Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may put a final supplementary

Mr. Grafftey: Has it not been made clear to the Prime Minister by many people in this country since the declarations were made last week that the Canadian people are not satisfied with blind trusts, frozen trusts and that sort of thing?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, that has not been made clear. I have heard the hon. member voice that opinion but I have not seen general, overwhelming support for his opinion. Nor is this the case even among his own members in the Tory party.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

EFFECT OF FINANCIAL RESTRAINTS ON OPERATIONAL ROLES OF FORCES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the increased emphasis on offshore resources, pollution off our coasts and a presence in the north, would the minister explain the rationale for the cutbacks in the operations of Maritime Command which have resulted in one flight every six months in the north, next to no effective coastal patrols, and no joint exercises with our NATO allies?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have before me figures for the last month. There were 15 Argus flights in October and 12 Tracker flights. This amounted to 150 hours for the Argus and 67 flying hours for the Tracker. We have carried out more flights than this in other months, but these facts confirm that the surveillance flights are being flown on a regular and continuing basis.

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister assure the House that the figures he has just read out are flights for training, which has top priority to keep men in a training stance so they can learn; and can the minister confirm that there has not been a flight to the north or over the north, about which we talk so much, and that none is intended until after this fiscal year?

To conclude this supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell the House what we are not doing now that we did do before the financial restraints of the minister cut back operations?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I think my previous answer indicated that the surveillance flights are continuing. Some of them are training flights, but there are flights over the Atlantic. Flights to the north have been curtailed and no date has been set for the next flight to the north.

EFFECT OF FINANCIAL RESTRAINTS ON STRENGTH OF FORCES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question though it comes closer to a question of privilege. The minister knows that that answer is pure pap and that we are in serious trouble. My supplementary question to the minister arises out of a response given by the Minister of Finance, who has indicated to the House, by way of explanation of his remarks last night, that it was not the intention of government to cut back the numbers of people in the public service of Canada. I ask the Minister of National Defence whether he has a clear understanding from the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister that that philosophy will apply to the Canadian Armed Forces and defence employees.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have explained to the House on earlier occasions that the numbers in the Canadian Armed Forces must be related to the tasks, and we are in the process of bringing the numbers and the tasks into balance.

EFFECT OF FINANCIAL RESTRAINTS ON STRENGTH OF FORCES IN YUKON

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister. In view of the announced intention of the government regarding the cutbacks and the avowed policy of the government to establish and retain Canada's sovereignty in Canada's north through the presence of armed forces personnel there, is it also the intention of the government to cut back on the existing armed forces' strength in the Yukon, which is now five to cover 207,000 square miles of Canada's sovereign territory?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. I would remind hon. members that the defence budget has not been cut; it has been increased by more than a quarter of a billion dollars this year over last year.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

MR. CHARLES SPATERO—REASON FOR ALLEGED DELAY IN INSTITUTING EXTRADITION PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question refers to a matter I raised in the House a week ago obviously seeking either comment or information from the government, and regarding which I have received neither. My question relates to Mr. Charles Spatero, a convicted arsonist, with very obvious international criminal connections who, while on weekend leave from the Warkworth prison, a federal institution, crossed the border in a green Cadillac traceable by law enforcement agencies on both sides of the border to an international criminal figure. During the period Mr. Spatero was in Buffalo, he was even interviewed by a Toronto newspaper—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lawrence: My question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Lawrence: —is to the Minister of Justice. Why was there a delay from June 15 to July 26 before the extradition papers were signed in the minister's department, and why was there a delay from July 26 to October 29 before these same extradition papers were received in the office of the law enforcement agency in Buffalo, New York?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it from memory, the actual locating of this individual took place on July 4, and after that the proceedings to put the necessary material into flow began with the Crown prosecutor in the province of Ontario playing his part through the Department of Justice, the Department of External Affairs, the United States Consulate Office and so on. There was in this particular case some difficulty with the material in that some backup work had to take place which resulted in the lengthy time lapse.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, does the minister mean there was difficulty in the Department of Justice here in Ottawa in respect of the actual serving of the papers from July 26 to October 29?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the problem in respect of the papers was actually between two arms of the United States government.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ESTIMATE OF NUMBER OF UNEMPLOYED IN 1975—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in view of the projection last night by the Minister of Finance that 250,000 new jobs will be created next year as compared with over 400,000 jobs in each of the last two years, and in view of rapidly increasing unemployment in the United States, would the minister indicate what he and his advisers have estimated as the number of unemployed in the year 1975?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I never make any prediction as to the rate of unemployment because of the number of variable factors that can play a role, including the inability to predict what the labour force will be, how many young people will leave or enter it and how many women will be part of it. As a result, I confined my prediction, as I have since holding my portfolio, to the number of new jobs and to the rate of growth.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, in view of the layoffs already announced by such industries as the labour industry, the textile industry and the auto industry, would the minister indicate what specific steps, if any, the government intends to take to deal with this accelerating problem of unemployment?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that was the reason for the stimulus added to the economy last night.

AGRICULTURE

BEEF—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AID PRODUCERS

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Since the Minister of Justice said that wheat producers will see the price of their product increase, does the government intend to take the same measures to help beef producers?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this is related to the initial prices paid to farmers in the west and has nothing to do with feed grain costs in the east.

UNITED STATES QUOTAS ON BEEF—SUGGESTION ACTION CONTRAVENES GATT

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Could the minister tell the House if United States restrictions on Canada's beef exports to the US contravene the GATT trade agreements signed by the two countries?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): We think so, Mr. Speaker.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

REASON FOR EXEMPTION OF SPOUSES FROM DECLARATION OF INTERESTS AND TIME SPAN ALLOWED FOR DECLARATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister in connection with the conflict of interest position that exempts spouses of ministers from any control and provides a very substantial period of time before ministers need register their arrangements. I should like to ask what the reason is for that time span and how he is going to overcome any suspicion that this would provide a minister with the opportunity of transferring embarrassing resources to his or her spouse.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the time span is not part of the policy guidelines. In reality I think the guidelines should be implemented as soon as reasonably possible. In the case of some ministers, this really means immediately, and in other cases this means disposing of various forms of holdings, which very often cannot be done overnight and takes some time. I feel it is within my responsibility, and that of the ministers, to proceed with all due diligence in making sure that in the meantime there are in fact no conflict of interest situations which do arise.

As far as the spouse is concerned, Mr. Speaker, the guidelines do not include them directly. The intention is, of course, to ensure that the minister, whether the minister be male or female, is fully responsible for any conflict which might arise through his or her spouse. The government quite frankly felt, and I would be interested to hear if the opposition has contrary views, that it was not in keeping with modern standards that the spouse be guided or obligated by whatever career his or her spouse has, and that the spouse should not be prevented from engaging in the pursuit of his or her choice.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I will make it clear to the Prime Minister that I have the opposite view for the simple reason that the provision makes a complete farce of any regulations that have been developed.

INDUSTRY

UNITED AIRCRAFT—PUBLICATION OF DOCUMENTS CONCERNING GRANTS

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services.

Could he tell us when he intends to release those documents relating to United Aircraft of Canada Ltd. and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and why they have not yet been released?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I have been studying the matter of publishing United Aircraft of Canada Ltd. development contracts with my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Officials of my department have had talks with United Aircraft representatives with the specific aim to disclose publicly as many documents as possible. The result of that procedure is that we now have a great many documents which will require several days to be translated. Therefore I kindly ask the House to wait until we are ready to table every required document to meet the wishes of the hon. member.

FINANCE

REASON FOR REDUCTION OF TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS—PROVISION FOR MONITORING RESULTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's previous objection to removing the sales tax on building materials because in his mind the benefits would not accrue to purchasers, will the Minister of Finance tell the House what persuaded him to make a change of this kind and, if his original view still holds, has he made arrangements with his colleagues, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, to monitor the situation in respect of these price changes, and also the changes in respect of production machinery in the hands of those who produce mobile and prefabricated homes?

● (1500)

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have changed my mind about the tax because the economic situation changed. I held that view for two or three years because of the strong demand for housing as opposed to the inadequate supply, and that the removal of or a reduction in that tax would not have much effect on the price of housing. Now, the demand has slacked and there is an inadequate number of houses being built, so the economic force would come into play and that reduction in the cost represented by the tax cut would be reflected in lower prices. To insure that this is the case I have asked my colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, to conduct a monitoring of the results of that cut.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE CONSUMERS BENEFIT FROM REDUCTION OF TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Finance.

Since a recent inquiry clearly demonstrated that repealing the tax on clothing and footwear was of no avail to consumers, I should like to ask the minister how—

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I shall repeat my question to the Minister of Finance. May I ask the minister, considering that the tax on building materials dropped from 12 to 5 per cent, and considering there is no price control—

An hon. Member: It is not true.

An hon. Member: You need information.

Some hon. Members: Order.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will understand that his role during the question period is not to make a speech but rather to ask a question. If we are to get around to as many members as possible it is simply impossible to accommodate this kind of preamble.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. How can the minister assure the House that the 7 per cent reduction of the tax on building materials will benefit consumers, taking into consideration the examples which I gave.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I could not hear the preamble of the question, because there was confusion in the House as well as in the question asked by the hon. member. Anyhow, I can assure him that the reduction will be closely checked.

EFFECT OF BUDGETARY PROPOSALS ON JOB VACANCY RATE—INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that the partial thrust of the budget is to create something like 250,000 jobs, at the same time he made no mention of any policy to remove the disincentives. I would point out that the job vacancy rate is something like 20.2 per cent or some 130,000 job vacancies. Would it be fair to ask the minister whether he is attempting to add to the job vacancy rate as a result of this thrust without giving any direction or introducing any policy to remove the disincentives to work.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

MANPOWER

JOB VACANCY RATE—POSSIBLE PREMATURE CURTAILMENT OF IMMIGRATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In light of the fact that the job vacancy rate has risen to an unprecedented state in terms of 20.2 per cent or some 130,000 jobs outstanding for the past four weeks, does the minister not now believe he was a little premature in bringing about curtailment of immigration in light of the fact that many of these jobs will continue to be taken by the immigrant labour force?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is indicating a complete misunderstanding of the regulations and changes we did make which, while curtailing the increase in the rate of immigration, still permit the expediting of people from abroad where that is the only avenue or only source for workers, Canadians having been considered as to availability willingness and competence for the jobs in the first place.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of privilege concerning the remarks made by the member for Joliette that consumers did not derive any benefit from the withdrawal of the tax on clothing and footwear. I can assure him that the work done by the officials of my department, far from disclosing—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I see that the members opposite do not want to learn the facts.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Baldwin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. minister has the floor on a question of privilege. Until I hear what he has to say I am unable to decide, as is the case in respect of all hon. members in the House, whether it is a proper question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that what should be revealed in this House are facts, not allegations. I think it is my duty to inform the House that this inquiry is going on. Until now there is no reason to believe that this tax bears unjustly upon consumers. On the contrary, I can assure the hon. members that if this tax had not been removed, prices would likely be higher still by now.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River,

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to interrupt the question period, but Your Honour has clearly held, and properly, in respect of members on this side of the House that it is not a question of privilege for a member to stand up in the House and try to correct a statement made elsewhere. Your Honour has clearly ruled in this manner. The minister has violated the rules of the House. He knows better and should not be allowed to get away with it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not find myself in great difficulty in deciding on this question of privilege. However, if there are other members who wish to make a contribution I will be happy to hear them at this time. Without further contribution on that particular question of privilege, I have no difficulty in deciding that that is precisely the same kind of exercise in which members of the opposition have often engaged the House by suggesting they are unhappy with the content or quality of a statement made by a minister in reply. Similarly I do not think it is a question of privilege for someone on this side of the House to comment on the quality of a question from the other side.

Orders of the Day.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order which arises out of an answer of the Minister of Supply and Services a few moments ago. A week ago in the House I asked the Prime Minister if the government would provide all the documentary details concerning the contractual arrangements entered into between the government and United Aircraft pertaining to grants that company had received. At that time the Prime Minister had said that in principle he would be in agreement if the company agreed. Subsequent to that, on the next day in the House, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce confirmed that that would be done. Today in his answer, if I heard the Minister of Supply and Services correctly, he used the words "as many documents as possible", the implication being that all of them would not be provided. I wonder whether the minister, on this very important question, would take a minute to clarify the situation. Are we to get all the documents and contracts entered into between the government and United Aircraft or are some to be omitted?

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member has a very valid point of order to clarify what documents the minister proposes to table in view of the fact that it was the minister who indicated that he proposed to table some documents.

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I related my answer to the development contracts.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, with respect, may I say that that does not exactly clarify the situation. Is the minister saying that all the details pertaining to research and development contracts will be tabled or will some of those be omitted, or are all of them in that category?

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I intend to make public the main contracts and most of the attachments annexed. The only texts I do not intend to disclose are those related to technical problems and problems related to the engine itself, not the financial arrangements or the capacity of the corporation to hit external markets.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Towers: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Red Deer rises on a point of order.

● (1510)

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister referred to a note sent to Washington. I wonder if he would be prepared to table that note in today's Hansard as an appendix.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Red Deer has the floor in this debate.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, I rose on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: With due respect to the hon. member, I heard his suggestion that he had a point of order. However, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gave no indication of an intention to table any document.

An hon. Member: He did not hear.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, apparently you did not hear me when I rose on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I heard the hon. member very well. He rose on a point of order and asked a question. I am simply endeavouring to indicate to the hon. member as clearly as I can that he does not have a point of order; he has a question for the Prime Minister but the question period is over. In the case of the previous hon. member who had a point of order, the minister indicated that he proposed to table certain documents and the hon. member wanted clarification as to the documents the minister wished to table.

In this case there has been no indication of any intention to table documents. I submit, therefore, that it is not a point of order but simply a question put to the Prime Minister, which may only be asked in the question period and not after orders of the day are called. I recognize the hon. member for Red Deer because he has the floor in the debate before the House.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE MAXIMUM AMOUNT OF ADVANCE PAYMENT

The House resumed, from Monday, November 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-10, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to speak in this debate I feel it is our responsibility on this side of the House to warn people in western Canada who are in the business of producing grain to watch with great attention the agreements they are entering into with regard to advance payments. We recognize the fact that this piece of legislation is generally considered to be good, but it could well be that we will be making amendments to it because there are shortcomings in the bill which should be considered in committee.

We know that the maximum rate of advance payment is $15 per acre for wheat, $18 for barley and $14 for oats. In view of the fact that this constitutes only about 10 per cent of the income from the vast majority of the land used to grow these grains, it could well be that we will have to consider this matter in committee. It seems to me that the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board is playing a game of roulette with western Canadian grain producers. I warn producers to be careful with the arrangements or agreements they make with this minister, because I consider some of his statements to be devious. One of the first things I learned as a boy when at an exhibition was that when you saw somebody with money in his hand, you had to be careful. I remember that on one occasion I learned what was probably the best lesson I ever had: a man was standing with $4 in his hand and he said to me, "If you give me $2, I will give you $4", but when I gave him $2 his $4 disappeared.

I am reminded of this story now, when the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board is bringing in legislation to advance to individual prairie grain the sum of $15,000. We must realize, also, that this amount is multiplied for two or three producers. This is as it should be, because agricultural operations are becoming much larger. However, one of the shortcomings in the game the minister is playing is that inevitably the initial payment for grain each year is much lower than it should be. A case in point was this year.

Yesterday the minister rose in his place and increased the initial payment, and rightly so. There is no reason in the world why there should not be such a reasonable payment at the beginning of the crop year. There would not, then, be any reason for an interim payment. The minister always seems to be handing out a little bit of candy as you would to a youngster. I can assure the minister that the producers in western Canada do not wish to be treated like children: it would be wise for him to recognize that they do not appreciate this. There is no reason why the minister cannot make a fair assessment, at the beginning of the crop year, of the vicinity the final payment will be in. He should at least be able to give the producers 75 per cent of the final payment initially, and I am sure the producers would be happy with it.

It would be in the best interests of the producers, the grain companies and the Canadian Wheat Board, as well as members of the House, if the minister would take it upon himself to increase the initial payment to 75 per cent or 80 per cent of what he anticipates the final payment will be. Of course, the minister juggles around with the final payment. If there should be an election in the current year he will grant it early, but if there is no election he will hold it back until a later date.

The deviousness of the minister was evident yesterday when he suggested in the House that the income of western producers was increasing at a phenomenal rate. He said that the increase in the first three quarters of last year was 90 per cent in the province of Saskatchewan. Perhaps it was, if he wants to use percentages, but he did not tell members of the House on what he was basing his percentage.

An hon. Member: Cash receipts only.

Mr. Towers: Cash receipts only, my colleague says. As the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) has stated, the income of the western grain producer is still far below that of other people in the industry. Even the grain handlers are making far more than the prairie grain producers, so I do not think it is exactly cricket when the minister uses percentages. It would be far better, far more honest, if he used the dollar value, because this is what should be recognized.

Also, the minister is trying to push through committee the two-price system for wheat which was dealt with in Bill C-19. We have reservations about that legislation. There were weaknesses in that bill and we notified the minister of an amendment we were going to put forward. In all these cash transactions the prairie grain producer must exercise a great deal of caution in dealing with the minister. At a Grains Council meeting in Edmonton not too long ago, the minister started meddling with the Crowsnest freight rate. Now he is putting forward another piece of candy for the prairie grain producer. He says he will give the grain producer a subsidy if he, the minister, will be allowed to juggle the Crowsnest freight rates.

I warn grain producers to watch the manoeuvring of this minister because they must remember that the candy might disappear. I suggest that one of the prime responsibilities of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale), who represents a large wheat growing area, is to cast a scrutinizing eye on what the minister is doing, and to at least help us on this side of the House to keep the minister within bounds. Then we come to the matter of stabilization on which the minister said he will bring in a bill. He will take a dollar from the grower and the government will put in a couple of dollars. Mr. Speaker, I suggest it would be a good idea if the minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) got together and worked out a policy on crop insurance in lieu of a stabilization bill. When the Minister of Agriculture brought in his crop insurance bill, it was supposed to resolve all the problems of agriculture—but it did not go far enough. The Minister of Agriculture did not accept our suggestions nor, apparently, did he accept any from the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Surely, if the two ministers put their heads together they could present a policy that would be for the benefit of agriculture in Canada, especially western agriculture.

● (1520)

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that stabilization will establish another large bureaucracy for this country. Last night in his budget speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) hinted at a freeze on the size of the civil service, but there is no denying the fact that one of the largest bureaucracies that western Canada has known would be required to implement a stabilization bill. This is the area where the minister should co-operate with the Minister of Agriculture to bring in one all-encompassing program for the benefit of all. As things stand now, some farmers will be in the crop insurance program, some in the stabilization program—if they accept it at all—and probably some farmers will not be in either.

Next comes the farm credit program which is to be enlarged. There is the danger that it will involve farmers in such a large amount of debt that they will never get out of it. Some years ago a former minister of agriculture who is now a member of the other place prophesied that the time would come when those who operated farms would not own them. As a westerner and one who has, with a good wife, raised a family on a farm, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it will be the saddest day Canada has known if we reach the point where the farm operator is not also the owner. We just have to consider what is happening in Russia in this regard: at the present time, 15 per cent of agricultural production comes from the 3 per cent of the land allocated to the operators. This should be a lesson for us, Mr. Speaker. No program should ever be initiated in this country that would take ownership of the farm away from the operator.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Towers: I am glad my hon. friend across the way agrees, because it means he will keep his eye on this devious minister. The sad thing is that the minister is also the Minister of Justice, so it is hard for the Canadian Wheat Board to get justice if he does not see things the same way as it does. This minister also lent support to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when the grain handlers were on strike. Western Canadians have not forgotten that, and are not likely to for a while. I should like to draw the attention of the House to an item which appeared in yesterday's Ottawa Journal. It reads:

> A spokesman for the Public Alliance of Canada said Sunday federal grain inspectors in Vancouver have voted to reject a conciliation board report. The conciliation board report called for a lump sum payment of salary retroactive to July 29 and a 12.5 per cent raise in a one-year contract dating from November 15.

Mr. Speaker, I said this minister was devious and I believe this to be true. He tried to back the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour by sending word to the western farm groups, the basic producers of wheat, oats and barley to put pressure on the grain companies to agree to the grain handlers' demand for a 61 per cent increase in wages. The government is now offering 12½ per cent to its employees.

Mr. McIsaac: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I wonder if you would draw to the attention of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) the fact that the bill before the House deals with cash advances to grain farmers. We had a debate some time ago, and probably could have another if the hon. member wants to put forward a motion, on this labour question and the award. The bill before us deals with an entirely different matter from that which the hon. member has spoken about for the last half hour.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the point of order. I do not believe that is a valid point of order, with respect. I do not think the parliamentary secretary would want to tell my colleague the type of speech he should make. I find the hon. member's remarks relevant to the topic at hand, and I think it is improper—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Whether or not there was a point of order, I am sure the last intervention had nothing to do with it. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) is touching generally upon the subject of agriculture, and I think this is fair. It is very difficult to speak of financing and inflation in the field of agriculture without touching upon the general subject.

Mr. Towers: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the comments of the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac), and I realize that he does not seem to comprehend what we are talking about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Towers: What we are talking about is a two-price system. We are talking about the financing of the western grain producer.

Mr. Lang: You are filibustering.

Mr. Towers: We are talking about financing the grain producer. The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley apparently does not understand when we talk about a two-price system. He said it was a small item, but we are talking about $70 million and that is a lot of money to us. If the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley does not think so, he can report to his producers—

Mr. Lang: Tell us how to paint a granary.

Mr. Towers: I have to report to my producers, and they tell me that $70 million is a lot of money. The western grain producer has to be careful not to get too far in debt, because financing is available to him and his margin of profit is so small that he will not be able to pay off his debt. We were dealing with grain inspectors. At present the elevators in my area are plugged. We are on a three-bushel quota and grain producers find it difficult to deliver grain while people on the other side of the world are dying of hunger. This government sits on its fanny and does nothing to improve transportation to reduce the amount of grain in our elevators. Farmers rely on advance payments because grain does not move. They need money to pay taxes and to pay grocery bills. They, too, are consumers. It costs them as much to live as it costs any other consumer in Canada. That is why we must chastize this government: it is not moving grain as efficiently as it ought to be moved.

Farmers need extra money with which to buy fertilizer, the price of which has also been inflated. Fertilizer prices have risen from $103 to $163 for 11-48. That is a 60 per cent increase in one year. In addition, machinery prices have increased this year by approximately 30 per cent. The price of land has doubled, not because it is in demand for agriculture but because outside money has pushed up the price. Only if those engaged in agriculture can make even a modest profit will some land continue in use as agricultural land. Without a modest profit, farmers cannot stay in business.

Advance payments are not the answer. They have nothing to do with profits. Every cent of the advance must be repaid. The minister himself said that 99.9 per cent of advances over the years have been repaid. What else should we expect? Does he not realize that he has been dealing with farmers, who are honest. This money must be paid back. He has asked the grain companies to administer this program. Is this fair ball? He has asked them to distribute money and to collect it. When the Minister of Finance asks the banks to sell bonds, he rewards them. The banks do not worry about collecting money.

Under the present program, however, the grain company or the elevator agent is accountable after five years for money not collected. That is, they are accountable for the debt outstanding. There are bound to be some people who find it hard to pay because of unforeseen circumstances. I say this is a very important question on which we should spend some time. Does it matter if the agent is accountable for 10 per cent of outstanding debt or for one-quarter of 1 per cent of total advance payments? By giving him that responsibility, are we playing fair ball? The government is asking these agents to advance money to farmers. In return they will receive nothing except the goodwill of those whom they serve. We must examine this aspect of the bill in committee.

Surely the minister will be fair. He may even consider the suggestions of members from western Canada which could be of fundamental importance to western Canada and all grain producers. After all, we want to continue grain production at its maximum. If it were not for our grain, our balance of payments in Canada would be in terrible shape and Canadians would not be enjoying their present benefits. But for our exports of agricultural products and natural resources our trade balance would be one of imbalance. No country can long survive under such conditions.

Therefore, I urge the minister to consider the proposals we shall bring forward on behalf of prairie grain producers. We want to facilitate passage of this bill. We are not trying to filibuster: we merely wish to demonstrate some of the shortcomings of this bill and impress upon the minister and his colleagues how important these issues are to grain producers. We shall look after the interests of the prairie grain producers as long as we are able to stand on our feet and voice disapproval of policies which we do not think are in the best interests of all concerned.

[Mr. Towers.]

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I am glad of this opportunity to voice my concern about agriculture. This bill deals with one aspect of agriculture, the provision of advances to grain producers for wheat stored on the farm. It has been generally accepted that the principle behind this legislation has been useful. Although this bill will be useful, I suggest that its usefulness will be limited. Why, Mr. Speaker? The agricultural industry is now working under conditions of deep distress. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) occasionally expresses interest in the plight of agriculture, but apparently he is not supported by his cabinet colleagues. This was made abundantly clear in last night's budget speech which did not contain a single reference to incentives or assistance to farmers in any part of the country. That was deplorable. I think the government ought to be ashamed of that omission, especially in view of the importance of agriculture to the well-being of this country.

The bill we are considering is designed to increase the amount of cash which may be advanced to a wheat producer. It will assist him until he must repay the cash advance. For that reason I suggest that the bill is one of limited usefulness. The basic difficulty facing our farmers stems from the fact that the government which has been in power most of the time since confederation has taken no interest in agriculture. This government has acted in accordance with a report on agriculture which was produced several years ago. That report suggested that surpluses of agricultural commodities which could not be disposed of were responsible for the difficulties facing farmers. The government then decided that the obvious answer was to reduce the number of farmers on the land and most of its agricultural policies were aimed at reducing the number of farmers. Once farmers were taken off the land the government did not need to worry about their income. That basic policy has been detrimental to this country. It must be changed or thrown out because it has not helped Canadian farmers.

In the five-year period 1956-61, approximately 95,000 farm families left the land. In the next five-year period, 1961-66, when a Conservative government was in power, because of the great interest which that government took in agriculture the rate of farm depopulation decreased—only 50,000 farm families left the land. Significantly, between 1966 and 1971, when the Liberals were back in power, rural depopulation escalated and 65,000 farm families left the land. These figures speak for themselves: I do not need to elaborate on them.

We have to ask ourselves how long this kind of depopulation can continue before this country is in the position where it can no longer produce enough food to feed its own people. I think the answer is, "Not very much longer." Indeed, in 1969, for the first time in the history of this country, there were many areas of agricultural production in which we did not produce enough to feed our people. We had to depend upon imports to supply our needs—imports which this country is well equipped to produce: I am referring to meat, dairy products, poultry products and sugar, commodities we are well able to produce.

We witnessed no particular action by this government to relieve that situation. Instead, we have had general policies, on a continuing basis, designed to create disincentives to our farmers. An example of this is the LIFT program. At that time, the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, the minister from Saskatchewan who at least theoretically should be familiar with agricultural problems, visited his rural constituents and found they had a lot of wheat in their bins. It so happened at that time Canada was having difficulty disposing of its wheat. In his wisdom, the minister decided not to seek markets but to pay farmers to stop growing wheat. That was somehow supposed to help farmers. The minister's thinking was that if you reduce the farmer's income by 100 per cent in one year, it does not matter as long as he does not have any wheat in his bin which the minister has to worry about disposing of.

Mr. Lang: We found record, new markets.

Mr. Yewchuk: If that is the case, can the minister explain why LIFT was introduced?

Mr. Lang: I have explained it many times, but I will explain it again.

Mr. Yewchuk: I would also like the minister to explain how much that program cost the western wheat producer in terms of loss of income. I had the figure calculated not too long ago. I do not have it before me, but it was billions of dollars.

Mr. Lang: That is fictitious.

Mr. Yewchuk: It is not fictitious.

Mr. Lang: Totally fictitious.

Mr. Yewchuk: The reduced production of wheat caused by the 1970 program was not even recovered in the succeeding four years.

Mr. Lang: How do you know?

Mr. Yewchuk: Figures were provided to me by Statistics Canada for 1970, 1971, 1972 and, I think, 1973. They show that total wheat production was not up to the level which was achieved prior to the LIFT program. The LIFT program was followed by another brainchild of the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. It had the same goal: reduce the production of grain. That was the grass incentives program. Those two programs combined have almost destroyed western agriculture as we once knew it. If the minister responsible for the Wheat Board is honest and sincere, I do not think he will say to the House and the people of this country that those two programs were useful to western agriculture. He cannot say that either of those programs has stopped or even decreased the depopulation of rural areas that is taking place at this time. He cannot say that either of those programs caused the farmer to say, "Yes, there is a great future in agriculture. I will stay on the farm and encourage my children to do the same."

In his opening remarks the minister made reference to the great incomes which farmers are now receiving. It was less than honest, to say the least, to suggest that farmers' incomes are substantially better than they were 20 years ago. I have some figures for individual items. I will first deal with the price of oats. In 1952, 22 years ago, the price was 76 cents a bushel. In 1964, ten years ago, it was 62 cents a bushel. In that twelve-year period the price decreased by 14 cents a bushel. During that time farm costs did not go down by that percentage; in fact, they increased. In 1972, oats sold for 89 cents a bushel. For 1973-74 the price is $1.03 a bushel. This represents an increase in farm income, insofar as oats are concerned, of approximately 25 cents a bushel over the past 22 years.

In 1951, wheat sold for $1.55 a bushel. In 1962, it was $1.66 a bushel; and in 1972, $1.86. The figure for 1973-74 is $3.50. In the 20-year period 1952 to 1972 the price of wheat per bushel dropped from $1.55 to $1.35—20 cents a bushel. Can the minister tell me of any farm cost that went down a similar amount in that 20-year period? I challenge the minister to show me where farm costs were reduced during that period.

I now wish to deal with live beef sold at the stockyard. In 1951, the price was 28 cents a pound; in 1961, 19 cents a pound; and in 1971, 29 cents a pound. That is one cent a pound more than in 1951, over 20 years ago. I challenge the minister to show me where the cost of producing beef has decreased or even stayed the same during that 20-year period. The figures today are a little higher. However, the report of Mrs. Plumptre, chairman of the Food Prices Review Board, indicates that although the price the beef producer receives for his product is better than it was 20 years ago, he is still selling beef between 5 and 10 cents a pound, live weight, below the cost of production. I do not think the policies this government has put forward over the past two years in so far as beef is concerned have done very much to stimulate the industry. The government has not put forward anything to encourage beef production: indeed, everything that is happening does exactly the opposite.

The beef producer is in absolute despair at this moment. Many are dispersing their herds because there is no profit in beef production. We have read in the press in the last couple of weeks that farmers were slaughtering their animals to emphasize to the public of Canada the desperate plight they are now facing because of complete lack of action by this government to assist them in keeping the industry viable. I am concerned about keeping agriculture viable. That must be the concern of us all. Where will this country go if we continue to face policies which take people away from the land, create disincentives toward production and end in loss rather than profit? Keeping animals alive on the farm actually costs the farmer money now that he cannot sell them even for as much as it costs him to raise them. So I ask, where is this country going? I should like to know the answer to that question.

Let us now consider farm costs. I have spoken at length about farm incomes, which the minister gleefully said were so great at the moment. I have pointed out that over a 20-year period farm incomes basically have not changed. However, it can be readily pointed out that farm costs have tripled, quadrupled or even more over the same period. So where is the justice in this just society of the present Liberal regime? People are slaving away for long hours, summer, spring, winter and fall, producing food to feed this country and, indeed, to feed many parts of the world. As a matter of fact, I think it is fair to say that our farmers are probably the most hard working people in the country, when looked at in terms of hours put in to keep their businesses going. Where is the justice when at the end of the year these people wind up with zero profit, or even suffer a loss? Some make $2,000 profit or a minimal amount like that. I wonder whether the minister responsible for the Wheat Board is proud of his achievement that the average net income of a western farmer at the present time is $2,200 a year?

Mr. Lang: Where do you get that figure?

Mr. Yewchuk: If the minister would care to do his own research he would find that that figure is close to accurate.

Mr. Lang: I will talk about that figure later.

Mr. Yewchuk: I ask the minister to show me which other group in this country, or indeed in North America, would be willing to work for one year for that kind of wage. I do not think he could do so. I should like to give a couple of examples of the kind of costs farmers are facing. Let me take the tractor that is equipped to pull a three-bottom plow, if I may put it in its simplest terms. In 1950 such a tractor sold for between $2,000 and $2,500. Five years ago it was selling for $5,000 to $6,000. I do not know what it is selling for today because of rapid increases, but I think it is around $10,000. This means that while farming income has basically stayed the same over a 20-year period, the cost of the basic implement of power on the farm, the tractor, has tripled or quadrupled.

Other farming costs, such as fertilizer, twine, barbed-wire and machinery parts have similarly doubled, tripled, quadrupled or increased even further during the past 20 years. Indeed, we do not need to go back that far; this increase has taken place within the past two or three years. The government indicated some small interest in this problem not too long ago when it appointed the Barber commission to study the prices of farm machinery. The commission made a report which included several recommendations. The Minister of Agriculture, in response to a question about a year ago, informed the House that he had implemented all of those recommendations but one, which I think was the one dealing with a tax on the profit made by farm machinery companies. The same minister has been asked since that time to tell us the effect of his implementation of these recommendations. Either he did not implement any of the recommendations or the recommendations were of absolutely no value in terms of keeping down the price of farm machinery.

I have already mentioned the beef producers. There seems to be some confusion on the part of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) about what the policy really should be. On one hand the Minister of Finance says we should increase production, though the events of recent weeks and months suggest the very opposite to producers. Indeed, as I have said before, many producers are in the process of dispersing their herds. Many questions have been asked during the past few days about how the beef producers can be assisted, but the only answer we have had was from the Prime Minister today. He said he had sent some sort of note to the United States, which I presume was a protest note but which he refused to table or to divulge to the members of the House when asked to do so. I think that is a pretty feeble effort in dealing with a crisis situation, as feeble an effort as made by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board when the international grains arrangement ran out. The effort was so feeble that no international agreement was reached on the price of grain and no effective action was taken in terms of dealing with United States policy on the importation of Canadian beef.

If the minister, who considers himself the Messiah of agriculture—he told me that personally, using those exact words—is as good as he thinks he is, why has he not taken the opportunity of going to the United States to talk about the beef situation? Instead, he sits back and does nothing except to say that some day a stabilization program will be brought in. I do not think that kind of statement does very much to encourage farmers to stay in business. It does not help the cow-calf operator who is now faced with winter and no feed to winter his calves. If he disposed of them he would do so at a loss. This is why he is waiting impatiently for some solution from the government that was so recently given a mandate.

So, Mr. Speaker, basically we must do two things if agriculture is to survive. First, more aggressive and effective action must be taken to increase farm incomes. On the other side of the coin, more aggressive and effective action must be taken to decrease or at least stabilize farm costs. During the last election campaign we proposed a solution to this problem. I am not saying it was necessarily the best solution, but it was a solution. We proposed the placing of controls on farm costs. Indeed, we proposed placing controls on farm costs nearly a year ago. If our advice had been taken a year ago, I can say quite sincerely that our farmers today would be suffering nowhere near the distress they are suffering at the moment.

Mr. Lang: Look at United States farmers.

Mr. Yewchuk: Instead of listening to good advice—

Mr. Lang: What about the United States farmers?

Mr. Yewchuk: If the minister looks at the figures of economic performance in the United States during the time their controls were in effect, he would find they were a very useful instrument at that time. The difficulty has arisen since the controls were removed.

Mr. Lang: Exactly.

Mr. Yewchuk: That simply indicates that further action was required, not the do-nothing attitude the present government is taking and with which the United States government followed up its program. In any case, it falls under the whole general subject of inflation control. I am not suggesting to the minister that he must use controls if he does not like them, but he must do something. If he does not like controls, then what would he suggest to keep farm costs down? I have not heard him suggest anything. He has been mocking me for the past couple of minutes for suggesting controls on farm costs, but I have not heard him offer any kind of alternative that would be better.

● (1600)

Mr. Lang: The anti-profiteering bill.

Mr. Yewchuk: The fact is that to date nothing has been done by this government to keep farm costs down. No matter what their promises have been—promises of an anti-profiteering bill or anything else—nothing has been done and farming costs continue to accelerate at a rate which is absolutely unacceptable. As long as this minister, the Minister of Agriculture and this government continue to follow do-nothing policies or policies designed to discourage production, the agricultural industry in this country will continue to decline, with its only hope for the future being continued depression and despair.

I do not know what we must do to impress upon the minds of this minister, the Minister of Agriculture and the government, that drastic action is required in agriculture today. We can talk about promises and we can listen to them; we can listen to the minister commenting on problems in other countries of the world—but none of this really comes to grips with the agricultural problems of this country and none of it is helping our farmers to survive. It is time the minister and his colleagues reassessed the situation. It is time they realized Canada must remain self-sufficient in food production and, in addition, that we must remain a major food supplier for the world.

The World Food Conference in Rome, which dealt with massive food shortages in many parts of the world, has just concluded. This is an area into which Canada can fit extremely well, because if there is anything this country can do well, it is in the field of food production. All we need are policies from this government which will encourage food production, assure a reasonable return to the producers and assure some kind of long-term stability. If we can guarantee these things to the farmers of this nation, their long-term survival will be assured.

One of the things we might also consider—this goes hand in hand with my suggestion—is that more of our foreign aid should be given in the form of food, since producing food is one of the things we do best. I make that suggestion in conclusion, Mr. Speaker. I hope the minister responsible for the Wheat Board will consider the suggestions I have made. I noticed him making notes: I am sure he will take them home and study them carefully. During the remainder of this session I expect to see legislation dealing with these matters to the benefit of the Canadian farmer.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I shall not be long in my comments on Bill C-10. However, I would like to make one or two points, first on the legislation itself and then on the whole area of grain production in Canada. Most members of the House would agree that increasing cash advances from $6,000 to $15,000 is a step in the right direction. It has been said—and it is certainly true—that inflation has hit farming in Canada, specifically in western Canada, as hard as it has hit any segment of our society. One might suggest that the increase in cash advances is a partial buffer against further inflationary rates and it can be assumed that members on this side will not be opposed to the legislation when it comes to a vote perhaps on third reading.

One matter about which we must be concerned is that of providing a guarantee, a floor price or an intervention price in respect of grain production. We hear continually from people engaged in grain production about what will happen if the world market price drops. At the present time it looks as though grain prices will remain stable at least until 1977. One of the more important pieces of legislation to be brought in for scrutiny in the House of Commons is the grain stabilization bill, if and when it is presented.

From the little we on this side have seen of the grain stabilization bill I can only make two comments. Firstly, if the government is including all grains under this grain stabilization bill in respect of payments, I think that would be wrong. Secondly, if the government clings to its $25,000 limit as the total amount that can be accumulated by any one producer, that is totally and completely unrealistic having regard to the grain prices we are experiencing at the present time. We are all looking forward to a close examination of the grain stabilization legislation when it comes before us and, hopefully, we can make that legislation more acceptable and more in tune with the agricultural situation which now exists.

One thing I should like to refer to which is of concern to a lot of people in western Canada is this: we in the west, because of our energy resources and our agricultural potential, have a considerable responsibility to feed Canadians and other people around the world. At the present time we have high input costs in agriculture. Some examples are fertilizer, chemicals and fuels. Labour costs have also increased significantly, as have the costs of machinery and land.

If we are to maintain the kind of production required in present world circumstances, we must expand production in the area of grain. The one major problem that we are faced with in this regard is the problem created by increases in agricultural input costs. If the price protection the government proposes is not realistic in terms of dollar values, then we could conceivably have a reduction or cutback in grain production because of a reduction in the number of acres seeded to grain. If a farmer can make money by seeding a given number of acres, why should he expand the number of acres and take that added risk unless he is sure there will be a reasonable return to cover the extra risk involved? Consequently, unless something is done in a positive manner we could conceivably see a reduction in the actual number of acres used for the production of grain. I think this would be very detrimental to agriculture in Canada and to our balance of payments as a country.

The minister spoke about the positive aspects of what is taking place at the present time, and there are many. However, there are two or three uncertainties so far as grain is concerned. One is the whole aspect of transportation. No meaningful conclusion has been reached concerning the direction our transportation industry in Canada is to take. Discussions, meetings and studies have been undertaken, but there is still no clear path concerning the direction transportation is to take in western Canada. We are still at the point where we speak about inland terminals and whether there should be more, about the trackage situation at Vancouver and about whether the whole concept of grain elevator rationalization should continue.

The government has given no indication of its intention in respect of the abandonment procedure. The deadline for this will be within the next month. The whole question of grain transportation and the direction it will take in the latter part of the 1970s and into the 1980s is rather vague. This creates many uncertainties so far as the western agricultural producer is concerned. Another matter closely coupled with transportation is the Crowsnest pass rates. I believe the minister has been sending out feelers in the form of recent statements about what the government might like to do. At the resent time the government is not doing anything. In other words, the government is running a flag up the flagpole to see which way the wind is blowing. Rather than making positive statements, the government is making overtures. This creates uncertainties in the area of grain transportation.

When we speak of the Crowsnest pass rates we are speaking about something which is fundamental and almost a basic way of life. If the government feels that a change is necessary, it should state what is to be done in return for the removal of the Crowsnest pass rates. I think this is the type of thing the farmers will be looking for.

Another matter of frustration, contention and uncertainty is the movement of grain at both our grain ports—Vancouver and Thunder Bay. The longshoremen once again are talking about a strike and the grain inspectors, from the information I receive, are almost sure to go on strike in the very near future unless they receive the kind of pay increase the grain handlers received some months ago. There are examples of the types of uncertainties that exist at the present time. The government has not taken the lead in respect of these uncertainties, and in fact has left this matter basically to the grain industry. While this is not bad, still the government must assume the major role and be the major catalyst in this whole affair because decisions will have to be made in connection with transportation, the Crowsnest pass rates and, ultimately, labour.

These matters will have a great effect, not just for the next year but certainly for the remainder of this decade. Therefore, it is very crucial that at this time leadership is shown by the government. I expect that the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board will have to assume a major portion of the responsibility in this situation.

In the area of the amounts and kinds of grain we have on hand in Canada, it is well known that the yield of the 1974 crop was disappointing. There was a decline in the grades of grain and a great proportion of it would fall into the category called utility. Because of this, I think prices will remain high for the foreseeable future, certainly into 1977 and perhaps even into 1978. An example of our supply situation is that the Canadian Wheat Board is to sell down so that it virtually has no grain left on hand. I think this is a commendable aim. It certainly is satisfactory at the present time.

Because of the quality of the grain, and because the price is remaining strong in respect of wheat in Canada—well into the $6 level—I think it must be pointed out to consumers well in advance that for the next few months, or possibly the next couple of years, they will have to pay higher prices for food in Canada. If the price of grain is high to the livestock, hog, cattle and poultry industries, this will affect the price of other commodities. I think the consumer will have to bear with the agricultural industry in this case and be prepared to accept higher consumer prices for food.

In conclusion, I should like to say that the increase from $6,000 to $15,000 in Bill C-10 in respect of cash advances is certainly welcome. I would caution the government, however, that if it should be found at some point that there is a downturn in the rain market—although this is not likely—the $15,000 limit may not be high enough. If farm input costs in respect of producing grain gallop along as they have, it will not take much of a downturn in the end price before farmers will be in a financial position similar to the one they were in during 1969, 1970 and 1971. If this situation should arise, I hope the government will be prepared to introduce an amendment to this legislation in order to increase the limit to more than $15,000, which would be more in line with the costs being incurred by farmers.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few comments on this bill. I support its general thrust: I believe it is recognition of the fact that the cash advance idea put forward by the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was feasible. I remember in the discussions of 1957 that the Liberal government of the day felt that cash advances were not a good thing, that farmers would make off with the money or that the money would not be collected in substantial amounts. It has been proved that these fears were unfounded, and now we have an expansion of these advances more in keeping with the present situation.

So I agree in principle with the bill. However, I wish to make a few comments about the necessity of the elevator agent being a collector for the government. I feel that this situation should be looked at and that someone other than the agent might well be in charge of collecting accounts, particularly where there are disputes or in cases where the individual concerned may be in difficulty. The elevator agent is in a difficult position. He is an agent of the company, which very often is the pool or the United Grain Growers. He is also an agent of the Canadian Wheat Board and must interpret what is meant by the board's regulations, and so on. He must act as arbitrator in respect of grades.

In other words, he is caught in the cross-fire between his employers, the government—through the Wheat Board—and the Grains Commission, and he attempts to satisfy his customers and often his friends and the people with whom he lives in the community. Therefore, while there do not seem to be many accounts that are delinquent for a long time, it seems important that if possible these problems should be removed from the elevator agents and taken over by someone else. Surely, in the hierarchy of people who look after the grain growers some group might be found which would be better equipped than the elevator agents to cope with this problem.

Now I should like to turn to a few other matters that are related to this bill, although not directly. One is the budget. Last night the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) spent a great deal of time telling us that we should grow more grain, and I think he almost used the expression that Canadians were living too high off the hog. I do not want to expand on this subject, but it seems to me there was nothing in the budget last night for farmers, for the grain handling system. Perhaps there was a little in it for the flour processors, but there was practically nothing for the individual farmer or grain grower. In the last six years there has been a steady erosion of the tax position of grain farmers in the provisions concerning straight line machinery depreciation and the basic herd for cattlemen. We are faced with the fact that the outlook for the world is not very good. One thing which we will be able to grow and which we can export is grain, but not beef in quantities. After 70 years in which Canada has been growing grain, at least wheat will be king in the next few years. Our ability to grow and to export grain is dependent to some extent on what is in this bill.

The next subject on which I would like to speak is the settlement by the government of the grain handlers' strike. I would like to comment on this matter because in the curling rinks, the coffee bars, the pool meetings and UGG meetings across the west everyone wonders whether the federal government is ready to nationalize the grain handling system, particularly the terminals. Perhaps it is not generally known that most of the terminals are owned by the grain handling companies and are in the hands of the western co-operatives. I think it was forgotten when we put through the grain handling bill that the farmers on the prairies own these terminals. As an official of the grain handling pool said to me, "If they take away our terminals, they will be taking away the guts of our system and then we might just as well give up the country elevators".

I was impressed by an article which appeared in the Toronto Star, written by Mr. Ed Finn, public relations director of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers. In this article he presents a unionist's point of view on the grain situation. I do not think Mr. Finn knows too much about the grain handling business, but I think he was expressing a point of view that is prevalent in the country. I think it is a mistaken point of view and perhaps Mr. Finn is somewhat uninformed, but I believe it will bring to the attention of the government, and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) in particular, that bad relations at the grain handling end cannot be solved by nationalizing terminals and thinking that everything will then be all right. Mr. Finn suggested that our attention span with regard to labour matters is momentary and we forget about them as soon as a dispute is settled. Nevertheless, the after effects in Vancouver are still with us.

It is important to look at the facts. At the moment we have the demands from the Thunder Bay terminal union which are up for negotiation. These not only include the fringe benefits gained by the Vancouver workers, but $2 an hour in wages in the first year and $1 an hour in the second year of a two-year contract. This compares with the 87 cents and 65 cents legislated for Vancouver and would put the Thunder Bay workers far ahead of their Vancouver counterparts. This is an unheard of wage relationship when judged by any previous experience. I think the pool elevators and the UGG did realize that the demands would be high because of the Vancouver labour settlement, but the Minister of Labour kept reiterating that the Vancouver settlement would not be a benchmark on which to base settlement of disputes of other workers in the grain handling industry. The situation is very clear in the minds of Thunder Bay workers and their representatives and it will be a long time before the aftermath of that situation is over. Furthermore, Mr. Finn said in Vancouver that the four grain elevator companies and local 333 of the grain workers union have never been able to negotiate a contract voluntarily. There is no reason to be optimistic about their next confrontation.

It has been suggested in this House, and indeed throughout the country, that over the years grain handling companies have not negotiated in good faith. I think that is inaccurate, Mr. Speaker, and just helps to create an unhealthy atmosphere. It is agreed that the relationship between union representatives and the Vancouver management group is not good, but I do not think there is a hostile relationship between the men and the supervisory staff. At the UGG, 800 loads a day have been handled since October 11. Prior to that time only 300 or 400 loads a day were handled, so it would appear that relationships between management and the union are pretty good at that terminal. The government appointed Mr. Justice Bayda to look into the grain handlers' dispute, and his findings may be of some help.

The longshoremen will soon be entering into negotiations on their contract. The main difference between the longshoreman's role and that of the grain handler is that he does not work regularly and so traditionally has received a higher rate of pay. We must realize that although this bill will help to some degree, we will have to face interruptions in the supply of grain to world markets because of the demands of unions as they attempt to keep up with the cost of living. Another consideration is the budget measures which were announced last night, which will certainly increase inflation. Mr. Finn also made an observation, which has gained wide credence, to the effect that grain co-operations are almost entirely to blame for the problems on the west coast and at Thunder Bay. This is the impression given by the appointment of Mr. Justice Bayda by the Minister of Labour.

There has been a lot of talk about the nationalization of grain terminals. However, this is not the solution unless the government intends to give in to every request made by the grain handlers' union. The government has not had much success in handling its own employees—and I make this statement with regard to any government. The problem of the federal postal employees comes to mind, and also the problem of the federal grain inspectors who must clear the grain through Vancouver harbour. If the government should take over the grain terminals, it is likely that they would grant the grain handlers a raise in pay every time they demanded one, because the money would not come from the taxpayers but from the handling charges paid by farmers. We must rid ourselves of the notion that grain must be moved at all costs. There may well come a time, Mr. Speaker, when it is just too expensive to move grain and union wage demands must be resisted. Mr. Finn made a statement which I believe to be wrong but which received wide coverage. He said:

But the grain companies wanted to have a settlement imposed on them, so they could blame added costs on the government and claim further federal subsidies.

It is his view that governments would be more free with settlements if they owned the elevators, because they would be using the farmers' money and not government money. There is also widespread belief that the federal and other governments are involved in subsidizing grain handling. But this is not the case, Mr. Speaker. Any wage increase must come out of the handling charges paid by farmers. I raise this matter because I believe the western farmer is uneasy that the grain terminals may be taken away from him and nationalized, leaving him completely at the mercy of the government. Some western farmers feel they are too involved with the government already; that government is trying to tell them what to do and is not allowing them to work out their own problems.

I support this bill in principle, Mr. Speaker. I believe it will help the farmer to plan the difficult operation of moving grain from his farm to consumers across the oceans; but we must remember that there are many other people involved who can stop the flow of grain.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak on Bill C-10 from which farmers across this country may expect to receive some benefit. It is a bill that was first introduced in this House some 17 years ago by a different government, and while the objectives and philosophies seem to be the same, the motives have changed. It seems to be an attempt to keep pace with the feed grains policy—a policy which has not worked as well as it should. I should like to make it clear at the start, Mr. Speaker, that a cash advance is not a hand-out to farmers. The publicity that is so often associated with such a proposition might give people the impression that farmers are getting something from the government for nothing. Perhaps the minister could clarify this and make it known that the farmer pays back the money.

We have been hearing a lot about food in these past weeks and I sometimes wonder why it has taken us three decades to realize the consequences of our agricultural programs. It is only three or four years since the LIFT program was introduced. We can look at the bill in that light and see that it begins to implement a philosophy relating to farmers which is long overdue. At long last farmers are beginning to be recognized as professionals, a status which agricultural producers have never enjoyed. Let me ask, why were farm people not represented at the World Food Conference in Rome? There, a whole organization was talking about international food production and there was not one farm representative from this country except the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). There was much talk of food production but there was no farm representation.

Although I applaud this legislation as being one small step toward implementing professionalism in agricultural production, I say that we are doing too little, too late. If the conference in Rome had dealt, say, with oil instead of with food, can you imagine oil interests being represented only by the government? Would not one have expected to see representatives of the oil industry at such a conference?

[Mr. Ritchie.]

This bill is important because it represents one small step toward professionalism in agriculture and permits farmers to make predictions concerning agricultural production. If farmers are to be managers of their businesses, they must be granted the right of prediction. Thus, this bill starts to introduce what may be termed as the element of predictability. For example, consider what has happened in the beef industry. Some time ago the Liberal government in its so-called wisdom said to Canadian farmers, "We do not need so much grain. Grow grass." They introduced LIFT, and the results are there for all to see.

Now, because of an excess of beef, we have witnessed on television the slaughter of cattle. This is happening at a time when markets have not been stabilized. This instability has resulted from our interfering with the market system. That is why I say there can be no professionalism in farming until there is professionalism in the marketplace. Production will only be stabilized when farmers can predict market demand. The ability to predict is important if we are to maintain high, stable, ongoing, effective methods of production. For too long farming has been associated with life style and not with business. The farmer has been treated as a labourer, not as one who deals with pesticides and insecticides or acts as a veterinarian, or one who looks after a large capital outlay. The average farm on the prairies is worth at least as much as the average small business, perhaps even more.

This bill is to increase maximum advances from $6,000 to $15,000 per individual borrower and in so doing it seeks to keep abreast of conditions in the agricultural industry. It takes into account cost increases brought on by inflation and the difference between today's production costs and those of 15 or 20 years ago. However, I must raise one question about this bill. The increase provided for is not based on any principle: there is no sliding scale for advances and no formula which will take into account increases in costs of production. I suggest that if farmers are to become professionals and produce great quantities of high quality food, the bill must do more than just set a figure.

Mr. Lang: We changed the law last year.

Mr. Malone: The bill provides for a greater advance but does not seem to take into consideration costs of production.

Mr. Lang: It can.

Mr. Malone: With respect, there is no connection between the cost of production and the amount per bushel advanced. In other words, the bill provides for a flat rate. Let me talk about another important area. The federal government and provincial governments must accept an increased responsibility for maintaining agricultural land in production. Failure to do this will bring consequences which will be absolutely frightening in view of current trends. Literally, on every parcel of prime land in Canada we see industrial development and transportation systems.

If we were to examine a soil zone map of Canada we should see that land of the highest quality is being swallowed up by industry and transportation systems. I have learned that in the United States about 100,000 acres per day are put under concrete or pavement. Although I do not have Canadian data, I suggest that an equivalent amount of our land is so used, if we bear in mind our lesser population. We need soil and water for food production. If we ignore the importance of these resources we shall suffer the consequences.

Anthropologists say that human beings have been on earth for at least 50,000 years, every day of which men have eaten food or searched for food. Only in the last 2,000 or 3,000 years have we used hard metals, and only in the last two or three generations have we used oil. Yet we allow agricultural land to be destroyed. I suggest that we are much more conservation-oriented on land containing hard metals or oil. We must resist the tendency to gobble up 80 acres of prime land merely to build a highway system which will allow one to make a right-hand turn. Why does the government build airports in the midst of class 1 and class 2 soil, especially as this country, contrary to popular myth, is limited in its possession of really high quality soil?

Finally, it behooves us to talk about deplorable conditions in the grain industry for which the government must take the major responsibility. I am talking about what happened on the west coast. Hon. members will recall that in face of the strike of grain handlers on the west coast the government said, before negotiations had taken place, that it would stand by the recommendations of the Perry commission report. That report provided for an increase of about 61 per cent. The government asked farmers to write to grain companies and demand a settlement before parliament was recalled last fall. Now, grain inspectors who work in the same dust, in the same conditions and in the same buildings say that they will not accept the government's offer of 12.5 per cent. Who can blame them?

Originally, the government wanted to give grain handlers parity with longshoreman who worked alongside. The grain handlers said that if the government followed any principles it would grant them 60-odd per cent. We knew what would happen. Now we are witnessing the prospect of another strike; another mess in the grain industry. If the inspectors go on strike, we shall know whom to blame. Certainly farmers in this country would be most frustrated. But that perhaps is only part of their concern. Another concern must be the whole food situation about which we hear so much. We have just finished a week in which people all over the world have been talking about food. We must take a look at the kind of policies that are being established and the kind of commitments that are being made. They do very little to encourage farmers to raise more either in terms of quality or quantity.

The whole transportation system across the west is in a mess. You can walk from my constituency to Vancouver faster than you can ship grain—and I mean that literally. The average speed at which grain leaves the side postings until it arrives in Vancouver is an average of 4½ miles an hour. This takes into account the number of stops it makes at the various locales, the number of days it sits in Calgary before moving west, and the number of days it sits in port waiting to be unloaded. If you can walk from central Alberta to Vancouver faster than government trains can get there, obviously something is seriously wrong. Perhaps the government might suggest we carry grain out there in bags.

All of that is really to wrap up what I am saying. While I support this legislation in principle, the fundamental thing that must be a part of all legislation is to professionalize the farmer to the degree that he feels a sense of predictability, is encouraged and receives a reward for raising food. Obviously, the need is there to raise increasingly vast amounts of higher quality food measured not just by the style and appearance of the food product but by its nutritive value in terms of some kind of nutritive analysis. I simply say to this government they have a lot more work to do if they want to make the farmers comfortable and have as the end result a whole world that is well fed.

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak briefly to Bill C-10. We in the official opposition have always supported cash advances. This legislation was first introduced in 1957-58 by the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). When it was introduced, the legislation made possible the survival of many western farmers who were under extreme cash pressure. The minister stated yesterday that the main reason for bringing forward Bill C-10 was to keep cash advances in line with the growth in inflation. I am glad the government realizes how hard the farmer has been hit by inflation.

Mr. Lang: I didn't say that.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): That is how I interpreted it.

Mr. Lang: You did not hear my remarks.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): The minister must agree that no one is harder hit by inflation than the western farmer. We need only look at the extent to which his costs of production have increased in the past few years. In order to increase production he must use fertilizer in large quantities. However, the cost of fertilizer has doubled and in some cases tripled. In the past year the price of baler twine tripled. We must also look at the price of farm machinery. A combine that not many years ago sold for $15,000 now costs over $25,000. A half-ton farm truck that cost approximately $2,500 in 1967 now sells for over $5,000. Inflation is increasing the farmer's cost of production.

Yesterday the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) hit on the real reason for increasing cash advances. Last year the government introduced a new food grains policy. Under this new policy a farmer can sell his wheat to the Canadian Wheat Board or directly to the elevator companies. However, because of the low initial price of grain, farmers are almost forced to sell on the open market. The minister will have to admit that because of this policy, cash pressure on the farmer has been very great. This is the real reason we are seeing an increase in cash advances.

I want to stress to urban members that cash advances are not a hand-out to farmers. They are advances made on future grain deliveries. The farmer must repay every cent. I have found that many urban members and others from eastern Canada think that the final payment to the farmer is a subsidy or hand-out. That is not true. When the Wheat Board sells the farmer's grain, part of the money is held back. At the end of the crop year the final figure is arrived at and the farmer receives the final payment: it is money owing the farmer on completion of the sale.

Yesterday the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) announced an increase in the initial prices of grain. He stated that wheat is being increased to $3.75, barley to $2.25 and oats to $1.20. It is hard for members on this side to understand why the minister took so long to raise the initial prices of grain. Farmers have been demanding this increase since the end of the last crop year. If the initial price for grain was not so low, there would not be so much need for cash advances. The government has continually played around with initial prices: we have seen them increased during an election campaign and reduced after the election. The formula for initial prices should be at least 75 per cent of the expected prices. In this way the farmer would have some idea of the direction in which he is heading. This has certainly not been the case with this government.

One wonders why the minister chose to bring forward the cash advance legislation at this time. There are far more urgent matters affecting western agriculture. It makes one wonder about the priorities of this government. We have repeatedly asked what the policy of this government is on transportation as it affects the movement of grain. At this time we do not know the government's policy on railway branch lines. We know a freeze was put on the closure of all branch lines until the end of this year. The farmer and the grain companies do not know what is going to happen in less than a month and a half. This lack of policy is costing the grain companies, the pool, the grain growers and the farmers great amounts of money. I can give many examples where indecision by this government has been very costly.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

CREATION OF JOB INVENTORY FOR UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River) moved that Bill C-212, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I cannot help being somewhat disappointed that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) is not here this evening. I know of his interest in this matter and of his concern with the problem that this bill is trying to correct. However, I am sure his representative is here. I should like to appeal, not only to members on the government side of the House but to members of the other opposition parties to allow this bill to go to committee since it is designed to correct a very serious discrepancy in the Unemployment Insurance Act.

I have just returned from a visit to some of the more remote areas of my constituency in northeastern British Columbia where it has always been difficult to enjoy many of the services of both the federal and the provincial governments. I suppose it is natural that a member of parliament is looked at, in areas as remote as the Alaska Highway, as a liaison officer or ombudsman, and one should not be surprised if a member from an area such as this is always confronted with problems which he is very seldom able to explain or to solve himself. When one thinks of government from as far away as northeastern British Columbia, it becomes an almost impossible task to reconcile the activities of government with the actual needs of the area. One finds in almost all cases that the activities of the various government agencies work at cross-purposes. The Unemployment Insurance Commission and the services offered by Canada Manpower are a perfect example of this, and my bill addresses itself to this problem.

Even if we ignore the fact that the services of these agencies are available only on a very limited scale to people in remote areas, limited service is totally useless to Canadians in areas such as I have described. First of all, even though my bill does not provide for the reamalgamation of Canada Manpower and the Unemployment Insurance Commission, I should like to say that the separation of these two agencies, if they can be considered separate at all, had an even more disastrous effect in the remote areas of our country than in others.

During my travels I am constantly confronted with a paradox which demonstrates the chronic and acute shortage of people in almost all categories of the labour market, not to speak, of course, of the total absence of professional people which is a different problem altogether. I refer to the paradox between the lack of people and the rate of unemployment in these areas, which is usually higher than the national average. I could, of course, use many examples but one which demonstrates better than anything else the serious discrepancy that my bill is trying to correct is the situation that exists in the lumber industry of British Columbia and, I am sure, in other areas of Canada as well.

The difficulties experienced by that industry have in recent days and weeks been the subject of attention by the House of Commons and people throughout the country. We have had proposals to set aside any other business of the House of Commons in order to discuss, under certain rules and orders, the problems of the forest industry, and in particular we have addressed ourselves to the serious question of unemployment that is connected with the difficulties facing the industry.

In British Columbia alone we know that at least 15,000 people have been laid off, even without considering the massive cutbacks and shutdowns in the service industry as a result of the slowdowns. The unemployment rate in northern British Columbia now appears to be approaching 10 per cent. British Columbia is considered to be a "have" province, but I am sure that the "haves" must all live in the lower mainland, in Vancouver, since in northern British Columbia there is, as I say, an unemployment rate of 10 per cent. In spite of this, it was necessary for a firm called Fort Nelson Forest Industries to limit their production to one shift since they were not able to employ 75 people. They did not limit production to one shift because of the depressed lumber market, for a change, or even because of shortage of boxcars or a breakdown in rail service; it was for no other reason than shortage of labour. The shortage is not confined to one category but is apparent in all—skilled, semi-skilled and unskilled labourers.

If you were to travel, Madam Speaker, along the Alaska Highway by automobile, as I often do, you might find the operators of a rest stop or roadside facility unable to provide you with service because of lack of help. If you do not know how to repair your own tire, I would advise you not to travel the Alaska Highway this winter because you might well become stranded somewhere between Fort Nelson and Watson Lake, unable to find someone who is able or prepared to assist you. Several business people have told me they find it impossible to continue their operations, and lack of facilities along this highway will make winter travel extremely hazardous, if not dangerous.

One must ask oneself what is wrong with the system. Certainly it would seem that the established guidelines for the two labour-management agencies, namely, Manpower and the Unemployment Insurance Commission, were designed to deal with these problems and I think that in theory they have. Canada Manpower has a wide range of services. A person can apply for a grant to explore a new area in which he might find an opportunity to work. He can get a travel grant to go to another part of the country in order to find employment. We can provide, through Canada Manpower, a person's moving expenses to a new location if it is found to be a suitable location for work. We can retrain an unemployed person to help him or her find new skills. We can maintain storefront offices in some areas of our country in order to help people seeking employment and employers to get together, and so on.

The Unemployment Insurance Commission has its own programs designed to help people find new employment and to upgrade their skills. But quite often—altogether too often—in remote areas where there are no offices the two agencies work at cross-purposes. Let me give the House an example. Yesterday I telephoned the regional office about a constituent who found himself chocked and buried by a mountain of red tape. When I explained to the regional officer the claimant's case and he gave me a ruling, I said to him, "Would you allow your mind for one moment to be exposed to reason and would you tell me if you think your ruling makes any sense at all, looking at it from the claimant's point of view?" His reply to me was, "Mr. Oberle, I would rather not comment on that". I hope he will not want to comment on it because no one in his right mind could make sense out of the Unemployment Insurance Act, which would better be called "Catch 22".

This is what happened. The man consulted the Manpower and Unemployment Insurance offices before he left his employment on September 5. He was allowed to leave to attend a school sponsored by Canada Manpower at which he wanted to upgrade himself. He was told he would have an additional three-week waiting period, which he was prepared to accept, so in total he would have to wait five weeks before drawing unemployment insurance. The Manpower course was cancelled after he had given his employer notice and lived up to that commitment. He then started looking for work, but in his field—exploration for petroleum and natural gas—the employment scope is limited. I suggest it will be more limited as a result of last night's budget, since most of the companies carrying out this activity have left the country. As a result of this man's honesty in stating on his weekly report card that he was not taking the training—not because he did not want to; and he quit his job to do so—he is not eligible for unemployment insurance and is now living off his neighbours.

Perhaps that little example illustrates some of the things my bill attempts to correct. Let me discuss in more specific terms the bill I have proposed. On November 22, 1973, in a statement to the Standing Committee on Manpower and Immigration the minister said:

> The heart of any employment service is the technique it uses to match job orders with available workers.
> In Canada, we have used, and used well, the traditional approach to job matching followed by other advanced industrial countries, seeking from employers their job vacancies and registering Canadian workers by occupation. The match is then made between the two by comparing occupational codes. Our level of employer patronage, referrals to jobs and placements compare very well with those of other countries. However, this approach has not kept pace with the growing complexity of the labour market, and the growing adaptability and mobility of Canadian workers.

The minister admitted we have a special problem because in that statement he said:

The current paradox in Canada of high unemployment and increasing labour shortages indicates that employers, as well as workers, may have special problems.

We have special problems and there is no way, in Canada today, that we can carry out the commitment the minister made in his statement to the committee. There is no way we can effectively match employees with job vacancies. My bill would correct that situation by making it compulsory for employers to list with Canada Manpower services and, preferably, with the Unemployment Insurance Commission, a total inventory of job capacities. My bill would establish, in a compulsory way, a job inventory throughout this country.

Mr. Caccia: More bureaucracy.

Mr. Oberle: My friend suggests that this would create more bureaucracy. The fact is that all the reporting that would have to be done to carry out and maintain such a job inventory is already being done by our existing bureaucracy.

Mr. Caccia: No, it is not.

Mr. Oberle: All we have to do is ask Manpower to make use of the many services and statistics already being provided by the bureaucracy to which my friend refers.

Mr. Caccia: It is not being done any more.

Mr. Oberle: If the hon. member would keep quiet for a minute he might learn something. I carried out a very interesting survey in the city of Prince George. Interestingly enough, this survey was carried out in the same city where we spend annually $334,674 to maintain the services of Canada Manpower, where we employ—my hon. friend speaks about bureaucracy—35 individuals to do what I can demonstrate is being done there. I made a study which pointed out some very interesting facts. Canada Manpower is only involved, in that area, in 7 per cent to 10 per cent of job placements. Only 15 per cent of employers in both industrial and service sectors normally consult Canada Manpower in respect of shortages of employees. A large percentage of job seekers told the people who carried out the survey for me that the only reason they consult Canada Manpower at all is to provide proof to the Unemployment Insurance Commission that they are actively seeking employment.

Mr. Caccia: Oh, come on!

Mr. Oberle: I told you if you would just be quiet you might learn something. The greater percentage of employers would welcome such a scheme as I have outlined and only a small number would object to it. Their argument is that most of the information is already in the hands of one or other department of government, Statistics Canada or Information Canada, and they would not object to an exchange of this information. The implementation of such a program would certainly eliminate all abuses presently experienced. We would know what the true unemployment picture is in Canada, and we would know into what areas of Canada special assistance programs should be directed.

In addition, we would no longer have to subject the unemployed to the harassment of proving they are actively seeking work. If we could provide them, with the first week's cheque, with a list of employment opportunities which would be categorized to suit individual needs, this would provide Canada Manpower with factual information as to the areas to which training programs should be directed. It would also give Manpower officials the information needed to justify the implementation of many other services which the office provides.

I have concerned myself particularly with the obvious argument one could expect from employers, namely, that this would be a further infringement by government on their affairs. This argument was discounted by the many comments I received from employers who stated they considered the unemployment situation a problem which must be faced by government, business and labour alike. Almost all businesses interviewed were ready to make their contributions to the cause.

I can go into—I do this at least twice a month, and often more than that—an air terminal or office of a travel agent and tell them I am travelling from Fort Nelson to Fort St. John, to Edmonton, to Vancouver, to Toronto and to Ottawa and the agent will invariably walk over to his little computer, punch a few buttons and give me certain information. He will tell me that my flight will leave at 16.40, Fort Nelson time, flight 48. He will tell me that I get into Fort St. John at a certain time, leave on the same flight at a certain time and that I will have to change to a different flight at Edmonton. He will tell me that again in Vancouver I will have to change flights, but that I will be on the same flight from Vancouver to Toronto to Ottawa, with a short stop-over of 20 minutes. The computer tells him that and it does not take three hours, a day, a week or a month: he gives me that information in two minutes.

I say the advancements in respect of computers and technology must be applied to some of the more serious problems in Canada today, of which unemployment certainly is one. An unemployed person should be able to walk into a Manpower office, where a person would go to a computer and tell him that his category was such and such. He should be able to say that this person could go from category 15 to category 15A, B, C, or D. If there is no opening in that particular category, he should be able to tell the unemployed person that there is an opening in Fort St. John, Fort Nelson, Watson Lake, Edmonton, or St. John's. That information could be available to the unemployed person in two minutes. But, of course, Canada Manpower does not have this information in the first instance, so how could it pass it on to the unemployed person who must prove to the Unemployment Insurance Commission, in order to have his basic right recognized, that he is looking for work?

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Oberle: Certainly, Madam Speaker. Obviously I am here to inform, and I will permit a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Because the hon. member's allotted time has expired, we would need the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Caccia: Would the hon. member inform this House whether he believes empty seats and unemployed people are the same?

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, I would say there are many empty seats on the Liberal side. Would the hon. member be more specific? I have some information here as to what the minister thinks about this bill, if the hon. member like information in that respect. Frankly, I do not understand the question.

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to take this opportunity to offer you my sincere sympathy in connection with the recent passing away of your mother. She was a respected citizen of my riding and please believe that we are most sincerely distressed by the ordeal that has be fallen you.

I would like to thank my hon. friend, the member of the Official Opposition, who has given us the opportunity to discuss the very important and up-to-date subject of unemployment insurance. It is obviously useless to insist upon the tragedy of those who, for one reason or another, do not have an opportunity to find work and for whom the consequences are extremely tragic not only for themselves but also for their families. It is equally useless to insist upon the fact that the unemployment insurance budget has reached astronomical heights and that any solution which might help diminish its alarming growth should be seriously considered.

Bill C-212 would compel every employer to give the Unemployment Insurance Commission a list of his total job capacity together with the kind of job held by each employee and the employer would also have to advise the commission of any vacancy or change in the number or type of jobs. It is easy to see that this bill is made up of two parts. First, we are asking each employer for an official list of his employees and second, no unemployed person would be obliged to further submit to the procedures involved in finding a new job.

In his bill, my hon. friend refers to the 1971 act which, as we all know, contained a considerable broadening of benefits for those who, for one reason of another, are faced with the impossibility of finding a job.

In my opinion, it goes without saying that the 1971 act is not perfect yet, but it is a clear indication that the government is always preoccupied by the unemployment situation, and it is very important, and I agree with the government on that, the unemployed enjoy adequate benefits so he and his family can go through that difficult period because it is then impossible for him to get a job and to contribute effectively to find solutions for his family and for his own community.

However, Madam Speaker, I believe my hon. friend's proposal has a great defect and I say so with all due respect. Indeed the suggested inventory constitutes a duplication of what already exists. We in Quebec are a bit used to that sort of arguments which may not impress my hon. friend, but we know people who never miss the opportunity of reminding us that we have two forms of government, that we often have two departments, which in a way constitutes duplication.

In order to apply that argument to the matter now before us, I must remind my hon. friend that the Department of Manpower and Immigration already has an inventory of available jobs to which unemployed people may refer easily enough if they are really interested in solving their problems. For if it is a moral necessity on the part of the government to help the unemployed, one must not believe that unemployed people should purely and merely be content to stay at home and wait for public servants or government legislation to bring a complete solution to their problem.

Both the government and the unemployed have responsibilities they must try to share. I know personally that in the Jonquière manpower office, in the constituency of Lapointe, such an inventory exists. Unemployed people can be provided with general information enabling them to make active and effective efforts to find a job. It is a new form of procedure. Those offices have been created tentatively, at least in my area, a few months ago only and, on the basis of consultations I had with the director of the manpower office, that solution seems acceptable, profitable and effective at the present time, provided of course unemployed people are really willing to participate and have an opportunity to do so.

I recognize that the solution advocated by my hon. friend is somewhat relevant, but I believe it would be preferable to find a mechanism that would ensure better cooperation between the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Unemployment Insurance Commission rather than try to find formulas which may be excellent but burden the public budgets and in fact are not new solutions. There are often complaints about the lack of communication between the Department of Manpower and Immigrations and the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

I know the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) has looked at the problem, is seeking solutions and has even found some which, however, did not work as expected.

I believe what the manpower offices now have as inventories is the answer, but that does not exclude my hon. friend's proposal, if the unemployment problem is really not worked out sooner or later.

Second, my hon. friend suggests indeed that the unemployed be relieved from having to make any effort to find a job. With all due respect to my hon. friend. I do not agree with him on that. I think that when you are temporarily without a job, you must contact the authorities at the appropriate places to try to get one.

In my opinion, it is unfortunate that the unemployed feel that it is enough for them to register at the Canada Manpower Centre and wait very quietly at home, when they are not travelling or on holidays, till someone communicates with them to offer a suitable job.

If we do not want to erode the desire of the unemployed man or woman to make an effort to settle his or her problem, I think it is important to keep this obligation for the individual to take some steps. I recognize that public servants do not always show the best judgment. Often, they require the unemployed to take absolutely useless steps and sometimes too many of them. With their overly strict interpretation of the law, they often deprive the unemployed of their right to unemployment benefits. Far be it from me to suggest that the unemployed be deprived of their right to unemployment benefits through excessively strict interpretation of the law, but I feel that the unemployed owes it to himself to take concrete steps, in a field in which he can work, to find a solution to his problem.

The bill submitted to us by my hon. friend gives us an excellent chance to realize that perhaps, on both sides of the House because neither party has the monopoly on this we have been traumatized, and rightly so, by the acute problems of unemployment. Beyond considerations of political nature, we are trying to find real solutions. I must congratulate my hon. friend for having introduced a bill that is totally honest, totally interesting, which I cannot support wholeheartedly but for which I feel we can certainly commend its author. It has given us an opportunity, though perhaps too brief, of reflecting again on the serious problem of unemployment. This is perhaps a new occasion to to work together towards finding solutions, for there is no worse problem than that of unemployment. Though we must sympathize with those who are without work, we must above all else work together, setting aside political considerations, and find adequate solutions to the trials besetting those people.

[English]

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I must say that there is a certain sense in Bill C-212, proposed by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle). As the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) pointed out, he would like to match the job vacancies with the unemployed, a problem which has defeated many people for a long time. There is no question, of course, that that is the ultimate that one would look for if one had a perfect scheme, and if in fact people were airplane seats.

Unfortunately, as my friend does not seem to understand, people cannot be equated with empty seats on airplanes because there are a great many more people than airplane seats, even in the region of Prince George-Peace River. I do not think for a moment that my hon. friend, when he reads what this bill would propose and takes the time to think his thought through, would want to establish a gigantic bureaucracy, another bureaucracy, when he is already complaining that there is too much bureaucracy in manpower and unemployment.

A few moments ago the hon. member commented on the reasons given for someone in his office being refused a claim in a complicated issue, where the man quit his job to undertake a retraining program, and something went wrong. The hon. member would only multiply that kind of thing one thousand times if his plan were implemented. I think we must consider the unemployed and we must also consider the problems of an employer who reports vacancies. Let us remember that an employer in a small business frequently does not even know how many people he may be using. He has not got a certain number of staff that he uses at all times.

At one time I operated a small business and often hired about 50 people from the National Employment Service, as it was at that time. Usually it was for the Christmas rush and I did not know too far in advance how many people I would need. I am sure that the seasonal nature of the employment is an important consideration in the hon. member's area as well.

The hon. member mentioned that his proposal would do away with the need for the unemployed person to conduct an active job search because that would be done for him by the Manpower Office. Surely this would be a step backwards, Mr. Speaker. Of late we seem to have come down a bit hard on people who register at the Manpower Office and, for some reason, are disentitled.

The hon. member's party claims that unemployment insurance benefits are a disincentive to people, and on the other hand he claims that we should not require people to make an active job search when collecting benefits. They cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker. I do not see how the hon. member can say that an unemployment insurance scheme should be arranged so that not many people will take advantage of it, and then present us with a bill that would make it easier to collect unemployment insurance without conducting an active job search. Surely that is not consistent with the philosophy of his party.

The hon. member must know that a claimant just does not register at a Manpower Office and immediately collect benefits. Hon. members from urban areas, or areas of high unemployment, I am sure receive many complaints that people register at a Manpower Office and are cut off after a five week period because they are not considered to be actively engaged in job hunting. I notice that one of my friends from Newfoundland, who I am sure has these problems, indicates his agreement.

The hon. member mentioned that Manpower provides 11 per cent of the jobs, but I was not clear whether he referred to his own district or whether that was presented as a national figure. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that is not too bad. When you take into consideration the fact that most people find their own jobs, for a single employment agency to find 11 per cent is not bad at all.

I am sure the hon. parliamentary secretary has a few things to say, but before I sit down I would remind the hon. member that people and airplane seats are not the same things. That may come as a surprise to him, but it is a fact.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Madam Speaker, I had not intended to speak on this bill, but obviously members on the other side intend to talk it out and I think we should correct some of their statements before they do that.

I took the time to cross the floor and ask the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) what his question meant when he compared people to seats. Apparently he was referring to a statement made by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) about how computers work for airlines. Members from the other side have inferred that the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River was comparing people with airplane seats, when what he was trying to do was point out the advantages of using computers.

We know the trouble the Manpower Offices got into when they became involved with computers, but an examination of how airlines use computers to fill seats might be useful to them. If an aircraft did not operate at maximum capacity the airlines would be here looking for subsidies, but the use of computers has enabled them to fill their planes and use their facilities to the maximum.

The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River used that illustration to make things as simple as he could for hon. members opposite who concern themselves with trying to talk out bills that sometimes have a lot of merit. I notice some of them are laughing. I had a private member's motion recently, Madam Speaker, and one of the members opposite, who yelled loudest, told me it was a good bill when he met me later and said he was sorry he had to talk it out. I think we should have discussions on a non-partisan basis sometimes to see if members who do not sit on the government benches have ideas that the government could use.

The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) seemed to think that a Manpower Office that filled 11 per cent of the available jobs had a good record. I have had some experience with the Manpower Office in my riding, which has an aggressive manager and staff who make sure they find out what kind of people industries want. The area is growing very quickly and private agencies have not entered the market yet. But Manpower Offices in general do not seem to know what kind of people employers want. A private agency, on the other hand, keeps an inventory of jobs available and knows what kind of people are required. Some of them are using computers and doing well with them.

The hon. member stated that private employment agencies place the people on the top half of the scale, and Manpower gets the people on the bottom end of the scale. That is not quite correct, Madam Speaker. A company in Vancouver called Hospitality Services provides staff for restaurants—dishwashers, waitresses, cooks, etc. I think a dishwasher would be considered to be at the lower end of the scale. This company is doing well because Manpower was not filling that need.

This same company, although it is a private company, as the minister well knows, is willing to work in cooperation with the Manpower Office. Actually, it is willing to pay a fee if the Manpower Office will handle some names. The Manpower Office deals with people who are looking for jobs. The agency I am speaking of goes across the country trying to place employees in various restaurants, hospitals, work camps and so on.

An hon. member opposite mentioned computers and said that we cannot compare airplane seats with people. That is exactly what we are not doing. We are trying to solve a serious difficulty within Manpower Offices and place people in jobs. We want to help the employer who goes to the local Manpower Office for an employee. We suggest that there is a better way of bringing employers and prospective employees together.

Some hon. members on the government side say that the kind of program suggested will entail the creation of a massive bureaucracy. I suggest that that is not correct. Most will agree that in West Germany great expansion of the economy there has taken place with zero unemployment. The program which the hon. member opposite suggests will not work in this country has been in operation in West Germany and, as those who have visited that country will testify, you will not find a massive bureaucracy. It is a country dedicated to private enterprise and it is flourishing. Therefore this suggested program has been proved. It works. It is not one which members on my side have dreamed up, Mr. Speaker. As I say, it has been shown to be a good program.

It is important for us to create an effective inventory for jobs. All I am suggesting is that if an employer is looking for a particular type of employee, he should fill out a card. However, we must make sure that the card he fills out bears some relationship to the card which the prospective employee fills out. Computers are designed to deal with this kind of information. They only fail when the information fed into them is wrong. Surely the government, with all its resources, can see to it that cards are designed so that the card the employee fills out is compatible with the card the prospective employer fills out. I suggest that such a system would be better than the one under which we presently operate.

An hon. Member: Anything would be better than the present system.

Mr. Reynolds: My hon. friend says that anything would be better, and I must agree. In my area, and I cannot stress this too strongly because I have close working relations with the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Manpower Office, government services are working relatively well. I represent a small community of 150,000 people and Unemployment Insurance and Manpower Offices, because of their small size, have become involved in the community to an extent I have never seen elsewhere.

When I was first elected, the major complaints of my constituents had to do with shortcomings of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Manpower Office. I received four or five complaints a day. At that time these programs were handled in Vancouver, in one massive office which was several storeys high, and contained several hundred employees. Now that these matters are handled in the municipality of Richmond, many of our difficulties have ended. Perhaps that sort of thing can be discussed if the bill goes to committee. I suggest that computers could do the job I am talking about now. I do not think my suggested program would require a large bureaucracy. Once the computer system is working, fewer and fewer people will be needed to work the system.

Some hon. members opposite are under the impression that the work load of counsellors in Manpower Offices is staggering. In certain areas the workload is staggering, but the workload of counsellors working in the private industry is not. I am thinking of a company in Vancouver known as Dunhill's. I know very well the two men who run it. One is the treasurer of the Liberal party in B.C. and the other fellow happens to be a good Conservative and a good friend of mine. Both are businessmen, and both work in cooperation with the Manpower Office and the local Unemployment Insurance Commission. I think hon. members opposite should look closely at what these men are doing, as it will become evident that we can improve greatly on our present system.

The hon. member for Spadina said, "If anyone is really interested in improving the situation, it is easy to do so".

An hon. Member: Did he say that?

Mr. Reynolds: I wrote down his words. Perhaps I was mistaken, but I do not think so. I did not pick those words out of my earphone.

An hon. Member: Maybe he did not say that.

Mr. Reynolds: Perhaps he did not. People do not remember everything they say in private members' hour. Some of them read speeches which have been prepared by research departments. If the hon. member did make the statement, it will appear in Hansard. In any event, I suggest that the unemployed in Canada are usually interested in improving their situation. In the odd case the unemployed person may be content to stay on unemployment insurance, which has been all too easy to obtain. However, by and large, I suggest that most unemployed people want to improve their situation.

Sometimes a fellow may decide in December that he wants to improve his situation in March or April, and he takes three months off skiing. That was possible until fairly recently. The minister tightened the regulations because of complaints from my side of the House, as well as from his side. Actually, the former minister of the environment spoke out loudly before the last election about abuses under the unemployment insurance program. He wanted the government to end them.

I say to hon. gentlemen opposite that the time has come to change our system and allow private bills, proposed by backbenchers on both sides of the House, to proceed to committee. I know that some on the government side are given the task of talking these bills out. That must be changed. We should use private members' hour to consider private members' bills, so that after one hour we can send them to committee and discuss them in a non-partisan fashion. At present, as I say, some members opposite are given the task of talking these bills out, so that they are not sent to committee and the responsible minister is not asked to give up some of his valuable time.

An hon. Member: They are trained seals.

Mr. Reynolds: Some call them trained seals. Of course, if we, on this side, were to sit on the other side, as we shall one day, we might operate on the same basis. I think we should look at my suggested program in a non-partisan way. This program has worked in other countries, and I do not see why it cannot work in this country. I think we should follow the example which has been set by others, and for that reason I hope hon. members will allow this bill to go to committee and allow us to correct a difficult situation.

[Mr. Reynolds.]

Mr. William Rompkey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member conceded that the system works quite well in his area. If the system works well in one area, clearly, it can work well anywhere. Therefore, the hon. member is making a judgment. He is passing judgment on the staffs of certain offices. He is suggesting that some staffs are not as good as others, and is therefore passing judgment on certain staffs. Clearly, he does not condemn the entire system. He said that he had a very good relationship with a certain aggressive, able manager and that the system works well. I would argue—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but the hour appointed for private members' business having expired, I leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-10, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, before five o'clock I was pointing out that I will be supporting Bill C-10, to increase cash advances from $6,000 to $15,000. I had pointed out that cash advance legislation was originally introduced by the government led by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I had also mentioned how inflation has affected the farmers' costs of production, and that increased cash advances were necessary to meet the ever increasing costs which our farmers face.

I had not mentioned the fact that we still do not know the priorities of the government as far as the western grain situation is concerned. Parliament has been in session since September 30, but to date there has been no statement from the government on what its transportation policy is going to be as far as moving grain in western Canada is concerned.

Hon. members know that the present freeze on branch line abandonment in the west will terminate at the end of this year, less than a month and a half from now, yet we still have seen no action from the government. We do not know what its policies are going to be. This lack of action by the government has caused concern in many areas as far as branch lines are concerned. It has added extra cost to the grain companies and the farmers.

I want to use, as an example, a branch line in my constituency. This is a CNR line that runs from Neepawa to McCreary, Manitoba. Several years ago, because CNR would not guarantee future service on this line, Manitoba Pool Elevators and United Grain Growers consolidated service on it. There were four points served on the line, Eden, Riding Mountain, Birnie and Kelwood. To improve service at that time, the United Grain Growers took over the elevator at Riding Mountain and had the farmers in that area deliver their grain to Kelwood. The situation was vice versa with the closure of the Birnie Manitoba Pool Elevator. They had their customers deliver their grain to the pool elevators at Eden. This happened two years ago.

At that time both the United Grain Growers and Manitoba Pool Elevators asked CNR about the future of the line because they wanted to keep up the facilities. They wanted to make sure the elevators could be kept in top condition. No matter how many times they asked CNR, they received no assurance.

This summer the main Manitoba Pool elevator at Eden more or less collapsed. This meant that the farmers from that area had to find a new delivery point to handle their crop for this fall, as well as their crop for next year. All this has come about because of a lack of government decision as to which direction it will head on branch lines. Manitoba Pool Elevators have now advised the farmers in the Eden area they will not rebuild their facilities there. Instead, they will build a large elevator at Neepawa. This means a haul of an additional 10 to 15 miles for farmers in that area.

Because of the location of these elevators, sometimes close to our national parks, the farmers have to negotiate a few steep grades, which present them with considerable difficulty with their present equipment. The Manitoba Pool Elevators have told their membership, and all farmers in the area, that they will be glad to build a new elevator at Eden, but because the government has not yet decided the future of these branch lines the CNR will not guarantee service. This lack of policy is going to cost both the pool elevators and the farmers in the area a lot of money.

I can give other examples where the lack of government policy on branch lines is causing extreme concern in western Canada, a matter mentioned many times before in the House. Instead of bringing in legislation like Bill C-10 I hope the government will soon announce its new transportation policy and disclose its priorities as far as western agriculture is concerned. The government should put its priorities in proper perspective.

In his earlier remarks the minister responsible for the Wheat Board stated that the government was not raising the cash advances because of inflation. I do not know what the reason is, but it does make me wonder. Perhaps the reason is the over-payment made to the western farmers in early June. Perhaps it is the two-price wheat payment that the government is now demanding back from the western farmers.

Perhaps by increasing cash advances the government feels the farmers will be able to afford to pay back the over-payment that was made at election time. Between May 27 and June 3 cheques were mailed out, by the minister's office, to 9,586 special permit holders in western Canada as two-price wheat payments. Later it was disclosed that 7,635 of these permit holders were overpaid varying amounts totalling in all $1,449,000.

At the time the minister stated that the computer had made a mistake, but it makes one wonder whether it was not another form of election bribe to the western farmers. As I say, perhaps the reason the minister is raising cash advances is to enable the farmers to repay the bribe that was made at that time. In closing, may I say I support Bill C-10. However, I feel there is much more important legislation that the government should be bringing forward to solve some of the problems in western Canada.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board speaking yesterday on this bill, and I was interested to hear him speak so highly of it. This bill is amending an act which came into being as a result of legislation brought in by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he was Prime Minister some 17 years ago. Naturally the minister gave no recognition to this fact in his address. He delivered his speech in such a manner as to lead people to believe that this piece of legislation was entirely his own doing.

Of course this is not uncommon with government members. They very often adopt the policies and ideas of the opposition, and later on rather brazenly give the impression that they are their ideas. In particular I recall quite vividly that our policy of indexing income tax, which was brought forward in 1972, was ridiculed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), but subsequently adopted by him.

> Hon. members will have recently noticed figures for the whole of Canada which show that farmers' cash receipts are up to more than 43 per cent in the first nine-month period of 1974.
> They will have noticed, too, that in the province by province analysis the greatest increases have taken place in the prairie provinces. Saskatchewan leads the way with cash receipts which have moved to $1.93 billion for the nine-month period, from $1.02 billion for the corresponding period a year earlier. That is an increase of approximately 90 per cent for Saskatchewan, over what I believe was itself a record.

Was the minister is charge of the Wheat Board attempting to give the rest of the country the impression that farmers in the west have never had it so good? The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) straightened the record out, however, when he spoke shortly after the minister and quoted statistics to the effect that in 1973 the average income of the farm family on the prairies, after expenses and interest, amounted to some $2,200. I believe the minister is out of touch—if he ever was in touch—with the farmers of Saskatchewan.

I wonder whether he realizes that up until two or three years ago farmers on the prairies were living on their equipment depreciation allowances. Year by year their machinery was getting older and they had no money to buy new machinery. They now have a few dollars in their pockets but equipment prices are very high, having gone up four, five or six times in the last few years.

Mr. Lang: Do you believe the $2,200?

Mr. Neil: It is very close, I would say, Mr. Minister.

Mr. Lang: Out by about $10,000.

Mr. Neil: I would say that the increase in income that the farmer has realized in the last two or three years has largely been eaten up by his expenditures on replacing farm machinery. The price of fertilizer has gone up two or three times, the price of fuel has gone up, grocery bills and general living expenses have gone up. The farmer has been called upon to pay interest on loans at anywhere between 10 and 15 per cent.

While we must admit that cash receipts for the last year or two have been high, it is a case of considering what the farmer has in his pocket after he has paid his bills. The minister will find it is not just that much. Certainly there are some large farms doing quite well and those farmers have bank accounts and so on, but the average farmer has used most of the money that he has received in the last two or three years to update his equipment and pay off some of his debts.

I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) who stated that, in his opinion, this bill became necessary because of the feed grain policy that was instituted last year. This is probably the only reason the bill is before the House.

I assume the minister and the officials of the Canadian Wheat Board are concerned about the possibility that when elevators are plugged, and quotas are closed, some No. 1 and 2 CW wheat will be sold on the open market as 3CW, unless farmers have a fair amount of cash available under the provisions of this bill.

The minister spoke yesterday about a logical and full-scale stabilization program for grains on the prairies. I wonder if this program started with Operation LIFT and will end with the abandonment of the Crowsnest Pass freight rates. I am afraid that might be the case, as the minister has been putting out feelers recently, testing public opinion on the suggestion that producers on the prairie will not suffer if the Crowsnest Pass freight rates are abolished.

It has been suggested that the subsidies being paid to the railway companies should be paid either directly to the farmers or to the municipalities for the construction of roads and public works following certain rail line abandonments. Perhaps the money will be put into the Wheat Board Pool account and divided up in that manner. I wonder whether some producers in Saskatchewan realize that if we take off the Crowsnest Pass freight rates this could mean an increase in transportation charges on wheat of from 50 cents to 75 cents per hundredweight. The whole transportation and grain handling systems must be examined thoroughly.

We have received no answer from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) to our questions about his intention in connection with rail line abandonments following the freeze which will end December 31 of this year. A decision must be taken fairly quickly, as the elevator companies must know what is going to happen in order that they can make necessary plans for the construction of elevators and storage facilities. I suggest that the railway companies and the producers must know what is to happen. The farmers must know if they will be able to deliver grain to the local elevator or how far they will have to travel to get their grain to market.

The farmers must also know what kind of trucks they will require to transport their grain, and the cost of moving the grain to market. If the Crowsnest Pass freight rates are abolished it might be cheaper to move the grain to the Lakehead by truck rather than by rail. This is what is happening in the United States at the present time.

Will the full-scale stabilization program suggested by the minister involve on-farm storage? It would seem to me that if we had a type of on-farm storage it might eliminate the need for a cash advance program such as we are discussing tonight. The farmer would benefit by being paid for the storage of his grain on his farm. This would enable him to build modern storage facilities, dual purpose or otherwise, thus assisting him to modernize his farm. This in itself would make quite a difference in the appearance of farms in western Canada. If one travels around the prairies at the present time he will see some pretty poor storage facilities, mainly because the farmers have not had the cash to build new grain storage bins.

Mr. Lang: I don't think you have travelled there.

Mr. Neil: The Canadian Wheat Board would also benefit from such a scheme involving on-farm storage, in that it could buy the grain from the farmer and would know exactly what quality and quantity of grain there was in storage, and would then be able to call for delivery of grain in an orderly manner.

Mr. Lang: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Neil: At the end of my statement I will entertain questions.

Mr. Lang: This is relevant to what you are now saying.

An hon. Member: It will still be relevant.

Mr. Lang: I am very interested in the analysis the hon. member is making about on-farm storage. Would he explain how the grain would be graded, what kind of arrangement would be made to assure that it was being kept in place, and how it would be called forward when it was needed?

Mr. Neil: There would be no problem in assuring that the grain was in storage if a scheme existed that enabled farmers to build proper facilities.

Mr. Lang: How would it be graded?

Mr. Neil: It would be graded by the elevator men taking samples of the grain in the bins. The grain could then be locked up and would belong to the Canadian Wheat Board. The system would be somewhat similar to that which is in existence in the State of Montana. Perhaps the minister is suggesting that the farmers would be dishonest and would sell the grain in storage. I suggest to him that the fact that farmers have repaid over 99 per cent of their indebtedness under the cash advance program indicates the honesty of farmers. If the minister talked to some of the farmers in the west they would explain to him that a program of on-farm storage would work, and would be of value to them. I would urge the minister to look into this matter and give it very serious consideration.

In closing let me say that I support the legislation. I believe it is necessary, but I feel that at some future point it should be replaced by an on-farm grain storage program.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth.

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Sharp: Filibuster.

Mr. O'Sullivan: It may seem unusual for a member representing the great riding of Hamilton-Wentworth to want to participate in the debate on Bill C-10, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

Mr. Sharp: You have run out of speakers, I guess.

Mr. O'Sullivan: The government House leader suggests we have run out of speakers. That is not so, but even if it were, it would put us in a better position than the government which has run out of ideas.

Mr. Lang: You finally have a good speaker with no knowledge.

Mr. Sharp: Go ahead, fill in the time. We can waste our time, too.

Mr. O'Sullivan: It is not because I come from the constituency of Hamilton-Wentworth, which contains some of the most arable land and the most dedicated farmers in Canada, that I rise to speak, because obviously this bill will have a particular interest, not for the farmers of southern Ontario, but for the Canadian grain farmers, chiefly those in western Canada. I rise to make the point that this bill affects not just those members who have the honour of representing grain producers, and not just those of us who represent other segments of the agricultural industry, but simply because this bill affects all hon. members. It is because of the implications of this bill for people from every walk of life and every part of the nation that I speak.

I make this brief interjection in the hope that the debate will not review the bill with the narrowest of views, thinking only of the direct implications, but will take the widest possible view, recognizing that Bill C-10, coming as it does in the particular circumstances of today, is significant for all Canadians and, very hopefully, is significant for all the people of the world.

I am particularly pleased to note that cash advance legislation for our grain producers was first introduced by the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). At that time the Liberal Party opposed such legislation. It is interesting and noteworthy that the government now has turned around and presented this bill, under the name of its minister from the province of Saskatchewan.

It was in connection with my work with the right hon. member for Prince Albert, before becoming a member of this House, that I first visited the province of Saskatchewan to campaign with him in his constituency. That was in 1968. I have been back to that province campaigning with him in the last election. I have also been back to that province, for other reasons, on many occasions. During my visits to that province I had occasion to spend some time in the beautiful city of Saskatoon, which is represented in part by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, and also by my colleague who has a distinguished record as a barrister, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn).

During these visits I have had the fortunate opportunity to speak to some of Canada's grain producers. I have come to appreciate, to some limited extent, the many difficulties they face. That over-all personal impression has been buttressed by the many conversations with my hardworking colleagues who represent them in parliament, and through listening to the speeches of hon. members in debates such as this.

As well, I have become aware that one does not necessarily have to be involved in the industry to be knowledgeable or concerned about the problems and the potential of those involved in grain production. This is evidenced, I suppose, if one wished to be particularly generous, by the fact that the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board does not claim personal involvement in the industry. This has been evident to me from my personal conversations with his predecessor as a member of parliament from the city of Saskatoon, Dr. Lewis Brand who, although a member of the medical profession not involved in farming, demonstrated a knowledge of the problems facing the farmers in the constituency of Saskatoon-Humboldt that brought great credit to him and to those who supported him.

One of the most pressing problems expressed to me is the need for stability if people engaged in the grain production industry are to enjoy living in an atmosphere of security. I believe this is necessary. I am glad the government has finally recognized that the maximum amount that may be payable under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act must be increased to take into account the economic conditions facing Canadians earning their livelihood in this way, and facing Canadians generally who have felt the continuing effects of rising inflation over the last several years.

In agreeing with this provision of the bill I feel obliged, as well, to note the fact that we in this party also have some reservations in respect to it. However, these, I believe, have already been clearly voiced by other members of this party who are far more knowledgeable with respect to these aspects of the legislation than I could ever claim to be, Mr. Speaker. What I do say is that in commending the minister for the positive reform this bill provides, I hope he will also take the reservations and suggestions expressed by my colleagues in the true spirit in which they are offered, and that he and the government will for once be willing to give careful consideration to the merits of the arguments presented by members on the other side of the House.

In the atmosphere of partisanship that is inherent in our parliamentary system and in this business of politics, given the party system in Canada, we face the daily and considerable temptation of allowing our party loyalty to blind us completely to the possibility of there being merit in the expressions of our political opponents. I think we must recognize we all have a common goal, to seek ultimately that which is right and best for our country. So, our approaches may vary, our words may be different and our techniques may change, but our objective, our goal, remains the same. I hope the minister will understand and take this into consideration as he ponders the proposals put forward by my colleagues. This is in keeping with what the late Dag Hammarskjöld wrote in Markings:

> Without the humility and warmth which you have to develop in your relations to the few, with whom you are personally involved, you will never be able to do anything for the many.

It is incumbent upon those of us who represent the many, the many in a country that is diverse and extensive, and who also represent the hopes and aspirations of the many throughout the world, to recognize that our personal relations with the few, and by that I mean other members of this House on all sides of the chamber, must be developed in a spirit of friendship that transcends all partisanship.

Earlier I spoke of the significance this bill has for all Canadians because of the particular conditions in which we are living. By this I refer to the present world food crisis, which must surely be of concern to every member of this House, and to every man and woman living in a land as bountiful as ours, who feel compassion and a sense of responsibility for our brothers and sisters of mankind. We have been reminded in recent days, from many sources, of the grave implications that the world food crisis has for millions of people. We are reminded of it every day through the media, and by particular events such as the recent World Food Conference in Rome, where my party was so well represented by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis), whom I know to be a man of great compassion and bearing a sense of true international responsibility.

In the same spirit in which I have made that comment and those which preceded it, I should also take notice of the contribution made by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier). Hon. members are also reminded of this situation by their constituents. We receive letters of representation from constituents writing as concerned Canadians. We were eloquently reminded of the problem during the special debate which took place in this House last Friday, which debate was initiated by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan). I refer to the international food crisis.

The point I wish to emphasize in supporting this contention is that the bill has implications for all of us, rural and urban dwellers alike. In the continuing fight against inflation, which all Canadians have faced and are facing, the central concern has been the production and cost of food. This is a common concern of all hon. members, reflecting as it does a common concern of all Canadians who, in recent years, have been asked to set aside much larger percentages of their family budgets for the purchase of food.

This is a very serious situation and one of continuing and pressing importance to my colleagues and myself in this party. Indeed, we believe that any attack upon inflation, any general thrust to ease its impact, must first be directed against inflation that has affected particularly the cost of the necessities of life: food, shelter and clothing. I make this observation because nothing that I am about to say is in any way meant to lessen the importance of the need for this government, and all governments in Canada, to wage an effective fight against undue increases in the cost of living, particularly as they relate to food.

At the same time I think it is incumbent upon us, at this particular stage of world development, to reflect upon the great benefits that are ours simply by the good fortune of fate which has called us to be Canadians and to live in this land. Just as partisanship, which I mentioned earlier, must not blind members of this House to the merits found in the ideas of members of other parties, so it is that we, as Canadians, must never let our domestic problems, however great they may be, blind us to the more serious and pressing problems of peoples living in developing countries. It is essential that this government, this House and all Canadians recognize that whatever our problems are as they relate to food, these are small when compared with the daily struggle for life faced by so many throughout the world.

I view this as one of the most serious challenges facing the world today, placing a special responsibility on those of us who are privileged to live in a developed and prosperous nation, and particularly placing a responsibility upon men and women involved in the public life of such a nation. At the basis of any action to be taken by governments must be the understanding and support of citizens willing to show the kind of self-restraint that so many Canadians have unselfishly come to accept in recent days.

My colleagues and I are committed to use all the resources available to us to the end of bringing true peace, justice and hope to all the peoples in the world. This problem has also been recognized by spokesmen for the government, and as the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen)—whom I am glad to see in the House tonight—will know, I have recently passed along to him comments in support of Canada's position taken at the World Food Conference, and directed to the government by constituents in Hamilton-Wentworth. I was pleased to read a speech made by the minister at that conference, delivered on November 6 of this year, part of which reads:

> —mankind has no choice but to arrange his feeding in harmony with a balanced use of all the earth's resources, or his civilization will go the way of those of Nineveh and Babylon—which destroyed the soils that fed them. The World Population Conference at Bucharest marked the first, albeit halting, step towards using a full range of policies to control the pressures exerted on this planet's resources. Progress in this area must be accelerated.

The spirit reflected in the minister's remarks has been one that has caught the conscience of Canadians in all walks of life. This is evidenced further by a resolution recently passed by the Hamilton Steelworkers Area Council representing a group of men who, I am sure even the minister will admit, work in a much different environment than does he. Yet they too recognize this concern and recently passed a motion which reads as follows:

> The United Steelworkers recognize the world-wide problems of hunger and starvation, and condemn any policies which result in uncalled for cuts in food production, or in storage policies which risk the spoilage of food.

This is a problem which transcends all political considerations and all economic differences that may separate Canadians. It unites us all, whatever our background, whatever our walk of life, whatever our aspirations for our own personal development, in a common concern to feel a commitment and to make a contribution to international relations.

This is why I further support, as a general rule, the provision by Canada of aid to assist the citizens of a country rather than the giving of assistance directly to a foreign government. In this way it is possible to disagree with the policies of another government, but not to let those policies stand in the way of assisting people who are in need, and who should not be made to suffer as a result of the shortcomings of their country's officials. A significant problem presented by such a policy, we must admit, is to ensure that this really benefits those citizens and is not misdirected by the government in question. It is in this spirit, with this intention, that any action on the part of the federal government, to provide aid for the people of any country in need, is deserving of our support.

So I welcome this bill chiefly because it should create conditions favourable to high productivity on the part of our grain producers. Productivity, high productivity, absolute and ultimate high productivity—that must be the byword and the objective of every farmer in every part of Canada in the coming years. Never again should we have a government policy, as this government had, to pay farmers for not producing food, the chief among the essentials of life. Rather, we must adopt the attitude enunciated so eloquently by the late President Kennedy when he said:

> I don't regard . . . agricultural surplus as a problem. I regard it as an opportunity . . . I think the farmers can bring more credit, more lasting goodwill, more chance for peace, than almost any group, if we recognize that food is strength, and food is peace, and food is freedom, and food is a helping hand to people around the world whose goodwill and friendship we want.

It is in this spirit that I welcome this legislation, and express the deep hope that the government will act in consequence of the deep concern which, I believe, is felt by all Canadians for the needy people of the world.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the opportunity of this debate to present a few of my views on the matter of grain handling and grain production. Before the minister closes the debate I would like to have an opportunity to mention a few of these matters.

Bill C-10 will increase cash advance payments from $6,000 to $15,000. According to the Order in Council that has been passed for quota acres for the purposes of cash advances at 10 bushels for wheat, 20 bushels for barley, and 20 bushels for oats, at a rate of payment of $1.50 for wheat, 90 cents for barley, and 70 cents for oats, a farmer applying for a cash advance, if he is a wheat producer, must have approximately 1,000 acres to get a $15 per acre maximum advance. I should like to ask the minister if the formula could not be changed to take into consideration the producers in Manitoba, whose operations are likely to be smaller than producers further west?

Although I believe it was the minister's intention to present this bill as a housekeeping measure, I think it was also a recognition of the increased costs of production faced by all western farmers.

The constituency of Provencher is located in the so-called designated area of the Canadian Wheat Board, but despite this it is also a large importer. Production costs of beef, poultry—and I almost hesitate to mention eggs in view of the government's attitude toward that product—have increased in past years. I would suggest to the minister that he might consider a stabilization program for other agricultural products within the Wheat Board area.

In view of the food crisis facing the world today it behooves us, as one of the few countries with surplus capacity, to produce food so that the hungry people of the world can be fed. The impact of the crisis becomes more vivid when one realizes that many thousands of people in the world did not eat dinner neither today nor yesterday.

The government, however, embarked on a deliberate program of cutting back production, reacting to what it thought was a surplus situation. Operation LIFT was introduced in order to take the political heat off the government, and now we find ourselves not only in a "cash short" situation but in trouble with the beef industry as well. To a large extent the leadership of the government has brought us to this point. It will have to show much better leadership to get western Canadian farmers into a cash position so that they can produce at maximum capacity and help feed a hungry world.

I support the concept of an international food bank to which Canada would be a mojor contributor. But the burden must be shared by the industrial countries of the world, Mr. Speaker, including the newly rich countries of the Middle East which should make a cash contribution toward the creation of such a food bank.

The cyclical nature of agriculture means that it cannot be regularized, and the government should seriously consider giving financial aid to Canadian farmers in order to ensure steady production. It needs to be made clear to the consumers, however, that such assistance should not be classified as farm subsidies but rather as consumer subsidies. Such aid is only available to the farmer to give him a reasonable return on his input costs. This matter should be set straight for the record.

It is possible that Bill C-10 would not have been necessary in its present format if the initial payment had been higher. That has been changed recently, but we still have the three bushel quota which is forcing many farmers on the open market.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to impress upon the government that if agriculture is to remain viable it must be in a cash flow position. Production must be increased so that we can help the hungry of the world, but it must not be done at the expense of the farmer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. Before recognizing the hon. minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) I would remind hon. members that, if the minister speaks now, this will close the debate on this stage of the bill. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few things in response to the comments of hon. members. First of all, however, I must observe that we have had another of these fairly typical debates that take place when the subject is grain or wheat. This debate perhaps confirms the wisdom of the suggestion made by the government House leader that debates in this House should be televised.

Some 11 Conservatives have spoken in succession after the first round was completed and it was made clear that all members would support the bill presently before the House. The advantage of television would have been that every set in the country could have turned off ten Tories ago and that might have—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You haven't got any Liberals in western Canada at all. You can't restrict debate.

Mr. Lang: The important thing is that of those 11 speeches, two might have been worth discussion if they had been allowed to go forward because they had some relevance to the subject of the debate. I should like to make it clear that I do not refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan). I appreciate his entering the debate, recognizing as he did, that he does not represent an area which is greatly concerned about the subject, but that he wished to utter important words of poetry and get the subject off his soul.

I thought the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) and the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) spoke well on current issues and, in a sensible and rational way, put forward questions and propositions of relevance. This distinguishes them completely from other Conservatives who took part in this debate. If one thing is clear, it is that those other Conservatives who participated in the debate have not taken advantage of the services of their research bureau in preparing material to be presented in the debate.

We heard two sorts of presentation: we heard the sort of thing we have heard many times previously, that is, hackneyed repetitions of old charges, old comments and old analyses. There was nothing new in them. Yes, there was something new in this debate, and that was the completely fictitious and completely false positions put forward by some. It was absolutely astounding for members sitting on my side to listen to that kind of impossible contribution made by hon. members opposite on a bill which, as 11 members in succession said, they will support because, "after all, we invented this idea and therefore it is good."

[Mr. Epp.]

Members opposite began by observing that they could not understand how the Liberal government can support cash advances 17 years after Conservatives introduced the principle. They, being Conservatives, think that if you are against something in 1957, by George, you will be against it in 1974. Well, Mr. Speaker, some Liberals who were here in 1957 are not here now. Times and ideas change, and the Liberal party has changed. It adopts the best policies put forward by any side of the House, and does so unashamedly.

The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) made a number of remarks attempting to show, I think, that the Conservatives seem to be against demurrage payments being borne by the Canadian Wheat Board. Clearly, demurrage payments on wheat, are the responsibility of the board and are borne by the board. Demurrage charges on grains which are not the responsibilities of the Wheat Board, whether on rape or flaxseed, are borne by those involved with those particular grains. He was also concerned about the possibility of the cost of boxcars being borne by grain farmers. He ought to know that these boxcars were paid for by the treasury.

I also found interesting the hon. member's suggestion that the increase in cash advances represents some kind of effort to rescue our feed grains policy. He said that he agrees with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and with the agricultural critic of the Conservative party, the hon. member for Lisgar; he agrees that the open market for domestic feed grains is a good idea. But he was worried in case this bill would undermine that principle. He ignored the fact that when the feed grains policy was provisionally announced in 1973, part of the announcement said that cash advances would be raised in order to assure that farmers are given the choice of delivering to the Canadian Wheat Board or on the open market, as they see best. Cash advances were designed to take financial pressure off them. I mention this to show that there was support for our feed grains policy on the part of the Conservatives.

Then the next member who spoke, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), indicated his tremendous contempt for the feed grains policy and anyone who supported it. Here, again, we saw Conservatives showing their need to speak. Indeed, I suppose they should speak on every issue, otherwise we shall not know how that party stands, as it has not adopted any party policy of any consistency on any subject. It is amazing that they do not seem to know that they take these opposite positions.

The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) was worried in case the feed grains policy will destroy the Wheat Board. I assure him that it will not.

Mr. Benjamin: Why do we need it?

Mr. Lang: We need it because the operation of the federal agency created a different price in one province than was possible in other provinces, and that was unacceptable in economic terms in Canada. We must have one economic price throughout Canada. This should be clear to the hon. member. The feed grains policy will not bring more grain on to the open market than is needed by the domestic market. The limit will be set by demand, and the only relevant question is what price will be charged. Let me say clearly that I believe farmers, generally speaking, will obtain a better return if they deliver to the Wheat Board for the export market. Of course there will always be those who will be attracted by a price close enough to the Wheat Board price to deliver to the open market for domestic use.

Mr. Benjamin: But only Tories will take the lower price.

Mr. Lang: The hon. member says that only Tories will end up delivering the wrong way and getting the lower price. In that case, why is he worried? The fact is that the domestic price on the open market for feed grains will be close to the basic, long-range price as estimated by the Wheat Board. So, the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre need not worry.

In addition to comments on feed grain policy, we witnessed the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) speaking against the grass incentives program. This is the first time I have heard a Conservative speak this way about that program. Usually they voice support for the program, but the hon. member spoke against it. The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone) heard him and, not having been a member of this House for long did not realize the strangeness of his colleague's position and spoke against the grass incentives program as well.

I still say that we needed to switch additional acreage into forage, and I am confident in the long-term development of the beef industry of this country. That was the correct program to introduce, as Conservatives at one time knew, but as present Conservative members no longer seem to know. I suppose one can expect no less, considering that 11 speeches were made without the help of research facilities. As members opposite are confused in their positions, all things considered, it might be better if they were to allow this legislation to pass, as most have said that they support it.

The hon. member for Dauphin made useful suggestions, as did the hon. member for Lisgar, concerning the elevator agent as the collector of the cash advance and the administrator of the program. Let me say that I believe the cash advance system has worked so well because the elevator agent has assumed responsibility for an important role. When he is involved in cash advances he knows the farmer he is dealing with, knows how much grain the farmer possesses, and is able to deal with him in a kind, neighbourly and responsible way.

The question arises: is the elevator agent being paid adequately for the part he plays in administering the program? Of course this may involve the elevator agent, the Canadian Wheat Board, and others, but that is another question. We should appreciate the role which elevator agents in this country have played in making the system work as well as it has, Mr. Speaker.

Many speeches, as I indicated previously, just repeated old monstrosities and accusations raised in times gone by—

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I point out to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) that there is such a thing as relevancy in debate. He should know that, considering his academic background; if he does not, his ignorance stems from the depth of his inexperience and ignorance about how this chamber operates. Presumably the government would like to see some progress. We have tried to make arrangements so that that can be done.

I would just ask the Minister of Justice to recognize the principle of relevance, and make a special effort to refrain from the innuendo that there is some restriction on members speaking in this House on a piece of legislation that is of special interest to them. It would be impossible for there to be 11 government members speak on this bill who would have any direct interest in it, because such members just are not here. They do not exist. I do not want to take up the time of the House any further. I appeal to the minister to try to help us expedite business.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the advice of the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean). Early in the debate the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac) asked about relevance when a Conservative was speaking. I have no doubt that a great deal of it was irrelevant. I am now trying to deal with a good deal of what was said. I find it hard to understand how the Conservatives can say these things and then, when I deal with them, I touch sensitive nerves and they cry out "Order".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, I wish to make myself perfectly clear. I have no objection whatsoever to the minister objecting as strongly as he wishes to anything said by any member on this side of the House. My objection stems from the fact the minister seems to think there is something improper in 11 members on this side of the House speaking in succession. I point out to him that the prairie area of Canada is heavily represented in this House by opposition members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: It is indeed, Mr. Speaker, although I am happy to say less so than before, and I hope less so in the future. It is not extraordinary when 11 Conservatives speak in a row. It is when 11 speak in a row and have nothing to say. That is extraordinary to everybody but a Conservative.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: I want to deal with some of the remarks of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton). He is the man who manufactured a few facts for the purpose of the debate, which were then used by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) as though they were facts.

It is a most extraordinary thing. I referred to figures for cash receipts in Saskatchewan, comparing the first three quarters of 1974 with 1973. I gave the actual figures and the percentage increase. A few minutes later I was asked why I had not given the actual figures, which I had done. Those figures showed an increase.

I did not do that to indicate that the measure we were about to put through the House was unnecessary. I thought it would be obvious to anyone that, when a bill stands in my name, it is proposed for passage by me. I indicated it was necessary, notwithstanding that the cash position of the farmers on the prairies is somewhat better than it has been for a long time. I would have thought any member who purports to have come from the prairies, and knows anything about the situation, would know that is a fact.

Those of us from the prairies need not run away from that, even though we may want to emphasize that, despite the fact that today we in the prairies may be getting more for our grain than we would really need to get if we had not a deficit from days gone by, the fact is we have that deficit and it has to me made up sometime. It is being made up very rapidly.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain came out with a fantastic statement which is recorded at page 1410 of Hansard. He said that all the Saskatchewan farmer received for the full calendar year, for 1973, after expenses and interest, was approximately $2,200 per family. He said this is the type of living condition the minister calls "rolling in dough". Of course I did not call anything rolling in dough. I simply referred to the facts.

What are the facts with regard to income? I do not know where the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain got his figures. I ask the hon. member for Moose Jaw not to accept the $2,200 figure simply because it was used by that hon. member. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain must not have been talking to farmers. If he had been, he would know they made a little more than $2,200 per average farmer in 1973.

Statistics Canada figures show that in Saskatchewan in 1973 the net income of farm operators from their farming operations was $993 million. If there were the same number of farmers then as in 1971, that works out to just about $13,000 per farmer for net farm income from farming operations in Saskatchewan.

Statistics Canada further forecast what 1974 is likely to be—it is simply a forecast, but the first three quarters' figures tend to bear it out. It indicates that the net farm income in Saskatchewan for 1974 may well turn out to be $1,801 million. If worked out with the number of farmers in operation in 1971, that comes to $23,404 net farm income per farming operator. That is contrasted to the $2,200 figure of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain. It shows what I mean when I say I do not think he has been near a farm in the last couple of years or he would know farmers are doing better than that.

I wish that in the course of a debate like this, improving one measure in a small way, it would not be necessary to have members from the prairies doing several things. It is not necessary to say 11 times over "Let's get on with other legislation which may be more important." Also, they need not once again go over their pessimism about the future of agriculture. If those people had the power, there would be reason to be pessimistic.

[Mr. Lang.]

We will continue to ensure that farming is a good way of life for more and more farmers in the prairie region and, I hope, throughout this country. That is what this government is about, and that is what our optimism is about. I wish members opposite would share this optimism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

CUSTOMS ACT

MEASURE TO EXTEND TERRITORIAL JURISDICTION OF CANADA

On the order: Government bills (Senate):

November 4—The Minister of National Revenue—Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of Bill S-4, to amend the Customs Act.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is the desire of the House to make progress on a couple of bills on the order paper this evening. The first is the one that has just been called. I believe it is the desire of all hon. members, and this might be ascertained by asking if there is unanimous consent, that this bill be considered in committee of the whole rather than referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs so that it can be disposed of this evening.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a general understanding that that shall be done. We certainly have no objection.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is part of the agreement. The agreement also includes that we will give it third reading tonight as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is it agreed that the motion be for reference to committee of the whole?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sharp (for the Minister of National Revenue) moved that Bill S-4, to amend the Customs Act, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

● (2120)

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I think we should put on record an explanation of why the House has moved to hold the bill in committee of the whole rather than send it out to a standing committee. If we look at the purpose of the bill, it is merely to extend Canadian customs jurisdiction to the outer limits of the territorial sea of Canada.

It was some years ago that the territorial sea was defined after many, shall I say, abortive efforts and a great deal of promise. We did have a sort of halfway house in regard to our fishing limits. First of all we had a three mile limit, which was then extend to nine miles, a zone where foreign fishermen could come in but our fishermen could not go out. We now have a 12 mile zone and can send customs officers out to the 12 mile limit, and we are determining what shall be the territorial sea of Canada so these officers will be able to operate in what are essentially Canadian waters.

This is a tidying up bill. There is nothing very consequential about it. We are not going to make lengthy speeches or anything like that, so that the shirt tails of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) get into a knot and he becomes overly excited. If there had been consultations, a good deal of the spleen that he vented this evening might have been turned toward some of the scheduling that went on, since Bill C-14 was supposed to be coming up for debate tonight. It so happens that the minister and members of the committee who should have been here to consider Bill C-14 were hauled off to a committee meeting to consider Bill C-9, and were thus removed from the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, Mr. Speaker, I will not yield the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Speaker, although the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) served for nine months as Speaker of the House and wishes to boss the House as a sergeant major, I rise on a point of privilege.

If Bill C-14 had been called yesterday or this afternoon, and if hon. members of the Official Opposition had not made systematic obstruction to the bill sponsored by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), I should have been willing to debate Bill C-14. I know it as well as the hon. member for Edmonton West.

[English]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I never knew that the hon. member's thin skin was a question of privilege. Certainly he knows that the minister was not here, and the hon. members who wanted to discuss the bill were not available. Therefore we have now arrived at this point. As a matter of fact, the hon. member was not here himself a little earlier so we could not have dealt with the bill in any event. He has just come into the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I was here at 8.15 p.m. and I knew very well, thanks to the information received, that hon. members of the Official Opposition would speak one after the other until at least nine o'clock.

[English]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, if I may I will return to dealing with customs jurisdiction in the territorial sea. I hope that housekeeping amendments of this nature will not necessarily be kept this long. There is a rather interesting subclause that I think could lead innocent parties astray. Now, apparently, the making of signals is becoming an offence. Perhaps hon. members of this House are going to have to watch their hands, and be very careful if they stand up at the wrong time. Perhaps they will be making signals which might be deemed an offence under the rules of the House. In any event, I am quite pleased that we are able to bring this legislation forward and can deal with it in detail in committee, and then take third reading.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mrs. Morin in the chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. House in committee of the whole on Bill S-4, an act to amend the Customs Act.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

On clause 3.

Mr. MacLean: Madam Chairman, I have one question to ask by way of clarification. I am wondering whether this bill will have any effect on the privilege ships have to use material and sell it on board ship in areas where normally they were customs free. I suppose Atlantic passenger ships would have to refrain from this custom until they were outside Canadian waters.

Mr. Sharp: Madam Chairman, may I make one brief comment about the bill, really in reference to what was said by the hon. member for Edmonton West. It was my pleasure while Secretary of State for External Affairs to see the territorial waters extended to 12 miles, and I join with the hon. member in congratulating the government for finally having caught up with the housekeeping.

In reply to the question I have just been asked, it is my understanding that legally ships would have to refrain from engaging in these activities until they had passed beyond the territorial waters of Canada.

Mr. Crouse: Madam Chairman, may I ask the House leader a question about this bill. It is my understanding that the delay in bringing the bill forward was somewhat necessitated by the phasing out operations of various countries which were fishing in zones which formerly were open to them. I am speaking of the phasing out of fishing operations which had to be concluded with the United Kingdom, Norway, Denmark and Portugal. I believe this work was carried out commencing in 1964, at which time the nine mile fishing zone was established contiguous to the three mile territorial sea.

Then in 1970 the territorial sea was extended to 12 miles, which leads us, as I understand it, to this legislation. Is this correct, and in the interval have any negotiations been carried on and an agreement reached with, for example, Spain? Have any negotiations been carried on with the United States and France, or do these countries still have certain treaty rights that would exclude them from the terms of this legislation?

● (2130)

Mr. Sharp: Madam Chairman, I do not really think this bill can be related to the question just asked. The purpose of the bill is to give to Canadian customs jurisdiction in areas in which it did not have jurisdiction until 1964 when the territorial seas were extended to 12 miles. It has nothing to do with treaty rights or fishing zones. It is entirely related to the matter of enabling our customs inspectors to go out to 12 miles rather than three miles, which used to be the width of our territorial seas.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On Clause 4—Smuggling liquors and narcotics.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Chairman, this particular clause is related to one of the most colourful passages in Canadian literature dealing with the smuggling of wines, spiritous and fermented malt liquors into Canadian waters. A great number of romantic stories have been written about activities off the Atlantic coast, and some members suggest off the Pacific coast as well. I have been informed by good authority that many of these stories contain a great deal of truth. In any event we are not changing the nature of the offence or anything like that, we are merely changing the clause so that it no longer refers to the three miles but rather to the 12 miles.

Mr. Forrestall: Madam Chairman, I hope I am not roaming too far afield when I ask the minister if he could shed a little bit of light on how the Department of National Revenue intends to enforce not only this bill, but other similar acts which have been amended? Perhaps he could indicate whether the government intends to aid the Department of National Defence in terms of dollars and cents to acquire a specific seagoing capability in order to assist in the enforcement of this legislation up to the 12-mile limit.

With this amendment, and other pending amendments to other legislation, we might in the foreseeable future, at least during the lead time to construct a fleet with a seaborne capability, require additional ships to meet the requirements of this and other contemplated acts. We may be placing ourselves in the position of having to police activities out to the 12-mile limit. Can the minister make a comment or two in that regard?

Are we going to provide one of the branches of government that has a military capability with the type of seagoing fleet necessary to meet the requirements of this and other measures, or are we going to continue along as we are with no capability of enforcement? Could the minister make a comment in that general area?

Mr. Richardson: Madam Chairman, I question whether this amendment to the Customs Act has any direct bearing on the operations of the Department of National Defence. I can say to the hon. member that when called upon by the Department of National Revenue we do go to its support. We have, at different times, been involved in the policing of infractions to the customs regulations, but this is not part of our established duty. That is only the case when we are called upon by another department to offer assistance.

Mr. Forrestall: Madam Chairman, we are talking about an area that involves our territorial seas, our territorial fishing zones, the Gulf of St. Lawrence and our inland waters which include our freshwater lakes and other major rivers. This involves a number of areas into which we would not want to send men in 14-foot motor boats.

What long range plans does the government have in respect of policing this measure in particular and, in a more general way, other acts? We have had an extension of the authority of the Canadian armed forces under various peace officers acts, and I regret that as I do not think our armed forces people should be involved in police work. Be that as it may, this involves an area described as inland waters. What specific plans does the government have to meet the lead time requirements in respect of that type of fleet?

We cannot send our DDH 280 ships out after small boats. It would be a little difficult to get our sophisticated war ships out after these other vessels that might be engaged in illicit smuggling. We are talking about a five-year lead time, and at this point we have no capacity to police our waters effectively. Does any department of government have any contingency plan, or anything on the drawing board, that would lead us to expect the adequate enforcement of these regulations?

Mr. Sharp: Madam Chairman, of course the Department of National Revenue will have to increase its capacity to police the territorial seas in order to make sure our customs regulations are observed. This is probably one of the reasons why the bill has taken a little time to come before the House. Preparations had to be made to discharge the responsibilities involved. I should point out that this bill has nothing to do with fisheries zones, but has only to do with an amendment to the act to substitute 12 miles for "three miles" wherever that appears.

The government does recognize the necessity for having to spend some money in policing this larger area of territorial sea and in making preparations for that purpose. As my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, has said, however, it is not the purpose of his department to prepare for that contingency. He has other responsibilities from time to time. The Department of National Defence may be called upon to help, but that is not the purpose of national defence policy.

Mr. Crouse: I think the point raised by my colleague has still not been answered by the President of the Privy Council. We have now been told it will not be the responsibility of the Minister of National Defence or his department to enforce this legislation. We have also been told by the President of the Privy Council that steps will be taken, but he has not been explicit, nor has he indicated what steps will be taken and exactly whose responsibility it will be to provide a suitable ship to go out in the North Atlantic, a distance of 12 miles, in order to examine a ship which may be contravening these regulations in respect of Canada's territorial sea.

I speak as one who comes from Nova Scotia and from a port where we are perhaps not too proud of some of our history, because at one time we in Nova Scotia were rather famous for our rum running activities. As one of my colleagues mentioned, we still are at election time. The ships that were engaged in this illicit trade took on cargo at St. Pierre Miquelon and then discharged it off the coast of the United States. There is still some of this illicit trade going on, and there are rumours from time to time that some illicit cargoes are still landed along the coasts of Atlantic Canada. This bill, as I read it, really is an attempt to deal with this situation. It states:

> The offence of smuggling wines, spirituous and fermented malt liquors and narcotics shall be deemed to be completely committed when any vessel, decked or undecked, containing any goods not reported pursuant to section 11, arrives in Canadian waters.

Canadian waters will be 12 miles off the coast of Canada. This distance off the coast of Newfoundland in the North Atlantic, or off the coast of Sydney, or even Halifax can be, from my own experience, very dangerous even today. I have been on board on my own ships in these areas during storm periods. One certainly requires an adequate ship which should be, in my estimation, no less than 100 feet if the captain and the crew of the ship containing the protection officers required are to be assured of a safe passage and a safe return. This is not something I feel we can pass over lightly and slough off, as the minister attempts to do this evening by saying it will be looked after, Madam Chairman.

We are simply asking what steps have been taken, prior to bringing in this legislation, to make sure that we will be able to enforce the laws we are preparing? I think this is a very important point, and I should like a more definitive answer from the minister before we pass this bill.

Mr. Sharp: Well, Madam Chairman, in the first place it is necessary to amend the legislation so that the customs officials can operate within the limit of 12 miles. In our previous legislation which became outdated, the offence was not committed until a ship came within three miles. So, we have to amend the law to bring it into conformity with the present situation. As I said, this bill is being brought in now, some years after the law was amended, because we must be prepared in order to be able to enforce this legislation within reasonable limitations. This does not mean that even if a ship comes within the 12-mile limit that it will be considered to be smuggling liquor and will be apprehended and searched. Not at all.

The purpose is to stop smuggling and to give it all our attention, but not necessarily so that we will stop every ship coming within our sight and say that the Customs Act is amended to cover an area within 12 miles of Canada, and we want to know whether it has cargo on board which is being smuggled. Surely the hon. member is not suggesting that. I assure the hon. member that we would not be bringing in this bill if we were not prepared to bring it into effect.

Mr. Benjamin: May I ask the minister if he would elaborate on just what are the preparations. Would the Customs and Excise people have the authority to commandeer a National Defence vessel in certain situations? What are the preparations? I think that is what hon. members want to know.

ENVIRONMENTAL CONTAMINANTS ACT

MEASURE TO PROTECT HUMAN HEALTH AND ENVIRONMENT FROM CONTAMINANTS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of the Environment) moved that Bill C-25, to protect human health and the environment from substances that contaminate the environment, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the bill being presented is largely the same as that introduced on March 4, 1974 by the Hon. Jack Davis. The changes in the present version have been made only to clarify the meaning of some sections, and the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé) will be explaining these changes in greater detail when we examine the bill in committee.

The passage of this legislation will mark a pivotal point—

Mr. Fraser: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am wondering if, under the circumstances, it is appropriate for the parliamentary secretary to introduce this bill by saying that in most respects it is similar to the bill which was introduced last April, Bill C-3. The House is about to enter into a debate in principle on this bill, in spite of the fact that certain matters were raised in the debate in April, 1974, which clearly called for a second look at certain aspects of the bill.

My point is that under those circumstances I, and I think other hon. members in my party, believe it to be completely inappropriate for the parliamentary secretary to advise the House that the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé) will not deign to open this debate but will only speak when the bill goes to committee, at a time when there is no absolute guarantee that that is where the bill will go until these matters are fully discussed.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I was just getting into the meat of the explanation which I was going to make in connection with the bill. The Minister of the Environment is attending meetings in Victoria, and at this point it is perhaps a little premature for the hon. member to be making these remarks. As I go on with my remarks the hon. member will see that there have been some changes in the bill. The purpose of my remarks is to make sure that hon. members have some idea of what the bill is all about at this stage of the discussion. If the House is willing, I have seven minutes left in which to speak on behalf of the minister. If it is the wish of the House, I am quite willing to forgo my remarks and have the bill referred to committee where we can study it in detail.

Mr. Fraser: May I ask the parliamentary secretary another question? Through you, Mr. Speaker, I would ask him if what he is saying to the House is what I suspect, namely, that the Minister of the Environment will not speak on this bill during second reading? That is an extraordinary situation. Is that the position he is taking?

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): This is not extraordinary at all. Parliamentary secretaries, even more so since Mr. Speaker made his recent ruling—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): —have some functions to perform in the House. One of the functions that is clearly given to us is the right to introduce bills. I am introducing this bill on behalf of my minister. I cannot finish my remarks by ten o'clock and, by the rules of the House, I cannot wind up the debate. But surely, after the House proceeds with the bill, the minister may see fit at some stage to make some remarks. But at this stage of the proceedings I wish to proceed with the remarks I have.

Mr. Fraser: May I ask the parliamentary secretary another question?

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Madam Speaker, rather than accept another question, the only deal I am willing to make is to have the bill given second reading and reference to committee. Otherwise I would like to complete my remarks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): The passage of this legislation will mark a pivotal point in the history of this country's response to the challenge of environmental degradation. It is the latest and one of the most important signals that we are passing now from the era of tactical responses to pressing problems, to an era of long range strategy or, to put it another way, we are moving from cure to prevention.

Necessarily our first priority has been damage repair—the rollback of pollution, emergency action to save endangered species, and so forth. These measures have moved forward with vigorous momentum. But we have also been phasing in measures to prevent the damage before it occurs. In the environmental field as in the health or industrial safety field, or in any other organized activity, prevention is always the more efficient and economic way to do things. We must deal first with the very core of the problem. On this, industry and the environmental experts can agree.

Before going into detail, let me say this: it is not being introduced as a replacement for existing laws, federal or provincial. We are talking about a law that will close loopholes, one that will give new effectiveness to other federal and provincial legislation. It will increase the effectiveness of such diverse legislation as the Fisheries Act of Canada, the Arctic Waters Pollution Act, and the proposed act to ratify the international convention on ocean dumping. One of the two key goals of Bill C-25 is to answer questions about chemical substances which are, or might become, contaminants of the environment. When passed, this law will give the federal government new power to gather precise, hard data about substances which may pose a threat to human health and the environment. Where the need presents itself, we want to be able to demand data about existing substances, and about substances that are still in the proposal stage.

Information about the way such substances are used and in what quantity, about their chemical, biological and toxicological properties, is all information on which we will want more data. We will know more about the persistence of these substances in the environment and about the rate and degree of dispersion in ecosystems. We will have a clearer picture of quantities in use. We will know more about concentrations in the food chain, and we will be in a better position to determine conditions of release and control measures.

We need this intelligence urgently. We need, for instance, to understand more about the impact on the environment of phenols and freons. We need to know more about the quantity of heavy metals being released into the environment, either deliberately or unknowingly. Polychlorinated biphenyls, the PCB's, are another worldwide question mark.

Mr. Benjamin: Explain.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I can give you a lecture on organic chemistry if you like, but this is not the time now.

Although we have no specific law, we have been able to deal with a certain number of these problems through co-operative efforts with the industries involved.

With this new legislation on the books, we can do a much more comprehensive job. Legislation already on the books has been aimed at abatement of direct contamination of either air or water, and has operated by controlling effluents from sources such as factory sewers and smokestacks. However, we have need of legislation that will enable us to deal with the reality that each year hundreds of new chemicals are introduced to the market place, and many may eventually appear in the environment. Although most are probably fairly harmless in the quantities, concentrations and conditions under which they presently enter the environment, there are and will be exceptions. Some need to be looked at much more searchingly. What this act does is to enable us to measure the risk in its totality.

Bill C-25 will give us an excellent new sensory system. We hope it will be an efficient tool. It will require that companies, at their own expense, perform tests and come up with information on the substances to be listed. Following evaluation of the data, the ministers of the environment and health, after consulting with the provincial governments involved and with other federal departments, would make the appropriate recommendations regarding manufacture, distribution, use and disposal of deleterious chemical substances.

The bill will be the perfect instrument for filling all gaps. Without going into fine detail let me say that it is firm but flexible, adapted to the delicate job of preserving the environment.

There is built-in protection against the pursuit of phantoms—of panic button pressing. This characteristic is an essential feature of sound environmental thinking.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. In accordance with Standing Order 40, a motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been made and seconded at this time. Therefore the question is: "That this House do now adjourn."

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Speaker, before we go into the adjournment debate, as I look over at the hon. parliamentary secretary it does not appear that he would need very much time to finish his remarks. If he would wish it I am sure we would be prepared to allow him to finish.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Thank you, Madam Speaker. I shall not abuse the time of the House, and shall just take three or four minutes to complete my remarks.

In the proposed Environmental Contaminants Act there are provisions for consultation. It calls for mandatory establishment of a board of review to hear objections to measures taken. This does not mean that we must wait the findings of the board before we can act. Emergency controls can be imposed where it seems warranted.

This government, from the beginning of its mandate, has been committed to a balanced view or concept of a healthy environment. The government's policies have been based on an assumption that the physical and economic aspects of the good life cannot be compartmentalized. There is no point in substituting poverty for pollution, particularly when it is entirely within our capacity to attenuate both. An unpolluted, resource-abundant environment, as the setting for meeting human need, is being sought. The vigour and innovativeness of our scientific and industrial sectors are among our most vital resources.

The bill has evolved in close consultation between government and industry. We know the industry agrees with us that this legislation is an idea whose time has come. Many sectors of industry have participated in the design of the legislation itself.

It is our view that it is much better to prevent environmental damage than to go around cleaning it up after it has occurred. We must not see economic and environmental imperatives as being in conflict.

Filtering out or treating pollutants that should not have been in the works to begin with—that is inefficiency. Cleaning up pollution after it has poured into air and water—that is inefficiency too, and very expensive. Trying to revive a valued endangered species when it reaches the very edge of extinction may be a vital task. But how much less painful, and less costly it would be if the problem had been seen from further up the road.

Cleanup does not come as cheap as prevention. We know that the imposition of abatement measures can be economically painful, that it can disrupt established industrial practices. We know that remedies, applied in an unco-ordinated way, can actually complicate the problem. Actions taken to control water pollution may conceivably generate air pollution. Or water pollution controls may metamorphose into a problem of sludge disposal.

Other nations are moving in the same direction—from the cure phase to the preventive. Japan, Sweden and the United Kingdom now have similar legislation, and the United States Congress is in the conference stage with its Toxic Substances Act. With the passage of the Environmental Contaminants Act Canada will have some of the most advanced legislation of its type in the world.

I wish to thank hon. members for their consideration in allowing me to finish my remarks, Madam Speaker.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—POSSIBLE CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN DEBATE AT UNITED NATIONS ON THE MIDDLE EAST—CANADIAN POSITION ON RIGHTS OF ISRAEL

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, in the short time available to me during the adjournment debate I wish to raise a matter which is of very grave concern to many Canadians.

Since the Canadian abstention from the vote relating to the Palestine Liberation Organization, legitimate concern has been expressed in this country as to whether there has been any serious change or alteration in the Canadian policy, which has always been that Israel has the right to exist within secure and recognized boundaries.

To clarify this situation to some degree I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) on November 12, as recorded on page 1223 of Hansard, whether Canada intended to take part in the debate in the United Nations or the Middle East and, if so, what would the Canadian position be? The minister replied:

> I believe that if and when Canada participates in the debate this will give the Canadian spokesman an opportunity to restate Canada's position in respect of the existence of Israel, and its right to exist within secure and recognized boundaries, as the foundation stone of our Canadian policy.

That, of course, is the Canadian position and we welcome the minister's statement. Nevertheless, the stated aims of the PLO give rise to a particular concern. The articles of the covenant of the Palestine Liberation Organization say as follows:

> ... Palestine with its boundaries that existed at the time of the British mandate is an integral regional unit.
> ... The Palestinian Arab people possesses the legal right to its homeland, and when the liberation of its homeland is completed it will exercise self-determination solely according to its own will and choice.

As most people know, Madam Speaker, at the time of the British mandate Palestine comprised the complete state of Israel within its present boundaries.

On June 8, 1974, the PLO made a statement. May I read the translated version, which says in part:

> The PLO is fighting by every means, and primarily by the armed struggle, to free the Palestinian land and establish a national, independent and fighting government over every part of the soil of Palestine to be freed.

Clearly, the aim of the PLO is to create a new state of Palestine which will extinguish the present, existing state of Israel.

On November 14 I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he had decided whether the Canadian delegation would take part in the debate at the United Nations. He answered, as recorded at page 1314 of Hansard:

> ... I think it is certain there will be a statement by a Canadian representative before the close of the debate. I am not sure when that statement will be made, but it will be made.

[Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo).]

That, I think, could be taken as a commitment, in the context of the question and that answer, that Canada indeed would take part in the debate on the Middle East, and that a representative would be making a statement. I point out also that the Secretary of State for External Affairs also indicated that matters I had raised would probably be dealt with then.

When we come to November 18, we face an extraordinary situation. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), answering the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), said, as recorded on page 1400 of Hansard:

> ... no official position on whether we would speak has as yet been made ...

I rose on a question of privilege and pointed out to the Prime Minister that his statement was completely inconsistent with the statement made a few days earlier by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Prime Minister graced me with a reply and said, as recorded at page 1401 of Hansard:

> It appears that it had been the intention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to have a statement made on behalf of the Canadian delegation, but it was not certain whether he would make it himself or have someone make it on his behalf. If the latter is to be the case, the minister proposes to make his statement in the House around the same time. These were the plans which were laid but they were not absolutely decided upon and it would depend on the nature of the statement itself. The intention was as the minister indicated, but I am not saying there will be no change.

I suggest that the government is involved in an extraordinary state of affairs at a time when the whole world is watching the Middle East.

My question tonight is simply this: Is Canada going to take part in that debate before the United Nations and make it clear to the whole world what Canada's policy has been, and is now, with respect to the continued right of the state of Israel to exist within secure and recognized boundaries which, as I have pointed out, is the antithesis of the aims of the PLO? That is the question I very much want answered tonight, and answered without any ambiguity.

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I wish to confirm the answers given to the hon. member on November 12 by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen). I have stated in this House on behalf of the minister, and the minister stated previously, Canada's policy with regard to the existence of Israel. That has not changed.

I wish to confirm to the hon. member that there will be Canadian participation in the United Nations debate at some point this week. The Canadian spokesman will restate Canada's position in respect of the existence of Israel and its right to exist within secure and recognized boundaries, as the foundation stone of Canadian policy.

AIR CANADA—PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF BASE AT WINNIPEG—DATE OF COMPLETION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on November 6 was based on a statement made by him during the election campaign in Winnipeg on May 23. The Prime Minister said that Air Canada would build a new maintenance hangar at Winnipeg, valued between $12 million and $15 million, to service its own aircraft as well as those of the Defence Department and some regional airlines. He said this would be begun immediately. It is almost six months since that time.

Questions repeatedly have been asked in this chamber of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) as to when the promised program would begin. To date, there has been no answer.

The question of an overhaul base at Winnipeg for Air Canada has concerned the people of Winnipeg and Manitoba for many years. Looking through the record, I find that my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in 1948, 26 years ago, asked the then Minister of Trade about rumours that Trans-Canada Airlines, as it was then called, was planning to move facilities of all types from Winnipeg, which was its headquarters, to Montreal. He was assured by the then Minister of Trade, the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, and the then president of the company that these things would not take place. Over the years, department after department was moved to Montreal.

It is not my intention to go over that whole story tonight. The point is that promises were made by the late Liberal Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson that the base would be continued. During the recent election campaign the Prime Minister stopped in Winnipeg on May 23, and made some very specific promises. He promised that a new maintenance hangar would be started in Winnipeg immediately. He stated that Winnipeg would get defence department overhaul work even before the overhaul base was completed. He said a decision had been made by the federal cabinet the previous week.

The Prime Minister further stated this would mean more than 300 additional jobs in Winnipeg aerospace industry, bringing employment in aircraft overhaul work to a minimum of 800 initially. On that occasion the Prime Minister was flanked by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) and the Liberal member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay).

He said that Air Canada would buy back the hangars sold to Canadian Aviation Electronics in September, 1969, when it closed its maintenance facilities and moved them to Montreal. He said further that Air Canada would immediately start to do major overhaul work on defence department Boeing 707 aircraft at the Winnipeg hangars, and would conduct a vigorous search for other overhaul work that could be performed there.

The Prime Minister emphasized that construction of the new facilities in Winnipeg would not take jobs away from Montreal, a fear that had been expressed in this parliament and in Montreal by various people. The Prime Minister siad; "We're making sure that both places will grow".

These are the promises that the Prime Minister made. I hope the Prime Minister meant what he said and that the overhaul base in Winnipeg will be re-established, will be expanded, and also there will be 800 jobs at Winnipeg. He also said that this would be done without jeopardizing the work now done in Montreal.

I am realistic enough to accept the fact that what has been done cannot be undone. But the fact is that the Montreal base, simply by virtue of the building on a new airport at Mirabel, will have to be expanded. There is no reason why there will not be more than enough work, from Air Canada and the defence department, to take care of all the people now working at Montreal and all those people whom the Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence promised would find work at Winnipeg. I remind the House that the promise was that the work would be begun immediately.

As I said a few moments ago, it is almost six months since the Prime Minister made that promise. Air Canada officials have said as recently as a week or ten days ago that they have no plans of this kind before 1979. Air Canada is a Crown corporation, and I am assuming it must be responsive to the wishes of the Prime Minister and his cabinet colleagues.

What I am asking tonight is that the government stop equivocating and trying to hide behind some kind of screen, for reasons I cannot understand. I ask the government to indicate tonight, not to me—what I think of the government is not very important—but to the people of Winnipeg when it will implement the pledges made by the Prime Minister when he visited Winnipeg during the height of the election campaign and made the statement he did on May 23, 1974.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, in answer to the points raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in his speech of May 23 did make commitments in relation to the Air Canada Winnipeg aircraft overhaul base. I had no knowledge until the hon. member just spoke that this base has had such a long political history.

The Prime Minister did state that Air Canada would construct a new hangar capable of handling all types of aircraft in the Air Canada fleet. He also said that, in co-operation with the government and people of Manitoba, the Canadian government intended to help expand employment at Winnipeg. The Prime Minister stated as well that the hoped for growth of employment in Winnipeg, as the result of the construction of that hangar, would not take place at the expense of employment at the Dorval overhaul base. Employment could be expected to grow at both points.

We do not have the exact date when the base will be completed and operating, but it will certainly be moved forward substantially from the original plan of 1979 as far as Air Canada is concerned. I point out that recent newspaper reports suggesting that Air Canada intends to delay the new Winnipeg hangar until 1979 are inaccurate.

A vice-president (maintenance) of Air Canada wrote a letter dated November 5 to the editor of the Winnipeg Free Press correcting the inaccuracies of that paper's November 2 article. In that letter Air Canada stated that the date of 1976, referred to in the newspaper's headline, applied to the establishment of a line maintenance hangar at Mirabel, and not at Winnipeg as the article seemed to indicate. The hangar will be needed at Mirabel, as the hon. member can appreciate, to handle the new aircraft there when the airport is opened. As for the Winnipeg line maintenance hangar, it has been planned by Air Canada for the future. The date has been moved back, but the date of construction is now being reviewed and will be announced very shortly.

NATIONAL CAPITAL—ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE TO STUDY FULLERTON REPORT—SUGGESTED CONSULTATION ON TERMS OF REFERENCE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Speaker, on November 5 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) certain questions in respect of the structure of the national capital as proposed in the Fullerton report, and basically how the final decision would be taken. I asked whether that decision, following the consideration of a report by a special joint committee proposed for the study, would be based merely on a statement or statute by the government of Canada, which in effect could be an imposition of a particular form of government in an area, or whether on the other hand it would be based on agreements which I believe would have to be obtained from the governments of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario and possibly, because there might be a constitutional amendment involved in respect of the designation of the capital of Canada as the city of Ottawa, other provinces. At that time the minister said the decision would be taken by the committee.

I think the matter must go beyond that. Surely the government would not see fit to operate in this very important sphere without at least the consensus I have mentioned. The importance of the question, not just to residents of the national capital, but as well to the people of Canada, can be drawn from the fact that the proposals set forth in the Fullerton report cover the power to tax, to borrow, to plan land use, the question of the administration of justice in any proposed national capital, representation, as well as the whole matter of education, which is a provincial field involving at least two provinces, and the matter of language and its applicability in the institutions of the area and in the educational system.

The matter goes even further than that. If the committee is to deal with the question of the national capital, where it would have to get into the whole matter of decentralization of the institutions of government, the government being the largest single employer, is it to be the thrust of federal government planning in this area to concentrate in the downtown core of Ottawa and perhaps Hull, or is it to be part of the policy of the government of the day to decentralize the institutions of government, bearing in mind the municipalities on the Ontario side outside the city of Ottawa which are capable of receiving government buildings, plants, laboratories and other facilities? This would all have a bearing on the assessments and would assist those municipalities.

All these things are of great concern. It is because of that concern and because this report may influence the decision, and may be implemented at least in part, that we ought to have an assurance now, not just for the people of this area, but for the people of Canada, that there will be no imposition upon the people in the area of any form of government without their consent on the one hand and without the consent of the provinces involved on the other.

Since I asked my question the Minister of State for Urban Affairs answered a question posed by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle).

As I read his answer to that question it seems that there would be no attempt to impose, that there would have to be a will to accept any form of government which might be recommended, and that will could be extended to include the will of the people in the area as well as the governments of the provinces concerned. I should like the assurance of the minister, or his parliamentary secretary, with regard to that point, which is the main point in the question I asked.

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member referred to the Fullerton report. I welcome the opportunity to say that I read it to the end, as well as Volume II which includes various appendices and special studies.

I would say I have a great deal of respect for the study. Mr. Douglas Fullerton is highly reputed. His report shows much insight and a full knowledge of the area, where he has been living for a number of years and of which he is fully cognizant. He also has a very good knowledge of various studies undertaken on bilingualism in the area, especially that by Mr. Weld which in my opinion is extremely comprehensive and shows that the area should reflect our dream for this country. I would tell the hon. member that even a fast reading of the Fullerton report indicates the only point on which there appears to be a consensus is that no single agency can model or shape the future of the area, without active support from and agreement with the other agencies concerned. I might say that the main function of the parliamentary committee shortly to be created will be to deal with the development of the capital city over the last 18 years, that is since its predecessor committee last met. The new committee's terms of reference would be to advise the federal government on various aspects of the problem, to determine how best to serve the interests of all Canadians, as well as those of residents in the area itself. To that end, nothing of course will prevent the committee from making its views known to other levels of government. Clearly, such a committee's terms of reference must include much more than the evaluating of Mr. Fullerton's propositions, that deal only with structures for government. The committee must look at the area's future, in the light of the propositions by the National Capital Commission on planning and the views of both regional agencies dealing with urban affairs in an area covering 90 per cent of the Region, an area outside direct federal jurisdiction and NCC planning.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:30 p.m.

By region in Canada, what was the strontium 90 level at the end of September of 1974, 1973, 1972 and 1971?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Strontium 90 levels in milk are determined each quarter on a composite of samples taken during the quarter. Levels, expressed in picocuries per litre, are given below for the 3rd quarters of 1971, 1972 and 1973, and for the 2nd quarter of 1974.

MOTOR VESSEL "NORTHERN SHELL"

Question No. 474—Mr. Forrestall:

1. With respect to the rescue of the Motor Vessel Shell, trapped in ice in Hudson Bay in September, October and November of 1972 (a) of what registry was the Shell (b) was it certified for ice operations and, if not, for what reason (c) were any non-Canadian tugs involved in the rescue and, if so, for what reason (d) what assistance and by what ships, if any, was given by the government to this ship (e) what was the cost of this assistance (f) was any damage done to Canadian ships in this operation and, if so, what was the amount of such damage (g) what was the nationality of the crew of this vessel (h) what damage was incurred by the Shell (i) what was the cargo carried by the Shell, what was its destination and what was its point of origin?

2. What winds and other weather factors were present when decisions were taken to the effect that no emergency existed?

3. What was the amount of user charges laid against the shipper or ship owner by Canadian authorities?

4. What is government policy with respect to such user charges?

5. What is the policy of other governments, such as that of the USSR, with Arctic coasts in terms of user charges?

6. Who would have paid for damages resulting from any oil spills that such entrapment might have caused?

7. Under what type of permit did this vessel enter Canadian waters?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Transport and National Revenue as follows: 1. There is no ship by the name of Shell in our records, but we assume that the question refers to the Northern Shell; (a) British (At present the ship is registered at Hamilton, Bermuda); (b) No. At the time the vessel sustained damage there was no regulatory requirement in force calling for mandatory ice-strengthening; (c) Yes, they were engaged by Shell Oil Canadian Tankers (1964) Ltd. We are informed that Canadian tugs were not available at that time; (d) The Northern Shell was assisted by the CCGS Norman McLeod Rogers, Labrador and the John A. Macdonald; (e) $25,000; (f) No; (g) Officers were Canadian; crew was Spanish; (h) She had suffered damage to her rudder; (i) Heating fuel and gasoline for Deception Bay from Montreal.

2. The Northern Shell was alongside the wharf at Deception Bay and weather conditions were not so severe as to constitute an emergency or rescue situation. However, temperatures were below freezing and the ice cover was such that it was urgent to tow the vessel out to open water to prevent her being trapped in ice all winter.

3. $25,000.

4. The policy is to charge for services which are beyond the normal services rendered by icebreakers to ships in ice. In this instance, the services included towing a vessel which was not in any danger at the time and this task was undertaken only because the tugs present were either not capable or willing to tow a vessel of that size in the ice conditions that existed at that place and time.

5. The current policy of other governments on user charges is not known. However, it is understood that some governments including that of the USSR charge for icebreaker assistance to commercial vessels.

6. The owners of Northern Shell.

7. A permit was not required at that time. The M/V Northern Shell, being a British built, British registry vessel, was entitled to engage in the coasting trade of Canada. This voyage was properly reported outwards at customs from Montreal for Deception Bay, on August 7, 1972.

TELEVISION STUDIO PRODUCTION FACILITIES IN FREDERICTON, N.B.

Question No. 503—Mr. Howie:

What plans, if any, exist for the development of television studio production facilities in Fredericton, New Brunswick to enable that capital city of the Province of New Brunswick to better disseminate provincial and local news and share its cultural and educational facilities with viewers in other parts of the Province and Canada?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation does not have, at present, any plans for further development of television studio production facilities in Fredericton, New Brunswick. In 1969 the CBC planned applications for an English language television system which would have involved, initially, a "mother" station to serve Saint-John—Fredericton, a rebroadcaster at Moncton, and eventual extension to the rest of New Brunswick, but the plan was turned down by the CRTC. An alternative for the CBC is to purchase one of the two privately-owned television operations in New Brunswick. There is no indication however that either of these operations is available for purchase.

CANDIDATES FOR POST OF SENIOR ASSISTANT DEPUTY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Question No. 514—Mr. Cossitt:

What are the names, the present and previous positions in the Public Service along with dates of same, of all persons who were considered for the position of Senior Assistant Deputy Minister of Transport prior to the announcement of the appointment of Mr. James Davey and, in each case, for what reason was the individual found unacceptable?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: In order to protect the privacy of individuals and to ensure that there is no contravention of the Bill of Rights, the Public Service Commission in its regulations under the Public Service Employment Act, holds in confidence information concerning candidates for positions for which the Commission has appointment authority, except that a candidate's own standing and results will be discussed with the candidate. In keeping with this long standing practice, and having regard for the right of privacy of candidates and the possibility that the release of such information could prove not only embarrassing but prejudicial to them, the Commission regrets that it is unable to provide the names of other candidates who were actively considered for the post of Senior Assistant Deputy Minister of Transport.

PAYMENT TO W. SCHULTHEIS, PROFESSIONAL HORSE TRAINER

Question No. 536—Mr. Schellenberger:

Is the Minister of National Health and Welfare aware that $75,000 is being paid by the government to a German professional horse trainer, Mr. W. Schultheis, to train three Canadian horses for dressage competition during the next three years in his native country and, if so, is such a payment compatible with Canadian amateur sport policy?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): While Mr. W. Schultheis is working with the Canadian dressage team, he is not being paid by the Canadian government.

REVISION OF CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

Question No. 540—Mr. Schellenberger:

Is consideration being given to revising the Canada Elections Act, Section 46(1) so that Canadian students who are studying in foreign countries might be allowed to vote by proxy?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Representations of this nature are normally considered by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. Both during the 1972 and 1974 elections, the Chief Electoral Officer has received correspondence from Canadian students who were studying at universities outside Canada in which they requested that they be given the privilege of voting by proxy and has informed correspondents that he would be pleased to lay their representations before that committee when it next sits, on the instructions of the House, to consider amendments to the Canada Elections Act if they would write him to that effect.

*CANADIAN PENITENTIARY SERVICE—DISMISSAL OF MR. GORDON SPENCE

Question No. 626—Mr. Fairweather:

2. Was Mr. Spence the victim of a physical attack by inmates of Dorchester Penitentiary on February 25, 1974?

3. How long has Mr. Spence been an employee of the Penitentiary Service?

4. On what date was Mr. Spence's pay stopped?

5. Has the Penitentiary Service in its possession medical evidence that Mr. Spence cannot return to his present position because of the February 25 beating?

6. What plans has the Penitentiary Service in hand to ensure that Mr. Spence obtains other employment in the Penitentiary Service or the Public Service generally?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): The answer to the question is as follows: 1. Mr. Gordon Spence was released under section 31 of the Public Service Employment Act for incapacity by the Public Service Commission on recommendation of the director, Dorchester penitentiary.

2. Yes.

3. Mr. Spence commenced employment with the Canadian Penitentiary Service on October 12, 1965.

4. Mr. Spence's sick leave credits were exhausted as of May 11, 1974, and on that date, he ceased to receive salary from the Canadian Penitentiary Service.

5. The Canadian Penitentiary Service has in its possession medical evidence, signed by Mr. Spence's personal physician and dated May 13, 1974, to the effect that Mr. Spence is unable to continue to work directly with inmates or in any job where he has contact with them.

6. In view of the medical evidence mentioned in part 5, the Canadian Penitentiary Service could not provide other employment for Mr. Spence. However, Mr. Spence's case was referred to the regional director of the Public Service Commission in Halifax. At this time, a committee composed of representatives from the Public Service Commission, the Department of National Health and Welfare, and the Canada Manpower Centre, is considering two alternatives for Mr. Spence: first, a medical pension; second, employment elsewhere within the public service.

Order Paper Questions

ESTABLISHED GENERAL CRITERIA FOR THE CONSTRUCTION OF TERMINAL FACILITIES—NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD PORTS

1. What are the established general criteria for the construction of terminal facilities which apply at the ports under the jurisdiction of the National Harbours Board, for each general type of port development so entertained?

2. Is the National Harbours Board the final decision making level in port development such as the Jacques Cartier and Halterm facilities or does the government and the Minister of Transport still retain final responsibility for final decisions in matters such as these?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. The general criteria for the construction of terminal facilities at ports are technical feasibility, economic justification, financial viability and environmental acceptability.

2. The total capital budget for the National Harbours Board is approved by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Minister of Transport, the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Finance. The individual projects are then separately approved by the Treasury Board and by the Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Transport, before funds are made available.

Question No. 642—Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier):

1. (a) Are negotiations in progress (b) are agreements anticipated concerning CBC television and radio productions, suitable for use in the field of education, but which, owing to copyrights, permits, retransmission rights and other reasons, are not available at present to provincial school councils?

2. Are studies being made on (a) the cost of buying back such rights (b) the possibility of free access to such productions by school councils (c) the means of distribution considered (d) the regulations dealing with such productions and, if so, will the Minister advise of the results?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. (a) No. (b) yes.

2. (a) Yes, although it will be a matter of acquiring rather than buying back such rights; (b) Various access arrangements for schools and other borrowers are being studied; (c) Yes; (d) Yes, if by regulations is meant conditions of use set out by CBC. I shall advise of the results of these studies when they are available.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CONTRACTS AWARDED TO LAPOINTE TRANSPORT LTD.

Question No. 653—Mr. Grafftey:

1. What transport contracts have been awarded by the Department of External Affairs to Lapointe Transport Ltd., 105 Industriel Blvd., Longueuil, Quebec, since January 1, 1972?

2. What was the amount of the contract in each case?

3. Were public tenders called in each case and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. None.

2. Not applicable.

3. Not applicable.

*UNICEF PROGRAM

Question No. 681—Mr. Fairweather:

Has Canada been asked to contribute to the UNICEF program of aid to children and mothers in the Indochina Peninsula and, if so, what has been Canada's response to this special appeal?

[Translation]

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Canada has received a request to contribute to this programme and the matter is still under consideration. However, CIDA has engaged UNICEF to implement on Canada's behalf a $500,000 bilateral health project in the Khmer Republic, one of the countries covered by UNICEF's special programme. The purpose of the bilateral project is similar to that of the UNICEF programme, in that it will provide medical supplies to a network of health clinics. In addition, Canada announced this month at the United Nations that, subject to Parliamentary approval, CIDA will contribute $3.5 million to UNICEF's general budget for fiscal year 1975-76. This is an increase of 40% over the 1974-75 contribution which, in turn, was 30% greater than the contribution made in 1973-74.

RCMP—MOTHER TONGUE OF SENIOR EXECUTIVE CATEGORY

Question No. 698—Mr. Jelinek:

1. What is the mother tongue of all officials in the senior executive category (equivalent to the SX category in the Public Service) in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

2. How many of the officials in the senior executive category make over $25,000 per year?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): 1. Of those 20 members of the R.C.M.P. equated to the SX categories of the Federal Public Service, there are: 14 whose mother tongue is English; 4 whose mother tongue is French; 1 whose mother tongue is Ukrainian; 1 whose mother tongue is Finnish.

2. All of the above.

1. For each of the past five years for which statistics are available, from which four countries did the majority of French speaking immigrants come?

2. How many immigrants came from each such country?

3. In each case, how many indicated they wished to settle in the Province of Quebec?

LIP—ALLOCATION OF PROJECTS

Question No. 230—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How many LIP projects were allocated to each federal constituency for the 1974-75 programs?

2. How much money was allocated to each federal constituency for the 1974-75 LIP programs?

Return tabled.

LIP—ALLOCATION OF FUNDS

Question No. 237—Mr. Beatty:

1. By constituency, what is the estimated rate of unemployment used in calculating LIP funds?

2. By constituency, how many dollars have been allocated under LIP?

Return tabled.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, before we proceed I should like to say that I inadvertently listed a question that was being answered today which, in fact, is not. I refer to question No. 67. I would like to withdraw it.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion for the production of papers No. 18 is acceptable to the government subject to the usual reservations concerning confidential documents and to the authorization of the government authorities concerned.

I ask that the other notices of motions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRADE

ALLEGATION CANADA WRECKED INTERNATIONAL SUGAR AGREEMENT—REASON FOR HIGH PRICE IN CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON NEW SUGAR AGREEMENT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of reports in the Financial Times of London in October 1973 which stated that Canada and Japan, the largest importers of sugar under the now defunct sugar agreement, formed an alliance at the 1973 conference in an attempt to keep prices at the lowest possible level—prices which would bankrupt smaller, underdeveloped countries which are dependent on their sugar exports—and also the moves by the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. to dissociate themselves from the stand taken by Canada and Japan, can the minister tell this House whether he is prepared to reconsider his statement in the House yesterday concerning the extent of Canadian involvement in what now appears to be the wrecking of the 1973 sugar agreement?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Murta: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Either the minister has been misinformed by his officials or he does not understand the gravity of the questions I am asking as he appears to be holding to his original position. May I now ask the minister, since Canada is one of the world's leading importers of sugar, if he can explain why sugar retails at the present time at some 49 cents per pound in Washington, approximately nine cents in Mexico and 69.8 cents in Ottawa?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that we have stayed in very close contact with the earlier negotiations and with the present situation. There are two working groups in which Canada will participate which have been established to consider stock policies and prices. As I indicated in my answer yesterday, I am not optimistic that there will be a new international sugar agreement at the present time because the producing countries have indicated it is not in their interests to go to the bargaining table.

Mr. Murta: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In this context, I think if the minister were to look at some of the events of that time he would find that Canada was a party to the breaking of the world sugar agreement. Since it appears that a new sugar agreement is likely by the end of 1974, may I ask the minister what the government's position is in regard to such an agreement and what prices are being considered?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, we have not taken any position on what the price should be. Quite clearly negotiations between consuming nations and producing nations involve a price which will ensure a reasonable return to producers and a stability of supply to consumers.

Oral Questions

FINANCE

EFFECT OF OIL REVENUES PLACED IN CAPITAL ACCOUNT IN DETERMINING EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS—POSITION OF COMMITMENT TO SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and arises from his budget statement that 30 per cent of provincial oil revenues will be taken into account when computing equalization payments. In view of the fact that on March 28, 1974 at page 934 of Hansard the Prime Minister said that all such additional oil revenues would not be taken into account in determining equalization payments providing those revenues were placed in a capital fund, I should like to ask the minister a direct question. If a province places all its additional oil revenues in a capital fund for resource development, will 30 per cent of that sum be used in determining the equalization formula for that particular province?

An hon. Member: Yes or no.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who put the question knows full well that a yes or no answer is not sufficient for his purpose.

Mr. Nielsen: Tell Gillespie that.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The understanding was that producing provinces in total would be putting about two-thirds of their additional revenues into capital funds—funds that would not thereby be eligible under the equalization formula—and that one-third of those funds in total would enter consolidated revenue funds and thus enter into the equalization. Under the proposal I am putting to the provincial ministers of finance on December 9 and 10, only one-third of additional revenues from oil and gas deriving from the international situation and recent price rises would be taken into the formula. Then, what any particular province does with its own fund would be irrelevant.

● (1420)

Mr. Broadbent: The answer is yes, then.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the Prime Minister on March 28 said specifically that Saskatchewan intended to put practically all its additional funds into a capital account which would not be subject to equalization, and as Saskatchewan has set up a fund and put all its additional money into that capital account, does the Minister of Finance, in the budget, now propose to abrogate the commitment which the Prime Minister made to this House and to the producing provinces?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Sir, I think the commitment was set forth clearly in the budget speech. The provinces will want to examine the proposal. Undoubtedly, Saskatchewan will bring its own representations to the table on December 9 and 10.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

APPLICABILITY OF DEDUCTIBILITY PROVISION FOR OIL AND GAS REVENUES TO NON-RENEWABLE RESOURCES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance a final supplementary question about the deductibility of royalties, taxes and like payments made to provincial governments. Will this deductibility provision apply only to revenues from oil, gas and minerals, or will it also apply to royalties from renewable resources? Will it apply to stumpage dues, for instance, and timber royalties?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will have to go into the ways and means motion, to see how it is drafted. In principle, we are talking about mineral resources and oil and gas revenues. If, of course, stumpage dues were to be converted from a flat, classical type of royalty payment into a disguised tax, we would need to look at that as well.

Mr. Horner: And the same would apply to asbestos.

SALE OF CANADIAN SHARES ON INTERNATIONAL MARKET—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Is he aware that a World Bank report published this week and titled Borrowing in International Capital Markets says that out of a total $1,451 million in foreign bonds sold on major international capital markets during the third quarter of this year, $336 million or 37 per cent were sold by Canadian groups and if yes, could he tell us whether he considers the situation as normal and favourable to Canada's economic development?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): The hon. member might allow me to read the report and answer later.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Could the minister say whether he intends to seek early approval for measures which will allow governments and industries in Canada to find here the financial means for a normal development?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I think, Mr. Speaker, that we still have some means.

AGRICULTURE

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUGAR POLICY—POSSIBLE INCLUSION OF SUGAR BEET INDUSTRY

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In the past month there have been repeated references to a forthcoming sugar policy. Is the minister prepared to make an announcement now as to the date when the government will announce its sugar policy?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Darling: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the new sugar policy include the establishment of regulations for a Canadian sugar beet industry? What type of guarantee will the minister give to sugar beet farmers which will protect them from loss, should the commodity price of sugar on the world market drop?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, there have been past programs of aid to the sugar beet producer. I am sure if such a policy were to be adopted by the government we would make sure that it would be adopted again.

INCOME TAX

DEDUCTIBILITY OF ONTARIO LAND SPECULATION TAX AS BUSINESS EXPENSE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. After nine months of trying to evoke some sort of positive response from the minister, I wonder whether he is now in a position to indicate to the House and the people of Ontario whether payments made under the Ontario land speculation tax will be deductible as a business expense under the Income Tax Act and related statutes.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, has a legal opinion to the effect it is not deductible, and I will make clear to the minister of revenue of the province of Ontario and the provincial treasurer that, in policy terms, it is not deductible for the same reason that other provincial taxes are not deductible.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, is it in order for me to ask the Minister of Finance to very briefly explain why?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SURVEILLANCE FLIGHTS OVER THE PACIFIC—USE OF NAVAL UNITS TO PROTECT FISHERIES RESOURCES

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. In reply to a question yesterday, the minister said that flights to the north had been curtailed. Have the same restrictions been applied to the operations of Maritime Command Pacific? Also, when were the last Tracker training and Argus surveillance flights over the Pacific and when is the next one scheduled?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as I said to the House yesterday, the flights over the Atlantic have been reduced. They have been reduced to the same degree in the Pacific area, but they are continuing on a regular basis. There are flights to the north from Comox in the Pacific area as well as from the Atlantic area. Flights will be continuing to the north, although not the same number.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Has the minister received any representations urging that Canadian naval units stationed on the west coast be assigned surveillance duties in the Pacific to preserve our fisheries resources there against encroachment from foreign fishing vessels?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I have had no recent representations because they are already doing a good job.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the cabinet is reportedly meeting at the summer palace at Meach Lake to watch the Grey Cup game this weekend, and there is no doubt the Edmonton Eskimos will win—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: —is the Prime Minister assigning the kick-off duties to his wife and if not, why not?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should inform the hon. member that he is wrong as usual. The cabinet is meeting on Saturday and the game is on Sunday. Insofar as the kick-off is concerned, I will invite the hon. member to lie down and I'll invite my wife to give him a good kick.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GRAIN

WHEAT—REASON FOR DELAY IN SENDING CHEQUES TO ONTARIO PRODUCERS

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Why have government cheques in the amount of some $10 million not yet been received by the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board for its 15,000 wheat producers for the 1973 wheat crop?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I understand these were held up because of some technicalities; however, they are ready to go soon.

Mr. Wise: Because of the importance and urgency of this matter, I ask the minister to give a definite commitment to this House that he will immediately investigate this matter in an effort to get these long over-due cheques in the hands of Ontario wheat producers.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, some of the documents I have been reading here are about this. Therefore, I have received a report.

Oral Questions

MULTICULTURALISM

REPORT RECOMMENDING FEDERAL SUPPORT FOR THIRD LANGUAGE TRAINING IN SCHOOL SYSTEMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the minister responsible for multiculturalism. As the minister has now had an opportunity to review the interim report of the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism, can he inform the House whether he supports the principle of federal government involvement and support for a third language education in the school systems and whether he intends to implement this recommendation?

● (1430)

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the manner in which the question was asked leads me to reply that this is an area of provincial jurisdiction, as he is no doubt aware. If the hon. member is really asking whether we are prepared to encourage the acquisition of greater linguistic ability by all Canadians in speaking and understanding languages other than the two official languages, the answer is, yes. To this degree we already support that principle through the grant structure.

As to the recommendations of the report the hon. member mentioned, I would point out that to date there has been only one regional meeting and one executive meeting. The council itself will be meeting later to consider the report about the middle of December and I shall be happy to keep the hon. member informed about the progress made.

REPORT RECOMMENDING FEDERAL SUPPORT FOR THIRD LANGUAGE BROADCASTING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): The recommendations concerning federal government involvement in education are quite specific, but I shall not pursue the matter now; the hon. gentleman will have a chance to read the report himself. I should like to ask him a question with reference to one other recommendation which is considered to be very important by ethnic groups. What is the government's position with regard to third language broadcasting on the CBC radio and television network? Does the minister intend to support this particular recommendation and implement it in the near future?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): The hon. member may not fully appreciate the way this process is going. I must repeat that the entire council, to which the report is being made, has not yet met to consider the matter. The council will meet to consider it and make recommendations and give advice to me, based on that report, at some time in mid-December. After I have received those recommendations, depending on what the council's advice may be, representations to the CBC may be in order. But I cannot prejudge the matter at this time.

HOUSING

AVAILABILITY OF FIVE HUNDRED DOLLAR GRANT TO OWNER CONSTRUCTED RESIDENCES AND MOBILE HOMES

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Can he tell the House whether or not the $500 grant offered first-time purchasers of a new home between November 1, 1974 and November 1, 1975, also applies to those who are building their own homes?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. This applies to those who own their own homes and to those who were in the process of building their own homes before November 1, provided occupancy took place after that.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

With regard to the $500 grant, will the owners of mobile homes also be able to benefit from that subsidy?

[English]

Mr. Danson: It applies to mobile homes if they are considered a principal residence and are of a permanent nature. It does not apply to recreational vehicles but if it is a principal residence of a home-owner and of a permanent nature, it would apply.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED FIFTY MILLION DOLLAR LOAN TO SOUTH VIET NAM—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question was intended for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since he is not in the House I should like to put it to the Prime Minister. My colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster, asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question in the External Affairs Committee about a meeting held in Paris on October 17 of the World Bank and the Asian Development Bank which discussed a United States aid proposal for providing funds of the order of $50 million to the Saigon government in South Viet Nam. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that Canada had made no commitment. Yet on the morning of October 19 Le Monde reported that Canada had in fact supported the American proposal. I now ask the Prime Minister whether Canada, either implicity or tacitly, supported the proposal or any variation of it.

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): I will take the question as notice and make sure the hon. member gets a response.

Mr. Brewin: Would the parliamentary secretary also take this question as notice: is the proposal still under discussion and what is Canada's attitude toward it?

Mr. Breau: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE UNITED STATES SUPERTANKERS USING COASTAL WATERS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA WILL HAVE DOUBLE BOTTOMS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Since the Department of Transport is responsible for cleaning up oil spills and since surveys indicate that oil spills could have been avoided in 73 per cent of the accidents and 92 per cent of the groundings if the tankers had double bottoms, is the Department of Transport, together with the Department of External Affairs, carrying on any negotiations with the United States government to ensure that the supertankers coming from Valdez will have double bottoms, thus providing greater safety for the coastal waters of British Columbia?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the problem of pollution, we are working in close co-operation especially with the Department of the Environment. We have signed agreements with the Americans to fight oil pollution on our common boundary. As for the technique which consists in using double-bottomed vessels to better protect the environment, it has not yet been fully developed; we are following its progress very closely, but I believe that Canada is one of the most advanced countries in the world in that field.

[English]

Mr. Friesen: Recognizing the extreme vulnerability of the waters around British Columbia, will the minister undertake to pursue this matter aggressively and negotiate agreement with the U.S. government that the supertankers be double-bottomed?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, until the technology is perfected and it is economically feasible, it will be difficult to put this as a condition.

[English]

What we are doing now with the Americans is to have a formal agreement and help each other each time there is a spill.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—MINISTER'S DISCUSSIONS WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF CHRYSLER CONCERNING EFFECT OF CLOSURE OF UNITED STATES PLANTS ON CANADIAN OPERATIONS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce arising from the recent announcement by Chrysler Corporation in the United States that five of its six car assembly plants are to close, with the consequent lay-off of some 63,000 workers, or about 70 per cent of the company's total U.S. work force. Will the minister tell us whether he has been in consultation with representatives of the Chrysler Corporation and whether the American shut-downs will have any effect on the Corporation's Canadian plant? If he has held such meetings, can he now report to the House?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have had meetings with senior officials of the Chrysler Corporation. There is undoubtedly a very serious situation in the United States automobile market and sooner or later that situation will overlap into Canada. So far, we have been reasonably fortunate. It is still premature to say whether or not there will be any effect on the Chrysler operation in Canada but there is a good chance there may be some change.

Mr. Alexander: I don't know what the minister means by "sooner or later". Can we take it, if there is a possibility that the spill-over will affect Canada, that the minister will discuss this question with the Minister of Manpower to see to it that the impact on Canadian workers in the industry is minimized? In other words, will he see to it that they can be directed to some other industry?

Mr. Gillespie: There is very close consultation between myself and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

EFFORTS OF MINISTER TO GET CANADIAN MANUFACTURERS TO REDUCE PRICES TO UNITED STATES LEVEL

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Considering the fact that approximately 75 per cent of all vehicles produced in Canada are exported to the United States, and considering the related fact that sales in the United States have dropped off now by about 30 per cent, will the minister inform the House what steps he has taken recently, vis-à-vis the manufacturers in Canada, to get them to bring their prices into line with the United States prices so they might increase their sales within Canada, which could help compensate for the inevitable falloff that will occur as a result of the falloff now taking place in the United States that will affect production here?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right when he says the Canadian market has helped compensate for the drastic reduction in the United States market. Perhaps part of the reason is that the price differential has been narrowing. I can assure him that I have on a regular basis made it very clear to the presidents of Canadian manufacturing companies that we expect that price level to keep narrowing. I have studied the recent trend and I am satisfied it is continuing.

ENERGY

DATE OF PUBLICATION OF REPORT ON RESERVES

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources stated last week in this House that he sent a copy of the National Energy Board report to the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, would he now inform the House whether he has had a reply from those provinces, and is it the intention of the government to make that report public as soon as possible to facilitate members of this House during the budget debate?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have had a reply from the minister of mines and minerals of Alberta asking that the report be made public. The minister for Alberta expressed no opinion with regard to the substance of it, and apparently any level of exports from Canada would be acceptable to him. Taking that into account, I will be making recommendations to my colleagues and I expect the report will be made available in the very near future.

ALLEGED REPUDIATION OF AGREEMENT ON OIL PRICES BY PREMIER OF ALBERTA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the statement made budget night by the premier of Alberta that he is no longer considering the March accord on petroleum to be in effect, will he say whether he has been in touch with the premier of Alberta, and will he be calling a meeting of the first ministers or taking any other steps right away so the new energy uncertainties can be resolved?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should remind the House that when we met several weeks ago the premiers agreed that we would be meeting in May, presumably to talk about—

An hon. Member: May! That's too late.

Mr. Trudeau: —in May to envisage the accord, which would have to intervene after July 1. As far as we are concerned, the situation has not changed. If the premier of Alberta takes certain steps which make the accord that was reached last March inapplicable, perhaps we will be thinking of some further steps.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of this, and the fact that the indication is that the price of crude may go up prior to the date that was set in March, would the Prime Minister consider taking urgent steps to talk with that premier and arrange some earlier meeting of the first ministers?

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Mr. Trudeau: There was an agreement reached between all parties, and as far as I know—

An hon. Member: You broke it.

Mr. Trudeau: As far as I know, the premier of Alberta has indicated he might not consider himself bound by that agreement. I understand that later he indicated he might feel himself bound over the winter. I think it would perhaps be incumbent on the premier to contact myself and other premiers if he feels he is not going to be bound by the agreement that was reached.

HEALTH

ALLEGED SALE OF CONTAMINATED CANNED PET FOOD—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare who is attending the dominion-provincial conference, I would direct my question to his parliamentary secretary, and I would suggest it is perhaps more important if less exciting than the last one I asked. The question is prompted by comments of officers of the Consumers Association of Canada and other responsible people to the effect that contaminated and unfit products are being canned as pet food, and that the health of a number of Canadians has been jeopardized from contact with affected pets, and regretfully in some cases of impoverished Canadians by direct consumption of pet food. Could he advise whether the department is or will undertake an investigation of this very serious health hazard?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will take note of the hon. member's question.

FISHERIES

POSSIBLE CHANGES IN HERRING QUOTAS UNDER ICNAF—ADHERENCE OF SOVIET UNION TO QUOTAS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of State (Fisheries) advise the House that on the basis of reports from the ICNAF conference in Florida last week the subject of herring quotas in the George's Bank area was discussed and, if so, would he advise whether any changes were made on the agreed quotas as related to herring and other quotas?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to be patient until tomorrow as I am meeting with officials who return later this afternoon to get a full briefing. I know that this subject matter, which is of urgent concern generally to Canadians, and particularly to Canadian fishermen, will be coming up at the January meeting. There was some discussion in the area of herring and I would not want to mislead the hon. member by answering until I have been fully briefed.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, would the minister take up at that meeting the fact that last year the Soviet Union over-fished their quotas by several metric tons, and the fact that his predecessor requested them to stop fishing off Georges Bank? At the same time, is the minister able to advise the House as to the results of that request to the Soviet Union, and will he take this up, or will those Soviet fishermen continue to violate the quotas agreed upon by ICNAF?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, the delegation had instructions to be very firm on this very question in respect of ICNAF regulations. I will have to wait for a full briefing from my officials to know what took place.

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO ENSURE ICNAF QUOTAS ENFORCED

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the announcement by the Minister of National Defence that surveillance flights by national defence aircraft have been reduced considerably, thereby reducing our supervisory or enforcement capability, I should like to ask what alternative steps the minister is taking in order to insure that Canada is in a position to adequately enforce ICNAF regulations in respect of herring and other quotas off our east coast?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, surveillance was not only carried out by plane but also by ships and that part of the operation is still continuing. Surveillance flights have been reduced but have not been curtailed in full. The regional director for the Atlantic area is on his way to Ottawa and I want to have a further meeting with him.

EFFORTS TO ENCOURAGE COUNTRIES TO BECOME MEMBERS OF ICNAF

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, would the minister of fisheries indicate if any further steps have been taken recently to encourage nations which are not now members of ICNAF to become members of this association so that over-fishing on our continental shelf can be more fully controlled?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I know of no formal steps that have been taken in this direction, but I will inquire.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST THAT BAIL BE DENIED THOSE TRAFFICKING IN HEROIN AND THAT PROSECUTIONS BE RESPONSIBILITY OF PROVINCE

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, in view of the serious heroin problem in Canada, particularly in the province of British Columbia, will the Minister of Justice consider bringing in legislation that would, on a temporary basis, not allow bail for those arrested for heroin trafficking?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be unfortunate in respect of any crime to treat someone accused as convicted. There are, of course, important considerations in respect of bail legislation having regard to a series of crimes; the likelihood of a person accused showing at his trial being one, and judges have a good deal of discretion in this regard. I would note in passing that we might be very grateful at the success investigating officers are having at this point in time in breaking up a series of drug trafficking rings, and that certainly will allow us to make a good deal of progress.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that trials are taking so long in the province of British Columbia, would the minister consider turning over all prosecutions for heroin trafficking to the government of British Columbia?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I do not see how that would in any way facilitate the speed with which trials are taking place. Certainly, in the most serious cases we have always proceeded by way of direct indictment so as to be sure that in fact the trial can be as expeditious as possible.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REMOVAL OF NORTHERN PAY ALLOWANCES—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board.

Following the announcement of the abolition of special allowances for federal civil servants posted on the north shore, does the President of the Treasury Board know that, since eight o'clock this morning, certain federal services are completely paralysed in that area and, if he does, could he tell this House what steps he intends to take to correct this situation which has tragic consequences for the whole population of that area?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I know that a number of employees have walked out on their jobs in that area this morning. I must inform the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, that the decision to abolish these allowances had been taken jointly with the union representatives of those employees when we reached an understanding on certain norms during the reevaluation session. With these new standards, this area is no longer qualified for these allowances, as is the case with several other areas which are in the same situation in Canada. It is not a unilateral decision taken by the government, it is rather a decision that was taken jointly with the union representatives and the national union representatives have not approached me on this subject.

DATE OF COMPLETION OF REVIEW OF STABILIZATION PRICES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Some time ago, answering a question I asked him concerning the support price of farm products, the minister said his officers were reviewing the standards of the Farm Prices Stabilization Board. In view of the producers' concern and in order to reassure them, can the minister tell the House whether that study is over and whether he is now in a position to make a statement to the House on that matter.

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, so far as I know the review is not complete so I am not ready to give the hon. member an answer to any other question.

GRAIN

WHEAT—ALLEGED AGREEMENT WITH ONTARIO PRODUCERS CONCERNING ALLOWANCE FOR INCREASED COST OF PRODUCTION

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the officials of the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board advised a number of members of parliament yesterday that they believed they had had an agreement with the minister as late as February 12, I believe to the effect that there would be a provision in legislation to make allowances for increased cost of production, in other words an indexing in the legislation of two-price wheat, I should like to ask the minister if that is his view as well that there was an agreement and commitment from the minister. If so, could he explain why such provision is not in the legislation brought forward by the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the statements I made and the letter I sent to the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board on February 11, 1973 do not say that. Nothing at all is said about indexing in the letter I wrote to them at that time.

Mr. Benjamin: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that those same officials said that as a result of their discussions with the minister they believed and understood the minister was prepared to do this, I should like to ask the minister whether he had discussions with the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board and whether he made any effort to persuade that minister to incorporate an item in the legislation which many members on all sides of this House want to have.

Mr. Whelan: The legislation to which the hon. member refers deals only with the subsidy and not those other topics we are talking about at the present time.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

TRANSPORT

SUGGESTED POSTPONEMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION OF TOWBOAT REGULATIONS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the B.C. Towboat Owners Association has sent a telegram to all members of parliament from British Columbia wherein they have expressed their concern that the new navigation practices and procedures regulations and other regulations will create an impossible situation in the towboat industry, will the minister give consideration to postponing implementation of these regulations until a full representation has been made by this industry.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, at this moment we are revising the regulations so that there is not only security but so that more tugboats are covered by the regulations.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RECOMMENDATION TO CABINET OF SOLICITOR GENERAL ON SENTENCE OF TWO MURDERERS OF POLICEMAN

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General because he is the minister who introduced the bill to retain the provision of capital punishment in the case of the murder of police officers. Since the Solicitor General is responsible for the safety of members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, in view of the recent verdict of guilty by a Supreme Court jury of two men who murdered an RCMP officer, will the minister advise what his recommendation will be to cabinet regarding the sentence handed down by this jury which met to consider a recommendation of clemency and refused to recommend such clemency.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, as the Solicitor General does not choose to answer the last question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Solicitor General was not given an opportunity to answer the question because the question was not in order. To ask the Solicitor General to anticipate what his answer will be when a matter comes before him in the future surely is not a proper question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I apologize to the Solicitor General. I did not hear Your Honour rule the question out of order.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST THAT PROGRAMS BE EXTENDED TO YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Since he administers a department which is set up for the purpose of eliminating regional and economic disparities in all parts of Canada under federal legislation, I wonder whether he can inform the House when he will make the Canadian legislation applicable to all parts of Canada by implementing programs in the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should recall that we discussed this matter on a number of occasions. The predecessor to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and I had lengthy discussions on this subject. The objective was to have the same kind of assistance rendered in the territories as in the provinces. I have not, however, had such a discussion with the present minister but undertake to do so. Although it may not be under the DREE program we will try to level it out in terms of both parts of the country, if you wish to put it that way.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONFINEMENT OF VALENTYN MOROZ BY SOVIET AUTHORITIES—REQUEST PRIME MINISTER INTERVENE—SUGGESTED EXAMINATION BY GROUP OF IMPARTIAL PHYSICIANS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. It has to do with the incarceration of Valentyn Moroz. Having regard to the latest representations made to this government and to all members of parliament by the committee on defence of Valentyn Moroz together with the assertion that the information communicated by the Soviet Foreign Minister to the Secretary of State for External Affairs is either false or outdated, might I ask the Prime Minister if he is now prepared to intervene personally and make representations to the Soviet Union to determine accurately the medical condition of Valentyn Moroz.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member remembers the answer given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs a very short while ago. He is asking that I review representations which I have made at the highest level, the level of Premier Kosygin and the level of the ambassador. Quite frankly I have no reason to believe any new statement by me would bring any different reaction than I received in the past. I would like to know if the hon. member has some reason to expect things would change.

Mr. Mazankowski: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the conflicting statements, I wonder whether the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs have considered approaching the Soviet authorities with a view to requesting that Mr. Moroz be examined by an independent and impartial group of physicians to accurately determine the state of Mr. Moroz's condition since the committee in defence of Mr. Moroz suggests that he might not be expected to live beyond the end of this year.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe this has been envisaged by the government, and I would have some hesitation in endorsing that course of action. It is really tantamount to indicating that we have no confidence in the Soviet government in respect of its word, and if we say that there is no reason to believe they would be any more generous to us if they think we do not have confidence in them.

TRADE

ALLEGED INTENTION OF WESTERN PROVINCES TO SEND TRADE MISSIONS ABROAD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): My question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The minister is aware of the meetings which took place in the past week and up to the last weekend of the industry ministers of the four western provinces. Having regard to the joint communique issued by the industry ministers of the four western provinces following their meeting last week in Winnipeg in which concern and dissatisfaction was expressed with respect to federal policies concerning the west and announcing the intention of the western provinces to embark on a number of joint promotion and development activities, including the dispatching of trade missions outside of Canada, is the minister prepared to take steps with respect to his trade commissioners' service which apparently is failing to meet the needs and aspirations of western Canadians, according to the ministers, so that the unnecessary duplication and additional burden to taxpayers can be avoided?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on the first point, I want to make it clear that we are trying to assist the western provinces to realize all their aspirations for both trade and industrial development. I have had a number of discussions with them as recently as today on just that point.

The second point I want to make is that in the past some of the provinces have set up trade missions abroad for their own purposes. I am not sure that they proved to be fully satisfactory. However, that is a decision which they alone will want to make.

As to the other kinds of trade missions, that is to say the kind where they would pay a visit to another country, we will do everything we can to assist them in those missions so that they can make the best use of their time.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

DISSATISFACTION OF WESTERN PROVINCES WITH THEIR SHARE OF FEDERAL PURCHASES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. Having regard to the concern and dissatisfaction expressed by western industry ministers with respect to western Canada's share of federal purchasing dollars, is the minister prepared to take immediate steps to direct his department to deal with western Canadian suppliers on an equitable basis as opposed to its apparent current discriminatory practices?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, if there is discrimination these days, it is in favour of the west. I spent the weekend in Vancouver, where I met with businessmen and inaugurated a regional supply centre on the Pacific coast. On December 6, I shall go to Manitoba to announce the opening of an exhibition where the federal and provincial governments in close cooperation, will indicate to businessmen how to do business with the federal government and what possibilities are offered them. Therefore, I can say that the west is certainly in a position to do business with the federal government, and increasingly so with the same opportunities as in the rest of the country. That is the government's policy.

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF PROVINCIAL CROWN CORPORATIONS TO EXPLOIT OIL AND GAS—DIFFERENCE IN TREATMENT AS COMPARED WITH HYDRO CORPORATIONS

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's statement that he would not look favourably on provincial governments having provincial Crown corporations exploiting oil and gas to escape federal taxes, could the minister explain in what manner these corporations would differ from provincial hydro corporations and similar utilities?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): The question is still hopefully hypothetical.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ARRANGEMENTS TO IMPLEMENT COMMITMENT OF FOOD TO NEEDY COUNTRIES

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Bearing in mind that Canada made a commitment at the world food conference for one million tons of food for three years starting next year, may I ask the minister what is the earliest month in 1975 in which that food will be sent, what countries will receive that food, what transportation plans are being made, and will these plans be in a sufficient state of preparation to be announced at the November 29 meeting of ministers?

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the many questions asked by the hon. member, I am sure he and the House are aware of the fact that Canada made a commitment. I will be making a more detailed statement tomorrow, and I hope that some of these questions will be answered at that time in more detail.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBLE CHANGE IN PRIORITIES OF ROLES OF FORCES—ALLEGED LACK OF PATROLS IN ARCTIC

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that the government's white paper on defence set as a top priority that there will be surveillance of our own territory and coastlines, and this was confirmed by the Minister of National Defence as recently as October 15 in the debate on the Speech from the Throne when he said:

> Our first task and our central responsibility are nothing less than to defend Canadian independence and sovereignty.

—can the Prime Minister tell the House whether the priorities in defence have changed in view of the admission by the Minister of National Defence yesterday that all coastal patrols on both the east and the west coasts have been substantially reduced and at that time—meaning yesterday—there were no patrols in the Arctic and none contemplated? Can the Prime Minister answer the question, keeping in mind that the other three priorities set out in the white paper, that is NATO, NORAD and peacekeeping, have had no cutbacks?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, the priorities have not changed. The government is doing the best it can within its budgetary limitations to fulfill these priorities in the order that has been stated by the minister.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put my next question to the Prime Minister but I think I will put it to the Minister of National Defence. In the light of today's report that Soviet and American armed forces are encroaching on and over Canadian territory in the north, would the minister advise the House what action his department is taking to police, patrol and protect Canadian territory in the high Arctic? At the same time, and with your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, would he clarify the answer he gave to the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich when he said that there were flights in the north, having admitted yesterday that there were none and that none were contemplated?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): I did not say yesterday that no flights were contemplated. I said very clearly that patrols were continuing on a regular basis but at a reduced level. I said yesterday that I did not know the date of the next high Arctic flight. I can report today that there will be flights next month and in the following month. They are continuing on a reduced but regular basis into the high Arctic.

On the hon. member's question concerning the report this morning by the CBC, I can confirm to the House that to the best of my knowledge no Soviet aircraft are flying in Canadian air space or have been flying in Canadian air space.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I will make this a very direct supplementary question. In view of the fact that there have been no Arctic flights of the Maritime command either from Comox or any of the Maritime command bases in Canada in September, or October or until this time in November and yet the minister said yesterday, as recorded at page 1443 of Hansard:

. . . no date has been set for the next flight to the north.

—how can the minister say with such assurance that in effect there is no encroachment either from the sky or from the water?

Mr. Richardson: The hon. member should know that it is not reconnaissance flights that identify foreign aircraft, but rather the radar screen and our interceptory aircraft, which are working at full capacity and have not been reduced in any way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Monday, November 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on Monday evening I referred to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) as being an over achiever when it comes to inflation. But I want to be fair to him and I want to say that he is not the only over achiever in the government. We must consider the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). He has certainly done his share. In fact he has done so well that he seems to have acquired some delusions of grandeur because he now refers to himself in the third person. The minister keeps saying that we on this side of the House are trying to destroy him because he won the election. I thought he might have given some credit to his leader. But seriously, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether he really believes he could have won that election without my help.

● (1510)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Then there is the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson).

An hon. Member: The Winnipeg Kid!

Mr. Stanfield: Here we have a pleasant, modest man who has demoralized the armed forces without even trying. The minister has told us that in the course of this debate he will not be able to say just what his forces will be doing in the future. He tells us not to worry about it, however, because he has just opened a canteen for the armed forces in the Near East. There is no question about the minister's proven ability when it comes to opening up a mess.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The problem from time to time with some messes is how to close them down and keep them closed. The Minister of National Defence is still sitting there with his own mess. I hope he can tell us soon just how he plans to manage it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Stanfield: The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) is not here now and as we know he is responsible for an important sector of our economy. He is a charming and amusing man but one who simply does not know whether he is going or coming. For a Minister of Transport it is rather disturbing. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) is also absent. He stands as the top travelling salesman of the government and accepts the invitation of a kind and cordial friend and takes off for Israel. He saved the government a substantial expense, but however he may look for all sorts of explanations to hide his action, his guilt remains nevertheless obvious. The minister reminds me of someone caught in the buff holding a trembling leaf the better to hide his honour.

[English]

I suggest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) the other day that he should consider asking the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) for his resignation for those operations. After the exchange that took place between the Prime Minister and myself yesterday I recognize that we have substantial differences of view with regard to conflict of interest and propriety particularly as they relate to the spouses of members of the government. Sir, I have to ask myself, and I say this in all sincerity, if I had the responsibility of being Prime Minister of this country how could I rebuke one of my ministers for borrowing a flight to Israel from a friend in Canada when I did not take any objection at all to my wife accepting a larger travel gift? It is not a question of me, or anybody else, thinking that such a thing would affect any future decisions of my making if I were Prime Minister—

Mr. Boulanger: You will never be Prime Minister!

Mr. Stanfield: —or that it would affect in any way any decision that the present Prime Minister will make. That is not the point.

Mr. Caccia: Deal with the budget.

Mr. Stanfield: I say, Sir, that if it is O.K. for those at the top it will be regarded as O.K. by ministers and all public employees throughout the government service.

An hon. Member: That's right!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I do not think it is O.K.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The budget paid lip service to public confidence, seeking a consensus, and seeking self-restraint from Canadians. But how do you achieve the consensus? How do you achieve these things if Canadians do not know if they can trust you? Trust is a very fragile thing and it can be wiped out in many ways.

The Minister of Finance is fond of saying that he always comes clean with the House and the people of Canada. I certainly would not accuse him of any deliberate misrepresentation with regard to his revenue forecast. The minister has a short term forecasting capability, about the same as that of the crew on the Titanic.

Mr. Nielsen: With the same result.

Mr. Stanfield: I hope the results are not as serious. In less than six months he has had an enormous turn around in current revenue expectations and predictions. He is literally swimming in tax revenues because of the effect of two figure inflation on incomes, so that even with his one year lag indexing in effect he is just swimming in additional moneys. The minister repeated the other night that he has always been frank with the House and the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: We all recall, even some of my friends down there who are trying to make their presence known today, how this minister introduced indexing, speaking of coming clean. His words were somewhat muffled inasmuch as he was speaking, in effect, from somewhere in his stomach, having swallowed himself to do it. But even with indexing, this minister who always comes clean—his cup runneth over with tax dollars which have come in at the expense of the erosion of the real net income of the taxpayers of this country.

The inflation rate this year substantially exceeds the rate the minister has adopted for indexing. So the minister decided he had better give back some of the money he had taken, in the urgent hope that this would help ease the pressures for the further large wage and salary increases that people feel they need to keep up with inflation. I do not quarrel with that action. It is the kind of thing we recommended many times. But I do take exception to the minister's representing these things as tax cuts.

How many Canadians has the minister, and his immediate predecessor, taken off the tax rolls of Canada? Is it 25 million? It must be 25 million by this time. And yet he stands up in this House and solemnly intones what this means in forgone revenues to the government. He considers this a significant demonstration of belt tightening by the government. The quality of that argument is about the same as the quality of hamburger acceptable to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The cut, if it be such, is a cut from what? It is a cut from unjustifiably high tax rates which the government set in the first place—that's what. And the government is forgoing what? It is forgoing revenue which accrued to it because of the inflation which the government did not have the guts to tackle. That is all this means. How in the world do you tighten your belt unless you trim something off current federal expenditures? How can the Canadian people take this government seriously? How can they think it is serious when it talks about achieving some consensus, or sharing national productivity, or sharing the pie, or exercising discipline in collecting its share of taxes?

How can anyone believe that the government is serious about tackling economic conditions in this country? Sir, aside from the rate of inflation, the job vacancy rate is at a higher level than it has been at any time in the past four years yet the unemployment rate is still unacceptably high and the cost of unemployment insurance is running at over $2 billion per year. But will the government undertake an independent inquiry into the unemployment insurance program? No, not on your life, Sir. How can you take the government seriously when it talks about wanting to achieve consensus but offers nothing on which consensus can be built?

The minister says he always comes clean. I challenge him to reveal the inflation forecast on which he based the budget figures. I am not challenging him to predict the rate of inflation. He says he always comes clean. Well, let him tell the House what the rate of inflation forecast was on which he based the estimates he presented to the House on Monday evening. On what did he base estimates of revenue? He should reveal the basis for his estimates if he wants to appear serious about encouraging discussions which will lead to a voluntary consensus. But he will not disclose those figures.

The minister is asking other segments of society to cooperate, without their knowing on what the government based its forecasts for revenue. That is absurd. Sir, this sounds like something from Alice in Wonderland. The cover on the budget speech ought to read, "John in Blunderland."

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Oh, boy! Send that back to whoever wrote it.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not pretend the minister's task is easy. I sympathize with him in his task. I would show even more sympathy if he would show more determination in facing it, instead of indulging in razzmatazz.

An hon. Member: George is the expert in that.

Mr. Stanfield: George may be the expert, but the minister knows how to practice it. If he had shown clear determination to fight inflation, we could have accepted his stand. I do not ask him to follow my suggestions. On the other hand if he proposes serious measures which show he intends to fight inflation in this country, I will support him. But he did not do that. There is not the slightest hint in the speech of any determination to face that responsibility.

The minister expressed concern about a recession. I share his concern. Like him, I dread unemployment which may develop in the near future. The minister also mentioned measures designed to induce growth in Canada; on the other hand he said clearly that we cannot expect continued growth unless inflation is brought under control. But the budget is a complete cop-out in the fight against inflation. It is a complete cop-out in terms of effort to reach any consensus. Clearly, the measures referred to in the Speech from the Throne, and hints the Prime Minister has been throwing out since then, are so much guff. In the budget speech there was nothing but mush. There was nothing about consensus in the speech. That idea, clearly, has been abandoned; I doubt if it was ever entertained seriously.

In our country productivity rates are declining and the size of wage and salary settlements is increasing. Canadians are doing this to protect themselves from the rising cost of living. The minister wants to control inflation, avoid a recession and preserve growth. But how can you avoid a recession when you have not done anything to control inflation? And how can you induce growth under those conditions? Perhaps Mr. Clean can tell us.

The trouble in our housing industry has been created mostly by inflation and associated high interest rates. Mortgage interest rates will not decline substantially unless somebody—certainly the minister will not do it—reduces the inflation rate substantially in this country.

Sir, the minister has put the country on a roller coaster. In association with the Bank of Canada he moved interest rates up; now it appears he is to move them down. Next year, to meet the government's cash requirements, very probably he will move interest rates up again, unless the money supply is vastly increased. But that increase in itself would be highly inflationary. The minister has indulged in the sort of erratic manipulation of economic tools which for years the Economic Council has condemned. As I say, he has put the country on a roller coaster.

I would have expected at least a little humility on the minister's part on Monday night. It ought to be apparent to him, for example, that his policy on interest rates and his handling of the public debt in the last few months has cost Canadian taxpayers billions of dollars. He encouraged interest rates to rise, which in itself was inflationary, and because this created a run on Canada Savings Bonds he had to increase substantially the yield on outstanding Canada Savings Bonds.

Furthermore, as recently as last September 30 the minister created a new issue of Canada Savings Bonds and simultaneously moved up yields on all outstanding Canada Savings Bonds, not to protect people against inflation, but to persuade Canadians to hold on to their bonds and buy new ones. This action was not the result of any anti-inflation policy. And, such was the minister's planning and foresight that now, a few weeks after September 30, the minister has reversed his policy on interest rates. Having moved them up sharply and, incidentally, wrecked the housing program in the country, the minister has now decided to lower interest rates.

You know, all this reminds me of an old nursery rhyme with which you must be familiar, Mr. Speaker. It goes something like this:

The King of France went up the hill
With twenty thousand men;
The King of France came down the hill
And ne'er went up again.

Undoubtedly the last part, as it applies to the minister, is correct; but I am afraid he will go up again.

● (1530)

In any event, the manoeuvre of the Minister of Finance was not merely nonsense, but very costly. The discounted present cost of the minister's nonsense over the life of Canada Savings Bonds would exceed $2 billion. That is quite a sum, even for the successors of the Hon. C. D. Howe. Let us all humbly give thanks for the boundless wisdom of the government and its tremendous skill in short term forecasting.

With regard to housing, which is a great worry to Canadians, what did the minister do besides starting a downward trend in interest rates? Nobody knows what will happen there. He stuck with the gimmicks announced in the May budget and during the election campaign.

This reluctant tax indexer has reluctantly removed part of the sales tax on building materials. There again we have rather muffled tones from the minister, who always comes clean with parliament and the Canadian people. As far as that is concerned, it is another self-swallowing act for the minister and the Prime Minister. A few more budgets and the minister will have as many or probably more swallows than Capistrano.

Let us look more closely at the little game that is being played. Instead of taking off the full 11 per cent sales tax on building materials, as we have advocated for a long time and still advocate, the minister reduced the rate to 5 per cent. And he has set up a new program to pay $500 to first time purchasers of new homes.

The bureaucracy necessary to collect the 5 per cent sales tax is just as large a bureaucracy as was required to collect the 11 per cent sales tax. In addition, the minister is setting up a new bureaucracy which will have to be of some size to administer the new program of a $500 home-owner grant to each purchaser of a new home. I do not know if that is the key to the job creation program for the new year, but it is a great way to fight inflation. It would be far simpler, more effective, more meaningful, and make more sense to do what we and many others have suggested—simply remove the whole 11 per cent sales tax on building materials.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The minister, who always comes clean, is rewriting a bit of his own record. Last May he told us that cutting the sales tax was not advisable, but now it is an ingenious method. Of course, we do not have to go as far back as last May to see how things change in this cabinet of chameleons.

During the election campaign the Prime Minister talked about his great housing platform. He said cutting the amount of sales tax on building materials would be inequitable. He would not touch it with a 10-foot pole.

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Stanfield: He may be right, but he better explain why it is equitable now.

Mr. Trudeau: I did explain.

Mr. Stanfield: The admirers of this government may consider it to be a government of infinite flexibility and adaptable pragmatism, but in plain old-fashioned language, I can only term it dishonest.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Stanfield: Several of the attitudes and statements coming from this government are frankly dishonest, and that word does not seem to me to be exaggerated. Too often, several statements reflect a misconception of the facts, and the Prime Minister himself made such mistakes. One has only to take the example of charges and taxation in the field of natural resources.

In Brantford, Ontario, on June 7 last, at a press conference, the Prime Minister dealt with that question on three occasions in relation to the report of the Royal Commission on Taxation presided by the late Kenneth Carter.

The following quotations are from a report of that same press conference which was provided by the Office of the Prime Minister.

[English]

At one point during the press conference, the Prime Minister said, and I quote:

> And as Carter recognized many years ago in the Carter report, the best and simplest way to do that is to disallow royalties for federal corporation tax purposes.

Later in the news conference he referred again to the Carter report and said:

> The position we took in the budget, which I repeat is the one recommended by the Carter commission, is disallowing royalties as an expense from the point of view of federal taxation.

A bit later the Prime Minister said:

> —the approach recommended by Carter is a very good one. It is saying the federal government will have its right of taxation, it won't count royalties as an expense deductible for income tax purposes.

In these three references the Prime Minister firmly and unequivocally represented the Carter report as offering on the record support for the action which was proposed in the May budget and again in this budget, action to disallow deductibility of provincial royalty payments for federal income tax purposes. The Carter report did, of course, deal with this subject. It is covered in some detail in Volume 4. I quote from page 350 of Volume 4:

> Whether the provincial governments derive revenues from natural resources through lease payments, royalties, or a tax on income, the charges are nevertheless a cost of acquiring a supply of the mineral or petroleum concerned. Therefore, such charges, regardless of their form, should be deductible in the computation of income in the same way as any other cost of doing business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: In its conclusions and recommendations, at page 375 of Volume 4, it states, and I quote:

> Payments to the provinces for natural resources should be deductible. Similarly, the mining taxes paid to the provinces should be allowed as a cost of earning income and not as a tax credit.

The Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and other ministers may have their own reasons for the action proposed in the budget, but for the Prime Minister totally to misrepresent the Carter report to a news conference hardly generates much confidence in the good faith of the government. It hardly indicates that the government has much confidence in its own position, or that it really believes in the merits of that position. Clearly the Prime Minister was attempting to manipulate an issue which goes to the very roots of our confederation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The record of the government's recent dealings in the resource field is marked throughout not only by dishonesty, but by what can only properly be called treachery. We are all familiar with the agreement reached between the government of Canada and all the provinces on March 27 of this year, an agreement on the price of crude oil at $6.50. The Prime Minister reported this in the House on March 28. He indicated it would last for a period of 15 months, from April 1, 1974, to June 30, 1975.

● (1540)

We all remember how relieved we were to get this information—how everybody regarded this as an act of statesmanship on the part of the Government of Canada and of the provinces concerned. But less than six weeks later, less than six weeks after the statement announcing that agreement had been made in this House, the government produced its astonishing proposal on resource taxation, a proposal which it knew would be unacceptable to the provinces involved. The Minister of Finance must have known, the Prime Minister must have known that the provinces concerned would never have entered into that agreement on March 27 if they had entertained the slightest suspicion about what the Minister of Finance intended to do on May 6, and what he repeated again on Monday night.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: That is what I mean by treachery, Sir. Those Pearl Harbour boys are at it again.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Yes, they laugh. But it is hollow laughter. On March 28 of this year we all saluted what appeared to be a new spirit of good will and seeming good faith, which made this 15-month agreement possible. Less than six weeks later we were sharply disabused of our feeling that the Prime Minister had been conducting himself in a spirit of good faith in his negotiations with the provinces. The bad faith became evident. I say, Mr. Speaker, without hesitation, that I know nothing in the history of federal-provincial relations in this country which involved such bad faith and such treachery.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The presumption of the government is that confrontation is in style and that the central government will eventually prevail. The presumption of the government is that anything is fair in dealing with a province or a group of provinces. It is a sad thing that is happening. In pursuing these ill-considered and sneak attacks in its budget proposals the government is playing with fire, and playing with the future of this country.

As to the changes the minister has in mind with regard to equalization, I am prepared to wait until he has met with the provinces—he has indicated he will meet with representatives of the provincial governments before bringing in legislation to change these arrangements. As I say, I am prepared to await these important developments.

What we are seeing is a two-pronged power play by the federal government to centralize power, to control natural resource development and marketing—

Mr. Fairweather: —and to tear up the constitution.

Mr. Stanfield: It is a move designed to make provinces puppets of the federal government.

An hon. Member: Wait until Davis dances.

Mr. Stanfield: Speaking of dancing, I hope none of the Liberal members from Quebec, who always seem to remain silent when questions of importance are being discussed, are not at all surprised that support for the PQ is on the rise in that province.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): They are wide awake, now.

Mr. Wagner: Now they are listening!

Mr. Stanfield: I don't know what stand the federal government could take, or what stand these Liberal members from Quebec would support which would do more to disillusion the people of Quebec or make them feel more that their traditional rights were being abandoned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: How about your own party?

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, when the government had a two-price system for oil in the fall of 1973, Quebec representatives sat back. There was nothing wrong with that. They accepted it. That was not unfair at all. Who was it who spoke up in the House?

Mr. Trudeau: Talk to one of your leaders in Quebec.

Mr. Stanfield: Never mind about that. Here they are now, the men who are supposed to represent federalism in Canada, the members from Quebec who belong to the great federalist tradition in the Province of Quebec. They sit in silence. Well, if they are going to sit in silence, I wish they would keep silent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: How many PQ supporters voted for your party?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Well, well. The Prime Minister came alive.

Mr. Trudeau: I said it in the debate last spring. I quoted them. They are working for your party. You can regret that separatism is making inroads.

Mr. Stanfield: I guess I missed those words of wisdom. The question is not what I miss. That does not make much difference. The question is, really, what the government is doing to the country. No longer will there be any need for serious consultation and bargaining. The federal government assumes the right to fix the price and to dictate revenue sharing arrangements by disallowing provincial royalties as deductions from income for federal tax purposes. I do not see how the Minister of Finance could make such a proposal. If I ever understood his ideology at all, I do not understand how he could possibly justify it.

This will probably encourage take-overs of petroleum and mining operations by provincial governments. Whether a province wants to take over petroleum or mining operations on the merits is a question for the province concerned to determine. Clearly this ought not to be the purpose or effect of federal tax policy, to push or encourage provincial governments to take such a position.

The people of Canada ought to be aware of what the federal government is up to, and what will be the effect of a fundamental change in the nature of our country. The government is set on a collision course which may shake the very foundations of our confederation, and at the same time a course that deprives future Canadians of security of resource supply. The present generation of Canadians in their own lifetime will begin to feel the terrible effects of the continuation of this madness, and future generations of Canadians will suffer the full brunt of it, and will lament that those who did not have to pay the price condemned them to reap the whirlwind.

I call it madness; to me the word is hardly strong enough. The course must be altered. The passage of this budget in its present form would be an indelible black mark on the record of this parliament. In the time left to us before the final vote on the relevant bill we must seek other means of persuasion to achieve alternatives, but if the government chooses to remain unbending it will face an official opposition of equal resolve.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: There was an atmosphere of unreality surrounding the minister's speech on Monday night. It was hard to believe, listening to him, that the country was gripped by raging inflation, that our world is threatened by a future energy shortage, or that the world is threatened by the disaster of escalating crises. Can anyone who loves this country, anyone who values civilization, stability and economic progress, accept the government's arrogant cowardice?

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Stanfield: When I think of a simile to describe the conditions and dangers of the world today I think of the mental pictures we all had as boys, of the terror and catastrophe created on old warships by a wild cannon careening around the deck as the ship pitches and tosses.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I don't know what is so amusing to the Prime Minister, but perhaps he would let me in on it.

Mr. Trudeau: The mental picture you are presenting.

Mr. Stanfield: I don't think that that's very relevant. The world today is like the deck of one of those ancient ships, with many cannons secured only by a very slender rope, ready to careen if somebody cuts the rope. I suggest, with regret, that no one is offering real leadership in attempting to make these cannons secure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister laughs.

Mr. Trudeau: I sure do at the metaphor.

Mr. Stanfield: That is a pretty good metaphor, and if the Prime Minister reflects on it I am sure he will agree.

Our Minister of Finance rattles around the world, and he talks like a cannon, at least in comparison with the rate at which I talk. If he has offered one constructive thought as to how these cannons should be made secure we have yet to hear it, and the budget address on Monday night did not contain any hint of it.

As far as we can tell, the government's international economic policy is like its domestic policy; it is fatuous, cowardly, inconsistent and dishonest.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The government has its mandate to govern and to lead, but what in fact is it offering? Here we have a government picking a fight within our own country; dividing the country, endangering the development of future supplies of energy for Canadians, talking about a consensus but pursuing a confrontation. There was no attempt to come to grips with inflation. Yes, there was some language of warning; but what comes through essentially is complacency. How fortunate we are! If only those in charge of other countries could run their affairs as well as this government runs Canada!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: There is nothing in the budget to summon Canadians to do battle with a mortal enemy that may destroy us. There is nothing here in the budget that encourages Canadians to accept some temporary sacrifice, to accept restraint in order to bring inflation under control. There was certainly no call to arms. There was a battle plan against the provinces, but there was certainly no battle plan against inflation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner):

[Mr. Stanfield.]

That all the words after "that" shall be deleted and there be substituted the following:

"This House condemns the budget as failing to mount a concerted attack on domestic inflation while at the same time proposing measures which contribute to national disunity."

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to begin by commending the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) for what I thought was an excellent speech, and to indicate to you, Sir, and to the House, that we agree with his position on the constitutional issue. He put that issue very well and in very concise terms. I agree that the federal budget presented on Monday is a breech of confidence with the oil producing provinces of this country, and is something the government will dearly pay for in the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Let me also say that the same thing holds true when it comes to equalization with respect to the province of Saskatchewan. Our province had a commitment from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), that equalization would not be touched if that province agreed to the oil agreement of last March. That, of course, is not going to be the result of the budget brought down last Monday.

I want to say that to me the budget brought down Monday night seemed like a classical Liberal 19th century type of approach to the economy. We might almost have seen Gladstone rather than the Minister of Finance presenting the budget on the evening of November 18, or we might have seen the ghost of Ben Benson, puffing his pipe and drafting the economic policies of this country. These are the things of which the budget reminded me, as a member of the New Democratic Party.

The budget in my terms is a rich man's budget. It proposes nothing new to improve the lot of the average and low income people of this country. Nearly all the measures in the budget will give more to those who have money. Nearly all the measures are regressive. They follow the old Liberal theory called the trickle down theory. They prime the pump at the top, and pour in money at the top, to the wealthy and the corporations, in the hope that it will trickle down to those at the bottom, those at the bottom who are able to live, who have jobs and who work in this country. That is the theory our party rejects. It is one which our party feels strongly will not work, and has never worked in this country.

If you look at the proposals in the budget you will find that almost everything fits into that type of pattern. There is the registered home ownership plan, and the exemption of the first $1,000 of interest income which has now been expanded to include dividends, or a combination of dividends and interest. There is the first $1,000 for extra pension other than pensions which are universal in this country. There is a new provision to exempt income in respect of building an apartment building. All these proposals assist far more the wealthy and the haves in this country than the ordinary citizen whom we represent. The same is true for corporations.

Again the minister has provided all kinds of goodies for the corporations. There is the extension of the fast write-off which was supposed to have been eliminated at the end of this year. It has been continued indefinitely without the report to us that the minister promised. The provision of the 100 per cent right-off for exploration for petroleum companies, and a 10 per cent corporate surcharge, that excludes almost all the corporations in this country, together with the 5 per cent corporate tax abatement to the petroleum companies, add to the already extensive bonanza this country has provided to the corporations, year in and year out, from the pockets of our taxpayers.

On the other hand, what is there in the budget for the ordinary citizen? There is a tax cut of $50. I suggest the Minister of Finance was a little less than honest in the way he presented the tax cut, as if it were to be a minimum of $150 for the people of this country. In February, 1973, he implemented a tax cut of $100. That tax cut continues in the main budget. Last May another $50 was added. The tax cut that came in the budget on Monday was just a re-introduction of the $50 tax cut of last May. So, all that is gained by the ordinary and low income person in this country is a $50 tax cut, which is 97 cents a week—less than $1 a week. That is the only thing in the budget for the low income persons, of whom there are many in this country from one coast to the other.

The government even failed to mention an increase in the basic old age pension. It failed to offer any assistance to the working person. It failed to raise the exemption or to give any credit to people with children, for child day care. It failed even to mention any assistance to farmers. I think it pointed out in explicit terms the people the government is interested in helping, and the people the government is interested in forgetting about in our society.

This is clearly a budget for the rich, the wealthy, and those who already have. It is a budget for the investor, the stockbroker, the corporate executive, the doctor, the lawyer, and for the very mandarins who drew it up, Mr. Speaker. These are the people who will reap real benefits from this budget, not the middle or low income people in this country.

The proposals in the budget violate the principle and intent of the recommendations made by the Carter Commission when it pointed out that we have one of the most unfair taxation systems in the industrialized world. Because of the budget before us today, more loopholes and exemptions will be created, and we will forget about the theory that a buck is a buck, no matter from where it comes.

Now this government decrees that it is the type of buck which decides what kind of an exemption a person will get for it, and not where that dollar happens to come from, and this, I think, is a very bad theme in which we should not become involved in this country. I think the theme of a budget, in a country as wealthy as this, should be the redistribution of wealth and income in order to provide a more egalitarian society for one and all. I think that should be the theme of any budget.

We are fortunate to possess immense natural and mineral resources, and a manufacturing and processing industry which is growing strong with people who are very highly skilled and highly trained. With all the affluence we have I see no reason why Canada should have such a high rate of poverty and unemployment, and such substandard housing conditions for many of its people across the country. We have an inflation rate which is one of the highest of any country in the industrialized world. This budget should have started to redistribute some of the wealth, and incomes, from the rich to the less fortunate, and should have taken steps to plan the economy so that all Canadians might share equally in the wealth this country possesses.

We in our party believe in co-operation through a planned economy, rather than in the ad hoc proposition of the so-called corporate free market. I believe the time has come when people, through the various levels of government, and through their various community and work associations, should exercise the power of planning and directing the economy, and should take it out of the hands of those in the corporate boardrooms where it has been for the past 100 years.

I think that the gap between the rich and the poor has widened in recent years since this government took office. Regional disparities have increased, and foreign domination of our economy has intensified. To me this is a natural consequence of an economy dominated by foreign and large corporations. Our party believes that the only way to reverse that trend is to take the decision making away from those in the corporate sector and give it back to the people, where it belonged in the first place.

Our monetary and fiscal policy must be independent. I think the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) referred to this recently in the House. The aim in this country must be to improve the quality of life and economic well being of the average and less fortunate Canadian.

I suggest that Monday's budget is typical of past budgets in that it fails to give any direction in respect of providing us with new approaches. The government fails to realize that the world economic situation is more dangerous now than at any time since 1929. The United States admits it is in a recession, with a growth rate not much above zero. Britain, Italy, Japan and other industrialized states face very serious problems that will cut down on their ability to purchase goods from us. Coupled with this is the fact that we have inflation, which will almost certainly continue at a very high level around the world for the immediate future.

What does the government provide? It is not going to wrestle with inflation. The minister has provided nothing at all. All he does is repeat the old clichés to the effect that our inflation or unemployment rate may be better than that of country X, that he is concerned, and that the west should have its place in the sun. But the government will not intervene in the so-called free market place, and is afraid to allocate resources and funds to improve the lot of the average Canadian. It relies on incentives to wealthy individuals and corporations in the hope that they will provide the jobs and guide the economy of all Canadians. I believe that that does not work.

Our party believes that the most effective and humane way to create jobs and strengthen the economy is to provide incentives to the lower and middle income people, to give to people at the bottom of the scale the proper type of income so that they can purchase goods and provide food, clothing and shelter for their families. I believe that the government is not taking that approach in this budget. I will go over a few things that are in the budget that our party considers to be gimmicks and to be regressive.

First of all, there is the registered home ownership savings plan from the budget of last May. It is a $1,000 annual tax write off for people who can afford to put $1,000 into a savings plan on an annual basis for the purchase of a home, or to purchase furniture with which to furnish that home. It is obvious that any statistician or economist will tell us that people who take full advantage of that will be the wealthier people in our society, and not the low income people about whom we should be concerned.

Second, there is an exemption for the first $1,000 of interest income, that was also in the budget last May. This has been extended to include dividend income, or a combination of dividends and interest. Who will take advantage of that provision to its fullest extent? Once again it will be people who have substantial investment portfolios, not the little old lady in Toronto, the workman in Winnipeg, or the farmer in the maritimes. This, too, is a regressive step. Funds that are spent on these types of programs would be better spent on programs of tax credits for all Canadians, starting at the bottom level and stimulating the economy where I believe it should be stimulated.

Third, there is the provision for exempting the first $1,000 of pension income other than universal pensions paid for by the government. In some cases we are helping some people who, I believe, have not received a fair deal. But again it is only fair to point out that in the work force today only 30 per cent of the people who are working contribute to private pension plans.

Finally, there is a new provision to exempt from income tax funds used to build apartment blocks or apartment units. Who in my riding, or in any riding, will be investing money in apartment blocks? Again it will not be the ordinary citizen. It will be the doctor, the speculator, the lawyer or the dentist—those who have money to invest in apartment blocks—not the ordinary citizen.

This is the type of direction in which we are going in the budget. There might be more money going into apartment blocks, but who else will write it off in income tax but the wealthy people of this country? So what do you have for the average citizen?

There is the continuation of the 5 per cent tax cut from 1973, with a minimum $100 cut and a maximum $500 ceiling, and an additional $50 cut for 1974. That is the only thing there is in the entire budget for the low income person. Second, there is an additional $50 in 1975 which will raise the minimum tax cut to $200. The rate will go up from 5 per cent to 8 per cent, and the ceiling will also go up from $500 to $750.

Again this is a regressive step. When you lift the ceiling to $750 here you look at families that have incomes in the $30,000, $40,000 and above category, rather than the average low and middle income salary in this country. Almost all measures in this budget are regressive and will not help the ordinary person.

I want to illustrate what I mean by taking three typical Canadian families and trying to figure out what kind of tax saving they would have as a result of the budget. The families will consist of a man, his wife and two children under the age of 16, in all three cases in three different income brackets.

First there is Bob, a maintenance worker in Winnipeg. He has a salary of $8,000 to support himself, his wife and two children. He has no tax savings at all through various gimmicks such as the registered home ownership savings plan, and the other plans and gimmicks brought down in the budget. The only saving he will have will be the basic $50 tax cut provided by the minister in 1974. In 1975, on a salary of $8,000, he will save another $50, for a tax cut of some $100.

Now we come to the second Canadian, Richard, who might be a sales representative in the city of Halifax or Toronto. Again he has a wife and two children and lives on an income of $14,000, an average middle income person in Canada. He is probably living in an apartment, and with the cost of living as it is today he cannot afford to buy a house. Therefore he cannot save anything under the registered home ownership savings plan. He probably has savings. Let us say he receives $100 a year in interest or dividends on his savings. In 1974 he will save $133, and in 1975 $183 under the budget that was brought down on Monday.

Now we come to the man in whom the Minister of Finance is interested. He is a wealthy Canadian, whom we will call John. He is an executive living in Toronto, a management consultant, and is earning $40,000 a year. John has been very lucky. He has an investment portfolio, and he gets about $2,000 in interest and dividends that he can write off in part because of the budget. John might decide to move out of his swanky apartment and buy a swanky house, so he can take advantage of the registered home ownership savings plan. In the taxation year 1974, because of Monday's budget, John will be saving $1,120 because he has a high income.

As if that were not all, John also heard on Monday night that he can now invest money in apartment blocks and apartment units. So he has a meeting with his investment club and they decide that, for the taxation year 1974-75, they should take advantage of the capital cost allowance provisions and invest in an apartment block. He invests a lot of money in it, and he has an additional tax exemption of $4,242, which he can calculate in his taxation. The other provision that takes effect in 1975 is the 8 per cent tax reduction ceiling. It goes up from $500 to $750. In 1975 the tax saving for John will be $4,492. That is more than the gross income of many people in my riding, and indeed of people in all parts of this country. While the ordinary worker will save $50 or $100, the wealthy person can save $4,000, $5,000 or $6,000 quite easily.

Then what happens when it comes to the pensioner? I do not think we need to say that there is nothing in the budget for pensioners, no increase in the basic amount, and none of those incentives that the Minister of Finance bandies about in the House. All the measures before us will widen the gap between the wealthy and the have nots in this country, a gap which has been increasing in the last decade because of the rule of the Liberal Party.

I want to go over a few statistics which I think should be on the record, and should be of concern to us all. I will take the income figures for families and individuals in 1965 and in 1972. In 1965 the bottom 60 per cent of Canadians earned 34.2 per cent of the income in this country; the top 20 per cent earned 41.4 per cent. In 1972, some seven years later, the bottom 60 per cent saw their income drop; they made only 32.2 per cent of the national net income, while the top 20 per cent earned 42.9 per cent. Again there is a widening of the disparity during the years of the so-called just society.

When you come to the wealthy, the figures are even more startling. The most recent figures we have for wealth are for 1970. The top 50 per cent of people, families or individuals, own 93 per cent of the wealth of this country; the top 10 per cent of people, families or individuals, own 41.8 per cent of the wealth, and the top 1 per cent, many of them friends of the Minister of Finance, own 12 per cent of the wealth of this country. Is that the just society, Mr. Speaker? Is it a step toward equality? I say it is not and, as the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) comments, it is just for the rich, but we see it continued in the budget that is before us today.

When you look at the comparison between the corporate and the individual tax bill you find that over the last ten or 20 years individuals have paid more in taxes, and the corporations have paid less. In 1950 individuals paid 27 per cent of the tax bill of the federal government and corporations 28 per cent; in 1968-69 individuals paid 34 per cent of the taxes and corporations paid 20 per cent; after five years of the just society the individual tax bill went up again, and in 1973-74 they paid 41 per cent of the taxes and corporations paid 18 per cent.

That trend is continued in the budget before us today, which gives even more write-offs and incentives to corporations. The two year write-off has been extended indefinitely, although it was supposed to run only to the end of December, 1974. The minister was supposed to review the effect of that fast write-off for the House, but we have not seen that review. Why has he not been consulting us in this regard? The minister also said the fast write-off would cost $150 million, but I suspect it will cost much more than that.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) has talked about an expansion of billions and billions of dollars for manufacturing and processing. If this is so, how can the fast write-off cost only $150 million? The Minister of Finance should come clean about this. In the last year or two, industry has earned very high profits and there is no reason why it should seek to have the write-offs extended beyond the end of this year.

Then there was the phony gimmick of the 10 per cent surtax on corporate incomes. But an examination of the budget information shows that almost all corporations are exempt from that tax. This can be found on page 20 of the supplementary information provided with the budget. The surtax will not apply to manufacturing or processing profits, to petroleum or mining profits, Canadian controlled private companies eligible for the small business deduction, to investment, mortgage investment, to mutual funds, to non-resident-owned investment corporations, or to the investment income of private corporations. Who in the devil does it apply to, Mr. Speaker? Is it just a gimmick to try to make people believe that the minister is concerned about profiteering in this country?

As a change from the May budget the minister has provided an abatement of five more tax points to the oil companies, beginning in 1975 and 1976. Then the minister offers a write-off for exploration costs of 100 per cent. That was supposed to be reduced to 30 per cent in the May budget. I wonder why that is being done when the profits of at least Imperial Oil and Gulf are so high.

Finally, the minister has gone ahead with the non-deductibility of provincial taxes and royalties. This was done without consultation. An agreement was made with the oil producing provinces earlier this year, but that is now broken and we can expect difficulties as a result. It strikes me as strange that the minister would disallow taxes paid to a provincial government by oil companies. The provincial governments on behalf of the people own and husband the resources. At the same time the minister allows exemptions for depletion, fast write-offs, write-offs for exploration and development, for entertainment, and almost anything else. When it comes to a provincial tax or royalty, however, he does not allow a company to write that off as a legitimate expense.

A company can claim a royalty to the CPR, or a royalty to any nation in the world as a legitimate expense, but when it comes to the people of Saskatchewan or Alberta the minister is concerned that they are getting too much maney. I suggest the minister has broken an agreement and it is not surprising that the premiers of those provinces are unhappy with the budget.

The minister has also broken his word to Saskatchewan regarding equalization. He told the provinces that if the additional oil funds went into capital funds they would not be equalized, but all of a sudden in the budget he proposes to equalize one-third of those funds. That will cost Saskatchewan $36 million to $40 million this year, Mr. Speaker, according to the minister's department and to the provincial department of finance. This just should not happen in a country where there is supposed to be a consensus, where there is federalism. The minister strikes me as one of the new Godfathers of Confederation. He broke an agreement that, after a great deal of bargaining was signed and put into effect.

In this country there are all kinds of handouts. A few years ago the Carter Commission said that gas and oil companies paid taxes on only 7 per cent of book profits, and mining companies paid something the same. Now the government is asking us to give more concessions to gas and oil companies.

The time has come for us to say that exhaustible and depleting resources should be owned by the people and used by them as public utilities. In most provinces the hydro is publicly owned, and the government should be encouraging the moves of Saskatchewan and other provinces toward public ownership and control of non-renewable resources. Instead, the minister has threatened, at a press conference, to impose a tax on provincial Crown corporations if these resources are put under public ownership. That is the heavy handed approach of 1984, Mr. Speaker, and should not be considered. A quicker move toward public ownership and control of exhaustible resources would be better for the people of this country, and the minister should not impede any such action.

A couple of other things in the budget warrant comment, Mr. Speaker. A major part of it dealt with housing. We all know that housing starts are down from 269,000 in 1973 to an adjusted figure of 173,000 in 1974. This is due to excessively high mortgage rates and the inflated cost of land and building materials. A new home is now out of reach of most middle and low income Canadians. The slowdown in the housing industry is causing lay-offs in the lumber and forest industries in parts of the country. Despite those facts, however, what does the budget offer to the person who wants to buy a home?

First of all, the minister says that person can have a $500 home builder's grant. As the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) said the other day, giving a grant of $500 for building a house nowadays is like throwing a peanut to a starving elephant. It means nothing.

Second, there is the registered home ownership savings plan. I have already commented on that.

Next there is the lowering of the sales tax on building materials, but with no mechanism to monitor whether that saving will go to the home builder or the consumer. Often any potential saving is gobbled up by the middle man in the private sector. My party has always supported the removal of the sales tax on building materials, but only if the saving is passed along to the home builder, or if he is given a rebate in the form of a tax grant. The tax saving should not filter back to the private entrepreneur.

We should treat housing as a social right and remove it from the private, speculative market. The minister has not done this. Instead, by allowing private entrepreneurs tax exemptions on certain income, no matter what its source, he hopes to encourage the building of apartment blocks. The owners will probably charge usurious rents, and tenants will be without protection. That being so, I say that housing should be considered as a social right, in the same way as education and medical care are treated as social rights, and should not be left to the vagaries of the private market or in the hands of the private entrepreneur.

We should pump hundreds of millions of dollars into subsidized public housing, to make life tolerable for low income people. Banks, financial institutions and insurance companies should be told that they must allocate a certain part of their investment capital for mortgages, at interest rates as low as, say, 6 per cent. The government has not done this. We must do it if we are to treat housing as a social right equally available to each and every Canadian.

Other members of my party will comment on other aspects of the budget during the budget debate. I am concerned about the cost of living and about the failure of the Minister of Finance and of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to wrestle inflation to the ground. The budget does not attempt to do that. It contains nothing of benefit for the ordinary citizen although inflation continues to run at between 11 per cent and 12 per cent a year in Canada. The minister predicted that inflation would run at about 10 per cent, and the current level of unemployment is probably higher than last year's level.

The time has come for the government to control inflation in this country. We should establish a prices review board, with expanded jurisdiction to review all prices and price inputs, and with power to order the rollback of excessive profits or excessively high prices, which I am sure the board would reveal.

We must also extend the two-price system, which presently applies to wheat, oil and copper, to all basic commodities, including iron ore, steel and lumber. Only by doing such things can we hope to ease the rate of inflation in this country and insulate ourselves from international inflation. This we are not doing at present.

I notice that the budget does not deal with agriculture. The word "farmer" does not even appear in the budget speech. We all know of the difficult time the beef industry is going through.

Mr. Gillies: The difficulties were created by the government.

Mr. Nystrom: And we know of the difficulties that cow-calf operators are going through.

Mr. Gillies: Again, these are difficulties created by the government.

Mr. Nystrom: The Minister of Agriculture gave this House a commitment that the government would soon establish a policy for beef. Where is the policy? What has happened to his commitment? The budget ought to have included a financial commitment to keep the beef industry, including the cow-calf industry, healthy and in operation. Further, the budget does not mention allocations of funds for a farm stabilization program, and does not mention increased aid for countries whose peoples are starving.

It is wrong for the government not to contribute at least 1 per cent of our gross national product in foreign aid and not to contribute food from Canada to the peoples of the world who are starving. There ought to have been such a commitment in the budget; its omission is immoral. We are being immoral if we do not produce as much food as we can to help needy people in this country and the millions who are starving all over the world.

My colleagues will elaborate on my party's position as the budget debate continues. In view of the shortcomings of the budget, a budget which is not of significant benefit to ordinary people, and in view of the continued rise in the cost of living and continued handouts to the wealthy and to the corporations of this country, I wish to move a subamendment to the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a semicolon, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words: "and for failing to provide any significant tax benefit for low and middle income Canadians while granting unwarranted tax concessions to upper income Canadians and corporations."

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention, in the course of the present debate, of enlarging upon the voluminous contents of the budget for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975. We will have the opportunity, in the course of coming debates, of analyzing the credits of the various departments. I do not want to waste too much time on that mess of figures, but would like instead to keep to economic considerations which we cannot always deal with during the other debates.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased, during this budget debate, to invite the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) to leave the beaten path, for a change, and set Canada on a financial path other than the one we have known, and especially the one I have known in the last ten years that I have listened to the various budgets brought down before this House.

Mr. Speaker, to my mind, the budget of a nation is its most vital administrative tool, for it represents the eventual economic development of a whole nation. The Canadian Minister of Finance says yes or no to all that can be done economically for the good of the Canadian people. All the departments are dependent on the financial conditions created by the Department of Finance, for they dominate all others. Only dreamers say that finance is not important; the realists know that to accomplish something, finance is required; otherwise, dreams will always remain dreams.

The Minister of Finance is therefore entirely responsible for stagnation in Canada, the progress or financial setback of each department and consequently of Canada as a whole.

Each morning in a business firm, the accountant or general manager opens that vault to take out the accounting books, the invoices, the cash box, the bank books and everything required for the satisfactory administration of the business in order to take the essential decisions. If the accountant, the general manager or the Minister of Finance, instead of taking the necessary decisions in due course, keeps explaining why the business is at a standstill, saying that competitors and other people are to blame, it is because he is incompetent. If he keeps saying that the business is deteriorating, it is because competitors are underselling him and that is yet another indication of incompetence. When the director of a company keeps imitating his competitors, it is because he is incompetent.

It is the same thing for a country. Unemployment is not to be blamed on others, but on ourselves. Inflation is not to be blamed on others, but on ourselves. Epidemics of bankruptcies are not to be blamed on others, but on ourselves.

Economic regression, such as we are now witnessing in Canada, is not to be blamed on others, but on ourselves. When the Minister of Finance of a country keeps throwing the blame for our troubles on others, then he must be incompetent or unable to act in that he is bound by forces which command him to act against his own competence.

Blaming foreign conditions for what is happening in Canada, as the Minister of Finance did in his budget speech when he referred to inflation, is indeed the easiest thing to do.

Maybe in the next budget we shall blame some unidentified outer space beings for interfering with and disturbing things on our planet as an excuse for our own blunders. Blaming others only enhances our incompetence or inability to act.

The Minister of Finance should exercise 100 per cent control over the country's finance instead of being controlled by the country's financial forces. Why is the Minister of Finance always trying to defend the present government which keeps bringing him everything he does not want? For it is indeed because of the present financial system that the greatest inflationary pressure ever in Canada has been occurring. The present system is indeed the reason for the deficit of our balance each and every year. In 1961-62: $791 million; in 1962-63: $692 million; in 1963-64: $619 million; in 1964-65: $38 million; in 1965-66: $39 million; in 1966-67: $422 million; in 1967-68: $795 million; in 1968-69: $576 million; in 1969-70: $393 million; in 1970-71: $370 million; in 1971-72: $750 million; in 1974-75: $1.5 billion. The present financial system is actually responsible for a taxation system which accounts for the fact that over 50 per cent of all revenue is siphoned off by various levels of government. It is indeed because of our present financial system that the worst unemployment crises always occurs in peacetime. Indeed, because of our present financial system, the wealth can be distributed among the people only under the condition of waging war. Again because of our present financial system, we experience an economic recession; it is only the beginning. And yet Canada has been built with courage, confidence, hope and dreams about the future that are all melting in the pot of the inflationary financial system the Minister of Finance is happy to defend.

In his budget package, on page 1 of the Highlights brochure, the minister refers to a prudent economy policy, instead of a buoyant economy policy. Reference is also made to inflation and a slowdown in growth instead of reduced cost and increased industrial activity.

Further down, the minister says there should be an attempt to sustain demand. So he is not sure. He says there should be an attempt, instead of stating that demand should be increased. Further down, I read that rising expenditures should be kept down, but in the same breath announces a deficit of one billion and a half dollars. He spends one billion and a half more than the amount of revenues. He says one thing and does exactly the opposite. Surely this is the utmost in inconsistency. Special attention should be given to the weak point in the economy, says the minister. But in such an economic chaos, the Minister of Finance should have realized long ago that the weak points in the economy all point to a basically unbalanced monetary system, which entails structural faults and weaknesses.

With his economists, the Minister of Finance is inspective the roof of the present financial structure in an attempt to repair it instead of working at the very foundations of our monetary systems which cause all those faults. He calls them weaknesses in our economic system.

Our continuing economic troubles have their direct cause in our monetary system, but the Minister of Finance takes his time before repairing the cracks. His economist advisers will blame everyone else but the national system, but the Minister of Finance will listen to nobody else. He will go on fooling around, with the same results. Because economists keep on producing the same causes, he will go on repairing the same results of the present financial system, an obsolete one, without ever going to the roots of the evil.

The cause of all the economic unrest lies in our present financial system, but the hon. Minister of Finances has never dared to propose a financial or monetary reform. He accepts the present monetary and financial system as a fait accompli, as if it was a divine creation. He seems to consider that our monetary and financial system should never be changed or improved.

However, everything has changed in terms of techniques, in terms of science, in terms of producitivity and this is true in every area. Progress and changes follow one another and are necessary but the hon. Minister of Finance maintains the old and vicious monetary system of the 19th century and does not even dare to make changes as the authority of those who control credit instead of the government is such that one is even not allowed to question the biggest racket in the history of our supposedly free world, this racket by which our credit remains in the hands of a private or banking monopoly which today controls also our monopolized production system. In Canada, our goal is not the free production system anymore. We live in a monopolistic production system. The free enterprise system means in the 1974 context that monopolies control our production. Private enterprise has disappeared because it was stifled by monopolies with the help of governments and today we live in a free enterprise system. If we are to go backwards, toward the best production system in th world, private enterprise, we must first, Mr. Speaker, create a National Credit Board. All kinds of boards have been created up to now, but the more important one in our situation of inflation would be a National Credit Board so that credit would be at the disposal of society and not society at the disposal of credit as it is presently the case.

Once credit is at the disposal of society, monopolies will no longer be able to strangle others through credit, as was so often the case in the past, when many private enterprises went under the control of monopolies which are in turn controlled by the chief of them all, the credit monopoly.

I hope that the Minister of Finance will read again tomorrow this part of my speech to find out how such a National Credit Board could operate. Its main function would be, first of all, to maintain the volume of money and credit in circulation at a level where the whole population could buy at fair prices all goods which are offered on sale and this, without any risk of inflation or deflation.

Mr. Speaker, as long as there is no National Credit Board, people will juggle with prices. The lack of purchasing power in relation to production will become increasingly obvious.

It would provide the Bank of Canada with the necessary credits for its administration, and the credits needed by municipalities and school boards in general, and by all the developments requiring joint capital, provided there are production possibilities and needs. The loans would have to be paid back to the extent of the depreciation of the corporate capital thus created. Finally, it would allow the reduction and eventually the clearing of the public debt. The Minister of Finance has said nothing in his budget speech, did not have a word about the lowering, the disappearing or eventually the payment of the public debt.

The duties of the Commission would include establishing an accounting system indicating the assets and liabilities of Canada, the appreciation or depreciation of goods and services, using for this purpose the services of the existing numerous statistics offices or those which would be established, in order to measure at regular intervals the increase in real wealth in Canada and the additional amount of buying power which would have to be distributed corresponding to the real increase in the wealth thus generated.

When the economic stability is insured through a balance between productivity and consumption by means of a production-based credit which will enable production to meet consumption at all times, then and only then the present economic defect shall disappear whereby the distribution rate of the purchasing power for a certain product is always less than the total cost of pricing which creates a constant and cumulative lag between total costs, that is prices, and incomes, that is the purchasing power. The economic unbalance is fundamentally caused by pricing and that unbalance is inflation.

Mr. Speaker, this Minister of Finance or his predecessors should have fired a long time ago the economists around them whose job is to protect the present system, because they are at the service of the people's exploiters who have paid for the establishment of the London School of Economics where economists are trained in large numbers in order to make sure that their system is maintained. In this so-called place of high learning, the London School of Economics, they are taught how to mend the holes of the present financial system and they are brainwashed not to look for economic and social wrongs in the monetary "basement" controlled by their bosses who thrive on the perpetual debts of Canadians and others.

Mr. Speaker, given the economic realities of 1974, this budget is the sign of financial incompetence, perhaps not directly on the part of the minister but certainly on the part of his economists.

In this budget, the government shows a great nervousness towards the future, because it already feels that the "basement" of the economic structure of Canada is unsteady, and indication of a government that does not know where it is going and feels that recession already has a stranglehold on the country.

● (1650)

This budget is evidence that the finance minister may have good intentions, because in trying to avoid a worse evil, an economic recession, he proposes measures that are to the people who are writhing under inflation no more than Lazarus' drops of water on the tongue of the bad rich man in hell.

Mr. Bussières: We are now hearing words of Revelation.

Mr. Rondeau: This budget which is too little too late will not prevent the worse, because it is already too late. The flames of finance and inflation will burn down our economic structures and the feeble stream of water from the small hose with which the finance minister is fighting them will in no way slow the blaze of recession. As a people, we shall pay for our folly and that of imbeciles such as the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Bussières) who has never, since he has been sitting in the House, been courageous enough to stand up and say out loud what the people in his riding think.

Mr. Bussières: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Portneuf on a point of order.

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, while listening to some imbecilities, I should like to recall that I have had the opportunity to rise in the House and speak, but since the member who has the floor was always absent, he could not possibly know that.

Mr. Laprise: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Abitibi on a point of order.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, each time a member of the opposition is rising either to ask a question or to make a speech in the House, the hon. member for Portneuf is jabbering to himself in his corner. It might be interesting to send him to a psychiatric hospital for examination to know really what is the matter with him.

Mr. Bussières: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think that unless—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Unless the hon. member wants to rise on a new question—We can hardly transfer the Chair at the other end of the House to watch closely the interventions. I would invite hon. members to allow the member who has the floor to carry on with his remarks without too much trouble. The hon. member from Shefford.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention that if the doctor does not find anything wrong with the hon. member who has just interrupted me, we should have the doctor examined.

Mr. Speaker, we, as a people, will pay the price of our stupidity as all other people have down through history because every action calls for a reaction and that is a natural law. We cannot pay the western farmers to let their land lie fallow without provoking a reaction. There will be a day of reckoning for all human stupidity. We cannot put a limit on the milk quotas for the eastern farmers as we have done for many years without getting a reaction and we will pay for that. We cannot destroy 28 million dozen eggs without getting a reaction and we will pay for that. We cannot destroy potatoes by the millions of bushels for years and, at the same time, pray the Good Lord every Sunday to be so kind as to bless the fruits of the earth. The reaction is coming and we will pay for our own stupidity. We cannot hang calves sky high, with their heads to heaven, to protest against prices without getting a reaction. We will pay for our stupidity. Prices are the result of man's good or bad management. The animals in the forest, in the jungle or in the wilderness live off the fruit of the forest provided by nature. Unfortunately they often have a lesson in logic to teach man. The beavers build their dam across waterways without borrowing, without debt or taxes and they do not pay the price of three of four dams to other financial beavers to finance their project. Men, however, through sheer pride in their talent, also build dams which they must repay three or four times over, if not forever, to other men to whom they are indebted for financing the construction of the dams. Beavers build without debts, without taxes, without loans. Men can only build with debts and taxes. That proves, Mr. Speaker, that beavers work more intelligently with their tails than the Liberals in power with their heads.

The Minister of Finance is trying his best to convince himself and us that the present system is good while at the same time bewaring of the economic discomforts that have already emerged. Inflation cannot be stopped, he says. Recession, we will try to avoid, he says.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, if I had a general manager of my businesses telling me the same thing I would not risk waiting for the worst, even with a smile. I would be forced to change the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, having the honour and the privilege of being the lead off speaker of the government on the budget speech my opening words will be first for the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), first to thank him for having placed his confidence in the people of his country during the election of July last and for having offered the people of this country a choice so representative of men and women among the social groups that make up this country and a choice so representative of the age groups that make up Canada.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, a remarkable number of young members are now sitting in this House, and I realize that the responsibilities facing them are extremely heavy responsibilities in view of the present economic situation.

I would also like to pay special tribute to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand). As some of my colleagues sitting on the other side of this House, I was fortunate enough to enter politics with ministers who bring credit to the government of this country. Mr. Marchand is well known in Canada for his sense of aggressiveness and his involvement to ensure that all Canadians have equal access to the resources of this country.

Finally, I would like to note that the seat I now occupy was once the seat of Mr. J. Antonio Thomas, who was a member of this House for nine years and left in his constituency a lasting impression of generosity, of tenacity and especially of honesty. In fact, this man gave an example that several among us should follow in that the member of parliament, in today's context, should be a true social worker, maybe even before being a representative in Parliament.

Indeed, several among us have to deal daily with a population that requests services, and needs easy channels to communicate with the government whose administration, as we all know, is getting ever more complex.

On the other hand, I would like to comment on certain remarks of the previous speaker who severely criticized today those who studied at the London School of Economics.

Like the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) and the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), I am a graduate of the London School of Economics, and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the teachings of this school are not such as described by the previous speaker. On the contrary, if he had asked more questions of the groups who have already taken part—

Mr. Rondeau: On a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford rises on a point of order.

Mr. Rondeau: Will the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Joyal: Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly be glad to reply to all the questions that the hon. member wishes to ask once I have finished my comments.

I would however like to note also certain comments of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Stanfield) who said this afternoon that members from Quebec were particularly silent and did not really defend the interests of their province.

● (1700)

In fact, Mr. Speaker, the present economic situation in Quebec shows disquieting signs generally and in some areas, they are really disappointing. The population in Quebec has not grown satisfactorily compared to neighbouring provinces. The birth rate has dropped by half and for the first time since the end of World War II, there was a net immigration in 1970 and 1971. In 1970-71, there was a net immigration of 382,000 people in Ontario compared to 75,000 people in Quebec. For the first six months of 1974, 29 per cent only of immigrants are French speaking.

The second sign I am concerned about, Mr. Speaker, is the difference between the individual incomes in Quebec and those of other Canadians. In fact, far from decreasing, it has even increased.

The increase in the Quebec labour force in the last ten years is below the Canadian average. Indeed, Quebec's share in Canadian employment is slightly below its share of the population, which accounts for a higher unemployment rate than in Canada as a whole. Further, the quantity and quality of available capital has been below the national average.

Investments grow faster in Quebec than in Canada only in the primary industries, the institutions and the public sector. Despite recent improvements, the growth in the manufacturing industry, trade and utilities is still too low compared to the country as a whole. Productivity per employed person is still lower in Quebec than in the rest of Canada. The main reason for a slower growth in production lies in the very structure of Quebec's economy. Two-thirds of the Quebec labour force are employed in the production of non durable goods. All these meet essential needs, but they represent a rather stable market and especially a slow growth one. Sectors like the textile and the leather industry, which are important in Quebec, face stiff competition.

Demand from countries which have been traditional clients for Canada in this segment tends to stabilize, while nations that export these goods bring tremendous pressure to bear on the Canadian market in order to increase their exports. It should be difficult, Mr. Speaker, to balance such losses since the share of industrial labour in fast-growing industries, such as smelting and metal processing, transportation equipment, electrical equipment and machinery, is slightly more than half the percentage in Ontario. But the markets for Quebec goods are only half the size of those in Ontario, where the proximity of the American interline has considerable influence on the supply of goods produced in Ontario.

Because of lower production and revenues in Quebec, and differences in the production structure, the ability to pay tax per capita is lower than in Canada as a whole. Because of this, the tax burden is higher in Quebec and consequently heavier.

Quebec still produces only 61 per cent of its food needs. The Quebec farm production represents only about 13 per cent of the total Canadian production. In addition, some industries that are important to the economic structure of Quebec are in a very difficult situation. The lumber industry, for instance, has been heavily hit by lay-offs, in spite of a potential that could support twice its current production. Employment in the fishing industry is stationary. The mining industry is holding its own even though the depletion of resources is being felt in some areas. The manufacturing industry is also having problems.

The relocation of employees from hardstruck industries to expanding industries is slower in Quebec than elsewhere. Indeed, only the services sector has shown real signs of dynamic growth, both in employment and in production. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the economic forces at work in Quebec remain the same, we cannot hope to see any improvement in the situation in the near future. If present trends in the Quebec economy do not change, clearly Quebec will not be able to improve the quality of its participation to the national economic progress, nor will its resources achieve the degree of development to be wished for if the living conditions of its citizens are to improve.

Despite concerted efforts since the establishment of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in 1969, it is essential for the federal government to give priority to the definition of measures designed to correct that structural shortcoming at the roots.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, taking into consideration the report tabled by Messrs. Mountain, Higgins and Reno in 1969 on the growth poles of the Quebec economy, we realize that the Montreal region is experiencing a serious setback. Indeed, in most fields, the amazing progress of Toronto leaves us pensive. I do not say so, Mr. Speaker, to point out that there is competition among Canadian cities, but to emphasize the fact that balance in a country is based on an economic growth which takes into account a degree of weakness at each pole.

As far as human resources are concerned, for example, employment in 1966 was 1 per cent in Montreal and 2.9 per cent in Toronto. As for financial institutions, the number of headquarters in Toronto has been increasing as follows: In 1952, for each Toronto head office, there were 1.2 per cent in Montreal. In 1972, this ratio increased to 1.67. Transport, an important economic factor in the Montreal area, is deteriorating. Toronto has become the leader in air transport, is first in trucking, has further shot ahead in railway and water transport. Montreal has now only 6 per cent of the Canadian shipping of general goods, as compared with 12 per cent in 1961 and 40 per cent at the turn of the century.

The Montreal manufacturing industry also dropped off. New investment in Montreal grew from $180 million to $371 million between 1961 and 1971. In Toronto, in the same period, they jumped from $168 million to $438 million. In the communications area, the rise of Toronto has been staggering. Computers number 772 while in Montreal there are only 549. The sales situation is clearer at the provincial level, with assets of 1,873 units in Ontario against 764 in the province of Quebec. Advertising agencies are established mostly in Toronto and are the ones who feed Montreal with contracts.

The growth in the field of telephone, telex and telecomputers bears evidence to the leading part that Toronto is playing over Montreal. In the material resources and building fields, there again a sharp decline. During that period, industrial building increased by 32 per cent in Toronto and declined by 15 per cent in Montreal. The rate of use of hotel rooms is now 55 per cent in Montreal and 66 per cent in Toronto. Mr. Speaker, I deliberately leave aside a number of factors that would only better illustrate my first remarks.

Therefore, I completely agree with the Minister of Finance when he mentions in his budget that we should constrain governmental capital projects in those parts of the country where conditions continue to be tight. This selective approach, said he, as well as our regional development policies, is especially important when the economic situation is so mixed with shortages continuing in many sectors and regions and surpluses developing in others.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the budget as presented also affects a vital segment of the Canadian economy.

My colleagues who spoke before me this afternoon pointed out the importance of housing. My colleague from Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) even said it was a social right. Mr. Speaker, I am completely in agreement with that assertion. It is nothing new. As a matter of fact, in the report of the Board of inquiry on Health and Social Welfare, better known as the Castonguay-Neveu Commission, published in 1971, one can see on page 184 the statement on the following right:

> To recognize home ownership as a universal right therefore implies a direct action of the state on the whole housing industry, that today still depends almost entirely upon private entreprise.

As universal access to education and medical care required governments to assume their responsability in those areas, in lieu of private enterprise, so to acknowledge entitlement to housing as a universal right implies a similar need for direct intervention in housing services.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, because of changes in our political philosophy, we have come to consider housing today as a government priority. Such a priority was reasserted in a report published in July 1974 by the Economic Council of Canada under the following title: "Toward a more stable growth in construction". Recommendation No. 7, reads as follows:

> ... we recommend that future low-income housing efforts be organized and funded so as to ensure a smooth growth path over a period of years, on a regional basis, independent of any swings in other residential or nonresidential construction.

There is no doubt in my mind, Mr. Speaker, that we have to separate housing, public housing, from the whole business of economic activities relating to housing in general.

The federal government has had various experiences in dealing with public housing since 1964. In 1970, a $200 million program was to be introduced to provide for the building of low cost housing units. That program taught us meaningful lessons. In fact, it was bitterly criticized, and most of the projects developed under that program experienced operating difficulties and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation had to take over in several instances.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to quickly go over the facts presently underlying the building industry. We know that in 1974, the number of starts has decreased alarmingly. In fact, it dropped from 266,900 units in August 1973 to 206,100 in August 1974. There are several causes to that slowing down. The first one is the rising cost of manpower, which rose by 9.9 per cent within 12 months. Another reason is the rising cost of building materials which rose during the same period by 10.7 per cent. Besides, the regulations which were introduced to control rent increases in some classes of rental housing also had the effect of slowing down the market. Moreover, the mortgage market also experienced hard times. Interest rates have gone up and the shortage of funds has been clearly felt.

Over that same period, business investments and investments in office buildings have grown considerably. In fact, Mr. Speaker, looking at it, that increase in investments is positively colossal. In the sole Montreal area, while investments in office building construction neared $2 billion, only 100 million were invested in public housing.

Mr. Speaker, I believe those figures speak for themselves, and we can realize the significance of housing at this time for the government.

A well balanced housing policy should have two objects in view. First, it should be aimed at preserving currently available units. the best way to do it is to pass, as soon as possible, certain regulations that would allow the Department of Urban Affairs to put a fund at the disposal of municipalities to encourage owners to renovate their dwellings in accordance with the National Building Code. This is the passive aspect of the policy, Mr. Speaker, in that it is aimed at protecting dwellings now available without increasing their number.

In Montreal, at least 15,000 units should be started to meet present needs. If this objective is to be reached, we shall bring basic changes to our housing concept. It is essential to establish a ceiling for land prices. In fact, in the budget speech, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) mentioned a policy that would allow land owners to put back in the economic system their enormous stocks of land instead of waiting the effects of inflation before releasing them.

On the other hand, when it comes to skilled labour, the figures given by manpower reveal a surprising shortage. In fact, even with a relatively high unemployment rate, there is a shortage of skilled labour in housing.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, all the regulations concerning the proficiency certificate should be reviewed. When a young man gets laid off, the months of training he has accumulated are lost and he must start all over again when he goes back to work. He therefore loses his apprenticeship days and this has for immediate effect that young workers, which should normally constitute one of the main strengths of our economy, lose interest in the building industry.

On the other hand, as concerns building materials, I was very happy of the annoucement made by the hon. Minister of Finance concerning the reduction of the 11 per cent sales tax. Like my opposition colleagues, Mr. Speaker, I have for several years emphasized the effects of such a tax on the building market. I whole heartedly support the Minister of Finance when he states that the present situation allows this reduction. However, I wonder what effect it will have. In fact, like all my colleagues, I sincerely hope that the reduction will be passed on to the consumer and will not be pocketed by the contractor.

However, Mr. Speaker, Canada has a free-trade policy for building materials. I believe that it is time that this policy be reviewed and access to materials regulated. There again, Mr. Speaker, we are completed by today's situation to make an in depth review of positions that we have always believed to be immovable.

The economic effects of regulations aimed at controlling rent increases should also be reviewed. It is now impossible to judge if the tendency towards higher interest rates is caused precisely by this factor. Our sub-contracting system should also be reviewed. There is considerable outbidding by sub-contractors on the financial market. This outbidding has nothing to do with the cost of materials and manpower. It is caused simply by an increase in demand and there is no reason, Mr. Speaker, why the required regulations in this area should not be implemented.

I also want to deal with the cost of money for apartment buildings starts. This aspect is a most important one, Mr. Speaker. Tax concessions which might be granted to investors in joint housing should be re-examined in the near future. There could be loans, tax cuts, measures to stimulate investments primarily into that sector, forgeting for a while commercial and office space investments.

I would also like, Mr. Speaker, to draw the attention of the municipalities to a certain form of municipal by-laws. In today's context, the contractors are quite often responsible for sewering the land. The city supervises and approves. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, a contractor making profits with such services should no longer be allowed to do so. The municipalities should be the sole contractor responsible for the installation of such services in new developments.

It would also be important that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation review its standards. I feel that the standard of 22 per cent of gross income is no longer in line with reality. The increase in salaries and household costs are such that the standards now applied by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation no longer reflect market constraints.

I would also like to point out, Mr. Speaker, the need to provide the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation with a committee on the economic situation. Such a committee would allow the Corporation to adjust its policies and programs in line with market developments.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to stress the effects on the housing market in Quebec of an agreement passed in the month of July last between the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Quebec Housing Corporation. Under that agreement the Quebec Housing Corporation becomes the only implementer of housing policies in Quebec with the funds of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. That agreement will have two effects.

In the first place, public housing is no longer owned by municipalities but by the provincial government. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the results will be achieved directly through the centralization of a bureaucracy that should remain at the citizens' level. I am perfectly aware that the provinces should be implementers of housing policy in certain areas, but I personally feel deep concern that in the present context we should no longer leave to other levels of government a responsibility that lies squarely and mainly within federal jurisdiction.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would mention one of the main features of the budget speech, and by that I mean the statement by the Minister of Finance that in the current inflation period, no group will use any measure of restriction unless they know other groups will do the same. Each group has a tendancy to protect itself against the highest rates of inflation it anticipates. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the minister of Finance is referring here to the inflationary escalation. In this context, groups in short are forced to protect themselves against whatever the economy can offer them. I recall that during these last few months we paid visits to food stores where the management had deliberately changed their prices even though they had been supplied with products at prices lower than what is now being asked for the same products on the market. I am anxious to see the hon. Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) get the approval of this House on the bill which will limit excessive profits and impose drastic controls upon these double prices.

I would like in concluding to emphasize one of the most significant elements in today's political situation. It concerns all the social groups, the community organizations which are working out plans to protect themselves and to make the public aware of the needs of their membership. In recent years, we have witnessed the coming on the Canadian political scene of a variety of Canadian committees and community groups banding together to oppose rent increases, to fight against price rises or even to fight against the nefarious effects of credit that some of my colleagues have discussed earlier.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that each and every member of this House should be very much concerned about the fact that leadership in social policy reforms may not be provided only by the members themselves but also by these groups. I know, Mr. Speaker, that all kinds of abuses are being committed but I do believe that their aim is, in short, to improve the economic and social conditions of people with the same needs as their own. Personally, I am glad that the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner), the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), and the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) have come up with policies which allow these groups to participate more in the preparation of government reforms.

Mr. Speaker, during the forthcoming debate, I will gladly receive any proposal which the hon. members opposite may care to submit on various aspects of the budget. However, I am very anxious to have it adopted as expeditiously as possible, so that people most in need may benefit as soon as possible from the tax reductions provided in their case.

[English]

Mr. Rondeau: May I ask the hon. member who has just taken his seat a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) is seeking the floor for the purpose of asking a question. Is it agreed that he be granted this permission?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: In view of the fact that the hon. member said in his early remarks that he attended the London School of Economics, could he tell us who launched the financing of the foundation of this school?

Mr. Joyal: Mr. Speaker, I have a great respect for those who presided over the foundation of the London School of Economics. When they contributed to collecting the funds which were necessary for the establishment of the school, they clearly indicated in the constitutive charter that one of the priorities of the school should be to promote the interest of the less favoured in England, particularly coal miners and textile workers.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Shefford is taking into account the direction this school took when referring to the funds which enabled its establishment. In fact, had he himself sat on the benches of this school, he would have realized that it actually formed the most progressive men in England.

[English]

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect this afternoon to be participating in a debate on the rights and wrongs of the foundation of the London School of Economics. Nevertheless it was very interesting and elevating.

From present indications, with one notable exception, it appears to me as though this budget debate consists of a litany of shortcomings, broken commitments and Liberal failures to face their responsibilities. Would that it were otherwise, but I will add mine to the list, speaking from some experience. Let us take consultations, for example. Liberal consultations, as we have seen them in this budget speech and in the budget of May 6, were a sham. I speak of consultations—and we might cite them by the hundreds—about Pickering, Ste. Scholastique, Vancouver airport, and Victoria airport. The gesture of consultation is there, but the decision is made before the consultations are undertaken, and the steamroller goes on, Mr. Speaker.

My concern this afternoon, however, is less with the sham of Liberal consultations than with the lethargy, apathy or straightforward inactivity of the government in the face of problems pressing on the Canadian people: inflation, housing, excessive government expenditure—and that comes into a number of categories—or even such mundane matters as the tanker route.

Since as long ago as the time when I made my maiden speech, almost two years ago, I have been urging the government to take action on the West Coast tanker route. I kept up the pressure by well placed and pertinent questions. I tried to be constructive, but all to no avail. I consider the matter sufficiently important, Mr. Speaker, that I feel compelled to go over the ground once more and bring together in one place the dangers, needs, proposals, advantages, and the means of attainment.

When I first addressed this House in my maiden speech of February, 1973, I spoke about marine services in all aspects.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We will never forget it.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I am afraid the government has forgotten many things. The fact that I spoke of it at that time should not be a surprise, given my background with coastal command during the Second World War, my service abroad, the location of my riding and my home.

When I am at home I look out my front windows on a part of that inland sea which embraces Puget Sound, the HARO Strait and the Gulf of Georgia. If I were not to live in the Saanich part of my riding, as I do, but in the Esquimalt part, I should look out on a body of equally well known water, the Strait of Juan de Fuca. One way or another I am surrounded by a very important body of water, jurisdiction over which we have still to determine according to replies to some of my questions lately. I think this is open to discussion, however.

My concern with these matters is therefore quite natural, and furthermore is sufficiently broad to include fisheries, pollution, delimitation of inland waters as well as the means of enforcing regulations affecting those vital areas, that is, a realistic coastguard, in other words, a maritime protective service.

My experience in parliament, a matter of not quite two years, has shown me that to deal with a subject once in debate is not really sufficient. However reasonable and sensible one's ideas may be, they have to be repeated time and time again, particularly with this government, before there is the slightest indication they have begun to sink in at all.

I have always thought it unfortunate that parliamentary delegations on assignments abroad are not provided with an automatic opportunity, under the rules of the House, to report on the outcome of their assignments or, better still, to open up debate on the outcome of their visits. I tried to do this on July 25, 1973, the day following a visit to Washington by a small all-party delegation from this House, of which I was a member, to let people in the United States Congress know how deeply concerned we were about the dangers of the proposed west coast tanker route from Valdez, Alaska, south through the Pacific into the Puget Sound, through the Strait of Juan de Fuca, and then via the Rosario Strait to Cherry Point for offloading. My interest was prompted because of the location of my riding, and also because of the notion I put forward at that meeting which, in my view, has not only regional but national impact. Since I still feel that the proposal I made in Washington is worth recording I propose to repeat it now.

First, I think one or two things about the Alaska-Cherry Point tanker route that prompt my worry and concern are worth mentioning, considering the inactivity of the government to do anything about the matter. One is that ships carrying Prudoe Bay crude from Valdez to Cherry Point can travel the entire route over a combination of U.S. waters and the high seas. That is to say that passage through the Strait of Juan de Fuca can be negotiated without entering Canadian waters. Canada's ability to block, or even to regulate or control ships plying these waters is, in other words, nil. Our negotiating position on the question would appear to be negligible. We can exhort, plead or urge, but we seem to be in no position to bargain. As I shall indicate later, we have a bargaining position and have failed to use it.

The second thing about the route we are looking at is that the Strait of Juan de Fuca, though reasonably wide, is subject to high winds, strong tides, and fogs at all seasons. The daily weather reports that I hear when I am home indicate a small craft warning nearly every day. That means that winds are blowing up to 30 miles per hour, with riptides. This strait, and the Rosario Strait, through which the tankers also have to pass, are treacherous, subject to strong winds, strong tides, and the currents seem to run, in the main, from south to north, for example, toward the Canadian shore.

Another thing about this route relates to fisheries because, through these narrow binational waters without regard to boundaries, passes one of the last surviving large salmon migrations, out to sea as fingerlings or grilse, and later at spawning, as full grown fish, heading inland to lay their eggs, perpetuate their kind, and die.

A large oil spill in these waters would endanger this migration, threaten the livelihood of many commercial fishermen, both Canadian and from the United States, and cast a lasting blemish on a marine playground enjoyed by thousands, nay, perhaps millions. Is it any wonder then that I feel obliged to raise my voice in defence of these waters?

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

When we went to Washington on that visit in July, 1973, I put before the assembled group a proposal that the United States authorities concerned should consider an oil route that would eliminate the need to use that inland sea altogether. The tankers, I suggested, should proceed further down the coast to the nearest feasible offloading site. I mentioned Gray's Harbour, just 100 miles or so down the Washington coast, where deep sea facilities are already available—in depths which, admittedly, would not accommodate the deepest of deep draft tankers, but in waters that are dredgible. And if dredging produced insuperable engineering problems then possibly offloading could be assured, with less danger, in a basin. This motion was well received. I have since given it wide circulation among interested congressmen, state officials and oilmen, and I have publicized it in Canada.

The then secretary of state for external affairs said it was not really his business to propose alternative offloading sites. What is to be lost by so doing, I ask?

The great shortcoming of this proposal—and I recognized it as well as anyone—was that Canada did not appear to have any leverage or persuasive argument to make the United States listen. We did not seem to have a negotiating position. As soon as we start to talk about keeping the tankers out of the inland sea, we get back the arguments of (a) what about the tankers taking oil out of Vancouver harbour through these waters—this was done, regrettably, at the height of the Middle East oil panic last spring—or (b) what about the tankers in United States waters on the east coast, offloading Venezuelan and/or Middle East oil for eastern Canada through Portland, Maine? These are tough arguments to counter. The first of these counter-arguments has disappeared, I hope forever. What about the other one?

Can we not negotiate? Can we not trade off safety in east coast United States waters in return for real safety in west coast binational waters? Why not, I suggest now, off-load east coast oil at present terminals in Nova Scotia, say, and use a pipeline to carry the crude, or refined product, to consumers in Quebec? Is it the cost of a pipeline that is stopping us?

We talk, with some abandon, of a pipeline or a railway across the Canadian Arctic to the United States border. Why not the much shorter pipeline on the east coast from Port Hawkesbury, say, to Quebec City? The approaches to Port Hawkesbury are not nearly so devious as the approaches to Portland, in Maine, are said to be, Mr. Speaker.

If we were to give serious consideration to this notion, we should have a negotiating position—we keep their backyard tidy, and they undertake not to throw their dirty oil barrels in our backyard, or in my front yard. I suggest, therefore, that we do have a negotiating point. I put it forward merely as one possible way out—we avoid Portland, Maine; they avoid the Strait of Juan de Fuca. Thus we save our west coast fisheries from the threat of an oil spill; and we save the shipping channels in and around Portland, Maine, from the risk of frightful pollution.

Gray's Harbour, at the mouth of the Chehalis River, the entry from the sea to Aberdeen, Washington, is the port which I suggest should be used. I made this suggestion in Washington more than a year ago. I said, "Either dredge the channel that is already there for deeper draft ships, or create an off-shore offloading rig, as is done in the Persian Gulf; or construct a fully protected basin." The swell, I am told, off this part of the coast of Washington is something to experience. Overcoming it involves engineering. Mr. Speaker, engineering problems are there to be solved; they are not there to beat us down.

And what of the cost? We should have a cost to bear in transporting our offloaded oil from our east coast port to the large consumer centres east of the Ottawa Valley; they would incur the expense of improving facilities at Gray's Harbour and transporting the crude oil only a few hundred miles to refineries at Cherry Point or Eugene, Oregon.

I submit that the sort of pipeline I am suggesting will bring advantages over and above those which are readily apparent. It would provide a transport vehicle for Canadian oil to flow east when the right moment comes, if we can ever get back into production. Considering the provisions of the present budget, I wonder if we shall ever be able to do this. Nevertheless, if the pipeline were in place we should have in our hands a real bargaining weapon and not be subject to OPEC's whims and arm twisting.

In light of this budget and its depressing effect on production, my proposal may be out of step with the times. On the other hand, if we can recover from the deductibility features of this budget, we may be able to consider the ideas I have put forward and put these notions to work.

I wish to deal with other matters relating to the proposed tanker route, such as navigational aids which will be needed for regular merchantmen using our inland sea off Vancouver Island. Because of the time limitation, I must put these concerns to one side and talk of a matter which is equally important in maritime terms. I am referring to the enforcement machinery at Canada's disposal. This relates to the claims the government made at the Law of the Sea Conference which was held last summer in Caracas.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, this debate is very likely to turn into a litany of complaints about problems. At this point, however, I wish to pay tribute to the Canadian delegation which carried Canada's case at the conference in Caracas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Do not applaud too quickly. While I was there I saw that the operation was wholly in the hands of public officials. Of these I cannot speak too highly. They were professionals to their fingertips and they worked tirelessly for causes of deepest concern to Canadians—reduction of the risk of pollution on and off our shores—this ties in with my present remarks and with those immediately foregoing—fisheries, appropriate jurisdiction for mining and petroleum development off our shores, marine research and so on.

As an observer at the conference rather than as a delegate, I naturally made no public allusion during my short stay in Caracas to the reservations I had about the position the government was taking, or, rather, to the doubts I harboured as to the government's ability to present a credible case on its claims to jurisdiction over an economic zone extending 200 miles off-shore.

It is important to look at this 200-mile zone and see what it actually means. Of course, we are talking about 200 miles to seaward from a headland to headland baseline drawn around our deeply indented coasts. In short, we are talking of 200 nautical miles, which equal 230 land miles that you, Mr. Speaker, and I travel in our cars. To give this distance some real meaning, I suggest that we get in a car and travel for four hours without let-up at 60 miles an hour. At the end of four hours, if you were at sea, you would reach the edge of the 200-mile zone. That is a long way.

In terms of area, the proportions of this economic zone to seaward are even more staggering. Extending our jurisdiction seaward by 200 miles from our east coast and west coast is like adding a few more provinces. I do not think the government understands this. Have you any idea, Mr. Speaker, how much extra acreage is involved? Extending this zone 200 miles out to sea of our east and west coasts alone would mean adding another 660,000 square miles to the area over which we claim jurisdiction. That would be like adding another Quebec plus another set of maritime provinces, or another Ontario plus a second Manitoba.

What bothers me is that we must enforce our writ over all that extra territory. I do not believe, as matters now stand, that we have that enforcement capability. Nothing in the budget suggests that we shall acquire that capability. This afternoon the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson), in reply to a question, said that his department is carrying out patrols every once in a while. The next one will be carried out next month, and the next one the month after that. This I find frightening.

I have long contended that Canada's coastguard is inadequate even for patrolling and enforcing jurisdiction over our existing territorial waters, which at present extend only 12 miles offshore. Complaints have been heard from both coasts, and incidents recorded regularly in the press and queried in this House during question period, testifying to the validity of my contention.

As a consequence the question I must ask myself, and which I now put to the ministers concerned, is this: given that we do not have a seaborne protective service on a scale sufficient to keep poachers out of our present 12-mile waters, what measures are being taken to remedy that situation, in view of the possibility that we might shortly be expected to keep poachers out of a 200-mile zone; or, if we are not to keep poachers out, how are we to keep track of licensed vessels within the area to ensure that what they are doing meets with our approval?

My second question relates to the first one. It is the question which I refrained from asking during the conference, but it is one which must now be faced honestly. It is this: how forcefully does the government believe it can press its claim to a 200-mile economic zone at an international conference—the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) might ponder this question—when it is clear for all to see that we are completely unprepared to enforce any mandate we might secure over such an area.

And if, as I believe, our case is weakened precisely by the absence of enforcement machinery, what plans is the government able to announce, in the way of shipbuilding programs, for example, command structure reorganization—not to mention improvements in our airborne surveillance posture—which will make Canada's claim more credible? The recent replies of the Minister of National Defence have given cause for even greater worry than I felt when I was in Caracas.

This is like the question which was asked many years ago in another context, and it is the question which our friends were asking us in Caracas: how many divisions has the Pope? How many divisions has Canada? I have asked this question four or five times in the last year or 18 months in the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, but was pooh-poohed for my pains. Speaking in plain credibility terms, who is going to believe that we are serious in advancing our argument in favour of a 200-mile economic zone off-shore, let alone a good claim out to the margin, unless we can show that we are either prepared or are seriously preparing to carry out appropriate enforcement measures in that extended territory?

By enforcement I do not necessarily mean total exclusion of all comers, but rather enforcement of rules of our making as to the size of catch, kinds of fish caught, open and closed season and so on; management decisions over that extended territory. That is what we have to make. That is what we have to enforce. That is what we cannot now enforce.

Extending our coastline out 200 miles on the Pacific and Atlantic means, as I said, adding another Ontario and another Manitoba over which we should be able to exercise some control. To carry our claim out to the edge of the margin, as would be required if we wanted to protect the breeding grounds where our inshore species begin their life cycle, to carry our claim out that additional distance into the Atlantic as far as the Flemish Cap, the only area affected, would mean we would be taking in another British Columbia. Is the government aware of the scale of these extensions of territory? I think it is completely oblivious to these dimensions.

The magnitude of these claims takes on some meaning when stated in these terms. To satisfy the wishes, and possibly the needs of all Canadians in terms of fishing and spawning grounds, we might have to acquire control over seaward areas as great as Ontario, Manitoba and British Columbia combined. How are we going to exercise any sort of control over such areas with our present seaborne and airborne equipment?

All we have is some 86 vessels of all types operated by the Department of Transport, not one of which is designed to travel much more than 12 to 15 miles offshore at the best of times, and not one of which has the speed required, let alone being built for offshore service, to intercept and inspect poachers in distant waters. Can you imagine what patrolling the whole of Ontario and Manitoba would be like with patrol cars, not one of which is capable of travelling at more than 25 miles per hour, and none of them fitted with snow tires? That is the sort of comparison I am making here. It is ludicrous.

The navy could do this work if we could man the vessels now stored in polyethylene. I am sure it would rise to that challenge, but before the navy can take on, or even share properly in such a task, some decisions are needed from government so that those in command of our naval units have the power to search and, at need, to arrest. I might point out that a commander of a Canadian naval vessel does not have the power in peace time to carry out an arrest unless it is expressly accorded to him by the Minister of Fisheries on a case to case basis.

Are our naval forces enough to handle these extended territories? What plans does the government have to strengthen our hand at sea? The Minister of State (Fisheries) (Mr. LeBlanc) mentioned in committee the other day plans to lay down six new keels. That is good, but will those additions to the coastguard and naval strength prove sufficient to meet our future needs in that vastly extended area of the sea? Somehow I doubt it. I fear the decisions have not been taken long enough in advance of the need.

To be absolutely convincing, both at home and at the international conference table, we have to show that we mean business inside our newly acquired economic zone, be it 200 miles or out to the edge of the margin. Command structures must be redesigned, and new tasks for our maritime and airborne services have to be clearly established so that effective surveillance can be carried out, and so that offenders will know they will be brought to task speedily.

Let it be added here that it would be a mistake to think of the remodelled force charged with guarding our coasts, which I like to call our maritime protection service, and let us not think of it solely in terms of our fisheries. A capable and competent protective service is needed for pollution patrol as well.

This was written before hearing the comments today and yesterday of the Minister of National Defence. I know I will be told that our long-range patrol aircraft, our Argus and their replacements, if they are ever acquired, can effectively carry out the surveillance necessary in terms of pollution control. We are told they can. To observe maybe, but not to prevent.

You cannot serve summonses from aircraft. Those of us who have flown in aircraft on patrol know it is an impossibility. The very idea that a surface vessel on patrol could pop up over the horizon at any moment, with a warrant to arrest nailed to its masthead, is enough to deter any skipper from sluicing out his bilges as soon as he loses sight of land and discharging filthy oil sludge into the sea just off our beaches, a sludge which produces a film to cut off the oxygen necessary for the healthy development, the very life, of our fish.

The fact that in Canadian waters today—and tomorrow too, unless the government stirs its stumps—no skipper need fear the appearance of any such vessel is like a ticket of leave to do whatever the skipper wants to do once he can no longer be seen from the shore.

The government has been severely criticized for its inaction in the face of inflation, its failure to deal effectively with unemployment insurance abuses, its inability to treat the veterans properly, its reckless spending of public funds, and its refusal to reduce taxes for the needy. Now we see it inviting a perilous situation, for example, the creation of wide expanses of ocean that it is going to have to control and with which it is going to be totally incapable of dealing. I see but little sign of increased capacity in our waterborne strength, certainly none to match that which is involved in our extended responsibility.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. It being six o'clock this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

AGREEMENT ON TIME LIMIT FOR SPEECHES DURING BUDGET DEBATE

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there have been informal discussions amongst the House leaders and there is general agreement that, in order to give more members an opportunity to participate in the debate on the budget, speeches be limited to 20 minutes.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

TABLING OF REPORT ON BILINGUALISM WITHIN PUBLIC SERVICE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table a report on the progress that has been made in implementing the resolution adopted by Parliament in June 1973 as it relates to carrying out the government's responsibilities under the Official Languages Act.

The report contains the results of the process of identifying the language requirements of all positions in the Public Service for which the Treasury Board is the employer. Information is provided on the number of bilingual employees occupying positions identified as bilingual, as well as data related to language training for public servants.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, hon. members will note that the number of positions identified as bilingual is approximately 53,600, compared to the estimate of 25,000 made in December, 1972. The main reasons for this are that the number of bilingual positions required to serve the public servants were underestimated. In addition, to allow public servants to work in the official language of their choice, the number of bilingual supervisory positions is higher than estimated. Criteria for identifying bilingual positions were established in consultation with certified bargaining agents.

Fifty-three per cent of incumbents of bilingual positions are bilingual, leaving an estimated training load of some 19,000, the majority of whom are Anglophones. Experience with full-time language training is still quite limited and it will be some time before complete data becomes available on the number of employees who will be able to complete language training successfully. However, the government wishes to ensure that the maximum number of public servants are able to acquire a knowledge of their second official language. Therefore, a study will be carried out by recognized linguists to determine why some persons appear to be unable to learn a second language and whether, as a consequence, teaching methods can be improved.

In addition, at the request of the government the Public Service Commission has agreed that, effective immediately, unilingual employees aged 60—or over, will automatically be exempted from language training while retaining the right to occupy or be appointed to bilingual positions. This means that a unilingual employee aged 60 or over who has all the other qualifications for a bilingual position can be appointed to the position without having to become bilingual.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution adopted by Parliament called for measures to increase the use of French within the Public Service as well as for ensuring full participation of both the anglophone and francophone communities. Hon. members will, I am sure, hope for a continued improvement in the situation indicated by the statistics describing a linguistic profile of the Public Service.

During the process of implementation of Parliament's Resolution the Certified Bargaining Agents have been consulted. The fruitfulness of our consultations with these employee representatives and particularly the work of the Official Languages Committee of the National Joint Council deserve special mention and I wish to express the appreciation of the government.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would like to thank the minister for his courtesy in supplying a copy of the statement well in advance. I think all members of this House want to make certain that Canadians can secure the services of their government in both languages and that our public service will not only be the best possible but, more than that, it will be a contented public service while this process is going on. Even Liberals, however, are human—

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —and there are few greater examples of mismanagement than with respect to this program and its implementation which is so important to the future unity of our country. Perhaps I should not be unduly unfair in singling out the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien)—as many of his colleagues are equally guilty of mismanagement, as we saw a few days ago at the beginning of the debate in which we are involved.

Let me tell the House why we on this side believe there has been gross mismanagement. I will use only the data contained in the minister's statement to support my claim; then I will tell hon. members how the program could have been implemented in a much more efficient, economic and humane manner. Let us consider the minister's report. It shows, first, that the government has misled the Canadian public, this House and the public service. The report shows that the number of positions identified as bilingual has more than doubled in two years, from 25,000 to approximately 53,600. Notice the word "approximately", for the figure may go substantially higher. There is little evidence here of any sensible planning before the government made its decision.

This increase, apart from being an example of the government's shoddy preparation for the bilingual program, has deeper implications. It shows that Canadians who are unilingual, either Francophone or Anglophone, will find it more and more difficult to reach the higher ranks of the federal public service; and since, as the government admits, no one knows why some of us cannot learn languages, the government is unnecessarily halting the careers of a large number of young Canadians. When one considers the lack of leadership by the federal government in the provision of language training in schools across the country, and the relative failure of the government's own language training program, one can appreciate the hardship caused to young Canadians.

Nineteen per cent of all positions are now designated bilingual. In the national capital region the figure reaches 66.4 per cent. This means that promotion in our national capital region is highly restricted. Yet even outside Ottawa the chances of promotion are not much better. A glance at appendix B to the report provided by the minister shows that 92.7 per cent of all executive positions, 36.6 per cent of administrative positions, 26.8 per cent of all scientific and professional positions, and 25 per cent of all administrative support positions are designated as bilingual in which fluent use of both French and English is essential.

These figures make a mockery of the various so-called protections provided in the government's proposals for the implementation of bilingualism in the federal public service of this country. The minister, in his report, demonstrates the generosity of the government, if I may use that word. Unilingual employees aged 60 or over will be exempt from language training while retaining the right to occupy or to be appointed to bilingual positions. Since at the same time the government is endeavouring to force many civil servants into retirement at the age of 60, one can see exactly how much protection is afforded by such vacuous statements as the one just referred to. The government admits, as we all must, that there is a serious problem in connection with language training. This is a problem which seems to bother most English-speaking countries and countries such as ours where a high proportion of the population speaks English. Most educators could have told the government the grave problems facing it in the area of language education. The evidence was all around the government but was obviously ignored and the government decided to go ahead without consultation.

We need to do a number of things. Most of all, we need to improve the motivation of members of the public service of this country to join wholeheartedly and willingly in the bilingualism program. If we are to accomplish this we must do certain things. First, we must reform our language training programs so that far fewer public servants will need to take full-time, centralized training programs. This can be done by having continuing interdepartmental programs which will assist members of the department concerned to understand and read the other official language. Only those with particular motivation and aptitudes should be required to take full language training in order to qualify, which would involve competence in speaking and writing as well. Competence in reading and comprehension are sufficient for many of the tasks necessary in positions which have currently been designated as bilingual in the full sense. An increase in the number of public servants who can read in the other official language will mean that an increasing number of unilingual personnel, either Francophone or Anglophone, can be employed in better positions than at present.

I suggest we also need to adopt a new approach to the operational side of the public service based upon a decentralized, bilingual infrastructure. We need a rapid translation capability so that an increasing number of Canadians can work in their own language within their departments. A little outside advice would have helped the government improve the implementation of these programs. That advice was offered but the government refused to accept it.

In closing, let me say that we are just beginning the debate on the budget; therefore I am particularly disappointed that the minister's statement did not contain any figures concerning the cost of the program. Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to remind hon. members that during the twenty-ninth parliament we asked the government to put into the law of the land the protection of the guidelines that we dealt with in that debate. This they have apparently refused to do. I think the public service is not served well by that refusal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have often wondered why I have so much difficulty learning French.

[Translation]

Now I understand: I am 60 years old—

[English]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That applause was so delayed in coming that I thought I would have to translate into English what I had said in French. This whole question of bilingualism in Canada, particularly bilingualism in the public service is, to put it mildly, a sensitive issue. Nevertheless, the fact is that parliament, with the support of all four parties, passed the Official Languages Act and has continued to support the policy of bilingualism in the public service, because we believe it should be made possible for Canadians of both our official languages to communicate freely and easily with their government. Therefore, it seems that we can only approve when the government indicates it is taking steps to try to carry out a policy decision that has been made by parliament.

It is true that along with its responsibility to develop that policy, the government also has the responsibility to be fair to the employees concerned, particularly those who are unilingual either way. We welcome the fact that this is still being recognized by the federal government. We welcome in particular the recognition—I alluded in my opening remarks to this fact—that for some persons it is difficult to learn another language. My hon. friend across the way, who just said he is having no trouble learning English, is an example of proficiency in this field, as is the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) who, when he first came here, did not know a word of English.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I like the realism of the statement that it is necessary to carry out a study by recognized linguists to determine whether our teaching methods are filling the bill. If they are not, we believe the government would do well to see that those teaching methods are improved. On behalf of my party, I wish also to say that we like the recognition on page 9 of the report that the only way this problem of learning a second language can be resolved for Canada as a whole is for Canadians to have the chance to acquire the basic knowledge of a second language, be it English or French, at an early age.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We believe that this recognition should be put into practice even more than it is at the present time. It is quite possible to get into a numbers game on this issue and it is quite possible to be aware of the sensitivities, feelings and criticism which there may be. However, Canada, being the kind of country that it is, and this parliament having endorsed the principle that bilingualism should be a fact in the public service, we believe efforts should be made to work that out with fairness to all concerned. This includes both major language groups and the rights of all those in the public service.

I have just one other word to say to the government. Acceptance of the principle of bilingualism in certain parts of Canada is helped if the policy of multiculturalism is pushed and advanced, and I urge that the government put a little more steam into that program. In fact, it might be a good idea once again to assign a full-time minister to that effort, to the development of multiculturalism in all parts of Canada.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should have thought that the minister would have made a statement to the effect that the government was willing to supply the department of education of each and every Canadian province with the funds required to teach both official languages in our schools. Absolutely no more than five years would be required for all Canadians to become fully and totally bilingual. Once again we start at the end of the line.

Mr. Speaker, when I hear our minister telling us about the good intentions of the government and yet see that some departments are still hiring unilingual staff, I wonder then how sincere the minister is.

Recently I took an Air Canada flight; some of the young hostesses of 20 or 22, spoke only one language, English, and they had just been hired. I claim that if a young French-Canadian girl wants to be hired by Air Canada, she should learn English, just as an English-speaking one should have to learn French before getting a job with Air Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the minister says that 53 per cent of those who hold bilingual positions are already bilingual. Thus that leaves some 19,000 people who are mainly English-speaking. The minister should have said totally English-speaking, because in the federal ministries, no French-speaking civil servant is going to be hired if he does not speak English. I know that by experience.

Mr. Speaker, the other point that I find very hard on present civil servants is that the minister says: At the request of the government, the Civil Service Commission has accepted unilingual employees aged 60 or over. Mr. Speaker, just ask someone who is 50 or 60 years old to learn the second official language. It is almost impossible and I think it is unfair. You do not learn the second language when you are 50 years old: that is much too late. So, instead of saying: Civil servants of 60 or over, the minister should have said: 50 or over and established the maximum at 50 years of age. But we are still going to spend money to teach the two languages to the 35 or 40 year-old civil servants. I have nothing against that, on the contrary. If the government gave those millions to the provinces to allow them to teach the two languages to their young people as early as the first grade in all the provinces of Canada, we would obtain much better results within five years. The member for Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) says it is up to the provinces to do that. We spent $53 million to learn that English was spoken in Ontario and French in Quebec. Why don't we spend another $53 million to teach both languages to the young people of Canada and within five years Canada will be a bilingual nation. That is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order respecting the import controls on beef and pork which have been imposed by the United States government over the past few days. The reason for my point of order is this. The situation might be very serious in terms of pork for the immediate term, and in terms of beef for the long term. We could be talking about a loss in sales of up to $100 million. I think to a great extent the government has brought on the problem by its own fumbling and mismanagement—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member be good enough to come to his point of order.

Mr. Murta: My point of order is this. The minister indicated that he would make a statement in the House telling the Canadian people what the government is proposing to do. Even if the government is going to meet with officials of the United States government in the near future, I still feel that it is up to the Minister of Agriculture to give some explanation to the Canadian people so that we know what the government is doing, if anything.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. In yesterday's Hansard, at page 1496, in reply to a question by my colleague the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) regarding the world food conference in Rome, the Minister of Agriculture replied, in part:

> I will be making a more detailed statement tomorrow, and I hope that some of these questions will be answered at that time in more detail.

This simply confirms the assurance that I thought some of us had from the minister that a detailed statement on the world food conference in Rome would be made on a day not later than today. I can appreciate the minister's very serious difficulties in attempting to draft a statement that would bring some credibility to the government, but that is not my question of privilege. My question of privilege is that yesterday in this House the minister assured us in unequivocal terms that a statement would be made today, and he has not risen in his place to do so.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, when I said yesterday that I would make a statement today, I did not know that my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien), had made arrangements to make a statement today, so I thought I would make mine tomorrow, and that is what I intend to do rather than take the time of the House today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue).]

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Greenwood rising on the same point of order?

Mr. Brewin: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I want to associate myself with the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis). The minister did say he was going to make this statement on an extremely important subject, and I am wondering what is keeping him from doing so.

TRANSPORT

SUGGESTED CO-OPERATION WITH UNITED STATES IN RE-OPENING SEAWAY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the leave of the House to move a motion that is self-explanatory and which I feel should meet with approval from both sides of the House. I ask permission to move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), the following motion:

> In view of the most serious situation created by the blocking of the St. Lawrence seaway as a result of the sinking this morning of the Canadian freighter the Roy A. Jodrey in United States waters, off Wellesey Island west of Brockville, Ontario, the House requests the Minister of Transport to offer immediate and full co-operation to American authorities in taking any steps necessary to re-open the channel and that the minister advise the House as to when it is expected the seaway will re-open as indicated from the latest information available to him.

Mr. Speaker: Before putting the question pursuant to the motion under Standing Order 43, with regard to the proposed point of order raised by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) and supported to a certain extent by an alleged question of privilege by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis), the point of order is not, of course, valid in view of the fact that the minister, as I recall, indicated yesterday that he hoped he would be making a statement today. Comment may be valid in respect of the minister's statement, but there is no requirement at all that the minister make a statement at any time. Therefore, I cannot accept that the hon. member's point constitutes either a question of privilege or a point of order.

This motion having been proposed by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) pursuant to Standing Order 43, it requires unanimous consent of the House before it can be debated. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

OIL—SUGGESTED ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONSERVATION MEASURES AND SETTLEMENT OF LAND USE REGULATIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of widespread reports about our country becoming less than self-sufficient in oil in a few years time, I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, instead of concentrating on fighting over the spoils, when he is going to announce to this House a program of conservation and development of our petroleum resources? In particular, when is the minister going to announce to the industry and to the country in general a settlement of the land use regulations question, which has been all up in the air in the north since as far back as 1970?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I anticipate putting before parliament, prior to our rising for the Christmas adjournment, the details of the conservation program which we hope will be effective in changing the attitude of Canadians, over a period of time, toward their use, particularly of petroleum and natural gas.

With regard to the oil and gas land regulations, one of the principal obstacles to a final conclusion in this regard has been the fact that these same regulations apply to the east coast offshore and apply to the north. The desire for some time was to have an identical set of regulations, including rent collection, for the two areas. As the hon. gentleman knows, it has not been possible to come to an agreement with the five easternmost provinces as yet with regard to the east offshore. I will be suggesting to my colleagues that we proceed separately on the two different issues, proceeding in advance with the regulations in the north. If legislation should be necessary, as indeed it may be, that could be introduced in the House during the current session.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. With regard to the land use regulations has there been any effort by the minister or the federal government to obtain an agreement with regard to that aspect of the conflict with the five eastern provinces? Is the minister telling us there has been a refusal by those provinces to agree to the land use regulations proposed for the north, or is it other aspects of the eastern off-shore contract about which there has been disagreement?

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): Of course, the basic disagreement is with regard to the question of jurisdiction. What the federal government has proposed to at least the four provinces which have agreed is that the jurisdictional question should be put aside and we should work out an appropriate regime to cover both the revenue question and the administration of the resource which may be there, both in terms of the operational practices as well as rent collection. So, the rent collection apparatus with regard to the permit and leasing arrangements has been an integral part of the whole discussion. We have not attempted to go ahead and solve a particular issue but were rather hopeful that the entire arrangement might have been concluded before this.

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition on a final supplementary.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the urgency of the settlement of the question with regard to land regulations, the urgency in respect of the settlement of that question offshore and the urgency in the north, what possible excuse has the minister for at least not having had this question settled so that the question of land regulations would be cleared up for the north and presumably for the offshore as well.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): If the hon. gentleman has been following the public reports of this question he will have noticed that the question of land regulations is one of the points on which the government of Newfoundland in particular has been most critical of this government.

In respect of the land regulations, the administration of the resource is really the fundamental and basic question involved in the over-all administrative arrangement. It therefore, I think, does not make much sense to talk about settling that particular question until one can settle the over-all regime, whether it is to be carried out by the federal government under its jurisdiction, as we think would be the appropriate legal position, or whether it is to be carried out co-operatively, as we think is the appropriate political solution.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Regina East on a further supplementary.

Mr. Balfour: My question is not a supplementary, Mr. Speaker, so I will defer it.

OIL—POSSIBILITY OF CRISIS SUPPLY SITUATION—REASON FOR FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO CURTAIL EXPORTS TO THE UNITED STATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. According to the figures which are purported to have come from the National Energy Board report, which the minister has not yet made public, it is estimated that even if Canada were to cut off its supply of crude oil to the United States we will be in a position of non-self-sufficiency in less than eight years and if we do not cut off supplies to the United States we will not be self-sufficient in four years and will not have sufficient oil to put through the pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal. In view of this very serious situation, and the possibility that Canada may be heading into an energy crisis within a few years, I wish to ask the minister whether the government is taking any steps to phase out the exportation of oil to the United States which last year amounted to 1.2 million barrels a day?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I should say to the hon. gentleman that that is one of the questions to which the National Energy Board addresses itself. I can indicate to him that it would be my intention to make the report public tomorrow afternoon. Bearing in mind the fact that the recommendations in the report could have potential financial implications for the firms involved here, I think it should be done after the close of the last stock exchange in this country, about five p.m. I will be making arrangements through my colleague the hon. member for Algoma-Manitoulin to make sure that the hon. gentlemen, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain and the spokesman for the Ralliement des Creditistes receive copies in advance in the hope that we might have close co-operation in dealing with this tomorrow afternoon at five p.m.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that, as the minister says, the National Energy Board has the power to deal with this matter, and in view of the fact that its report was handed down last April and undoubtedly they had the statistics before that time—the minister shakes his head. Whatever time he received the report he has had it for several months. The National Energy Board has had the data. That was admitted before a committee of the House. The National Energy Board has had this data and information for months and the minister should have had it. I want to ask him why we have allocated 977,000 barrels a day for export to the United States for the month of November and 974,000 barrels a day for the month of December and why have these exports not been phased out? Why is the minister dragging his feet and why has the National Energy Board not acted in the face of this critical situation?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can correct the hon. gentleman. The Board report was received by me just at the beginning of this month. I transmitted it shortly thereafter to the two producing provinces in order to seek their approval in this regard. I think it is appropriate that we should consider the board report first within the framework of our relations with the two provinces. A dramatic reduction in exports from Canada to the United States would mean an abrupt drop in the revenue of the producing provinces, and this is a question upon which we thought it natural that we seek their views. We could, of course, have acted upon the report unilaterally but chose not to do so.

At the same time, we recognize the impact that a dramatic reduction of Canadian oil exports to the United States could have, particularly on the northern part of the United States, and we considered it sound within the maintenance of good relations with the United States that they should have an opportunity to react to the impact of the report before the government made a final decision. As I said, this question has now been considered and we will be making a public statement on it tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: A final supplementary by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's desire not to drastically reduce the revenue for the oil producing provinces, may I take it for granted that he proposes to persuade the Minister of Finance to withdraw some of the provisions of his budget? May I also ask him, in view of the statement he made a few moments ago that the government intends to undertake to persuade the Canadian people to alter their attitude with regard to the conservation of oil, whether he is prepared to begin with the government and persuade it to change its attitude and stop these large exports of oil?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Well, the government certainly would intend to accord its own policies in the use of oil to those that it would be advocating for others. With regard to oil export, I think I would have to restate the previous response, that it is true from the standpoint of the consuming interest in Canada that it would be desirable at the earliest possible date to reduce exports from Canada to the United States. That is the position which, in general terms, I have been stating these many months while we have been waiting for the board's report. The actual fact of the matter is that I think before an action of this kind is taken, which could adversely affect our relations with the United States and indeed adversely affect revenues in the two producing provinces, it would be appropriate to have consultation. At this time, I can only say I find it rather surprising that the official opposition, which has had so much to say about consultation, should be opposed to this particular course of action.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD REPORT ON OIL RESERVES—REASON FOR MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON ALBERTA'S POSITION—POSSIBILITY OF CONSULTATION

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, on the same subject, yesterday the hon. member for Crowfoot asked the minister whether he had received a reply from the provinces with regard to this report and the minister's answer was as follows:

Yes, Mr. Speaker, I had had a reply from the minister of mines and minerals of Alberta asking that the report be made public.

● (1450)

The minister for Alberta expressed no opinion with regard to the substance of it, and apparently any level of exports from Canada would be acceptable to him.

My question to the Minister, in view of the statement he made yesterday, is: what is the source of his information which permits the minister to make that statement of judgment?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the minister of mines and minerals sent me a telegram in response to my request that we have a response from Alberta, giving no substantive response whatever. Indeed, prior to the cabinet discussion of this question today I sought to contact that gentleman during the course of yesterday to find out if in fact it was the position of the government of Alberta that it was not going to respond substantially. I reached Mr. Dickie late yesterday and he indicated that, quite the contrary, they would like to have consultation and input into the level of exports over a period of time. We have taken that into account in the course of the decision that has been before the cabinet.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the whole matter that we have just been discussing is verging on a question of privilege, as you can understand. My supplementary question is this: in view of the fact that the minister says he does not choose to act without consultation, does he now intend to have a meeting face to face with these ministers of the producing provinces to find out authoritatively what their opinion is, rather than this gratuitous type of statement made in the House yesterday?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The statement which I made in the House yesterday was literally correct—

Some hon. Members: Literally!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —that there had been no substantive response from the government of Alberta. I am glad that even as late in the game as last night, after having had the report for two weeks, the Alberta government indicated it would like to discuss it and expressed the wish that we discuss it. This is one of the factors that we will take into account in our action on this matter.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I want an answer to that question: will there be consultations with the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan on this subject of what their wishes are on this matter?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would say that there already has been. Having communicated the report to the provinces very close to two weeks ago and not having had any response, except at the very last minute, from both of them, I think the federal government went a long way toward consultation with the provinces—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I think that an important element in terms of federal-provincial consultation is that when we are under pressure, as we have been in the House, to make a document such as this one public, if the province is substantively interested in it it should make some effort to make its views known as soon as possible.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a question of privilege, and I think you will have to make a ruling. Yesterday the minister said in the House that he received the report from the minister of Alberta expressing no opinion with regard to the substance of the National Energy Board Report. Then, he want on gratuitously to make the following statement:

> . . . and apparently any level of exports from Canada would be acceptable to him.

My question of privilege is obvious. The minister is trying to mislead the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): In his statement in the House today the minister said that when he took this up with his cabinet colleagues he telephoned the minister in Alberta trying to get more information as to what the latter's opinion was, which confirms the fact that the minister did not know what he was talking about yesterday. Yet, he stated that any level of exports from Canada would be acceptable to Alberta. I want to put it to you very bluntly, Mr. Speaker. I think you will have to rule on whether there is a case of contempt of the House by the minister in misinforming the House on the views of the province of Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, in relation to the question of privilege, I think that the words speak for themselves. I would be quite happy to lay on the table of the House the telegram, which I do not have with me. As I said before, I think it is appropriate in these federal-provincial discussions that if there is to be effective consultation we should have a full and prompt reply.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Are there other hon. members who wish to make a contribution to the question of privilege.

Mr. Horner: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The minister appears to be complaining that the province of Alberta has not replied in substance to the secret document of the National Energy Board. The government of Alberta believes that the report was sent to them in confidence, and therefore they will make their answer to it public when the report is made public.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Are you speaking for them?

Mr. Horner: I will speak for them only if they ask me to do so. But I know very well that is their answer with regard to the secret report. That is why they want it made public. Then they will make their remarks to you public.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Unless there are other hon. members who have a contribution to make to the alleged question of privilege, my view, on the submissions to which I have listened carefully, is that the proposed question of privilege—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My view is that the proposed question of privilege amounts to a complaint about the quality or content of the minister's answer to a question that has been put to him in the House. I think it is significant that the last question which was put to the minister by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain was, as I recollect it, in these terms: that the hon. member was seeking a direct answer to the question as to whether there will be consultation between the federal government and the provinces involved. The minister made an answer to that question, and now the hon. member seeks to complain about the quality of the answer in which the minister was referring to past consultations as opposed to future ones. However, in all that I am unable to see it clearly established that there is a charge that the minister, either deliberately or otherwise, is misleading the House. The proposed question of privilege amounts to a complaint as to the quality of the answer. I am sure the hon. member is well aware that this does not constitute a question of privilege.

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO CONTINUED SUBSIDIZATION OF DOMESTIC OIL PRICES

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): My question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will the minister advise the House whether the government intends to continue the subsidization of oil prices after exports of oil to the United States cease and, if so, what method of subsidization will be implemented?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The actual determination, whether and when exports will drop, of the way in which the subsidy will be financed is, I think, premature at the moment. I think it is obviously a question to be considered, depending upon the appropriate level at which exports are to be set either this coming year or in the following years. I think the hon. gentleman's question is premature in that it precedes the government's announcement of its position.

INDUSTRY

TEXTILES—REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO CURB DUMPING

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, we are going to leave the area of oil to turn to that of textile. All is not going well there either.

I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can he advise the House whether the prices paid for the textile products which have been imported by Canada from the Far East over the past six months are considerably lower than those paid for Canadian textile products? If so, does the minister consider this as a form of dumping, and can he say whether he will take any steps to protect Canadian textile industry workers?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I am not aware of any dumping at present or undervaluation of imports. I am aware of a good deal of distress selling on the part of foreign producers of textiles, seriously affecting the prospects of the Canadian textile industry. For these reasons, I have referred a number of textile products to the Textile and Clothing Board for an urgent and immediate examination. I hope to have a report in the near future.

FINANCE

TAX POSITION OF OIL COMPANIES OBLIGED TO SELL TO PROVINCIAL CORPORATIONS OR MARKETING BOARDS

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Is it possible that the effect of the ways and means motions Nos. 7 and 7.1 of the current budget will be to require petroleum companies in Canada to pay tax to the federal government in excess of their production revenues in circumstances where such companies are obliged, by provincial law, to sell their production to provincially controlled corporations or marketing boards?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member ought to know that he ought not to ask the minister for interpretation of a statute, even a statute that is not before the House, and particularly one which is obviously going to be debated in the House.

BEEF—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE CANADA WILL NOT LIFT IMPORT QUOTA ON UNITED STATES CATTLE

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Because of mounting speculation that the Canadian government will remove import controls on U.S. cattle, thus creating panic within the beef industry, can the minister unequivocally give this House an assurance that such action is not contemplated, in order to avoid havoc within that industry?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, should there be any change in government policy in respect of this matter it will be announced in the usual manner. In the meantime, I can assure the hon. member and members of the House that there is no change in government policy respecting beef import quotas.

BEEF—POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT PURCHASE OF SURPLUS FOR FOREIGN AID

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In order to maintain a stable market for beef in Canada, if a surplus becomes apparent in certain grades of beef for a short time, would the government consider purchasing that surplus and making it available for foreign aid?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the concern of the government I am sure is the concern of everyone in this House, so we are looking at every aspect to make sure that markets are properly looked after to ensure there will be no waste in this product. I had some consultations concerning beef aid with some countries when I was at the World Food Conference and some of them told me that they simply could not use beef in their food programs. We have already started trying to find what countries can use beef in any of their food aid programs. So, we are looking at that and we are looking also at programs to make sure that the market is stabilized.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RESPONSE OF UNITED STATES TO CANADIAN NOTE CONCERNING IMPORT QUOTAS ON BEEF AND PORK

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister and concerns the note sent to the United States. It appears that the protest lodged by the Canadian government with the United States may not be worthy of reply. I would ask whether he can assure the House that the matter of beef and pork restrictions imposed by the United States will be high on the list of matters to be discussed with President Ford on December 4?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it appears some misinformation has appeared in the press about the response of the United States to this note. It is my understanding that the United States government is announcing today that it welcomes Canada's request for consultations under the provisions of the GATT.

FISHERIES

POSSIBLE DISCONTINUANCE OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE IN VIEW OF SUGGESTED GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME PLAN FOR FISHERMEN

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries. Is it the government's intention to establish a guaranteed income plan for Canada's 20,000 self-employed fishermen? If so, will the plan be administered by his department or the Department of Manpower and Immigration and will unemployment insurance be discontinued for those fishermen whose earnings are above a specified inflation index level?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, it is the intention to establish such a plan. I must confess that when the problem of who administers it is the only problem remaining I will be very relieved. As for the matter of discontinuing UIC, that is also part of the discussion that is going on right now.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

POSITION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AT WESTERN ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITIES CONFERENCE ON JURISDICTION OVER NATURAL RESOURCES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister arising from an interview given by the Prime Minister to Ron Robert of Selkirk News Service on November 9. When asked about western problems and disaffection the Prime Minister said:

> ... the Western Economic Opportunities Conference was the place where we put our intentions and our objectives and our policies on the table ...

At that conference did government representatives clearly, categorically and unequivocally assert the right to invade and occupy a field of federal jurisdiction, natural resources, as they have done by their actions over the last few weeks?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

INTENTION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE CONCERNING FAIR DEAL FOR WEST WHEN DRAFTING BUDGET

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance based on the same interview. I put it to the Minister of Finance because I assume he is an assiduous reader of primeministerial statements whether attributed or otherwise. In the same interview, the Prime Minister said that:

> ... we as a federal government are determined to make sure that the west has what you would call a fair deal in Confederation.

Did the minister have this before him when he drafted his budget or did he forget about it?

FINANCE

ALLEGED AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA AND SASKATCHEWAN OF EFFECT ON EQUALIZATION FORMULA OF OIL REVENUES IN CAPITAL ACCOUNT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. Yesterday the minister said that there was an understanding between the Prime Minister and the premiers—presumably in particular the premiers of Saskatchewan and Alberta—that the provinces agreed that one-third of the additional revenues from oil and gas deriving from the international situation would be considered for equalization purposes. On March 28 in the House when reporting to parliament on that conference the Prime Minister said with reference to capital funds for energy development that the revenues taken into those capital funds would not be subject to equalization. He said, "would not be", Mr. Speaker—there was no qualification about percentage, whether 60 per cent, 40 per cent or 30 per cent. The Prime Minister said that the revenues so handled would not be considered for equalization purposes.

My question to the Minister of Finance is, when he said in the House yesterday that there was an understanding that this whole situation had been changed, between whom did this understanding take place? Was it between the Prime Minister and the western premiers, between the Prime Minister and members of his cabinet or whom?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker the last time this understanding was discussed it was between the Prime Minister, the premier of Saskatchewan and myself after the first ministers met with the Prime Minister two weeks ago. At that time, it was evident that there was no misunderstanding as to the true nature of the problem relating to equalization as it affects the situation.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question. I listened with care to what the minister said, Mr. Speaker. He said there was no misunderstanding between himself, the Prime Minister and Premier Blakeney as to where the federal government stood. Is that what he is saying or is he telling the House that the Premier of Saskatchewan did accept the reversal of the agreement that was announced in this House on March 28?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, it was the intention of the Premier of Saskatchewan at that time to bring revenue from oil royalties, amounting to $230 million extra this year, into a capital fund which under that understanding would not be considered for equalization purposes. On the other hand, Premier Lougheed of Alberta had made no such commitment, although he hoped to bring a substantial portion into the capital fund at that time. Whereas the amounts taken in by Saskatchewan would not be considered part of the equalization formula it was always evident to the Prime Minister and the premier of Saskatchewan that any amounts not brought in by Alberta would be part of the equalization formula. That is why on budget night I said that the general understanding was that in total the ratio would be about two-thirds to one-third which is the formula I intend to propose to the provinces.

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The minister's answer is still not clear. Is the minister saying that Saskatchewan is excluded, in terms of its use of the fund, from the general rule which he is applying to Alberta alone?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, Mr. Speaker. I should like to explain this in detail, although this is difficult to do in the question period.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure that it is proper to make that kind of explanation in detail during the question period. With the greatest respect, it has to do with the interpretation of the budgetary policy of the government, which is the very subject before the House today. I do not think we can expect the minister to give an explanation in detail in the limited time remaining in the question period. However, the minister may give a brief reply if he wishes.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I will be as brief as possible. It is apparent that the revenues affecting the Saskatchewan equalization position deriving from additional revenues from oil particularly are not only those revenues brought in through the coffers of the province of Saskatchewan but also revenues brought in to the Consolidated Revenue Fund by the province of Alberta. Therefore, the Saskatchewan equalization position can be affected by how Saskatchewan treats those revenues and, because of the different revenue position of Alberta, by how Alberta treats them.

[Mr. Turner (Minister of Finance).]

STUDY OF SITE FOR STEEL-MAKING COMPLEX ON EAST COAST—DATE OF PUBLICATION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Expansion. On October 30 I directed a question to the minister regarding the tabling of the Canstel steel report. At that time he said there were difficulties in translation and he would table it some time later. On November 14 I again asked, the same question. The minister said last week that he hoped to table the report by this week. He intended to discuss it with Premier Regan and hoped to present it to the House this week, as soon as the translation is complete. Is the translation complete and will he table the report either today or tomorrow.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if the translation has been completed. I had hoped to table the report tomorrow. In the meantime, perhaps we could make some kind of informal arrangement, in case the translation is held up, and I will be glad to make the report available, without tabling it, to interested parties on the understanding that I will table it in both languages later. If that is agreeable I would be glad to do that later, or tomorrow.

Mr. Muir: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that if the minister does as he suggests, he will receive support from both sides of this House. In view of the importance of the study to the three members from the Cape Breton area who are concerned about the future of steel in that area, I am sure that there will not be any objection to the minister's suggestion from any part of this House. Could we agree to do as the minister suggests?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will see that members who are interested, as long as it is not every member of the House, have copies available within the next 24 or 48 hours, or before the end of tomorrow.

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As he is not in the House, I will not ask my question today.

MANPOWER

SUGGESTED INTEGRATION OF MANPOWER AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE OFFICES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and arises from the speech made by the minister to the Toronto Chamber of Commerce on September 23 last in which he suggested that the number one priority was setting up a partnership between the Unemployment Insurance Commission and manpower offices. As unemployment is advancing at the same time as increases in job vacancies are advancing, can the minister tell the House when this partnership is to be established.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it has been established in the last two years and is working increasingly effectively.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister inform the House whether the partnership to which he refers and which he says has already been established goes further than putting the two offices under one roof? Does it involve the integration of these two important functions in the same ministry?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I have given members of the House in various forums a great deal of evidence regarding special measures which have been taken over the last two years; and, most recently, some fairly detailed description was given before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration about the special job placement drive, which was a cooperative effort between manpower and the Unemployment Insurance Commission in seven metro centres. It met with considerable success in placing people, in indicating which people are trying to find jobs, and in monitoring the unemployment insurance scheme. I indicated to the committee that it is intended that this successful pilot project, which is a broad one, is being extended across the country.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, could the minister answer my specific question. Is the minister to reintegrate these two functions which were disintegrated at an earlier time, as this really is the only solution to a satisfactory partnership.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is jumping to a detailed conclusion which may not be supported by a detailed examination. We are pressing, and successfully pressing, for increased coordination and cooperation between these two major operations, and I am not satisfied that an organizational integration is the answer to the particular problem.

Mr. Dinsdale: So, the answer is, no.

HOUSING

APPLICABILITY OF FIVE HUNDRED DOLLAR GRANT TO CONDOMINIUMS

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Can the minister advise the House whether the $500 grant to new house buyers will apply also to those who buy lodgings inside apartment buildings or condominiums?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yes, it does apply.

Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve): I wish to put a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Further to the question of the hon. member for Abitibi the minister replied that a $500 grant would be applicable to the purchase of a mobile house considered as a dwelling. Could the minister tell us if that $500 grant applies only to those whose financing is done by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or as well to those financed by chartered banks or by caisses populaires?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, the source of the financing does not matter.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question, directed to the Minister of Labour, who has been pushed into making statements concerning the Seafarers' International Union. In light of the serious allegation made by a member of the Ontario Legislature that the Seafarers' International Union has been resorting to violence, intimidation and bribery which affects federal officials and, even more important, politicians on the federal level, what immediate steps has the minister, along with the Attorney General and the Minister of Justice, taken to bring about an investigation by royal commission or otherwise, and I stress, or otherwise, into these matters?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, first, the premise of the question is wrong if it suggests that anyone has been pushed. I was asked by a reporter to respond to Mr. Shulman's statement within hours of his making it, and I made the comment which the hon. member has before him. I do not think that has anything to do with his question.

As far as the substantive part of the hon. member's question is concerned, I advise him that, according to the records of my department, no complaints have been brought to my department about the substance of the allegations which have been made against the union, in terms of beatings. That does not mean to say they did not occur. It means that no such complaints have come to the attention of the officials of the Department of Labour.

Second, if there are allegations of misconduct on the part of this union or various elements within it, and this may be subject to confirmation or advice from the Minister of Justice or Solicitor General, my opinion is that the provincial government is charged with responsibility for enforcement of the Criminal Code. They have ample power to set up royal commissions and go into this whole question if they feel that is warranted. Local and provincial police forces have power to investigate abuses of this kind and, indeed they should, if Mr. Shulman or anybody else has any information.

If Mr. Shulman or any member of this House wishes to bring to the attention of the federal government complaints of this kind, or they are of such a nature that they warrant investigation, we will of course be prepared to consider them. However, to do so here is questionable.

I might further indicate that as far as allegations against politicians are concerned I, like any other politician in this House, can defend myself, both in public and on the floor of this House. What is very serious here is there are allegations against federal officials, members of the public service who cannot defend themselves, and they are not being named. That is a practice that hon. members in this House should not condone under any circumstances.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): As a result, a cloud has been cast on the integrity of certain officials who cannot defend themselves.

Mr. Alexander: Nor can members of parliament.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I think members of parliament can defend themselves. We have a public forum here. We can defend ourselves against what we consider to be unwarranted attacks.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Mr. Alexander.]

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I am talking about a public servant.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the minister. His answer, although long, was certainly listened to very attentively which attests to the necessity for the length and substance of it. However, we are running out of time. Perhaps the answer could be abbreviated.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I have just one sentence to finish the answer to the hon. member. Because of the cloud of suspicion cast on certain unnamed officials, I and my deputy feel it might be related to officials in the Department of Labour since we have labour dealings with the SIU and so on. My department has asked the RCMP to investigate these allegations to see whether there is any substance to them as they may pertain to officials connected with the Department of Labour.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, in light of the very serious nature of this matter, and in light of the minister's extreme concern about public officials, and I would certainly add to that group the members of parliament because we do not know who this member in the provincial legislature is talking about, notwithstanding the fact the minister has asked the Attorney General to bring in a report, and something tells me that report has already been asked for and is on the way, has the minister discussed this matter with the solicitor general for the province of Ontario and the attorney general for the province of Ontario, particularly when inside or outside the House some member of the Ontario legislature has indicated, and I quote, "What is stopping the investigation is that someone in Ottawa is getting paid off." Does the minister not think that is a serious enough matter, whether questionable or not in terms of authenticity, that he should discuss this matter with the solicitor general and attorney general of Ontario in order to determine what proper method we can take, particularly with regard to a royal commission or otherwise, in order to get to the bottom of this matter?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): As I have indicated, Mr. Speaker, as far as these suggestions with regard to public servants in the Department of Labour are concerned, we have asked the RCMP to make inquiries. We are in the process of asking them to do this today. As far as the substance of these allegations is concerned, and that is all they are and no one is named, it is now perfectly within the competence of the attorney general of Ontario, and I am sure this is where a substantial portion of the membership reside who are subjected to this type of abuse, to set up a royal commission, if he feels the facts as turned over to him, if indeed they are turned over to him by Mr. Shulman, warrant such a commission.

As Minister of Labour, as far as I am concerned, no facts have been turned over to me by Mr. Shulman or anybody else other than this particular article. If the hon. member wishes to find out whether such facts that would warrant an investigation have been turned over to my colleagues responsible in this area, including the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General, and whether they would warrant the action the hon. member is now putting forward, it is his right to pursue those questions with the ministers responsible.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I have one final supplementary. This is a very important matter. It appears that the minister is fluffing off his responsibility.

An hon. Member: Come on.

Mr. Alexander: Don't tell me "come on". We are trying to get the facts. That is all we are trying to do. In light of the fact that the Seafarers' Union is under federal jurisdiction, and the solicitor general and the attorney general of Ontario recognize that fact and are therefore reluctant to move, will the minister now appreciate that fact and move himself in order that we can appreciate that the minister knows what his responsibilities are in this regard?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, let me make this quite clear. It is within the jurisdiction of a province, and in many cases this is what is done, for the attorney general to enforce provisions of the Criminal Code with regard to Canadian citizens residing in their province. The fact that this union may be chartered under federal labour laws is not pertinent to this particular question. If wrongdoing is alleged and enough facts have been advanced to me by Mr. Shulman to substantiate it, and none have been advanced to me, or to the federal Minister of Justice or Attorney General or the attorney general of the province of Ontario, there is a duty to investigate the matter. That is where this matter presently stands. On the other hand, if the hon. member is suggesting on the basis of an article like this that every politician in this House of Commons, irrespective of political persuasion, should be investigated, that is another matter.

Mr. Alexander: I didn't suggest that.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the usual Thursday point of order. I wish to ask the government House leader about the business of the House for the next week. In his reply, I ask him to indicate whether it is the intention of the government to continue the budget debate without interruption. Also, I assume there will be some time after that for other business before budget bills are brought in. What will be done in that interval? In light of exchanges which took place today and previously, will the government House leader seriously consider bringing in terms of reference to a committee on the issue of conflict of interest which has already been before the House?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the business for the next week, I can confirm that it is the government's intention that the budget debate should proceed on consecutive days until it is completed. It is also the government's intention that there be a break between the conclusion of that debate and the introduction of the budget bills. I hope I will have an opportunity of talking with my colleagues, the other House leaders, about the business we might have for Thursday and subsequently. I hope we might be able to proceed with the final stages of some of the bills that are on our urgent list that will be reported back from committees and which I am sure members opposite want to see completed.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Wednesday, November 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; the amendment of Mr. Stanfield (p. 1502) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Nystrom (p. 1506).

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have had opportunities to speak in the House during this parliament on behalf of the Department of External Affairs, but this is the first time I participate in a general debate.

Therefore, it is suitable that I offer you, Madam Speaker, my congratulations upon your election to those high duties. I pause to give the House a chance to get back to order.

The Acting Speaker (Mme Morin): Order, please.

Mr. Breau: Madam Speaker, I am convinced that the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) was experienced enough to take this burdensome responsibility of presiding over the proceedings of the House and that he is able to perform those duties with competence, firmness and fairness. In fact, he has already proved it.

Before dealing with my riding and area, Madam Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on the budget and the economic situation. I believe the budget speech the Minister of Finance made last Monday evening is a responsible and fair document.

● (1530)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. There are many conversations going on while the hon. member is trying to deliver his speech. The Chair would appreciate it if those who wish to carry on conversations would do so behind the curtain.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mainly on your side.

Mr. Breau: No, not only on my side.

I was saying, Madam Speaker, that the budget speech delivered by the Minister of Finance last Monday night is a fair and responsible document. It is responsible because it recognizes the problems facing us and proposes practical solutions. It is fair because it continues the policy of helping those for whom it is more difficult to face the economic situation.

Sometimes, a budget like that can be better because of what it contains, but sometimes because of what it does not contain. What the economic policy of the Minister of Finance does not contain is an element of panic, an element of over nervousness because of the inflation now facing us. It recognizes the problem of inflation and the problem caused by too rapid an increase in the cost of living. But it also recognizes that inflation is not a problem that must be considered in absolute terms. What is important is to look at it in the world economic context. What is important is our position towards other countries of the world.

All hon. members know, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) knows, that there are steps to fight inflation but what we must do is consider the consequences of various measures introduced by certain hon. members or certain economists.

Obviously, we must try and stabilize prices, I agree with that, but we must also work towards the objective of social justice without losing sight of that objective, and if fighting inflation means in certain cases withdrawal by the government from any intervention in society, then we must give it a second look.

As to the limitation of government expenditures I think an attempt should be made to reconcile the interest of price stabilization with that of greater social justice.

The policy of the government has been to encourage production in order to increase supply and, particularly, to help those who adjust themselves less easily to fluctuating prices. As for the earners with a fixed income, all those who are not unionized and work for very low wages, the government help them by reducing taxes.

In the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Stanfield), which started Monday night and went on yesterday, there is not much to be found by way of positive suggestions that might help us face current economic problems. The leader of the opposition criticizes the government expenses and suggests that they will be very high. But his speech does not propose any effective or concrete measure that could lead us to curtail or even abolish some programs. It is not difficult to say that the government expenses are high and should be cut down. The problem, Mr. Speaker, is to determine which program is least important for society.

I believe that, for the time being, it is not necessary to operate such an important cut in government expenses, for, when we consider how government expenses have been orientated for the past few years, we find that they aim at reducing existing inequities in this country.

[English]

On the question of petroleum, here again we did not hear many suggestions from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). He spoke about the price of oil and about provincial control, but he did not tell us what he would do if he were prime minister. He says we must avoid industrial concentration. Does this mean that if one part of the country wants to be more opportunist than another, its position should be accepted by the rest of Canada?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Is the hon. member saying that Alberta is opportunistic?

Mr. Nystrom: Or Saskatchewan?

Mr. Breau: Saskatchewan less that Alberta. My point is that it is easy for the Leader of the Opposition to criticize the government for its stand without telling us what he thinks about the consequences of the possible erosion of the federal government's economic position. What does he think about the possible erosion of federal financial power? Does he think it important to retain this power, or not? The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) made a comment concerning the merits of the situation; but regardless of the merits, the position taken by hon. members opposite would, if adopted, lead to erosion of the federal government's taxing powers.

I wish to express my firm support for the stand taken in the budget on this question. Some critics have based their arguments on the constitutional position, but I would remind them that the constitution was not written with the idea that it would cover every situation which might arise. Who can say what the spirit of confederation might have been had today's petroleum situation existed a hundred years ago? Everyone accepts the fact that this parliament possesses the power to tax. What is being done under the budget involves the Income Tax Act; we are not depriving the provinces of the power to manage their own resources.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Breau: As to the substance of this issue, I believe that one fundamental point was missed by those who took part in the last federal-provincial conference on the pricing of oil. I attribute this to the rhetoric of some provincial premiers and their friends in this House. As far as I am concerned, the crucial point is that there is a petroleum industry in Alberta and Saskatchewan today, not because those provinces were clairvoyant but because of a series of national policies. The protected market up to the Ottawa Valley line at a time when there was no export market, the system of depletion allowances, and the application of special export policies are among the measures adopted. The producing provinces have been the beneficiaries, and I am happy for them; but these were national compromises which some of us have had to defend. Not enough attention has been paid to this side of the story. If there is a petroleum industry in western Canada today, the whole of Canada paid for it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Nonsense. We couldn't raise a penny in Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. Breau: That might very well be so, but when a large percentage of our investment goes into one segment of the economy, someone has to make a sacrifice. Some of us had to defend the policies designed to support the oil industry in Alberta and Saskatchewan, and we are happy about that.

An hon. Member: You certainly did have to defend them.

Mr. Breau: Yes, we did, I admit that; and I am very humble about it, if that makes the hon. member more at ease. But this is precisely my point: at stake are the changing economic circumstances in the world—not in Canada, but in the world. Can we let the federal treasury become eroded to the point where equal opportunity among regions or among people in this country becomes impossible?

The essence of federalism, and especially of Canadian federalism, is to have a political instrument that can balance opportunities for all people in this country. I contend that that political instrument is this parliament. I believe that we in this parliament must make sure that we use every means, every power available to us to do what is best for the country, not just for one part of the country. What should govern us is not only technicalities in the constitution but the spirit of confederation and the desire to keep Canada a fair country for all regions. We must make sure Canada is a country that can stand in the world, and this parliament and the federal government within this parliament is the only body that can guarantee it.

It is one thing to be an opportunist, Madam Speaker, but one must be reasonable. An increase in revenue of roughly $1 billion for Alberta seems to be a reasonable payment in view of the economic circumstances in the world today. I repeat that I am not unhappy if Alberta is able to benefit from this revenue.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Who gets most of the export tax?

Mr. Breau: Again I will be humble about that. All the export tax goes to reduce the price of energy in Canada. That is what I mean when I talk of balancing opportunities and dividing the benefits among all the people of this country. The hon. member is helping me to make my point.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Say something about the royalties.

Mr. Breau: I have just been talking about the royalties and I said we were changing the Income Tax Act. Surely the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) knows that this parliament has power to deal with the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No one is challenging that.

Mr. Breau: If I am speaking about the importance of a strong federal government, Madam Speaker, it is not because of dogmatism or ideology, but merely because what Canada needs at this point in its history is Canadian reality. We have five relatively stable provinces, economically speaking, and five others that are less so. And that brings me to my riding and my province.

We need the federal government to improve our surroundings. We will always oppose measures which could erode the federal power and, consequently, its financial position. I said that my constituency depends on the federal government. The whole northeastern part of New Brunswick needs special assistance to improve its economic structure. However, I would like to point out one thing: we are not without organization, we are not "deportees", we are not beggars and we are not starving to death. I am feeling frustrated almost every week, if not every day, because of this attitude that is developing in New Brunswick and even elsewhere in Canada, this attitude which tends to depict us as a region overwhelmed by problems.

It is true that we have problems, and I will deal with them later in my remarks. And if the publicity about the Acadians in northeast New Brunswick which depicts them as poor people may make the population of New Brunswick and of the rest of Canada aware of the problems of this area, I will be glad. But that is not what happens. We find that the reaction of southern New Brunswick people, especially obvious within the government of New Brunswick—and I am not just referring to the Cabinet but also to the provincial public service—shows itself in a certain uneasiness, a certain restlessness when dealing with the northern people. This situation develops itself, I fear, as a stigma. Finally, in order to attract on ourselves the attention of the Canadian society and the attention of the New Brunswick society and to promote our development, some people have inevitably done deplorable things which gave us bad publicity and which in turn worries those who do not know us.

There is a multiplying effect in all this which generates still more publicity whose results are still more negative.

The worst was probably an article in one of the MacLean's magazines of last year which described a particular region, Tracadia, as a desperate area, obviously a disgrace. The article reflected this stigma, this lack of understanding of the problems of the people of northeastern New Brunswick, and particularly of Acadians in the northeast of New Brunswick. The strange thing about this, is that from what I have been told, the author of this article is a native of New Brunswick or stayed in New Brunswick for some time. I did not bother to keep this article or to quote from it because I found it disgusting, ignorant and unworthy of a supposedly responsible magazine.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Breau: It is true that we have poor people, we do not hide this fact, and it is also true that we have economic and other problems.

Madam Speaker, we agree that this should be made public, and I do not blame those who want to talk about it, whether it be MacLean's or the national press or whoever it may be, they can say all they want, but I take exception to the fact that they do not talk about the positive aspects even though there are some. For every sign of poverty, for every problem, there is a sign of progress. Moreover, for every problem without exception, there is a group or community direction to take care of it, to study it and to look for answers. Normally, responsible people would talk about these to give the true picture to Canada and the rest of the province. But some people try to show the opposite. We may have doubts about their motives, which are perhaps only to sell a sensational story. If this were true, it would not be so bad, but sometimes the motive can be much deeper and much worse.

I said that there were positive signs. I mentioned one of these, namely local leadership. I challenge anyone to compare the sense of leadership of the Acadians in northeastern New Brunswick with that of any other area of the country. The difference has its roots in our history and in sociological and economic conditions. Our condition is different and we should concentrate on other things, on problems which are different. This may not be as sensational or as far-reaching, but it is nevertheless very important.

The awareness has been there for a long time and we are trying to cope with the matter. But the negative publicity to which I referred is extremely prejudicial because it describes us as a society without future or direction. The effect is that the people, especially in southern New Brunswick and the remainder of Canada, are concerned about us, but that negative attitude does not help us at all.

There is yet another aspect which can still be more harmful. If others consider us as lost and without direction, it is not so bad after all, but we could become convinced, as our young people, that it is impossible to survive, that the problems are insuperable.

It is extremely difficult for community leaders to keep a positive and confident attitude before such a negative and distorted picture.

I hope that the awareness and negative manifestation will not give rise to an inhibition which the area will never be able to extricate.

I would like to conclude by urging the media to talk about our problems and our area so that they might understand, but I also urge them to give equal time to the efforts made by the people themselves in the area to solve these problems and to say that they are digging into them. The result will be a better understanding of the situation and confidence on the part of the Canadian public instead of unease towards solving our problems. And, even more important, the population will become confident and will stay positive.

Madam Speaker, repeatedly negative descriptions can only kill the morale of this region.

Before concluding, I would like to talk about a specific question because it is impossible in such a speech to outline all the subjects that deserve attention and that concern my riding. I must therefore choose and mention the most important one.

Fishing is not the only important element of our economy, but it is that which touches the greatest number of people. That is one of the reasons for our being proud of the nomination of my colleague from Westmorland-Kent to the position of Minister of State for Fisheries.

In the field of fisheries, in my opinion, we should as soon as possible, as the minister has already announced, implement a stabilization program for fishermen's income. The present unemployment insurance program is a far from adequate answer to the problem.

We must also ensure reasonable prices on the market. Through the use of different procedures, we must also make sure that the market, especially the American one, does not unduly exploit our resource so that the industry might pay the fishermen an adequate price and the factory workers, an adequate salary.

Madam Speaker, we must encourage increased production at home, especially for finished products. We must make a special effort to encourage the setting up of an integrated food industry. Institutional meals and food based on fish protein can be prepared just as well in our area as elsewhere. The government has only to provide for transportation costs caused by the fact that we are far from our markets and for other occasionnal costs which might be incurred from time to time.

But the most urgent problem that requires particular attention at this time is the lack of harbour facilities. Ships grow bigger all the time, require more and more wharfage and deep water, yet port facilities remain almost the same.

One must admit that the federal government already started to do something for deep-sea fishing in Shippegan, but the fishing industry still has serious and costly problems to face in Lamèque and in Caraquet.

As regards coastal fishing, something is being done also but there is still much more to do to improve many important fishing ports. In some cases, digging is the most urgent thing, but the wharves are far from being satisfactory.

I asked the Minister of State (Fisheries) (Mr. LeBlanc), my colleague from Westmorland-Kent, to watch the situation closely and if the estimates available to him are not adequate to solve the problem in a few years from now, I believe the government will have to make a special effort, either through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion or otherwise, as the development of the area should begin with upgrading the fishing field. As I said before, that is the part of our economy that affects the greatest number of people. Forests, agriculture and mines are also important in our area and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion will have to increase its efforts to improve the value added of those resources in the area. It must also keep on implementing the road improvement program and all the other services needed by the population to keep the economic development going.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: Madam Speaker, I apologize for interrupting, but there is a rule that speeches be limited to 20 minutes and my understanding is that the hon. member has spoken beyond that limit.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The time allotted to the hon. member expires at 3.57. He has one more minute.

Mr. Breau: I have finished, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, I am glad we have been able to come to an agreement that speeches be limited to 20 minutes. Perhaps there was a slight breakdown in communications to start with, but we hope we can catch up so that everybody who wishes to speak will have the opportunity to do so. We would like to have as many members speak as possible, at least those from this side of the House. Also, I understand the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Cullen) has a list, as long as both arms, of members who wish to speak. So I think we should get on with it.

In beginning my remarks this afternoon I wish to underline and reinforce as much as possible what was said by my leader yesterday about what I consider had its origin more last May than on November 18. This question deals primarily with taxation of the resource industries. The minister made some changes from what he said on May 6, but they are merely crumbs. I know the working capital position of the Canadian independent company may be helped and those few companies which may be able to obtain capital will perhaps embark upon limited exploration programs. They may be able totally to recover their expenses now, whereas such would not have been the case under the May 6 budget.

However, the problem is much deeper than that. I find it astounding that the minister, who has been to Alberta many times since May 6, has not the comprehension that I thought he had with regard to the nature of the oil industry. This is not a debate on the oil industry, but so far as the cabinet is concerned I wish it would take a lesson in fundamental economics with regard to the industry. Perhaps some members of the cabinet understand it, but for some blind reason they have decided that the government should take this course, perhaps to punish or try to punish the province of Alberta because of its stand on oil and gas, since it has not toed the line in respect of the demands of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

This problem did not start in May; it started last September when a grievous error was committed by this government in respect of the resources belonging to a few provinces. This government took unilateral action without consulting the provinces. There is the first sin of omission—lack of consultation with the provinces. The government decided to act by imposing a price freeze and an export tax. At the beginning the government did not know what to do with the export tax. I remember that when we came back to parliament the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) suggested there should be a uniform price for oil and that the Atlantic provinces and Quebec had to be held firm. This was agreed to by the Premier of Alberta. There was no quibble about that at any time. I find it rather naive on the part of the parliamentary secretary who spoke before me to suggest that the province of Alberta would take advantage of the situation and profit off the backs of fellow Canadians. That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Breau: I did not say that.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It has been said so often that we are sick of hearing it. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) did not learn one lesson from the May 6 budget; he did not learn one lesson from the election campaign so far as the provinces affected are concerned. What is the situation? The first ministers of the provinces of western Canada have rejected in the last few days this barefaced raid on their resources. There is no way the minister can escape that fact. The government talks about co-operative federalism. The minister was part of the administration a few years ago which thought it had invented the term co-operative federalism. With regard to taxes, the Government of Canada has the right to change the Income Tax, but we are concerned here with corporate taxes regarding which the provinces have an equal right. Yet unilaterally the minister will change the corporate income tax structure.

● (1600)

We will find out about that argument when it develops and see whether the minister has so much freedom that he can change the level of taxation without the consent or co-operation of the provinces. I am absolutely repelled by the thought of the struggle that will take place. I see headlines such as the one in last Tuesday's Edmonton Journal about Alberta cancelling the oil agreement. They have the right to do that. The only trouble is that the minister himself would like to have changed the policy on oil royalties, but unfortunately he found himself in a corner and so did his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald), who is in an even worse corner. I think we should send the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) ahead of the Minister of Finance if he should go to Alberta. As a matter of fact, I would like to see the Prime Minister go back to Calgary. He thought he received a warm reception in the month of May or June, but that was a tea party compared to the kind of reception he would get now.

We have indicated in our resolution that this budget includes measures which strike at the heart of unity in this country. I was never more serious in underlining those words. I would have liked the minister to visit Edmonton with me and circulate among the people. He would have learned their reaction during the election campaign and later. I can promise the minister that it will take a very long time for this legislation to pass. Many features of this budget repeat those of May 6. Some of these measures, such as some aspects of the personal income tax and some of the reductions, had merit. But here again I must temper my congratulations by saying that the combination of runaway inflation with a tax system that feeds and battens on to inflation gives the minister all sorts of scope to be generous.

Even with these tax cuts and the claim that hundreds of thousands of taxpayers will be removed from the tax rolls, is it not a fact that the tax yield for 1974-75, on the basis of the reductions and the additional exemptions, will be 27 per cent higher than it was in 1973-74, just through a combination of a bad tax system and inflation which this government does nothing to control? Total government tax revenues will increase 32 per cent—by$5,517 million—on the basis of the tables of budgetary revenues introduced by the minister Monday night. Corporation income tax will go up 42 per cent; Customs duty, 26 per cent, and other duties and taxes—that is, where the export tax is hidden—will go up 105 per cent, for a total of $1.446 billion. That is the increased take from the pockets of Canadian citizens and Canadian corporations.

The total is $5,730 million in additional budgetary revenues that will be siphoned off. No wonder the minister can be generous. He can take the tax off clothing and footwear, as he did—and that was a real performance, a real comic opera. They could not take it off during the election campaign, but a week after the election results were in the tax was taken off.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): At that time we had a mandate again: that made a lot of difference.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mandate, my eye! There was only a mandate in two provinces so far as the government is concerned. Now there is the removal of 6 per cent of the tax on building materials. I wonder why there was only this halfhearted gesture. There is the repetition of removal of the sales tax on certain types of construction machinery, municipal water distribution equipment and a number of other things. That is fine, but again it is only to be expected because the minister has so much latitude due to the heavy overrun of government revenues. Did the minister not forecast a deficit of $450 million last May? Last September there was a budgetary surplus in revenues of $560 million, for a total of $1 billion. The minister was going to follow the instructions of the throne speech; there was to be a restriction on government expenditures. How will he swallow that billion dollars? I would love to find out.

There is very little time left, but let me say that I would have thought that, since reference was made to consensus and we have had all this talk about inflation, why did the government not take the people of Canada into its confidence to fight inflation along with them, in partnership? There was such a call from the provincial ministers. It was rejected out of hand by the Prime Minister, who said that the provincial premiers were impotent. What an insult! Yet a week later he invited them to a long lunch. That is not the way to deal with the problem of inflation, if it is the important problem that is outlined in the budget speech. To deal with inflation takes preparation and it calls for united action, not only among governments but with industry, organized labour and everybody else. That would be arriving at consensus.

However, what does this government do, Madam Speaker? It hides its head in the sand. It hopes that the problem of inflation will be swept under the rug. It applies band-aids here and band-aids there, hoping that the people will be appeased by some goodies in the budget. That is the reason our motion is designed this way. We acknowledge there are some good things in the budget.

Mr. Gillies: There is nothing.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): My colleague says there are not. I would simply say that they are pleasing to a few taxpayers, but as far as dealing with the problem of inflation is concerned there is absolutely nothing.

Mr. Cullen: What are you going to do?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What am I going to do? The minister was hollering about a mandate a few moments ago: the problem is yours.

Mr. Cullen: That is not an answer. We want to know what you think.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This government was elected. If they want the opposition to provide the solution, that is another thing. But it is a most amazing and fatuous way of dealing with the problem. This government was elected to govern, and they turn around and ask us what we would do. What a way to act! This motion indicates that nothing is being done to deal with the problem of inflation. It sets out, in its provisions with regard to the resource industries, to rend this country apart and strike at the heart of confederation. Madam Speaker, I commend this motion to all members of the House, those who want to think about it, those who go beyond blind adherence and cupidity in so far as the policies of this government are concerned.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, it is a great privilege for me to have the opportunity to take part in this debate on the budget. I believe this is one of the most crucial and difficult budgets a Canadian finance minister has ever had to present. It comes at a time when the international financial and economic situations are in a state of turmoil and near chaos, when there is an increasing sense of frustration and despair, and when there has been a significant slowdown in economic activity while inflation continues to rage and the balance of payments deficits of oil importing countries soar to potentially disastrous levels.

While it is true that Canada has not been as directly affected as many countries in terms of oil imports and crop failures—which are the major causes of the present international predicament—still, due to our position as one of the world's great trading nations, we are extremely vulnerable to the unpredictable winds of international economic developments. With this background of uncertain and adverse developments from abroad, the minister's normally difficult task of providing economic and fiscal leadership and direction for Canada has increased immeasurably. However, it is my belief that he has succeeded admirably.

Madam Speaker, my training has qualified me in several spheres. However, the few economics courses which I took in university, and my not always successful attempts at managing the household budget, are not sufficient to enable me to discuss Monday evening's budget in the detail which I would like. However, there are many on both sides of this House who do possess the qualifications to do so, and I look forward to their comments with interest and no small degree of envy. For my part, I would like to discuss the budget in terms of its impact on the constituents I represent.

Toronto-Lakeshore, the constituency I have the honour to represent, is situated in the borough of Etobicoke, one of the six boroughs which comprise metropolitan Toronto. The trouble with representing a Toronto riding is that everyone lumps you in with the 20 or so other Toronto ridings. However, while many concerns and interests are common to all metro ridings, the degree and intensity of these concerns differ from constituency to constituency, and while the people may not readily identify with a federal electoral district as such, they do identify with communities and neighborhoods within that district. It is in the setting of these communities and neighborhoods that interests and problems are articulated and priorities established.

In Toronto-Lakeshore there are six distinct communities: Mimico, New Toronto, Long Branch, Alderwood, Queensway and Sunny Lea. Undoubtedly, the predominant concern of the people of these communities, as it is with most Canadians, is inflation measured in terms of soaring food prices, lack of moderately priced housing, record high mortgage rates and the day to day battle between the individual's pay cheque and rising costs. However, because of the economic, social and demographic composition of the communities, their priorities, although sometimes similar, often differ from those of other metro ridings.

The constituency I represent has a high percentage of senior citizens and, as such, measures to protect this group from inflation are continually being pushed. I was particularly pleased to see two such measures in the throne speech, namely, the elimination of the earnings test on retirement pensions for persons aged 65 to 70, and the payment of allowances to spouses aged 60 to 65 of old age security recipients.

An hon. Member: It is not enough.

Mr. Robinson: It may not be enough, but at least it is a start in the right direction. The budget contains a number of measures which should go a long way in lessening the impact of inflation on our senior citizens. The $1,000 exemption for interest and dividends, although available to all taxpayers, will have an especially beneficial effect on the elderly, who very often have much greater dependency than others on this form of income. The $1,000 deduction for pension income will come as a welcome tax relief to the elderly.

The same is true of the provision which will permit the transfer of the age exemption from one spouse who does not require it to the other who does, when completing the income tax return. I would like to see more of this kind of realistic and practical government flexibility in other programs. A final point before leaving this subject. I hope the government will act during this session to provide increased funding for senior citizens housing. There is a great need for more of this type of housing in my constituency, and I am sure this is true of many other constituencies.

However, I must say I was pleased with the emphasis the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) placed on housing in his budget. The proposal to produce 200,000 houses or more per year is commendable. The reduction of the sales tax on building and construction materials to 5 per cent, and the removal of the sales tax on construction equipment and on materials used in municipal water distribution systems should reduce the cost to the home buyer. The registered home ownership savings plan and the $500 grants to those purchasing new, moderately priced housing units will enable more Canadians to purchase a home. These measures and others contained in the budget should provide much needed stimulus for residential construction.

Another aspect of the housing situation which has attracted a considerable amount of interest in Toronto-Lakeshore is development designed to rejuvenate existing homes and neighborhoods; for example, the Laburnam project. I commend the Department of Urban Affairs for the increasing emphasis it is placing on this kind of project and ask them to encourage more such projects in the future. I would hope that Laburnam would be followed through and completed.

Madam Speaker, the overwhelming proportion of my constituents are middle-income earners many of whom are unionized. There has been a growing demand among union members that some form of cost of living allowance—COLA—provision be written into their labour agreements. There are certain serious weaknesses with the COLA provision, such as the consumer price index which is the basis of measurement and tends to underestimate the effects of inflation on lower income groups and overestimates its impact on higher income groups. Nevertheless, it remains perhaps the only acceptable mechanism to protect workers committed to long-term contracts.

While I am on this general subject I would like to say a few words about the growing number of strikes and lockouts, particularly in the public sector. I feel the public's patience and understanding in this regard is nearly exhausted. In terms of their number, disrupting effects and cost, strikes have reached an intolerable level. The point has been reached where management, labour and government must seek other alternatives. I am hopeful that before this parliament is over, progress in this direction will be made.

I have mentioned that a high proportion of my constituents are middle-income earners in the $8,000 to $15,000 a year range. During the past year or so I believe there has been growing resentment among this group; young couples beginning a family, the trained, experienced workers buying a home, and university graudates starting their careers feel that government has forgotten them or, worse, is taking them for granted. These people find themselves caught in the middle at budget time, with tax relief going to the lower income groups in order to assist them with inflation and to business enterprises in order that they may sustain or expand economic activity and employment opportunities. They feel their hard-earned tax dollars are spent on programs aimed at other groups and other interests, and too often they find serious abuses and inefficiencies in these programs.

Although I do not agree entirely with these sentiments, the fact is that this is how a growing number perceive the situation. This middle-income group has traditionally been the strongest supporter of social programs and legislation. However, I fear a backlash has been developing against certain such programs. Without the support of Canada's middle-income earners, new, needed social legislative measures will be in jeopardy, if not doomed. The government must act to wipe out abuses and inefficiencies in existing programs. In the same light, it must show or ask companies to show that tax concessions and other assistance to large businesses are not just increasing profits but, rather, are creating more employment and/or providing reduced prices to the consumer.

We must again provide some form of incentive for middle-income earners, incentive which many of them believe is now absent. All too frequently I come across university graduates who are on unemployment insurance or welfare. They find the opportunities to employ their talents are too few, the rewards too small and the alternatives both attractive and available; that is, welfare and unemployment insurance. I believe the budget which the minister presented Monday offers more to the middle-income earner than has been offered by any other budget in a good many years. A great many of my constituents will be able to look at a number of measures which are contained in this budget and say, "That is good for me." The most obvious of these measures are the personal income tax cuts. While the greatest benefits will be received by lower income earners, and rightly so, these tax cuts, both this year and in 1975 will assist most Canadians.

I have already mentioned other measures which will directly assist many middle-income earners, such as the housing initiatives aimed at reducing the cost and increasing the accessibility of home ownership, the interest and dividend deductions and other proposals such as the Canada Savings Bonds provisions which are designed to protect an individual's savings. In addition, there is the removal of the 12 per cent sales tax on adult clothing and footwear, implemented last July by order in council, along with sales tax reductions on a number of items ranging from buses to bicycles. I congratulate the minister for the removing such tax. I know that metropolitan Toronto will benefit from this measure: we need many buses and a great deal of subway equipment and I am happy to note that such equipment will not be subject to tax.

Although the Minister of Finance did not specifically mention in his budget speech the needs of the Canadian forces, I should like to do so at this time. It is my understanding that to perform the tasks outlined in the 1972 report, the Canadian forces will require a minimum strength of 82,000 personnel, together with the replacement of obsolete and obsolescent equipment, as well as the provision of new, sophisticated equipment required to keep our forces up to date. I hope the minister will also find funds to provide the expertise, ships, planes and ground forces to more adequately guarantee our sovereignty from sea to sea and in fact from our shores to the 12-mile limit and even out to the 200-mile limit, because we must project our fishing rights and the environment.

I began, Mr. Speaker, by giving a brief description of the world's severe economic situation which was the setting for the budget. The Minister of Finance said that the world is "in a fragile and precarious state, suffering from severe inflation and the gathering forces of recession." I should like to conclude by saying that the need for international co-operation has never been greater, if we are to avoid international catastrophe. This need for co-operation and joint action was reflected during the past year by such gatherings as the Law of the Sea Conference in the summer, the recent World Food Conference at home and other international economic meetings.

Unfortunately, the potential of these gatherings has been undermined by petty national and regional jealousies and interests. Just last week we had a demonstration of this with the United States placing quotas on beef and pork. History has shown that attempts to provide this kind of unfair protection for national producers during periods of economic uncertainty have snowballed, resulting in economic and social disaster for the international community.

I congratulate the Minister of Finance for his budget presentation last Monday night. It provides needed leadership and determination in the fiscal field, yet contains the flexibility needed to cope with unforeseen international developments. The measures incorporated in it will, I believe, have a beneficial impact in the fight against inflation while at the same time guarding against recession. Finally, I see the budget as an optimistic appraisal of Canada's potential and, at the same time, a realistic assessment of the dangers we must face.

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) took it upon himself to show the government team in its true light. Within a few hours, the minister served-us a speech, that is the budget speech which, while professing to be a government program, constitutes paradoxically a condemnation of the government by the government.

Throughout his speech, the minister managed to expose the hoax the people had already started to suspect. He recognized having misled Parliament through his erroneous forecasts, which he naturally attributes to others, the international context, the weather, poor crops throughout the world, monetary difficulties, market fluctuations, the price of gold and God knows what else!

He admitted having deceived the people who do remember that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) once condemned the removal of the 11 per cent tax on building materials. He particularly deceived the population by suggesting that he would lead a fierce battle against inflation, while today, dropping the gloves and worrying about a possible recession rather than about the present inflation, he leaves the battle before the first round has even been called.

Mr. Speaker, ever since 1968 until now, the Liberal government never had the intention nor the desire to control inflation. Never mind that, we, under the leadership of the leader of the opposition, to whom I wish to pay a tribute for the stirring speech he made in the House yesterday, will not give up.

[English]

One need be neither astute nor very suspicious to see this budget as the first step in a carefully planned and orchestrated game, a game that the Liberals have been playing for some time with our country and our federation. This budget, if we look at its highlights and provisions carefully, treats inflation as a trifle, something to acknowledge but not really worth seriously worrying about. The various provisions of the budget move in every direction so imperceivably that it is impossible to glean exactly the direction in which the government is going or the direction the country should follow.

This document comes from those wonderful people who offered Canada leadership, that strange, elusive quality that only the Liberals can offer and, as we were told by their hucksters, only they can deliver. This budget has done for statesmanlike leadership and economic leadership what the Boston strangler did for door to door canvassing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: However, let us leave this staring gap in the budget provisions and look closely at the one thing about which there is no doubt in this budget no doubt in the mind of the Minister of Finance and no doubt in the mind of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). The big red machine, in all its grandeur and arrogance, is picking a fight. Those gunslingers, the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister, with the itchy trigger fingers have saddled up and are eager to do battle with the people of Alberta. In any event, the big red machine seems prepared to fire the first shot and keep its guns loaded.

I suppose, Mr. Speaker, they figure that Alberta is Alberta and only Tories come from Alberta, so why not take them on. The real people, the Liberals' heartland of support—the golden triangle and central Canada—will be proud of the way the big red machine takes on the oilmen of Alberta: it might even push the machine a few points up in the polls.

Let us consider who the brave Minister of Finance is really aiming at in his budget. Alberta and her rights to the development of secondary industry and a renewable and consistent economic base happens to be one target. But there are others. What about Newfoundland and her hopes for royalties and development, thanks to her resources; or Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick? They, too, are directly implicated: they are directly in the line of the big red machine's sputtering cannon. Indeed, what this finance minister who rides high in the saddle has really done is cast a pall of smoke over the growing hopes of maritimers for the type of mineral and resource wealth that recent encouraging finds have given them every reason to build their hopes and aspirations on for the future. Of course, when one notes how much patronage the big red machine would lose if the maritimes enjoyed an economy that DREE would not have to support, one can understand the big red machine's desire to scuttle any hopes there.

The people of Quebec, how well they are served by their gunslinging representatives in the federal cabinet! The Quebec caucus of the big red machine may think that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are taking aim at Alberta, but closer examination reveals that those Quebec members who think they are looking out over the gunsights at Alberta are really looking into a mirror.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: How they serve confederation! How they stand "solide", as they used to say, as their leader takes away their province's mineral and resource rights, along with those of other provinces! The Minister of Finance always boasts that he seeks example budgets from many Canadians of all walks of life. That is, indeed, an admirable practice for such a straight-shooter. But I have to wonder—indeed, I have to ask—whether the section on resource taxation read by the minister in the House might not have been written by René Lévesque. As a former resource minister, Mr. Lévesque knows full well how much Quebec's prosperity and economic growth depend on its natural resources, and that a threat to those resources would aid in so many ways the separatist cause.

No province, no territory, no group of Canadians who seek or enjoy improved services through their provincial government can escape the effects of the budget's implications. It is, as I said, an old game, a game steeped in victory for the red machine, a game bathed in cynicism and deceit. The Liberals have always liked what confrontation does for them politically. They have always liked painting things black and white, choosing sides and watching the opinion polls come their way. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) did it in 1973 during the energy crisis that never was, and indeed the red machine's figures at the polls jumped high enough for them to coast home in July of 1974.

The Prime Minister, when minister of justice, built his reputation on confrontation with his own province. In more devious fashion they did the same thing in 1970, overreacting and spreading panic by their own extremism. But oh how their popularity soared and they coasted through on that. I would like to have more belief in this government, more belief of this Minister of Finance; but I say there is no basis in fact for any faith whatever.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: There is a basis in fact and a basis in history to believe that this government will seek in every way to manipulate this battle, to exaggerate its proportions and to extenuate its circumstances so as to reap maximum partisan gain. Our hope, Mr. Speaker, lies in the ability of Premier Lougheed and the other provincial premiers to work out meaningful options based more on public interest than the self-serving options of this minister and his government.

Once again I say that leadership is not being exercised by the federal government—only brinksmanship of the worst order. Leadership in the form of statesmanship will have to come from other sources and other major levels of government in Canada. My leader exposed yesterday the duplicity of this government, duplicity which covers everything from personal conduct—I need not give any examples—to insincerity of commitment and purpose.

This budget is another example of that manipulative ability, common to Liberals, to divide the nation while campaigning as great unifiers once the divisions they have begun are established. They have sought to divide Francophone from Anglophone when it has suited their purpose. Now they have returned to their old target—confederation itself. As the government seeks to divide Canada into easterners and westerners, producers and consumers, exporters and importers, as they seek to label their enemies and patronize their friends, as they seek to wreak dissension and disunity, I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that your compatriots and mine will remember that, above all, we are Canadians—Canadians who have worked out our problems before, patched up our differences and risen above the chameleon qualities of the demagogue and the political huckster.

They will recall how long we have striven to achieve the unity of purpose and sanity of approach which have protected and nurtured our nation's growth and development. Let us remain resolved that these little men who sit opposite shall not tear us asunder.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, there is a verse in a very well known song by Gilbert Bécaud which says: The train we take always takes us somewhere. Well, the train of the supporting measures which are found in the budget speech of November 18 is taking Confederation straight into bankruptcy.

I want to consider for a while the interference of the federal government into the area of natural resources, for this is indeed a case of real interference.

After having pondered over the possibility of meddling with exchange markets, carried out, through its URBEX projects, a general offensive in the area of urban planning, tried to lay its hands on the income which may flow from the development of off-shore mineral deposits, the government becomes excessively centralist in a number of chapters of the communications file, assuming increasingly more jurisdiction in a clearly cultural area, interfering at the level of territorial development through its community programs and what have you. This federal administration has finally decided to deliberately and off-handedly tackle the provincial governments through its taxation of resources.

By brutally asserting that royalties, taxes and other payments to provincial governments will no longer be deductible from taxable income at the federal level, the present federal government itself is violating the national energy agreement reached last March or, at the very least, is jeopardizing the survival of national consensus in the name of equity between east and west.

Of course, this way it is first of all reneging on the deal with the producing provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. But, at the same time, it is calling down upon itself the collective anger of the premiers of this country. The government, by this violation of the spirit and the letter of British North America Act section 109, is opening the door to a major constitutionnal conflict which will have a decisive effect. Reactions are already piling up and I shall spare the House that subject. In fact, they are coming from all corners of the country.

It is equally clear that Ottawa is looking for a confrontation and will get it.

Assuredly the present federal government, besides putting aside the limits that it imposed upon itself when formulating the long promised and awaited-for policy which is self-evident if we consider Bill C-32 and the new budget, wishes and is looking for a showdown. To be sure, if they had wanted one they would not have done otherwise.

With the government refusing to allow royalties paid to provinces as deductions for federal income tax purposes, the Prime Minister of the country has proved his inadequacy in building Canada's more and more complex future. It might well be that he is not interested in it anymore.

Here we are in Canada, Mr. Speaker, with a Prime Minister presumably elected in 1968 to tighten the bonds of national unity and he is speaking pocketbooks when he is talking about a policy which could lead Confederation to the brink of the precipice.

It is under the same Prime Minister who boasted of taming the Parti Québécois, of "having no good done" to young impatient Quebecers and who at first was elected because of that, that Quebec has seen its independentist movement rise like a meteor. He has no more managed to tame the P.Q. than he has managed or wants to manage to tame inflation. It is under this same Prime Minister that western alienation is gaining steam.

Had the present paradoxical, cynical, Machiavellian, Prime Minister of this country chosen to prove the non-viability of Confederation, he would not have proceeded otherwise.

The Minister of Finance in his unilateral approach in the field of resource taxation missed a fine opportunity to both promote exports and loosen up federal-provincial relationships.

The Trojan horse that has become the equalization program—there is talk of $253 million more for Quebec, but that is not sure—must not put to sleep either provincial governments or responsible authorities. One Trojan horse trick in history is enough.

Before concluding, because I will not be repeating here points that would be relevant to this debate that I had ample opportunity to express on November 4 last, I like to think that the Quebec government in particular will not be prepared to sell its rights. Let it realize that one day it could be its turn. Let it not wait to react firmly, officially and publicly. Let it not wait until the federal government glances at the power and mining resources in Quebec. The claims, and even more so, the legitimate aspirations for any "sovereignty", for obtaining increased powers, must all resist the federal millions.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps for the first time in the history of this country, provincial governments must understand and use the weapon of disinterested, total and open solidarity on an acceptable compromise in face of a central government which seems to be stricken with political panic and whose recent reelection can already be viewed as the greatest disservice in modern times Canadians did themselves.

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we are discussing this budget at a time when the world faces more serious problems than it has faced at least since World War II. In the underdeveloped parts of this world—Asia, Africa and South America—hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of people face death by starvation. In the industrialized part of the world—North America, western Europe and Japan—we see recession on its way or presently existing. Italy and Great Britain are faced with financial crises the like of which they have not seen for the last 200 years. Japan, that post-World War II miracle, is faced with unemployment and a sharp increase in costs with which they do not know how to deal. Our neighbour to the south, the United States, a country to which we sell most of our exports and from which we import more than any other country in the world, is now in a recession.

Let me put on the record a couple of paragraphs from last Sunday's New York Times outlining the situation in the United States. Industrial production—output of factories, utilities and mines—dropped six-tenths of 1 per cent in October, but this figure does not reflect recent large cutbacks in automobile production. During the July-September period, the gross national product slipped 2.1 per cent, the third consecutive quarterly decline. During October the dollar total of the country's payroll increased less than in September, a strong sign of recession, says the Times. Automobile sales were off more than 38 per cent in the first ten days of November, a more severe decline than had been expected. Unemployment, 6 per cent in September, continued to rise. And so on.

Despite these facts, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) brings down a budget essentially the same as the one that he presented in May, six months ago. The minister is engaging in parlour games while forces are massing which can shake this country to its roots. Yet the minister picks this very time to enter into a constitutional debate with the provinces, the consequences of which no one can foresee, with perhaps a battle in the courts that will take years to resolve. Instead of getting together with the provinces in order to work out an agreement to share revenue collected by the federal government as a result of the sharp increase in oil prices, the Minister of Finance makes a unilateral decision which in my view is constitutionally not permissible.

Instead of the government dealing with the real economic problems facing the country, this parliament, the press, radio and television as well as the public are to become engaged in the battle between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance with all the provinces. I do not intend to spend much time on this question since members from all parties will be discussing it. I simply say I find it strange that the Minister of Finance is proposing to adopt a policy that will permit Imperial Oil to pay royalties to Canadian Pacific Railway if it drills wells on CPR land, and will permit Shell to pay royalties to American owners of land or to Indonesian owners of land if Shell drills well on the soil of those two countries, yet will not permit those companies to deduct royalties paid as a business expense if they drill wells on land belonging to the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. This seems a strange way for the Government of Canada to do business.

In his budget the Minister of Finance is assuming that Canada can avoid the recession that is plaguing other countries. In the little pamphlet issued by the minister entitled "Budget... in Brief", we read the following at pages 4 and 5:

> With the benefit of measures in this budget, and with no unforeseen deterioration of the economic environment abroad or unforeseen shocks at home, the Canadian economy is expected to grow at a rate of about 4 per cent in 1975.

That is a completely unrealistic estimate. The OECD has estimated that Canadian growth in 1975 will not be 4 per cent but will be in the neighbourhood of 1 per cent. As a matter of fact, in a report that appeared in the Montreal Gazette a day or two ago, based on statistics issued by Statistics Canada we are told the following:

> The government yesterday issued sombre figures on the economy suggesting there was little or no growth in the year's third quarter, and the economy may even have gone into reverse.
> With economists forecasting a still poorer performance in the final quarter of 1974, the Canadian economy could face two quarters of negative growth—which would technically qualify as a recession—this year.

What is happening in fact, Mr. Speaker? A couple of days ago Chrysler of Canada announced that 1,700 Chrysler workers in Canada will face lay-offs as a result of the six weeks' cutback in production by the Chrysler Corporation of the United States. If auto sales in the United States do not pick up—as I have already indicated, they have dropped by over 30 per cent—these lay-offs are likely to be extended. At the time when this is happening in Ontario, the number of workers laid off in the forestry industry in British Columbia rose to over 15,000 last week, an increase from 14,719 unemployed at the beginning of the month. The Council of Forest Industries, in releasing these figures, said that the unemployment rate in the industry had reached 17 per cent of the total work force.

This is not surprising, Mr. Speaker, because housing starts in Japan, the United States and Canada have fallen disastrously. The Minister of Finance proposes to do very little about this. What plans does he have to deal with this growing cancer of unemployment and recession? As far as we can tell from his confident, ebullient budget, he has none. Five months have already been lost since his May budget, and I suggest that six months from now we will be presented with another budget which will attempt to deal with the recession into which we are heading.

I suggest that the Minister of Finance should have come before the House this week and said that his department, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the department that deals with housing, are calling on the provincial governments to prepare, now, the detailed plans that are required to be put in effect next March and April to deal with the situation if unemployment continues to grow in Canada. I believe unemployment will increase, and most economists say it will if the recession in the United States, Japan, Great Britain and Italy continues to grow worse, and every indication is that it will.

What the minister should be saying is that he is not prepared to encourage the private sector of the economy by tax concessions, of which it has already had too much, to take up the slack, but if necessary he is prepared to implement plans, which should have been prepared by the provincial governments, to pour into the Canadian economy a sum of money, which economists have estimated should be in the neighbourhood of $2 billion, for direct projects to put people to work doing things and creating facilities required in the form of houses, roads, recreational centres and community projects. These are the things we need.

What has the minister done? He has placed emphasis on expansion of the private enterprise system. He proposes to continue giving massive tax concessions to the corporations of this country whose profits have been and continue to be high. Just a few days ago the Toronto Globe and Mail carried a story, the headline on which was "Profit of Industrial Corporations Shows Smaller Year-to-Year Gain". However, if we read the story we see:

> After-tax profit of industrial corporations in the third quarter amounted to $2.31 million, up 27.5 per cent from a year earlier, Statistics Canada reports.

The minister called on workers who will be receiving a $50 tax rebate in the coming year to be moderate in their wage demands. What did he do for the corporations whose profits have increased by 27½ per cent in the third quarter of this year as compared to the third quarter of last year? He gave them more tax concessions. Mineral fuels, which I presume means the oil and gas corporations, had increased profits of 45.9 per cent in the third quarter of 1974 compared to the third quarter of 1973. For the first nine months of 1974 their profits were up by 37.7 per cent. The minister gives them more tax concessions, but tells the provinces he intends to squeeze them when they try to increase their royalties from oil companies. Then if the oil companies cannot pay more money, the minister says the government will squeeze the provinces rather than the oil companies.

What about the individual? The personal tax reduction and exemptions the minister is proposing are regressive. They provide greater benefit for the higher income groups and will only exacerbate the existing standards in respect of income. The combined effect of tax indexing, the reduction in the rate on the first $500 of taxable income from 12 per cent in 1974 to 9 per cent in 1975, and the general tax rate reduction in 1975 mean that for a single taxpayer with an income of $6,000 the tax saving in 1975 will be $183. For a single taxpayer with an income of $30,000 the saving will be $651. Where is the equity in such a proposal?

In the case of a married taxpayer, with two children under 16 years of age, who has an income of $6,000 the saving will be $214 in 1975. For a similar person with an income of $30,000 the saving will be $622. I wish that the Minister of Finance, when he was thinking about his budget, had read a speech made by his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), because in a speech which that minister made to the Empire Club in Toronto he showed how badly we have dealt with the people of this country. He showed how great the disparity in income still is in this country after all these years of Liberal and Conservative, but mostly Liberal, governments.

Let me summarize what the Minister of National Health and Welfare said in his speech to the Empire Club in Toronto. He noted that in 1972 there were one million families with incomes under $5,500 a year in this country. Those people live in what has been classified by the Senate Committee, headed by a Liberal, Senator Croll, by the Economic Council of Canada and by Statistics Canada, as poverty. Those families, which represent 20 per cent of all the families in Canada, received just 6 per cent of total family income that year. At the same time the 20 per cent of families at the upper end of the income scale, with earnings over $15,400 a year, received 39 per cent of all family income.

The one-fifth of the families at the top of the income scale had incomes which were six and one-half times as large on average as the one-fifth of the families at the bottom of the scale. These are national totals which do not reveal the even more serious income distribution inequities among people in various regions. However, these figures show clear evidence of the problem which must be faced.

How did the Minister of Finance face this problem? He faced it by increasing the disparity between people at the bottom fifth of the income scale in favour of the top 40 per cent. This is what we have come to expect from Liberal governments and from this Liberal Minister of Finance. In the so-called just society—a phrase I think the Prime Minister wishes he had never picked up from his speech writers—this is the kind of tax proposals we get from the Minister of Finance at a time when we face tremendous inflation.

When people in the bottom 40 per cent of the income scale find it increasingly difficult to pay for the bare necessities of life, the minister comes forward with a budget which will give the greatest benefit to the people in the top income brackets and which will give the least benefit to those at the bottom. It is for these reasons I, and members of this party, certainly intend to oppose the budget, vote against it, and will continue to call on the Minister of Finance to face the real problems of this country which are increasing unemployment, increasing inflation, and increasing poverty for most of the people.

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I think every member of this House has a commitment to all the people of this country. I believe we differ only in the method of achieving the desired ends.

Let me state first of all that I have a great deal of respect and admiration for some hon. members on the other side of the House, especially the hon. Member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), the hon. members for Halifax, Oshawa, Nanaimo, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I think they will go down in our parliamentary history, as I believe the great progress the Government of Canada has made in past years is due in part to their contributions in this House. However, I cannot understand anyone who suggests that the budget presented the other day is not a good, sound document designed to benefit the majority of the people in Canada.

The people of Canada knew this government would present this kind of budget, and that is why they returned this government to power with a majority. But each one of us here, both on the government side and in opposition, has his own ideas about what is best for Canada and what should be done in the future, and it is during this debate that we make our views known.

So that you, Mr. Speaker, will more fully understand the general content of my remarks, let me first state that I represent the district of Gander-Twillingate in Newfoundland. My district has 88 communities on the map. In actual fact it comprises 146 smaller entities; in some cases three and four separate communities exist under one name on the electoral district map. There are only a dozen of these communities that have any form of industry other than the fishery. In the majority of instances there is no real industry.

All of us here in this chamber look upon the budget in the framework of how it applies to the majority of the people we represent. Within this framework I am concerned about the underprivileged, the primary producers, those on fixed incomes, those who in many cases have not a hope in the world of improving their lot under existing circumstances. For even while we can legislate changes in taxation, income and social benefits, there is no real assurance that the benefits are passed on to the people. There exist the business community and provincial governments which sometimes operate in direct opposition to our legislation.

Let me state first of all that I have been concerned that, mainly because of a vicious taxation structure in some provinces over the past several decades, we have had a regressive tax structure in this country. What does a regressive tax structure mean? On a graph it says that those who make the least, pay the most in real income through taxes in one form or another. I, like other members, have wrestled with this problem for some time. I have conjured up visions of negative income tax and guaranteed annual income structures that would correct this grave injustice.

We must remember, Sir, that while we sit in this chamber a vast minority of our people sit at home wondering where their next dollar will come from; in fact many of these homes have large families and they face a never ending struggle for survival. The real crime respecting their situation rests in the fact that many are primary producers.

On the other end of the scale we have seen, over the past decades, the emergence of the newly rich, those who hold, because of their position in society, monopolies of one form or another. They have become rich because of our system. How did they get their money? Was it by the sweat of their brow? Was it by making two blades of grass grow where one grew before? No, as far as actual production is concerned they do not toil, neither do they spin. They sit in their stylish offices and watch the money roll in, Mr. Speaker.

More people want more. The selfishness of one class of our people must be checked by government. To see the starving millions in this world, for me, as a member of this House, to visit homes in my district where parents and children sit around the table with only bread and tea on it, not even any butter, that is a crime. It makes an even greater crime when, 100 feet away, is the ocean where there are tons upon tons of fish, such as herring, mackerel and capelin. But because private enterprise does not see fit, there are no fish processing plants. In some communities where those fish are being caught, we still operate on the feudal system, as is the case in my district. That is, the boats come in from Norway and other parts of the world, including other parts of Canada, load up the raw material, and send it back to us the next year, canned, charging sometimes 100 times more per pound than it cost the processors.

This government, in two budgets, has tried to right some wrongs. It has attempted to cope with the critical situation of world inflation. It has been among the more successful governments in doing so. In two budgets it has said, "We will try to correct inequality, we will offer greater social benefits, we will decrease taxation for the majority of our people, and we will try to increase production."

Our course is in the right direction. A guaranteed annual income for all Canadians in some form appears possible in the future.

This is a vast country with a multiplicity of problems, and we cannot always achieve justice. The Treasury Board knows that regional rates of pay for federal employees in Gander do not go over big with me, whereas they are a great thing for western Canada. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) is aware of the fact that to place the same stiff rules on unemployment insurance recipients in Alberta, where 30,000 jobs are vacant, and on recipients in Gander-Twillingate, where no jobs are vacant, is simply not fair play.

The Minister of State in charge of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc) realizes that when money was paid for loss of time due to ice last year, those fishermen unfortunate enough to be on welfare because of the ice conditions had that federal money deducted from their provincial welfare cheques.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) knows that family allowances given to those on welfare in Newfoundland are deducted from their welfare cheques, and that the new increase in January will mean nothing to those on the welfare rolls because of provincial regulations.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) knew when he proposed income tax cuts on the federal level that our provincial income tax went up four months ago by 11 per cent.

So, while the federal government is doing its best to equalize opportunity in this nation, the provincial governments have a role to play as well. The position that we hold, of trying to equalize opportunity federally, means that certain provinces have to give more to help other provinces, that certain groups in Canadian society must give more to help others less fortunate than themselves, and that we as a nation must, in the name of humanitarianism, be prepared to offer our food surpluses to those who are dying of starvation, and the problem of who gets what, when and how, must be dealt with in our method of distributing foreign aid.

What then does this budget do for the long run? We should never be accused of treating the symptoms and not the disease. All governments, for too long, have been blaming the mirror for not being a window when they see such inequalities in this country. The Minister of State (Fisheries) is looking at the income stabilization program for fishermen, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare is looking at some form of guaranteed annual income for Canadians.

The government, in this budget speech, has clearly stated its concern to deal with the real problems. The tax cuts on production equipment, the continual use of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to encourage production, the continuing funding of AHOP, the shifting of the tax burden on to the shoulders of those who can afford to pay, all this augurs well for the future.

In the case of my district my duty here in the House, in committees and behind the scenes, will be to try to impress on everyone the importance of the government playing a greater role in initiating industry, looking for the potential resource development areas, and then actively doing what private enterprise will not do. The provincial government of Newfoundland and the federal government have come together in a co-operative effort to create secondary industry without the immediate rip-off of profit going into someone's pocket.

All the rotten eggs of the Egg Marketing Board do not amount to the value of fish that go untouched in the waters of any one of the outport communities in my riding. The relative importance of many things must find new perspectives. The value of an individual, and his stake in this country, should not be determined by how much money he has in the bank, but better by how many children he has—what is the size of his family.

The 100 per cent write-off for exploration expenditures, the 50 per cent national tax rate for resource industries, the sales tax on building and construction materials reduced to 5 per cent, the capital cost allowance on new, multiple unit residential buildings for rent, to be claimed against any source of income, the federal sales tax on construction equipment and on materials used in municipal water distribution systems eliminated, the new registered home ownership savings plan, the $500 grants for new moderately price homes, the federal sales tax on transportation equipment removed, the two year write-off of new machinery for manufacturing and processing, the first $1,000 of private pension income exempt from tax, a 10 per cent surtax on corporate profits, special excise taxes on high energy consuming vehicles, the elimination of the sales tax on clothing and footwear, new tax incentives for small businesses, and tariff reductions on consumer goods—all will benefit the majority of Canadians, and will go far to eliminate the inequality within and between provinces.

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak in the budget debate. While the budget may be of some help to certain areas in Canada I feel it is of little or no help to the people of the Churchill constituency which I represent.

The constituency of Churchill covers some 200,000 square miles of central and northern Manitoba. The population is in excess of 85,000 people spread out over 75 communities. The physical make-up of the communities is as varied as you will find in any part of Canada. The one seaport is the port of Churchill located on Hudson Bay. I say this for the benefit of those members who have not yet visited our area.

The federal and provincial governments are in the process of rebuilding that entire community, with improvements in housing and recreational facilities. This revamping of the community, however, has put a burden on the people in that they are now unable to meet the high taxes and rents required for new housing and recreational facilities.

[Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate).]

The town of Churchill has undergone drastic change, but the people there claim they had no part in the planning. This is what happens when governments take over and try to improve facilities and communities; the people are pushed aside. They were given no opportunity to participate in decision-making, nor is there any evidence that they will be given this role in the future as Churchill is now classed as a government-owned and government-run town.

The port of Churchill is the only bright spot in the economic future of this community, but the government is not planning fully to develop and utilize this port. At present it is capable of handling some 40,000,000 bushels of grain during the shipping season, which runs from July 20 to October 20. Due to poor planning by the Wheat Board, however, only 22,000,000 bushels of grain were shipped through the port during the past year.

When grain is sold to a specific country by the Wheat Board I believe that the Wheat Board at that time should designate a date on which the grain is to be taken from the port of Churchill. During last year there were sometimes as many as eight boats in the port of Churchill waiting to be loaded, and at other times there was not a boat in sight for eight or ten days. I think the government should ensure that the facility is used to its full capacity.

A sound economic base must be developed so that people can work for a wage on which they can live. During the election campaign I said that people who live in the north should be given a northern allowance to offset the high cost of living there. An allowance of this nature would be an incentive to attract and keep people in the north.

The budget provisions announced on Monday night will be of little or no benefit to the average wage earner in the Churchill constituency. During the election campaign we heard promises to the effect that the eligibility age for old age pension benefits would be lowered. The budget has come and gone, however, and our senior citizens still have to face those difficult years when they must depend on benefits.

There are some 20 Indians reserves in the Churchill riding, ranging in population from 200 to 2,500. Many of these reserves have no sound economic base. Even though the chiefs and councils have been pleading with the government to help the bands develop industry, meaningful training programs and self-government on the reserves, it appears that most of these requests have fallen on deaf ears, or are tied up in the bureaucratic system. The Indian people are fed up with study upon study—they want action. I would suggest that the government should start to listen to and learn from the various Indian organizations that have made formal presentations.

In 1972 the federal government granted the province of Manitoba—namely, Manitoba Hydro—permission to divert the Churchill River and to control the water levels on Lake Winnipeg and the Nelson River. When the licence was issued, little or no thought was given to the project's detrimental effects on the environment and, most important, the flooding and immersion that will be caused to Indian reserve lands along the Churchill diversion, Lake Winnipeg and the Nelson River. Mr. Speaker, the chiefs of those reserves that are and will be affected are now involved in a legal battle with the province of Manitoba. I feel that the federal government was irresponsible in issuing this licence to the province without considering the effects that such changes in water levels would have on reserves and other communities in the north.

The Indian people affected have not taken this lying down but have formed a committee, called the Northern Flood Committee, to deal with the province of Manitoba concerning the flooding of reserve lands and other problems relating to their fishing and trapping rights. The former minister of Indian affairs and northern development granted funds to the committee, but these are now depleted. The committee has submitted a proposal for further funds to fight the flooding of the reservations. The chairman of the flood committee is in Ottawa today, trying to get funds which were originally promised so that he could continue with his job. As I say, these funds were promised during the campaign. They were to be approved last week, but that approval is still pending.

Let me now deal with mining in the constituency of Churchill. Really, mining is the backbone, the economic base of my constituency. We must always remember that mines are not discovered and developed overnight. The abortive budget of May 6 would have put the small prospector or small mining developer out of business. The budget of November 18 has not changed this situation. Large mining companies in my riding are now as vulnerable as the small prospector or developer.

The high cost of living, together with actions of provincial and federal governments, has squeezed mining companies to the point where they feel they are not getting a reasonable return on invested dollars, and will be forced to cut back. Cities and towns have been built around mines. Many communities are one-industry towns and depend completely on the mining industry. In excess of 35,000 people in northern Manitoba and in the riding of Churchill live in mining towns. These people, I feel, live in such communities because they like living there and because they enjoy a feeling of security.

After the May 6 budget many people living in mining communities became uneasy. They felt insecure and were uncertain about the future. This uncertainty caused many people this past summer to leave mining communities and seek employment in other fields. The result has been a shortage of miners in my riding. The budget of November 18 has further aggravated the sense of insecurity of people working in the mining field.

Governments say they want a fair share of the national pie. Considering the high cost of living, we must ask what is a fair share of the pie? Let me put some figures on record to show what I mean. Both federal and provincial governments in Canada received substantial net benefits from mining development, especially from development in the constituency of Churchill.

The federal government, during a 12-year period, received accumulated revenues of $407 million and spent only $7.8 million, receiving a net benefit of $339 million. Is that what you call fair sharing of pie? The province of Manitoba, during the same period received accumulated revenues of $78.5 million, and incurred expenditures of $13.4 million. The province's net benefit was thus $65.1 million. Provinces other than Manitoba also received benefits from mining development in my constituency although they did not incur expenditures. The accumulated total of these benefits reached $81 million by the end of 1971. From the foregoing figures it is easy to see how important mining is to northern Manitoba, especially Churchill, and that mining is indeed the economic base of the region.

May I now deal with northern Manitoba's fresh water fishery. I feel that such a fishery could easily employ an additional 150 to 200 Manitoba residents. That is the potential. Many lakes in northern Manitoba are stocked with fresh water fish such as trout, pickerel, whitefish and so on. The federal government has become involved in the marketing of fresh water fish in Manitoba. I am not convinced that the board is doing the job for which it was established, for the simple reason that a bureaucracy has become involved in the handling, processing and sale of this fish. I feel that the government should establish a standing committee of this House on the fresh water fisheries of Canada, which should be separate and distinct from the committee which deals with the salt water fisheries, as I do not think the fresh water fishery of Canada has been given adequate attention.

May I now touch on transportation in Churchill. I do not think any part of the country can be developed properly unless it is served by a good transport system. Northern Manitoba at present is served by a railway and a form of road. Our overland transport systems are limited. Basically, the area is served by aircraft. Aircraft are the only means of transport for isolated communities.

The airport at Thompson, Manitoba, is being used beyond capacity because of overcrowding to the point at which it is unsafe to land aircraft or fly passengers out from there. In July, the airport handled 5,200 landings; it is handling, on average, 4,000 landings per month. We acquired a new control tower at the airport, however, as air transport is vitally important to my constituency, I feel that the expanded facilities requested by municipal authorities and the town fathers should be made available. I submit that the government should consider expanding these facilities immediately.

I wish to register a complaint concerning the Air Transport Board. As aircraft are so important in meeting our transport needs, I suggest that changes in procedure are required if we are to licence aircraft properly so that they may carry passengers and freight. In some cases carriers have had to wait up to eight months to have their applications processed by the Air Transport Board. Such delays constitute gross neglect on the part of the government, especially as aircraft are so important in developing northern areas which rely almost totally on aircraft as a means of transport.

I also wish to voice a complaint concerning television in the riding I represent, and I do not intend to make anyone feel that I have anything against French-speaking people. Lastt week in Flin Flon a notice appeared stating that the CRTC would hold a hearing in Montreal on December 10 to have a second television channel in The Pas and Flin Flon. This second channel will be French. It will be a rebroadcast from CBWFT St. Boniface. The people in Flin Flon were appalled at the notice appearing in the paper with no consultation whatsoever with the people of Flin Flon or The Pas, especially when Flin Flon and The Pas combined have a population of only 8 per cent whose mother tongue is French. There are many people whose mother tongue is French; however, their children neither speak nor understand French.

I understand the cost is to be an initial $78,000, plus operating and rental costs. I wonder whether it would be possible to put this toward a second English channel in my constituency or, with 15,000 Cree Indians in the constituency of Churchill, possibly we could have a second channel in Cree. This would probably make a little more sense.

When talking about inflation, cutting government costs and so on, I wonder how we can justify an expenditure of this amount for such a small portion of the population. Perhaps this is a policy that has to go ahead and maybe I have no way of stopping it, but there are many people in my constituency who would support a second English channel. I do not believe many will be watching the French network.

The forest resources of the constituency of Churchill are also a very important aspect of our economy. I am sure all members have heard of Churchill Forest Industries. Perhaps everything they have heard has been bad. However, if you visit The Pas, Manitoba, you do not hear too many bad things about it because it has created a lot of jobs for people in northern Manitoba. This is what we have been pressing for, more jobs for the people of the north. We want the people of the north not only to have a place to live, but we want them to call it their home. You cannot develop a home by just coming up there, trying to make a fast buck and leaving. We want people to come there and stay.

The forest resources are going to be depleted if we do not get some help. I plead with the government to provide some help to protect those forest resources. I understand that in Quebec there are several CL 215 water bombers to protect the forests. In Manitoba we have a couple of old Canso aircraft that are not in very good shape. They have been through a few wars. I believe there is now an application from the province of Manitoba to have two CL 215's for forest protection during the summer. I have worked for the forestry department for years, and I certainly support the request for the two CL 215's.

Mr. Marke Raines (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of my first speech as a member of this distinguished assembly allow me, at the outset, to express appreciation for your role. It is, as we all know, a most difficult one.

I also congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) for presenting a most commendable budget. I am particularly pleased by the minister's commitment to restrain growth in government expenditures and his proposals to reduce personal income tax, protect savings and sustain capital investments. I am sure these proposals are welcomed not only by my constituents, but by all Canadians.

I wish to pay tribute to those who represented Burnaby-Seymour in past parliaments, most notably the Hon. Ray Perrault who served so well as the federal representative of this riding from 1968 to 1972. He set high standards, and a tradition of service which I will do my best to live up to, Mr. Speaker.

There is much to be done in Burnaby-Seymour. This is a riding where we see the need for many essential services. Railway overpasses and rapid transit are yet to be provided. We are part of a metropolitan area. There is one point I would like to stress. Our LIP allocations in Burnaby-Seymour are serving two significant purposes, taking people off welfare and unemployment insurance, and providing aid to a great number of noteworthy social and environmental projects. There is much yet to be done in Burnaby-Seymour and in Canada, and I share the expressed eagerness to get on with the job.

In the House of Commons on October 2 of this year the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) called for a major reform of parliamentary procedure if liberty and democracy are to survive. I would also like to see a major reform in order that I may survive.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Raines: To say that I have been appalled at the time-consuming procedures this parliament must go through to accomplish anything is putting it mildly. While I, perhaps, could accustom myself to juggling my time so that I may be in three or four different places at one time for a 10, 12 or 14 hour day, and in many cases a seven day week, I agree that there must be a better way.

It was suggested that we abandon outmoded ideas so that parliament could express the will of the people efficiently and completely. The proposals for reform included, among other things, strict limits on debates of non-controversial bills, television cameras in parliament, and the exploration of other modern ideas such as electronic voting. I hope that since we are now living in a very fast-paced world, my colleagues will not wish to remain saddled with government machinery of a bygone age.

There is one change that gives me great hope and optimism. That is the fact that television cameras will be allowed in the House of Commons early next year. Once the public gets a picture of the procedures under which the government of Canada must labour—the unwieldy, cumbersome and time-consuming procedures—I think there will be no problem in getting public approval for reform, indeed, public demand for reform.

The Prime Minister outlined a series of proposals to speed legislation through parliament, and he hoped that "members of parliament would give at least an expression of support". Today I want to go on record in wholehearted support of these proposals.

It is in the exploration of other modern ideas that I am most interested, especially in the matter of using some of our communication machinery, with the co-operation of parliament and the public, to help unite Canada, to expedite the business of governments, to keep Ottawa in touch with the people and to bring together in matters of mutural interest the municipal, provincial and federal governments.

It is for this reason that I feel it is urgent in the extreme that the federal authorities retain full control of the communications systems in Canada. Some provinces have been asking for jurisdiction over cable television, but I feel most strongly that to ensure that broadcasting remains in the national interest, control must remain a federal concern.

● (1750)

If federal control of cable television is lost it could mean the balkanization and fragmentation of Canada. The BNA Act has already separated us in many ways, but I believe that with a strong federal authority to guarantee the national interest, and with good communication and good will between the various levels of government and the people, many difficulties can be overcome.

To illustrate the need for a direct link of communication and co-operation between Ottawa and the provinces let me mention one problem now in the field of education. Because of the BNA Act education is a provincial matter, and each province has its own standards and requirements. In our extremely mobile society many students face difficulty in moving from one province to another, and university students generally lose credits if they transfer from one Canadian university to another. I feel that students should be able to transfer freely across Canada from one accredited university to another without losing credits.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Raines: If anything, it is my opinion that because they are experiencing and learning in new environments and coping with new ways and cultures they should gain credits. This is a question which would require co-operation between all the provinces, and a strong link of communication between Ottawa and the provinces could expedite the matter.

Communication is the key. The complexity of modern problems and the need to solve them quickly is going to require parliament to have a forum in a communications system which will receive and send information to the provinces, a system which will strengthen Canadian unity, a system which will not only seek and find answers from a limitless fund of information, from the most enlightened minds, but will receive and distribute vital information to every part of Canada.

These are only a few things that cable television could do, and because cable could become the principal vehicle of broadcasting to Canadians it is vital to keep it in federal hands. Meanwhile Canada has a national system of broadcasting—the CBC. And with some prodding, the CBC may, like Rip Van Winkle, waken to find itself in today's world. I would like to see the CBC gear itself to new and high demands, because the CBC could be a bridge to unite Canada more than the Canadian Pacific Railway lines united Canada in the past. The CBC could educate, stimulate, create understanding and appreciation of different cultures, places and problems.

The potential of the CBC is boundless, but it must come out of its torpor, its housekeeping bureaucracy. It needs, like any creative enterprise, constant changes and infusions and nourishment. I do not think the CBC has had many changes, infusions or nourishment to speak of for a long time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Raines: In the past the CBC has had its moments of brilliance. But it has a great deal to answer for, Mr. Speaker. British Columbia and the other provinces—I might say, all of Canada except Toronto—have been shamefully neglected on the national scene. It is a fact that Canadian talent generally has had to go south of the border, or to England or Europe, to gain any recognition or have a chance to perform.

The CBC has failed to create mutual understanding of the French and English viewpoints, when it should have been obvious that the two cultures could have been introduced to each other gradually with diplomacy, tact and humour.

Today, in spite of the fact that it has been forced to devote a certain percentage of time to Canadian content, the CBC seems unable to provide Canadians with the creative outlet we so badly need and want. In any Canadian city, any Canadian small town, any rural community, you will find talent that should be on radio or television. Yet the picture I receive on my set consists of reruns, empty and soul-less movies from the United States, and sports.

Where is there any suggestion of a search for a better world? Where is the vision that should be expressing itself in songs and plays? Where is the attempt to explain and interpret British Columbia to the rest of Canada, the west to the east, and the north to the south? The CBC has a lot of catching up to do. It must become a dynamic outlet for Canadian talent and energies, a force for making things better in Canada.

Summing up, Mr. Speaker, I repeat my support for parliamentary reform. I believe it was Nietzsche who said, "Any truth lasts for only 20 years". And governments, like people, should be continually appraising and rethinking ways and means of achieving their priorities and goals. I urge this parliament to retain jurisdiction over the Canadian communications system, including cable television, and to make new and high demands of our national broadcasting system.

I ask all hon. members to consider the brave new world that our new miracles of communication could bring about. The potential for useful exchange of information, carried across Canada and with other countries, is boundless. We have the machinery, we have the hardware. Now, all we must do is to remember the philosophy which admonishes us "to make no small plans—they have no power to stir men's minds."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Madam Speaker, the timing of this budget is somewhat different from those of the past six years that I have been here. I do not think it is an anti-climax to suggest that we are now facing a real recession for the first time in six years, though many other countries in the world may be facing a depression.

In Washington, President Ford has finally agreed that the United States economy is winding down and a recession is present. It is interesting to compare President Ford's policy with the policy brought in by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), which is entirely different from the measures taken in the United States as well as different from what the British, under the Labour government, have introduced for their country.

President Ford appears to be sitting tight, with no basic change in policy for the present. His policy is to let business run flat, even to take a slight downturn, so as to cool off prices. He wants to squeeze inflation out of the economy even if it means a recession; he is afraid that unless inflation is conquered it could well double when business recovers. The assessment of business in the United States seems to be for a continued slowdown for the rest of this year, and perhaps into May and June of next year. There is substantial evidence in the United States that prices are rising less quickly.

The budget of the Minister of Finance is quite inflationary. He claimed the other night that he was avoiding the risk of uncontrollable inflation and, at the other end of the stick, the risk of a serious recession and massive unemployment, which he assured us was inhuman. Thus he told us he would take a middle course in order to assure a good economic performance.

What do some of the people who make economic forecasts say about this budget? Mr. Beigie of the C. D. Howe Research Institute says that he is increasingly skeptical and concerned about Canadian policies dealing with inflation, especially now that Canadian inflation has become cost-push, caused, with a few important exceptions, by higher costs rather than by a situation of too much money chasing too few goods. He says that Canada seems to be adopting the view that its inflation problem will be cured by the United States exporting the anti-inflationary effects of a United States recession.

Mr. Beigie went on to say that such an approach assumes fairly close parallels between the economies of our two countries, especially as regards wages, but that those parallels do not in fact exist. The United States labour movement has accepted wage increases so low as to result in an actual decline in the real income of workers. Canadian labour, he says, has not done this. Canadian wages have risen faster, and the wage gap has narrowed between our countries without corresponding changes in productivity.

What has the minister done to control inflation? He has had some flattering suggestions, such as that the government "reconcile the various competing interests in our society," that there be a "national consensus comprising self-discipline" and a "good measure of political courage." The minister is courageously going to have a deficit on national accounts of $1.5 billion in 1975-76. The forecast in May was for a deficit of $160 million. The inflationary gains made by the government now show there is a $250 million surplus. Surely this indicates that through the government's inflation-generating tax collection agencies there will be much more money put into the economy than was the case six months ago. Even the Minister of Finance admitted this when he stated last May that his 1974-75 financial requirements were estimated at more than $2 billion. These requirements are now only $1 billion, which is a reflection of increased government revenues derived through inflation. This is the effect inflation has had on the government. Government costs have increased. The government, however, is the big winner in the inflation lottery.

While there has been unemployment of over 5 per cent there is a great increase in job vacancies. The government is unwilling to look at the effect unemployment insurance and other measures have had on the number of applicants for positions in the labour force. There is no doubt that there is a need to examine the effect of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and other agencies in order to discern whether the fairly high unemployment rate and the large number of job vacancies are an indication of malfunctioning of the labour market.

There is one aspect of the budget which, while in itself it is not large, yet it is part of what I believe to be an unhealthy way of creating savings. I refer to the possibility of saving $1,000 a year before tax, in respect of buying a house if the money is used for this purpose. This is a laudable objective but it certainly creates distortions with regard to savings. It is agreed that savings are necessary if our economy is to function. However, it has become increasingly obvious that our economy is not functioning well when provision must be made for pre-tax savings in order to generate enough capital. That is one of the great difficulties concerning our economy.

Long ago the government introduced the retirement savings plan and pre-tax deductions with regard to employee pension plans. The government now intends to introduce the home ownership assistance plan, as well as the exemption of tax on the first $1,000 of interest and dividend income. We have had the indexing of many of our pension plans. All of this is creating what I think will be quite an intolerable situation.

We continue to accept a tax system which is basically pitched against savings and in favour of spending. The most revealing aspect of this situation is to be found in the extent to which the generation of savings, employment, financing and economic growth is becoming dependent on the government's willingness to defer taxes. The economy should be capable of generating sufficient savings after taxes to finance both continued renewal and continued growth. By this standard the Canadian economy is in trouble and inflation exacerbates the condition.

Much of inflation is directly attributable to the rapid rise in government spending, and the capacity of the tax system to generate government revenues at rates consistently in excess of what was projected. The long-term implications of a system whereby savings for investment are becoming realizeable only to the extent which our government is prepared to defer taxes on current income, registered retirement and savings plans, a plan of this type of home ownership and equity investment, are admissions that the tax system is too onerous. It can be said that Canadians have cause to worry over the budget. It is now generally conceded that Canada will be lucky to reach 4 per cent real growth in the next year.

There is nothing in the budget to contain inflation. The government apparently is content to allow the United States recession to spill over and act as a restraining influence on Canadian influence. We now have real cost-push inflation. United States unions are accepting much lower increases than are Canadian unions. They are even accepting increases which represent less than the actual cost of living so that the workers receive less real income than previously.

In Canada, on the other hand, we had a settlement in the neighbourhood of 60 per cent in respect of the grainhandlers' dispute, and similarly at the Lakehead the grainhandlers are asking all that was received in Vancouver, plus a good deal more. Government spending is out of hand. There is no evidence in this budget that the government is involved in any kind of curtailment of its own cash requirements. In the next year it is widely forecast that food costs will rise and will be one of the main inflationary factors, but there is absolutely nothing in the budget to help the farmers produce more food.

Mr. Bruce Whitestone, writing in the Kitchener-Waterloo Herald Record had this to say:

> . . . there is increasing awareness of the likelihood of a business slump. Both rhetorically and actually, thus, anti-inflation policies have been accorded a secondary position.
> The main aims of the budget, stimulating the economy to resume its growth and produce jobs and to convince the nation, especially the business community, that it is being done responsibly, are unlikely to be achieved.
> A great deal of emphasis is placed on increasing supply as a means to combat inflation. Aside from the dubious validity of this approach, the food sector has been all but ignored by this budget.
> Yet, food costs have risen more than any other sector of our economy with the exception of energy prices, and there is every prospect that food prices will be the single biggest inflationary factor in 1975.
> No steps were proposed to assist farmers with easier credit or to encourage them to cultivate new land. Similarly, livestock producers received no encouragement from this budget.
> At the political level, Mr. Turner is up against a central question of contemporary political economy. The commitment to full or nearly-full employment entails inflation sooner rather than later to a rate which erodes purchasing power faster than the government can augment increases. This time around, the budget does not grapple with this key question.

I think this is one of the great problems in respect of this budget.

Now I wish to turn the subject of the taxation of the resource industries of this country, particularly oil and gas. It is perhaps fortunate, at least for western Canada, that there happens to be oil and gas in that part of Canada. I think the treatment of these resources is of paramount importance to the unity of this country and to the form of Confederation.

If this taxation is mishandled we may well see serious if not fatal strains on the confederate structure of Canada. Western Canada has always felt alienated from the rest of the country, but since the days of Louis Riel strong forces have been at work to tie the west to central Canada, and to make it desirable, if at times unpleasant and unremunerative, for western Canada to be a part of the country's confederation.

Western Canada is not old in the settled sense. It was settled in the beginning by people from Ontario and people from the United Kingdom in the early years, followed by the massive immigration of central Europeans. The single common element which bound together this heterogenous group of people was the British tradition of government, institutions and the Crown. However, in recent years these British institutions have all but disappeared as Ottawa has attempted to establish a sort of distinctly Canadian identity. But western Canadians are not able to take part in this identity. They feel estranged from the symbols and the institutions of central Canada. I think the adoption of the maple leaf in Canada's flag is an example. The maple, as such, is not present in the largest part of the land mass of Canada, certainly not in western Canada. It is a peculiarly central and southern Canadian symbol.

Similarly the attempt to disassociate the British symbols of the Crown and the royal attachment has tended to cut adrift the traditional symbols of the west with which westerners could identify. Up until a few years ago while westerners may have been dissatisfied with confederation largely they regarded themselves as protestors. They hoped that by making their voices heard by blocs of votes they would rectify some of their grievances. This was the main motivation behind the agrarian revolt of 1921, the rise of the Progressive Party, followed in the depression years of the 1930's with the splinter parties, the CCF and Social Credit. But until recent years those who might have favoured some sort of independence or remoteness from the government of Ottawa were not many and were considered local autonomists. Recently there has grown up a great doubt on the part of many western Canadians concerning the value of association with confederation. They cannot be dismissed as crackpots or irresponsible people.

In recent years the finding of natural resources in the west, and the fact that through much of the world small countries are as happy or happier than their largest neighbours all have given rise to a desire for more independence for the west, and at least for a variation of the structure of confederation. I think if we should ignore this, we would do so at our peril. The imposition of the taxes on the oil and gas industries will have a horrendous effect on the economy of the west and its future development.

The desire of the government to have a much lower price for oil within Canada than the world price, for an undetermined length of time, is placing great strains on western credibility. It is all the more senseless when it is realized that the cheap supply of oil and gas in western Canada is very limited and will last a few years at the most. Not only will this action of the federal government make for extremely bad relations with the provinces and with the west, but almost certainly it will lead to a shortage of gas and oil that will make us more dependent on offshore oil. Gone now are the halcyon days when we could expect cheap oil and gas from the tar sands in Alberta.

The minister stated that Ottawa would reduce its share of the tax by his abatement of 10 per cent of the provincial tax, and would further reduce it by a resource profit abatement which, for 1974, would be 10 per cent, for 1975, 12 per cent, and for 1976 and the year thereafter, 15 per cent. This means that the net 1976 federal tax rate will amount to 25 per cent. In the oil economics of today, this means that in 1976 the federal tax rate would be 25 cents a barrel less than it is today.

The minister also lessened the tax for exploration expenditure and depletion allowance. But in not allowing royalties to be a traditional deductible business expense he has reversed a principle of confederation. If Ottawa is to move in such a wholesale fashion with regard to one provincial jurisdiction, what about all the provincial jurisdictions?

This headlong confrontation with the provinces can only spur the provinces to protect their rights as best they can. They could use provincial Crown corporations which have traditionally been exempt from taxation at the federal level. The Minister of Finance stated in his budget that any province which sought to nationalize industry and thereby capture the revenues for itself should think about it carefully, because in such cases the federal government would have to consider the taxation of such Crown corporations.

This statement smacks of a direct desire of the administration to club the Conservative government of Alberta in particular, to conquer the westerners once more and take their resources from them. It is all the more important to westerners considering the great troubles they encountered, to assume control of resources in the 1920s, since on joining confederation they were not allowed to consider their resources as being under their own jurisdiction but had to bargain for them.

The hydro industry has been taken over by the different provincial governments. The minister could have attempted another approach. He could have attempted to work out with the provinces what the definition of royalties should be, and how much they should be taxed. He should have worked out with the provinces at what level royalties could remain deductible for income tax purposes. The government can take that matter to the Supreme Court, but it seems likely that in view of the makeup of the Supreme Court and the appointment of the Chief Justice, the decision will be favourable to the federal government. But, in the long run, the provinces will have to throttle back oil and gas production and in that way eventually natural shortages will force prices up to world levels.

There is another part of the resource industry which has not been touched upon, and that is mining. The mining people are caught in the dispute between Ottawa and Alberta, and this affects all provincial jurisdictions. This budget is dangerous because, for the first time, it has led to a collision between our two main forms of government. The existence of confederation is at stake, and this problem must be resolved if peace in this country is to be achieved.

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Madam Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I take part in this budget debate and this, for a number of reasons. One of the main reasons is that it is taking place in historical circumstances, when world events are steeped in uncertainty. In view of these circumstances, this may very well be the most important budget speech in the history of Canada. Besides, the minister himself indicated nearly openly his concern for and helplessness about our economy which is deteriorating due to increasingly stronger pressures. Moreover, as a desperate shift, he seems to attribute to international forces the responsibility for the future of the Canadian people.

Madam Speaker, I shall explain myself later on this matter, but I want to emphasize first of all that my remarks will be bearing the stamp of objectivity, while setting out as equitably as possible everything which appears to me to be abnormal or inconsistent in the measures proposed by the minister.

First of all, I intend to discuss the main points of the budget speech and, in particular, some of the minister's proposals. Later on, I shall discuss the international situation, to which the minister addresses the thrust of the current debate. I want to show that the picture he has drawn up is far from complete, and that the minister has failed to mention some extremely important factors.

As a whole, the present budget contains proposals which are sound basically. One might, at first glance, be tempted to endorse them. Still, those measures must be analyzed carefully, and criticized in the light of the imperatives dictated by the context in which we now live. Only on that condition can we really judge, in the final analysis, of the value of the budget.

With regard to the minister's proposals on personal income tax, I must say that they are sound generally, and I recognize that they are well founded. Madam Speaker, I even congratulate the minister in this regard. Still, I can reproach him one small thing: they come too late for us to hope for any marked beneficial effects.

As we know, Madam Speaker, when a sick person has urgent need of a doctor, the latter's arrival is beyond value. But when the patient is already dead, or when he has reached the point of no return, the doctor's arrival is really of very little importance. This is how the personal income tax measures strike me.

As the very moment when those measures are announced the benefits provided by them are already reduced by the increase in the cost of living and the inflation now facing this country.

The minister is perfectly right in also taking credit for reducing to 5 per cent the tax on building materials. We have been urging him to do just that for already a couple of years. Three or four years ago I was saying: let us do away completely with that tax to ensure a true respite in construction, but nothing was done. Now, after the situation has deteriorated, the minister accepts in part our proposal. That step will provide some help but a lot less effectively in the present context. Had it been adopted when we proposed it it would have its full effect today. Construction would have been a lot more active. That is a sector that affects a very large number of workers from the lumberjack, the trades, and others, without forgetting all the industries that participate in the construction industry.

On the one hand, there would have been less unemployment and, on the other, Canadians would have been better prepared financially to meet the inflationary increase that we had and have to meet. That would have been seeing ahead, and at the same time the government would have prevented the drop that now worries it about the number of housing starts. But it seems clearly to me now that those measures which would have been fine before are now quite secondary because they come too late.

Personal income tax reductions, the lowering of the sales tax on building materials, the $500 grant for a year by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to any new owner of a new house, all those measures and most of the others mentioned in the budget all have the same flaw in that they come too late. If those important steps had been taken earlier Canadians would have found themselves in a position where they could get out of it, as will do in the months to come our big oil and mining companies that the minister did everything to protect. The minister himself said in his budget that he had gone out to meet those big companies and examine the situation.

He then wanted to include in the budget some measures allowing big companies to buckle themselves against market conditions while, to use his own words, providing a fair return to their shareholders. If the minister is doing such a good thing in granting special measures to large corporations, so that they can make profits, would it not have been also advisable for him to give farmers, old people, low income citizens and rental housing builders, before inflation shaves their savings, a chance to lighten their tax burden before tonight or the budget speech, to help them keep afloat and provide their budget with a fair return?

Madam Speaker, as far as the aged are concerned, the minister proposed measures aimed, as he said, at protecting savings from the effects of inflation. At first glance, it seems an excellent and comprehensive measure. However, on closer examination, the picture changes completely. It might well be that the minister wants to protect savings and indeed that could help some people.

But such is not the real problem for most aged persons, but it is rather the need of a minimum vital income. This is not a true but rather a negative form of assistance. It is not bad, but it only affects the people who already enjoy some security. But the others, majority, those who have little more than the old age pension, what do they become? Indeed, in many cases, only one spouse old age security due to the age difference. The minister does not refer to them. It is very well to protect the savings of the aged, but who will protect those who are penniless? Such is the question. This is why we say that we can consider with derision those measures meant to help the elderly. There would be much to say about the matter, but I will come back to it later.

There is another point, Madam Speaker, which I must raise. Alone, it would justify a bitter objection against that budget and it is the fact that nowhere in the minister's speech reference is made to agriculture. This is most serious in my opinion. I am against it not only because I represent a strongly rural constituency, but also because I know full well that strong agricultural action was expected at this time by all Canadians that share a real awareness of the situation.

A number of countries around the world are hit by starvation. Our grain reserves are almost nonexistent. We face serious problems concerning our egg, poultry and beef producers. Our people leave their farms while population is growing. A growing number of farmers have to go bankrupt or leave their farms. They realize more than ever their production costs are not even covered by the price at which they sell their goods. And finally, if they sell their farms to others than their sons, in comes federal income tax that takes almost everything they get for their farms, animals machinery, chattels and what have you.

At the same time our gracious and smiling Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) proposes in this House a budget almost completely devoid of anything for our farmers, as if they were non-entities.

Some things are not clear to me. Consumers know that food prices now reach astronomical levels. Farmers know they cannot make ends meet and produce at normal costs. Finally, everyone knows from the budget speech that the Canadian government cares nothing about it.

On the other hand, the minister places much hope in international relations based on the goodwill of the countries to solve the current economic crisis. I am tempted to say to him, "Mr. Minister, you should take immediate steps to prevent your budget speech from being known to other countries." If he does not, he simply risks losing their confidence, and even being considered blind.

The minister says in his speech he has much hope on close international consultation. He even points to sharing with nations in trouble, and further states:

> Do we not have an even greater duty to conserve food in a starving world?

And during all that time in his budget he does not say a word about the farmer. And in the same speech, there is not a word about agriculture which is slowly going down the drain in front of everybody's eyes. Where is the logic? Where do we find responsibility in that? I would even go so far as to say: Where is the goodwill so necessary to correct the world situation for those who are hungry, for those who are hungry even in our country?

Canada, through its Minister of Finance, has made certain commitments to help other countries, in the agricultural field for example, and at the same time we are letting our own agricultural situation deteriorate without making a move. How will that be considered by the nation's concerned? They will have proof positive that Canada is ready to promise them anything without ever intending to deliver. Won't that just be one more good old example in humanity's history where everybody talks while nothing is done to correct an already rotten situation.

Madam Speaker, I would now like to say a word about the international situation that the Minister of Finance considers of the utmost importance to correct a situation.

With the economic corridor the government and its Minister of Finance are now entering, and for months to come, the Canadian nation is being exposed to taking on the immediate colour that very short-term world events will give it. On the other hand, this turn of events on the international stage is very closely related to the world energy crisis and the minister indicates that the uncertainty he feels towards the future is linked to the burning and explosive question of oil.

But we may very shortly have, to take into account another factor, just as important as oil, if not more, and I would like the minister to pay attention to it, for I noticed he made no mention of it in his speech. If he did so on purpose, then he was simply confessing that he knows of no better solution. On the other hand, if he does not take it into account, we might have a whale of a surprise. I am talking about an element which possibly vouches for an even worse world situation than the oil conflict, I mean the raw materials rush.

The budget speech may be the most dramatic ever heard, not so much because of what it says, as because of some disputable points and the serious situation it hints at, and above all because it is an acknowledgment by our government of its inability to cope—even timidly—with our present difficulties. The objective outlined in it is simply to keep the country afloat and wait. Several of the suggested measures are worthwhile, but they have come too late to be successful. This is not a creative, dynamic budget which aims at initiating things, but rather a feedback budget. It is therefore an indication that the government is holding up any initiative, taking a defensive stand, and waiting for developments before it moves, and that it is relying to a considerable extent on positive changes in the world situation.

The government has already waited too long, in my opinion, to take national measures. It is waking up now, but it is too late. And the only possible solution, as we have seen, is a status quo budget which betrays a form of weakness, even if at first sight it may appear as a form of administrative flexibility.

What will now happen in Canada depends no longer on what we do according to the minister himself, but on whether or not the international situation changes for the better. But past experience as concerns the results achieved by international organizations makes us wonder what will happen. I do not wish to be an alarmist, but we must be realistic. The opening attitude of the minister, as the rest of his budget speech, shows that he no longer has any choice. All depends on the possibility of changes on an international or national level. He has little or no control over our future.

The control that we expected the minister to announce, the control of our economy, either has been forgotten or is beyond the minister's capacity. He feels that the government is unable to establish this control. The Speech from the Throne already gave indication of a strongly anticipated crisis because of the international economic situation, and the budget speech now confirms this.

Mr. J. Larry Condon (Middlesex-London-Lambton): Madam Speaker, a great honour has been done me. I am speaking for the first time in parliament, and I have been asked to speak on the budget. To be honest, I am overwhelmed to see the tremendous crowds everywhere, to see all those members of parliament who are diligently paying attention, listening, and hanging on my every word.

[Mr. Beaudoin.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Condon: Their attentiveness is the criterion of Canadian people in action. It is important for the people of this country to know just how diligently members of parliament work in the interests of those whom they represent. Frankly, I was surprised to note how much work members do. I do not think the people back in our constituencies realize just how hard members work, how many hours they put in when they are away from home. They can only know this if they come to Ottawa and perhaps follow a member around for one day.

Mr. Stanfield: Just during the daytime.

Mr. Condon: I am grateful for the way new members have been accepted in Ottawa. The attentiveness and helpfulness of staffs, including the staff of this House, cannot be praised too highly. All have been kind to the boy away from home in the big city.

We belong to a special club, and the honour of belonging to it is something no one can take away from us. Our children, grandchildren and even great grandchildren will cherish the knowledge that at one time we, of this House, had our names on the side of a desk in the House of Commons.

I said I come from a small town. I come from Strathroy, where I served as mayor for three terms. But I am not just a small town boy; I come also from that great city which returned three great members to this House, all of whom sit on my side; I come from Verdun, Quebec.

I am fortunate to be here, being the third Liberal member since confederation to be given the honour of representing the riding now known as Middlesex-London-Lambton. I follow in the footsteps of impressive men, Mr. Robert McCubbin and Mr. Jim Lind, who have set an example I shall try to follow in the next several years.

We must remember that the budget affects people. Too often we forget that the politician who is closest to the people is not the one at the federal or provincial level, but the one at the local level. I shall try to be as close to my people now that I am a member of parliament as I was when I was mayor of Strathroy.

The budget contains important provisions which will affect sewers and storm sewers. Of course one does not go around shouting how happy one is to see storm sewers. Nevertheless, they are important for the growth of Canada, important for the growth of towns, and important for housing developments. We need more houses. The federal government has said, through the medium of the budget, that it will make money available to municipalities and enable them to push ahead with sewer programs. I am sure municipalities will be grateful for this help, as it is difficult for municipalities to use their own financial resources and accumulate enough to pay for these services.

All this shows that the federal government is aware of municipal problems. Too often governments in the past have forgotten about them. I make this point as a former mayor of Strathroy who hopes to grow, through experience, into an effective member of parliament and representative of Middlesex-London-Lambton.

Before coming here I was concerned about municipal matters; now, as a member of parliament, I must consider the wider picture which affects all Canada. That is why I say that the budget affects all Canadians. It is not designed for separate groups. It is time Canadians forgot regionalism. If we want to grow into a respected world power under the leadership of our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), we must forget regionalism. I see some young people in the gallery; they know what I am talking about. They think of themselves first as Canadians, and they know the correctness of what I say more than some others in this chamber.

The budget, as I say, is for the benefit of all Canadians, including those who were not given the opportunities which you and I were given, Madam Speaker. We are obligated to help unfortunate people. If we do not, we shall not fulfil our obligations to those who are not as fortunate as ourselves. We must send food to the needy. Again, we are obligated to do this, not because we are Canadians, or politicians, but because we owe unfortunate people something—and because we have had it so damned good ourselves. This obligation, as I am sure the opposition will agree, is an ongoing one. So, let us get on with the job. Let us pass the budget, because we have work to do on behalf of the people of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Boulanger: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have listened very carefully to the remarks of the previous speaker and he stated that the constituency of Verdun has had three representatives from the government party. However, we must not forget that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) has also been the representative of Verdun, and I would not want the hon. member to forget it as he was a Liberal at that time.

[English]

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to make a few comments this evening in relation to the budget, as well as to other matters occurring in the country which are of much concern to me. I think it would be fair to say that at this time the most obvious concern to me and all Canadians is the question of national unity. It is more than a coincidence that since this administration has been in power, unity within the country has been suffering in one way or another.

We started in 1968 with what appeared to be a tremendous strain on unity as a result of the method by which this administration was carrying out its bilingualism policies. It did so in a very insensitive way without concern for the various regions of the country.

Even though the intention may have been to increase unity, it in fact spread much disunity in the country. The record since that time has not improved. It has been very much the same. I can quite easily point out many examples where unity has been very much strained by this particular administration.

Let us take a look at government policies concerning relations between the federal and provincial governments, particularly relations between the federal government and some western provinces. I can be even more specific and say Alberta. About a year or so ago, when it appeared—

An hon. Member: You should speak on the budget.

Mr. Yewchuk: My friend has not been here very long. If he has, he has been sleeping most of the time. He is one of those Quebec members who sleep most of the time. If he had been awake, he would realize that during the budget debate the subjects can be very far ranging simply because the budget speech touches on almost every aspect of Canadian life. Therefore in the debate it is quite reasonable to touch on a number of subjects. I am sure Your Honour is aware of all this, but I say it for the edification of the hon. member who is new to the game and needs to be educated on procedure.

● (2050)

I want to deal with some of the other things that are creating disunity in this country. These factors of disunity are not occurring by accident. They are occurring by design. For example, a year ago the federal government decided to bring in an export tax on oil. We all know the result of that. There was a strain on the relations between Alberta and this government, simply because there was no consultation with that provincial government prior to that move being instituted.

There was then an allocations bill which tramped over provincial rights. It was conceived and put forward without any consultation with the provinces involved. We now have before the House the petroleum administration bill which does essentially the same. It tramps over provincial rights. It was conceived, produced and put forward without any significant consultation with the provinces involved.

During the recent election campaign there was a blatant and open attack on the province of Alberta by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald). He committed something like 17 per cent of Alberta's petroleum supply to a particular plant in Ontario without even so much as a telephone call to Alberta, the province which, under the constitution, is responsible for the development of these resources and, indeed, is the owner of them.

We can look at the relationship between the federal government and the maritime provinces insofar as provincial rights are concerned, with regard to offshore minerals. The same has happened there. In short, what we are seeing is a federal government that is involving itself in an open power struggle to take more and more authority unto itself.

We should look for the reasons why the government feels it must have all this authority.

An hon. Member: They were elected by the people.

Mr. Yewchuk: I do not think we can come up with a reasonable answer. I heard a comment from the member opposite, who seems to be still awake, that they were elected by the people. I ask him who he thinks elected the provincial governments? I ask him what is the meaning of the constitution? Why have a constitution which delineates quite clearly provincial authority and federal authority? Why do we have a federal government encroaching on areas which the constitution gives to the provinces? It must be because the government is power hungry. It has a greed for power.

I am particularly concerned because this power struggle is being led by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I see him as a person who would have done very well as a dictator in the days of old when dictatorships were commonplace. They still are in some places, but they are not commonplace or acceptable in this country. That is something the federal administration fails to realize.

What we are seeing is the result of a failure on the part of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government to achieve constitutional change through the accepted legal channels. In spite of repeated efforts over the past six years there has not been any success in changing the constitution through acceptable channels. Therefore, what we have is a slow but progressive change through the back door. It is a slow but progressive erosion, and invasion into areas which have traditionally been known to be provincial jurisdiction.

I am quite concerned about the technique that is being used in this power struggle, a technique of continuously provoking confrontation. It is rather interesting that last year about this time when we were faced with winter, an effort was made to provoke a confrontation between the province of Alberta and the federal government.

The federal government wanted to pit Alberta against the rest of the country. It tried to provoke Alberta into saying it would cut off oil for the rest of the country. The federal government could then run around the country saying it was the great saviour of the nation—"support us or you will freeze in the dark". That was the attitude the government took last fall and last winter. When spring rolled around the weather improved and there was not such a great hazard. The whole thing subsided. There was not much mention about it. We are now coming into another winter, and the whole thing is being started again through open and repeated provocation in the same manner as before.

If the intention is to provoke Alberta into shutting off supplies of energy I do not think it will succeed, because I believe Alberta is showing greater concern over the national interest than is the federal government. The result of the federal government's attitude is a widening sense of alienation in the west. Westerners are beginning to wonder what will come next—is the federal government planning to end the Crowsnest rates? Is it trying to punish the west for sending back so many Conservatives after the last election?

An hon. Member: The same number.

Mr. Yewchuk: There is a statement commonly made by federal Liberals after the election campaign of July 8. They say to westerners, "You will find out now what it is like to have no representation in the government". Then we find that a man from the other place, a Senator, has been appointed as spokesman for Alberta.

An hon. Member: He is a member of parliament.

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

Mr. Yewchuk: Yes, he is a member of parliament but he happens to be an appointed member, a former bagman for the Liberal party. He did a good job in that capacity, and maybe he can do a good job of advising the government on the feeling in Alberta. However, I think it is fair to say that elected members are in closer contact with their constituents, and therefore in a better position to give advice which would make the government sensitive to the needs of particular segments of our society. This is a correction which should be made forthwith.

Faced with the government's continuing efforts to alter the constitution by the back door rather than through legal means, Canadians are at a crossroads. They have to decide whether they really want this kind of constitutional change or not. In making such a decision they will have to make up their minds whether they believe the present administration, under the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and his colleagues, can do a better job of developing the Canadian petroleum industry than the provincial governments which have been entrusted with this task under the constitution. Can they be sure that if the constitution is changed, either by direct or by indirect methods, so as to give the federal government this power, the security of supply we have enjoyed in the past will continue, or that there will be a more effective development of our natural resources?

On the basis of the government's record I am not convinced that it can do a better job of developing these resources than we have seen so far. The result of the federal government's incursions into the energy field so far has simply been the slowing down of exploration and development.

Only this morning we saw a report in the national press concerning a report produced by the National Energy Board which predicts that within four to seven years Canada will no longer be self-sufficient in oil. Mr. Speaker, that is a very short period. Yet in the past year, as a result of federal intervention, we find that important sections of the oil industry are leaving the country and that exploration has been severely restricted.

The development of the tar sands is being retarded; there is a lack of interest because the oil industry is unable to make long term plans, due to the continuing vacillation of the administration in Ottawa. We should consider the possible long term consequences of this interference with the petroleum industry. It may well be we shall be dependent on oil from the Middle East, Venezuela or some other country. I do not think we should get ourselves into such a situation, particularly when we have the capacity to be self-sufficient.

I also wish to comment on the subject of multi-culturalism which has been my responsibility recently. Following the 1972 campaign we saw what appeared to be a genuine interest in this subject expressed by the federal government, to the point at which a minister was assigned to the portfolio and a budget was placed at his disposal. This was an occasion for hope among one third of Canada's population. At that period the administration held office only through the support of a shaky minority, and I believe it was more sensitive to the needs of Canadians than either the previous government or the government whose members sit on the treasury benches today.

In any case, between 1972 and 1974 some progress appeared to be made and ethnic groups began to believe there was some hope for their survival as identifiable groups. However, after the 1974 campaign one of the first actions to be taken was the removal from office of the minister responsible for this particular area, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz). His post was obliterated as a separate entity.

Mr. Paproski: The demise of the program. Shame!

Mr. Yewchuk: Responsibility was transferred to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro)—the relationship is difficult to explain. The Prime Minister is now trying to convince us that the Minister of Labour is able to do more for multi-culturalism by devoting 5 per cent of his time to it than the hon. member for Parkdale was able to do by devoting his full time to it. I don't know whether the Prime Minister feels the Minister of Labour is a superman, or whether he has a low opinion of the ability of the hon. member for Parkdale. I hope it is not the latter.

I was quite concerned when the throne speech was read, and even more concerned when the budget speech was read, to find absolutely no mention of the subject of multiculturalism or of any plans to change direction. What we heard was a reiteration that greater priority would be placed on bilingualism. I have no objection to that; I think bilingualism is fine. I am not saying that bilingualism and multiculturalism are not compatible. But I am saying that the failure of the government to make any mention of multiculturalism, while placing a lot of stress on other topics, might lead some Canadians to feel they are once again being suppressed.

I just want to make a few general comments about Canada's ethnic groups and on why we must ensure that we do not suppress multiculturalism. I think it is fair to say that a lot of people came to this country seeking freedom. Whether it be political freedom or economic freedom, generally this was the goal they were seeking; and I think it is also fair to say that these two freedoms were provided them in abundance.

Let me just examine what has happened to these people generally since they arrived in this country. I want to look at them as individuals. These people did well economically, they did well politically, but what happened to them socially? Hon. members can examine any group—Italians, Germans, Ukrainians, Poles. Some have had to change their names for one reason or another; they have changed their original name to an English name. Some of them changed their religion. Others became ashamed to speak their own language, and in some cases refused to acknowledge publicly the language group from which they came.

What does that mean to you, Mr. Speaker? I suggest it means they have experienced very much a lack of freedom in one area, namely, the area of social freedom. These people have been facing all kinds of prejudices in this country, prejudices against their name, their religion and their language. As a result they felt they could not survive or compete in this country unless they became Anglicized or Francophonized. The policies of the government have been reinforcing this feeling. If we want to extend hope to these people—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret I must interrupt the hon. member. I have tried to allow him a little extra time to permit him to make his point, but I think he would need more than a few seconds.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see this budget back before the House again after a long wait since May. It is like the return of the prodigal child—very welcome. I congratulate the minister for the level headed approach that his budget takes toward Canada's economic situation in November of 1974.

Canada's economy is a sound economy. We have withstood the economic unrest that is sweeping the world better than many of our fellow members in the world community. For this reason I am glad to support a budget that pursues a reasonable path between the extremes of excessive government stimulation of the economy on the one hand, and creating a deliberate economic slowdown to combat inflation, on the other hand.

This is not a time for extreme measures but a time for sensible, stable, economic measures. I am equally glad that this is a budget which seeks to protect the most vulnerable of our citizens, those least able to bear the effects of world wide inflation, from erosion of their limited incomes by rising prices. While the amount of the tax cuts proposed in this budget for 1974 and 1975 may seem small to some members of the House, I can assure them that there are many people in the constituency of Comox-Alberni to whom that extra income in the pay envelope means a great deal.

The people of Comox-Alberni are not the wealthiest in Canada. by and large they are hard working folk who put in their shifts in mills and factories, in fishing boats or logging camps, in mines or on farms. They are the strong and enduring foundation of this country's economy, people who work hard for their pay. They do not want a strictly controlled economy. They want to earn their living, to earn enough to maintain a respectable standard of living, and to put by a little from each pay cheque towards their future.

I believe that the proposals contained in this budget will help the people of Comox-Alberni lead the kind of life they want to lead. The tax cuts will enable them to see more of the income they earn go toward providing them with the things that make up a good life. The proposed exemptions of $1,000 in income from their savings will make it that much easier for them to look ahead to the future for which they plan.

One of the problems the people of Comox-Alberni face, a problem faced most by young couples beginning their lives together, is the high cost of housing. For many the cost of purchasing a modest home in which to raise their families is prohibitive. That is why I am pleased to see the proposed reduction of the federal sales tax on building and construction materials. If there is such a thing as the Canadian dream, one of its most primary elements is the desire of each family to own its own home. Any steps taken by the government to help make this wish a reality will not be lightly dismissed. And to make sure that this reduction in the federal sales tax benefits those who most need it, I hope that the government through the proper agency will ensure that the resulting reduction in the cost of housing is passed on to the consumer.

Comox-Alberni is an island riding, surrounded on three sides by straits and inlets of the Pacific Ocean. Communications and transportation in such a riding, separated as it is by 30 miles of water from the mainland, are of vital concern to its people. For that reason I welcome the budget's proposed elimination of the federal sales tax on transportation equipment. If the elimination of that tax results in lower shipping costs and resultant power prices of consumer goods, as I am sure the government intends, the people of Comox-Alberni will not take it amiss.

As an example, Mr. Speaker, let me describe to you the situation facing the city of Port Alberni, one of the three major centres of population in the northern half of Vancouver Island. Port Alberni is connected to the rest of Canada by one narrow strip of two lane blacktop. A city of nearly 25,000, Port Alberni must import almost every consumer item, from can openers to heavy machinery, by way of that road. And almost everything Port Alberni imports must come by truck along that single highway.

Port Alberni is one of many similar cases in Comox-Alberni constituency. Transportation and communications in such isolated areas as these, despite the fact that they are bustling, growing cities, are matters of great concern to the people who live there. In many of the smaller settlements, however, boat transportation is the only means of moving people and goods. Further to the proposed elimination of the sales tax on transportation equipment, I would urge upon the government similar measures for boats and ships where these craft are used as transporters of goods to areas unreachable by roads.

Recently it was reported in the press that people in the Mount Waddington region, the northern part of my constituency, wished to secede from Canada and unite with Alaska. The residents of that area felt that they were not enjoying the full benefits of being Canadians. To relieve the doubts of the people of northern Vancouver Island as to their welcome place among the rest of Canada, and in order to unite this country from coast to coast by one continuous highway, I would urge the government to extend the trans-Canada highway northwards from its present end in Nanaimo to the town of Port Hardy, and from there onwards to the west coast of Vancouver Island.

Not only would this extension of the highway restore the people of the Mount Waddington district to the Canadian fold, it would bring a better quality of life to the more isolated areas through an increased input of goods and materials, along with lower prices because of easier transportation processes. In the same vein, I would like to see in the near future the extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway lines northward from their present terminus in the city of Courtenay to the people of the northern end of Vancouver Island.

In villages like Port Alice and Port McNeill the recent announcement that television service will be extended to the people there in 1976 has been received with great happiness. We of the southern regions of Canada, surrounded by the technological wonders of the urban centres, cannot, I believe, truly understand how much a seemingly small thing as television reception can mean to those who are denied it by virtue of their isolation from the mainstream of the country.

[Mr. Anderson.]

Being able to announce that television service would soon be a reality in the northern end of Vancouver Island has been one of the most enjoyable acts I have performed in my short time as a new member of this House. I know that, for those people up there, to be able to sit down and watch the Grey Cup or the Stanley Cup playoffs is not something they take for granted.

Still on the subject of transportation, I would urge the government to examine closely the prospect of improving and developing small craft harbours along the coastline that borders three quarters of the constituency of Comox-Alberni. To many of the people in that riding, boats must take the place of automobiles as the primary means of transportation. To people who must rely on boats to make the weekly shopping trip, to visit a neighbour, even to bus their children to school, proper and well maintained wharves and harbours are as necessary as roads and parking lots are to mainland residents.

Vancouver Island is ready to grow. It has the resources; it has the people; it has the Pacific Ocean, with all the markets of the Pacific Rim, at its doorstep. What Vancouver Island needs is better transportation facilities, in the areas I have outlined, and the establishment of deep sea ports to handle the trade in natural resources that could be emanating from Canada's most westerly territory. The excellent natural harbour in the city of Campbell River, for example, could become an outlet on the Pacific that would help keep Canada's exports steadily on the increase.

Another matter of primary importance to Comox-Alberni is the maintenance of a strong and viable fishing industry on the west coast. Such policies as the establishment of a territorial limit of 200 miles, or to the edge of the continental shelf, can have a real and profound effect on the future of that industry. I would urge the government to pursue strongly this policy of extending Canada's territorial limit, taking into consideration traditional fishing rights of our neighbours, to protect our fishermen from encroachment on their waters.

Another matter which I would very much like to see the government become involved in is the question of establishing a strong coastguard presence on the west coast. If, as is government policy, we are to have the 200-mile limit, the Canadian presence in our territorial waters must be augmented so that our claim to these waters is not just theory but fact.

Additionally, a well established coastguard force, with bases all along the British Columbia coast, would raise the level of protection we can offer to men on the water. A fast, efficient search and rescue capability would seem sufficient reason for creating a coastguard, without taking into account the IR duties in fisheries patrol and customs law enforcement. Another advantage to having a coastguard service on the west coast would be to raise the general level of competence in navigation and seamanship among the men who make their living from the sea. When, as would most likely be the case, members of the coast guard leave the service to work in the fishing industry, their knowledge and experience would serve to make it a safer and more professional enterprise than ever.

I would like to turn to the subject of national defence, a subject that has been commented on in relation to the budget, both here in this House and in the media. From 1956 to 1962 I was proud to wear the uniform of the Royal Canadian Air Force. I was proud to have been adjudged worthy to serve Canada as a member of its armed forces. I am still proud today of having had that distinction.

I urge the government to ensure that those men and women who wear the uniform of the Canadian armed forces today can continue to share my pride. I ask that those people who are willing to lay down their lives for this nation receive the consideration they most assuredly deserve. Let their equipment be the best we can give them, and let their pay be equal to the task we ask of them. The Bible reminds us that the labourer is worthy of his hire; the soldier is no less worthy.

The armed forces of Canada have a reputation all across the world as powerful fighting troops and efficient peacekeepers. I believe that these two roles, so seemingly in contradiction and yet related to each other like two arms of one body, have brought the Canadian armed forces the respect and admiration not only of the military establishments of other nations, but of foreign civilian populations as well. Few nations have matched Canada's forces' reputation both in the field and in the buffer zones, a reputation which I count as a privilege to uphold. I urge the government to give present and future members of our armed forces the opportunity to live up to that reputation.

One other matter I would like to put before this House is a question that concerns not only the people of Comox-Alberni, but all women across Canada. I am referring to the plight of women who through divorce, separation, or widowhood are left with the responsibilities of supporting and caring for a family all by themselves. For many women in this unhappy situation the only course open to them is to rely on social assistance for the support of their families. For many, the cost of day care facilities for their children takes too large a bite out of their incomes, so that they would actually be financially better off on welfare than out earning a living with their skills.

I think it a tragedy that women who want to work, perhaps at jobs that they find worthwhile and fulfilling, must leave the work force in order to give their children a decent standard of living. I ask the government to consider a complete tax exemption for women in these circumstances who are earning a moderate income. Although this measure would admittedly reduce government revenues by some lost taxes, I am certain that the loss would be more than equally offset by the reduction in the cost of maintaining these women and their children through social assistance. Such a measure would also reduce the numbers of the unemployed as well as provide the social benefit of putting skilled people, who want to work, back into the labour force.

I would like to go on record that as a western member I am in agreement with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) on his position regarding royalties. It is my sincere opinion that in the province of British Columbia the mining royalties will drive the mining industry out of the province. Already exploration has drastically declined and speculative capital for mining investment has left the province for healthier climates.

The present government of British Columbia can only be called a disaster looking for a catastrophe to happen. It is hard for members of parliament who come from provinces which, I assume, have sane governments, to realize the insanity taking place in la plus belle province.

Mr. Boulanger: Listen to a true Canadian speaking.

Mr. Anderson: I must apologize for my lack of French. However, in my constituency of Comox-Alberni my constituents have told me that first I should learn to speak English before I learn how to speak French.

B.C. is a part of Canada, although at times it is hard to determine.

Some hon. Members: Explain!

Mr. Anderson: Personally I pledge my support for the federal concept which, I believe, is ultimately in the best interest of western Canada and of B.C. in particular.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thought the name of the province was British Columbia.

Mr. Anderson: In closing, Mr. Speaker, allow me to say again that I congratulate the Minister of Finance on the sensible approach he is taking toward resolving Canada's economic problems in the light of worldwide inflation. I believe that the course the government is pursuing to combat inflation and prevent an economic slump will spare Canada further economic unrest, while at the same time allowing this country to progress to heights that not even we as members of parliament can imagine in our wildest dreams, and this includes of course the province of Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, it is probably appropriate that I have only ten minutes in which to make my speech since part of my argument tonight, later on when I deal with the matter of the reform of parliamentary procedures, is to suggest that the House limit itself to ten minute speeches henceforth. I only hope, Sir, that time will permit me to get to that part of my argument, because now I have other things to say.

The first thing I would like to note, out of deference to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) who is here this evening, and who has been here to listen to participants in the debate on his budget, is that I will say something about it, although not very much. I think it was an attempt by the minister to adjust to the pressures of inflation by easing the burden on some who suffer from inflation. With the exception perhaps of measures such as the partial removal of the sales tax on construction materials, I do not think that there were many measures in the budget that dealt with the root causes of inflation or tried to take some strong corrective measures.

I think also that it is pretty horrifying when we have two such budget presentations in the year, and suddenly figures that the minister forecasts are seven or eight figures apart from the same forecast made a few months earlier. If that does not indicate how deeply the fangs of inflation are biting, then nothing else does.

I am a native of Moncton, New Brunswick, and one of the proud things that happened to that city this summer was when a group of young singers—an Acadian group—went to the United Kingdom and, in competition with some of the great choirs from all over the world, gained not one prize but four international prizes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCleave: I think that is an event that is worthy of being put on the record in the House. It is one of the things that make me proud of having been born in Moncton.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I can deal with many things here this evening. I am a philosophical fellow. When I come here in the morning and look down the corridor, and see that the other place has a different floor wax than the one that is used here, I am inclined to ask whether there could not be some saving in combining the services in this House and the other place. God knows, sir, what battles are fought in the middle of the night, jurisdictional battles by the ladies armed with wax mops, as to who draws the other place's wax line and who does the waxing for this part of the building. Anyway, there is room for savings here and I hope both Mr. Speaker and Madam Speaker of the other place can get together and perhaps work out some joint services.

During the election campaign something different happened to me, something that was a challenge. I asked the deaf community in Halifax and East Hants to attend one of my political rallies. It is quite something to stand up and try to tell a joke, as perfectly as I tell them, and to have it translated by a person through sign language with her hands. Yet these people enjoyed being brought into the political swim. If any member in his or her next campaign wants to have a different type of experience, and a satisfying one, just ask the deaf community to attend meetings and they will find there is a great deal of enjoyment in it.

I would like to make one plea for people who are disabled in this way. I would like to see every deaf person have the right to a special machine that can be attached to the telephone. I think its cost is $200 or less. It lights up to indicate that someone is trying to contact that person. There is also a special typing apparatus that is able to transmit messages back and forth. I think that is a small amount of money for a very substantial help to disadvantaged citizens.

Later on in the session I will be dealing with some of the local issues, but now my time is running out and I would like to turn to some of the affairs as they concern the Chair of the House of Commons. I would ask you, Sir, to compliment Mr. Speaker on his selection. On election night, given the realities as they existed in the province of Ontario, I turned to my wife and said: "I bet that when parliament opens, the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) will be the Speaker of the House of Commons." This was long before Margaret had told Pierre, or anything like that. I think that the hon. member will do a tremendous job for us here.

Sir, I already complimented you because I held your position once and I know the dangers of being deputy speaker. There are more dangers in being deputy speaker than there are in being Speaker, and perhaps, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you will allow me to tell the rest of the members what those dangers are. Consider the following: in 1957, the deputy speaker, a Mr. Robinson, was defeated in his attempt for re-election. The next deputy speaker was Mr. Courtemanche, and where is he today? The next one was Mr. Sévigny, followed by Jacques Flynn, now opposition leader in the Senate, followed by Mr. Paul Martineau and then Gordon C. Chown. All those gentleman were defeated.

Then comes the honourable exception to this litany of gloom, Mr. Lucien Lamoureux, who was deputy speaker from 1963 to 1965, and who defied the curse upon deputy speakers. But then behold Mr. Batten. The next one, the present Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) had sense enough to escape while escape was still good, and went into the ministry after a decent interval between deputy speaker and being a parliamentary secretary. Then came Mr. Honey, my immediate predecessor, now Judge Honey.

So now it behooves a person who walked down this death valley, like myself, and came through, to become a backbencher. But it was not easy, and a legitimate question was raised in the campaign: why vote for somebody who is not apt to be able to speak in the House of Commons? This has mixed blessings. He may get another position of greater worth, and so they would get some satisfaction that way.

I did not like to tell them what I thought was likely to happen, that I would be a backbencher after the election was over. I was caught between the devil and the deep blue sea.

The problem is that no great minds such as those of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) concentrated on the problem of the Deputy Speaker—that his hands are literally tied once he takes the chair.

In this House the practice has been to keep the Speaker in that position or, when he decides to go, to give him some recognition. But you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, are in a different category entirely. You suffer the handicap I did, that of not being able to participate in debate, and to a lesser extent your assistants suffer the same disability. The only way I can see to overcome this is to take some new step for the Deputy Speaker and his assistants, such as setting aside time in which they could make short speeches—I presume they would be of a non-partisan nature. In that way their constituents would feel that their concerns were being looked after in parliament. That is the only solution I can see for yourself and others, before you who take that march down Death Valley that I had to come through in my time.

There is another matter which is personal. On the defeat of the government on the vote last spring, at that moment the rights and privileges, pay and allowances of Deputy Speakers ceased. I am not making a plea for myself but for you, Sir. You have headed the Canadian delegation to Cuba and you are undoubtedly finding now that you have to carry out a quasi-diplomatic function. You are receiving visitors from abroad.

I led a delegation to South Korea, and the business of that delegation did not end the night the government was defeated. I had to come back to Ottawa to complete the work. It was a labour of love, but it was not paid labour. I think the supposition that the Deputy Speaker's duties end when a session of parliament ends should be examined with a view to making redress. I do not ask it for myself, and I would refuse it if it were offered, but I ask it in light of your particular circumstances.

There is much more I could say, Mr. Speaker. I never did get around to talking about the ten minute speech as the cornerstone of parliamentary debate, but perhaps I will have an opportunity to do so later in the session.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sure hon. members will allow me to say how thankful I am to the hon. member for his remarks.

It being 9.45 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section 6 of Standing Order 60, to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put the question on the subamendment now before the House.

All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Nystrom) which was negatived on the following division:

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—REPORT BY MINISTER

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to report on the World Food Conference which began slightly more than two weeks ago in Rome. Last Saturday the conference came to a close, and of the 123 countries represented and the more than 1,200 delegates attending, virtually none did not have impressed upon them the need for increased production by all farmers in the world. While many countries were called on to produce more food and help developing countries to do the same, Canada was among the few that had chosen to give a clear and significant mandate to their representatives at the conference.

Let me say a word about our representatives. Our delegation at Rome was well prepared and was one of the best there, if not the best. We had two federal cabinet ministers, a provincial cabinet minister, three parliamentary observers and representatives of the public service. They all took their responsibilities very seriously and worked hard to achieve positive results. Right here I would like to set the record straight about one thing. Some people have alleged that our delegation was trying to filibuster in the committee dealing with trade. This is absolutely false. At no time did anyone on the Canadian delegation attempt any type of negative action at the conference. In point of fact, there were fairly extensive exchanges on the trade issue but these were between the delegates of the developing countries that held some very divergent views on the subject.

When my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), made known our willingness to provide a more than proportionate share of the minimum world target for food aid and to more than double contributions to the world food program, there was a good deal of optimism that the turning point of the conference had been reached. The feeling of optimism was increased when Australia made a corresponding offer in response to the example set by Canada. If other countries had done the same, the World Food Conference would have been a greater success.

Everyone with a real interest in farmers and agriculture ought to have the chance to go to a meeting like the World Food Conference. It brings home just how important good farmers and productive, efficient agriculture really are. When I sat in on some of those meetings held in a big building that Mussolini had put up for the 1942 Olympic Games and waited for the translators to catch up to the speaker, or maybe listened to delegates from various countries arguing for 20 minutes whether the right word to use in a sentence was "scarce" or "limited", I had a chance to think about some of the countries that were represented there.

What really struck me was that there were no developed countries that did not have well developed agriculture as the strong foundation for the rest of their economy. If a country's agriculture was not healthy, you could be pretty sure that they were having other problems as well. You could see the same sort of thing with respect to the developing countries. You cannot just lump them all together under that name. Some of them who had not paid enough attention to their farmers and their needs were wishing they had. But you could tell that the countries that were really looking after their agriculture were also going to take off pretty quickly in the rest of their development.

To try to get anything done in those committees was something else again. They would start off with a pretty reasonable draft of a resolution and go at it until it looked like the turkey two days after Thanksgiving dinner. Sometimes I wondered if they would ever get any meat back on the bones. In spite of the difficulties, we did make progress. Our delegation met several times a day to discuss progress and problems in the committees. In this work we were helped considerably by Canada's active participation in the preparatory committees.

I would just like to mention here that apart from official government delegation at Rome, Canada was fortunate in having very fine representation fron non-government organizations, or NGOs as they are called. Representatives from our delegation met with them frequently and the discussions were both cordial and useful for all of us. I have nothing bút praise for them and the job they did on behalf of their respective organizations.

The facts of Canadian leadership at the conference are as follows: the Canadian food aid pledge helped to move Australia and the EEC into making specific food aid pledges and the United States to accept a ten million tons annual food aid target. Canada drafted the clause ensuring that the Agricultural Development Fund would come into effect when there were substantial new funds and the prospect of continuity. Canada was also one of the first western countries to accept the Agricultural Development Fund. Canada was the only country to pledge 20 per cent of its food aid through multilateral channels, including a 100 per cent increase in Canada's pledge to the world food program for 1975 and 1976.

Canada pushed for a universal exchange of information on crop prospects and inputs. Canada offered to earmark national grain reserves for world food security. Canada led in stressing the importance of fisheries and environmental concerns. Canada has pressed for effective follow-up to the World Food Conference using existing international agencies that have a proven record of producing results.

At no time did Canada forget the importance of the producer as the key contributor to an adequate food supply. All these are examples of Canadian initiative and leadership at the World Food Conference, but this list is certainly not complete.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I was approached on many occasions by ministers of agriculture from developing countries who wanted to get bilateral development aid from Canada. They were looking for Canadian agricultural technology to use in their countries because they think Canada has the best technology and the most productive agriculture in the world. They also know that they can get help from Canada without political strings attached, if they are willing to make the effort to help themselves. It is still too early to make an adequate assessment of the World Food Conference. Nonetheless, I believe that there are real reasons for being optimistic. Perhaps the most important of these is that as a result of the conference many countries will start increasing their food production earlier than they would have.

Several resolutions were passed by the plenary session of the conference. However, the accepted wording of the resolutions was made on the basis of oral amendments, and final wordings of the resolutions are not yet available. Most important among the resolutions is the one to establish a fund to be called the international fund for agricultural development. The fund would finance agricultural and fisheries development projects in developing countries. Contributions to it would be on a voluntary basis. The fact that the resolution's co-sponsors included oil producing nations such as Iran, Kuwait, Oman, Saudi Arabia, Qatar, the United Arab Emirates and Venezuela may be regarded as a commitment by these countries to use some of their financial resources, and we hope they will, to support a multilateral program for agriculture and fisheries development.

The conference has asked the FAO and other concerned international organizations such as the International Wheat Council to make the arrangements necessary for the establishment of a global information and early warning system on food and agriculture. The objectives, policies and guidelines as set out in the text of the proposed FAO international undertaking on world food security were also endorsed by the conference. Governments of major exporting and importing nations have been invited to enter discussions on the feasibility of establishing grain reserves in appropriate locations. The Director General of the FAO has convened a meeting of representatives of interested countries for November 29 to look at the short-term problems of the developing countries most seriously affected by current food shortages.

The arrangements for follow-up at the conference were covered in a complicated resolution that in effect sets up a world food council at the ministerial level that would report to the United Nations General Assembly through the Economic and Social Council. The World Food Council would serve to co-ordinate follow-up policies concerning food production, nutrition, food security, food trade and food aid. Membership of the World Food Council has yet to be determined, but its members will be nominated by the Economic and Social Council and elected by the United Nations General Assembly.

The conference did recommend, among other things, an FAO committee on world food security, an intergovernmental committee of the World Food Program, and that the board of directors of the international fund for agricultural development should submit periodic reports to the World Food Council. The conference also requested that international groups and organizations take leadership in following up the results of the conference. The conference did adopt a long declaration entitled "Declaration on the eradication of hunger". Its final wording is not yet available, but it is a document that contains the suggestions of many groups that were agreeable to others, and hence is perhaps weaker than we would have liked because of the need for consensus.

Canada's leadership and contribution to the conference is perhaps best summed up in a letter to the Secretary of State for External Affairs dated November 9, from Mr. Aquino, executive director of the World Food Program, as follows:

> I would again like to express to you, and through you, also to the Secretary of State for Agriculture, the hon. Mr. Whelan, my own and my colleagues profound gratification for the excellent policy statement which you recently presented to the World Food Conference in Rome on behalf of the government and people of Canada. We in the World Food Program are deeply appreciative of the leading role CIDA has long taken and so clearly intends to continue to take in helping to "seek the elimination of hunger". Your moving speech and very practical undertakings and proposals are certainly most encouraging.

I was a proud Canadian before I went to the conference. I am an even prouder a Canadian after attending this conference.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I realize it is the custom, when responding to a statement such as we have just heard, for members of the opposition to thank the minister for sending them a copy of his remarks. Your Honour will recall that yesterday I rose on a question of privilege having to do with the minister's failure to make a statement yesterday. From the remarks he made in reply to my question of privilege, and from other information, I am confident the statement was available approximately 20 hours ago. At 10.30 this morning I got in touch with the minister's office. I did so again at 10.35. At 11 minutes to 11 I attended the minister's office and in his presence and the presence of his staff demanded a copy of his statement. I received the statement when I came into this chamber today.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Jarvis: My office is located in the same building as the minister's, up four flights of stairs, and even if it meant the minister climbing those four flights of stairs, surely we could have received a copy. The minister speaks continually about co-operation in the interests of Canadian and world farmers. If this is any indication of the co-operation he proposes to extend to other nations to meet the world food crisis, then heaven help the world's hungry. The only sympathetic thing I can say is that I, too, would be ashamed to release this statement if I were the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: In his final article on the World Food Conference, Mr. James Rusk, writing in the Globe and Mail, summed it up by saying:

> Politics won and food lost. The issues were political, the actions were political and the conclusions were political.

I do not point a finger at the minister, but this is my view of what happened at that conference. I have no way of judging whether the conference was a political success; but in terms of judging whether it was a success in solving the world food crisis, none of us in this house can claim that it was successful. With respect to the position taken by Canada and its participation, I say to the minister and to all hon. members that I was proud to be a Canadian on the second day of that conference. I was proud when the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) gave his statement. I think we all had reason to be proud at that particular point.

We went to the conference in the hope of offering leadership. I believe we did that, Mr. Speaker. Our commitment of food aid of one million tons a year for the next three years had two very obvious things to commend it: first, our commitment was expressed in terms of tons rather than dollars, which is what we had been requested to do; second, in comparison with other food exporters I think our tonnage commitment had everything to commend it. However, there is another yardstick. I do not refer only to the statistical fact that just three or four years ago the tonnage we delivered to the hungry nations far exceeded our Rome commitment: I emphasize that this three-year commitment does not begin until the next crop year. The Montreal Gazette, in an editorial on November 28 had this to say:

> The Canadian contribution of one million tons for the next three years is disappointing when weighed against earlier contributions. Canadian refusal to assist with fertilizers is miserly when compared with the 150,000 metric tons given in 1970 and the fact that approximately 30 per cent of Canadian fertilizer production was exported to the United States in the 1973-74 season.

In the same vein, the Globe and Mail said this:

> It is impressive only in that it stands out against the shameful background.

The yardstick that I refer to is measuring our assistance in terms of our capacity as Canadians to produce. Measured against that yardstick, no Canadian can take too much satisfaction. If we submit ourselves to that test, we have only to answer the question to read the minister's statement to this House on October 3, 1974, when he said, as reported at page 96 of Hansard:

> I have said the farmers of this nation will increase their productivity by 50 per cent in five years if they are given a decent return for what they produce and a guarantee that they will receive the same as the rest of our society wants—

Submitting ourselves to that test of capacity, not one member of the House or one producer in this country can take too much satisfaction. In terms of emergency relief, I noted the question put to the Secretary of State for External Affairs on November 14, a day during which the conference was being held, and the figure of $50 million was thrown around helter-skelter. The only thing I know about this $50 million is that as a result of the conference in Rome there has been a reallocation within the CIDA program of $50 million. There is no new fund. It is no big deal.

May I deal now with what, in my opinion, was the most significant issue from the Canadian viewpoint. That was the necessity of assisting developing countries to increase their own food production. Canadians had every reason to believe that we in the Canadian delegation would offer real leadership. First of all, we looked to the speech of the Minister of Agriculture prior to his leaving for Rome and he indicated that this was our number one priority since we had the leadership and the expertise necessary to assist in this regard. I believe that the most important sentence of the address of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the conference is as follows:

> Canada emphatically supports the development of increased food production capacity by developing countries as the key to an anti-hungry strategy.

Similarly, in his speech in the House on November 15 when he listed seven points which he hoped would assist Canada to participate in fighting this crisis, he said, as reported at page 1376 of Hansard:

> First, Canada is prepared to accord a high priority in its assistance program to the agricultural development of countries which are mobilizing their own resources to increase food production.

These have been hollow words. We did not exhibit any dramatic leadership in this area; in fact, we have demonstrated no real leadership at all. The conference itself did not come to grips with this issue. The future for agriculture in developing countries is little or no brighter as a result of the conference. The only ray of hope which the minister mentioned—and I hope it is a ray—is the agricultural development fund, which at this moment is unfunded. The only contribution that Canada makes, I repeat, is the reallocation of $50 million within the CIDA program.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) may wish to take exception to my criticism of this vital aspect of the Rome conference, but I can illustrate my point simply by saying this: if, as he has said repeatedly, we went to Rome expecting a conference on food production, why did Canada's delegation not include at least one person who represented the food producers of Canada? Ministers of the Crown do not produce food; members of parliament do not produce food; public servants do not produce food, and neither do international conferences.

The minister has bragged about—I share his pride in this respect—the tremendous talent available from farm organizations and producer groups in this country, yet not one of them was represented at the conference. Coincidentally, at this conference were two Canadians, Mr. Munro and Mr. Pigeon, both of whom represent producer groups in Canada. But they were there in an international capacity; they were not even invited to informal meetings held by the Canadian delegation until I made a point of seeking their presence at those meetings.

Unhappily, the world must conclude that the conference was not successful in respect of the key issue of food production in developing countries. Canadians must conclude either that we failed to provide leadership in this area or that whatever leadership we intended was not evident to other delegations. Whichever is the case, we must all regret our failure in this one area which we acknowledge to be the most important.

● (1130)

There are two matters I wish to discuss briefly. One is the presence in our delegation of senior members of the public service. It might be said by those more cynical than me that public servants really prove their mettle when they are dealing with ministers whose shortcomings are obvious in certain circumstances. I am not a cynic: I only say that within the framework of their instructions, the responsible public servants of the Department of Agriculture demonstrated an enthusiasm and determination for which I sincerely commend them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: The other point concerns the members of the non-governmental organizations. I appreciate the minister's comments in his statement. But, unfortunately, that feeling was not unanimous within our delegation and in my opinion there was even the suggestion that their role for future conferences should be questioned. If that role—which to me is a vital and enthusiastic one—is questioned, it should be questioned in this House, and nowhere else, because I believe these people fulfilled a very useful function. I appreciate your restlessness, Mr. Speaker, but anyone who has been a parliamentary observer knows that his function defies job description. I am working off a little of my frustration right now and hope you will bear with me.

My final point is an obvious one, and because it is so obvious we sometimes lose sight of it. We met in Rome because many people in this world are starving to death and many more are so undernourished that their chances of making a meaningful contribution to society are minimal or non-existent. This was why delegations from so many countries journeyed to Rome. Yet repeatedly at the conference, from our delegation and others I heard the desperately needy countries criticized in private because of the actions of their leaders. This criticism took the form of statements that country "A" was wasting money on expenditures for such things as armaments, money that otherwise could be used to provide more food for its people; country "B" was guilty of graft and corruption in dealing with food aid; country "C" had delegates at the conference who were riding around in Rolls-Royce cars while its people were starving.

All Canadians can take a personal affront at such action, particularly when we talk of countries who are recipients of our aid. All members of parliament can go to their respective ridings and be safe politically for not only criticizing such actions but, indeed, for justifying the withholding of aid because of such immorality. I sensed this personal feeling of effrontery every day at the conference. But what we ignore or forget is that it was not the starving child who was guilty of wasteful government expenditure, it was not the undernourished mother who was guilty of graft and corruption and it was not the worker, who is so underfed that he is non-productive, who is riding around in a Rolls-Royce. I suggest that all of us should resist the natural negative and politically expedient reaction of using such actions as reasons or excuses for withholding assistance. I suggest that these actions, albeit reprehensible, of needy countries should not provide the reason or excuse but, rather, should provide the challenge to us to make our aid more effective. Some 80 per cent of that aid is bilateral, so we can accept this worthy challenge.

In conclusion, may I say that Canadians share our disappointment that the World Food Conference failed to fulfill our aspirations for it. In a positive sense, however, I believe we should feel that the failures of the conference will add to the focus on and the urgency of the world food crisis. If nothing else, the focus on this crisis has provided us, as Canadians, with a dramatic challenge. The Gazette editoral to which I referred, under the heading "The hungry still unfed" states—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must ask the hon. member to please conclude his remarks.

Mr. Jarvis: I have about three more sentences, Mr. Speaker. Quite clearly, the work which was started in Rome, like the work started at earlier UN conferences in Caracas and Bucharest this year, will have to be continued. There is, however, growing urgency in respect of the food crisis because of its immediacy and the inhumanity of failing to tackle it. That this government acknowledges and meets this challenge is the demand of our party and, I believe, the demand of our country.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the House in advance for detaining it longer on this matter, but I think this conference was one of tremendous importance and significance. I, too, was a parliamentary observer and I hope the House will bear with me while I make a few remarks on the subject. This World Food Conference was, despite all the cynics and all the pessimists, an historic and significant occasion. It was, of course, dealing with a basic problem of humanity, the problem of food, which includes the age-old problem of malnutrition affecting millions of people, including 200 million children throughout the world. The conference was also dealing with the urgent and immediate problem of threatened starvation on a large scale in some parts of the world, and I mention Bangladesh, India and central Africa.

The conference was watched with hope and anxiety by the whole world. It was historic in the sense that it was the first time representatives of nations had gathered together to apply their minds to this problem. As Pope Paul VI put it in a striking address to the conference: "The food crisis is a crisis of civilization and solidarity." It would obviously be too soon to assess the results of the conference. They will depend on the follow-up and upon whether the nations of the world are prepared to give content to the resolutions they passed by providing the resources and machinery to make them work.

My view is that the conference had both successes and failures. An outstanding failure was in the area of trade. The resolution of the food problem of the world in the long run requires substantial increases in the purchasing power of the least developed countries. The resolution of the conference on this point was disappointingly vague. I want to make one thing clear; there seemed to be universal agreement that this problem could be solved. Nature has provided the means; the question is whether man can provide the wisdom to solve it. There is another observation I want to make, and that is that those who produce surpluses of food must not use those surpluses in an attempt to gain political advantage.

There were several aspects to the conference. The first dealt with the threat of starvation caused by the exhaustion of food reserves. I believe this immediate problem will be effectively tackled. But there is also the even more important, long-term problem of increasing food production, particularly in the developing world. The developing nations themselves have the immediate and primary responsibility for this task but through lack of capital and technology they cannot tackle it alone without massive assistance from the developed world.

A resolution was passed, as the minister told us in his statement, for the setting up of a fund for agricultural development. That was introduced by some of the OPEC nations and I regard it as one of the most encouraging features of the conference. I understand a follow-up conference is to take place on November 29 under the auspices of the Secretary General of FAO, with a view to putting reality into the proposals for this fund.

Above all, the third world of the developing nations must be put in a position where it is not the recipient of hand-outs but is enabled, through expanding trade, independently to expand its own agricultural production. What am I to say about the contribution of Canada in this regard? The minister has spoken in the usual glowing and customary terms of self-praise and it is hardly necessary for me to add very much to that. Although I am a member of the opposition and inclined to be critical, I think the specific proposals of the Canadian government to expand its food aid while emergency conditions persist, to base that food aid contribution on physical terms and not on dollars, and to commit an average of one million tons of food grains annually for the next three years, were constructive proposals and gave real leadership to the conference.

I was not so satisfied with the arrangements made by the conference, supported by Canada, in respect of world food security. In my view, it would have been far better to have created a world food bank with power to deal with speculation in foodstuffs and to stabilize food prices. Instead, what we got was a plan for national stockpiles of food grains, their use to be co-ordinated by some form of international organization. This is definitely a second-best program.

Another point I wish to mention is that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) in his speech to the conference spoke of Canada responding to countries which give high priority to developing efficient food production. Naturally, we must strive for efficiency but I warn against that being the only criterion: there is the danger that if this is done, the aid will be channelled to the wealthier producers, and this may enable them to drive small producers and landless labourers in developing countries off the land and into urban slums. That situation must be guarded against.

There is another aspect where I feel the Canadian contribution was totally inadequate. This is in respect of the drive of the third world for trade policies enabling them to expand their exports and thus to finance food production in their countries. Trade, aid and food production are intimately linked. Of course, detailed trade discussions could not take place at this conference; but it is equally true, in my judgment, that the third world was right in asking that consideration be given to the general direction to be taken on this whole vital question. In my view, the Canadian response initially was almost totally negative. The minister said it was a falsehood to say that they filibustered. They may not have filibustered, but I was there and I say that the initial attitude was almost entirely negative and a filibuster would have had the same sort of effect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: However, I give the minister some credit. Later in the conference the attitude seemed to become more flexible. Perhaps I am giving him undue credit when I say he was responsible for that. I was extremely disturbed at the initial Canadian attitude in respect of this vitally important subject. We lined up with the wealthy, developed countries and said we would not even bother talking to the developing countries about the problems they thought were important. I must admit that that attitude changed. The final resolution was a weak compromise, but if the minister is responsible for changing it, in fairness I give him credit for it.

I conclude my remarks by saying that I agree with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) that the key to the world food problem lies primarily in the hands of the agricultural producers both in the developed and developing countries. They must be consulted, their security considered, and there must be a radical revision by the modern world of its attitude toward the importance of agriculture. Agriculture must not be subordinate to the interests of speculators or private interests which so often control markets for their own benefit. A totally new structure is required. All these matters will not be solved, as Pope Paul said, by automatic, technical solutions: fundamental human values must be taken into account. I believe that on the whole the Rome conference pointed in the right direction. It was a step forward, and with good will and hard work it can be turned into a highly significant step in the history of humanity.

I would like to add one footnote. I join the minister in his tribute to the Canadian group which was known as NGO, a non-governmental organization. I think the Canadian group made a valuable, informed and indeed intelligent, critical contribution. If they had not been there, I am sure the Canadian contribution would have been far less than it was.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have heard the statement by the Minister of Agriculture and I must say his comments were not exaggerated and I believe he is right when he says that Canada had a positive participation in that conference through its expert delegates and above all the proposals that were put forward.

Canada has been one of the most responsive countries in the past few years. It can do more and the aim of the conference was to find means of sharing the planet's food resources to meet the actual needs of hungry populations. The sight of starving people is in itself difficult to bear, but when you have suffered from hunger or seen your next of kin suffer from it in your own home, it is even worse. Then, I guess, you understand better the actual situation of those starving populations deprived of any means of developing their land to produce enough food to meet their needs.

Some hon. members have sometimes accused us, without any malice I am sure, of resenting Canada's assistance program to developing countries. Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat that we favour Canada's help to developing countries, to countries whose populations are starving, but we would like to make sure that our help reaches its destination, that people who really need it are the first beneficiaries. We have been told that huge quantities of food products have been spoiled because they were stored in the wrong kind of warehouses. Our country had made an effort, but not every necessary step was taken. I don't know if that was done accidentally or on purpose, but at all events, we still have a long way to go before those products we send to starving people reach their destination. Of course Canada has huge resources of all kings and it can even produce more.

[Mr. Brewin.]

It is not only recently we have been maintaining that Canada should put its farm land to better use so as to produce sufficiently to meet the needs of the Canadian people and also help the needy countries.

I consider, Mr. Speaker, that it is a crime against humanity that thousands of farms lie abandoned and thousands of strong workers are forced into inactivity instead of working.

During the last weeks I have received numerous petitions coming from mothers in my riding asking me to press our government that our country might adopt a better food production policy. That is what I shall do at the next possible opportunity.

When my colleagues and I had the opportunity to travel in Belgium and Holland in September 1974, we witnessed that in these two countries all farm land is developed 100 per cent. There are people who understand the necessity of making use of all their production capabilities and if Canada wants to produce more efficiently, we will immediately have to adopt stronger measures to support our farmers.

It is not enough to say that we will give, that we will do our share. We must absolutely produce if we want our wishes to take on a concrete form.

Mr. Speaker, the scandalous increase in the price of chemical fertilizers will contribute to the discouragement of the farmers and I fear that 1975 production will suffer a rather shocking drop due to the fact that I have just mentioned. The horrendous increase in the cost of farm machinery is sufficient to further discourage the farmers.

In conclusion, I would like to say that if we want to, we can, and that should be the slogan of this Parliament. It is good to have the best of intentions, but acting efficiently is even better.

Besides producing, we should adopt a system insuring distribution even onto the tables of those who are in need.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by Mr. Chrétien, pursuant to Standing Order 59:

That the Supplementary Estimates (B) tabled this day be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE TO BE FOLLOWED FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as the House is aware, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) wishes to make a statement today and to table a copy of the report of the National Energy Board. I think there is general agreement that for this purpose we should revert to motions today at five p.m., the reason being that it is not desirable to table this report and have the statement made while the markets are open.

Mr. Speaker: I should comment to the House, if it is agreed and understood, that the Chair would not see the clock at five o'clock when reverting to motions. After the statement by the hon. Minister it is expected the customary replies would take place by spokesmen of each of the other parties. The Chair would then see the clock and adjourn the House on completion of such statements.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I have been informed by my office staff that copies of the statement I made today were distributed to the leaders of all parties and should have arrived in their offices maybe not as early as they should have, but possibly by 10.20 a.m.

Mr. Schumacher: Why didn't you tell me that on the phone, then?

COMMUNICATIONS

LACK OF TELEPHONE AND TELEVISION FACILITIES IN NORTHERN NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, related to projected industrial development in northern and western Newfoundland which emphasizes the need for immediate support in communication facilities.

The lack of satisfactory progress by both Canadian National Telecommunications and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in providing adequate expected television and telephone service will deter prospective development. This prompts the need for action by the government of Canada to demand that both agencies fulfil their responsibilities to Canadians.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion which contains some reference to elements of immediate necessity. It being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 it cannot be debated without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent the motion cannot be put.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED INTERVENTION OF PRIME MINISTER ON BEHALF OF CERTAIN CHILEAN CHILDREN—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask leave of the House to put a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of testimony given by Neil McDermott, Secretary General of the International Commission of Jurists that the Chilean military junta is considering a scheme to send children of supporters of former president Salvador Allende to forced labour in rehabilitation camps, and in view of the Prime Minister's intervention on behalf of Valentyn Moroz, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House instruct the Prime Minister to inform the Chilean junta that we in Canada consider such action to be contrary to all principles of decency and humanity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 and containing elements of immediacy. It cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be debated at this time.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROPOSED REFERENCE OF ABORTION PROVISION TO COMMITTEE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I rise to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the renewed representations made to most members of the House, not only in person over the past few weeks but also by hundreds of telegrams and letters, urging the House to examine the abortion laws now freely in existence in this country, and in view of the fact that this is a matter dealing with life itself, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis):

That the government be instructed to form forthwith a committee comprised of members of this House to thoroughly investigate this entire area affording such organizations as the Alliance for Life and others, in fact, all segments of our society, the opportunity to express their views on a matter involving the very lives of thousands of unborn children.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion. With due respect I would call the hon. member's attention to the provisions of Standing Order 43 which read as follows:

A motion may, in case of urgent and pressing necessity . . .

Representation Act, 1974

The Chair can only assume that the use of the word "urgent" and in addition the words "pressing necessity" makes specific reference to the fact that a motion be not only important, as the subject matter of the motion is, but have an element of immediacy, of "urgent and pressing necessity". I am afraid, with due respect to the hon. member, that I am not able to see that the matter, while important, has any more urgency today than it did in the last parliament or that it will have in future parliaments. It is a matter of prominent and important concern to all members of the House but surely the fact of recent representations cannot take it out of the level of continuing concern and place upon it the element of urgent and pressing necessity as declared by the terms of the Standing Order. I, therefore, regret that I cannot put the motion.

POST OFFICE

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE REVIEW OF OPERATIONS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Canadian postal service has deteriorated to such an extent that businesses such as McConnell Nursery Co. have to curtail a major portion of their business because they cannot depend on the postal service to be reliable, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale):

That this House direct the operations of the Post Office to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications for immediate review, and implementation of the Samson, Belair, Riddel, Stead report on the Post Office that recommends the return of mail transportation to the more efficient private carriers.

Mr. Speaker: The element of the collapse of the firm referred to gives, without further detail, at least some indication of immediacy. Accordingly, I must ask whether there is unanimous consent to adopt the motion being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be debated at this time.

TRADE

SUGAR—ATTITUDE OF CANADA TOWARDS NEW INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT AND PRICE TO BE OFFERED

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As Canadian housewives and Canadians generally pay what is probably the highest price in the world for sugar as a result of Canada's inflexibility and parsimonious attitude to producing countries during the 1973 sugar talks, will the minister assure the House that Canada will now take the lead in negotiating a new sugar agreement.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we shall be interested in negotiating a new sugar agreement if we can find the basis for a new sugar agreement which will provide for stability of supply for consuming nations and fair prices to producing nations. So far we have not been able to find that basis.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In order to avoid the confusion which arose during the 1973 sugar talks concerning Canada's unwillingness to negotiate a fair price for sugar, will the minister tell the House what price Canada is now offering sugar producing countries for their sugar?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, no active negotiations are going on at present. I indicated to the House that we have two preparatory groups which are ready to proceed, both with respect to questions concerning stability of supply and the question of price. We shall be prepared to sit down with producing nations as soon as they indicate to us that they are prepared to meet, as well. I should point out also that Canada is not alone in wishing to take part in these negotiations. Canada is but one of a number of consuming nations. A large number of under-developed countries are consuming nations and net importers of sugar rather than net exporters. They, too, have very important views on the price of sugar.

POSSIBLE INCREASE IN DOMESTIC SUGAR PRODUCTION—RESULTS OF CONSULTATIONS BETWEEN MINISTERS

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the statement of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, made in the House on November 7, that he was waiting impatiently for the Minister of Agriculture's recommendations as to the possibility of increasing to a certain extent sugar production in Canada, has the minister conferred with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs about this? If so, what were the minister's recommendations? If not, will the minister please explain to the House his tardiness in this matter.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and I are always conferring about something. May I inform the hon. member that one reason the document in question was not sent to the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot sooner is this: I was meeting representatives of the sugar beet producers of Canada in my office and we are actively working together in trying to solve this problem.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SUGAR—REASON FOR HIGH PRICES IN CANADA

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of reports to the effect that sugar companies in the United States have increased profits by between 1,200 per cent and 2,000 per cent and as sugar costs the consumer in Canada almost one third more than it costs the consumer in the United States, let me ask, what in hell is going on with sugar prices in Canada.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—FUTURE EFFECT ON CANADIAN AUTO AND RELATED INDUSTRIES OF LAY-OFFS IN UNITED STATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Considering that 100,000 automotive workers in the United States have received word that they will be laid off immediately or very soon, and, consequently, as the industry has announced that it will lay off workers in Windsor, St. Thomas, Ajax and Oshawa, and that more lay-offs will follow in Canada, what has the minister's department done in terms of forecasting future lay-offs? Further, what plans has the department made in order to deal with these forthcoming, serious lay-offs in this industry?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we have the matter under continuing study. I indicated that I participated recently in a number of meetings with members of the industry. As for the second part of the question, let me refer the hon. member to the statement made by the President of the United Auto Workers of America. He pointed out that Canadian economic policy seems to be much better designed to maintain a buoyant climate for the automobile industry in this country than is the case in his country.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The president of the UAW was comparing what they have down there with what we have, and I suppose in that context his recommendation was not bad. I do not want to be frivolous, although the minister has tried to suggest this is not a serious matter, as he usually does. May I ask the minister this: As it is estimated that one job in six or seven in Canada is related directly or indirectly to the automotive industry, what studies has the minister's department undertaken into the indirect effects of United States lay-offs which will affect employment not only in southern Ontario, but everywhere from St. John's to Vancouver? Has the minister's department determined what other industries will be affected if the inevitable lay-offs in the automotive industry take place? What has the minister done to counter the indirect effects?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, we do not accept the premise of the hon. member's question. We do not think there will be the large number of lay-offs to which he refers. I have said to him that we expect lay-offs of a short and periodic nature from time to time, as a result of the situation in the United States. Indeed, at present we are witnessing a number of lay-offs in companies supplying parts to U.S. automobile manufacturers but, according to indications, these will be of a relatively short duration. I do not anticipate, at present, massive lay-offs in Canada such as have taken place in the United States, or such as the premise or preamble to the hon. member's question suggest.

AUTOMOBILES—SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF DIFFERENTIAL IN PRICE BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a final supplementary question. Considering that consumers in Canada, automotive workers in Canada and in the United States and the American government have all been pressing the government of Canada to bring down the price of automobiles in Canada, which would be a method miles ahead of any other for generating employment in the industry in Canada, and considering that on the assembly line in Oshawa this morning two identical cars were produced, one to go the United States and one to be sold in Canada for $1,000 more than is charged in the United States for that car, the price differential being considerably greater than the 7 per cent or 8 per cent differential the minister has talked about, when is the minister finally going to do something to reduce the price differences in this industry?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as I have assured the hon. member and indicated to this House recently, we have made real progress in narrowing these price differentials. I remind the hon. member that the Canadian market is strong, probably for two reasons, these being, first, the general economic climate of this country, and second, the fact that the price differential has been narrowing. I remind the hon. member that import today account for close to 15 per cent of the total market, whereas two years ago they accounted for close to 25 per cent. That is a reflection of the narrowing of the price difference.

Mr. Broadbent: With respect, it is not.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTION IN UNITED STATES PUBLICATION CANADIANS DIRT FARMERS AND TRAPPERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

A few day ago, a big and influential American magazine, which is very close to the American government, stated that if it were not for American industries, Canadians would be only trappers and dirt farmers. I should like to know whether the Prime Minister or some high official of the government has challenged the magazine and advised it that at one time the Canadians saved the United States and that even today, were it not for Canadian raw materials, several of our insignificant southern friends, such as the one who showed off in the Baron Magazine, would be starving like rats. Has the Prime Minister advised them of that?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, we cannot waste our time replying to all the nonentities who have such erroneous opinions about Canada.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN GUIDELINES FOR CABINET MINISTERS AND CIVIL SERVANTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It arises from the statement of the Prime Minister that his government "believes that no higher standards should be demanded of anyone than of ministers themselves." In light of the fact that conflict of interest guidelines for civil servants require them to disclose apparent conflicts of interest while there is no requirement of disclosure on the part of cabinet ministers, can the Prime Minister tell the House why his government is insisting on more stringent rules governing the conduct of civil servants than those governing their political superiors?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I may have misunderstood the purport of the question, but there are, of course, guidelines requiring ministers to disclose conflicts of interest.

Mr. Beatty: Apparently the Prime Minister forgets the statement he made to the House last year in which he said cabinet ministers could put their holdings in so called blind or frozen trusts, as did the Prime Minister. Is it the policy of the government to allow civil servants to place their holdings in frozen trust, which remain secret from everyone except the individuals involved and their trustees at the same time as they are able to influence public policy that may directly enhance their holdings, as is the case with cabinet ministers?

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, that is not the case with cabinet ministers nor will it be the case with civil servants who each have to report to the minister on the action they have taken to eradicate or eliminate any conflict of interest.

Mr. Beatty: I suggest that perhaps the Prime Minister does not understand the regulations for cabinet ministers. In light of the fact the present regulations regarding ministers allow conflicts to continue hidden behind frozen or so-called blind trusts and no provision is made for the holdings of spouses and the reporting procedure has ministers accountable to a civil servant and not to an officer of the House, is the government giving consideration to replacing its guidelines with a system of full, true, plain and public disclosure of the assets and liabilities of all ministers, their spouses and dependent children, before an officer of the House?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member is obviously making a series of representations on what he thinks the conflict of interest guidelines should be. We have laid the guidelines before the House.

Mr. Beatty: They are just a smoke screen.

Mr. Trudeau: We are prepared to defend them. If members opposite feel they do not go far enough, they in conscience can take their own action, as did the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi.

Mr. Beatty: You campaigned on leadership.

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member feels he is in a conflict of interest situation, surely in his own conscience he should go further than he has.

IMMIGRATION

AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC—RECONCILIATION OF ENCOURAGEMENT OF FRANCOPHONE APPLICANTS WITH HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT RATE IN QUEBEC

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the upcoming agreement between Ottawa and Quebec with regard to the recruitment of French-speaking immigrants to Quebec and Quebec's establishment of immigration bureaus in Portugal, Spain, Morocco, Portuguese Africa, Haiti and Latin America, will the Prime Minister indicate how this matter can be reconciled with the October 22 statement of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration whereby immigrants would be coming into Canada on the basis of job vacancies when the unemployment rate in Quebec is consistently higher than that of the national average?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of all the offices that the hon. member alleges will be opened. Certainly, some that he named are not in French-speaking countries. However, the reconciliation will of course be made by the fact that all immigrants, no matter what their ethnic origin or linguistic group, will have to come under Canadian laws and regulations. The provinces are not in any position to exempt any immigrant from those laws and regulations.

AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO CHANGE MADE

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): In view of the 1971 agreement between the government of Canada and the government of Quebec whereby the immigration bureaus of the province of Quebec could only interview prospective immigrants who had been referred to federal immigration officers, will the Prime Minister assure us that process will not be changed? I ask this question in view of the fact this agreement is now being re-negotiated.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know of no plans to change that agreement. The whole object of the procedure referred to by the hon. member was precisely to ensure that the Quebec representatives would have facilities in proximation to the federal facilities so there would be no danger of confusing a prospective immigrant and he would know the overall situation, I repeat, I know of no plan to change that situation. I will take notice of the question on behalf of the Minister of Immigration in case there is something to add.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I also have a supplementary for the Prime Minister.

Given the importance, for the province of Quebec, of having a higher proportion of French-speaking immigrants, would the Prime Minister be prepared to give particular attention to that possibility?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am under the impression that we have never seen more clearly than today the division among the Conservatives on the question of bilingualism.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

REASON FOR EXCLUSION OF SPOUSES FROM GUIDELINES

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It may be supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo. A loophole in the Registered Home Owner Savings Plan has been identified whereby a husband can transfer the family home to his wife, save up to $10,000 tax free and then buy back part of the house. Department of Finance officials are aware of this loophole. I quote from an article that appeared in this morning's Gazette:

Property transferred to a spouse remains her property in the event of a divorce—a possibility most individuals would not want to risk.

Can the Prime Minister indicate whether there is similar reasoning behind his view that spouses of cabinet ministers need not be subject to conflict of interest regulations?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

REQUEST THAT SUBJECT MATTER BE REFERRED TO A COMMITTEE

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to continue on this question of the government's reluctance to come clean on the question of conflict of interest. I refer to the refusal yesterday of the government House leader, in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Peace River, to indicate the time of reference to a committee of guidelines concerning conflict of interest. I ask the Prime Minister to now give us a date when there will be a reference to a committee on the conflict of interest question and give us a specific commitment that the terms of reference of that committee will be broad enough to allow consideration of the Lalonde affair and all potential conflicts, including spouses of ministers.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no reluctance on the government side to refer this to a committee. We indicated in the previous parliament we were doing this. In this parliament it is a matter of House leaders getting together, deciding when they will make the reference and what the terms will be. I, personally, am looking forward to the views expressed by opposition members in the matter of responsibility of spouses. I look forward to seeing what position they take insofar as the respect of the individuality of the spouse is concerned and whether they intend to withdraw from wives or husbands the right to act on their own in areas which come within the law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR DEBATE ON GOVERNMENT POLICY ON IMPORT QUOTAS ON BEEF—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question, which is on another subject, is addressed to the Prime Minister. When can we expect a definitive statement of policy in this House on the subject matter of last Monday's cabinet meeting, namely, the embargo by the United States against the importation of beef and hogs into that country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The note to the United States was tabled in the House and it was made clear that we are expecting a response from the United States. I imagine the next step will be to hold meetings of officials so that we can discuss that response, and perhaps place the matter before a meeting under the provisions of GATT.

Mr. Lawrence: I am not talking about the response of the United States to the note. I am talking about the response in this House, or the opportunity afforded the opposition to make a response in this House to the policy of the government. It is a completely different matter.

Mr. Trudeau: We are very anxious indeed to have the views of the opposition on this as on other matters. Surely, the present debate on the budget is an occasion which will permit the hon. member and his colleagues to express their views on this question—they seem to be talking about everything else which is irrelevant.

THE ACQUISITION OF PRICE COMPANY BY ABITIBI PAPER COMPANY—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

Following the important stock exchange operation which was carried out yesterday and which saw the control over Price Company Limited, a Quebec-based firm, fall into the hands of Abitibi Paper Company Limited, a Toronto-based firm, does the minister intend to order an investigation into the methods used in this case which have been reportedly detrimental to a number of small investors who, for all practical purposes, have been swindled pure and simple.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I take notice of this question, later to give the hon. member a more complete reply.

SARNIA-MONTREAL PIPELINE—DATE INTERPROVINCIAL FIRST RAISED QUESTION OF SUPPLY—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO CONSTRUCTION

Mr. John Fraser (Vancouver South): My question is for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. I hope he will consider this one to be relevant. It refers to the Sarnia-Montreal pipeline. The minister of energy admitted to the House only last Thursday that the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company has become concerned lest there might not be adequate reserves to supply the line in early 1980's. Since the construction of this pipeline has been government policy for more than a year now, it seems strange that such concern should not have been raised until some time last month. Can the Prime Minister tell us, in the absence of his colleague, the date on which this concern by Interprovincial or others first came to the attention of the cabinet or of himself?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I cannot mention the exact date, but I will gladly take note of the question on behalf of the minister.

Mr. Fraser: Just to try to keep the question relevant, and to put it in very plain English, or the other official language—and this should be a question the right hon. gentleman can answer without referring to the minister of energy—may I ask whether the government is still committed to the pipeline project? Is there a timetable for its completion, and, if so, what is it?

Mr. Trudeau: I shall take note of that question, too.

EFFECT OF WAYS AND MEANS MOTION NO. 9 ON BRITISH COLUMBIA NATURAL GAS COMPANY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that in British Columbia private gas companies have the right to shut off all natural gas at the wellhead rather than be forced to operate at a loss, as would be the clear effect of motion No. 9 in the Ways and Means motions we are considering, would the minister advise us whether he is urging that the price of natural gas in the Pacific Northwest be renegotiated in order to make marketing arrangements in British Columbia viable? Or is he willing to see the British Columbia Petroleum Corporation collapse?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I do not accept the preamble. I do not even accept the conclusion from the preamble on the basis the hon. gentleman has put it.

POSSIBLE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION RAISED BY WAYS AND MEANS MOTION NO. 9—SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Aside from the question whether the preamble is acceptable or not, would the minister agree that motion No. 9 in the Ways and Means motions brings up a constitutional question and might interfere with traditional rights under the British North America Act, and that it certainly destroys whatever marketing arrangements for natural gas exist in British Columbia at the present time? Would the minister urge the Prime Minister to call a conference of first ministers in this country before the legislation involving the Ways and Means motion is presented to this House so that one of the most serious federal-provincial confrontations which could ever occur in this country might be avoided?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): That is up to the Prime Minister, but I would not urge it at this stage.

Mr. Leggatt: In view of the very serious constitutional issue which arises both with regard to the question of royalty deductions and to the question of fair market value in assessing the income of private oil and gas companies, would the minister at least consider making a constitutional reference to the Supreme Court of Canada on this subject so that before a confrontation takes place we may be in possession of a definite decision as to whether the minister is acting constitutionally in connection with the budget now before the House?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I cannot see that there is anything in the British North America Act which would apply to royalties being deductible for income tax purposes.

POSSIBLE IMPOSITION OF IMPORT QUOTAS ON EGGS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, or his parliamentary secretary, or for the Minister of Agriculture. I should like to know, from whoever answers my question, whether the Canadian government will be placing import controls on eggs coming into Canada from the United States as from Monday.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON PATTERN OF TRADE RELATIONS DEVELOPING WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Since it seems apparent that this is what will happen—that the price of Ontario eggs will be going up on Monday, and the only way in which this can take place would be by preventing eggs coming into Canada from the United States, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he will be making a statement as to the pattern of trade relations which is developing between Canada and the United States? Will he make such a statement during the early part of next week, possibly on Monday?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Definitely not on Monday, because I shall be meeting with the provincial ministers of agriculture to discuss this very problem. I want to make it clear that there will not necessarily be any statement made.

DATES OF MEETINGS AND NAMES OF VARIOUS GROUPS CONNECTED WITH DISCUSSIONS ON MEASURES TO FIGHT INFLATION—TERMS OF REFERENCE OF JOHN YOUNG

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that in the budget he stresses that cost-push inflation is still a serious problem and that he proposes to deal with it by meeting with representatives of various sectors of the economy, can he tell us the specific dates of these contemplated meetings and name the specific groups he proposes to meet in connection with these consultations?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Not today, Mr. Speaker. Consultations are proceeding between the Prime Minister and other ministers and various groups on an informal basis. In due course a statement will be made in the House.

Mr. Gillies: Can the Minister of Finance tell us whether or not part of the terms of reference of John Young is to declare an incomes policy for Canada?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The answer is, no.

ENERGY

POSSIBLE SHORTAGE OF OIL—SUGGESTED SHELVING OF PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT AND BUDGET PROPOSAL ON OIL ROYALTIES

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the prospect envisaged by the National Energy Board that Canada's self-sufficiency in oil may not be long maintained, and that shortages may arise within seven years even if exports to the United States are cut, would the Prime Minister consider shelving the Petroleum Administration Act as well as the proposal put forward in the budget speech dealing with royalties and other disincentives to the production of oil in this country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice.

● (1230)

Mr. Yewchuk: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister indicate whether, in view of these reports of insufficiency in the near future, he intends to put before the House some new and extraordinary measures to encourage an accelerated rate of production of petroleum products in this country?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member can wait and see.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Baldwin: I see the Prime Minister about to go, but it has been brought to my attention that during the course of a legitimate exchange on the question of conflict of interest a short time ago, the Prime Minister made a derogatory remark about an hon. member on this side. He pointed across the Chamber and called him a name which is quite improper and unparliamentary. The right hon. gentleman is nodding his head. If that is the case he should stand up and tell the House what he did say and who the hon. member was.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely, in questions of conduct or language and their proper usage and respect for parliamentary custom the Chair can only take notice of remarks that are on the record. I was not able to hear the remark referred to, and unless the Chair heard it at the time I could not pass judgment on it.

Mr. Alexander: Stand up like a man and show that leadership.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings on the question of privilege.

Mr. Hees: I hope that the right hon. gentleman will get up and say what he called the hon. member on this side and withdraw the taunt. If there is any doubt about what was said, I heard it three times and would be glad to repeat it.

Mr. Speaker: The Prime Minister is rising on the question of privilege.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman is referring to the hon. member who asked me a question relating to divorce in my family, I would gladly repeat to him what I said. If he wants to step outside I will tell it to him to his face.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre (Calgary Centre): On the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary Centre on the question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Resign.

Mr. Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, first off I want to say that I deeply regret that the Prime Minister or anybody on that side of the House took the interpretation of my remarks that he did. I would invite hon. members to examine Hansard. I can assure the House that my points—and hopefully one does not have to attest to the validity of the position by making some declaration or oath—in raising the question were twofold. First, I thought the reply by the official of the Department of Finance that the threat or risk of divorce was sufficient deterrent to anyone making use of that loophole was a ridiculous basis upon which to make law in this country. Secondly, I also wanted to re-emphasize, along with other members on this side, a point that my leader emphasized earlier this week and one, about which we feel very strongly, namely that guidelines on conflict of interest which require semi-disclosure in the form of a blind trust on the part of cabinet ministers, but no disclosure in terms of the spouses of cabinet ministers, are in fact no disclosure at all.

Contrary to reflecting on the family life of any cabinet minister, we are operating on the assumption that their families are of such a make-up that they could make use of this loophole in the conflict of interest guidelines. I repeat that I regret the Prime Minister did not see fit to remain and hear these remarks. There was no intention whatever, in anything that I have said or I am sure anything in what my colleagues have said, to reflect upon the personal life of any member of this House. But that does not get away from the fact that it is important for the people of Canada to have the assurance that there is no conflict of interest on the part of cabinet ministers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Témiscamingue rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order or a question of privilege, it does not matter. I think that we are wasting precious time in the House discussing conflicts of interests. Nobody in Canada, I think, would allow a minister representing the government to travel at the expense of a private company. However, I will point out to my Progressive Conservative friends that when they were in power, we learned that ministers of the Crown flew to Boston football or baseball games in government planes. This was unauthorized.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With the greatest respect, the question at issue is not the subject of conflict of interest and guidelines related thereto, except in so far as these relate to the question of privilege that has been raised. I think it might be appropriate to get back to the original question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), and again by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), which was based on an alleged remark made by the right hon. Prime Minister.

I have heard hon. members in discussion of this question. One of them was the right hon. Prime Minister who made reference to a remark about divorce. Accordingly, I allowed the hon. member for Calgary Centre the opportunity to explain what his remark meant in his own terms. In any case, the only relevancy of the question of conflict of interest in that context was as an explanation of the hon. member's reference to divorce, so far as it related to the alleged question of privilege.

With regard to the question of privilege, again I say I have benefitted from the contribution of hon. members to the question of privilege, which basically arises from something alleged to have been said sotto voce by the Prime Minister. It is not on the record, the Chair was not able to hear it, and accordingly I am not in any position at this time to rule on it. It may come to light in some other way if there is an actual and formal complaint by a member who was aggrieved or offended by the remark itself. Since I do not have it before me at this time, I would hope that hon. members might now busy themselves by concluding the remaining five minutes of the question period.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, Your Honour has disposed of the question of privilege. I would rise on a point of order. Accepting the invitation of the Prime Minister, and in order that this matter may be brought out before the public as it should be, I right now indicate my willingness to meet with the government House leader to arrange terms of reference so that this House can have a full public and independent inquiry into the facts.

HOUSING

HABITAT '76 IN VANCOUVER—CONSULTATION WITH THE PROVINCES

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

As the United Nations have agreed to the Canadian proposal for an international conference on human establishments in Vancouver, in June 1976, is the minister in a position to advise us as to whether Canada has since received a favourable reply from the provincial governments and from private institutions expressing a wish to participate in it by advocating worthwhile projects?

● (1240).

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I could hardly hear the question because of the side talk. As I understand the question by the hon. member for Abitibi, let me say there has been a great deal of interest by the provinces, non-government organizations and municipalities in the United Nations Conference on Human Settlement in Vancouver in 1976, known as "Habitat '76". The demonstration projects are only incidentally related to that conference. It is an ongoing program for five years and there has been considerable interest. We are having regular meetings. There is an excellent and progressive advisory committee which receives these submissions and we hope to have an announcement in the not too distant future on the initial projects that have been approved.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, my question was to be addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who seems to have had too much of Parliament and has withdrawn.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member raising a point of order?

Mr. Laprise: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have been rising three times to put a supplementary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and I have not yet been recognized. I wonder why other hon. members are being recognized for supplementaries while I am unable to obtain the same attention.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I raised the question of privilege and, in my opinion, it has priority over any other issue.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs—

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: My question of privilege is this, Mr. Speaker. A moment ago I raised on a point of order and I asked you to make a decision on this point. I am now asking you to make a decision.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will realize that it is always within the discretion of the Chair to allow or disallow supplementary questions in some instances, particularly late in the question period when there are many members who have not had an opportunity to ask a question, and when the Chair is endeavouring to get around to as many members as possible. The nature of the question of the hon. member for Abitibi invited a general response and an indication of developments that may take place a considerable time in the future. Having received a complete answer to that, it is within the discretion of the Chair to suggest that the hon. member ought not to be granted the opportunity to pose a question supplementary to the one he has asked and has had answered, but that other hon. members ought to have an opportunity. That has always been the discretion of the Chair, and that does not constitute a point of order or question of privilege.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION CONCERNING HOUSING FOR VETERANS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the many references made on November 5 and November 6 during the recent debate on the Veterans Land Act to the possibility of introducing veterans' housing legislation, which would be even better than the provisions of the Veterans Land Act, could the Minister of Veterans Affairs now say whether such legislation will be introduced in the near future?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as was indicated by myself and also by my colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, this proposal is still under study, and I feel good progress is being made.

SURVEY OF VETERANS HOUSES IN NEWFOUNDLAND—POSSIBILITY OF ASSISTANCE FOR IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. As a result of a survey conducted by the provincial command of the Canadian Legion of Newfoundland, looking into the substandard quality of many veterans' homes, would the minister indicate whether he has received the results of that survey, and if he is going to advance any program to provide recipients of war veterans' allowances and other veterans with government assistance to improve the substandard quality of their homes?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have received the first part of that survey, which I note is in parts and is not yet completed. When it is completed and has been fully studied by my department, if there is policy to be derived from it, there will be an announcement in due course.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but in his absence perhaps I might direct it to his parliamentary secretary. I wonder if I could have the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

An hon. Member: He is not in the House.

BEEF—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO AID CATTLE INDUSTRY INCLUDING CASH ADVANCES

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture who has announced his discovery of the great demand on the productive capacity of our farmers, and has announced his intention of increasing that capacity by 50 per cent over five years. Will he tell the House today what the government will do to assist the cattle industry in Canada over the next few years, and particularly what it will do to help that industry get over the coming winter, thereby preserving and industry so vital to the farm sector?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I want to make it very plain and clear that the hon. member is taking what I said at least partially out of context. I said that if our farmers were given the incentive—stabilization, etc.—they will increase their productivity 50 per cent in five years, and we are going to bring forward plans for stabilization, etc., to help all sectors.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, in light of the minister's planned meeting on Monday with provincial agricultural ministers, will he tell the House today if he is prepared to brief those ministers in respect of a formula which would give the cattle industry the cash advances necessary to get it through this winter so that cattle farmers will not have to sell off their breed cows?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the main purpose of that meeting to be held with the provincial ministers on Monday is to discuss the egg marketing problem we are facing in Canada at the present time, and the follow-up meeting we are to hold with them in July. They have appointed an ongoing committee of provincial and federal representatives to study the situation and make a report. There is no doubt in my mind that other topics will possibly be put forward, and the one the hon. member has mentioned will perhaps be one of those topics for discussion.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Thursday, November 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stanfield (p. 1502).

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) on what I sincerely believe is the best economic budget we have ever had in that it is reasonable, sensible and of benefit to all Canadians. Certainly, the reductions in income tax will be of benefit to all Canadians, as will the reduction in the tax on building materials which amounts to a saving of $650 on the purchase of a home. I should also like to refer to the $500 grant to those purchasing new, moderately priced homes within the next year. I think this provision should have gone a little further and made the grant available to individuals purchasing their first home who, because of limited income, must of necessity purchase an older home. I think they, too, should have the benefit of this $500 grant.

I am receiving a great many representations from people on low incomes who want to purchase a home for the first time but can only afford an older home. Surely they should be given some consideration by the government in respect of this proposed grant. To this end, I hope the Minister of Finance, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) and the cabinet as a whole will give consideration to this matter and will come up with a proposal as soon as possible.

I have congratulated the minister. It is not often that I rise and give out congratulations, but today I will speak of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) who represents Winnipeg South. I would be in favour of maintaining the number of armed forces personnel at the target of approximately 82,500. I know the minister is making representations to the cabinet to this end, and also to obtain a sufficiently large budget to provide our armed forces with the proper, necessary equipment for training, for peacekeeping activities, for NORAD and NATO, for aid to civilian authorities, and so on. I believe the Minister of National Defence has done a tremendous job in making these representations to the cabinet. The minister has also done a great job in bringing industry to western Canada, at the risk, in many instances, of being criticized. He has put his job on the line and his head on the block. The Minister of National Defence is very sincere in what he is doing; and with reference to pork-barrelling in certain areas, there is certainly less of it in western Canada, especially in Manitoba and Winnipeg.

I would like to refer to some things the minister might have done. With regard to the 12,697 pairs of snowshoes which are being purchased in Ontario at a cost of over $100,000 more than if they were purchased in Winnipeg at the retail price, I compliment the Winnipeg Free Press for bringing this matter to the attention of the public. I am certain that the fact they were not bought in western Canada is not the fault of the minister. I shall now refer to some things that the minister has done to the benefit of western Canada—and there is no doubt that the west needs a lot more help. Since we have been debating the budget, the opposition have made frequent references to the fact that very few Liberal members are from western Canada. It was said yesterday by opposition members—and I listened very carefully—that this government does not pay enough attention to western Canadians and this is the reason so few Liberals represent that part of the country.

I say to you, Madam Speaker, that the voice of the Minister of National Defence and the voice of all western Canadians is clearly heard and listened to. I suggest that without doubt western Canada would receive its fair share even if there were no Conservatives representing it in this House nor, for that matter, any Liberals. As I have said, there are very few of us; however, I think the number is unimportant. What has the Minister of National Defence done to benefit western Canada? Let me give a few examples. The Arctic trading centre in northern Manitoba at Churchill means that the expenditures of the Canadian forces personnel living permanently in Churchill, in addition to the expenditures of hundreds of personnel sent there from time to time for training, will help to strengthen the economy of northern Manitoba. This trading centre was opened in response to requests from the town of Churchill and the people living in the area, as well as requests from members on this side of the House.

Throughout the province there was during the past year a substantially increased expenditure by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Within the last year, 41 incentive grants have been made to encourage small business activities. More than 1,450 jobs have been created in Manitoba as a result of federal government grants. I am not referring to the year 1974 but, rather, to the period ending December, 1973. For example, there was the decision to build a defence research establishment in Winnipeg, another project which was brought to Winnipeg by the Minister of National Defence. This will mean more jobs for university graduates in Manitoba because the variety of skills and trades related to this research project will provide more employment. Although there are seven defence research establishments throughout Canada, employing more than 2,000 people, there has never been such an establishment in Manitoba throughout the 107 years of Canada's history. This is also to the credit of the minister from the province of Manitoba.

With regard to protection of the north, increased activity and interest in the north will be created by the decision made to have Canadian naval crews undertake some of their training at Hudson Bay and Manitoba's port of Churchill. I am glad to be a member of parliament from that area. Canada is a three-ocean country and Canadian sailors should be as familiar with Arctic waters as they are with the Atlantic Ocean and the Pacific Ocean. The Minister of National Defence can be credited with establishing the training base in the northern port of Churchill.

The minister has done many other things to benefit western Canada, Manitoba in particular. To name but a few more, there is the Boeing aircraft plant in Manitoba, the fresh water research institute at the university of Manitoba, built at a cost of some $8 million, the new federal building on Main Street and major renovations at Lower Fort Garry. Let me also point out that part of the Royal Canadian Mint was moved to Winnipeg, where all coins in circulation in Canada will be minted. These are certainly assets for western Canadians and we thank the minister for them. He made an all-out effort to show Canadians that no matter whether they support this government or not, they are not forgotten. The mint in Winnipeg will also be minting coins for many other countries.

[Translation]

In addition, Madam Speaker, I would like to put on record in Hansard the various subventions my constituency and particularly the great number of French Canadians who live in it, have received. I am referring to the subventions allocated to the official languages program in the constituency of Saint-Boniface, from 1969 to 1974.

Madam Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, at one o'clock, when the House took recess, I was just starting to enumerate the subsidies to language training in my riding of Saint-Boniface. As you know, the city of Saint-Boniface itself, and not the riding, has a population of 50,000, although the two other cities in my riding, Transcona and St. Vital have a population of respectively about 26,000 and 39,000. Saint-Boniface, has the most important group of French Canadians in the west, and that is where we got subsidies under the terms of the language program.

I should like to take this opportunity to put them on record. Very briefly, I will say that the SFM received, from 1969 to 1974, $562,000 for Social animation, $120,000 for support, $29,340 for publicity and $81,930 for support and activities. The Cercle Molière received $6,500 for publicity, and $99,300 for support and activities. As you know, Cercle Molière is well known through Canada. The choir "Les Intrépides" got $7,250 for broadcasting and $7,300 for its operations. The "100 Nons" received $5,950 for broadcasting and $35,050 for operations. The Saint-Boniface cultural Centre received $150,000 for support and administration for the period 1969 to 1973. This is a federal-provincial program. Furthermore, the cultural centre also received another $75,000 in 1973 for operations and activities.

Another organization sponsored by SFM, "Manicopains", received $2,000 for operations, "Mélo-Mani". $15,000 the "Gais Manitobains", $6,320 also for operations and the "Mini-franglais", $10,000 for operations and rapprochement which gives a total of $1,213,540 and this does not include grants under Local Initiatives Programs. And there are many other things I am not talking about.

I would like to add that the Pedagogical Institute at St. Boniface College, which is located in a new building, received, once again with the provincial government's help, $1 million in 1972-73 towards the construction and operation of this building and another $95,000 for operations, which makes up 25 per cent of the cost, the balance being paid by the provincial government. The library of this college also received another grant of $25,000.

Mr. Speaker, I am mentioning these things because I believe it is important to get them on the record not only for the organizations which received these amounts but also that other people in my riding might know what is happening.

I would also like to mention the fact that insofar as the Secretary of State is concerned, for the year 1974-75 ending March 31, franco-manitoban SFM expenses will total about $301,800. That means that the cultural centre will receive, for 1974-75, a share of $100,000, social animation, $107,000, French-English relationships, $21,800, youth, $18,000, broadcasting, $25,000, special projects, $10,000 and I am not mentioning other grants totalling $20,000.

I thought those things deserved to be mentioned along with the others.

I would also like to mention federal participation of up to 90 per cent towards construction of senior citizens' housing. As you are aware, these are arrangements between the federal government and the provincial government, under which the federal government always lends 90 per cent of the amounts required to build these houses. We have the same situation with other programs we set up with the province. The people who live in those buildings are inclined to believe that it is the provincial government that gives those things to them, and not the federal government. I think we must stress our participation in these programs and openly tell the aged that the federal government lends 90 per cent of the amounts, that it set up the program New Horizons for the Aged and that it deserves credit for that.

● (1410)

I submit that the federal government is not being given enough credit for programs resulting in the building of homes including those for senior citizens. The people of Canada ought to know that we, the federal government, through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation make available 90 per cent of the funds in this area. By far the greatest proportion of the cost of these homes is borne by the federal government through grants and other payments, and not by provincial governments. Of course, the federal government has provided substantially increased financial assistance for housing of all kinds, including low-cost housing, senior citizens' homes, and so on. For example, in one year the federal government provided $94 million for housing programs in Manitoba. These facts are well worth noting.

I see that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) is present. What I am about to mention I think will interest him. I am referring to an article, by Frances Russell, carried in the Winnipeg Free Press of November 18 last. The headline is, "Fired on from all sides". The article refers to the efforts of the Minister of National Defence to have Air Canada establish an overhaul base in Winnipeg. It speaks of Air Canada building its own $15 million hangar to be used for overhaul work of its own and other aircraft. The target was the creation of 800 jobs. I have spoken to the Minister of National Defence about this, and I will say that when he makes a promise he always fulfils it. I have discussed the matter with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and have been assured that this promise will be fulfilled. Actually, the Prime Minister made the statement on behalf of the Minister of National Defence. So I wish to reassure my constituents that this promise will be carried out and it will be of significant benefit to all Manitobans.

I now refer to my own bill, Bill C-139, which was presented in the previous parliament. The same proposal is now before this House but the number of the bill has been changed. I believe that members on all sides supported my previous bill and I hope they will wholeheartedly support my present proposal. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and his officials support my proposal. I believe it would have been carried if the election had not intervened. Of course, what is proposed can be carried out in many different ways. Although the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) established the Hall commission to look into various aspects of railway workers' pensions, and although that commission is doing a good job and I see nothing wrong with it, I believe its establishment was a holding tactic because it will be a long time before the commission makes its recommendations.

That is why I have brought forward my own proposal. The government may consider the advisability of implementing it, or of doing the same thing through order in council so that railroad workers will not remain orphans, as they now are, and will be given the same benefits as are accorded to employees of other Crown corporations such as Air Canada. The employees of other Crown corporations have available to them superior pensions. I believe railway workers and railroad pensioners should be given pension benefits at least as good as those given to employees of other government agencies. There should be parity of pensions. I believe my solution would not cost the government any more money than it is already supplying to the CNR. The time has come for all employees in the public service and in Crown corporations to be treated alike.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) is known for his courage in defending people of his constituency. The remarks he made today show that he has courage in defending the minister from Manitoba. That minister needs all the defence he can get because, when the chips are down, if he cannot fulfil what he has promised he must resign from the cabinet. I hope the hon. member for St. Boniface will be on his side when that fight takes place.

Ordinarily, budget speeches try to deal with subjects which the House should face. But the present speech does not face the facts of life; it does not really deal with international monetary affairs. The entire world, including Canada, is wondering whether western nations are not plunging headlong into another ten-year depression. One would expect the budget to tell us how the government plans to head off a depression in this country, but it does no such thing. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) does not seem to be aware that there are no models, no precedents to follow in the current situation. Domestic monetary and fiscal policies in Canada are still based on the concepts of the 1930s, on the concepts of Lord Keynes. Those concepts are obsolete. For example, we face shortages of internationally-traded commodities.

If we were doing our duty in this House, this debate would be centred on the necessity to develop models to grapple with the new situations which have arisen. This budget is, in a narrow sense, simply the old establishment bunch handing out a few goodies here and there. When one adds it all up, it means that you take $2 billion from the suckers—the taxpayers—because of growing inflation, and hand them back a quarter of it. Instead of dealing with the problem of inflation, particularly with regard to trade, we find our country aligning itself with resource-deficient nations of the world, especially those within GATT. We see them turning down all the efforts of the newly-developing nations to organize themselves and get a fair price for their products. We take the side of the fat-cats in a walled city handing out a few crumbs at the gates.

I could go on listing all the things a budget debate should include, but they would have to take second place to the real issue of this budget. The real issue is that this government is, unilaterally, changing the constitution of Canada. By unilateral action it is ignoring the efforts of many people over the past 20 years to find a way of bringing the constitution home and finding a way to amend it by consultation with all Canadians. The government is plunging ahead on a unilateral course that can only be described as a declaration of open war on the provinces of this country.

This is a federal state. This federal state is unique. There are not many federal states in the world and the one we have is unique because it seems to be working better than any other federal state. I do not intend to make a long analysis of the federal system of the United States, Malaysia, Australia or any other country that has the system. I am simply saying ours has worked reasonably well for 107 years. It is an example to the world that people of different regions and different ethnic backgrounds can get along together.

This situation is being challenged. The excuse for the challenge is that there is supposed to be a shortage of oil and gas in the world. When the parliament of 1972 met, on behalf of the official opposition and with the support of the NDP I proposed to the resource minister of this country that because the world shortage of certain resource commodities, particularly energy, offered Canada one of the greatest opportunities in its history, we should develop an industrial strategy that would bring industry here on a comparative advantage basis. I proposed that all parties should pull together and help to develop not only a national energy policy but a national resource policy, and from that an industrial strategy with all the nations of the world, as a result of which everybody would benefit.

I thought that offer was accepted. We were told to wait until July, when the government would bring out its two-volume report on energy. We were told, on that basis, that we could have consultations with industry, with the provinces and the various parties in parliament, and we would evolve such a policy. However, all that fell apart on September 4, 1973, with the panic actions of the government trying to convince Canadians that the Liberal Party was the party for the consumers. The only thing of substance they had to offer was a voluntary agreement to keep the price of oil at $4 a barrel. Later that month the government brought in the export tax. They said that half of the tax would go to the producing province and half to the federal government. In November they brought on the phony oil crisis. Here were we, a nation surplus in oil, being told we must tighten our belts in order to survive. The minister said we would be short 200,000 barrels a day. I said at that time it was a shocking revelation that would increase tensions in our federal system.

The minister was so desperate in trying to make himself the Grinch who stole Christmas that he even advised Canadians to sleep two in a bed and pull down the blinds. That is how scared he wanted to make the Canadian people. In my innocence, I thought we always slept two in a bed and always pulled down the blinds. That was a phony crisis.

What was the position of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition during this period? One, consultation with the owners of these resources so they would work in co-operation for the national good. Two, to give a cushion to consumers so they would not be harmed by the rapid rise in oil and gas prices. Three, to work on a program of staging price increases that would be fair to consumers and to producers, and in harmony with the facts of economic life. Since all this staging and cushioning would be carried out as a subsidy from producing provinces, we asked that there be a quid pro quo for the producing producer. We asked the government to accept the fact that the provinces are now subsidizing us at the rate of $3 billion a year, and we should see that they got something in return so they would not mind continuing the generosity.

All parties supported a one-price system, (a) to help individuals, and (b) to bring industry into this country because we can produce things more cheaply with our great reserves of energy. Finally, after a lot of pressure the government gave in: they held a conference of ministers in January and a conference of first ministers in March, 1974.

In this House all parties said, after the wild panic of the fall, that statesmanship had been restored to Canada. We congratulated everybody for being able, after consultation, to bring us together. However, within hours of that agreement the government introduced into this House the petroleum administration bill of last session, Bill C-18, which constituted a breach of the agreement that had been made. They broke their word to the ten governments within hours of having given it. That can be seen in the evidence given before the committee on energy, mines and resources.

In this parliament the government brought in a revised version of the petroleum administration bill: they included natural gas, which was not part of the agreement, and the oil sands, which was not part of the agreement. They broke another agreement made by the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald), and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when they assured industry that if they would put a billion dollars into the tar sands the government would not impose price controls on this resource. This bill breaks this agreement of the two ministers and the Prime Minister.

As I read this petroleum administration bill I see there is no staging formula as promised in the agreement, and no terminal date. The government wants a permanent situation. There is no quid pro quo to show we are asking two provinces to subsidize every Canadian to the extent of $3 billion a year. Above all, there was no consultation. The government said, in effect, "If you do not agree, we will enforce it; we will put in our own agreement."

The budget of May 6, the parent of this one, added the coup de grâce. It said in effect, "Not only are we breaking the agreement we make with you, but we are going to break the constitution; we are going to say that the property to the people in the provinces, provincial resources, is no longer protected by the British North America Act," which states that resources belong to the provinces, and that one government cannot tax another government. The federal government said, "We shall breach sections 109 and 125 of the B.N.A. Act and declare that provincial royalties on all the resources in a province are non-deductible." The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) went on to refine that doctrine. In the election campaign he said, and I paraphrase, "We accept the fact that a royalty is the constitutional property of the people of a province, being their share of ownership, but it is only constitutional if it is a little royalty. If the royalty becomes really big, it is not constitutional."

As one of my hon. friends is quick to observe, this is like saying that a female can be partially pregnant or a little pregnant. In fact, it is all or nothing. I suggest that the war on the province which started on May 6 is now the issue which must be resolved, not only by this parliament but by the legislatures of every province in Canada as well as by the people of Canada generally. The budget of November 18 will be known as "the war on the provinces budget." Certainly, there are a few olive branches in it to industry and to the provincial governments. The government said, in effect,: "We'll reduce our share of the profits by two points and the provinces should do likewise." If the provinces match pro rata the two points which the federal government drops, the tax will have been lessened by four points. So if the provincial government is taking 60 per cent of the profits of an industry, and the federal government takes 30 per cent, adding up to 90 per cent, then on this new olive branch theory we shall be asking industry to put up with 84 per cent.

Anyone with any knowledge of the industry knows that people who put up billions of dollars to develop these resources are unlikely to be able to operate on the basis of 84 per cent if they cannot operate when 90 per cent of their profits are being taken away from them. However, I do not want to become too involved in the details of the subject because it leads us away from the main issue. The main issue is this: the federal government is determined to establish control over provincial resources; it is determined to establish a price control system on a permanent basis; it is determined to control the supply of all resources from beginning to end. I am not talking about oil alone; I am talking about every resource, including coal, hydro, asbestos and all the minerals within a province. This is open war on the provinces. Just 107 years after the constitution was written, the federal government declares its intention to control the supply and price of provincial resources, and I refer to every aspect of provincial resources, including land.

The second thing which is obvious about the budget is that the government is amending the constitution unilaterally. All the phony conferences which have been held over the years, asking for opinions, are to be disregarded. My hon. friend, the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), who is rarely moved to strong words, called this treachery and deceit. I endorse the language he used. It is a planned conspiracy to change the constitution and to centralize the control of resources by bureaucrats here in Ottawa.

I have been as patient as I can hope to be with the hon. member for Rosedale who holds the energy, mines and resources portfolio. I know how difficult it is to learn all the details of this involved industry. I thought in the beginning, when I was watching him two years ago, that I was just dealing with an amateur. Then I realized that in spite of all the hard work he has done to learn all the gobbledygook—in fact, he reminds me of a computer; you push the button and get the answer—and despite all the programmed answers he has been giving, he has been blundering around, rushing this way and that way. I can only describe him by recalling a situation I encountered as a young lad. A man was walking along the street with his head away out. The farmer I worked for commented: "Here's my head; my heels are coming." In the case of the minister it is, "Here's my mouth; my brains are coming."

I do not intend to go into this matter in detail, but the Prime Minister as this parliament unfolds, will be known as the Bronfman boy. I will say no more than that. The Minister of Finance is no longer just the nice guy, regurgitating what has been fed to him; now he has demonstrated to us that he is like a willow tree that bends in the wind in order to stay in the cabinet. He knows enough about federal systems around the world to understand the need for constant consultation. When the powers of one jurisdiction conflict with those of another, or when they overlap, there must be consultation if the system is to survive. That is why I declare this budget to be a war on the provinces. It is out to destroy the constitution and to set up centralized power. The government is choosing the course of confrontation with the ten provinces rather than the traditional approach through consultation.

My mind goes back to the years of the government led by my right hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I remember the then minister of labour, Michael Starr, when putting together a winter works program which was clearly outside the jurisdiction of the federal parliament, saying to the municipalities, "This is how we will help you. If you want us to help you, first you must get permission from your province." No province refused the municipalities. In this way thousands of people were employed during those years of unemployment.

I can recall the same minister's work in the field of education, which is entirely outside the jurisdiction of this parliament. He went to the provincial ministers of education setting out details of the manner in which he was ready to co-operate if permission was obtained from their provinces, and we were the first government which really helped in the educational field. Take the roads to resources program: the federal government has nothing to do with building roads in the provinces, yet those roads were built with provincial consent. The ARDA program affected an area almost entirely within provincial jurisdiction, but every province accepted it. I remember the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), then minister of resources, setting up the machinery to bring an important consultative group into being; he was the minister who established the council of resource ministers, a technique for constant consultation.

I could go on and on, but I think I have made my point. All I can say is that the battle is joined. British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan will be fighting. Soon, Ontario and Quebec will join them. Hon. members have read the words of an ex-minister of the Crown, Mr. Kierans.Even that great centralizer, Mr. Lynch, believes in consultation now. I know the provinces will unite. They have to unite. Instead of being a confrontation between one big boy and one or two little boys, it will be a contest between one big boy and a lot of others. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have had the opportunity to make these comments. On another occasion I look forward to making some suggestions for dealing with this situation which I trust will be interesting to hon. members.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to take part in the budget debate, because until now very few speeches have dealt with the budget proper. I believe an attempt is made to divert attention by introducing the problem of federal-provincial relations on the resource issue. I believe the budget has been extremely well received, since it includes provision by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) for the transfer to the taxpayer, under various forms, of almost $800 million to help increase its purchasing power and allow him to face the current situation.

I would like to say a few words in this resource debate, because it is apparently suggested the federal government wants to take over resources. It is a fact that resources are under provincial jurisdiction, and we are fully aware of and in total agreement with that fact. Interprovincial and international trade however is the responsibility of the federal government. The federal government acted to fulfill its responsibility to make sure the development of resources benefit all Canadians. If anyone suggests the Minister of Finance and this government will not negotiate I would invite him to read the budget speech. The Minister of Finance made provision in his budget, following representations by provinces, for a partial withdrawal on the propositions put forward in April. But I hope the provinces will also understand their responsibilities. We agree that the oil industry, because of present difficulties, needs some extra liquidities at this time to keep on with its exploration work. We therefore hope the provinces will do as much as does the federal government to accommodate the industry, and this in my opinion will solve the problem. Actually, the province of Alberta wants to try to take the opportunity provided by the Minister of Finance who stepped back to give more cash flow to the oil industry. Alberta would like to take one more bite in revenues from—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Who closed the door?

[English]

Mr. Gillies: The federal government has no constitutional right to be there in the first place.

Mr. Chrétien: We have constitutional rights in interprovincial and international affairs: that is clear from the constitution. At the federal-provincial conference we reached agreement with the premiers of the ten provinces to supply oil across the border. It is clear that the industry should also make some contribution to the coffers of the national government. What is happening at the moment is that the provinces are trying to obtain big settlements for their economies and isolate themselves from the federal tax collector so that they do not share in the responsibility of running this country.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is a distortion.

Mr. Chrétien: If we, as the federal government, do not have the right to tax the resource industry, what industry do we have the right to tax? Tell me what is written in the constitution which says that the government shall tax one industry but not another?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You are taxing the royalties.

Mr. Chrétien: The royalties are royalties no more.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the minister, but I would remind hon. members that we are not in the proceedings of a committee of the whole.

[English]

We are not in committee of the whole, where we ask questions from one side of the Chamber to the other. The minister should be allowed to make his remarks without too much interference, and if time is available at the end, I am sure he will accept questions.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I had a speech all ready, dealing with expenditures and so on, but I am a little fed up when the story is put that way and we do not tell the other side of the story to the people of Canada. It is the duty of this government to make sure there is equality in this land. If we were to tax Quebec in this way, I would make exactly the same speech that I am making today. Members of parliament have the right to discuss government business, but they should also make sure that the wealth of this nation belongs to everyone. I should like the hon. member from Ontario to rise and tell other members from Ontario that for years and years they paid a high price for oil and gas in order to protect the market for Alberta. But who speaks of that now?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is another distortion.

Mr. Chrétien: I am very pleased to speak about this matter, but not as a Quebecker. I am speaking as a man. For four years the people of Kingston paid a lot of money for their oil in order to help Alberta develop its resources. Now, because the Arabs have increased their oil prices, these people would like to sock it to the people of Kingston. If the hon. lady does not want to defend the people of Kingston, I will defend them. This is why we have confederation. When times are tough in some parts of Canada, it is the responsibility of other parts of Canada to help. I resent this, and I would have the same resentment if Quebec had done the same thing. I should like Quebec and New Brunswick to be in the fortunate position of giving money to Saskatchewan or Alberta because of unforeseen new wealth.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You do not know anything about the oil industry.

Mr. Chrétien: I know everyone regards me as an easterner, but my grandparents on my mother's side lived in Alberta and I know that when times were tough for them they were very happy to have some help from the federal government in order to survive. I know that, not because I was told but because it is part of our family history. This is why we have confederation. I do not like hon. members not looking at both sides of the argument.

We see, in Canada, socialists in Saskatchewan trying to set up Crown corporations to isolate the resource industry from federal taxation. I do not accept that kind of socialism which does not spread wealth across the land. When hon. members rise in the House and talk about the poor, they should consider this particular aspect and then tell the government of Saskatchewan not to use this kind of scheme to hide profitable provincial industries from the tax collector of Canada.

I was not prepared to speak about this topic, Mr. Speaker, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is well able to defend himself. He made a very good speech, and I am glad to see him back in the House. I am sure the government of Alberta will start to think things over. We have moved in the right direction. There were many meetings between the two levels of government, and the budget is a move in the right direction. In the tax field we have moved back to make some money available to industry; and if the government of Alberta wants to find the liquidity needed for industry in the province to expand, they should do likewise.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You took that away in May; don't forget that.

Mr. Chrétien: That is how I see the problem, and I always like to speak my mind. That is why I think I should give hon. members a break, because apparently when I speak my mind they get excited. I will take my text and just read it in the traditional way. I have always felt that this issue should not be only one-sided, and I hope members will understand that.

● (1450)

The last time I spoke at length about government expenditures was when the House was in committee of the whole considering the first supplementary estimates for this year. At that time I tried, in the briefest possible terms, to explain the content of government expenditures as they had developed and as reflected in the estimates presented to the House up to that time. That very day I was given some encouragement to believe that an understanding about the nature of government expenditures had begun to penetrate the understanding of a number of members opposite because the comments made were, in the main, constructive and sensible. Unfortunately, the comments of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) were an exception. He proceeded to classify the total budget expenditure indiscriminately as a rip-off and spoke of expenditures as being out of control, playing again the same old theme he has played on so many occasions over the years.

However, my message must have done some good because I note that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), in his remarks on the budget earlier this week, generally spared us the usual expressions of horror about government expenditures. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), when he followed and spoke on behalf of his party, was similarly restrained. I am not in the least accepting what they said about the subjects they raised, but at least we heard no easy generalizations about waste, extravagance and about cutting expenditures. Therefore, I am encouraged that the attempts I have made, and those of my predecessor in this ministry, to inform our colleagues opposite about the composition of government expenditures are beginning to be successful.

This morning I tabled a second set of supplementary estimates for the year. I want now to anticipate some of the questions that may arise, and to place the estimates figures in clear relationship with the figures used by the Minister of Finance in his budget. This second set of supplementary estimates is very large—$1,749 million. They are larger than any previous supplementaries for one circumstances which also dominated the budget speech: this circumstance is, of course, inflation.

Almost three-quarters of the supplementaries, that is $1,200 million, are related in some way to inflationary pressures either in the way of new costs created by inflation or in the way of increased expenditures the government has decided upon to soften the impact of inflation for some groups of Canadians. These latter expenditures should be recognized as a continuation of the government's well established policy of selective countermeasures, where we see they are most called for, to deflect the full brunt of the very real distress that rapidly increasing prices can cause.

Let me give three or four examples. The government has doubled the provisions made for subsidies on manufacturing milk and cream from the $125 million in the main estimates. These supplementaries add another $125 million. In the same item in the estimates, which takes the form of a payment into the agricultural stabilization account, there is also included the money needed for the premium quality beef program which operated until August, 1974, and has now been replaced by a price stabilization program. There are $202 million in additional payments to the provinces under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act attributable to increased tax yields in certain provinces, which are in turn attributable in great part to the effects of inflation.

There is an item of $118 million to compensate the railways for their having frozen the level of freight rates throughout this year. The additional contributions to the provinces under shared-cost programs affecting hospital insurance and university education total $125 million because hospitals and universities have higher costs to meet. We have no control over those costs; they just send us the bill.

I wonder, in passing, if hon. members opposite would stop their tirade about federal-provincial relations long enough to take note of the fact that much of the federal government's expenditure at this time, and at any time, is made up of payments to the provinces. They should stop to see how well this fact squares with their charges of centralization and betrayal. One might expect even an opposition at the federal level to adopt a more responsible line.

Another portion of the supplementaries is related to economic development and supply, such as $18 million more in capital subsidies for the construction of commercial and fishing vessels and $20 million for a loan toward the completion of the heavy water plant at Glace Bay. That is the plant started by the Leader of the Opposition when he was premier of the province, and he forgets that he put some salt in the water rather than using clear water. There was also $50 million in loans to the CNR, and $19 million for hydro projects in the north by the Northern Canada Power Commission. We have, as well, additional social measures including $30 million for Indian economic development and other needs of our Indian and Innuit population, and about $90 million related to the Local Initiatives Program for this and the past season.

[Translation]

Up till now, Mr. Speaker, government estimates total $24,516 million. In view of the usual difference in expenditures—indeed, experience has shown that about 2 per cent of all the credits are not used—I expect that real expenditures as concerns estimates submitted up till now will total about $23.9 billion.

The Minister of Finance set the total expenses to be incurred during this fiscal year at $24,850 million. Excluding serious unanticipated requirements, this means that we are once again expecting to submit supplementary estimates for expenditures of approximately $900 million. The largest item in these estimates will apply to oil import compensations which would be paid under the act yet to be passed by Parliament.

The Minister of Finance included a few tables in his speech of last Monday. One of these tables shows the budget expenditures for 1973-74, 1974-75 and 1975-76, that is the real expenditures for the first year, and of course expected expenditures for the other two. The figures and increased percentage from one year to the next are as follows: in 1973-74, budget expenditures amounted to $20,040 million, or an increase of 24.3 per cent over the previous year, increase which is mostly due to the new family allowances. In 1974-75, expected budget expenditures amount to $24,850 million, or an increase of 24 per cent over 1973-74. In 1975-76, Mr. Speaker, budget expenditures are expected to be $28,750 million, which means an increase of about 15 per cent over 1974-75.

In this respect, it is most important to understand that the increase is largely due to inflation and to one of the inflation related measures. I am talking about compensations for oil imports. This item alone will increase by $1 billion the expenditures of the current fiscal year over those of last year. This sum subtracted, there has been an increase of only 19 per cent between the real expenditures for 1973-74 and estimates for 1974-75.

I do not intend to keep at this at length, even though I have other notes. I just want to say in concluding that next year, we want to reduce new expenditure to a minimum. Of course, the expenditure will rise because 56 per cent of the budget is related to outlays which leave us no choice at all, such as the automatic indexation of old age security and family allowances, or equalization payments over which we have no control.

I can assure hon. members we are determined to contain the level of expenditure next year, as much as it will be possible so as not to further feed inflation and create a situation whereby government expenditures could cause additional problems for Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad I had this opportunity of making those few comments. I have not finished my speech because I should have liked to give an ad lib outline of my views on federal-provincial relations and the problem of provinces which make exaggerated claims on the new wealth discovered within their boundaries.

[English]

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in considering the budget presented in the House last Monday a time honoured phrase keeps coming to mind, caveat emptor. I say so, Mr. Speaker, for upon cursory examination the budget seems to be a rather impressive piece of work. It looks good. And, when presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), with his customary style and aplomb, it sounds good. There is no doubt that it contains some worthwhile measures, but any member of parliament who has watched how this government operates cannot help but react with some concern, and caution the Canadian taxpayer to beware before buying without reservation the minister's fourth attempt at a budget.

Like the minister, I do not claim to be an economist and, like the minister, my instinctive reaction is to think of the constituents whom I am honoured to represent and to ask how this budget will affect the labourers of east Hamilton, the merchants in Ancaster, and the young couple in Stoney Creek who dream of owning their own home.

There seems little point in asking how this document will affect the farmers in Glanbrook and other parts of my riding because in this budget they seem to have been forgotten, left out in the Ottawa cold.

At the same time I share with other members of the House a responsibility to consider the impact the budget will have on Canadians everywhere, particularly upon Canadians who, like the people of Hamilton-Wentworth, still subscribe to the belief upon which this nation was founded and has prospered, who still believe that a man should get what he works for and that he should work for what he gets.

In considering this budget we must recognize that the foundations of our society have been shaken by a crippling wave of inflation. Indeed, we are now being made aware of the very real possibility of a serious recession. One might accept the design of this expansionary budget to prevent already high levels of unemployment from reaching disastrous proportions. However, if the government lays claim to virtues in combating unemployment, it must also accept the blame for contributing to it.

Thousands of jobs go begging in Hamilton today, including high paying jobs at the steel companies. Among the reasons are government policies which discourage incentive and make it more inviting for some simply not to work. The cost to Canadians of the Unemployment Insurance Commission remains at over $2 billion, yet this government still refuses to have an independent inquiry to clear up the mess and clear away the waste. One can only conclude that the government is indifferent to such waste, or it is afraid of an inquiry.

It would appear that the minister continues to embrace the outdated tradeoff between unemployment and inflation. Surely this simplistic concept has been discredited, and it is no longer reasonable to ask Canadians to accept higher and higher rates of inflation in another attempt by the minister to keep unemployment at levels the government considers tolerable.

In an economy as complex as ours it becomes imperative that the twin scourges of unemployment and inflation be attacked jointly and decisively. Anything less is an admission of the inability of the government to cope with the problems it was given a mandate to solve.

[Mr. O'Sullivan.]

We of the Progressive Conservative Party have long called for cuts in the tax bills of Canadians, made possible chiefly through a re-alignment of federal spending priorities and elimination of government waste. And so, while we welcome the minister's announcement of a cut, however small, in personal income tax, we view with alarm the fact that the federal government's budget continues to increase at alarming rates and itself feeds inflation.

Canadians are becoming even more concerned at the tremendous size and expense of government without experiencing any commensurate tangible benefits. In welcoming the small cut in taxes the Canadian taxpayer should not lose sight of the fact that what he is receiving is not a gift but just a bit more of the money he worked so hard to earn.

It is analagous to the Minister of Finance taking a $10 bill which has fallen from someone's pocket, then turning around and giving back $2—apparently out of the goodness of his heart. The poor luck fellow would think he had just met a very kind and generous man, until he discovered that he was missing his $10. Then he would realize he had just met Canada's finance minister.

Clearly these tax cuts could have been more meaningful if only the government would practice in its own spending the kind of restraint it asks of workers in setting wage demands, and of companies in setting their prices. One need only go through the spending estimates of almost every government department to find examples of duplication and waste. While there have been some very worthwhile projects, we still hear examples of thousands of tax dollars going to highly questionable LIP and OFY projects. One must not forget the Company of Young Canadians, even though the government would like to, Mr. Speaker. Recently we learned that External Affairs granted over $300,000 to a terrorist group in Africa. One wonders, in view of Canada's shameful abstention at the United Nations, whether similar aid will soon be granted to the murderous Palestinian Liberation Organization.

The government could also be more responsible in deciding where money should be spent. We recently heard the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) admit that our armed forces can no longer afford to patrol Canada's north to watch for Soviet incursion into our territory. The government continually downgrades our involvement in NATO, using budgetary restraints as an excuse. Canadians would not begrudge the careful use of their tax dollars to ensure the morale of our armed forces, to protect Canada's sovereignty, and to honour our commitments to international peace and freedom.

In this debate there has been much discussion about Canada's resources and Canada's future. I think we would all agree that, in terms of her future, Canada's greatest resource is the potential of young Canadians. If that resource is to be developed fully we must offer all young Canadians, regardless of their financial background, equality of opportunity to acquire an education and useful skills.

Although education falls within provincial jurisdiction, the federal government long ago recognized the need for it to assist in this important field. Since costs of vocational schools, colleges and universities are increasing tremendously I would simply like to reiterate the words of another hon. member who sits in this chamber, and who said:

> I hope that some day we will move toward a gradual reduction and an eventual abolition of student fees at all levels . . . I am not suggesting that we should subsidize the small part of the population that may have the talent or initiative to obtain a university education. I hope that in the whole realm of technical and vocational education, as well as university education, we would move gradually toward the elimination of student fees.

I endorse those words which appear on pages 6616 and 6617 of Hansard for June 20, 1966, and were spoken by the then member for St. Lawrence-St. George. Today he sits in this House as the member for Ottawa-Carleton, and on the treasury benches as the Minister of Finance. Now that he is in a position to do so, I hope he will act upon his own worthwhile suggestion.

Mr. Gillies: Don't count on it!

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Speaker, an area in which the minister has taken some positive action is with regard to the housing crisis. For several years my party has called for the elimination of the 11 per cent federal tax on building materials. The minister took a step in the right direction by reducing this tax, but as the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) pointed out, the collection of a 5 per cent tax still requires as big a bureaucracy.

Additional bureaucrats will be required to administer the grants of $500 to each purchaser of a new home, so long as it is "moderately priced". In setting its standards of what constitutes moderate pricing, I would hope that the government will bear in mind the astronomical increases in housing costs in recent years, especially in southern Ontario, and I would suggest that the limit be set just slightly below the going rates to encourage developers to bring down the prices of their units to the acceptable level. Ultimately, however, I think we have to forgo such patchwork measures in favour of a wholesale review of housing financing.

As pointed out by Dr. James Johnston, an economist and publisher of the Cobourg Sentinel-Star, it is simply no longer fair to ask potential homeowners to compete for loanable funds from the same sources as giant corporations, which can meet high interest rates and even charge them against taxes. In finding a way truly to assist Canadian families in housing, we can start on the road to the desirable situation of having double income families by choice and not out of sheer economic necessity.

To this point, Mr. Speaker, my remarks have dealt with a few of the technical aspects of government economic policy. It has become a tradition to look upon a budget as some kind of a periodic report of revenue and expenditure of government. I strongly feel it should go beyond that and truly be a statement of social purpose as well.

That is why the highlight of this budget, for me, was the recognition by the Minister of Finance of Canada's obligation to do everything possible to combat the world food crisis. My concerns about this terrible and continuing tragedy were outlined when I spoke earlier this week in the debate on Bill C-10. So, at this time I simply wish to commend the minister, in a very sincere and non-partisan way, for reflecting the feelings of all of us and for undertaking a commitment to our brothers and sisters in mankind who look to us for help.

May that statement by the minister also start a tradition of making the budget a commentary on the social, as well as the financial policies of a government. We cannot separate productivity from the question of our qualify of life. We should not talk of consumption without speaking of conservation. We must not set out to create jobs without first deciding conditions of work.

We must recognize that the facts and figures side of a budget is not all that an economy is, or all that it should be. And one must remember that the gross national product measures neither our wisdom nor our courage, neither our integrity nor our compassion. So, Mr. Speaker, a budget should say more, not just about our national productivity but also about our national spirit.

I commend the Minister of Finance for the positive efforts contained in his budget. I hope he will accept my comments in the spirit with which they are offered, for although we have our differences about some of the budget provisions and other government policies, I believe he is doing his best at a most difficult time. For the sake of the people we all seek to serve, I wish him well.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Madam Speaker, if I had the time I should like to discuss several aspects of this budget, which I consider is designed to help those who have too little by giving tax concessions to those who have too much.

Since I only have a limited time, however, I propose to devote myself primarily to that portion of the budget which deals with resource taxation, the repercussions of which could cause great disunity in this country. I discuss this question as one who, throughout his political life, has been a firm advocate of a strong federal government. I would go further. The New Democratic Party has consistently supported the concept of a strong federal government clothed with the power necessary to deal effectively with social and economic problems. For instance, the New Democratic Party advocated and supported a two price system for oil, and a single price across Canada, in order to protect the Canadian people against the 400 per cent increase in international oil prices.

The New Democratic Party has supported Bill C-32 which is still before the committee of the whole of this House and which will become the Petroleum Administration Act. If this bill is passed it will provide that, in the event negotiations are not successful with the provinces, the government may establish a price in Canada for all oil and gas entering into interprovincial and international trade. On November 13 and 14 I argued in this House that the federal government must have that power if we are going to deal with the problem of energy supplies in this country. I must say, however, that the budget may cause us to re-examine our position if the federal government intends to use its powers in the ruthless manner which it is now displaying.

Canada needs a strong federal government in order to cope with the many problems of this country, and nowhere is this more necessary than in the field of energy where we are faced with a crisis in the years immediately ahead.

But we contend that the powers granted to the federal government should not be used to trample upon the legitimate rights of provincial governments, nor should those governments be tricked into agreements which are later repudiated.

● (1520)

I think the provincial governments acted in a statesmanlike manner at the First Ministers Conference which was held in Ottawa on March 27 last. On March 28 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) paid tribute to the provincial premiers in the following terms, as recorded at page 933 of Hansard. He said that we had reached:

> ... An agreement ... which stands as a tribute to the vitality of our Canadian community ... yesterday was a great day for federalism.

The Prime Minister went on to say, as recorded at page 934 of Hansard:

> The national oil agreement I have just described would surely not have been possible without the good will and deep commitment to Canada of the premiers of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

I submit, Madam Speaker, that these tributes were well deserved.

What did the oil and gas producing provinces agree to do? They agreed to accept a price of $6.50 per barrel, when the Chicago price at that time was between $10 and $11 per barrel, and now it is much higher. Every barrel of oil sold in Alberta and Saskatchewan is being sold for $5 less than could be secured on the Chicago market, plus transportation. In other words, the provinces gave up over $2 billion. I am one who supported what they did. Considering the type of national emergency we faced then and which we still face, a price must be set to protect the Canadian people from exorbitant international oil prices. The provincial premiers agreed to this.

Further, they agreed to forgo the 50 per cent share of revenue from the export tax which they had received up until then. On the basis of the production of 1,200,000 barrels a day during the last 12 months, one can say that Alberta and Saskatchewan gave up some $800 million or $900 million from this source. Those were great concessions, and the Prime Minister was right in saying they were made possible only with the good will and deep commitment of the provincial governments concerned.

In return the Prime Minister committed the federal government first, to a just and reasonable price for this depleting resource; second, to assist the provinces in developing new oil resources; and, third, to help those provinces ensure alternative economic development. In order to carry out the commitment to assist the provinces in developing new oil resources the Prime Minister agreed, and so reported to this House, that the federal government would allow the oil producing provinces to set up capital funds for resource development, into which they could put their additional oil revenues, and that those funds would not be taken into consideration in determining equalization payments.

Let me put the Prime Minister's words on record. They are crystal clear. He said, as recorded at page 934 of Hansard for March 28:

> The House may wish to note that Saskatchewan intends to place most of its added oil revenues in a capital fund for energy development; Alberta proposes to handle a high proportion of its added revenues in the same manner ...
> While the revenues taken into those capital funds would not be subject to equalization, the federal government will, of course, pay equalization respecting any oil revenues that go into general funds.

That was the commitment. Nobody expected that revenues which went into the general account would not be taken into consideration in determining equalization payments. But there was the clear understanding that if a province chose to set up a contingency fund, a depreciation account to enable it to replace a resource which is depleting far more rapidly than most people realize, that fund would not be taken into account when the equalization formula is computed.

What happened, Madam Speaker? In the budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) says that one third of the additional oil revenues of those two provinces combined will be considered as revenues for equalization purposes. He is to do this by estimating the total amount which will be going into general revenue. But that is not in accordance with what the Prime Minister said on March 28, as I have quoted. He said that Saskatchewan proposes to put most of its revenue into the capital account. There was no mention then of lumping both provinces together, and there was no mention of roughly one third of the total amount which comes from additional oil revenue going into general revenue because Alberta proposes to put a larger amount into general revenue. Actually, Saskatchewan has carried out its part of the understanding to the letter. It has placed all its additional oil revenue, every nickel, into a capital account for resource development, because it needs millions of dollars if it is to develop heavy oil in the Cold Lake district.

The government is breaking its commitment. It is saying to Saskatchewan, "You will be lumped together with Alberta. We estimate that roughly one third of the total additional oil revenue of both provinces is going to general revenue and therefore you will lose, under the equalization formula, $40 million a year."

I submit that either the Prime Minister misled the provinces and the House when he reported to us on March 28, or the Minister of Finance has overruled the Prime Minister. The heir apparent is now telling the king what to do. This reminds me of what Shakespeare said:

> Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed,
> That he is grown so great?

The provinces justifiably feel they have been tricked and betrayed. I submit, Madam Speaker, that this will not encourage federal-provincial cooperation. The west will feel that it is paying a heavy price for the majority it enabled the Liberal government to acquire in the last election.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The west does not provide the government's majority.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): But it sent back enough members to enable the government to have its majority. The old arrogance is back. We can live with that. But welching on a solemn commitment is something which the Canadian people, including many Liberal supporters, will not condone.

Further, the government has shown its appreciation to the provincial governments for their cooperation by declaring that oil, gas and mineral royalties will not be deductible for income tax purposes by the producers of these commodities. For the first time in the history of Canada the federal government has said that royalties paid to a provincial government shall no longer be deductible for income tax purposes. This is utterly absurd. Why, Madam Speaker? First, royalties paid on freehold, say by the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Hudson's Bay Company, will be deductible, but royalties paid to a provincial government will not. I know of Canadian companies which own properties in other countries. The royalties they pay to foreign governments will be deductible, but royalties paid to a provincial government in Canada will not be, Madam Speaker.

If Imperial Oil Company spends $10 million in an advertising campaign to increase the consumption of gasoline, which we ought to be conserving, it can deduct that. However, if it pays $10 million in royalties to the oil producing provinces, that is not deductible. The argument made by the Minister of Finance, and made again this afternoon by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien), is that the government wants to share its resource revenues with all the people of Canada.

May I first point out that the federal government has other ways of taxing oil and gas companies. It could, if it wanted, impose an excess profits tax. On the contrary, it has reduced the tax rate and exempted the oil and gas companies from the 10 per cent surcharge. It could reduce the depreciation and depletion allowances. Instead, it has given them 100 per cent write-off for exploration and 30 per cent for development.

The sharing of oil revenues in all parts of Canada and treating everybody equally, is something which ought to be examined. I noticed a press release issued by Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan the day before yesterday. May I quote a small part of it:

> If Saskatchewan levies a royalty of $1 a barrel on Imperial Oil, we receive $1. However, for every $1 of provincial income tax paid by Imperial Oil, Saskatchewan's share is less than four cents. Imperial Oil is a large company, operating across Canada, and its provincial taxes are divided among the provinces according to a formula based on its wages and sales in each province—not its oil production.
> So, for every dollar of provincial tax paid by Imperial Oil, Ontario gets about 30 cents, even British Columbia gets more than six cents. And Saskatchewan gets less than four cents.

When the government talks about everybody sharing equally in the taxes from the resource industry, it seems that the tax structure which the government has built should be subject to re-examination. Moreover, Madam Speaker, are these royalties which are declared non-deductible on non-renewable resources to apply eventually to renewable resources? On November 20 I asked the Minister of Finance a question with regard to royalties and stumpage duties. As recorded at page 1488 of Hansard, the minister answered in part:

> If, of course, stumpage dues were to be converted from a flat, classical type of royalty payment into a disguised tax, we would need to look at that as well.

When is a royalty not a royalty? Answer: when the Minister of Finance says it is not a royalty. The Minister of Finance does not stop there in his bull in the china shop display of how not to get along with the provincial governments. In motion No. 9 of the ways and means resolutions we have a measure which will have the effect of either dismantling every provincial resource marketing agency or bankrupting the oil and gas companies operating in the provinces. British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan all have natural gas marketing agencies. Alberta has one handling methane and propane. The province of Saskatchewan has one handling petroleum. Let me give an example.

In the province of Saskatchewan, starting back 20 years ago, Saskatchewan Power Corporation was given authority not only to handle the production and distribution of electrical power, but also the transmission and retailing of natural gas. It buys gas from a producer at 16 cents per thousand cubic feet. It is sold to the people of Saskatchewan at no profit, as close to cost as possible.

Under the provisions of the No. 9 ways and means motion the government will have the right to say that the fair market value of that gas is not 16 cents, but 60 cents. The gas producing company will be required to pay its tax on the basis of having received 60 cents, or whatever other figure the government decides is fair market value, and not on the amount which it actually receives. In other words, what the Minister of Finance is seeking to do is to say that a provincial government cannot use a Crown corporation or marketing agency to give the people of that province the benefit of their resources at the lowest possible price. That is surely an infringement on the right of the provincial government.

The other day the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) said that this measure could force the provincial governments into nationalizing some of their industries. The NDP would certainly welcome that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): However, the Minister of Finance has already prepared a tactic to deal with that situation. Last Monday night at a press conference he said, and I quote:

> Any province for its own ideological reasons that seeks to use this budget to nationalize industry and thereby capture revenues for themselves should think about it carefully, because then the federal Government will have to consider taxing Crown corporations.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The time allotted to the hon. member has expired.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): If I could have two minutes, Madam Speaker, I could finish this point.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance is saying that if a provincial government, with the consent and support of the citizens of that province, wants to set up a Crown corporation so that the benefits of developing its resources will go to the people rather than to the private sector, then the Minister of Finance and the federal government will, if they think it right, tax that Crown corporation. Does the minister propose to tax Ontario Hydro, Quebec Hydro and the government telephone companies of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta? These are the things that come to the fore.

In conclusion there is to be a meeting of the Minister of Finance and the provincial treasurers on December 9 and 10. I suggest to the government that this House not deal with Bill C-32, and with the bills arising out of the ways and means resolutions, until that meeting has taken place. Until the federal government and the provincial governments have had a chance to discuss this, and until the Minister of Finance has had an opportunity to be informed as to what the effects of this budget will be, we ought not to be asked to deal with that legislation. This is a vital matter.

This Liberal government, which for decades has paraded itself as being the party that can bring national unity to our country, is taking steps at the present time that will cause more disunity than I have seen since coming to this House some 39 years ago.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to be taking part in this debate. It is a particular privilege to follow the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) who, as he said, has 39 years experience in this House as well as in the parliament of Saskatchewan. His contribution not only to Saskatchewan but to this country is well known to all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McIsaac: It is with a great deal of pride and humility that I make my first formal contribution to this debate. I wish to take advantage of the latitude normally accorded in the budget debate to discuss some of the aspirations, feelings and concerns of the people of my constituency, Battleford-Kindersley. I want to discuss some of their areas of concern and tell hon. members something about the nature of my constituency.

● (1540)

It is a large area in total acreage, primarily agricultural, and varying from good grain land in the southern part to grain land, grass land and excellent cattle country in the northern part of the constituency. Surprisingly enough, over half of my constituents live not on the farms but in urban centres such as North Battleford, and Battleford where 15,000 people live, Battleford, the City of Lloydminster and some of the best towns in the west, like Unity, Rosetown, Kindersley, Wilkie, Kerrobert and Macklin.

During the course of the July 8 election campaign, along with my opponents and, I am sure, most other members on both sides of this chamber, I knocked on hundreds of doors and spoke with hundreds of people. I have been active in campaigns before, Madam Speaker, but this one was different. I want to tell you in what way it was different. First, regardless of their previous voting habits, people in my part of Saskatchewan did not want an election. They saw no need to be going into an election campaign. They had just come through a tough, long winter and it had been a wet, late spring; farm work was weeks behind. To a large extent they blamed members of the New Democratic Party, and to a lesser degree members of the Conservative Party for bringing on an election.

I would point out, though, that while they did not want an election, people were happy to speak to me as a candidate—I am sure this applied to any other candidate who knocked on their doors. I have never had a better personal response regardless of how people voted in the past. I make this point in order to demonstrate the genuine interest and concern with regard to federal issues of Canadians in my province.

They are concerned about agricultural programs and policies which may, perhaps, affect them more directly than others. They are concerned about industrial development in Saskatchewan. They are concerned about such matters as local processing of agricultural products instead of this work being done at either end of the country or somewhere in between. They are concerned about the rising cost of farming, the rising costs of doing business generally, and they are concerned about the difficulty of getting manpower, whether to help on the farm or to help in the operation of a small service station. They are annoyed to think that some individuals can, and do, quit their jobs and draw unemployment insurance benefits while farmers and small business operators work double shifts to keep their operations going.

Saskatchewan people believe in working hard. They are not enthused with programs and policies which result in people being able to get along adequately by working only when they wish, or by working very little. Like most other Canadians my constituents believe that governments, both federal and provincial, are spending too much money. Mind you, at the same time when it comes to any cutbacks they believe, as do most Canadians, that such cuts should be made somewhere else. But inflation was and continues to be the cause of deep concern to my constituents.

The phrase "western alienation" has been bandied about in western Canada, in Saskatchewan and, indeed, in this chamber during recent years. The cause of western alienation is not easy to define. Indeed the definition of the phrase varies depending on the person to whom one is speaking. It means different things to different people. In some ways it is the east versus the west theme which we have been hearing for years. Ottawa is a long way from Battleford, Kindersley and Meadow Lake, and those places are further still from Montreal and Quebec City. This in itself is part of the problem—the geography of Canada itself. I mention these concerns felt by my constituents, I mention the reactions of voters in the campaign, and I mention this feeling of western alienation in order to give some picture of the thinking of my constituents before I discuss the resource taxation measures proposed in the budget.

This week we are hearing loud screams of agony from Mr. Blakeney, leader of the NDP government in Saskatchewan. On Wednesday we heard the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) criticize the budget in this House on the ground that it threatens confederation. Well, I have an oil industry in my constituency. There is a very considerable potash industry in Saskatchewan. Though there are no potash mines in Battleford-Kindersley, the first mine to be sunk in Saskatchewan was sunk outside Unity; it never reached the potash but the know-how gained in the course of that operation led to the success of half a dozen other mines in the province. So resources and resource taxation are important to me and to my constituents.

I believe the provinces have every right to royalties from the resource industries. On the other hand I disagree with the concept now being advanced by provinces such as Alberta and Saskatchewan under which the term "royalty" includes not only rental rates in respect of resources but every cent of the profits of resource industries. The hon. member who spoke before me referred to Saskatchewan and the stand it had taken.

Let us consider the attitude adopted by Mr. Blakeney and the NDP government of Saskatchewan. What have they done to encourage resource development in the province? Last year they introduced Bill 42 in the Saskatchewan legislature, a measure which enables the provincial government to take 100 per cent of the selling price of a barrel of oil over and above the figure of $3.60, I think it was.

Mr. Broadbent: Hear, hear!

Mr. McIsaac: The NDP members opposite applaud.

Mr. Broadbent: Additional profit.

Mr. McIsaac: There were other measures passed which amounted to complete confiscation of the mineral rights of the province.

Mr. Broadbent: Rubbish!

Mr. McIsaac: It is not rubbish. If the temporary leader of the NDP would go to Saskatchewan he would find out for himself. That Bill No. 42 effectively killed any further development of oil, gas or potash resources in Saskatchewan. Here is the proof. In January, 1974, 17 permits were issued to drill oil wells in Saskatchewan. A year earlier, in January, 1973, 86 permits were issued. Bill 42 killed exploration in Saskatchewan long before the budget of May 6, and even longer before the budget of November 18. The NDP government in Saskatchewan made similar moves affecting the forest industry and the potash industry. The potash industry is the latest to be affected.

The most recent action taken by the provincial government effectively ended any possible hope of companies getting other than a nominal return, as decided by the NDP government, on their investment. New taxes of $87 million are projected for 1975.

But Mr. Blakeney says he still wants the 46 per cent of the money he is now spending that comes from Ottawa. Keep that coming—he wants that too. Of the $1 billion that the province budgeted for last year, over $400,000 came direct from the federal treasury. Mr. Blakeney says "Don't touch that. We still like those large equalization grants". Incidentally, in the last number of years, through federal-provincial negotiations and conferences, the equalization grant payable to Saskatchewan has grown from about $10 million in 1968 to almost $150 million last year, due to revisions of the formula and developments arising from these conferences. They still demand their share of medicare and education grants, and they still take the additional federal money added to equalization a couple of years ago for school board spending in the province of Saskatchewan and seven other provinces.

So I ask hon. members opposite who have been crying about this budget threatening confederation, who is threatening the resource industry? Who is being greedy and taking high handed actions which are killing further exploration and development? I cannot accuse the province of Alberta entirely because they did not take 100 per cent of the profit, only 65 per cent. But who changed the rules in resource industry taxation? Who made the first move? Not this government.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You had to throw the second stone, did you?

Mr. McIsaac: Who is threatening confederation? Who is bleeding the resource industries dry in the province of Saskatchewan? Again I say it is not the federal government.

I am not happy with the situation in which the resource industries find themselves—far from it, Madam Speaker. I have communities like Lloydminster, Coleville and Kindersley that are dependent upon a healthy oil industry. Neither am I happy with the combination of moves by both the federal and provincial governments which are resulting in shutdowns of a number of wells in that particular area. I have made representations to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) to seek a better break on the export tax on Lloydminster heavy crude, which is not exactly a choice grade of crude, and I hope that this particular issue can be resolved so that oil continues to be in production and jobs in the industry in my part of the country are filled.

I may say also, Madam Speaker, that there is a definite feeling in western Canada, and certainly in my part of Saskatchewan, that the western provinces can stand some increases in revenue for the next one or two years or so, in short, some "catch-up" time if you like, to make up for some of the slack years of the past. Therefore, I urge the federal ministers responsible for energy, mines and resources and finance to keep this thought in mind as they deal with the rapidly changing issues of energy and resources today.

I spoke earlier of some of the feelings of my constituents. They want their fair share of the good things of this country, and they do not want more than their fair share. But they consider a fair share to be something more than they have been getting during the first 100 odd years of confederation. Above all, I want to say they are still Canadians first and foremost. They want one strong Canada, not ten strong states, with a weak central government.

In this respect I regret very much the narrow tone of the remarks made yesterday in this debate by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk). I think any member opposite who speaks as he did is doing his province and his country a disservice in this regard. He contributes not to Canadian unity and understanding, but instead to disunity and misunderstanding. I think there is plenty of room for honest differences of political opinion between provinces and parties, but these need not result in continuing this divisive approach of the Tories and the parochial approach of the NDP.

I think the budget represents a fair compromise by the federal government on the proposals on resource revenue put forward on May 6—the tax abatement, the 100 per cent write-off for exploration costs—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That was not in the May budget.

Mr. McIsaac: No, it was not, and that is what I am saying. This present budget is an improvement. The next move is up to the provinces. How far will the provinces go in pushing their demands, even at the expense of changing confederation? Which industries are next? I suspect that the NDP government of Saskatchewan will move in and take over windfall profits of farmers next. That would be a very logical move for that province to make. If the governments of the provinces continue in this direction, they will very definitely change confederation and weaken the national government in this country in so doing. I am concerned to see that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources continue negotiations and, indeed, if need be enter into further trade-offs to maintain national unity

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, this budget had the general approval of the electorate on July 8. The tax relief measures for middle and low income Canadians were approved by Canadians on July 8. One of the provisions which was very popular during the election campaign was the exclusion of the first $1,000 of interest from income tax, and many other provisions in that budget received the approval of the people at that time. I am glad to see those measures brought back with the budget, and indeed other measures that will result in tax breaks for the average Canadian citizen. When one looks at this budget and the changes in direction it has taken since the May 6 presentation, it clearly demonstrates how responsive is this government to changing circumstances.

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Madam Speaker, two of the really major problems facing Canada today are the state of the economy and national unity. The inflation that grips our economy resembles a ticking time bomb destined to destroy us because of an almost complete lack of government action in recent years. The state of our national unity is also like a ticking time bomb destined to destroy us because of continued wrong and foolish government actions.

In its six years in office the government has given us little in the war on inflation other than higher prices, and it has given us little in the field of national unity other than sewing the seeds of national disunity. The government is insidiously undermining our unity, and the truth of what is going on has never really been clearly and forthrightly spelled out to the Canadian people. Many have undoubtedly remained silent because of the possibility of being smeared with the bigot label, something generously and quickly bestowed by this government on all who remotely question its actions in regard to national unity, and more particularly in regard to the methods being used to institute bilingualism.

Five years ago parliament passed the Official Languages Act. Since then the government has ruthlessly stamped on the hopes of many who originally supported its spirit and its general principles. A systematic attempt has been made to institute bilingualism, outwardly in the name of national unity but inwardly by methods of implementation that will surely destroy national unity, if continued much longer. The truth is that the public service of this country has become riddled with fear—fear of the heavy arm of discrimination being used by the government in hiring, in promoting, and in its over-all general approach towards bilingualism.

Like a number of others in this House, I have heard from many concerned public servants. It is all too obvious that the merit principle has become something to be bent and twisted, not only for the promotion of the Prime Minister's close friends to high places but also to fit in with the government's discriminatory approach to bilingualism.

● (1600)

In recent months we have seen the hypocrisy of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). As he supposedly with sincerity asks nine provinces to accept bilingualism, he stands in peculiar idleness and near silence as Quebec legislates in favour of unilingualism. His government refuses to disallow Quebec's Bill 22, and it refuses to refer it to the Supreme Court of Canada for judicial opinion as to its constitutionality, despite the fact that constitutional authorities like Liberal Senator Eugene Forsey have expressed their grave misgivings.

The Prime Minister's attitude toward Bill 22 reveals in all its naked ugliness the gross insincerity, the unadulterated hypocrisy and the complete and utter fraud that make up the substance of the government's very disastrous approach to bilingualism.

Canadians might well ask with justification, "How idle or silent would our Prime Minister have remained if any other province had introduced and passed legislation making English its only official language?" Without a doubt he would have, and rightly so, reacted swiftly. We would have heard high sounding phrases about minority rights and his extreme dedication toward the protection of such rights.

But the Prime Minister's reaction to Quebec's Bill 22 clearly shows that when he speaks of the rights of minorities, it all depends on which minority needs protection. By his own actions the Prime Minister has reduced his high sounding advocacy of bilingualism to the indecent level of cheap and sanctimonious twaddle.

If the province of Ontario passed legislation interfering with the rights of its French-speaking minority, the rights of those inhabitants of eastern or northern Ontario whose mother tongue is French, I am certain all of us in this House would angrily rise up to stop such injustice, and we would not be called or considered bigots. But when the province of Quebec passes legislation interfering with the rights of its English-speaking minority there is an almost unbroken, pitiful silence in this Chamber, orchestrated by the Prime Minister, and the script includes the bigot label for those who dare speak out against that silence.

Without any doubt, the real bigots in Canada today are those who sit in the front benches of this government; the Prime Minister and those who follow him blindly, apparently willing politically to manipulate this country on the basis of race and language for some questionable and peculiar purposes.

An hon. Member: It is not very questionable.

Mr. Cossitt: This government, whose leader has spoken often and righteously of the need for national unity, is in reality moving along a most dangerous path that leads inevitably to the destruction of national unity, a path which the Prime Minister's predecessors from Quebec, those great men Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Louis St. Laurent, would never have followed, and a path I am certain is unacceptable to the great majority of Canadians, including those living in the province of Quebec.

In the midst of this stands that dithering dilettante, Commissioner of Official Languages, Keith Spicer, in theory a servant of parliament but in practice a tool of this government. He has consistently displayed a one-sided approach to the implementation of bilingualism, flitting about the country snickering and giggling his way from soirée to soirée, coining ridiculous phrases like "Westmount Rhodesians".

Two incidents instigated by Spicer and his office in my area of Ontario serve as examples of the reprehensible methods used by this government and its supporters in implementing bilingualism. The first occurred at Prescott, Ontario, when Spicer sent one of his investigators over the International Bridge to the United States with instructions to return immediately to Canada posing as a French-speaking tourist coming home from a trip with a half empty bottle of wine in his car.

This sneaky individual with his phony story was apparently attempting to trap unilingual Canada Customs officers into errors that would incriminate them in the guise of supposedly conducting an investigation of the port's bilingual facility. This member of Spicer's staff, or perhaps I should say Spicer's gestapo, even stole a scratch pad from the office counter when the customs officers were not looking. He brought it back to Ottawa and gave it to Spicer. In due course Spicer complained to the Collector of Customs that the scratch pads being used by his staff were not bilingual.

Aside from its comic Dick Tracy aspects, this incident has a serious side. It illustrates the lengths this government is prepared to go in undermining public service morale by spying on conscientious employees, sneaking around in disreputable fashion attempting to create trouble for those who are unilingual, and all this disgraceful behaviour carried out in the name of national unity, and in the name of fairly implementing bilingualism.

This summer, just a month or two ago, at the Thousand Island Bridge at Lansdowne, Ontario, in my constituency, Guy Robitaille, Spicer's chief assistant, arrived at the border from the United States at one o'clock in the morning. Speaking perfect English he demanded to be spoken to in the French language. There was no officer on duty at that time who spoke French. Immediately he proceeded to raise a fuss and insisted that a bilingual Canada Customs officer who lived 10 miles away from the port of entry be called out of bed at one o'clock in the morning and forced to dress and drive back to work to answer questions that he had already asked in English.

Just how much is it costing taxpayers to finance these nonsensical methods of implementing bilingualism? How much is being spent on salaries to those who run around on orders from Keith Spicer playing funny little games with half empty bottles of wine? How much is being spent on language courses, not just for public servants, but for the wives of senior officials, one of whom was quoted in the press not so very long ago as saying she is learning French at government expense in order to get on better at cocktail parties?

I suggest, Madam Speaker, that the implementation of bilingualism should have a thorough examination by a committee of this House. The methods of implementation being used are staggering in cost, and it is shameful that so far they have managed to escape careful scrutiny.

If ever there was anything that clearly illustrates the need for careful scrutiny it is the statement made on the implementation of bilingualism by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) yesterday. The minister released a lot of figures but not one of those figures was the estimated total cost, and it is really not hard to understand why. It is because the estimated cost of what this government plans, added to the cost of what it has already done, is so high that the Canadian people in outrage would demand an investigation if they were given such information.

A year ago the government estimated 20,000 positions in the public service would be designated bilingual. Now the minister admits that the total has reached 53,600, and that is only so far. What will it be a year from today, and what will it be two years from now?

The minister says a further 19,000, mostly Anglophone public servants, will be required to learn a second language, but for the sake of the government's skin he wisely does not say how much the schools and teachers will cost Canadians. Without doubt, the wastage of public funds runs into the millions of dollars.

We are told those age 60 and over will not be required to become bilingual. Why age 60, which in reality is the retirement age for many? Why not age 50, or for that matter why at any age in certain specific cases? Again I think of my own constituency where several years ago this government dragooned Canada Customs officers into French language courses, only to find that they soon forgot what they learned because their jobs furnished no necessity for using a second language. The taxpayers, of course, in the meantime footed the unknown bill and, magnified all across the country, we can imagine how much it has cost.

This government has turned the implementation of bilingualism into a sacred cow, supposedly on a pedestal above the right of democratic criticism, an expensive sacred cow costing Canadian taxpayers millions of dollars a year. Why should it not be examined and why should it not be criticized? Why should there be anything wrong with pointing out gross errors and ulterior motives of this government in handling the implementation of bilingualism? Most important of all, why should one hesitate to speak out against a government whose policies are so potentially damaging and ruinous to the future of Canada?

● (1610)

This leads me to what I think is a very peculiar situation. When persons in French-speaking Canada rightfully and proudly point to their culture and to their heritage, when they call for preservation of their traditions, this is viewed in the eyes of those who control the government as "standing up for their rights". But when persons in English-speaking Canada rightfully and proudly point to their cultures and their heritages, and call for the preservation of their traditions, in the eyes of the government this is apparently "bigotry". What kind of nonsense is this?

Mr. Drury: I challenge that.

Mr. Cossitt: The minister says that he challenges it. The information he has given, and the information his successor now gives, lead me not to have much faith in what he says. What kind of nonsense is it? For what purposes does this government attempt to con all those Canadians whose ancestry is British, German, Dutch, American, Italian, or whatever, into believing that they are bigots and persons against national unity if they so much as utter a peep in support of the contributions made by their backgrounds and traditions to the development of Canada?

I often wonder if the Prime Minister realizes that he would not be sitting in this Canadian House of Commons if it were not for the fact that there was previously a British House of Commons that made all this possible. Perhaps the attitude of the Prime Minister on this subject is accounted for by his obvious disdain and impatience for parliament and the democratic process.

Since this government assumed office there has been a steady attempt to erode our democratic processes and to downgrade and ultimately destroy many traditions on which the institutions of this country are founded.

One needs only to remember that the Prime Minister once declared that members of the opposition were a "bunch of nobodies". What a demonstration of appreciation that was for the democratic process! One needs only to remember that the Prime Minister once told a group of working people outside this building to go and eat dung when all they were doing was exercising their democratic right to protest. What an understanding he displayed of our traditional freedom to dissent!

One needs only to remember that supreme act of hypocrisy after the government's near defeat in 1972 when the Prime Minister, who had long turned his back on the British connection, suddenly in desperation rushed off to London for tea at Buckingham Palace in an attempt to save his political skin.

For years this government has neglected our NATO friends while the Prime Minister did such things as tiptoe through the Orient to sit at the feet of Chairman Mao. Today this government still neglects our friends in Europe, despite the attempt to make it look otherwise by the Prime Minister's recent unimpressive and not very successful afterthought visit to Brussels.

Not long ago Ivan Head, that strange ogre of the Prime Minister's office, spoke of our "new left wing foreign policy" in a move that was an all too obvious flying of a kite to see how far they could go and get away with it. But the reaction showed that there are more people than they realized in this country who know what is going on. The Prime Minister quickly pulled in his horns, reverted to his role of Prince Charming, and declared that it was all some kind of misunderstanding or misinterpretation. In other words, it is a case of holding up the con game for a while until no one is looking and then moving quickly forward with a new episode of legerdemain.

When it comes to government sleight of hand, there is no better example than its attempt sneakily to change the capital of this country. If it is government policy to change the capital from Ottawa to Ottawa-Hull, then why does the government not honestly admit it and propose an amendment to the British North America Act? But no, instead it follows the course of a sneak. Its illegal approach to this matter was clearly revealed several months ago in one of its own publications entitled "Canada's New Capital". I will quote a few words from this pamphlet:

> Ottawa is the capital of Canada. Right? Wrong. It used to be that staid, musty old Ottawa was known as the nation's capital. Technically, it still is. But let's drop the technicalities . . .

Aside from the fact that the publication of this insidious nonsense cost the Canadian taxpayers $18,000 for 20,000 copies, it is also an excellent example of a typical episode in this government's well planned con game.

Undoubtedly the next episode will be a further attempt to downgrade the effectiveness of a democratic opposition, and a good hint of what is to come was in the Speech from the Throne when we were told that the government would seek "as a matter of urgency" the "necessary reforms of parliamentary rules".

The key words used foretell what lies ahead. They are the words "matter of urgency" and "necessary", urgent and necessary to tamper further with the rules of this House because of the government's impatience with the democratic process.

How much easier it would be if the cabinet and the Prime Minister were not obliged to come here daily to provide answers to elected representatives of the people. How much easier it would be to run this country whatever way they want if the oral question period was abolished and it was required that all questions be submitted in advance.

This government is motivated by a kind of dictatorial complex. Call it of the right or of the left, it makes no difference. It is a government in the hands of a clique whose interests, I believe, are not synonymous with the best interests of Canada's national unity.

If this was a truly democratic government, surely someone on the front bench opposite would have risen to denounce the words of the Quebec minister of justice spoken earlier this week when he threatened Quebec's English speaking minority by saying that Quebec anglo-phones are heading for "big disaster" and that he was giving them a "sympathetic warning". He declared:

> If the anglophones of Quebec are not ready to accept a minimum measure like Bill 22, they will inevitably provoke a confrontation and reaction that would further the cause of separatism.

There it is, the myth, the lie, the fraud, peddled by this government and its friends. If anyone speaks out in the name of common sense, or stands up for national unity and an end to the fractionalizing of Canada on a racial basis, they are at once a provoker of separatism.

If Canada some day does split apart—and certainly the ignored west, the forgotten Maritimes, and the neglected areas of eastern Ontario, have every justification to think of possible separation—if Canada someday splits into pieces and God hope it never does, this government will go down in history as the author and the instrument of that destruction.

May I say in conclusion, Madam Speaker, that the time is overdue for the great silent bulk of Canadians, no matter what their mother tongue, to tell this government that we have had enough of its ill conceived, foolish, expensive and disastrous measures of implementing bilingualism; to tell the government that we all want to be just plain Canadians and not hyphenated Canadians, and that we are not prepared to witness the destruction of our country by policies of language and racial confrontation conducted by this government.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine): Madam Speaker, at the beginning of my first speech in the House, I would like to paraphrase one of the great men of the antiquity who, returning from a glorious conquest, had exclaimed: "Veni, vidi, vici". It remains indeed that the election of a member at 20 years of age is a victory for the people of a certain age who think that the young people are just good enough to carp about the respective merits of Das Kapital of Karl Marx or the small Red Book of Mao.

With the other members in this House, I would like, on the contrary, to try to give a new impetus to the legislative process and in that context, I wish to thank the electors of Lafontaine for their initiative and their courage, because courage is necessary to turn aside from the beaten track, especially in politics where ultra-conservatism is too often a maxim and the status quo a rule.

I remember a metaphor used by the hon. member for Hamilton-Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) when he was talking about youth in this House. He was comparing youth to a sailboat with the wind of idealism as the motor and reason and common sense as the wheel. In the next few years, I hope to follow a line of conduct inspired from this ideal and it is with this in mind that I rise today to defend some principles which I hold to heart and which come from a certain understanding that I have of our society and the future that I anticipate for it.

Madam Speaker, every day, through the media or in the discussions that we have with other members, we hear about all kinds of problems which are all impossible to solve, including, I must admit, price increases and the various causes of inflation. Much has been said about this, and I am not surprised that the opposition with its legendary opportunism took advantage of this subject during the last electoral campaign. In fact, the problem is much more social than economic or political, and that is what I shall try to prove further on. The fact is that the problem exists and that we have to try and solve it. On this subject, I must immediately give the following explanation: I agree little if at all with the temporary measures suggested by some of our economists who still try to analyze our problems on the basis of assumptions which no longer apply in 1974.

Even though very valid in its details, this budget applies to a temporary period, and I shall not dwell on the external causes of inflation but rather on what we must anticipate in the medium and the long term. To better understand the Canadian economic context, we must realize that Canada is one of the rare countries ready to enter fully a new era, that of a post-industrial society. Solutions developed in the last century no longer apply when it comes to understanding the mechanisms which will control tomorrow's society. The great economic cycles moving on sinusoidal curves are the characteristics of a transitory society undergoing radical changes: such is ours.

We went from the agrarian period to that of industry in the middle of the 19th Century; we are now stepping into that new era I spoke of a while ago, which will be dominated by the third and fourth sectors of our economy.

What then are the main characteristics of that post-industrial society? I quote Jean Fourastié, well known French economist, who wrote in his book "Le Grand Espoir du 20e siècle", and I quote:

> By liberating man from tasks inanimate matter can perform for him, the machine must lead him to tasks he alone among created beings can perform: those of intellectual culture and moral perfecting.

We can already see the first effects of that evolution. The third sector, which resists technical progress, will eventually permeate our whole economy and the activities relating to advanced technology limited by its very success, and will absorb only a small part of the labour force. Again, I quote:

● (1620)

> The service industries will remain unstable for a long time. Primary and secondary production, the financial value of which will be small though formidable because of its material size, will depend on relatively few workers; a large portion of the population will be made up of indirect workers. One or two hundred workers in a key sector can already threaten the economic system of a nation; in the third sector, a few hundred technicians will be able to deprive millions of human beings of electricity, transportation and food.
> This implies the need for a State in a position to make the common good prevail. Inversely, the least hitch in the complex third sector, are oversight or a mistake in the tremendous effort of co-ordination, classification and planning, will result in serious consequences in primary and secondary production.

In fact, such a society is the end result of a process developed in the 19th century during the general industrialization campaign.

This new society overlooks a basic principle, namely "production for production's sake", which can only give rise to never-ending spiral: price increases, salary increases, and so on. As a matter of fact, what we must try to do is to make people understand and try ourselves to understand, that at some point, improved living conditions are not evaluated in terms of additional TV sets or telephones for every member of a family, or else in terms of the size and horsepower of a car, but rather in terms of services provided to the people and particularly, the distribution of this affluence, of this opulence of which Galbraith speaks so rightly. Therefore, it is a completely new outlook. Can we draw any conclusions from it?

First of all, as a direct corollary, one must reason with the producers of goods for whom only the sales volume, therefore, the profits, is an indicator of social and economic progress. We must stop trying to adjust supply to demand and fight rather on a new front by adjusting demand to supply. I know that it may look simplistic but it is in fact the mentality of a whole nation that we must try to change.

We must first urge company directors to plan their production instead of giving priority as is the case now to development that I would term as of the "wildcat" sort. We must then change radically the attitude of the consumers themselves. I would like to illustrate briefly a few means of fulfilling those aspirations as related to the rationalizing of industry in Canada, and the setting up of an infrastructure for transportation to regionalize that industrial output. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) understood that priority, and he seems about to introduce a complete restructuration of the means of transportation in Canada.

The immediate effect of that action would be the creation of a planning board with a purely advisory function because I basically believe in the capacity of producers to adapt when it is in their interest. It would be up to that planning board to set up the priorities in the development of areas in line with the long term policies of the government. That already exists at the embryonary stage in the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and I know that the new Federal Business Development Bank will provide advisory services for small and middle businesses.

Still about cost rationalization, a systematic effort should be made to promote the seeding and development of cooperation which has already proven to be an excellent way of serving the often conflicting, but always complementary interests of producers and consumers. Finally, for the consumers themselves, they should be honestly informed so they can learn for themselves the benefits of voluntary restriction.

I would like to say incidentally that it is sheer utopia to hope for a change of attitude in that area as long as the consumer will be the victim of propaganda—and I strongly stress that word—propaganda daily imposed on the consumer through often misleading advertising. I look upon a healthy capitalism where free competition would be effective and whose absolute weapon would be honest information on the true values of the products offered and not a daily and systematic hammering based on mass psychology.

I urge the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) to implement as soon as possible a really efficient code of ethics providing for, among other things, a drastic limitation of budgets allocated to advertising by Canadian companies. That would be a good short-term way to curb inflation, cutting 5 to 10 per cent off the production cost of item offered to consumers.

[Mr. Lachance.]

Finally, any proposal put forward could only be the prelude to the inevitable and long awaited-for final gesture of implementing a guaranteed annual income for all Canadians regardless of age or status. Let us now consider the total cost of government programs of a social nature with identical purposes. Here are some figures: program concerning senior citizens, old age pensions: $2.5 billion; guaranteed income supplement $950 million; pension annuities: $250 million; general social assistance to provinces: over $1 billion; special social assistance: $700 million; family allowances: almost $2 billion; unemployment insurance: $2,250 million. Which gives us an unbelievable total, the grand total of $11,360 million in transfer payments and other revenue support payments.

One can but deplore the administration red tape and daily frustrations citizens are faced with concerning the implementation of these programs, especially when these measures do not meet their hoped-for purpose, which is the case right now. Other mechanisms must be considered.

The guaranteed annual income concept has been gaining momentum these last few years. I quote the following from an article signed by Claude Lemelin which appeared in Le Devoir of November 21:

> Within a year, Canada could be provided with a new Federal-provincial guaranteed income program which could replace the numerous income support programs already implemented by Ottawa and the provinces thanks to the progress reported by the Ministers responsible for Social Affairs from the country's 11 governments during the Conference held in the Nation's capital on the 19th and 20th of November.

During this conference three steps were outlined:

> 1. A unique and monolithic system, guaranteeing a minimum income to any citizen whose revenues from other sources would not reach a given level, regardless of other socio-economic characteristics;
> 2. A two-prong system, which would include first of all a guaranteed income program for workers whose income is inadequate, either because of the size of their families or the seasonal character of their job; and then a full-scale guaranteed income program for those who are either unemployable, unable to find a job or would meet some objective qualification requirements;
> 3. A two-prong system identical to the preceding, except that the income guarantee would be provided through tax credits (cashable by non taxpayers) rather than through direct allowances from public funds.

In 1971, the Senate special committee report on poverty already proposed a great number of guaranteed annual income formulas among which I single the following: a negative income tax to be applied nationally on an uniform basis. I quote from the report:

> The program would be financed and administered by the federal government which would make uniform cash payments to all economically underprivileged Canadian residents. The payments would depend upon the size and the needs of the family and they would determine a new minimum under which no family would be left alone.

To illustrate this, the poverty line as established in the report is about $7,000 for a family of four. I challenge anyone to claim that the full amount abovementioned is provided through current programmes.

In short and in order to prevent people from regarding me as a so-called "philosopher", I will say I dream of a Canada in which every citizen will have the opportunity of developing his talents and skills, without having to prostitute intellectually, in order to make a living for his family. I dream of a 21st century Canada, which will stop waging constitutional wars and set to work definitely so that everyone may share its good fortune. I dream of a Canada in which we will decide to care for the aged, not by giving them mere pittance and letting under the constant threat of exploitation, but by setting up a rational home care and recreation system. That will be done by programs such as New Horizons and particularly by building homes which are in accordance with the aged and their needs.

Madam Speaker, the days of half-measures are over. The federal government must take the lead and the leadership in all fields with a socio-economic character. Experience has proven that we cannot rely on provincial programs concerning salary supplements. I can assure this House that I am not very proud when a pensioner comes to see me about pension indexation and says to me: "Your programs are all very nice, but why did the provincial government cut my income supplement by an amount equal and sometimes superior to the increase I received from the federal government?" What will be the impact of the new program which is supposed to be in force in 1975? Concerning spouses aged 60 or 65 now on their pension, what will happen when they receive these supplementary amounts? Will the provincial government definitely cut off their income supplement? In that case it is a joke. You cannot fool people that way all the time. We look like fools. No, we must rationalize programs, and the only way I think we can achieve that is by putting all these programs under one level of government, that is the federal government.

Madam Speaker, rebellion is threatening among the poor. It is not sufficient to close our eyes and pray. The time has come to take measures in that area.

In conclusion, let me quote the report of the special Senate committee on poverty, in which is stated the challenge we must face:

> Measures must be taken now, if we want to prevent millions of Canadians from continuing to consider life only as a cruel and fierce struggle for survivance. We must set aside our social assistance and service policies and replace them by a program of revenue and financial assistance. We must give the defenseless the hope for a better future.

Madam Speaker, Galbraith wrote about production in his book The Affluent Society:

> Furnishing an empty room is one thing. Piling up furniture until the whole place is ready to collapse is another. If the matter of production had been bound to fail, man would have remained doomed to his traditional fate. But if we fail to realize that we have found out the solution and immediately undertake the necessary task, we will be heading for an equally frightful tragedy.

Madam Speaker, I have a dream of happy Canadians. That has been the greatest hope of the 20th century and I have been elected to work at its realization.

Mr. Bert Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that during the two years when I was absent from this House the government, in view of the situation it was facing, would change its thinking. I can see by what has been presented in the budget, and from what has gone on in the House during the present session, that it has not. I had especially hoped that after election night this country would be governed by a new government, and I am disappointed that the wisdom of the voters of the Meadow Lake constituency was not reflected in the election results in the majority of the constituencies in Canada, especially in the constituency of Ottawa-Carleton. If those voters had voted differently, the people of Canada might have been spared the disappointment of this budget.

Be that as it may, I am sure most people in Canada hoped that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) would show leadership and bring forward good ideas. Instead, he has simply added sugar to the same old stew—and with sugar being expensive, he did not add much. If he bought the meat right from the producer, he bought it dirt cheap. One can only say that the Minister of Finance is doing as his fellow ministers are doing, falling flat when faced with his "big moment".

It is difficult to move a truck which is stuck in a rut when a tire is flat. Well, the government is not even trying to move that truck. It thinks that if it leaves the truck there for the winter, the ground will freeze and it can drive the truck away, smiling. Let me tell you that many farmers who own trucks are not smiling, especially if there is livestock in the truck.

It appears that the Minister of Finance has forgotten that it was actually the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) who won the election for the government and enabled the minister to keep his job; yet the Minister of Finance, in the budget, hardly mentions anything in which the agricultural industry can show great interest. Certainly that omission does not speak of gratitude.

The Minister of Finance calls for restraint, yet it is evident from the budget figures, to an ordinary farmer or rancher like myself, that the government is suffering from diarrhoea of the purse and intends to cure it with a laxative.

I have seen many of the end results of this ailment, resulting from the way the government has spent so much of the taxpayers' money in a few areas. It is nothing short of deplorable that one quarter of the people in my area do not have television reception; for many the only method of transportation is by air. Unfortunately, most of the residents of my area do not have friends of the sort the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has, Madam Speaker.

I have been told recently that television will not be available to the people of a vast area in the northwestern part of Saskatchewan comprising Canoe Narrows, Beauval, Pinehouse, Ile à la Crosse, Buffalo Narrows, Patuanak, Dillon, Portage la Loche and Turnor Lake, until 1976. In 1972 I was told it would be available in 1974. I wonder what I will be told in 1976.

We should bear in mind that Ile à la Crosse is one of the oldest settlements in Saskatchewan. It was this government that destroyed the people's chance to have television reception in this area as long as nine years ago. The radar towers and equipment which were put there at no cost to this government were destroyed. The CBC has showed interest in this equipment. It was an asset with regard to bringing television to this vast area. The radar tower at Fort Black was reduced to scrap for no reason whatsoever.

We realize what television would do for the people in this vast area during the long winter, particularly school children and senior citizens. Do I have to tell the people of that area that the government wants to forget them for another two years? This is going to be very bad news for the people in this part of my constituency.

It was this government that discontinued the Roads to Resources program. Large portions of this area, going into the Athabasca region and the great mining country around Uranium City, are as far away from an all-weather road as they were 10 years ago. This government dropped the Roads to Resources program which was set up by the Diefenbaker government. The area around Uranium City has created enough wealth that it should have had an all-weather road leading into it long ago.

I could go on at great length about the shortcomings of the government with regard to the north country. Unless some changes are made, this budget will be pretty slim picking for the people of that area.

There is a terrible problem in western Canada with regard to agriculture. We saw what happened a few years ago to the pork producers in the west. They were put out of business. Today the beef producers are in a deplorable situation. A lot of this has been caused by government meddling.

Only a few months ago the government was advocating that farmers diversify and go into beef cattle. I do not know where the government researchers were, but I know the predicament in which the western farmers find themselves today. We know what the beef producers are doing in eastern Canada. We saw an example of that not too long ago.

There have been many farm starts in my constituency. People were encouraged to go into beef cattle. In order to do this they borrowed money at a high rate of interest. Many who bought breeding stock last spring cannot get back one quarter of what they paid.

Are we to look forward to the same kind of situation for our grain producers? Just recently the minister in charge of the wheat board introduced a two-price system for wheat. Our party has advocated that for many years. We worked hard for a two-price system. However, today the government wants a two-price system with a maximum price for wheat consumed locally. It did not call in the producers or the farm organizations to discuss setting a price for a period of seven years. At the rate inflation is going in this country, I wonder whether $3.25 a bushel will be adequate in seven years. Who knows? Why would the government force through such a bill without first consulting those who are very much concerned? It is very injust. I think the opposition has forced the government to take another look at this. I think it will now call in the producers and farm organizations to discuss this bill. There are many such situations in western Canada. The people there will certainly not be happy with this budget.

We hear a lot today about rail line abandonment. In my area many lines have never been completed. If some of these lines had been completed, they would be on a paying basis. How can a rail line that has not been completed, pay? There is still a gap in the line, and now the government is talking about abandonment. This makes me think of our forefathers who pioneered this country. They advocated the rail lines. However, even at this late state the lines have not been completed and, as I say, now the government is talking about abandonment.

Everyone in western Canada knows that grain can be moved much cheaper by rail than by truck. Therefore I do not know why the government is determined to go hog-wild into rail line abandonment. The people concerned should have some say about this.

There are many other items I could deal with, especially northern development. The government should take a close look at the Roads to Resources program. It should also provide television for these people I have mentioned. They are entitled to it. These people have spent the greatest part of their lives in that area. Surely they should have the right to television.

I took notice of what the minister had to say in his budget about housing. For years we have been asking for the removal of the sales tax on building materials and at a time when so many young people are in need of homes I do not understand why it should be retained, even in part. It is true the Minister of Finance has agreed to reduce it, but when one considers the expense of maintaining the bureaucracy needed to collect the tax at 5 per cent, it might have been far better to have abolished it altogether.

● (1650)

The whole budget is ill-conceived as far as I am concerned, speaking for the constituency of Meadow Lake.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, on a point of order I do not know whether the House would like to continue to discuss this subject matter for another seven minutes or whether we might revert to motions at this point. The opposition spokesmen, unfortunately, are not here yet.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, I do not think it is worth taking the floor for five or seven minutes today. I therefore agree for the Minister to proceed with his statement.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I merely wish to point out that the spokesmen on this issue for the Progressive Conservatives and for our party are not here at the moment. They are still studying the documents. Would it not be better to wait until they arrive?

Mr. Foster: Keep it in neutral for five minutes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is a verse in the Bible which says that there was silence in heaven for the space of half an hour. Maybe we could have silence in this chamber for five minutes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): May I simply make a request, Madam Speaker. I am not taking the floor because I shall not be able to attend Monday's debate. However, with your kind permission, I might leave the floor to my colleague, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), who could continue Monday.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased with the agreement voiced by my colleagues in this House.

Inasmuch as we are discussing a most important matter, that is the billions of dollars involved in the budget which has been brought before us, and in the light also of the very interesting and very serious remarks made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) in his budget speech, I should like to have the opportunity of reviewing the budget more completely in order to comment on it in a fair manner and to make suggestions which should improve our public sector financing system. Also I will be in a position to bring forward very concrete proposals for improving the situation of low income families which in my opinion, have not been dealt with properly in the budget speech of the Minister of Finance.

Madam Speaker, may I call it five o'clock? I could perhaps continue on Monday.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Shall we call it five o'clock?

There is no agreement.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Madam Speaker, since there does not seem to be agreement, I am willing to continue. Please tell me when it is five o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. member for Bellechasse may continue.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): The budget presented by the Minister of Finance does contain interesting proposals. The tax reduction on building materials is an excellent measure, I believe, but that tax should have been removed completely. A mere 6 per cent reduction in the tax on building materials will not be enough to incite those who wish to build a home to avail themselves of this reduction, because financial institutions are less and less eager to lend money to young people. As for those who wish to build factories or plants, they are denied the necessary credits.

Last week, Madam Speaker, I witnessed an attempt on the part of three young men who got together to launch a business. Those young men had a good trade, good training and would certainly have been useful in their community, where they could have operated that kind of business, that kind of industry. The finance companies denied them the credits that were required to buy the land where they wished to build that factory. Now, we blame young people saying that they lack initiative, that they wish to take advantage of society without making their own contribution. They are being accused of all kinds of things of which they are not responsible and they are being discouraged. They are deterred from their goal, which was to undertake something useful.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member but it being five o'clock, the House will now revert to motions, according to the provisions of the special order passed earlier this day.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO CURTAIL OIL EXPORTS—TABLING OF NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD REPORT

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I should like to thank all hon. members for their courtesy in enabling us to adjust our procedures to the statement to be made.

In February, 1973, I announced that the National Energy Board would hold a public hearing "in order to provide opportunity for interested parties to be heard as to the appropriate methods for protecting the public interest in respect of oil exports over the longer term". After preparatory work, notice of the board's hearings with respect to this matter was given on July 5, 1973 and companies and interested groups were asked to file briefs with the board by October 15. Subsequently, the board held hearings in Calgary, Vancouver and Ottawa, terminating on May 2, 1974.

The board, after carefully considering all submissions, testimony and argument presented, set out its findings in a report to me on the matter of the exportation of oil which it submitted under section 22 of the National Energy Board Act. Under section 23 of the act, reports of the board made under Part II may be made public with the approval of the minister and, having regard to the importance of this report, I decided that it should be made public so that all Canadians may be aware of the oil supply and demand outlook in Canada, and of the need to take further action with respect to oil exports.

The government accepts the board's finding that steps should be taken to reduce exports of oil with a view to providing additional protection for Canadian requirements. To this end the board intends to modify immediately its licensing procedure.

The government accepts the board's recommendation for a new export control system. However, in view of the impending requirements for the Montreal market, I intend to seek early consultation with the producing provinces with a view to reducing exports more sharply than under the board's recommended formula. The board allocated 250,000 barrels per day for the Montreal market from 1975 onward but proposed that these supplies be declared surplus to Canadian requirements—and therefore eligible for export—until the Montreal line comes onstream in 1976. I intend to discuss with the provinces the advisability of "shutting in" these supplies beginning in mid-1975, rather than considering them surplus to Canadian requirements for export purposes until the line is completed in 1976.

This would result in a reduction of exports to a level of about 650,000 barrels per day for the latter part of 1975, compared to an export level of some 800,000 barrels per day that would otherwise be in effect.

[Translation]

Evidence produced before the National Energy Board during its hearing and its appraisal of this evidence indicated an inevitable decline in producibility of indigenous crude oil commencing next year and continuing in the 1980's, when frontier oil and larger quantities of oil sands output are expected to become available.

Based on present supply and demand trends, there is a forecast deficiency in supply to the domestic market served by Canadian oil in early 1982 which would grow to 200,000 barrels a day by late 1983. In the face of this prospect the Board decided to adopt a new procedure to determine the level of oil exports, based on a formula by which the volume of crude oil available for export licensing during a given year will be related to oil producibility, demand for Canadian use, and a conservation expectation as estimated for that year. The volume of oil exports thus computed would be reduced by a factor which would become more severe as the estimated period of self sufficiency decreased.

[English]

The government decided against an immediate and complete discontinuance of oil exports because cessation of exports would provide for sufficient producibility for only a few months additional to that provided by the phased reduction of exports approved by the cabinet. That is, an immediate halt to exports would extend sufficient deliverability for about two and a half years while the government's decision to phase down exports in line with the board's recommendations will extend the period for about one and a half years. As I stated, it is my intention to seek consultations with the producing provinces with an aim to extending this period to two years by beginning the phase down of exports next year and in 1976.

An immediate halt to exports would be disruptive to Canadian-United States trade relations. It would deprive certain northern U.S. refineries and their communities of the Canadian crude oil on which they have traditionally relied.

In Canada a sudden and complete reduction of current exports would deprive industry of a major source of cash flow required to find the higher cost reserves of the frontier areas. It would also idle a portion of the capacity of producing facilities which have been financed over the past few years. There would be a major impact on the income of the oil producing provinces, on the oil service industries, and a major effect on Canada's foreign exchange.

In adopting its new procedure the board will identify the volume of allowable oil exports for a period of at least one year, but annual average levels will be adjusted to account for immediate supply and demand factors by issuing monthly export licences, as at present. Hearings will be held periodically to receive evidence with respect to the potential producibility of Canadian oil, the domestic demand for indigenous feed stocks, and the effects of conservation on Canadian consumption and surplus.

While the board is forecasting that by 1982 there will not be enough crude oil production in Canada to meet the Canadian market demands which are now served by Canadian oil production, plus 250,000 barrels a day for Montreal, this outlook can be altered not only by the board's proposed export control formula but also by greater attention by all levels of government, and by all citizens, to conservation measures in the use of energy. The federal government will announce this winter a series of programs designed to conserve all forms of energy.

In 1960, when the federal government launched the national oil policy, the export level was about 100,000 barrels a day. By 1970 exports had risen to 670,000 barrels a day. The rapidly growing deficiency in the United States in the early years of this decade created a sharply increased demand for Canadian crude, and exports rose to the 1.1 million barrel a day level by 1973 when the government instituted export controls. This control system has enabled the government to reduce exports, which for 1974 have averaged 900,000 barrels per day.

By the 1980's we can expect a resurgence in production as the frontier areas and the oil sands are opened up. At the same time our capability in nuclear energy production will also become very significant. Thus the energy supply outlook for the long term is promising. The challenge before us is to maintain a high degree of self-sufficiency in the intervening years, and this new regime of oil export control I have announced today is designed to attain that objective.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should now like to table copies, in the two official language, of the report of the National Energy Board, "In the Matter of the Exportation of Oil".

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the report by the National Energy Board entitled "The Matter of the Exportation of Oil" demonstrates to this institution that the National Energy Board can produce a very useful document whenever it is requested to do so. I welcome the National Energy Board back to its function as laid down in the act of 1959, namely, of advising the government and the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have read the report and I cannot help but compare it with the report we received from the government last July entitled, "A National Oil Policy for Canada". When I look at the charts in that volume on supply and the optimism and the expectations they represent, I get the impression that the figures we read in this report today are going to be much more useful to the government in planning future policy.

I cannot understand for the life of me, in view of what is in this report on the exportation of oil, presented to the House today, why the government kept it secret so long. It would have been just as useful two weeks ago, and we might have avoided a lot of the misery the members of this House had to endure this last two or three weeks. I think it will become clear in my remarks why that is so, Mr. Speaker.

I am not going to quote extensively from the report, but would like to refer to two short passages, the first one dealing with supply in barrels per day. I want the House to listen to the conclusion reached by the National Energy Board after it heard all the submissions of industry and its own experts. It reads:

● (1710)

Various studies of geologically potential oil, gas and other resources leave little doubt that there are abundant deposits in widely scattered areas of Canada. The conversion of known resources, such as the oil sands and heavy oils, and inferred or potential resources, such as are expected in the frontier areas, into established reserves will require technological progress but, more importantly, will require favourable economic conditions for development, production and transportation. There is also a major problem in respect of timing. However, given sufficient lead-time and proper economic incentives, there is a good prospect that Canada could become self-sufficient in energy for a long period.

In view of that conclusion there is no need to terrorize the people of Canada into thinking that our future is opaque and dismal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Would the hon. member please give me the page number from which he quoted?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Page 2-14.

Then again in chapter 5, page 15, speaking this time on the subject of exports, the report reads:

Given the size, nature and timing of a possible supply-demand intersection, as set out in section 4 of this report, the board is of a view that policies of all levels of government, of the financial community, and of the industry itself must be such as to ensure that adequate rates of return and cash flows are available.

That is the view of the board that we in parliament set up to advise us on the public interest in matters of energy. I repeat again, as the minister has stated in his own statement and as the report states, that Canada needs a continuation of imports into this country to keep our own economy healthy and to keep our energy situation healthy, particularly in the next 10 years. Also, if we are to achieve this type of situation where our industry is healthy, we will have to provide favourable economic conditions. The question is, how? I will come back to this in a moment.

But before I go into that I would like to talk about imports. On October 3 in the House I made a proposal to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) which he has promised to consider, that Canada should offer its hospitality to all countries of the world, both importers and exporters of oil, presumably some time next year, with the purpose of bringing a rule of law into world prices of oil, and also to give us the framework within which the countries of the world allocate supplies instead of this being done by international oil companies.

As I stated, the Prime Minister promised to consider that proposal. The reason I hesitated in asking if he has made a decision is that I requested the Arab nations in OPEC to make their representations to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) in Canada indicating to him, and hopefully through him to the Prime Minister, that the Arab nations consider this proposal in a favourable light. I have great hopes that even though we do not have ambassadorial strength in all the Arab countries, and even though our own nation does not go to see the Arabs, that the Arab nations will come and see us, expressing a will to join in such an international undertaking.

An international commodity agreement should have been in place these last 50 years. Instead, we have had to rely on the good graces and efficiency of the international oil cartel to set our prices and allocate our supplies.

Secondly, in regard to favourable economic conditions, I do not think there is a person on either side of this House who, in his heart, does not know that there should be an end to this war on the provinces. We have to realize that provincial governments are the voice of the people of an area. You cannot go over them with unilateral actions, repudiating agreements not only with provincial premiers and provincial ministers, but with industry.

I suggest that if we are going to follow the recommendations in the exportation of oil document provided by the National Energy Board we should return to the traditional Canadian way of working out our federal system, namely, consulting with our provinces in the running of this country.

By consultation, Madam Speaker, I do not mean just the phasing down procedures which the minister has stated he is going to start in consultation with the producing provinces. I am not talking about that itty bitty little bit of technical detail. I am talking about the whole energy picture, and that includes price and the staging of price increases; it includes a cushion for the consumers. If there is injustice, or if extra sacrifice is demanded from the producer provinces greater than the ordinary Canadian should have to bear to maintain these national purposes, the principle of quid pro quo should still apply as it applied at the time of the drafting of the British North America Act without which there would be no agreement, and as it did in the Alberta and Saskatchewan Natural Resources Act of 1930. Without that agreement we would not have made the progress we did make in this country in the last 107 years.

In this whole energy picture we should consider the provinces on the question of exports, the question of imports and, above all, in the matter of taxation, which is the present quarrel. Pipelines should be brought to their attention. It is in our prerogative entirely, but they are providing the energy and we should consult with them.

Above all, in the final industrial strategy people who live in Ontario, in the industrial complex between Sarnia and the eastern townships of Quebec, know that other regions of this country want a chance to share in its wealth, not as a handout through a DREE grant but with their resources giving them comparative advantage. I would suggest that if you consult on this over-all energy picture it would be a tremendous day in the history of Canada.

In view of the minister's attitudes and his actions in the last two or three years, this means he will have to follow the precedent of an illustrious predecessor who was a leader of the Liberal Party. When William Lyon Mackenzie King sat on this side of the House he said he was prepared to "walk in the valley of humiliation". He survived.

I notice today, Madam Speaker, that in response to a question by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) the Prime Minister said that he was willing to reconsider the petroleum administration bill and the resource sections of the budget that have divided this House. I ask the Prime Minister, through the Minister of Energy (Mr. Macdonald) to give that matter his deepest consideration because, if we do not become flexible again, if we do not treat our provinces as provinces of Canada deserving of consideration, the end will be something most of us do not want to contemplate. I am putting it this way, in terms which can be understood. If we do not agree to create a favourable economic climate, it will be the consumer who will pay the price for our neglect.

Having said that, may I now comment on the proposed oil pipeline. I used to refer to it as the pipeline to Montreal, but now I prefer to speak of it as the pipeline from Montreal to Sarnia. This must be a two-way pipeline. It must be capable of moving oil in both directions if we are to do what the report recommends. We must utilize to the maximum any oil which we acquire on world markets. If the government cannot find a private corporation which is willing to build a pipeline because of uncertainties over guarantees, I think the government, in the interests of this country, must build it itself, even if the pipeline stays empty. It will be there to protect us. It will protect those in the centre of Canada. It will move oil to Sarnia, if necessary, or to Montreal and the eastern areas of the country.

Next I shall speak on the question of export. I think the recommendations of the report are sensible. They come down against cutting off exports completely and recommend, from the beginning, production of about 650,000 barrels a day, plus 250,000 for the Montreal market, giving an average rate of production of 900,000 barrels per day. That should show western producers that there is a future for them in the Canadian market. If the government goes ahead with its proposals, the market will be stable.

I know oil companies are concerned about price, and we hear talk of much confusion and despair. I know that many boards of directors are considering their programs for next year. If the government would only say, "We will consult with the provinces on taxation, sharing of rents, and so on," I think the industry would feel more confident.

On October 21 last I made a suggestion which, if adopted, will give a way out for the provinces, the industry and the federal government. I know my proposal will work because if it will give the federal government more money, provincial governments more money and the industry more money, it will be acceptable. I ask the government to look at that proposal, because I think that it would restore the confidence of the industry in this country. If that confidence is restored, Canada can look forward to a great future; but that future can only be realized if there is cooperation between senior governments.

I will not say much about conservation and the environment, as the report deals with these questions adequately. Incidentally, if the minister intends to turn lights off, I wish he would turn off the lights in the Pearson building.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

They are on every night. We can live with the recommendations of the National Energy Board on that subject.

The report does not deal with alternative sources of energy. True, it mentions nuclear sources but does not mention renewable sources of energy. Our neighbour on the North American continent, the United States, is spending $20 billion in a 10-year program developing alternative sources of energy. It is spending at the rate of $2 billion per year. Of that $2 billion it is spending $60 million a year on a biomass program—the minister will tell the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) what that means. According to the information I have, Canada at present is spending about $200,000 a year in this field.

I feel I have dealt adequately with the report, Madam Speaker, to show that it is sufficient grounds for confidence. The report shows that we are justified in our confidence in the future of Canada, even though there is a difficult 10-year period ahead. Canada has before it great opportunities, and the report will do much to enable us to restore our confidence in ourselves. Certainly we must bring frontier oils and tar sand oils on stream between 1985 and 1990; it is a just a question of being sensible in the meantime. I hope the government will take advantage of this report, withdraw the petroleum administration bill and cancel those sections of the budget which would start a war between the federal government and the provinces.

If it does that it will be amazed at how the stock market will react on Monday and succeeding days, and we shall all be pleased at what we in this country can do, once we create a favourable economic climate. We need not despair, Madam Speaker.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Madam Speaker, I feel something like a passenger on the Titanic watching the captain re-arranging the seating after having struck the iceberg.

I have only had an opportunity to make a very hasty and cursory examination of this report. I think it is probably more realistic than some of the reports we have had from the National Energy Board. It is certainly much more realistic than some of the estimates that have been made by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources with respect to the life index of oil supplies in Canada. However, I would point out that they are still fairly optimistic and are still making assumptions which, in my opinion, are very dubious.

If I can summarize it quickly, they are suggesting that if we leave our exports to the United States at their present level and continue our present consumption and present imports, the life index of our conventional western oil is 7.3 years. If we cut off our exports as of January 1, 1975, our supplies will last 9.9 years before we will be in a position of non self-sufficiency. If we phase out the exports on a schedule which they have set, we will extend the life of the oil reserves of Canada to some 9.0 years.

I cannot for a moment understand why we should talk about phasing out exports to 1982. The minister said in his statement that he wants to reduce these exports more rapidly than the National Energy Board has suggested. However, as I take it from his statement, all he is proposing to do is have consultations with the provinces with a view to beginning, in the middle of July, to take the 250,000 barrels a day which would be going through the pipeline if the pipeline were there, and retaining that oil rather than making it available for export. That means we save 150,000 barrels a day until such time as the pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal is built. The minister hopefully suggested that that might be in 1976. That is not stepping up the reduction of exports very materially.

It should not be necessary to take seven years to phase out our exports to the United States. I agree with the minister that we cannot cut off those exports all at once. That would be unfair. I think it would call for the measures of retaliation. I have advocated for the past four or five years, and I have said it many times in this House, that we ought to give the Americans notice that we are going to phase them out over a period of three or four years. That would give them time to make arrangements for other sources of supply. I think that should be done. However, I see no reason why this phasing out process should be extended over a seven-year period.

The minister argues this will cause some dislocation in the United States. I want to point out to the minister that it will cause some dislocation in Canada if in 1982 we are not able to meet our own oil needs. Also, I think that three or four years would give the Americans ample time to prepare themselves for any dislocation.

Canadians tend to forget that the Americans have larger supplies of oil than we have and that the Americans import a smaller percentage of their oil requirements than we do.

In the 12 month period ending June 30 last, we exported 60 per cent of our oil production. That is ridiculous in a country which has only a few years of conventional oil supplies left.

I can see no reason why the period for phasing out exports cannot be reduced to three years or, at the most, to four years. The minister raises a question of great importance when he says this will cause hardship to the oil-producing provinces and to the oil industry. That is true, if we phase out exports and lack facilities for sending that oil to eastern Canada. The oil would have to be kept in the ground. But I would think the minister could work out a suitable policy.

I see no reason why payment cannot be made for oil in the ground. I remember that when we did not want to export some of the surplus supplies of natural gas from Saskatchewan, because we knew we would require them, we actually paid those same companies to keep the gas in the ground until we required it. And now, of course, we do require it and are very glad to have it available. I believe the provinces and the industry could be compensated until such time as we can take the oil out of the ground.

We are running close to the line. We shall face a critical situation in 1982. I think the margin allowed by the National Energy Board is too narrow. They are counting heavily on the tar sands coming into production from 1980 on, and they are estimating that the Canadian Oil Sands Company will be producing—it is, indeed, producing now—and that Syncrude will be operating at full capacity, which is dubious, and that Shell will be in production by that time. Shell has not even started. It is supposed to start next year, or the year after, but there is no guarantee that it will. The whole report is based on the optimistic assumption that from 1980 on we shall be able to count on fairly large supplies of oil from the tar sands.

There is also the assumption that we shall be able to count on oil from the Arctic and from the east coast. But if one examines the report closely, and looks at the figures given by the different companies, one reaches the conclusion that supplies of oil from those two sources can hardly be expected before 1985-1990.

I am disappointed the minister has not told us what policies the government intends to follow to ensure these further supplies of oil when our present conventional supplies are exhausted or near exhaustion. He has delayed making a statement on this report; his statement was held over until the stock market was closed. I do not know why. All the minister is telling us is that the National Energy Board is proposing to phase out our exports over seven years, and that he intends to carry out a public relations campaign to persuade Canadians to preserve petroleum. There is certainly nothing startling about that. What we need to know are the government's policies with respect to ensuring an increase in supplies to meet the critical situation that the National Energy Board has anticipated around 1982.

The National Energy Board assumes, for instance, that in the tar sands one plant will be built every 18 months. That is at least $1 billion per plant, and with inflation we can probably add 50 per cent to that. Not only is it a financial problem, but we have yet to solve the environmental problem. A million barrels a day from the oil sands means that after the oil has been extracted you have to dispose of two million tons of loose oil sand. The environmental problems are tremendous and they have to be faced up to, now and in the future.

Arctic and frontier development will require large sums of money and manpower. What policies has the government to ensure that in only seven years we are going to have from the tar sands, and/or from the Arctic and east coast, adequate supplies of oil to meet the very critical situation that is almost upon us? I think that unless we can get some statements of policy it is very difficult for me to share the optimism either which the minister displays or which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) indicated.

To sum up, Madam Speaker, I think this country is heading into a very critical energy crisis. I think we are in a race against time. I do not like to sound like Cassandra; the only feeling of justification for so doing comes from the fact that Cassandra was right.

As I say, we are heading into a very critical situation and we have only a few years in which, firstly, to conserve the oil we have by reducing our exports, and secondly, to enter into a crash program to develop the tar sands and, if possible, to get oil from the Arctic and the east coast. Keeping in mind that so far we have not discovered any oil of commercial quantity either in the Arctic or off the east coast, we may be leaning on a broken reed. Therefore, our best hope at the moment is to get oil from the tar sands. I have seen no indication of any program that will supply the large sums of money required for that purpose.

This is a race against time, and time in this instance is not on our side.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, the National Energy Board report just tabled by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) indicates to the people of Canada that we are on the verge of an energy crisis, an oil crisis more serious in nature than we were told in October of last year. The minister however concluded on an optimistic note.

I find that hard to follow. I remember at the beginning of the session in the fall of 1973, I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources what were our reserves for eastern Canada, and whether there was danger of scarcity during the winter of 1973-74. At that time, the minister answered reserves were adequate and there was no danger whatsoever. Yet a few days later the minister said in a special debate that we were on the verge of a full energy crisis. This optimistic note by the minister now leaves me in doubt. And when I see that known Canadian reserves are adequate for 7.3 years only, even in the assumption of immediate curtailment of exports, this would give only a 2.6-year extension. There comes the immediate conclusion that we must take steps to find other sources of energy.

It is now mentioned in the province of Quebec that the investment in the hydroelectric project now under construction in my constituency will reach the $20 billion level. There is mention of investing some $80 billion in the exploitation of Albertan tar sands and Athabaska heavy oils. In other words, it will take hard cash to get heat. Madam Speaker, I suggest Canadians living now, as those living in 1980 or 1990, will not be able to repay even the interests on the investments involved in the development of resources needed for industry and everyday life. This makes evident the difficulties we are facing in such undertakings. The multinational oil companies now use the slogan to which we were accustomed by finance companies: "Travel now, pay later".

Some oil companies have followed this pattern. Since last fall, they have been telling us: Pay now for the development which will have to come later. That is what we have been forced into. Prices of gas and home heating oil have increased. Now we have to face these difficulties. Even by taking immediate action in order to reduce exports to the United-States or, at least to phase them down, we will only solve part of the problem which finally will have to be faced: storing 250,000 barrels a day in the area of Montreal until the day when we can use the pipeline which is expected to be built by the fall of 1976. The laying of the pipeline has not started yet, and given the building problems of an undertaking of this kind I, very much doubt that it might be ready then.

Madam Speaker, one thing is sure: We now know what to expect and I believe that the government, with the agreement of the provincial governments, must take immediate action to promote further exploration, not only of oil, but of any form of energy which might be used by Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. As it is past 5 o'clock p.m., the House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 o'clock p.m., under standing order 2 (1).

At 5:46 p.m., the House adjourned pursuant to the special order passed earlier today.

THE GREY CUP—SPORTS

RESULT OF THE EAST-WEST CANADIAN FOOTBALL LEAGUE CHAMPIONSHIP

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the symbol of mourning for the Edmonton Eskimos that has been placed on my desk. I rise to pay tribute to the gridiron gladiators who yesterday gave more than 100 per cent effort and, like politicians, took nothing in return but a few bruises. Never has there been a greater display of national unity than there was yesterday in Vancouver. The Grey Cup game and its festivities have done much to bring together the east and the west. To the president of the Canadian Football League, Mr. Jim Hole, to the commissioner, Mr. Jake Gaudaur, and to both teams I pay tribute. I congratulate them for their spirit of sportsmanship.

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PREMIERS OF ALBERTA, SASKATCHEWAN AND PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, what I have to do is not related to the spirit of humility which was just shown by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski). However, I am pleased to join in the tribute he paid to the players taking part in the Grey Cup game.

I wish to table correspondence between myself and premiers Lougheed and Blakeney concerning resource policy. I would do this under Standing Order 41(2), with the permission of the House. I obtained the permission of the premiers to table this correspondence only this morning, and for that reason translations have not yet been completed. I ask the indulgence of the House to table the English version only, and for permission to table the French translation a little later.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

AMENDMENT TO DISABILITY PENSION PROVISION

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-364, to amend the Canada Pension Plan.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to amend the Canada Pension Plan and remove certain existing inequities. Under the present law, in order to obtain a disability pension one has to show absolute incapacity for any substantially gainful employment. This bill would change that definition and allow one to receive a pension even though one can do something useful.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether the House might consent to momentarily revert to motions as I understand the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé) has a document she wishes to table pursuant to motions. Does the House agree?

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SHORTAGE OF LIDS AND RINGS FOR MASON JARS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of urgent and pressing necessity in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order No. 43. This pressing matter concerns the plight of an unprecedented number of Canadians who this year planted unusually large gardens or purchased large quantities of fresh fruits and vegetables from producers with plans to preserve the food for economic relief. These people were confronted with a crucial lack of lids and rings for the wide mouth reusable Mason jars used in homes across Canada for the preserving of fruits and vegetables. As a result, consumers were forced to buy new jars, complete with lids and rings, at considerable expense and a considerable wastage.

This year the western Canadian market was the most adversely affected. Until recently, this market has been dominated by cheaper imports from the United States. However, a reported shortage of plate steel used in the manufacturing of these lids—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member, as I am sure he is aware, is entitled to a very brief introduction of the nature of the subject he proposes to deal with in his motion pursuant to Standing Order 43. Perhaps the hon. member might be good enough to put his motion.

Mr. Whittaker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That in the opinion of the House the government should give immediate consideration to the undertaking of measures to alleviate the serious shortage of lids and rings for wide mouth Mason jars in an effort to protect Canadians struggling against inflation in this manner from this same frustrating obstacle next crop season.

Mr. Speaker: Frankly, I have reservations about the immediacy of the matter. However, the terms of the motion are sufficiently mixed that there may be an element of immediate urgency to the hon. member's motion. Accordingly, I will ask for the consent of the House. A motion proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 cannot be debated without the consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Sauvé.]

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be debated at this time.

SEIZURE OF HEROIN—CHARGES

Question No. 2—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Will the Minister of Justice advise if any charges against any person are still before the courts as a result of the seizure of 20 pounds of heroin on June 15, 1973 on Highway 401 near the Vancouver-Burnaby border?

2. Will the Minister advise for what reason the charges against Hing Poy Wong of 1009 Hamilton, New Westminster, British Columbia, were dropped&

3. What did the government do with the 20 pounds of heroin seized?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): 1. Hing Pay Wong was charged with possession of heroin for the purpose of trafficking and a stay of proceedings was entered in respect of that charge on February 20th, 1974.

2. The charge against Hing Poy Wong was not dropped, but a stay of proceedings was entered, because evidence that would have come to light in the course of the prosecution would have seriously prejudiced a large international investigation into heroin trafficking which was then in progress. It was believed, therefore, that the public interest would best be served by entering a stay of proceedings in connection with the charge against Hing Poy Wong. The investigation has now been completed and arrests are being made in various parts of the world including British Columbia. The charge against Hing Poy Wong is now being revived and will be proceeded with at the earliest possible opportunity.

3. The 20 lbs. of heroin seized is in the custody of the R.C.M. Police.

PERCENTAGE OF INDIAN STUDENTS IN SECONDARY SCHOOL

Question No. 178—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How does the percentage of Indian students beginning secondary schools compare with the percentage of the whole population beginning secondary schools?

2. How does the percentage of Indian students finishing and graduating from secondary schools compare with the percentage of the whole population finishing and graduating from secondary schools?

Mrs. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. The Grade 9 enrolment of registered Indian students as a percentage of the Grade 1-13 enrolment of registered Indian students is 6.7 per cent. The Grade 9 enrolment of Canadian students as a percentage of the Grade 1-13 enrolment of Canadian students is 9.2 per cent.

2. The enrolment of registered Indian students in the graduating classes of secondary schools as a percentage of the number of registered Indian students enrolled in Grades 9-13 is 11.51 per cent. The enrolment in the graduating classes of secondary schools in Canada as a percentage of the Canadian Grade 9-13 enrolment is 16.27 per cent.

NOTE: Statistics on secondary school graduates are not available.

GROWTH OF OFFICE SPACE IN GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

Question No. 195—Mr. Orlikow:

1. In the past ten years, how much new office space, by square foot, have departments (department by department) increased their office space (a) in Ottawa (b) outside Ottawa?

2. Of this space, how much is in (a) buildings owned by the government (b) privately owned buildings?

3. Of the space in government owned buildings, what was the cost of building constructions per square foot, and what is the actual cost of maintenance per building per square foot?

4. Of the space occupied in rented buildings, what is the actual rental per square foot and what is the cost to the government of maintenance per square foot?

5. For what period is the government committed to remain and to pay rent in the buildings in which they have rented quarters?

6. Does the government assume financial responsibility for structural and decorating costs of rented space?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): The information is not available to provide an accurate answer to this question. The costs in manpower and time to undertake the very large amount of work which would be required to gather such detailed data as is obtainable for the period covered by the question, would be prohibitive.

TREATMENT AND REHABILITATION OF ALCOHOLICS

Question No. 212—Mr. Howie:

What assistance, if any, is (a) now offered (b) planned to aid the provinces in providing services to treat and rehabilitate those afflicted with alcoholism?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The federal government offers various forms of aid to the provinces in providing services to treat and rehabilitate those afflicted with alcoholism: (a) Through the Non-Medical Use of Drugs Directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare, the federal government supports preventive, treatment and rehabilitation activities concerned with alcohol abuse. This support is available for research, for funding of demonstration projects, as well as for information and education. Under the Canada Assistance Plan, the federal government shares in the costs to the provinces of providing assistance and welfare services to persons afflicted with alcoholism who are in need or likely to become in need if they do not receive such assistance. The Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons Act also provides for federal cost-sharing in provincial programs. Those afflicted with alcoholism may be recognized as disabled persons and may benefit from the services provided by the provinces under this program. Rehabilitation services may include counselling, assessment services of restoration, training and employment placement. In addition, National Welfare Grants offer assistance to public and private welfare agencies for short-term research, demonstration or other kinds of projects designed to test innovative approaches to social welfare problems or to research problem areas of significance in the social welfare field. Finally, the necessary treatment provided to those afflicted with alcoholism by medical practitioners and hospital services are cost-shared by the federal government under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and the Medical Care Act. (b) The problems of persons afflicted with alcoholism are receiving on-going consideration. The federal and provincial governments are examining the whole question of rehabilitation in the context of the overall review of Canada's social security system. Services to alcoholics is one area of rehabilitation being studied. Preventive and treatment programs are likewise under study. It is anticipated that the review will be completed by the spring of 1975.

POST OFFICE—NORTHERN FREDERICTON, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 225—Mr. Howie:

1. On what date will tenders be called for the planned post office in Northern Fredericton, New Brunswick?

2. On what date will the new postal walks for door to door mail delivery be instituted in Fredericton, New Brunswick?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Public Works and Post Office as follows: 1. Subject to confirmation of Canada Post Office priorities, the Department of Public Works tentatively plans to call tenders for construction of a postal station in Northern Fredericton, N.B., in eary August 1975.

2. No date has been set. New postal walks will be placed in operation in four to six weeks providing there is no appeal from pending competition for letter carriers.

RATES OF PAY ON A REGIONAL BASIS

Question No. 291—Mr. Coates:

1. On what date was a decision taken to determine rates of pay for various classifications of public servants on a regional basis?

2. On what dates were zones established within the various regions?

[Mr. Lalonde.]

3. How often are determinations made by the Public Service as to the rates of pay for similar classifications of employees who are gainfully employed outside the Public Service?

4. In each of the zones and regions which have regional pay rates, what is the rate presently available to a public servant in receipt of regional pay to a similar classification of employee outside the Public Service?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): 1. June 29, 1922. The Civil Service Act of 1918 provided the Governor in Council with authority to exempt positions in whole or in part from the Act and to prescribe regulations where the Civil Service Commission decided that it was not practical nor in the public interest for the act to apply. Order in Council, P.C. 1053 of June 29, 1922, exempted from the Civil Service Act 144 classes of trades, unskilled and semi-skilled labour, and domestic service occupations under this enabling provision. The employees so exempted were paid rates comparable with those prevailing in the locality in which they were employed.

2. September 27, 1968. Pay zones were defined as such for the first time and established as part of the initial collective agreement for the General Labour and Trades Group which was signed by the Public Service Alliance of Canada and the Treasury Board on September 27, 1968. These pay zones replaced the prevailing rate pay system which had provided rates for more than 350 localities.

3. The federal government, as employer, primarily utilizes Pay Research Bureau (Public Service Staff Relations Board) and Labour Canada data on rates paid outside the public service in the determination of rates of pay of public service employees. The PRB surveys are conducted periodically at the request of the parties to collective bargaining to meet their needs, and the Labour Canada survey is conducted annually.

4. It is the policy of the federal government, as employer, to pay rates of pay which are comparable with those paid for similar work performed outside the public service. Through the process of collective bargaining the employer negotiates new public service rates of pay which are comparable to those prevailing in the region or zone at the time of negotiations together with a further pay adjustment for a later date based on expected rate changes for the classification or group.

CANADIAN DIPLOMATIC MISSIONS AND EMBASSIES—ENTERTAINMENT COSTS

Question No. 328—Mr. Coates:

1. What was the cost of entertainment provided Canadian Diplomat Missions and Embassies in each fiscal year 1973-74, 1968-69 and 1963-64?

2. What sum is requested as a forecast expenditure for entertainment provided by Canadian Diplomat Missions and Embassies in the fiscal year 1974-75?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned: 1. 1973-74, $1,010,000 (estimated); 1968-69, $764,-940.36; 1963-64, in accordance with government policy on the destruction of public records, the files containing the requested information have been destroyed.

2. 1974-75 $1,070,000 (projected).

In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1. During 1973/74 officers overseas were reimbursed for direct entertainment costs totalling $545,990. No figures are available for 1968/69 and 1963/64.

2. For 1974/75, the forecasted expenditure is $580,000.

In so far as the Department of Manpower and Immigration is concerned: 1. 1973-74, $117,517; 1968-69, $35,309; 1963-64, The historical records required to reply to this fiscal year have been destroyed under authority of T.B. Minute 615 320 of September 11, 1963 and Order in Council P.C. 1966-1749.

2. $94,000.

CHILEAN IMMIGRATION

Question No. 367—Mr. Dick:

1. (a) How many persons have immigrated to Canada from Chile since September 11, 1973 (b) what is the name of each such immigrant and in what country did he or she live during 1969 and in what country was he or she born?

2. (a) Other than the immigrants who have landed in Canada in answer to Part 1, how many persons presently in Chile have been granted visas to enter Canada as immigrants but have not as yet arrived (b) what are the names of each such persons and in what country did he or she live during 1969 and in what country was he or she born?

3. Are there any security reasons, or otherwise, which would make it inapporpriate or improper to supply the names and, if so, will the government answer the questions by granting each person a number and supplying the appropriate information beside that number?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. (a) between September 11, 1973 and September 16, 1974, 1,098 persons whose country of last permanent residence was Chile have entered Canada; (b) it is not considered to be in the public interest to divulge the names of these persons. Particulars concerning their country of birth have not yet been tabulated. Particulars of their country of residence during 1969 can only be gathered by a physical search of their applications. These applications remain at the posts abroad and the Department does not have the resources available to make this search.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. The theme for its 1973 Annual Report was "people" as evidenced by the photographs. Inclusion of the Port of Halifax container facilities would, therefore, have been inappropriate.

4. Will newsprint companies that participated in the investigation be asked to contribute to the outlay?

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Newsprint Distribution Research contracted the services of one of the foremost United States rail transportation and warehousing research groups to assist in the identification of distribution alternatives for newsprint which would improve the Canadian industry's United States marketing efforts: (a) The consultants fee was included in the total cost of the Newsprint Distribution Research (NDR) sector of the newsprint distribution study undertaken jointly by NDR and the Canadian National Railways; (b) In the opinion of NDR the high degree of experience required in the field of rail transportation, warehousing and cartage, in the United States where much of the work was to be done, was not available in Canada at the time the study was undertaken.

2. Yes, within the terms of reference of the study. Although line-haul benefits were uncovered, using the newsprint train concept, these were offset by increased costs for warehousing, truck delivery and inventory carrying charges at both producer's mill and United States warehouse.

3. Stevenson and Kellogg Limited were engaged by NDR to provide an independent evaluation of NDR operational methods. It is understood that NDR and CN intend to make the report public by the end of November.

WITHDRAWAL OF QUESTION No. 67

Question No. 911—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What is the reason that the answer to Question No. 67 asking for certain details about the use of the National Conference Centre by the Liberal Party was suddenly withdrawn on Wednesday, November 20, 1974 after the answer had been prepared and after the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council had announced in the House that the Question would be answered as of that date?

2. What is the identity of all persons who asked for withdrawal, gave instructions for withdrawal or had anything whatsoever to do with withdrawal of the answer to this question?

3. Will Question No. 67 be answered and on what date?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. The answer was withdrawn because it appeared to be incorrect as was question No. 389, at the same time for the same reason.

2. Mr. John Reid, M.P., Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council.

3. As soon as the answer is satisfactory.

ENERGY

OIL—GOVERNMENT FORECAST OF RESERVES USED AS BASIS OF POLICIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON GUARANTEEING SUPPLY TO EASTERN PROVINCES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It arises from the forecast made by the National Energy Board with regard to the producibility of oil in Canada in the next eight to ten years in relation to the projected demand. I should like to ask whether government policies in relation to oil and the positions the government has taken during the past year have been based upon similar forecasts; in other words, whether, for these purposes, the predictions made by the department are substantially the same as those of the National Energy Board.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Subject to confirmation, I think I can say that the department's estimates with respect to reserves have been the same as those of the National Energy Board, both in the orange report prepared prior to December, 1972, and the report tabled on Friday night. The difference has arisen with respect to the question of producibility—the rate at which those reserves can be made available. After a year of full production in the major producing areas, the conclusion has been reached that the anticipated rate of producibility was overstated. That is the reason for the rather more pessimistic view taken recently.

Mr. Stanfield: Since the department has been somewhat more optimistic than the National Energy Board in its forecasts of producibility in the next few years, does the minister contemplate abandoning the stated policy designed to guarantee security of supply to the eastern provinces having regard to the fact that the National Energy Board envisages only 250,000 barrels a day going to the east—scarcely a quarter of the present market there?

● (1420)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, that statement is, of course, always made within the context of Canadian supplies being available, and in particular additional supplies being developed in Canada on the frontier, either offshore or in the Arctic. It does, of course, remain our objective to move towards self-sufficiency, although the difficulties in this, given the environment in which we are operating both in the north and on the east coast, should not be underrated.

OIL—JUSTIFICATION FOR PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT CONCERNING ABANDONMENT OF OTTAWA VALLEY LINE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A final supplementary question for the Prime Minister, who on December 6, 1973 made a statement which seemed to be in no way conditional. As reported at page 8478 of Hansard the Prime Minister said:

> The new policy will abolish the "Ottawa Valley Line". The Canadian market for oil will no longer be divided in two, one for domestically produced oil and another for imported oil. It will thus be a "one-Canada", not a "two-Canada" oil policy. The western provinces will have guaranteed outlet for increased production; and the eastern provinces will be guaranteed security of supply.

May I ask the Prime Minister how he justifies such a statement as that in view of the answers the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has just given to the two preceding questions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has just indicated in his reply that the policy was subject to the oil being there. The policy remains the same. If, of course, in a certain number of years there is less oil, we shall have to share it differently.

REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL OF PROVISIONS RELATING TO OIL SANDS FROM BILL C-32

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, still on the subject of the importance of guaranteeing supply of oil, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance based on the report of the National Energy Board put out last Friday in which it was stated—I am quoting—that "the rate of oil sands plant construction will be clearly influenced" by points inclusive of "incentives offered by provincial and federal governments in terms of taxation".

In view of the fact that Bill C-32, which is before parliament at the present time, relates to development of the oil sands and provides for price controls in the regulations, would the minister make a public statement to reassure the oil companies who are willing to put their millions into this type of proposal that he will withdraw the oil sands provisions from Bill C-32 and restore his original undertaking to these companies to provide the export price to oil sands oil?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my undertaking to the Syncrude operation was that the tax arrangement made between the companies and the province of Alberta and the federal government would not be affected by the budgetary provisions. That was the limit of that undertaking.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain may put a final supplementary.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in view of what the minister has just said, that the budgetary undertakings will not interfere with the understanding to the Syncrude group, I should now like to ask the Minister of Finance whether it is not a fact that Bill C-32, which in effect puts price controls on oil from the oil sands, interferes with the agreement that he undertook?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That would not be my interpretation of it, Mr. Speaker.

ENERGY

OIL—SUGGESTED REDUCTION IN PERIOD FOR PHASING OUT EXPORTS—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE FOUR PLANTS OPERATING FROM OIL SANDS BY 1983

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the National Energy Board report tabled on Friday estimates that Canada's self-sufficiency in oil will probably end in 1982 and that it recommends that our exports should be continued on a declining scale until 1982, is there any reason why this seven-year phase out period could not be reduced to three years, with appropriate compensation for shut in oil, in order to give Canada additional time to bring alternative sources of oil on stream?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the critical element in the hon. member's question is the reference to appropriate compensation for shut-in oil. Of course, the general taxpayer would be the one to make this kind of compensation payment. The government's conclusion is that, both from the standpoint of our relationships with the United States and of sustaining the levels of income of the two producing provinces, it is preferable to phase it out over a longer time frame than doing as the hon. member suggested on Friday evening, shutting it down in two or three years time.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that the National Energy Board's estimate of having alternative oil supplies on stream coincides very closely with the end of our self-sufficiency, and is based on the assumption that there will be three oil producing plants in the Athabasca tar sands by 1982, and four plants in 1983, I should like to ask whether the minister can give the House a firm assurance that these plants will be in operation, or is this merely an optimistic assumption? I would ask the minister specifically whether he can assure the House that the Shell Oil Company plant and the Mining No. 4 plant will be in operation in 1983 when we have gone beyond the point of self-sufficiency?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the institution and operation of oil sands plants fall entirely within the jurisdiction of the government of Alberta, and there is no way the government of Canada can be assured that that government will direct its policy in such a way that these plants will be on stream within any time frame. I would have to say that what the board was doing in exercising its judgment was giving its best estimate, given the desire of certain of these companies to bring these plants into operation when they would be able to do so, and taking into account the regulatory delays that may occur in Alberta, as well as the cost and other factors they would have to face.

SARNIA-MONTREAL PIPELINE—ALTERNATIVE IF INTERPROVINCIAL DOES NOT CONSTRUCT—DATE OF COMPLETION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of that uncertainty, it would seem to be rather wise to telescope the phasing out period. In view of the fact that the Interprovincial Pipeline Company asked for an adjournment until the National Energy Board Report was tabled, and also until it got some assurance of a $25 million a year return from that pipeline, and in view of the fact the minister has stated that the company has now got cold feet, may I ask the Minister what assurance he can now give the House in respect of the construction of that pipeline, the approximate date of completion and whether he has any alternative proposal to make in the event the company does not proceed with the construction of this line?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the company and the National Energy Board have had extensive discussions and correspondence with regard to the financial impact in the 1980's if such a line ceased to be producing revenue at any point. My understanding is that these discussions have now stalemated. It would be my intention to put to my colleagues a suggestion as to how we might act at the government level, as opposed to the National Energy Board level, to try to overcome this last obstacle to the Montreal pipeline.

POSSIBLE COMPROMISE WITH PROVINCES ON PROVISIONS OF BILL C-32 AND BUDGETARY PROVISIONS RELATING TO OIL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that the Minister of Finance said on Sunday on the TV program "Question Period" that the compromise door was always open between the federal and provincial governments, was the minister suggesting as a result of that statement that he is prepared to compromise the terms and conditions of the bill referred to by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, and also to compromise the harsh tax measures brought in by the budget?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would think, in view of the fact that in the budget we backed off from the May 6 proposal by about 25 per cent, $100 million this year and $170 million in the year 1975, and more thereafter, and in restoring the 100 per cent immediate writeoff for exploration expenses, compromise might be looked at now from the provincial side.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I take it from what the minister has said that the compromise is laid out in the budget and he does not intend to take one step further in compromising the other matter so as to assure a greater supply for Canada and maybe fulfil the export commitment just made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, that he is now standing firm and there will be no further compromise with the provinces in that regard? Is that his harsh position?

● (1430)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman would read the budget speech again, it would be indicated to him that I took account of the problem of declining reserves of petroleum in this country and the need for new exploration and development which is why the 100 per cent immediate write-off was restored, why the abatement was raised from 20 per cent to 25 per cent and why the federal tax was reduced from 30 per cent to 25 per cent. I would now hope that the government of the province of Alberta, sharing my concern for the future of the health of that industry, would also react.

FARM MACHINERY PRICES—POSSIBILITY OF BARBER COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in th absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I should like to put my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the spectacular price increase for farm machinery, which leads to heavier production costs, could the Prime Minister tell the House whether the government will follow the recommendations of the Barber report by enforcing antitrust legislation in that area?

PUBLIC SERVICE

STRIKE OF GRAIN INSPECTORS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO SETTLE—JUSTIFICATION OF GOVERNMENT OFFER

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the fact that Canadian grain shipments have once again ground to a halt, this time as a result of the grain inspectors strike, could the minister bring the House up to date on the current status of negotiations and advise the House what steps the government is taking to ensure that grain shipments will be returned to normal as quickly as possible.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry there is a strike in that sector. The officials of my department and the representatives of the Public Service Alliance met Saturday afternoon; they also spent part of Sunday holding a meeting and are still holding one at this very moment. I believe some progress has been made and I trust they will soon come to an agreement. I understand the strike is legal. The civil servants had the right to take that attitude. We do hope that in the course of those meetings a solution to the problem can be found quickly.

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: I have a supplementary for the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Speaker. Since this dispute arises largely from the government's mishandling of the grainhandlers' strike which saw a 61 per cent or 54 per cent settlement imposed upon the grain elevator companies—and I say 61 per cent or 54 per cent because of the calculation which could be made—could he explain to the House and this country how the government could possibly justify an original offer of 11½ per cent over a 27-month period to the grain inspectors at a time when the bench mark of 61 per cent has been established which now clearly becomes the basis for future negotiations in labour.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we made initial offers but as a result of conciliation, a majority report was submitted to the government, which the latter endorsed. There was also a minority report and we followed normal procedures during negotiations. We hope present negotiations will give results. The Parliament of Canada gave the civil servants the right to strike and we must follow standard procedures. I fail to see why we should not respect their right to strike at this time.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Vegreville on a final supplementary.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, since the strike seems to be far from being settled, I wonder whether the minister would consult the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Justice who seem to be more liberal in respect of labour negotiations?

POSITION OF GRAINHANDLERS AT PRINCE RUPERT—ASSURANCE OF ROLE FOR PORT IN EXPORT OF GRAIN

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the President of the Treasury Board as well. While the officials are holding discussions with the Public Service Alliance in respect of the problems with regard to the grain inspectors at Vancouver has the minister or any of his officials discussed the matter of the port of Prince Rupert where the grain handlers are much behind their counterparts at the port of Vancouver and will he ensure that the port of Prince Rupert will play the role it could play in western Canada in respect of the transport of grain to other countries.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, this means all inspectors of primary products and not only wheat inspectors working in the ports. A much greater number of public servants are therefore involved and we are dealing with the problem. As for grain carriers in Prince Rupert, their problem is different and we are trying to solve it if necessary.

OIL—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON MAINTAINING AND FINANCING ONE-CANADA PRICING POLICY

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to earlier questions asked of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In light of the fact that the export reductions proposed by the minister will make Canada a net importer of oil next fall, that is, prior to the time the new extension is completed of the Montreal-Sarnia pipeline, is the government still committed to maintain a one-Canada oil pricing policy and, if so, how does the government propose to finance the price subsidy when we get into a new-import position?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this of course is a question we will look forward to discussing with the provinces in the context of discussions taking place about the future of the on-going prices from July 1.

AUTOMOBILES—DISCUSSION WITH INDUSTRY REPRESENTATIVES ON PROSPECTS FOR FURTHER LAY-OFFS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. On Friday I asked the minister a question concerning automotive lay-offs in Windsor, St. Thomas, Ajax and Oshawa and what steps he was about to take to deal with the increasingly serious situation. The minister in reply said two things: first, that he did not expect a large number of lay-offs and, second, that those which would occur would be of a short and periodic nature. In light of the fact that, either while he was speaking in the House on Friday answering the question or the previous evening, the Ford Motor Company was announcing further lay-offs in Oakville and Talbotville, almost one-fifth of which were of permanent duration, I should like to ask the minister if this new information has caused him to alter his judgment at all concerning whether or not we can expect further significant long-range lay-offs in the automotive industry and if so what he intends to do about it?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Ford Motor Company advised me that 145 hourly and 50 salaried employees will be laid off indefinitely at Oakville at the end of the month.

Mr. Broadbent: How about Talbotville?

Mr. Gillespie: Some of the lay-offs result from steps taken following the completion of the new model launch and others I am told are due to a cost-cutting program due to declining sales. With regard to the Talbotville plant I have been told that what had been planned as a one-week lay-off has been extended to two weeks.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I would add the information that this has been extended beyond the period the minister has indicated. I should like to ask the minister whether his department has consulted at the directorship level of the automotive companies concerning some of their expectations about further lay-offs in the assembly plant operations in the coming weeks and related to that has he or his officials consulted with the parts industry which accounts for about half the employment in the industry to find out what are their expectations? If so, is he prepared to tell us what the government plans to do about this?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have had a number of conversations with the presidents of automotive manufacturing companies and representatives of the auto parts industry. They are concerned, as I am concerned and as I know hon. members in this House are concerned, about the prospects in the automotive industry particularly as a result of decline in the United States market. I think that this situation would underline the interdependence of our two markets. Notwithstanding that, the words that I received from the senior officials of the Canadian automobile manufacturers is that they are cautiously optimistic about this year and the coming year as well. That is not to say that there are not dangers; I have clearly indicated that there are but I think the situation is best put in those terms, that there is still a cautious optimism about the coming months.

AUTOMOBILES—SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF DIFFERENTIAL IN PRICE BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I address my last supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the minister has progressed from "optimism" on Friday to "cautious optimism" today about the fate of the industry when everybody else who knows anything about it is extremely pessimistic, can the Prime Minister tell the House if the minister was stating government policy last week when he said that the government would do nothing more about bringing down the price of cars sold in Canada to the same level as those sold in the United States, for which there is ample economic justification and, since that is the best means of increasing sales and hence employment, does the government intend to do anything about narrowing the price gap in the next few weeks?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

EFFECT OF EXCISE TAX ON PLEASURE CRAFT ON SMALL BOAT BUILDING INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ALLEVIATE RESULTANT UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. The proposal for a special excise tax of 10 per cent on all pleasure craft will strike a detrimental blow to the small boat industry in Nova Scotia, and especially to the builders in my constituency who are already struggling in the grip of inflationary costs. In view of the increased unemployment that this tax will create in the small boat industry, may I ask the minister if he consulted with the minister of Regional Economic Expansion before proposing this levy and what steps will be taken to assist those who become unemployed as a result of it?

SUGGESTED REVIEW OF ABORTION PROVISION—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. In light of the recent pilot survey carried out in British Columbia on implementation of the 1969 abortion amendment which showed that hospitals were critical of the difficulties inherent in interpreting the abortion law, does the government have any intention of forming a committee to thoroughly investigate the question of the law as it now stands at the same time giving organizations the opportunity to present their views on a matter so important to all Canadians?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we do not have any present intention of forming a committee as a means of inquiry into the operation of the law but we have the matter in hand otherwise.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the dilemma of not only hospital boards but thousands of Canadians which is caused by the uncertainties in interpreting present abortion laws, can the Prime Minister advise the House whether the government intends to clarify the situation by announcing in the near future a clear government policy either pro or antiabortion and could he let us know which direction the government intends to take?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the clear government policy is to abide by the law as it now stands on the book and to make sure it is respected everywhere. I hope the Tories have as clear a policy.

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): I could not say, Mr. Speaker, if the departments to which the hon. member referred would be involved in the future of the Deputy Minister of the Environment but it is true that from February 19, he will be in the employ of the company mentioned.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

EMPLOYMENT OF CIVIL SERVANTS BY COMPANIES WHOSE INTERESTS ARE IN THEIR AREA OF RESPONSIBILITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister? Is the right hon. gentleman satisfied that the oath of secrecy covers the question of conflict of interest and public interest regarding this practice or is his intention to prepare guidelines on the appointment of deputy ministers and other officials in sensitive positions that would remove, for a period of time, after leaving the government, their freedom to work for companies or institutions that may have a direct and immediate interest in the areas that involve responsibilities of deputy ministers and those officials?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I apologize but I missed the previous exchange. In so far as the question itself is concerned, the government did consider this alternative and it was rejected. I think if it were to apply to civil servants it would have to apply to all members of the House and we do not think that members of the House would want to apply that rule to themselves. However, we will see, when the matter comes before the House on the conflict of interest guidelines.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the right hon. Prime Minister missed part of the question. I wonder if I could ask if he is satisfied that in such case the oath of secrecy is a sufficient protection to the public interest for those who are employed in such areas subsequent to their employment in sensitive government areas. I say that, Mr. Speaker, because the hon. Minister of the Environment said in answer to my question on November 15 that she felt the oath of secrecy was sufficient.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I repeat, I missed the previous exchange and when the hon. member talked about "in such case", I do not know what case he is talking about.

Mr. Fraser: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I respect what the right hon. gentleman has said. The case is that of a deputy minister or other official in a very sensitive position being employed afterwards by the private sector or corporations or individuals that may have a very, very direct interest in the information which those particular people acquired in the course of their responsibilities with the government.

Mr. Fairweather: Insiders.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, frankly I have no further solution to this difficulty and I see it as a real one. I do not think it is a practical alternative to suggest that when officials or ministers or for that matter civil servants or members of parliament, have departed from their particular employment that they be in some way restricted as to the use of their freedom. I would hope that their oath of secrecy and their innate honesty would guide them in the circumstances that the hon. member suggests.

POST OFFICE

EFFECT OF DECERTIFICATION OF UNION ON PAYROLL DEDUCTION OF UNION DUES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Postmaster General and may I say we welcome him safely back from his sojourn in the land of his fathers where he was attending the funeral of a very distinguished president. May I ask the Postmaster General, since the decertification of the Council of Postal Unions if he or his officials have circulated a memorandum to all postal employees informing them that they can now opt out of the checkoff for union dues?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the question raised by the hon. gentleman is one that is rather contentious and has created a certain amount of controversy within the postal ranks. To be precise, under the law we have no right to deduct dues from members for unions that have been decertified. What we have is an alternative suggestion, one which was discussed with the heads of the various unions, that we would continue to make the appropriate deduction from the payroll unless notified in writing by individuals working in the post office that they no longer wished to pay union dues to the union with which they are associated.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What gives you legal authority to do that?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the sensitivity of this issue and the necessity of good labour relations in restoring the efficiency of the post office, could the Postmaster General circulate a memo assuring all employees that, notwithstanding decertification, the government is honouring the terms of the collective agreement?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. What is the question—"could"the minister have done that as a suggestion or "has" the minister done it? I did not understand the question. One is hypothetical and the other is argument.

Mr. Dinsdale: Could he, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, when the Postal Council applied for and was granted decertification by the Public Service Staff Relations Board it was suggested by the chairman that although the collective agreement is null and void, as many features of it as possible be recognized on an official basis. We have done so. The only part of the question looked into by the Department of Justice officers concerned the propriety of deducting payroll union dues of those members who were theoretically no longer covered by a collective agreement. In effect and in summary, we are enforcing all features of the collective agreement, including the deduction of union dues which are turned over to the appropriate union, unless otherwise notified by postal employees who no longer want these union dues deducted from their pay.

FINANCE

REASON FOR ALLOWANCE OF ROYALTIES PAYABLE TO FOREIGN JURISDICTIONS AS DEDUCTIBLE EXPENSE BUT NOT THOSE PAYABLE TO PROVINCES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Is the minister aware that it is present government policy to allow resource royalties payable by Canadian corporations to foreign jurisdictions such as Guatemala to be deductible from their income before federal taxation, while it is proposed to deny this privilege to such companies with respect to provincial royalties. If the minister is aware of this, will he explain why a provincial royalty is not an expense of doing business, while a foreign royalty is considered as an expense of doing business?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

STUDY RECOMMENDING MAIL DELIVERY BE LEFT WITH PRIVATE CONTRACTORS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. In view of the startling revelation by Mr. D. S. McConnell, president of the McConnell Nursery Company of Port Burwell, Ontario, that the postal strike of April, 1974, cost his firm more than half a million dollars, and that he can no longer chance issuing his seed catalogue for 1975 because of the threat of postal strikes and poor mail delivery, will the minister now consider implementing the recommendations contained in the $.25 million Samson, Belair, Riddel and Stead study which recommended that mail delivery be left in the hands of private contractors who deliver mail more efficiently and economically.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, that report, I think, was published in 1969. My hon. friend may or may not have been here then, but I remind him that the question of the efficiency of private enterprise arose in connection with the Lapalme dispute.

Mr. McKenzie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I think I am as familiar with the document as the Postmaster General is. Will he consider reviewing the recommendations of the report and report back to the House, as the firm making the report goes into extensive detail on the advantages of private contractors handling mail delivery.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, this involves a question of philosophy, really. Last April the gentleman to whom the hon. member referred suffered financial hardship and, if he is not prepared to take a chance again, it means that people will have to turn to some other firm for their seed catalogues. As to whether private enterprise can handle more efficiently than the post office the delivery of mail by truck, let me remind the hon. member that the matter was faced by the department. It decided one year or so ago to phase into the post office various contracts which had expired in the private sector.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR INCREASED FUNDS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Considering the appreciable reduction of employment in forestry work, especially in saw mills—and this problem has occurred after the allotments of grants under LIP—would the minister reconsider the distribution of those funds or recommend to the cabinet the provision of supplementary estimates for local initiatives projects for the next season?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will give full consideration to the representations of the hon. member and give them full thought.

Mr. Stevens: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the minister was prepared to answer my question, which I certainly intended to be a question on policy. Is it government policy to allow royalties payable to foreign governments to be deductible, whereas royalties paid to provinces may not be deductible?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member's memory is not keen on the point, but that form of question directed to a minister is not acceptable under the terms of reference of the question period, which have been discussed recently. In addition, the request for a minister to interpret a statute concerning legal liability under the statute is not acceptable, according to precedent. This is distinct from the sort of question put to the Prime Minister as to whether a minister was pronouncing government policy when he made a certain statement at a certain time. That would be different, in order and quite acceptable. The request that a minister of the Crown interpret a statute and legal liability under that statute is not proper in the question period, according to my understanding of the rules. The hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a further point of order. Could I direct my question to the Prime Minister?

Mr. Speaker: In due course. The hon. member for Greenwood.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED LOAN OF FIFTY MILLION DOLLARS TO SOUTH VIET NAM—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Did the Canadian representative at the October 17 meeting of the World Bank or its associates at Paris support, tacitly or explicitly, an American proposal for a $50 million advance to the Saigon régime, apart altogether from making any actual commitment.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that we did not support the proposal in fact, in principle, or in any way at all.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs undertake to inform parliament before any such commitment is made to bolster the Saigon régime, whose disregard for fundamental human rights is notorious.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the whole issue seems to be somewhat hypothetical. At the moment I am inclined to doubt whether that eventuality will take place at all, whether we will subscribe to that kind of participation.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

WATER QUALITY—SUGGESTED STUDY BY DEPARTMENT IN VIEW OF POSSIBLE CONTAMINATION

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. In view of alarming allegations in the United States that drinking water taken from the Mississippi and other rivers is being severely contaminated by materials which were formerly considered to be non-contaminants, is the government of Canada planning to undertake studies similar to those initiated in the United States, to ensure the quality of water consumed by Canadians.

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the quality of our water is constantly being tested by Canadian authorities. I should like to know to what precise problem the hon. member is referring in connection with the Mississippi River. If difficulties arise in other parts of the world of which we did not know before, we immediately take measures to look into the situation, to see if the same conditions exist in our own country.

Mr. Wenman: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister suggested that studies are being undertaken. Can she tell the House under whose authority those studies are undertaken, in order to assure Canadian people that Canadian water supplies are safe and uncontaminated. To which studies was the minister referring?

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, numerous studies are undertaken. Water quality and possible hazardous effects on health are looked after by the Department of National Health and Welfare. We rely on the information given to us by that department. If new difficulties arise, we initiate studies in order to find out if there is a problem.

STATISTICS CANADA

SUGGESTED INVASION OF PRIVACY AS RESULT OF QUESTIONS ASKED DURING SURVEYS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Regardless of the supposed, and I stress "supposed", confidentiality of data collected from surveyed individuals by Statistics Canada for surveys such as the one on food expenditure presently being undertaken by the ministry, does not the minister feel that information on topics such as family mortgages held, stocks and bonds held, land interests, cigarettes, personal care articles and alcohol purchased, as sought by Statistics Canada, is a serious invasion of privacy; and, regardless of the supposed necessity for this information, does not the minister believe that being forced to answer questions of a private concern under threat of prosecution is an unreasonable and unjust intimidation of personal freedom?

An hon. Member: Snoop!

● (1500)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the act governing the operations of Statistics Canada is very precise with respect to protecting the privacy and confidentiality of the information.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, it is still mandatory and the result is a police state.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a supplementary question?

Mr. Darling: I want the minister to answer the question. What he is doing is making a demand on the privacy of an individual as compared to a commercial request or something of that nature.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS INTERNATIONAL UNION—SUGGESTED CONSULTATION WITH ONTARIO OFFICIALS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Solicitor General in light of the fact he is now working with the Minister of Labour in order to determine some of the facts regarding the Seafarers International Union. Does the minister intend to meet with the solicitor general of the province of Ontario and the attorney general of the province of Ontario in order to gather all the facts that are available and which I think will assist the Minister of Labour when he returns from the ILO Conference in Mexico to call for an inquiry into the whole matter involving the Seafarers International Union?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, at the request of the Minister of Labour, I have asked the RCMP to look into the allegations made against officials of the Department of Labour. The RCMP are doing that and I expect a report from them shortly.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the minister deliberately did not hear my question. In the absence of the Minister of Labour, I asked the Solicitor General when he will be meeting with the solicitor general of the province of Ontario and the attorney general of the province of Ontario in order to gather all the facts, thereby putting the Minister of Labour in a position when he returns from Mexico in another five or six days to determine whether an inquiry should be brought about immediately. I want to know whether the minister is going to see these provincial ministers.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I have no intention at the present time to meet with the solicitor general or attorney general of Ontario. When we ask the police to investigate something, they do it free from political interference.

AIR TRANSPORT

TAX ON AIRLINE TICKETS—ALLEGED HARDSHIP ON TRAVEL AGENTS

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. Since the government in its wisdom chose to try to recover some of the cost of security checks at airports and has imposed a tax on airline tickets to defray these expenses, will the government correct the inequity which has been created by virtue of the fact that taxes collected from Canadian travel agents, whether the ticket be for a trip within Canada or a trip with the point of origin and destination both outside Canada, is causing a severe hardship for travel agents within our borders?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to refer the question to the minister.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SURVEILLANCE FLIGHTS IN THE ARCTIC—INADEQUACY OF FROBISHER BAY FACILITIES—SUGGESTION EUROPEAN COUNTRIES MIGHT PATROL CANADIAN TERRITORY

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Last week the minister announced the resumption of two flights in a six-month period in the Arctic. Was he aware at that time that the necessary maintenance base at Frobisher Bay had been closed; the doors locked, telephones disconnected and the communications centre run down? Does the minister intend to service these two flights with existing resources or with additional help?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to tell the hon. member that Canada has two coasts and that we can fly to the high Arctic from Comox without going near Frobisher Bay.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I am fully aware that Canada has two coasts. I am concerned about this Minister of National Defence. What I am most apprehensive about is that this minister does not know anything about the armed services. He does not know we have three coasts, not two.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: My question was not answered. I know the minister does not have to answer it. My supplementary question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Because of our reduced operational activity in the Pacific and the Atlantic and thus our reduced presence, particularly in the Atlantic, has the minister been advised by any country, and I am thinking of three European countries, that they are sending additional ships to patrol in our pollution zone areas off our coasts next year?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nowlan: Will the minister check with his department and advise this House. Britain said it would send seven destroyers here next year. Germany has already notified this country that at least one, if not two, destroyers are coming here. These European countries will be establishing some presence in our fishing grounds. England was kicked off the fishing grounds of Iceland.

Mr. Speaker: Order of the day.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Friday, November 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stanfield (p. 1502).

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, when the debate was adjourned last Friday, I was saying that young people who want to go into business have great difficulty in obtaining the necessary loans to realize their projects. That is regrettable since most of them now have a trade and an excellent training, and if they cannot use this knowledge, these talents, the entire Canadian society loses because these young people are not contributing to increase production or provide services. This certainly does not help to reduce inflation as these young people are still consumers even though they are not producers at the same time.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, in view of the present cost of education, this is too much to pay for training the unemployed.

In his speech, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) talked a great deal about the inflation problem without suggesting any new formulas to solve it. He only repeated well known measures. The government tries such or such a measure, and if this does not work, it recommends starting over again by using the same recipe in case some ingredients were omitted. Here is what the minister said in his speech, and I quote:

> We cannot expect to eliminate inflation overnight. It will be a prolonged and tough fight. But we are striving to get the rate of inflation down below the two-digit level next year. It will take a determined effort on the part of all sectors of our society. Self-discipline and a good measure of political courage to get it down to 5 per cent over the next few years.

In another part of his speech, the minister said, and I quote:

> We are confronted by the twin problems of inflation and slower growth. They are very closely related, since inflation—if allowed to get out of hand—threatens the continued growth of real income, production and employment.

Really, Mr. Speaker, one would have to be blind or of bad faith not to recognize that our economic system is unsatisfactory and needs reforms.

Those who benefit from the present system, trusts, monopolies and even some politicians, prefer the status quo. But the working classes, low income families and individuals, are this system's victims, therefore they are not delighted with it. It is on behalf of these classes of people that I now speak in this House, to ask Parliament to bring in reforms before it is too late. To cure an illness, one must first of all know its cause. The same holds true for inflation, to cure it, one must first know its major causes.

In my opinion, these major causes are: First, interest rates which are too high; second, the increase in debts and the cost of their financing, both in the public and private sectors; third, excessively high tax rates which are eating up progressively larger and larger portions of the salary of human labour.

If there is no change soon in the present policy in respect of the credit which is necessary to finance the public sector, in respect of interests and taxation, our system and economy might very well collapse under the pyramid of our debts and taxes. One needs only look at statistics for confirmation of this statement.

We must remedy this situation. When the Minister of Finance stated that a strong dose of political courage would be necessary, he was right. The government will have to be strong also against the powerful and the monopolies, so that they will no longer destroy through their abuses the gains we expect from social legislation and job-creating programs such as LIP, in which this government certainly did not invest enough money this year, because of the increase in unemployment.

"We shall have to take the bull by the horns", as the Chairman of the Board of directors of the Bank of Montreal said in a speech which appeared in the annual report of this bank for 1973.

Dealing with the inflation problem, he stated that indexation will solve nothing. This is my opinion too. It's a plaster on a wooden leg. The only efficient action, he said, is to take the bull by the horns in grappling with the very essentials of inflation. In another part of this same speech, the minister said the following: "But this question is beyond the interest of each of the social groups, and neither investors nor labour nor any interest group, in spite of the quality of its organization, has the skill and the responsibility to rise to that global understanding. Only the state can. It alone is responsible for that." And he goes on to say: "It's time to make the essential choices. Will our elected representatives understand it?" This is, Mr. Speaker, another banker who speaks like a Social Crediter. Will the Minister of Finance believe this one?

As a solution to the problem of inflation, we Social Crediters are suggesting something. We are sometimes told: "You are always criticizing, but you never suggest any solution!" Today, Mr. Speaker, I will make very concrete suggestions and put them on very solid basis. First, immediate adoption by Parliament of a law guaranteeing each Canadian a minimum income. This income would be added to revenues provided by each person's efforts and would not be part of prices. Second, passage of legislation authorizing old age security pension payments as early as age 60 for those who wish to retire and also for those who are unemployed but also need income to live. Third, a discount on Canadian products sold at retail. I will say more on that later on if possible. Fourth, financing in the public sector using credits from the Bank of Canada and on which carrying charges would not be higher than administration costs.

This new method of financing would put an end to the competition that the Canadian and provincial governments are now providing for the private sector on the money market. This would lower interest rates on the capital necessary to industry in general. It would also contribute to a decrease in production costs and therefore, in prices.

In his 1975-76 budget, the Minister of Finance provides an amount of $3 billion and a half for interest on the public debt. That is exactly one billion more than for 1973-74. If that is not a real cancer gnawing at the vitals of society, Mr. Speaker, I wonder what cancer is? The way things are going, more than 10 per cent of the budget will soon be used just to pay interest on the public debt.

It is not normal that a sovereign government should be forced to finance the country's expenses by kowtowing to those who have the privilege of making money with the country's credit by plucking out of the blue the money they lend government. That is no more and no less than slavery and it is therefore vain to speak of democracy.

A sovereign government must realize that it has the power and the duty to create and monitor the instrument of exchange the people of this country need for their exchanges of products and services.

It may be argued that if that formula were good other countries would have tried it before today. To those people I say that President Lincoln used it successfully in the United States from 1860 to 1864. It is true that he paid with his life the courage and the guts of having dared put money at the service of his fellow man.

● (1520)

Another American by the name of Goldsborough introduced a bill in the U.S. House of Representatives on August 22, 1935. The purpose of that bill was to restore to the American government its supreme role of creating the money necessary for financing the expenditures of the American people and liberating it from the slavery of money comptrollers. I obtained a copy of that bill and had it translated in excellent French. Of course, I do not intend to read the whole thing in this House but I am quite prepared to hand a copy to the Minister of Finance so he can have a look at it and use it in due time.

What was the purpose of that bill? The purpose of that bill was as stated in clause 1, and I quote:

> To restore to Congress its constitutional power to issue currency and control its value; to provide a monetary income for the people of the United States with a dollar whose purchasing power will be stable and equitable, adequate at all times to allow people to purchase the goods and services that industries and business services in the United States can provide at full capacity; to abolish the practice of creating bank deposits by private groups on fractional reserves and for other purposes.

Indeed, the purpose of that act is quite clear. Furthermore, the sponsor of that bill suggested that U.S. consumers be given a retail discount to fight, as we are still doing today, inadequate incomes of low income consumers to help them to further benefit from production at prices they can afford. I continue quoting from the same bill:

> Application of Retail Discount Rate—Upon and following the passing of this act the retail discount rate will be applicable on purchases of goods and services from retailers as described in this act by bona fide consumers, provided such purchases are for the personal use of the consumer or his family and not for resale, exchange or manufacturing.

However, we have been proposing this to Parliament for several years, Mr. Speaker. When we hear that this was never done anywhere else, it is not because nobody thought of it but because, here like elsewhere, we have captive governments, which are unable to take their responsibilities and which are at the service of big business.

In another part, section 305 says, and I quote:

Policy statement: The purpose of this Act is to maintain at all times a rough balance in the national credit account in all banks. The intent of this Act is to control the volume of the means of payment for the goods and services according to the capacity of the entire nation to produce and to consume in an upward standard of living, in order not to have an excessive monetary expansion and consequently an undue progression of prices and so that the present system of issuing currency through private initiative for profit, which causes disastrous inflation and deflation periods does not recur.

Here is an advised legislator, Mr. Speaker. A few weeks ago, the leader of the Social Credit of Canada introduced a bill in this House and he explained its nature. It is a bill to amend the Bank of Canada Act so that the latter can give long term loans to the federal government and the provinces for financing the public sector at an interest rate not exceeding the administration expenses. This is why a Liberal member killed the bill, and I am very sorry to see that the government chose a physician for this murder. I had always thought that physicians were rather in favour of life.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if this Parliament has failed up to now to pass a legislation that would straighten up our financial situation so that the money used by Canadians would be created by our government as a sovereign government, it is not because that was not mentioned, but because we have a government that is not free; our Parliament should be free and do something before it is too late.

Some people may say: Under the influence of Social Credit, the value of money is going to drop. There is no Social Credit for the time being, and we still have inflation. Social Credit is not ruling the country, and money has been losing much of its worth.

Mr. Boulanger: We deal with other countries.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I know that. But the hon. member will make his own speech and explain. They say, and I quote:

Inflation has eroded wage increases by 60 per cent.

There is your system! They say that 60 per cent of wage increases are eroded by inflation, which is created by the system the hon. member upholds so vigorously.

An economist quoted in an article of the January 31, 1974 edition of La Presse said, and I quote:

The value of the dollar will go down by 50 per cent within ten years

This is only a partial truth, for we know that the situation will be even worse, considering the present trend of changes.

The former chief of the hon. member knows that. Even though the hon. member comes from the Mercier constituency in Montreal, he has not yet been blessed.

At all events, Mr. Mackenzie King, in 1935, at the time of the great battle to free Canada from US financial domination, uttered some truths that can be verified, but did not act accordingly afterwards. I quote:

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Once a nation loses control over its currency and its credit, it does not matter much who in that nation makes laws. Once in control, money lenders will ruin any country.

We too, in Canada, are in the process of being ruined.

Mr. Speaker, I refer to an authority, the late Pope Piux XI who said—and I wish everyone enslaved by finance people would hear this:

Those who hold the money and have absolute control over it regulate credit and dispense it as they see fit. In so doing, they direct blood to the economic system, which they hold in their hands. Consequently, nobody can breathe without their assent.

This is why we have ill-breathing governments, Mr. Speaker; they have good intentions, but lack the means to fulfill the people's legitimate desires.

I would therefore hope the few suggestions I just made be kept in mind. I repeat that if the Minister of Finance wishes to see it, I will give him a copy of the American bill I just referred to.

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as minister responsible for housing through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, I welcome many elements in the budget which both directly and indirectly deal with the very real challenges which face us in maintaining the high quality of housing we enjoy in Canada and the availability of housing at prices people can afford at a time of high inflation. In the housing field, inflation manifests itself primarily in very high interest rates as well as in the high cost of building materials and labour.

By continuing to direct his policies toward achieving an even-handed approach to inflation and economic growth, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) assures us of the fundamental stability and strength which makes Canada the envy of virtually all western industrial nations. While no one would suggest that we do not have serious problems, it is evident to everyone that we are coping with these with greater success than others, more particularly than our principal trading partners most of whom have higher rates of inflation and who predict zero or minus growth rates in their real gross national product while ours is projected to grow by some 4 per cent in the coming year.

This basic strength gives hope for 1975. Without it we could not realistically begin to cope with the disturbing drop in housing starts which has plagued us, along with other nations, in the latter part of this year. Over the past six years we have consistently and significantly surpassed the required 200,000 starts per year. By the end of this year we expect to see final figures of 220,000 to 230,000 starts and about 250,000 completions. This would be cause for satisfaction were it not for the fact that these figures reflect an exceptionally high level of starts in the first part of the year, which level declined dramatically to an annual rate of 173,000 starts in October.

Of further concern to me has been the consequence of high interest rates, high construction costs and high serviced-lot costs which have made it extremely difficult for Canadians, especially young families, to get their stake in the housing market. While home ownership is presenting problems which we are tackling vigorously, the lack of rental accommodation has reached critical proportions in many cities across Canada. While rents, on the whole, have not increased at nearly the rate of other costs, continuing vacancy rates of less than 2 per cent will put pressure on rents that will be unacceptable to Canadians and their government. Rent controls are not the answer in this market. Indeed, in the provinces where they have been applied they have tended to exacerbate the problem, and I reject controls as a solution or even as a palliative. A major portion of our efforts in 1975 will be directed to the rental field.

The government's over-all approach of increasing supply is one which I shall apply in coping with both home ownership and rental accommodation. It is for this reason that we shall use government resources and taxpayers' dollars to achieve the maximum effect in making it possible for builders and developers to deliver good accommodation to Canadians at high levels and affordable prices. This can only be done if provinces and municipalities accelerate the rate at which they approve building plans. The concern being shown for good planning is welcome. The very real problems of municipalities are well understood. On the other hand, most people acknowledge that administrative delays and, in some cases, prolonged resistance to any reasonable development are major factors in increasing development costs and aggravating problems of supply.

I therefore urge provinces and municipalities to look carefully but urgently at all plans before them, with a view to accelerating the flow of residential building permits in areas of shortage or high cost. This might mean a lot of night and weekend work for planning bodies. However, it is essential in dealing with our current and anticipated situation and should not detract from good planning practices: it concerns just the administration time of such practices.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us look at the specific measures in the budget which will help us reach the minimum target of 200,000 starts which we have set for 1975. The most dramatic is the decrease in sales tax on building materials from 11 per cent to 5 per cent. This, on the average, will reduce the cost of a home by approximately $650. For first-time buyers of new, moderately priced homes we must add the $500 grant which I announced on November 1, making a reduction of $1,150. This is a significant incentive to bring this type of new housing on to the market at prices Canadians can afford and which the housing industry can provide, as proven to us by them, with the Assisted Home Ownership Program.

Demand pressures have relaxed to the point that the marketplace is beginning to work. I want to see homes sell at prices related to their cost, rather than what the traffic will bear. While I am hopeful that this will be the case, I do not intend to leave it to pure chance. For this reason I am implementing a monitoring procedure to make certain that sales tax reductions are passed on to the builders by the suppliers and by the builders to the home buyers. I have invited representatives of the supply and building industries to meet with me and with my officials in Ottawa to seek their co-operation and to develop and explain procedures which will best achieve the reduction in costs and increase in supply which the measure is designed to achieve. My colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), is co-operating fully with me in this effort.

Another factor in the budget is the disallowance of the carrying cost on land until it is brought into use. This should accelerate the supply of land. Combined with the action of some provinces, our federal programs for land assembly and servicing and the reintroduction of Bill C-34 to assist municipalities and provinces in providing sanitary and storm sewer services, plus the co-operation of planning authorities, will help substantially in shaking out a distorted land market that has been under pressures which have added inexcusably and even unconscionably to serviced-lot prices and thus to housing prices.

The registered home ownership savings plan gives considerable incentive to families to save for the down payment on their first home. The sum of $1,000 can be deducted from taxable income each year for up to ten years. This means that if both partners are working they can save up to $2,000 yearly or $20,000 in ten years if that is their priority. Invested at even 8 per cent interest, this would add up to about $14,450 total in ten years for one income earner, or $28,900 for both. It should also add significantly to the flow of investment money which will find its way into the mortgage market which, in turn, will help provide the homes which these couples are saving to buy. Add to this the $1,000 in deductions from interest earnings for all taxpayers, and we have a major infusion of money into the mortgage market.

In addition, I am urging the significantly growing pension funds to allocate a greater proportion of their investment to the residential mortgage market. Mortgage investment corporations being formed under legislation from the last parliament, and the establishment of the Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation, are further incentives for residential mortgage investment. Combined, all of these measures should assure supply of mortgage funds and act as a stabilizing factor on mortgage interest rates.

What I like best of all about the registered home ownership savings plan, Mr. Speaker, is the incentive to savings—an almost forgotten word in these times of almost insatiable demand for all the good things available to us in an abundant society. I have said in the past that every Canadian has a right to good housing and it is my responsibility to see that it is provided. I have also said that every Canadian family has the right to the option of their own home. This measure gives them the means to set their priorities. If a home rates high on their list of priorities, they now have one of the most generous and effective vehicles for achieving this goal. It is now my job to deliver programs to make certain that enough homes are built, at moderate prices, to meet the demand, and also enough rental accommodation for those saving toward ownership as well as those who choose rental rather than ownership.

A growing number of Canadians are seeking rental accommodation, particularly in or near the centres of our major cities. It must be apparent that living in our growing urban centres must be relatively high density and the dream of a single-family dwelling on its own separate lot is only achievable at economic cost, for most, away from the central areas of our cities. The choice for many thus becomes achievable single-family ownership in suburban or smaller communities, town house, condominium type ownership or rental within the city.

The increase in demand for rental accommodation is outstripping supply and investment in multiple-family units, especially apartment buildings, is lagging. In many parts of the country this investment has traditionally come from private investors who have invested in such real estate at its inception or as a secondary market to provide funds for builders to engage in further new construction and as a good investment for themselves. Until tax reform they could write off the depreciation or capital cost allowance against this other income. This tax shelter was withdrawn on the grounds of equity as a result of tax reform. The consequence has been a serious cutback in new construction in some areas. To give impetus to this critical area we are encouraging this investment for those who build multiple-family rental accommodation in 1975 by allowing the application of capital cost allowance against other income.

These measures, combined with substantial funds to be applied to existing programs and the new measures I plan to place before the House in December, will add to the total matrix of policies necessary to increase momentum in the housing industry. There is no single magic, or simplistic, solution: needs vary from family to family, from city to city and from region to region. We do know, however, what has worked well in the current situation and now we can make it work even better. The Assisted Home Ownership Program has brought some 20,000 new homes on to the market at a cost of $450 million in loans. I have allocated a further $50 million in loans and subsidies for increased limited dividend, voluntarily controlled rental accommodation for the last two months of this year—enough for about 2,000 units. CMHC has received applications for over 6,600 units under this plan and is selecting those which give the best value. These programs will be expanded in the coming year in response to the need and the demonstrated interest of the builders.

Because our resources are not unlimited I will be introducing legislation which will make it possible to tap the capital resources of the private mortgage markets to do much the same job. There are still areas where government, through CMHC, will have to be the lender and provide the subsidy to make it possible for low-income families to buy or rent new, moderately priced housing and not spend more than a reasonable proportion of their income whether buying or renting. The family income ceilings for this assistance range up to $8,000 and even $18,000 in high-cost areas.

We want to make it possible for even more people to be helped; but, as we have seen, even over half a billion dollars in federal funds in these two programs alone, assisted home ownership and limited dividend housing, in 1974 is not enough. To untap the major sources of private mortgage funds we intend to bridge the gap in interest rates between the minimum rate at which private lenders can economically lend and the maximum rate at which lower and medium-income Canadians can afford to borrow. This will apply to more areas of Canada and to a broader income range. As the objective is to increase the supply of new, moderately priced housing, this measure will be specifically directed at this moderate price range of new housing. I will also be proposing legislation to provide warranties to home buyers to protect them from unscrupulous or negligent builders.

Mr. Speaker, the world economic situation is largely beyond our direct control. That which we can affect will be pursued with vigour, responsibility and sensitivity. We are determined that the continuing goal of good housing at affordable prices is achievable for all Canadians even under present difficult circumstances. We intend to continue support to a productive housing industry working toward government objectives.

We are, further, determined to maintain high levels of employment and productivity in this vital segment of our economy which employs 200,000 Canadians directly on site, a further 30,000 off site and two or three times that number who supply the appliances, furniture, rugs, drapes and other furnishings that go into a home. We have done so consistently over the years and have increased our budgets in the life of this government from about $716 million in 1967 to $900 million in 1974. I do not intend to lessen now this momentum in such a critical area of our society and economy. Indeed, the emphasis, resources and impact will be greater still, not only in homes for Canadians but in homes in cities and towns which are increasingly well planned and in an environment in which we can live richly.

To summarize, Mr. Speaker, the government has a multipronged and aggressive approach to deal with what otherwise would be an unacceptable housing picture. In the budget there is a reduction in sales tax on building materials to 5 per cent, the elimination of sales tax on construction equipment, the registered home ownership savings plan, the encouragement of private investment in rental accommodation, and other measures to encourage savings and mortgage investments.

The existing programs include a $500 home owner's grant, assisted home ownership for moderate and lower income Canadians, limited dividend rental accommodation, rural and native housing, non-profit housing, co-operative housing, student housing, senior citizens' housing, land assembly programs, land servicing programs, municipal sewer programs, the Neighbourhood Improvement Program, the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, programs for innovative housing, the Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation, mortgage investment corporations, and others which complement these. Those are the existing programs.

In the near future we will have the Assisted Home Onwership Program with private sector participation for moderately priced homes, which I just briefly outlined, the limited dividend rental program with private sector participation to increase the leverage for low rental accommodation in Broadview and all the other great places across this country, and new legislation to provide land at economic cost for low-income housing in high land cost areas. This is extremely important in major cities such as Vancouver, Montreal, Toronto and Peterborough. Also, there is the expansion and extension of our municipal sewer system assistance program which is extremely important for municipalities in bringing more housing lots on to the market, and the warranty protection program for home buyers which I have mentioned.

Other measures might be necessary to meet new problems or opportunities as they arise. I urge, Mr. Speaker, that our home building industry and the lending institutions gear up for a year of sustained activity in 1975, a year in which housing starts can well exceed, and comfortably exceed, the minimum 200,000 units if Canada's economy continues to perform as it has and in a way which this budget is designed to sustain. I am not suggesting that it will be easy, but I am saying that every effort of the government will be expended to make it possible.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to follow the urban affairs minister and to note how pleased he is about all the things that are going on. He says we have a multipronged approach to the housing problem. If you will pardon the terrible pun, I would say it has been devilishly ineffective, whether multipronged or not. I have been reading with great interest the new red book—we used to have Redbook in the United States, another called True Romances, and I would call this one "New Romances"—in which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) tells us how good things are. In it he says:

> With the benefit of measures in this budget, and with no unforeseen deterioration of the economic environment abroad or unforeseen shocks at home, the Canadian economy is expected to grow at a rate of about 4 per cent in 1975.
> It is projected that about a quarter of a million new jobs will be created in 1975, on top of some 870,000 jobs created in Canada in the past two years.
> A determined effort will be required by all sectors of our society to get inflation down over the next few years. We are striving to get the rate below the two-digit level next year.

The Man from Glad could not have been any more soporific than that at a time of great crisis and challenging economic deterioration in this country. It is nothing more than, as a distinguished author said last week, saccharine solutions for a marshmallow world. We are going to have a bad situation in respect of employment. We received information from Statistics Canada the other day. Thanks to information received from one of my colleagues with a constituency of four different names—I refer to the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty)—it is indicated that for Hillsborough it is expected there will be an unemployment rate of 14.7 per cent for this winter. This follows immediately after statistics which show that in one year food costs at home have risen 20 points. This is not only in that province, in that constituency, but in all of Canada there will be a winter of discontent.

The other day we heard that many people in this country, a quarter of them living at the poverty line—and that is not gracious living—are reduced to eating pet food, some of which is highly unwholesome. It is alleged that Marie Antoinette once told the peasants of France that if they did not have bread to eat, they could eat cake. What the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) told the Lapalme drivers to eat was neither bread nor cake. However, I do not think pet food is a very good suggestion. We are living today, not in a just society but in a rendezvous with stagflation. That is an outrageous word but it is a much more outrageous condition.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) confessed the other day that his family was using powdered milk, but months ago he prescribed to old age pensioners a more complete diet than that—a diet of powdered skim milk, peanut butter and day-old bread. What a glorious old age for our senior citizens—stale bread, peanut butter and powdered skim milk! That was the message given to each of them with their old age security pension.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No sugar.

Mr. Macquarrie: No sugar, and no wine, which was recommended as so nutritive by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). So we have just stale bread at 65 years of age, after a lifetime of service.

Mr. Lang: It is not stale at a day old.

Mr. Macquarrie: One of the unfortunate developments in a political system wherein one party remains too long in power is that opportunism rises and the capacity to accept a challenge is diminished. One would like to have seen this government which was re-elected with its cherished majority on July 8 come in with a sense of direction, a sense of purpose, grateful that the people of Canada had given it a four-year mandate, instead of coming in with outrageous displays of incompetence or worse. I have heard all the arguments about who is responsible for the loss of 28 million eggs. I am not really concerned about jurisdiction or about who knew and who did not know. In a world of starvation it is an outrage that people should be so casual and blasé as to try to explain it away. It is a crime, and nothing short of a crime. I wonder what has happened to the old Calvinist sense of sin.

To suggest there may not be things in the world that require exceptionally urgent action by the Canadian government is the worst kind of myopic nonsense. We are facing very, very grave situations. I am just old enough to have some lingering recollections of the depression. I feel there is a very great danger that we may be heading into the same sort of situation. I have that uneasy feeling of déjà vu.

I think sometimes people seem to be cast in familiar roles. In Britain we have Harold Wilson, who might have been a Ramsay Macdonald, suddenly becoming garrulous. In Washington we have a Herbert Hoover without Hoover's fine intellect, great rectitude and proven internationalism. Everywhere there is a directionless sense and directionless people. In Canada we have Mackenzie King-ism; a little more stylish but a recycled laissez faire. This was the way it was viewed in 1929; that things would somehow work out and we would just sit here. We know what happened.

The only time ministers across the floor make any real reference to the international situation is when they invoke it to cover up their domestic blunders. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) is famous with his mess; that is a unique thing and he gets special credit for it. The Minister of Finance is especially good at bringing in everything from the weather to the full moon when things go wrong with his calculations.

We experienced a series of disturbances on the international scene. I do not think there is any thoughtful person who is not disquieted by the conference in Bucharest. I was not at all proud of the Canadian role there. The Law of the Sea Conference was a matter of great dissatisfaction. The recent food conference at Rome was a grievous disappointment, and the failure of our own government to deal with the matter forthrightly and fully in this House added nothing to the grim story of what went on when the gathering finally convened.

We have been making mistakes and not even trying to delineate them, much less make recompense for them. Not long ago I went with some colleagues to a part of the world where starvation was not a dictionary word but a daily occurrence. Life there was really precarious. I came back to this chamber and found this government, the same one that is here now, paying for non-production of food in this country. That is another crime, Mr. Speaker. No man, no government, no organization in a world where food has become a constant and vital reality should ever encourage the non-production of foodstuffs. But we did just that. The same people who piloted that bill through the House were quite capable of rationalizing their subsequent failure in other realms by referring to the shortage of food in the world.

Another very significant food product is fish, yet this government has allowed our fisheries to be ravaged and raped with impunity. It is well that the Arctic is not a good fishing ground, because it would be even easier for anyone to go in there and take what they liked.

Mr. Stanfield: They fly over it twice a year.

Mr. Macquarrie: Yes, they fly over it twice a year and might catch them between seasons. Daily, food is being wasted on our coasts.

Mr. Fairweather: Sovereignty on the instalment plan.

Mr. Macquarrie: Food is thrown away; it is wasted by the ships of other nations. Seemingly, we have no capacity of leadership to bring about correction of these problems. There are problems which should shake the complacency of a government that cares; problems of our own that are grave enough, without trying also to fortify ourselves, as we must, against the buttresses which will come from a deterioration in the international economy. That is as clear as can be, with fluttering currencies, faltering economies and lack of confidence all around. Of course we are heading for tough days, and we have to recognize and fight them in order to sustain our own economy and look after our people. We do not do that by tepid conferences, rotten eggs and the jerks and starts so apparent in our relationship with the United States.

An hon. Member: And the jerks in government.

Mr. Macquarrie: One of my colleagues says it is the jerks in government, but as you know, Mr. Speaker, I am too polite to call them that. I would not call them anything worse than insensitive incompetents: I would not think of calling them jerks.

There have been some fine speeches in this debate, and I commend hon. members who have taken part. I am a great believer in general debate in which representatives deal with the issues affecting all people. I was much attracted by the excellent address delivered by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) and that of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) who pointed out something very significant in this budget, namely, that at a time of inflation and because of the way this economy is handled, the people who suffer most are those who can least afford to suffer at all; that is, the poor people. That is the problem. The rich are doing quite well and the government is doing quite well out of inflation. It is not a bad time for those two groups. But it is hard on the middle-class, and unbearable for the poor.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North was dead-on when he pointed out that the taxpayer earning $6,000 will, according to 1975 schedules save $183 and the fellow earning $30,000 will save $622. If I may be scriptural, let me ask for whom, then, should the government show greater concern; for those who most need care, or for those who do not? I submit that a good government cares most for those who most need care. Experts have for years studied our income tax structure, yet for 1975, when the poor will suffer greatly, the taxation system will be regressive and will injure most those who are at the bottom of the scale. The lot of those at the bottom of the income scale, those close to the poverty line, will become worse, day in, day out, as inflation rages. Their difficulties will become more acute until they become unbearable. Yet we are told that the world looks on us as an example of how to deal with people and manage an economy.

I associate myself completely with the motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). As my political ambitions are limited, and as my transition from a slowly aging politician to a mature, elder statesman will be accomplished only by the passage of time, I am able to say exactly what I like. As the present crew of our ship of state is more interested in the design of the cabin and the colour of the hull than in the direction in which we are travelling, I wonder if the Leader of the Opposition, who has displayed more knowledge of the economic structure and problems of this country, and more genuine compassion for the plight of our people than anyone else in this House, will reconsider his announced intention to leave the public life of this country.

There were times in ancient Rome when they had to ask people like Cincinnatus to return and help guide the ship of state. As Rome was only about 50 miles long, that journey was not too difficult. But I am wondering if the hon. gentleman should settle in Halifax because I am convinced, fearfully and painfully, that we shall need him in this country. The present crew in charge of the ship has lost control. Although the people of Canada expressed themselves in their vote—and we accept their view and the ancient saying vox populi vox dei—yet I think they will find the next four years exceedingly long, and in the next election we shall not hear very much about minority governments not being as good as majority governments. So I hope that the mover of this motion will still be available to our country in the future because I am sure the need for him will be painfully apparent.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in the debate on the budget because in such debates one may talk about the budget and about special difficulties in one's own constituency. This opportunity is especially welcome if one represents a constituency in the north of Ontario. I congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) on preparing this budget. I am told that his parliamentary secretary had a major role in its preparation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): At least we know whom to blame.

Mr. Foster: The difficulties facing the world are unprecedented. They are a reflection of the instability which exists in the international sphere, which is partly the result of terrific balance of payment difficulties faced especially by oil importing nations.

Mr. Stanfield: Among those numbers Canada may now be counted.

Mr. Foster: We are witnessing the most serious world inflation of 20 years, accompanied by a serious downturn in the economy of North America, especially that of the United States. May I draw attention to what the United States president of the United Auto Workers told a meeting in Canada which he addressed recently. Leonard Woodcock was speaking to 500 delegates from the union's General Motors Corporation council at a meeting in Toronto. The United States economy was under consideration, and Mr. Woodcock said that at least the Canadian budget proposes income tax cuts for individuals but increased corporation taxes. Clearly, the good points of our budget are being recognized at home and abroad.

The budget takes into account threats to our economy posed by inflation, recession and unemployment. The Minister of Finance has chosen to counteract inflation by restraining government spending and by encouraging increased production of goods and services. At the same time, budget measures will increase take-home pay, especially of those in low income brackets. The budget also deals with unemployment. It proposes to increase personal tax cuts in 1975. It will lead to a turnaround in our economy. The present budgetary surplus of $250 million for this year is to become a deficit next year of $1.50 billion. This will present a total budget turnaround of $1.75 billion. The government will incur this deficit because it will implement reductions which were announced first in the May 6 budget. The original 5 per cent proposed tax reduction is to be increased to 8 per cent, the minimum saving is to be increased from $150 to $200 and the maximum to $750.

Mr. Stanfield: There was no 5 per cent cut.

Mr. Foster: In addition, personal income taxes will automatically be reduced as a result of the 1971 tax reform bill because the rates are reduced by this bill. As well, indexing provisions will lead to higher deductions for those paying income tax. For instance, a married taxpayer earning $10,000 a year will increase his take-home pay by about $250 per year as a result of the proposed tax cuts. The budget also contains provisions which will bring important improvements in the position of senior citizens. There is provision for a deduction of up to $1,000 from a personal pension. Of course, senior citizens and others will be able to claim up to $1,000 derived from interest or dividends, as tax-free income.

This provision is important because I have always thought it unfair that the person who has saved money, bought savings bonds or made other investments should pay tax on the proceeds of that investment. The provision of which I speak will allow a certain portion of such returns—that is, up to $1,000—to be free of tax. This budget moves to remove the inequity that existed in this area. It is also proposed that any deduction which is not claimed by a senior citizen may, if it is advantageous, be claimed by his or her spouse.

I wish to refer to the items in the budget which are designed to stimulate housing starts in this country. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) indicated that the number of units being started this year has dropped back from the record high level of 1973. The minister recently announced a $500 cash grant for each new house of moderate value. In his budget, the Minister of Finance followed this up by an immediate reduction of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials to 5 per cent. It is estimated that this will save $650 on the price of a new house.

The budget also proposed special capital cost allowances on new, multiple-unit residential buildings for rent, which may be claimed against any source of income. This will channel a great deal of new money into the housing industry. The sales tax on construction equipment and materials used in municipal water distribution systems will be eliminated. A new registered home ownership program is in the budget. This will allow young couples to save for a new home, tax free, up to $10,000. It will encourage young people to save for a new home. I am glad these measures are in the budget because they will stimulate housing starts and provide new jobs in a North American economy that has turned downward this year.

However, and even more important in my constituency, these housing starts will increase the demand for forest products, especially lumber. Perhaps no industry in the Algoma district has seen such a dramatic turn around in the past year as the lumber industry. A year ago, prices were at record high levels. In many cases these prices have been cut in half in the short time span of one year. Some one-industry towns, such as Blind River, have had their only industry shut down due to lack of demand and low prices for their products. Several other mills throughout the Algoma area have also had to shut down or curtail their operations.

I believe that these budget items will increase the demand for lumber and building materials. However, at the same time I realize that much of our lumber is sold into United States markets. Their housing starts are down by 50 per cent from last year. Until the U.S. market improves, the industry will not return to a fully healthy state.

Within the past few days the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) announced Local Initiatives

Program approvals for this coming winter. They will provide temporary help during this time of seasonally high unemployment, especially this winter when the lumber industry is depressed. Some 24 projects have been approved for the Algoma-Manitoulin area which will create 100 jobs this winter and cost some $320,000. There are also several projects under way in the constituency under the winter capital project fund, worth over three quarters of a million dollars, which will create more jobs this winter. This program will make improvements to community arenas in several communities throughout the constituency. Likewise, it will construct new township and community buildings and medical clinics. Several smaller projects have been approved, such as the improvement of libraries and other buildings. This past weekend I attended the official opening of a new arena at West Bay in my constituency. It was built largely with winter works funds from previous years.

The nearly $1 million dollars in winter works programs will be most beneficial due to the serious turnaround in employment caused by cut-backs in the lumber business. There is a strong feeling throughout the Algoma district that this kind of program, funded by the federal government, is much to be preferred to the payment of welfare and UIC benefits. At the same time, many worth-while community projects are being carried out to provide winter employment which would ultimately have to be paid for by the municipalities whose budgets are already stretched to breaking point.

I would also like to mention the problems facing the beef industry in this country. In some ways the problems are similar to those of the lumber industry, in that prices were at record high levels a year and a half ago, and although the price of top quality, finished cattle is at a reasonable level today, input costs have risen dramatically over this period of time. Items like feed grain for fattening, fuel costs and baler twine have risen in price to levels that remove all profits. However, the real disaster in beef farming is in the cow-calf operation. Most of the beef industry in northern Ontario is cow-calf operation. The two fall sales in the Algoma riding, at Thessalon and Manitoulin, saw a drop in price this year from last year that can only be termed disastrous.

Let me quote from a letter written by the president of the Manitoulin Livestock Cooperative. This letter expresses the deep concern of the board of directors at the depressed prices of feeder cattle and the whole future of the cow-calf farmer. No other business has been forced to take a 30 per cent drop in wages in the past year. The board of directors indicate that unless action is taken many of the cow-calf operators will be forced out of business. The price at the September sale this year was 34 per cent below the 1973 price and 7 per cent below the 1972 price. At the same time, these farmers indicate the following price increases: gasoline up 29 per cent; diesel fuel up 51 per cent; baler twine up 238 per cent; fertilizer up 66 per cent. The letter goes on to indicate that there was a reduction in this one fall sale of returns to the farmers of Manitoulin of $300,000.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) announced a stabilization program for beef cattle in August of this year. It is difficult to assess the full impact of this program, but certainly finished beef cattle prices have been better in Canada than they have in the United States. However, the program seems to have had little effect on calf prices, and this is where the main problem lies today. The minister has indicated that stabilization legislation will be brought forward during this parliament to ensure that beef producers receive adequate prices for their cattle. The problems of beef supplies and prices have been further complicated by the recently announced U.S. quotas on Canadian beef exports. Over the long haul it is desirable for us to have an open border between Canada and the U.S.A., although the present system of quotas imposed by both countries is probably less harmful to Canada.

The problem facing the beef industry must be of very serious concern to parliament and to the government. It will take every bit of our ingenuity and skill to design programs to ensure the long-term stability of this industry. Only with such stability can we ensure the provision of adequate supplies, at reasonable prices, for the consumers of this country.

I want now to refer to the uranium mining industry because of the importance of the mines located at Elliot Lake in the Algoma riding. In the past year or so there has been a great deal of concern expressed by these miners concerning problems of health in the mines, especially silicosis and lung cancer. The problem of silicosis was first raised by Dr. Charles Stewart of the Workmen's Compensation Board of Ontario, who is responsible for chest x-rays and studies of this nature. It has been indicated that over 120 miners now are receiving Workmen's Compensation Board pensions due to some degree of disability, and others have symptoms of dust affecting their health.

Likewise, a recent paper by Dr. Jan Muller of the Ontario department of health which studied the incidence of lung cancer indicated that 41 people had died from the disease between 1955 and 1972. This figure was obtained from a survey of some 8,500 who had worked in the uranium mines during this period. Dr. Muller's paper indicated that this rate was about three times that which would have been expected in the general population. This is surely a matter of serious concern.

What is not known is whether these health threats are mainly the result of working conditions in the early days of uranium mining in Elliot Lake, when there were many mines in operation with a strong orientation toward production and lower standards of ventilation and less protection from exposure to radioactive substances, or whether there are still conditions in these mines which make them less safe than other mines in the province. To try to discover these facts the Ontario government established two health studies this year and a royal commission concerned with the health and safety of mine workers.

One health study has been directed to the examination of the miners themselves, using x-rays, pulmonary function tests and sputum tests. This study was carried out last spring, but as yet no report has been released. The other study to which I referred is designed to test and assess the mine environment. A test of dust levels would determine the amount of free silica in various parts of the mines. Examination will also be made of the levels of radon gas, which is harmful because it is radioactive. The study will also determine whether there are harmful levels of gases from the diesel equipment used in the mines. Hopefully, it will also be determined whether these three factors have a multiplying harmful effect when all are present.

The royal commission has broad terms of reference to look into matters of safety and health in mines in Ontario, as well as compensation programs for disabled miners. I believe the royal commission's role is most important because it will be able to bring a balanced judgment to these matters and make recommendations should the medical and technical studies not reveal all the details of the difficulties involved, either in the health of the miners or the dangers of the mine environment.

With the results of the studies and the testimony given at the hearings, it will be possible to assess the adequacy of the present system of maintaining a healthy environment in the mines. If it is inadequate, the commission will recommend improvements. At the same time, the commission will make recommendations on the safety of affected miners to continue working, and adequate compensation programs for those who are disabled.

I had the opportunity to attend an international symposium, in September of this year, in Bordeaux, France, on the dangers of radiation in the mining and milling of uranium and thorium. Three representatives from the United Steel Workers of America in Elliot Lake, as well as representatives of the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Ontario department of health were in attendance. Great emphasis was placed on the dangers of radon gas as a cause of cancer. Considerable stress was given to the necessity of more frequent testing of the mine environment for this gas to ensure that there is adequate ventilation. It was also stressed that the testing should be done by an independent agency.

The Department of National Health and Welfare is planning to launch an experimental study this winter to develop a testing procedure which will show the cumulative amount of radioactive gases to which miners have been exposed in uranium mines. There is real urgency to see these health matters resolved, Mr. Speaker, both to correct any inadequacy in the mine environment which may be discovered and in the health and compensation programs for affected miners. Equally important in these studies is the need to ensure trust and confidence in mine safety and health programs in both present employees and in new people who will be coming to work in the mines in the future. It is estimated that last year's production of some 4,100 tons of U_3O_8 will be increased to 8,000 to 9,000 tons by the early 1980s at the two operating mines of Rio Algom and Denison. The labour force will grow from some 1,500 today to 4,500 in the next ten years. Service industry people will add another 1,200 workers to the Elliot Lake community.

At a recent meeting I attended with officials from the municipality, the province of Ontario and the mining companies, we discussed the question of housing and community services for a township which is expected to grow from a population of 9,000 today to nearly 26,000 which is projected over the next ten years. There can be little doubt about the importance of Elliot Lake to Canada and to the world, a world which is starved of energy and which will be more and more dependent upon uranium as a source of energy in the future.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to participate in the debate on the budget and I also congratulate all those who have taken part in it.

Mr. Speaker, the budget makes worthy recommendations but when one speaks of checking inflation, as the government has been doing for so long, and ensuring Canadians economic stability, I have serious doubt that those objectives can be achieved.

Of course some Canadians will benefit from some of the measures proposed by the budget. On the other hand, in view of the present situation, I feel it is important, and we can do so very objectively, not only to blame the government but also to insist that it give much more serious attention to some measures which unfortunately are not contained in the budget.

With regard to what it now proposes, I should like to say how we can have citizens benefit from it directly in some cases. But I shall come back to that later.

I deplore especially the lack of agricultural initiatives. I should have thought, Mr. Speaker, that this government would have given some priority to agriculture in view of its present difficulties and the present situation. I am sure the government and all hon. members now in the House know very well what I am alluding to. They know what the situation is. This is a bad situation, and a disastrous one for the farmers and it could have regrettable consequences in view of the government's inaction in the field of agriculture. The budget speech therefore contains no farming measures, when action should be taken so urgently.

● (1630)

During the last election campaign, our party had committed itself to grant old age security at 60. I do not think I am mistaken in saying that the Prime Minister did what we wished him to do when he suggested to Canadians that he would seriously consider this possibility. I am not saying that the Prime Minister had committed himself to grant old age pensions to people 60 years old. But, in support of our argument, which was valid and interested many people because of the advantages it would provide for Canadians, the Prime Minister had suggested that he was ready to consider this possibility. However, the budget speech contains no mention of the possibility of lowering the eligibility age for old age security from 65 to 64 over a five year period. I believe that this would have been very useful for our society and the Canadian public.

Unfortunately, these omissions are justifiably disappointing for many Canadians and I especially regret them. However, this will not prevent me from asking the minister responsible and the government to reconsider these measures because they are of vital interest for all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I had also hoped that special votes would be announced for the establishment of basic recreational facilities in our communities. Some may say that this would go against provincial jurisdictions. I believe it is possible to establish—

Mr. Béchard: It is sad to say such things.

Mr. La Salle: If the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) will listen to me, I shall make him a suggestion that he will certainly accept.

I believe it is possible to propose a measure or votes within a policy of tripartite financing.

Mr. Béchard: What the hon. member is saying does not make sense.

Mr. Stanfield: The government has destroyed the provinces.

Mr. La Salle: If the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine will just listen to me, he will realize that a three-level financing policy could be established in co-operation with municipalities and provinces. The municipality which could share 25 per cent in a leisure-connected project could make an application to the province concerned which, in turn and within the limits of its own planning, would accept or refuse to participate as a province for 25 per cent of the cost, which would entail, following the province's decision, the undertaking of the federal government to share 50 per cent of the expenses.

I feel this three-level policy is financially sound and would not limit provincial jurisdiction in any way. I feel also that the provinces would be eager indeed to participate in such a policy. As the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine indicated, people will not stop until they have told us that it is illegal. This formula has never been put to the test, and I think that provinces as well as municipalities would be very happy to participate in such three-level financing policy.

I think that we would abide by provincial jurisdictions to the letter if ever the minister responsible suggested to the provinces and municipalities such a policy which would enable the latter to establish basic recreational organizations rather more interesting that any amateur sport policy now existing.

Mr. Speaker, as all other members, I am told that the estimates for the New Horizons Program are inadequate. It is a really fine initiative which I applauded. I was quite pleased to see that the government had introduced such a policy. Unfortunately, many clubs of the golden age in our constituencies have to wait one or two years before obtaining their grant. We know perfectly well that those grants are extremely useful since they allow a group of individuals to meet in the proper premises and keep their zest for life. I urge that supplementary funds be made available to those groups, in order to carry on adequately—an interesting government initiative.

Such is not the case at the present time. I think all hon. members will agree with me that a lot of golden age clubs have to wait too long before they reach their very legitimate objectives.

An hon. Member: Where will the funds come from?

Mr. La Salle: They will have to come from elsewhere! Mr. Speaker, I should also like to draw the government's attention to the fact that, in my constituency, the matter of protecting properties situated along the river, particularly in the communities of Lanoraie, Lavaltrie and Saint-Sulpice, has been outstanding for a long time. I made several representations to the Department of Public Works. I always got the same answer. My proposals on behalf of those individuals are all fine, but there are no funds. I think it is time to lift the concern of those riverside residents whose properties are shrinking because of erosion caused by ships or tides. I recently heard that if the Treasury Board agreed to make the necessary funds available, the building of a 15,000 foot protection wall would finally be agreed to. I believe the Department of Public Works could find the necessary funds to carry out that project which would put an end to that unfair situation of those residents. I think requests to that effect were made as early as 1958. Therefore, I have not been the first member of Parliament who made recommendations and representations respecting that most important project.

Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, some of the budget speech measures are quite commendable. And yet I was wondering how we could apply them so that they would benefit the consumer. Let me take for instance the 12 per cent tax on building materials which will be reduced to 5 per cent. We have learned from past experiences in the area of sweets as well as clothing and footwear that the removal of the 10 per cent tax did not benefit the consumers. For instance, we now pay 22 cents for a chocolate bar that was priced 10 cents. Soft drinks were 15 cents, but today they cost 25 cents. Mothers know very well that the removal of taxes on clothing and footwear did not benefit them too much, except that it was a way fo subsidizing industries and intermediaries. Since the minister lacks control over building materials, I wonder how he will manage to enforce this tax reduction which he thinks will directly help new house owners, that is consumers. I do hope the minister will take the necessary measures in that regard and will create a review board or whatever so that in the end the tax cut will really be passed on to consumers or new house owners. But today, in view of the experiences I mentioned and which we have lived, we must unfortunately question seriously the efficiency of such measures.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, as our time is quite limited, I would also like to raise the matter of the extraordinary powers which the government intends to avail itself regarding natural resources within the provinces. In view of the Minister's statement and of Bill C-32 now under consideration it seems that the whole confederative system is questioned and that these extraordinary powers relating to natural resources are defined simply and purely by the word centralization.

This brings us to a confrontation between the provinces and the federal government. Alberta is a perfect example of the marked differences in this country. I understand that Albertans are anxious to keep their provincial rights and jurisdiction. We do recognize at the outset that, constitutionnally, such powers belong to the provinces. The interference of the federal government on the basis of those intentions should concern us as MPs, and especially those of us who want to see the provincial rights respected.

May I take this opportunity to congratulate our leader, the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) for the respect he has shown ever since he has been the head of this party, for the vested interests of the provinces. I also entirely agree with the statements he made and the views he expressed.

Today, it is the province of Alberta which is confronted with the measures this government intends to take. But if we consider the extended powers they contain, when speaking about natural resources and control of our energy resources, we must understand that, as Quebecers, we should also be concerned because, tomorrow, our mines and water resources might be involved.

I am also concerned by Quebec Premier's stubborn silence, for in the next two years, he is likely to want to sell his electricity to the United States.

The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the federal government will be able to apply restrictions as easily as they did or intend to do. I am also concerned by the silence of little Robert in Quebec and when mentioning little Robert I do not mean the dictionary, but his silence worries me.

As members from Quebec I think we should ask ourselves some questions because I believe it is our responsibility to compel the Quebec premier to publicly tell if he endorses the intentions of the federal government.

When the minister, Mr. St-Pierre was attacking, last week, the encroaching of the federal government I found surprising the muteness of the Quebec premier. It is not the first time that Quebec ministers make representations to the federal government, in the telecommunication or immigration field or another area. Recently, Mr. Choquette was claiming a few million dollars as did the Ontario Government. Today, Mr. St-Pierre is attacking the federal government and worries about the extraordinary powers it intends to take. He invites the provinces to get together to fight against interference by Ottawa. Most surprising is that the Bourassa government did not say anything about it yet.

I think that as members from the province of Quebec we should oppose a categorical refusal to these centralizing powers if we are to maintain the objective of national unity that is mentioned at every electoral campaign.

Today, Mr. Speaker, we recognize obvious disparities and not only at the regional level. The ten provinces have differences, different needs and this for different reasons. I think it is normal and it might be more logical to talk about national harmony. It is urgent to reach this national harmony objective as national unity is not for tomorrow. But I think possible to harmonize differences. To recognize that we are different and coordinate measures with the provinces at the federal level and not to centralize, that is the final objective we must aim at.

It is important that members of the House understand what makes us different and what prevents us from attenuating many of our problems. So long as we do not respond to that wish on the part of the provinces to invite the federal government to play the role of a coordinator and not that of a centralizer, we are going towards a failure, and the results will be deplorable.

I for one believe that it is our duty to engage a pitched battle against federal government infringement upon the jurisdictions of the provinces. For us, Progressive Conservatives, it is a decision that we will not be long in announcing. We are going to engage, for the respect of the provinces, precisely for their survival, what we think is a perfectly legitimate battle. In this way, we are assuming our responsibilities.

I hope that the members from Quebec will respond in the same manner to defend the interests of their province.

I congratulate the people from Alberta for eagerly defending their rights to the natural resources of their province. And let no one tell me that in the interest of the national good these powers have to be taken away from the provinces. It is unthinkable that a federal-provincial meeting cannot produce interesting results for the whole country's welfare.

I suggest that these meetings are not enough. There is no need for confrontation but we should get together again with the provinces as often as necessary. I believe that negotiations between provinces should be carried out by people who understand the interests of the country and of the province itself.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we are mistaken if we believe that these powers should be handed over to the federal government. It is quite an easy thing for the federal government, during wartime for example, to take over those powers which belong to the provinces and then later to refuse to give them back. Today we are being asked to believe that these powers must be taken over and away from the provinces once again in the national interest.

But the national interest would be to have the provinces satisfied in order to bring about the kind of national harmony where differences are being acknowledged and where we are still being asked to participate in the meaningful building of this country.

We do not ask those who are different to build the country with the same tools as we are using. What is important is to build a wonderful country, of course, but with certain differences. This could be acceptable. The differences would be justified, taking individual differences into account.

That is a fact, let us acknowledge it and I think that we would be taking a step towards that much needed harmony but not through centralized powers such as is being recommended in the budget before us.

[English]

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate as the proud representative of the counties and riding of Kent-Essex, the constituents of which collectively decided at the recent election that their voices and opinions should be expressed once again, after some considerable time, from this side of the House.

Kent-Essex is a balanced rural-urban riding located in what must be viewed as probably the most productive and arable agricultural soil in this nation. The north edge of the riding is bounded by the winding Thames on whose shores is located the city of Chatham. That city owes much of its productivity to the auto pact. The residents of Chatham look forward to the continuation of that pact and, contrary to much of what I have heard here, they feel it will continue for some considerable time in the future. In addition, Chatham is famous for its food production and owes, as does the town of Leamington with its processing of tomatoes and corn, a great deal to agriculture. I would hasten to indicate, when speaking of Leamington, that it is very widely known as the tomato capital of the world.

Moving to the west and then southerly, we go through a number of small towns and villages such as Tilbury, Cottam and Merlin which have sprung from the rich soil and its food production, the residents of which continue to give strong support to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). Many of the constituents of my riding have told me over and over again of the good work the Minister of Agriculture has done. Many of them have said that never has a man so well and so frequently protected, supported and nourished the rights of farmers.

At the southern edge of the riding, bounded by the ever cleaner waters of Lake Erie, exist a number of fishing ports and harbours stretching from Kingsville to Wheatley, each of which proves that in fact the fisheries of this nation do not exist only on the coastline but that we indeed have a substantial fishing industry inland which is doing its part in the production of food for the world. I would be remiss if I did not point out to the House, as well, the acres of greenhouses that exist in the riding, producing tons of cucumbers, lettuce and tomatoes, the latter having justifiably earned for the town of Leamington the designation of being the tomato capital of the world, as I said just a few minutes ago.

I also have the honour to represent the southernmost part of Canada, Pelee Island, just off Point Pelee National Park. Its inhabitants are linked to the mainland by ferry and a recently upgraded airport. It is interesting to note that when I visit Pelee Island in my riding I am substantially further south than the most northerly part of California.

I should now like to speak briefly about a few of the things I have learned since coming to Ottawa. It appeared initially to me that certain superlative adjectives seemed only to belong to members of the opposition. It seems that whenever anything is terrible, whenever anything is cowardly, inconsistent or dishonest, these are adjectives which can only be used by the opposition to describe something which has happened on this side of the House. I have scurried to the dictionary to see whether in fact this is true. I am pleased to be able to announce to the House that these words are totally non-partisan and are not the sole prerogative of the opposition; rather, I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, my friends on the opposite side of the House are dealing in excess.

● (1650)

I am pleased to say that I have learned, when I go back to my riding, that my constituents have also discovered this fact. It appears they are not concerned whether in fact the government is cowardly or is guilty of conduct described by the other adjectives I have used. They are content that this government is living up to what it said it would do if it were elected on July 8. I should like to advise the House as well, Mr. Speaker, that it seems to me the new members who have come to this House are following a respectable, good trend in respect of the speeches they have made here. I think we are attempting—and I claim this for myself since I do not intend to speak for very long—to keep our speeches to a minimum, to be direct in our approach and not to deal in verbiage and excess. In this small way we will get on with the business of government. I think this is a healthy sign and I hope it continues.

I should like now to refer to the amendment on which we will be voting this evening. It reads in part:

—failing to mount a concerted attack on domestic inflation while at the same time proposing measures which contribute to national disunity.

I confess that, faced with such a strong and negative statement, I returned to the budget statement to reread it lest I had somehow failed to appreciate the full significance of what I had heard last Monday evening or had completely misunderstood it. I found, among the budgets other provisions, that people in my riding and the citizens of Canada generally will receive the 5 per cent tax reduction brought down in 1973, and that the minimum tax cut is to be increased to $150 from $100. My mental arithmetic interprets this as an increase of 50 per cent, which I confess I am unable to describe as insignificant or as no effort to curb inflation.

I find, further, that for 1975 the basic income tax reduction is increased from 5 per cent to 8 per cent. This is an increase of 60 per cent, which I also find difficult to describe as an insignificant effort to curb inflation. In addition, I find that by reason of the increase in the minimum income tax cut to $200 and the increase in the maximum cut to $750, federal taxes will be reduced by $615 million in 1975-76 and two-thirds of that amount will be enjoyed by people earning less than $12,000 a year. If that be so—and I cannot but accept that it is—then the people in my riding, and I am sure all Canadians, will not read this provision as being insignificant and will not accept that it does not, in fact, deal very effectively with inflation.

I see, as well, that a wage earner with two children who in 1975 earns $10,000 will increase his take-home pay by $300 as a result of these deductions. While my colleagues on the other side of the House may have difficulty describing $300 as significant, my constituents do not. I can only conclude that if my constituents view all these things of which I have spoken as significant, and I and my colleagues view them as significant, then my colleagues on the other side must be either misguided or misinformed and I invite them to read again the budget speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) on Monday last in order to arrive at some new conclusions.

Earlier I spoke of the greenhouses in my riding. I should like to refer to them again in order to emphasize the interest my constituents must, of necessity, have in our energy policies. These greenhouses, of necessity, consume a large amount of natural gas, oil and—not so much now, but of late—coal. The cost of these forms of energy has risen tremendously in the last few years, to the extent that we have now reached a point where the production of lettuce, cucumbers and tomatoes is reaching a marginal position. If, in fact, something is not done to protect the producers against these rapidly rising costs, these products will of necessity be removed from the market. I suggest it would be a disservice to this country if these three crops were removed form the market, because then we would become reliant upon importations from California, Mexico and the southern United States in order to fulfil the demand of the consumers of this country.

I suggest that a possible answer to the problem with which the growers in my area are faced would be, in fact, to allocate a certain portion of the available energy to the production of food; and coupled with the portion of energy which would be allocated to food production, the price would in some manner be stabilized so there would not be a continuing price spiral in this type of food. I suggest that we cannot do without the three crops of which I speak. I think tomatoes, cucumbers and lettuce form a large part of the diet of Canadians and are not items which consumers are prepared to leave out of their diets.

Dealing further with energy and related products, I should also like to refer briefly to fertilizer. The constituents of my riding are concerned about the cost input of fertilizer. I understand that the nitrate fertilizers are increasing in price in a spiral of 100 per cent to 200 per cent. I am glad that the government has announced it is prepared to examine this industry to determine whether the profits are acceptable and, if they are not, to do something about it. I suggest that my constituents, as late as last weekend, are tremendously pleased with the budget as it has been described to them. If nothing else, they see that in fact the government has been honest with them in that it ran an election campaign based on a budget, and since the opening of parliament they have seen brought forward a number of measures which were promised in the election campaign. They see in the budget measures they were told about last May. They see these measures repeated. I suggest that they see not measures of cowardice but, rather, of bravery.

It seems that the amendment to the budget, and the subamendment voted on last week, are examples of what I have come to expect from the opposite side of this House: it is a repetition of what I believe to be formalized in the phrase, used over and over again, "too little, too late." It seems to me it has become much too easy to say this. Perhaps it is viewed as the role of the opposition—though I cannot accept this—to criticize without coming up with any constructive suggestions.

I feel constrained to say that we on this side of the House have learned something and have lived up to our promise to return the budget voted on by the people. With regard to those on the other side of the chamber, it appears they have failed to learn the lessons of July and have come back with a position rejected by the people of Canada. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I speak against the amendment and in favour of the motion. The budget, in all its terms, does in fact deal with the problem of inflation, although perhaps not in the same manner as my friends opposite would have dealt with it. But I am mindful that their proposals were rejected by an even greater voice than ours. I am prepared, therefore, to vote for the motion and against the amendment.

The Budget—Mr. Gilbert

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) in the House this afternoon. The more speeches I hear from the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, the more displeased I become with his policies and those of the government. I have never seen a more startling array of deceptions and disappointment for the people of Canada than are set forth in this budget, Mr. Speaker; and I shall mention only four areas: first, the attitude of the federal government toward the resources of the western provinces is a blatant attempt to shake the bonds of unity within Canada; second, the federal government's charging of the equalization formula concerning tax revenues on resources, without consultation or agreement with the provinces, is shocking; third, the $50 tax allowance to taxpayers, and the attempt by the government to indicate that it is $150 when in fact $100 was in the 1973 budget and $50 in the May, 1974, budget, is a clear deception.

The $50 allowance for 1974 amounts to 96 cents per week for the average wage earner. In a recent statement, John Deutsch, former head of the Economic Council of Canada and now principal of Queen's University, said that the workingman has lost $5.95 a week in purchasing power as a result of inflation. Now the Minister of Finance comes forth with an allowance of 96 cents per week for taxpayers and asks them to apply restraint in future wage demands. That is a disappointment, Mr. Speaker.

The fourth area, and the one to which I shall devote most of my speech, is the wrong and feeble approach of the government to the serious housing problem in Canada. In his budget speech, the Minister of Finance referred to the short-term prospects for construction of new housing and said it threatened, first, to reduce employment; second, to raise production costs; third, to increase housing prices and rents; and, fourth, to reduce the supply of new housing. He said these things would lead to a lower standard of accommodation than Canadians deserve. Mr. Speaker, he is right on all counts. With regard to reduced employment, the 25 per cent reduction in housing starts from 269,000 in 1973 to 173,000 in 1974, means on a seasonally adjusted basis, the loss of nearly 100,000 full-time jobs in the construction industry alone, in addition to thousands of jobs in manufacturing, in the saw-mills and forest operations.

In regard to the statement that it would raise production costs, already inflation has caused building products to soar in price and be in short supply. The minister's prediction of two-figure inflation in 1975 is not an encouraging sign. With regard to increased housing prices and rents, we already have the highest home prices, the highest land prices, the highest mortgage rates and the highest rents ever experienced in Canada, with little or no hope of experiencing any reduction in these areas. The result will be what the minister has predicted, a shortage of housing starts and a lower standard of housing in Canada.

Where has the government failed in the budget with regard to its measures for housing? First, it has failed to take measures to implement the philososphy on housing, namely, that every person is entitled to adequate housing, at reasonable cost. This was the impact of the Hellyer report on housing, the Canadian Council on Social Development, the New Democratic Party, and even the predecessor of the present minister who said in the early part of this year that adequate housing, at reasonable cost, was the goal of the Liberal government. This afternoon the same philosophy was repeated by this minister.

Mr. Speaker, the minister and the government have decided to treat housing as a commodity from which financial institutions and rich people can gouge the highest possible profits for themselves. In fact, in a speech made at the Inn on the park in Toronto on Wednesday, November 20, before Property Forum '74, the minister set forth his philosophy on housing when he said that financial measures set forth in the budget and other government programs would achieve "more bang for the buck" for builders, developers and entrepreneurs. Mr. Speaker, this is the most crude and cruel statement I have ever heard from any minister of housing. When he talked about "more bang for the buck" he issued an open invitation to speculators, builders, developers and financial institutions to gouge as much profit as they can from land prices, house prices, interest rates and rents.

Mr. Danson: Read the whole speech.

Mr. Gilbert: He does this at the expense of middle and low income people on the pretence that it will give all Canadians the kind of housing they need. The measures set forth in the budget will do exactly what he claims; they will give these people "more bang for the buck". That is the theme of this minister. The government has failed to provide measures to create an increase in housing starts and an increase in land banking of serviced land. It has failed to deal with land speculators and to give direction to financial institutions to set aside part of their portfolios for housing at an interest rate of 6 per cent for middle and low income people. Housing is a social right and financial institutions have a social responsibility to respond to housing problems in this way. None of the measures in the budget will remedy the high cost of land, the high cost of homes, the high cost of interest and the high rents experienced in Canada today.

What has the government done in the budget, Mr. Speaker? First of all, the government reduced the sales tax on building and construction materials to 5 per cent. This afternoon the minister said this would mean a saving of approximately $650 to a home purchaser. I would point out to him what was stated in the Globe and Mail of November 20 by James Purdie:

> The reduction of federal sales tax on lumber and building materials will produce almost no benefits for retail purchasers for at least three months, and even then the savings will be small, industry officials warned.
> Howard Perkins, president of the Lumber and Building Materials Association of Ontario, said in an interview that the full sales taxes of 11 per cent on lumber and 12 per cent on construction materials have already been paid on inventories. By the time these stocks are sold—in three to four months—inflation and labour demands at the producing levels will erode the cost savings the federal government said should be passed to consumers . . . industry officials said that by the time the tax filters through to house buyers it will represent a saving of only about $450 on a $45,000 house.

There is no guarantee that any tax saving will be passed on to the purchaser. The minister said that he will set up a monitoring process to make sure these savings are passed on to the purchaser, but that does not persuade me it will happen. I have in mind what happened to sales tax reductions on drugs. The drug companies absorbed the savings themselves and never passed them on to the buyer. I am sure this will happen in the case of building materials' sales tax reductions: the builders and developers will absorb any savings and that will be the end of it.

The minister this afternoon also spoke of the registered home ownership savings plan under which people will be able to deduct up to $1,000 per year, for a maximum of $10,000, of money which is to apply to the purchase of a home and essential furnishings. The minister's statement, that this will be a new source of mortgage money, was incredible. How is this saving by prospective home buyers to become a source of money? What guarantees are there? What assurances has the minister that financial institutions which will handle this money will apply it to housing? There is no guarantee. The minister said that financial institutions will not be compelled to use this money for housing.

How generous is the government being in introducing the registered home ownership savings plan? Suppose a couple that is 25 years old saves $1,000 for ten years and at age 35 is prepared to buy a home. The couple finds that applying $10,000 to the purchase of a $50,000 home, it must take a $40,000 mortgage. Present mortgage interest rates are about 12 per cent. So over 25 years the couple must pay $412.76 per month, and in 25 years $123,828, in order to repay this loan. Probably that is what the minister had in mind when he spoke of people getting more bang for their buck. It will be a bang at whose expense? At the purchaser's expense; at the expense of the working and middle-classes of this country.

If the government adopted NDP policy, moderate and low income people would pay no more than 6 per cent interest and that couple would pay about $82,000 in repaying the same $40,000 mortgage over 25 years. But the minister wants some people to have more bang for their buck, so the couple must repay $123,000 in 25 years. Further, the couple which began paying the mortgage at age 35 will end paying it at age 60. What a great achievement the ministeer has brought down! Is this the way to solve the housing crisis in Canada? The minister also said that certain capital costs on new residential buildings built for rent, begun after budget day but before December 31, 1975, may be claimed against any source of income by building owners. I am positive that when developers and their rich friends read that statement they will laugh all the way to the bank and plan to take an extra month's holiday in Florida or California.

When the big developers in Toronto, such as Greenwin, Cadillac and Markborough, take advantage of this measure they will think Santa Claus has come early this year—Santa Claus being the minister in charge of urban affairs. His idea, apparently, is to give the big developers who control development in the large cities of Canada more bang for their buck.

Mr. Peters: They were his campaign supporters.

Mr. Gilbert: Next, the minister announced that first-time buyers of new houses costing less than a certain price set by CMHC will be eligible for a $500 grant. If ever fraud or deception was perpetrated on the Canadian people, this proposal fits the bill. I remind the minister that the person receiving the grant will need to pay only $123,328 instead of $123,828 over 25 years in repaying a mortgage of $40,000 at 12 per cent. What a saving! We are assuming, of course, that the purchaser can find a house which comes within the price levels set by CMHC. What housing, then, are we talking about? The minister referred to condominium and row housing. Does he want the average married couple to raise children in a condominium? Apparently, the $500 grant is not to apply to co-op housing. Why is the minister refusing to give the $500 grant to purchasers involved in continuing co-op developments? Why will the grant be made available to those buying condominium and row houses and not to those buying co-op housing? I submit that such a grant would help those involved with co-operative housing.

Mr. Danson: They get 100 per cent financing and a 10 per cent grant.

Mr. Gilbert: The minister is willing to provide money to builders of residential housing at 8 per cent, but is charging provincial governments 10¾ per cent for money applied to rental houses. That shows how the minister thinks. Carrying costs incurred in connection with land awaiting development are not to be chargeable against other income, on the basis that land will be released. CMHC reports clearly indicate that residential land required in the next ten years is controlled by major developers in the large cities of this country. This means that a small number of private companies control most of the land we shall need for future housing. House building will remain concentrated in the hands of a few companies and it is easy to predict that housing supplies will remain tight and land prices will continue to rise. All interest payments, taxes and other related charges will eventually be passed on to the purchaser. Yet the minister says, "I will allow land developers to deduct land carrying charges from income for income tax purposes."

The Minister of Finance expressed fear that short-term measures applied to housing will not reduce unemployment. He is also afraid that house building will decrease in volume and that house prices will increase. He is afraid that the reduced supply of housing will lead to lower housing standards across the country. I suggest that the fears of the Minister of Finance will become fact in 1975. I remind the minister that these fears are being expressed not only by members of the New Democratic Party but by an economist employed by the Toronto-Dominion Bank. Dr. Douglas Peters, vice-president and chief economist for the Toronto-Dominion Bank, said:

● (1720)

The government policy is going to have to be changed to bring on more housing starts than the minister suggested.

Dr. Ralph Sultan, chief economist for the Royal Bank of Canada, said the number of housing starts would not have much of an impact in the short run. It is for these reasons that we in the New Democratic Party are so displeased and disappointed with the measures the Minister of Finance has brought forward, greeted with pleasure and glee by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. He has missed the point that housing is a social right of Canadians and they are entitled to housing at a reasonable cost.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the budget debate I wish to refer to the personal taxation proposals brought forward by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). For 1974, the May 6 budget measure of increasing the minimum tax credit to $150 was reintroduced. For the $6,000 wage earner who receives an additional $50 under the scheme, the amount is not sufficient to compensate for the loss in purchasing power experienced by the earner in 1974 to date, let alone the further price increases that can be expected in the remaining weeks of the year. In 1975, the minimum tax credit will be raised a further $50 to $200. Again, the price increases expected during 1975 will more than cancel this income gain, resulting in a further loss of real purchasing power to the lower income bracket individual. The maximum tax credit payable will be increased to $750, a gain of $250.

On a $10,000 income, using the minister's example, the $250 increase may, as the minister suggests, cover the food cost increases for a family during 1974, but it will not cover the cost increases in other areas of essential consumer expenditures for 1974, and it will do nothing to halt the erosion of real purchasing power of the earner in this income bracket during 1975. The other two existing, non-budgetary taxation measures referred to by the minister in his November 18 presentation were the lowering of the tax rate on the first taxable income bracket for 1975 from 12 to 9 per cent, and the indexing measures. It is worth pointing out that these two measures do not raise the real purchasing power of individuals but only partially compensate for the loss in real purchasing power that has already occurred. The minister asks that income earners bear his taxation proposals in mind when making their demands for wage increases. Since the proposals do not even maintain existing real income levels, one can hardly expect dutiful labour restraint in the coming year.

Concerning the finance minister's proposals establishing tax exemptions to encourage savings, as has been said before these measures only lessen the rate at which savings are eroded. The broadening of the $1,000 exemption to include stock market earnings as well as interest income is a useful addition—but an addition to a proposal which is inadequate to start with. Additional, new personal taxation measures proposed by the minister are offered as assistance to those aged 65 and over. The $1,000 exemption from pension income, the indexing of the 65-year old and over basic exemption, and the transfer to spouse capability of the 65 and over exemption are indeed efforts to tax older persons on fixed incomes at less than wage earners. But the fact that, in the minister's example at page 1428 of Hansard, a person could receive up to $8,258 in annual income before paying federal taxes presupposes that a person 65 years old could achieve such an annual income level. No federal taxes for low income pensioners is a step forward: it does not, however, solve the problem of those who have an inadequate income to start with. The reintroduced proposals of May 6, and the new proposals of November 18, regarding personal taxation do not provide much real comfort to the taxpayer. They were necessary, but insufficient. The life of the minister's "tax relief to all" thesis is best shown by the continuing rapid escalation of personal tax revenues.

I would also like to comment on the housing crisis in Canada. It appears highly unlikely and improbable that consumers will benefit from the reduction of the sales tax on building materials to 5 per cent. This measure is specifically designed to provide incentives to builders in an effort to aid the ailing construction industry. Consumers and potential home buyers are naive if they are fooled by the $650 savings figure mentioned by the finance minister in the budget. It should be recognized that this saving, if there is to be one, will be beneficial only to the builder in the long run.

This reduction and the undertone of savings it appears to present will do little but further confuse the construction industry when it is considered in the context of other federal housing policies. This measure is a purely psychological device, intended to soothe the fears of the potential home buyer by creating an atmosphere which gives the illusion that the future is not all that bad. The problem in passing on this saving to the consumer arises from the fact that most builders, due to the recent slowdown in construction activity caused by excessively high interest rates, have abnormally high stocks of inventory on which the sales tax has already been paid. Building industry spokesmen maintain that the government is expecting them to now absorb the loss on these inventory stocks. Industry's mark-up on these building materials is too low at present to allow the construction industry to pay the tab.

Furthermore, the total value of dealer inventory is now estimated at approximately $100 million and will take at least three or four months to deplete. By the time these stocks are depleted, inflation and labour demands, if both persist increasing at present rates will have virtually wiped out any potential savings to the consumer. The best saving hoped for would be approximately 3 per cent on an estimated $15,000 value of building materials per unit. The government appears to ignore the fact that the entire housing and construction problem has been caused by high interest rates, the factor which can be blamed for slackening the demand for building units. Yet there are no measures contained in the budget which would ease this problem. Had the reduction been included in the May budget, perhaps it would have represented some benefit to consumers. However, as the slow season for construction activity approaches, it appears that builders will have little chance to deplete their already taxed stocks.

Furthermore, many secondary industries dependent on housing construction, such as the forestry sector, will continue for the most part to be plagued with unemployment due to the percentage of their activity that is dependent on the U.S. housing market which has declined to an annual rate of less than half the previous year's production.

This government has been accused of many, many things, but it has never been accused of being responsive to the public need except in cases where necessary actions would also meet its political ends. This budget is, of course, another example of this. But since that fact is obvious enough for even members of the government to recognize, I wish to deal primarily with another monetary matter of which the government has shown a distinct inability to grasp the hard realities. I refer to the decision of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) to build an aircraft overhaul hangar in Winnipeg under the management of CAE Industries Limited of Montreal, to overhaul his department's five Boeing 707s. This is an impractical, short-sighted move necessitated by irresponsible promises and previous poor decisions made by the government.

It is impractical because an operation this size cannot be made viable on the overhaul work needed by five airplanes and some artificial make-work projects dreamed up by the government. The minister admits to having no firm contracts yet from any regional air carriers for their overhaul business and, even if received, there are still not enough planes to make the operation practical on the scale envisaged. It is a short-sighted decision because it ignores and is probably meant to pre-empt the filling of Winnipeg's real need for and right to a proper second Air Canada overhaul base.

I would urge the government to contract out the overhaul work on the Boeing 707s if necessary, stop construction on the makeshift hangar that is proposed, and instead begin now on the thorough planning, designing, construction and training necessary for a facility capable of properly servicing Air Canada's entire fleet, with the accent on the new tooling necessary to service the Boeing 727 aircraft which are now coming into service. These planes will become due for overhaul shortly after the base I propose would be ready for them. By that time they will number close to 30, and with other aircraft from the Air Canada fleet will supply sufficient work for this hangar without taking jobs away from the present base in Dorval.

There are many reasons why this move would be a wise one, both for Air Canada and for the country. Historically, Winnipeg's climate and terrain have made it the most desirable location in Canada for an aerospace industry. In the past a substantial portion of our national airline's maintenance work has been repeatedly promised to the Manitoba capital. Eleven years ago last Friday, on November 22, 1963, the late Lester B. Pearson, then prime minister, told the Commons that the Trans-Canada Airlines maintenance base would remain in operation in Winnipeg for at least ten years. Yet the final decision was made anyway on December 6, 1968, in Prime Minister Trudeau's office to move the base to Dorval. I do not think these facts jive with the Prime Minister's statements at a Winnipeg press conference, on May 23 of this year which suggest to hold Liberal governments blameless for the move.

In the past I have made charges about inefficiency, low morale, labour unrest—and the resulting threat to passenger safety—at the Dorval maintenance base. These and other charges were of course pooh-poohed by the government and by Air Canada, notwithstanding that a number of employees from Dorval backed the claims I made. But I am very gratified to note that, after exhaustive investigation into my charges, the Winnipeg Free Press has published a series of articles on the situation clearly substantiating what I have said. A reporter was sent to Dorval to interview employees and personnel at the base, and his conclusions are very close to what I have been saying for more than a year.

The maintenance base at Dorval is neither more economical nor more efficient than it was in Winnipeg. In fact the opposite is the case, and this cost difference will be multiplied many times when Mirabel International Airport becomes operational in a year's time. With ferrying costs between Dorval and Mirabel likely to amount to as much as $4 million a year while both airports are functioning, the timeliness of the Winnipeg alternative cannot be ignored.

Air Canada at Dorval is overstaffed in some departments, grossly understaffed in others. Basic training in M.O.T. standards, requirements and general procedures is almost non-existent. Tremendous unnecessary costs are being incurred because of duplication, out of date methods and equipment, and low employee production.

Highly-trained workers are being lost every day as they retire early at ages of 55 and even younger. I have talked with a number of these men. They tell me the constant union demands, friction between employees and working conditions have been too much. They have been made so unhappy they have had to quit. Morale at the base is at an incredibly low level. This results not only in low speed and low quality work, but is also driving away skilled, senior employees.

New people cannot be trained overnight, nor can they gain 20 years' experience in a hurry. This is a frightening situation, and one which could have even more severe implications if allowed to continue. Air Canada is the most strike-prone employer in the public sector. Almost all of its unionized employee groups have struck the airline at least once since 1968, some have struck two or three times. It should be noted that there was not a single strike at the overhaul base when it was located in Winnipeg.

Right now there is too much Air Canada maintenance work for one base to handle effectively. This is evidenced by the vastness of the Dorval operation and the huge amounts of overtime pay being handed out there. In addition to Air Canada, work is being done for Nordair, Wardair and CP Air at the base. In the words of one senior employee, it has become an almost uncontrollable situation in which quality will inevitably be jeopardized.

I quote the words of another employee at the base, speaking about the shift of the base from Winnipeg to Dorval, "The transfer was a monumental blunder resulting in excessive costs beyond our imaginations. Any fair, unbiased comparison of the former Winnipeg operation with the existing Dorval operation would reveal not only that Winnipeg was robbed, but that all Canada is paying a costly penalty."

This senior employee went on to say that at Dorval efficiency was an ignored quality.

Even if the Dorval base was efficient and was not beset by criminally low morale, substandard quality, and severe friction between employees, there would still be many reasons for splitting up the overhaul work. As I have shown, Air Canada has too much overhaul work for its present base, and enough to make two bases viable operations. Air Canada has maintained that a centralized operation is more economical and efficient. This thinking must be questioned. Indeed, it has already been questioned and refuted by experts.

In the Journal of Air Law and Commerce last year, an article by Samuel R. Reid and James W. Mohrfeld concluded that there is no basis for the support of this argument, which holds that profits increase as growth progresses. This study suggests that "a program of periodic and orderly spin-offs of components of the larger airlines appears to be in the best interests of the airlines as well as the public". Throughout the world most airlines have taken this advice and moved to decentralize their operations. But Air Canada, while growing at a rate of 15 per cent a year, and despite the government's supposed regional policies, insists on the opposite. In case anyone thinks that there is perhaps something unique about Air Canada which exempts it from such a rule, let me refer to a confidential transportation study done here in Canada. The McKinley Report was submitted to the government in 1971 recommending that Air Canada operations be decentralized. The opposite has continued to happen.

Facts such as these must make many Canadians wonder not only about the quality of Air Canada management but also about the political factors which have seen the airline moving steadily to centralize huge facets of its operations in Montreal. Even if Air Canada clings to the belief that its maintenance work should be consolidated in one location, it still has no solid argument against a move to Winnipeg. With flight operations being moved to Mirabel, the airline is going into a split situation anyway, considering the immense additional ferrying costs that will be necessary.

The overhaul work could be carried out at Winnipeg International Airport efficiently and quickly. Schedules could be worked out for the new Boeing 727s which would result in no deadheading whatsoever. The economics of the situation insist on this course of action. With the expected saving in ferrying costs, up to $4 million a year, the Winnipeg base would be more than paid for by this saving alone within four years.

Again one must wonder who is playing politics when Air Canada resists this obvious course of action. It is about time that both the government and Air Canada started listening to what the opposition has to say, and started heeding some of the advice given them. With the immediate past record of Air Canada in mind, many Canadians are seriously worried about the decline in services and quality of their national airline. Still others mourn the passing of an airline they were once proud to call theirs.

As one example of reasons for these feelings I refer to the mess at the opening of Toronto's terminal 2, a disaster which senior administrators foresaw but were unable to prevent; the emergence of labour unrest and strikes as a way of life in Air Canada; the deterioration in food, services and reservations; the unnotified cancellations, foul-ups, bumping of passengers, constant busy signals from A.C. phones; and the unobliging, uncaring attitude of many employees who have lost the pride they once had in their jobs and who have apparently given up hope concerning the management of the corporation—and with good reason, Mr. Speaker.

When an Air Canada deficit of $5 million was announced recently, the chief executive officer's only reply was that the air line would have to raise its fares. Apparently no thought was being given to streamlining management procedures or to implementing recommendations resulting from critical analyses commissioned by the air line and the government. Nor was any thought given to the validity of Air Canada's decentralization policy.

Many government decisions regarding air line operations must also be questioned at this time. The Minister of National Defence has called the maintenance base transfer from Manitoba to Quebec one of the worst decisions in the history of Canada. Many respected experts agreed with this criticism, yet the decision was made.

Air Canada recently had a number of obsolete Viscount aircraft overhauled, even though the aircraft has been phased out of service—a program which Mr. Pratte admitted "probably cost us money". The unnecessary work was done as an attempt by the government to fulfil irresponsible commitments to Winnipeg for overhaul work. These Viscounts have since been sold for an undisclosed amount, but as a spokesman for the buyer said after the deal, "We didn't pay too much for them".

The government has made no progress on the matter of improving international air route agreements, especially in regard to Winnipeg. This city has two direct air routes to the United States serviced exclusively by two American air lines. For more than 25 years Manitoba has been handed line after line, denials and deception about its aerospace industry's future by successive TCA and Air Canada officials, as well as successive governments. I have a file an inch thick—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret I must interrupt the hon. member as the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, may I have a few short minutes?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member can only complete his remarks or finish his sentence with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Another hon. member is seeking the floor so I would have to recognize him unless he yields.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, may I thank my colleague who indicates I may continue. In my maiden speech in this House in February, 1973, I said that we in Manitoba believed that if Mr. Richardson could not convince his government to fulfil its previous promises, then he should be prepared to resign from the cabinet and move to the backbenches to challenge the sincerity of the Prime Minister.

In light of the countless promises, later broken, made by this government to the people of Manitoba and western Canada since that time,I must strongly reiterate this belief. If Mr. Richardson is a man of principle, then he must give us—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but all through his speech he has been referring to ministers by name. At the conclusion of his speech I think he should read citation 146 of Beauchesne, where he will find the instruction not to use family names or the name of a minister, but rather refer to him by his portfolio. The same is the case with hon. members; they must be referred to by their constituency. I have hesitated a little in singling out the hon. member because this practice has been going on, not only all through this debate but through the Speech from the Throne debate as well. The Chair always feels uneasy in pointing to one member who makes this mistake because he does not know it is not permitted by the rules, or because he has forgotten the rules. However, may I take this opportunity of pointing this out, at the same time excusing myself to the hon. member but hoping it will benefit all members of the House.

Mr. McKenzie: My apologies, Mr. Speaker, and I shall conclude my speech momentarily. If the Minister of National Defence is a man of principle then he must give us some immediate proof that Winnipeg's Air Canada overhaul base is being built or he must register his public disapproval of the government's tactics. If this were to happen then one would also have to expect the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) to illustrate his honesty by a similar act of courage, in view of his constant and unfailing support of the Minister of National Defence, most recently in his budget remarks of Friday last.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, if I am not mistaken, is it not the member for Ottawa-Vanier?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I am taking part in this debate with special interest. I have read the budget speech very thoroughly and I am pleased to note that it is progressive and meets present needs.

I wish to join my many colleagues, Mr. Speaker, in congratulating you on your appointment to your new office. I would also like to take this opportunity to thank my constituents for having re-elected me.

Some people think that the present depression experienced by developed countries is only a fortuitous factor and that minimum efforts or a short period of austerity would be sufficient to restore normal conditions. But this is not so. The prosperity of developed countries mostly rests upon the processing of raw materials bought from developing countries often at ridiculously low prices. These same countries are just beginning to realize that they were being exploited and that on top of it all their raw materials, being their only resources, are not inexhaustible. People tend easily to believe that the oil crisis was brought about by the war in the Middle East, and is the only cause of inflation that we experience. Really, the increase in oil prices is only one of the causes of inflation at this time and we should keep in mind that the costs of raw materials had already been rising since the middle of 1972.

The situation will never be as it was before and it becomes clearer every day that we are living in a system based essentially on lack of foresight and wastage. Inflation as we know it now should incite us not to regret the situation that was before but rather to review our way of life.

The United States are a good example of this. It is no use having a gross national product increase year in and year out, if this growth is due to the manufacturing of absolutely useless products that, in addition, do not bring any deep satisfaction to individuals who contribute, finally, to deteriorate the environment. What is the use of sending a few men on the moon if, on this earth, millions of people live in inhuman cities where it is impossible to take a walk in the street at night without taking the risk of being assassinated.

Canada is fortunate in having abundant resources, with an environment that is generally not deteriorated beyond repair. We must therefore take this opportunity to avoid errors made elsewhere, and to create our own lifestyle where individuals may thrive. We should emphasize the improvement public equipment, because the percentage of our resources used to improve our public services is definitely inadequate, as compared to the consumption of often unnecessary products.

For this reason, we must contain excessive individualism to the extent it goes contrary to common interest, and use our limited resources in a more logical way. The liberal government has been working in that direction in a number of important areas, namely, urban development, housing, public transit and pollution control.

In the area of urban development in particular, the federal government has made considerable efforts in the National capital area to show other cities in the country that an urban centre can very well expand while keeping human prospective. May I refer to the preservation of historical buildings, such as Académie-de-la-Salle which, once renovated, will be occupied by Urban Affairs offices. Negotiations are also under way to preserve the Ottawa Archdiocese building. These are but a few examples of well planned modernization.

Another urban planning measure also deserving mention is Rideau Square, which is designed to renovate, preserve and animate a commercial and tourist centre right in the downtown area of our National Capital, in keeping with the wishes of the communities involved.

But as often happens, even the best of things generate new problems. Indeed, fast population growth, high family formation rate, and the attraction of a pleasant National Capital all helped increase housing demand. In the Ottawa-Vanier constituency in particular, catching up had to be done in the area of social housing.

In order to correct this social situation, the federal government has allocated important sums for the construction of new housing. The accent is being put on so-called social housing, as I said before, to provide housing for senior citizens and middle-income earners. Through provincial agencies, many of these buildings were built in my riding over the last three years.

It follows from that experience that the funds loaned by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to provincial housing authorities must be under a much stricter control than it has been the case up to date. The federal government at present has no direct qualitative or quantitative control over those buildings. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation lends up to 90 per cent of the cost of those buildings. Since the federal government has no control whatsoever over the planning and management of those buildings, it is not sure that the loans granted always produce the planned benefits.

I suggest that in my riding of Ottawa-Vanier, the situation in this respect is alarming. The Ontario Housing Corporation has apparently become an aid agency for speculators rather than the population. It seems impossible to me that a provincial corporation has accepted to pay prices as high as those which were paid for land located in my riding or elsewhere without there being any negligence and maybe even collusion involved between certain speculators and certain civil servants.

Such assumptions are most certainly in order, Mr. Speaker, if we take into account the proceedings brought against certain officials of this agency in Ontario.

I would now like to quote an example which I am very familiar with. In May of 1971, when I was trustee for the Ottawa School Board, there were discussions for the purchase of one and a half acre of land belonging to the Ottawa Episcopal Corporation and located on Donald street. The asking price for that land was then $35,000 approximately. In September of 1971, the planning committee of the School Board, having examined the question, recommended the purchase of this land and started the necessary negotiations through their legal counsel. Needless to say, I was quite surprised when I learned that, in the meantime, one of our own trustees had taken out an option on that same land and finally bought it through his company for $105,000. A little later, on March 22, 1973, he sold in to the Ontario Housing Corporation for the sum of $273,000, therefore turning, in less than nine months, a profit of 155 per cent or $168,000. It seems to me that provincial or other organizations entitled to it should use the tool that is expropriation to prevent that kind of profiteering. Since that time the province of Ontario legislated against speculators by passing an act entitled the Land Speculation Tax Act. Needless to recall that that act does not apply to sales to government agencies. I also suspect, Mr. Speaker, that several other transactions of this kind took place in my riding. However, I leave it up to the provincial MLA to raise that whole question at the Ontario legislature and determine whether those allegations have any base.

I think the example I just quoted proves that the province of Ontario and its agency—the Ontario Housing Corporation—are thwarting all the efforts of the federal government in the field of social housing in Ottawa, and in part in my riding. But, as always, it is the people who will pay for it and the community who will be impoverished because that profiteering increases the price of all land in the city, in the riding where I live. How is it that for land of equal value the municipality of Vanier, for example, pays $5 a square foot when the Ontario Housing Corporation pays two and three times that price for nearby land?

Such action on the part of the provincial corporation contributes to increased prices for land. But speculation is only one cause of the housing crisis. Provincial and municipal governments, in addition to stopping real estate speculation, will have to try and discover new solutions to that problem. They will have, on a much larger scale than now, to create land banks that they will resell themselves. In proceeding in that way, using their powers of expropriation, governments will pay the fair market value for land and sell them in turn at a reasonable price, because there will not have been any speculators to make exaggerated profits between the time of the purchase and that of the sale. It will be necessary to make experiences in the area of city planning. It may also be necessary to generalize the creation of satellite towns situated some distance from existing major urban centers. Let me remind the House that such a satellite town with a projected population of 100,000 will be created in Carlsbad Springs, on the outskirts of Ottawa.

As far as the present urban-oriented architecture is concerned, it is completely outdated and will not allow an increase in population density without a possible deterioration of the quality of life. It is in fact as an incentive to innovate in this area that the federal government has invested $100 million in a program entitled "Urban Demonstration Program".

I pointed out that the opposition, because of its usual lack of imagination, criticized this program as soon as it was proposed. The members on the other side of the House probably have not the necessary intelligence to realize its full significance. However, in the meantime, because it felt it to be an urgent matter, in the budget speech, the federal government presented or adopted various measures which might help and bring a fast and immediate improvement in the housing field. First, the carrying costs on land awaiting development should not be charged against other income but be taken into account only as land is sold. I suggest that this measure should assist in bringing land for housing onto the market more quickly. Then the sales tax on building materials is reduced and the sales tax on materials purchased by local governments for use in the construction of water distribution system is abolished. Moreover, to help young people accumulate the savings required for buying a home, a new savings plan is being established: a registered home ownership plan. Finally, the main credit institutions are invited not to confine high ratio loans to middle- and lower-priced housing.

As for public transport, in the budget the government shows undoubtedly that they are doing what they have pledged themselves to do in the last election campaign, by proposing the removal of the sales tax on any transportation equipment, which includes railway cars heavy trucks, buses and commercial planes. The removal of that tax will deprive the federal government of about $100 million of income. As for the protection of environment, Mr. Speaker, the government has reintroduced for two more years the fast paying off of the equipment used to fight pollution, a measure which was to come to an end within the current year.

But while the government is taking care of the material comfort of the people, it cannot be said that it is neglecting intellectual matters. In that field, the government has shown interest in some undertakings which, if they succeed, will contribute a lot to the development of a typically Canadian culture. May I be allowed to mention more specifically the case of the CBC which has now undertaken to set up an organization to be entrusted with the distribution, for educational purposes, of audio and visual tapings of the broadcasts of the corporation. Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at eight p.m.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Madam Speaker, I should like to continue the speech I was delivering before dinner by reminding hon. members that I was dealing with all the audio-visual material and the huge library that belong to the CBC and that should be made available to the public at large, I think, since after all, it is the Canadian taxpayers who paid the broadcasts that may be useful in education or in other fields.

It seems to me the National Film Board could very well take the responsibility of distributing that audio-visual material. Recordings are often a source of information of an unparalleled richness and they could be used for educational purposes throughout this country instead of being left to deteriorate in warehouses as happens at the present time.

An organization such as this one would be especially useful to all francophone minorities outside Quebec for which it is extremely difficult to obtain French culture instruments.

Besides it is to help the French-speaking minorities outside Quebec and even the province of Quebec in particular that the federal government concerns itself with the problem related to textbooks. As a matter of fact, a conference convened by the Secretary of State is being held in Ottawa today to examine all that question. It is almost impossible for the francophone minorities to obtain those textbooks they so greatly need. Purely Canadian textbooks written in French are almost non-existent, and the people concerned have to resort either to textbooks imported from France, which do not reflect the Canadian situation, or to English textbooks.

Madam Speaker, I should like also to deal with a very important question, namely bilingualism.

I shall not deal with the programs now under way in the public service, nor with the policy of institutional bilingualism, but rather with a linguistic centre, in the private sector, which would be located in the national capital of our country. At the present time, 35 per cent of all workers in the national capital area are public servants, and 65 per cent are employed in other sectors.

That private linguistic centre would allow more than two-thirds of the workers in the national capital area to learn a second language and perfect their knowledge of their mother tongue.

I am talking about setting up, in the national capital, a service considered essential by several people, if ever we are to achieve the objective of a Canadian national capital that truly reflects the bilingual character of Canada. That centre would be supported by the expertise of the Language Training Centre of the public service and Algonquin College, and would be designed according to a centralized administrative formula with a qualified teaching staff, grouped in teams; they would, in fact, belong to an academic centre, and be composed of mobile teams that would go to the private sector to dispense their instruction.

The National Capital Commission now has a budget of $250,000 earmarked for the development of bilingualism in the national capital. Numerous public, municipal, and regional organizations as well as several industries and businesses are asking for financial assistance from the NCC to enable them to adopt bilingualism in fact.

In the public sector, at the municipal and regional levels, the need for bilingualism is felt very strongly, whether it be in the police forces of Hull or Ottawa, in the fire departments, in the hospitals and in other fields of public administration generally. I think that it would be possible to establish that language centre for public and private affairs with the co-operation of the National Capital Commission, the provinces concerned and the private sector.

My discussions with several organizations have shown the interest and merits of such an undertaking. I hope, Madam Speaker, that Algonquin College, the National Capital Commission, the Quebec and Ontario governments will take an active interest in the matter.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I wish to say that this budget, which can be qualified as expansionist, helps to promote economic activity in Canada.

Reducing taxes, while increasing the purchasing power of Canadians, it copes adequately with the threats of depression by which we are all concerned.

● (2010)

[English]

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, first of all let me say that I am very pleased to be participating in this debate with you in the chair. At the risk of being accused of being a male chauvinist I will say that you bring to the chair a charm and dignity which is all too apparent tonight—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: —and which we always admire in you.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But you are still not going to get more than 20 minutes!

Mr. McGrath: Of course I have a certain advantage since I happen to be closer to the chair than most members. I am sure, however, that your qualities are apparent to all.

Just one day after the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) brought down the budget, Statistics Canada released the regional cities index. This is a breakdown of the consumer price index according to the principal cities in the country. It showed some very interesting things. For instance, my own city of St. John's, Newfoundland, had by far the highest over-all increase in the cost of living of any city in the country, although Winnipeg and Edmonton were not too far behind.

Of particular significance was the fact that the food component of the index for the month of October in St. John's showed a startling 3.8 per cent increase. That represented a 20.8 per cent over-all increase in one year.

It was also interesting to note that the figures showed that, while St. John's, Newfoundland had by far the highest rate of increase in the cost of food, Ottawa had by far the lowest increase in the cost of food, .4 per cent. I say that is significant because Ottawa usually has one of the highest rates of increase of any city that is surveyed.

I believe the reason for the change was due in no small part to the fact that the Food Prices Review Board selected Ottawa as the site of a pilot study. It surveyed food prices on a comparative basis in the city of Ottawa, in all of the major supermarket chains operating in the Ottawa-Hull area. The results of the surveys were made public and, as a consequence, there followed real competition between the various supermarket chains to lower food prices.

I raised this question at the time and I ask it again tonight; when can we expect similar surveys in other cities in Canada? After all, the Food Prices Review Board is a national board with national responsibilities. One of the interesting things to come out of the survey was the fact that food prices in Ottawa did go down as a consequence of publishing the findings of the survey.

Another interesting thing to come out of the survey was that supermarkets in the lower income areas, where consumers are virtually locked into dealing with a particular supermarket in their neighbourhoods because of their not being as mobile as consumers in the other areas, perhaps through lack of a family car, charged higher prices for food. I am told the same thing applies in Montreal. I certainly hope that aspect of the study will receive more attention from the Food Prices Review Board, and also from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Department of National Health and Welfare.

The increase in food prices in the city of St. John's by 3.8 per cent in the month of October compares with the national monthly increase of 1.4 per cent. This obviously means that food prices are rising at a more striking and rapid rate in St. John's than in other cities of the country. We have also a substantially higher rate of increase in unemployment in my city. It too is growing there at a faster rate than in other cities.

It is easy to deal in statistics, Madam Speaker, but I believe that they tell only part of the story. In order to translate these statistics into real practical terms I did a survey of my own. I picked out a national supermarket chain in the city of Ottawa and a similar chain store in the city of St. John's just at random, and I picked out a number of essential food items.

Here is what I found: in St. John's, one dozen Grade A eggs, 99 cents—in Ottawa, 75 cents; in St. John's, a quart of milk, 57 cents—in Ottawa, 49 cents; a 24-ounce loaf of white broad in St. John's, 47 cents—Ottawa, 36 cents; 10 pounds of potatoes, in St. John's, 98 cents—in Ottawa, 69 cents, hamburger in St. John's, 98 cents a pound—in Ottawa, 75 cents a pound; ground chuck, in St. John's $1.38 a pound—the same in Ottawa, 95 cents a pound.

How could there be such a differential, Madam Speaker? Obviously transportation is a factor, but is it that much of a factor? I doubt it. Earlier this month the Food Prices Review Board released a special study of food prices in the province of Newfoundland compared with food prices prevailing elsewhere in Canada. The board thought this disparity was great enough to warrant a special study, and that in itself is significant.

While the findings of the board were by no means conclusive, it did make some very worth-while recommendations to both levels of government. These recommendations are significant. First of all, Newfoundland has to import most of what it consumes from the mainland, so transportation is a significant factor. And if the board's recommendations were accepted, the distribution system within the province would be improved.

I hope that the study and its recommendations receive immediate and serious consideration from both the federal and provincial governments.

One area where the federal government could take immediate and unilateral action is in regard to the recommendation that the consumer subsidy on powdered milk also be applied to evaporated milk. The per capita consumption of evaporated milk in Newfoundland is considerably higher than the per capita consumption of powdered skim milk in the rest of Canada. I have already asked the government to take immediate action on this recommendation in the report.

● (2020)

There is no doubt in my mind that there must be fundamental changes in business practices in the province. The board has telling and meaningful things to say on this aspect, and I hope the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) and his provincial counterpart will take into account the board's conclusions and recommendations.

In October another study was undertaken on Newfoundland transportation. That study was commissioned by the Canadian Transport Commission into all phases of ground transport in Newfoundland. That study, which was prepared by professional consultants, is in 11 volumes. Since the commission has invited the public to make submissions on the report no later than the end of January, 1975, I will reserve my comments, except to say that I hope the study will receive the immediate consideration of the government, so that when the period for public submission has ended we can expect some direction from the government as to what course it intends to follow in implementing the principles, conclusions and recommendations of the report. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) carries great responsibilities in this field, by virtue of the responsibilities of his portfolio, and because he is the province's representative in the government of Canada. As the months go on we shall watch the minister's reactions to the public submissions and to the final disposition of the study by the government.

[Mr. McGrath.]

Transportation is the key to closing the gap between food prices in Newfoundland and food prices in the rest of the country. A substantial proportion of what we consume must be brought in from the mainland and distributed over an area covering 156,000 square miles. Therefore an adequate transport system is both vital and essential. It is not enough for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to say in this House that we are spending $50 million on the gulf service. I submit that we are not getting full value for that money because of the archaic thinking which the Department of Transport has adhered to in matters of transportation affecting Newfoundland, and because of the archaic thinking of the CNR. We live in a day of modern transportation technology, when modern developments have made possible modern transport systems, yet we still operate in the steamship era in providing service to Newfoundland.

Food prices in Canada accounted for over half of the increase in the consumer price index during the past two years. That is an astounding fact. Food prices in the past 24 months in Canada have risen by almost 40 per cent, leaving low income earners and those on fixed incomes to shoulder a particularly heavy burden. Because of high unemployment and a per capita income that lags 35 per cent below the national average, Newfoundland has been harder hit by this wave of inflation than the rest of the country. This places a particularly unfair burden on the people of my province. For that reason, although we look to the government of Canada for immediate relief—I am sorry to say that such relief is not evident in the measures proposed in the budget—we look forward to realizing the potential of our own natural resources over the long term. That is why I regret particularly the decision of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) to tax resource development in Canada, and I emphasize the decision to tax oil and gas.

This brings me to my next point. Newfoundland has just completed its first 25 years as a province of Canada. We became part of Canada 25 years ago after a referendum in which less than 52 per cent of the people of Newfoundland voted to confederate with Canada. I do not think it is unreasonable to say that if we had known, when Newfoundland was about to enter Confederation, that one day the government of Canada would unilaterally and arbitrarily abdicate its position vis-à-vis the British North America Act, if we had known that the ownership of natural resources would be called into question, that fact alone, I submit, would have been enough to keep us, the people of Newfoundland, out of Confederation.

The people of Newfoundland would never have voted to confederate with Canada if they had known in 1949 that they would lose their right to exploit their own natural resources. Let me point out that we entered confederation with Canada as a full-fledged dominion, with full sovereignty over our resources. We are not a big province. Our population is small and we are represented in this House by only seven seats. The province contains only a small percentage of the population of Canada, but we will fight any attempt by the government to take over control of our resources or to change in any way the pact of Confederation. I support what my leader said in this House. And I support the position adopted by the Premier of Alberta. I can sum up our position in no finer way than by repeating what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) said, "The provinces of Canada may not be sovereign states, but neither are they colonies".

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Madam Speaker, as a newly elected member I rise to speak in this House, over which Your Honour presides with such fairness and competence, feeling very much aware of the responsibilities of an elected representative taking part in this debate. No matter how long or how deeply one has considered beforehand, the actual moment of speaking in this House, following the mandate solemnly given in a democratic election, is one that makes one think anew of one's commitment to the democratic process and of one's duty to listen to constituents, to evaluate their needs and expectations, and to strive to have these reflected in legislation.

The riding which I have the honour to represent is an urban one with a high concentration of new Canadians. It is a riding where many people work hard, and struggle to buy homes and educate their children on modest incomes. The 1971 census figures showed the average income of heads of families as $6,347; the average family income was $8,658. In 1971 only 7.6 per cent of families had incomes of over $15,000.

The measures announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) to maintain a good level of production and employment are welcomed by my constituents who are particularly vulnerable in times of low employment. The measures to stimulate housing construction are of special interest in a riding where 10.1 per cent of those in the labour force are employed in the construction industry. The more prosperous families in Trinity are very socially aware and will, I know, support the measures taken to increase the purchasing power of those on low incomes.

According to the 1971 census figures, 8.6 per cent of Trinity's population was over the age of 65 years; of these, 61 per cent were women. The recent amendments to the Canada Pension Plan and the reductions in personal income tax announced in the budget ease the current difficulties of senior citizens but, Madam Speaker, many of the retired women contributed during their working years to private pension plans which have not served them well; still others worked for many years in jobs where they were excluded from all fringe benefits.

Women who are employed in the service, trade and manufacturing industries are often doubly disadvantaged by low wages, which allow little or no margin for saving, and by discriminatory pension plans. Minimum wage legislation appears to have narrowed the male-female wage differential in low-wage occupations, but differentials still exist, particularly in non-unionized establishments. A recent Ontario study estimated the average differential as high as 22 percentage points.

In May, 1972, legislation was introduced in this House to amend the Canada Labour Code to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sex and marital status. That bill, which did not receive third reading before dissolution of the twenty-eighth parliament, contained a limitation clause excluding pensions and life insurance plans from the amendments.

The province of Ontario in 1971 enacted a human rights code which prohibited discrimination in employment on the grounds of sex or marital status, but the section on fringe benefits has not yet been proclaimed. Since fringe benefits are generally considered part of pay, women are increasingly asking why a country and a province which advocate equal pay can at the same time tolerate inequality of fringe benefits.

Among the many discriminatory practices to be found in employees' group insurance plans are, first, eligibility requirements. Length of service for eligibility varies for men and women, for example, five years service or 25 years of age for women, before entry into the plan. Vesting of the plan, continuous service stipulation, is sometimes longer for women than for men.

Second, take the case of death benefits to spouse. Most plans provide for reduced benefits to the spouse of a deceased male contributor, but nothing for the spouse of a deceased female contributor. There are many variants relating to dependent children of a deceased contributor. For example, the children of a deceased woman contributor must prove a situation of hardship and/or receive lesser amounts that those provided for the dependent children of a man contributor. Most plans have fewer joint and survivorship options available for women contributors.

Third, many firms have an earlier compulsory retirement age for women resulting in lower contributions from both employee and management and, therefore, lower pension benefits. This practice is now changing. However, there are still almost a quarter, some 23.2 per cent, of those women who are now enrolled in pension plans who are required to retire at an earlier age than men under the same plans. When the earlier retirement age is combined with the delayed entry I mentioned earlier, a woman's pension is doubly depressed.

Fourth, there are amounts of life insurance. Many plans offer lower amounts of life insurance coverage to women. The group life insurance plan of one Crown corporation provides single women with exactly half the amount of insurance protection which a single man buys for the same premium.

Fifth, there is the example of health insurance plans. Management generally contributes to these plans but does not allow the married female employee to participate unless legally separated, divorced or widowed. In situations where the wife is the permanent worker, the husband must pay the premiums on a private basis and the couple lose the management contribution normally extended to married men.

Sixth, look at part-time employees. Some firms have no plans—pensions, medical, life, disability—for a part-time and/or temporary workers. Since many women are in this category because of family responsibilities they are particularly discriminated against in loss of benefits and in loss of management contributions.

Eighty-four years ago, in 1890, Canadian women were told they did not need the vote for they could accomplish as much by loving persuasion of their men. The argument failed to take into consideration the growing number, even at that time, of unmarried women wage earners who had no husbands to persuade, lovingly or otherwise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Nicholson: In 1974, women's pension plans are still based on the assumption that women employees are all supported by men who will provide well for all contingencies, and that women have no financial responsibilities for dependents and no need to plan for their own economic well-being or that of their dependents.

However, the fact of the matter is that over a quarter of a million working women, 266,000, or almost one-tenth, of the female working force, are separated, deserted, divorced or widowed. Add to these over a million single women, 1,006,000, who make up more than a third, in fact 34.1 per cent of the female labour force, and the assumption of no female employee need becomes hard to support.

In this day of early marriage, the fact that only one-third of the female labour force, 33.3 per cent, is under the age of 25 is also a meaningful statistic.

Another consideration which must not be overlooked concerns those women in the labour force who are married, and that is the level of earnings of the male breadwinner. Many women who work do so in order to maintain a decent standard of living which the husband's wage alone would not permit. Pensions are generally assessed on the basis of average earnings over a period of time. Where those average earnings are low, the earned pension will also be low. If the wife's earnings are needed to establish a healthy life-style for the family during her working years, her pension is also needed to allow the couple a decent standard of living when they retire, and income replacement is needed if she becomes unable to work because of illness.

Disability insurance for women is limited in availability, and higher premiums are charged to women than men, as much as 61 per cent higher. The annual premium differential is said to be based on actuarial tables. However, insurance companies are quite coy about releasing the data on which they base their discriminatory premium rates for disability insurance. This is particularly strange because they freely publish the life tables on which they base their justification for discriminating between men and women in connection with retirement pensions and annuities. Perhaps they fear being embarrassed by discovery that this discrimination is due to emotional bias and myth and cannot be supported by fact.

Statistics Canada labour force survey indicates that the pattern of absences from work because of illness for the last number of years has been fairly consistent. The rate of absences because of short-term illness is somewhat higher for women than for men, but the rate for long-term illness, and it is this type of illness for which disability insurance is made available, is higher for men than for women. In 1973, 1.82 per cent of all full-time working women were absent from employment because of illness lasting for a period in excess of one week; during the same year 1.97 per cent of all full-time working men were absent because of illness lasting over one week.

Canadian suffragists at the end of the nineteenth century and the beginning of this century were part of a more general reform movement that was concerned to remove a wide range of injustices and evils that afflicted the country at that time. Contemporary Canadian women, too, usually see women's rights in the broad context of human rights and social betterment.

Situations which are unfair to women are usually closed situations where some persons are able to make and implement decisions which they do not have to explain or account for and, therefore, are situations which are unfair to some men also, especially those from minority groups. Opening up situations for discussion and requiring reasons for decisions normally results in increased representation not only of women but of men from minority groups.

As long as discrimination against women in pension plans and life insurance continues, and insurance companies are not required to account fully for their practices, one must wonder what other forms of discrimination may be practised on the grounds of secret actuarial tables, and what the cost is to the economy as well as to the individuals concerned.

Human rights codes generally stress public education, and research into attitudinal change and cultural conditioning. But people who are discriminated against, whether on the grounds of sex, colour or race, are increasingly interested in changing behaviour rather than attitudes. Changing attitudes is a slow and nebulous business. Changing differential treatment in existing benefit schemes is much more susceptible to clear definition and practical solutions.

● (2040)

It is my hope that the human rights legislation which is due to come before this House will deal firmly and fairly with this matter. It is surely in the interest of the Canadian economy, as well as in the interest of justice, that there should be fairness and equity in every phase of employment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Madam Speaker, I am sure you are well aware of the fact that it is with a surplus budget of some $250 million that this Liberal administration intends to carry out its operation which, by the way, has been rendered twice as difficult, when we considered the budget speech the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) made last Monday night, which aims at reducing the inflation rate and prevent the Canadian economy from entering into a long-lasting recession period.

If I remember correctly, in the first budget speech for the year 1974-75 which he made in May of this year, the minister had announced that he would fight inflation with a deficit budget of some $450 million.

In spite of this, Madam Speaker, I consider that he is not offering any valid solution to fight inflation, and that the measures proposed by the minister are clearly not enough for our people in the low-income bracket. At best, as far as I can judge, the minister is about to invite provincial governments to reduce their public expenses and incite Canadian workers and corporations to exert a minimum of discipline.

As the hon. Minister of Finance said: "Canada is confronted by two major challenges—dealing with persistent, deep-seated inflation and at the same time maintaining a good level of production and employment". I do not feel that the minister's budget speech can solve those two problems because, first of all, they are contrary and they require different solutions. The budget is only grappling with the effects of inflation while hoping the price increase for 1975 will be lower by about 1 per cent compared to the increase for this year.

But what about the causes, Madam Speaker? We keep claiming from all sides that this plague we call inflation is imported, but it does not seem that Ottawa has decided to come to grips with it. On the contrary, we find rather easily that some measures are clearly inflationist and that the said inflationary thrusts for 1975 come from inside.

While all great nations in the whole world are trying to innovate and find new ways to deal with this problem, Ottawa is at the same time doing its utmost to convince Canadian people that there is not much possibility to check inflation and that meanwhile we have to bear our pain patiently.

On the other hand, I am happy to see that Ottawa has finally understood—even though not entirely in my opinion, but it still is a first step towards understanding—considering that the federal government has decided to lower the sales tax on building materials from 12 to 5 per cent. However, I do not think that the government and its building speculator friends will suffer much, since the government used to keep this tax for itself and the big builders still increased their annual profits in unimaginable proportions.

Madam Speaker, in this budget which applies exceptionally to an eighteen month period rather than a normal year, it is surprising and even disappointing to note that Ottawa has not considered lowering the old age pensions admissibility age to 60 over a period of five years, in view of the fact that the government of the Prime Minister talked a lot about senior citizens during the last election campaign.

Moreover, the budget contains nothing to get agriculture out of its present stagnant situation, and according to the predictions of the hon. Minister of Finance, there will be in fact an increase in unemployment in the next few months, a decrease in production before the end of the year, and a rate of inflation of about 10 per cent in 1975.

Madam Speaker, I believe that it is not by granting income tax deductions of about $650 million for 1974 that the government can support the demand of the Canadian people and maintain at the same time Canadian production. This will only reduce somewhat the burden of Canadian taxpayers. In other words, the only true measure implemented by Ottawa to maintain the rate of growth of our economy consists in reducing the taxes for manufacturing industries and small companies, as well as mining and oil industries, which measure aims at increasing the offer and preventing shortages.

Madam Speaker, there is a very simple and well known way to shirk one's duty and present commitments and to forget current problems. It consists in trying to make predictions, in talking, in discussing, in argumenting about future problems. One thus seems knowledgeable, worried and concerned, while on the whole washing one's hands of problems that should be solved today.

Being unable to face the present wisely, coldly and objectively, one withdraws into the past, dreams about or fears the future. And problems take roots, remain and develop mostly because those responsible for solutions are caught in the machinery of conditioning or routine, following the well beaten path of their predecessors. However, Madam Speaker, the present requires an administration that can no longer follow patterns of the past. As can be seen we are courting disaster. Time has come for the federal government to make sure it takes the required steps to give all Canadians the purchasing power they need to do credit to Canadian production, thus spurring demand.

Several times, government members voted against proposals calling for the implementation of a guaranteed minimum income, which would allow each and every Canadian to live decently, according to the Canadian productive potential. Yet, I read in Le Devoir of November 21, 1974, that in about a year Canada could equip itself with a new federal-provincial guaranteed income system.

We, of the Social Credit, will not hesitate to apply such measures, because families must be assured of a decent income. We have been advocating the solution for years.

According to the rules and traditions of times past, and of the wonderful progressive capitalism of those past few decades in Europe and North America, the budget speech that was read out last Monday by the hon. Minister of Finance is undoubtedly a masterpiece of accuracy, status quo and stability of the present situation which protracts for a few months the very same problems of inflation, unemployment and poverty, without the flimsiest hope for national economic balance which every citizen in Canada has been expecting from our government.

And yet I shall accuse no one for their reluctance or even their carelessness. I find, Madam Speaker, that the officials at the head of most departments are doing everything they can. They are not to be blamed nor replaced they should simply be asked to alter their consistently retrospective mental attitude, their frame of thinking, and direct it to the present, which would benefit each and everyone of us, as soon as we would become conscious of our present capabilities.

If we go rapidly over our national economy since 1934, when the Bank of Canada was created, as a result of far reaching royal inquiries into our financial situation, our industry, our trade and banking system, we realize the huge progress made in every respect with the production and capitalization of huge supplies in the hands of prosperous citizens and great corporations private or public, millionaire or billionaire, national or multinational.

Production and capitalization have been in constant progress as opposed to the constant slowdown of consumption. If we admit that broad fact far and wide, Madam Speaker, then solutions will immediately arise which we shall behold with astonishment. We will just have to apply them easily and plainly in our usual work, in Parliament, without having to change people or monetary, economic or political systems.

All the monetary, economic and political systems and mechanisms which were used to build up a fantastic production and an extravagant surplus capitalization may well be used at the same time to regulate a more complete system of personal, family and social consumption under the leadership of the same ministers and members of Parliament elected last July 8 by the people of Canada who produce, consume and capitalize. We merely have to change a few percentage points in incomes and taxes between different places without harming anyone and by doing so much good to all with concrete results in both the national and world mentality almost desperately seeking a better economic national and world balance, and we can assure better distribution for all we can produce.

Madam Speaker, having reached a point where in 1974 we are boarding for the future as much as 42 per cent of our annual production and consuming the other 58 per cent, judging by the budget that is before us, where we Canadians are consuming in 1974 only $80 billion out of a production of $139 billion, thus capitalizing $59 billion for the future, I can clearly see, madam Speaker, that we should immediately transfer $15 billion of our exaggerated capitalization to make for the deficiency in our consumption. This would at once reduce or drive out inflation, unemployment and poverty and effect an immediate return to a national economic balance between individuals, families and companies in all parts of Canada, to start with, and this condition would soon spread to all parts of the world following our convincing experience.

[English]

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Madam Speaker, the budget presented in this House a week ago tonight by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) dealt with three problems—inflation, unemployment and leadership. While it is true that these are the three problems faced by all Canadians, I suspect that they have a meaning for Canadians that is somewhat different from the meaning they have for the Minister of Finance.

The impact of inflation on the average Canadian today gives rise to a real fear about his ability to be able to cope with the rapidly increasing cost of living, indeed his ability to obtain even the basic necessities of life. I suspect that the impact of inflation on the Minister of Finance does not appear to concern his standard of living, though it may have some relationship to his advancement within the political spectrum.

The fear created by unemployment for the average Canadian is again the fear of the economic consequences of his loss of income. I expect that the fear created by unemployment for the Minister of Finance is the fear that if there is massive unemployment across Canada he will not be employed in the position that he would like to have in the not too distant future.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: When the Minister of Finance talks about leadership, the leadership that he has in mind is different from the leadership that Canadians had hoped would be given them in the budget that came down recently. Otherwise, why would we have had this budget? I suggest we would have had a totally different budget from the minister.

Actually the budget brought down last Monday was a particularly irresponsible one in light of the international situation within which it was introduced. Every member of this House knows that we are probably facing and living in the most unsettled economic climate we have experienced for over a quarter of a century. From the end of world war II until 1972 the United States was willing to finance measures to meet international problems around the world. Today it cannot do this. The fact that it is no longer able to do so has been exacerbated by the fact that there has been an increase in the price of oil of over 400 per cent in the past year, creating an economic situation that is almost insoluble.

We in the industrial countries of the world have to find a way to settle a $40 billion balance of payments problem and to recycle $60 billion worth of petro dollars, and this still in the first year of this new situation. There is absolutely no way in which the existing central banking system and international monetary program can handle this particular problem. And here we have the Minister of Finance bringing down a budget that offers no solutions to these problems, and that makes no suggestion as to what Canada can do to alleviate the situation.

As Dr. Henry Kissinger, Secretary of State for the United States, said in Chicago on November 14, "collaboration among the industrialized countries of the world will be an inescapable necessity". The first part of this co-operation must be to bring down the rate of domestic inflation. In this era of economic tension and uncertainty, it seems to me almost inconceivable that the Minister of Finance would bring down one of the most divisive budgets ever brought down in the history of Canada. Why at this time, when we are teetering on the edge of international problems the like of which we have never before seen, would the Minister of Finance decide this is a good time for the federal government to interfere unilaterally with constitutional powers that were settled years and years ago?

What can be the thinking of the government in this regard? The federal government does not need the money; it has been collecting more money than it knows how to spend intelligently. Perhaps the government did this because it believes fundamentally in the centralization of authority in Ottawa, thus going against the trend to decentralization that most countries of the world think is the right one. It may be—though I would hate to credit this to the party opposite—that the government believes that for purely political purposes it benefits much more from confrontation than it does from conciliation. If this is the reason, Madam Speaker, what a dreadful situation in which to place the people of Canada at the present time.

I do not believe that the party opposite is quite as Machiavellian as that, though it is possible that it is, Madam Speaker. I think the reason the budget was brought down at this time, and the reason for this confrontation with the provinces constituted an attempt to try to divert attention from the way in which the government has been managing the economy in the last couple of years. What other reason is there for a budget of the sort we have at the present time?

The fact is that the Minister of Finance has brought down four budgets. Every single one of these budgets started out in the same way. They stated that the nation was facing unemployment and inflation, and through the process of all these four budgets no progress whatsoever has been made to deal with those twin problems. It seems to me that the terrifying thing about this budget is that the minister shows no comprehension of why we have unemployment at the present time.

The reason for unemployment in this country today is simply that the government has done nothing about inflation for the last couple of years. All of the forces bringing about unemployment today result from inflation. For example, look at the decline in housing starts, which show a 25 per cent drop. This rate will probably go higher. Why have we had this drop in housing starts? It was simply because of the interest rate policy that the government was following, a policy designed to do something to curb inflation but which just did not work.

Why are retail sales down 3 per cent? If these policies of the Trudeau government are continued Mr. Bennett will look like one of the most enlightened men of all times. Retail sales were down 3 per cent in the month of September because in spite of what the government says its policies are not keeping up the real standard of living of most Canadians.

Why do we have a decline in sales of manufactured products? I suggest it is partially because of a slowdown in other economies. However, the major reason is that we have become one of the highest cost producers in the world, with no increase in productivity but with an increase in cost and an increase in unemployment.

Why do we have the unenviable record of having more days lost through strikes and industrial unrest than any other industrial country in the world? I suggest the reason is because we have done nothing about inflation, and people have to use this device to try to maintain their standard of living high. We are in the middle of declining economic activity because of the inability of the government to do anything about the inflationary process, and in the middle of that situation what is so frightening is to have a budget that obviously does not perceive this as the major problem of the country at the present time.

The Minister of Finance forecast at the start of the year that we would have an increase in gross national product of 5 per cent. Some six months later it was 4 per cent—in six months time a decline of 20 per cent. There was little economic growth in the third quarter of this year and we will probably have none in the fourth quarter, and that is all because of the policies followed by the government. The one thing that was clear during the last parliament, and is now clear during this parliament so far is that the foundation stone on which the Minister of Finance has built his policies to fight inflation has crumbled.

The way in which the Liberal government said it was going to fight inflation was by increasing supply, but where is that increased supply? Our gross national product is down, there is no increase in supply, and this policy of the government has been a total failure. That sort of a solution cannot work. The last person who tried this particular policy was Lyndon Johnson in the United States. He argued in the United States that they could have both guns and butter. I suggest you cannot have both—you cannot have both in this country just as they could not have both in the United States. You cannot expect the government and the private sector combined to take more out of the economy than the economy is producing, and if you try to do so you will end up with nothing but inflation, and that is precisely what we have today.

To say that after a year in which you have a 25 per cent or 30 per cent increase in government expenditure, in the midst of double-digit inflation, that you have really accomplished something, the next year by bringing expenditure down 15 per cent is simply nonsense, because that policy simply will not work. That policy is doomed to failure. It is a real disaster to have a Minister of Finance who came in with a budget a week ago saying that he is trying to cure the economic sicknesses in this country by giving it more of the same medicine—more government expenditure. That simply will not work.

The Minister of Finance and his government are talking now about a budgetary deficit for next year. I suggest that this will produce more inflation. The Minister of Finance obviously does not understand the problems under which the economy is operating at the present time. If there was ever such a thing as a tradeoff between inflation and unemployment, it is quite clear that does not exist now. We have both at the present time, and it is quite clear that the government's policies are not working. To think that you can deal with the unemployment problem in that way is obviously a great mistake.

The Minister of Finance must understand these things and the problems we are faced with, but the great question is why does he not do something about it? The only reason I can think of why the government and the Minister of Finance are not moving strongly is that they are afraid to provide the leadership necessary to deal with the problems. It is absolutely essential that we do have leadership now, but the Minister of Finance will not give it. He will not give it because it would be really unpopular, and no government and no politician ever made any yards fighting inflation. This is a very unhappy thing to have to do today, but let me tell you that if we cannot find people in this democratic system with sufficient courage to deal with these problems, we will have a very difficult time keeping our democratic institution viable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: History repeats itself, and it is very clear that if you do not control inflation, or at least keep inflationary expectations down, there is no way you can maintain a prosperous economy. If you cannot maintain a prosperous economy, then you cannot maintain a democratic institution. We had an over 10 per cent inflation rate last year, we have an over 10 per cent inflation rate this year, and the way things are going we will have even more next year. That is no way to maintain the fabric of our society. If we are not willing to use our democratic institutions to fight inflation then we are indeed in terrible trouble.

The Minister of Finance says that this is all an international problem. That has to be the greatest cop-out that has ever taken place in this House of Commons. How can anybody suggest that our inflation is all the result of an international problem? Can anybody really believe that the drop in housing starts and the increase in unemployment are the result of something that has happened in Spain or Portugal? Does anybody really believe that the decline in retail sales is the result of something that has happened someplace else in the world? Can anyone believe that the inflation we have here is the result of anything but the policies that we are following in this country?

I find it really quite astonishing that the Minister of Finance, who prides himself on travelling all around the world talking to other ministers of finance, would not take a look at the budgets other countries are bringing down. Regardless of where you look or of what ideology is involved, whether it be a socialist government such as that in England, a capitalist society such as that in Japan, or a society such as that in the United States, you do not find them following the policies advocated by this government. There is not a chancellor of an exchequer or a minister of finance who has brought down a budget recently that has not told the people that they will really have to work to solve the inflationary problems.

In this country, which has an inflationary rate of over 10½ per cent, we do not have to absorb any of the impacts of the increase in world oil costs with which other countries have to contend. With that sort of situation, the problems with which we are now faced seem to me to be unacceptable. I really believe that had the present Minister of Finance been a father of confederation there likely would never have been a birth, but there certainly would have been a lot of heavy breathing.

The fact is that we will not solve inflation unless we are ready to go after it with strong measures. Some people may feel that the situation we face in this country is not particularly serious. I suggest that it is very serious, and we will not long have the things that keep a private entreprise system going with a continuing rate of 10 per cent or 12 per cent inflation. We are going to require something far less, perhaps an inflation rate of 5 per cent, 6 per cent or 7 per cent.

Let us consider the record of Germany. It has an inflation rate of 6.8 per cent and a 3 per cent rate of unemployment, but that country is worried. If the Minister of Finance wants to make comparisons with other countries around the world he ought to be making comparisons with the OPEC countries at the present time.

Since I have been in this House of Commons I have tried to analyse what is taking place in our economy in terms of budgetary expenditure, tax and monetary policy, and I wonder why in a great country like Canada we cannot use our resources more effectively. I wonder why we have anything like the inflation we have today. We have so many resources, and an agricultural community that is strong and productive. I can only conclude that while we have two real problems in this country, unemployment and inflation, the greatest economic problem we have is the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in the budget debate. The budget speech, somewhat like the speech from the throne, brings the new member face to face, and rather brutally, with his role as a newly elected representative of the people.

I should like to attempt to be as faithful as possible a spokesman for the concerns of the constituents of Portneuf. Still, as it is always very difficult to speak on behalf of another person, I wonder if it is possible to speak for over 80,000 constituents, that is the population of the riding of Portneuf.

Be that as it may, I have tried to regroup as best I can my own reflections on what the electors pointed out to me during the few weeks of the election campaign, as well as on the comments I heard during my numerous meetings with various groups in my riding since the election on July 8.

I would like to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, how much I respect my constituents and my predecessor in this House, Mr. Godin. I take this opportunity to announce to you, Mr. Speaker, and to all hon. members, that Mr. Godin has been elected alderman of an industrial town in Portneuf riding, called Donnacona. I want to congratulate him and wish him every success in his new duties.

Portneuf is a beautiful and large riding, a third of which is a rural community and two thirds are highly urbanized. I am very happy to find that the measures announced in the budget speech will affect all groups of these citizens.

The first point that holds my attention in this budget speech has to do with housing. From all corners of Portneuf riding, my constituents will benefit from these measures. The urban area is in full development in terms of low cost and average cost of private residences.

The reduction to 5 per cent of the sales tax on building materials, plus the $500 subsidy will make it possible to save approximately $1,100 on the purchase of a new house.

The registered home ownership savings plan will certainly help a large number of young people in my constituency who had hardly any hope of becoming home owners.

These measures plus the elimination of sales tax on municipal transit systems and water distribution equipments will certainly improve the lot of municipalities.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to give some indications of the way these measures will favour the voters of the Portneuf riding.

The first group concerned will be affected in an indirect way. In both the Eastern and Western ends of my constituency, there are a number of saw-mills as well as producers of building materials of various types, including insulation panels, acoustic tiles, bricks and cement blocks.

It is obvious that the renewal of activities in the construction of new housing will be an incentive for those firms and clear the unemployment threat which haunted the numerous employees in this industry.

In the urban part of my riding, we will also witness a renewal in the construction sector. In addition to provide many jobs to the workers in this sector, that renewal will favour home ownership and better housing.

Many young people, in particular, will avail themselves of the new Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan, and the day will come faster for them to become owner of their own house. Whether in Rivière-à-Pierre, in Saint-Raymond, in Pont-Rouge, in the district of Les Saules or in Loretteville, many citizens will take advantage of those measures announced in the budget speech, measures dealing with housing policy.

Still in that field, it seems to me that we should take steps so that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which is our national housing corporation, upgrade its clauses for the profection of the new house buyer.

In the Des Saules district, for instance, numerous buyers have been wronged as a result of the financial difficulties of some builders. This situation should be provided for, mechanisms should be set up to protect the consumer. As an example, there could be an insurance plan under which an owner, as soon as he takes possession of his house, would deal directly with the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation, so that he could complain and recriminate if there is anything wrong with the house.

It also happens that in those circumstances the sub-contractors suffer losses. We should change the terms under which loans are granted so that sub-contractors are assured of payment for work they have done on a particular house.

Agriculture is the second matter I should like to deal with. A large part of my riding of Portneuf consists of beautiful farm lands and many farmers are engaged in either dairy production, horticulture, or cattle breeding. All members have heard either through the media or during the special debate we had in the House, about the situation of farm producers in the province of Quebec.

During the election campaign, as well as since July 8, I have had the opportunity of discussing matters with many farmers in my riding. Today, being a farmer is really running a business. Investments are considerable, labour is hard to find, salaries are very high, and production costs vary from one season to another. As for the farmer, his income is subjected to the vagaries of very volatile markets. Which brings us to the problems such as the one we witnessed in Quebec with regard to certain grades of beef cattle sent to the slaughterhouse.

The media show us regularly cases of people who suffer from starvation or malnutrition throughout the world. In the meantime, the owners of beautiful farms, real gardens, whether it be at Neuville, at Cap-Santé or elsewhere, are thinking of quitting the land because they can no longer cope with the job, because their children do not want to take a gamble in a field they consider much too uncertain. Mr. Speaker, we must get our agriculture out of its insecurity, we must support our minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) when he is brought face to face with the disparagers of marketing boards and other measures aimed at stabilizing the income of farm producers.

The tax reduction for small wage-earners contained in the budget will also be helpful to most of my constituents of Portneuf. They will thus recover the purchasing power which they had lost due to price increases. This provision as well as the possibility of deducting the first $1,000 of interest income will be beneficial to the budgets of Canadian taxpayers.

The constituents of Portneuf are aware that inflation means profits for some people. They realize that it helps increase government revenue but they are pleased to see that the minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has given up a certain amount of revenue to help them make both ends meet. The budgetary measures are correcting the situation and the government is in a way refunding this inflationary revenue.

They are also aware that inflation benefits certain companies. And I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that the last letter I received on that subject came from a businessman of Ancienne-Lorette. He pointed out that fact to me and stated his interest in a legislation that would provide a ceiling for profits or that would control company profiteering. This businessman's concern is the same as that of most of the people of Portneuf. They are anxious to see the minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) introduce legislation in this respect and they are assured that the minister is highly qualified to administer such a legislation in the best interest of all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, if some companies lack social conscience to the point of using inflation to expand their profits in an exaggerated way, it is the duty of this government to take action and bring them to reason.

The constituency of Portneuf is also proud, Mr. Speaker, of having within its limits one of the most beautiful, the most modern and the biggest Canadian Forces base, the Valcartier base. The action of Canadian servicemen and their efficiency as peacekeepers is known throughout the world. Our servicemen are peace professionals. This may sound contradictory, but it is a contradiction that an old saying has recognized from time immemorial.

We used to hear when we were young, "If you want peace prepare for war". For us, Canadians, the need or even the usefulness of armed forces is not so obvious. Public opinion is strongly divided in that respect, and government decisions must take into account Canadian public opinion. However, we must not for that matter lose sight of the need to increasingly qualify the staff of our armed forces and provide them with the best equipment available to ensure quality of service and also guarantee the viability of this career they chose to enter. Young people are still being recruited. Those young people must feel that they are entering an open road into the future and not a dead end street that would make them regret their decision after a few years. Last summer, Mr. Speaker, an unfortunate accident occurred at the Valcartier base. This accident is much more regrettable because it has stricken young cadets in training. Some quarters have taken this opportunity to make a quick trial to the Armed Forces and the cadets corps. However, I want to express my appreciation to the cadet corps. I also want to express it to the militia groups who devoted their time and experience to the training of young cadets.

When I was a student I had the opportunity to belong to a cadet corps for five years. I highly appreciated the qualities of discipline and other aspects of the manly education that is given there. These days, when everything encourages free-and-easiness and inaction, when more and more people are asking themselves questions on the quality of discipline in our schools, we should increase our efforts in favour of the renewal of these cadet corps.

I would also like to mention that the many people who work at the Valcartier military base have great difficulty with highway traffic. It must also be mentioned that Ville Belair is the place where all military and civilian personnel pass through on their way to Camp Valcartier. The citizens of this residential community are gradually being chocked up by a volume of traffic that is becoming quite a hindrance. The Citizens' Committee who favours the expansion of Henri IV Blvd. should get all our attention.

The leather industry is another interesting sector in the industry of Portneuf riding. Whether in Saint-Émile, the Huron Village in Loretteville or l'Ancienne Lorette, there are many manufacturers of moccassins, shoes, slippers and gloves. This industry uses very qualified local manpower and in spite of fleeting difficulties, the management of these establishments show dynamism and imagination in improving the quality of their products and finding new markets for them. However, there is always a menace hovering over this type of business and that is meeting import competition. These manufacturers are counting on the clearsightedness of the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) to help their products keep their place on our markets and thus keep employment high in places where unemployment is a sore that too often must be patched up.

I would find myself wanting if, in conclusion, I did not point out the interest shown by the citizens of Portneuf riding for the budget of May last. That budget quickly became one of the main topics for discussion during the election campaign. I must also add that there has been some apprehension since the election of last July 8. Some doubts were being shown about the new budget as it was feared that the majority government might go back on the good intentions that were set out in last May's budget. I am pleased that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) kept the same approach, making it possible for the Canadian people to breathe better in spite of the suffocating atmosphere around the world economy.

Some hon. members reproached the government for having thrown all the blame for the present state of our economy on the situation in other countries. Others said the measures were good but came in too late.

Mr. Speaker, the budget of the hon. Minister of Finance is marked with carefulness, not the carefulness of the pusillanimous but of the realistic, the carefulness of a government which is open to the world, which knows the volume of its exports and imports and does not want to retire within itself.

As to those who think the measures are good but come in too late, they will be the first, Mr. Speaker, to claim that the government acted this way because of them. They will be the first to boast that they recommended these measures and that the government listened to them at last. But they will make these remarks when it brings them political dividends.

May I be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate again the Minister of Finance for the interest expressed in his budget speech towards everything which is of concern to all Canadians.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, we are now in another budget debate, another budget which is really failing to deal with inflation, another budget out of a shotgun with shotgun measures trying to deal with inflation. In the few minutes I have I should like to deal with some of the shortcomings in the budget.

Any provisions to provide aid for farmers are noticeably absent from the budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whittaker: There was no further mention of incentives for farmers, including the stabilization of incomes and markets, as promised in the Speech from the Throne. It would seem apparent that to curb inflation and relieve the international food crisis the Canadian farmer requires massive assistance to expand his production to meet Canadian and world needs. This assistance could have been made available by special interest rates and relaxed loan conditions on the farm improvement loans plan; easier financing for clearing unused arable land; the upgrading of existing land and investments in machinery, agrichemicals and modern techniques; and government investment in research development assistance.

Indeed no effort was made to aid the agricultural sector through financial stimultation of co-operation between production and transportation toward alleviating the often critical distribution problem. I might say in this connection that the fruit industry in British Columbia is again having trouble with the transportation of its fruit.

One last remedy available to the government to cure the current inflation and hunger ills was financially to encourage Canadian farmers to adopt more efficient agricultural techniques to increase crop outputs. A generous new investment in agriculture would increase the potential of increased food surpluses, thereby satisfying one objective of the budget, that is, to increase supply and would also represent a step toward alleviating the world food and hunger crisis.

If the government were really sincere in its intent to combat inflation it would devise programs for using some of the money now being used for LIP programs and UIC benefits to construct canneries and granaries to take care of agriculture surpluses. Such a program would put a lot of unemployed to work, cutting down on high unemployment and on taxes required for UIC benefits and LIP programs.

The lack of any concrete programs to use agricultural surpluses to bolster our economy and decrease unemployment clearly indicates that the government is unable to identify with the critical areas within the Canadian economy; it is unable to initiate appropriate operative programs for effective relief.

For many Canadians the reduction in personal income tax will be welcome news, but Canadians will realize in due course that this reduction in their income tax is really, in fact, further depreciating the value of their spending dollar. As long as the cost of living prices remain as they are, these personal income tax reductions will benefit Canadians, but the budget does not get to the heart of attacking inflation or finding ways to curb it, and inflation and the cost of living will go up considerably in the months ahead.

Any benefits Canadians will receive because of the reduction in their personal income tax will soon be eroded by the increase in the cost of living and inflation. What the government has attempted to do is to lull Canadians into thinking it is being a big brother to them by reducing their personal income tax. Canadians will soon realize they have been duped when they find prices of their goods going up and their spending dollar being further reduced in value. Whatever benefits they are going to receive now will be taken away from them in due course, simply because the government has done nothing to check inflation and the increase in the cost of living.

In the budget speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) stated that he would hold the increase in government expenditures at 15 per cent next year, compared with the 24 per cent increase in the current year's expenditure over last year's. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) recently tabled in the House supplementary estimates totalling $25,951 million for the fiscal year 1974-75.

In a recent CTV interview the Minister of Finance stated that it was "intensely difficult in the political process to hold these expenditures down. You've got the legitimate ambitions of ministers of departments." It seems to me that some of those legitimate ambitions of ministers have greatly increased the financial burdens of the Canadian people. I am especially recalling the $510 million deficit in the UIC program, brought about by a previous minister's inability to manage his department properly. The ones who were forced to pay in the end for that deficit were the Canadian people.

It would seem to me that ministerial ambitions, especially at a time when we have high unemployment, inflation running rampant and the cost of living constantly going up, should rank second, and ministers should be finding ways to curb wasteful spending in their departments. They have an obligation to the Canadian people, who elected them to the positions they are now holding, to do so. There is no justification for the increase in government spending and waste when the people of this nation are experiencing high unemployment, increases in the cost of living, and depreciation of their spending dollar.

Any reduction or help in reducing the cost of homes is certainly welcome, but sales tax on building materials should be entirely abolished. The reduction to 5 per cent is a step in the right direction, but the government should have totally abolished the sales tax. The 5 per cent sales tax will leave intact the existing bureaucracy for collecting the building material tax; it will be just as complicated a set-up as the one which collected the 11 per cent tax. Another bureaucracy must now be set up to administer the new program under which each purchaser of a new home is to get $500. If this is a key to the job creation program which this government has in mind for next year, it's a great way of fighting inflation.

Under the present set-up we are not providing an incentive for young Canadian families who want to build and own a home. Our present structure alienates young people from building and owning a home. They find building, costs, land costs, etcetera, more than they can handle. If we completely abolish the sales tax on building materials, the bureaucracy created for collecting the sales tax can be eliminated and materials would be available at prices most Canadians could afford. The long-term effect of this would be a substantial decrease in our housing shortage.

News of benefits granted to our old age pensioners is welcome; but if in the months ahead these benefits are to be swallowed up by the spiralling rate of inflation and increase in the cost of living, our pensioners will be no further ahead. Pensioners fortunate enough to receive an income from a registered savings plan or from a deferred profit-sharing plan will much appreciate the exemptions provided for those. Pensioners with $30,000 invested and old age pension supplements do not now pay any tax, or very little, so that many of the proposed new benefits will apply only to those fortunate enough to be in higher income brackets.

For those pensioners who are not so fortunate, who are only receiving old age security, the news is not so good. The budget has failed to provide them with added protection against inflation and increases in the cost of living. Single pensioners who are receiving only the basic minimum of about $2,700 will feel the ravages of inflation and increases in the cost of living. Present conditions make it almost impossible for them to enjoy a decent existence. The government has failed those pensioners whose only source of income is their old age security pension, because it has not provided for any pension increases. The government must stop dishing out piecemeal benefits to these hard-pressed pensioners. The government has an obligation to provide this segment of our population with adequate protection in order that these people can cope effectively with inflation and the high cost of living which is constantly eroding the purchasing power of their pensions. Something more substantial must be done for pensioners who are receiving only the old age security pension. This budget has done nothing for them. It has left them more vulnerable to the further ravages of inflation and increases in the cost of living.

The government proposals in the budget to provide incentives for incorporated small businesses by increasing the annual limit on profits taxed at the 25 per cent special rate to $100,000 from $50,000, and the cumulative limit to $500,000 from $400,000 may benefit our small business owners, although I do not think the benefits are substantial enough to encourage more Canadians to own small businesses. These incentives, however, will enable some to capitalize on their expansion.

The Liberal government has never seemed to realize that the backbone of the economy of this nation centres on small business. Small businesses account for over 50 per cent of Canada's gross national product, and they pay 50 per cent of the taxes collected by the government.

The small business is also the breeding ground for new industries. What may be a small business today can become a leading industry tomorrow. Unfortunately, the government does not see it this way, and as other segments of our country receive more and more benefits the small business segment of our population receives less and less. The government's policies on small business have been such that many have been allowed to go into bankruptcy because they have not been provided with adequate financial means or incentives to enable them to survive and compete.

The government is willing to make substantial loans to foreign governments for the benefit of the relatively large corporations in Canada, but when it comes to making loans available to small Canadian businesses from Canadian banks, it turns a deaf ear. The budget incentives for small businesses in Canada are not good enough.

It is time the government took its head out of the sand and took a good look at the present system which favours foreign-owned companies over Canadian owned companies which for years have formed the backbone of the economy of this country.

There are a few really depressed areas in my constituency of Okanagan-Boundary. One is the beef industry. The ranchers in the area pioneered this country. They were one of the backbones of the economy. Because of the policies of the government they are in one of the worst situations they have ever faced in history.

There is a large lumber industry in British Columbia. Today it is very hard pressed. I realize that as far as this government is concerned, a lot of the input into the lumber industry comes from the provincial government. However, the federal government still has an obligation toward this industry.

There is an extensive mining industry in my constituency. This industry has also been a pioneer in my constituency. It has been going on for many, many years. However, the way the industry is being treated by governments today, it will not be around much longer. It is well-known that there should be more exploration. More mines could be in the area. It was only a few short years ago that one of the leading copper mines was discovered and developed. With this kind of situation in those three leading industries, it will be very hard for the people in my area, and for Canadians in general.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. It being 9:45 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to Section 7 of Standing Order 60, to interrupt these proceedings and put forth with the question on the amendment now before the House. All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

[Mr. Whittaker.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Call in the members.

DATE OF REFERENCE OF SUBJECT MATTER TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the government House leader and Acting Prime Minister. When does the hon. gentleman intend to bring forward the motion dealing with the proposed rules regarding conflict of interest as applied to members of parliament and move the necessary reference to committee in that connection?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I hope I shall be able to meet with the leaders of the other parties today and have the opportunity of discussing this and other matters. There are a number of very urgent items on the order paper which we hope to see disposed of, including the petroleum administration bill and the bills founded upon the budget; these are of most urgent importance because they affect the price of fuel in eastern Canada, and I hope they can be disposed of even before we turn to such an urgent matter as the one to which the Leader of the Opposition has referred.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the great importance of this question to the people of Canada, and in view of the great desirability of setting the committee to work with the necessary instructions on this question as it relates to all members of the House of Commons as well as to members of the government, will the hon. gentleman not give us an assurance that he will bring this reference forward at a very early date, particularly in view of the obvious differences of opinion which exist between members of the government and ourselves on this subject? After all, the Prime Minister is just as likely to blow his stack on this subject after Christmas as before.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Sharp: I wish to assure the Leader of the Opposition that we have nothing to hide and that we would welcome the views of hon. members on the other side concerning this question of conflict of interest as it applies to members of parliament. We might then find out whether they want their spouses to be affected in the same way as they have suggested spouses of members of the cabinet should be affected.

Mr. Stanfield: If we tender the hon. gentleman one of the days allotted to the opposition, could he screw up his courage enough to bring forward this question on one of those days?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: I can assure the hon. gentleman we have no reluctance to debate this issue, but I do hope members opposite have the same perspective with regard to other business before the House and will deal urgently with the matters to which I have referred.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

GUIDELINES FOR CABINET MINISTERS—USE OF PRIVATE INVESTMENT COMPANIES—SUGGESTED DISCLOSURE OF LIABILITIES AS WELL AS ASSETS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): My question, too, concerns the government's conflict of interest guidelines, and I hope the hon. gentleman will not be evasive in his reply. Is it the policy of the government that cabinet ministers who choose the so-called disclosure option under the conflict of interest guidelines can continue to manage their investments secretly and directly through private investment companies, disclosing the names of the companies but not the companies' assets?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): That is a very technical question, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sharp: —which I will have to take as notice.

Mr. Beatty: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Apparently the minister does intend to be evasive. My supplementary arises from the guidelines tabled by the Prime Minister concerning conflict of interest of civil servants last December 18, one of which stated: "In order that honesty and impartiality may be beyond doubt, public servants should not place themselves in a position where they are under obligation to any person who might benefit from special consideration or favour on their part or seek in any way to gain special treatment from them". In order to ensure that a similar policy is followed for cabinet ministers, is the government intending to take action requiring the disclosure of liabilities of cabinet ministers, not just their assets?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think these are the kind of questions that can be discussed when reference is made to committee. We would certainly welcome the views of hon. members, first of all as to how these rules are to apply to members of parliament. Then based on this foundation we can formulate the conflict of interest guidelines relating to members of the cabinet.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi can ask a final supplementary.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE MINISTERS HAVE NOT TRANSFERRED ASSETS TO THEIR SPOUSES

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister and involves solely ministers of the Crown. Can the Acting Prime Minister assure this House that during the time that the right hon. Prime Minister gave his ministers to put their affairs in order under the new conflict of interest regulations no minister transferred to his or her spouse assets which, if held in the name of the minister, would put him or her in conflict of interest under the regulations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not personally, of course, in a position to answer that question but it is one which I will direct to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question. Would not the Acting Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Beatty.]

ALLEGATION FEDERAL GOVERNMENT BROKE AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA AND SASKATCHEWAN ON OIL REVENUES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question arising out of correspondence tabled yesterday by the Prime Minister related to the recent budget. In the absence of the Prime Minister I will address my question to the Minister of Finance.

With reference to the oil agreement reached in discussion with the provincial premiers last March, the Prime Minister, in separate letters dated March 12 of this year to Premiers Blakeney and Lougheed, referred to the "one year" accord which was reached between him and the premiers. Would the Minister of Finance inform the House why the federal government decided unilaterally to break this accord, to use the Prime Minister's own term, since such action not only changed fundamentally the details of the particular agreement but put in serious jeopardy all future relations based on trust between the federal government and the provinces?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will deal with this fully in the budget debate tomorrow.

ALLEGATION FEDERAL GOVERNMENT BROKE AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA AND SASKATCHEWAN ON TREATMENT OF OIL ROYALTIES PUT INTO CAPITAL ACCOUNT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It would have been nice to have the Prime Minister here today, but I will put a second question to the minister though I suspect I will get the same answer. The Prime Minister said in each of the letters to Premiers Blakeney and Lougheed, with reference to provincial capital funds established with additional oil royalties, that "we would propose that these capital amounts would not be included in the revenue base for equalization". In view of the fact that in his reply dated March 21, 1974, Premier Blakeney said, and I quote: "I concur with your proposal", meaning the Prime Minister's proposal, would the minister on behalf of the government explain what could possibly have led the cabinet to decide to break this specific federal-provincial understanding so totally?

● (1420)

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that understanding was not broken. As I say, the Prime Minister will deal with this subject tomorrow. I can say to the hon. gentleman that when Premier Blakeney, the Prime Minister and I—the three of us alone,—two weeks ago discussed the question of Saskatchewan's understanding of equalization, after a mutual analysis of the subject Premier Blakeney said there was no misunderstanding. As I say, the Prime Minister will deal with that fully tomorrow.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, on a final supplementary—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In fairness I have never really taken the occasion to appear in any way to limit the opportunity of the leader of the NDP to ask a rather lengthy question followed by supplementaries during the lead-off portion of the question period. However, under circumstances in which he has received again a reply which indicates that his questions will be answered by the Prime Minister during his speech tomorrow, it would seem appropriate to wait for that speech rather than to go on with another supplementary question at this time.

Mr. Broadbent: With great respect, Sir, I sat here as the parliamentary leader of the NDP and listened to members of the Conservative party not only lead off the question period, which I respect, but follow with a series of supplementary questions directed by not one but two other members of that party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: So far, Mr. Speaker, I have asked two questions only, and given the fact that the Prime Minister is away and we are told is going to deal with this very important issue during the debate, it seems very important to get this matter on the record in the hope that he will deal with these questions which are of great concern not only to members of this House but to all the premiers of the provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This may be an appropriate occasion to clarify both matters raised by the hon. member in his point of order, the first being the practice of beginning the question period each day with questions posed by the Leader of the Official Opposition, then by supplementary questions by members within that party. This is the practice the Chair has been following in recognition of the fact that that party enjoys a particular status in the House as Her Majesty's Official Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Ordinarily that practice extends to only one member. However, there are occasions when the subject is such that it perhaps requires extended treatment. During today's question period, as an example, when the subject is of such current importance and interest, it seemed appropriate to go to a second member of that party before moving on. Undoubtedly other members may want to pursue the subject further, but rather than carry out that questioning at this time, I felt it was appropriate to go to the leader of another party in recognition of that importance.

Having regard to the hon. member's point dealing with three supplementary questions, I have always permitted that. However, as I have already said to hon. members, when a minister rises in his place to answer a question by indicating that in respect of further information that is sought the answers will be given tomorrow or, as in this case, the information on the subject under question will be dealt with fully by the Prime Minister in a speech tomorrow, it seems to me appropriate not to carry the matter further by way of supplementary questions. This is an unusual situation and I would rule on it in that way. It is a discretionary matter, and in these extraordinary circumstances I think it calls for an extraordinary cut-off to the opportunity that would ordinarily be given to the hon. member as a matter of course.

Mr. Nowlan: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, because of the importance of the question and the assurance given by the minister, I should like to point out that we have had an example already during this session of this parliament of a Prime Ministerial speech in respect of which many members thought the question of inflation would be dealt with, but not even the word was mentioned. I just wonder what assurance we have that the subject matter of the questions posed by the leader of the NDP will be mentioned tomorrow, in view of this precedent?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise on that point of order. I have always had the greatest respect for the decisions Your Honour has handed down, and I know that you discharge your responsibilities as Speaker of this House with great fairness and impartiality. However, I do want to suggest that it is not within the competence of anyone to say for sure that the Prime Minister will tomorrow answer the questions the leader of this party has now asked.

Surely he has a right to put those questions because he cannot be sure, the government cannot be sure and certainly Your Honour cannot be sure, that those questions will be answered in the speech to be made by the Prime Minister tomorrow. I think he should be allowed to ask that second supplementary. As a matter of fact, I think some of the rest of us ought to be allowed to ask supplementaries arising out of the answer to his question.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —surely it is open to the hon. member and his colleague from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands to put those questions to the Prime Minister tomorrow if they are not satisfied with the points he makes in his speech tomorrow. The question the hon. member is putting is an important one. It has certain debating aspects. The Prime Minister will be dealing with the general subject and the hon. member will have the opportunity tomorrow or subsequently to put that question to the Prime Minister in its true context.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

POSSIBILITY FORCE COMPILES FILES ON MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT—RIGHT OF MEMBER TO SEE FILE

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General.

Since it seems the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has files on each member of parliament and some individuals from across the country, would the Solicitor General be able to tell the House whether that is true and, if so, would it be possible for me to go through my file, as a citizen and member of parliament?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the RCMP does not have dossiers on all members of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: It is not the policy of the RCMP to investigate members of the House of Commons unless they are suspected of committing some criminal offence or of being a threat to national security.

An hon. Member: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could the minister tell the House whether in fact the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has files on some people who are now federal members of parliament?

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, as I have just said the RCMP does not have files on any member of parliament unless he was suspected of a criminal offence or subversive activity. If we were investigating a certain member of the House of Commons we would not announce it in the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a final supplementary question.

Could the hon. minister tell the House if, in case a file existed about me or any other member of parliament, we could look into it?

[English]

Mr. Ellis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Allmand: Well, Mr. Speaker, as I said if there were an active file in respect of a member of the House of Commons, I certainly would not advise the person being investigated that he was suspected of some offence. If the hon. member is referring to a closed file or something similar, I think it would be up to the member to come to see me on that and I would discuss it with him.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Hastings rising on a point of order?

Mr. Ellis: Yes, just briefly, Mr. Speaker. The Solicitor General said no members of parliament were investigated unless they committed a crime, as I recall what he said, or were suspected of criminal activity. Having been subjected to an investigation by the RCMP because of some interest I had in the Unemployment Insurance Commission about a year ago, I know that not to be true. I just hope the Solicitor General is not accusing me of some criminal activity.

● (1430)

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, it is the policy of the RCMP only to investigate individuals, whether or not they are members of parliament, if they are suspected of committing an offence or suspected of subversive activity.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Allmand: The hon. member made an allegation that he was investigated by the RCMP. That is a serious allegation, and I will check into it and report to the House.

EFFECT OF INCOME TAX PROPOSALS ON MINING COMPANIES—SUGGESTION COMPANY REPRESENTATIVES OR PROVINCIAL MINES MINISTERS BE ALLOWED TO MAKE SUBMISSIONS

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in view of the very serious charges that have been laid by the ministers of some of the provinces vis-à-vis federal ministers of the Crown breaking their word and agreements, I wonder, in the interests of being constructive, if I could not ask the Minister of Finance a question in the hope that he will take it in the spirit in which it is meant. In view of the fact that mining companies, as distinct from oil and gas companies, are very hard hit by the double taxation of the present budget, will the minister give an opportunity for this industry to make representations before the ways and means motions on income tax become law?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any way under the present procedure in which that could be done, since the ways and means motion and the subsequent bill are dealt with on the floor of the House.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Since I have failed in getting an opportunity for the mining industry to present its case, I wonder if the minister—in view of the fact that the mines ministers conference will be held next week on December 4, 5 and 6—would give some assurance that the views of Provincial Mines Ministers will be considered before the ways and means motion is finally passed and made into law.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I would certainly want to hear what they have to say, but I want to say to the hon. member that officials of the mining industry have seen me on several occasions since the May 6 budget and are well aware of the situation on provincial and federal taxation. I have also had separate meetings with the mining association of British Columbia and several of the other provinces, and I would be glad to have anything else they could add.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I understand the answer of the minister about the mining companies in response to my first question, but I am asking now about provincial ministers. Will they be given a chance of representing the mines of their provinces?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): When they are down here, if they would like to see me my door is open.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGATION MEMBERS OF PALESTINIAN LIBERATION ORGANIZATION PLAN TO ENGAGE IN TERRORIST ACTIVITIES IN CANADA—PRECAUTIONS TAKEN BY FORCE

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): My question is directed to the Solicitor General. It arises out of the deportation from Canada on or about October 29 of two suspected members of the Palestinian Liberation Organization who jumped ship at Thunder Bay. Could the minister advise the House whether the RCMP has uncovered or is investigating the possibility of the existence of a conspiracy on the part of the murderous PLO to have their members jump ship at Canadian ports in anticipation of terrorist activities at the 1976 Olympics?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the story that appeared in some of the newspapers that two suspected members of the PLO jumped ship in Canada was not correct, and that story was never confirmed by me or by the RCMP. What happened is the following: On October 28 at Thunder Bay two crew members of a Greek ship deserted. On October 29, the Salvation Army telephoned the RCMP to report that the deserters were there and wanted to surrender to Canadian authorities.

Mr. Fairweather: They infiltrated the Salvation Army.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Allmand: Hon. members do not seem interested in hearing the answer, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Quite the contrary, Mr. Speaker. We are critically interested in the answer to the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: So listen to it.

Mr. O'Sullivan: My supplementary question to the minister—

An hon. Member: On an answer you didn't hear.

Mr. O'Sullivan: —is whether the RCMP has taken precautions to ensure that the PLO will not succeed in any plans they may have of which the RCMP may be aware to plant terrorists in Canada. Furthermore, would the minister say whether discharged Constable Samson of the RCMP had in his possession all the details of the security arrangements surrounding the 1976 Olympics?

Mr. Allmand: I will continue to answer the first question. Following the call from the Salvation Army, the RCMP and the immigration authorities picked up these two individuals and had them deported to their own countries, namely to Greece and to Syria. The only allegation that these people might have been related to the PLO is a statement by the captain of the ship that he thought that one of the two was a member of El-Fatah, but the RCMP found no information to back that up, and they also say that there is no organized effort to plant cells in Canada by jumping ships.

With respect to Samson, we have no information that Samson had plans for Olympic security and was selling them, as alleged recently by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence).

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—CANADIAN POSITION ON MAINTAINING TRUCE SUPERVISORY FORCE—POSSIBLE CHANGE IN ROLE OF FORCE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to either the Secretary of State for External Affairs or to the Minister of National Defence. It has to do with the status of the Canadian forces in the Middle East and the present position of our men. Has Canada now been invited to commit troops for a further period in that theatre and, if so, for what duration of time and, if not, will we withdraw our troops in the near future?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): With respect to the UNEF, there has been an invitation from the Secretary General of the UN to commit the force for another period, and that is presently under consideration by the government. With respect to the force operating in the Golan Heights, the mandate expires at the end of November, and that presently is also under consideration by the government.

Mr. Forrestall: Could the Secretary of State for External Affairs expand a little on the nature of the invitation from the Secretary General in terms of what we have been asked to do. Are we to take from the minister's reply that we are there to continue in the role that we were invited to play at the outset, or has there been any change in the status of the role which would involve, for example, an expansion in the number of troops?

Mr. MacEachen: My understanding is that there has been no changed role proposed for Canada, but in the light of the question I will be ready to double check. However, that is my impression at the moment.

HOUSING

DATE FIVE HUNDRED DOLLAR GRANT AVAILABLE—REQUEST FOR EARLY INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister responsible for housing, and I think he has notice of this question. On November 1 he advised the House and the nation that: "Rather than wait until legislation can pass through the House, I wish to make this benefit available to families immediately". I am referring to the $500 grant with regard to housing. Subsequently, I have been advised by CMHC that this grant, although effective as of November 1, 1974, cannot be made until the necessary legislative authority is given, which is expected within the next several weeks. There seems to be a problem here, some misunderstanding as to what the minister's attitude is, and I hope he can clarify it now. Is that money available immediately, as he indicated in his statement of November 1?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I thank the hon. member for bringing this misunderstanding to my attention, but I would like to draw his attention to the total statement as it appeared on page 2 when I said:

> In other words, Mr. Speaker, the legislation, if approved, would be retroactive and would benefit people who bought and occupied their new house now, without waiting any longer.

In other words, we must wait for the legislation. The commitment is being made as of November 1. I wanted Canadians, including the hon. member, to know where they stood. As soon as that legislation is brought in, the moneys can be paid in accordance with the will of the House.

● (1440)

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the minister cannot fluff me off that way. The statement was definite. It shows purpose and intent, that the money is available immediately. Now, apparently, the money is not available immediately and legislation is required before the payment can be made. In order to—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Question.

Mr. Alexander: What is the Minister of Finance saying? He had better look after his job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: In order to give some hope of this payment being immediate, will the minister use his influence and see to it that this legislation is given priority in the near future.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I need not use much influence as my colleague, the Leader of the House, has already told me that he will give priority to this legislation as soon as it is ready. It is in the final stages of drafting and we hope to introduce it in the near future.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ROLE OF ISRAEL IN DECIDING ATTENDANCE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF PALESTINIAN LIBERATION ORGANIZATION AT GENEVA CONFERENCE—POSITION OF CANADA

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the honourable and learned Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is based on his speech to the United Nations General Assembly in which he declared that Israel should be an essential party in deciding the question of the PLO's attendance at the Geneva Conference. Assuming that the minister is aware of the Israeli government's public statements on this matter and considering that the Palestine created by the UN is under Israeli occupation and that one and a half million Palestinians are in refugee camps, how does he envisage the Palestinian representatives being at the Geneva Conference?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether my vision is involved in the earlier statement. It seems to me self-evident that, unless there is concurrence on the part of Israel with regard to whom it will negotiate or with whom it expects to negotiate, there is little prospect for a settlement or any negotiated result. That is why it is obvious that Israel has a role to play in deciding which group, body, person, organization or combination thereof will speak for the Palestinians.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question for clarification. Is it the view of the minister that Israel will be able to exercise a veto over the composition of the other delegates at the conference?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would not put it in that negative form but I believe that it is reasonable to expect that Israel, as one of the interested parties, will be involved in reaching a decision as to what personality, body or representative will speak for the Palestinians. It is hoped, in the circumstances, that the question of the veto will not arise on either side of the negotiations.

TRANSPORT

RAILWAY FREIGHT RATE FREEZE—DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO FORCE RAILWAYS TO DISCLOSE COSTS OF OPERATION

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. As early in October the President of Canadian Pacific said that when the freight rate freeze expires we would see hefty hikes in freight rates and as the railways have now filed application for a 25 per cent increase in rates which were affected by the freeze, can the minister inform the House when he intends to introduce long-awaited legislation which will force the railways to disclose their costs, bearing in mind that such legislation will undoubtedly receive speedy passage in this House.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Leader of the House can convince the other House leaders that we should introduce this legislation right away. It is not complicated, and I hope it will be before the House soon.

SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF RAILWAY FREIGHT RATE FREEZE UNTIL IMPLEMENTATION OF LEGISLATION FORCING RAILWAYS TO DISCLOSE COSTS OF OPERATION

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the freeze was expressly intended to provide an opportunity to review and remove certain anomalies and inequities in freight rate structures and since the attempt to do so has been thwarted by the railway's refusal to reveal their cost data, will the minister agree to extend the period of the freeze until such time as the proposed legislation is in effect or until the railways have provided the information which is required.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not think, personally, that that would serve any practical purpose, because, as you know, the freeze touches only about 22 per cent of the revenues of both the CN and CPR. We do not know exactly how rate structures are made up; we do not know exactly which ones would be affected and we shall only know when CN and CPR file their applications with the CTC. So, I think the most efficient thing to do is to introduce the legislation as soon as we can.

RAILWAY FREIGHT RATE FREEZE—INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT WITH REGARD TO PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION TO RAILWAYS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As both railways have succeeded in making the government, and particularly the Minister of Transport, look very foolish, because they have thwarted the intent of the freeze, will the minister advise the House—I asked him this earlier in October—how much money the railways have received in compensation as a result of the freeze or whether the government intends to pay anything, since the railways have refused to give the information which is needed.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this matter is being negotiated right now.

ABORTION

LETTER CONTAINING VIEWS OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE SHOWN BY CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION TO DETERMINE RESPONSIBILITY FOR RELEASE

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Would the minister care to table or otherwise make available the letter he wrote to the Secretary of State in which he gave his views on abortion, as the letter was shown on the CBC national news last night. May I also ask my supplementary question, which is this: If the letter is confidential, is an investigation under way to determine how it became available to the CBC, as the minister refused to table it in this House.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this is certainly not the type of correspondence ordinarily tabled, and we are looking at the second part of the question.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, the second part of the question was, "or otherwise make available."

BASIS FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF JUSTICE—GOVERNMENT SHOULD NOT FINANCE GROUP ENGAGED IN ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—PRODUCTION OF EVIDENCE

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is this. In the letter, the contents of which were broadcast over the CBC last night, the Minister of Justice said that it is so unseemly and against our political interest to have the federal government involved in financing a group engaged in illegal activities. Can the minister advise the House whether the advice he gave the cabinet as the cabinet's legal officer was based on his political interest, or was it based on a proper legal interpretation of the Criminal Code given by the law officers of his department.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like the hon. member to understand that the word "political" has a broad, important and honourable meaning. The federal government, in considering these matters, should take into consideration how a government appears to act as well as how it acts in the interests of the public and in upholding the laws of the country.

Mr. Leggatt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. That letter also referred to illegal activities which allegedly were carried out by that particular women's group. Did the minister have any evidence of illegal activities? If so, did he request the Attorney General of Saskatchewan to lay charges based on that evidence, and will he table the evidence, if he has it?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member's premises are false.

POST OFFICE

FIRE IN TERMINAL A, TORONTO—POSSIBLE LOSS OF PENSION OR FAMILY ALLOWANCE CHEQUES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. Will the hon. gentleman inform the House and the people of Canada if the disastrous fire in Terminal "A", Toronto—

Mr. Fairweather: Burn the old mail!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Fundy-Royal for his assistance. Will the Postmaster General inform the House if the fire caused a further delay in the handling of the 50 per cent of mail which passes through this important terminal daily and, specifically—if I may ask my supplementary question now—has there been any loss of pension cheques or family allowance cheques? If so, what action is being taken to meet this emergency?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, there was a serious fire during last evening in Terminal "A", Toronto. I do not think there is anything humourous about the fire. There was about $2 million worth of damage although, happily, no family allowance, pension or welfare cheques were burned, thanks to the tremendous cooperation of the Toronto police and Toronto firemen, who were able to protect the mail on the bottom two floors with tarpaulins. But for their help the damage would have been more extensive. We are very grateful to them. We have also hired other premises in the Toronto Exhibition Centre in order to continue the mail operations. The mail that has been damaged is mostly mail going to and from overseas as well as third-class mail.

UNITED AIRCRAFT—POSSIBILITY COMPANY MAY MOVE OUT OF QUEBEC

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Since comments were made public last week to the effect that United Aircraft of Canada Limited might completely move its operations outside Quebec if the conflict that affects it were to last, is the minister aware of such a possibility and, if not, could he get some information about it and report to the House?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that probability. Of course, there is always that possibility, but I have satisfied myself that it is not a probability.

GRAIN

MALTING BARLEY—SUGGESTION PREMIUM SHOULD BE PAID TO THOSE WHO PRODUCE THIS TYPE OF BARLEY

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Can he assure the House that the $1.15 premium paid for malting barley will go to those producers who produce the malting barley?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): As the hon. member well knows, Mr. Speaker, it has been common practice for the premium on this particular grade of barley to be distributed in the pool that relates to that grade, apart from whether or not their barley was selected for malting. The wheat board has under consideration a possible proposal to recommend a separate pool for selected malting barley. Needless to say, if the wheat board recommendation comes forward, I will bring it forward as soon as possible.

Mr. Horner: Would the practice outlined by the minister not tend to distort feed barley prices on the open market?

Mr. Lang: I do not think so, Mr. Speaker. The real question is whether it is more fair to distribute the premium for the barley selected only to those farmers whose barley was selected by the malting companies or whether it should be distributed to those farmers who produced that particular kind of barley and sold it otherwise into the system. Over the years up to this point the weight of farmer opinion has been in favour of retaining the malting premium for all farmers who produce that particular grade or quality. There is a bit of evidence regarding a change of mood among producers at the present time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COMMITMENT OF FIFTY MILLION DOLLARS FOR AID TO NEEDY COUNTRIES—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO USE

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. At the World Food Conference in Rome the government pledged $50 million of development assistance for the current year. Subsequently, the minister told this House on November 14 that the money had been committed, but not designated. My question is, committed for what? Specifically, can this $50 million be used to send food now to nations experiencing severe crop shortfalls, particularly Bangladesh where severe cold, floods and crop failures have produced destitution?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I recall making a statement in the House during my speech on the address to the effect that that question of allocation of $50 million was under consideration. I do not contest the hon. member's use of words, but I do not think I put it exactly that way. In answer to the second part of the question, the money could be used for current hunger situations, including Bangladesh. At present there are a number of proposals relating to a number of countries under consideration. I hope to be able to make a statement or an announcement on this matter as soon as a final decision is made.

Mr. Roche: Since the World Food Conference in Rome, several members on this side have been trying to find out how the $50 million will be used. I previously asked the Minister of Agriculture specific questions. He said the answers would be forthcoming in his statement which was given in this House last Friday. Specific answers to the specific question of how the $50 million that we said in Rome we were going to send have not been given. Did the minister go to Rome and pledge $50 million without any idea as to how that $50 million would be used?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker, not at all. Specific answers will be given which I think will be satisfactory to my hon. friend.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NOVA SCOTIA—DATE WHEN METROPOLITAN AREA GROWTH INVESTMENTS LIMITED WILL BECOME OPERATIVE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Were all political roadblocks cleared away by the minister and the premier of Nova Scotia in their recent meeting insofar as finally having Metropolitan Area Growth Investments Limited, an important Crown agency which was funded for $20 million in 1973, become operative and useful? Can the minister now confirm that this important agency is now in a position to fulfill a useful and active role?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, certainly any disagreements there were as to procedure have been cleared away. They were not serious disagreements, but they are now out of the picture. We are in the process of searching for a chief executive officer. If I can take the time of the House, if any hon. member knows of a good candidate, I would be pleased to hear about it.

An hon. Member: Stanbury.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Miss Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The record of the vote last night has excluded my name and substituted the name of Mr. Nielsen. I would just like to explain that I really do not think Mr. Nielsen and I look at all alike.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I am sure you would not vote alike. However, it was observed that this error had been made in the transcription of Votes and Proceedings. Steps have been taken to make sure the record is correctly reported.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Monday, November 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean).

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression that a member of another party was to speak at this time.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie).

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) for clarifying the situation. I was not aware Your Honour had called orders of the day. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Please allow me to assure the minister that I did in fact call orders of the day, after which the Clerk read the appropriate order, resuming debate on the motion of the Minister of Finance. Everything now seems to be in order to proceed with the minister's intervention in this important debate.

Mr. Gillespie: I would like, Mr. Speaker, in the time at my disposal to direct my remarks to the problems and opportunities that prevail in international trade and their effect on Canada's industries. Very clearly, there are important implications in the efforts of countries to deal with inflation while encouraging economic growth. Equally challenging is the problem of adjusting to rapidly changing international trade payments and patterns caused by price changes, particularly for oil. Of course, as all hon. members are aware, there is great need to quickly come to grips with the food needs of the world. If I were to try to put the problems facing us in a few words, I would say they are problems of political will and of confidence.

The international trading system is under enormous and conflicting pressures brought on primarily by balance of payments problems and by inflation which has shaken confidence in some quarters. This is why the individual and collective will of the trading nations to keep the system going is so important at this time. The difficulties of managing balance of payments adjustments are considerable and I do not want to underestimate them, but I am encouraged that governments of major trading countries are concerned about the risks of unilateral action designed to restrict imports to safeguard their balance of payments in the face of high energy bills. I believe there is an earnest desire on all sides, out of self-interest if nothing else, to co-operate in solving this problem. It is reflected, for example, in the trade pledge adopted last June by members of the OECD. With this pledge, governments undertook a political commitment against introducing import restrictions for balance of payments reasons.

Moreover, much effort is being devoted to finding political and economic ways and means of recycling earnings of the oil exporters to countries whose payments positions have been jeopardized by the energy crisis. The energy problem has demonstrated in a stark way how interdependent are the trading nations of the world. At a time of difficulty, perhaps it is worth recording that world trade has expanded many times since the Second World War and that as citizens of a major trading country we are richer for it. In large measure, this growth stems from the six rounds of tariff-cutting negotiations carried out under GATT auspices since 1947. We are now preparing for the seventh round—the Tokyo round. In this round we shall be seeking easier access abroad for more of our manufactured goods so as to enable a higher degree of processing of our natural resources in Canada before they are exported.

Foreign trade barriers, both tariff and non-tariff, are a major impediment to further processing in Canada. We look to these multilateral trade negotiations as the most effective way or removing or reducing these barriers. To this end, we are promoting a "sector approach" in the context of GATT negotiations, advocating a uniform or zero tariff for all steps of processing of, say, a mineral up to its fabricated state—from the ore to the beneficiated ore, to the smeltered metal to the refined metal, to the fabricated metal products; the whole chain of further processing.

In preparing our position for the GATT conference we have been fully aware of the interests of the provinces. Over a year ago I invited the provinces to submit their views on what they would like us to obtain from the negotiations and what they would be prepared to concede. I have held a number of meetings with my provincial counterparts to discuss these questions. A number of useful meetings between federal and provincial officials have also been held. Some provinces have already submitted their views and these will be most helpful to the Canadian negotiators. I should like to take this opportunity to invite those who have not already done so to submit their views. I hope the Canadian negotiators will shortly be able to move into the intensive phase of these discussions which have been delayed pending the obtaining of the needed negotiating mandates by the United States and the EEC.

We have, of course, all been watching with considerable interest the progress, or lack of it, of the U.S. trade reform bill through Congress. The mandate contained in this bill is a vital ingredient for getting on quickly with the new round of trade negotiations. If an effective negotiating mandate is not obtained by the U.S. administration, it will be a serious setback to international trade liberalization. United States leadership is essential if we are to make effective progress at this time. In addition, this is not the time for countries to allow the international trading community to slip back into the dog-eat-dog policies of the 1930s. We should play our part in trying to strengthen international co-operation. I am hopeful the need for an effective mandate will be recognized and pursued urgently to ensure against a serious deterioration in the international trading environment, for time is running out.

Against this background, let us take a look at Canada's current trading picture and make some projections of what we may expect by way of international trade over the next 12 months and even beyond. For the first ten months of 1974, the value of our exports is up by 28 per cent, compared to the same period in 1973. Thus, for the whole of 1974 I now expect that our exports will total more than $31 billion. To put it in another way, I expect that exports will increase by about $6.5 billion over the figure for 1973, compared with a gain of something more than $5 billion from 1972 to 1973. Some may find this surprising, especially in a year when our major trading partners, the United States, the United Kingdom and Japan, have experienced an economic downturn. The increase in our exports has taken place, of course, because Canada is fortunate enough to be a major exporter of a number of commodities which are in short supply and for which prices have risen sharply in the past year. These include wheat, copper and zinc as well as crude petroleum, with regard to which the collective action of the OPEC countries has resulted in even larger price increases.

Although the physical volume of exports of these commodities has been lower in 1974, increases in price have more than offset decreases in volume. The commodities I mentioned have, therefore, made a major contribution to the increase in the value of Canada's exports in 1974. It is largely because of the decline in the physical volume of those commodities, including lumber, that the index of the volume of Canada's total exports has declined in 1974. For the first ten months of 1974 this decline amounted to about 6 per cent, compared with the 1973 levels, and I expect that the decline for the year as a whole will also amount to about 6 per cent. We are aware, too, that the physical volume of our exports of automotive goods has been affected by the drastic slowdown in the United States auto market. A similar decline in housing construction in the United States and a slowdown in Canada have caused a serious problem in Canada's lumber industry.

The budget contains a number of important measures which should help to increase market demand in Canada. I refer particularly to the reduction of the sales tax on building and construction materials from 11 per cent to 5 per cent. There are already indications that this is being reflected in lower average housing costs. Second, there is the change in the treatment of capital cost allowances on new, multi-unit residential buildings put up for rent. Parenthetically, I might mention another helpful measure—the provision for a $500 cash grant to individuals who purchase for the first time new, moderately priced housing units.

Returning to the budget, I hope, too, to see more developed land coming on to the market because we have eliminated the privilege of taxpayers to charge against income the carrying costs on land awaiting development. There is, also, the provision for capital cost allowances at 15 per cent to firms who hold certain types of timber limits and/or licences to cut timber. We all recognize that transportation is a major cost factor in forest-based industries. Thus, the complete elimination of the 12 per cent sales tax from a wide range of transportation equipment, including large trucks, will be felt not only in forest-based industries but also in downstream industries, including residential construction.

My department is carrying on a vigorous export promotion program. As a matter of fact, a timber trade mission returns from the Middle East tomorrow and I am optimistic about what it will have to report. Timber exports to the Middle East, by the way, increased from just $75,000 for all of 1972 to more than $3.5 million for the first six months of this year. I believe this is an illustration of what aggressive promotion can accomplish. We found a new timber market in Cuba which took nearly $3 million worth of lumber in the first six months of this year alone. They imported none at all from us in 1972 or 1973.

We have also been promoting other Canadian export interests. All hon. members are aware that I led trade missions to Mexico, the Middle East countries, and Brazil this year, and I can assure them that in every country we were impressed by the great interest in Canada and in the desire to co-operate with Canada in the development of closer trade and economic relations.

As a result of my visit to Iran in April, for example, it has been agreed to conclude a trade agreement with that country to facilitate the flow of goods from both sides. It is apparent that a wide scope exists for a wide exchange of products, the employment of Canadian expertise, the establishment of joint ventures and other forms of economic and technical co-operation between the two countries. In Brazil, just last month, I was further convinced that aggressive marketing by Canadian entrepreneurs can and will pay off. Brazil itself presents myriad opportunities. This year we have already trebled our trade with Brazil, on a year to year basis, over last year. Our increase in exports to Brazil this year will be of the order of $200 million. These opportunities in Brazil range all the way from increasing our current exports to establishing new, joint ventures with Brazilian partners.

I submit that there is sufficient international demand to give the Canadian economy a needed stimulus and to provide the confidence that market opportunities can indeed be captured by an aggressive Canadian business community. At the same time, however, I have been impressed by the need for flexibility in our trading strategies. In certain developing countries, for example, I can see direct participation in their industrial development as clearly the best way to strengthen our trade and economic relations. I am encouraging Canadian business interests to look at the opportunities provided by joint ventures. I also plan to continue the market development program that I have initiated through trade missions to ensure that Canada does not lose out on the major, new international trade and economic opportunities.

As for next year, we must be realistic. We must recognize that Canada cannot much longer escape the impact of continuing economic stagnation in our trading partners. It looks as if the rest of the industrialized world will experience marginal economic growth next year, particularly during the first half of the year. This means that recovery, in physical volume, of our exports will be slow in 1975, certainly in the first half of the year. In spite of that, however, we should still obtain a moderate increase in total value of exports.

Over the longer run, I am optimistic. Canada has been steadily building an internationally recognized and internationally competitive industrial base. It has a strong supporting institution in the Export Development Corporation and has a variety of programs offered by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. What is essential to our export outlook at this time, in view of the slowdown abroad that I have noted, is that Canadian entrepreneurs keep up the momentum of recent years even though in the short run it may not appear to be in their immediate interest. But over the long run it will clearly be in their interest and it will be in the interest of Canada. I can assure them and Canadians generally that we will be doing our part to assist them.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, when I go around my constituency and discuss with the people I represent matters that are of special interest to them, I find that not since about 1938, which is many years ago, have so many people been apprehensive and worried about the future. This is due partly to the fact that they cannot see ahead. They are troubled about where they are going, not only as a province and as a country but as a western civilization. In addition, they are beset by economic problems. They feel lost in a sort of desert of shifting sand, their savings depreciating and their costs escalating. Goals which were almost within their reach quite recently are now suddenly unattainable. The necessities of the immediate future they find have been squandered in the luxuries of the immediate past.

There are three important matters with which I find my constituents concerned, and I propose to talk about them for a few minutes but not in order of their importance. These three problems are the energy crisis, inflation, and what I might term loosely as the food crisis. For a few decades now North American civilization has been infatuated with the high-powered automobile. We have been producing millions of cars that consume twice as much gasoline as necessary to travel a given distance. It seems unreasonable to me, and I think to most people, that an automobile should require a gallon of gasoline to transport one man perhaps 10 or 12 miles, which is often the case in our large cities where people insist on using high-powered automobiles, expensive ones at that, which consume a large amount of gasoline. Other cultures are not so dependent upon the automobile as are we in North America.

In addition to this, in the last few decades there has been great mechanization in the field of agriculture, with a parallel input of energy in the form of petroleum products. Added to that we have, of course, begun to use oil almost exclusively for heating homes because of its convenience and for other reasons. I think that for many years we were living in a fool's paradise. The cost of crude oil remained fairly steady, but as times changed and the western world became more and more dependent on oil from the Middle East and other sources, and it became a sellers' market instead of a buyers' market, it became inevitable that the cost of petroleum products in their raw state would increase.

This is exactly what has happened, Mr. Speaker. For many years the price of crude was around $3.85 a barrel, basis Edmonton. I do not know exactly what that would mean, but I suspect it would mean that the countries in the Middle East would charge, by way of royalties or taxation, something like $1.70 per barrel of oil exported. At the same time, countries in which these products were being consumed were taxing them to an even greater extent. The provinces were collecting an average of $2.40 a barrel in the form of gasoline tax on Middle East oil imported into Canada, from which gasoline was extracted. It was hardly surprising, in that situation, that the cost of oil would greatly increase.

Canada is in the relatively happy position of being self-sufficient in oil and will be for a couple of years or longer because our exports equal our imports. This created a special problem because we wanted the cost of crude to Canadians to be below the world price and the only way to accomplish this was to impose an export tax on what we exported, to subsidize what we imported. Under these circumstances no one objected to this tax because in that way the differential between the cost of crude oil to Canadians and the higher world price was maintained. In these circumstances, the producing provinces had to make a concession for the common good and they have been very generous in the matter of the distribution of this export tax.

In addition, the exporting provinces own the resources, under the British North America Act. Petroleum is a non-renewable resource and the provinces are concerned that they obtain a reasonable benefit from the exploitation and selling of this resource which can only be sold once. Therefore, they impose royalties. Someone has likened royalties to rent in doing business. There may be some similarity in the case of renewable resources such as stumpage on forest land, and that sort of thing, but in the case of non-renewable resources there is no relationship between rent and royalties. Royalties represent the sum of money a province receives for what it sells because one day its non-renewable resources will be gone forever.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) declared in his budget that royalties paid to a province are not legitimate deductions in computing income tax. Royalties paid to a foreign country are allowable, but if royalties are paid to a province they do not represent a legitimate deduction in computing income tax. What the government is saying, in effect, is that royalties paid to a province are illegitimate; they are not legal and should not be considered. This position is high-handed, unfair, untenable and even illegal. I implore the Minister of Finance to re-examine his position with regard to royalties. The minister has made a long and involved argument in favour of this stand, on the basis that royalties in some cases are not really royalties but are camouflaged taxes that erode the federal tax base, and that sort of thing. I am not arguing that there is not some basis for that argument and I would agree that this may be so in some cases. But that is not justification for denying what I believe to be a superior right of a province, that is, to charge royalties on resources that are owned by the provinces and exploited by companies.

Surely, a much better solution would be found if the Minister of Finance were to agree that these royalties will be accepted as legitimate deductions for income tax purposes up to some mutually agreed amount, either a percentage or a specific amount based on the quantity produced, or something else that could be worked out. I am not suggesting the technicalities here, but I think this could be done. The minister said that to find a solution of this sort would be very difficult. That is an old, old argument. I remember perhaps 20 years ago when the suggestion of making cash advances on farm-stored wheat was put forward time and time again. The government of that day said it would love to do this, but it was technically impossible and too complicated. The government gave a million reasons why this could not be done. However, the government changed, and it was done; it was not found too difficult. I think a way could be found and I implore the minister to try to find it. Surely a compromise could be reached without violating the basic right of a province to charge royalties on the exploitation of the natural resources which it owns.

At the present time, primarily Alberta is involved. However, we should not forget that presumably most of the oil in Alberta has already been found, and if we are to find additional large quantities of oil in Canada they will be found either on land that is under the jurisdiction of the federal government or in a province or provinces other than Alberta. Therefore, every province has an interest in this principle not only in respect of petroleum products but in respect of the whole spectrum of natural resources. As far as petroleum is concerned, we in the Atlantic provinces feel that the federal government has a penchant for confiscation. It is argued that offshore resources belong to the federal government. The government now thinks that as far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned, if commercial quantities of oil are found in that area it will not matter, because the federal government says it has a prior right over natural resources discovered offshore.

Referring to page 11 of the budget speech of November 18, the minister said:

> Third, the federal government should recognize the special position of the provinces with respect to the taxation and charges on resources within their boundaries.

I agree with that. The trouble is the minister says this but has not done it. This government is doing the opposite, and I suggest it should do what the minister has said it should do. I have taken more time on this matter than I intended, and I now turn for a few moments to the problem of inflation. It is my belief that high government expenditure is a considerable factor in inflation in this country. It is perhaps not the most important factor, but it is important. I am concerned about the rapidly accelerating and excessively large expenditures of governments in Canada, not only at the federal but at all levels. The federal government is not without blame, by any means, in this regard. The minister was interviewed on television the other night. I had the pleasure of watching him for a little while. He was asked the following question by Mr. Lynch:

> Why don't you admit that the thing is beyond your control, as many people think?

He was speaking of inflation and the expenditures forecast for the next fiscal year. The minister replied:

> I won't admit that at all. I will say that the discretionary element in those expenditures is about $7 billion or $8 billion out of $35 billion because a lot of it is statutory, a lot of it is federal-provincial in medicare, hospitalization and equalization, some of it's the servicing of the public debt, and so on . . .

● (1530)

With that I agree. However, if one looks at the forecast for the next fiscal year it will be seen that it is roughly $35 billion. If we subtract even the larger of the two figures mentioned by the minister, $8 billion, we are left with $27 billion. The minister, in effect, is saying that the non-controllable expenditures for next year will be about $3½ billion more than the total expenditures for last year. In that light I think it is fair to say, unhappily, that government expenditures are out of control. The rate at which they are out of control is a question that remains, but the fact is that these trends must turn around; we cannot go on like this indefinitely without something going bust.

As a nation, we must reverse some of these trends. We must control them or level them out so that such a large amount of earnings will not be extracted from Canadians in the form of taxation. I have been talking about billions of dollars. Speaking of millions or billions of dollars makes the figures become almost meaningless; however, we should not forget the astronomical sums of money which are being spent by the federal government. Someone said, in this respect, that if one were to give his wife $1 million and she spent $1,000 a day, she would be broke in about three years and would be asking for more; but if one gave his wife $1 billion and she spent $1,000 a day, she still would not have run out of money at the end of 3,000 years. We tend to think there is only one comma between one million and one billion, but there are three in one billion. Therefore, people are concerned about the future and I believe there is a confidence crisis.

Last weekend I was reading an official booklet put out by Air Canada which referred to how one might benefit from the monetary crisis. It advised people travelling by Air Canada to buy gold, silver or Swiss francs. I think what we need in Canada is an atmosphere in which Canadians can believe that their best future lies in the development of this country and in the principle of production. If we can increase our efficiency and our productivity, prices in real terms are bound to be more advantageous for the consumer.

I wish now to turn to another matter. I am sorry that I have only a few moments left to deal with it. I refer to the crisis in respect of food production. Over the last 30 years Canadians have been able to buy economically-priced food. In my judgment, food has been underpriced for many years. For almost three decades the price received by the primary producer has remained practically constant. The price to the consumer has increased gradually, but this is due to the fact that food is being marketed in an ever higher state of processing. Also, the cost of distribution has increased. But the price the primary producer has received for his product has remained almost static for about three decades.

Under these circumstances, the principle of supply and demand has broken down. As prices dropped, the primary producer, instead of producing less tried to produce more in a neverending attempt to stay out of bankruptcy. In the process thousands, if not millions, of farmers in North America have been forced off the land, with the consequent effect that in order to gain the degree of efficiency needed to produce food at low cost there had to be large units of production with very high inputs of energy, in the form of petroleum products, and fertilizers. No longer does the farm produce its energy as well as food. With the terrific increase in the price of energy in the last couple of years, the cost of producing food has skyrocketed.

I have almost finished, Mr. Speaker; I see that you are becoming very restless. Perhaps I would be allowed one more sentence, and I shall leave it at that. The result is that we can never expect to buy food as cheaply, even in constant dollars, as has been the case over the last few decades. We can have cheap food now and starvation in the future, or we can have reasonably priced food now, economically distributed, guaranteeing continuous production in the future.

At this moment, many beef producers in my riding are on the verge of being forced out of business. There is general apprehension on the part of many people that perhaps it is beyond the power of governments in a democratic system to take the resolute action which must be taken now to control inflation. I believe some governments in democratic countries can control inflation, but it would seem this government is not one of them.

Mr. Mike Landers (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to remind the Liberal cabinet that on July 8, 1974, we had an election and that by accident, design or otherwise I was elected to the government side of the House of Commons to represent Saint John-Lancaster. Prior to July 8, 1974, one of the main thrusts of my campaign was to convince the voters of Saint John-Lancaster that our constituency should have a member on the government side of the House of Commons. Apparently, the voters were convinced.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope to be able to convince the cabinet that Saint John-Lancaster should be recognized for the foresight and insight of its voters. More specifically, I hope to be able to convince the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) that the constituency of Saint John-Lancaster has some special needs. With regard to the Department of Transport, I have come to realize that a "no" answer can normally be expected to requests made of that department. My complaint is that the "no" answer is often a long time arriving and often precludes a member of parliament making attempts to modify the "no" answer to a "perhaps" answer.

In the constituency of Saint John-Lancaster we have a number of problems. However, we have one urgent need—more housing; especially more low-rental housing and senior citizens' housing. I fully realize, Mr. Speaker, that this problem is not unique to my constituency, and I was pleased to hear the budget proposals in relation to housing. However, due to an industrial construction boom in Saint John-Lancaster, workers are being imported from the rest of the province, the rest of Canada and from countries throughout the world. These workers come armed with lucrative expense accounts and are prepared to pay higher rents than regular citizens of Saint John-Lancaster can afford.

● (1540)

The influx of workmen has caused a serious housing shortage, and because many of these workers are on expense accounts, rents have escalated rapidly, putting them out of the reach of low-income families and out of sight for senior citizens. Each and every week since I was elected I have received a minimum of five supplications for housing. One senior citizens' apartment tower presently under construction received, before construction began, five applications for each unit that would become available. Because of the housing crisis I implore the cabinet generally, and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs specifically, to rush to the assistance of my people. The housing shortage is a fact. It will not go away. If, as a member of parliament, I am unable to convince my government to alleviate this problem over the next four years, I shall call upon the voters of the constituency of Saint John-Lancaster to retire me; to march to the polls and turf me out.

Mr. Forrestall: We'll remind you of those words.

Mr. Landers: Many problems exist in the field of transportation. Due to the increase in population and the construction boom, traffic congestion has become intolerable. Immediate negotiations must commence between the federal government and the provincial governments to ensure completion of the Saint John throughway on an emergency basis. The Saint John winter port is badly in need of additional federal funding, not necessarily on a cost-recoverable formula. Although the National Harbours Board and the provincial government apparently could not agree on Rodney terminal, the terminal is almost completed. Some federal funding has been made available; however, the brunt of the cost of Rodney terminal is falling on the backs of the citizens of the province of New Brunswick. I call upon our government to lift the financial burden from the backs of my people and also to provide additional funding for a forest products terminal. Other terminals are needed as well: however, I would call upon government officials and National Harbours Board officials to consult the International Longshoremen's Association before deciding what to build and where to build it.

I now turn to the Saint John airport. A recent list of eight current priorities of the city of Saint John, released by the mayor and council of my city, called for improvement of the airport, including the lengthening of both runways, better navigational aids and lighting, better terminal amenities and improved air service. We are looking for direct, dedicated flights to Toronto, as a first priority, Montreal, Halifax and Boston, plus an improved regional air service and dedicated freight service.

I call upon my government to consider allowing blind and otherwise handicapped people, who have to be escorted to major cities for medical and other attention, to fly at a 50 per cent fare discount on Air Canada flights. Also, the escorts of blind or handicapped persons should be allowed to fly at a 50 per cent discount. If this fare structure were implemented, the present discrimination against such people requiring escorts would be eliminated. I wish to point out that in the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, sightless persons and their escorts are allowed a 50 per cent discount on intercity and interprovincial bus services. However, it takes 14 hours to travel from Saint John to Halifax, which is a long and boring trip for a sighted person but, I submit, it is a most painful and even longer trip for a sightless person. Therefore, the Canadian government should provide reduced air fares for blind and handicapped persons requiring escorts.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for recognizing me for this, my first speech in the House of Commons. It has been a fascinating study of human behaviour for me, sitting here at the back, listening to and observing 263 other hon. members perform, each in his or her own unique manner. With this event soon to be behind me, Mr. Speaker, you can probably count me as one further member whom you will have to keep in order in the future. Having said that, and acknowledging that at this stage of the first session of the thirtieth parliament it would seem inappropriate to congratulate Your Honour upon being elected Speaker of this House, as hon. members preceding me have so fittingly done, may I take this opportunity to commend and congratulate you on the skill and art which you have acquired and exercised in a short few weeks in your role as Mr. Speaker. Not having been subjectively involved in the debates to date, I have been able to assess, I would say, dispassionately your handling of sometimes difficult situations in a manner which I have felt to be most creditable to the high office Your Honour holds on behalf of all hon. members.

I would say also, Mr. Speaker, that these remarks should be considered to apply equally to the Deputy Speaker and Chairman of Committees of the Whole House (Mr. Laniel), the Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole House (Mr. Penner) and the Assistant Deputy Chairman of the Committees of the Whole House (Mrs. Morin). As a new member, I have been impressed by the affability, friendliness and co-operative attitude displayed by the staff under your jurisdiction.

In a few days it will be 21 years since a member representing the constituency of Oxford has given a maiden speech in the House. On that occasion it was the late Wally Nesbitt who so faithfully represented Oxford in the House and whose privilege it was to speak at that time on behalf of his constituents. I am honoured both to be chosen as his successor and, indeed, to sit in the House. Inasmuch as there are only very few hon. members now in the House who were here 21 years ago, perhaps I can be forgiven if I offer a few comments in praise of my constituency.

Oxford is situated in the heart of southwestern Ontario. Interestingly enough, the village of Tavistock where I live, on the northern fringe of the riding, is probably farther from a significant body of water than any other municipality in Ontario. We are about equidistant from the three great lakes—Huron, Erie and Ontario. I hasten to admit, sir, that we do sit on the edge of the headwaters of the Thames River which, although it may dry up in the summer, develops into a significant river as it feeds the reservoir known as Pittock Lake in Woodstock and courses on through the riding toward London and Lake Erie. Morphologically, the boundaries of the riding of Oxford correspond precisely to those of the county of Oxford. As a county in Ontario, we are unique in having been recently granted the privilege and responsibility of undergoing a political internal restructuring in lieu of a scheme of regionalization which has involved large areas of Ontario.

The economy of Oxford is quite diversified, with our population about equally divided between rural and urban dwellers. We are basically an agricultural community with a long and enviable record in the dairy industry. Although cheese-making was carried on in the very early days by pioneer settlers, the first cheese factory in Canada was established in 1863 near Norwich, in Oxford, to be followed two years later by the forerunners of the present Ingersoll Cheese Company which in 1866 produced the still famous mammoth cheese weighing over 7,000 pounds which was shown at the New York State Fair. One year later, in 1867, the Canadian Dairyman's Association was founded at Ingersoll with a convention attended by over 200 delegates from Canada and the United States. As a more timely note, I can say without fear of contradiction that both the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) would most certainly have been presented with a gift of Oxford cheese when they visited our riding during the recent election campaign. In addition, Oxford is blessed with a significant mixture of other branches of agriculture, including beef cattle, hogs, poultry, tobacco, cereal and feed grains, increasingly large acreages of corn, turnips and apples.

Our urban balance is maintained by the city of Woodstock and the towns of Ingersoll and Tillsonburg, each of which makes a significant contribution by way of manufacturing and light industry of a remarkably varied nature, much of the products of which are exported across Canada and around the world. This segment of our economy continues to make significant strides, with a good growth potential for the future. Although Oxford, by this description, may sound like a land of milk and honey, we do have our problems in spite of three forays into our riding by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) during the last election campaign. A constituent of mine of a different political persuasion than I, but nonetheless a friend, has strongly urged me to say something nice about the minister.

Well, Mr. Speaker, like other new members I have got to know that he, too, is an honourable gentleman. But more than that, he has provided the farmers of Oxford and, indeed, Canada with an unparallelled challenge by way of an agricultural policy with the ups and downs of a roller-coaster. Like the rest of Canada, our farmers suffer from the same insecurity generated by complete lack of a consistent agricultural policy. Or, again, take the matter of excessive government intervention in the dairy industry. I quote Mr. Philippe Pariseault, chairman of the National Dairy Council of Canada, in speaking to the council back in September:

> Here is a partial list of new intrusions by our benevolent federal benefactors: moisture content of cheese, fat content of butter and cheese, fat content of ice cream and frozen desserts, fat content of yogurt and cottage cheese, generic classification of cheeses, recall code procedure, Companies Act, competition bill, environment Canada regulations, termination of the fluid milk subsidy, enlargement and extension of milk powder subsidy, Maple Leaf grade symbol, increase in support price for butter and powder, maximum coliform content for cheeses, preparation of brief for GATT, preparation of brief for Food Prices Review Board, report on the dairy industry by Dr. McFarlane, regulations for partially skimmed milk, seminar on the dairy industry held by FPRB, emphasis on violations under Weights and Measures Act, Health and Welfare research projects, codex alimentarius—margarine standards.

And, as Mr. Pariseault points out, this all takes more staff, more government spending and either more taxes or more inflation of the money supply. I think it was Thoreau who once said: "Government is best which governs not at all." Mr. Pariseault went on to say:

> There doesn't seem to be anyone in Canada in charge of co-ordinating the over-all federal government's concern and intervention in our industry. We've had Agriculture Canada, Health and Welfare, Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Statistics Canada, Weights and Measures, Environment Canada, dairy branch, Canadian Dairy Commission, food additives, etc. All get into the act and talk about developing more rules and regulations for our industry during this past year.
> It is difficult to be too critical about a great deal of this government's activity, but it's the proliferation that is so overwhelming and the timing appears to lack any co-ordination whatsoever. After all, one can have an excess of filet mignon and sex.

It would be redundant and time-consuming for me to detail more of these problems now. But by the same token, many of our industrial and small business concerns and farmers have struggled along during the past six years with inadequate financial support in the way of federal small business loans, which just often are not available, together with a government policy not always favourable to the growth and development of Canadian-owned industry.

I would like to touch on one more specific problem which is not unique to Oxford but concerns southwestern Ontario in general. I speak of the appalling lack of public transportation in the rural areas, a problem which appears to be completely ignored by our present Liberal government. Twenty years ago, virtually all the villages and smaller towns in my area were served several times daily by either bus or train, and in many instances by both. Gradually over the last 20 years these means of public transportation have been withdrawn to such an extent that many communities now have no access to larger urban centres. This is a serious handicap for pensioners, for those who do not drive and for single car families where the breadwinner has the car all day. In many instances it causes commuters to waste gasoline energy when they would otherwise use public vehicles for going to and from work in the cities. At a time when efforts are being made to encourage people to live outside the large urban and metropolitan areas, this lack of public transportation is a significant deterrent.

All rail passenger systems were discontinued in midwestern Ontario on November 1, 1970. This was done as a result of a decision by the railway transport committee of the Canadian Transport Commission under the authority of the National Transportation Act of 1967. Public hearings were held to review this measure in the spring of 1972, in London, Chatham, Stratford and Walkerton. It has been 2½ years since the public hearings were held and release of the report by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications which recommended that the rail service for this area be reinstated. This recommendation of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications was submitted to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) in a letter sent on April 3, 1974, to the Hon. E. J. Benson, president of the Canadian Transport Commission. The minister referred to expressions of concern by the public and members of parliament that public transport services in the region were inadequate, or in some cases non-existent. He requested that the commission, in co-operation with provincial authorities, undertake a review of the situation. At present the passenger rail service has not been reinstated.

Having spent thousands of dollars on public rail hearings in this area, and with the report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications recommending the reinstatement of rail service, why has this government done nothing to implement the recommendations or offer a viable alternative such as bus service? The Fifth Report and Review by the Canadian Council on Rural Development, dated December, 1973, and entitled "Commitment to Rural Canada" states, on page 13, under the heading "Rural Predicaments" that improvements in communication and transportation networks make accessibility easier and extend the size of the area served by urban centres. Mr. Speaker, while the networks may be there, the total absence of public vehicles on these networks makes a mockery of the succeeding statement on page 21 that "the ultimate goal of development is, therefore, the improved well-being of the people."

I would like now to deal with three topics essentially of national concern but relatively ignored by our government save for paying them lip service. I refer to the problems of inflation, inadequacies in the field of medical research and, finally, the utter failure of the government to adopt policies designed to instil a sense of dignity, self-pride and self-respect into Canadians. Inasmuch as this is a budget debate, it would be only appropriate that I should refer to the problem of inflation. To be sure, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), who is present in the House, referred to it several times in his budget address. Although physicians are sometimes acknowledged as being inept and lacking in business acumen, it takes very little expertise on my part to realize that what the Minister of Finance is offering this country serves only to fan the flames of inflation.

Even I can realize that year after year of deficit budgeting, with its concomitant expansion of the money supply and credit, can lead to nothing but uncontrolled inflation. And, of course, one does not have to read for very long either books on inflation or the daily newspapers to realize that world authorities on economic and fiscal policies are saying the same thing. But, Mr. Speaker, we have had a government for the last six years, and will for the next four years, that has found it can buy the votes of the Canadian people by offering them ever increasing give away programs by the single deceitful procedure of expanding the money supply. Sir, it is nothing short of reprehensible that this government should, for reasons of its lust for power, commit this travesty on the Canadian people.

Next, Mr. Speaker, I would like to discuss certain aspects of our health care system which I feel are deficient and which I believe our government finds it expedient to ignore. One could devote one's total time allotment to discussing problem areas in health care. By the same token, governments that promise the people "the best health care available" are simply ignoring costs for, as in education, the limits are infinite. Before making rash promises it would be prudent to try to determine what good health care really is, or, in short, how one measures the quality of health care.

This brings us to the question of medical research. The recent Liberal administration has been satisfied to adopt, once again, the politically expedient stance of giving or providing "free" health care to all Canadians. As mentioned when discussing inflation, more votes can be secured by offering the present expensive system of health care whereby, until lately, the prime focus has been on high-cost, hospital-centred care. To invest money in researching how to provide more effective health care and, more important still, how to measure the quality of health care is not something that is newsworthy or vote-catching.

Over the years government funds for medical research in Canada have gone almost entirely to furthering research in the basic sciences and clinical branches of medicine. And even in this area the amounts made available in Canada are pitifully small in proportion to what the USA and Scandinavian countries provide. Commendable as this type of research is, and acknowledging the contribution that has been made to a better understanding of the etiology and treatment of disease processes, we have completely overlooked the funding of operational research and how we can better put to use the clinical knowledge that is made available to us. In short, how does one measure the quality of medical care?

Medical associations have recognized this challenge as of paramount importance and have even made attempts to enter this difficult field of study, only to be stalled for lack of funding. Again I say, it is fine for governments to promise complete care from the womb to the tomb, and by so doing remove all responsibility from individual citizens most of whom could well provide for themselves at lesser cost; but where the problem is too great for individuals or even large associations to cope with, the government abdicates its responsibility to the people as in the question of how to assess the quality of health care. To illustrate how our present government views this whole matter I would refer to a working document published in April, 1974, entitled "A New Perspective on the Health of Canadians." The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde)—who is present in the House, I am pleased to say—has his name on the cover, as would an author, and, indeed, he has written the preface, or at least signed it. I went through 76 pages of this treatise looking for some reference to quality, and at the end of a 12-page chapter headed "Major Problem Areas in the Health Field" I finally found, in the second last word, the one and only reference to quality in the statement that we had to "ensure accessibility to quality service." There is no suggestion that we might have to research what quality service is, in fact. However, the same chapter discusses the health status of the population in terms of life expectancy, mortality rates, causes of death, morbidity, problems in the organization and delivery of health care and, finally, conflicting goals in the health care system—but no thought of how to measure the quality of health care. The following was even admitted:

● (1600)

> No such public demand exists for research and preventive measures. As a consequence, resources allocated for research, teaching and prevention are generally insufficient.

How is that for leadership, when a cabinet minister not only fails to recognize the existence of a problem, but even when he does he states that no funds would be available if there were no public demand. That same chapter discusses the problem of costs of personal health care, stating that for a family of four in 1971 the cost was about $1,100 and that "most of the costs were met by insurance." The minister knows that this is not entirely true, and that the majority of these costs are met by taxes and not insurance.

Nor can I fail to observe, in the same chapter, the statement that "what is really needed is a measure of the prevalence of ill-health in the population." The College of Family Physicians of Canada, with whom I have been closely associated for many years, has repeatedly been turned down by this government when we have sought funds for the establishment of an illness observation unit designed to collect and measure the very information the minister said is needed. Finally, Mr. Speaker, as a family physician and general practitioner whose numbers represent slightly over 50 per cent of practising physicians, much could be said about the problems which they face. However, since I have been discussing the problems of medical research I would be remiss if I neglected a major problem affecting this important and rapidly growing group of doctors.

Traditionally, medical research has been done at university centres under the aegis of a principal investigator who is normally a salaried member of that institution. But we have now entered a new era where medical teaching and medical research, particularly in the field of family medicine, must increasingly be done by private physicians out in the real, live world of general practice. Again, the government is dragging its heels by failing to recognize that physicians out in practice have to sacrifice income and earning power in order to devote time to operational research and morbidity studies. Unlike the university-centred principal investigator, these physicians must be remunerated for time spent on research. Once again, it is the people of Canada who suffer in the long run due to the failure of this Liberal administration to adjust to changing times.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, time does not permit me to deal adequately with the more philosophical yet very real problem of how our government is gnawing away at and destroying the very fibre of our Canadian citizens. The budget which we are debating serves only to aggravate this insidious process of decay of human worth and self-respect by paying people for doing nothing, instead of using the money to reward them for doing productive work. The October, 1974, letter of the Royal Bank of Canada states:

> Government is an art to be learned, like medicine or engineering or law, or any other profession, and not merely an office to be won.

This government may have won the office but it is still groping for the art.

[Translation]

Mr. Raynald Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate you as well as the Deputy Speaker and Chairman of Committees of the Whole (Mr. Laniel), the Deputy Chairman of the Committees of the Whole (Mr. Penner) and the Assistant Deputy Chairman of the Committees of the Whole (Mrs. Morin). I am sure you will justify your reputation of earnestness and impartiality while acquitting yourself of this task which is so burdensome these days when you must preside over the discussions of a Parliament housing the representatives of four different political parties.

Even if the budget presented by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) did not generate unanimous enthusiasm, it did seem to please the majority of the members in this House and, I think, most other Canadians as well as it provides for a number of positive policies aimed at fighting against Canada's present number one problem which is inflation.

In 1973-74 we tried more or less successfully to fight inflation and unemployment. Of course, the economic position of the United States did not help us as everyone knows that our own economy is closely involved with that of our neighbours. However, I think that this budget speech contains certain measures which can give more independence to Canada and will allow us to overcome this problem of inflation.

Certain budget policies are interesting especially concerning the following subjects: suggestions concerning resource taxation, adjustments to the equalization payments system, provisions to stimulate housing, support for investment, important decreases in personal income tax and, finally, savings protection.

Some other provisions included in last May's budget have been added, to wit: taxes or exemptions in certain fields, stronger stimulants for small industry, improved registered retirement savings plans, new legislation for the reorganization of companies and finally provisions to reduce custom duties.

With regard to some of the proposals, I should like the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) to give us more details on how he intends to set up the merchant marine which was mentioned briefly in the Speech from the Throne.

● (1610)

Does he intend to set up a department, a commission or an independent body to do so? As for me, Mr. Speaker, I feel that a department in charge of the merchant marine, as well as of all matters pertaining to transportation by water, would be ideal, considering some of the criticism the Department of Transport has been subjected to; it is a huge department, composed of several divisions. I feel that solution would free, not only the Minister of Transport from part of his responsibilities, but also the administrative mechanism of that department.

Having said this, I wish to congratulate warmly the Minister of Transport for his tenacity throughout the years in wanting to give us a merchant marine. As a matter of fact, he fought for that idea even when he was in the CNTU and since then, he has kept on believing in it and doing everything possible to achieve it. Progress in that direction is now encouraging, but does the minister know when it can become a reality?

That is an area from which our country has been absent for many years, although Canada ranks among the most important trading nations in the world. The benefits which would result for our economy would be many, in view of the increasing amount of products such as grains, oil, ores, coal, lumber and a great many other commodities which Canada must export.

It is difficult to accept that Canadian ships or ships under Canadian flags are nearly absent from this area. In my opinion, this is a matter of important national prestige. I was very glad to hear this mentioned in the budget speech, and I dare hope that the money that will result from the new tax on natural resources will help equip Canada with a merchant marine, thereby allowing our own people to transport our own resources aboard our own ships.

Another matter closely related to shipping has to do with shipyards. Our last program, known as STAP, that is the Shipbuilding Temporary Assistance Program, has enabled the ones we have to build over thirty ships for foreign owners, while gaining valuable experience in the construction of heavy tonnage units and developing new building methods.

I think that the government would be well advised to keep this program and enlarge its scope so that it may be applied to shipowners who could benefit from it either by increasing or streamlining their present fleet. I do hope that the departments concerned will take the necessary measures to assure the survival and the maintenance of that fleet. This program is to expire on March 31, 1975.

Always with regard to shipyards, my riding at Lévis has one very well known all over our country if not all over the world. In the past few years, at least four departments have been preparing a study for a report on the feasibility of building a giant dry dock in the Lauzon shipyards. I am eager to know when that report will be tabled. As far as coastal traffic is concerned, I note with utmost satisfaction that several of the points I made in my budget speech last year did materialize.

At that time I also drew attention to the pension fund for CN workers. Some commendable improvements were brought to the pension plan for retired CN employees, but I think the basic problem has not yet been solved, namely pension rates for retiring employees. CN employees are now wondering why, as employees of a Crown corporation, they are not being treated exactly like employees from other corporations under federal jurisdiction.

I believe their demand is reasonable, and I think their pensions should be geared to the cost of living.

Another problem inherent in inflation is that of agriculture, and especially farmers. I have no need to emphasize the very serious situation of egg, grain, and beef producers, and even sugar producers now, since all that is being accurately reported on by mass media.

The government also admits to that emergency situation. Therefore, I would like to see measures developed rapidly to prevent those disasters which we will necessarily head for if we do not take immediate action. The government should act more quickly in respect of food products and especially sugar.

What is the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) waiting for to make a statement on those measures and programs for helping farmers produce more sugar beet? Besides, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) should enter as soon as possible into international agreements with sugar producing countries and of course try to get the fairest, that is the cheapest prices.

Incidently, I would like to make a few comments on the Plumptre Board. The Plumptre Board has no powers but an informative role, or at least that of a watchdog, if one looks at what happened last month in the Ottawa area. We know that the Plumptre Board made a survey during over five weeks going from store to store, checking prices, publishing price differentials. Fortunately, because the Plumptre Board was there, last month's statistics prove that only the Ottawa area did not register higher food prices. For that reason I welcome the work of the Plumptre Board.

As I said in my opening remarks I will not praise indefinitely the Plumptre Board because I know it has no power but at least until we take further steps it continues to play the role of watchdog it plays so well at present.

Another suggestion comes from the farmers themselves. Recently Quebec farmers at a convention asked the federal government to intervene directly into the beef problem. It replied that the matter came under provincial rather than federal jurisdiction. I confess this is true but it is also true that we were elected to this House by the people of this country and it is our duty to help them when they ask us to do so.

When he next meets with his provincial counterparts, will the Minister of Agriculture consider setting up an agreement scheme providing for special intervention by the federal government when the people of this country ask for it and when situations such as those we faced and we now face call for it? Mr. Speaker, the people of this country need to be reassured, and I sincerely hope that this Parliament will take the necessary steps to ensure more stability in our economy.

Mr. Speaker, this is my first speech since the election of July last, and I want to thank the voters of the riding of Lévis who elected me for a fifth consecutive time and put their confidence in me so I would vindicate first their interests and contribute with my colleagues to passing legislation guaranteeing them more justice and a happier life. I want to assure them that I will do everything in my power not to betray their confidence.

[English]

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, for those of us who sit on this side of the House it is always a challenge to participate in a budget debate because in my view Liberal budgets are almost always deceptively misleading at first glance. This budget is certainly no exception. Not only is it deceptive but it is, in my judgment, misleading. Moreover, it is based on highly questionable assumptions with respect to the predicted rate of growth of the economy and the export outlook of our durable goods. But most significant of all is that at a time when Canadians on low and fixed incomes are not making ends meet, and when Canadians in the middle-income bracket are bearing an increasingly burdensome share of taxation, there will be neither relief from inflation nor any meaningful relief from taxation.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, this budget is one of the most regressive budgets we have seen in the past six years. It harks back to the days before the Carter commission on taxation. It is a piece of classical nineteenth century Liberalism. It is a budget for the wealthy, for the big corporations, for the foreigners who own and control our resource industries. It is a budget for the big investors. This is not a budget for the hundreds of thousands of ordinary Canadians, many of whom supported the Liberals last July hoping that the Liberal Party would finally come to grips with the spiralling cost of living, high unemployment and the growing dissillusionment in general with respect to politics, politicians and governments.

When fully appreciated by the Canadian people, this budget will serve only to heighten their suspicions that government in Ottawa today is no longer responsive to their basic needs; that it no longer cares about decent housing at reasonable prices; that it no longer cares if ordinary Canadians are paying over 75 per cent of their incomes in taxes, food and accommodation; that it no longer cares about the widening gap between those who have wealth and power and those who have neither. In short, Mr. Speaker, this budget will do nothing to redistribute more equitably and more humanely the great wealth of this nation. In reading the budget one gets the impression that the mandarins in the Department of Finance have not changed their philosophy since the grand old days of the Manchester School. Joseph Chamberlain would have been proud of this budget. What a short way in economic philosophy we have come in one hundred years!

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that hardly a day goes by that members on both sides of this House do not receive letters from their constituents asking why building lots which sold for $8,000 two years ago now sell for $17,000; why basic food staples such as bread, milk, meat and vegetables have nearly doubled in price in the same period of time; why mortgage interest rates have priced the average home buyer out of the market; why bank interest rates, even backed by collateral, have soared to 18 per cent. The list could be extended, but suffice it to say that Canadians across this country are growing angrier by the day as they see their real income falling behind at the same time as their suspicions of price gouging and profiteering are increasing. It is this deplorable situation that is dividing our nation and leading to social tension and mistrust. And this budget has done nothing to allay our people's fears, suspicions and frustrations.

If we cannot learn from our own mistakes, Mr. Speaker, why cannot we learn from the mistakes of other countries such as the United States where division between rich and poor has been the major cause of violence and social upheaval? I hope that some day the Liberal Party will abandon its old-fashioned posturing and face up to the realities of the latter half of the twentieth century. Let us look at some important aspects of the budget as they affect ordinary Canadians. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) said that "continued attention must be given to mitigating the effects of inflation on the more vulnerable members of our society". Just what attention has he in fact given? The government is going to give $500 to every Canadian who is buying his first home. This was a great election gimmick. But how many will be able to take advantage of this "gift"? In the first place, the house must be a new house. In the second place, the cost of the house must fall under a certain ceiling, which in my constituency of Brant is about $34,900; but in the city of Brantford, in which I live, it is impossible to purchase a new house for less than $38,000 or $40,000. So much for that "gift".

Has the government done anything about the exorbitant interest rates home buyers must pay even if they can afford the down payment? The answer is, of course, no. But the government is prepared to allow trust companies and other mortgage firms to borrow more money for mortgages, even though there has been no evidence whatsoever that, over the past three years, as more mortgage money became available interest rates went down. The opposite was the case. This is why most Canadians cannot buy a house today, Mr. Speaker. They simply cannot afford the carrying charges. Their monthly budgets will not permit it, and they cannot just print their own money. The budget did state that the government will allow Canadians to save $1,000 a year up to ten years, for a total of $10,000, and deduct this from their taxes. But how many Canadians can afford to save $1,000 a year? Again, very few; and certainly not those on low or fixed incomes—certainly not the very Canadians who so desperately need better housing.

There is little indication in this budget that the federal government is prepared to push its land assembly scheme of which it was so proud a couple of years ago; it is simply dragging its feet. But the government is not dragging its feet when it comes to the wealthy real estate investor. Lawyers, doctors and wealthy businessmen will now be able to form syndicates for the purpose of building large luxury apartment buildings, because they are now to be given a 100 per cent capital cost allowance write-off against all other forms of income if they invest in rental accommodation. What a fantastic new tax haven for the rich! We in the New Democratic Party believe that decent housing in a country such as Canada should be the right of everyone. The only way this will ever come about is by greater government intervention in and control over housing, not by giving tax hand-outs to the wealthy. We have seen far too much of this in the past. And because the private sector controls the housing industry, we have seen residential building lots double and even triple in price in the past four years.

The Minister of Finance has announced that the federal sales tax on building materials would be reduced from 11 per cent to 5 per cent. Again, at first glance this may look like an effective means of lowering the cost of housing. Indeed, for a short period of time the advantage here may be passed on to the home buyer. But in fact, whenever hidden federal sales taxes have been eliminated or reduced in the past, prices have mysteriously climbed back up again. Look at the price of footwear and clothing for children. This sales tax reduction will ultimately benefit, not the home purchase but the large developer, the guy who has had it so "rough" during the past three or four years. So, Mr. Speaker, in the field of housing for those who most need it, this budget is a farce. It is worse than that; it is contemptible.

I would now like to turn my attention to the "fantastic tax breaks" that ordinary Canadians are going to get from this budget to "mitigate the effects of inflation", as the Minister of Finance so benevolently put it in his budget address. In the first place, those whose incomes are so low that they do not pay income taxes get no breaks in the budget, because this budget is not in any way designed to curb inflation. They will continue to suffer the ravages of inflation without any mitigation whatsoever. Again there is the deception I referred to earlier, Mr. Speaker.

But what about those Canadians who are on low and middle incomes and do pay taxes? Under existing law, taxpayers are entitled to reduce their federal tax liability by 5 per cent, with a minimum tax credit of $100 and a maximum of $500. This budget will increase the minimum by the paltry sum of $50, and the maximum by $250. So the guy at the lower end of the pay scale gets a tax break, to fight inflation, of 97 cents a week, when in fact his purchasing power declined by nearly $6 a week during the past year alone. The Minister of Finance, in granting this "fantastic tax break", has the unmitigated gall to ask working men and women to exercise restraint at the bargaining tables this year. What deception!

However, if your income happens to be around $30,000 a year, you can claim a tax credit of $750. It is this, Mr. Speaker, that makes this budget to regressive, so unfair and so oriented toward the wealthy in our society. I ask, how can a struggling family in Canada today fight inflation with a tax reduction of less than a dollar a week? The price of food and rents is going up; houses are beyond the reach of not only the poor but the middle income earners. Yet the Minister of Finance says his budget will "mitigate the effects of inflation". That is so much rubbish. In virtually every situation since the Second World War, wage increases have come after the effects of inflation have reduced the purchasing power of working people. No reputable economist has suggested that the latest round of price increases has been caused by pressure from wage demands.

Is it any wonder that thousands upon thousands of Canadian workers, men and women, are becoming deeply frustrated with the present spiralling cost of living? No one in his right mind would opt for wage restraint when he has lost nearly $6 in real wages per week and the government gives him back less than a dollar a week to fight inflation. A great deal of the labour unrest in Canada today is due to the fact that Canadian workers have lost faith in their governments to protect them against the devastating effects of inflation, with no end in sight. In his budget speech, the Minister of Finance stated that "we have to find a better way of reconciling competing interests of the various groups which make up our society". No one can argue against that. Yet statistics show that wages and salaries, as a proportion of the gross national product, have been falling steadily since 1971. In 1972, wages and salaries made up 55 per cent of the GNP; by the fourth quarter of 1973 this figure had fallen to 53.2 per cent. Meanwhile, corporate profits have been going up from 9.6 per cent of the GNP in 1971 to 13.7 per cent in the last quarter of 1973.

In his budget, Mr. Speaker, let us see how the Minister of Finance responded to this situation. First of all, he has extended indefinitely the two year rapid write-off for the purchase of machinery and equipment by manufacturing and processing companies. This extension is based on the questionable assumption that the GNP will continue at about 4 per cent when in fact the OECD, a more accurate forecaster than the Minister of Finance, predicts that the real growth of our economy could fall to 1 per cent.

Secondly, the minister's reaction to the wishes of the private sector is based on the other faulty assumption that Canada's trade will remain strong. Canada exports 60 per cent of her goods to the United States. That country is now in a recession, with no sign of improvement in sight. If we cannot sell our products to the United States—and there is already a decline—what good is the rapid write-off? I also strongly suspect that the Minister of Finance's thrust toward deficit financing is not so much to buoy up our economy but is, more precisely, to pay for the unemployment that is bound to increase as our volume of trade with the United States continues to decline. I suppose we will just have to wait to see what taxpayers across the country, generally speaking, will have to pay for unemployment insurance benefits in 1975.

This budget, Mr. Speaker, also has seriously reversed the government's earlier decision to create a greater public presence in our resource industries not only in terms of investment but in terms of important decision-making. Now the emphasis has been shifted back to the private sector, to those "poor, destitute" companies like Exxon, Shell, Texaco, BP and so on, whose profits have been soaring as the retail price for gasoline and home heating fuel has soared. In fact, within a year we may well be paying over $1 for a gallon of gasoline. As the Minister of Finance has implied, the primacy of the private sector in the resource field is reaffirmed. This is a serious, retrograde step.

Unless Canadians, through their elected governments, gain greater control over their natural, non-renewable resources, we will be a have-not nation within a generation. Why, then, I ask, is the federal government bent on lowering the tax rate on petroleum products from 30 per cent in 1974 to 28 per cent in 1975 and to 25 per cent in 1976? And why the 100 per cent write-off of exploration expenses? These measures will put hundreds of millions of dollars in the corporations' hands, only to be stacked up with other little goodies like tax deferments. Again I repeat, this is a rich man's budget; it is a corporate budget; it is not a people's budget.

Here we have a situation where the Minister of Finance says we must lessen the burden of inflation on those most vulnerable, yet does nothing for the most vulnerable. He reaffirms his faith in the rich, powerful, corporate elite by giving them even bigger hand-outs and tax concessions, and does nothing to place our depleting natural resources in the hands of responsible, democratically elected legislators. At the same time, no doubt to protect himself later, the Minister of Finance admitted that not only would food costs remain high but they would probably go even higher in the coming year.

We in the NDP presented a policy during the last election campaign—a policy I admit the people of Canada did not accept—to establish a prices review board with power to investigate suspicious increases in prices and to roll back those increases if they were clearly unwarranted. We still demand this as the only safeguard for the average Canadian against price gouging and profiteering. But with four years of majority government ahead of us, I doubt whether this will ever become government policy. In the meantime, Canadians will continue to pay more and workers, organized and not organized, will not only bear the brunt of this tragic situation but they will continue to be unfairly and unjustifiably blamed for it.

I would like to turn my attention to our senior citizens. As of October 1, a single pensioner receiving the maximum old age security and the guaranteed income supplement was receiving just over $200 a month. The average rent for a one-bedroom apartment in the city of Brantford, where I live, is between $160 and $170 a month. Though there are a few very fine senior citizens' public housing developments in Canada, they total only 67,000 units. In Canada there are about two million senior citizens. What did the budget have for these two million Canadians? Sixty per cent of these people will derive no benefit at all from the budget because they are receiving the guaranteed income supplement. For those whose incomes prevent them from getting additional assistance because of private pension schemes, there is a benefit. For this I am personally pleased, because now they will be tax exempt up to $1,000 a year on income from private pensions. But, I repeat, the majority will get no benefits whatever, not even an increase in the basic OAS.

It is also worthy to note, Mr. Speaker, though tragic, that there is nothing in this budget to assist the native peoples of Canada. Once again they have been totally ignored. Some time ago I asked the Minister of Finance if he would grant a tax concession to retired Indian teachers who had taught in Indian schools on reserves all their lives. When they were working they did not have to pay income tax because of the Indian Act. Now that they have retired they find they have to pay income tax on their superannuation, yet the source of income is the same—the federal government. In view of the fact that both their salary and superannuation are considerably lower than those who teach or have taught off reserves, I asked the Minister of Finance if he would eliminate this tax on superannuation. He passed my representation on to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Basford) whose executive assistant sloughed it off with departmental jargon showing lack of both sense and compassion. I intend to pursue this issue further.

Mr. Speaker, my time is running out, if it has not already, but 20 minutes is not enough time to attack a phony, misleading budget. In conclusion, I have searched in vain for the answer to the question, what has this budget done for the average Canadian? Is there anything in it of substance to effectively cure the monster which is gobbling up everyone's savings, driving up the cost of living and provoking conflict between unions and management? No doubt those who do not have will be the payers for those who do. As I have pointed out, the only persons who got a break on November 18 are the wealthy, and the corporations; and by no stretch of the imagination can anyone say that prior to the budget they were the most vulnerable members of our society. This budget is so out of tune with the economic realities of today that I predict we will see another budget within six months. But I am not holding my breath; we will probably just get another replay.

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I am especially glad to take part in the debate on the budget.

We have two opportunities each year to express our personal opinions on subjects which are important to us. Today, I would like to tell you about my opinions and make a few remarks on a very current subject and certainly one of the foremost problems of our time—that world poverty and particularly starvation.

Mr. Speaker, I would have liked to tell the House about the social economic problems of the area and the constituency which I am privileged to represent. However, during the debates on bills to be brought forward during this Parliament, I will have other opportunities to talk about this and to describe the economic situation in my constituency where economic readjustment remains slow.

The subject about which I shall talk today is much more general and much more far reaching, but it still concerns the people of my area. It is the problem of poverty and hunger in general.

The measures announced by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) in his budget speech are extremely important for the Canadian economy and we shall have other opportunities to discuss them. However, Mr. Speaker, I was extremely glad to note the remarks of the Minister of Finance when he said, and I quote:

> Our countries, including Canada, must review their foreign aid programs in the light of . . .

—the present situation.

> Canada must, at the minimum, help these people meet the most urgent and basic need of their people—food.

The minister also stated: We also intend to expand all our contributions to developing countries capable of increasing their own food production.

> These are moral commitments. We intend to fulfill them.

Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege and the honour to be a member of the Canadian delegation to the world food conference held in Rome from November 3 to 17 and I thought it might be interesting to tell my colleagues in this House about some of the comments that were made recently at the conference and generally outline the international food situation as described at the conference as well as the Canadian position assumed at Rome and the possibility of substantially increasing our aid to developing countries.

For a dozen years certain international agencies, especially the World Health Organization and the Food and Agriculture Organization, have been warning the world about the possibility of a food shortage and giving ways and means to avoid the crisis now confronting us on a world scale. What has brought us to this point? Whatever the reason, said United Nations Secretary General Kurt Waldheim at the beginning of the conference, the crisis is facing us and we therefore must act now.

It is paradoxical, Mr. Speaker, that the present world food shortage, accompanied by malnutrition, which has never been so widespread, should happen at a time when the potential of technological progress is taking on unprecedented proportions.

When the FAO launched an invitation to all the countries of the world for a world food conference, everyone was asked at the start to present concrete provisions and to suggest immediate solutions to the extremely urgent problem of hunger in many areas of the Third World.

In many ways, and especially as to concrete provisions, one could say that the Rome conference was half a success.

On the other hand, the fact of having brought to the attention of the world the main ingredients of this complex problem of hunger and thus revealing the alarming proportions of the situation is sufficient evidence that the Rome conference was a success.

How is it that the food problem, the problem millions of people face to feed themselves, and the malnutrition problem should have suddenly appeared at this particular moment?

In his opening address to the World Food Conference on November 5, the Secretary General of United Nations stated:

> The situation is indeed critical. World food production which had shown a disastrous decline in 1972 has reached levels which in the historical perspective may be reasonably high, but have never allowed to a security margin nor to meet the spiralling demand . . . From now on, to alleviate, the difficulties of the world strategic reserve, we can only rely on about 25 million hectares of tillable land unused in the land banks of the United States.

The Conference held in Rome has provided most of the delegation with the opportunity to state openly their policy with regard to the serious food problem. In one of the most noted statements during the Rome Conference, the Honourable General Carlos Romulo

● (1640)

[English]

—Secretary of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of the Philippines and chairman of the Philippine delegation to the UN food conference, in a speech entitled "What went wrong?" said:

> I dare suggest to my fellow delegates from developing countries that there must be something wrong with our development plans, something wrong with our objectives and priorities, something terribly and disastrously wrong, when 25 or even 30 years of independence and development have only led us to this sorry pass, to this crisis—and I know it is an overused word, but I can find no real equivalent—to this crisis of world hunger.
> What went wrong? Where did we take the wrong turning? I am aware, deeply aware, of the aspirations and expectations of our peoples, or—more accurately—of their leaders and planners and decision-makers. After centuries of colonial exploitation, of producing raw materials for the industries of the metropolis, of being captive markets for its manufactures, of being "hewers of wood and drawers of water", we were driven by the desire, by the urgent political need, to develop our own economies, to be economically independent, to give employment to the landless workers crowding into our new cities, to mean something in the world, to be respected and taken into account, to find our "place in the sun".
> Surely, this was not wrong. Surely this was a legitimate objective, a legitimate aspiration.
>
> What was wrong, what went wrong, I dare suggest to my colleagues from developing countries, was our understanding and appreciation of priorities and of the economic and social, and by that token also the political realities.
>
> The question, the hard question, the unavoidable question, we must now ask ourselves is this. What is the purpose, what is the use, of brand-new factories, or even of a nuclear device, when millions of our people do not have enough to eat? When an unacceptable proportion of our children die before leaving infancy? When those who survive are stunted physically and mentally? What price, then, a nuclear bomb or the missile to carry it across the globe?

[Translation]

Similar remarks, Mr. Speaker, have been made by many heads of delegation in respect of developing countries themselves. Some reproaches have been directed to the developing countries for the exercise percentage of their gross national product earmarked yearly for national defence.

Some delegations have also pointed out the fact that several developing countries accept to make investments sometimes somptuous but of little importance for the basic development of their social and economic potential. Several reproaches may certainly be directed to the developing countries. But the same is true, Mr. Speaker, for the developed countries, and in this respect, I think the latter have a major responsibility to shoulder for the present world food crisis.

Most of the developed countries' delegations at the Rome Conference have been disappointed, and this in many respects. Everyone thought that the developed countries represented at the Rome Conference would make concrete propositions and contribute a substantial aid for the difficult food problem which is rampant in many parts of the world. For many countries faced with serious food problems, it has been a great disappointment. We can say, Mr. Speaker, that amongst all the countries which have sent a delegation at the Rome Conference, Canada has certainly been one of the countries whose propositions have been best received, not only by the developing countries but also by the developed countries which have appreciated the Canadian position as a firm, sensible and realistic one.

Everybody agrees that Canada has an enormous food potential. Moreover, agriculture, not only in developing countries, but also in developed countries, is presently under-going huge difficulties. A great variety of factors explain why the agricultural sector now has to face extremely intricate problems.

Millions of people in several countries of the world not only do not eat their fill, but are positively starving. Only a short time ago, the FAO stated in one of its publications that 10 to 15 million people died directly or indirectly from starvation or malnutrition every year. Several countries had agricultural and food surpluses, possibly not this year, but just a few years ago. Many countries voluntarily slowed down agricultural production, and also destroyed food stocks. Considering the rise in oil costs and its incidence on the increased cost of fertilizers, and considering that political leaders of many countries in the world find it extremely difficult to deal in a positive and definite way with that huge problem, may I say, Mr. Speaker, that the contribution of rich countries in the Rome conference was so scanty that we might regard as somehow shameful the parsimonious commitment of rich countries to those countries to which they are so much indebted.

We all know the advantage taken by several countries, purposely or unvoluntarily, of the huge differences in rates of change and of an all too often unfair trade situation.

Canada had a prominent role in that conference, and our Minister for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) indeed made a key speech in the Congress House. The Secretary of State for External Affairs stated in his speech and I quote:

> We in Canada will not shirk these responsibilities, and are willing to play our part in furthering those common endeavours which bear promise of helping to produce a lasting freedom from want for all mankind—but the endeavours will remain barren if they are not truly common and truly sustained.

A little further on, the minister said:

> We are now carefully re-examining the skills and resources that may exist in Canada suitable for assisting the development of new agriculture and fisheries capacity in developing countries to determine practical ways of making them readily available. We therefore intend to have a matching response for countries who set about energetically to mobilize their internal food production resources and who give a high development priority to efficient food production.

In a more encompassing perspective, the minister stated:

● (1650)

[English]

—mankind has no choice but to arrange his feeding in harmony with a balanced use of all the earth's resources, or his civilisation will go the way of those of Nineveh and Babylon—which destroyed the soils that fed them.

[Translation]

There are several ways, Mr. Speaker, to change the present food situation in several countries of the world. There is, of course, food assistance and plain help to developing countries, which must be considerably increased. In many countries, there is a lot of waste that must absolutely be prevented. Sacrifices must be made by some nations if they want to put an end to hunger. As regards our country, people must be made aware of the problems of poverty in general and of nutrition in the third world in particular. This awakening must be done not only by the decision makers, but also at the whole population level. Here, Mr. Speaker, non-governmental agencies can play a major role. Mention must also be made of the important part these agencies played at the Rome conference. I am convinced that they will pursue their awareness campaign throughout the country. In our efforts to try and change the situation in which several countries now find themselves, we should not forget the farmer. I was very pleased to see that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) took the responsibility of pointing out to the delegates to the Rome conference, and particularly in the commissions, that the farmer was indeed the basic element of a reform which would make it possible for the developing countries to expand considerably their food potential. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Minister of Agriculture of Canada was highly praised by several delegates to the Conference because of what he said and because he took the defence of the agricultural class. Two suggestions were made at the Conference in order to remove hunder in the world which are worth being pointed out. Mr. Romulo, whom I quoted earlier, stated:

[English]

Let me sum it up briefly. There is no substitute for food. You can have your factories, as many as you want; mills and markets, foreign exchange reserves, golf, oil, special drawing rights, whatever your economists and financial experts can think of and demand; but if your people do not have enough to eat, if they do not grow enough food to feed themselves, you are in trouble, deep trouble, you are in crisis.

An economic crisis, a political crisis, a moral crisis, and in the long run nobody can bail you out of it except yourselves.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, a similar statement was made by the chief of the Chinese delegation, who reminded the developing countries that they should no longer depend on wealthy countries, given their selfishness, and that from now on they should depend on their own resources only.

Although these statements are certainly commendable, for they offer, in the long run an ideal solution to our problems, the fact is that this solution is not possible in the short run.

Mr. Speaker, as regards development assistance, Canada can be a leader. One of our great diplomats, Mr. Maurice Strong, said a few years ago:

[English]

There are three overriding influences determining our age, one is the space race, one the nuclear arms race and the third the development race; Canada has no role to play in the first two, but in the one of the developing countries we can be a major power. We know what development means because we've done it here ourselves.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, during the two weeks of debates and discussions of the Rome Conference, one of the most remarkable contributions which I had the privilege to listen to was not made at the Palace of the Congress where the conference was held, but during the audience which Pope Paul VI granted the Conference delegates in the St. Peter Basilica in Rome. Here are some excerpts which I found particularly interesting:

This crisis appears mainly as a crisis of civilization and solidarity. A crisis of civilization and method which appears when the development of life within a society is seen from a unilateral point of view, when considering only the type of society which results in an industrialized civilization, that is to say, when putting excessive trust in the automatism of purely technical solutions and forgetting basic human values. A crisis which appears when the search for economic success only resulting from major profits in industry intensifies, thereby causing the nearly complete abandonment of the sector of agriculture and the accompanying neglect of its highest human and spiritual values. Also, a crisis of solidarity which maintains and sometimes accelerates the disparities between individuals, groups and nations, and which unfortunately results—as it is increasingly obvious—from the insufficient will to contribute to a better sharing of available resources, especially with underdeveloped countries and with human sectors which are still living under an essentially primitive type of agriculture.

We are therefore faced with the paradox of the present situation: Mankind has an unequal power over the universe; it possesses tools by which full productivity can be obtained from its very resources.

Will the very people who hold those instruments remain struck with paralysis in the face of the absurdity of a situation in which the wealth of a few would tolerate the persistent misery of too large a number, in which the highly enriched and diversified food consumption of a few nations would be content with the vital minimum granted all the others, in which human intelligence could alter the fate of so many gravely ill and yet would shirk the task of ensuring adequate food to the most vulnerable peoples of humanity?

Should it come to that, grave errors in orientation will have been committed, though perhaps at times only through neglect or omission. It is high time to discover how the mechanisms have been warped, that the situation might be rectified or rather set upright from end to end.

And finally, the Pope added:

[English]

To you who are engaged in a task at once so difficult yet so rich in promise, we put forward two principles to guide your work: on the one hand, to face up to the data of the problem without allowing yourselves to become bewildered in your evaluation of them through panic or through excessive timidity; and on the other hand to feel yourselves sufficiently stimulated by the absolute urgency and priority of the needs in question so that you will not be satisfied in any single case by delays or by half measures. This conference will not resolve everything on its own; it is not in its nature to do so. However, through the clarity and energy of its conclusions it will give the impetus to a series of effective and sincerely accepted commitments; or contrary to the expectations placed in it and in spite of the goodwill of its members, it will have been held in vain.

● (1700)

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I think one should try to assess why the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is unique in not having been subjected to more criticism during his tenure as finance minister in this government. Anyone reading the budget speech will learn the answer, I suggest. The minister is unique because he has discovered that if you want to keep out of trouble, you must do nothing. Anyone examining the minister's record will see that it is a record of drifting. It has been his policy that this country should drift aimlessly in its dealings on the world market, in its approach to modern economics, in allowing inflation to take its course and in allowing other economic pressures to take their course. He has done little to control the inflation ravaging this country.

When one deals in billions of dollars it is easy to lose perspective. Therefore, I think it is wise to look at what has been happening in this country in the last ten years. According to current estimates before the House, the government plans to spend in the current year almost $26 billion, compared with slightly under $10 billion which the government spent in the year before the present Liberal government assumed power. Total government spending in the 1974 fiscal year was slightly under $20 billion; this year it is to be slightly under $26 billion. It is to spend 30 per cent more in one year. Or, putting it another way, the government is to increase its spending at the federal level, in one year, by an amount equal to the total federal budget of the early 1960's. It is time members of the House asked for this trend to be arrested.

I was disappointed in the statement the Minister of Finance made on CTV. He said he would attempt to hold spending this year down to a 15 per cent increase and then he said, as reported in the newspapers:

> Now it's intensely difficult in the political process to hold these expenditures down.

Why is it so intensely difficult for the government of Canada to do what is prudent and hold expenses down, when virtually all other nations are trying to do that and are succeeding? The United States intends to hold its budget this coming year down to $300 billion. If our minister were, say, minister of finance in the United States he would increase that country's spending to $345 billion. They would spend $45 billion more than they intend to spend this year.

The actual situation is more alarming, Mr. Speaker. Estimated government spending in the current year, that is, the 1975-76 fiscal year, will run, according to the appendix to the budget speech, at $28,750 million. But there is a footnote which says that this is a mid-point range; in other words, expenditures could go up to $30 billion just as easily as they could go down to $27 billion. That is significant. If you add 15 per cent to the minimum of $26 billion the government estimates it will spend in the current year, you will add slightly under $4 billion and the total will be slightly under $30 billion. I suggest that if the Minister of Finance has been completely candid he would have admitted that the government intends to spend $30 billion in the current year, and not the more modest figure he mentioned on budget night. The formula can be expressed another way: the government has been spending at the rate of a 40 per cent cumulative increase per year at the federal level. How can we arouse the Canadian public to the dangers entailed by this spending spree being indulged in by Ottawa?

I wish to deal with specific items in the budget. Two particularly distressing points should be mentioned. The first is the government's persistent attitude concerning the taxation of resources. It is particularly unfortunate that the government has chosen to confront the provinces on the question of resource revenue sharing. The Minister of Finance, supported by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), has indicated that royalties paid to provinces with respect to oil and other resources are no longer to be deductible from income for purposes of income tax. The government's attitude on the payment of royalties to provinces is strange. The Minister of Finance confirmed yesterday evening that royalties payable to foreign governments can still be deducted from income before the federal income tax is computed.

What is the difference? Let me give an example. If a Canadian company is taking oil from Venezuela, it must pay approximately $2.28 per barrel in royalties and pay a profits tax of $6.31, for a total payment to the government of Venezuela of $8.59. Under existing Canadian law, both the royalty and the tax paid to the government of Venezuela can be considered as a business expense and may be deducted from income before calculating Canadian federal income tax.

But if the same company proposes to take oil from, say, Alberta, what happens? The royalty payable to Alberta is $2.62 per barrel. But the government says, "No, you cannot consider that royalty as an expense; you cannot deduct it from income in computing income tax." The company must pay 34 cents per barrel more in royalty to Alberta. I ask, how is the Minister of Finance justified in saying, "In no way will the royalty you pay to the province of Alberta be deductible as a business expense"? I believe this House deserves an explanation from the government. Why is this policy being followed? We need an explanation for the government's strangely changed attitude to oil taken out of the ground in this country.

I point out that while the Americans are striving to change their position from one of dependency on foreign oil to one of self-sufficiency, Canada appears to be drifting from a position of self-sufficiency to one of foreign dependency on oil. President Ford hopes to lead the United States to self-sufficiency in oil production by 1980. The Prime Minister of Canada appears to be willing to allow our country to become dependent on foreign oil by 1982. The American plan, named "Project Independence", anticipates that through better conservation measures and the development of as yet untapped oil reserves, the United States will be able to switch from being a net importer to being a net exporter of oil.

What is happening in this country? Last Friday the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) outlined an entirely different future for Canada. He released a pessimistic National Energy Board report which says that Canada will not have enough oil for domestic purposes in 7.3 years, and that we shall become dependent on oil imports in the relatively near future. Within eight months the present government has changed its position dramatically on this question. When appearing before the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works last March, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. when referring to oil, stated:

● (1710)

We can see a ten-year supply, a ten-year period during which the supply will be adequate to meet the Canadian demand.

A year earlier he said:

For another decade or longer we could continue to meet export commitments and to meet the growth of the Canadian market.

In the energy department's policy for Canada published in 1973, a 15-year reserve of oil was referred to constantly. It was pointed out that these figures did not include the oil sands reserves or northern reserves. In the space of less than a year, what has happened to Canada's oil reserves? Did they leak away? Did someone kick a hole in our oil barrel? I suggest the answer is no. We have a government that acts in strange ways. There may have been a mistake in calculations, but I do not believe it is that. I believe the government has taken its present stance with regard to oil for five deliberate reasons. First, the government plans to increase the price of oil from $6.50 a barrel to $8.50 or more. How can you suggest such an increase, however, without first claiming oil is in short supply? The industry has stated higher prices are needed before oil exploration can continue, so it is higher prices we are going to get. That will mean seven or eight cents more for a gallon of gasoline.

Second, Canada would like to cut back on oil exports to the United States. It is certainly easier to explain the cutback if you can first say to the Americas, "Honest fellows, we are running out of oil ourselves. We would like to help, but you know how it is". Third, the government intends to launch their new Crown corporation—they love Crown corporations—which will be known as PetroCan. It will be active in the oil exploration field. It can better be justified by stressing that oil reserves are low and the new state-run corporation will be needed to find new oil. On that point I would say "balderdash". PetroCan will not start to solve any oil reserve problems in Canada in a meaningful way.

Fourth, this government has done virtually nothing to encourage conservation in this country. They have not instituted a program other than the petty little $1 million advertising program that they recently suggested. They have not instituted a program to grapple with the fact we are misusing much of our energy resources in this country. I believe the present stance with respect to reserves is to get the public ready for some type of program of conservation. The government wants to dissuade the public from the belief there is virtually unlimited wealth in resource energy in this country. In short, in order to have a more effective energy conservation program I believe they are suggesting we have to talk scarcity.

The fifth reason is that previous oil reserve estimates anticipated that exploration would continue to produce new oil finds roughly equal to our annual consumption of oil and gas resources. For the past year, however, with government indecision and quarrelling with the industry and the producing provinces, the drilling rigs have commenced to pull out of our oil-fields. Little new oil has been found and the authorities are at last getting alarmed. Hence the gloomier picture.

It is unfortunate that we in Canada, with so many natural assets and with such great resources, have to be ruled by a government which is in a position of allowing the country to not properly manage the resources at our disposal. We do not have to become dependent on foreign oil imports. If we do, there is only one government in this country and one association that is to blame; that is the Trudeau, Liberal government which has ruled this country indecisively since 1968.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I now wish to touch on a second awkward point in this budget, the question of housing. As hon. members know, housing starts in this country are dropping dramatically. We have a new Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson). When confronted with that statement, he said, "Well maybe the forecasters say that housing starts are dropping, but it is my job to prove the forecasters wrong." I hope the minister will start on his program and soon prove the forecasters wrong. We have not seen anything in the form of legislation from that minister, nor in this budget, that would lead any forecaster to doubt his previous forecast of disaster for the Canadian housing industry.

Take the $500 gimmick to home owners. I sometimes believe that government projects rarely sound better than when they are first announced. Do you remember, during the election campaign, the promise of $500 for each and every home buyer, made by the Prime Minister? Many felt it sounded pretty good. True, with house prices soaring, some wondered if $500 would even cover one month's inflation. However, most agreed something was better than nothing. It now appears that what the government had in mind was closer to nothing than something.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: The Minister of State for Urban Affairs announced earlier this month, and reiterated today, that the scheme would begin as of November 1, but there were conditions: the $500 would be available to first time buyers only; it could only be received if you bought a new house. In my constituency a house would have to sell for less than $44,915. With the average price of a single-family home in Newmarket now $52,318, and in Aurora $51,060, it is not likely the government will be sending many $500 cheques to that area. In fact, it is not likely they will be sending many cheques anywhere. Based on the minister's own estimate of the cost of the grants this year—$2 million—it would appear that throughout the nation less than one buyer in 200 will be eligible for the grants. That is what you call getting maximum publicity mileage out of a minimum effort.

There is an aspect of housing that is perhaps being overlooked. There is a regional disparity in this country that is not being dealt with by the present government. I am referring to the fact that a person in Toronto needs a 40 per cent higher income to buy a home than does a resident of Montreal. For example, in Ontario the average price of a single-family house is $46,899. In Quebec it is $32,600. Yet the average income in Ontario in 1972 was $6,690, while the average Quebec income was $6,286, only some $400 less. To date, however, the government has treated this problem as a national one. It has not acknowledged that if $500 is worth anything, one needs more than $500 in the Toronto area in order to help a Toronto man to buy a house comparable to one in Montreal. Prices have got out of line, yet this aspect of the matter has not been recognized or dealt with.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for giving me the opportunity to participate in this important debate on the budget.

It has been several years, 16 to be exact, since the member for Charlevoix addressed his hon. colleagues from this side of the House. I would like to take this opportunity offered by this first speech I have the honour to make today, Mr. Speaker, to thank the people of my riding who put their confidence in me during the last election. The return of Charlevoix to the Liberal party after 16 years means a lot to me because the mandate given to me is first of all to come and express in this House and to the government the needs of my riding, and also work within the Liberal government to establish across this country a just society for all Canadians. It is for the sake of that ideal that I was elected, Mr. Speaker, and that is what I intend to fight for beside the right hon. Prime Minister and his cabinet colleagues.

The budget introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) meets exactly that double mandate in the sense that, through various measures, it is first aimed at lessening the tax burden of those on low income, something which will allow us to help those in our society who are most vulnerable to the effects of inflation. Second, the budget is aimed at making all parts of Canada benefit from the particular resources which are sometimes the attribute of a single area.

As a member representing a riding experiencing an unfortunate rate of unemployment of about 25 per cent all year round, it will be easily understood that it was with some apprehension that I expected a budget that could have been little more than anti-inflationary. Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance had the wisdom and the courage not to listen to the prophets of evil and introduced an expansionary budget allowing the people in underprivileged areas of this country to look at the future with hope.

The economic slowness of underprivileged areas such as my riding is very often due to their remoteness from large centers. Because of this fact, the Speech from the Throne included a new transport policy for such remote areas, a policy enabling their people to live at the same pace as others in urban centres.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay special tribute to the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) who always worked for a united Canada, as is once more illustrated in this new transport policy. This policy is especially important for my constituency, where there is no regular air service within a 450 mile radius, and where train service is provided in a quarter only of the total Charlevoix area.

Mr. Speaker, I hope we will soon be in a position to reactivate Forestville et Saint-Irénée airports, which will allow people in Charlevoix to live at the same pace as those in urban centres and also to use services in those centres. Also in the field of transportation, it is important, Mr. Speaker that our ports along the St. Lawrence be maintained in operation. In addition to the traditional importance of these ports for our trade and tourist industry, it should be fully realized that Charlevoix has always depended on the St. Lawrence and that the use of its docks is a privilege we grew accustomed to.

We cannot speak of regional disparity without mentioning the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which since its inception has been the main factor in providing equal opportunities for all Canadians. I very firmly believe in the department's work. It will need increasingly bigger funds to meet the demands from all such Canadian areas that are not responsible for the inflation spiral or pressures on the economy, but that must of necessity bear the consequences. It is urgent in my opinion that the department, along with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, take steps in the nearest possible future to help create jobs in the tourist industry. This industry, the leading economic force in a number of Canadian areas, has an increasing need of government help to face the general cost increase. It should be treated in the same way as other industries. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, in that field and in most cases, they are small and medium businesses to which the government wish to give assistance.

For too long, Mr. Speaker, the riding of Charlevoix was considered, outside our area, as one of the most beautiful parts in the province of Quebec, reserved for the wealthy tourists who enjoy living in isolation during summer months.

Times have changed and people wish now that the touristic attractions in their riding be organized on an industrial basis which will allow them to work for decent wages and to participate also in the many advantages we find in Charlevoix, advantages which were reserved until recently to a small minority.

Located between two very active economic poles, that is the Quebec City area and the Baie-Comeau-Hauterive area, the riding of Charlevoix does not benefit at all from those two centres of attraction. Inside our own territory, our future must be based on agricultural and touristic development, on the development of forest resources and of our maritime location.

In my riding, people live on a very low scale. The great national problem which we now have to face is the fact that this country still has underprivileged people, underdeveloped areas and Canadians who are unable to get their share of the resources and benefits it offers. That is why, Mr. Speaker, the budget proposed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) should have favoured an expanding economy in order to come to the help of those Canadians who have a right to pass the poverty point.

As I mentioned earlier, Mr. Speaker, I believe, and I know that my colleagues hold the same view, that it is for the achievement of this single purpose, that I have been sent to Parliament. It is rather significant that a majority government should have been elected in this time of alarming economic troubles. We have been given a clear mandate, which is governing this country for the well-being of all Canadians.

When we look to the future, we cannot help thinking that governments have to interfere in economics, social and international policy, and they will have to do so more and more in the future.

Mr. Speaker, we must stop worrying about the terms used to describe the government's action, we must not engage in vain debates whether we are too socialist, capitalist or centralist, or not enough. We must take advantage of the years when we are in power to put forward economic and social measures whose only aim will be the well-being of Canadians. This is exactly what the budget proposed by the Minister of Finance intends to do.

● (1730)

[English]

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, much has been said in this debate by my leader, and by my colleagues from other provinces, concerning the disallowance by this Liberal government of royalties and other provincial taxes as deductions in computing taxable income. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) referred to the tradition involved in allowing these deductions in the past, but he hides behind the complexity and variety of the provincial claims. In doing this he completely ignores the constitutional rights of the provinces given under the British North America Act. The government is trying to make a scapegoat of Alberta in order to hide its all-out financial war against the provinces.

Little has been said about the effects of this policy on my own province of British Columbia. This is probably because of the absence of our premier in Tokyo. However, his resources minister said the federal government move was an obvious and deliberate invasion of provincial fields of revenue. British Columbia's mining industry, which is also involved with non-renewable resources, has been hard hit, and much of its direction has been forced out of Canada. Even renewable-resource industries, such as forestry—which is striving for a sustained-yield position—will be greatly concerned by the government's decision to disallow the deduction of provincial taxes.

The obvious intention of the government is the total disallowance of all provincial levies. Already the minister has indicated that the Ontario land speculation tax is non-deductible, and every Canadian businessman must now wonder when some provincial or municipal tax that he pays will become a non-deductible expense in the view of this government. Even some normal business expenses such as advertising were disallowed when the expenditures were for space in foreign periodicals. The failure to resolve this issue only reinforces the impression that the government continues to offer stop-gap legislation.

The most startling thing about the budget is that it makes no attempt whatever to wrestle with the problem of inflation, and yet it is itself inflationary. It predicts higher government expenses and calls only for a rate of growth of government expenses lower than that of recent years. Referring to the minister's estimated reduction in total financial requirements from $2 billion to $1 billion because of the effects of higher-than-expected inflation, the Globe and Mail was moved to observe that "the government has been the big inflation winner."

This view is consistent with that expressed by the Honourable J. V. Clyne, a prominent British Columbia industrialist, who said during this year's election campaign that the Trudeau government had totally abandoned any idea of curbing inflation in favour of seeking votes. He cited this government as the worst contributor to inflation, and referred to the increase of 140 per cent in government spending over the past six years.

Looking into the budget we can see that it treats a few of the symptoms of inflation. There are a few tax cuts for individuals fortunate enough to have taxable incomes, and there are added exemptions for pensioners. The minister proudly states that a married wage-earner with two children will pay no federal tax in 1975 unless his income exceeds $5,871. If his income does not exceed $5,871 he will be starving, Mr. Speaker. Other than the indexing provisions of 1973, the only benefit available in 1974 to the working poor is a $50 increase in the minimum cut in personal income taxes, which does not even begin to cover their loss by added inflation since indexing began.

Now let us look at some of the income tax changes and how they affect other taxpayers. Compared to the married wage earner with two children who pays no federal tax on his $5,871, the minister tells us the married pensioner-couple can earn $8,258 before paying any federal tax. Of course, the minister will not help them receive that much. They would have to have a substantial private pension plan and over $10,000 in Canada savings bonds or other security in order to obtain the maximum benefit from the minister's offer. This is just another empty offer by the government to those pensioners who are struggling to exist and cannot afford to take advantage of it.

But here is the big gainer, Mr. Speaker,—the non-typical couple who are both employed. Let us say they both take a $1,000 home ownership savings plan exemption, and both use the $1,000 interest deduction, and both have a maximum deduction under a registered retirement savings plan. This charming couple will receive exemptions of $16,000 and, in addition, will be eligible for tax cuts of up to $750 in 1975.

We should not be misled by the minister's reference to the fact that no federal tax is payable by the sample wage-earner or pensioner. Even these individuals will pay a significant amount of provincial income tax that this government will collect from them on the regular tax form.

I recall that nearly two years ago in my maiden speech in the then budget debate I suggested the total removal of personal income taxes and the substitution of a consumption tax. The government laughed, but I would like to quote briefly from my speech, as reported at page 1708 of Hansard for February 27, 1973:

> There is also a precedent for this idea in this country. Already the government allows individuals to save up to $4,000 per annum tax free in a registered retirement savings plan. This money is taxed when it is taken out of the plan and spent, usually after the taxpayer has retired. Look at the effect of this idea on a young family starting out—and much is said about the difficulties facing them. At present, two young people working side by side to make a start for their family are forced to pay a vast portion of their income in tax, even though their consumer expenditures are very low. My suggestion would allow them to get a boost by paying a tax only on the amount they spend. Similarly, those on low incomes would pay little in tax, and high-living Canadians would pay their fair share based on their high expenditures.

This government by its registered home ownership savings plan has taken another step toward my suggested goal, and I suppose I should feel grateful. And I would be, if the minister did not continue to permit so many glaring inequities to persist in our tax system.

We can see another example of the government's bungling in its attempt to solve the housing problem of Canadians. The government has reduced the sales tax on building materials—something Progressive Conservatives have long advocated—from 12 per cent to 5 per cent, providing a good saving on an average house, but leaving about $500 in sales taxes payable.

In the meantime, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) has announced that he will give purchasers of new, moderately priced homes a $500 grant. Now, of course, this is just another empty offer because of the lack of new homes in the price ranges given. But, Mr. Speaker, the government has retained all of the bureaucracy of the sales tax department, and you can be sure that it costs just as much to collect a 5 per cent sales tax as it does one of 12 per cent, and it will create a whole new bureaucracy to administer the $500 grants. The net effect to the purchaser would be the same if the 12 per cent tax were wiped out entirely, and we would eliminate a double bureaucracy.

This housing minister's predecessor was horrified last session when I said the government should get out of housing. My views were echoed only two months ago by the Vancouver Province newspaper, which said:

... our housing difficulties, particularly in the rental field, compose a classic case of problem creation by government.

It continued:

We did not begin to experience real rental shortages in this country until the federal government removed the tax incentives that channeled a lot of private money into rental accommodation.

Finally, the badly needed incentive to entice high-income Canadians to invest in housing has been restored, if only for 13½ months. Of course the government needs the private sector to solve the housing problem, and has shown repeatedly that government-provided housing is unacceptable or unavailable to those people the government says it wants to help. But, typically, the government's plans to help the needy must fail because the really needy cannot afford to take advantage of the plans offered.

● (1740)

Many of the factors in the high cost of housing can be traced to the action of some level of government. For example, not too long ago municipal governments used to approve sub-divisions with gravel roads, septic tanks and drainage ditches. Improvements were put in gradually and paid for over decades through local improvement taxes. Now they require pavement, curbs, underground wiring, street lights, storm and sanitary sewers before the first house is occupied. The municipalities were saved, but the purchaser had all these costs added to the purchase price of his new house. Today delays of two years in obtaining all approvals are common, and this can add 25 per cent or more to the cost of raw land in a subdivision.

[Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra).]

This government did its share in escalating housing prices. For example, CMHC refused to lend on non-sewered lots. The government's inflation has caused interest rates to skyrocket, which magnifies borrowing costs for housing in an incredible fashion. A typical 7 per cent mortgage for $40,000 carries monthly payments totalling $84,000 over the term, but a 12 per cent mortgage of the same amount requires payments of $124,000, a $40,000 increase.

If one doubts that inflation is a factor in interest rates I should remind hon. members that the Liberal government sold 3 per cent perpetual bonds in 1936. These bonds are still outstanding and worth about one third of their face value in 1936-dollars, or about 10 per cent in terms of purchasing power. This year the government sold Canada Saving Bonds at 9¾ per cent, and these carry an immediate cash redemption guarantee.

Bond yields offer an interesting aside here, Mr. Speaker. The minister, early in his budget speech, referred to the increase in the average yield of outstanding Canada Savings Bonds, which is now 10½ per cent if held to maturity. No mention was made of the yield on marketable government bonds maturing after 1980, with rates that vary from 4½ per cent to 6¾ per cent and with present market values ranging from $69 to $81 for a $100 bond. No, the minister would only adjust interest rates when it was to his government's advantage. In order to stop the flood of redemptions on Canada Savings Bonds he had to increase their yields. But the poor holder of the marketable bonds has to suffer the effects of the government's inflation policies right up to the maturity date of the bonds he bought in good faith.

Holders of Canadian government annuities find they too are locked into long-term agreements at rates of 4 per cent, and they, along with the holders of the 3 per cent perpetual bonds, are having their pleas for justice turned aside. When it suits the government the minister claims sanctity of contract, to the detriment of patriotic Canadians who loaned their money to the government. Truly the government has been the big inflation winner.

Before the increase in yields on Canada Savings Bonds was found necessary the minister told an annuity holder that an increase in annuity yields would require "a tax increase for all taxpayers to subsidize a minority of Canadians who are holders of government annuities". In the same letter he said:

Certainly, if any action of this nature were to be contemplated, it seems to me it could hardly be restricted to government annuities, and not extend to holders of government bonds.

Now this highly-principled government has done a complete about-face and given special consideration to the holders of some government bonds, but no consideration to annuity holders and holders of other government bonds. It reminds me of the government spokesman who, in reference to the principles involved in resource taxation, said that the federal government had backed down halfway on its principles and that the provinces should do likewise. That is so typical of members of this government. They do not realize that if a principle is involved it should be worth defending, and there is no backing down.

Let me return to the contribution the government has made to the high cost of housing. Naturally an investor faced with 10 per cent inflation cannot lend his money out at less than the rate of inflation plus a return on investment. A few months ago G. Arnold Hart, Chairman of the Bank of Montreal, said savings would have to yield 17 per cent for the average taxpayer to get ahead of inflation which is running at an annual rate of 10 per cent or more.

Governments speak of speculator profits, and say government land banks are necessary. Speculators will not make profits if there is no demand. The increased value of land only reflects the demand for it at any given time. For example, today houses in Ottawa are selling for less than they did last spring. Demand is off because of high interest costs, lack of mortgage funds and other reasons. So what does the government decide? It decides to add to the existing demand for raw land the pressure of government bids for its land bank. The government will have to outbid all other potential buyers.

Inflation again is a factor in higher constructions costs. The government's inflationary policies force all workers to seek not only increases to keep up, but create an anxiety in people and a loss of confidence which forces them to seek gains to cover future inflation. The construction industry is highly organized and very powerful, and its workers are therefore able to obtain top wage increases not available to all home buyers.

Now the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) say they can do nothing about inflation. They talk about imported inflation. I would refer these gentlemen to the "Bank of Canada Review" where they will see that the export price index increased 37 per cent in the year to April, 1974, whereas the import price index increased only 26 per cent in the same period. The conclusion one can draw from this is that our prices are rising at a substantially higher rate than those of our trading partners.

While our government is saying nothing can or needs to be done by Canada, the British government told a NATO meeting this month, in London, that the prized possession of freedom and security were at risk if the evils of recession and inflation were not controlled.

The government says it is trying to help the poor, and points to its generous programs to help the needy. But the government's over-all policies on inflation and taxation are eliminating the benefits for the poor and the elderly, and are making these Canadians more dependent than ever upon the very government that continues to say it wants to make these people more independent.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have spoken in the House of Commons and, in all humility, I must confess it is one of the proudest moments of my life, including my pride at having my family here today. My one regret is that my son is not here to share in this, the highlight of my public career.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parent: I congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, and your associates, not only because you have been chosen by your colleagues to preside over our debates and deliberations, but also on the stand you took last November 5, when the duties, responsibilities and privileges of the Speaker of the House were reiterated and reaffirmed.

The Budget—Mr. Parent

For some weeks now I have been weighing which items I should include in my initial address to the House. It is understood that I will comment on the budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) on November 18. But more than that, I wanted to set forth guidelines for myself as a member of parliament, having regard to my constituency of St. Catharines, our beloved country, and to our role in the international community of nations.

The city of St. Catharines is set in the richest countryside and most inviting climate in central Canada. It is just about the right size, with about 114,000 people. It is big enough to support excellent elementary and secondary schools and a university. I have had the pleasure of teaching in three secondary schools in the city, and also of serving as a school board trustee for the schools in the county. Both these experiences were rewarding and interesting.

St. Catharines has five libraries, well staffed and well equipped medical facilities, and enough variety of activity and personality to ensure continued interest. It is near enough to several large cities such as Toronto and Hamilton to provide a change, if you so desire.

● (1750)

St. Catharines is an historic town with United Empire Loyalist origins and sturdy, happy, productive ethnic groups. Each year our folk arts festival attracts thousands of participants and visitors. In June, 1974, over 28 ethnic groups took part in the festivities. In all modesty, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that St. Catharines is a microcosm of Canada and we are proving daily that people from various cultural backgrounds can and do live in harmony. It is called 'The Garden City,' and with just reason. It has more parks per capita than any other city its size in Canada.

Employment is high in the plants and shipyards within the city limits. New construction as well as three new industrial developments are likely to mean continued prosperity. It should be noted that with 1975 designated as the year for women—and my able colleague from Trinity commented on the status of women yesterday—there is no job discrimination and women's groups in St. Catharines are respected and well accepted. St. Catharines is an easy going town—perhaps due to the climate, or perhaps it is the friendliness of the people there. The city nestles in the shelter of the Niagara escarpment. One of my continuing delights is to look out of my dining room window and savour the beauty of the escarpment.

The largest employers in the area are the automobile factories, the paper companies, the metal fabricators, and the food processors, including the wineries. It has been estimated that 80 per cent of Canadian wine comes from the vineyards of the Niagara Peninsula. My colleague, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Andres), can attest to that. These wines are the pride of Canada. The Niagara Grape and Wine Festival held toward the end of September attracted over a million visitors to St. Catharines, and we helped in fostering favourable international understanding by welcoming the citizens of our twin city in the West Indies.

One of the strongest influences in recent years was the establishment in 1964 of Brock University. The city vibrates to the pulse of young academics. A few weeks ago

I had occasion to visit Brock, and from the Tower the view of St. Catharines is breathtaking. The theatre is alive and well at Brock. We have a symphony orchestra which is the envy of southern Ontario. Athletics compliment the academic flavour and the two live side by side, encouraging physical fitness and scholastic excellence. Our prowess in lacrosse is legendary.

In 1970 we hosted the world rowing championships. Our Royal Henley course is the finest natural rowing course in Eastern Canada. Each year over 3,000 young men and young women use these facilities and we are now fielding crews who are competitive internationally. It should be noted that crews from all over the North American continent compete yearly at the Royal Henley.

It is incumbent upon me, Mr. Speaker, to see to it that the views and the opinions, as well as the problems of the citizens of St. Catharines, are articulated in the national councils of government. Conversely, it is my responsibility to ensure that our people are kept informed of the development in the House of Commons. To this end, I have inaugurated a plan whereby I can report directly to my constituents by radio via talk shows and interviews, by newspaper, and by sending out at least four newsletters per year.

It is my duty to communicate with the inhabitants of St. Catharines by attending the various cultural and organizational functions which take place. It is my pleasure to trumpet the achievements and accomplishments of our city and its citizens.

In order to be conversant with the legislation and regulations which affect our citizens in St. Catharines, I have asked for and been appointed to the following important standing committees of the House of Commons—Labour, Manpower and Immigration, and Veterans Affairs.

Since the House opened on September 30 the Standing Committee on Labour was instrumental in settling the West Coast grainhandlers' dispute, the sub-committee on manpower has presented legislation for parliament's consideration, and the sub-committee on immigration has moved to make our immigration policy flexible enough to admit over 200,000 immigrants each year while also permitting us to select those people who have specific talents which are in short supply in Canada. On November 6 the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs updated the Veterans Act to make it an instrument more responsible to the needs of our veterans.

The budget that parliament is debating is, in its approach to the country's economic problems, one of the most important in many years. To describe it as a re-run of the May 6 production with new sub-titles hardly does it justice. The Minister of Finance has reworked it from his earlier presentation by ameliorating the crunch of the oil and gas industry and by lessening the confrontation between Ottawa and Edmonton over resource revenues.

Most important, however, he reworked it in light of domestic and world economic conditions and prospects that have changed since May 6. He reworked it against a backdrop of recession fears in the United States, Japan and Europe, where Canada sells most of its exports. As a result the budget is a careful selection of policies which, in large measure, are designed to soften the impact of declining foreign demand for Canadian goods and services.

After a government is elected with a solid majority, as this government was last July, one would normally expect tax increases and government spending programs reflecting election promises. Instead it has proposed to reduce taxes, to curb government spending and to implement election promises only when they contribute to the objective of strengthening the country's ability to withstand economic assault, be it inflation or recession.

This is sound economics. Many persons have been advocating government economy and tax cuts for the last two years and more, the latter particularly so that people would have more take-home pay in order that they could buy more and thus create incentive for industry to hire unemployed workers. Now it has been concluded that the time is opportune for this approach, so the domestic market can take up any incipient slack, or part thereof, in the country's industrial infrastructure.

The Minister of Finance was not unduly pessimistic last Monday evening. He mentioned the word recession only twice; once a nod to the risk, and later a reference to the gathering forces of recession throughout the world. But he admitted that the outlook for the Canadian economy is less bright than in May, that signs of slowing down have appeared, and that tariff protectionism and payments problems abroad are causing weakness in foreign demand for our exports. In proposing tax cuts, he said there is need to sustain the growth of purchasing power over the period ahead.

I note that it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker. I could finish my comments after the break. I require about a minute and a half more.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we extend the time enough that the hon. member might finish his speech, and then enjoy his dinner with his family.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The House has heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Parent: I thank my colleagues, Mr. Speaker. The budget gets rid of some of the aggravations of tax returns, as by limited exemption of interest and pension income from taxation. It is also strongly humanitarian, as when it proposes limited tax exemption of private pensions, transfer of tax credits to spouses, aid for those who want but cannot afford houses, and more aid for the handicapped. These proposals tend to cut the ground out from under those who argue that our liberalism is spelled only with a capital L.

The proposal to put higher taxes on heavy cars makes sense when you consider the need to conserve domestic oil resources. So does the corporate surtax, and higher taxes on alcohol and tobacco. The costs of government are at an all time high, and rising under the influences of inflation and swollen equalization payments to the provinces.

I have been asked many times what my reaction is to being in the House of Commons. I must confess, Mr.

Speaker, that the first time I was ever in the House was as a sitting member. At first I was awestricken; now I am only slightly confused by the procedures. But I hasten to add that I have no doubt as to my role as a member of parliament in this House, this crucible of democracy in Canada. I am sobered by my responsibilities and duties.

As a supporter of the government in power, I am expected to criticize constructively government policy and to offer my own opinions and ideas. It is true that I am not as vocally prominent in the House as my colleagues who form the opposition, but my reticence does not extend to our regional or national caucuses. I am a Liberal by choice. I choose to be a member of the Liberal party because it satisfies my own personal beliefs, and I believe it encompasses the hopes and aspirations of the majority of Canadians. This was borne out by the results of the July 8 election.

Canada is part of the international community of nations and it readily embraces this most important role. For years our peacekeeping forces have spread our reputation as a nation which is strong, understanding, fair minded and decisive.

[Translation]

The prophecy made by Victor Hugo at the Paris Peace Conference held in 1849 comes to my mind. Here is its most celebrated excerpt: "A day will come when war will seem absurd, a day will come when there will be no battlefields other than markets open to trade and minds open to ideas. A day will come where cannonballs and bombs will be replaced by votes and universal suffrage throughout the nations. A day will come when cannons will be shown in museums just as intruments of torture are being shown today. A day will come when we will see two huge groups, the United States of America, North America and South America, standing face to face, with the United States of Europe extending hands across the seas and exchanging their goods, their trade, their industries, their arts and their genius."

Mr. Speaker, to my mind, that day has come.

[English]

I look forward to the months and the years ahead during which I will be sharing in the decisions of this superb legislative body. It is quite probable that the awe of my first days will be replaced by a reverence which is reserved for quasi religious bodies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. It being after 6 p.m., I do now leave the Chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6.05 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, may I say what a great pleasure it is for me to join other hon. members of the House in the debate on the budget. Before

I begin my remarks may I congratulate the freshman member from southwestern Ontario, my neighbour, the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday). It is clear from his fine performance in the House this afternoon that he will continue to represent that old riding in Ontario, Oxford, in the very fine manner in which it was represented for 21 years by the late Wally Nesbitt.

I sat quietly and listened attentively on budget night while the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) delivered his 18,000-word document. The minister has acquired the ability to make a good presentation in this House, and elsewhere for that matter, regardless of the merit or content of that presentation, be it good, bad or indifferent; I sincerely extend that courtesy to him personally and regret that he is not present to hear my remarks. The budget is unique inasmuch as the foreword, preamble, observations, international scanning and comparisons make up the bulk of the text. The actual changes and adjustments are dealt with like passing flashes in the night. Descriptions of his address are many and varied. Some describe it as a consumer budget; others simply as a bad example. Some see it as a tightrope walk or a rerun of something old, something new.

I do not want to reject the budget outright, Madam Speaker, for some of its proposals, as far as they go, are both necessary and welcome. The reduction of the sales tax to 5 per cent from 11 per cent and 12 per cent on building and construction materials, the larger exemptions for pensioners, the allowance for interest and incomes from private pension plans, are meagre measures but ones well received and indeed desired by individuals. The removal of sales tax on heavy trucks and municipal water system materials and equipment will represent a degree of savings to our municipal governments which, with their limited tax base, are experiencing real financial difficulties.

We must ask ourselves this: how effective will these budget proposals really be? Does this budget do enough for business interests? Will the budget really cut into inflation, or will it even cool the inflationary expectations so prominent both internationally and domestically? In view of the government's past record and performance in this regard, I must say, Madam Speaker, that it is most difficult to share the minister's optimism. He indicates that he is striving to get the rate of inflation down below the double digit level. Hopefully, he is more adept at striving than the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is at wrestling.

It is obvious that, with the introduction of this budget, the government has chosen to continue its high wire dance rather than move ahead with any real authority in order to cope with record high inflation and the increasing cost of goods and services. We acknowledge the fact that inflation is present internationally, and that we are somewhat limited in this area. We are limited in our ability to control the cost of imported goods, but we also should be prepared to acknowledge that a larger inflation percentage than perhaps the minister is willing to admit is related to our own domestic situation in connection with goods and services.

The decision rests in the hands of the minister. He has chosen again not to act, and Canadians and Canadian businessmen are forced to tread water until some time in the future. We hope they will survive and not drown in the process. Yes, the strong and the rich will survive; many of the others, unfortunately, will endure further hardship.

It is almost unbelievable that absolutely no measures for agriculture were contained in the budget. This government that avows a policy to increase production seems quite content and satisfied to let milk producers sell their product at or below the cost of production. It seems satisfied to let beef producers sell their product at 40 cents per pound while the cost of production is recognized to be 60 cents; it does not take into account beef cow prices at 10 cents to 15 cents.

The budget contains no tax concessions whatsoever to producers of food products. I ask the minister, where, in his 18,000-word document, will I tell producers to find the item to encourage them to continue in business and, indeed, to increase their production? I am aware of one item involving a tax increase. The minister has told tobacco producers in southwestern Ontario that they will once again have to shoulder an extra tax burden. This is not the first occasion, of course, when these producers have been called upon to bear extra costs. Too often they have received political wipings from this government.

The budget does little to assist small businessmen or to dispel their concerns over lack of capital. An article in the Financial Post of November 23, 1974, entitled "Small Firm Necks in Tight Credit Noose" and written by Roger Worth clearly and accurately describes the near drastic plight of small business. Mr. Worth indicates that Canada's small businessmen are turning to leasing companies, factoring firms and even finance companies in attempts to beat a major cash crunch. Tight credit rules and cash shortages force small operators to pay suppliers on a cash on delivery basis rather than the usual 30, 60 or 90-day terms. Proof of this situation was indicated when a finance company manager made it known that loans to small businessmen and entrepreneurs were on the upswing. He indicated that his company was getting good credit risks who were paying between 16 per cent and 24 per cent for money because they had reached their credit limits at the banks. This is certainly not a healthy situation.

This sector of which I have been speaking, Madam Speaker, forms the backbone of our economy. This sector is responsible for providing stability to our economy and social well-being to our lives. It is also vitally important in that it employs approximately 60 per cent of our labour force, and these people are not protected by large unions who can look out for their interest. Seldom are they protected by labour contracts and cost of living benefits, or "COLA" clauses.

It must be recognized that some business ventures are extremely risky; others are doomed to failure. On the other hand, our large, progressive and sound operations of today in most cases experienced small, perhaps somewhat uncertain and shaky beginnings. The lack of working capital is a serious problem and the budget does nothing to help remedy the situation. The lack of adequate mortgage money, and record high interest rates combined with inflated prices, have played havoc with residential development and home construction at a time when our housing needs have never been greater.

[Mr. Wise.]

• (2010)

Canadians have witnessed a slump in housing starts ranging from 20 to 30 per cent. Ad hoc programs have no doubt assisted in a small way, but have fallen far short of the needs of Canadians.

With regard to the $500 grant for first time buyers of new homes, a measure contained in the May budget and introduced by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) a short time ago, how effective can this measure be when it is estimated that only one purchaser out of 200 will qualify? Surely the Minister of State for Urban Affairs must be less than enthusiastic about this program. I suggest this program would be greatly improved if buyers of older homes could also qualify for this grant.

The real problem in the supply and demand aspect of the housing industry is caused by high interest rates and a critical shortage of mortgage money. Until these are modified it is difficult to imagine any substantial improvement or real progress being made.

I want to say a few words concerning the minister's heralded tax cuts. The minister's contention that income earners keep his new tax cuts in mind when forming their wage demands is nothing but whistling in the dark. The year 1975 will no doubt see an unprecedented string of strikes, both legal and illegal, accompanied by excessive wage demands and excessive inflationary settlements.

Labour leaders, because of spiralling unchecked inflation, are forced to make demands according to what they think the cost of living will be in the coming years, and their estimates are invariably extremely high. This is no great wonder considering that the government does little to ease the fears or increase the confidence of these wage earners who cannot be blamed for looking out for their own interests.

To repeat as I began, the budget is not all bad. Some of its provisions are welcomed. Its failure lies in the fact that it does not go nearly far enough and that it involves a little too much hoping, and perhaps even praying, than it does concrete changes in economic policy that will help us to cope and effectively deal with the inflationary pressures ahead.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in the debate on this particular budget in view of its interesting and rather unusual history, as a budget which in large part was put before the House on an early day in May. Although it was received with a great deal of acclaim in many parts of the country, it was less well received by the House in the mood it was in at that particular moment. It is a budget which was defeated in the House of Commons but sustained by the electorate in Canada. Therefore it is basically put before the House of Commons again with the endorsement of the best possible kind.

Having had a budget sustained by the electorate in this fashion, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) found it possible to put before the House, notwithstanding that, some significant improvements in the budget and its overall approach. One or two of these, like the change in the reduction of the sales tax in housing, were as a result of a change in the circumstances. This led the minister to conclude quite rightly that what would have been wrong to do, in a time of extreme demand upon housing and an all-out construction program, as existed only half a year ago, was in fact right in circumstances when the housing industry had slowed and where an encouragement to purchase was in fact desirable.

The budget, after the election, also showed the impressive fact that whether winning or losing, it is possible to obtain certain messages from the electorate. I think we understood the general concern of the country about restraint in government spending as a major kind of approach. In a rather different area, the improvement in the position of persons on private pension reflected the continued concern of the government, a concern reinforced by discussions and contact with people throughout the campaign.

In the way in which the government can, we have moved to put people on private pensions in a better position to protect themselves against the deterioration of the value of their pensions. We are allowing them a deduction on a certain part of their pension benefits. Where there is not a second income in the family and both pensioners are over 65, we are allowing them to claim the full over 65 special deduction against private pension earnings.

These are significant and important steps along the road to improving a budget which was already sufficiently good that it could be stood upon and campaigned upon successfully in the country.

In the budget as it stood in May there were also certain significant approaches and proposals with regard to the taxation of oil, gas and minerals. It is perhaps important to recall that these provisions were in the budget as it stood before the electorate on July 8.

In this particular budget, the Minister of Finance has made some changes in those proposals, but not changes in the basic principles which were seen as being important in the approach to taxation of oil and minerals in Canada and the approach between the provinces and the federal government in that regard. Tonight I want to particularly deal with these issues because they are seen, I think, rather wrongly today as being issues of particular or special concern to the west, Saskatchewan or Alberta in particular, and therefore to the area where I was born and which I represent.

In dealing with this issue, I wish to propose that we recognize there are three quite separate questions involved in the current dispute about the place of oil and gas taxation in particular. These three issues are, I suggest, first, the special question of the export tax or the price for oil in Canada. The second is the right to taxation, the proper constitutional position for the federal government as opposed to the provinces with regard to particular taxation or an approach to it. The third issue is the correct use of whatever constitutional power there may be in existence—in other words, the correct levels of taxation and the correct sharing arrangement between federal and provincial governments, having in mind the importance on occasion of at least a third share, the share of industry of individuals involved in carrying on activities.

I say that the export tax must be examined first because it frequently is brought forward in a confusing way by western premiers who try to deal with it as though it bore on the other two issues. The export tax issue is essentially a question of whether in Canada we have the right to determine what the price of a product such as oil ought to be, particularly when there is no free market price being set—when the price is being set by a cartel which, if we could exercise control over it, we would try to break up. If there were an international government perhaps we would be able to break up that cartel. But the point I should like the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) to consider is that we need not accept the cartel price in Canada, since we happen to be in a fortunate position. What is the right price for oil?

Mr. Horner: You should make it clear who is subsidizing whom.

Mr. Lang: It is not a question of who is subsidizing who. The question is, simply, what is the right price for oil? Would the wrong price be justifiable in these particular circumstances? We made a judgment, and it was a judgment agreed upon by ten provincial premiers assembled together, which in itself made it quite a remarkable agreement. The right elements to take into consideration when dealing with the proper price for oil are questions like the long term supply and demand situation, the question of alternative sources of energy, the fact that as oil becomes a scarcer commodity the higher price is reasonable to restrict use or abuse. These are all appropriate considerations when making a judgment. And judgment is not easy.

I do not say there is any magic attaching to a particular price, but that, it seems to me, is a separate issue. The determination of what is the right price for oil in Canada, regardless of the actions of the cartel formed by other countries, is a special question. I suggest it does not involve any question of outright subsidization of any one group by another. Rather, it represents a refusal to accept exorbitant profits being made by a particular group in Canada just because people like them elsewhere would go for a similar price.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You didn't move like that over rapeseed.

Mr. Lang: Well, we did, as a matter of fact. We moved with our export tax before the western provinces had even appreciated the problem.

Another matter which should be borne in mind, when trying to determine whether $6.50 was an appropriate price, is that one year or two years before that price was set when oil was priced at $3 or less, Alberta took the view that the more oil sold at that price the better. That was their approach just two or there years before. They may have been deadly wrong, but at least I put this forward as evidence.

The next question is the question of the right to tax, the question of the attitude of the federal government, when assessing its own taxes, toward what amount of taxation measures could be undertaken on the part of provinces or, in other words, whether it was right in theory to disregard royalties imposed by a particular province when determining what should be the level of a particular federal tax. It should be plain to anyone that in a federal state it would be altogether inappropriate for the federal government to take more in taxation from an industry in one province than it took from an industry of exactly the same kind in another province. This is essentially the principle which is involved.

To go further, how ridiculous it would be if the federal government were to take less from an industry in a particular province because the government of that province chose to take more from that industry as its own share. In other words, if we were to allow provincial taxation generally to be deducted before calculating federal tax we would be encouraging, practically forcing, provinces into the position of taxing at the highest possible level to make sure that the federal government got less. This could be put in another way. Indeed, it was evident from the actions of Alberta and Saskatchewan that it was the other way.

If there is a federal tax structure and an appropriate level of taxation to be imposed by the federal government on industry throughout the country, the provinces may be tempted to increase their levels of taxation if those are to be counted by way of subtraction. We saw this clearly in the way in which Alberta and Saskatchewan acted. Alberta introduced higher levels of royalties than had been contemplated. Royalties were taken not only from the increased profits of the companies but from the proportion of revenue which the federal government would have obtained from those companies.

Look at what happened in Saskatchewan. Royalty rates there were put up even higher. If these rates had not been treated as they were treated in the budget we are now considering, the people of Saskatchewan, through those higher royalty rates, would have obtained a higher share of the profits of the oil industry than those in Alberta, though the oil industry in Saskatchewan would have paid less to the federal treasury than the identical industry in Alberta. This is unacceptable from a federal viewpoint.

There are some who claim that this approach to the treatment of royalties may encourage provinces to consider the next step of actually socializing the industry. I have heard this said, but it is wrong for two reasons. First, the very spirit of what we are doing is against that proposition. Saskatchewan has already gone half way toward socializing the industry by applying its particular level of royalty. This approach is being discouraged rather than encouraged by our handling of this question.

Further, there seems to be an easy assumption that somehow or other we could not or would not tax a Crown corporation operating a business which otherwise would be taxed within a province. Let me say it is our considered opinion that we could indeed tax such a Crown corporation operating in any such field. The fact that we have not done so in the case of utilities like power and telephone concerns is not a sign of the lack of constitutional power to tax but, rather, reflects policy decisions made at the time.

Indeed, utilities may be in a special position anyway because they are quite commonly under government ownership or directly regulated so that their profit or return is very carefully controlled. I do not say this means we have to avoid taxing them in every case; I simply say it may be an explanation for the decisions which led to this conclusion as a matter of policy.

The point which I consider to be of importance is that we could indeed tax a Crown corporation within a province if it engaged in activity which otherwise we were taxing in other provinces. This should be accepted by everyone in the House who does not believe that our constitution was not specifically aimed at promoting socialism in the provinces. If it were otherwise, every step toward socializing an industry would remove that industry from the federal taxation scene and there would be a clear impetus toward socialization.

The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) may smile, and that is because he would like a constitution which was aimed in that direction, but I should like to think that members of the Conservative Party and, indeed, the premier of Alberta might think twice about approving a constitution which was biased toward socialism because of the nature of the tax structure. Our considered conclusion is that it is not so, either in fact or in law.

The real question is not the right to tax and the propriety of allowing the federal government to tax business without regard to taxes or royalties imposed by provincial governments, but rather what the appropriate level of the tax should be. That is the appropriate question.

Mr. Andre (Calgary Centre): Is that what you said at the meeting of the premiers?

Mr. Lang: Yes, Madam Speaker, we indicated quite clearly in advance of that conference that it would be necessary for us to protect ourselves in regard to our revenue against such action that the provinces might take.

Mr. Andre (Calgary Centre): That's not true!

• (2030)

Mr. Lang: I suggest that as far back as last January the federal government made clear its position that the key question was appropriate shares between the federal government, the provincial governments and industry. The argument about appropriate shares is, of course, practically as old as confederation itself. It is not our view that the industries in this country should be so throttled with taxation that they have no incentive to explore. It is not our view—though it is the view of the NDP government of Saskatchewan today—that it is appropriate to expropriate without compensation and take over industries, totally discouraging all development and private initiative. That is not our view. It is our view that we should have appropriate and fair shares, which is the kind of matter that we can discuss.

In recognition of this, in his budget in May the Minister of Finance indicated, even though for very logical reasons he had to move to the conclusion that royalties should be treated as non-deductible for purposes of federal taxation, that he would allow a higher level of abatement which, in effect, restored to the provinces an appropriate and decent share of the revenue that was available. After all, it was the provinces that took the first move in regard to taking most of the revenue that was available, and that also tried to move to take away not only the revenue from the companies but revenue from the federal government as well.

The question of what is the appropriate share is a question that needed discussion and that had discussion. In effect, the Minister of Finance said this. I did not think he needed to be of the opinion that he was taking too much in May of last year but, being the accommodating person he is, and in an accommodating government he said we would make some more revenue available to the companies and the provinces and hope that provinces, such as the province of Alberta, would agree to give more revenue to the industry so there would be incentive there for them to explore and develop resources. That is the approach that was taken.

Of course in the province of Saskatchewan—this should give the Conservative members opposite some cause for reflection—there is little likelihood of the NDP government being concerned to make any room at all for the companies. They are not concerned about the companies, or about development, private enterprise or private initiative. I hear the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) applauding the complete absence of private initiative in his province. I am glad to tell him that within a few short years we will be putting him back to private enterprise and initiative, and I have told him that before.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the minister but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, it is indeed a rare occasion when I follow the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang). Most of the debates in which he and I speak in this House are on wheat and related subjects. I will not tell the House now that I am not going to divorce myself from wheat on this occasion, but mostly when debate relates to those two subjects the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board waits in abeyance until I have spoken, and then attempts to answer the criticisms I have been able to level at him and his department.

I should like on this occasion to spend my entire 20 minutes criticizing the Minister's approach. All I can say to him and his fellow Saskatonians, both in this House and in Saskatchewan, is that I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) makes room for him after the next election in some university, such as McGill or Laval in Quebec. After this speech about taxing provincial corporations in the field of power, telephones and oil if necessary, and his attempt to disallow the Crownest freight rates, I really do not think there will be much room for him in Saskatchewan. I have often forecast—and I shall be there when it comes about—that I shall see Otto Lang tarred and feathered, and driven out of Saskatchewan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: The oil is too expensive these days, Jack.

Mr. Horner: I will pay for the oil, and I will pluck the chickens. That will be a little sacrifice that I will make for my beloved home province of Saskatchewan.

In his budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) dealt with the economy of Canada and compared it to the world economy. He suggests that Canada is on an inflationary cycle about which he can do nothing. He hesitates to slow it down because slower growth will mean slower growth.

An hon. Member: How about that!

Mr. Horner: If the House will allow me more than 20 minutes I can quote his exact words. One can find them on page 2 of the "Budget Highlights," where he says that world economies are weakening and that the world may well be in for a recession. He even suggests that the world may be in for a deep recession. One can gauge his words in that way and ask: what can we do about it?

The minister also adds on page 2 of his "Budget Highlights" that we are in need of massive growth in the production of food commodities and a number of other things. In the budget one looks for two indicators. First, the minister says the world is bound for a deep recession, and one looks for some indication that the Canadian economy will be protected so that Canadians feel this deep recession less than the rest of the world. Second, the minister stresses in his budget that the world is heading for a crisis in food production, and one asks what the budget can do to stimulate food production in Canada. Those, Madam Speaker, are the two highlights I took from his budget, and these are the two features of it to which I will direct my remarks this evening.

In trying to gauge the minister's political future at this time I ask myself what he is attempting to do in his budget. Is he trying to protect Canada by putting forward an expansionary budget, or is he trying to protect his own political future? It is for every member of the House to put forward his own views, and I have no doubt that the Minister of Finance will disagree with mine. He sees himself, one year from now, looking backwards and saying: "Well, I put forward an expansionary budget and we are in a deep recession. I did the best I could, so do not criticize the Minister of Finance".

Madam Speaker, you know the kind of political futures ministers of finance have in Canada. I am not suggesting that the minister's future is going to lead him to a higher role in Canadian political life, though he might think so in some of his inner reflections. But this is the main reason he has put forward an expansionary budget at this time.

Let me take him through one short and elementary lesson in economics. If you are headed for a recession and the finance minister of the country does not heed that recession and deal with it, then he only deepens the recession. This is the course that the minister is plotting for Canada today by putting forward an expansionary budget. He should really be cautioning all Canadians to produce more, save more, and spend less; but he is doing nothing of the kind.

Today the world is gripped by some kind of energy crisis. I have looked in the budget to see what it is going to do for Canadians in this respect. Is it going to encourage them to produce more energy in the form of hydro electric power, gas and oil, at less cost? I do not see anything in the budget that would encourage them in that way. Will it encourage Canadians to produce more food at less cost? I see no encouragement in the budget in that regard.

● (2040)

The budget has attempted to keep abreast with rapidly growing inflation. The Minister of Finance has given some recognition to escalating revenue in the federal treasury brought about by inflation, and has attempted to give some of this back to lower income groups. I do not deny the minister that fact, and certainly this is worthwhile if he acknowledges that he can in fact do nothing to apprehend the inflationary spiral that exists in Canada and other countries in the world.

What can the minister do at this particular time to offset the recession most Canadians and most world citizens believe we are heading for in the next year? The minister has suggested in the budget, and I could quote the page, that he expects a 4 per cent economic growth rate in Canada.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): After the budget.

Mr. Horner: The minister corrects me. After the budget he expects a growth rate of 4 per cent. He also said that he expects, after the budget, an increase in government expenditure of 16 per cent. One does not have to go past grade three or grade four, or to have an excellence in mathematics, to realize that a 16 per cent rate of growth in government expenditures and a 4 per cent growth rate in the economy constitute an inflationary complex.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is at about the grade nine level.

Mr. Horner: Can we believe the minister that the rate of government expenditure will be limited to 16 per cent? Let us look at the past record which shows that the rate of expenditure increased by 24 per cent. What gives us the idea that he will hold the line on this budget?

An hon. Member: He said so.

Mr. Horner: Somebody says "He said so", but we on this side of the House know that he does not have a close relationship with the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien), and that they are miles apart on many things. I am afraid we cannot believe him when he says that he and the President of the Treasury Board will hold the line on government expenditure. It is with sad heart that I say to this House that we have no confidence in the government which says it will hold the line on government expenditure. We know that a year ago government expenditure increased by 24 per cent. The Minister of Finance now is predicting a 16 per cent increase, and 4 per cent real growth in the economy, and that in itself is inflationary.

In Canada we have the ability to produce energy, and we have the ability to produce food. These are two commodities the world will be anxious to receive throughout the coming years. I have heard the Minister of Finance in this House and on television suggest to the country that the federal government receives only 8 per cent of the royalites being paid on oil and gas in Canada, and he cannot understand why the producing provinces, Saskatchewan and Alberta, condemn him for not allowing royalties as a tax exemption within those provinces. These royalties have been allowed as an exemption ever since confederation.

The minister is a lawyer and he has a great deal of legal assistance at hand, and there is nothing in the world to stop him from providing a clear and exact definition in respect of royalties if he finds that the provinces are finding loopholes. There is nothing to stop him or his department from laying down the exact meaning of a royalty which falls within his exemption category. If the provinces go beyond the boundary then the minister can say that he does not consider what they are attempting to exempt as a proper royalty.

The minister did not follow that course. He said that all royalties would be disallowed as tax exemptions within the federal government's jurisdiction. The minister has completely disallowed royalties paid to the province as tax exemption items for resource companies.

There has been much talk about the bleak future in respect of energy supplies, and I should like to deal with that for a few minutes, as well as with the National Energy Board report. I think I would be remiss if I did not point out at this time how Albertans feel about the way the minister is using them. The minister is using and abusing them.

I have in my hand a letter sent from a consulting firm in Calgary to an individual who wanted to purchase a small oil company in Saskatchewan. He wrote this consulting firm asking whether this would be a wise purchase. This involves a $2 million expenditure, and relates to 61 exploration and some producing wells. Let me just read the last paragraph of this letter which states:

> Alberta operators are not hit as hard by provincial royalties as are Saskatchewan operators; nonetheless, as a consultant I cannot in clear conscience recommend to you investing monies in Canadian oil and gas properties even though lack of private investment spells the end to my consulting practice.

That is like the old mother hen cutting off her own head. Mr. D. O. Bossort, the consultant, attached a financial statement for the month of October 1974 in respect of this oil company which shows that the federal export tax amounts to $76,344, and federal income tax amounts to $18,926.91, for a total federal tax of $95,270.91. It shows that the provincial tax and royalty of the same company amounted to $13,513.46, with a royalty surcharge of $30,994.23, for a total of $44,507.69, with a net after taxes of minus $344.86. It is no wonder the consulting firm did not advise this private Albertan Canadian citizen to buy into that small company in Saskatchewan.

I might add that this company had gross operating costs of $18,582.05 monthly, but by the time it paid federal taxes and provincial royalties it was operating in the red. This, as I say, is a $2 million enterprise. Government bonds represent a far better investment than oil and gas. This is a pure and simple example of that fact to all Canadians. I am prepared to put this whole letter on the record, or to send a copy of it to the Minister of Finance or anybody else who wants it. I suggest it is a prime example of why Canadians will not independently go out and buy up small companies or shares in multi-national corporations, because they are all losing money producing oil and gas.

The individual to whom I have referred has said that he plans to leave whatever oil and gas remains in the ground. Why should he bring it out when it costs him $344.86 a year to do so? Let me point out, for the benefit of Canadians all across the country, that wise Canadians are not putting their money in oil and gas, and wise Canadians who already have their money in oil and gas are leaving those resources in the ground because it does not pay them to take them out after paying the taxes this Minister of Finance has levied.

The Economic Council of Canada pointed out today that the domestic price of oil should be allowed to rise to the international level by 1977, otherwise Canadians will become dependent on foreign oil before the end of this decade. That is pretty simple, but did the minister say anything about that in his budget? I suggest that he said nothing like that.

What does the National Energy Board report say in respect of oil exploration? It tells us what we already knew. It states that voluntary conversion and reducing oil sales to the United States are trivial substitutes for finding and developing new Canadian oil. It says what I have said many times. I have said that we will be a net importer of oil by 1982. I said in this House, time and time again, that the pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal would be empty in six years. I said that on April 9, 1974. The National Energy Board report substantiates what I have been saying in this House and what Imperial Oil has been saying. What has the government done? It has gone on blindly.

The National Energy Board report further states:

> The lack of important discoveries of oil in traditional Prairie areas means Canada—caught between rising demand and falling production—can run out of oil. It will have to import heavily unless it quickly develops big—very big—new reserves.

Canada will have to import heavily unless it quickly develops big new reserves. That is the point I want to make. What did the Minister of Finance do? He attempted to ease taxes. He did not clear the air. Since his budget Gulf Oil has publicly stated that it will reduce expenditures for oil exploration from $322 million to $222 million. If one takes into consideration that the expenditures by Gulf Oil represent 5 per cent of the normal amount of money spent on exploration in Canada, this means there will be $1 billion less to be spent on exploration this year because of the budget of the Minister of Finance.

Further, the National Energy Board report says that we will run out of oil unless we quickly develop big new inventories of oil and gas. We cannot do it with this budget. All the people of Canada, for whom the minister is supposed to speak, want to have an abundant supply. We do not want to be in the bleak position suggested by the National Energy Board, which says quite clearly that in 1985 Canada will be producing 900,000 barrels a day and will be importing 2,500,000 barrels a day. In 1990, if conditions remain the same, we will be producing 600,000 barrels a day and importing 3,100,000 barrels a day. We are on the wrong track with regard to energy.

Now I should like to deal with the question of food. It is interesting to hear members speak repeatedly in this House of their deep concern for the starving millions throughout the world. We always take pride in being a great wheat producing country. Last year there was an anomaly in Canada, which was no fault of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, although I might also say it was no credit to him. World prices rose substantially. Farmers were embarrassed by the huge amounts of money they received for their wheat sales. In fact as of this day, in deferred payments through the Canadian Wheat Board the Farmers of western Canada have deferred payments amounting to $500 million or $600 million. That includes wheat sold through the Canadian Wheat Board and grain sold off the Canadian Wheat Board. We see the final payment for last year's crop deferred until January 1. That amounts to another $500 million.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Horner: I wonder if I could beg a few minutes to finish the thought I was expressing?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I also wish to thank members of the House. I should like to finish this chain of thought in respect of wheat. We have an anomaly in Canada in that when people throughout the world are starving the wheat farmer is reluctant to deliver grain. We have a situation where there are now deferred payments amounting to $600 million. The minister has deliberately deferred the final payment of $400 million to $500 million on last year's crop, and we see the rise in the initial payment deferred until January 1, which amounts to another $100 million.

So without even a close tabulation there is already waiting for the farmers on the prairies payments of $1 billion for wheat, which they will have to declare as income next year. As one engaged in the business of raising cattle I know many instances arise where farmers will defer paying income tax by deferring sales of cattle. They will feed cattle for a longer period, and attempt to defer the payment of income tax by buying cattle on December 31. We see the same thing happening in the grain industry.

There is an interesting situation outlined in the budget where, through a registered home purchase savings plan, people may set aside $1,000 a year for a total of ten years for the purchase of a home, or the purchase of furniture for the home. There is already in the Canadian tax system a plan whereby a wage earner can set aside $4,000 each year in a registered retirement savings plan, which he may draw upon at some future time whether or not he should be working. However, the farmers and people in the grain industry have to deliver their wheat in the next year. The government should seriously consider helping the farmers set aside some money in a registered retirement savings plan so that the individual farmer will be able to be self-reliant through hard times and good times.

I would suggest, for the agricultural industry, a registered retirement savings plan with a maximum savings limit of $50,000. In this way the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board will be able to do away with the guaranteed prices for agricultural commodities, because the farmer himself could accept the liability by setting aside $50,000 in a registered savings plan upon which he could draw when crops were poor or when prices were low. I believe such a system would create greater self-reliance within the individual in the field of agriculture. It would create less dependence upon the government, which is always a good thing, because governments continually muddle things, particularly this government. I would ask the Minister of Finance to consider this.

The Minister of Finance has said that the budget is good only for as long as he thinks it is good, and that he will bring in another budget whenever he thinks it is wise, in four months, in six months or at some other date. If I gauge it correctly it will be in March of next year, because the farmers then may be reluctant to plant grain and reap the crops to produce food for the world for they will be reluctant to pay the government the income tax they might have to pay.

Those engaged in the agriculture industry are becoming astute businessmen. They do not want to consider their income before taxes. They like to consider it after taxes, the same as any other businessman. So I encourage the minister to bring in a budget next March and to accept this concept. It will do the agriculture industry some good, it will do the millions throughout the world crying out for food a lot of good, and we must consider that seriously.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, the budget that is before us deals with the effects of inflation on Canadians, and it deals also with the measures that are necessary to keep the economy strong in the event of an economic regression which looms on the horizon. I support this approach in our budget because it is a sound one, and also because it faces courageously the issue in which I and most of us in the House believe, namely, that the wealth of one province belongs to all Canadians. This approach also confirms the fact that we, being federalists, do not believe in a Canada consisting of 10 Biafran republics, each one pulling in a different direction. We believe that the basis of confederation is the sharing of wealth wherever it may be found.

As to the accusation that has been made by opposition members of treachery on the part of the federal government, the correspondence that was tabled on Monday by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) shows how empty was that charge. We all know, as the result of reading that correspondence, that there was an agreement on price reached last March, but there was no agreement on the fiscal policy. That distinction seems to have been missed by many spokesmen for the opposition.

I read the speeches made by Conservative spokesmen since last Thursday, to find out what ideas they put forward. Frequently they spoke about inflation, but they offered very few ideas on how to deal with it. All members of the Official Opposition, down to the last speaker, offered the recurring remedy, which frequently appeared as the main theme of their speeches, of trimming down government spending and establishing an inquiry into unemployment insurance. I ask you how resourceful and how effective these measures would be in fighting inflation? Only the opposition knows. They are silent on where to cut down spending and by how much, knowing that a good portion of the budget is determined by statutory agreements which determine our transfer payments to the provinces, which leaves not much room for cuts. Even so, assuming that this idea would be worth looking at, the opposition has failed to tell the government where to cut and by how much.

Strangely enough the opposition has also been silent on wage and price controls, the great theme that popped up one day in the House of Commons early this year. In February of 1973 the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) advocated a great expansionary budget in the House, and he accused the government of not doing enough to expand the economy. In his opinion, inflation at that time did not exist, and yet that was only a year and a half ago.

Early this year we heard about the other great discovery—wage and price controls. That idea was tested during the election, and perhaps that is the reason why we have heard no mention of it by the Conservative members. I suspect that the reason why they have not come forward with any specific ideas is that they cannot agree among themselves on what should be the economic policy of this country, and how to cope with inflation. They did not agree during the election—their members and their candidates had differing views—and they still do not seem to agree on economic policies and on how to cope with inflation. Witness the fact that if you go through Hansard, all you find are proposals to trim government spending and to institute an inquiry into unemployment insurance. What a shame that is, what an ideological bankruptcy! That is all that the opposition can produce.

We Liberals approach inflation in a positive way. We do not believe in wage and price controls. Why do we not believe in them? Because we know that they can be very effective only with regard to certain groups in society, but cannot be applied to others. It is very true that the controls advocated by the Conservatives could indeed be very effective when applied to those who are on payrolls. But how do you control the income of people who make a living from professional fees? How so you stop a professional person from seeing another client? Obviously you cannot. Because wage and price controls cannot be applied effectively to one group in society but can be applied effectively to wages and salaries, we believe that that is not fair, and we say that inflation cannot be fought on the backs of wage and salary earners.

The Tory approach also exempts farmers, and it could not be applied to imports. A situation would develop where prices would remain where they are, that is, high, and incomes would remain where they are, that is, low. This is not social justice. We as Liberals approach inflation along four main lines. First, the reduction or elimination of tariffs on essential imports or products; second, giving farmers, small businessmen and manufacturers the incentives that they need to produce more and produce more effectively.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Caccia: Third, we have worked very hard, despite the howls from the opposition benches, to establish a price for Canadian oil several dollars below the international price. We have put an export tax on oil, despite the howls from the opposition benches, to pay for the cost of oil imported to eastern Canada. Fourth, we have again imposed in this budget a 10 per cent surtax on corporate profits earned between May of this year and April of next year to catch undue profits.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, how do these picayune measures proposed by the Tories to trim government spending and establish an inquiry into the UIC stand up as measures to fight inflation against the background of our Liberal policies? I ask you to comment on this. Obviously, there is a bankruptcy of ideas on the other side if that is all they can come up with, Mr. Speaker.

In the limited time left to me I would like to speak briefly about our manpower policies and unemployment.

Mr. Oberle: It will take too long.

Mr. Caccia: The hon. member is quite right, particularly in trying to straighten out the confusion in his mind because only last week he was trying to link the unemployed with empty seats on airplanes. Imagine that!

● (2110)

May I now touch on immigration. I take this opportunity to urge the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) not to yield to the temptation, evident in some quarters, of linking immigration to unemployment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: I do not subscribe to that theory. There is no study to this effect. Since coming to Canada 19 years ago I have seen no evidence to support the notion that immigrants take jobs away from others, or that they fill jobs which would otherwise be filled by native Canadians. The evidence shows the contrary, that immigrants fill vacancies in construction, in mines, in factories, in restaurants and in hotels, and that these vacancies occur because Canadians do not wish to fill these jobs. This subject has prompted much political rhetoric in the past few decades.

When the green paper sees the light of day, probably on a cold day in January, I hope the minister will deal with immigration on its own merits. He should ask whether Canada wants immigration, what kind of immigration it wants, and where, and not link immigration to unemployment levels, unless it can be demonstrated that there is a relationship between the two. Personally, I do not believe there is such a relationship.

I believe that immigration has served and continues to serve Canada well. Besides filling economic vacancies, immigrants have become and will continue to become new consumers and stimulate new production of items such as furniture, clothing, appliances, etc. Immigrants seeking jobs numbered between 60,000 and 92,000 on average in recent years for which statistics are available, or less than 1 per cent of our labour force. At the same time, in the third quarter of this year 120,000 jobs in Canada remained unfilled. I suppose that figure can be interpreted several ways. Personally I think these facts point to two things; first, to a probable flaw in recruiting policies abroad; second, to a flaw in our manpower training program. This, after all, is understandable, as it is difficult to keep pace with the changing demands of employers in the post industrial society.

I should like to pursue these thoughts in a broader sense. It seems to me that the time is rapidly approaching when we in Canada must offer people work of a sort that fits a post industrial society. What we have done in the past few decades served a useful purpose, but we are on the threshold of a new age and we shall need a new approach for dealing with men and women in the labour force from the time they enter it until they retire.

Our private enterprise system, while it has been a system that has produced a higher standard of living for more people than any other system we know of, has had and continues to have the inherent weakness of not being able to generate full employment. This is true despite the many government spending programs and policies introduced in the post war period to support it.

There is a growing number of people, including myself, who believe that our unemployment insurance scheme should have a more positive orientation. But we should not engage in the kinds of witch hunts which opposition members have been proposing. We, in the Liberal party, do not act that way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Caccia: I believe that we should assess the system and see how it can be improved. I see merit in giving our unemployment insurance scheme a more positive orientation. It should not merely be an instrument which reacts passively to the cycles of varying degrees of unemployment our private enterprise system seems unable to overcome, despite government spending programs and policies designed to do just this. Therefore the question is: why unemployment insurance? Why not employment insurance?

Employment insurance, presumably, could be based on our present approach to unemployment insurance, namely, a fund. All Canadians who are working would contribute premiums to that fund, which would be available to Canadians who are out of a job.

Mr. Oberle: That is merely another form of unemployment insurance.

Mr. Caccia: This fund would have two functions. It would provide income to maintain those who become unemployed while they are seeking employment, and it would provide employment for those who cannot find jobs in the private and established public sector of our economy. It would be funded in the same way as the unemployment insurance fund.

Since the major function of the employment insurance fund would be its job creating aspect, perhaps I might deal with that first in the time available. Many useful jobs could be created which would benefit society as a whole. In making the selection, perhaps three factors should guide us. First, the jobs should be non-profit in nature; second, they should have the element of an investment in our future; and third, they should be varied enough so as to provide choices. For example, we could create jobs which would involve recycling; reforestation of Crown lands; the renovation and maintenance of historical buildings; the restocking of our rivers, lakes and seas; the cleaning of our rivers, beaches and ravines; the maintenance and repair of homes of retired citizens whose income limits their ability to pay for such work; the provision of supporting personnel to work with the handicapped and retarded children in our society; the preservation of wild life, and a host of other jobs. These are examples only. We have already learned what is needed through government programs like LIP, which was a forerunner of future programs. The LIP program indicated the road we might follow.

The selection of jobs which will be created by the fund will be decided in consultation with provincial authorities, labour unions and management, to ensure that the jobs supported by the fund do not conflict with their interests. The selection will not be without problems, but if we are to provide jobs which will not otherwise be created, some decisions will have to be arrived at despite the problems.

The next consideration which must be dealt with is the wages to be paid for this type of employment. My own view on the wages which might be paid for the kinds of jobs the fund would support is this: if one were to evaluate a job in terms of its usefulness to society, such job should command a much higher wage than many jobs which are included as part of the private enterprise job stock.

Mr. Oberle: We will all be working for the government.

Mr. Caccia: We are inviting members of the opposition to contribute their ideas and improve what we are putting forward. These ideas have been advanced for the sake of improving our entire society, because if we were to do things as members of the opposition think they should be done, we would continue to be boxed in by automation instead of becoming its master.

● (2120)

This is the challenge that is facing Canadian society and, I suppose, all western society. The number of jobs to be created would of course be determined by the level of unemployment that exists in other sectors of the economy. Some unemployment will always exist because of the fact that people who have to become unemployed need time to search for another job. This would, of course, have to be taken into account.

The other function of the employment insurance fund is to provide income to maintain those who become unemployed while they are seeking employment. The levels of income maintenance would be the same as those paid in benefits through the unemployment insurance fund, with the same maximum and subject to income tax as at present. The duration of the—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret I must interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I do not profess to be an expert in a great many fields as did the former speaker, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia). With regard to his remarks I would simply like to say that if his expertise in all the other subjects he covered is comparable with his expertise in agriculture, he really lacks expertise and has demonstrated it here tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: There are a lot of barnyard phrases one could use. A great many of them would be applicable as a description of his remarks. However, let us refrain from those in the august company in which we find ourselves, and simply say that his remarks on agriculture certainly must be a reflection on his knowledge of all subjects upon which he spoke. It is extremely limited indeed by that measure.

An hon. Member: Let's hear what you have to say that is constructive.

Mr. McCain: That sarcasm might work back home, but we don't need it here. I find, as I look at the budget, that there are two subjects which are extremely significant by the total absence of constructive suggestions for their well-being. These two subjects are, of course, fishing and agriculture. It is as though fishing did not exist, and agriculture was a consumer problem not worthy of any major reference as far as government is concerned. For too long this has been the treatment of both these subjects.

Not too long ago the people on the east coast of this country suffered a serious amount of storm damage. It was utterly impossible to get any answers from the department. I can assure the minister that as of this moment, with the storm that is presently raging on the Atlantic coast, he better have a policy of a constructive and remunerative nature because the damage in all probability will run into the hundreds of thousands of dollars.

A rather minor storm was estimated to have caused something in excess of $100,000 damage to lobster traps off Grand Manan about a week ago. The storm of that day is insignificant compared with the one of today. Therefore, what is to be the policy? Is it the intention of the government—the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and all those who sit around and behind—to ignore the traditional position of the government of Canada toward those who suffer losses over which they have absolutely no control? This was accepted as a national responsibility until the advent of this particular administration. It has been evaded effectively and shamefully since this administration took office under this Prime Minister.

It is time the government began to take a long, hard, practical, progressive look at what is necessary in the face of the rudimentary economic structure of both fishing and agriculture, and developed concepts which will produce health in each industry.

I will not dwell on the fishing problems as they presently exist. However, I will repeat that there has been a totally unrealistic approach in respect to regulations from the water to the can, from the fisherman to the processor, which have been totally unrealistic and which are contradictory to all the practices in a great many other countries in the world. They have been detrimental to the fishing industry and fishing opportunities that would be presented around our shores given a realistic approach. Under the direction of this administration we have seen this nation close fishing operations which are thriving in other areas. We have seen this nation deprive our fishermen of an opportunity to catch fish in the sea, fish which are marketable in other areas in Canada.

We have seen our health regulations, as devised by the government for unquestionably good purposes, imposed upon our fishermen whether the fish are to be consumed at home or abroad. We have seen other countries approach our shores to try and buy fish from our fishermen, but we have said "No, we will not eat it ourselves and will not sell it to you." This is done even though these other countries have entirely different standards for their food requirements. We have unnecessarily and ill-advisedly deprived our fishermen of income which was rightfully and properly theirs.

In the agricultural industry we have not been particularly realistic in our recognition of the problems as they exist. There is no denying the economic health of the western grain grower, as described by the last speaker from this side of the House. There is no denying that certain aspects of agriculture have been extremely profitable. There is likewise no denying the fact that the crisis in several other facets of the agricultural industry for a long period of time has put agriculture in the position where people can ill afford to have a hard year. In some instances a hard year is just around the corner.

It is rather interesting to note that the government of New Brunswick chose to make an arrangement with a starch factory in that province so it would re-open its doors in case there should be a necessity of processing culls, a second rate product in the province of New Brunswick. This is indicative of a supply which may indicate reduced prices which that industry can ill afford. However, there is no immediate mechanism to put it to work under this government program. If the people concerned do strike a depressed year in income, they may not be in a position to plant another crop. It is an ad hoc approach. It is, I am sorry to say, a continuation of the approach which I heard a former minister of agriculture, the hon. Mr. Olson, put forward, "If the heat is too strong, get out of the kitchen." What he was saying was that if you cannot compete on the international market, don't farm.

There has been no change in this structure, no recognition of the necessity of international negotiation to give our agricultural industry an element of projection which it deserves, both for itself and the service of consumers at a fair price. Ministers have walked blindfolded in the mass of confusion as they formulated agricultural policy. It will not work. Their one policy, which has been the cornerstone of agriculture, has ended up in the position of being investigated by a committee of this House. I submit that that in itself is reflection enough on the attention which is given to agriculture, and on the keystone policies which the government has formulated and put into practice through legislation.

The budget may very well denote a great many difficulties as far as the Atlantic area is concerned. I wonder if in the long range the Atlantic area is unique in the position in which it finds itself, particularly with respect to energy and its long-term supply.

● (2130)

It is about time the government of Canada got off the ad hoc boat and began to alert the Canadian people to the exact nature of the long-term energy supply situation. There is now some indication by insinuation, and I suppose it will come out bluntly before too long, that all Canada may eventually have to pay world prices for oil. It is obvious that the first area which would be affected by such an eventuality would be the Atlantic area, and that there is no plan in the wind to take care of the energy requirements of the Atlantic area, particularly of industries in the petro-chemical field.

It is time consideration was given to the question of whether or not there is likely to be sufficient oil to fill the pipeline which it is proposed to build to Montreal. It is time the government gave consideration to the change in income patterns which might take place if the oil resources of Canada should attract industry and jobs to their locations. I do not quarrel with the idea of growth in any part of Canada, but I suggest the government should be aware of the possibility of such a shift in the distribution of wealth, jobs and opportunity and the effect this might ultimately have on the Atlantic area.

The government should consider whether Quebec might be next to be affected. Will Ontario be affected in turn? Our known energy resources certainly lie west of the Great Lakes, not east. Money, jobs, production, cuddle around the energy source to take advantage of lower costs of production. The entire equalization formula as we have known it may well be changed, province by province.

Making this situation worse is the policy of confrontation pursued by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and others in the cabinet with respect to the development of natural resources and the income derived therefrom. There was never a time in our history when there was any dispute as to the ownership of natural resources. They were the property of the provincial government concerned, whether in Quebec, New Brunswick, Alberta, or any other province. Never has a federal government said to the provinces; "We should share in the revenue which comes to you because of your natural resources."

Even in the driest of dry times, the Province of Quebec or the Province of Prince Edward Island has only, by virtue of equalization grants, shared in the benefits which accrued to others by virtue of their bountiful natural resources. But now the Government of Canada is demanding its share and challenging the provinces on this basis.

It seems to be new to the government that anybody should suggest a percentage of profits as a yardstick for royalty derived from natural resources. Such a measure was initiated in the fifties in New Brunswick for a special purpose, and agreed to by the Government of Canada in the hope that it would lead to development in New Brunswick. The government of New Brunswick agreed not to collect a royalty on a cents per pound or any mandatory basis in connection with a natural resource, but to ask for royalties only at such time as the mining companies had developed a surplus under federal tax laws. This goes back to the fifties. But it seems to have come as a surprise to the government that a percentage measurement of profit should be the measurement by which royalties are to be paid to a province.

This approach, as presently exercised by other provinces, has been pursued to excess. Only from this point of view do I support the Minister of Finance. Excessive charges have been levied at the provincial level. But the answer is not to confront ten provinces because two or three do not stay within the guidelines laid down by the government. The answer is to sit down and negotiate a sane and sensible deal with those provinces which have stepped over the traces by federal standards.

As a result of excessive taxes imposed by various provinces in Canada there has been a new impetus for exploration of mineral resources both in New Brunswick and in Nova Scotia. There are indications that some of the offshore exploration for oil may have been concentrated in the Atlantic area because unstable economic structures exist in the rest of Canada affecting oil resources. Reliance was placed upon the economic commonsense of the Atlantic area as an attractive basis for exploration and development. This certainly applies in the case of metals.

If the government applies to the whole of Canada the income tax law proposed in the budget before us, it will not only be punishing one or two particular provinces that have quarreled with it, but it will be punishing other provinces as well. This is not good government. We in the Atlantic area are concerned about this change in basic principle—about not allowing royalties as an expense of operation of the companies. This is not fair. It is not right. It is an infringement of constitutional privileges extended to every province since confederation. Is it the intention of the government to rewrite the constitution through the budget?

An hon. Member: Yes!

Mr. McCain: Members opposite know the problems they would face if they were to try to rewrite the constitution by legislation. Are they attempting it by means of a budget which automatically passes at a given point in time, regardless of the views of the opposition or of the provinces? If so, it is a shame and it is detrimental to the wellbeing of the country. And little do they care, Mr. Speaker, about what happens or what may be the feelings of others as long as those in power in Ottawa get their own way regardless of the consequences to the rest of us.

There has been a great deal of talk about the fiscal responsibility of the federal government. The government has expressed concern about the increasing cost of goods and services. I submit that in perfect contradiction of these expressions of concern the government has produced a series of budgets which are a denial of these protestations.

In the fiscal year 1973-74 the budgetary requirement was $23,726 million, according to figures made available in the budget speech delivered by the Minister of Finance. In the fiscal year 1974-75 the corresponding figure was $30,175 million. In the fiscal year 1975-76, as projected at this moment, the figure is no less than $34,900 million. In 36 months the government has escalated its expenditures and tax collection by 50 per cent. By what possible standards could there be an appeal to any section of the public to exercise restraint when the government sets an example by spending at a rate greater than the rate of inflation which presently exists?

Take one example of the effect of federal policies. There are in this country shortages of products required by agriculture, particularly in the chemical field. Within the last few months an executive of a company producing one of these products came to my office and stated that his company alone could end one of the shortages which presently exists, but it would not do so now because, if his firm were to invest money at its present cost, it might very well be priced out of the market due to interest charges alone. That is the effect of high interest rates in this country on development, employment, agricultural and chemical opportunities.

This stifling budget, and this stifling policy of high interest rates, have to be changed. It is a contradictory budget, which makes one question the real veracity of any government that would support such a situation as this. The budget is contradictory with respect to small businesses. No real concern has been expressed about them. The minister is going to change the Industrial Development Bank and do a lot of things, he says, for small business. But when you consider interest charges, labour charges, raw material charges and inventory charges, and the way they have escalated over the past five years, and if we adopt the standards of some of those members to our left and say there have been excessive profits so let us tax them as well, then I submit that the small businessman is constrained and restricted, and at this moment in time is looking forward to a not very bright future.

I grant you, Madam Speaker, that there has been a change in his taxable returns, but I submit he has now reached the point in time where he needs, as does every individual taxpayer in the country, an exemption, whether it be $30,000 tax free profit, provided it is reinvested in the business and works for the business. Small business is hurt and it is high time that the government, to the benefit of small business, the provinces and people in general, came out from behind its facade and into the world of reality.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully last Monday night to the budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), and I would be less than honest if I did not commend the minister on his very lengthy, historic and concerned review of economic conditions, both nationally and internationally. Certainly the stated objectives of the budget to meet the serious economic problems of the country are worth while, but whether the actions that will be taken will really attain those objectives remains to be seen.

I trust that the members of the House will not push the panic button too soon or too late, as the case may be, for fear that instead of inflation, recession, slow growth and such other economic phrases, we hit rock bottom with a serious recession or depression, along with even more serious unemployment. We are just gliding at the moment. The trip will not be smooth or easy, but with less wind and proper navigation we should be able to land fairly smoothly within the next 10 or 12 months—that is, if the pilot, navigator and crew have steered the proper course.

What I am saying is that I sincerely trust that the members of this House realize the terribly fragile condition of the economy and use their best endeavours, despite political or party allegiance, to co-operate with the minister in every way possible in order to share the load and achieve the goal of moderating inflation and, at the same time, sustaining economic growth.

However, I question whether the May budget, so called, was the real issue in the July election, at least in my own constituency anyway. I just want to set the record straight in that regard.

It behooves all of us during this session to be patient with the minister and the government in their alleged efforts to "wrestle inflation to the ground". But it behooves the minister and the government to inform the House immediately of all the restraints and their results, both good and bad, and if it is necessary to change course at any time, immediately to advise the House. If his theories are wrong, the minister should admit it. Each and every one of us must continue not only to urge government restraint—that is, reduce government waste, duplication, bureaucratic bungling and empire building, red tape and inefficiency, and, at the same time, provide adequate services—but we must urge and promote savings and less waste, not only in government at all levels but also at all levels of the private sector. Quite frankly, it is not so much what is in the budget that should concern this House; it is what is missing from the budget that concerns many, many Canadians.

Much is said in the budget about housing. A number of other items should have been added. First, there should have been an amendment to the Income Tax Act to provide for deduction by home owners of mortgage interest, municipal and provincial property taxes. Mortgage interest under the present act is subject to taxation in the hands of both the mortgagee and the mortgagor. This is double taxation and unfair and unjust. Second, there should have been an amendment to the Income Tax Act to exempt from taxable income interest on municipal bonds. Third, there should have been an appropriate provision for assurance that elimination of sales taxes on building materials and supplies will be credited to the home owner. Fourth, there should have been steps to reduce interest rates immediately on mortgages for home building or home purchase, and reduce interest rates for municipalities for public works by setting up a separate banking authority. I sincerely believe that these items could very well be included in the budget without upsetting the balance, and they certainly comply with the objectives, goals and aims indicated by the Minister of Finance on Monday night last.

The matter of regional disparity is still an important priority in this country. I was happy to hear during this session that government restraint will not cut into programs of regional economic expansion, particularly in the Moncton constituency. This is one program which eventually could make the poor provinces self-sufficient. Regional economic expansion must concern itself not only with secondary industry but also with transportation and primary industries such as farming, fishing, forestry and mining, along with power development.

Furthermore, a great deal is said about what is being done for our older citizens. Possibly the old age pension should be renamed a citizen's service pension, and on that basis these pensions should commence at age 60 instead of 65, in certain qualified cases, with the basic pension increased substantially.

The budget as presented purports to provide savings by government restraint. There is certainly a need to cut out waste, duplication, red tape and bureaucratic bungling, and to create greater efficiency in government. A little common sense, along with business sense, can create a great deal of savings of both dollars and cents.

One of the quickest and most effective ways to save millions of dollars, yes even billions according to some calculations, and create unity in the long run, is to reassess and improve the method of implementation of bilingualism in this country. Many public servants are just waiting for "doomsday," the date of their retirement, in the knowledge that their chances of promotion are practically nil. The merit system, in fact, is no longer in effect. Adult language educational programs in the government services and in Crown corporations just are not effective for the amount of money spent thereon. This is a perfect example of government waste.

Problems of this kind usually are solved by educational means, not at the adult level but in the public schools throughout the country. It is time we took an example from other countries where barriers have automatically arisen because of segregation in educational systems. It is my sincere belief that if Canada and Canadians are to be truly bilingual, and if we are to believe in equal rights and opportunities for all, then all youngsters in this country must be educated together. If this country is to be truly bilingual, it is time both English and French were taught in our public schools on an integrated basis. Let all our children be educated together. Let them learn together, play together and work together. Then they will get along together. Then and only then will our children become true Canadians.

If the consent of the provinces is required, or if it should be necessary to amend the British North America Act in order to bring this into effect, then a serious attempt to do so must be started forthwith. We should face the facts. Barriers are a problem in Canada. So often I have found young people unable to obtain employment in their chosen field, both in government and in private business, because they are not bilingual. The ground rules are being changed quickly and easily. Many of our young people are not being given the opportunity to comply with the rules. The barriers are set up at a young age. Let us change the ground rules if need be, but let us make a proper and fair preparation for such changes.

Bill 22 enacted by the legislature of Quebec will not promote unity or harmony. In my opinion it is unconstitutional, and will result in injustices and inequities for Quebeckers and other Canadians. The onus is still on the federal government to put a halt immediately to this matter by appropriate steps. Bill 22 conflicts with Canada's Official Languages Act and the New Brunswick official languages act in that it provides for only one official language in the province of Quebec.

Millions, yes, even billions of dollars can be saved both in government at all levels and the private sector if the implementation of bilingualism is reassessed and halted. If the government and the minister are sincere in their efforts, then this is the type of item which can and should be deleted as not absolutely essential to our economy, security and wellbeing. Top level meetings should be arranged with the appropriate ministers and first ministers of all the provinces right now.

In addition to languages being taught through a uniform integrated educational system from sea to sea, along with geography, the sciences, the arts, etc., our children should learn more about the nature of that thing which will concern them every hour of their lives; the money in their pockets and the banking and credit system. They should be taught how money works, what banks do with it, how governments are controlled by it. They should be taught about the banking system and how banks can increase or decrease money supply. Perhaps if all these things were taught to our children, and they were given more knowledge and know-how in respect to the monetary system, the next generation would never find itself in the economic situation we find ourselves today.

One former Liberal prime minister once said:

> Once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit, it matters not who makes the nation's laws... Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of Parliament and of Democracy is idle and futile.

Just to be fair let me read what a former Progressive Conservative Minister of Finance once said:

> I emphasize that the government of Canada has no power of control whatever over the money supply. It cannot increase it or decrease it.

As evidence of good faith the Banker's Association of Canada, representatives of the federal government and the Bank of Canada should meet to work out the details and timing of a changeover to a new monetary system as soon as possible.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening first of all to pay tribute to a great parliamentarian. I did not agree with all his views, but I have no doubt whatsoever that he was sincerely dedicated to the people of Canada. I refer to Mr. David Lewis, and would like to take this opportunity to wish him well in his new career.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: I should now like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) on what I believe to be a sincere desire to give this country a budgetary policy which is both realistic and humane. Inflation is the scourge of our times, and I applaud the minister's determination to fight it and at the same time to maintain economic growth without jeopardizing employment. We must not underestimate the complexities of inflation. Anyone who says there is an easy, pat solution to the problem is either a fool, a liar, or both.

[Mr. Jones.]

One of the easiest traps into which a free enterprise system can fall is that which by promoting vertical integration in the name of efficiency, can very well be instrumental in elbowing out the small businesses. Yet in the same free society it is often the same small businesses which, by their creativity, industry and determination, are the very pivot on which our economy turns. To these small but essential businesses I am proud to say that this government in this budget has accorded recognition and incentive.

Many of the constituents whom I have the honour to represent are senior citizens to whom we owe an immense debt of gratitude for their hard work and fine example. The people of York South, therefore, welcome the tax concessions to pensioners.

I should like to pause on that note, Mr. Speaker, and add a few words about the Canada Pension Plan. My constituents are primarily hardworking people to whom the work ethic is a fact of life. But, our modern pace is quicker and more full of stress and strain than that of some years ago. Despite the best will in the world, the 60-year old of today is sometimes just too tired, too exhausted to work, yet he or she just cannot afford to retire. In the name of these people I look forward to the day when the eligibility age for the Canada Pension Plan can be lowered to 60.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: And what of the millions of housewives who, through no fault of their own, are ineligible for the same plan? Let us not forget the fact that, despite the growing number of women in the labour force, there are still many who would rather sacrifice material gains in order to assure a proper home atmosphere for their children and a base of peace and tranquility for their husbands. Many of those housewives would be delighted to contribute, but many cannot afford to, and this latter group must be just as protected as the former.

I realize that the problem is a complex actuarial one which needs the attention of people more qualified than I to solve it. Complexity alone is no reason for sweeping questions under the mat. I would hope, therefore, that the Department of National Health and Welfare will dedicate to this subject the same capabilities and skills it has afforded to others.

To many of the constituents of York South the ravages of war and the horrors of discrimination and persecution are harsh memories, of which they bear the scars to this day. To them, and to their friends and relatives they left behind, peace is not only a necessity to survival, but a daily prayer. To these constituents the recent proceedings at the United Nations have been of paramount importance.

Canada too wants peace and strives daily for justice for all. I hope and pray that both can be achieved, and applaud the Liberal government, of whom I am a loyal supporter, for continuing its efforts, and in no way deviating from its path of traditional friendship towards Israel.

At one time in my career I was a member of the air force. There I received training second to none, combined with a sense of duty and discipline that has stood me in good stead throughout the following period of my life. May I now take this opportunity to express my deepest admiration for the work done by our armed forces, not only—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but it being ten o'clock we must proceed to the adjournment motion.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PUBLIC SERVICE—REMOVAL OF NORTHERN PAY ALLOWANCES—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, further to the question I put on November 20 last to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) concerning the removal of the special allowances to federal civil servants on the north shore, I should like to give additional information to my hon. colleagues and the President of the Treasury Board in this regard and, in return ask the latter to enlighten me on that decision which strikes me as unjust, not only for the 800 civil servants on the north shore, but also for the population in that area which extends from Forestville to the eastern part of my riding, and encompasses as well the larger part of the riding of my colleague from Manicouagan (Mr. Blouin).

I should like to add, Mr. Speaker, that the same problem exists in Skeena, in the Prince Rupert area, in British Columbia.

In his reply to my previous question, the minister had advised me that the decision to abolish pay allowances had been taken following recommendations by the Joint National Council, which comprises representatives of both the Treasury Board and Public Service Alliance. I accept this explanation, Mr. Speaker, but I feel that this decision, no matter how it was reached, is hardly acceptable to those who must live in an area where they cannot readily obtain all essential services and where the cost of living is 12 per cent higher than in the nearest major center, namely Quebec City.

Mr. Speaker, I should like the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) to take into consideration the fact that all specialized services are not available to us on the north shore, for instance in the area of health, and that the people must travel to Quebec City or Chicoutimi to see a specialist. Such is also the case in the area of education where local general or technical training schools offer only a limited number of options. In many cases, parents must send their children away to continue their education at the secondary level, and in all cases at the university level.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention briefly the fact that private companies of this area provide an additional amount for their employees, either in the form of special allowances or in the form of higher wages, and even both in some cases, to allow them to face more adequately the higher cost of living in the area.

The same applies, Mr. Speaker, to the employees of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, who receive a special allowance of $728 if they are single and $1,044 if they are married. Bank employees also receive a similar allowance of approximately $900 a year.

I wanted to give all these details, Mr. Speaker, to show that there is a danger that the federal public service will have difficulty in the future in hiring people as able as the present employees because it is quite possible that north shore staff will ask to be transferred to another area or seek employment in the private sector.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize the urgency of this problem, because if it is not solved quickly, the population of the area may soon not have any federal services.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am taking note of the remarks of my hon. friend who has spoken about a problem that I consider serious. It would perhaps be appropriate to say a few words about its history.

The special allowances granted to public servants in that area, as well as those for employees on the north shore of British Columbia, were created several years ago because of existing conditions at that time. However, in 1969, the Treasury Board referred the problem of isolated positions in Canada to the Joint National Council, which includes representatives from the unions and the management, which I myself represent.

The Joint National Council studied the problem and tried to establish criteria determining the conditions under which public servants working in isolated areas should receive isolation allowances. They defined minimums and reached the conclusion that wherever the cost of living was not 20 per cent over that of the area closest to the point of arrival of supplies, there was no need to grant the special isolation allowances which were established in the Skeena riding and on the Quebec north shore to solve problems in those areas that were experiencing unusual development quite a number of years ago.

This is a very difficult situation both for the union and ourselves, because the problem has been under study since 1969 and the Joint National Council made its decision more than a year ago, long before I became President of the Treasury Board.

I can understand clearly that in Sept-Îles, Baie-Comeau and some areas of the constituency of my hon. friend and of the hon. member for Manicouagan, hiring conditions may be better in the private sector than in the public one. But collective bargaining provisions at the government level make it possible to negotiate regional rates that meet those needs.

We have done so in other areas, and I can see no reason why we might not, as the collective agreements of the civil servants in that area are being negotiated, introduce regional clauses that would provide them with rates similar to those in the private sector, as the hon. member mentioned earlier.

I am pleased that the matter has been raised. I do not foresee any solution in the near future. I am ready to discuss that problem with the union. I am personally in favour of regional negotiations, because sometimes national rates do not fulfill their objectives. Therefore, I would rather favour regional negotiations, but, under the present circumstances, and considering standards are not met, I can see no reason why there should be special allowances just for those places.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—PROPOSAL BY UNITED STATES TO ESTABLISH EXPORT PLANNING GROUP

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, since the World Food Conference ended in Rome we have heard nothing from the Canadian government except self-congratulations about our role there. If the rhetoric of the government were food, the world would have a massive case of indigestion. The fact is that the government has, as usual, set up a smoke screen of verbiage. The Broadway playwright who gave us "Promises, Promises" could not hold a candle to this government. Instead of being congratulated the government ought to be castigated, for the fact is that it failed to respond adequately to the world food crisis with even emergency or long term measures.

We got a great press around the world for our pledge of one million tons of food grains per year for three years. The world thinks that we are rushing food to starving people. What a fraud! The fact is that it will be one year from the Rome conference before any of that food is in anyone's mouth. There may be millions starving, but they will have to wait for another crop year, and then have to wait while we work out transportation arrangements. I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) on November 20 what is the earliest month in 1975 in which food would be sent from Canada, what countries would receive it, and what transportation arrangements were being made. The minister said that this information would be in his statement subsequently made in the House last Friday. But you can search that statement in vain for these specific answers.

Then there is the question of the $50 million in immediate assistance. I quote from the opening speech made in Rome by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) as follows:

> As an earnest of Canada's commitment to the solution of the world food problem, I am pleased to announce that the Canadian government has decided to allocate at once the sum of $50 million of Canada's development assistance to be used in ways which will make an effective impact on the present critical situation.

Since then many members have been trying to find out how and where this $50 million will be spent. Just today, almost a month after the minister made that statement, he was unable to provide specific information to my question. Yet the minister says:

> I regard the problem of hunger as great if not greater than any of the other global problems.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Well, if this is how we respond to an emergency, our long range solutions for the alleviation of starvation will likely show up in the next century.

● (2210)

What is holding up the immediate implementation of this aid? Can it be the grain inspectors' strike, which has virtually halted grain movements out of Canada? If so, let the government state it clearly and then tell us what it is doing to end the strike. At least let us know that the government is trying to do something, particularly for the people of Bangladesh. Only today I had a lengthy conversation with an official of that country who confirmed a report in the New York Times, November 24 that thousands of people in Jamalpur, 120 miles northwest of Dacca, are destitute because of crop failures, the effects of floods and now severe cold:

> What's the use of feeding them?

This is what a distraught international official said of these victims.

> They are going to die anyway, if not by hunger, surely by cold.

In this district the people get a ration of a quarter of a pound of watery gruel made of rice and lentils once a day; they are being kept alive on what is technically a starvation diet.

I refuse to believe that Canada could not find a way to get food, not to mention clothing, to these hapless men, women and children if we really cared. Why not an airlift? Why could we not apply some of that $50 million to flying emergency supplies to people in real emergency conditions this winter? Why cannot we back up our words at international conferences with immediate action?

Why is there starvation in a world that has been blessed with the Green Revolution? I spoke of Bangladesh. The people of Bangladesh know how to grow food and they could feed several times their population. But they cannot afford the capital investment needed. Last year Bangladesh spent $40 million on oil imports. This year the bill is $160 million. That is the story of the developing countries. They are being squeezed out of existence by international energy politics. When developing countries cannot afford energy, they cannot produce fertilizer and crop yields plunge. There must be monetary and trade reform at the international level so that developing countries can be enabled to produce their own food.

All of this is well known. The external affairs minister himself said in the most important sentence of his speech in Rome:

> Canada emphatically supports the development of increased food production capacity by developing countries as the key to an anti-hunger strategy.

This brings us to the structural reform I advocated in a question to the minister on October 10 in which I suggested that emergency measures to obviate famine be contained within a total strategy for development. But our response is inadequate, measured in terms of emergency aid or long-range development.

A total strategy, as the United Nations keeps telling us, involves a better trade deal for the developing countries so they can help themselves and thus close the rich-poor gap. Yet Canada's history in trade negotiations involving developing countries has been negative, to say the least, and this trend has only been reinforced in Rome. Time and again, Canada has been in the forefront of those countries regularly turning down the requests, suggestions, demands and pleas of the Third World. This history leads me to believe that we need to have a total reappraisal of our position in GATT, which has been truly labelled a rich man's club. Let us stop using diplomatic tricks to sideline the Third World's legitimate aspirations to better trade deals.

Could we not heed the words of President Echeverria of Mexico, who sums up the food crisis by saying:

> ... in the final analysis, this situation has been determined and brought about by the inability of the great industrial nations to submit their production model to a system of international solidarity and shared development and interdependence based on equity and justice.

Since the food conference opened in Rome I have received 71 letters from people urging strong Canadian action. These are more letters than I have received on any other single subject, with the exception of capital punishment and abortion. I know that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has also received a very heavy volume of letters.

Canadians care about this issue. They want a government that will face up to this global calamity with courage, conviction and action, not just words.

I am happy to see the minister present in the House. He knows of the great respect I have for him. I wish him great success in his important portfolio. He knows that I will not oppose any initiatives he may take in this field, and I encourage him to take greater initiatives in the field of international development.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member referred to the performance of the Canadian government at the World Food Conference at Rome. It is unfortunate that he and other members should fail to recognize the substantial contribution which Canada made to the success of the World Food Conference. It does not help Canada or the hungry of the world to misrepresent and undermine the solid commitment which was made at that conference. It is unfortunate that we must look to persons outside Canada if we are to recognize what was actually contributed at that conference.

We were asked to respond to precise proposals that had been put before the conference by the secretary general of that conference, who was appointed by the United Nations. In making our food commitment for a three-year period commencing next year, we were responding to the precise request of the secretariat.

If other member nations at the World Food Conference had responded in like amounts, either in cash or in quantity, I can say with certainty that the concern expressed tonight by the hon. member about the hungry of this world would be less soundly based.

Canada can hold up its head with respect to its performance at the World Food Conference and its commitment. I hope the hon. member will recognize that.

The hon. member talked about the $50 million. We did commit for this year an additional sum of $50 million for development. In making that commitment we had in mind that there might be projects or possibilities opened up at the conference to which this $50 million could be allocated. However, these possibilities did not open up. We are presently engaged in determining the places best suited for the allocation of this additional $50 million.

The commitment will be lived up to and the decisions will be announced very early. I can assure the hon. member that he has no reason to doubt the sincerity of the government in making that commitment, of which the precise terms will be made public at, I hope, an early date.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:20 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. STEVENS—OBJECTION TO FACT THAT STANDING COMMITTEE NOT YET CONVENED TO STUDY SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege that concerns not only the privileges of all members of this House but the basic and fundamental privilege of the House to grant or to refuse supply. Obviously, if that right is taken away, this House does not exist. It is not so obvious that this House does not exist, except in shadow form, when the right to grant or to refuse supply is emasculated through abuse of the rules of the House and the contempt of ministers of the Crown for the law of parliament.

● (1410)

On Friday last, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) tabled Supplementary Estimates (B). These supplementary estimates petitioned this House to provide the government with the sum of $1.75 billion to cover 49 items of expenditure. The Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates is charged by this House with the duty of considering these estimates and reporting them back to the House either granted in full, reduced, or refused.

The steering committee of the miscellaneous estimates committee met on Monday evening, set priorities within a very short time-frame and said they would like to hear ministers with respect to certain estimates. We asked to hear the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand), the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie), the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), and from certain other departments.

The fact is that so far, no meetings have been arranged. In spite of the fact that $1.75 billion is being asked for—which is more than the total budget of most provinces in this country—we are asked to consider 49 items in, now, only ten meetings at most. I raise this matter because I believe it is unfortunate that this procedure is being followed. For example, instead of referring the estimates only to the miscellaneous estimates committee, they should have been referred to the other relevant committees. I suggest that there must be a better way of treating this kind of expenditure.

In the result, the President of the Treasury Board abused the spirit of one of the basic rules of this House by tabling these supplementary estimates within a time-frame which effectively frustrated the order to this House to consider—I emphasize the word "consider"—this request for $1.75 billion of public moneys. Several ministers of the Crown have further frustrated that order by refusing to fit themselves within the time-frame that was suggested by the steering committee on miscellaneous estimates. As members of the committee, we are required, by the action of the President of the Treasury Board, to do the impossible.

Therefore, if it is acceptable to Your Honour, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Huron-Middlesex (Mr. McKinley):

That the subject matter of this question of privilege be referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak very briefly on this question of privilege. I submit to Your Honour that since the present rules of the House under which we are operating were accepted, government spending has more than doubled. I submit it is an abuse of Standing Order 58(15), under which the House deals with supplementary estimates, for the government to rely more and more on the Standing Order to get its supply through this House. In my humble submission, the Standing Order was never intended to be used to the extent it has been used by this government. I humbly submit it was never intended that the miscellaneous estimates committee should be charged with the responsibility of considering, within the very narrow time-frame prescribed by the Standing Order, estimates to the extent of $1.75 billion.

I submit to Your Honour that this is clearly an abuse of the rules of the House. I hope Your Honour will treat the motion of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) with consideration and will have this matter referred to the standing committee, where it can properly be considered.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, you will have to rule whether this is a question of privilege. I rise only to say that I believe the rules of the House demand a very fundamental revision and I would be quite happy to see this, among other questions, discussed in the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If there are no further contributions to the question of privilege, I might indicate that the hon. member was good enough to give the Chair notice of his intention to raise this question of privilege. It seems to me that the argument the hon. member has presented in support of his prima facie question of privilege, supported by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), raises what is in fact a very important subject and, therefore, a very important grievance in respect of the manner in which this substantial sum of money for proposed government expenditure will be examined by this House.

Railways Freight Rates

There can be no doubt that if there is any rule which is fundamental to the operation of a parliamentary system of government, it is the rule which pertains to the examination of, voting on and approval of government expenditures. Perhaps hon. members will have notices that it is inherent in what has been said in support of the grievance—I use the word "grievance" as opposed to "question of privilege" advisedly—that what has been done is, in fact, in conformity with the Standing Orders of the House. On the other hand, in conforming with the Standing Orders of the House the procedure has worked a hardship or difficulty on members in their necessity to fulfil their proper duties by examining these estimates very carefully.

Therefore, I have to find that because the Standing Orders of the House have been obeyed, there is not a prima facie question of privilege. However, whenever the Standing Orders work a hardship on members who want to do their duty diligently, it is very comforting to have the assurance of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) that in the examination of the procedures of the House this very important grievance ought to be, and will be, taken into account.

TABLING OF GREEN PAPER "MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT AND CONFLICT OF INTEREST"

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies of the green paper entitled "Members of Parliament and Conflict of Interest". TRANSPORT

EXPIRATION OF FREEZE ON RAILWAY FREIGHT RATES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of rather urgent and pressing necessity, namely the question of the expiration of the freeze on railway freight rates to take effect at the end of this year. Because of the refusal of the railways to respond to the request of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) for full disclosure of their costs to justify their present freight rates and their proposed 25 per cent increase effective January 1, and since the minister has threatened since July, 1973, to bring in legislation to force such disclosure, claims he has legislation ready and has asked for the co-operation of the House for speedy passage of such legislation, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House requests the minister to immediately present his legislation for first reading, and further that this House agrees to co-operate to effect speedy passage of such legislation.

● (1420)

Mr. Speaker: Before putting the question I should tell the hon. member and the House that I have some grave reservations about the validity of the motion in that it seeks to anticipate an order of the day and, in addition, in the latter part it anticipates speedy passage by the House which is a term I submit which, even if the motion were adopted by this House, would be impossible to define with any degree of accuracy. However, the motion as put forward refers to a matter of some pressing necessity and urgency; therefore, I shall resolve the doubt in favour of the hon. member. Does the House give unanimous consent that the motion to be proposed under the provisions of Standing Order 43 be debated at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion may not be put.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would point out that yesterday the Minister of Transport requested the co-operation of the House to the speedy passage of legislation and it was government members who said no to the motion.

ALLEGED INCREASE IN STAFF AND POWERS OF PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of particularly urgent and pressing necessity because of press reports today that the Prime Minister's office will exercise an even larger role in controlling the government of this country with presumably a further decrease of the power of Parliament. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Stewart):

That it is the opinion of the House that further expansion of the power of the Prime Minister's office is not in keeping with the democratic process or the rights of Parliament and that the House requests the Prime Minister to make a statement on the changes that have been made, or that are contemplated, in the staff and duties of his office and in particular an explanation of the duties, salaries and job designations of Michael Kirby, former principal assistant to Premier Gerald Regan, Michel Rochon on loan from the Treasury Board, Jim MacDonald former Liberal candidate in Grenville-Carleton and Joel Bell, a one thousand dollar a week consultant.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have tried to take the occasion previously to indicate to hon. members that motions proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 must relate to not only an important subject matter but must have some factor or ingredient within them that distinguishes them from ordinary important business and puts them in the category of urgent and pressing necessity. I can only say with the greatest respect to the hon. member that I fail to see that ingredient contained in the subject matter of this motion.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

MEASURE TO CHANGE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY FROM BERTHIER TO BERTHIER-MASKINONGÉ

Mr. Antonio Yanakis (Berthier) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-365, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Yanakis: Mr. Speaker, since the new electoral redistribution on the provincial level last year, the territory of the riding of Berthier that I represent is completely included in the provincial ridings of Berthier and Maskinongé. That is why I should consider it fairer for all my electors if the federal riding were henceforth to be known under the new name of Berthier-Maskinongé.

SUBSIDIZATION OF FERRIES

Question No. 235—Mr. Reynolds:

Does the government subsidize ferries to the tune of tens of millions of dollars on the east coast and, if so, can the government advise for what reason it is refusing to subsidize ferries on the west coast?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): In so far as the Ministry of Transport is concerned: The government of Canada, under the Terms of Union of Canada-Newfoundland, and the Terms of Confederation of Canada and Prince Edward Island maintains and pays for ferry services connecting these two island provinces to the mainland. The ferry services are interprovincial by nature. In general, it is not the policy to subsidize intraprovincial ferry services of a "road link" nature. For this reason, no direct subsidization of such services has been entered into on the west coast. A number of agreements have been negotiated during the past few years transferring from the federal government to provincial governments' responsibility for the operation of ferry services coming under the definition of "road link". The Canadian Transport Commission advises me as follows: The following subsidies were paid to water transport during the fiscal year 1973-74: 1. East Coast: To coastal freight services, $3,043,220.89; to ferry services, $3,739,881.06; 2. West Coast: To coastal freight services, $923,000.00.

COUNSELLING SERVICE FOR HOMOPHILES

Question No. 250—Mr. Herbert:

1. Does the government consider it essential or preferable that counselling service for homophiles be provided by lesbians and homosexuals and would the same line of reasoning be applicable to (a) alcoholics (b) drug addicts (c) prostitutes?

2. Did the government have prior knowledge of the competence of the individuals that were awarded an Opportunities for Youth grant to set up a summertime counselling service for homophiles?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of National Health and Welfare and Manpower and Immigration as follows: 1. No.

2. Yes.

RURAL POSTAL SERVICE

Question No. 358—Mr. Herbert:

In areas where there is no delivery of mail, particularly in rural areas, and where, as a result, it is necessary to pick up mail at a local post office, will the Post Office Department consider discontinuing the charge for a regular size mail box to be more than offset by the savings to the department in reduced counter and delivery personnel?

Mr. Raynald Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): The Canada Post Office is currently reviewing its lock box policy. All relevant factors concerning lock box service are being examined. It is important to note, however, that current Post Office policy provides for general delivery service at no charge for persons living in areas where there is no delivery of mail.

LEGISLATION TO RESTRUCTURE PORTS AND HARBOURS IN CANADA

Question No. 454—Mr. Forrestall:

1. With respect to the news conference on transportation policy given by the Minister of Transport, June 19, 1974, on what date will the "new legislation to restructure ports and harbours in Canada based on the principle of giving greater local autonomy to port authorities and allowing greater local public participation in port-related decisions" be introduced?

2. Will the government invite submissions from representatives of the shipping industry, various Port Commissions and other public and individual bodies prior to or in the course of any Parliamentary debate on this matter?

3. From what bodies has this been solicited since or before the June 19 news conference and on what dates specifically?

4. Does the government accept the principle that full and widespread public debate should precede legislative changes involving "greater public participation in port-related decisions"?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. No date has been set for the introduction of new legislation on ports, but I expect that it will be in this Session.

2. The National Ports Council has been the focal point for submissions and discussion concerning ports reorganization for more than two years. These submissions have been the subject of study by the Special Committee on Ports and Harbours since last spring. This committee has reported, and its proposals are being considered. The consultation process will continue: the proposals will be discussed fully with the National Ports Council before any ports legislation is introduced.

3. Submissions have been solicited from the National Ports Council, since this body is composed of representative interests, including Harbour Commissions, the Local Port Authorities, National Harbours Board representatives, and officials of provincial governments, as well as officials of certain federal departments. The submissions were received, for the most part, prior to June 1974.

4. The development of a new administrative structure for ports is a complex task. The National Ports Council has the expertise necessary to examine the upcoming proposals, and because of its composition, it is considered to be representative of public and port user interests. It will be the focus for discussion of this issue prior to introduction of legislation. My reference to "greater participation in port-related decisions" refers to a principal characteristic of the new ports structure which we are trying to develop. That is, there would be a greater degree of local autonomy for the ports in future.

ESTABLISHMENT OF RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICE TO FREDERICTON

Question No. 504—Mr. Howie:

What plans, if any, exist for the establishment of railway passenger service to the capital of the Province of New Brunswick?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): There are no federal plans to establish a railway passenger service to the capital of New Brunswick at this time.

*DATE OF FINAL DECISION ON FACILITIES FOR PORT OF DARTMOUTH-HALIFAX

Question No. 516—Mr. Forrestall:

On what date will the Minister or Department of Transport make an announcement as to a final decision on the expanded container facilities required for the Port of Dartmouth-Halifax?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, no recommendation for expanded container facilities at the port of Halifax has been made to the Minister of Transport by the National Harbours Board. Such a recommendation would be only in response to the demonstrated demand for such facilities, the timing of which has not yet been clearly identified according to forecast traffic projections; and to the financial viability of the project related to revenue from such anticipated cargo.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SOLICITOR GENERAL—CONTRACTS AWARDED TO LAPOINTE TRANSPORT LTD.

Question No. 656—Mr. Grafftey:

1. What transport contracts have been awarded by the Department of the Solicitor General to Lapointe Transport Ltd., 105 Industriel Blvd., Longueuil, Quebec, since January 1, 1972?

2. What was the amount of the contract in each case?

3. Were public tenders called in each case and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Ministry Secretariat, Canadian Penitentiary Service, National Parole Board and Service: 1. Nil.

2. Not applicable.

3. Not applicable.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police: 1. Nine contracts for the movement of household effects.

2. $639.64; $1,996.71; $255.85; $894.24; $440.32; $541.18; $1,349.30; $399.21; $261.20; Total, $6,777.65.

3. No. The contracts were awarded under the equalization system, whereby all approved moving companies are given an equal dollar share of the business available.

2. Will the 14th floor at Ste. Anne de Bellevue Hospital now be opened and filled with those veterans who have been awaiting admittance?

3. Is the hospital operating at patient capacity and, if not, for what reason?

4. Up to what year is it calculated that this hospital could remain filled to capacity by veterans whose hospital care is the responsibility of the Department of Veterans Affairs?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. Yes.

2. Not at this time.

3. Yes.

4. Probably 1985.

4. What was the pay differential for the same classification in 1970-71?

EXPENDITURES FOR PUBLICITY IN DEPARTMENT OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

Question No. 562—Mr. Symes:

1. What were the amounts of money spent by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs on publicity and/or information in each of the fiscal years 1972-73 and 1973-74?

2. What were the names and addresses of firms and individuals who received these contracts, what amounts of money were spent in each case and what was the purpose of each contract?

3. In the case of expenditures for publicity and/or information made within the Department by its publicity or information division, what was the amount in each case and the purpose of the expenditure?

Return tabled.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It relates to the fact that answers to questions standing in my name Nos. 45, 46, 47, 48, 49 and 51, all placed on the order paper on September 30, the first day on which questions appeared on the order paper in this new parliament, have in effect been provided to the press by someone in the government, and almost the complete text of the answers. This information first appeared in the Globe and Mail this week. My objection is not to the fact that this information is now available for public consumption and consideration, but to the fact that if members of parliament still do not have a right to receive the information that is given to the press, then there is something wrong with the whole system under which we are operating.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: On a number of occasions this parliament has indicated its support for bilingualism in this nation. Surely, the people of this country have a right to know, through Hansard, what the cost and what the success of the program that the government has proposed is in actual fact. That is what I sought to secure, so that members of parliament would be in a position of being better able to examine the program and determine its strengths and weaknesses. It is rather difficult if the government refuses to give me information that somehow it is able to give to the press. I believe it is a serious matter and one to which you, sir, should give serious consideration to see that we, as individual members of this House, are protected.

● (1430)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) on a question of privilege.

Mr. Stevens: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have placed starred question 788 on the order paper and it continues to be unanswered. The question deals with conflict of interest guidelines for cabinet ministers. In view of the government House Leader's statement on Friday last outside the House that there are such guidelines and that they are, to use his words, "probably the most advanced in the world", I would call on the government to produce the presumably secret guidelines without delay. Surely the government does not want to pretend that the July 18 or December 18 guidelines referred to by the Prime Minister on those dates are the most advanced in the world.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I may be able to throw a little light on this. I would indicate that the guidelines are those very guidelines I made public in the House when I made a statement a year ago. I can understand that hon. members do not agree with them. That is why we have referred the whole matter to members so that they may express themselves on it. But the guidelines are known; they were made public.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order. Yesterday on a point of order the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) rose and disputed a statement I made that the RCMP would only investigate members of the House of Commons if they were suspected of criminal or subversive activities. He said that he had been investigated by the RCMP and had not committed any criminal offence. I have checked into this and I find that in November, 1973 the RCMP did conduct an investigation with respect to the hon. member for Hastings because it was alleged that he had in his possession a classified document belonging to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. This could have constituted an offence under the Official Secrets Act. The RCMP did investigate but found that there was no offence and dropped the case.

Mr. Nowlan: Are those plumbers or snoopers?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) asked the Chair to take into account a question of privilege but did not follow it with a motion requiring action by the Chair. Nevertheless, the point is not lost.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it seems we may have been scooped by the Globe and Mail which only has to print in one official language.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, notice of motion for the production of papers No. 12 is acceptable to the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is it the pleasure of the House that motion No. 12 be adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the other notices of motion be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FINANCE

INCENTIVES TO OIL INDUSTRY TO ENSURE SELF-SUFFICIENCY—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGES IN BUDGETARY PROPOSALS TO ACHIEVE THAT OBJECTIVE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I assume that in preparing his budget for presentation to the House the minister had access to the report of the National Energy Board which stressed the importance of the petroleum industry receiving proper economic incentives in order to ensure self-sufficiency in the future. Whether or not the minister had access to it, however, was his budget based upon agreement with the position taken by the National Energy Board that the petroleum industry must have proper economic incentives to ensure self-sufficiency or is it the minister's view that some governmental instrument like Petro-Can can do the job?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in my address to the House in the budget speech I made reference to the threat of declining petroleum reserves and it was for that reason I restored the immediate write-off at 100 per cent for exploration of petroleum and gas and, indeed, mineral resources.

An hon. Member: Eight cents a barrel!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I reduced the federal tax from the equivalent of 30 per cent to 25 per cent by increasing the provincial abatement from 20 per cent to 25 per cent and in these measures drew back from the May 6 position as it affected the petroleum industry by about 25 per cent, restored to that industry an additional $100 million this year, $170 million for 1975 and on an accelerating increasing basis over the subsequent years.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I take it from the minister's response that it is his view that the budget provisions will assure adequate rates of exploration and development within the present economic climate faced by the petroleum industry and that the minister does not intend to introduce any additional measures of encouragement as a result of the report of the National Energy Board?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan make some moves then the health of the petroleum industry in terms of international competitiveness would be, I think, restored. Whether in other terms over the period of the next few years we have to look at the question of price, cost and other factors, of course, is something we will be dealing with as the situation develops.

Mr. Speaker: A final supplementary, the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, if the minister is serious about accepting the proposition that the industry has to be encouraged, in view of the interpretation of the investor as reflected in the market since the minister presented his budget and the decision of the industry to cut back on the amount allocated for investment in the industry, is it the minister's position that the industry simply needs a little more explanation and that he, in fact, knows much more about their business than they do?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think it is generally accepted by officials in Ottawa and Edmonton and by the industry that a fair rate of return at the wellhead or production profits should give the industry 30 or 35 per cent to ensure the objectives the hon. gentleman mentioned. By increasing the abatement and restoring the exploration incentive, in effect the industry's share has gone from 24 per cent to 29½ per cent. As for the market reaction, in so far as it affected oil and gas, there was some reaction and probably the market was discounting rumours about the National Energy Board report. During the week following the budget the Toronto stock exchange dropped about 2.5 per cent against New York's 5½ per cent.

MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF REPORT OF ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA WHEN PREPARING BUDGETARY PROPOSALS FOR OIL INDUSTRY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I hope I can get a straight answer from the Minister of Finance rather than a shilly-shally answer. I should like to ask the minister if he had in his possession and did he study the report of the Economic Council of Canada. Did he know its intention prior to the presentation and preparation of his November budget, particularly in reference to petroleum and natural gas and the question of security of supply. I would refer the minister to page 61 and page 141 of the report.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I received a copy of the report at the same time as every other hon. member.

Mr. Woolliams: Well now, that is a shilly-shally answer. I wonder if the minister would tell us whether he had the report and if he studied it. If he did not have it and did not study it, did he know the intention of the report, particularly the recommendations as to security of supply and price setting?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the first time I saw the summaries of the report issued by the Economic Council of Canada was yesterday. I had no advance warning of the content of the report whatseover.

The Economic Council of Canada is charged with an over-view for the medium and long term of the economy of Canada. I received the report as did every other member of this House.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to have to press this but I think the minister should come clean with us. This report has been out since July at least, so it has been lying on somebody's desk. Surely, he knew the intention, particularly of those important recommendations. Where was the report? Did the minister know its intention? If he did not follow it, whose recommendations did he follow in preparing the budget in question?

● (1440)

STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF JUSTICE ON FEDERAL TAXATION OF PROVINCIAL CROWN COMPANIES DEVELOPING RESOURCES—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Last night in the House the Minister of Justice indicated that he strongly favoured federal taxation of Crown corporations if they are used by provinces to develop their resources. Was the Minister of Justice speaking simply as an individual at that time or was he stating government policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is not stating what the minister said. I read his speech just a few minutes ago. He did not say he strongly favoured that. I don't know why the leader of the New Democratic Party places those words in the minister's mouth. He said it was possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to learn that the Prime Minister is paying attention to debates in the House. It is very reassuring. Whether the minister strongly favoured it or not is a matter of judgment. If you read his text and argument, I think my interpretation is an understatement. The Prime Minister still has not answered my question. Is this government policy or is it not?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice said it was possible to do that. That is all he stated and I support him in that.

Mr. Broadbent: If the government embarks on such a policy, will the Prime Minister inform the House whether one result would be extending the idea to taxing provincial departmental activities in the resource sector if they took over certain developments independent of using a Crown corporation. Is the federal government considering that as well?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am sure you realize the question is hypothetical.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have one final supplementary.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: It is obvious that not only the Prime Minister is a sensitive individual. A lot of his backbenchers are the same.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: If I could just have a little quiet over there. If it is the intention of the federal government to move in this direction, will the Prime Minister assure the House that when the government finally acts, it will do so after consulting the 10 provinces and not simply impose such a policy on them unilaterally?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the provinces consult us before nationalizing industries, we will return the same courtesy to them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSING

REQUEST THAT CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION REDUCE INTEREST RATE

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

I believe all hon. members recognize the efforts the Minister of State for Urban Affairs is making now to give a new impetus to the building industry. Here is my question: In order that those efforts be valid and efficient, could the minister advise the House whether he, his department or the government intend to take the necessary steps to require the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to set down their interest rates at 9¾ per cent for 1975?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am interested in the suggestion of the hon. member and I appreciate his kind words. I wish I could reciprocate in such a manner to make him as happy as he has made me.

An hon. Member: Go over and kiss him, Barney.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: All I can say is I will continue my efforts along with CMHC to make sure we deliver good housing for Canadians at the lowest cost and at interest rates they can afford to pay.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister advise the House whether negotiations have been initiated with loan companies and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to provide for the amounts of money—at reasonable rates—necessary to build houses in 1975?

[English]

Mr. Danson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have asked not only the leaders and representatives of the building industry but also the lending institutions to meet with me in Ottawa in the next several days so we can discuss these matters in relation to housing.

NEIGHBOURHOOD IMPROVEMENT AND RESIDENTIAL REHABILITATION ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS—REQUEST FOR INCREASED FUNDS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact the Economic Council of Canada is urging the government to increase funding for the rehabilitation of housing for low income earners, has the minister met with the provinces to designate areas where the Neighbourhood Improvement Program will apply and also with regard to the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program? Is the minister intending to increase the funding under this program which at present is very low, as it would do much to satisfy the needs of low income people trying to bring their homes up to standard?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the remarks of the Economic Council of Canada in relation to substandard housing. There is more in this country than we should be tolerating. I am pleased to say that all provinces have now signed Neighbourhood Improvement Program agreements. Already grants of $41 million have been committed and $23 million in loans. I believe there are some 65 areas designated under RRAP. This is now expanding. It has been a long process getting these agreements in place and meeting with the various provinces and municipalities. The program is well underway. I am sure there will be adequate funding. I am pleased to say I will be meeting with officials of municipalities in Nova Scotia on Monday on this very subject, and I hope to repeat that across the country.

POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF REHABILITATION PROGRAMS TO RURAL AND NATIVE HOUSING

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Along with the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program and taking into account rural and native housing where Canadians in rural areas can qualify for rehabilitation grants apart from the Neighbourhood Improvement Program, will the minister indicate if there is any extention or promotion of effort in this direction by the provinces and what action is being taken in this regard?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I cannot do everything at once. I find I cannot do one thing as well as I would like. This is an extremely high priority. The Economic Council of Canada has highlighted this. The program is very generous. I look at it as one way to make a rather vigorous attack in the coming year and I look forward to having the funds to do that.

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION CONCERNING FIVE HUNDRED DOLLAR GRANT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact that the minister is so concerned about grants, and knowing that the government has been less than honest with the Canadian people in terms of the $500 grant which now calls for legislation, can the minister advise how close that legislation is in terms of preparation for implementation by way of introduction to the House.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Frankly, I was hoping to have it before the House in about a week's time. There have been some delays, but it will be within two week's time unless something unusual happens.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

REFERENCE OF SUBJECT MATTER TO COMMITTEE—SUGGESTED INCLUSION OF INCIDENT INVOLVING MINISTER OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the government House leader. In view of the fact the minister seemed to shadow box with the Leader of the Opposition yesterday with regard to reference of the general question of conflict of interest to a committee, has the minister had a chance to discuss with his colleagues, the Minister of Communications and the Secretary of State, a more particular reference involving the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and a possible conflict of interest there so this matter can be clarified?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as members of the House will see, I have given notice to the table of a reference of the question of conflict of interest in which members will be invited to first look at the green paper that I tabled today and make recommendations on it so that we have a foundation. Once they have completed that, they can deal with the subject matter of ministers and conflict of interest, and public servants and conflict of interest. This question can be discussed in committee providing, of course, the committee wants to deal with members of parliament as a whole before dealing with special members of parliament who are cabinet ministers.

EMPLOYMENT OF MR. JOEL BELL AS CONSULTANT IN PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE—POSSIBLE CONFLICT WITH OTHER EMPLOYERS' INTERESTS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Would the Prime Minister tell the House whether or not Mr. Joel Bell who, according to the press, has been hired by the Prime Minister's office as a $1,000 a week consultant, has in fact other employers or other clients and whether or not Mr. Bell will be incorporated into the Prime Minister's office as a public servant in view of a possible conflict of interest?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As to the first part of the question, I do know that Mr. Bell is working in the Prime Minister's office. I do not know under what terms or under what arrangements. I will inquire. I will inquire, also, whether he has any other occupations. From then on, we shall see whether the second question is a hypothetical one—whether it has any foundation.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ALLEGED REORGANIZATION OF PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE—POSSIBLE INCREASE IN STAFF OR CHANGE IN ROLE OF OFFICE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Would the Prime Minister tell the House whether the current reorganization of his office will result in an increase in the staff and whether or not his office will now assume a new policy role outside that which is traditional under our parliamentary system, that of the Privy Council or the cabinet?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As to the second part of the question, the answer is no. As to the first part of the question, I can tell the hon. member that there is no reorganization currently going on. As to the numbers of staff involved, the hon. member will get that information from the estimates.

ENERGY

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF ENRICHED URANIUM PLANT IN JAMES BAY AREA—CONSULTATION WITH QUEBEC ON EXPORT OF PRODUCT

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that uranium may be exported only if a permit is issued by the Atomic Energy Control Board, and bearing in mind the right hon. gentleman's remarks on the subject while he was in Paris, is the Prime Minister aware of any discussions which will be taking place next week in Paris between the premier of Quebec and the premier of France with regard to the establishment of an enriched uranium plant in the James Bay area? Can he tell us whether there have been any preliminary discussions between the federal government or any of its agencies and the Province of Quebec with respect to the export of the product of such a plant?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not know with whom the premier will be speaking but I am fairly certain he will be dealing with the subject of the hon. member's question. I believe I made the posture of the Canadian government quite clear when I was speaking to the French authorities, not only with regard to export but with regard to other aspects which concern us. At that time we set up a task force on energy whose purpose was to continue informing the French about the federal position. I believe they held a meeting some days ago to inform the French of our position.

As far as discussions with Quebec are concerned, I cannot speak for other levels of the cabinet or of the civil service, but I personally spoke to the premier of Quebec and reminded him of our position on these matters.

EXPORT OF FISSIONABLE MATERIAL—REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT ON SAFEGUARDS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): My question, too, is directed to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister tell us when the House will be advised concerning the nuclear safeguard policy which apparently has been considered by the cabinet. It would seem we are now holding up 12 uranium contracts pending a report by the cabinet to this House. Can the right hon. gentleman tell us when we can expect to find out whether Canada is to continue to sell Candu reactors abroad and continue to export uranium or not? There are a great many people in this country who would like to know.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It is true that following the nuclear explosion in India the government decided to increase the safeguards which are related to the export of fissionable material. It is my impression that this decision was made known in a public statement. I will check where and when it was made. But whether it was made public or not, it is the policy of the federal government to increase the stringency of the safeguards and the matter is again before cabinet at the present time. If no statement has been made I shall ensure that a statement is made in due course so that the country and the world may know what our policies are in this regard.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

INQUIRY AS TO GUIDELINES IN EFFECT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It arises out of his comment concerning my point of order with regard to starred question 788. As that question dealt with conflict of interest and was really a summation of the high points of Prime Minister Pearson's guidelines for his cabinet given on November 30, 1964, could the Prime Minister tell us, now that he says that his guidelines are confined simply to the statement of July 18 and September 18, whether we are correct in assuming that those guidelines, which are much narrower than Prime Minister Pearson's, are now the guidelines in effect?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I would have to refer to the text of my statement in the House, but my recollection is that rather than departing from Mr. Pearson's guidelines I based my statement on those guidelines—that, indeed, I gave more precision and more depth to the guidelines he had established; I believe the latter were more general in some instances, while applying to particular cases in others. The difference is, of course, that ministers are now under a specific obligation to declare their holdings. This is certainly something which was not required under previous governments.

Some hon. Members: A supplementary question!

Mr. Speaker: Order. Earlier today the President of Privy Council tabled a green paper pertaining to conflict of interest with the intention, at least as disclosed in his remarks, that the matter should be referred to a standing committee. Such an order has not, of course, yet been made by the House, and in these circumstances it would be improper to discourage any questions relating to these guidelines. However, if an order of reference is to be made to the standing committee, once the matter is before a standing committee it ought not to be the subject of questions here.

DATE OF REFERENCE OF SUBJECT MATTER TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question on that very point. Can the President of Privy Council now give us a date on which this reference will be moved? Can he tell us, for example, whether the reference will be moved on Monday next? Or is he still sticking to the position he put forward yesterday that the reference might be moved some time hence, perhaps some months hence, after the House had dealt with other matters which the President of Privy Council considers to be of even greater urgency?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is the President of Privy Council who would consider these other matters to be of greater importance. I think it would be the people of eastern Canada where he happens to live. I believe it is important that there should not be a lapsing of the authority we presently have for the payment of a subsidy affecting eastern Canada to ensure that the price of oil is maintained at a stable level throughout the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: As Leader of the Opposition, and on behalf of my hon. friends in the House, I again tender to the President of Privy Council one of the allotted days assigned to us. If the hon. gentleman could begin, I invite him to screw his courage up to the sticking point and put this reference before the House.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I assure the Leader of the Opposition that I accept his offer. My concern is that the time allotted to the Conservative Party might have been used for other purposes and that we would have to devote other time to discussion of the question of conflict of interest. However, if the hon. gentleman is ready, now, to give up another day—one has already been moved ahead—I would be happy to accept it.

Mr. Baldwin: No days have been given up!

SUGGESTED BROADENING OF DECLARATION OF INTEREST

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): In the interim, would the Prime Minister tell us whether consideration has been given to making the declaration more meaningful? For example, rather than providing that a frozen trust should simply be disclosed, at least show who the trustee is, and in the case, for example, of a 30 per cent interest in a private company, require the minister to show who owns the other 70 per cent, and what interests that private corporation, in turn, controls.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think these are suggestions which are worthwhile. They are precisely the type of matters which should be discussed in the committee. The opposition seems to forget the point that, in addressing myself to this matter in my statement to the opposition of a year ago, I said all ministers were members of one or the other Houses. We will, of course, as a matter of fact be bound by whatever guidelines the House wants to impose on its members or on their spouses. What the cabinet has done has been to adopt guidelines which we think go considerably further than those that hon. members will want to adopt for themselves.

● (1500)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, we shall see. But when I was speaking about the guidelines relating to ministers I made the statement that this subject would be brought back after we saw the guidelines relating to members, and it might be that we would have to modify them to bring them more into conformity with what members decide to adopt for themselves.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ETHIOPIA—SUGGESTION CANADA MAKE EFFORT TO STOP EXECUTIONS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the secretary of state advise the ambassador of Ethopia that Canadians are appalled by the summary executions which have taken place in that country, including the execution of the international president of the YMCA, and will the minister tell the House what efforts he is making personally to prevent the execution of the former emperor, which should be stopped if for no other humanitarian reason than that he is a very old and courageous man?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was shocked, as I am sure hon. members were, by developments in Ethiopia, particularly the further projected executions that are being contemplated. I have instructed the officers of the department, in my name and in the name of the Canadian government, to send a message to the powers that be in Ethiopia asking them to exercise restraint and to hold off any further executions.

RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION IN CHAD—REQUEST THAT REPORT OF CIDA BE REFERRED TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is also addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of reports reaching Canada that there is a wave of religious persecution in Chad which may affect the future of our aid projects in that country, notably our food aid distribution program in the Sahel, would the minister agree to have the report of CIDA referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence so that these and related matters might be examined to the full?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his suggestion and I will certainly give it consideration at an early date.

TRANSPORT

RAILWAY BRANCH LINE ABANDONMENT—SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF FREEZE—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES ON FORMULA FOR COMPENSATION

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise another freeze with the Minister of Transport. Is it the intention of the government to allow the freeze on railway branch line abandonment to expire at the end of December, or is it the intention to extend the freeze? If not, have any criteria been arrived at as to which, if any, branch lines are to be abandoned?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as far as branch lines are concerned, I hope the decision will be made this week.

Mr. Benjamin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the minister's intention to live up to the commitment made by the Minister of Justice that no branch line will be abandoned without the prior concurrence of the province concerned? In addition, has he or his department arrived at any agreement with the provinces on the formula for compensation to municipalities, departments of highways, farmers and so on, for the extra costs involved for them?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would prefer to have an answer from the Minister of Justice himself.

Mr. Benjamin: As my final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister again whether he will agree to maintain the freeze both on freight rates and on branch line abandonment until such time as the costing information has been provided by the railways regarding freight rates, and until such time as the provinces concerned have reached agreement with the government on the abandonment of any branch lines?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, as far as the second part of the question is concerned, I still believe that the Minister of Justice should answer that. As far as the first part of the question is concerned, I do not think we should change the decision. I think there is a lot of misinterpretation concerning the lifting of the freeze. The west was complaining, and justly most of the time, of the inequities, anomalies, long haul and short haul rates and so on, but these anomalies were not related to the freeze at all. Therefore, I think it would be misleading the public to say that in maintaining the freeze we would correct such situations; these are going to be corrected in co-operation with the ministers of transport in the west.

HOUSING

AVAILABILITY OF FIVE HUNDRED DOLLAR GRANT FOR RENOVATIONS

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Since repairs to a house are sometimes more or at least no less costly than the construction of a new one, has the minister thought of granting the $500 rebate to owners of that category?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I shall be able to deal with the matter when the House studies the bill, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

SUGAR—POSSIBLE CHANGE IN TRADING PATTERNS TO REDUCE PRICE

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the agriculture secretary of the United States has recommended that the U.S. resume trading with Cuba to reduce the soaring price of sugar, does the minister foresee any changes in trading patterns in sugar for this country which would be helpful in bringing down the price of sugar to our consumers?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, Canada's trading patterns with Cuba in particular have already changed very dramatically. I think last year something like 47,000 tons were imported by Canadian companies from Cuba. This year I think the estimate is very close to 97,000 tons.

SUGAR BEETS—POSSIBLE RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF INDUSTRY

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, since that is quite a small percentage may I address a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture, who told me in reply to a question some time ago that he would interest his cabinet colleagues in the question of re-establishing the sugar beet industry in southwestern Ontario, so that if the price of sugar remained at the present level, at least some of these funds could be left in this country to help the economy in his and in my particular district. Could we have a report on the minister's progress in this regard?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we still have ongoing meetings, and as I have said a paper is being prepared for my colleagues in government.

EGGS—DISAGREEMENT AMONG PROVINCES ON RECOMMENDATIONS ON MARKETING—POSSIBILITY OF FURTHER MEETING OF PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Agriculture. It arises out of the meeting of provincial ministers of agriculture on November 25 in connection with the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency and the recommendations that have been presented. It is to be noted that the recommendations that were adopted were passed on division. Could the Minister of Agriculture advise the House which provinces agreed and which provinces did not agree to the recommendations that have been submitted?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): It was a voice vote and was not recorded, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Inasmuch as the success of CEMA is dependent upon the total co-operation and support of all the provinces, and in view of the fact that the chairman of CEMA has some very grave reservations about the recommendations that have been put forth, would the Minister of Agriculture now see fit to summon the ministers of agriculture together again for another meeting in order that some better understanding and consensus might be arrived at?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the opinion of the provincial ministers at the meeting was that they would wait until the parliamentary committee submitted its report. If the committee should happen to recommend any great changes and it was necessary to change legislation, then before the changes were put through the parliament of Canada we would summon the ministers.

IMMIGRATION

HAITIANS—POSITION OF THOSE WHO REMAIN IN CANADA ILLEGALLY

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Could he tell the House what were his findings and what conclusions he reached as a result of the conversation he had on the 21st with Father Déjean, responsible for the Christian Community of Haitians and, in particular, could he tell us whether he is prepared to give specific instructions to the special attorney representing his department before the appeal board when these deportation orders are being considered, in order that the Public Prosecutor leave the whole decision to the appeal board and refrain from any representation?

● (1510)

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the law requires that this judgment be made by the immigration appeal board. As I have stated on many occasions, the immigration appeal board has the authority to exercise its jurisdiction beyond the decision about the legality or otherwise of any deportation order for any person to which one would be applied, in terms of humanitarian and compassionate grounds or on the occasion of unusual hardship. The board has exercised that kind of jurisdiction and made that kind of decision in the past and it will continue to do so in these particular cases. Our departmental representation before the board is on the basis of upholding the legality of the deportation order, or speaking in the odd case of absolutely frivolous claims to justification for a compassionate or humanitarian decision within the Board's jurisdiction. However, it is the jurisdiction of the board that must be exercised and there is no discriminatory power lodged in me or any member of the government and that is the condition that will prevail.

[Translation]

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I note that the minister has failed to answer the first part of my supplementary. He may like to do it when answering the supplementary question which I am about to ask.

Following the evidence submitted by Father Déjean, is the minister now satisfied? As shown by two examples during recent weeks, it is extremely dangerous for those deported Haitians to return to their country and on the other hand, even if the deportation order were not enforceable or enforced, it follows that hundreds of Haitians are compelled to live clandestinely with all the human, economic and social effects to which it gives rise.

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I had a discussion with Father Déjean last Thursday for two or three hours. I found it informative and interesting, and I indeed expressed to him, as I have expressed in this House, a very deep concern for every individual involved in this situation, as would be the case with anybody who has faced a similar situation, whether they came from Haiti or otherwise. Frankly, Father Déjean did not present to me proof in the sense that the hon. member is implying, or as the words the hon. member used would suggest. I listened to his presentation and would still come to the conclusion that there has to be an individual decision made in each of these cases. That power is vested in the board. We are condident that the board will exercise its jurisdiction and will be able to make a decision as between which case is meritorious on the ground of possible reprisal in the country from whence they came and which are cases of economic migration, which is very distinctly possible in the case of Haitians and others. So, frankly there has not been a change in our position on this matter.

Oral Questions

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTION FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SUBSIDIZE SEWAGE TREATMENT PLANTS FOR THE PRODUCTION OF FERTILIZER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment regarding statements made in the budget that there is a shortage and a high cost in respect of fertilizer in Canada. Can the minister advise this House whether she has any plans to bring in legislation to allow the federal government to subsidize sewage treatment plants across Canada in order that Canada can produce fertilizer through these tertiary treatment plants and thus make sure we have a high supply of fertilizer at low cost?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there is already a federal government program of which the municipalities can take advantage for the treatment of sewage waters. Any province can take advantage of it.

Mr. Reynolds: As the minister must know, Mr. Speaker, this legislation does not require the municipality to have tertiary treatment plants, but only supplies money for treatment plants. Will the minister bring in legislation requiring tertiary treatment plants so that we will have fertilizer from the sewage plants and then Canada will have lots of fertilizer at low cost?

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, the question is a little bit involved and several departments might be required to look at this.

HOUSING

AVAILABILITY OF FIVE HUNDRED DOLLAR GRANT FOR CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement by the Economic Council of Canada in its 11th annual report to the effect that low income families face a very serious housing crisis in this country, and in view of the fact that the predecessor of the minister responsible for housing when introducing the major housing bill at the last session of parliament indicated that co-op housing offered the best opportunity of alleviating the housing problem for low income families, would the minister explain to the House why this discrimination exists against purchasers of co-op housing in respect of the $500 first purchase grant?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is certainly not a discrimination against co-op housing. As a matter of fact, I give it very high priority, but I do not consider it the one answer to the housing problem, but one in which I am particularly interested. I think the hon. member should bear in mind that there is 100 per cent financing plus a 10 per cent grant. This is to help people make a downpayment. We are not only helping the people make a downpayment, but giving them 10 per cent on top of that to buy the land. If there is not enough money in the new legislation as a result of the 10 per cent for land in high cost areas, we are going to make that even easier for them.

As part of the minister's reduction of the armed forces is he planning to close out the defence research establishment facilities with the loss of jobs for 39 scientists and 80 other staff?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker, there are no current plans to reduce the level of activity at the defence research establishment at Esquimalt.

APPLICATION OF KAMINSKI FAMILY FOR REFUGEE STATUS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and relates to the Kaminski family which has applied for political asylum in Canada. Has the minister examined this particular case and has he made a decision on the merits?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Kaminski family has now applied to remain in Canada as refugees, and this will be given full and serious consideration. I am not in a position yet to indicate to the House a decision because all the information has not yet been made available to me.

FINANCE

PROPOSAL THAT OPEC COUNTRIES LEND MONEY TO INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the extremely serious world situation arising out of the enormous monetary balance held by the OPEC countries, can the minister tell the House what success the committee, of which he is the chairman, of the International Monetary Fund has had in getting these countries to lend their money to the International Monetary Fund or any other world bank?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, some progress is being made on a number of fronts and I will be in Washington on Friday talking to the managing director of the International Monetary Fund and the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NOVA SCOTIA—DATE OF COMMENCEMENT OF OPERATIONS AND OBJECTIVES OF METROPOLITAN AREA GROWTH INVESTMENTS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, without having had a supplementary question I should like to pursue a point I was making with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion when orders of the day were called yesterday. He indicated that a search is still underway for a chief executive officer for this very important Crown agency, the Metropolitan Area Growth Investments, under his jurisdiction in Nova Scotia. Because of the great delays that have plagued this project over two years, can the minister now say with some precision whether a target date has been set when this agency will in fact be operating, and whether under the circumstances its terms of reference and objects are still the same as they were when enabling legislation was passed in 1972? May I say very briefly that I do not believe the minister is the one responsible. I lay the blame at the door of the Premier of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I will not comment on the last part of the question other than to say we are at the moment in complete accord as to how we are going to proceed. The objectives remain the same, and what we have now agreed upon is a technique for searching. Earlier this was done through one of the professional placement agencies and did not prove to be a very successful way of going about it. I was serious when I mentioned to the hon. member yesterday what we are doing. A number of nominations are coming in from a variety of sources, and we are looking these over in the hope of finding somebody who will be mutually agreeable and who will also at the same time be competent in terms of these objectives to which the hon. member refers.

METROPOLITAN AREA GROWTH INVESTMENTS, NOVA SCOTIA—USE OF FUNDS IN ACCOUNT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for taking the time of the House but since the minister is in an expansive mood with regard to MAGI I wonder whether he will indicate to the people of Nova Scotia and to the Canadian taxpayers to what use the money is to be put that was placed in that account over the years by the federal authority?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I can only assume, without asking a specific question on this matter, that it is in the Consolidated Revenue Fund, but I shall be glad to make an inquiry and find out.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Medicine Hat.

Business of the House

Mr. Hargrave: Mr. Speaker, my question was for the President of the Treasury Board but I see he has left the House.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As today will see the conclusion of the budget debate, unfortunately leaving the budget in the same position after the debate as when it started, I should like to ask the government House leader, following our question and answer of last Thursday, what business the government will be proceeding with tomorrow, the next day and the beginning of next week.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, following the conclusion of the budget debate we will call legislation in the following order: Bill C-14, the Federal Business Development Bank bill; Bill C-15, the Indian Oil and gas bill; Bill C-18, the fire losses replacement account bill; Bill S-13, the Alberta-British Columbia boundary bill; and Bill C-25, the environmental contaminants bill.

As soon as the consequent bills are ready, we shall seek concurrence in the notices of Ways and Means with regard to the Customs Tariff and to the Excise Tax Act and I would, therefore, in accordance with Standing Order 60, ask the designation of Orders of the Day to facilitate this.

On Monday, December 2, we shall call bill C-36, the representation bill.

We shall commence consideration of the two budget bills just mentioned on Wednesday, December 4.

Tuesday, December 3 and Tuesday, December 10 shall be allotted days pursuant to Standing Order 58. As I mentioned earlier, the opposition House leaders had informed me some time ago of their willingness to transfer one allotted day from the present supply period to the next one and I suggest that we now make it an order that there be four allotted days pursuant to Standing Order 58 in the supply period ending December 10, 1974 and that there be eight such days in the supply period ending March 26, 1975.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House agreed and is it so ordered?

Mr. Baldwin: In respect of that last particular proposal of the government House leader, I wonder whether we might have further discussion out of which may emerge a committee reference which hon. members of the House seem to keenly desire, namely the question of the debate on the conflict of interest rules. Then, perhaps the government House leader, other House leaders and myself might work out a suitable date to take into account the question of opposition days at the same time.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing to hold that part of my recommendation. Therefore, it is only the designation of the Orders of the Day to deal with the Ways and Means motions that I suggest at this time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, since the President of the Privy Council has been giving a forecast of House business which runs into two or three weeks, I wonder whether he could indicate to the House when the bill will be presented which has been referred to several times by the Minister of Transport, and which should be dealt with quickly, concerning a requirement that the railways disclose their freight cost structures?

I wonder also if he could tell us when the Minister of Veterans Affairs will be presenting the bill to implement the unanimous recommendation of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs having to do with Hong Kong veterans?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I thank the House leader of the New Democratic Party for his representation and I will try to obtain answers for him as quickly as possible.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, if I may have your indulgence before you call Orders of the Day, when I asked the Minister of Transport if he could advise whether the government would live up to the commitment of the Minister of Justice that no railway branch lines would be abandoned without the concurrence of the province concerned, the Minister of Transport said that he thought the Minister of Justice should answer that question. I wonder whether you would allow the Minister of Justice to answer it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In accordance with the request of the President of the Privy Council I so designate the day named by him for consideration of the Ways and Means motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I trust I shall be forgiven for raising a brief point of order. I do so on the basis of certain discussions which have taken place. There having been two recorded votes with regard to the budget I think Your Honour will find there is general agreement that the debate itself can end on a voice vote and therefore that we could use the extra 15 minutes to get in one more speech.

I therefore suggest, if it is the will of the House, that the debate end today not at 5.45 as provided by paragraph (8) of Standing Order 60 but at six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: If it is so agreed, and members are so disposed, it should be so ordered at this time so that there can be no doubt about it. Is it so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Tuesday, November 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, with your indulgence I should like to correct an error in my speech of last night as reported in Hansard. It occurred just before the adjournment debate was called. With your indulgence, sir, I will repeat the sentence as it should read. In speaking about the proceedings at the United Nations, I said: "Canada, too, wants peace and strives daily for justice for all. I hope and pray that both can be achieved, and hope that this government of which I am a loyal supporter will continue its efforts and in no way deviate from its path of traditional friendship toward Israel."

Mr. Speaker, at one time in my career I was a member of the air force. There I received training second to none, combined with a sense of duty and discipline which stood me in good stead throughout the following period of my life. May I now take this opportunity to express my deepest admiration for the work done by our armed forces, not only in defending Canada's sovereignty but, more especially, in the peacekeeping activities abroad where they become, for those of us at home, veritable ambassadors of goodwill and political stability. But apart from the other, more widely known roles of our national defence forces, I feel it is incumbent on us all to remind ourselves that the armed forces also provide perhaps the best training school we have in this country. Is it generally known, for instance, that many of our commercial pilots, doctors, engineers, nurses and even tradesmen such as butchers, clerks, cooks, and a long list of others, received their training in the armed forces? And what of our children? I know of few better ways of instilling in them a love of country, dedication to duty, purpose in life and broadening of interests than in the cadet movement.

Mr. Speaker, when I filed my nomination papers during the recent election campaign I gave as my profession that of housewife. I was recently asked what particular qualifications were needed for that profession, and I replied, "A lot of good common sense and patience". The budgets I prepared as a housewife can hardly be compared with those presented here, but there is at least one common denominator: we both had to list our priorities. In this respect, I hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), when setting his priorities, will give a high rating to medical research. Long before coming to this country I had read with great admiration of the work of two Canadian researchers. Diabetics throughout the world now owe their very lives to the studies and efforts of Dr. Banting and Dr. Best. Remarkable progress has been made in medicine and I hope that Canada will continue to promote studies to cure or, better still, to prevent the diseases which still plague mankind.

We have often been reminded that Canada is not one of the big powers. If power is measured by physical might and the quantity of Bellicose weapons we possess, then I hope we will never become one of the big powers. I believe, though, that we should broaden our understanding of this word. I believe that power can mean influence for the common good. I believe that by scrupulously following our moral obligations we are fast becoming not a big power but a great one. We live in an affluent society, yet there are several countries in this world which hunger not for power but for their daily bread. While most of our children eat their fill and pursue their dreams, theirs are condemned to malnutrition and early death from famine.

As a Canadian, I was proud when at the recent food conference in Rome our country took the lead. Instead of uttering pious platitudes we put forward constructive action. Nor will we now be complacent about this action. Our Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) urges us to put aside narrow self-interest and respond generously to the needs of weaker nations. I hope we will all rise to the challenge. If future generations are ever to accuse this parliament of fairness and humanity, I hope they will find ample evidence on which to convict us. The Minister of Finance will probably be criticized by some for not giving enough. Oliver Twist asked for more because he was in genuine need, and therefore no one can honestly blame him. But in our society there are others who ask for more and still more, and here we must be careful to distinguish between need and greed.

I have the greatest admiration for the frankness of the Minister of Finance. Like all of us, he has his ideals, but above all he is a realist. Of course, he would like to offer more, but I firmly believe that the time has come when we must put an end to the fiction that bigger and better programs are paid for by somebody else. There are those who demand, and once they receive they demand more. For those we could, perhaps, carry a statutory warning on every program which would read, "This package is hazardous to your economic health". The Canadian public is wary, and justly so, of those who would offer more goodies than the Sugarplum Fairy herself but at the same time carefully hide the price-tag; because Canadians know that whatever kind of tax system we have, in the final analysis all taxes are paid by the individual taxpayer in one way or another.

Like the Minister of Finance I, too, am confident that by working together at home and abroad we can overcome our difficulties. I feel that this can best be achieved, not by confrontation but by much more dialogue and more education. There have been heavy increases in the price of food and other basic commodities, and the consumer, with a certain sense of hopelessness and frustration, has often hit out at the apparent cause without pausing to wonder whether the attack was justified and, more important, whether the object of the helpless anger was indeed really the guilty party. No one will deny the producer a just and equitable reward. The operations of the Food Prices Review Board have gone a long way toward informing the consumer of the difficulties and uncertainties faced by the producer. But the consumer needs to know very much more than this. We must know how many middlemen there are between the farm gate and the consumer's table. Are they all necessary? Whom are we paying for what? How much do we pay for their services? Do their services always work in the interests of the consumer?

My personal experience in this area leads me to believe that there may well be erroneous assumption when it comes to consumer reaction and buyer attraction. Not too long ago I heard an advertising executive express the opinion that the average housewife would not buy a certain brand of cereal unless it were packaged in a colourful box. Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that so long as the cereal is nutritious and reasonably priced, the average housewife will look for her colour at the breakfast table in the natural hues of fruit juice, eggs, and so on, rather than in the more costly production of a multicoloured rooster.

I have already mentioned the advertising media with particular reference to the consumer. I would like to add that in few walks of life can we find the wealth of imagination, creative genius and even power that we find in the advertising media. Because of their power, especially as regards our children and the less sophisticated members of our society, I believe they have a very real responsibility toward our society and the consumer in general. To be more simplistic, I believe that when they teach us to buy they should also tell us why, and their reasons must be as responsible and as honest as their efforts to sell. To take one example, I believe it is morally wrong and highly irresponsible for anyone to try to persuade a young, naive consumer that his or her love-life will dramatically improve if he or she will only use a particular brand of toothpaste or a yucky shampoo. Most of us are well aware that if one does not already have a satisfactory love-life, no toothpaste or shampoo in the world will provide one with it. I would hope, in the interests of future family life in Canada, that our young people would choose their partners on more fundamental and honest criteria than that.

What of the radio announcement which warned us to have our television sets checked now, even though there is nothing wrong with them, instead of next year when prices go up? If we are now asked to have regular check-ups even for our appliances, then all we will end up with will probably be less spending money for other, more necessary items and we may even run the risk of owning a neurotic television set! I believe that this kind of thinking will in turn only lead to inflationary psychosis.

Inflation is a problem which cannot be faced by government alone: it is a battle in which we must all do our share. I believe that the Minister of Finance has made an excellent evaluation in setting his priorities and I feel that we should now do likewise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, one should commend hon. members who rise in the House for the first time to address their colleagues and the Canadian people and demonstrate great concern for people in their speeches, as evidenced by the distinguished and honourable new member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni). I am not an economist and I know very little about budgets, but I wish some members on the other side would, in terms of priority, let us get on with the bill for which we are all waiting. I wanted, in the limited time available to me this afternoon, to attempt in a historical sense to talk about national defence. I welcome the comments of the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) in this regard. Also, Mr. Speaker, I want to do something I have never done in this House, and that is to read a speech. I can read faster than I can talk, and I am less likely to be led astray.

● (1540)

There are a number of factors emerging in the current debate with respect to defence spending that I believe require the closest scrutiny of Canadians. For some years now I have had the curious feeling that a direction for the Canadian Forces has been set, procedures laid down and ends to be attained, that has not had cabinet approval nor an adequate input from Canadians generally, let alone the House of Commons. From a standing volunteer force of some 125,000 about ten years ago, we have—with no reduction of agreed defence roles—seen the forces run down to the present level of less than 80,000.

After the Second World War the forces were initially established at approximately 50,000 men and women. For a country which at that time ranked as the fourth power in the world, one which was firmly committed to support of the United Nations and one that heavily depended on foreign trade, this level of military strength was low; indeed, it was considerably short of what our senior military people at the time deemed responsible or prudent. Nevertheless, 1947 saw total forces strength drop to approximately 35,000 at a time when the then secretary of state for external affairs saw fit to be highly critical of the United Nations Security Council, claiming it had become "frozen in futility". The then secretary of state also stated as a guiding principle that there was "need to accept responsibilities in the same way in peace as in war". In the same year, Prime Minister Mackenzie King was widely acclaimed for initiative in establishing the charter for the North Atlantic Treaty.

The point is, Mr. Speaker, that from such actions and pronouncements of those most responsible for our external affairs, the people of Canada were led to believe we were prepared to back up words with action. The harsh reality of the outbreak of the Korean war on June 25, 1950, soon proved this assumption to be false. With the call for help to Korea on June 27, 1950, we were, fortunately, able to immediately dispatch from our small standing force a three-destroyer unit. However, with respect to the primary requirement for ground forces we were out in left field. We underwent the time-consuming and agonizing process of recruiting some 10,000 personnel and forming the 25th Infantry Brigade. This was a task that took much longer than our allies in that theatre would have wished, and a lot longer than was necessary or would have been taken if defence planning realistically had been tailored to external policy and the reality of the world around us.

The 25th Infantry Brigade was not in a position directly to contribute until February 19, 1951—this in spite of the fact that we were able to attract a large number of World War II veterans who were still competent in their military skills. As well, we still had an arsenal of conventional weapons and supporting equipment which was suited to the type of action involved; a situation which, of course, meant that rearming time was relatively short. Nevertheless, it took an embarrassing amount of time to respond to the call.

This leads me to my first general observation. With a force of 50,000 in 1950 we were not able to respond adequately to a plea for help, even with the relatively unsophisticated weapons and delivery systems of those days. How can we expect to respond today, in a timely fashion that might involve us in hostility or combat with a higher level of sophistication, with the weapons and armed delivery systems which we have? Since 1950 Canada has been assuming responsibility for an increasing number of sophisticated defence tasks. This means that an increasing percentage of our military personnel can be expected to be trained for support rather than for front-line roles. It follows that availability of front-line trained personnel out of the purported 80,000 men and women is unlikely to be much better now than was the case in 1950.

Another area of concern relates to equipment. In all too many cases we are still using fighting equipment that was available in World War II and the Korean war days. Why have we not replaced this equipment? Certainly, Mr. Speaker, we have had plenty of assurances during the past several years that our forces equipment would be modernized. However, these patronizing assurances always seem to have the same result: a further rundown in personnel, no new equipment, and more assurances that with further reorganization and cutbacks all traditional, plus new commitments will be met because money saved through resultant efficiency will be available to buy new equipment.

We know what happened. The traditional opposition approach, when there is reason to suspect serious mishandling of defence matters, is to resort to what might be called the numbers game; that is, attempting to judge the relative merits and costs in terms of dollars and personnel with respect to re-equipment and modernization. This has proved to be a useful technique but, strangely enough, I have been rather more inclined in recent months to question seriously the intentions of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in this respect. I am pleased to see him in the chamber. I question his intentions for the armed forces today and in the future. I think it is in this direction that Canadians will find some, if not all, of the answers.

Liberal prime ministers during this century, with perhaps one qualified exception, have displayed consistent lack of appreciation of the relationship of national sovereignty and defence responsibility. Prior to World War I, Laurier consistently sought national autonomy while avoiding defence commitments outside Canada's borders. Borden, on the other hand, took an opposite approach while being equally concerned with autonomy. Borden freely accepted defence commitments and consequently was able, primarily because of the magnificent performance in battle of our soldiers, to demand—not beg—a strong, independent voice in international affairs.

Later, in the mid-1930s, under somewhat similar circumstances, Mackenzie King significantly added to the Liberal tradition of an inward-looking if not irresponsible attitude toward defence. With war clouds ominously gathering over Europe, he made it perfectly clear that he did not want Canada to have any related defence commitments. He was agreeable to having armament industrial business for Canada so long as there was no associated Canadian government responsibility for administering contracts. In 1936, when his defence minister proved so unwise as to support a military recommendation for a $200 million, five-year program, Mr. King expressed his displeasure so vehemently that the defence minister dropped his request.

By this time an aroused public, obviously made of more responsible stuff than the Liberal government of the day, forced an about-face attitude toward participation. The country was, as might have been expected, militarily unprepared. But, thanks to the extra time provided by the somewhat "on again, off again" philosophy early in World War I, our national embarrassment with respect to preparedness was reduced to some extent. Canada was again portrayed as a clearly autonomous and responsible entity in the eyes of the world.

In 1950, albeit forced by an alerted opposition and an aroused public over readiness to meet the Korean difficulty, the then prime minister, Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, took action that appeared to break tradition with Liberal attitudes toward defence. Instead of the standard pattern of isolationist, inward-looking policies of the past, defence forces were built up toward a more responsible status. Defence watchers were encouraged to proclaim that Canada at last appreciated that defence was integral to political and economic factors in the world at large. Not everyone was convinced, and the contrary viewpoint was perhaps best expressed by Mr. Frank Underhill in 1953 when he wrote:

> ... the most modest quota of armed forces to Korea and western Europe shows only a reluctant, half-isolationist acceptance of new, unpleasant international duties—maybe we should not flatter ourselves that the 1950s are so far in advance of the 1920s.

Mr. Speaker, if there is any validity whatever with respect to Mr. Underhill's criticism of Canada's defence posture in the 1950s, I suggest it must represent an undeniable truth in relation to the 1970s. This leads me back to my concern about the Prime Minister's attitude toward defence. Not only does he demonstrate the traditional Liberal-prime minister lack of appreciation of the relationship of international and defence responsibilities, but it seems he is prepared deliberately to deceive the Canadian public as to what our defence capability really is. It is one thing to quite openly adopt an isolationist stance and face the public's conclusion; it is quite another matter to pretend to have an order of defence capability that in reality does not exist.

From the outset the Prime Minister has demonstrated to Canadians his desire to retreat from world involvement. Suggestions of isolationism have surrounded many of his moves since 1967. With respect to the forces, he has questioned their necessity. He has confronted our neighbours to the south on numerous occasions. He masterminded the unilateral withdrawal of half of our forces from NATO at a delicate point in MBFR talks and would have brought them all home except for pressures both from within NATO and from Canadians here at home. Conceding only the importance of international trade, every other posture has been toward neutrality, away from the traditions and patterns of our external alliances and toward external postures which reflect only our own self-interests. They have been away from the recognition that we are deeply involved in a world that does not as yet know peace nor is able to discern it for the immediate years ahead.

We have been cautioned by our senior military field commanders that the forces can no longer meet the roles and tasks as presently laid down for them with fewer men than they now have. Indeed, it is interesting to note we have now eroded about 40 per cent of our first priority, that of the defence of Canada, so that we might support our fourth priority, that of maintenance and supervision in the Middle East. Indeed, most of them will privately admit that they are hard pressed to even meet these roles with their present strength levels. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that in this regard it is reassuring to have our senior men speaking out.

I have always believed that it was not alone the responsibility of cabinet to maintain civil control over the military but, rather, the responsibility of an informed electorate as well. We will only be fully informed when our senior professional military leaders are able to speak out. I think it is healthy to have an informed electorate, and if this is the only way then let us have more of it from time to time. I trust the high degree of professionalism and belief in our country that is deposited in our general ranking officers. The present minister does not strike many Canadians as being one who is prepared to fight the battles of his professional force within cabinet or with the Prime Minister. He is a good man but he is not known for his strength in cabinet. Therefore, what else can one conclude but that it is the PMO calling the shots?

We do not have enough funds adequately to meet our first priority, let alone the other three. We have not renewed our equipment. We have not renewed our armaments nor their delivery long-range systems. We have shelved long-range maritime patrol replacement. We have seen plans to replace our track-tank. We have not gone into the many areas where equipment renewals are not only necessary but important if we are to maintain the confidence of our allies both within the United Nations and here on the North American continent.

I cannot help feeling that the present position of the Canadian armed forces is as a direct result of application of the personal philosophy of the Prime Minister. If he has sought out the best senior professional military advice and the highest level of external affairs advice available, and on the basis of that advice has concluded that Canada does not require a national armed force, let us have some national dialogue and debate. He may be right, but I say he is not—and he will not be right if he has taken this position in isolation. He is not acting responsibly on behalf of Canada by putting our forces in a position where they are no longer an adequate military force but a paramilitary force with the role of protecting the north or the mid-Canada line. I say the Prime Minister is wrong. The position he has adopted is a disservice to Canada and our allies to the south. It is an enormous disservice to our trading partners around the world.

I suggest he has let down the United Nations with regard to Canada's traditional undertaking to support those actions which require the presence of a neutral military force. I reiterate that Canadians will not find the answer to concerns about Canada's defence forces in numbers, but in the deliberate denial by the Prime Minister's office alone, bypassing the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) and not providing the funds required and asked for by the senior professional military force in order to maintain an adequate force capable of meeting the priorities which this government has given to it. The least possible position acceptable to the forces and Canadians in general is for the Prime Minister to indicate the posture he would like to see them adopt with regard to our four priorities and to our role in the world today. That is the least the Prime Minister owes to the Canadian armed forces.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair would like some direction from the House with regard to the order adopted on November 21 setting a limit of 20 minutes on speeches of hon. members. I know that under Standing Order 60 there is no time limit. I wish to be sure of this order now, rather than have someone interrupt the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) after 20 minutes. I would like to be sure that he has unlimited time according to Standing Order 60(9). Is this agreed?

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, we completely agree that despite the terms of the order the Prime Minister should have more than 20 minutes. That is proper, not only because he is Prime Minister but because he will need additional time to deal with these issues.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I trust the Prime Minister is not worried lest I disagree. The fact is that we agree but, as one of my colleagues says, we hope the Prime Minister will have something to say. We hope he will not follow the rule religiously and speak for unlimited time. We hope he can present his case within an hour.

● (1600)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the House leader of the Conservative Party for agreeing that I not be limited by the 20-minute rule. I shall take some time to deal with the subject which the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) yesterday asked the then Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp) to make sure I would deal with. That will take up a substantial part of my speech. To the House leader of the New Democratic Party I would say that I want to deal with the questions asked of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) by him, questions relating to petroleum in general. This will take some time. The only thing I can tell the House leader of the New Democratic Party is that I shall not imitate the sixteenth century divine who exhausted time and encroached upon eternity.

[Translation]

This year, Mr. Speaker, for the first time in the Canadian history, we have witnessed in an unprecedented way the formidable power of Parliament, with its right to question the budgetary policy of the government. Its refusal of our budget, six months ago, had consequences which caused us to realize more fully the implications of parliamentary democracy.

While I still hold that the recent general election which resulted was both inopportune and useless, except from a constitutional point of view, I remain convinced that the concretizing of the official terms and conditions of our constitution in the supremacy of Parliament and the dependency of the government on the support of the people, has been beneficial not only to Canada, but also to each and every one of us.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

Modesty forbids me to elaborate unduly on the collective decision of the electorate, while my inborn kindness prevents me from emphasizing what the Canadian people thought of the arguments on which hon. members of the opposition based their rejection of our budget.

I need only say, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberal party is now on this side of the House, to your right, that it is presenting a new budget, that it has a few more members and that its members are a little more confident about the results of the vote to be held later.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, many things have changed since May. Only one has remained and will remain the same: the resolve of the government to listen attentively to the concerns and problems of the people who elected it to serve them, and to bring effective solutions to all those difficulties.

There is no doubt that the steady increase in the cost of living constitutes the main concern of most Canadians. We are well aware of that concern that prevails throughout the country. That feeling sometimes turns into powerless rage in the face of economic forces that spread such painful uncertainty among so many Canadian families. We have seen illustrations of that indignation with the recent livestock slaughters and the waste of millions of eggs—scandalous things to happen in a starving world. We still see that feeling in the quiet but deep concern of those workers and their families who could be overcome in their fight to maintain their economic position within the community.

We also find that concern among elder people abashed by the decrease in their purchasing power and who still feel its cruel effects.

Young couples who are disappointed at seeing fade away in an uncertain future their hope of owning their own house one day are also deeply concerned. And the concerned faces of small entrepreneurs and businessmen tired of explaining to their customers that they are not responsible for inflation, but rather its victims, tell us a lot about their state of mind.

We know that many parents are concerned not only about being able to provide decent food, clothing and shelter for their children but also about the economic stability of the world in which they will have to live their adult lives.

Threatened by inflationary forces he does not fully understand, but convinced that no government, no group of influence is entirely responsible for the problem nor able to solve it alone, the average Canadian seems to have adopted an ambivalent attitude.

On the one hand, he is increasingly inclined to look first and above all after his personal interest and those of his family. On the other hand, he is more aware than ever of the interdependence of individuals and nations, more prepared to co-operate and participate in a joint action against that common enemy that is economic instability.

People want a government that is alert and sensitive to their needs, a government that shows compassion for the vulnerable and the weak, a government that can come up with solutions to its most pressing problems.

Mr. Speaker, even though the economic uncertainty is extremely serious, the Canadians seem to be deeply aware of the strength and good fortune of Canada: they are confident that by working together at home and in co-operation with other nations, they will finally succeed in solving the world problem with which they are now grappling.

On this side of the House, I admit it willingly, we are disappointed to see how weak an influence governments can exert on the problem that exists on a world-wide scale. But that feeling of frustration has reinforced, and not weakened, the will of this government to act vigorously everytime it can hope, ever so slightly to succeed, even partially, in the common fight against the plague of inflation.

[English]

Despite our frustration, Mr. Speaker, this government has been, and will continue to be, a government committed to strong and effective action to protect the individual in his personal fight against inflation and to protect the country by maintaining a high level of economic activity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: While we have refused to put on the economic strait-jacket which the Conservative Party tried unsuccessfully to sell to the Canadian people, we are continuing to wage war against inflation on several fronts. The budget we are debating is proof of our resolve. Because shortages often drive up prices, create hardship and slow down economic activity, we are giving high priority to measures designed to stimulate the production of a greater supply of the things we need, especially food, energy and housing. Through the two-price wheat system and the federal-provincial energy agreement we are protecting Canadian consumers against the worst effects of high world prices for two vital commodities while at the same time guaranteeing a fair return to Canadian producers.

It was with reference to the oil pricing agreement of March 27 that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), in his speech a week ago, most clearly revealed the policy vacuum within his own party. To set the stage, let us go back in time to the spring of this year, to the discussions which resulted in the agreement to set $6.50 as the fair domestic price for a barrel of oil. Consider the political problem which confronted the Leader of the Opposition at that time. He could not at one and the same time support the Conservative premier of Alberta who would have liked a higher price, and the Conservative premier of Ontario who would have liked a lower price. Still less could he support the federal compromise of $6.50 because, in the rather antiquated political philosophy of the Conservative Party, that would be the most serious crime imaginable—admitting that a Liberal government of Canada had accomplished something worth while for the people of Canada. What could he do? He had to say something lest the Conservative Party should appear to be an irrelevant observer in a matter of critical importance to the country.

The Leader of the Opposition found his answer in a kind of rhetorical camouflage which allowed him to endorse all the motherhood principles involved, which allowed him to avoid either agreeing or disagreeing with any of the parties to the discussion and allowed him, most importantly, to avoid taking any position whatsoever on the most crucial question at issue, that is, whether $6.50 was a fair price. Yes, he was in favour of a fair return to the producer, and he was even in favour of a fair return to the consumer. Yes, he was in favour of a domestic price lower than the world price. But what about the guts of the issue: was he in favour of $6.50 as a fair price, a reasonable compromise between the competing interests of producer and consumer? His answer was a revealing silence, a pervasive silence which continues to this very moment.

There was a time, Mr. Speaker, when political games of that nature—creating the appearance of a policy to mask the fact that a party does not want to take a stand—and that kind of tactic could have fooled a large part of the electorate. The difficulty for the Conservatives is that the Canadian electorate has become too well informed, too sophisticated to be fooled by the old tried and true Tory strategy. I would have thought they had learned that lesson in July, but they have not.

The proof can be found in the address delivered in this chamber last Wednesday by the Leader of the Opposition. In only one part of his speech could I find any reasonable attack. He pointed out, rightly, that some months ago I had cited the Carter commission as supporting the government's view on disallowing provincial royalties as an expense for federal tax purposes. I have learned that I was misinformed at the time and I agree with the hon. gentleman opposite that the record should be corrected. I know that the Leader of the Opposition, in similar circumstances, would be equally willing to admit a mistake, just as I know he would be as surprised as I was to hear a human error described as a dishonest act. In his speech he also used words like "bad faith" and "treachery"—headline grabbers which deflected attention from the fact that he took no position whatsoever on the issue he was purporting to discuss.

The issue, Mr. Speaker, is the entitlement of the federal government, the producing provinces and the producing companies to fair shares of resource production profits, shares consistent with the rights, needs and responsibilities of each. The question before us is whether the provision in the budget which disallows provincial royalties as deductible expenses in the computation of federal corporate income tax is a reasonable and necessary step toward re-establishment of an equitable pattern of revenue sharing. We believe it is. Some provincial spokesmen believe it is not. Premier Blakeney even stated to the Canadian Press a couple of days ago: "Since resources are constitutionally a provincial area, they are owned by the provinces. As a matter of principle the provinces should get everything over and above a fair return to the corporations". That is what Premier Blakeney believes.

What does the Leader of the Opposition believe? We do not know. We cannot know. Only he knows, and he's not telling. Through the strategem of harsh accusations he has avoided giving any answer to the critical questions at stake. Does he believe the share of resource revenue claimed by the federal government is excessive? He offers silence. What level of sharing does he consider to be fair and reasonable? More silence. Does he support ths provincial argument that the federal government should share with the companies whatever is left over after the producing provinces take as much as they want, no matter how much they want? Deafening silence, Mr. Speaker. He has refused to come down on the side of either the federal or provincial governments in this revenue sharing debate. He has refused to offer any alternative position.

He opted for the appearance of strong disagreement with the federal position, without indicating any actual substantial disagreement. He opted for the appearance of agreement with the provincial government of Alberta, without giving any hint of any actual substantial agreement. In the finest Tory tradition, he skirted the real issues by choosing bombast over substance, rhetoric over commitment. Such a performance does not deserve to be commended, even by the political pragmatists within his own party. He deserves to be exposed, and that is what I propose to do.

The foundation of the attack launched by the Leader of the Opposition was the statement that the resource producing provinces would never have agreed to the March oil pricing agreement if they had known that we would disallow provincial royalties as deductible expenses. He therefore implied that resource industry revenue sharing was an essential ingredient of the March agreement. He further implied that the federal government had made a secret pre-agreement decision to disallow royalties, and that alleged decision vitiated any claim we might make to have been bargaining in good faith with the provinces during our discussions early this year.

Let me deal first with the implication that the provincial governments had no indication, no warning prior to the March conference that the federal government would take strong action to protect its interests in the event that the provinces altered their royalty structures in such a way as to freeze us out of the field of resource taxation or, alternatively, reduce our access. Let me deal at the same time with the allegation that the federal government somehow violated the March agreement by subsequently modifying the level of federal taxation of the resource industries. I would emphasize, first of all, Mr. Speaker, that matters relating to federal and provincial levels of taxation formed no part of the March agreement. It was an agreement on price, not an agreement on the sharing of production profits.

Let me remind the House, for the record, of the earlier approach that we adopted at the end of January of this year at an open conference televised for everyone to see, an approach which precisely was one of trying to get an agreement on the sharing of production profits. We had proposed a sharing. We had proposed shares which no doubt were debatable but which were not debated. It was the approach of sharing which was rejected, and this is why in March, when we had only a few days left to make sure that some order was brought into the petroleum industry, we had to act. That is why we did not use this sharing of profits approach; we looked for an agreement on price and on a few other things which I reported to the House and which I will be talking about. Once again we must keep in context the January approach, which was one of sharing. We did not want the industries to be driven out of business. We did not want the provinces to have too little. We did not want to take too much. We wanted to discuss fair shares, but there was no discussion.

So we come to the March agreement. It is true that prior to the agreement, some time early in March, Premiers Lougheed and Blakeney both gave me an indication of their intentions, the former proposing to move to a royalty rate of about 65 per cent on oil prices above the old price levels then prevailing and the latter proposing to take close to 100 per cent. Premier Lougheed, for instance, told me privately on March 4 of his intentions to move to 65 per cent and I expressed my concern over this. I indicated to him by phone on March 8 that this would be going too far, from our point of view, eating into what we considered a reasonable federal level of corporation tax receipts.

So levels of taxation and royalties were, indeed, discussed with Premiers Blakeney and Lougheed a number of times during the period leading up to March 27, but no agreement was reached. I emphasized that the new and much increased royalty schedules contemplated by the two provinces were a serious concern to the federal government. I indicated that we had to reserve the right to take whatever tax action we felt appropriate and necessary to protect the federal revenue position. To underline still further the fact that the provinces were advised of our concern in relation to royalty levels, and were advised of our determination to protect the federal interest, I would refer to correspondence, copies of which I placed on the table on Monday, between myself and the premiers of Alberta and Saskatchewan on this matter.

Particularly relevant are substantially similar letters I sent to each of the premiers on March 12 of this year, 15 days before the oil price agreement was achieved, not an agreement on taxes. In my letter to Premier Lougheed I said in part:

> Finally, with respect to oil policy as such, I should like to comment upon the potential impact of provincial royalty policy upon the corporation income tax. The taxation of corporate income has long been regarded as one of the most important tools of federal fiscal and economic development policy. Further, I think that the needs of the federal government to be able to share, to a reasonably appropriate degree, in the various streams of income across the country are self-evident. Historically, it has not been difficult to reconcile the interests of federal and provincial governments in this regard, but the taxation of the added income arising from higher oil prices is presenting us with a new set of problems.

I continue to quote from the letter, Mr. Speaker:

> As I indicated to you, we feel we must preserve the effectiveness of the federal taxing power to raise needed federal revenues.

As I indicated, this was the phone call I made to Premier Lougheed. I continued:

> We understand that the provinces appreciate this fully, but believe that any federal action should be confined to the corporation tax field. Under the existing tax structure, a very high level of provincial royalties obviously erodes the corporate tax base and narrows substantially the scope for whatever incentives the federal government feels necessary to maintain exploration.

I would repeat those words, "a very high level of provincial royalties". I continue to quote from the letter, Mr.

Speaker, and would ask hon. members opposite to remember these words before making accusations of bad faith:

In underlining these facts, I do not want in any way to question your right to levy royalties, or to comment upon your royalty policy. However, I must make clear that any action that you may decide to take in respect of royalties would have to be without prejudice to our freedom of action as regards federal taxation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Lougheed has suggested that this warning, clear as I thought it was, was not a sufficient indication to him that the federal government would go as far as to consider changes in the long-standing treatment of provincial royalties. I accept his statement without question and regret that any misunderstanding could have occurred. Yet I still think the warning was about as clear as we could make it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I will read it again, because I think there is a bit of misunderstanding.

Mr. Broadbent: I have read it. I have a copy here.

Mr. Trudeau: I will read it again as you do not seem to have understood it. I stated:

. . . I must make clear that any action that you may decide to take . . .

That was to Premier Lougheed, and I was writing the same thing to Premier Blakeney.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The same letter.

Mr. Trudeau: It was the same letter, in which I stated:

. . . I must make clear that any action you may decide to take in respect of royalties would have to be without prejudice to our freedom of action as regards federal taxation.

I still think that warning was about as clear as we could make it, in view of the fact that the federal government at that point had made no decision as to the specific nature of any action we would take. We were reserving our right to act, in principle. We had not yet determined what instrument we would use, but there was no doubt in my mind, as I made clear to the premiers, that the federal government would have to act to protect its tax base. What was unresolved at the time was the question of which particular instrument we might use to achieve our goal. That decision was made after the meeting of first ministers, in the weeks immediately preceding the budget of May 6. The Minister of Finance in his budget speech explained why we adopted this particular instrument. It might be worth while to repeat the arguments very briefly.

Why did we choose this technique of total disallowance of royalties instead of some other device? It was for very good reasons. After a full examination of all the alternatives open to us, we found that total disallowance was the only instrument capable of re-establishing a fair share for the federal government of resource production profits. There was no other way. In fact, if we had maintained the deductibility of royalties but eliminated every other federal incentive to the resource industries, we would still have fallen far short of an equitable federal share. If we had eliminated the depletion allowances, the 100 per cent write-off for exploration costs, the 30 per cent write-off for developing costs, and the new abatements—if we had done all those things we would still not have come close to re-establishing a balance because of the magnitude of the return from the provinces under the royalty structure.

I invite hon. members to read that letter in full. The letter I quoted from, I repeat, was sent 15 days before the March agreement. I would then invite hon. members to compare it with the statement made in this House last Wednesday by the Leader of the Opposition when he said:

The Minister of Finance must have known, the Prime Minister must have known, that the provinces concerned would never have entered into that agreement on March 27 if they had entertained the slightest suspicion about what the Minister of Finance intended to do on May 6, and what he repeated again on Monday night.

Then followed these memorable words:

That is what I mean by treachery, sir. Those Pearl Harbour boys are at it again.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Trudeau: If there was any treachery, it was not on our part; it was on the part of whichever friend of the opposition leader misinformed him to such an extent that he was persuaded to climb out on the limb which has now been cut off.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: There has also been the suggestion that once we made the decision announced on May 6 we should have assumed that the March 27 agreement was void and should have recalled the first ministers. That presupposes, of course, that the agreement covered the question of taxes and royalties, which, as I have noted already, was simply not the case. Does the hon. gentleman opposite really believe, for example, that we would have agreed to the 100 per cent royalty rate adopted by Saskatchewan, leaving no federal share through corporate taxes of the excess revenues involved in moving the price from about $4 to about $6.50? Does he agree with the views expressed by Premier Blakeney in an interview published in the press yesterday where he is quoted as having said that as a matter of principle the provinces should get everything, over and above a fair return for the corporations? I reject that principle, implying as it does that the people of Canada as a whole have no right to any share of the higher revenue resulting from the increased market value of natural resources.

● (1630)

I challenge the Leader of the Opposition to say whether he accepts the principle enunciated by the Premier of Saskatchewan. I am particularly interested to know what the members of the New Democratic Party in this House think of that new doctrine. What do they think of the new doctrine? What does Premier Schreyer think of it? Please let me know. Of course the question of royalties was vital to provincial interests, as were many other factors which had to be considered by all governments before agreement was reached on the $6.50 price, a compromise on all sides made in the knowledge that the price would be reviewed again before too long and hopefully a new bargain struck—one in which the export tax, for example, will almost certainly be a smaller factor than has been the case under the current agreement.

On that latter point, Mr. Speaker, I repudiate the suggestion that the Minister of Finance misled the public by not including the yield from the export tax in his calculation of the current federal share of resource production profits. The export tax is a unique, short-term and disappearing phenomenon. It is a device designed to make possible the federal-provincial agreement that there should be a single domestic price for oil lower than the world price. Benefits derived from the export tax do not remain with the federal government; they are transferred to the provinces east of the Ottawa Valley line so that consumers and industry there may pay roughly the same price as those west of the line.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: So the export tax does not belong in any discussion of the long-term sharing of production profits. Indeed, those who include it are themselves distorting the real picture.

I would like, now, to take a few moments to deal with a question of special importance to the province of Saskatchewan. Premier Blakeney has reacted unfavourably to the budget proposals on equalization. I should like to discuss this question in particular, because Premier Blakeney has been quoted in the press as saying that the proposed equalization arrangements appear to be a clear, direct and specific violation of both the spirit and letter of the March agreement of first ministers. He is also reported to have said, "Saskatchewan would get $40 million less this year than if the oil pricing agreement had continued to be honoured by Ottawa".

In my view, Mr. Speaker, the budget proposals on equalization are clearly in accord with the spirit of the arrangements which were accepted in a general way at the March meeting. Moreover, there is no doubt in my mind that Premier Blakeney is mistaken in implying that the oil pricing agreement would fully protect Saskatchewan from any reduction of equalization in respect of oil. I would like to recall for hon. members the nature of the understanding which was reached by first ministers last March. On March 28 I reported to Parliament on the effect of the new provincial oil revenues on federal equalization payments to the provinces as follows:

> The House may wish to note that Saskatchewan intends to place most of its added oil revenues in a capital fund for energy development. Alberta proposes to handle a high proportion of its added revenues in the same manner. While the revenues taken into their capital funds would not be subject to equalization the federal government will, of course, pay equalization respecting any oil revenues that go into general funds. We calculate our added equalization payments will likely be something over $100 million.

This is very vital to the agreement that was reached between the first ministers, because on the one hand those provinces which are consumers of oil and not producers were saying that Alberta and Saskatchewan are getting rich, and asked whether this means that the equalizations payments would correspond to that added wealth, as in other instances added wealth has meant increased equalization payments. Of course, the producing provinces did not have the same point of view. Nor did we. We did not want the totality of the added revenues to go into equalization, because the way we calculated it, we would have ended up in a short time even having to pay equalization to Ontario. This would have made a mockery of the whole system of helping the poor provinces. So we reached this compromise of a fund. Everything put into the fund would not be subject to equalization, and everything that went into general revenue would be subject to equalization. This is the principle. Now, let us see how it applies if we follow the letter of the March agreement and the letter of the budget or the spirit of either. Let us see how it applies, because this statement makes clear our understanding, and I repeat here that our additional revenue would be treated in two ways for purposes of equalization.

The understanding did not go so far as to specify the specific proportion of additional oil revenues that would be placed in general and capital funds by each of the producing provinces. However, it did indicate that this proportion would be high in the case of both Alberta and Saskatchewan. In making calculations of equalization for 1974-75, since last March—the federal government has made the following assumptions: First, that Saskatchewan would place all of its additional revenues from oil into capital funds. I think this would satisfy the interruption of a moment ago by the NDP. Second, that Alberta would place 65 per cent of its additional revenues from oil royalties into capital funds, but none of its additional revenues from other kinds of levies on oil. Third, that none of the other producing provinces would place any of their additional revenues into capital funds, referring of course to revenues from oil. Over-all, we expected that this would have the effect of excluding from equalization approximately two-thirds of the additional revenues from oil.

The Minister of Finance has already referred to the difficulties which would be encountered if the equalization calculations were to be dependent on provincial decisions from time to time respecting sequestering of oil revenues in capital funds. Therefore, an alternative method of implementing the intent of the March understanding has been developed and will be discussed with provincial finance ministers next week when the federal Minister of Finance meets with the provincial ministers of finance. He will put the alternatives before them. However, it might be interesting for the House to know the results and to know of the two systems.

Mr. Baldwin: They had better take along a Bible: they will want a Bible at that meeting in order to have someone sworn.

● (1640)

Mr. Trudeau: I think the hon. member opposite has really elevated his mind. I remember a few years ago when his authority was the Canada Year Book. Now it is the Bible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Do you remember that time, Mr. Speaker, when you were a backbencher and the hon. member, in the debate on the rules, quoted the Canada Year Book as his authority? But now the Bible may give him something to think about.

Mr. Baldwin: You don't understand either of them. You had better read one of them.

Mr. Trudeau: I hear the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) saying that the hon. member should try the Koran.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The new equalization proposal should produce approximately the same result as the March understanding since it also involves the inclusion of one-third of the additional revenues from oil. Estimates have been made of the amount of equalization that would be paid under the new proposal for 1974-75—the ones in the budget of the Minister of Finance—and the results have been compared with the latest official calculation of equalization for that year, 1974-75; a calculation made in September on the basis of the March understanding. The results are virtually identical both in total and in distribution.

In fact—I will wait until the leader of the NDP pays attention, because I am sure he would want to know that this is the crux of the argument he has been throwing at me and the Premier of Saskatchewan—the province of Saskatchewan would be slightly better off under the new proposal than it would be on the basis of the March understanding.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Surely these facts cannot be taken by Premier Blakeney as evidence of a breach of the spirit of the March 27 understanding. Federal ministers and officials have all along been concerned about providing Saskatchewan with protection against a catastrophic fall in its equalization entitlement, even though the province is enjoying an increase in oil revenues which this year is likely to exceed $200 million. In short, we have sought ways to protect Saskatchewan from the full effects of the equalization formula which, roughly speaking, provides that as a province gets richer it receives less help.

We never contemplated, however, that the province would experience no loss in its equalization entitlement, no matter how rich it became from new oil revenues. Indeed, to protect the province absolutely from any decline in equalization payments would have made a mockery of the equalization system. Finally, I should note that the benefits to Saskatchewan from the budget proposal concerning equalization will apply for three fiscal years, whereas the March understanding would apply for only 15 months.

I hope that these facts will help clear the air of the accusations we have been hearing inside and outside the House, as well as in the media, for the past few days, that in some way we broke an agreement because we acted in a certain way. The agreeing parties knew of it in advance; they were warned of the principles of our action, particularly as the so-called breach relates to matters which were not part of that agreement. I hope that will clear the air a little bit and at least deter the Leader of the Opposition from using such words as "treachery" and "bad faith."

I agree that in this debate there is some difficulty in understanding the compromise between the federal and provincial governments, not only the federal government and the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. Hon. members are wise enough to realize that there were other provinces at that meeting and they wanted a lower price and an equalization formula that would be of more benefit to them than the one that was reached. So there was an honest disagreement. A compromise was reached and an agreement made. I think that should be the basis of any discussion. I repeat that if there are any policies that the Tory Party or, for that matter, the NDP want to put forward to show how a better agreement can be reached—because they and we will have to reach a decision in this parliament for the period following July 1—it would be interesting for them to begin now to lay down the groundwork for their principles on the basis of which they will give advice to the government, rather than waiting until a year later and talking of a breach of agreement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I think that our policies, their policies and the views of the Canadian people would be more enlightened if we sketched briefly the history of the taxation of the resource industries in Canada and explained why we had to act as we did. For many years, and especially during the 2½ decades following the Second World War, the tax policies of the federal government were designed to foster and encourage the discovery and development of Canada's minerals, oil and gas. The federal government granted preferential tax treatment to these industries. The three most important of these incentives were automatic depletion, rapid write-off of exploration and development expenses, and the three-year tax holiday for new mines.

So generous were these incentives—I think some people even used the word "rip-off", but they are on the other side of the argument and say that we do not do enough to encourage the development of the mines—that in the petroleum industry only a handful of producers had paid any tax by the end of 1972 and the total amount of tax paid to the federal government over the entire period was less then $400 million. During this same period, provinces levied royalties on oil and gas production and collected about $4 billion in the form of royalties and other charges. This figure does not include provincial corporation tax revenues of about $100 million. Over this same period, federal taxes collected from the mining industry were also very low. Federal taxes amounted to considerably less than 15 per cent of book profits before tax, while federal taxes on all other non-resource industries averaged more than 30 per cent, compared to 15 per cent in the mining industry.

In sum, over the long period of development from 1945 to 1972, provinces received almost ten times as much revenue from the petroleum industry, and about 1¼ times as much revenue from the mining industry, as did the federal government. At the same time, the federal government sought further to encourage resource development in the west by establishing the Borden line, guaranteeing an assured market for western production and at a price higher than world prices so that consumers in Canada were paying higher prices to help develop the petroleum industry of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: In this debate on throttling the petroleum industry, which we hear mainly from the Alberta members, let them remember these figures. Who has been taking the lion's share for the past 25 years, and who has been giving incentives by taking a very modest share, ten times less? The federal government has been developing these industries and giving incentives. The provinces were getting a pretty good revenue. Now, when prices have gone up, I think we should stay in the same position. Yet they say that any increase in our taxes is a sign that we want to drive the petroleum industry out of business. This is not the context in which the petroleum industry was developed, because the industry responded extremely well to the income tax incentives granted over this period. Canadian productive capacity was greatly expanded, so that by the middle of the 1960s it was becoming clear that a lesser degree of federal tax incentives was required to maintain a healthy and growing resource industry.

● (1650)

It is important to recall that in designing the tax regime enacted in 1971 the government acted against the background of the long-standing provincial tax and royalty structure which was in effect at that time. The level of royalties in the petroleum industry was about one-sixth of the wellhead price. The rate of provincial mining taxes at that time did not exceed 15 per cent in any province. One of the objectives of the 1971 regime for taxation of the resource industries was that all Canadians should willingly bear the cost of the tax incentives and should not expect to lay claim to substantial revenues through the tax system in years of relatively low prices. In return, all Canadians could expect to benefit from a reasonable share of the profits of these industries in years of higher prices. At the same time, the people in the producing provinces would receive a reasonable share of the value of output each and every year. As I will show in a moment, were it not for the provisions of this budget the intent that all Canadians benefit during years of higher prices would have been frustrated.

During the period between the beginning of tax reform on January 1, 1972, and the end of the first quarter of 1974 the situation was as follows. The price of Canadian oil and gas was rising slowly. The federal government's share of oil and gas production profits was running at about 5 per cent to 5½ per cent. The provincial share, including royalties and provincial corporation taxes, averaged about 22 per cent.

Mr. Broadbent: Because you were not taxing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You can't have it both ways. Make up your mind.

Mr. Trudeau: So we are taxing now. Are you going to support us? Are you going to support our budget? We are taxing now.

Mr. Broadbent: Continue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Trudeau: We helped develop the petroleum industry in Saskatchewan, Mr. Speaker. The people of Canada helped through these tax incentives. Now that prices are higher, we think in all fairness the people of Canada should get back a little bit of what they paid.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: In April, 1974, the price of Canadian oil rose to $6.50 per barrel at the wellhead. Had the provinces left their royalty structure as it was in January, 1974, their revenues in 1974 would have been about 31 per cent of production profits. By virtue of the price increase, federal revenues would have risen to about 13 per cent. This increase in the federal share from 6 per cent to 13 per cent was in keeping with the expectation that all Canadians would begin to share in the profits resulting from the higher prices. I remind the House that this was the sharing of petroleum revenues that would have existed for the last three-quarters of 1974 under the tax and royalty structures in place last January. But during 1974 the provinces began to levy new and heavier royalties and other charges. Alberta introduced an incremental royalty which averaged 65 per cent of the increased price of oil.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Trudeau: Saskatchewan introduced a royalty equivalent to 100 per cent of the increased price.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Trudeau: British Columbia introduced new and heavy royalties on oil and announced that the British Columbia Petroleum Corporation would appropriate most of any increase in the price of gas. All of these additional levies on income of petroleum producers were in the form of charges of a kind that under the then existing federal tax regime would have the effect of reducing federal income tax revenues. As a direct consequence of these actions the federal share of production revenues would have fallen from 13 per cent to 6 per cent in the last nine months of 1974. In the same period, provincial revenues would have risen from 31 per cent to 42 per cent of production income. A very low level of federal tax would have persisted in the years ahead. For the balance of the decade, and notwithstanding any further increases in the prices of oil and gas, the federal share would not have increased significantly from this 6 per cent level; yet the provincial share would have continued to increase from 31 per cent to 42 per cent. This would have meant that the residents of the resource-rich provinces would have enjoyed very significant benefits, while Canadians in other parts of the country would have enjoyed very little benefit.

This low percentage was not the reasonable share that Canadians as a whole had a right to expect in this period of higher prices. What choice did we have, as a federal government with responsibility to the whole nation, to remedy the situation? We examined many possibilities, but it became abundantly clear that as long as any royalty or royalty-like charges and claims were allowed to reduce or eliminate the federal tax base there was no way to protect federal revenues.

Mr. Speaker, I have tried to outline the simple facts which led us to the budget measures relating to the taxation of the resources industries. I have tried to explain why we had to act when we did and as we did. I recognize that our proposed solution has not met with the approval of the producing provinces, and I deeply regret this. We have made it plain that we are not in any way challenging the provincial right of ownership or jurisdiction over natural resources. The issue is simply one of the right of the federal government to tax.

I would emphasize that in the legal sense, in the constitutional context, the budget does not in any way limit the freedom of the provinces to impose any royalty they wish. There has been some talk of our rolling back these royalties or preventing the provinces from taxing. Nothing the Minister of Finance has done in his budget is preventing the provinces from taxing. It does not reverse, roll back or repudiate these royalties. The disallowance provision does not take one dollar out of any provincial treasury. On the contrary, as federal corporate income tax revenues increase so will the provinces' share of that revenue increase. In the economic sense, of course, the budget does exert a very real impact on the resource producing companies, and that is the problem. Not on the provinces, Mr. Speaker—on the companies. If the total tax and royalty demands upon the companies threaten their health and viability, somebody has to give ground. We have given ground; we have reduced our claim by 25 per cent in this budget as compared with the May budget.

Both the federal and the provincial governments have a vital interest in maintaining and encouraging resource exploration, development and production. It is up to both levels of government to co-operate in making that possible. The federal government cannot be expected to bear the full burden of incentives to the industry. The budget does not force the provincial governments to do anything at all, in a legal sense. In an economic sense it invites them to co-operate with us in ensuring a healthy and vigorous industry.

Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased to see that the Liberal leader in Alberta, Mr. Nick Taylor, courageously stood up and spoke in favour of this budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I realize that it takes a courageous man to do that, and Liberals are courageous people when it comes to the good of the country. The Liberal leader realizes that his province will derive enormous wealth from this new development in the petroleum industry, and he believes that the people of Canada should share in some of that wealth because they shared in the crises and burdens which made possible the development of that industry. That is Liberal policy.

● (1700)

Let me make clear that in these comments I have been dealing with the long-term taxing system of the federal government and its access to a reasonable and continuing share of the profits of the resource industries. I have been speaking of the tax regimes which the federal government and the producing provinces apply to the resource industries within the price structure at which these resources are sold in Canada, or at which they move to the frontier for sale beyond our borders. I have not dealt thus far with the separate question of the export tax which is at the moment applied to Canadian oil as it moves into foreign markets.

An hon. Member: You bet.

Mr. Trudeau: I can return to explanations which have been given many times, but I do not think I have to take up too much time of the House to repeat that that is not money which the federal government keeps for its own purposes; it is money which serves to ensure that all the people of Canada will be paying more or less the same price for petroleum products.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: There is no question in my mind that the people of Canada owe a debt of gratitude to the people of Alberta and Saskatchewan for willingly entering into an agreement under which they would receive less for their resources over 15 months than the enormously increased price that suddenly prevailed in the world.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I see that the Alberta members who are guffawing do not appreciate that gratitude. Perhaps they do not take my word for it. However, I am sure there are members in their own party who are very happy that the province of Newfoundland, for example, does not have to pay $10.50 a barrel for its oil.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: When I hear members opposite, some provincial politicians from those provinces and in some instances the premiers, argue that the proceeds of the export tax represent simply a gift from their provinces to Canadians generally, I think they carry the argument too far. Surely the country as a whole, which shared with the producing provinces the burden of encouraging the resource industries to develop, as I have said, in the form of very generous tax incentives and in the form of a guaranteed market west of the Borden line, should also have a fair share of the revenue resulting from higher prices, not as a gift but as a right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: No doubt we will soon be working with all the provinces, with Alberta's and Saskatchewan's interest particularly in mind, toward a new price level for some succeeding period. This is as it should be. At the same time, we have moved in the budget to ensure, over the longer term and across the wide spectrum of resources, that the federal government on behalf of all Canadians can have assured access to a reasonable proportion of the profits generated by the resource industries of this country.

We do not seek a confrontation. We believe our objectives to be fair and reasonable. We are cognizant of the report of the National Energy Board and have reduced our tax imposition in recognition of future development needs. We have taken the steps that we felt were necessary to achieve our objective, consistent with maintaining a healthy industry. We have gone a good distance toward meeting the views of producing provinces while protecting the interests of all Canadians. We have listened to the concerns expressed by the producing provinces and the companies, and we have responded. The budget reduces our claimed share by 25 per cent. With a reasonable approach by everyone, we will have the climate so necessary in Canada to the development of the new energy resources we need.

I have been on my feet an hour and five minutes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacKay: It seems longer.

Some hon. Members: More.

Mr. Trudeau: I remember the enjoinder of the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) yesterday, that I make sure I do not sit down a second time in this session without having dealt with inflation. Therefore, I ask the indulgence of this House to give me another five to seven minutes to talk about the problem of inflation which I dealt with earlier in my speech. I was talking then about the human impact of inflation and about the government's general response. I would like to draw attention to some specific responses and the way in which all Canadians can, together, attack the problem. One of the specific responses was, of course, our petroleum policy which kept prices considerably below world prices and, by the device of the export tax, permitted Canada to escape the kind of disruptions which hit so many other industrialized countries.

Mr. Broadbent: Where did you get that policy?

An hon. Member: From the Liberal caucus.

Mr. Trudeau: The leader of the New Democratic Party wants to know where we got the policy. The hon. member is right: we got it from the Liberal caucus. I am sure the New Democratic Party is frustrated in its attempts which began last May to make the Canadian people believe that they had thought up this policy; but never mind, they do not have to remain frustrated. A new agreement will have to be reached by July 1. Let them set out now what their policy is for that period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: All I can say is I would be very grateful if they did. If they can set out that policy, as I am sure they will—their leader is shaking his head—and they can get Premier Blakeney, Premier Schreyer and Premier Barrett to agree to that policy, it will make it much easier for me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: If, by some miracle, the Tories can also set out their policy in due course and can get premiers Moores, Hatfield, Davis and Lougheed to agree, we will have a very nice federal-provincial meeting some time in May. We may even have it in front of television, and I will then say that the policy was developed for the people of Canada by the leader of the New Democratic Party and by the leader of the Conservative Party—if there is still a leader at that time. I will, as usual, be very humble in telling the Canadian people that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: As to specific responses, the most obvious of the social inequities caused by inflation is that it aims its harshest blow at the most vulnerable, pensioners and low-income families; the very people who are least able to fight back by increasing their income. That is why this government has redistributed massive amounts of the national income, asking those who have more to share with those who need more. We have raised the family allowances, which in the next fiscal year will involve a payment to Canadian families of some $2 billion of our national income. Increases in the old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement mean that we will allocate some $3.9 billion of our national wealth toward the income needs of the elderly. We have made sure that these social benefits will continue to rise automatically with increases in the cost of living. Through the Canada Assistance Plan we will provide, next year, some $700 million to low-income families and individuals.

• (1710)

To help all Canadians cope with inflation we are reducing what the government would otherwise take of the national income. The tax cuts proposed in the budget will have the effect of giving the government some $2.2 billion less during the next fiscal year than it would have received if the tax structure had remained unchanged. This will leave more purchasing power in the hands of Canadians, helping every taxpayer to cope with the cost of living and helping the economy to resist stagnation.

The government has sought to moderate the rate of price increases by reducing or removing tariffs on some commodities, removing or reducing the federal sales tax on others, and by subsidizing the cost of still others. As Canadians, we on this side of the House are proud of the strength of our economy relative to that of other nations. As Liberals, we are grateful that we have been able to play a part in maintaining and reinforcing that strength.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Many Canadians have contributed to the impressive performance of the national economy. I would like to draw particular attention to the singularly effective contribution of my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: His ability and good judgment have won for him the respect and confidence of the people of Canada, as well as the high regard of the representatives of other countries who have chosen him as the chairman of one of the most critically important committees of the International Monetary Fund.

Despite the evidence of Canada's strong performance in relation to other countries, we in the government are the first to admit that the pervasive disease of inflation continues to pose a very serious threat to the economic health of Canada and the world. It continues to breed a sense of fear and futility, especially among those who neither understand its causes nor believe there is anything they can do about the problem. It is important, therefore, that the people of Canada understand the nature and causes of inflation and come to the potent realization that if all of us make a commitment to co-operation we can pack a mighty clout. If Canadians, as individual citizens and consumers, as producers and businessmen, as trade unionists and professionals, as farmers and members of governments, really decided to work together in the one direction of the common good, instead of in the many competing directions of self-interest, we would find we have the strength to deliver a much more powerful blow against inflation.

It is understandable why each group in the price chain feels it must protect itself against rising prices, that it must get a better return for its resources, investment, labour or risk. Yet it has become increasingly clear to everyone that the vicious circle we have created is self-defeating; that even the strong are suffering; that the plight of the weak and unorganized is getting worse; that there must be a better way. There is a better way, if we have the courage and the common sense to pursue it. In normal, non-inflationary times we all accepted the vigorous jockeying for position among the various economic groups in our society. Buyer and seller, producer and consumer, business and labour pitted their strengths against each other in the marketplace and thereby established the share each received of our total national income.

The traditional sharing may or may not have been fair, but at least we had a stable economic framework within which we could apply selective judgments designed to achieve greater economic and social justice. With normal increases in productivity, the size of the pie got bigger. While each group maintained its traditional share, each became better off because an expanding pie gave bigger pieces.

In inflationary times, the relative size of the shares gets thrown out of whack. For example, Canada could not insulate itself completely against the rapidly rising price of oil around the world. It was inevitable that foreign and domestic oil producers would increase to some degree their share of the national income pie. However, if every other group insists on maintaining or increasing its traditional share, inflation is the unavoidable result. That is to say, if the shares add up to more than 100 per cent, if the total claim on income is greater than the sum of the real value of what we produce, then the effort to increase shares when we are at high levels of economic activity and employment causes the dollar value of national income to be raised artificially. That is inflation. Everybody's dollar is worth less.

In normal times, if one economic group increases its share of the pie another group gets a smaller share. If labour gains, business pays through lower profits. If pensioners gain, those who are currently working pay through taxes. What causes instability is the fact that no group, even though it recognizes the inevitability or desirability of a larger share going to someone else, is willing to accept a smaller share for itself. When we, as a country, give a larger share to the oil producing countries because we cannot avoid it, or to our own farmers because justice demands it, then there are only two possible consequences—either other groups in Canada accept a proportionately smaller increase in their incomes and we have a non-inflationary redistribution, or those other groups insist on maintaining their traditional shares and we have to increase the money supply, resulting in inflation. Which do we want? If we want stability, then we must pay for it: all of us must pay for it, excepting only those groups to whom we give a bigger share either voluntarily or involuntarily.

If we want stability, then it makes no sense to say, "Yes, I agree that farmers, fishermen, pensioners or our native population, deserve a bigger share; but don't try to take it from me." Where are these bigger shares to come from, if everyone refuses to budge? I am not asking business, the workingman, the investor or the other levels of government to bear an unfair share of the burden of income redistribution. No one expects any one group to do all the suffering for the rest of us. We can succeed only if all the power groups in our national community, and all the strong countries in the community of nations, are willing to scale down their demands so that those in need may survive and economic stability be restored.

How do we start on the road toward stability, on the road toward some kind of agreement among the strong power groups in Canada, an agreement about how the pie should be divided equitably? We start by talking to each other, by seeking together a greater understanding of the problem which afflicts us all—inflation and the fears and problems it creates. If business and labour, government and the press, the farmer and the consumer could learn to understand each other's problems it should be possible to co-operate on the basis of that understanding.

That is why the government is launching a program of consultation with various interest groups across the country. Before any program of shared national restraint has a chance of success, Canadians in different power groups must come to know each other, understand each other and trust each other a lot better than we do now. No group can be expected to scale down its demands upon the economy unless it has reasonable assurance that the effort of scaling down will be shared equitably with other groups, with none going backward but some going forward somewhat less than they might otherwise have liked. Obviously, the federal government must take the lead in bringing together competing interests to serve the national interest. We are not shrinking from that challenge. We were given a mandate to lead and we are exercising that mandate—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —both here at home and in our international efforts to restore stability to the world marketplace. The budget is the proof of our determination. We are saying to business and to labour, "The federal government is willing to reduce its take of the national income by $2.2 billion, in the hope that you will moderate your claims for increasing profits and wages". We are saying to corporations, "The budget is giving you generous write-off allowances, lower sales taxes on building materials and construction equipment, capital cost allowances, pollution control assistance and general encouragement of investment. If you didn't get this assistance your costs would be higher, so you would have to push your prices up. So when you're setting your prices, when you're calculating the amount of profit you need to finance new investment, remember the budget; remember the ways in which we have reduced your costs."

● (1720)

We are saying to the working man, "Here's an income tax cut which gives you this year between $150 and $500 extra take home pay, non-taxable, and even more next year. That could take care of your increased food costs in the run of a year. We're helping you through reduction of various sales taxes. We want you to take this into account when you're making your wage demands. You don't have to get as much more pay as you otherwise might, because we're giving you a portion of it. And remember, if we're allowing you to keep $250, for example, through the tax cut, it's really equivalent to about $380 if you had to get it through taxable income from your employer."

Canada, Mr. Speaker, is a country which has become a great country because of the willingness of its people to work out their differences in a spirit of fairness and mutual respect.

[Translation]

That respect, Mr. Speaker, is fundamental, if the structure of our country is to remain intact, if the strength of our people is to keep on increasing. That is why today I have quite extensively spoken about the problem of inflation, particularly in the oil field, why I have tried to explain the problem and its solution. Of course, Mr. Speaker, in a conflict of interests opposing ten provinces, specifically consuming and producing provinces, and also opposing these provinces to the federal government, since, after all, it is always the same taxpayer who has to foot the bill at all levels of government, in this type of tension which I should hope would be creative between the various levels of government, it is important that citizens and parliamentarians alike understand the true nature of the problem and the solutions we are proposing.

That is why I mentioned two things, Mr. Speaker. I have talked somewhat regretfully of the bitterness which marked this debate and which I have found again in the mouths of the Leader of the Opposition, some of his colleagues, and also, unfortunately, of many people, especially in western Canada, a bitterness which results from a lack of understanding, Mr. Speaker, and also from the fact that we ourselves had not explained fully the principles on which I elaborated today and which cause all Canadians to wish to share in these resources which belong to them. That is why I have asked the opposition parties to put forward, not only criticisms of our policy, but alternatives as well which they might feel are superior, and which we ourselves would be happy to adopt if in fact they are. But, I beg of them, let them drop the tone of bitterness, of peevishness, which has permeated this debate as well as those that preceded and followed the budget speech, and which does great harm to this country. That is the first point I wanted to make.

I am happy to say, Mr. Speaker, that the accusations made in bad faith did not come from the premiers of the western provinces; but, unfortunately, they came from hon. members opposite. I am also happy that, down deep, in spite of our disagreements, the Alberta and Saskatchewan premiers do not accuse us of bad faith, of misunderstanding; they do accuse us of having interests that conflict with their own; but, I say it again, Mr. Speaker, bad faith does not belong in our debates.

The second point I wanted to bring up is this: what strikes me, as the lack of seriousness—if I may use that gentle expression—shown by some of the leaders of other provinces which benefit considerably from the oil policy we adopted in March, and who, probably for reasons of political or interprovincial solidarity, manage to give reason to Alberta and Saskatchewan in the current debate, against the federal government and the budget of the Minister of Finance, giving them reason in theory, while pocketing in practice the benefits accruing to them through our budget.

[English]

The spirit of equitable compromise among differing interests is the glue which holds us together. We are a nation, not because of the borders which surround us but because of our common resolve to live together in peace, tolerance and justice, sharing both the burdens and the benefits of this bountiful land. I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that the current problems of which I have spoken today can be resolved by Canadians, whether in public or private life, working together in a spirit of compromise and co-operation toward greater social and economic justice for all. To that spirit and toward that goal I commit the Government of Canada.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have never seen a more disgusting display of bad faith regarding matters which are the subject of an agreement.

An hon. Member: You are afraid to listen.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took an hour and a half, and outside of some pablum dealing with inflation which he fed to the open mouths of his devoted followers his speech was filled with nothing but glaring inaccuracies and deceptions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It was not even his own speech.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Andre (Calgary Centre): Arrogance in the extreme.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understood that the hon. member who was just on his feet was to be the next participant in the debate, which would have given him the opportunity to make the kind of interjection he has just made.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order I would ask how it is possible within the space of 12 minutes to answer this mass of inaccuracies and deceptions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: I suggest that it is absolutely impossible, and I should like to know—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In the ordinary course hon. members will realize that the message will probably not disturb our procedures until closer to six o'clock than 5.45. If the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) commences now, he will perhaps enjoy his full 20 minutes. I assume there are others who will be addressing themselves to the same type of complaint, for example the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in rising on this point of order I would make the plea to the House that we practice fairness. There was an understanding earlier today that the debate would not end at 5.45 but, rather, would end at six o'clock. When we made that agreement we felt there would be adequate time for at least two 20-minutes speeches following that of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I do not complain about the fact that the Prime Minister spoke for an hour and a half, but I think we should now revise the arrangement for today and make it clear that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) shall each have 20 minutes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): To facilitate this, I would suggest that the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod be asked not to knock on the door until after the two next speakers have had their full 20 minutes.

Mr. Speaker: In light of the challenge that has been put forward by two hon. members in respect of the speech of the right hon. Prime Minister, there seems to be a general spirit of accord that each of those members somehow be provided with 20 minutes in which to make their speeches. I am not able to govern the conduct of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod. In any case there seems to be agreement to make an order of the House that however these proceedings finalize today, those two members shall each be granted 20 minutes before the conclusion of the debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, 20 minutes will not permit me to deal with all—

An hon. Member: Come on, stick around.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It was abundantly clear to all members, despite some stimulating comment, that the speech of the right hon. Prime Minister, although an hour and a half in duration, was listened to very attentively and I think hon. members ought to pay the hon. member the same attention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Time will not permit me to deal with all the inaccuracies; certainly I could never deal with them all in 20 minutes. Never in an hour and a half have we heard so many inaccuracies and so many deviations from the true facts as we heard from the Prime Minister in the course of his speech. Within the time allowed me I will limit myself to dealing with only the most glaring inaccuracies and those areas in which the Prime Minister made a 180 degree departure from the true facts.

I first want to nail down the right hon. gentleman on his statement on the discussion between the first ministers on March 27 of this year, which he said was strictly limited to the question of pricing and dealt with no other issue at all. I have in my hand Hansard for March 28 in which is recorded what the right hon. gentleman said in very unctuous words: "We have been great statesmen, I and the other ten first ministers, and have come to an agreement with regard to petroleum products which affect us nationally." He said that the first ministers had displayed extraordinary patience and co-operation and he paid tribute to the spirit of generosity of the ten premiers. Included in the issues which the Prime Minister brought out at that time and related to this House were these which he stated as recorded at page 933 of Hansard:

> It was apparent that if we wished to assure the huge investments necessary for adequate future supplies, somewhat higher domestic prices would be essential; that the oil producing provinces—mainly Alberta and Saskatchewan—must be assured a fair return.

That is something more than just the question of pricing. On the next page of Hansard the Prime Minister said, talking about the provinces:

> . . . to assisting them on a national basis to develop unconventional new oil sources such as the Alberta oil sands; and to helping them ensure alternative economic development so that future growth can be sustained and diversified in western Canada.

The Prime Minister is convicted by his own statement to this House on March 28, and what he said today is inaccurate and does not correspond to the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: With regard to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) the Prime Minister said:

> The price level and the duration of the price at that level are temporary, as he has described them. They comprise a stage in the ongoing process, and I believe that is the proper way to have proceeded.

The Prime Minister is convicted of not having told us the facts, of not having recorded what did happen and not having given this House the views and opinions of the premiers, by these words that appear in Hansard. He said there was merely an acceptance of the price agreement and that this was the proper way to proceed. I think the Prime Minister should be somewhat less selective if he is to come into this House and make speeches which he expects the House and the country to accept. I suggest he should adhere much more closely to the truth. As a matter of fact, and I do not know whether it matters, his general characterization of this country is well known.

As I was coming to the House today I was not sure whether I was to speak and a Latin phrase kept running through my mind. I remember it well from the days I studied Latin. I think perhaps it should be put both in Latin and in English and hung high in the office of the Prime Minister, the offices of cabinet ministers and the offices of the national federation of the Liberal Party. I am sure some of my friends of the legal profession will remember the phrase suppressio veri et suggestio falsi, or "the suppression of the true and the suggestion of the false". That is the way the right hon. gentleman operates.

I regret that this difficulty has arisen in respect of the meeting of the first ministers on March 27; I regret it very much, because this country in which we live is a difficult one to govern. We have a constitution, albeit a constitution with difficulties, and in order to make it work in any way at all it has become necessary to supplement the written words of the constitution with the actions and agreements of those charged with responsibility—parliament, the legislatures and, particularly, governments. There always will be conflicts, division, arguments and disagreements. There must be trust, which can survive only when agreements made are fully and frankly kept. That has not been the situation here. I shall come to that in a moment.

I say that on March 27, when the first ten ministers and the right hon. gentleman gathered at that meeting, there was a light hanging over 24 Sussex Street. It was not the star of truth; it was not the cross of understanding; it was the double-cross of deceit and dissimulation. It will be exceedingly difficult for provincial premiers to meet with the Prime Minister hereafter with regard to this and related matters. If I were a provincial premier I would not leave a meeting until I had everything down in black and white under the signature of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald), because there was deceit when that meeting was over.

Let there be no doubt about this, because the facts lie within our knowledge. I intend to deal with a few of these facts in the time I have left. The clear purpose and intent of the federal government has now emerged from an overall survey not only of its proposed legislation but of the words and conduct of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Beyond any shadow of doubt they propose, under the guise of very questionable legislative proposals—and I certainly do not intend to take any part of the time allotted to me to deal with constitutional issues—to confiscate property clearly belonging to the provincial governments.

There is no question that a combination of certain of the clauses of the petroleum administration bill and the amendments to the Income Tax Act which are contained in the ways and means motion are calculated to interfere with the right to ownership of natural resources to such an extent that to all intents and purposes the provinces involved at this particular time can be said to have lost effective control. There is a legal definition of theft. It means taking and converting to your own use without any power of right. That is what this government is attempting to do with these legislative proposals. The purpose of this legislation will be to so alter the right of the provinces to deal with their natural resources, not merely those things over which they have jurisdiction but that are their property, that it will be beyond their capacity to deal with them adequately within the scope of the constitution as it was intended they should.

That is what has emerged from this debate up to the present time. This certainly has been confirmed by the words of the Prime Minister tonight. I suggest that when a federal government, in exercising the very sweeping powers of taxation which it has, conducts itself so as to act in a way to do violence to the spirit of the constitution, there must be some avenue open to the citizens of the provinces affected. The Minister of Finance stands up in this House and appears on radio and television programs and says that the provinces are entitled to royalties, but that he, the Minister of Finance, will be the sole judge and jury concerning what will constitute the extent of the royalties, and if in his opinion the royalties go over a certain figure, he will say what the royalties shall be.

These are royalties in respect of resources which were plainly given to the provincial governments. They belong to them. These are rentals on property which belongs to the provincial governments. The Minister of Finance says that he will determine what is an adequate royalty, and if he thinks it is too high he will disallow it in his capacity as lord justice and high executioner. Let me tell you, Madam Speaker, there is a spirit abroad in this country which takes offence at the words contained in the speeches of the Minister of Finance, repeated tonight by the Prime Minister, and this will do little to allay the spirit of frustration, anger and annoyance throughout western Canada and parts of the Atlantic provinces. Hon. members opposite may jeer at me, but I say to them that they are fooling with forces lying beyond their control and it would augur well if they would heed what the situation is. If they do not want to be known as the godfathers of confederation, let them take heed of their actions.

Let me now turn briefly to the issues surrounding the meeting of March 27 and the statements made by the Prime Minister. During the winter and fall of 1973, issues had arisen in this country involving the supply, transportation and cost of petroleum products. There had been concern, anguish and great anxiety. Threats had been made by the provincial governments and the federal government. There had been concern on the part of a great many people and the oil industry. As a matter of fact, it is rather interesting to note that at a meeting of the committee on natural resources in November, 1973, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources urged the provincial governments to increase the extent of their royalties. He suggested they were the judges of the extent to which they should be increased. I shall not go into that matter to any great extent; however, that statement appears on the record.

Prior to the meeting of March 27 there had been concern and anxiety. This is not contradicted by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister met with the premier of Alberta on March 4. At that time the Premier of Alberta told the Prime Minister that it was his intention in due course, not too long from then, to increase royalties. He indicated specifically the extent to which he intended to raise them. That was made quite plain. I suggest that if the Prime Minister had the gumption and honesty he should have, he would have said categorically to the Premier of Alberta that this was not satisfactory. He should have said that he would not accept this attempt to increase royalties to such an extent. He should have added that the government did not agree with it and would not allow it.

Surely this is what first ministers have meetings for, so that they can honestly and frankly lay their cards on the table. In the words of an insurance contract, it is not enough not to be deceitful; it is essential to be completely frank and truthful and to tell all the facts. There must be the utmost good faith. In the name of heaven, how can anyone in this House, after hearing the Prime Minister and reading the contents of the letters, say that he accorded anything like good faith to the Premier of Alberta in these discussions? If we need any corroboration on the issue of equalization, we have the discussions with the Premier of Saskatchewan. I am not as well acquainted with the Premier of Saskatchewan as I am with the Premier of Alberta, but from what I know of him he is an honest, reasonable and truthful man. Each of the leaders of these provinces, the premier of Alberta and the premier of Saskatchewan, has said they were deceived and that there was dissimulation on the part of the Prime Minister and the Government of Canada.

They have said that when they emerged from the meeting of March 27 they had every reason to believe they had reached agreement and knew what the facts were. When I hear these gentlemen make such statements, even if I were not an opponent of the Prime Minister but were an unbiased observer I would have to say that the balance of credibility goes against the Prime Minister. On March 27 the government had in place the petroleum administration bill. Four days later they introduced it in the House for first reading, including four provisions which were entirely contrary to the agreement reached on March 27.

● (1750)

The Attorney General of Alberta, appearing before a committee of the House earlier this year, said, "Here are the things we agreed to about Bill C-18, and here are the things we disagree with." He enunciated them clearly and categorically. He said that these were not subject to the agreement and they were not discussed. In fact, the agreement, to the extent it was discussed at all, was contrary to the provisions to which I have referred. So at the very time the Prime Minister was standing in the House after saying goodbye to his friends, the ten provincial leaders, at the last supper, he had in place a legislative proposal which was contrary to the views of the ten provincial premiers. Just five or six weeks later the budget was brought down.

I read the letter of March 12 to which the Prime Minister referred today. Any reasonable person can search that letter to find anything by which the Prime Minister suggests it is the intention of the government to disallow provincial royalties. Of course, the Prime Minister said that the federal government intended to exercise its right to tax corporations as it saw fit. But that is far different from the frank, forthright, honest and decent treatment which the ten provincial premiers are entitled to receive from the Prime Minister. The very evening he had discussions with them he had ready budgetary proposals which destroyed the whole basis of their discussion. That is what he did. Legislation must be prepared ahead of time. The income tax Act amendment is very thick, and the ways and means motion, translated into French and English, is a lengthy, formidable document not prepared overnight. I do not believe the Prime Minister for one moment when he says that he was not aware, on March 27, of what the Minister of Finance and his government intended to do with regard to royalties. He knew it.

Mr. Cullen: He said he did not.

An hon. Member: Are you kidding?

Mr. Baldwin: You can take your choice—ignorance or deceit. That is not dealing in honesty and good faith. How can you have meetings of the first ministers of the provinces and the Prime Minister in order to carry forward the essential business of this country under circumstances of this kind? Any first minister dealing with the federal government will have holes in his head unless in the future he has the most categorical assurance in writing, and if I were him I would have it sworn to as well. That is why I spoke about the Bible.

I do not have much time left, Madam Speaker, but I want to make this statement. There are many things I would like to say, but let me make this point. The world is in a difficult state. One need only travel outside Canada, outside the scope of government publications, to know that there is a great deal of pessimism abroad in the world today and much of it is justified. No matter what we do in the country, even if we give the government credit for doing the things we would like to see done, we are not immune from the difficulties that will wash over Canada. We will have to deal together, the people, the government of Canada and the provinces, in good faith, honesty and forthrightness if we are to come anywhere close to surmounting these problems.

I suggest to the government that in view of its record of deceit and dissimulation it should withdraw that part of the budget relative to taxation. The government should not withdraw these provisions completely but should put them to one side, do what the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) used to say and what the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) says, namely, go back to the bargaining table. That is the place where this issue should be settled between the provincial premiers, the Prime Minister and the federal ministers. I suggest that this can be done in spite of what has happened. It is not too late yet. I would suggest to the government that if they want this country to rise above the sea of troubles that will confront us, they should embark now on a program of frankness and honesty. They should deal in good faith with the provincial governments, otherwise I am afraid we will be in serious trouble.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Madam Speaker, at the outset, because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) spent so much time on the Liberal Party's oil policy, as he described it, generated as he said by the Liberal backbenchers, I would like to make a very brief comment on the origin of that so-called Liberal oil policy. First of all I want to say that in so far as the Liberal government has a policy that is in any way substantial or worth while, it is entirely the product of negotiations that took place between the NDP and the Liberal Party last December.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I hear howls from the backbenchers. Let me document this.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: May I have the attention of members, please? We listened to the Prime Minister for a considerable length of time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Can I have the attention of the House, Madam Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) has the floor. The Chair would appreciate it if he could enjoy perfect silence.

Mr. Broadbent: Briefly stated, there are four essential aspects of that policy. There is a uniform national price for oil which the Liberals had rejected until last December. There is the export tax that they mysteriously accepted last December and which during the previous nine months or so was denounced around the country by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald). There is the acceptance of the need for a national pipeline, which the Liberal Party had denounced for many months in 1973. Finally, there is the establishment of a national petroleum corporation. These were the four points which were dismissed out of hand by that wonderful, smug cabinet and by a set of backbenchers who were so laudatory in their support of the policy enunciated here today. All those points were proposed, argued for and forced upon a reluctant minority government by the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Apparently the Prime Minister has trouble reading even the daily newspapers, but he quoted from today's Ottawa Citizen. He attributed to Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan a view and a policy that is entirely incorrect, and all the Liberals cheered. This part he attributed accurately, and I will read it:

● (1800)

> . . . as a matter of principle the provinces should get everything over and above a fair return for the corporations.

This is with reference to the corporations operating in the provinces in the resource field. The implication the Prime Minister left with this House and country was that Mr. Blakeney was saying that the federal government should have no access to the corporate taxes of those corporations.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Broadbent: It is a clear implication. The Prime Minister did not quote further, as he should have if he had wanted to be fair to Premier Blakeney. I will get to some of the serious omissions in the correspondence to which the Prime Minister referred. I will not quote what Premier Blakeney said at length, but would refer hon. members to page 9 of the Ottawa Citizen. The Premier of Saskatchewan makes it clear that the federal government is entitled to and should have tax benefits from profit derived by corporations operating at the provincial level. That is surely a totally supportable position. It is one which the Premier of Saskatchewan has taken for some time, but this afternoon the Prime Minister deliberately distorted it beyond recognition.

I want to say, Madam Speaker, that as a thoroughly committed federalist I was dismayed, as were my colleagues, to see a provision in last May's budget which prohibited corporations from deducting provincial royalties from federal taxes. Such provision strikes at one of the basic roots of Canadian federalism. As a constitutional expert, the Prime Minister knows very well, and the New Democratic Party agrees, that in Canada we need a strong federal government to deal with many of the problems which are national in scope. That is beyond argument. The Prime Minister also knows that the surest way to produce disunity and undermine the authority of the central government is for that government to move arbitrarily and unilaterally into a major area of provincial jurisdiction.

In our view, the federal government's position on resource taxation is such a move. For the first time in our history the federal government is saying to the provinces that provincial royalties on resources will no longer be deductible by corporations for taxation purposes. In case there was the slightest doubt about that, the Prime Minister dealt with it at length this afternoon.

It is important to note, Madam Speaker, that this issue is not simply a matter of the federal government versus the oil producing provinces of western Canada. I think it is important to stress this point particularly in this budget debate because during the past eight or ten days that has been the principal focus, aided and abetted, I would suggest, by the Prime Minister himself. It is a posing by the federal government in respect of national interest, in opposition to the western provinces. That is the way the Prime Minister would like to see the issue go. This is a matter which affects all the provinces, Madam Speaker, and it is one upon which all the provinces have made their views known to the Prime Minister. In the communiqué issued following the annual conference which took place in Toronto on September 12 and 13, the premiers expressed their strong opposition to the federal government's then recently expressed position on resource taxation. I quote briefly from the communiqué:

> The premiers were unanimous that the non-deductibility of provincial royalties and mining taxes in determining federal income tax was contrary to the spririt of confederation.

That was a unanimous declaration by Canada's ten provincial premiers. They described this action of the federal government as a blow to federal-provincial relations and strongly urged the Prime Minister to remove the non-deductibility provisions from his forthcomimg budget; that is to say, from the budget they knew was coming within a month. In complete disregard of this sensible and constitutional request, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance reintroduced the objectionable proposals in the budget that was presented to this House last week. That was done with the full knowledge that such action would produce confrontation and prevent co-operation from all our provinces.

Why are the provinces united in their opposition to the federal government's non-deductibility policy? Perhaps this is the most serious question that has to be faced. It was not faced in a serious way this afternoon by the Prime Minister. The provinces object because such a policy impinges in a financial way upon one of their traditional domains, ownership and control of their natural resources. They ask why a royalty paid by one company to another should be deductible when a royalty paid to a province is not. The second and related basic question is why a royalty paid by a Canadian company to a foreign government should be deductible from federal tax, but one paid to the province of Ontario or Quebec is not. That is an important question which the Prime Minister dealt with this afternoon. The government's sole justification for federal incursion into provincial rights is its contention that all Canadians should have a right to share in the benefits of the natural resources of this country. The Prime Minister tried to make that point this afternoon. This is so self-evident and so simple in principle that no one, including the provinces, argues against it. The Prime Minister has created a straw man to attack. He thinks he has made a substantive policy decision by destroying the straw man he himself has created.

The point in dispute now is not the right of all Canadians to share directly or indirectly in our natural endowment; rather, the point in dispute is the means of achieving this goal. To begin with, you do not get a determined spirit of co-operation on this issue by the ten provincial premiers by taking away a right they have correctly assumed has been theirs since confederation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Surely that should be self-evident. Such an approach produces only resentment, anger and non-cooperation in the premiers of all the provinces, not just the premiers of the two oil producing provinces. What is required is a frank reassessment of our approach to equalization in Canada. This is essentially what Premier Blakeney, among others, has been saying for many months now. Until such reappraisal takes place and new ingredients are added to a mutually agreeable formula, it is fundamentally wrong, in the view of the NDP, for the federal government arbitrarily to change the existing rules of constitutional practice.

What is so reprehensible about the government's action is that it has produced, entirely on its own initiative, an atmosphere of distrust and suspicion from a foundation last March, to use the Prime Minister's words, which was one of good will and deep commitment to Canada. That is the atmosphere he described and reported back to the House last March. The Prime Minister's disregard of a solemn commitment has led to the present situation. I say that with care and deliberation. His disregard of a solemn commitment has led to the current constitutional problem on this issue.

During the many months of last winter's energy crisis a series of meetings at every level of government took place. Finally, in March, an agreement was reached concerning oil prices and related taxation policy control, again referring to what the Prime Minister said this afternoon, pertaining in particular to the establishment of capital funds. This agreement would not have come about but for the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

● (1810)

An hon. Member: And Ontario.

Mr. Broadbent: Those two provinces sacrificed millions of dollars, in the national interest, by accepting a lower Canadian price for oil than the market situation would have permitted. All of us in other parts of Canada owe a debt of gratitude to the people of Alberta and Saskatchewan for this direct and costly sacrifice. On March 28, following that meeting, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in this House:

> Yesterday was a great day for federalism . . . the national oil agreement would surely not have been possible without the goodwill and deep commitment to Canada of the premiers of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

The March 27 meeting of the first ministers was primarily a formalization of agreements reached earlier in the month between the Prime Minister and the premiers of Saskatchewan and Alberta. This is an important point, and it is one which is made clear in the correspondence which was tabled in the House on Monday by the Prime Minister. Two points are crucial to the understanding of the substance and process of the unilateral breaking of this commitment by the federal government. First, in his two letters to premiers Blakeney and Lougheed dated March 12, the Prime Minister refers to the "one year accord" reached between him and the premiers. Second, in both these letters, in addition to the agreement on price—and contrary to what the Prime Minister said this afternoon, this was not simply an agreement on price—there was a specific commitment not to consider for equalization purposes oil revenue placed by the provinces in special capital funds to be used for the development of future energy sources. I quote from the Prime Minister's letter to Premier Blakeney, dated March 12:

I understand that it is intended that the funds shall be used to develop sources of energy to replace the diminishing oil reserves. Under such circumstances we would propose that these capital amounts would not be included in the revenue base for equalization.

Nothing could be less unambiguous. The same commitment was made in the Prime Minister's letter to Premier Lougheed. In his reply on this point, Premier Blakeney concurred and requested an assurance that—and I quote—"this approach will not be abandoned to our detriment after the interim agreement expires." What Mr. Blakeney did not know was that the federal government would not wait until the one-year period of the agreement had expired before taking action. The budget presented by the Minister of Finance last week completely reneged on this commitment. The provision which stipulates that one-third of the additional oil revenues in the oil producing provinces would be considered for equalization purposes clearly revokes the commitment made by the Prime Minister last March. The Saskatchewan government has calculated that this will cost them about $40 million.

The New Democratic Party opposes, in the strongest possible terms, this course of events. We urge the government to live up to its commitments to the oil producing provinces by withdrawing the provision that one-third of the oil revenue be considered for equalization purposes. Further, and of equal importance, we urge that it live up to its obligations to all the provinces by withdrawing the provision for non-deductibility of provincial royalties for tax purposes as applied to corporations in the resource sector. Such steps are not only compatible with a strong and stable federal government, but under present circumstances they are essential to its realization.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty at this point, pursuant to the order made earlier this day, to interrupt the proceedings forthwith and put the question on the motion now before the House. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Mr. Baldwin: On division.

Motion (Mr. Turner, Ottawa-Carleton) agreed to.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COSSITT—ALLEGEDLY MISLEADING STATEMENTS OF MINISTER ON APPROVAL OF LOCAL INITIATIVES PROJECTS

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which affects the rights and privileges of all members since it may involve seriously misleading and inaccurate information being furnished to the House by a minister.

On October 23, as shown on page 647 of Hansard, I asked a question of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) on the subject of the Local Initiatives Program grants, namely as to why constituencies represented by Liberals received approximately $15 million more than constituencies represented by Conservatives. Since it is pertinent to my question of privilege I will read the minister's reply:

● (1410)

Mr. Speaker, it was based on the worthiness of applications by the sponsors in the various areas of Canada, coupled with the degree of unemployment and the formula which I enunciated in this House on several occasions.

In a supplementary question I asked the minister whether he could assure the House that political considerations were not involved in such grants and he replied, as shown in Hansard:

Most certainly, Mr. Speaker.

The information thus given by the minister to the effect that the Local Initiatives Program is completely outside politics has consistently been the contention made by the government to hon. members of this House.

Copies of documents which I am prepared to table have come into my possession indicating that the minister and the government have seriously misled the House and that the awarding of LIP grants has not always been done on the basis outlined to the House by the minister but, instead, often on the basis of political considerations.

To clearly establish my case of privilege I refer briefly to certain of these documents as follows: One, a memorandum dated January 30, 1973 to D. C. Trehearne, at the time director of programs of LIP, from the minister's office, signed by R. J. Gairns, headed "LIP Applications—MP Priorities", and seeming to order on behalf of the minister's office that LIP applications specifically listed in the memorandum be approved in constituencies represented by 10 specifically named Liberal members of parliament and one specifically named New Democratic member of parliament.

The second document is dated January 25, 1973, headed "Confidential" and "Memorandum to the Minister", signed by J. M. DesRoches, then deputy minister of manpower, which establishes that the country was divided into regions with certain Liberal Cabinet ministers having veto power over LIP applications in such regions as illustrated by these words on page 2 of the memorandum: "No project is approved without concurrence of the regional minister".

The third document is a letter to the minister of manpower dated November 30, 1972, signed by the then Minister of the Environment, Jack Davis, stating:

As the minister with a responsibility to review these projects for British Columbia, I ask that no project be given final approval until clearance has been obtained from this office.

The fourth document is a letter in reply to the Minister of the Environment dated December 6, 1972, signed by Robert K. Andras, and containing this significant statement in the last paragraph:

Certainly my office will make every effort to ensure you are properly consulted on LIP projects in British Columbia . . .

I am also prepared to table a memorandum with attachment dated December 8, 1972 signed by R.J. Gairns, head of the LIP special information group and addressed to Dan Coates, executive assistant to the minister, establishing further the existence of politics in the LIP program; and finally, a memorandum to the minister dated December 29, 1972, establishing what appears to be a connection with the LIP special information group and those who were considered to have a political interest in LIP.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I believe these documents clearly illustrate that the minister and the government may have seriously misinformed and misled this House, and if in your judgment I have a legitimate case of privilege I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the matter be referred forthwith to the Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have grave reservations about the validity of the question of privilege, which I will develop momentarily if necessary. I do not like to receive representations on matters of this sort from only one side of the House, and if the minister wishes to make an intervention on the matter I will hear him.

The hon. member was good enough to give the Chair notice, as is required, of his intention to raise a question of privilege. In addition the hon. member gave the Chair, only recently, a copy of his notes to be used in the presentation of the question of privilege, which was of great assistance to an understanding of the detailed nature of this grievance. Again I use the word "grievance" as opposed to "question of privilege", because it is evident from the remarks of the hon. member that what he has is a dispute as to the quality of the reply of the minister in the House, and a dispute as to the accuracy of the information he has obtained in reply to questions asked during the question period. In addition, there perhaps is a clear difference of opinion between the hon. member and the government in respect of the matters under the administrative responsibility of the government.

The matter is made perfectly clear, if it was not otherwise understood, by citation 113 of Beauchesne's, one sentence of which reads as follows:

But a dispute arising between two members, as to allegations of facts, does not fulfill the conditions of parliamentary privilege.

Accordingly, I would have to hold that, while the member may have a difference of opinion or grievance, he has several other avenues to explore in order to take that up with the minister and this does not in any way constitute a prima facie question of privilege.

Mr. Andras: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member would have served the House well if he had considered many other statements I have made in this House and publicly, to wit that I give very significant credence to representations of members of parliament of all parties, from both sides of this House, in this type of decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: This type of decision about which projects will or will not be approved requires judgment in every case. Although I fully appreciate and respect the talents and integrity of the public service I have always said to my officials that the elected representatives of the people who sit in this House have knowledge and understanding of their constituencies and the conditions in those areas as represented by the fact that they were elected in the first place. I would entertain, and have entertained, from many members from all sides of the House, from all parties in the House, views with regard to which projects are or are not appropriate to be approved, while maintaining for myself, which is proper and is my job, the responsibility to make the final decisions. That is how I have exercised my responsibility.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Calgary North rising on the point of order?

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to the point of order. It is true that ne has asked the members to help set up committees and make decisions, but he has overlooked one fact. A place like Calgary North might get $50,000 or $70,000 while the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources last time got almost a million some odd, so I think there is a little hanky-panky going on. It does show one thing—there is a little influence.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In the manner in which this honourable chamber often manages to balance things out on its own it seems to me that we have had countervailing non-points of privilege and non-points of order on the same day. It might be well to get on with the business of the House.

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PREMIERS OF ALBERTA, SASKATCHEWAN AND PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, you will recall that on Monday I tabled some correspondence which at that time had not been translated because I had only a few hours before I received authority to table it. The whole series of letters has been tabled but now I should like the House, under Standing Order 41 (2), to permit me to table them in translated form.

AUDITOR GENERAL

TABLING OF REPORT FOR YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1974—REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), to table the report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1974.

I wonder, on behalf of my colleague the President of the Treasury Board, if I could ask the unanimous consent of the House that the report of the Auditor General be referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether there is any significance in the fact that this report seems to have a red cover?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The suggestion has been made that the House give unanimous consent that the report referred to be referred to the standing committee. Is it so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DENIAL OF BENEFITS TO CERTAIN CLAIMANTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Many citizens of Canada who are unemployment insurance claimants and who are legitimately seeking employment in compliance with unemployment insurance regulations are being denied benefits as a result of lack of flexibility and compassion in realizing particular geographical problems and a lack of employment opportunities in certain areas of Canada, and as a result are being discriminated against by district officers who, through no fault of their own, must comply with government regulations which do not take account of the facts.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the government direct that the Unemployment Insurance Commissioner be dispatched with hardship pay to proceed to those rural districts in Canada to interview the many claimants who wonder about equality of opportunity for all Canadians, and that the matter be referred to the appropriate standing committee for debate and decision.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have sympathy with the proposal of the hon. member in the motion which he read pertaining to an important subject matter in this session. However, the provisions of Standing Order 43, I repeat, contain the specific words that the matter must be of urgent and pressing necessity. It seems to me that the contents of the motion refer to a situation which is not new but is rather a continuing difficulty. It has no element of urgent and pressing necessity at present. Accordingly, I must rule that although it is an important subject to be brought to the attention of the House, it does not conform with the requirements of urgent and pressing necessity contained in Standing Order 43.

THE SENATE

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT MEASURES BE INTRODUCED IN HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THAT SENATE BE ABOLISHED—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): I also rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity and one that is new.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Leggatt: In view of the fact that new government legislation has been introduced in the Senate with respect to the alteration of penalties for the possession and trafficking of marijuana, long awaited by the Canadian public, and in view of the fact that there is now ample evidence that this legislation will be further delayed in the Senate for intensive hearings in Committee, in spite of the four years study by the LeDain Commission and the expenditure of $4 million of public money in that study, and in view of the urgency that that legislation come before the House as soon as possible, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House request that government bills generally be initiated in this House and not in the Senate, and that the House request that government legislation be proposed to abolish the Senate for presentation to this House at the first opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I may have some grave reservations about the validity of the substantive part of the motion, but there is no doubt that the preamble makes it qualify for consideration pursuant to Standing Order 43. Accordingly, I ask whether there is unanimous consent that the motion be debated.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be debated at present.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SUGGESTION INDIAN BANDS BE PAID MONEY OWING TO THEM—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the distressing economic situation of Indian bands, the inability to secure funds in the Hobbema area for economic development and the failure of the government to provide funds rightfully belonging to these bands, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That the government take immediate steps to pay to the Indian bands their money in order that they will be able to honour their economic contracts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Measure for Abolition of Court

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43. It cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be debated at this time.

PUBLIC SERVICE

STRIKE OF GRAIN INSPECTORS—BASIS OF OFFER TO EMPLOYEES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO SETTLE

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the fact it has been reported that the justification used by the federal Treasury Board for denying grain inspectors wage increases comparable to those given to grain handlers in Vancouver is based on the premise that the inspectors, who are federal employees, do work that is unrelated to the grain handlers who are employed by private grain companies, could the minister explain how this can in any way be considered logical? The federal government, by law, forced the private companies to pay an increase of between 54 per cent and 61 per cent, but now refuses to grant its own employees an equal increase to even one-quarter of the amount that was granted previously?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the grain inspectors have chosen to strike and they are perfectly entitled to do so. The board of conciliation presented both a majority report and a minority report. The latter, written out by a union representative, accomplished far less than the act passed last fall. I fail to see therefore why the Treasury Board should offer more than was suggested by the union representative to the conciliation board.

[English]

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary for the President of the Treasury Board. In all sincerity I say to him that I do not believe the government is aware of the seriousness of the present situation. In talking with grain company officials in Winnipeg this morning it became apparent that we are faced with loss of sales in the next two or three days unless something positive is done. Since the grain industry is being brought to its knees because of the strike, may I ask the minister what positive and immediate measures the government is considering in order to get grain moving again or does it intend just to sit around and wait?

● (1430)

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the Parliament of Canada gave government employees the right to strike. I feel that it behoves us to respect that right as long as the Parliament of Canada does not withdraw it. That is why we asked a mediator to intervene this morning. We trust that we can achieve a settlement through standard procedures without being forced to withdraw the right to strike granted the public service by the Canadian Parliament.

[English]

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Labour is absent, may I direct my supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board. The President of the Treasury Board indicated that he hopes that an agreement will soon be reached. Has he any concrete information on which to base his belief that an agreement will be reached with the grain inspectors and that they will be back at work in a short time. If not, in view of the serious consequences to the total Canadian economy, is the government prepared to bring in emergency legislation, to order these people back to work?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of the strike earlier this week, we are continually in touch with the unions. This morning, Mr. Finkelman has appointed a mediator and we hope he will be able to bring the two parties to an agreement, but I cannot predict what will happen in the future.

[English]

STRIKE OF GRAIN INSPECTORS—SUGGESTED RECALL FROM MEXICO OF MINISTER OF LABOUR

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Labour. As grain movements out of Canada have been virtually halted for the second time this year owing to the current grain inspectors' strike, and because approximately one million bushels of these shipments consist of famine relief supplies which are intended for starving nations, particularly Bangladesh, will the Prime Minister acknowledge the urgency of this matter by recalling the Minister of Labour from Mexico so that immediate action may be taken to ensure that grain movements return to normal as soon as possible.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the House will want to know, I am sure, that the minister is in Mexico attending the ILO conference, which even members on the opposite side may find important to Canada. The substance of the question has already been dealt with by the President of the Treasury Board, who has responsibility for this rather than the Minister of Labour. It has been dealt with, except to this extent: the question was inaccurate in that the hon. member did not realize that an exception was made for Bangladesh, to which country supplies are being sent.

TRANSPORT

UPGRADING OF GRAIN MOVEMENT FACILITIES—ABILITY OF MINISTER TO KEEP COMMITMENT IN VIEW OF LABOUR DISPUTES

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister explain to the House how he expects to fulfil the commitment made in the Speech from the Throne concerning the upgrading of grain movement facilities if the grain transport system is continually plagued with labour disruptions which appear to be beyond the control of the government.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the hon. gentleman decided not to address a serious question to me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants to tell me that his party is ready to remove the right to strike from all those who are handling grain in Canada, I shall agree with him.

FINANCE

WINTER WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR INCREASED FUNDS IN VIEW OF FORECAST INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As the $350 million winter capital works program fund which was set up in 1972 is now exhausted I ask, in view of the forecast that unemployment levels will increase this winter and in the coming spring, if the minister intends to add new funds to this capital works fund.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are reviewing this program. The momentum of this program will carry it forward until May 31, 1975. We hope to supplement it by providing some stimulation to the housing market and the construction industry. We hope this will remedy the situation which the hon. member has in mind.

PROVISION OF LOW INTEREST LOANS TO MUNICIPALITIES FOR THE INSTALLATION OF SERVICES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the urgent need for municipal services, particularly the need for finances for services associated with the construction of housing, will the minister consider providing emergency low interest rate loans to municipalities so that they can provide services which are necessary for the construction of an increased number of housing units during the coming winter months.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt, because provinces exercise authority over the priorities under which the money is to be spent, that the winter capital works program in some provinces was directed to the infrastructure in municipal services. The hon. member will recall, of course, that the budget provides tax relief for sewage plants and municipal transport, and this should go some way to relieving that particular problem.

Oral Questions

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO INCREASE SUPPLY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a final supplementary question. The minister could have said simply no in reply to my last question. May I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. As the President of the Canadian Real Estate Association forecast a 10 per cent increase in house prices next year, and given the 30 per cent decline in housing starts this year that forecast is not unrealistic, has the minister any plans in addition to those which were announced in the budget for increasing the supply of housing, as this will be of decisive importance next year.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the report of the President of the Canadian Real Estate Association, and perhaps he has not read my speeches. I think he is entitled to his view, which is held by some people. Nevertheless, I hope my programs will be sufficiently successful to ensure that we will prove him wrong, just as we have proved wrong some respected economic bodies. Certainly, we are concerned about the lower rate of starts. We are not satisfied with that. I outlined a range of programs in my speech on Monday; I hope the hon. member will read it, because he will see that there is a potential there for keeping housing starts high.

IMMIGRATION

HAITIANS—PROPOSAL BY QUEBEC MINISTER OF IMMIGRATION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

The Quebec Minister of Immigration has just made public a report that he recently made a proposition to his federal counterpart to help settle the Haitian situation in Canada and to avoid similar ones in the future. Can the Minister of Manpower and Immigration inform the House of the nature of the proposal made by Mr. Bienvenue and what he intends to do in this regard?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I met with Mr. Bienvenue last Friday, I believe, and discussed the whole range of immigration questions, particularly immigration in Quebec. We did, of course, talk about the Haitian problem, but no specific proposal was made at that time and, unless he has sent me a communication subsequently which I have not received since that date, I cannot enlighten the hon. member further.

REMOVAL OF SALES TAX ON HEAVY TRUCKS—SUGGESTED RETURN OF TAX PAID ON VEHICLES IN DEALERS' HANDS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I address my question to the Minister of Finance. As the budget proposes removing the sales tax on heavy trucks, has the minister received urgent communications from a number of associations and dealers who are finding themselves left with heavy, specialized units on which many thousands of dollars of sales tax have already been paid and on which, in some instances, they may be forced to take a loss of over $100,000.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have received representations from members on both sides of the House. We are reviewing the situation again this afternoon.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. The minister may recall that there is ample precedent in the past for returning sales tax in these circumstances.

An hon. Member: Under a Conservative government, too.

TIDAL POWER FROM BAY OF FUNDY—POSSIBLE DEVELOPMENT IN CONJUNCTION WITH THERMAL AND NUCLEAR POWER UNITS

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources relates to the review of Fundy tidal power which he tabled at two o'clock. May I preface my question by thanking the minister for the cooperation he has shown throughout the review and by tabling the report.

● (1440)

In line with the positive action which has been taken in relation to Funday tidal power development, is it the intention of the governments involved to consider the development of tidal power in conjunction with the possible development of thermal power from the Cumberland coalfields and the development of nuclear power from the proposed nuclear power station to be built at Point Lepreau, New Brunswick?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I should like to thank the hon. member for his introductory remarks. As he notes, the tidal power project as contemplated in the reassessment would involve complementary thermal stations. One of the critical questions would be how large a market might be needed for tidal power in eastern Canada to make the project feasible. With respect to the possible coal deposits in Cumberland County, the federal government is presently financing, with the provincial government, an assessment of the coal resources of Nova Scotia outside Cape Breton Island. Any addition to the power grid in the near future, the likely addition of nuclear power at Point Lepreau and possibly at some site in Nova Scotia would, of course, build up the over-all grid and make tidal power generation possible.

TIDAL POWER FROM BAY OF FUNDY—INVESTIGATION OF OTHER TIDAL POWER PROJECTS

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): My supplementary question relates to the method which will be used by the investigators over the next two years in determining the feasibility of constructing dams to harness the Bay of Fundy tides. Will those engaged in updating the information presently in existence with regard to tidal power production involve themselves in examination of the tidal power operation at La Rance, France, on the Severn River in Great Britain and at Kislaya Bay where a Russian development is said to be taking place?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, those engaged in carrying out the further studies which are now the subject of discussion with the provincial governments would, I believe, wish to examine the systems which are already in place; they would like to follow the hon. gentleman's example by investigating them on the scene. Indeed, it might be desirable if he and I were to investigate the two sites he mentioned in the Soviet Union and Great Britain, though preferably at another time of year.

ESTABLISHMENT OF LONG-RANGE TRANSMISSION GRID—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF WORK OF QUEBEC HYDRO AND NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North in thanking the minister for making the report available. My supplementary arises from the answer given by the Prime Minister a couple of weeks ago on the subject of a long-range transmission grid. Could the hon. gentleman find out what Quebec Hydro and the National Research Council have been doing in connection with long range transmission so that the information going into the Prime Minister's Office can be updated in this respect?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I read the hon. gentleman's question. The principal obstacle to a nationwide grid lies not so much in Quebec as within the Province of Ontario—the linking of northwestern Ontario with the southern part of the province. Ontario Hydro has concluded that for the time being it is not to its advantage to link up the two systems. I can say that the report tabled today does indicate the desirability and the feasibility of better interconnection between the Atlantic provinces and the Province of Quebec in particular—an eastern grid. To a degree there is already such a connection accommodating Churchill Falls power, and the report brings closer the day when there will be further development of connections between those parts of the country.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The minister has touched upon the very point I am trying to make. When he has found out what Quebec Hydro and the National Research Council have done, would he also inform the government of Ontario of the progress which has been made?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would be glad to do so. However, Ontario Hydro is a very experienced and well-advised Crown corporation and I am sure the people there are up to date on these matters. However, I will make certain they are familiar with this additional research.

CHURCHILL FALLS POWER PROJECT—PROPOSED CABLE TUNNEL BETWEEN LABRADOR AND NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): My question is to the same minister, Mr. Speaker. As a result of his reference to the Lower Churchill and the potential development of an alternate source of energy, would the minister indicate what progress is being made with the Province of Newfoundland as a result of implementing and building up that potential with regard to the transfer of the power, the submittance of the power between Labrador and Newfoundland through a cable tunnel? And if I do not get the chance to ask a supplementary—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marshall: —has there been any indication that there could be terms of reference indicated to enlarge on the cable tunnel to ask for a cable and transmittal tunnel for transit vehicles?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the matter of a connection between Labrador and the island was the subject of discussion with the Newfoundland ministers several weeks ago here. At the moment we are discussing the question of interconnection both in relation to Churchill Falls power and also with respect to the possible development of some sites downstream, particularly at Gull Island. The difficulty is that the construction costs of the downstream sites would be very substantial and would present a considerable financing problem both to the federal and the provincial governments. In these circumstances I think it is not likely there will be provision for pedestrian or vehicular traffic between Labrador and the island in the very near future.

ALLEGED INCONSISTENCIES BETWEEN STATEMENTS IN PAMPHLET "BUDGET IN BRIEF" AND STATEMENTS OF MINISTER

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In the budget address, the hon. gentleman said—and I quote—that he believed the tax cuts "can help to reduce prices and costs." Does the minister have an exact projection of the extent to which prices will be reduced, and, if so, what is it?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I hope the hon. gentleman will look through the background material and get a wider perspective of that speech.

Mr. Paproski: Having regard to the vagueness both of that answer and of the statement in the budget address, may I ask whether the minister is aware that the pamphlet "Budget in Brief" makes the bold statement: "Tax cuts will reduce prices." If so, would he tell the House just which we are to believe—his words in this chamber, or his pamphlets?

The pamphlet also says that the reduction in the sales tax "represents an average saving of about $650 per house". Speaking in this chamber, the minister said only that it would "contribute to moderation of prices". Does the statement in the pamphlet represent the government's position, and, if so, will the hon. gentleman tell us what means he intends to use to keep that promise?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the pamphlet "Budget in Brief" and the budget address are readily reconciliable. I hope that when we get to the committee stage the hon. member will be here to put that argument again and I can attempt to reply in the detail that it deserves.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—maybe a question of privilege. I find there are misleading statements in the pamphlet "Budget in Brief". I have found two fairly serious inconsistencies. First, on page eight, the pamphlet states:

It is estimated that at current rates about $1,100 in sales tax is paid on the building materials that go into an average home. The reduction of the tax therefore represents an average saving of about $650 per house.

In his budget address, the minister simply stated:

I am confident that this measure will add stimulus to the industry and will, at the same time, contribute to a moderation of prices for housing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: On page three of the pamphlet it is stated:

Tax cuts will reduce prices and costs directly or indirectly and increase the take-home pay of Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Just to show the minister I have read what he has said, let me point out that in the budget address he simply stated:

I believe the tax cuts can help to reduce prices and costs directly or indirectly, and thus slow down the upward movement of inflation.

Why isn't the minister honest with the House and the Canadian people?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has raised a point of order. The fact of the matter is that detailed questions about the budget could have been asked during the budget debate. Moreover, detailed submissions about the legislation to be proposed when those measures are before the committee of the whole—there is a series of budget bills to be considered. The questions put to the minister by the hon. member are related to the subject matter of those bills, yet they might have been acceptable because, at the same time, they were connected with the speech made in the House by the Minister of Finance. In any case, I cannot find that the hon. member has a legitimate point of order.

[Mr. Paproski.]

SALES TAX ON AUTOMOBILES—APPLICABLE TO DATE OF ORDER OR DATE OF DELIVERY

Mr. Robert McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is further to the question asked by the hon. member for Edmonton West regarding the sales tax on trucks which might be on dealers' lots at the present time. Would the hon. gentleman give the House some information on this question and can he also tell us whether or not the new tax on automobiles that he is proposing will apply to new cars which were ordered but not yet delivered or whether it will apply as from delivery dates?

● (1450)

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I put it to the hon. member's colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton West, I will try to deal with these points in reviewing the application of the sales tax on trucks as it affects inventory. As to the application of the additional surtax on high energy consuming vehicles, I will give the hon. gentleman more detail. We can go into the question in some amplitude when we get the bill before the House.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. This is a very urgent matter. Dealers are selling cars and trucks every day and they would like to know the answer within a day or two.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I will give the hon. gentleman some details of a more precise nature, but I always hesitate to give a precise interpretation of a Ways and Means motion just off the top of my head.

DRUGS

ALLEGED LACK OF TESTING OF NEW PRODUCTS—SUGGESTED USE OF ALL TESTING FACILITIES

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Why does the drug directorate of the health protection branch, or any other federal health agency, not test all new drugs coming on to the market?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there is a very good reason. If the directorate itself were to test, in the sense that the hon. member must mean, every single drug that comes on to the market, we would require a lab much larger than any lab presently existing in the country. It has always been our policy to require very elaborate and thorough investigation and testing of drugs on the part of private applicants, and these tests are then checked and verified by scientists of the health protection branch before permission to market is granted. This practice in this area is followed in most other countries.

Mr. Symes: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I find the minister's excuse rather shocking, and he is playing with the public's health in this regard. Let me ask the minister this. In fact the drug directorate makes only random samplings, and in 1973, 5 per cent of the drugs tested had to be withdrawn. Would the minister explore every avenue of drug testing, including private agencies, universities and so on, so that we do not have another thalidomide or similar drug disaster in Canada?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that the health protection services of this country compare favourably with the health protection services of any other country in the world. So far as the hon. member's question is concerned, we are, of course, continually reviewing our policies in this respect and any means of improving them will be examined. If the hon. member has specific suggestions I will certainly take them into account.

SUGGESTION PRIME MINISTER DISCUSS UNITED STATES BEEF IMPORT QUOTAS WITH PRESIDENT FORD

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to pose a question to the Prime Minister. In light of the apparent failure of our agricultural officials to discuss United States beef import quotas at the Washington meeting yesterday, will the Prime Minister assure the House that this subject will receive high priority at his upcoming meeting with President Ford on December 4?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would have to find out first what the results of the discussions yesterday were. I think the hon. member may be misinformed in saying that there was a failure to discuss them.

USE OF BEEF IN FOOD AID PROGRAMS—POSSIBLE OTHER MEASURES TO STABILIZE BEEF MARKET

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I will direct to the Minister of Agriculture. On November 21, I believe, the Minister of Agriculture stated that he had started to look for countries that could use beef in food aid programs, and he was also looking for other programs which would ensure that the market was stabilized. What has been the minister's response to the proposals made by the National Farmers Union, and what other programs of this sort has he under consideration at the present time to help stabilize the beef and red meat industry?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, while at the world food conference we did discuss with countries in dire need of food aid whether they could use beef, and we were told on two occasions that they could not. We have been exploring other areas to find out whether we could use beef in countries other than those two, but we have not yet had any success. Last Friday afternoon I discussed with the president of the National Farmers Union their proposals, and they are being considered at this time along with several other proposals regarding what we should do.

VIEWS OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE ON ABORTION AND CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. An article in yesterday's Montreal Gazette quotes the Minister of Justice as saying on the subject of abortion: "I don't think we should have a situation where, parliament having passed the law, we have it in any way widely abused". Would the Minister of Justice tell me whether he feels the same way on the issue of capital punishment?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that it is the view of this government that the appropriate approach to the law is to adhere to it in every respect in regard to all matters.

Mr. Friesen: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I will address to the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister support the Minister of Justice in his point of view?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO LEGISLATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to my friend the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who is responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission. In light of the latest report that the maximum weekly unemployment insurance benefit will rise to $123 on January 1, and in light of the fact that the Minister has indicated that these payments are unproductive, would the minister advise whether the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act are now prepared and, if so, when can we expect some priority to be given to the bill?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I did not say that the unemployment insurance benefits paid were unproductive. I said that in my view they should be made more productive. I would be very glad to explain that to my hon. friend in some detail on the first available occasion. As for the amendments to the act, they will be forthcoming and will be presented to the House in due course.

REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF AMOUNT OF BENEFITS PAID IN 1974

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I see the former minister of labour is very concerned at the fact that I have asked that question, but notwithstanding that can the minister advise me whether he is in possession of any information which indicates that we are now in for another record year in terms of benefits paid out? If so, what is his prognosis in this regard?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not judging the amount of benefits paid out in terms of making or breaking records or not making or breaking records. We pay out benefits to people who are entitled to them in relation to the terms and conditions of their unemployment.

Mr. Alexander: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I know the former minister of labour dislikes my asking these questions, and I know that the minister of manpower is presently trying to evade my question, but I would ask him to answer it. Has the minister any idea what the benefit pay out will be in 1974? That is all I am asking and I know he has the answer.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is, not deliberately but inadvertently, misleading the House if he thinks that I have the answer to that right now off the top of my head.

REASON FOR DIFFERENCE IN TAXATION OF MARINE EQUIPMENT AND AUTOMOBILES

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance regarding the extra tax on certain vehicles at a time when the manufacturing, wholesale and retail sectors of the marine industry are suffering from a severe recession. Would the minister explain to the House why he intends to impose such a discriminatory tax as the 10 per cent surcharge, which could bring the extra tax on an outboard motor boat which sold at $6,000 up to $600, whereas a high energy car which can sell for $10,000 to $12,000 would only be taxed on an extra 200 or 300 pounds, which means an extra tax of probably no more than $100?

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the quarterly quota on hog exports to the United States will be filled by the end of this week, will the Minister of Agriculture inform the House what tentative plans he has made that will deal with this very serious situation?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we do not foresee any great difficulty in respect of pork products. Arrangements and plans in respect of what we are going to do regarding pork products have not been finalized at the present time, but we are working on them.

KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF REPORT OF NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD WHEN PREPARING BUDGETARY PROPOSALS FOR OIL INDUSTRY

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, last night in the House the Prime Minister said, and I quote:

> We have taken the steps we felt necessary to achieve our objective, consistent with maintaining a healthy industry.

The Prime Minister was referring to oil. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he had the new National Energy Board study on oil supplies before presenting the budget, and whether the studies used by his department in preparing the budget indicated that the exploration level for oil and gas as a result of the budget would increase, stay the same or decrease? I should also like to ask the minister if he will table these studies?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I dealt with that question in some detail in reply to questions put to me yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition. Perhaps the hon. member would refer to those answers, and, if they do not satisfy him, he might put the question to me again tomorrow.

LEVEL OF ROYALTIES AT WHICH GOVERNMENT MIGHT CONSIDER DEDUCTIBILITY

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of his reference twice yesterday in the House to a very high level of royalties eroding the federal tax base, and the statement by the Minister of Finance that the provinces have gone too far, implying that some lower level of provincial royalties might have been acceptable, would the government consider permitting the deductibility of royalties up to some level considered to be reasonable so that Canadians will not be faced with the possibility of freezing in the dark?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that is an interesting question, and if it had been asked by the premier of one of the provinces some months ago we might have come in with a different budget, although I do not know. Obviously, they did not want to act in that direction.

KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF REPORT OF ECONOMIC COUNCIL WHEN PREPARING BUDGET PROPOSALS DEALING WITH ROYALTIES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question supplementary to that of the hon. member for Calgary South and along the lines of a question I asked yesterday. I should point out to the Minister of Finance that in one chapter of this report it is stated:

The analysis in this chapter suggests that energy strategy should give great weight to the need to encourage exploration for oil and gas . . .

I should like to ask whether the minister knew of the intention and recommendations of the Economic Council of Canada when he prepared his budget which included a tax on royalties as dealt with by the Prime Minister during his hour and a half speech yesterday?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I dealt with that in specific terms in reply to the hon. gentleman yesterday. I can say to him that I had no advance consultation with the Economic Council of Canada in respect of the report. I might add that the Economic Council, by reason of its terms of reference in the statute setting it up, deals with medium and long-term economic prospects for Canada. Of course, members of the House and myself deal in the short-term as it affects these prospects.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, might I ask one further supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: With all due respect to the hon. member, I think we have now gone beyond even representations on the question asked by the hon. member for Calgary South. In this instance not only is the same question being asked, but the hon. member is asking the same question he asked yesterday, and I think we ought to move on.

MEAT AND GRAIN INSPECTORS—SUGGESTION INSPECTORS REMAIN AT WORK DURING NEGOTIATIONS—APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in view of the unhealthy situation existing in the red meat industry which jeopardizes the assurance of supply of red meat to the consumer, due to the meat inspectors and graders striking and working to rule as a result of the affiliation of the meat inspectors with the grain inspectors, would the President of the Treasury Board accept as his personal responsibility the resolving of this disagreement, and while negotiations are taking place will he request all inspectors to remain on the job?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that meat inspectors and other officers who deal with primary commodities are not on strike. For the time being, only grain inspectors are. Yesterday, some officers left work, but I am advised that they are back on the job today. Anyway, non-designated employees among the 2,300 primary commodities inspectors have the right to strike, since it is a right which was given to them under a parliamentary legislation.

[English]

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the graders were out on strike yesterday and the inspectors are working to rule, which jeopardizes production in the red meat industry, will the President of the Treasury Board agree that if Mr. Finkelman does not resolve this problem within a few days he will appoint a new mediator?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I was aware that the hon. member was going to ask this question, and a mediator was appointed this morning.

STRIKE OF GRAIN INSPECTORS—PROSPECTS FOR SETTLEMENT IN VIEW OF SIZE OF SETTLEMENT FOR GRAIN HANDLERS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that we now have a double standard in labour negotiations that has been perpetuated by this government, does the President of the Treasury Board not feel that until a satisfactory explanation is made in respect of the two offers, and I refer to the grain handlers, or until that discrepancy is resolved, the prospects of reaching a resolution to this strike will be severely inhibited?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, there are well known procedures to solve labour conflicts in Canada. As regards those inspectors, as I have said earlier, a conciliation board has presented a report. The majority report has not been accepted by the workers, but I must say that the minority report, as proposed by the union representative, did not even claim as much as the grain handlers have received.

REQUEST FOR CANCELLATION OF SALE OF CANDU REACTOR TO ARGENTINE—SUGGESTION NO FURTHER SALES BE MADE IN VIEW OF LACK OF SAFEGUARDS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I would direct my question to the Prime Minister. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has indicated that the government of Canada is seeking safeguards from the government of Argentina prior to the disbursement of the Cabinet-approved ECD loan of more than $129 million for the construction of a Candu reactor in Argentia. In light of the highly volatile political situation in that country and the very obvious instability of the present Argentine government, will the Prime Minister inform the House whether he is going to cancel the sale of the Candu to Argentina?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would say to the House that this matter is under consideration at the present time, and I will take the question of the hon. member by way of representation.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, while the Prime Minister is doing that would he also consider that, in view of the fact there can be no safeguards when providing other countries with this nuclear potential, this kind of sale should not be entered into even though it might provide a number of jobs for Canadians?

Mr. Trudeau: Of course, Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with the premise of the question which is, if I understood it well, that there are no safeguards that can be provided. That is not the government's view. In the past we have applied safeguards, and the government is presently increasing the strength of those safeguards. To take the attitude of the hon. member would mean that Canada would sit on this very advanced technology and not be willing to share even its benefits with some of the countries of the world that do not have our advantages.

DATE ON WHICH MINISTER WAS CONSIDERING BUDGETARY PROPOSALS CONCERNING DEDUCTIBILITY OF ROYALTIES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether the Minister of Finance will say categorically that on March 27 of this year he was considering changes to the Income Tax Act which would disallow the deductibility of provincial royalties?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. As the Prime Minister said in his speech yesterday, we made it clear to the provinces in advance of the conference that we were disturbed about unilateral action in the way of royalties and other techniques on the part of the provinces which would erode the federal tax base. At that time we were exploring a number of avenues, but we had not arrived at a decision as to the best method to follow.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, had the minister made known to the Prime Minister that he was contemplating income tax amendments of that nature so that the Prime Minister would have known of that on March 27?

● (1510)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said quite categorically we were exploring a number of avenues in order to preserve the federal base, but I had made no final decision at that time. I advised the Prime Minister, and he communicated to the provinces, that we should put them on guard against unilateral use of the royalty technique to erode the federal base. That was communicated, as the Prime Minister said yesterday, both in writing and verbally to the two premiers concerned.

GOVERNMENT ACTION FOLLOWING REPORT OF TEXTILE AND CLOTHING BOARD

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

On November 18, I asked him what he would do to assist the textile industry. Since the situation is still very critical owing to massive imports and numerous layoffs, I would like to know, following the presentation made this afternoon of the Textile and Clothing Board's report, what immediate action he intends to take to deal with that urgent situation?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I tabled the three reports to which the hon. member referred today. The government is accepting the recommendations of those reports. These provide for restraint measures in respect of those products covered by those reports except for nylon fabrics. In respect of nylon fabrics we have already, two days ago, entered into negotiations with the Republic of Korea aimed at reaching a restraint agreement. We have under international rules an expectation that we should be able to get it within 60 days.

If, however, during that 60-day period it appears that we are not making progress then we can under international rules obtain an emergency provision which would give us a restraint agreement in seven days. The other point I should like to make is that since those reports were written and submitted by the Textile and Clothing Board there has been a deterioration in the textile industry in Canada occasioned by international competitive practices, and in view of that I instructed the Textile Board to make a review of the situation and report to me at an early date.

I wonder whether the Prime Minister can tell us why that report has not been made and when it will be made?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear every bit of the question because it had not been addressed to me at the outset, but if it deals with the matter I heard at the end, it is a question of which I took notice on behalf of the minister and I think the member might well be advised to ask the minister.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the question was asked most recently of the Prime Minister and twice before of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. At no time was there an answer except an answer by the Secretary of State for External Affairs who was in the House and has left to the effect that he would give a full report to the House. I am interested in knowing why there has been this long delay in making available the information about any connection between the person mentioned by the Cliche Commission and the Government of Canada and when we can expect a straight answer and receipt of that report.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, my answer was that I did not know and that I would take notice of the question on behalf of the minister. The minister was out of the country on government business. He is out of the House on government business and the member might obtain permission to ask him when he comes back.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. At this stage of the proceedings yesterday when we were dealing with House business for ensuing days and weeks I asked the President of the Privy Council if he could indicate when two bills would be presented, first a bill by the Minister of Transport having to do with requiring the railways to disclose their freight cost structures and second a bill by the Minister of Veterans Affairs having to do with Hong Kong Veterans. Yesterday the minister said he would get the answer as quickly as possible. I wonder whether he can give that information today.

Mr. Sharp: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have good news and bad news. The good news is that the Minister of Transport is in the throes of drafting the particular bill and it will be presented soon. The bad news is that my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs is studying the proposal.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What do we do to get the Minister of Veterans Affairs "into the throes"?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Rocky Mountain on a point of order.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, a moment ago the Prime Minister suggested that I might ask permission to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he returned to the House from government business. My question to the Prime Minister and twice before to the Secretary of State for External Affairs—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Whether it be suggested by the Prime Minister or not, the fact of the matter is that the question period has come to an end. I do not know whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs might have some pertinent information he might add, but if so he might want to do that. Otherwise we will go on with orders of the day.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, sometime ago the hon. member asked about Mr. Mantha. The fact is that for some days or some period after the information had been available the hon. member was not in the House.

● (1520)

I do not complain about that. As I recollect, his question was: what status did Mr. Mantha have with respect to a CIDA project. He is not directly employed by CIDA. He is employed by a contractor in a CIDA project. As I understand it, prior to his going to Zaire the clearance had been given to him as a qualified person. But since he has returned, he is not on the project.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): That was half an answer, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH CORPORATION

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-14, to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) has on the order paper an amendment at this stage of the bill pertaining to the definition clause. I am sure the hon. member is aware of the fact that the Chair has some very grave reservations about the procedural regularity of the amendment. However, in view of the fact that the amendment would appear to add a totally new clause to the definition section, which in turn would add a totally new principle or concept to the application of the bill as a whole and therefore would offend one or two basic rules pertinent to amendments at this stage, I would not want to make a final ruling without giving the hon. member an opportunity to defend his amendment from a procedural point of view.

It seems to me that an amendment which adds to the definition clause of a bill a definition which was not contemplated in the original drafting of the bill, thereby seeking not simply to clarify the definition section but to limit the application of the bill to the kind of activity that is defined by the proposed amendment, would go not only beyond the scope of the clause under consideration but would probably be outside the principle and scope of the bill itself. Under those circumstances, I have grave reservations about the amendment, but I will be pleased to hear from any hon. member who wishes to contribute to the procedural point before we continue.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have not prepared myself to speak to the amendment which I tabled some three weeks ago before the bill went to committee, and it had been tabled for over two weeks in the House. The first suggestion that there is a procedural problem with respect to it was made thirty seconds ago by Your Honour. I had no notification from the Clerk. This leaves me in the difficult position of trying to bring forward precedents in defending the amendment.

However, I respectfully submit that a bill which defines a business enterprise and provides that money will be lent to business enterprises in Canada restricts, to a certain degree, what a business enterprise is. Therefore, the amendment is in no way outside the scope and intent of the bill. This is a very wide bill which sets up a new bank. Surely, in setting up a new bank we may in some way try to influence the direction the bank will take. The evidence in the committee was that 1 per cent or 2 per cent of the bank's funds might be affected by this amendment, so it can hardly be suggested that this amendment goes too far in restricting the bill or its scope.

This amendment would not affect taxes or government expenditures. It is merely deals with the definition of a business enterprise to which the bank may lend funds. Surely members of the House of Commons have the obligation and the right to express their views on a matter of this nature. I would point out that I find myself in a difficult position in having to defend the amendment after it has been in circulation both in the committee and the House for five weeks, everybody having accepted it and debated it as well as voting on it in the committee. Only a few minutes ago I learned, for the first time, that the amendment was challenged and now I have to be an instant expert on the matter. I regret that I cannot be an instant expert, and I hope we will be allowed to debate the substance of the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It may be suggested that we reserve consideration of this amendment and proceed to the consideration of two others that will be put before us, if the hon. member wants time to prepare himself to defend the procedural aspects of his proposed amendment.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in case I am not in the chamber at the time of the debate on this amendment, may I point out to the Chair that if Your Honour examines the recommendation—which of course is not binding by itself—it is written in very wide and vague terms and I suggest there is nothing in the recommendation which would inhibit the hon. member in bringing forward his amendment. I have not had time to review the bill, but I studied it when it was before the House for second reading. I would call the attention of the Chair to clause 4 of the bill which deals with the objects of the corporation. It reads:

> The objects of the corporation are to promote and assist in the establishment and development of business enterprises in Canada—

Under the interpretation section of any statute the words "business enterprises in Canada" would receive the widest possible latitude and interpretation. The hon. member has sought, by his amendment, to give some meaning to that term. It lies within the competence of the government to interpret the term "business enterprises in Canada". Perhaps the government, for reasons best known to itself, said: We will not interpret "business enterprises in Canada"; we will leave that interpretation to the minister, to the courts, or to some vague, indefinite group of people.

However, when you have a statute which presumably is of a remedial nature—we must assume that every statute tends to remedy some defect or to provide some cure for a problem which has existed—a statute which, in the terms of this enactment, would incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank, and certain definitions are given but there is complete silence as to the intent of the government with regard to business enterprises in Canada, then we must admit that the legislation is wide open. Surely it is possible, under these conditions, for any hon. member to give a more precise interpretation to the term used in the bill.

I would agree 100 per cent with Your Honour if the bill had gone on to say that "business enterprises in Canada" means certain specific types of business enterprises and the recommendation of His Excellency contained such limited description. In that case, the hon. member would find great difficulty in convincing me and convincing the Chair that the amendment should provide the benefits under this legislation, that is, the expenditure of money, to organizations outside those limited by the definition clause of the bill. There being no such definition in the bill, we are left with the words "business enterprises in Canada", and I would assume it is competent for any member of this House to try to place a definition upon that phrase.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for his contribution. I propose to hear other hon. members in order to resolve my difficulty. I wonder if hon. members, in contributing to this point, would direct themselves not only to the question, as they have, of whether the proposed amendment is contrary to the basic principle of the bill—in other words, establishing that the application of the bill would be restricted to strictly Canadian corporations, as opposed to having wide application in its original intent—but also to the basic problem of whether, even accepting that the amendment is permissible—and I have some doubt there—it is proper to endeavour to do what is sought by changing the definition clause.

What is happening here, it seems to me, is that by changing the definition clause an attempt is being made to make a very important, substantive change to the basic principle of the legislation. Surely that is not the basic nature of the definition clause. Such a change, if it is to be made by way of an amendment, ought to be put forward, it seems to me, in the form of a substantive amendment to the basic principle of the bill and a series of consequent amendments to all the applications of the bill. So my problem is not simply that the amendment seems to be contrary to the principle of the bill but, rather, that it also goes far beyond the scope of the clause in question, being a simple definition clause as opposed to a substantive clause.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, your suggestion that perhaps we should stand this item and go on to the next three amendments is acceptable. It takes me a little by surprise that there should be any question of the admissibility of this amendment. I would point out, however, that not only is the question of business enterprises referred to in the clause discussed by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), but it also occurs in clause 20(1)(a). Listed among the powers of this corporation is the power, in effect, to lend money to a person who is engaged or about to be engaged in a business enterprise in Canada.

This question was discussed in committee and there seemed to be considerable doubt about what was meant by the term "business enterprises in Canada". There was the suggestion that it should be defined so as to make it clear that it was a small business enterprise. We hesitated to suggest that type of amendment because in today's inflationary world one might say a $200,000 company is a small business. However, there was no suggestion in committee that to define a small business enterprise as having to be Canadian, in the sense that it did not have foreign-ownership content, would be out of order.

I would point out that in the Industrial Development Bank Act, which is chapter 1(9) of the Statutes of Canada, the term used which is comparable to the one we are considering is "industrial enterprise in Canada". In that act "industrial enterprise" is defined. Frankly, I think the draftsman of the bill before us simply overlooked or omitted giving a definition. I think it would be much better draftmanship to define exactly what is meant by "business enterprises in Canada" in this bill, in the same way as the act defines "industrial enterprise in Canada".

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I have just a couple of points, Mr. Speaker. I should like, first, to deal with clause 4 which the Conservative House leader referred to in building a case to the effect that this amendment should be admitted. He referred to the words "and assist in the establishment and development of business enterprises in Canada" and spoke about the corporate objectives of the Federal Business Development Bank. Clause 4(1) reads:

> —of business enterprises in Canada by providing, in the manner and to the extent authorized by this act, financial assistance, management counselling—

The key phrase is "business enterprises in Canada". I would argue that indeed the amendment is restrictive because it clearly would change the importance attached to that phrase and substitute something quite different, that is, an enterprise controlled in a shareholder sense by Canadians. It would restrict from the operation of the Federal Business Development Bank business enterprises which are operating in Canada, which are employing Canadians, which are managed by Canadians, which are paying Canadian taxes and which are using Canadian materials. I would argue that the change proposed by the hon. member is a substantive one, and for that reason I support the submission that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There have been suggestions that we should defer consideration of this amendment. The Chair would be prepared to accede to that suggestion or, alternatively, to deal with the matter at once. Is it possible that the House might be agreeable to proceeding to consideration of motions Nos. 2 and 3, allowing this matter to stand for a few minutes for further consideration. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I make a suggestion? We do not need to take up the time of the House unnecessarily. If the first part of our argument has any appeal at all to the Chair, so that there may be a possibility that for the reasons advanced some means could be found of making an amendment of this kind, but that procedurally—and I can see the Chair's point there—it is quite impossible to place this amendment within the four corners of the definition clause, we could give some thought to an alternative form of amendment which might place the proposal of my hon. friend somewhere else in the bill and consequential amendments could be made.

In those circumstances, if the Chair is convinced beyond any shadow of doubt that any attempt by a private member to give some meaning to the words "business enterprises in Canada" is objectionable ab initio; that is it. On the other hand, however, if that is a surmountable objection I think the Chair might have a problem. If it is mainly a matter of taking this amendment, placing it elsewhere in the bill and adding a clause when the consequential amendment is made, then we can be devoting our ingenuity and time to doing that.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for his latter contribution particularly. Frankly, the aspect of this matter that disturbs me is that the hon. member was caught by surprise in respect of the procedural acceptability of his amendment. That leaves the House in the position that not only the hon. member who proposed the amendment, but many other hon. members who looked at the amendment and thought it would perhaps give them the opportunity to express themselves on this very important point, might now be deprived of that opportunity, and because of the notice requirement would be deprived for all time from making this kind of amendment in that procedural form.

To a certain extent, rather than making bad law by accepting the amendment in a form in which it ought not to be accepted, I would rather go back to the last point of view expressed and, if possible, permit another amendment, a proper amendment, to be put. This would have to be done with the consent of the House, however, because the notice provisions would have to be abridged. I wonder if the House is now in a position to give its consent to waiving the notice provisions in respect of the introduction of this amendment in another form at, perhaps, eight o'clock this evening. Would that be agreeable?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, before we consider that point may I draw to your attention that this particular amendment is not new to the members of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. The hon. member advanced this amendment and the committee considered it and rejected it. There has been an opportunity already for members of the committee to argue the point. It was fully argued and, of course, is covered in the proceedings of the committee.

Mr. Speaker: That is exactly the point: I am anxious that members of this House have an opportunity to do what was done in the committee, if at all possible. Quite frankly, I am reluctant to do it by accepting an amendment to a definition clause when I feel very strongly that it ought not to be in there but should be somewhere else. If the hon. member could indicate that he would be prepared to have his amendment ready for eight o'clock, and if the House would give its consent to retabling it, I think that might take us out of a rather awkward procedural position. Is this agreed?

[Mr. Speaker.]

● (1540)

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: We could proceed to the consideration of motions numbered 2 and 3. It seems to me that motions Nos. 2 and 3 are similar in purport and priority might be given to motion No. 2, standing in the name of the minister, as it was received first by the table. It might be open to the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) to propose part or all of his motion as an amendment to motion No. 2. On the other hand, motions 2 and 3 might be discussed together but a favourable vote on motion No. 2 must, of necessity, dispose of motion No. 3. It is suggested that motion No. 4 be considered on its own and in the usual way.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved:

That Bill C-14, an act to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank, be amended by striking out lines 28 to 42, inclusive, on page 15 and substituting the following:

"36.(1) In this section,

"applicant" means a person who applies to the corporation for assistance in the form of a loan, guarantee, underwriting agreement, purchase or lease;

"interested person" means

(a) a director of the corporation or a member of a council

(b) the spouse or a child, brother, sister or parent of a director or a member of a council, or

(c) the spouse of a child, brother, sister or parent of a director or a member of a council;

"member of a council" means a member of a council appointed under subsection 16(1).

(2) Every applicant shall disclose in writing to the corporation in an application for assistance whether that applicant is an interested person, or where the applicant is a firm or corporation, whether a partner of that firm or a director or officer of that corporation, as the case may be, is an interested person.

(3) Where an applicant discloses in an application for assistance that the applicant is an interested person or, where the applicant is a firm or corporation, that a partner of that firm or a director or officer of that corporation, as the case may be, is an interested person, the application shall be submitted to the board for approval before an agreement to provide such assistance is entered into by the corporation.

(4) A director shall not vote on a resolution relating to, or be present at a meeting of the board during the time at the meeting when the board is considering, an application submitted to it under subsection (3) if the application is from

(a) that director,

(b) a person related to that director in a degree of relationship described in paragraph (b) or (c) of the definition "interested person" in subsection (1),

(c) a firm or corporation of which that director is a partner, shareholder, director or officer, as the case may be; or

(d) a firm or corporation of which a person referred to in paragraph (b) is a partner, director or officer, as the case may be.

(5) The amount of each agreement approved by the board under subsection (3) and the name of the person, firm or corporation with whom the agreement is entered into shall be included in the annual report that the corporation is required to submit under subsection 75(3) of the Financial Administration Act."

He said: Mr. Speaker, in committee there was considerable discussion about provisions dealing with potential conflict of interest situations. I undertook in the committee to bring before the House new language which would meet some legitimate concerns. The amendment before the House may be further improved. I believe the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont) also wishes to present other amendments to the House.

The main purpose of this amendment is to incorporate in Bill C-14 the proposal made in committee on November 12, namely, that it shall be made a requirement of the act that every application for financial assistance that involves a director or a member of a regional advisory council of the corporation, or a person related to that director or member, be submitted to the board for approval and that information regarding the total amount of assistance given by the corporation under such circumstances be reported in the corporation's annual report. The amendment, I believe, also accomplishes the following: it corrects a weakness in the present wording of clause 36. As clause 36 now reads, a director is prohibited from voting on a resolution relation to a transaction with the bank that involves either that director or a firm or corporation of which that director, or one of the relatives referred to in paragraph (b) or (c) of clause 36, is a partner or shareholder. But that director is not prohibited from voting on a resolution relating to a transaction with the bank that involves any of those relatives acting in a personal capacity. This omission is remedied by the inclusion of subclause (4)(b) of the proposed amendment.

Second, it reinforces the requirement that a director must not vote on a resolution relating to a transaction involving a corporation of which that director is a shareholder, by adding the further requirement that he cannot vote if he is a director or officer of that corporation. The added words "director or officer" will be found in subclause (4)(c). Third, it adds a reference to assistance in the form of a lease, which did not appear in clause 36. This will be found in the definition of "applicant" in subclause (1) of the amendment.

It should be noted that in subclause (2) of the amendment, a corporation that applies to the bank for financial assistance is required to disclose whether a director or officer of that corporation is an interested person, but the corporation is not required to disclose whether a shareholder of the corporation is an interested person. I think further improvements can be made in this area, as previously indicated. Similarly, in subclause (4)(d) of the amendment the word "shareholder" has been omitted, since a director of the bank cannot be expected to know the names of all the companies in which any one of the persons related to him has shares. That was our original view but on second thought we saw that it was not a strong argument. For that reason the hon. member for Gatineau will be proposing an amendment.

I understood Your Honour to say that we should speak to both motion No. 2 and motion No. 3. If that is correct, may I make a general statement on motion No. 3, standing in the name of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). In my view, the motion which has been proposed by the government, as well as the amendment to be offered by the hon. member for Gatineau, cover the problem areas which we dealt with in committee. For that reason I believe motion No. 3 to be redundant: I believe we have fully covered the concern expressed by its mover. Motion No. 2 fully deals with the situation of a director having an interest in a loan being required to disclose that interest.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, if I may deal with motions Nos. 2 and 3 together, in accordance with Your Honour's direction, let me say I was surprised to hear the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) suggest that motion No. 2, the government's proposal encompasses motion No. 3. Actually, both motions are different in purport. Motion No. 2, as I understand it, provides that a director of the Federal Business Development Bank may borrow from the bank provided the loan is cleared at the board level and, second, the loan must be disclosed to those involved. On the other hand, motion No. 3 states categorically that the following shall not be granted a loan:

(a)(i) a director or a member of a regional advisory council

(ii) the spouse or a child, brother, sister or parent of a director or a member of a regional advisory council or

(iii) the spouse of a child, brother, sister or parent of a director or member of a regional advisory council, or

(b) a firm or corporation in which the beneficial interest of any person or persons described in paragraph (a) exceeds 50 per cent individually or collectively . . .

The fundamental question is, should the bank, which is really a newly constituted Industrial Development Bank, be allowed in any circumstances to lend moneys to a director? A serious question of principle is involved. Chapter I-9 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, under which the Industrial Development Bank is incorporated, provides for the board of directors of the bank to include the board of directors of the Bank of Canada and the Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I mention that because the Industrial Development Bank is a wholly-owned subsidiary of the Bank of Canada and because the directors of the Bank of Canada, in turn, sit on the board of the Industrial Development Bank, as well as the Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

The new bank which is to be established by Bill C-14 is to be differently constituted. First, the new bank will come under the aegis of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce; second, the Bank of Canada will no longer be directly connected with the new bank. Further, ten persons from outside the public service of Canada will be selected to sit as directors of the new bank. In addition, the president and four other persons from the public service of Canada will be included on the board. As well, regional councillors from various regions of Canada are to be appointed as the governor in council shall decide. These could be five to ten in number, depending upon the number of regions designated.

The bill provides that not more than 12 members can sit on this regional advisory council, so it might easily be that 50 or 60 members could be involved in a possible conflict of interest since they would be entitled to borrow from the new bank. I might mention that under the Bank of Canada Act it is specifically laid down that the directors must divest themselves of all interests which appear to be in conflict with their role as directors of that bank. For example, they are required to divest themselves of any connection they may have with an investment dealer who in turn deals with the Bank of Canada; they are expected to relinquish any interest they might have in a brokerage firm or any other bank.

I mention this because I believe it illustrates the manner in which earlier parliaments, in their wisdom, chose to make the board of the Bank of Canada a very isolated board to ensure against the possibility of any conflict of interest arising. I would point out, too, that the Industrial Development Bank is wholly owned by the Bank of Canada and that the directors of the IDB at the present time are also directors of the Bank of Canada. In any case, the existing legislation was framed to ensure that there would be no conflict of interest and, indeed, there has been no conflict of interest under the existing law with respect to the Industrial Development Bank and the Bank of Canada.

However, under the bill before us today, not only may we surmise that there is a possibility that loans may be made to directors but, as set out in clause 36, we find there is specific provision for such an eventuality. The clause provides:

> A director shall not vote on a resolution relating to, or be present at a meeting of the board during the time at the meeting when the board is considering, a loan to, a guarantee to, a guarantee of a loan to, an underwriting agreement with, or a purchase from, that director or a firm or corporation of which
> (a) that director
> (b) the spouse or child, brother, sister or parent of that director, or
> (c) the spouse of a child. brother, sister or parent of that director,
> is a partner, or shareholder, as the case may be.

The point I am making is that the bill before us is very different from the Industrial Development Bank Act presently on the statute books. There is no suggestion there that a director should have the right to borrow from that bank. In fact, the reverse is the case. In the bill before us, on the other hand, we even find a formula set out as to the manner in which a director should handle the question of conflict of interest if he wishes to borrow from the bank.

This is why we challenged the whole concept in committee. I would remind hon. members that we are dealing with a bank which is, after all, a subsidized bank owned by the people of Canada, a bank which is supposed to be devoted to helping small business in this country. There ought not to be the slightest suggestion that those who are honoured by appointments to the board of that bank, or who act as members of a regional council, should feel they are able to borrow from the bank. Surely this is a very strange and dangerous example to be setting for Crown corporations in this country.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Replying to our arguments in the committee, the minister suggested he would attempt to rectify the situation, not by prohibiting loans to directors or councillors but by seeing it was done in such a way that people would know what was happening. I agree that if he is to allow these loans to be made, it would be preferable not to proceed in a secretive way. But why should this practice be permitted at all? We, as members of parliament, are being asked to endorse the creation of a new bank, supposedly to help small business. Its assets will amount to $2.2 billion. At the same time, we are being asked to agree that those who sit on the board should have the privilege of borrowing any amount of funds from the bank. In preparing the bill which is now before us, the minister apparently felt that any suggestion of conflict of interest should be avoided with respect to the president of the bank. In clause 13 we read:

> Where a person who is appointed as president has
> (a) a direct or indirect ownership of any shares in a lending institution or in a company authorized to provide management counselling, or
> (b) a pecuniary or proprietary interest in a business firm that provides management counselling,
> He shall divest himself of that ownership or interest within three months—

And so on. Why should it be fitting to cover that type of conflict of interest while setting up, in another clause, a framework, an apparatus which may be used by another 50 people to borrow from the very bank we are entrusting them to run? I think it is shameful that the government should be suggesting such a thing. I urge hon. members to break party ranks and show that they will not tolerate any further suggestion of conflict of interest at such a level.

Surely the least we can do when incorporating a bank such as this, a state intrusion into the private banking sector, is to ask that the directors who accept the honour of being directors of the bank shall accept, also, the fact that they may not wheel and deal with the Federal Business Development Bank, as it will be known, while at the same time acting as directors. Surely this is not an unreasonable request, and I am startled that the minister and, presumably, the government should persist in trying to force this type of legislation through the House.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I am happy the minister has at last seen fit to come forward with motion No. 2 after what happened in committee. This is certainly a stricter provision than the one to which objection was taken. I wish to associate myself with the observations of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) with regard to motion No. 3. I do not know why we should leave open the possibility of conflict of interest. The motion gives us a definition of "interested person" and goes on to say that an interested person may apply for a loan, or for financing, but that if he is a director or a member of the council he shall not participate in a vote or be present at a meeting which might result in a loan or financial assistance being given to himself or his spouse or certain other persons related to him.

● (1600)

I think the time has come in this country, especially in view of what has happened in the past few weeks in regard to a number of instances involving clear conflict of interest, when we as parliamentarians should say very clearly and succinctly that certain people shall not participate in the benefits of a federal program if they themselves are determining who should get the benefits of the program. In this case, the directors of the Federal Business Development Bank, the people sitting on the council, and their spouses, in my opinion should not be able to get the benefits of the legislation that is before us.

I strongly urge members of the House to look very closely at motion No. 3, which sets out explicitly those people who will not participate in receiving benefits from the legislation. The motion names the people concerned—for example, a director of the council, the spouse or child, brother, sister, or parent of a director, and so on. I think we should not hesitate to take this step. I hope that when the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont) moves his motion, he will bring us closer together than motion No. 2, presently suggests. In closing, may I say I am glad the legislation is before the House. I am happy to see the federal government, through an agency like a Crown corporation, competing in the banking field with private banks. This is long past due and we should expand this concept rather than be cautious about it.

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I join the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) in commending the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) on his motion No. 3 which is clearly a step in the right direction. Because of the concern many Canadians have expressed over the last while—a concern many members of the House have expressed—about the question of conflict of interest, this House has the responsibility of ensuring that everything possible is done to prevent conflict of interest on the part of members of parliament or public servants.

I have been dismayed over the past few days, in the discussions we have had with respect to conflict of interest, to discover that the government's attitude is that any substantive action taken by the House to try to restrict or reduce conflict of interest is against the wishes of the government, whether this action be by legislation relating to members of parliament, regulations relating to civil servants or to people in Crown corporations such as the one under discussion.

The minister's proposal in motion No. 2 would simply institutionalize conflict of interest as opposed to forbidding it. I do not think it is too much to ask of people who have the honour to serve an agency such as this that they be as clean as possible—as clean as a hound's tooth. It is not good enough to suggest that, when these people are involved in questions of conflict of interest, the facts should be pointed out publicly; it is important that the conflict be prevented entirely.

As I say, it is an honour to be associated with such an agency so I do not think it is asking too much of people who would be so honoured to maintain minimal standards of behaviour with respect to conflict of interest. I point out to the minister that there are 22 million people in this country, so he should not have great difficulty in finding persons willing to serve who have not had any dealings with the bank. I think it is a rather shocking situation if the minister is suggesting that it is very difficult to get people free of possible conflict of interest to serve on the board and the only people who would want to serve would have a conflict of interest.

As I say, I do not think the hon. member for York-Simcoe is in any way asking too much. As he pointed out, some $2.2 billion worth of assets of the bank will be controlled and I think the public is justifiably concerned about how this will be done. The hon. member was also quite correct in pointing out that there is a double standard that the minister would institutionalize, that of requiring the president of the bank to divest himself of any holdings of the bank or business that might involve conflict of interest, but not requiring this of other people who serve with him. That is an anomaly I cannot understand.

The confidence of the public and the integrity of people who serve in public institutions are very frail and fragile tissues which are easily torn apart. My regret is that the government, in its actions both with respect to the legislation now before us and other proposals dealing with conflict of interest, has taken action that can only exacerbate the problem we have, that can only serve to destroy people's confidence in our public institutions and bring into question the integrity of people who serve either in the public service or in our parliament. I strongly urge the members of this House to support motion No. 3 moved by the hon. member for York-Simcoe.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I support motion No. 3 wholeheartedly, and in doing so I should like to say a few words. First of all, I am rather shocked—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the hon. member would allow me at this time—this should have been done earlier—to read motion No. 3 into the record. We are moving from one motion to another and only motion No. 2 has been put on the record. People reading Hansard will then be able to refer to motion No. 3 more directly. So, with the consent of the House, I will put motion No. 3.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) moves:

That Bill C-14, an act to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank, be amended by deleting lines 28 to 42 at page 15, being clause 36, and substituting the following:

"36. (1) The corporation shall not make a loan to, a guarantee to, a guarantee of a loan to, an underwriting agreement with, or a purchase from

(a) (i) a director or a member of a regional advisory council

(ii) the spouse or a child, brother, sister or parent of a director or a member of a regional advisory council, or

(iii) the spouse of a child, brother sister or parent of a director or member of a regional advisory council, or

(b) a firm or corporation in which the beneficial interest of any person or persons described in paragraph (a) exceeds 50 per cent individually or collectively.

(2) A director shall not vote on a resolution relating to, or be present at a meeting of the board during the time at the meeting when the board is considering, a loan to, a guarantee to, a guarantee of a loan to, an underwriting agreement with, or a purchase from a firm or corporation in which the beneficial interest of that director or any person described in subparagraph 36(1)(a)(ii) or (iii), as the case may be, does not exceed 50 per cent individually or collectively.

(3) Any loan, guarantee, underwriting agreement or purchase under subsection (2) may only be made by the corporation if authorized and approved by the board.

(4) The corporation shall list in a schedule to its annual report made under the Financial Administration Act every loan to, guarantee to, guarantee of a loan to, underwriting agreement with, or purchase from a person, firm or corporation described in this section with the particulars in each such case."

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I regret that I missed a portion of the mover's speech, but I should like to say a few words about the bill. First of all, in dealing with the question of conflict of interest I have always been rather shocked that one cannot get full disclosure as to the amount of money, by way of salary, earned by people in high positions whether they be presidents or directors. It is particularly shocking in the case of Crown corporations. Setting up a bank of this nature involves the use of public funds. To start with, it is financed with public funds, and the profits arising from the operations of the bank may be reinvested to expand the business of the bank. Surely salaries of the directors, and so on, should be bared and made public.

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: I rise on a point of order. Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member is dealing with motion No. 4 when he talks about directors' salaries.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I know what the hon. member's point is and I will deal with it later. Hon. friend's opposite are laughing, but since these directors can borrow money from the bank it is important that we know their salaries. After all, the first thing you are asked when you go to any bank for a loan is what your assets are and what your salary is. My good friend rose on a point of order, but with his business experience and knowledge he must know that the first thing a bank asks is what your assets are, what your income is at the time, and what you expect to make in the future. So I do not think I am out of order when I say that those salaries should be known and laid on the table so the public will know what they are. There is nothing out of order, as far as I am concerned. With regard to the directors, let us look at clause 36, which provides:

● (1610)

A director shall not vote on a resolution relating to, or be present at a meeting of the board during the time at the meeting when the board is considering, a loan to, a guarantee to, a guarantee of a loan to, an underwriting agreement with, or a purchase from, that director or a firm or corporation of which

(a) that director,

(b) the spouse or a child, brother, sister or parent of that director, or

(c) the spouse of a child, brother, sister or parent of that director, is a partner or shareholder, as the case may be.

Motion No. 2 refers to this clause and reads:

That Bill C-14, an act to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank, be amended by striking out lines 28 to 42, inclusive, on page 15 and substituting the following:

"36.(1) In this section,

'applicant' means a person who applies to the Corporation for assistance in the form of a loan, guarantee, underwriting agreement, purchase or lease;

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

'interested person' means

(a) a director of the corporation or a member of a council" . . .

Surely, when we are dealing with conflict of interest, the directors of this bank should not be able to obtain loans. As far as I am able to ascertain, there is no ceiling on the amount, so these people could make loans of a million dollars to themselves. We have experienced this kind of scandal before. There was a scandal in respect of the Alberta Housing Corporation, not under the present government, but the facts are coming to light showing the corruption that took place. I do not believe anybody in the public service of Canada, a member of parliament or a member of the Senate should have the right to borrow money from this bank. There is bound to be a conflict of interest. These people are empowered, as directors, to administer these funds for the public. The money comes from the taxpayers. Surely there should be a rule or a formula which prevents the directors borrowing money from the bank set up to serve the public. Even the managers of chartered banks cannot borrow from their own branches unless they go through channels at the top.

Mr. Gillespie: There is exactly the same provision here; they must go to the top men.

Mr. Woolliams: Let us see who will be on the board.

Mr. Gillespie: Have you read the proposed act?

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, and I will read it for your benefit. I have been asked a question, Mr. Speaker, so let us see what clause 5 provides. It reads:

The board of directors shall consist of

(a) the president;

(b) four persons selected from the public service of Canada and appointed from time to time by the governor in council on the recommendation of the minister; and

(c) ten persons selected from outside the public service of Canada and appointed in the manner provided in subsection 6(1).

Who approves a loan when the applicant is a director or the president? I am prepared to sit down if the minister is willing to answer.

Mr. Gillespie: If the hon. member will look at motion No. 2 he will find there the answer to his question.

Mr. Woolliams: Let us see what clause 35 says. It reads, further:

The board may make bylaws

(a) respecting the calling of meetings of the board and of the executive committee, the quorum for such meetings and the conduct of business thereat;

(b) fixing the fees to be paid to directors and council members for attendance at meetings, as authorized by subsection 19(1);

(c) for the administration and management of the business of the corporation; and

(d) for the conduct in all other particulars of the affairs of the corporation.

In these days, when we are concerned about conflict of interest, I do not think these persons should be able to obtain loans. I therefore support the amendment of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens).

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the amendment proposed in motion No. 3 by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), I emphasize the fact that in my view this amendment will remove a cloud that I feel presently hangs over the philosophy and purpose of Bill C-14. I have looked very carefully at the amendment proposed by the minister and I do not feel it covers the same ground that is covered by motion No. 3.

We must ask ourselves why we have this provision which would allow the directors to borrow money from the bank. Also, why was there some resistance by the minister—as I believe there was—in the committee to a motion which would restrict this practice? Perhaps the argument can be made that the Federal Business Development Bank will want to attract a staff of highly qualified people presently employed in private industry. I agree to some extent with that proposition but, by the same token, I do not feel that motion No. 3 will in any way inhibit the Federal Business Development Bank in recruiting directors or members of the regional advisory council. If the bill goes forward without this amendment, there will be a cloud over its philosophy and purpose.

As the bill now exists, even with the amendment proposed by the minister it would still be possible for a director or member of the regional advisory council virtually to steer a loan application through the administrative process up to the point of approval. The bill, in my view, hangs under a cloud in respect of the administering and granting of loan applications, particularly when a director or member of the regional advisory council may be the beneficiary of a loan. There is no doubt in my mind that undue influence could be brought to bear in respect of a loan application, a guarantee, a guarantee of a loan or an underwriting agreement. In addition, if carried further a director or member of the regional advisory council could develop a source of financing for the products of a company in which he has a financial interest. The mechanism is there through which this could be done. It would be a very simple matter to arrange, as part of the sale of a product, for Federal Business Development Bank financing if an officer of the company were a director or a member of the regional advisory council.

In addition to the fees paid for performing the functions of a director or member of the council, a director or member of the council has the potential to make in-pocket profits as a result of a sale financed by FBDB funds. We are dealing with human beings and we are trying to make this piece of legislation as pure as possible so there cannot be any suggestion of conflict of interest. Probably the quickest way to destroy the integrity of the FBDB would be to let this bill go through unamended, or to accept the amendment put forward by the minister. We are restructuring the IDB through Bill C-14, to make it more responsive to the needs of small businesses. We know this legislation is sorely needed because we are aware of the liquidity problems facing small businesses. We are particularly aware of the problems which will exist in the next two or three years.

We must always keep foremost in our minds the public perception of our parliamentary process, the governmental process and the conduct of government agencies and Crown corporations. In my opinion, the FBDB should be available to all and should be able to withstand any degree of public scrutiny. Never is this more important than when public funds are concerned. Conflict of interest has been mentioned several times by other hon. members and it is a subject of public discussion and debate. I do not think we should pass legislation where potential conflict of interest exists, as it does in respect of Bill C-14 even with the amendment proposed by the minister.

I do not think anything reduces public confidence in government more than there being disclosed, say, that applicant A was successful, because he had the inside track or was privy to inside information, over applicant B. There has been much public discussion of insider trading and interlocking directorships which lead to conflict of interest respecting shareholders or potential shareholders. Surely we should set an example in the legislation we frame, so that we may assure the general public and potential applicants for loans that the decisions rendered by the directors and members of the regional advisory boards will be above reproach, and that the directors and members of a regional advisory board are not profiting personally from a bank transaction, whether or not they abstain from voting on a particular application for a loan.

I am very concerned, as I am sure all members are, about the public perception of our governmental process. The cynicism deepens and lowers the public perception of our parliamentary and governmental process when conflict of interest is involved. I would like the minister to include in the bill and his amendment strict guidelines, in the clearest possible language, which will assure the public that no conflict of interest can exist and that any director or member of a regional advisory board cannot claim ignorance of the guidelines due to language ambiguity and interpretation, as is the case with many of the regulations that we have today. Because of the scarcity of information available in annual reports, and the practice of submitting them to a standing committee at the time of its first meeting, I feel it is mandatory to supply information with the annual report that will detail the loans, guarantees, guarantees of loans and other agreements, or anything of that nature. One problem we have is that we do not get enough information from annual reports in order to carry out a proper examination.

We do not seek to restrict the commercial talent available to the Federal Business Development Bank. For this reason we propose that a director or member of a regional advisory council not be allowed to be the recipient of a loan to a company in which he has more than a 50 per cent interest. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I support motion No. 3 to amend Bill C-14 standing in the name of the hon. member for York-Simcoe.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is difficult at the best of times to understand the minister. However, I think I understood him to say that the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont) has some amendments, I presume to motion No. 2 in the minister's name. I presume that the amendments of the hon. member for Gatineau were worked out in collaboration with the minister. I do not think it makes much sense to debate a motion in the minister's name which, to the minister's knowledge, will subsequently be amended. I do not like him playing this kind of a game. I think that if the hon. member for Gatineau, on the instructions or otherwise of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) has amendments to the clause now under consideration, he should bring them forward.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not rising on a point of order. I rose a couple of times to put forward some amendments. But before I do so, I would like to make a few comments.

The remarks of the opposition members apparently place on the same level the responsibilities of the president and of his directors. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) told the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs that those directors would be handsomely and generously paid. Directors, Mr. Speaker, are not full time civil servants. The board of directors, which, I believe, as in all other companies, will assume the bulk of responsibilities, consists of the president, two directors from the public service and two other directors selected out of the ten directors, and I think the amendment of the hon. member for York-Simcoe has a much broader scope than the Minister's amendment and my own one. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) mentioned that, considering my business background, when one applies for a loan in a chartered bank ... Talking about chartered banks, Mr. Speaker, no provision in the Bank Act prevents a bank director from getting a loan on behalf of a company which he manages. I know the hon. member for York-Simcoe said there was a difference between chartered banks and the bank we are now dealing with. He said that the bank under consideration deals with public funds. In my opinion, deposits made by the public in a chartered bank belong to the public, but there is a request that directors as well as members of the board of directors be denied the right to obtain loans. The amendment of the hon. member for York-Simcoe digs even further. No loan, gurantee, underwriting agreement or purchase could be made. I also believe the minister accepted the suggestion of a certain member of the finance committee when we consider subclause 5 of motion No. 2 which says and I quote:

(5) The amount of each agreement approved by the Board under subsection (3) and the name of the person, firm or corporation with whom the agreement is entered into shall be included in the annual report that the Corporation is required to submit under subsection 75(3) of the Financial Administration Act.

Under the bill as it now stands, there is no such obligation for directors of the Bank to include those loans in the annual report.

Before presenting my amendments, I should like to give some explanations on the amendments I would like to move to those proposed by the minister in motion No. 2.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, when the text of the proposed amendment to section 36 as set out in the order paper was prepared, the word "shareholder" was not included in the second last line of subclause 36(2), nor in the fifth line of subclause 36(3), since it was considered that it would be virtually impossible for a corporation with a large number of shareholders to know whether or not any one of its shareholders happened to be related to a director of the bank or to one of the members of a regional advisory council in any one of the degrees of relationship described in the definition of "interested person". However, it would appear that most of the corporations which would be seeking assistance from the bank would be private corporations with a limited number of shareholders, so that in actual practice it would not be too difficult for such a corporation to ascertain, through consultation with its shareholders, whether such a relationship exists.

Similarly, with respect to subclause (4) of the proposed amendment as set out in the order paper, it was considered at the time the amendment was drafted that a director of the bank could not be expected to know the names of all the companies in which any of his relatives as described in subclause (1) have shares. However, under subclause (1) of the proposed amendment the onus is on the applicant to disclose in the application whether or not the applicant is related to a director. The application is then submitted to the board and the director is prohibited from voting on any resolution relating to that application. In the context of this specific procedure, the director, having been identified in the application, is in a much different position than he would have been under clause 36 of Bill C-14 as that clause now reads.

Subclause (4) of the amendment as it is now set out in the order paper prohibits a director from voting on a resolution relating to a loan to a corporation of which that director is a shareholder, but not a corporation of which that director's spouse or any other relative is a shareholder. Instead, the prohibition applies only where the director's spouse or other relative is a director or officer of the applicant corporation. The purpose of the proposed motion to amend the text as set out in the order paper is to extend the prohibition to apply to every loan to a corporation of which the director, his spouse or any other relative is a shareholder, director or officer.

Moved by Mr. Clermont:

That the amendment to Bill C-14 as set out in Motion No. 2 be amended

(a) by striking out the second last line of subclause 36(2) and substituting the following:

"or a shareholder, director or officer of that corporation, as"

(b) by striking out the fifth line of subclause 36(3) and substituting the following:

"of that firm or a director, shareholder or officer of that"

(c) by striking out the last line of subparagraph 36(4)(b) and substituting the following:

"person" in subsection (1), or"

(d) by striking out subparagraphs 36(4)(c) and (d) and substituting the following:

"(c) a firm or corporation of which that director, or a person referred to in paragraph (b), is a partner, shareholder, director or officer, as the case may be."

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since the hon. member is proposing a rather technical amendment, I wonder if he would be willing, as I see he is, to pass around copies of his amendment so we can follow it as he is explaining it to us.

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: With pleasure, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are very kind.

Mr. Clermont:

(d) for subclauses 36(4)(c) and (d), the following:

"(c) a firm or corporation of which that director or a person referred to in paragraph (b) is a partner, shareholder, director or officer."

Mr. Speaker, in the matter of—

[English]

There is a well established principle in other acts that financial institutions can make loans to directors of their corporations.

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that we received the amendments introduced by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont), because I think they rebut completely any suggestion which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) made in his opening remarks that the amendments introduced by the hon. member for Gatineau address themselves to the very serious problem raised by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) and others on this side who have spoken in the debate. Clearly, the amendments introduced by the hon. member for Gatineau are simply technical amendments. They make no change at all in the substance of the amendment introduced by the minister, the purpose of which is simply to put up a smoke-screen so it would appear that the House was dealing with a problem with which, clearly, the government is not prepared to deal.

The minister, in his earlier remarks, suggested that there was no difference in purpose between his amendment and amendment No. 3 in the name of the hon. member for York-Simcoe. Clearly, there is a difference. The hon. member for York-Simcoe introduces in his amendment an absolute prohibition of conflict of interest and the minister, in a move that has not at all been changed by the amendment of the hon. member for Gatineau, is simply creating a very large loophole through which conflicts of interest are not only likely to occur but, indeed, are encouraged to occur.

The amendment introduced by the minister does not contain a prohibition of any kind. All he asks is that when there is an evident conflict of interest, the director concerned must simply absent himself from the voting. What the minister is establishing here is a game of musical chairs; he is legalizing musical chairs and, in effect, giving the authority of the House of Commons to the possibility of an evident and rampant conflict of interest. What is obvious to anyone in the House is that if a director absents himself when there is a potential conflict of interest, theoretically, under the amendment proposed by the minister, he can rely upon his friends to approve the loan in which he is interested, in repayment for which favour he could subsequently support the application of the parties involved. This would involve the conflict of interest of another director. It is a cosy kind of arrangement, but no matter how you cut it, it is a very clear instance of the possibility of conflict of interest arising. That is not something which we are prepared to accept on this side of the House.

I want to emphasize what has been said already today, Mr. Speaker. This government has been altogether too careless about the question of conflict of interest. I say "careless", and one of my colleagues says "at least careless". At least it can be said that they have been very careless about the possibility of ministers of the Crown taking advantage, through a series of guidelines, which are as much a smoke-screen as the amendment introduced by the minister, and vague regulations, of various means of transportation when making so-called official visits, and so on. I think this is the first occasion since the controversy arose in this House about conflict of interest that the Parliament of Canada has had a clear opportunity to say whether it approves or disapproves of creating a law to control conflict of interest.

While I think the amendment introduced by the minister is a smoke-screen and is virtually useless because the directors can get around it, I am pleased that in this particular at least the government is prepared to recognize that a conflict might attach not simply to the individual concerned, but also to his spouse or other relatives. I think that principle, which the minister has recognized in this particular smoke-screen, will be recognized in other actions that the government is prepared to take on the question of conflict of interest, as it obviously has not been prepared to act on the question of guidelines covering the behaviour of ministers of the Crown.

It would be of interest to members of the House to know why the minister insists on a provision which clearly allows for conflict of interest. Why does he want the capacity for a conflict of interest to arise? Does he fear that if we adopt the very sensible and progressive amendment proposed by the hon. member for York-Simcoe he will not be able to find people willing to be directors? That is nonsense. But what does he fear? Why does he want to bring in a piece of legislation, through the amendment which he proposes, that would have the effect of establishing in law, giving legal form and effect and the sanction of this parliament, to a capacity for conflict of interest?

As has been indicated by members on this side of the House, the offices in question involve positions of trust. They involve the vesting of trust by the government and, by extension, by this parliament in individuals who serve as directors. That kind of trust relationship requires certain sacrifices in the public interest. Surely, the least of those sacrifices should be that directors are, in fact and in appearance, clear of any suspicion of abusing their position for profit, gain or personal purposes. I repeat that point, Mr. Speaker: the amendment we have before us in the name of the minister does not accomplish that; it allows a large loophole, deliberately created by the minister, for the continuation of conflict of interest.

What kind of reflection does the amendment drafted by the minister cast upon people? What does it tell us about the kind of people he is seeking as directors of this bank? Surely, if we want the bank to be run effectively we want people who have standing enough that in the normal course of events they are not likely to avail themselves of the lending services of the bank. Surely, that has to be the logic, if there is any at all, of the minister's argument. If he is saying anything at all, he is saying he must have this provision for conflict of interest in order to get people to serve as directors. That is simply not believable to members on this side of the House.

One of my colleagues mentioned earlier that what is at issue in this question of principle is not simply the constitution of a particular board of directors of a Crown agency; not simply a question of conflict of interest that arises rarely, but a very important principle that involves public trust and the outlining of the responsibilities of those who assume public office, whether elected or appointed as would be the case of directors of the Federal Business Development Bank. It is not an incidental matter. This amendment offers every member of the House of Commons the clear opportunity to express a view on the question of conflict of interest. Unfortunately, on the evidence of his amendment the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, on behalf of the government, has indicated that he wants to deal with the question of conflict of interest with a phony gesture, one which will not meet the problem but will only seem to if one is half blind and well into senility.

There is no way that amendment No. 2 can accomplish the important purpose put forward by the hon. member for York-Simcoe. In amendment No. 3 the hon. member for York-Simcoe proposes to write into the legislation an absolute prohibition of conflict of interest. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce simply proposes to write in a detour by which one could achieve a conflict of interest. That kind of skirting around is not acceptable to members on this side. The carelessness about conflict of interest is evident in the amendment put forward by the minister.

We are not just passing a law here today; we are setting standards which we expect to work, for the country to follow and, to some degree, to be bound by. If we establish the standard that it is all right to allow a conflict of interest as long as you put some phony smoke-screen around it, we are suggesting to everyone in the country who holds a position of trust that it is all right for them to abuse the trust placed in them. That is the question of principle involved in this important amendment put forward by the hon. member for York-Simcoe. For the minister to suggest that his amendment, which simply provides a detour on the way to conflict of interest, in any way achieves the same purpose is simply not correct.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the hon, member's remarks. After we scrape away the intemperate language, perhaps we can look at what he actually said. He was speaking in favour of amendment No. 3, and if he looks at it he will see that there is no absolute prohibition in the situation where an interested person has less than a 50 per cent beneficial interest. That comes through quite clearly. He seems to be saying that the principle of absolute prohibition is important and that its absence is a phony, smoke-screen, a dodge or a detour.

The hon. member will have to face his own logic and admit that the provisions in amendment No. 3 which relate to less than 50 per cent beneficial interest are phony, smoke-screens, dodges or detours. I am sure the hon. member is intelligent enough that upon reflection he will realize that is not what he was arguing. I think he is intelligent enough to look at amendment No. 2 which I proposed and which was amended by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont), and to realize that very substantial protections are built in with respect to conflict of interest.

● (1650)

There are three kinds of disclosure and protection anticipated in motion No. 3 which the hon. member supports. Our amendment insists that all applicants shall declare whether they are interested persons. An interested person is defined clearly in the amendment I proposed. In the language of the amendment—

> "interested person" means
> (a) a director of the corporation or a member of a council
> (b) the spouse or a child, brother, sister or parent of a director or a member of a council, or
> (c) the spouse of a child, brother, sister or parent of a director or a member of a council—

This provision must be considered in conjunction with paragraph (3) of the amendment which says that where an applicant is an interested person, the decision with respect to his particular application must be made at the board level itself, not at the regional level. This point is important. The IDB, which is the predecessor corporation, made about 97 per cent of all loans at the regional level rather than at the board level.

The amendment of the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont) provides that where an applicant discloses in an application for assistance that he is an interested person, or where the applicant is a firm of corporation, a partner of a firm or a director, or a shareholder or officer of the corporation, as the case may be, he is an interested person and the application shall be submitted to the board for approval before an agreement to provide such assistance is entered into by the corporation. If an applicant is an interested person, the board of directors shall review his case. Further protection is provided in paragraph (4) of the amendment, as amended, which reads:

> A director shall not vote on a resolution relating to, or be present at a meeting of the board during the time at the meeting when the board is considering an application submitted to it under subsection (3) if the application is from
> (a) that director,
> (b) a person related to that director in a degree of relationship described in paragraph (b) or (c) of the definition "interested person" in subsection (1),
> (c) a firm or corporation of which that director, or a person referred to in paragraph (b), is a partner, shareholder, director or officer, as the case may be.

Clearly, a director shall not vote on any transaction in which he an interest, nor shall he be present when it is discussed.

An hon. Member: Don't be so naïve.

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), in motion No. 3, has advanced exactly the same principle that is advanced in motion No. 2. I think he copied part of motion No. 2.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Gillespie: I think the hon. member supports what is in paragraph (5) of motion No. 2, which reads:

The amount of each agreement approved by the board under subsection (3) and the name of the person, firm or corporation with whom the agreement is entered into shall be included in the annual report that the corporation is required to submit under subsection 75(3) of the Financial Administration Act.

I submit that paragraph (4) of motion No. 3 seeks to do what paragraph (5) of motion No. 2, which I have just read, seeks to do. This is a good provision, as it ensures that agreements envisaged in the amendment will be made public. In the last analysis, publicity is the public's best protection in matters of conflict of interest.

The hon. member also deals with the situation in which the beneficial interest of those concerned exceeds 50 per cent. He recognizes that total prohibition is not acceptable and tries to provide a cut-off line, a 50 per cent beneficial interest. If a person has a greater than 50 per cent beneficial interest in a firm or corporation on whose behalf an application is made, that person shall not be eligible for a loan. Clearly, as precedent shows, loans may be granted to such interested persons, in certain circumstances, so long as disclosure is made. The amendment provides for this protection in order to avoid conflict of interest. I think the hon. member for Gatineau made this point clear.

My last point concerns the president. He, as chief executive officer of the corporation, is in a position different from that of regional advisers or councillors or directors. It is not anticipated that the ten directors who will come from the private sector will be full-time employees, nor is it envisaged that the number of regional advisers or councillors who have been referred to will be full-time members of the advisory council. On the contrary, it is expected that they will be part-time members and their responsibilities with respect to the advisory council will be added to their other responsibilities. That being so, we require conflict of interest provisions which will take cognizance of the fact that they are serving part time on the council and have other interests. Clause 13(1) provides:

Where a person who is appointed as president has (a) a direct or indirect ownership of any shares in a lending institution or in a company authorized to provide management counselling, or (b) a pecuniary or proprietary interest in a business or firm that provides management counselling, he shall divest himself of that ownership or interest within three months after the date of his appointment and shall not during his term of office acquire any such ownership or interest.

Clearly, the president's position is a special one and the bill deals with his position in a special way.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question? Will he say what, in motion No. 2 as amended by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont), will prevent a director from having fellow directors look after his interests or the interests of anyone associated with him, in his absence, on the understanding that there is to be reciprocal treatment in cases where he remains on the board and one of the other directors is absent?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I am not a legal authority and I do not think one has to be to realize that such practice would be illegal and very likely criminal. That kind of collusion would constitute a criminal offence.

An hon. Member: An exceedingly hard thing to prove.

Mr. Gillespie: Second, proposed section 36(5) requires disclosure in cases where interested persons enter into transactions. The subclause provides:

... the name of the person, firm or corporation with whom the agreement is entered into shall be included in the annual report ...

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): But the bill will not prevent what I suggest may happen.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. As it is five o'clock, we must proceed to private members' business unless members decide not to see the clock.

Some hon. Members: Five o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Social security—Government intention with regard to economic position of those over sixty-five; the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—Housing—Request for funds for low rental housing; the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche)—Immigration—Possible increase in number of Chilean refugees admitted—Government position.

Order. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, namely, notices of motions (papers), private bills and public bills. There being no item under the heading notices of motions (papers), the House will now proceed to private bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

[English]

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill S-11, respecting British Columbia Telephone Company, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Reid: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I draw Your Honour's attention to the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, printed in Votes and Proceedings of November 21, 1974. In this report the committee recommended that the charges of $200,400 paid by the B.C. Telephone Company in accordance with Standing Order 91(4) be held in abeyance until the House had disposed of Bill C-29.

My point of order is that it is beyond the capability of a standing committee to make a report of this nature to the House of Commons since its order of reference was only to consider Bill S-11. It has always been my understanding that an order of reference to a committee was complete in itself, and that when dealing with a bill a committee had the option of reporting the bill with amendment or without amendment; it did not have the authority to make gratuitous comments on the bill or on any of its aspects. I should like to quote from Standing Order 65(8) which states:

Standing Committees shall be similarly empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters as may be referred to them by the House and to report from time to time and, except when the House otherwise orders, to send for persons, papers and records . . .

I would also cite Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, citation 304(1), where it is stated:

(1) A committee can only consider those matters which have been committed to it by the House.

(2) A committee is bound by, and is not at liberty to depart from, the order of reference.

There are a number of other authorities which could be quoted, but I believe my point is clear. The second report, though it has not been moved at this point, is completely out of order and I think some decision should be made by the Chair upon the matter.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid), I wonder whether he did not put himself out of court in his last sentence. As he said, the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications is not before us. All that is before us now is the report stage of Bill S-11 which was reported back to the House as the third report. If anyone were to try to move concurrence in the second report, I could understand the point of order being raised, but since the issue is not before us I do not see why Your Honour should be asked to rule on a hypothetical situation.

Mr. Campbell (LaSalle-Émard-Côte Saint-Paul): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is entirely correct. I think the motion will be moved on Monday next. In my view, it would be better if a decision were to be deferred until then, rather than to attempt to make a decision on the point of order at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Reid) wants to prevent study of the bill at the report stage. I did not quite understand his point. I do believe the Committee on Transport and Communications could be authorized to study the matter with the unanimous consent of the House. If there is unanimous consent, the Chair could authorize a change that is not contrary to the rules of this House.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The procedural point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is certainly a valid one. We are not now discussing the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. However, it was the intention of the Chair to clarify the situation; to indicate to hon. members the position taken by the Chair as to the handling of the sum of money mentioned in the second report of the committee. The parliamentary secretary was recognized on a point of order on this subject, but it may be the Chair should itself have undertaken to raise the matter, after which hon. members could have made their observations, if any. In any case, I would at this point ask for the co-operation of hon. members and seek their consent to suspend the report stage of Bill S-11, as it were, so as to allow the Chair to make a few comments concerning the second report of the standing committee. Is this agreed?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I will agree, but I do so under protest. This matter is not before us. If Your Honour wishes to make a ruling, we shall not stop you, but I think this is an irregular procedure. I myself have some questions I should like to raise. I wonder if I could drag them in at this time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member is aware that Bill S-11 has been reported to the House without amendment. The report of the committee was preceded by another report, the second report, which put some kind of restriction—

An hon. Member: Not on the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Not on the bill, maybe, but with regard to the handling of money. The Chair feels that before considering the report stage of the bill an opportunity should be taken to clarify the matter. As I say, the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is a valid one.

● (1710)

The Chair is presiding over the proceedings of the House of Commons daily, and when the Chair feels that some procedures, decisions of committees or actions of hon. members, do not correspond to the basic rules, it must stand up and express opinions that should be on the record, thus preventing hon. members from believing that the decisions or actions of other members have not been acted upon. That is the main reason I wanted to enter these remarks in the record at this time concerning the second report of the committee and before the House proceeds to consideration of the report stage of Bill S-11.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would probably agree with the ruling that I suspect Your Honour is anxious to make. In fact, I have seen other reports come in which to me were questionable. But the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications has not been moved and is not before the House. Your Honour agrees that the report stage and third reading of Bill S-11 is what is before the House. We are in private members' hour and that has been called. The report which referred back Bill S-11 is the third report, and there is nothing in the third report which says that it is conditional upon what is in the second report.

I do not want to go on for a long time in an attempt to prevent the Chair from doing something it wants to do, but somehow we are getting into an order that is not before us, and that is irregular. No member of the House at this moment is trying to do anything that is out of order, but if a member were to try to move concurrence in the second report, then I certainly think that the Chair would have to rule on that.

Mr. Campbell (LaSalle-Émard-Côte Saint-Paul): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I ask Your Honour to reserve judgment. We will have some material showing that it is not a precedent in requesting that the $200,000 payment be left in abeyance. We will have some material prepared for Monday, and if you will allow us to present it before you make a final judgment on the motion, we would appreciate it.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, I rise to say how much I agree with what my colleague to my left has said. I do not understand why the chairman of the committee is talking about the $200,000, which has nothing to do with what is before the House today. We have before us a private member's bill set down at report stage and for third reading, and the House agreed to get the bill through. There is a real need for passage of this legislation in my province so that this company can obtain further capital.

As I say, I cannot understand why this topic is now raised; it deals with a report from the committee that is not before the House, a totally separate matter. Certainly the bill is not contingent upon the $200,000 fee that we have been talking about. I hope the Chair will allow the House to continue with the report stage and third reading of the bill so that we can pass it today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I see the point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I am advised that before we can even dispose of Bill S-11, the fees have to be paid. We have a report of a committee, giving direction that a certain sum of money be held in abeyance. This is why the Chair feels this would be the time to make a decision as to the acceptability or legality of this report of the committee, and that is what I was about to do.

If the hon. member insists that I do not do this, then I am ready to proceed with consideration of the report stage of Bill S-11. Of course, the hon. member will argue with me that the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, not being before the House at this time, cannot be recognized as a decision of the House as such and that it does not prevent these fees being paid. If that is the interpretation, then I am ready to look into the matter and perhaps bring it back tomorrow before orders of the day. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Now that I have decided to hold this whole matter in abeyance and perhaps bring it back tomorrow after examining it more deeply, I think the House should proceed immediately with consideration of the report stage of Bill S-11.

[Translation]

Order. Before proceeding with the study of the motion of amendment moved by the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) and even agreeing to broaching it, I feel I should draw the attention of hon. members precisely to that amendment which, according to the Chair, falls completely outside the scope of the bill before the House. The motion of the hon. member is, to my mind, out of order, first of all because it adds a new clause to Bill S-11. In fact, through his amendment to Bill S-11, the hon. member is attempting to reach the main act governing the company which has already been incorporated, and his amendment is contrary to Standing Order 105 in that it seeks to alter Bill S-11 which itself seeks to amend the act. I doubt very much that such an amendment is in order. I should like to invite hon. members to comment on this point.

[English]

In my opinion, by this amendment the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) is trying to reach the main act of this corporation by changing the name of the corporation, a matter not contained in the bill at this time. However, I am ready to invite comments from the hon. member before making a decision.

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Speaker, you pointed out an irregularity in my amendment by saying that the first introductory lines, instead of reading as follows:

That Bill S-11, An Act respecting British Columbia Telephone Company, be amended by adding immediately after line 9 at page 8, the following new Clause:

You are quite right to remind me that instead of section 25 of chapter 66, I should have written: "to add a clause to Bill S-11".

[English]

The way I am presenting my motion is this. I am amending the law of 1916 by adding a clause to Bill S-11, so the preliminary notes have, of course, to be changed. With regard to the history of the amendment I am presenting, I made a suggestion at the committee hearings to the company, namely, that in the French version of the act—

[Translation]

—the French version uses the name "La Compagnie de Téléphone de la Colombie-Britannique".

[English]

Members of all parties who were there were sympathetic to the idea, the representative of the company was sympathetic to the idea, and earlier this week I received a letter from the company in which it says:

● (1720)

... I am enclosing clause for proposal as an amendment ... which you have kindly stated that you would be prepared to introduce at the report stage in the House of Commons.

This was done with the mutual consent of every member of the committee. At that time we said we would consult as to how this should be done, and the company got in touch with the clerk of the committee and indicated it would be prepared to propose another clause which would be to the effect that the company may use, as the French form of its name, in the transaction of business and its affairs generally "La Compagnie de Téléphone de la Colombie-Britannique".

[Translation]

I see that the hon. member for Saint-Boniface (Mr. Guay) is interested in this matter. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this idea was submitted and approved by all the members of the committee.

[English]

The company is very agreeable to the idea, and I hope the Chair will allow me to propose the amendment, as at the committee stage, if there is unanimous agreement. The company itself suggested the amendment which I present on its behalf. If we do not proceed in this way, the company will have to present another bill later to accomplish the same purpose.

I understand the spirit of the rule of procedure is such that in order to do something of this nature I require the unanimous consent of hon. members. I hope that my colleagues, in the spirit that existed in the committee when everybody agreed to the idea presented by the company, will allow me to propose this amendment which would allow the company to use that French form of its name. If everyone is agreeable, I hope a procedural argument will not prevent this bill from being accepted. Otherwise there will have to be another bill, with the whole burden that implies.

This whole matter is important, although not in itself, to what we are trying to do. As the member for Matane, I represent 20 or 30 English-speaking families and I insist that all federal buildings have bilingual signs. I do this as a matter of fairness. I have explained why this company's name must be bilingual.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must nevertheless interrupt the hon. member, for we are now discussing the point of procedure in question and not necessarily his amendment. If he continues he will have completed his intervention before the Chair even decides whether to accept the amendment.

I must say to the hon. member that all the points he made are more debatable than procedural matters. I am convinced no other hon. member will disagree with all the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) said but he must nevertheless understand that the Chair is bound by the rules, and the Constitution of Canada or the rules of this House cannot be changed through the Chair. I think it is important that I draw the attention of hon. members to very specific rules, the most difficult of which might be rule No. 105—and by ricochet it applies both to the hon. member and the report of the committee of the House—which states, and I quote:

105. It is the duty of the committee to which any private bill may be referred by the House, to call the attention of the House specially to any provisions inserted in such bill that does not appear to have been contemplated in the notice or petition for the same, as reported upon by the Examiner of Petitions . . .

The hon. member said to the House he has in his hand a letter from the company stating that it would be happy to have its name made bilingual. Of course, the normal channel to have that change made would be for the company to have a new private bill introduced to amend its name.

Having said that, although hon. members do not doubt the word of their colleague, neither the Chair nor any member of this House have a copy of that letter, and the rules of this House do not provide for the tabling of such documents. I think everyone will agree to take the word of the hon. member. I must also refer him to different citations from Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms respecting amendments, particularly citation 202 on page 169 and citation 203 on page 171 which state explicitly, and I quote:

203. (1) It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed.

The hon. member knows that the bill before us is a bill on the financing of the company, which has never been presented to the House to amend the name of the company or some other aspects of its administration.

If the hon. member keeps on reading citation 203, he will come to paragraph (3), and I quote:

(3) An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.

This being said, and considering that hon. members seem to be in a good mood and considering also the limited effect of the amendment the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) is proposing at the report stage, which nonetheless raises an important point as the hon. member said, the Chair would be willing to consider the motion and let the House decide. But that could be done only by unanimous consent.

[English]

I do not know whether all members followed my remarks, but the Chair feels that this kind of amendment should not be accepted in our general procedure. Noting that the intent of the bill is not to amend in any way the name of the company, or anything other than the financial structure, and noting the co-operation that seems to exist following the remarks of the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané), if there is unanimous consent the Chair would be ready to accept the amendment for debate. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. De Bané: I have one note of particular interest.

● (1730)

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané moved That Bill S-11, An Act respecting British Columbia Telephone Company, be amended by adding immediately after line 9 at page 8, the following clause:

"6. The following is added as section 25 of chapter 66 of the Statute of 1916, as amended, namely:

'25. The Company may use as the French form of its name, in the transaction of business and its affairs generally, «La Compagnie de Téléphone de la Colombie-Britannique".'

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might make his comments later.

[English]

Mr. John M. Reid (for Mr. Anderson) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave now.

Mr. Reid (for Mr. Anderson) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Matane could make his remarks right now.

[English]

Mr. De Bané: I simply wanted to say to the hon. member for Peace River that the British Columbia Telephone Company—

British Columbia Telephone Company is owned by the same people who own the telephone company of Gaspé. I understand that the president of Quebec Telephone, which is the company in our region, has just been appointed president of British Columbia Telephone Company, thus representing two different parts of the country. I am very happy about this. I should like to place on the record my compliments to British Columbia Telephone Company for having accepted, without any hesitation, the French name. I think that more and more we should ask private business to do what the federal government is doing.

In my opinion it is quite unreasonable that only the federal government takes on the burden of projecting bilingualism. I think the provincial departments of education and private business should support this as well, because otherwise it does not make any sense. Perhaps on another occasion the Chair might permit me to expand on that subject. However, I commend the British Columbia Telephone Company. I think it has taken an enlightened position in respect of the Canadian fabric.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say how much I appreciate what the hon. member has said. I am glad to see the zeal with which hon. members on the other side take into account the constitution and the rights of people in this country under the constitution. I hope the way in which members on this side have co-operated with the hon. member in getting this through will persuade him, and some of his colleagues, in turn to take exception to what the government is doing in respect of oil resources, by stealing from the provinces resources which belong to them. I hope the people in Gaspé, in an appreciation of the rights of people in other provinces, will take strong exception to the deceitful actions of the federal government in taking from the provinces things which belong to the provinces.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief. I entered the chamber a little late so I must apologize for having missed part of the debate. I might say that I do not rise to delay the passage of this bill. I appreciate the objective of allowing this private monopoly to expand and continue to serve the people of British Columbia over the next ten years, which I see is the objective of the bill. However, I think there are a few things which should be placed on the record in respect of that particular oligopoly. My colleague from Burnaby-Richmond-Delta suggests that we are making it a little richer for the people of British Columbia to take over. I think the people of British Columbia are probably concerned to see telephone service expand even in this innovative and expensive way.

I believe the people of British Columbia would prefer to see a public corporation, and I hope in the future it will become a public corporation, as is the case in respect of most other telephone companies. The people are very satisfied with the kind of service they receive from these other corporate telephone services, but the people of British Columbia are not very satisfied with the kind of service they receive from the British Columbia Telephone Company.

I am concerned about this oligopoly being allowed to expand, to go into the market and obtain sufficient funds especially when there is a source of funds which I submit this company has failed to tap. I refer to the funds available to this company from the subsidiary companies of the British Columbia Telephone Company, companies such as Lenkurt Electrical and Western Electric which supply services to British Columbia Telephone Company. My colleague from Burnaby-Richmond-Delta says they are good, free enterprise companies.

There is nothing further from free enterprise in this case in respect of the relations Western Electric or Lenkurt Electric have with the parent company for the services they provide and the material they supply to the parent company. If British Columbia Telephone Company would look at the profits of its subsidiaries and plow back some of those profits into the parent company then this company could get along with less money than it needs to go to the market for now.

In British Columbia the structure of a company is determined by the type of service it renders and not by the magnificent performance of its subsidiaries which are not regulated by government agencies. I want to place on the record the fact that the time will come when the people of British Columbia will not stand for this kind of rip-off. Madam Speaker, I have said enough. I do not wish to say any more. Thank you.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): I do not want to prolong this discussion any further but I would simply like to congratulate all hon. members. While listening to those who spoke before me I was thinking that from 5 to 6 o'clock would be the proper time to present all the bills which must be passed quickly. I think it is the best hour to work in this House to put an end to our differences and to stop getting into empty discussions.

The member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) managed to get across his message on Alberta oil. I call him the "oiler" from Alberta, but he acted well in calling it to our attention and it is also his right to praise his province. As always, the member from the NDP would like to see everything nationalized. We respect his ideas but I must admit we prefer private companies. Of course, it is initiative, private initiative, Madam Speaker, which gave birth to our country while state institutions have always tended to weaken the country instead of strengthening it.

I would particularly like to congratulate the member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) for his masterly stroke in having managed to have his amendment to Bill S-11 passed even though there was nothing in the order paper on this. I guess this is due to the good will of this House and the cooperation of all members. I congratulate him and I wish, as he himself mentioned it, that all Canadian companies, whatever province they may be in, follow the leadership of those who are bilingual today. I hope that will be proof enough that all our Crown corporations as well as private companies also want to adopt bilingual names so that we can identify them. When we hear of these companies we simply say: there is a Canadian company. I therefore congratulate all hon. members and I would like to say once again that I wish that more bills could come before the House during the private members' hour so that they may be passed more quickly.

● (1740)

[English]

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Madam Speaker, I will not speak for more than a couple of minutes. I wanted to make some comments on the words spoken by the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) who went to great lengths to thank the B.C. Telephone Company for being so co-operative in letting its name be put forward in the French version, in an amendment which is only proper and right. However, in all fairness he should have mentioned that British Columbia members from my party, who were in full attendance at that committee, certainly had no objection to that change.

Quite often when we are outside the House we become political and it is easy for someone to make a speech about the Conservatives not supporting bilingualism. So, Madam Speaker, I wanted to make sure that my comments with regard to our party were on the record because members from my province have a good record in this respect. In my province by comparison we spend more per capita on bilingualism, and I wanted to make sure that that was on the record.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reynolds: I also wanted to make sure that I said something about big bad capitalist B.C. Telephone Company, since my good friend in the riding next to me had something to say about people not standing for this rip-off much longer. I suggest that he speak to our premier. That might be the big issue in the next election. He will see how popular that issue is in my province.

People in my province are tired of seeing take-overs; they like to see free enterprise operate, and they like to see the type of bill that is now before us being passed in the House. I received a few letters saying that it was a good idea. I would love to see us fight the next provincial election on take-overs in my province. I do not think people in my province want take-overs. I myself have been one of the great complainers in this respect because I cannot get enough telephone lines in my riding. The only problem is that we are the fastest growing province in the country and we have a hard time getting material, supplies, and so on when they are required.

An hon. Member: Who is your company competing with?

Mr. Reynolds: I would be happy to compare them with any of the publicly owned telephone companies in Canada, but they do not have to compete with anybody. Telephone companies in every province do not have to compete, but they have to buy materials from other sources. They are short of supplies such as plastic and rubber wiring, and there is a shortage of telephones. So that is not B.C. Telephone's fault but the fault of world wide shortages. They are doing a good job with what they have, and in passing the bill today we will make sure that they receive more capital which will benefit the people of British Columbia.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Reid: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been discussions through the usual channels and I think there is willingness on the part of the House to deal with the report stage of Bill C-214. This bill was only reported yesterday and has not yet been on the record for the full length of time required, but if there is unanimous consent we would like to proceed with it and perhaps to complete the report stage and third reading today.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING REASONS FOR COMMISSIONS' REPORTS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (for Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West)) moved that Bill C-214, to amend the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, as reported (with amendment) from the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. McKinley (for Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West)) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure, on behalf of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), to move third reading of this bill. It contains a sensible suggestion, namely that electoral boundaries commissions set up in provinces give reasons for their decisions regarding the boundaries of ridings and in what way they reached them. I am sure that, from time to time during redistribution, members as well as many constituents, candidates and county and township councils wonder how the commissioners come to the decisions they do. This bill simply states that the commissions which set up these boundaries and constituencies would be required to provide reasons as to why the boundaries are outlined in the way they are.

It should be noted that if reasons are given regarding how the boundaries of constituencies are established, there would be less controversy and objections to those boundaries.

I am pleased to note also that an amendment was passed in committee requiring that the report of a commission be published under subsection 17(3) in the Canada Gazette and the recommendation therein set forth.

I would like to express my appreciation to all members of the House for the negotiations we had with the official representatives of the different parties in the House, for waiving the necessary notice required to bring this bill forward today so that it can receive third reading and be passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. member for—

An hon. Member: Coast Chilcotin.

Mr. Jack Pearsall (Coast Chilcotin): Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is west of the Rockies. I have found the same doubts as to who I am in the riding when men who have walked a very long distance, and look at me and ask, "Where have I seen you before"?

I should like to say that I endorse the comments made by my colleagues across the floor. We on this side of the House heartily endorse the amendment to this bill. In committee I stated that, as a former returning officer, I should like to recommend that all members pay attention to the bill and remember the text of it. If everyone knows what is in the bill there will be no room for mistakes in the next election.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise to extend my congratulations to a dozen or more new members whom I see in the House this afternoon and to remark that some of us had to wait years to see any private members' public bills get through. They are seeing such a bill get through today, and they have not yet sat here for two months.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I should like to indicate to hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), that as a result of a cabinet decision taken about three years ago there was a change in government policy with respect to private members' public bills. The record shows that since that cabinet decision was taken more private members' public bills and private members' motions have been passed than were passed in the previous ten years in this House. What we are trying to do now, Madam Speaker, is to examine each private members' public bill from the viewpoint of each department and try to give the benefit of doubt to members. We are trying to avoid bills being talked out as far as possible. The same applies to motions.

The draftsmanship of the private members' public bills presents a problem, however. In committee we are finding that if a bill comes back and is passed into law the draftsmanship might prevent it from being good law. We may have to work out a different system so that more time is made available, for discussion with the members. Hopefully the bills would be drafted more carefully, but perhaps many of the ideas that now show up in the form of a bill could be better discussed in the House of Commons in the form of a motion which would allow greater latitude. We may have to shift priorities.

As we start to look at these bills from the point of view of law, we find that they do not achieve their purpose, and are defective in other respects as well. There are dilemmas, and we may ask hon. members not to proceed with them as bills but, instead, send their subject matters to committees for discussion. As hon. members know, the power of committees to change bills is extremely limited by the material they are originally given, so we will have to overcome this by sending the subject material to committees for discussion.

I want to indicate to hon. members that we have changed the policy. We are trying to work out some agreements and trying to cope with the problem under existing Standing Orders. We hope a greater number of bills and motions will go to committee. There are attendant responsibilities upon members to canvass the ideas they are expounding in bills and motions. This could make our job and that of the committees much easier.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Madam Speaker, I agree with the parliamentary secretary. After 107 years it is time that more private members' ideas were debated and brought to a decision. The parliamentary secretary suggested one way that this could be done.

As a lawyer who has ascended to the respectability of being a member of the House of Commons and left the low degree of practice at the bar, I sometimes think it would be better if more bills were drafted by laymen. They might be more intelligible than those drafted now by members of the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it agreed to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The hour appointed for consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At 5.57 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH CORPORATION

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-14, to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and motion No. 2 (Mr. Gillespie).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. When the House rose at five o'clock it had been considering Bill C-14 at the report stage, motion No. 2 and the amendment thereto proposed by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont).

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I wish to comment on the amendment to the motion proposed by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont), and on what the minister said just before private members' hour. I was struck by how the minister distinguished between the directors of the bank and the president of the bank. The minister said that the president must divest himself of any holdings which might conflict with his function as president because he, the president, is to be a full-time president, whereas the directors of the bank, who will be part-time directors, will not be required to divest themselves of holdings which might involve them in conflict of interest. That, I think, was the purport of his suggestion.

Clearly, according to what the minister said, the president need not divest himself of all holdings, but only of those which may involve him in a conflict of interest. Therefore the distinction between the president and the directors of the bank is this: the president is to serve full time and the directors part time. Obviously, the president will not be at his job 24 hours a day, and for that reason he is to be allowed to keep some holding on the side, so long as they do not conflict with his activities as president.

The minister should examine the double standard contained in the bill as it seems to me that, under certain conditions, the president could be involved in a conflict of interest just as easily as any director of the bank. Obviously, the only real difference between the president and a director lies in the amount of time which each will spend serving the bank. Therefore the public interest is not served if we allow even the possibility of the directors being involved in the conflict of interest. I suggest, therefore, that the motion of the minister, as amended by that of the hon. member for Gatineau, is not nearly as satisfactory as the motion No. 3 on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens).

My next point concerns another failure in the motion before the House, as amended. The minister said that if the interests of a director or of his family are being discussed, that director must not participate in the deliberations of the board. The minister thinks that the public interest will be served if the director merely leaves the room and does not participate in the discussions. Surely he is not so naive as to think that because a director is not present, he will not influence the deliberations of his colleagues? It is quite possible for one who is not present to influence discussions and, in that way, to participate in them indirectly. That is something which cannot be monitored and may lead to a possible conflict of interest.

Second, one must bear in mind the psychology of groups. Groups, be they boards of directors of otherwise, function on the basis of co-operation and friendship. So, even if a director is absent and does not lobby directly for his interests, it is quite probable that directors remaining and taking part in the discussion may consider the interests of the absent director, may consider what may best serve his interests and what may aggrandize his wealth. I find it hard to believe that the remaining directors will be oblivious to these considerations, even though their ultimate decision may not favour the absent director.

Anyone who ignores these possibilities is ignorant of the way groups work. Clearly, the remaining colleagues of the absent director will be aware that his interests are at stake and these, unquestionably, will be considered, even though the result may not favour him. Unquestionably these factors will affect the deliberations of the board. For that reason I suggest that the amendment to the motion moved by the hon. member for Gatineau is inadequate, and motion No. 3, in the name of the hon. member for York-Simcoe, ought to be considered favourably.

● (2010)

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, our experience in dealing with the subject of conflict of interest in the House in the last two weeks in relation to other matters makes it clear there is a lack of appreciation by the government of what is really involved. In the particular case we are considering, that of a director of the bank or of a regional councillor, I do not think the minister's proposal comes close to meeting the situation.

It seems to me the thinking of the government is out of line with the thinking of the average Canadian on this subject. A great many people are already disturbed lest politicians and highly placed civil servants are taking advantage of the positions they hold. In these circumstances we ought to bend over backward to make sure that provisions against conflict of interest are sufficiently stringent. The proposal in motion No. 2 can only be described as milquetoast compared with the strong position taken in motion No. 3. The proposal put forward by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont) is so weak that I do not believe it would encourage the ordinary person in Canadian society to believe that situations in which conflict of interest could occur are being minimized.

In proposing motion No. 2 the government shows that it is not in touch with the times—that it is really trying to perpetuate the existence of a state of affairs which is unacceptable to the Canadian people. The need is for stringent legislation on this subject, and motion No. 2 simply does not meet it.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): In dealing with the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont) I would say, first of all, it is purely a drafting amendment and that no change in principle is contemplated. What I find most disturbing is the extremely confused interpretation the minister has placed on the differences between Motion No. 2 and Motion No. 3. For the minister to suggest that Motion No. 3 is not so far removed in its effect from Motion No. 2 is misleading.

Motion No. 3 makes it clear that the corporation shall not make loans etc. to directors or to members of the regional advisory councils. It is a direct prohibition. On the other hand the minister, presumably ever anxious to cater to the directors he intends to appoint, says in his motion that loans can be made to directors but they have to be made at board level, and that particulars of the loans are to be recorded in the annual report. We say that if such loans are to be made then the particulars should certainly be recorded and made known. But our position is this: why should the funds of the bank be used to support the business activities of directors or of those associated with directors?

If the House accepts the proposal put forward by the minister it means that any one of the directors, any one of the regional councillors, could borrow a million dollars from the bank at any rate agreed upon, and the only penalty would be that their names would be recorded in the annual report after the event.

I suggest that the minister attempted to confuse the issue. He pointed out that we do allow for a firm or corporation in which the beneficial interest of any person or persons, that is, a director or a member of a regional advisory council, is less than 50 per cent, to borrow in certain circumstances. We incorporated that provision deliberately because we did not wish to be unreasonable, and in an attempt to get government support for the motion. If the minister feels the 50 per cent figure is too high, let him say so. Nothing turns on it. If he thinks it should be 10 per cent, we would agree.

We are saying that only in certain cases would the type of approach favoured by the minister be permitted, that is, a loan to a corporation in which only 50 per cent or less is involved. Such a firm may wish to deal with the Industrial Development Bank, and in so doing we are stating it will have to declare its interest, refrain from voting at the board level, record the fact that a loan has been made, and that only in that situation should any loan be permitted.

The Industrial Development Bank has loaned out $247 million so far this year. It has almost $1 billion worth of loans on its books. If we pass this legislation the bank anticipates that it is going to increase this amount to a total of $2.2 billion. For the first time this corporation will be run by a board of directors, the majority of whom come from the private sector. Surely it would be the height of irresponsibility for this House to pass a bill which not only does not prohibit those directors from borrowing from this bank, but which sets up a framework within which, by going through the prescribed system, they can literally borrow from the bank to no limit, and in this way divert funds to their own personal benefit and away from the benefit of small business in this country.

Again I point out there is no definition given of "small business". We know that a certain portion of the loans granted by the Industrial Development Bank are over the $200,000 level. It could well be that the Industry, Trade and Commerce influence in running the new Federal Business Development Bank will ensure that loans made in future are much bigger and will total well over the $250 million mark already set by the Industrial Development Bank this year.

This is why I believe it is wrong for the minister to try to gloss over the distinction. The distinction between motion No. 3 and motion No. 2 is very simple. If hon. members vote for motion No. 3 they are voting for a prohibition against the directors of this new bank being authorized, and indeed entitled, to borrow from the bank of which they have the honour to be directors. If hon. members vote for government motion No. 2, what they are saying, in effect, is: "Go ahead, boys; if you are lucky enough to get a Liberal appointment to this board, then you can line up to get your loan. Naturally you will disclose your interest, and we would not like you to vote at board meetings, but in any event you will sure get your loan and, of course, you will have to show it in the annual report afterwards".

Surely it was not the intention, when the Industrial Development Bank concept was originally conceived, that directors would use it perhaps as their own private source of funding. I think it is time parliament showed the government that it in no way intends to accept such a misuse of public funds.

I hope that others will join in this debate, not only at this stage but at third reading, because I believe there is an important question of principle here. We must start drawing the line between conflicts of interest that can be tolerated and the point where parliament says it is not going to tolerate any further conflict of interest of the kind this government is indulging in. It is high time we showed the people of Canada that we believe we are acting responsibly, that we are not going to set up a bank with ten directors and perhaps 50 regional councillors who will have direct access to public funds in the bank for their personal benefit.

I repeat, the simple issue is this: if hon. members vote for motion No. 3 they are saying, "In no way will we tolerate this type of misuse of public funds". If they vote for the government motion No. 2 they are saying, "Go to it, boys; let us have more conflicts of interest. All you have to do is make sure you do it in the right way".

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to comment only briefly on this bill. Having listened to the comments of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), one begins to think that he is suffering from a Watergate mentality.

Yes, these men are respected in the community. They are gentlemen and ladies who will be picked to serve on the board of directors. One would think they could hardly wait to get their hands on all this money.

When this particular provision came before the committee, many of us on this side were apprehensive and thought there should be a tightening up. The minister was good enough to listen to the representations that were made and he gave us an undertaking that he would bring forth an amendment, which we should look at and see whether it met the kind of requirement that we had in mind, so there might be some form of restriction or control over loans which quite justifiably might be made to members of the board of directors or to regional councillors.

The rules in motion No. 2 are not easy to overcome, and I think the necessary protection will be provided in this bill. Unhappily, the hon. member for York-Simcoe has brought in an amendment which, so far as the bill is concerned, would put the members of the board of directors and of the regional councils into a kind of economic straitjacket.

Mr. Stevens: Nonsense.

Mr. Cullen: The same is the case with firms of which they are shareholders. This is precisely what would happen. It would put that kind of restriction on people who served on the board of directors or on a regional council. The impact that this would have on their particular business enterprise is just absurd to consider. So I think my words are correctly chosen: these people would be put in an economic straitjacket by the kind of wording suggested in motion No. 3.

I have not heard much in the way of substance in the hon. member's argument. We hear the raised voice, the suggestion that there is a condoning here of a conflict of interest. We see an illustration of phony anger across the floor, but a failure to recognize how difficult it would be to get a loan under motion No. 2 in some kind of underhand way, a loan to which they were not entitled. I think the amendment put forth by the minister, as he undertook to the committee to do, adequately protects the taxpaying public.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): It doesn't do a thing.

Mr. Cullen: The hon. member shouts from his seat that it does not do a thing. That is the kind of intervention we might expect. Obviously he does not even want to read the clause. The hon. member for York-Simcoe says that all one has to do is to get on the board of directors, and the gates are open and you can take out any kind of loan. With respect, that is Watergate thinking, and the businessmen of Canada do not operate in that way.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I find it interesting that the first member to make reference to Watergate is the hon. member who has just taken his seat. He suggests that the members on this side have Watergate on their minds. It is obvious that Watergate is on his mind.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Cullen) also said that these people are gentlemen, and that therefore we do not need—

Mr. Cullen: And ladies too.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Did the hon. member say that?

Mr. Cullen: Yes, I did.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So he said "gentlemen and ladies." Despite the newfangled approach, I would still prefer to say ladies and gentlemen. Therefore, said he, it is better to trust them than to make these ironclad arrangements.

I am going to refer to a conversation that took place between a minister and myself some time ago. It really does not matter when, because it is the kind of conversation that has taken place a good many times since I have been here. On this particular day there was a certain government document that some of us felt it was proper for at least one member of each opposition party to have in advance. For a while we were refused, with the statement that, "It is not that we don't trust you; you are gentlemen. We are doing this for your own protection". I think that is a good argument. I would say that in this matter my friends to the right, and they will probably be surprised to hear me support them for a change—

● (2030)

Mr. McKinley: Not at all; you are learning every day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I think my friends to the right have made a good case for the proposition that the provisions regarding conflict of interest should be precise and definite. I also feel that my friends to the right have been quite justified today in seeing in this, not just the issue as it pertains to this legislation, but the issue as it pertains to the question of conflict of interest as a whole.

I do not think one needs to go over this argument in great detail. The difference between Motion No. 2 and Motion No. 3 is quite clear. In Motion No. 3 there is an absolute prohibition against certain interested parties, or against certain people with whom there is a conflict of interest, getting loans from this bank. In Motion No. 2 this is simply made difficult. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, may say it is very difficult but, no matter how difficult it is, it is still possible. That is the simple difference between the two approaches, and I think the House should have the chance to decide between those two.

This leads me to express a concern about the announcement from the Chair earlier today as to how we would deal with Motion No. 2 and Motion No. 3. Maybe I am late in raising it, and perhaps I should have raised the point when His Honour made the announcement. As I recall what happened, he said there would be a vote on No. 2 and, if it was an affirmative vote, that would take care of the matter and there would then be no need to vote on No. 3.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) is calling for a vote on No. 3 rather than on No. 2.

If there is a vote on No. 2 and No. 2 carries, there will be no vote on No. 3. It seems to me this matter might be reconsidered by the Chair in that No. 3 goes further than No. 2. Surely the logical thing is to decide first if the position in No. 3 is what we want, then if the vote is yes that settles it. If the vote is no, it is then in order to retreat, as it were, to the position in No. 2. It seems to me that would be a much fairer way than that proposed earlier by the Chair, because if we vote on No. 2 and it is carried we get no chance in respect of the proposition in No. 3. I would hope, therefore, that that aspect of the matter might be reconsidered.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): During the dinner hour I examined the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont), and I cannot see that it is much more than cosmetic changes to Motion No. 2 put forward by the minister. The proposed changes do not really mean that much more, and like those who have spoken before me I want to repeat that there is a considerable difference between Motion No. 2 and Motion No. 3. I find it rather hard to swallow the line of reasoning put forward by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Cullen), that the directors and the regional advisory council members would be put in an economic straitjacket as far as Motion No. 3 is concerned.

Mr. Cullen: No, in so far as this bill is concerned.

Mr. Kempling: I think that is really stretching the point when you consider that the chartered banks in Canada have something like $60 billion available to them. Do you mean to tell me that some 50 people could not go to one of the chartered banks—

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I know my hon. friend is not deliberately misinterpreting, but I think he may have missed my words. I intended to say that they would be put into an economic straitjacket in so far as borrowing under this bill is concerned.

Mr. Kempling: And why should they not be?

Mr. Cullen: I am just making my point. My point was not that they would not be allowed to deal with other banks and financial institutions, but I said they would be in an economic straitjacket as far as this bill was concerned. They would not be able to make a loan or borrow money from this bank.

Mr. Kempling: The parliamentary secretary's point is somewhat clarified, but they do not have to take the jobs if they do not want to, Mr. Speaker. The choice is theirs. We are not creating a special situation just for the directors and the advisory council members. I still say that the chartered banks in this country have $60 billion to lend out, and they are quite free to go and apply for a loan from those banks if they desire. I just do not follow that line of reasoning at all.

I think the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) when he drafted Motion No. 3 was pretty straightforward and had his eyes wide open. He suggested, and I think we all generally agree, that if the minister would accept Motion No. 3, but felt that the 50 per cent as stated was too high, then it would be quite in order to reduce that. We had to strike a figure somewhere, and 50 per cent seemed like a reasonable round figure. I think we would be quite prepared to entertain the suggestion that we should reduce that to a lesser percentage.

The parliamentary secretary talked about a Watergate mentality. That is the furthest thing from our minds. We are talking about the integrity of this institution and the legislation we are passing. We had a considerable amount of difficulty, as the minister and the hon. member will appreciate, getting the proper information before the committee in order to make a thorough examination of the legislation.

I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he said these are really two separate issues. I certainly hope the Speaker will take notice of this and reconsider the matter in order that we might consider Motions Nos. 2 and 3 separately. When the Chair suggested that both motions should be considered at the same time I wonder if Mr. Speaker really understood the intent of Motion No. 3, because although they cover the same general area they are quite different in their approach.

I have not heard the minister, or any of the members on the other side explain why they think a director or a regional advisory councillor should be allowed to get a loan from this bank. As I understand the situation now, directors are not allowed to borrow from their banks.

The hon. member for Gatineau made some reference to the fact that directors of private banks or chartered banks could make loans from those banks but, as he well knows, this is covered by the bylaws of the banks. Just as with any corporation, they have bylaws that restrict the boards of directors.

I have not heard any argument or rhetoric from the other side which convinces me that the director or the regional advisory councillors should be allowed to borrow from this bank. What the bill and the minister's amendment say is that we are making loans available to them, and we have not heard why that should be so.

Surely to goodness we can find 200 people across this country who could be directors and regional advisory council members who do not require assistance from a Federal Business Development Bank. If they or any members of their families happen to be shareholders in a corporation we are not preventing them from borrowing from a bank, and I have not heard anyone on that side explain why these people should be allowed to borrow from this bank.

When I first read the bill this matter jumped right out at me. This hit me as something that should not be allowed. After all, the confidence and the integrity of the Federal Business Development Bank is most important, so far as I am concerned, and any suggestion that would erode its integrity, by insinuation that someone has an inside tract that someone else does not have, I think would be very detrimental. I should like to hear one of the hon. members opposite explain why he thinks a director or regional advisory council member should have the right to borrow from a bank.

● (2040)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The question is on the amendment in the name of the hon. member for Gatineau. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said amendment?

Mr. Stevens: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would appreciate it if the point raised originally by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), could be dealt with. I take it from your present proposal in voting on motion No. 2—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We are only voting on the amendment so far.

Mr. Stevens: All right, it is the amendment. I should like a ruling, if I may, as to whether once we pass the amendment to motion No. 2 we could proceed with motion No. 3 first, because I think the point is well taken that motion No. 3 is much broader and our inclination would be to support it for the reasons given. If that were defeated, we would then support motion No. 2 because it at least is better than the present provision in the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): What the House is considering now is an amendment to Motion No. 2. The Chair has noted the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), and all hon. members will be aware that the vote on motion No. 2 is deferred.

It will give the Chair an opportunity to consider the arguments made. Therefore it is not necessary, in order to make a decision on this point, to have a ruling at this time because of the deferral.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): All those in favour of the said amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): All those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): In my opinion the yeas have it.

Amendment (Mr. Clermont) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The question is on the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion as amended?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thought you just said this matter would be deferred. Did you mean that you would defer calling the vote or simply defer the recorded vote until a decision is made as to what is to happen in respect of motion No. 3?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The vote itself will be deferred under Standing Order 75(11), and before that vote is taken a decision will be rendered by the Chair.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): All those in favour of the said motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): All those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): In my opinion the yeas have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is a bit of confusion which could be cleared up if somehow we can be assured that there will be a chance to vote on motion No. 3. Somebody says that motion No. 2 has been carried. That is the whole point. We have been arguing that if motion No. 2 carried that would take care of motion No. 3, and that would be wrong. Your Honour said that question would be considered in the meantime. We cannot now have it said that motion No. 2 has been carried, for that would be the end of the story.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): I thank the hon. member. It was the understanding of the Chair that there would be a deferred vote on this. Obviously that was not the decision of the House this evening, and the Chair must abide by that. However, the view expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will of course be considered. In the meantime we have motion No. 4 and motion No. 1, which the House may now consider. I would seek the advice of the House as to which of these motions hon. Members wish to pursue now. Motion No. 1 is in the name of the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick), and motion No. 4 is in the name of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens).

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, could we request that there now be a vote on motion No. 3?

An hon. Member: No. It is carried.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the impression held by members in various parties on this side of the House was that the vote that was to be taken would not be a vote which would remove forever the possibility of voting on motion No. 3 as it appears on the order paper. We had the understanding from the Chair that the decision would be deferred as to the order in which we would deal with motions Nos. 2 and 3.

Mr. Beatty: On this point of order, Mr. Speaker, let me reiterate that it was quite clear to me, from what Your Honour said, that it was your intention to defer the vote on motion No. 2. It was our understanding we would have the opportunity then to have a vote on motion No. 3. Once having said you were deferring the vote on motion No. 2 you proceeded to call it, which came as a great surprise to us. I suggest it would be quite improper not to give the House an opportunity consciously to make a decision as to whether or not Motion No. 2 or motion No. 3 should be passed.

Mr. Stevens: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am sorry for the confusion on this point. I am particularly sorry our House leader is not here. We discussed this, and the consensus certainly at that time was that we would recommend that we proceed with the debate, and that hopefully we would proceed to all stages of the debate, but that if there were any votes they should be deferred to a later date. The initial suggestion was that they be deferred until Tuesday, but Tuesday being an opposition day we thought possibly it would have to be Wednesday. Unfortunately our House leader is not here, but I would recommend that you at least consider this suggestion.

An hon. Member: You have already voted.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): I think that the House finds itself in this difficulty because the opportunity to defer the vote, which was the understanding mentioned by the hon. member for York-Simcoe, was missed because the required number of members did not rise in their places, which would have allowed the Chair to postpone the vote according to Standing Order 75(11).

One way in which we can resolve the difficulty is, by unanimous consent, calling the question again on motion No. 2 and have members rise, and then we can defer the vote until the required time. If that were agreed then there still would be an opportunity for the Chair to take into consideration the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me there is confusion and, with respect, I think it is in your mind as well, between taking a vote and having a recorded vote. If you put the question and call for the yeas and nays—

An hon. Member: He did.

● (2050)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): All right, when Your Honour puts the question and calls for the yeas and nays and you declare the motion carried, that is the vote. To say that it is being put off until Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday is merely deferring the formality of the recorded division. My complaint is that the taking of the vote on motion No. 2, by virtue of the announcement made earlier today from the Chair by His Honour, Mr. Speaker, wipes out any possibility of voting on motion No. 3. In my view what should have been deferred was the taking of the vote the way we took it. When you say that the recorded division is being put off, that does not put off the vote. The vote has already been taken on motion No. 2 and has been carried, and when you couple that with Mr. Speaker's announcement, the vote on motion No. 2 takes care of No. 3, and No. 3 has had it.

I think the whole procedure should be reviewed by Your Honour at your next morning prayer meeting to see if you cannot sort it out again.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we could have some indication from the acting house leader as to whether it is the intention to defer whatever the vote is until Wednesday, on the understanding that the debate will be completed as quickly as possible either tonight or tomorrow.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I would like to get some clarification with regard to the proposal respecting a deferred vote. It is not clear to me how that deferred vote would be taken. What is the proposal of the opposition, or of the Chair, in regard to the order in which the votes would be taken and, if so, when, and what does the phrase "deferred vote" mean? I would appreciate, as I am sure other members of the House would, a clarification of some of these terms.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, pardon me for getting up so often, but what I asked for when I raised the point some time ago was not the mere deferment of the mechanics of a recorded vote until some other day but that the vote on motion No. 3 be called before the vote on No. 2. I gave my reasons, and the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) repeated them. Motion No. 3 is broader, and it seems to me that we should decide whether we go that far first. If, instead, we decide on the narrower proposition in motion No. 2, that ends the story. It seems to me that what is called for is a review of Mr. Speaker's announcement this afternoon that the vote would come first on motion No. 2 and an affirmative vote on it would settle motion No. 3. I think that the order should be reversed, that the vote on motion No. 3 should be taken first.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Because I believe in doing things logically. An affirmative vote on motion No. 3 would adopt the wider proposition. If it were defeated, it would be still open to us to slip back to motion No. 2. But if motion No. 2 is carried, there is no opportunity to go on to motion No. 3. I suggest that the House agree to let the whole matter stand until Mr. Speaker, and the rest of those in the chair and at the table, can review the matter at one of their morning sessions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): I thank hon. members for their contribution to the present dilemna in which we find ourselves. The Chair will make a suggestion to the House in order that we may proceed with the business before us this evening, and that is that, by unanimous consent, the vote on motion No. 2 be deemed not to have been put, and that we proceed with the debate immediately on motion No. 3. If the House would agree to that, then we would be able to proceed with our business this evening in a straightforward way.

Mr. Gillespie: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to clarify this matter of the debate on motion No. 3, because it was my impression that the House has been debating both motions Nos. 2 and 3 since we met this afternoon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is the order of voting that is at stake.

Mr. Gillespie: We have come now to the point where we are ready to proceed to other motions, and of course I would seek your guidance as to whether it would be motion No. 1 or No. 4. But so far as the debate is concerned, I understand that we have completed the debate on both earlier motions. The confusion, as I understand it, revolves around whether or not there was to be a deferred vote, or whether in fact a vote has occurred which has been an affirmative vote in favour of motion No. 2. I am anxious to co-operate with the House and to proceed with this bill as, I am sure, are members of the House. I hope it might be possible to reach agreement to conclude the debate on both motion No. 1 and motion No. 4 this evening, and then have a deferred vote at whatever time Your Honour feels is appropriate. I think that the House leaders and yourself have agreed.

The point I want to make is that this is an important bill. The whole question of extending loans to small businesses in Canada has been seriously slowed down awaiting the provisions in the bill, and I hope that all members in the House can join in agreeing this evening to an expeditious completion of the bill on the report stage. On that basis I would be prepared to go ahead.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, further to the same point of order that the acting House leader has brought up. I would ask whether the acting House leader would agree that we not proceed with third reading until the deferred vote that he has mentioned can be held on the report stage. If we could have that assurance, I think we could proceed with that kind of arrangement.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, surely the answer to that point is obvious. We cannot proceed to third reading until the report stage is over.

Mr. McKinley: But I am not sure the minister knows it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment on something the minister said a moment ago. In my view he was right, up to the point where he said that the debate on motions Nos. 2 and 3 is now concluded. But then he got off base a bit when he said that the confusion is about the deferred vote but on which motion to vote on first. I thought that Your Honour had that straightened out a moment ago when you suggested we vote first on motion No. 3. If it carries, then that is the last vote, but if it is defeated, then you can put motion No. 2. I think Your Honour was right a few moments ago.

● (2100)

Mr. McKinley: That does not answer my question.

Mr. Gillespie: In answer to the acting House leader's question to me, Mr. Speaker, I would agree that the vote on the motion take place, of course, at the report stage before we move on to third reading. I would suggest that the timing of the deferred vote be a matter of discussion between House leaders, but that the deferred vote should take place on each of those motions at the same time. I am not expressing any opinion as to which should come first. That opinion has been asked of the Chair, and it is something on which all members of the House would look to the Chair for guidance.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, in view of what the acting government House leader has said, we were wondering whether it would be possible to have these deferred votes next Tuesday, immediately following orders of the day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is an opposition day.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, for our side I say yes.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, now that there is some agreement as to how to proceed, perhaps it might be made an order of the House so that on Tuesday the vote could be taken automatically on all four motions. This might save some trouble.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just a minute, Mr. Speaker. My friends of the Social Credit Party are justifiably muttering that they do not want time taken out of their opposition day for three or four recorded votes.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, in a spirit of co-operation may I suggest that perhaps we could do it Wednesday after orders of the day.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Reid: Could we have a House order, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The House has heard the suggestion. By unanimous consent the vote on motion No. 2 is deemed not to have been taken. Motion No. 2 stands. The question would be put on motion No. 3 and deferred. Is it so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Reid: Could I make that clear, Mr. Speaker, that the votes on all four motions will be taken on Wednesday after orders of the day. Is that the understanding?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is that agreed?

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, we would agree provided we stay on this item until report stage is concluded.

Mr. Gillespie: Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, I thought we had reached agreement on the basis that we would complete debate on the motions this evening and had agreed to the deferred vote. We have already finished the debate on motions Nos. 2 and 3, and the suggestion I made was that we conclude debate on the remaining motions this evening and have a deferred vote at a later date.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that there was no agreement that two motions would be dealt with in the next 55 minutes. It may take an hour of tomorrow's time, or two hours, or an hour and a half. But it would be done before Wednesday. There is no doubt about that. However, we did not say we were going to be limited to 55 minutes. We have taken up 30 minutes discussing this procedural problem tonight. I do not think there was any agreement of the House that we would limit ourselves to 55 minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is it agreed that the House now proceed to consideration of motion No. 4?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thought you were going to put the vote on motion No. 3 so that we could defer it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): All those in favour of the said motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75 the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, in the discussions that have taken place as to the disposition of the report stage it was my understanding that the votes on all the motions would be taken Wednesday after orders of the day.

Some hon. Members: That is right.

Mr. Reid: I wonder if it might be possible to consider two alternatives to the question of that timing, first, that we might sit for an extra hour this evening if there was agreement to conclude the motion. That would provide two hours for discussion of the motions. Alternatively, perhaps we could agree to provide another hour or two hours out of tomorrow's time and conclude them that way.

An hon. Member: Right after question period.

Mr. Reid: It really does not matter to us when it is. There is a program that is expected to be completed tomorrow, and whether we take the time tomorrow or tonight does not seem to matter.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. parliamentary secretary's concern but we do not believe it will be necessary to sit extra hours tonight to conclude discussion on this item. If we do not finish tonight perhaps an hour or so tomorrow would be sufficient, unless other parties disagree with that. I cannot speak for other parties.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe) moved:

That Bill C-14, An act to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank, be amended by numbering clause 48 as sub-clause 48(1) and by adding next following line 26 on page 20, the following:

"(2) The statement of accounts that the Corporation is required to include in its annual report under the Financial Administration Act shall disclose the five highest salary or remuneration ranges in the pay and classification structure of the Corporation and the name and official job description of each officer or employee within each such range, other than a person selected from the public service of Canada under paragraph 5(b), during the year to which the statement relates."

He said: Mr. Speaker, we propose this amendment as a result of the rather surprising fact that, in committee, we were denied the right to learn the salaries of the five senior officers of the Industrial Development Bank. Granted we know that the Governor of the Bank of Canada, who is also president of the Industrial Development Bank, earns $75,000 a year. That is public knowledge. When we asked about the salaries of the other senior officials of the Industrial Development Bank we were denied that information.

During questioning in committee the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) asked us to show a precedent where senior officers of a Crown corporation were required to disclose their salaries. Such precedent was not produced at that meeting. At a subsequent meeting dealing with the Export Development Corporation, however, it was pointed out that in the corporation's annual report for 1973 in Note 9 to the financial statement, the aggregate of salaries of the officers of the Export Development Corporation was revealed.

Consequently we are in the position that the minister denied the right of the committee to know the salary levels of senior executives of the bank, on grounds that there is no precedent for such information to be divulged, without realizing that a Crown corporation which answers to him is quite prepared to reveal the aggregate of executive salaries. Surely when we are dealing with taxpayers' money, the taxpayers should be entitled to full disclosure of such relevant information. The minister is not justified in refusing to provide this information.

The government, along with provincial governments, has insisted on private corporations making this type of knowledge available to shareholders. Surely, as all the people of Canada are shareholders of our Crown corporations, it is not unreasonable to ask those Crown corporations to make that knowledge available to their shareholders, the people of Canada.

What does the law say about private corporations? Part I of the Canada Corporations Act requires the following information to be made available:

... the aggregate remuneration paid by the company during its last financial year, if completed at least three months prior to the offer ...

That refers to an offer of takeover:

... and estimated to be paid or payable during the current financial year ... to directors and (separately stated) to officers who individually have received or may be entitled to receive remuneration in excess of ten thousand dollars per annum;

Our law says that private Canadian corporations must make such information available.

Ontario Securities Act regulations say that remuneration of directors and senior officers shall be furnished, if possible in tabular form. That information is to include:

The amount of the aggregate direct remuneration paid or payable by the issuer ...

That language refers to the company issuing the security:

... and its subsidiaries, whose financial statements are consolidated with those of the issuer, to the directors and senior officers of the issuer, and as a separate amount the aggregate direct remuneration paid or payable to such directors and senior officers by the subsidiaries of the issuer whose financial statements are not consolidated with those of the issuer, such aggregate amounts to be furnished for the last completed financial year of the issuer and as separate amounts for the period from the last completed financial year to a date within 30 days of the date of the preliminary prospectus or the date of the prospectus filed under section 64, as the case may be.

I could cite other examples to establish the principle that a company must reveal the salary levels of its senior personnel. Yet, strangely, with respect to a company which is answerable to the public, namely, a Crown corporation, there is no such provision.

If there had been frank disclosure in committee, motion No. 4 would not have been necessary. As it is, we see no alternative but to propose motion No. 4, to ensure that the salary ranges of top officials working for the Federal Business Development Bank will be made public knowledge.

It was suggested in committee that motion No. 4 is not necessary, and that what we seek can be accomplished by an amendment to the Financial Administration Act. Mr. Speaker, it is not within the power of the opposition to amend the Financial Administration Act; therefore we have no alternative but to propose motion No. 4.

Let me add something else. Any member of this House may phone Washington and ask what is the salary of the senior officers of any state-owned corporation in the United States. That information will be given to you over the telephone. Such information is regarded as public knowledge. I have done this myself. I telephoned and asked what is the salary of the chairman of the Export Import Bank, and the public relations person I was speaking to said that it is $40,000. I then asked for the breakdown of the salaries of the next four senior officers of the Export Import Bank, a state corporation comparable to a Crown corporation in Canada, and was told that they each earn $38,000, and that there is no expense allowance. Mr. Kissinger's salary was given to me. You can ask for the salary of any government official in the United States. I was told such information is available as a matter of right to anyone who wants it. Yet, in Canada a secretive, arrogant, ruthless government denies such knowledge to members of the opposition and to the people of Canada. So we are forced to draw this matter to the attention of the public.

I ask all hon. members to support motion No. 4, so that we may be certain that this type of knowledge will not be kept secret in future. Why should it be secret? Public service salaries are public knowledge. We are not asking what the actual salaries of the officers of the bank are to be; we are asking, on behalf of the Canadian people, what is to be the salary range of the five senior executives of the proposed bank. Why should there not be this type of open disclosure? I will be dismayed if the government does not support this amendment.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I must endorse as strongly as I can what the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) has just said. We wasted three one-and-a-half-hour sittings of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs in trying to obtain the sort of information which must be divulged by private companies under the Canada Corporation Act. Our requests were refused, even though such information must be provided by the private sector. Yet here we are dealing with a Crown corporation and I, and other members of that committee, cannot understand why this information was refused.

We merely asked for the salary ranges of the five most senior officers. That information could have been provided; the exact dollars and cents figures may not have been necessary. I say that the government's refusal in this area, its attempt to keep certain information secret, indicates that it is out of touch with what the public of Canada expects.

Something happened in the committee which has not been made generally known. After we finished dealing with Bill C-14, we considered Bill C-9, the Export Development Act. An official of the Crown corporation concerned volunteered to make the sort of disclosure for which we are asking at present. When asked why, he said, "It is just good accounting practice; private corporations must do it, and I believe we should be required to do it as well."

That was an honest statement made by the President of the Export Development Bank, and he showed the direction in which we should go. I think it was a good statement and I can only hope the minister will support the amendment, or make some arrangement for disclosure each year in the annual report. This is the direction in which society should be going, and the bill before us should at least reflect what is being done by the Export Development Bank.

Mr. Beatty: If the minister would like to make a comment I would be delighted to let him speak first.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I should like to clarify a number of points. First, the amendment does recognize the relevance and jurisdiction of the Financial Administration Act. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) made that clear. He said that the statement the corporation was required to include in its annual report under the Financial Administration Act should disclose the higher salaries of remuneration ranges, and so on. Clearly he drew attention to the relevance and jurisidiction of the Financial Administration Act in connection with this measure.

The second point I wish to make is that the Financial Administration Act does not require disclosure. If parliament wishes to amend the Financial Administration Act with respect to questions of disclosure, that is a separate matter and one which should be dealt with on its own merits, particularly since I think all members would be concerned that disclosure provisions should apply uniformly. That is beyond our scope at the present time in dealing with this bill.

The suggestion is made from time to time that information as to salary ranges should be furnished under the Financial Administration Act with respect to the operations of the Industrial Development Bank or the FBDB in much the same way as information regarding ranges of salaries in the public service is available. But as was pointed out in evidence by the general manager before the committee, the administration of that Crown corporation is not arranged in the same way as it is in the public service, so it is not possible to classify income by salary ranges.

The last speaker was dealing with the practice of the Export Development Corporation in providing information about the aggregate salaries paid to its officers. This information is appended in a note to the financial statement. I find this is a useful practice. I do not quarrel with the hon. member's suggestion in any way. I will simply say that I, for one, as the minister through whom the new bank would report to parliament, would hope and expect that the new board of directors would adopt the practice which the Export Development Corporation has adopted with regard to the disclosure of aggregate salaries. I do not think I would be satisfied with the top five; it might make a lot more sense and be a lot more helpful if it were to include the top ten salaries. I hope this expression of opinion might meet the point raised by hon. members opposite, and if this were considered a reasonable way of dealing with the question we might move on to the next item.

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I personally am not satisfied to accept a simple assurance from the minister that he intends to encourage the new corporation to act in this way. Ministers come and go, but the principle here is one which I feel should extend beyond the term of office of a particular minister. If the minister were willing to give an assurance to the House that the government would make appropriate amendments to the Financial Administration Act, I would be inclined not to support the motion. I am disposed to accept the minister's contention that if the principle involved here is to be asserted, this should be done on a global scale. However, in the absence of an undertaking to enforce this principle generally in law I believe a precedent should be set here. The House is entitled to know what use is to be made of public funds.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) has suggested this is yet another example of the government setting a double standard in its procedures—one for private corporations and another for public corporations. As a citizen and as a taxpayer I am less concerned about the behaviour of private corporations than I am about the behaviour of public corporations.

If an example of behaviour is to be set, the standard governing the public sector should be the higher one—we should make sure that those in the public sector go the second half mile. There is no secrecy about this information in the United States. Citizens of that country are allowed access to this kind of information if they are interested in it.

I have no compelling passion to learn the salaries of the top five officials in the Business Development Bank. What is of greater interest to me is the principle of openness, the right of the people to know how their money is being spent. The onus is upon the government, upon those who would argue that the policy of openness should not be followed, to defend its actions. I urge hon. members to support the motion proposed by my hon. friend from York-Simcoe.

● (2130)

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on motion No. 4. I must say I found it rather difficult to follow the minister's comments on this amendment. I do not know whether he had prepared anything or whether he made up his speech on the spur of the moment but, as I say, I found him difficult to follow. As I understood him he was saying that he would like to see this sort of disclosure even by the top ten officials of the Federal Business Development Bank.

I find some sympathy for the position that the exact amount should be disclosed, since there is no such thing as a range of salaries. I think a good argument can be made for saying that this disclosure might be prejudicial when you are endeavouring to secure top level officials with entrepreneurial experience for this bank, but on balance I think the aggregate of the salaries paid would suffice.

After all, Mr. Speaker, if a firm tries to secure a loan from the Industrial Development Bank, one of the requirements of the IDB is that the aggregate salaries of the top officials must be disclosed by the auditor in the financial statement of the company. Many times they restrict the top limit to a certain figure, and the auditor is required to set it out in the statement.

With regard to the minister's remarks about the Financial Administration Act, if the minister gave us a commitment that he would recommend to his colleagues—he is the only one who can do this, we cannot—that the act be amended to provide for this kind of disclosure, then it would find a good deal of sympathy and support among the members on this side of the House.

We are not in any way trying to make things difficult for this new venture. Obviously we want to see it get the best calibre of person available in the country today. But by the same token we think the minister has a particular responsibility for seeing to it that the operations of the bank are open and above reproach.

In view of other remarks made today about disclosure and conflict of interest, which I will not repeat, I think it is incumbent upon the minister to see that the relevant information is made available in the annual report of the new bank. I do not think it is enough for him to say that he would hope that the directors, in their wisdom, would include this sort of information in the annual report; there must be some section of a statute requiring that this must be done, so that as ministers and directors change, and as government goes on, this reporting process is not lost.

I hope that the minister will respond to these remarks and will clarify what he said earlier, because he did leave a little confusion in my mind, and I think in the minds of many other members of the House as well.

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I was interested to hear the remarks of the minister because I was hoping he would indicate to the House some reasons, based either on principle or on practicality, in his experience as the responsible minister for this bank, why we should not adopt the motion proposed by my colleague from York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). It is an amendment that is founded upon the principle of doing public business and spending public money in a way that the public can see; it is founded on the principle of openness.

I was a little surprised by the minister's suggestion that he would prefer disclosure of the salaries of the ten top officials, and as a result of preferring this disclosure by the ten top officials, he would be prepared to vote against disclosure by the top five. That seems to me to involve some rather roundabout logic.

I must also say in passing that if the minister expects members, particularly those of us on this side of the House who are worried about the principle of openness, to accept his word that he personally would encourage his officials to be open in this regard, I think he will have to explain to the House why that instruction was not given during the long sessions of the standing committee, where for roughly three meetings this information was sought but refused Against that background I do not think the minister can expect us simply to accept his undertaking that he will encourage disclosure voluntarily, while at the same time he proposes to vote against the requirement by law of this kind of disclosure.

The minister made reference to the Financial Administration Act, and indicated that he would like to delay the kind of change that is being proposed by the hon. member for York-Simcoe until there has been a general change in the over-all provisions of the Financial Administration Act.

I think all of us tonight are aware of the backlog of legislation that there always is in this House, and surely no realist would assume that anything like short order amendments to the Financial Administration Act would be brought before the House. If the minister is asking us to wait until that act is brought to this House in amended form before making this necessary democratic change, then in effect he is asking us to wait forever, and those of us on this side of the House are not prepared to do this.

Dealing still with the Financial Administration Act, I think it is quite clear that, whatever that act provides, it is no obstacle to our acting here tonight on the amendment to this bill requiring the kind of disclosure proposed in respect of the five senior officials of this particular agency. At the moment there is no such prohibition at all.

The alternative of waiting until there is a general amendment to that act will not achieve the goal set forth in the hon. member's amendment. Either we do it now and guarantee public access to public information about public officials spending public money, or we will not do it at all. It is simply no answer to say that there is some other way, either by making a subsequent amendment or by fulfilling the hope of the minister of doing what the amendment proposes to do. It appears from the silence of the minister that there is no reason in principle why the amendment should not be accepted and the salaries of these particular five officials disclosed. As I say, we cannot wait for amendments to another act to bring this about.

I took a note of what the minister said, and I think he said that he personally believed it would be useful to follow this practice. I come back to the fact that it has not been followed, even under questioning, when it was the expressed wish of the elected members of the House of Commons serving in the recent committee to have this practice followed.

More particularly, I would question the minister on his logic. If he believes that it would be a useful practice to follow, then why does he decline to so enact? Why does he decline to make it a requirement? What is the reason for his refusal to give legal effect to what he says he personally believes would be a good thing to do? What is going on? Why is he not prepared to support this very sensible amendment, which is founded on the principle of public access to public information, and openness on the part of the government?

I have to express a certain skepticism, that I think is common on this side of the House, about the amount of openness we can expect from the government as long as that is simply a matter of government will, and as long as it is something the government can voluntarily do rather than being required to do.

All of us have frequently had occasion to seek information, the provision of which would not violate the security of the country, and would not be telling any basic or damning secret, but would simply provide the public of Canada with information that we have a right to but have been denied.

My colleague points out that this has happened most recently in respect of guidelines concerning ministers and conflict of interest, but it goes back to the LIP program, which is a matter of daily question in this House, to the Opportunities for Youth Program, and back into virtually any field you might wish to raise.

I see the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) perk his head up at the mention of the Opportunities for Youth Program, which was shifted out of his jurisdiction a year ago. I think the government knows that this is the case, and on its past record members have no reason at all to expect that from a simple expression of hope things will be made public. We know very well that the only way public information becomes public is when the law requires it to become public. That is what we are trying to do. That is what the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) is trying to do by this eminently sensible and highly progressive amendment.

As one of my colleagues has indicated, this is an amendment very much more in tune with current public demand for openness than is the action of the government which, for some reason or other the minister will not explain, is insisting on secrecy regarding the payment of public funds to officials of this agency.

I think I have made the case I wanted to make, but I would ask the minister or any of his assistants or supporters to tell us if there are reasons that we should not adopt this amendment. If there are reasons, tell us what they are. Until someone speaks up and tells us what these reasons are we, and the people of Canada, must naturally assume that the government's only reason is that it wants to keep this matter secret, and that is not an adequate reason to those of us on this side of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to make it abundantly clear that it is the principle in this amendment that we are seeking to establish. If the minister feels that an amendment is necessary in respect of the salaries only for the top five, that is acceptable. If he wishes to have specific salaries set out as opposed to a range of salaries, that too is acceptable.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think I should point out to the hon. member that he is more or less repeating part of the speech he has already made. I think we have now come to the point, the minister having already spoken, where the House has to make a decision, unless other hon. members wish to speak. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 4 in the name of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion? All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This vote stands deferred until Wednesday next after the orders of the day are called, and it will follow the votes on Motions Nos. 1, 3, and 2, also to be taken at that time.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been some consultations, and perhaps Your Honour might wish to have an order of the House, by consent, that the votes will take place on these motions on Wednesday next after orders of the day are called, it being understood that we will take tomorrow to complete the consideration of the remaining amendments at the report stage.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have agreed to that already, or I thought we had agreed to it, but I am happy to agree to it again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair was aware of an order that has been agreed upon. Unless I did not catch the point raised by the hon. parliamentary secretary, it is my understanding that an order was already made that all these deferred votes will be called after calling of orders of the day next Wednesday, in the following order: Motion No. 1, followed by Motion No. 3, Motion No. 2 and Motion No. 4. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think at this time, before the House continues its consideration of the report stage of Bill C-14, I might put some comments on the record.

Hon. members are aware of the position taken this afternoon by Mr. Speaker in considering a previous motion that appeared on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick). That amendment was to the definition clause, and the Speaker's reservations were mainly on two grounds.

I make this point now in order to clarify that in accepting the present amendment proposed by the hon. member I do not in any way intend to go contrary to the previous position taken by Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker said he had some reservations about the amendment on two grounds. He suggested first that it was contrary to the basic principle of the bill, and that the interpretation clause should not be used to enlarge on the scope of the bill in the way attempted by this amendment. He added that this was not the basic nature of a definition section, and that this would go far beyond the scope of an interpretation clause, usually being a simple definition clause as opposed to a substantive clause.

On the other hand, having listened to the remarks and the points made by hon. members, and particularly the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), Mr. Speaker indicated his desire to take into account those representations, and indicated that he did not want to deprive any member of the opportunity of discussing the important point in this proposed amendment, which was defective mainly because it was attached to the interpretation clause.

I feel it would be very difficult for me to question the amendment put before the House at this time by the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton with the knowledge that Mr. Speaker, in his conclusion, said that if the House would give consent to the tabling of an amendment at eight o'clock he felt that might take the House out of the then rather awkward procedural position. Although I do not wish really to invite a debate on the procedural acceptability of the amendment, some hon. members might wish to suggest there is a substantive factor in it. However, on account of everything that was said by Mr. Speaker, I feel I should give consent to the hon. member to present his motion. Therefore I would be willing at this time to put the amendment unless there are strong objections. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton) moved: That Bill C-14, an Act to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank, be amended in sub-clause 4(1) by deleting line 42 on page 2, and substituting the following:

"going, provided however that such assistance as authorized shall only be given in the case of a business enterprise which is carried on in Canada by

(a) a person who is

(i) a Canadian citizen,

(ii) a landed immigrant within the meaning of the Immigration Act ordinarily resident in Canada other than a landed immigrant who has been eligible to apply for Canadian citizenship for more than one year, or

(iii) a British subject who has not ceased to be ordinarily resident in Canada since the twenty-fifth day of June, 1967, or

(b) a corporation incorporated in Canada with or without share capital, a co-operative or partnership, that is not less than fifty-one per cent beneficially owned, directly or indirectly, by a person or persons described in paragraph (a);"

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, are copies of this new motion available?

Mr. Dick: Yes. This afternoon, as it had been suggested by Mr. Speaker that I remove the amendment from the interpretation clause and perhaps find another place in the bill in which it could be inserted I consulted a number of experienced and expert officers and members of parliament. We found that it could be placed in subclause 4. As a result of that there has been a change of wording at the end of subclause 4, and the wording is then included completely as it is recorded here in the notice of motion pursuant to Standing Order 75(5).

The printing office has been good enough to run off 100 or so copies which I have available for distribution to members. I appreciate their co-operation and unanimous consent. I apologize that I have copies only in English, but if members would like to read the French version in the order paper they will find it is substantially the same other than a few words. I presume it will appear in the translated form tomorrow, so that members will be able to read it in both official languages.

I would be prepared to begin my remarks at this time, Mr. Speaker, but I note it is two minutes before ten o'clock. I would probably require 20 minutes or so for my comments. I wonder if I might call it ten o'clock now and begin my comments tomorrow, if this is the wish of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House agree to call it ten o'clock and allow the hon. member to make his presentation tomorrow when we return to this order of business?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

SOCIAL SECURITY—GOVERNMENT INTENTION WITH REGARD TO ECONOMIC POSITION OF THOSE OVER SIXTY-FIVE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—pardonnez-moi, Madame le président. Madam Speaker, on Tuesday, November 19, the day after the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) presented his budget, I put a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), which is recorded at page 1442 of Hansard. My question was as follows:

Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, may I direct my question to the Prime Minister. Now that the Minister of Finance has taken steps to improve the position of the 40 per cent of Canadians 65 years of age and over who have other income, what steps does the government propose to take to provide a meaningful improvement in the economic position of the 50 to 60 per cent of Canadians over 65 who rely exclusively on old age security and the guaranteed income supplement and who already pay no income tax?

The initial reply of the Prime Minister was to remind me that the reason the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) was not present that day was because he was at a meeting with provincial welfare ministers discussing the whole problem of a policy paper on social security published a year and a half ago.

[Mr. Dick.]

At that point I put to the Prime Minister this supplementary question:

Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that on more than one occasion the Minister of National Health and Welfare has said that from time to time there have to be adjustments in the basic rate of old age security, may I ask whether consideration is being given to increasing that basic rate during this session?

Then the entry in Hansard reads as follows:

MR. TRUDEAU: No, Mr. Speaker.

It is that "No" which prompted me to file this question for an adjournment debate.

● (2200)

I appreciate the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is here tonight to give me his answer, which I hope will be better than the one I received from the Prime Minister. I hope I can say that the Minister of National Health and Welfare and I have a good deal of respect for each other, and each of us appreciates the concern of the other about the position of senior citizens. We agree on a good many things, but there is one point on which we have differed.

I am an unrepentant advocate of universal old age pensions. I believe that there should be a substantial basic rate paid to everyone, and I would like to see us get back to there being no means test on any portion of the old age pension. I think it is fair to say that the Minister of National Health and Welfare accepts the proposition of a basic old age pension on a universal plan up to a certain point, but he says there is a point at which the government has to be selective. By that he means there comes a point when any additional moneys that are available have to be used to increase the pensions of those who have less than others may have.

What annoys me about the position taken by the Minister of Finance in his budget is that this government is practising the principle of selectivity in reverse. What the government has done has been to provide an improvement in the economic position of Canadians, 65 years of age and over, who are already at the top. It has given something to those who already have something more, and nothing to those who have only the old age security and guaranteed income supplement on which to rely.

The percentages that were in my question are based on the fact that about 55 per cent to 60 per cent of Canadians 65 years of age and over receive not only old age security but some or all of the guaranteed income supplement. This means that their income levels are such that they are paying no income tax now. The improvements that the Minister of Finance has made, welcome as they are, apply therefore only to the 40 per cent—not a round figure but it is pretty close—of Canadians 65 years of age and over who have income other than old age security and any portion of the guaranteed income supplement. They will receive benefits from the budget, some this year, more next year if they live through 1975. There are the provisions for the first $1,000 private pension money to be exempt from income tax and for a $1,000 of interest income to be exempt from tax.

There is also the provision whereby, in the case of a married couple if only one is the taxpayer, that one can claim the age exemptions of both, and, as the Minister of Finance pointed out, there are certain cases where the total exemption could be $8,000. That is fine for couples 65 years of age and over who have $8,000 or more, but no one knows better than the minister that the number of senior citizens who have $8,000 or more income a year is not more than 40 per cent; indeed it is quite a bit below 40 per cent of Canadians 65 and over.

So I put it to my good friend, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and my fellow worker in the field of trying to do something for senior citizens: is he not ashamed of the fact that his government is practising selectivity in reverse? Does he not think that it is now time to do something for the 55 per cent to 60 per cent of Canadians who get no benefit from the budget? Is it not time to extend still further the principle of universality and provide now not just for the quarterly cost of living escalation of pensions but for a substantial increase in the basic amount of the old age security pension?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, first of all I wish to thank the hon. member for his kind words. I will not elaborate further on my own respect for his views and his abilities because of my fear that after ten o'clock this House might turn into a mutual admiration society.

He has mentioned areas of disagreement in terms of policies in this field, particularly on the question of universality versus selectivity. It is indeed my considered view that while we should retain the element of universality in old age pensions with basic old age pensions, we also must have a supplement which will help those people who really need to be helped. I am supported in this respect by all provincial governments in the practice they have followed, including governments belonging to the party of my hon. friend. Not one single NDP government at the provincial level has increased the basic old age pension, while some of them have not hesitated to increase the supplement. I can understand that rationale very well.

The hon. member also talks about means tests. I wish I could convince him that what we are talking about here is an income test. I think he has been used to the criteria in the previous legislation, but we have moved to an income test and there is a significant difference between them. I suspect we will have an opportunity to discuss that later.

It is true that the last budget helped senior citizens, particularly those over the guaranteed income supplement rate. I must stress, however, that senior citizens with marginal incomes apart from what they could get if they are on a partial guaranteed income supplement, will also benefit from the provisions contained in the budget. This should not be ignored particularly in relation to the $1,000 exemption for senior citizens on private pension plans.

The hon. member argues that we should now add to the basic and guaranteed income supplement. I can only tell him that we have made a lot of progress in the last three years. I have no time tonight to go over that, but I will indicate that we will again have escalation on January 1 which will bring the OAS/GIS benefits to over $200 a month.

After Christmas I hope to introduce a bill that will provide income tested benefits to spouses between ages 60 and 65. So we are making progress, though maybe not as fast as the hon. member would wish. I understand his eagerness; he has been an eager beaver, if I may say so, in this area for many, many years and has been prodding successive governments in this field. I respect his views but I am telling him we are making progress.

HOUSING—REQUEST FOR FUNDS FOR LOW RENTAL HOUSING
