ownership of the reserve, and as things stand to-day they cannot be compelled to part with it except by the consent of a majority of them. It is in that state of the law that we have this amendment introduced for the purpose of providing machinery for taking people's property away from them against their will. I lay that down only as a preliminary to a practical suggestion which I want to make with regard to setting this machinery in operation. You have to take as a starting point the fact that there will never be occasion to apply this law except where a majority of the Indians are convinced that they ought to keep the land, because whenever a majority of the Indians are willing to part with it, you will get the surrender. So that the situation being provided for is one where the minister as the guardian and the Indians as his wards are at loggerheads as to what is best for them, and the provision is to enable the will of the wards to be absolutely overridden. That being the case, it seems to me that some preliminary proceeding should be required before the minister sets this machinery in operation. I quite understand that there may be an interest in the public to have this machinery set in operation, and there may be an interest in the Indians to have it set in operation. It seems to me that there should be some requirement that the adjoining town or some proportion of its population should have to make some request in the matter, or that some proportion of the Indians should have to make some request in the matter. If an entire Indian tribe were determined that they wanted to keep their reserve, and if there were no demand from any other source for the expropriation of the reserve, I cannot see that it is incumbent upon this government, as the guardian of the Indians, to proceed to expropriate that reserve. It is, on the other hand, putting into the hands of the Superintendent General a power which he may exercise in a very arbitrary way. I am willing to admit that that would not be done by the present Superintendent General, but there might come a day when we would have a bad government that would have a superintendent not worthy of such large powers, and it seems to me that it would be only reasonable to provide that either the adjoining town, or some proportion of its population, or some class of people who could be said to represent the interest of the public as distinct from the Indians, or some proportion of the Indian tribe who might be supposed to form some judgment as to what the Indians' interest was, should make some motion or petition as a preliminary to the minister starting in to set this machinery in operation.

This would provide some means of proving the representations made by the different interests concerned. The initiative is taken by the Superintendent General on his own motion. When he has made up his mind that a reserve should be opened up to the public, and the Indians removed, the Governor in Council may refer the matter to the Exchequer Court. The Exchequer Court must give notice, and make an investigation, but there is only one party who comes before the court, and that party is the guardian of the Indians. The Indians have an adverse interest, because this proceeding can only be taken when the majority of the band do not want to give up the reserve. The Superintendent General, however, makes up his mind that it is expedient that they should, and he is the only one before the court. There is no one to represent the Indians who want to keep the reserve, and you have the court practically proceeding ex parte to determine the question. In the province of Quebec, when the interests of the ward are adverse to those of the guardian, the court appoints a special guardian to represent the ward. Something of the kind ought to be done here so that you would have the case of the Indians properly put before the court.

Mr. OLIVER. I have no objection, whatever, to meet the suggestion of my hon. friend regarding the initiation of the proceedings, but I cannot see that there is any necessity for it, because when an Indian reserve is situated near a city or town, it is inevitable that the latter should urge that the reserve be thrown open to the public. My experience in the position I happen to hold, leads me to believe that there is no danger of the Superintendent General acting without due pressure from an outside source.

Mr. DOHERTY. I would like to have it made quite clear what the outside source is from which the pressure comes. In that conceivably unfortunate time when we might have another Superintendent General, there might be people who would suggest that it was political friends who were bringing the pressure for their own benefit. My suggestion would provide a means of obviating that; and it is not asking a great deal that the people who want the law applied should come out and say so before it is put into operation. You do not enforce people's rights until they ask you to.

Mr. OLIVER. The great danger will not be that there will be a lack of representation, but a deluge of representation. I have no objection to the amendment suggested, but I cannot agree as to its necessity. Later on there will be certain amendments moved to other parts of the Bill, and we might then consider any suggestion my hon. friend may choose to make. His suggestion as to the appointment of counsel for either one party or the other is a fair one. I would hardly think that was necessary, but if my hon. friend thinks it is, I am quite willing to agree that the judge would have the right to appoint counsel for the Indians. While the Indian Act provides that the consent of the Indians to a surrender must be obtained, the House is aware that the Indian is not considered able to manage his own property. For that reason the responsibility is put on the department. There are many members who know of instances in which the Indians are unquestionably not getting value out of their property just the same as they would not get value out of any other kind of property they might hold, and it is the duty of the department to see that the Indian, who is not capable of managing his own property, should get full value for it. This Bill is rendered necessary by special conditions. We only ask parliament to authorize it under the most extraordinary conditions. Hon. members know that a large number of the committee wish to carry the principle very much further. I think the interests of the Indians are thoroughly safeguarded, and there is no trespass, absolutely no trespass, upon their rights.

Mr. GORDON (Nipissing). My limited experience with Indians leads me to conclude that what is required is machinery to protect the Indian from himself, and I believe that this Bill tends towards that end. What else would you do in a case of this kind?—I have in mind a reserve on which there is no game and, therefore, no means for the Indian to gain a livelihood, for on that reserve not one of the Indians can be induced to engage in cultivation of the land. They have been living in comparative poverty. Is it right to allow them to do so any longer? I think they have been that way already too long. These Indians are not business men. If you required a right of way over their land, they would not know whether they should get one thousand dollars or a hundred thousand dollars for it. Therefore, I claim it is the duty of the government as guardians of the Indians to do something in the manner proposed by the Minister of the Interior. If the land is put up to public competition it will bring all that it is worth, and that is all that can be expected on the part of those who act on behalf of the Indians. I claim that if this law had been in force before, the Indians I have in mind, would be very much better off than they are to-day. The only amendment I would like to see to this section is with respect to the limit of population that is fixed. I assume that to meet the condition fixed in the Bill there must be on one side of the reservation a city with a population of ten thousand. I would like it worded in such a way that if there are ten thousand people surrounding the reserve, the Bill should apply.

Mr. NESBITT. How far would you make the 'surroundings?'

Mr. GORDON (Nipissing). I mean, adjacent to it. There will be cases, and the case I have in mind is one of them, in which the town is not up close to the reserve. In this case one of the towns is within a couple of miles. But in that case to leave the reserve in the hands of the Indians means injustice not only to the Indians but to the people in surrounding country. Had it been opened up some years ago it would have been many thousands of dollars more for the Indians than will be realized now, because about two years ago a fire swept over that part of the country and did a great deal of damage to the standing timber. I think that many persons living in the vicinity of a reserve cannot but be of the opinion that if they can be released in some way out of the hands of the Indian it will be much better for them and much better for the people who live in the surrounding territory. I trust that if any amendment is made it will be in the direction I have suggested.

Mr. MAGRATH. As I understand the minister, the justification for this legislation is to give the Indian the value of the land, that is, when the land reaches a certain figure it is time that it should be sold and the money put to more beneficial use for the Indian. And he said he wanted to get the town lot value of the property. Suppose we have a reserve, as happens to be the case in my own constituency, 300,000 acres. We have 800 Indians on that reserve, roughly speaking. Suppose we have a town of ten thousand against that reserve, we are not going to get townsite figures for that entire property. The land values produced by ten thousand people are only felt within a reasonable distance from that town. I do not wish to press the minister too strongly. This matter I feel might largely be left in the hands of the judiciary. As I understand it this Act is only to be employed in emergency cases where it is absolutely impossible to deal with the Indians. And I think that when we are prepared to trust the Exchequer Court I think we ought to trust them to investigate the need of selling lands adjoining towns regardless of the extent of the population, and I do not see why that court cannot provide that land prices will be fixed that will be equivalent to those that would exist should ten thousand people be residing adjoining the reserve instead of a leser number. I do not wish to press the minister, as I say, but he knows that there is an urgent case in my own constituency that should have his attention.

Mr. BRADBURY. Just before six o'clock I drew attention to two or three questions that the Six Nation Indians requested me to ask, among them being the question whether this legislation would affect the Six Nation Indian reserve?

Mr. OLIVER. Not so long as the position remains as it is. It would not affect the Six Nations, because this section provides that it shall only apply where an Indian reserve adjoins or is partially contained within the limits of a town, and the Six Nation reserve does not touch any such town.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 4,

Mr. BARNARD. In this section I observe that the only value which the judge is expected to find is the value of the buildings and the improvements on the land. Is it not the intention of the Act that the judge should also report upon the value of the land itself? I understood the minister to say that he proposed to insert an amendment which would provide for the sale of the land by public auction. In that case, I assume there would be an upset price, and that upset price should be the value of the land as found by the judge as well as the value of the improvements. It surely is not the intention to sell the lands of the Indians at a less value than they are found to be worth by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. OLIVER. I hardly think the judge of the Exchequer Court is the proper person to fix the value of the real estate. The value of land must always be a matter of uncertainty, a matter of estimate. The value of improvements is a fixed value which can be arrived at by evidence before a court, the value of the land can only be an estimate. It is hardly proper to put that responsibility upon a judge. The provision we propose to insert later on as to the sale by public auction will, I think, cover all the requirements. There is a provision that the judge should report upon any of the other facts or circumstances of the case which he may deem proper and material. He may give his views in regard to the value of the land, but I think it would be hardly fair to hold a judge of the Exchequer Court responsible for the valuation.

Mr. BARNARD. Somebody must value the land before you can fix an upset price, and who is better able to do it than the man who takes the evidence as to the condition of the land and the surrounding circumstances?

Mr. OLIVER. While a judge might be able to do it, it is hardly a thing that we should require him to do. He may report his opinion, but I do not think we should place the responsibility upon him. The fixing of an upset price is a necessity of the auction sale.

Mr. BARNARD. Who is to fix the upset price?

Mr. OLIVER. We would have to have the land surveyed into town lots, if it was found to be town property, before it could be sold; and as it would not be so surveyed at the time the judge was holding his investigation he would not be in a position to give the valuation of these lots. After these lots were surveyed, the surveyor or some other competent man would be called upon to make a valuation.

On section 5,

Mr. OLIVER. In deference to the views that have been expressed as to the propriety of throwing upon parliament the responsibility in connection with any surrender. I move that after the word 'council,' in the third line, the following words be added:

Shall lay a full report of the proceedings of the evidence and findings before parliament at the then current or next ensuing session thereof, and upon such evidence being approved by resolution of parliament, may thereupon give effect to the said findings.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER. I move to insert the following words as a proviso at the end of the section:

Provided that in the event of a resolution being passed by parliament, said lands shall only be sold by public auction after three months' advertisement of the sale thereof in the public press.

Mr. DOHERTY. I understand that the effect of the amendment will be that a property is to be sold by auction only if a resolution of parliament requires it.

Mr. OLIVER. That is not the intention.

Mr. DOHERTY. Then there is a contradiction between these provisions.

Mr. OLIVER. The wording may have been hastily drawn. I will have a proviso drawn that will meet the views of the hon. member for East Lambton in words that will correspond.

On subsection 6: disposition of proceeds.

Mr. DOHERTY. I see it is provided that in case a part of a reserve only is taken the Indians shall not be removed till a new reserve is obtained. If merely part of a reserve is taken will it be necessary in every case to get a new reserve for the Indians?

Mr. OLIVER. It might or it might not; it would depend on circumstances, but we might assume that, generally speaking, it would not be necessary.

Mr. DOHERTY. Under this section you could not move them from a part of the reserve until you had a new reserve, whether it was necessary to get a new reserve or not.

Mr. OLIVER. I notice the difficulty that my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall subsection 6 stand?

Mr. OLIVER. Stands.

On subsection 7: expropriation of lands for new reserve.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What is the reason for conferring all these powers on the Superintendent General?

Mr. OLIVER. In securing a new reserve or a new location for the Indians it may not be possible to deal with the white people any more than it was to deal with the Indians, and it is assumed that the urgency of the case is such as to warrant the use of the powers of the Expropriation Act in order to secure a due and proper settlement of the question that is at issue.

On section 3: payment of Indian annuities.

Mr. OLIVER. Section 3 involves another principle altogether and has nothing to do with section 2. I will be able to offer the amendments to section 2 in a few minutes, but in regard to section 3, it deals with the question of annuities. For the information of the committee I may say that at the first session of the Dominion parliament an Act was passed, chapter 33, 'respecting the Governor General, the civil list and the salaries of certain public functionaries.' An item in this Act under the heading 'miscellaneous' was 'Indian Annuities—Quebec and Ontario—$26,664 per annum.' These were the annuities for the payment of which the province of Canada was responsible, and by the Act they were charged upon the consolidated revenue. Almost immediately after an amount sufficient to produce these annuities was capitalized at five per cent and was charged as part of the debt of the province of Canada. This amount is standing in the books of the Department of Indian Affairs, and the annuities have been, since the capitalization, paid from the interest. As further Indian territory was brought in, provision was made for the payment of annuities by vote of parliament. So that up to the present time we have one part of the annuities paid without the vote of parliament and the remainder paid with the vote of parliament. As every one knows, Indian treaty payments are an absolute charge upon the revenue of the country, and it is considered to be right and proper that they should not be subject to the vote of parliament, that the whole of the annuities should be in the same position as part of the annuities now are and as contemplated by the whole nature of the arrangement with the Indians; that is to say, they are a charge upon the revenues of the country and not subject to the vote of parliament. This section is a recognition in the statute of the right of the Indians to his treaty money and we ask the authorization of the committee to it on that ground.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. This is simply taking away the power from parliament of voting this money, and the government will practically say that this money shall come out of the consolidated fund?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. That in other times was voted by parliament?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes; part of it was under the Act that was passed by the first parliament of Canada. Part of it has always come out of the consolidated fund, and it is only under the additional treaties that the annuities are paid by vote. We think it is only right that the whole treaty payment should be brought under the one provision which is unquestionably the legal and constitutional provision.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Can the minister give us about the proportion of treaty moneys that are or have been paid in this manner?

Mr. OLIVER. The amount that has been paid in this way is $26,000 per year. These old Ontario and Quebec treaties are the only treaties that were extant at the time of confederation, and when we took over these treaties provision was made that these payments should be made out of the consolidated fund. Then, other treaties were added, but the Act was not amended accordingly, and we are asking for this amendment now to bring all under the one heading.

Mr. DOHERTY. I understand that all annuities are an absolute obligation, so that if parliament did not vote them, parliament would be refusing to do its duty?

Mr. OLIVER. Absolutely.

On section 4, subsection 5,

Mr. DOHERTY. What is the change effected in the law by this section?

Mr. OLIVER. This is a substitution for 37a which was the principal amendment of the Act of last session. Possession is nine points of the law, and it was found that previous to the passing of this provision there was serious difficulty in removing trespassers from Indian lands. This legislation made it possible to facilitate the removal of settlers from lands that were held as Indian reserves. We have found, however, that Indians in occupation of lands that are not specially reserved have not the protection it is desirable they should have. In the Yukon there are no reserves, and the efforts of the missionaries and others are directed to getting the Indians to enter on the permanent occupation of the land, and we think it is right they should have that protection which this amendment proposes to give them.

Mr. DOHERTY. I understand the minister to say that this extends to land which the Indians claim.

Mr. OLIVER. Exactly.

On section 2, subsection 5,

Mr. OLIVER. Reverting to this section, I would move to amend it by providing that no sale of such lands shall take place except by public auction after three months advertisement thereof in the public press.

Mr. DOHERTY. You still have power to alienate and lease the land and if you make special provision with regard to the selling, it might be nullified by disposing of the land in the other ways indicated. I understand that 'aliened' implies the disposal of ownership, and the minister would be empowered to alien the property by lease as well as by selling.

Mr. ARMSTRONG.

Mr. OLIVER. I think that is a good suggestion. I move to strike out the word 'aliened' and there will be no question about it.

Mr. BARNARD. The effect of the section as it now stands is that if there is a sale it must be by public auction, but the Governor in Council has power to lease on any terms it sees fit.

Mr. OLIVER. The Act says on the best terms obtainable, and that is about as definite as you can make it.

Mr. BARNARD. I recollect that an island in the harbour of Vancouver was leased for a long term of years at a very small annual rental, and the value of that lease is almost fabulous now. Such a case as that might happen with an Indian reserve, and by retaining that power to lease without restriction, you do away with all the protection that the sale by public auction gives the Indians.

Mr. OLIVER. The intention was to secure the best terms possible for the Indians, and that if leasing was more in their interest than selling we should have power to lease. However, I am not anxious to assume any more responsibility of administration than is absolutely necessary, and I would be willing on the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Barnard) to provide that the land could only be sold by public auction, and that there should be no leasing about it. At the same time it might be more advisable under certain conditions to lease than to sell.

Mr. BARNARD. You can get bids for leasing as well as for selling.

Mr. OLIVER. That's a good idea.

Mr. NESBITT. You can put in that it shall be leased by public auction as well as sold by public auction.

Mr. DOHERTY. I think the simplest way would be to say that it shall be sold or leased by public auction, instead of saying that it shall be sold or leased on the best possible terms.

Mr. OLIVER. I move to amend the sertion so as to make it read that it shall be sold or leased by public auction after three month's advertisement in the public press.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER. The hon. member for St. Anne raised a question in regard to the proviso in paragraph 6. If the words, 'or portion thereof,' in lines 36 and 37 were struck out, I think this would meet his criticism, because then the Indians would not be removed from the reserve if only a portion of the reserve were dealt with.

Mr. DOHERTY. That would leave the government in the position of taking only a portion of the reserve. In that case it is possible that the remainder of the reserve might not be large enough for all the Indians, and the government might have to provide another place for those removed from that portion.

Mr. OLIVER. While that is conceivable, I think it is scarcely necessary to make any amendment to the Bill to provide for it.

Amendment agreed to, and section 2 as amended agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER. The Bill now stands to be reprinted for the consideration of the first section, to which I offered a proposed substitute as an amendment. If the committee will agree to allow that section to be amended as I proposed, and let the Bill be printed as having passed the committee, I will agree, when the Bill comes up for its third reading, if there is anything requiring criticism, to refer the Bill back to the committee. I suggest this so that we need not delay the Bill to have it reprinted and brought back again to the committee.

Mr. DOHERTY. I think there is no objection to passing the proposed substituted section for section 1, if it is desired. Do I understand that the minister quite passes over my suggestion with regard to the first paragraph of section 2, that is, that the machinery should be set in motion at the instance of some outside party, and that provision should be made for representation of the Indians?

Mr. OLIVER. I would think it was not necessary to make provision for instituting the proceedings; but if the wording of subsection 3 does not provide adequately for the representation of the Indians at the instance of the judge, then I would ask my hon. friend to suggest some words that would meet the case, and I would be very glad to move their adoption.

Amendment to section 1 agreed to, and section 1 as amended agreed to.

Mr. DOHERTY. Possibly the hon. minister might be willing to let that amendment be made at the third reading. I am not prepared to say that possibly the words 'give directions,' might not be sufficient to meet the case.

Mr. OLIVER. I have no objection.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION ACT.

Bill (No. 147) to amend the Chinese Immigration Act—Mr. Oliver—read the second time and House went into committee thereon.

Mr. OLIVER. This Bill is rendered necessary by the conditions found to exist at the ports of Victoria and Vancouver. There is no serious change in principle, but the privilege of admission without payment of the head tax is extended to wives and children to a degree that did not prevail in the previous Act. That is an important amendment. The other amendments are amendments of detail intended to make more effective the principles already adopted.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Will the hon. minister tell us what progress has been made with the report of the commission dealing with the subjects that gave rise to this Bill, and whether he does not think it advisable we should have that report before proceeding further?

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot at the moment give any information as to what progress the commission has made. I quite see the force of my hon. friend's suggestion, and if he thinks proper to insist, I would feel bound to ask that the consideration of the Bill stand over. But I do not see any objection to giving the Bill some preliminary consideration.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I would suggest that the matter is of sufficient importance for every member of the government to know something of what that commission has been doing, because from the newspaper reports of the proceedings at Vancouver, which are the only information I have, it seems to me that there has been disclosed a condition of affairs which calls for amendments to the Chinese Immigration Act much more important and significant than the clause now put forward as the most important amendment. So far as I recollect from these reports, there were no irregularities in connection with the admission of Chinese wives, but there were very serious irregularities in connection with the admission of so called merchants, and irregularities to a lesser extent in connection with the admission of supposed students. The provisions allowing the admission of these were inserted in our present law a few years ago without any good reason why such amendments should be made, but possibly at the instance of the persons who contemplated the very frauds which have occurred. At the time of their insertion, no reason appeared on the surface why the Act should have been amended in that way. The door was opened voluntarily by this government without, so far as I know, any representation from any proper quarter that it was necessary to bring in a large body of students or merchants. Chinese business in British Columbia was being efficiently carried on by the merchants there and there was no demand for others. We in British Columbia recognize that there was not likely to be any considerable number of bona fide Chinese students wanting to enter Canada, but it was plain that any Chinese boy who had the intention of going to night school for one year might call himself a student and thus gain admittance. We protested that any one who came to Canada with the intention of peddling swill, would be, under that Act, a merchant, and might come into Canada, and that is precisely what happened. The door was thrown wide open to unlawful Chinese immigration—the immigration of merchants who were not merchants at all—to the profit of officers of this government and their associates in Vancouver. We are aware that a Royal Commission has been appointed to investigate this matter, and I submit that, as this is of the utmost importance, we must be fully informed by that commission as to the nature of the subterfuges employed to evade the intention of the Act which we now propose to amend before it is competent for us to consider these amendments. I do not see how we can intelligently amend the Act and remove grievances unless we have a report as to what those grievances are. I appeal to the minister whether it does not occur to him as a fair thing that he should be posted as the minister responsible to this House, and should learn just what that commission found out in its inquiry, that he may understand the conditions with which he is called upon to deal.

Mr. OLIVER. There is no question that the report of the commission if in the hands of the House would be of very considerable assistance in dealing with the question brought up under this Bill. As I said, I would not wish to push the Bill through the House without the fullest consideration or without the knowledge of the contents of the report if that report is available within a reasonable time. But, as I understand it, this Bill has been prepared with a view to meeting the difficulties which my hon. friend mentioned. While I concede that the addition of the wives and children was what might be called the new principle of the Bill, the important feature of the Bill is dealing in detail with the various classes of Chinese immigrants who are entitled to exemption from the head tax; and I simply invited the attention of the committee to its provisions so that we should have what might be considered a preliminary understanding as to what the Bill was trying to reach, so that we should be in better shape to deal with it later when we had the report of the commission, if that report is available in time.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster).

Mr. BARNARD. As I understand it, and as we are all aware from reading the newspaper reports of the proceedings of the commission that has been sitting in Victoria and Vancouver within the last two months, there are certain grievances with regard to the admission of immigrants, particularly Chinese, into these ports. Just what is the nature of the deceptions and frauds practised on the department it is impossible to say. For my part, I cannot see how the Senate could have intelligently considered the matter and framed this Bill without having the facts before them. It seems to me that, while we are all anxious that this matter should be set straight, and that the Bill should be put into effective shape, it is idle to endeavour to do so until we know what abuses we have to correct, and that, the minister admits, he does not know. No man can tell that until the report of the commissioners is made and the evidence taken is communicated. Of course, it is very pleasant sitting here in the evenings, but if you are going to do something that has to be done over again, you might as well leave it alone and do something else.

Mr. OLIVER. In view of the contention of my hon. friends, who are certainly deeply interested in this question, and the suggestion that the Bill should not be proceeded with to-night, I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. BLAIN. When is the report expected?

Mr. OLIVER. I am sorry to say I am not able to give that information. As my hon. friend (Mr. Blain) is aware it is under another department, the head of which is not in this House.

Mr. BURRELL. The commission has finished its work, has it not, and is waiting for the report of the judge?

Mr. OLIVER. So I understand.

Motion agreed to, and progress reported.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. DOHERTY. What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The privileges and elections report on the Richelieu case.

On motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.
